Now they stood face to face at an extremely close distance. The stern structure of the Vanished pushed right into the bridge. Duncan stood only a few steps away from the captain's chair of the Sea Mist.

For a moment, it felt as if the whole world went quiet.

A low, majestic voice reached everyone's ears: "I am very busy."

Tyrian's eyes widened in shock. He snapped his head toward the source of the voice.

But the brief meeting had already ended. The two phantoms, both sailing at full speed, overlapped for only a very short instant. The Vanished's ghostly hull swept past the Sea Mist like a gust of wind. By the time Tyrian came back to himself, he found that he and his crew had already returned to solid, physical form.

He ran to a viewing window on the other side and saw the Vanished racing full speed toward Pland, leaving the Sea Mist far behind.

The Ironclad Warship slowly came to a stop on the sea. The invisible force that had driven the ship faded. Control returned once more to the hands of the helmsman.

The badly damaged engine system was finally shut down under the sailors' efforts, but it was clear it would not be easy to start it again.

"…What just happened?" Aiden scratched his bald head. The strong First Mate looked stunned. "That ship… just left like that? Weren't we supposed to fight to the death?"

A sailor spoke, still shaken: "…It didn't seem like it wanted to fight us to the death from the start. It barely even slowed down. It just came over and rolled right over us once…"

"Too scary. I even feel like my heart started beating again just now…"

The noise of the crew reached Tyrian’s ears, but he had no mood to listen.

Right now, only one short sentence kept echoing in his mind.

“I am very busy.”

His father had said it. There had been almost no emotion in the voice. It could not be called a greeting between family at all. It was as cold as if Duncan were facing a stranger. But it was, without a doubt, a sentence that humans could understand, clear and rational.

It was not the mad roaring that belonged only to Subspace.

“Captain,” First Mate Aiden came over, looking uneasily at the silent Tyrian. “What do we… do next?”

Tyrian woke from his thoughts and lifted his head. “Can the ship still move?”

“Not really. The engines are shut down now. It will take some time to fix them. And quite a few people were hurt in the battle just now… pretty serious injuries. The kind where they broke into pieces and we have to shovel them up for a long time.” Aiden shook his head. His shiny bald forehead glinted faintly. “But the strangest thing is, the people who took a direct hit from the Vanished’s guns are all fine. Main Guns One and Three are completely gone, but the people in the turrets fell down into the holes without a scratch…”

“People shaken by the shockwave were badly hurt, but the ones hit directly did not die?” Tyrian repeated in surprise, then frowned. “How could that be…”

“Maybe… your father did not go for the kill?” Aiden glanced at his captain and spoke carefully. “Judging from the Vanished’s bombardment, it seemed like it only wanted to make the Sea Mist stop…”

“That’s not…” Tyrian started on reflex, but then shut his mouth. After a few seconds of silence, he shook his head slightly. “Get the ship back under power as soon as you can. At the same time, send a message to Pland. Tell them we did our best to intercept, but the Vanished still headed toward the city-state… The rest, let the much larger City Navy handle. We have already done what we could.”

Aiden accepted the order at once and left. But not long after, he rushed back in a hurry.

“Captain! We can’t reach Pland!”

“Can’t reach them?” Tyrian’s brow tightened. “Is the signal environment still disturbed by the battle just now?”

“No. We can still receive signals from the offshore patrol points, but we cannot receive anything from Pland. Nothing at all.” Aiden spoke fast, his face full of confusion. “It’s like the whole of Pland has vanished from the radio. At this distance, that is impossible.

“And it’s not just the telegraph. The Psychic Call from the Cathedral has no response either!”

“The Psychic Call has no response?!” This time, Tyrian’s expression changed clearly. At the same time, he thought of the Vanished’s mad dash toward Pland at any cost. A strong unease finally rose in his heart. “When did communications cut off? Is anyone watching the telegraph station?”

“The last call was yesterday. We made the routine report to the harbor office in Pland. Everything was normal then.” Aiden thought back and spoke quickly. “Captain, what do we do? Do we still return?”

He paused here, looking a bit hesitant. “This… this is already beyond the original plan.”

Tyrian’s face stayed tense. He did not speak for several seconds. At last he let out a long breath.

“We go to Pland—once the Sea Mist is repaired enough to move, we set out.”

Aiden looked surprised, but after a brief moment of shock, the loyal First Mate straightened at once. “Yes, Captain!”

…

The churning sea around them slowly calmed. Only the sound of waves remained.

The deafening roar of the cannons still echoed in Duncan’s mind, making him unconsciously scratch his ear. He clearly had not yet adapted to that sudden encounter.

Goathead’s voice sounded in his ear: “Just now you headed straight for the Sea Mist at full speed. I thought you wanted to say a few words to Tyrian. After all… this counts as a very meaningful ‘reunion’.”

“That was what I planned at first,” Duncan answered casually. “I just changed my mind all of a sudden.”

“Why?”

“…After meeting him, I suddenly realized I didn’t know what to say,” Duncan said openly. Since he and Goathead had already had that ‘lay-it-all-out’ talk, he no longer spoke as carefully as before. “We are not close.”

“…All right, whatever you say,” Goathead had no objection. “But you should still think about how you plan to get along with your two ‘children’. Everyone here tends to live a long time. You will have to meet them sooner or later. A good family relationship has a huge impact on fate. Back in the day, there was someone who…”

“Shut up.” Duncan cut off the wandering topic with practiced ease. Then, as if he suddenly thought of something, his expression turned a bit strange. “Come to think of it, it’s a pity we were missing someone on the ship this time.”

Goathead hesitated. “Missing someone? You mean…”

“Alice wasn’t here. She is back in the city minding the shop,” Duncan said in a relaxed tone, even with a hint of amusement. “I suddenly remembered that Tyrian once served under the Frostholm Queen for a time. Alice is walking around with the Frostholm Queen’s face.

“Imagine if Alice had been on the ship just now. That would have been interesting. I bet Tyrian would spend days thinking it over after he went back…”

“…”

“Why did you go quiet? Aren’t you usually very talkative?”

“I am not in a position to comment on your family matters…” Goathead replied. “But after hearing you say that, I also think that scene would have been worth seeing… Why don’t we turn back and make another trip? This time we bring Miss Alice along…”

Of course, Duncan ignored that ridiculous suggestion. He stayed silent for two seconds, then suddenly said, “Didn’t see it before, but you really are in it for the laughs.”

“What does ‘in it for the laughs’ mean?”

Duncan did not answer. He simply lifted his head and looked toward a certain spot on the distant sea.

Just now, for an instant, he had clearly sensed the body he left in the city-state of Pland through the Vanished, and had even felt the flames spreading through the city.

It matched his earlier guess. Once the distance was close enough, the connection between the Vanished and Pland… grew stronger.

Chapter 209: Mortal Realm Invasion

The stormy rain had not stopped. It even showed signs of growing worse. Wild winds drove the cold rain against the tall outer walls and stained-glass windows of the Deep Sea Grand Cathedral, like the heavy, chaotic heartbeats of the city-state.

On the square in front of the city, Steam Walkers and Steam Tanks had already assembled. Fully armed Guardians silently blocked every street.

On the bell tower at the back of the Grand Cathedral, a special brazier had been lit. Purified Whale Oil mixed with chips of Sea-Breath Wood burned fiercely in the basin. In the storm, the flame shone like a lighthouse guiding ships home. Special focusing lenses strengthened the light, so that the bright flame could be seen clearly from most of the city-state.

As the central Grand Cathedral's brazier flared to life, similar flames appeared above cathedrals all across the city. Even in the most remote neighborhood cathedrals, there was a tall bell tower facing the Grand Cathedral from afar. At the top of each of those towers, a brazier waited in its place.

On this dark, stormy day, bell tower after bell tower lit up, forming a chain of lighthouses over Pland. When all the lights came on, clear bells and loud steam whistles rang out across the entire city-state.

Every Cathedral's boilers fired up. Every Cathedral's bells rang. Pland roared in the storm, as if civilization itself were standing in the darkness, resisting some invisible invading force.

This strange situation made all the residents shut their doors and windows tight. Those who knew more about the supernatural field could sense the danger of the moment from this citywide upheaval of the Cathedrals.

Deep inside the governor's residence, Dante Wayne had just woken from unconsciousness when he heard the waves of bells and whistles outside. He also saw the many "lighthouses" near and far in the darkness. With the help of an attendant, he sat up and stared in shock at the apocalyptic scene through the glass window.

"The Grand Cathedral has activated the Mortal Realm Stabilization Barrier… Is this a Mortal Realm invasion-level disaster?!"

"We are still investigating," an aide hurried to his bedside, his tone a bit tense. "It came very suddenly. The Grand Cathedral only said that all districts of Pland must enter a Highest-Level Lockdown. You were unconscious at the time, so Bishop Valentine used emergency authority…"

Dante did not reply. He suddenly seemed to sense something. His brows slowly relaxed.

"…Vanna is back."

"Miss Vanna?" The attendant at his side turned with a confused look. "Miss Vanna did not return to the residence. She should…"

"I know." Dante knew the others could not understand his sudden words, so he waved his hand. His gaze finally settled on the aide. "Is the city's Guard Corps still under City Hall command?"

"Yes. Bishop Valentine only took direct control of the constable forces and some of the Guard Corps tasked with emergency response," the aide said at once. "Most of the Guard Corps are still waiting for your orders."

“Good. Aside from the First Division, put all units of the Guard Corps under the Grand Cathedral’s arrangements,” Dante said. His head still felt hazy, but his orders came fast. “Also, the whole city enters Highest-Level Martial Law. Ring all the Martial Law Bells. After the bells ring, anyone found on the streets—anyone at all—will be treated as a cultist.”

The aide was shocked by this order. “Mr. Dante, this…”

“Carry out the order.” Dante lifted his head. His one remaining eye was sharp. The skin around the ruby prosthetic eye on the other side once again seeped thin lines of blood. “We are now in a state of war.”

“…Yes!”

The aide took the order and left. Dante then broke into a harsh cough. Only after a long moment did the coughing ease a little. He spoke in a low voice to the attendant beside him: “Take me to the Grand Cathedral.”

“Mr. Dante, your body…”

“My body is not important. I have something important to tell Bishop Valentine.”

“Yes.”

…

Nina gripped Shirley’s hand and sat behind the shop window, shaking as she watched the wild wind and pouring rain outside. Thunder boomed again and again in the sky, making all the doors and windows rattle.

The scene was so frightening that even Shirley, who was usually very brave, started to tremble. She could not help muttering under her breath: “What the hell kind of weather is this…”

“Shirley, you… you can’t swear,” Nina said, face tense even though she was scared. “Uncle said you…”

“Okay, okay, I won’t swear, I won’t swear. Just don’t tell Mr. Duncan,” Shirley said quickly. Then, out of the corner of her eye, she suddenly noticed a figure on the stairs and shrank her neck on reflex. “Ah, Mr. Duncan is coming down.”

“Uncle Duncan!” Nina jumped to her feet at once and almost ran toward the figure coming down the stairs. “You… you finished your work?”

“Yes. I’m done for now, but things are not over yet,” Duncan said. He casually pressed a hand on Nina’s hair, then turned toward the counter. Morris still sat there, but his face already looked a bit better. Duncan nodded to him. “I have brought her back.”

“I just felt it. She came back,” Morris said at once. “I still don’t know how you did it, but… thank you very much for your help.”

“This is only the beginning. It’s too early to thank me now,” Duncan said as he turned his head to look out the shop window. “The plot was exposed. They have already started their move ahead of time. The intruders are attacking on the other side of the Veil… They will probably arrive very soon.”

Morris looked deeply worried. Nina looked at Duncan in confusion. “Uncle, what intruders? You mean…”

“Nina.” Duncan cut the girl off. He turned toward her, his expression more serious than she had ever seen. “Do you trust me?”

Nina almost did not hesitate. “I trust you.”

“Good. Then hold on to the belief that this storm will end safely. No matter what happens later, do not panic. No matter what I do, don’t get nervous, don’t be afraid,” Duncan said, looking into Nina’s eyes. Then he raised his hand and pointed at Alice, who was standing quietly by the stairs. “Alice can be trusted. If there is a real emergency, stay with her.”

Nina nodded in a daze. Alice spoke at once: “Please rest assured, Mr. Duncan. I will protect Miss Nina.”

“I really don’t have much faith in your fighting skills,” Duncan said, giving Alice a look. Then he sighed helplessly. “But there is no one else I can trust her to.”

Another clap of thunder exploded overhead. From somewhere out on the street came the crash of something falling down. Along with the crash came a sharp alarm from some unknown place and the urgent ringing of Cathedral bells farther away.

The lights in the antique shop flickered a few times, then went out.

The power went down.

Darkness fell over the whole street at once. It was as if the neighborhood had entered the veil of night early in the middle of the storm.

In the gloom, Shirley’s voice came from not far away: “I’ll light the oil lamp! I know where it is!”

Duncan answered with a soft sound, but suddenly, he felt Nina grab his hand.

Her hands felt a bit hot.

“Uncle…” Nina said in a tense, rapid whisper. Even her breath carried a faint heat. “I feel… a little hot…”

In the darkness, Duncan’s gaze turned serious at once.

But aside from that seriousness, he showed no extra panic.

From the very beginning, he had been ready for any sudden change in Nina’s condition.

He simply held Nina’s hand more firmly as it grew hotter and hotter. Between their fingers, in gaps that the eye could hardly catch, tiny ghostly green sparks flickered.

He heard the flap of wings. The pigeon AI flew down from upstairs in the dark and landed neatly on the counter.

Shirley lit the oil lamp. The wavering flame drove away the darkness in the shop for now, but outside on the street, the sky was already black as ink. The light and power of the Sun had been completely blocked by the storm outside the city-state.

“Nina, do you remember what I told you just now?”

In the dim light, Duncan’s voice reached Nina’s ears.

Nina nodded lightly. “Yes.”

“Don’t be afraid later. There will be some… very powerful things happening.” Duncan smiled and spoke softly.

Out of the corner of his eye, he looked farther away.

Outside the window, on the rain-soaked street, the falling sheets of water had begun to pick up an unnatural red tint. The red color was bright and flickering, like a reflection from another time and space cast upon the Mortal Realm.

But Duncan did not stare at the now-unusual rain, nor did he pay attention to the “reflections” coming through the Veil.

His gaze passed over the uneven buildings of Pland and the coast. He looked toward the Boundless Sea.

The ghostly silhouette of the Vanished slowly appeared in his pupils.

…

Heidi flinched the moment the thunder cracked.

She was curled up on a long bench in the main hall of the Grand Cathedral, both hands gripping the crystal pendant at her neck like an Amulet. She quietly recited the holy name of the God of Wisdom, Rahm, but stopped halfway through the benediction and lifted her head to look at the statue of the storm goddess.

“The Goddess is kind… she shouldn’t mind.”

She muttered under her breath, then went back to reciting Rahm’s name.

All at once, she stopped again. A strange thumping in her chest made it impossible to focus.

Heidi rose from the bench and looked around in that sudden unease.

She saw the Guardians gathered near the main doors. A small group of commoners who had not made it home in time and had come to the Cathedral for shelter sat on the benches before the statues. Several priests moved about the hall. Bishop Valentine stood before the statue with his staff, calm gaze fixed straight ahead.

Everything looked normal. So where was this feeling of dread coming from?

Without her noticing, the crystal pendant at her neck had begun to grow warm. But Heidi seemed not to care about that. She walked on instinct to a nearby window and looked out through the clear pane beside the stained glass at the scene in the square.

The young psychiatrist’s eyes went wide.

“Fire… fire!” she cried out in fear. “The rain has turned into fire!”

Chapter 210: Rain of Fire

The rain turned into fire.

Heidi cried out, and that seemingly illogical scream was the only description she could think of in that moment. She simply could not understand what she was seeing, could not understand what had happened. She only knew that a torrential Rain of Fire was falling from the sky.

It all happened in an instant.

The downpour that covered Pland transformed in a heartbeat into flames pouring down from above. It was like a fallen sunset, like an inverted corona. In less than a second, the whole city-state changed from a storm-battered city into the vision of a city melting in living fire.

Everything was set ablaze: trees, houses, towers, clock towers. Even the ground itself spewed fire. The rainwater running along the streets turned into searing lava. The deafening thunder turned into explosions all across the city-state. Those blasts came from steam pipes, gas lines, and pressure vessels bursting one after another in a short time. The roar was even more terrifying than the thunder before… the whole Grand Cathedral shook violently.

Heidi stumbled back in terror as she watched an ending of utter destruction directly overlap the Mortal Realm itself. Then she heard a tolling bell.

The sound seemed to pass through a thick barrier, as if it came from very far away. It was the steam clock tower behind the Grand Cathedral, ringing the Great Bell.

The loud and solemn tolling broke through the Rain of Fire. Right after that, more bell sounds came, near and far, from deep within the fiery rain.

The Cathedral matrix of Pland rang with a hundred bells at once. The Mortal Realm stabilization barrier activated in response. Under the tolling, the torrential Rain of Fire seemed to suffer some invisible disturbance. The flames falling over the Cathedrals turned back into ordinary rain. Even the burning spires and banners of the Grand Cathedral returned to normal in the blink of an eye.

The whole city of Pland burned, yet all the Cathedrals withstood the falling fire under the bell tolls. The bizarre rainstorm and the even stranger sea of fire mixed together in a grotesque way over the burning land. Each Cathedral became like a lonely island in a purgatory, holding firm as a chain of anchors amid the upheaval of heaven and earth.

Only then did Heidi finally hear a steady, aged voice behind her. Bishop Valentine broke the silence and said: “The enemy has launched the attack… Destroy every target that tries to approach the Cathedral bell towers!”

Heidi turned her head. She had just opened her mouth to ask something when a series of deafening explosions suddenly came from the plaza outside the Cathedral.

She ran to the window and saw the Guardian troops assembled in the plaza opening fire. The Steam Walkers’ rotary machine guns were spraying bullets toward the distant streets. The main guns of the Steam Tanks fired again and again. The units hastily transferred from the city-state’s Guard Corps had already set up fortifications at the edge of the rain and were pouring fire at something in that sea of flames.

Heidi finally saw the enemy.

They were writhing Ashen Humanoids, endless in number, crawling and squirming out of the fire. Just looking at them made her blood run cold.

Those ashes seemed to emerge from the flames out of thin air. The shifting forms shrieked and screamed in pain every second. They surged in from all directions, like beasts drawn by some strange lure, rushing toward every Mortal Realm stabilization Node in the city-state—the Cathedral bell towers.

The warriors fired in confusion. Most of them had no idea why this battle had begun or what had happened to their familiar home. They did not even dare think about where those disturbing “enemies” came from. But their duty as the city’s Guards, their trained obedience, and their will to survive pinned them to that infernal frontline. They fought by pure muscle memory, drilled a thousand times over.

So the Guard troops’ guns and cannons roared, easily ripping apart the first wave of ashes that swarmed toward them.

But the next second, more ash rose behind the scattered remnants. Even more twisted, burned things came with the flames and smoke, surging toward the Cathedral.

Their numbers were as if they equaled the entire population of the city-state.

“Hold the bell towers.” Valentine’s voice suddenly rang out, echoing over the whole Cathedral plaza and even above the entire city-state. “As long as the bells are still ringing, our Mortal Realm will not be altered and overwritten by them! Believers, the time has come to witness your faith… Hold the bell towers!!”

In the midst of the chaos, Heidi watched everything, feeling as if her world had already fallen apart. But after a short moment of adjustment, she forced herself to calm down. Once she realized this was a full-scale Mortal Realm invasion, she forced herself not to look at the sea of flames beyond the plaza, not to think about the “fact” that ninety percent of the city-state had already been effectively destroyed. Instead, she ran straight to Bishop Valentine and said: “Is there anything I can do to help?”

“Calm the commoners sheltering in the Cathedral. We must avoid anyone inside the Cathedral having a mental breakdown,” Valentine said in a deep voice. “Then wait with them until this storm passes.”

Heidi nodded at once. But just then Valentine suddenly lifted his head, as if his gaze pierced the tall walls of the hall and looked over the distant city.

Flames and flashes were reflected in the archbishop’s eyes. A bird’s-eye view of the entire city-state appeared in his sight.

He clearly saw all of Pland burning fiercely under the Rain of Fire. Each Cathedral became an island in the sea of flames. Every Cathedral suffered an invasion from beyond the Mortal Realm. Blazing Evil Spirits, released from some branch of Doomsday, were attacking the still-ringing bell towers in a frenzy, as if desperately trying to drag this surviving Mortal Realm world down into the same tragic End as their own. Behind those ashes stood countless Tall Gaunt Shadows.

Those dark figures stood silently in the fire, wordlessly pushing the city-state toward Doomsday.

They were the minions of the Sunspawn.

The minions of the Sunspawn?

Valentine’s expression suddenly shifted. Faced with this massive disaster at the level of a Mortal Realm invasion, he suddenly remembered a “small matter” that had supposedly been resolved long ago and nearly forgotten.

He turned sharply to a High Deacon at his side and said: “Are those Sun heretics still in the underground sanctum?!”

“The Sun heretics?” The High Deacon did not react at first. He stared blankly for a second before answering in a hurry: “Yes, they are still locked in the underground sanctum. A full Guardian battalion is on watch. They cannot escape…”

“They never planned to escape from the start!” Valentine said quickly. “From the very beginning, they wanted to be locked inside the Cathedral!”

“Wha…”

The High Deacon’s eyes went wide. Before he could finish, a dull boom suddenly came from deep beneath the Cathedral.

It was as if some giant beast had awakened in the underground sanctum.

Some priests in the Grand Cathedral who had lived through a certain Sun crisis four years ago thought of something else when they heard that boom.

Four years ago, hundreds of Sun heretics had gathered in their hiding place and, through a mad and bloody sacrificial rite, summoned a short-lived but terrifying forbidden power. A “replica Sun” formed underground and almost caused a catastrophe.

But before they could succeed, their plot had been discovered by the newly promoted Inquisitor Vanna, who led a team to wipe them out.

“…That was a test…”

The High Deacon stared, muttering to himself.

Heidi felt the heat around her suddenly rise and sensed the tremors from deep underground growing stronger and stronger.

Fire surged. Bells rang as one. Steam whistles shrieked through the Rain of Fire. Countless ash-born monsters appeared from all directions and rampaged across the mortal world.

Vanna had lived through many dangerous battles. She had faced cultists, forbidden monsters created by cultists, runaway Abyssal demons, and deranged, raving Enders. Yet no battle could compare to this purgatory before her.

She was no longer facing a battlefield, but a suddenly descended Doomsday.

Or rather, Doomsday had already come long ago. It had only been hidden behind the Veil until this day. Now someone had torn the Veil away—the living had no time to react before they became embers in Doomsday.

But Vanna was still alive. She had carved a bloody path through fire and ash and was struggling toward the towering Grand Cathedral at the center of the city-state.

Every breath burned her lungs. Her body was so exhausted it could have crushed an ordinary person several times over. Her armor was badly damaged. Her body's recovery could no longer keep up with the rate of harm. Her wounds grew worse bit by bit.

Yet the young Inquisitor still moved forward.

The bells of the Grand Cathedral were still ringing. That meant Bishop Valentine's defenses had not yet been broken. Perhaps the Guardians did not know the history of this corruption or the full conspiracy behind it, but they had always prepared for every conspiracy and battle.

As long as the battle at the Grand Cathedral continued, Vanna believed she had a duty to return to her place on that battlefield.

Vanna thought as she moved.

She noticed that Bishop Valentine had activated the Mortal Realm stabilization measures, which meant he had already realized part of the truth. At least that part of their response was correct. As long as the bell towers did not fall, the heretics' scheme to overwrite "true history" with a "false history" would not succeed so easily.

As long as the overwriting process was interrupted in the end and the corruption cut out from history at its source, the city-state could still be saved. The current destruction was not true destruction. It was only a terrifying "possibility" created by two different histories overlapping… It was not too late. It was still not too late.

Vanna repeated this in her heart as if she were cheering herself on. She tried not to think about the possibility of the other Cathedrals falling. She tried not to think about where that mysterious and terrifying Captain Duncan might be waiting along this chain of events. She only moved her feet in a mechanical rhythm, smashing every obstacle in her path and walking step by step along the burning streets, closing the distance between herself and the Grand Cathedral.

But suddenly, she stopped at an intersection not far from the Grand Cathedral.

A dark gray car had flipped and lay upside down by the roadside, as if it had overturned in an accident on its way to the Grand Cathedral. Several bodies lay dead nearby, thrown from the car.

There was still someone inside the car. An arm stuck out of the tilted window, trapped against the twisted door.

Vanna recognized the car at once, and she recognized that arm.

It was her uncle, Dante Wayne.

Chapter 211: divine blessing

That familiar car lay overturned in the street, as if it had crashed on the way to the Grand Cathedral. Vanna's uncle was clearly still inside. Her already hazy mind tightened in an instant. In the blink of an eye she rushed to the car.

Then she saw that the arm hanging out of the window was twitching slightly. The blood-soaked hand seemed to rise just a little as she drew near.

Her uncle was still alive.

Vanna reacted at once. She hurried forward, braced the car with one hand, and snapped the twisted door frame with the other. Then she leaned in, propping up the warped structure while she checked Dante's injuries. She pulled her uncle out of the car as carefully as she could, trying not to cause any further harm. Right after that, she cast divine magic. With the last of her strength, she called upon the Blessing of the Sea Breeze, trying to bring life back into Dante's fading body.

The almost suffocating hot wind still raged through the streets. Burning ash and falling sparks made the city-state look like a literal hell. Vanna held a Protective Ward around herself, its powerful pressure forcing back the deadly environment nearby. She laid Dante flat on the ground. After a round of desperate efforts, she finally saw the man who had raised her for eleven years slowly open his eyes.

"Ah… Vanna… you came back…"

That was the first thing Dante said when he opened his eyes.

“Yes, I came back,” Vanna answered at once. She did not notice what was strange about that word “came back”. She simply reached out and took his hand. “How do you feel? Can you still move? I’ll take you to the Grand Cathedral…”

“No… Don’t bother with a burden like me,” Dante shook his head slightly. He tightened his grip on Vanna’s hand, his fingertips pressing weakly. “I should have known this day would come… They came to claim the price… You have to go. Before they find you… leave Pland. Go somewhere no one knows you…”

Hearing her uncle’s whisper, Vanna froze. She suddenly realized that her uncle seemed to know something even she did not. Her voice trembled a little: “What do you mean? Who are ‘they’? What price are they taking? Did you… already know what was happening in the city-state?!”

Dante forced his eyes open. The ruby prosthetic eye he had worn was shattered, and blood ran down from the wounds at the edge of his eye socket. In his remaining human eye, the endless fires on the street were reflected. After a few seconds of silence, he finally spoke in a low voice: “The Enders… and the Subspace behind them… Vanna, do you remember the great fire eleven years ago?”

“The great fire eleven years ago…” Vanna’s eyes widened a little. “You actually remember that fire?”

“How could I not remember… It burns in front of my eyes every day,” Dante said with a bitter smile. “I just thought I could lie to myself for the rest of my life.”

Chaos boiled in Vanna’s mind. In that moment she seemed to forget her exhaustion and wounds. She stared at her uncle’s already clouding eye and thought of everything she knew about the fire, the Black Sun, the Subspace, and the Enders. Before all those clues buried her, she finally asked: “But what does that have to do with the Subspace and the Enders… and with me? What connection do I have to all this? Why are ‘they’ coming for me? What ‘price’ do they want to take?!”

Right after she poured out the questions, Vanna regretted her tone. It sounded less like she was talking to her uncle and more like she was interrogating a criminal. But Dante seemed not to care. He only took a few shallow breaths and then spoke again, his voice like a dream: “When that fire started, I caught a glimpse of… a thin projection of the Subspace. When that extreme and dangerous Truth arrived, I made a wish to the Subspace.”

“You made a wish to the Subspace?” Vanna stared at Dante in shock. “What wish?”

“I wished that nothing had happened. I wished that you… would come back to life.”

Every expression on Vanna’s face froze.

Dante silently gazed at his niece. His face looked as if he were crying, yet there was a bitter smile mixed into it. He slowly raised his hand, as if he wanted to touch Vanna’s hair. His lips moved, and he said in a low voice: “Vanna… you’ve grown up… I’m sorry, I really am. Your uncle was useless. Back then… I didn’t manage to save you…”

“But I remember you taking me out of that fire…”

“I only carried a little pile of ash out of the burning house,” Dante said quietly. “It happened in just an instant. There was no time to react. You turned into this tiny bit of charred ash… I went mad trying to escape that nightmare, trying to make everything go back to how it was before the disaster. I begged for help from anyone who could grant it, a deity, a demon, even the Subspace itself… And then, something answered my wish.

It took me many years to understand what exactly had answered me in that moment…”

Vanna seemed to no longer hear the rest of Dante’s words.

She slowly raised her hands and looked at her own body of flesh and blood.

She did not know how long passed before she finally broke the silence: “So, in a certain sense, my survival is the result of the Subspace’s divine blessing?”

Dante closed his eyes a little. He could not answer the question. He could only agree in silence.

“Then… how did I become a Saint?” Vanna asked at once. She was asking her uncle, but it also sounded as if she were asking herself. “How would the Storm Goddess allow someone who survived thanks to the Subspace’s divine blessing to become Her believer, and even grant such great power and protection?”

“I… I don’t know,” Dante said, shaking his head slowly. “Maybe only the Goddess Herself can answer that question, but… how could we ever…”

Vanna did not reply. Her thoughts were in greater turmoil than ever. The faith that had supported her all these years now showed a crack that could not be bridged. She did not know how to face her belief, or even how to face her own ‘existence’. Yet after a short silence, she still rose to her feet and said softly, almost to herself: “No matter what, someone has to stop this Mortal Realm invasion. We must… bring back the world we know as the Mortal Realm.”

“Vanna, you will die,” Dante said suddenly, his eyes snapping open. He used all his strength to push himself upright. “You cannot stay here. The foundation of this Mortal Realm is breaking apart. You must leave Pland, leave this manifestation, until it disappears from your memory completely.

Listen, if your survival really is the result of the Subspace's divine blessing, then correcting history may cause you to turn back into dust. That kind of paradoxical clash isn't something a mortal can…"

Vanna only gazed quietly at her uncle. Her eyes were gentle and calm.

"Uncle, didn't you say you loved this city-state and everything in it?"

Dante was silent for a moment. Then the firm expression returned to his face: "…Of course. So I will stay here and face fate together with this city, whether I live or die in the end. I'm ready. But… but you are different, Vanna. You can't…"

"I'm the same," Vanna said lightly, cutting him off. "I love this place too, and I am ready for everything… just like you taught me when I was small. Duty above all."

Dante quietly looked at Vanna standing before him, at the only family he had left in this world. Her figure was as tall as ever, steady and firm, like a seawall ready to meet a giant wave.

He knew his words would have no more effect.

So he let out a soft sigh. With the last of his strength, he shifted himself and leaned against a nearby lamppost.

"Go, then," he said softly. "I'll stay here… and wait for you to come back."

Vanna lowered her head and looked at her uncle.

In her memories, her uncle was still a tall, unwavering mountain. When had he become so much shorter than she was?

She bent down slightly and spoke in a low, gentle voice: "…If everything goes well, the Pland you know will return to the Mortal Realm. When that happens… don't forget me."

Dante did not answer. He only nodded slightly.

Vanna straightened up.

The next moment, an unsettling tremor came from far away and cut her movement short. Right after that came a terrifying explosion and the tooth-grinding screech of buildings tearing apart and collapsing.

Vanna looked in shock toward the source of the sound. She had never felt such fear and unease as she did now. In the next second, what she saw confirmed the source of that dread.

From the direction of the Grand Cathedral, a pillar of flame shot up into the sky. The blast wave almost tore apart the hot smoke clouds high above. A blinding, unnatural flash followed, as if a small Sun were rising from underground, ready to rise from below and melt everything to nothing.

Then something even worse happened.

She heard more explosions and more shrieking noise. She saw pillar after pillar of fire rise from all parts of the city-state. Huge fireballs floated above the sea of flames like small Suns. Each fireball rose from the location of a Cathedral.

The bells, which had never stopped ringing even during the city’s melting, finally fell quiet. The sheltered islands within the city began to fall one after another.

Vanna felt her mind go blank. The next second, driven by instinct, she rushed toward the source of the greatest light burst, toward the Storm Grand Cathedral at the heart of Pland.

Chapter 212: Diverging Paths – The End

All the Cathedrals fell in a short time. One blazing “fireball” after another rose from underground all across the city-state, burning away Pland’s last anchors to the Mortal Realm. The bells fell silent one after another. In only a few moments, this Sea Jewel had nothing left but endless ruins and ash.

Vanna rushed through burning intersections and streets like a storm, heading toward the Cathedral in her sight, the one crowned by a pillar of fire reaching into the sky. Yet in her eyes, the Cathedral had already changed in that short time—

The main building had collapsed. The thousand-year-old frame of the structure had melted and sagged like wax. The tall side wings had, in the blink of an eye, turned into twisted, red-hot skeletons.

Above all this, a Sun hung quietly in the air over the great Cathedral. Its edge shone white, but inside it was dark, black-red like dried blood. It looked like a horrible, hollow opening into an endless abyss, yet it kept releasing destructive light and heat.

Along the edge of this blasphemous Sun Wheel, bright red drops of liquid kept flowing and falling—molten lava, or perhaps the blood of the blasphemers.

Now what could she do by rushing over there? Kill some mastermind? Reverse the history that had already overlapped? Or use all her strength to die bravely yet uselessly, proving her own faith and loyalty at the very end?

Vanna did not know. She did not know what else she could do. But she still ran toward the Cathedral on instinct.

Just then, something twisted and ghostly green flashed at the edge of her vision, as if something flickered through the sea of fire. A stern, deep voice rang directly in her mind: “Go to the Great Bell tower.”

The voice came so suddenly that Vanna stopped on reflex. She searched for the source of the sound, or for any trace around her that might prove the ghost captain was turning his gaze toward her.

But all she saw was roaring fire. Molten drops from that blasphemous Black Sun fell down, igniting the last inch of ground near the great Cathedral.

At that moment, another sound broke her brief hesitation.

She heard a bright, long peal of bells suddenly ring out—the sound came from the ancient bell tower behind the Cathedral.

The bell rang so loud it seemed ready to cover all of Pland again.

But that bell tower had already been burned through by fire. It should not have been able to make any sound at all.

At that moment, Vanna dropped all doubts and worries in her heart and ran toward the bell tower.

She no longer cared what intention the ghost captain had, or what consequence might come from following his directions. With all the Cathedrals falling in an instant, with the whole city-state already burned down, the only path left for her was the bell tower that still rang.

She crossed the plaza in front of the Cathedral.

The defense forces that had once assembled on the plaza were completely wiped out. In the rolling waves of heat, she could only see countless twisted, ruined steam walkers and steam tanks. The defense line that Guardians and the Guard Corps had formed had become layers of charcoal, all buried under shocking ash.

She cut down countless ash shadows that swarmed at her, then passed through the Cathedral's main hall and sanctuary, which had already burned into ruins. She crossed the wide-open courtyard and saw the bell tower standing high at the end of her sight.

Hot ash fell from the sky. Sparks flew like fireflies.

It made her remember what she had seen not long ago on the other side of the Veil, the Pland she had seen that was burned down by fire in 1889.

False history had covered true history. What lay behind the Veil had replaced the Mortal Realm world in front of the Veil.

But the bell still rang.

The door leading into the upper levels of the bell tower had collapsed. The stairs inside had broken and fallen away. After seeing this, Vanna gave up on climbing the tower by the normal path. She came to the foot of the bell tower's outer wall, lifted her head to quickly pick a route, then reached out and grabbed the protruding stonework, climbing straight up.

The outer wall had been baked by fire for a long time. It was as hot as a red-hot iron plate. But Vanna's climbing speed did not slow at all. She swept upward like a gust of wind. In only a brief moment, she reached the upper part of the bell tower, crossed the stopped clock face, and stepped onto the top of the tower where the bonfire and the Great Bell were placed.

The top was broad. A pointed roof open on all four sides gave some cover. Under that roof, besides the fire basin, stood the bell-striker mechanism—a huge machine of gears and levers.

The Great Bell hung under this machine, hidden inside a resonance chamber.

Vanna vaulted onto the top of the tower and landed.

She looked back toward the way she had come and saw the city-state beneath her sinking into a sea of fire. Scorching lava flowed down the streets, leaving shocking ravines behind. From this height above the city, she looked down on a living hell and saw only ruin.

Then she turned back toward the bell-striker mechanism, which clearly had lost all power, yet still kept moving.

A figure—or rather, a clump of charcoal barely keeping a human shape—was clinging to the lever beside the bell-striker mechanism, using the last of his strength to keep the heavy gears turning.

Vanna stepped forward on reflex. The charcoal figure seemed to feel her coming closer. He slowly lifted his head and turned his face. A pair of human eyes looked at the young inquisitor who had appeared on the top of the tower.

“Hold… the tower…”

The charcoal figure rasped in a hoarse voice.

Then he crashed to the floor. His completely carbonized body broke apart. The last heat faded from the rubble of his remains, and the glowing red cracks on his body slowly went out.

A Storm Emblem, symbol of the Deep Sea Church, rolled out of the pile of charcoal and onto the ground.

Pland’s last bell finally fell silent.

“Archbishop!”

Vanna recognized those eyes. She rushed forward, wanting to save that heap of ash, or to push the bell-striker mechanism again herself. But just as she took her first step, a sudden, crushing pressure forced her to stop.

Vanna froze in place by sheer will and turned toward the direction that pressure came from.

A tall, thin figure in a ragged gray robe, body shriveled and dry like an ascetic monk, stood quietly at the edge of the platform.

The “monk” looked at Vanna with pity in his eyes. Behind him, in the sky, hung the Black Sun, its edge blazing bright, its body dripping molten fire.

Vanna did not know when he had appeared there. His arrival was so silent that she had not sensed it at all. It was as if he had been standing on this high tower from the very beginning, from long, long ago—even before the fire started.

“You have struggled with all your strength, child. You all have. You even delayed things several times longer than expected. But this delay and this defense have no meaning. No one will come to save you. In this already closed-loop historical Vision, any reinforcements are fated never to reach Pland before history correction is complete…”

The thin, black figure spoke slowly. He lifted his hand a little. His bony arm seemed to shimmer with flame in the light of the Black Sun behind him. “Now, embrace this new future. Rise from the ashes, child… your survival and return did not change anything.”

Vanna stayed silent. She simply took the greatsword from her back.

“Oh, so the talks have broken down…” The Ender saw Vanna’s action, yet his face stayed calm and full of pity. “Of course, you can easily kill me. But that has no meaning. The Sun’s spawn is already ready to welcome his descent.

“As for me, I am only a witness to this moment of the End. I will witness it now, and I will witness it again someday.

“And you… do you see that Sun?”

Vanna lifted her gaze a little. Her eyes passed the Ender and finally noticed that, deep in that blasphemous Sun Wheel, something dark was pulsing, like a forming embryo, like a heart slowly waking.

A strange unease rose sharply in her chest.

She finally realized that the crushing pressure from before had not come from the weak and thin Ender in front of her. It came from the Black Sun behind him.

Something was waking inside that Sun!

“This plan met many setbacks. A force we never fully saw kept interfering with our correction of history again and again,” the Ender said, still looking at Vanna’s eyes with that pitiful gaze, his voice low and almost hypnotic. “The disturbance it brought made some eyes, which should never have opened, notice the truth.

“You were actually only a step away from uncovering everything. Really, just one step away—but fate is like this.

“Child, fate is this unreasonable.”

He sighed with pity and slowly walked forward. He came to stand in front of Vanna, who still stood firm. Like he was reading out a sacred Truth, he said: “But you are blessed. You have truly resurrected, and you will live and die again. You have received the highest divine blessing… so you have the chance to embrace all this.”

Vanna tightened her grip on the sword. For the first time in her life, her killing intent rose not from justice or duty, but from fierce hatred.

But in the last second before she swung, her movement was cut off by a stream of fire that suddenly burst up along the edge of the platform.

A door of ghostly green flame appeared out of nowhere behind the Ender. From it stepped a tall, majestic figure, his whole body wrapped in spirit form fire.

The Ender seemed not to notice the door behind him at all. He spread his arms, like a prophet preaching to the world before the final judgment, and declared:

“Blessed child, do not resist. As you can see, the age has changed…”

He suddenly stopped.

A nameless terror stabbed into his clouded mind. A chaotic noise, as if straight from Subspace, blended into the roaring flames of Pland.

The madman tried in panic to turn around, but before he could, a hand rested lightly on his shoulder.

“Turn back.”

A calm voice spoke.

Chapter 213: Promised Ark

“Turn back.”

At the very instant she heard these words, Vanna also heard a huge roar of noise. It was a kind of endless rumbling mixed with sharp, tearing screams inside the burning fire. It did not come from any one direction. It was like the whole city-state, even the whole world, was making that terrible sound.

Amid that skull-splitting roar, she looked toward the figure standing behind the Ender.

It was the “Captain Duncan” she had once seen in a dream. But unlike last time, what stood there now was a “ghost” completely wrapped in blazing fire, his whole body showing a vague spirit form shape.

In an instant, Vanna knew this was not his true body but another projection. Yet this time, the projection had come to the top of the tower using her as a medium. She could feel that power flowing. She felt something in her own soul burning. She felt a voice in her mind that did not belong to her.

She lifted her hands on reflex and saw faint emerald flame clinging to her body. She saw a burning path of fire spreading from under her feet. She understood. She realized that long ago, the ghost captain had already turned her into a kind of Node that could project his power.

This corruption, and the degree of this corruption, had already gone far beyond what she and Bishop Valentine had imagined. And all of it… had been for today.

In the next second, the whole world in her eyes changed at once.

ghostly green flame spread out.

In every sea of fire in Pland, in every pile of ash, in every stream of rising smoke, ghostly green flame had already been hiding for who knew how long. Now it burst out all at once, swallowing the entire city in an instant!

It happened too fast for anyone to react. Or rather, everything had already been set up long before this “Mortal Realm incursion” began. Vanna remembered the scene she had seen earlier on the other side of the Veil and suddenly realized: the great fire the Enders and the Sun heretics had made had, without anyone noticing, already become the carrier of the ghostly flame.

Their act of burning the whole city-state with fire was exactly the last step the ghost captain needed to complete the Flame Usurper!

A shrill scream suddenly rang out, snapping Vanna awake. She looked toward the source of the sound and saw that the thin, stick-like Ender was also wrapped in roaring ghostly flames. He twisted and howled at the edge of the platform like a Sacred beacon Torch.

In his melting eyes, he saw the scene of the city’s flames being seized in an instant, and he shouted curses at the curse:

“Fools! Fools! All ruined! You rejected the gift of Subspace. You will suffer forever in this world of pain… fools!!”

Yet in contrast to his curses, another scene unfolded—

Pland, which the ghostly flames burned through completely, started to recover at an unbelievable speed.

Buildings that had been burned down by fire rebuilt themselves at a rapid pace. Roads that had been melted and torn apart healed as if they were new.

The Rain of Fire falling from the sky stopped. The doomsday clouds began to fade like time itself was running backward. At the edge of the city, a corner of normal sky even appeared. And farther away…

The long-silent bells began to ring again.

Just as Captain Duncan had said: turn back.

Vanna stared with wide eyes at the impossible sight. She had never thought that a city that had been completely destroyed could really be restored. Soon, she realized what this “restoration” truly was.

The history corruption brought by the Enders and the Sun heretics was being stripped away. The false history that had fully covered Pland and replaced the Mortal Realm was being rejected and pushed out by a mighty force!

She looked in shock toward the tall figure not far away. Duncan only watched the Ender, who was almost burned into a lump of charcoal, his gaze calm. After a long time, he spoke softly, almost like to himself: “Anything can be corrupted, except Subspace…”

The Ender was still not dead. Though his body had twisted into something no longer human, a hoarse, shocked voice still came from the pile of charcoal: “You… you turned this city-state into a part of the Vanished?!”

“The Vanished is the Promised Ark. I think we can broaden the idea of an ‘ark’ a bit,” Duncan said with a smile. He bent down a little. “If a ship that meets the Vanished at sea is assimilated and absorbed, then… why can’t Pland, under my gaze, be seen as another Vanished?”

A bright peal of harbor bells rang from the distance. Vanna looked up toward the sound on reflex. The next second, she saw something that shocked her.

She saw a ship.

The Vanished appeared, sailing in from the direction of the Boundless Sea, its hull wrapped in towering spirit flame. Its half-transparent spirit form sails billowed like a Veil that covered the sky.

The ship crossed the coastline and the Harbor that was rapidly being restored. Then, as if still sailing on the sea, it moved straight into Pland, which was now full of ghostly flames. It passed grandly between the walls, houses, and towers that were being rebuilt and reset.

Ripples spread out from its sides, each wave unreal, as if it passed through another world. And every time a ripple spread, the city's restoration jumped forward again.

It looked as if the whole of Pland was being reborn in the wake of the Vanished!

"You… you may save this city-state… but you cannot stop the Sun's descent…"

A faint voice came from the twisted charcoal heap that had once been the Ender, like the last whisper before a nightmare faded. "Even a few fragments pulled back from history… are enough to destroy again… doom…"

The voice grew weaker and then vanished. The twisted charcoal finally lost its last trace of life. Under the burning of the spirit form flames, it turned into a cloud of dust and blew away on the wind.

At those words, Vanna suddenly came back to herself. She quickly raised her head and looked up at the sky.

The Black Sun still hung high above the city-state. Its edge shone blindingly bright, while its inside stayed black-red like a deep abyss. The pulsing inside the Sun was even clearer and stronger than before!

The flames of the Vanished had torn away the history corruption eating at Pland, but that blasphemous Sun had never been part of Pland to begin with. The Sun was a historical projection summoned by the Ender and the Sun's spawn together. It existed outside all true and false histories. It stood alone.

"There's something waking inside that Black Sun!"

In that moment, Vanna even forgot who she and "Captain Duncan" each were. She shouted a warning without thinking: "It will—"

But Duncan only waved a hand at her.

Then Vanna saw the ghost captain turn his body toward the blasphemous Sun Wheel in the sky. He raised his hand, as if calling or welcoming something, and spoke in a gentle voice:

"Come this way… yes, don't be afraid. You won't fall. Just come forward.

"Do you still remember how to ride a bike? Just like that… come over. I'll hold you."

In the next second, a bright golden arc of fire shot out, stinging Vanna's eyes. She saw a huge crack open along the edge of the Black Sun. An arc of flame leaped out with a joyful cheer and landed on Captain Duncan.

As that flame left, a shrill scream burst from the cursed Sun Wheel in the sky!

It was like some great beast had just taken a blow straight through the heart. The dark red core of the Sun filled with countless blazing red cracks. The bright, gleaming ring around its edge was quickly tainted and burned away by ghostly green flames. Then those flames surged inward toward the Sun's dark core.

The pulsing from that dark core stopped completely. The faint life Vanna had sensed inside vanished almost at once. The core split apart. Boiling, burning matter flowed out, but every drop was burned away by ghostly green fire before it could fall into the city.

With a storm of shrieks, roars, and crackling blasts, the twisted, blasphemous Sun finally broke apart and disappeared. Only a few scraps of residue remained, falling into the ripples around the Vanished.

By then, the huge Vanished had sailed to the center of the city. Still in spirit form, it rose higher, drifting through unreal waves and ripples until it drew near the Cathedral's bell tower. Its towering stern slid past the tower. Its spirit form sails swept across the sky. The light and shadow of masts and ropes brushed past Vanna.

She heard bells ringing. They were the Cathedral's bells.

The bell tower under her feet also broke free from the grip of corrupted history. The bell-striker mechanism started moving on its own.

Archbishop Valentine's figure slowly appeared in the air. This archbishop, who had guarded the city until the final moment, had returned to the Mortal Realm. That proved that the history branch leading toward destruction had been erased for good.

But Vanna did not keep her eyes on the archbishop. She still stared at Duncan.

Duncan had turned around. A jumping arc of flame circled at his side. The warmth and light from that flame even softened his usually shadowed, solemn face.

"I thought you were going to open with a leaping strike," Duncan said with a smile, chatting with Vanna like an old friend. "Just like last time."

"…I'm not someone who charges in without thinking."

“Really? I thought you loved leaping strikes. Every seasoned warrior finds it hard to resist starting a fight with a big jumping hit at the enemy.”

Duncan joked lightly. He reached out and soothed the arc of fire at his side, which seemed a bit restless. Then he gave Vanna a small nod and said: “I’m done here. See you next time.”

Vanna froze for a moment and stepped forward on reflex: “Wait! You can’t just—”

But Duncan had already turned away. He waved his hand and stepped off the edge of the bell tower platform into the open air.

The towering stern of the Vanished drifted slowly past the high tower. Beside the ship’s wheel on the deck stood the captain himself, steering with his own hands.

Duncan’s projection, wrapped in spirit form fire, simply stepped aboard and merged into his true body.

He stood at the helm, both hands on the wheel. He smiled and nodded once to Vanna.

The great ghost ship began to speed up. Its phantom hull sailed over Pland, riding on widening ripples of unreal water. It crossed the city to the far side of the coast and headed once more toward the Boundless Sea.

Chapter 214: After the Vanished Left

The Vanished left in the same grand, brazen way it had arrived, just as unstoppable as before.

Vanna watched the enormous ship – one could almost call it majestic – sail with solemn bearing through the center of the city-state of Pland. She watched its ghostly hull pass over the rows of rooftops and towers. The spirit form hull faded from her sight like a distant mirage. As the Vanished moved away, the spirit form flames that had been burning across Pland also began to dim and withdraw, as if they had finished some mission and were returning to nothing.

All that remained was a clear sky, a city-state that looked as it always did, and countless people who had just gone through a nightmare.

Waves of bell chimes echoed over the city-state. The bell towers of cathedrals all over the city still rang according to their original path of history. Those bells had been meant to fight off an invasion of the Mortal Realm, but now they sounded more like a farewell. The steam whistle above the Grand Cathedral also began to howl. The sharp, shrill sound made Vanna jump.

She sensed someone approaching. She turned and saw Bishop Valentine standing beside her, though she did not know when he had arrived. The old bishop, who had once passed through death itself, gripped his staff tightly.

He looked up in the direction where the Vanished had gone and spoke as if talking to himself: “I feel like I just had a very, very long dream…”

“You should know that was not a dream.”

“I mean, I just dreamed that twenty rabbits wearing Shabop dance skirts were dancing in circles around me…”

Vanna froze for a moment. “Then you really were dreaming. Maybe it happened while your mind was recovering… Did you really have to tell that bad joke right now?”

“But it did make you wake up quickly and pull your mind out of that mess and back to work,” the old bishop said calmly. His face was so steady it was as if he had not been the one making the joke. Then he lowered his head and looked toward the Cathedral square. “We have plenty to do next. This time, the one that brushed past the Vanished was not just a ship like the White Oak.”

Vanna followed the old bishop’s gaze. On the Cathedral square, the Guardians and the city’s Guard Corps were already in a kind of dazed confusion. They looked at the city, which had returned to normal, as if waking from a long dream, but their memories were still stuck in that battle when the corruption of history invaded the Mortal Realm. Some of them had “woken up” earlier and had even seen the Vanished leaving. That only made the confusion and tension worse.

Valentine’s voice sounded again beside Vanna: “…First, have the Guard troops restore order. Then we start a full survey of the whole city-state. We need to confirm whether everyone has ‘come back’, check what is missing or newly appeared in the city, and…”

Valentine paused and looked at the young inquisitor beside him.

“And prepare to report to the Storm Cathedral. Vanna, the most challenging paperwork of your life is about to begin.”

Vanna’s breath caught for a moment.

The disaster had ended, but not everything was over. Now that everyone had survived… the real investigation seemed to be only beginning.

…

The sunlight was just right.

The solemn, heavy doors of the Grand Cathedral creaked open. Heidi stepped out onto the Cathedral square with a somewhat blank look on her face. She stared at the streets that looked as ordinary as ever under the clear sky, yet in her mind there still lingered the downpour from before and the terrifying moment when that rain had turned into a Rain of Fire.

How had it ended?

She only remembered a ghost ship rising from the sea of fire and sailing through the city like it was on parade. Her mind had floated in some dimension between the Mortal Realm and illusion. Two completely different histories crossed in her sight and were split apart along the ghost ship’s path. One branch settled and became the Mortal Realm. The other was crushed to dust.

A faint burning sensation came from her chest. Heidi lowered her head and saw that the “free gift” pendant Father had brought back from the antique shop was glowing softly. She reached out to touch it. The moment her fingers brushed it, the pendant gave off a quiet cracking sound. Then, as if it had used up all its strength, it silently turned into drifting dust. Even the cord that had held it turned to ashes.

Heidi stared in a daze for a moment, but the noise rising from all over the square soon broke her trance.

The Guardians were restoring order. Garrison troops from City Hall were also taking roll and regrouping under the officers' commands at every level. Some priests came out from the Cathedral to help with the work, passing along orders from Bishop Valentine and Inquisitor Vanna. At the same time, people were talking about the silhouette of the ghost ship that had just sailed away.

"…I opened my eyes and saw that thing floating over my head, like it was sailing through clear seawater…"

"It was terrifying to look at! Those flames were almost scraping the spire of the Grand Cathedral! But it seemed to just leave…"

"That was the Vanished, no doubt about it… Don't you doubt me. That was definitely the Vanished!"

A loud voice was shouting across the square, swearing that the ghost ship that had passed through the city just now was the legendary sea calamity, the Vanished. Heidi followed the sound and saw that the speaker was an old captain with graying hair. She had dealt with this captain almost every day before, and she knew him well.

"Captain Lawrence," Heidi walked over and greeted the old captain, who was talking with a few commoners who had taken shelter. "Are you all right?"

"Me? I'm fine, even though I still don't really know what happened," the old captain said with a smile when he saw Heidi. "It's really good to see you safe too, Miss Physician. That rain and then that fire before were really scary!"

Heidi replied casually, then asked at once: "You said the ship that just left… was the Vanished?"

“Yeah, that had to be it,” Lawrence nodded at once. “I know it too well! I’ve seen that sight before!”

A citizen who had taken shelter inside the Grand Cathedral earlier and was still shaken could not help speaking up: “You’ve seen it before?”

“Of course. Why else do you think I was quarantined in the Grand Cathedral for so long?” Lawrence widened his eyes, then turned to Heidi. “I know you can talk to the higher-ups in the Church. Let me give you some advice. Later, you should carefully check what things are missing in the city. When the Vanished passes by, it usually takes something with it… I’ve got experience!”

Heidi listened in a daze and nodded just as blankly. After quite a while, memories from not long ago, yet distant as another lifetime, suddenly rose in her mind—

[How is Father?]

…

Morris did not feel well. His head was spinning, and his stomach churned like he had drunk very strong liquor. He wanted to throw up, but he did not quite dare.

Because he felt that the mops and buckets in front of him were all staring at him like predators, and Alice beside him was also silently watching him.

If he really threw up on the deck, he might get beaten up. On this ship, even any random rope was older than he was. They probably did not have the idea of respecting their elders.

He felt he was probably seasick. Or maybe pigeon-sick.

Morris lifted his head and saw the pigeon named AI strutting around the deck, inspecting the mountains of fries. Earlier, that pigeon had turned into a terrifying Skeletal Roc and carried him onto this ghost ship when the sudden Rain of Fire fell outside the antique shop. Now it had changed back into its seemingly harmless form and was walking back and forth between the piles of fries.

The girl named Shirley was sitting not far away, with a Abyssal Hound by her side. They looked like a pair made up of a summoner and a Abyssal demon, yet right now the two of them were both on their best behavior. Shirley sat up straight like a well-bred lady and hardly dared to breathe. The Abyssal demon she called “A-Gou” had somehow found a newspaper. It sat primly on a barrel next to Shirley, trying hard to hold the paper in its paws and pretend to read it – though it clearly could not read at all, because the newspaper was upside down.

Farther away, he could see the tall masts, the gauzy, translucent spirit form sails, the boundless sea, and the city-state of Pland growing more and more distant.

When he thought back to everything he had seen and gone through while sailing with this ship through the city, Morris still felt his heart pounding. The experience of having his own body turned into a spirit form by Ghost flames, then looking down on the burning land, was a bit too thrilling. Many years ago, he might have thought it was a tense but fun adventure. But he was not young anymore. That kind of experience was now… a little too thrilling.

Morris took a shallow breath. His thoughts were a mess. He wondered whether he still had a chance to go back and worried about his family.

Just then, a voice came from across from him. It was the Abyssal Hound. Morris knew what a Abyssal Hound was, but he had never imagined one could be as calm and polite as this one: “O-old, o-old, o-old mister, do-do-do you think I… I-I look like… like a we-well-educated, cul-cul-cultured d-d-dog?”

“Uh… To be honest, I don’t think a dog needs to read a newspaper to show that it is well-mannered. But you are a Abyssal demon, so we can’t judge you by the standards for dogs in the Mortal Realm… Besides, even the smartest dogs in the human world could never sit on a barrel and read the paper,” Morris answered, still stunned, his expression strange. “Also, two things. First, the newspaper in your paws is upside down. Second… do you have a bit of a stutter?”

A-Gou froze, then quickly flipped the newspaper around and answered: “I-I… I don’t s-stutter. I’m ju-just… a-a-a little nervous…”

“A-Gou, I don’t think you need to be this nervous,” Shirley muttered softly. “And why are you even reading the paper? Mr. Duncan already knows the two of us are illiterate…”

Before she even finished speaking and before A-Gou could answer, Alice, who had been staring off into space, suddenly raised her hand: “Me too!”

Shirley looked very surprised. Morris simply lowered his head and rubbed his forehead in silence.

The old scholar felt he had come to a place that was far too absurd. [What in the world is all this?]

Chapter 215: The Well-Behaved Sun

“Do you think… what is the situation in Pland now?”

After staying silent for a long time, Shirley finally could not hold back. She looked up at the old scholar in front of her, then at Miss Alice, who seemed very familiar with Mr. Duncan, and asked the question hesitantly.

“…I don’t know. But I think Mr. Duncan has probably already acted and solved the problem – even though I cannot imagine how he did it,” Morris said, rubbing his forehead while he thought. “More than that, right now I’m more concerned about this place…”

He lifted his head and looked around. His gaze fell on the spirit form sails above them, swelling and moving with no wind. His expression grew a bit strange.

“This ship makes me think of that legend. The one about the Vanished…”

“That’s right,” as soon as Morris finished speaking, Alice’s voice came from the side. She had a proud smile on her face. “This is the Vanished. Welcome aboard.”

Morris froze mid-rub and stared in shock. “This really is the Vanished?! Then Mr. Duncan’s identity…”

“He’s the captain, of course. Old gentleman, you are really slow,” Shirley on the opposite side curled her lips. After being nervous for so long, she finally felt a bit happy because she knew something others did not, which made her relax a little. “He’s even called Duncan and you still didn’t figure it out?”

“You knew about this long ago?” Morris looked at the girl in front of him in disbelief. “I thought this was your first time on this ship, just like me…”

“It is my first time here – but it’s not my first time seeing Captain Duncan’s true form,” Shirley said proudly, straightening her back. “A-Gou and I have known Captain Duncan for a long time… anyway, longer than you!”

Morris did not really catch the second half of what she said. The moment he heard her mention “the captain’s true form”, he felt a twitch in his forehead. His face turned odd as he muttered, “…If possible, I would rather not know what a ‘true form’ is…”

Shirley blinked. “Huh? Old gentleman, what did you say?”

“Nothing… There are some things we should not talk about too often. It’s good for our physical and mental health.”

“Tch, say it or don’t say it. You people who do research always like being so mysterious,” Shirley muttered, curling her lips. But she did not stay quiet even for two seconds. She could not help looking toward the far end of the big ship’s deck. “Do you think… Nina is all right? She suddenly vanished in front of us, but Mr. Duncan said she only left for a little while…”

Alice’s gentle, confident voice sounded beside her, trying to comfort the worried Shirley: “Don’t worry. She will be fine.”

Shirley looked up. She was not familiar with Alice, but she knew this anomalous, beautiful and mysterious lady had been following “Captain Duncan” from an even earlier time. She must know some inside story others did not. So Shirley asked curiously: “Why do you say that? Do you know what is happening with Nina…”

“Because the captain said so,” Alice answered with a smile. “He said we don’t need to worry.”

The rest of Shirley’s words stuck in her throat.

For some reason, she suddenly felt that this especially beautiful lady in front of her seemed… not very smart…

…

At the same time, on the aft deck of the Vanished, Duncan was looking at the bright arc of flame floating in mid-air in front of him.

Now he could be one hundred percent sure that, at least in form, this arc of flame was a solar prominence. It kept repeating the process of surging out and falling back. It felt… as if someone had cut this solar prominence directly from a Sun, not only taking its existence but also taking its repeating state within a certain slice of time.

Now this “cut-out” solar prominence floated quietly on the Vanished. It even looked only as tall as a person.

But that did not mean it was truly this “small and harmless”.

Duncan could feel the amazing energy inside it. Even though he could sense only a small part, the destructive heat and the terrifying power of a star were still enough to choke him. This feeling was even stronger than the moment when he had used the Golden Mask to glimpse the Creeping Sun Wheel. It made him even more certain that this stream of flame really did come from the Sun.

It came from a real Sun – one that went beyond what those Suntists could understand, a Sun that had already mutated and broken apart in some ancient age.

This solar prominence only looked small and harmless now because it was still under control.

Duncan could not understand it. In the knowledge system he had, there was no way to explain why a part of the Sun would become like this, nor could he guess what had happened to the real star that this solar prominence had once belonged to.

Just as he could not understand this world either. He could not understand what kind of Great Annihilation could have created this strange and dangerous “Deep Sea era” they now lived in.

But in the end, he shook his head.

These things were not important for now.

Duncan took a slow breath and forced his mind to focus again. Then he carefully reached out his right hand toward the solar prominence.

A deadly heat appeared in his senses, but in the next second that heat faded like an illusion. He saw a wisp of ghostly green flame jumping at his fingertip. Inside the solar prominence, thin threads of green fire were also quietly moving, as if in resonance.

Not long ago, this bit of pre-planted corruption had ended and torn apart the birth of that Black Sun above Pland, and it had also preserved Nina’s “humanity”.

“Nina, try again,” Duncan said. “Remember how that moment of transformation felt and let yourself ‘come back’. We were very close to success just now.”

The stream of flame jumped a few times in the air. Then its surface bulged. Golden fire rose and wrapped around itself. In a short time, a figure slowly formed within the dancing light. The vague figure looked like a young maiden, but her features were still blurry.

She lowered her head, as if curiously looking at her own body. But in the next second, the newly gathered flames burst apart again, and she turned back into a surging stream of fire.

“Don’t lose heart. We will try again,” Duncan said. He was not impatient at all. He simply continued his mental guidance gently. “I will hold you up. Since you can recover to this level, it means this way is workable…”

The arc of flame swelled again. The golden fire inside crackled. Then Nina’s figure appeared from within the flames once more.

Duncan watched, a little tense. They had tried this many times already, but each attempt had failed halfway. According to the information from the spirit flame he had planted in the fragment of the Sun, this process should indeed be controllable. But clearly, this huge and unfamiliar power was not so easy to master.

The golden flames crackled. Duncan was already prepared for another failure.

But in the very next breath, the firelight and the arc of flame in front of him vanished at once.

A familiar figure jumped out from the last flicker of flame.

A gentle sea breeze blew across the deck, damp and cold. The tips of Nina’s hair lifted slightly in the wind. Bright sunlight slanted through the clouds and then through her wind-tossed hair. Between the drifting strands, the sunlight leaped and danced like tiny flames.

In the next instant, those sunlight flames dancing in her hair faded like illusions.

Nina smiled. She looked at the Uncle Duncan in front of her, who looked completely different from the one in her memory and yet was unmistakably the same: “Uncle, I’m back!”

Only then did Duncan finally let out a soft breath. As he did, the entire Vanished reacted with him. The ship seemed to have been tense this whole time, with all its ropes, masts, and sails pulled tight. Now crackling sounds rose from all directions, mixed with whooshing and clacking from under the deck.

It was as if the whole ship was cheering, celebrating together with its captain.

“Quiet,” Duncan said over his shoulder. The whole ship fell silent at once. Then he turned back and looked at Nina with some curiosity. “You can still recognize me?”

“Of course. You are Uncle Duncan,” Nina said as if it was obvious. Then she scratched her cheek – it was her habit when she was trying to hide her awkwardness and confusion. “But… I don’t even know how I knew. I just felt it was you. When I was floating in the sky before and you called me down, I also recognized you right away…”

She stopped, hesitating. She looked Duncan up and down, narrowing her eyes a little, as if she wanted to pick out some tiny details on this uncle in front of her.

He did not look like him at all. He was almost nothing like the Uncle Duncan from the antique shop.

But a clear knowing still appeared in her mind.

It felt as if she was not recognizing him with her eyes, but by directly “reading the facts”.

Nina did not know how to explain the feeling. She could only keep grinning foolishly until Duncan stepped closer and, just like always, rubbed her hair.

“That’s fine too,” Duncan said with a small sigh. “I was worrying about how to explain this ship to you, and my other appearance.”

Nina tried to dodge the hand pressing on her head. This Uncle Duncan was much taller and bigger than the one in her memory. His palm was broader and rougher too. The callused fingers brushed across her forehead and made her feel ticklish.

After a while, when he finally pulled his hand back, she suddenly lifted her head and stared straight into Duncan's eyes.

"I actually have two 'uncles'… right?"

She suddenly spoke.

Duncan did not look away. Although the question had come suddenly, he was not very surprised.

It was as if he had known long ago that this moment would come sooner or later.

If there was any power in this world that could resist "Captain Duncan's" might, then "the Sun" – no matter which Sun – was an expected choice.

He quietly met Nina's gaze.

"You noticed?"

"…Mm."

Chapter 216: the Vanished's Hospitality

The sea was calm. The breeze was pleasant. The small waves rolled gently, and the sunlight was not very strong. If one did not know what kind of Great Terror lay beneath the Deep Sea, this could even have been called a beautiful and peaceful scene.

It felt as if the terrible nightmare from not long ago, when the entire city-state had been dragged into Doomsday and burned in raging fire, had never happened at all.

On the raised platform at the stern of the Vanished, the dark helm turned by itself with no one touching it, slowly adjusting its angle. Not far away, the sails shifted bit by bit, changing their posture on their own.

Nina sat on the deck at the edge of the platform. She leaned her upper body on the rail, her legs hanging outside, swinging lightly back and forth. Duncan sat on a large wooden barrel beside her.

"…This feeling is very strange. I know you are my Uncle Duncan. I know you are someone I can rely on and trust. But at the same time, another fact is just as clear…"

She sounded as if she were talking to herself, her voice soft and slow.

"I had an uncle. He was an ordinary person. He used to be a very good man, honest and steady, hardworking. But later he became… not so good. He got sick. He started drinking, gambling, and losing his temper. Things got worse every day. At that time, I even felt that going home was a frightening thing…

“But then suddenly, my uncle became good again, like in a dream. His health improved, his temper kept getting better, and the atmosphere at home seemed to return to how it was before. It was even better than before, really. And from then on… I often thought, if only you could really be my uncle forever, how great that would be.”

Duncan slightly frowned.

“You had already noticed back then?”

“Vaguely… but I did not dare be sure. And there is one thing I still cannot figure out.” Nina turned her head and tilted her face up a little. “If it really was the kind of Evil Spirit in the books that took over my home, then why would that Evil Spirit still treat me so well?”

Duncan looked into Nina’s eyes. After a moment, he suddenly smiled.

“I am much stronger than any Evil Spirit.”

“Now I can see that. And you are also much kinder than an Evil Spirit.” Nina smiled too, resting her head on the railing beside her, looking lazy. “You are Uncle Duncan, right?”

“Yes. And I can be that forever.”

“That is really good… I feel much better now.” Nina let out a soft breath. She fell silent for a while before she spoke again, hesitating: “My other uncle… was he calm when he left?”

Duncan remembered the night he truly stepped into the city-state of Pland.

A cultist who could no longer be saved took his last breath in a cold, damp sewer. His gloomy companions were already planning to throw the corpse into the depths of the darkness. In his muddled mind, besides poisonous resentment, there was only twisted, fanatical worship of the Black Sun.

But a little bit of humanity still remained, and he still remembered the family member who had depended on him.

So Duncan had acted for that last bit of humanity.

“He went very peacefully. Now he should already be at rest,” Duncan said softly. “There were not many things he was still worried about at the end. You were among them.”

“That is good, then.” Nina let out a long breath, as if she had finally laid down the last of her burdens. She stretched hard, then simply leaned back and lay flat on the deck. The semi-transparent spirit form sails of the Vanished were reflected in her eyes. “So many things have happened lately, especially today… can you tell me about them? The things you have not told me yet. About this ship, about you, and… about me.”

Duncan rose from the barrel and came to lie down beside Nina. He said: “That will take a long time. Your uncle here has a lot of stories…”

…

“In short, Captain Duncan was just that amazing…”

On the wide deck of the Vanished, Alice was happily telling the Visitors about the captain’s great deeds. She had been chattering on for quite a while. At least two thirds of those deeds were things she had heard from Goathead. Those stories had first been exaggerated by Goathead, and now they had been scrambled all over again by this doll Miss, until they were twisted into something humans could barely understand. If Duncan himself heard them, he would probably jump in shock. Alice herself could not even guarantee she could repeat them correctly a second time.

Yet Shirley and Morris listened to such nonsense with great seriousness, and even Dog at the side put down his newspaper and listened with full attention.

They did not feel there was anything unreasonable in Alice's chaotic stories at all, not even when Alice firmly insisted that there were actually two huge long legs under the Vanished, and that the ship only ran so fast because it sprinted along the seabed.

When it was the big boss of Subspace, when it was the Vanished, the number one calamity on the Boundless Sea, things were supposed to sound outrageous. The more unreasonable, the more likely they were to be true.

In front of them stood Lady Alice, someone who had a place on the Vanished, who followed Mr. Duncan, and who even dared pinch Mr. Duncan's cheek back in the antique shop. What she said had to be right.

"No wonder it is the Vanished…" Morris clapped his hands in praise. He had spent his whole life studying, yet only when he listened to Alice did he realize how short his own knowledge fell. "I have seen many essays in books that study this ship. Those authors sit in their rooms and, relying on imagination alone, can write a whole book. But now it seems more than ninety percent of what they wrote is actually ridiculous…"

No sooner had the old gentleman finished speaking than a firm, authoritative voice suddenly came from the side: "I strongly advise you not to take Alice's words seriously. She is far more outrageous than those made-up books."

The moment this voice sounded, Dog shot up and darted behind Shirley. Morris quickly stood and looked toward the tall figure stepping down the nearby stairs. "Ah, Duncan… Captain, are you done?"

Duncan nodded and walked down the stairs. A small figure then followed him down.

“Nina!” When Shirley saw that figure, she jumped up and ran over in delight. “You are fine! You are back!”

As she stood up to greet Nina, the black chain wrapped around Shirley’s arm snapped tight. Dog, who had been burying his head and pretending he did not exist, was yanked forward by the chain and went tumbling and scrambling along, hopping and shouting: “Hey, slow down, slow down… hey, you are still dragging me… ow, my head…”

“Shirley.” Nina beamed, grabbed Shirley’s arm, and shook it hard twice. Then she bent down to look at Dog, whose skull had just banged into the stairs, and patted his bony head. “And you too, Mr. Dog. I am back.”

Morris also stepped forward to greet his student. Then he turned his head to look at Alice beside him and said: “Miss Alice, what you just said… you made all of that up?”

“I did not make it up! Mr. Goathead said it!” Alice widened her eyes at once. “It said it has served on the Vanished for a whole century. It knows this ship better than anyone!”

Morris looked completely puzzled. “Goathead?”

“My first mate. You will not enjoy dealing with him,” Duncan said casually. Then he let his gaze sweep over the people now standing before him.

Morris, Shirley, Dog. Unplanned passengers, Visitors the Vanished had not seen in a long time.

Back when the situation in the city-state of Pland had been critical, Duncan had already made a plan to use the Vanished’s special nature to strip away the historical corruption. But to be safe, he had still used an emergency teleportation to send the guests who had been taking shelter in the antique shop onto this ship. Now that the troubles in the city-state had calmed down, it was time to think about what came next.

At the very least, old Mr. Morris still had family in the city-state. He would not want to stay on this ghost ship forever.

After a brief thought, Duncan withdrew his gaze.

“I think you already know where you are now, and you already know who I am,” he said. “As you can see, this is the Vanished, and I am the captain of this ship. Over the past century, at least half of the horror tales on the Boundless Sea are more or less related to me.

“I will not comment on how true or exaggerated those tales are. But there is one thing the legends do get right. Once you board the Vanished, it is very hard to cut your ties with this ship. In a sense, after going through AI’s teleportation and the Vanished’s spirit form transformation, you already count as crew members of this ship.

“Sadly, this process is both irreversible and unavoidable.”

Duncan stated this fact straight out. It was also a conclusion he had reached recently from his experiences with the Vanished and with his own power.

Those who encountered the Vanished, those who came into contact with the ghostly flame, would unavoidably form a connection with Duncan, even if he himself did not notice it. The earliest example was the White Oak. The most recent was Vanna.

Morris and Shirley reacted more calmly than Duncan had expected. Only Dog drooped his head and muttered something no one could hear.

It seemed they had already thought of this outcome and were somewhat prepared.

Duncan deliberately paused for two or three seconds, then suddenly smiled and shook his head.

“But there is one way things are different from the legends,” he said, his tone turning lighter. “This ship does not only issue one-way tickets. And as for me, the captain… as you can see, I am not really the kind of calamity in a crazed runaway state that the legends describe.

“Your boarding happened because the situation was urgent back then, so I will not restrict your freedom.”

This time, Shirley and Morris finally widened their eyes a little, especially Morris. A moment ago, the old gentleman had still been worrying over how he could possibly return to the city-state, how he could win back the right to go back to the mortal world from a Subspace shadow. He had not expected the matter to be this simple and was greatly surprised. “So… we can go back?”

“Of course you can.” Duncan smiled. “The crisis in Pland is over. You are free to come and go. But…”

Morris immediately tensed up again.

“But at least stay for a meal before you go,” Duncan said casually. “That is my way of treating guests. The food on the Vanished is simple, but it has its own special flavor. Especially the seafood. They are things you cannot get back in the city-state…”

Chapter 217: The Devout’s Doubt

Heidi suddenly let out a strong sneeze, startling the young monk who was taking notes across from her.

“Are you all right?” The young monk looked at the Miss Psychiatrist in front of him with some concern. “Are you feeling unwell? Any sense of something unusual…”

“I am fine. It was probably just the cool wind on the square just now, plus all the anxiety before. Now I have caught a chill.” Heidi waved her hand before he could finish, rubbing her nose as she spoke. “Where were we?”

“We were at the part where you saw two Mortal Realms overlapping over the city-state while you were in a state similar to Soul Departure, and how the arrival of the Vanished caused one of those Mortal Realms to be stripped away and annihilated.” The young monk glanced at what he had just written and flipped back through the earlier pages. “You also mentioned that you had a crystal pendant, and that you sensed the crystal pendant might be the key.”

“The pendant is already broken,” Heidi said after thinking for a moment and nodding. “My father got that pendant from an antique shop, but I suspect neither my father nor the shopkeeper knew anything about its special nature. It was just a free gift, even with the glass workshop’s label on it.”

“In other words, an item that had extraordinary power but hid its true form, and by chance entered the Lower City and ended up in your hands,” the young monk said as he kept his head down and wrote. “Could you tell me about that antique shop and any detailed features of the pendant? This may help us grasp a fuller picture during the follow-up work. After all, extraordinary items often have the power to tug on fate. Your meeting with it may not have been an accident.”

“Of course, no problem.” Heidi nodded at once and began talking about what she knew. After she had finished explaining the general situation, she hesitated a little, then could not help asking: “Has everyone… come back?”

“From what we know at the moment… yes.” The young monk nodded. “Although almost everyone remembers a scene of the city-state being burned by flames, everything has now returned to how it was before the disaster. The explanation given for now by the Archbishop and the Inquisitors is an historical corruption disaster of Mortal Realm invasion level, but the detailed information still has to be made public.”

He paused and then added: “But your case is the most special. Almost no one remembers how the disaster ended, yet you saw the key process. That is why your testimony is crucial.”

“I understand.” Heidi sighed softly, then seemed to suddenly think of something. “Should I maybe send word home first to say I am safe? It looks like I will not be able to go back right away…”

“We have already sent someone.” The young monk smiled slightly. “You do not need to worry.”

“You have already notified them? Good.” Heidi thought for a moment and nodded slightly. “Then let us go on. What do you need to ask next?”

“All right. Next question. Do you remember any specific details about that ghost ship that floated between the two historical tracks? And when you recall those details, do you experience any mental confusion, or any hallucinations of hearing or sight?”

…

Vanna came to the great cathedral.

This wide, sacred place seemed especially quiet at that moment. Aside from the necessary guards at the entrance, the hall held only Bishop Valentine, standing silently before the holy statue.

Vanna’s footsteps broke the quiet atmosphere in the great cathedral.

Valentine turned his head. He had already removed the splendid robes and crown he wore only at special times. Now he only wore a plain long robe and a soft cap. Aside from the staff in his hand that marked him as the city-state’s bishop, he looked no different from an ordinary old man.

Vanna came to stand before Valentine, her expression calm. “Order in the Cathedral district has been restored. The garrison units are returning to their posts one by one to help restore order in the city-state. The high-ranking priests have already gone to the main factories to soothe the steam cores. At least before nightfall, we can make sure the dusk Bell will ring as usual, and the gas supply for the whole city will not be interrupted.”

The old bishop clearly let out a breath of relief. “You have worked hard, Vanna.”

“It was what I should do,” Vanna said calmly. “Even after the corruption faded, the lingering mental and cognitive chaos is still having an effect. Untrained ordinary people can hardly wake up from that disaster all at once. Even City Hall is a mess right now, so for now the professionals can only take over order.”

Valentine nodded, then reminded her: “After nightfall, besides ensuring the gas supply, we also need to increase the number of night patrols in every district. They must carry enough consecrated lanterns and incense, in case something slips in through the veil of night. We have just gone through a Mortal Realm invasion. The Mortal Realm foundation where Pland sits is in its most fragile state. We also need to check every nightfall Sanctuary World in the city one by one. Some citizens may still be so frightened that they have locked themselves inside. Once the holy oil in a Sanctuary World runs out, those panicked refugees will become a big problem."

Vanna nodded. "I understand. I will go arrange it in a bit. Tonight I will personally lead a team to inspect the key areas."

"…Just leave it to your deputy," Valentine said, looking at the young inquisitor in front of him with some concern. "Finish what you have on hand and then go rest. You are still hurt."

"My injuries have almost healed since I returned to the great Cathedral," Vanna replied at once, looking the older man up and down. "Your injuries earlier were worse than mine…"

"How could that be the same?" Valentine kept a straight face. "I have already recovered from the historical corruption. You, on the other hand, actually fought your way through the entire city-state twice in and out of the Veil. I can see how weak you are right now."

Vanna said nothing. She only turned silently, lifted her head, and under the glow of candles and gas lamps, she quietly let her gaze rest on the statue of the storm Goddess Gamona.

The great hall fell into a brief silence until Valentine broke it. "What are you thinking about?"

"I am wondering how I should write the second half of this report." Vanna sighed. "When Her Eminence the Pope wants to know about this disaster in Pland, how are we supposed to explain to her how all of this ended?"

Valentine’s expression also became rather complicated.

“In a way… well, we do not even need to say in a way.” The old bishop struggled for a long time, then could only sigh just like Vanna. “The fact is that the arrival of the Vanished extinguished the historical corruption brought by the Ender and stopped the birth of the Black Sun that was about to appear in the mortal world. Even though we do not know what that ghost captain’s purpose was in doing all this, there is no doubt…”

The old bishop stopped. After nearly half a minute of silence, he finally spoke in a low voice. “Pland survived because of the coming of the Vanished.”

“Perhaps he came for the Sun fragment.” Vanna had many thoughts in her heart, but she did not say them all out loud. “Do you still remember that ship, the White Oak? That ship faced the Vanished head on and finally got away intact, with only Anomaly 099 taken. Perhaps Captain Duncan’s goal was much simpler than everyone imagines.”

“Stealing away a Sun fragment is not the same as stealing an Anomaly,” Valentine said, shaking his head. “But you are right. This is indeed the only explanation we can think of for now. If Her Eminence the Pope wants an answer, this is the only one we can give her. The rest is to report everything that happened here truthfully and see what conclusions the priests of the great Storm Cathedral can reach.”

Vanna gave a quiet hum in reply, then turned back again, her gaze once more settling on the statue of the Goddess.

“Your heart is still very unsettled.” After knowing her for many years, Valentine could certainly sense that something was wrong with Vanna’s state. “Vanna, we have already discussed the affairs of the city-state and the Church. What else is shaking your resolve now?”

“I… I am fine.”

“We have known each other for many years,” Valentine said, shaking his head. “Although by office you and I are equals, in daily life you have always treated me as an elder you can trust. I can see that something has been off with you ever since you came back. What exactly happened?”

Vanna was silent for a while. She looked up at the veiled Goddess, then after a moment lowered her gaze and looked at her own body.

Dante Wayne’s words still seemed to echo in her ears.

In the great fire eleven years ago, in that source of the flame the Enders had used to open the historical corruption, her uncle had actually failed to rescue her.

That fire was the beginning of the historical corruption, the dividing line between the true history and the false history. The people who died that night had truly died. Only after that fire did Pland’s destruction and its survival split into two completely opposite world lines.

In other words, she, a person who had died on the night of the fire, was never supposed to have survived.

It was Subspace’s divine blessing that had let her live until today.

The crazed shouts of that Ender atop the bell tower still rang in her ears:

“You will undergo true resurrection, and you will be born only to die again…”

She had already undergone true resurrection.

But she had not been born only to die again.

The appearance of the Vanished had cut all of that off.

Now she was still standing here in one piece, breathing the air of the mortal world and feeling the warmth of the living.

Even the storm Goddess still bestowed divine blessing on her, using the sea wind's gentle power to heal all the wounds on her body left by the earlier battles.

This even made Vanna feel, for the first time in her life, a confusion related to the Goddess.

Did the storm Goddess truly not care about the fact that she had survived only because of Subspace's divine blessing?

And as that doubt stretched and spread further, the things it led Vanna to think of made her shiver even more.

If what that Ender and Captain Duncan had said was true, then at this very moment the whole city-state of Pland had already been soaked in the Vanished's flames. Every person in this city-state, even the land itself, had already become blasphemous heretics.

Yet the divine blessing still remained in the great Cathedral. Every Deep Sea priest in Pland still received answers to their prayers to the Goddess just as before.

For the first time in her life, Vanna began to doubt the faith she had always held.

Chapter 218: The Survivors

The holy statue of the Storm Goddess Gamona stood quietly in the Cathedral, as it always did, majestic, mysterious, and silent.

The veil over her face seemed not only to cover the Goddess's features, but also to shroud some kind of link between the mortal world and the God. For the first time, Vanna realized that she did not actually know, and did not even understand, what kind of existence the God she worshipped really was.

All this time, she had taken it for granted to believe in everything about storms and the Deep Sea. She had never, until today, thought about these questions this way. She had never tried to look at her bond with the God from a questioning point of view.

She shivered and snapped out of her brief daze. Her heart pounded hard, and a layer of cold sweat broke out across her back.

Thoughts gave rise to heresy, and the gods must not be probed.

She could not believe that those almost blasphemous ideas had come out of her own head. To start questioning the God's "actions" was already little different from becoming a Heretic.

Yet in the next second, she heard the soft sound of waves by her ear. The familiar gaze and gentle comfort from the Goddess rose up as always, easing the pain built up in her body and soothing her mind.

Even here in the great Cathedral, even with such wavering thoughts in her heart, the Goddess was the same as ever… Was it because the gods were ignorant too, or because the Lord simply did not care?

"…You really don't need to rest?" Valentine's voice suddenly came from beside her, breaking off Vanna's second bout of distraction. The old man looked at the young Inquisitor at his side with worry. In his memory, Vanna had never stood this dazed before the Goddess. "You look absent-minded… Wounds of the body heal easily. Weariness of the mind is much more troublesome."

"I…" Vanna hesitated a little. "Maybe I really am a bit tired."

"Then go and rest. Leave the follow-up to me," Valentine said at once. Before she could say anything else, he quickly added: "I just got word that Mr. Dante has returned to the mansion safely. I think… your family needs you very much right now, and you need your family too."

"Uncle…" Vanna paused. The scene of parting with her uncle rose in her mind. A strange feeling tugged at her mood and finally pushed away her last bit of stubbornness. "All right, then I'll go first. I'll leave this place to you."

"Go without worry," Valentine nodded lightly. "May the storm shelter you."

"…May the storm shelter you." Vanna echoed softly.

A dark gray steam car drove out from the Cathedral square. After passing the checkpoint at the central district intersection, it headed first toward the Governor's mansion.

Vanna sat in the front passenger seat. At the wheel was Heidi, who had just finished answering questions inside the Cathedral.

"Thanks. I still have to trouble you to drive me," Vanna said quietly to her friend as the scenery slid backward outside the window. "You could have left much earlier."

“No need to be polite with me,” Heidi said casually as she watched the road and held the steering wheel. “And I couldn’t have left earlier anyway. That young friar asked me a whole pile of questions, then made me sit in incense smoke for half the day. All ‘necessary safety measures’. By the time they were done, it was already close to evening.”

Vanna looked out the window. She saw the city-state’s Guard Corps and Guardians patrolling the streets. Frightened citizens hurried across the road. Some people who looked like they had just left the shelters were stopping passersby to ask what had happened. Every so often she saw a Constable with a loudhailer standing at a corner, announcing the latest situation to the nearby crowd: that the city-state had been disturbed by Visions, that the danger had been removed, that a Third-Level Lockdown would be in effect tonight, and so on.

Pland looked like a patient just recovering from a serious illness. Order in the city-state was still chaotic. Yet even this tense and jumbled scene filled Vanna with an indescribable sense of relief and… warmth.

Fear and nerves were proof of being alive. Only those who had survived the disaster had the right to be this uneasy at this moment. And the sunrise of the next day would be the best comfort Pland could receive.

“You okay? You look awful,” Heidi asked. Even while driving, she noticed Vanna’s fatigue and dazed look. “This is the first time I’ve ever seen you like this since we were kids. I always thought you were forged from a sheet of steel.”

“…If I told you that when the Rain of Fire fell, I fought my way alone through the whole city-state, would you believe me?” Vanna glanced at her friend. After leaving with Heidi, her nerves had already begun to relax. “I’m exhausted.”

“I do, of course I do. It’s you we’re talking about. If you told me you fought your way back from Subspace, I’d believe it,” Heidi said without changing her expression, nodding as if it were obvious. Then she suddenly looked Vanna up and down. “No wonder you’re this drained…”

Vanna felt awkward under her gaze: “Your eyes look weird.”

“I just suddenly had an idea,” Heidi said with a serious face. “Do you want to go to the Marriage Counseling Center right now?”

“…Why?”

“It’s so rare to see you this weak. Maybe there’s finally someone you can’t beat up. That wouldn’t even break your second vow back then: ‘In every fight, I will give it my all’,” Heidi went on, her thoughts already flying, not caring at all about how Vanna’s expression was twisting. “Otherwise, after you go home and sleep, you’ll be invincible again, and the Marriage Counseling Center will have to keep sending people to the hospital every few days…”

Vanna curled her fist a little.

The sharp crack in the air made Heidi fall silent at once.

After two seconds of quiet, Heidi muttered: “If you don’t want to, you don’t want to. You’ve been threatening me since we were kids. You even stole my lunches…”

The car grew quiet. After a few seconds of silence, Vanna suddenly spoke softly: “Thanks. I feel much calmer now.”

“Of course. I am the best psychiatrist in Pland, after all. And you really do need to be in a good state to face Mr. Dante,” Heidi said with a satisfied smile, as if her plan had worked. Then she brought the car to a smooth stop. “You’re home, my invincible Lady Knight. Cheer up. Every one of us picked up an extra life today.”

Picked up an extra life…

Heidi had only said it casually, but for some reason, Vanna thought of something the believers of the death cult often said—

Survival was not a right given at birth, but a thing whose price had already been paid in advance.

Vanna lowered her eyes and took a slow breath. After thanking and saying goodbye to her friend, she got out of the car and walked toward the nearby front door.

Heidi sat in the car, quietly watching Vanna’s back as she walked away. After a while, she started the engine, turned the car around, and drove toward her own home.

Was Father safe now? If he was safe, then… what was he doing at this moment?

…

Outside the cabin, lightning flashed and thunder rolled as a storm rose. Gale winds drove huge waves that slammed again and again against the tall hull of the Vanished. Under the deep, dark sea surface, it felt as if some unnameable giant beast had been enraged and was pouring boundless malice into the world.

Through the porthole, they could see giants wreathed in blazing flame standing at the bow, their burning chains stretching down into the sea. Some vast creature with countless tentacles, almost as large as the Vanished itself, was thrashing wildly under the surface. Tentacles bristling with eyes and fanged mouths kept breaking out of the water and climbing up the hull, as if trying to tear free of the chains, or drive the Vanished out of this stretch of sea.

Inside the cabin, whale-oil lamps burned bright, yet they could not dispel the tension and fear. Shirley had already curled into a shivering ball with Dog in her arms, listening to the noise outside with a horrified face. Dog stretched his neck hard to keep from being choked and asked Alice: “Y-you… you’re sure the c-captain is just fishing?!”

“Of course,” Alice nodded calmly and firmly, with a look that seemed to say: “You city people are so easy to scare.” “Fishing is the captain’s biggest hobby.”

“I finally know why you always make that face whenever you talk about Mr. Duncan’s fish…” Shirley finally realized something. She looked at Dog with a miserable expression. “If… if I’d known back when I ate it…”

Before she could finish, Morris, who had been sitting across from them with his eyes closed, suddenly opened them. The old gentleman stared at the girl opposite him in horror: “You… ate the, uh, ‘fish’ Mr. Duncan caught?”

“How was I supposed to know?!” Shirley almost burst into tears. She turned her head toward Nina: “You… you never told me your uncle’s fish were caught like that…”

“I didn’t know either,” Nina shook her head. Her expression was not as exaggerated as the others. She even looked a little… excited. She leaned over the table, peering through the porthole at the scene on deck. The tentacles bursting out of the water did not frighten her. They only filled her with curiosity. “What do you think… how do those things end up turning into fish?”

To be fair, Nina was acting no different now than she did in the city-state, as cheerful and lively and bright as always. That kind of behavior was normal in peaceful streets. Staying like this at the Vanished’s “fishing spot” was what made it a bit scary. Only now did Shirley seem to notice a startling side of Nina: “You and your uncle are both terrifying, really…”

Nina scratched her hair, looking puzzled: “Really? I think it’s fine…”

As they spoke, Alice suddenly stood up and walked out.

Shirley tensed up at once: “Ah, where are you going?”

“To get dinner ready, of course,” Alice said, as if it were obvious. “The captain is about to finish dealing with that big fish.”

Alice left, and the few people who had boarded the ship by accident, the Visitors, looked at one another in the cabin.

“I… I want to go home…” Shirley hugged Dog tight, on the verge of tears.

The red light in Dog’s bloodshot eyes flickered: “You’re choking me…”

Morris suddenly let out a sigh.

Nina quickly asked: “Teacher, why are you sighing?”

“I think I can write a book once I get back,” Morris said after thinking for a moment, spreading his hands. “I’m just worried my daughter will think I’ve lost my mind…”

Nina: “…?”

Chapter 219: The New Crew Members

Duncan returned to the cabin with a rich haul.

With a heavy thud, he threw down a big fish almost as tall as an adult. Then he tossed several smaller ugly fish beside it in a noisy scatter.

“Those fish really struggled today. Good thing I’m still stronger,” Duncan said in a proud, cheerful tone. He raised a hand to wipe his forehead. He had not actually broken a sweat, but as an angler showing off a pile of big fish, wiping his brow felt like the basic respect due to his catch. “Come and take a look. These count as a specialty from the depths of the Boundless Sea. They look ugly, but they taste pretty… Why do you all look like that?”

Duncan finally tore his gaze from his catch and looked up. In the cabin, Shirley, Morris, and Dog were all huddled far away. Dog’s expression was hard to read, but Morris and Shirley both clearly looked very unwell.

Only Nina ran over, greeting him as usual: “Uncle Duncan!”

Then she stared curiously at the fish on the floor.

They really were fish, though very ugly. They were indeed the same kind Uncle Duncan had brought home before.

“They’re really so ugly…” Nina sighed in wonder. “So they look even uglier before they get dried? And how did they end up like this…”

“Why do they all look like that?” Duncan finally asked, staring at Shirley and Morris on the other side of the cabin as if they had seen a ghost.

“They got scared by the noise when you were catching the fish, Uncle,” Nina answered at once. Then she thought for a moment and looked a bit embarrassed. “Actually, I was startled too. You make quite a scene when you fish…”

“I make a lot of noise when I fish?” Duncan frowned in confusion, as if he faintly sensed something. He looked up at Morris sitting far away. “Did something happen just now?”

Only then did Morris carefully get up from his chair. He cautiously approached the ugly strange fish, bent down, and looked them over again and again. Only after he confirmed they had really turned into fish did he speak, hesitating: “Mr. Duncan, are you… on very bad terms with the Deep Sea Spawn? Bad enough that you twisted them into this shape…”

Duncan froze. He finally understood what the constant sense of wrongness had been. He slowly turned his head toward Nina and said thoughtfully: “… In your eyes, what I caught weren’t fish?”

“They are now, but they weren’t before,” Nina answered in a small voice, sticking out her tongue. “We saw you fighting something huge just now. It looked… like this…”

Nina stretched her arms wide, trying to show the size of that vast sea monster that should never appear within human reason. Then she described what she had seen on deck just now. As she spoke, Duncan’s expression grew serious, and he sank into thought.

“That’s about it,” Nina finally finished. She glanced again at the bizarre fish, sounding full of disbelief. “We just didn’t expect that thing to actually turn into… fish.”

Duncan fell silent for a while before muttering thoughtfully: “That sounds like a very large octopus…”

Shirley, who had been hiding and saying nothing, finally plucked up her courage and edged closer. She could not help asking when she heard that: “Octopus? What’s that?”

“It’s also edible,” Duncan explained. “It looks scary, but it tastes fine.”

At those words, Shirley and Morris’s faces both twisted into quite a sight again.

Duncan paid no attention to their reactions. He only stared at his catch and fell into thought.

So the “fish” he caught had not been fish at the start.

The Deep Sea Spawn, the terrible monsters of the Boundless Sea, the sea monsters that made captains and sailors tremble, only became fish after he “hooked” them.

Why did this change happen?

At first Duncan felt surprise and confusion, but in the end, all of it merged into a more basic question:

Could he still eat the fish?

Duncan hesitated for a moment, but after a few seconds he had his answer. He had eaten them before, and aside from looking ugly, they tasted quite good.

This was the Boundless Sea. The Boundless Sea already held endless strange things. Compared with those truly unspeakable Great Terrors, what was so shocking about Deep Sea monsters turning into ugly fish once they came ashore? The words “Deep Sea Spawn” sounded impressive, but if you loosened your thinking a bit, Deep Sea Spawn were just another sort of sea monster. Looking over human civilization, how many creatures once treated as terrifying beasts had eventually ended up on the table?

In Duncan's view, the essence of the whole thing was just one kind of ingredient turning into another kind of ingredient on the Vanished…

"I've eaten it anyway." These words wiped away all his doubts. He decided not to worry about it. He could just treat it as having uncovered the secret behind this ingredient's delicious taste. If he was really worried, he could always ask Alice to cook it a bit longer.

Shirley and Morris watched as Duncan's expression turned cheerful again and heard his conclusion: "No need to think too hard. I'll take these fish to the kitchen first."

Shirley forgot to be cautious: "We're really going to eat them?!"

"It's not like you haven't before," Duncan said, giving the young lady a strange look. "Didn't you enjoy them last time?"

Shirley: "…"

No matter what the Visitors thought, this special dinner on the Vanished was served in the end.

And for Duncan, today was bound to be a special day too.

After such a long stretch of emptiness, the Vanished finally had a day that could barely be called "lively". In the cabin amidships, the dining room that had been shut for so long was opened again. Bright whale-oil lamps drove away the gloom. The long table had been polished until it shone, and on it lay the richest meal the ship could offer now—

Freshly baked bread, vegetable soup, stewed peas and meat, jam and mashed potatoes, two kinds of light wine and one strong liquor, and fish.

And of course, AI's fries and ketchup.

Duncan sat at one end of the long table, with Nina beside him and Alice on his other side to make up the numbers. Along the sides sat Shirley, Dog, Morris, and AI.

To be fair, compared with the huge dining room and long table, this small handful of people did not really count as “lively”. Strictly speaking, Morris was the only truly ordinary person here. Even so, this would be the most atmospheric meal Duncan had had since coming aboard this ship.

After all, normally the only ones at his side when he ate were Goathead or Alice. The whole ship could not even produce two people who ate human food. When AI finally appeared, her menu had only fries…

And for the few Visitors who had come aboard today, this would likely be the most unbelievable, most unforgettable meal of their lives.

Morris looked down at his plate. The roast fish that Alice had cut with her own hands sat at the center. After cooking, the Spawn’s flesh no longer showed any eerie or frightening trace. It looked like real food, even giving off an inviting smell.

Sitting on the Vanished, living alongside the Shadows of Subspace, sharing the flesh of the Deep Sea Spawn.

Morris almost could not help whispering the holy name of the God of Wisdom Rahm, but he was afraid the God might actually send him a divine blessing and let him see something he should never see.

The atmosphere around the table felt a bit stiff. Duncan noticed this, so he was the first to raise his glass: “First of all, let me welcome you all again. The process was a bit unexpected, but you are now all members of the Vanished. Let’s use this drink as a welcoming ritual.”

Their inner tension quickly gave way. Morris hurriedly lifted his glass and stood. Shirley followed, and Nina copied her. But Duncan quickly glanced at the two girls: “Juice is enough for you two.”

“I’m almost an adult!” Shirley blurted out on reflex.

“I… I’ll just sip a little,” Nina said in a small voice. “Fruit wine would be fine…”

“…Then you two may only drink a little,” Duncan said seriously. “I’ll have Alice keep an eye on you.”

“Okay, Uncle! Okay, Mr. Duncan!”

Morris watched the exchange between Shirley, Nina, and Duncan with some surprise. The scene felt almost too down-to-earth, and it suddenly loosened his taut nerves a little.

And not just Morris’s nerves.

When Nina eagerly took a sip of fruit wine and still ended up coughing again and again, the whole dining room seemed to relax.

Duncan felt it was time to talk about his next ideas and plans.

“After dinner, I’ll have AI take you back to the city-state,” he said, looking around the table, his tone relaxed and calm. “Mr. Morris, you can go straight home. Shirley, Dog, and Nina, you can return to the antique shop.”

Nina was still recovering from her coughing fit when she heard his words and suddenly thought of something: “Cough, cough… Uncle… then you…”

“Of course I’ll be waiting for you there,” Duncan said with a smile, his gaze also resting on Shirley. “In fact, that’s always been the case. I am both here and in the city-state.”

“Uh…” Shirley stared for a few seconds before blinking. “I thought… after you solved Pland’s problem, you wouldn’t pay attention to that city anymore. That you would, like in the stories, just keep sailing on with your adventure…”

“Of course the captain will keep adventuring. The Vanished will still sail on the Boundless Sea,” Duncan said, half smiling as he looked at her. “But the captain still watches the civilized world. As for the Vanished’s crew members… you will go back to the land you know, but there is always the chance you’ll come aboard again if the situation calls for it.”

“…We have to come back?!” Shirley froze for a moment before reacting.

Nina reacted too: “We can come back?!”

Chapter 220: Group

Anyone who encountered the Vanished would inevitably form a “connection” with Duncan. From another angle, Duncan, this “outsider”, also needed to build such connections widely in this world. Only by gaining as many channels of knowledge and help as possible could he learn more about this world, learn about the supernatural field, and even… learn about himself.

The reason Morris and the others were brought onto the ship might have been just the urgency of the situation at the time. But even if they had not boarded today, Duncan already planned to expand his “influence” in this world. In his eyes, the few people now gathered on the Vanished just happened to be excellent candidates.

Morris, an outstanding historian, a learned scholar, and a believer of the God of Wisdom, held precious knowledge. That was what Duncan lacked most right now. At the same time, this old gentleman was also a “social elite” with a certain status and network in the human world. At the right time, that would also be very useful.

Shirley and Dog, a controlled Abyssal demon and the summoner who had a symbiotic pact with that demon, had fighting power. They also held knowledge about the Abyssal Deep and even some knowledge related to Subspace. This knowledge happened to complement Morris, the “human scholar”. Besides that, the pair had a special way of sensing. They could detect traces left by supernatural power at no cost or at a very small cost.

Nina, his well-behaved and adorable niece.

And, incidentally, the current vessel of the Sun fragment.

Duncan’s gaze slowly swept across the long table. Around it, some faces were tense, some stiff, and some simply filled with curiosity.

They did not seem to notice that a very special “group” had already faintly taken shape during this dinner. What tied this group together was the shared identity they all had at this moment:

crew members of the Vanished.

“My earlier promise still stands. Your status as crew members of the Vanished will not restrict your personal freedom. I do not need forced loyalty, and I do not need any sacrificial rites or offerings and the like. None of that has any meaning to me,” Duncan said slowly. His voice was low, and the gentle sound of waves drifted in through the porthole not far away. “But since the link between you and me has already been established, this link can be seen as the foundation for a loose team.”

“To be honest, I had stayed away from the civilized world for many years. Morris should know this very well. The Vanished had not had contact with any city-state in the past century. In the civilized world there are many terrifying stories about me and about this ship. I admit those stories have a basis in fact, because for many years… this ship was in a runaway state.

“But as you can see, I took back my humanity and stabilized the Vanished again. And now… I am very interested in the civilized world a century later.”

Duncan spoke unhurriedly. These were words he had carefully prepared earlier while fishing. He needed to recruit crew members, but the terrifying history of the Vanished meant that any new recruit coming aboard would not be in a good mood about their new post. So he needed a set of reasonable, gentle, and proper reasons to calm the emotions of these new recruits. The first step was to build an image of a rational and friendly captain.

The Vanished had once been in a runaway state, but now the captain had reclaimed his humanity and regained control of the ship. That was the premise for the team to exist.

As for whether the new recruits believed it or not… that was their problem.

He had to admit, fishing really was a relaxing pastime that was good for thinking. Duncan felt he really should thank nature for its gift… or thank the Deep Sea Spawn instead.

Hearing Duncan's explanation, a thoughtful look appeared on Morris's face. He still did not quite dare to believe that the voice he heard was truly real. In fact, he did not even dare to believe that the Vanished he saw now was truly the real ship. But when he recalled the friendly attitude Duncan had always shown, he slowly began to persuade himself.

At the very least, if this explanation was true, the friendly behavior of this Subspace shadow would seem a bit more reasonable and believable.

Shirley was still thinking, as if she had not fully understood what was going on. But Dog, sitting beside her, had already reacted. The Abyssal Hound took a bold glance at Duncan and asked: "So that means you need us to be your retainers, to help you do some things in the world?"

"Only when it is needed," Duncan said with a smile. "When I need it. Besides, I do not think this relationship counts as retainers. You are crew members, so just call me Captain. Or you can keep addressing me the way you did before."

Shirley and Dog both answered with a simple "Oh". Not far away, after a brief pause to think, Morris suddenly spoke: "Then how will you contact us? Ah, of course, I know you have an avatar in the city-state of Pland, but I mean…”

“I know what you mean,” Duncan said, nodding lightly before Morris could finish. “If I want to find you, I will naturally find you at once. And if something happens and you need to contact me, you can call my name or the name of the Vanished near a smooth mirror surface. I can hear it. Besides, fire can strengthen my power, so if you are in danger, you can light a flame after calling my name.”

Morris listened, his expression a little complicated. After all, he was still a believer of the God of Wisdom, yet now he had half willingly joined a heretical group like this and was even learning knowledge from a Subspace shadow. That made him feel somewhat uneasy. But what made him even more uneasy was that the charm bracelet on his wrist, with its remaining four stone beads, did not react at all.

The Lord did not see. The Lord did not care. The Lord thought he was right. No matter which answer it was, it made the old gentleman feel complicated inside.

After hearing Duncan’s words, Nina’s eyes widened a little. She even looked a bit excited: “That sounds amazing!”

Duncan gave her a light look and said: “You do not need any extra fire…”

Nina did not react for a moment. “Huh? Why?”

Then, before Duncan could answer, she suddenly understood. She waved her hands in a hurry and said: “Oh, I get it, I get it, I can…”

“Do not change here!” Duncan saw the air around Nina already starting to twist a little and quickly cut her off. “Before you can fully control the power brought by the Sun fragment, you are not allowed to try to switch your form in enclosed spaces or in crowded places!”

Nina’s head drooped at once. “Oh…”

Duncan watched the air around the young lady slowly return to normal and felt the heat fade away. Only then did he let out a soft breath of relief.

With the help of this Flame Usurper bearer, the Sun fragment inside Nina was already under control. But clearly, the young lady herself still did not fully realize how powerful the force sleeping inside her really was. No matter how mature and sensible she might be, she was still only sixteen or seventeen. For someone that age, the fresh rush brought by first touching supernatural power was not so easy to suppress.

If there was a chance, he still needed to let her get used to her power more out here on the wide, empty Boundless Sea. On one hand, that would make the Sun fragment more controllable. On the other, it would make her understand just how dangerous that star-born flame really was.

“We might add new members in the future,” Duncan thought for a moment, then said. “So let us treat a dinner like today as the standard process for a new recruit joining. I think it will help deepen the bonds between team members.”

Morris subconsciously glanced at the plate before him and felt that he was seeing the truth hidden behind a warm, cozy scene once again.

Dining together under the gaze of a Subspace shadow, sharing the flesh and blood of a Deep Sea Spawn, and learning rituals and spells to summon supernatural power, this…

The whole set really gave him a strong sense of deja vu.

But what else could he say? He was already a member of this ship. He had already accepted Mr. Duncan’s protection. The flesh of the Deep Sea Spawn, the key part of this ritual, already sat before him. At this point, quitting was impossible. He could only, like the pigeon beside him that had been gobbling fries since just now, calmly accept the fate of “it really is delicious”…

The old gentleman let out a soft sigh in his heart and fully accepted this sudden turn in his fate, while silently comforting himself. From today on, he was like those legendary scholars whose names were worthy of the history books, stepping onto a one way road toward the abyss of truth. There was probably nothing left in this world that could still strike him as strange or sinister.

As he was thinking this, he suddenly heard Miss Alice, who had been silent not far away, break the silence. The beautiful lady had been standing quietly behind Duncan the whole time, and only now did she seem to realize something: “Ah, Captain, does that mean I will not be the only crew member here anymore?”

“You only just realized?” Duncan tilted his head and glanced at the doll. “Of course you are no longer the only crew member here. And before they leave later, you still have to teach them the crew rules, just like Goathead taught you back then.”

Alice froze for a moment, finally understanding what was going on. Then she belatedly smiled and clapped her hands happily. “Great! Then from now on I will…”

The next second, maybe because she was too excited, a familiar sound reached Duncan’s ear. “Pop!”

A head still wearing a golden wig dropped down right beside him and rolled to the middle of the table in full view of everyone.

The table went silent at once, until Shirley’s scream broke it. “Aaah, the head fell off, the head fell off! It fell, it fell, it fell!”

The scene instantly became chaotic. Shirley and Nina shouted in shock, Dog was cursing, and Alice’s stammering cries for help rose again and again. Mixed in with it was AI’s loud cooing. Morris watched all of this with a blank expression and suddenly felt that it might take him much longer to fully get used to this new team…

Chapter 221: Reunion

The familiar house stood quietly at the end of the quiet street, bright and warm light shining out from the windows on the first floor.

The sky was already completely dark. The streetlights on both sides of the road made the surroundings seem even more still. Heidi slowed the car a little. In the last hundred meters before the house gate, she used slow, deep breaths to gently adjust her feelings.

She had helped Vanna calm down, but she knew that her own mood was not as relaxed and calm as she seemed.

The scene of saying goodbye to Father felt as if it had happened only a moment ago. At that time she still had no idea what would happen in the city state, while Father had clearly sensed something already.

It was a farewell between life and death that she only understood afterward.

Father had told her to go to the Cathedral to seek shelter, while he himself went to that antique shop in the Lower City. But why did he have to go to that antique shop?

A trace of doubt rose in Heidi’s heart, but she quickly set it aside. The light in the entry hall at home was on. It was waiting for her.

The dark gray car drove smoothly into the yard. Heidi pushed open the front door, walked a few steps inside, and suddenly stopped in surprise.

The one waiting for her at home was not Father, who in theory should have gotten back long ago, but Mother. Mother wore a wool shawl with dark blue stripes and sat on a high backed chair by the dining table, a delicate pair of glasses on her nose as she read the newspaper with full attention. On the table beside her sat a tall stack of newspapers, which looked like old issues that had been moved out of Father's study.

Heidi froze in the doorway of the dining room, unable to react for a moment.

She could no longer remember how long it had been since Mother last walked out of that bedroom. It seemed that for many years, the Mother in her memory had always stayed in that dimly lit room, while there was always an empty seat left by the dining table at home. Father said that seat was reserved for Mother, yet no one ever sat there.

Heidi had always felt this was very strange, but after so many years, she had grown used to Mother never leaving the room. Until now. Seeing Mother sitting in that chair, she felt an unreal sensation, as if a whole lifetime had passed.

Heidi walked forward two steps without thinking. Her footsteps finally drew the old lady's attention. Mother looked up, saw her daughter, and at once smiled. "Ah, Heidi, you are back."

"I…" Heidi opened her mouth and suddenly did not know how to talk to her Mother. She clearly went to her parents' bedroom almost every day to greet her, yet at this moment she felt as if she had not seen Mother in more than ten years. "I was delayed for a while at the Cathedral. Are you… are you feeling better?"

"I am fine. I am right here," Mother said happily with a smile. There was a light in her eyes that Heidi could not read. She rose from the chair and slowly came to stand in front of her daughter. She stared a little dazed at Heidi's face, then reached out and touched her hair. "Let me look at you properly… It has been so long since I really looked at you…"

“Do we not see each other every day?” Heidi said without thinking. Then she looked at the old lady with some worry. “Why did you come out of the bedroom? Are you feeling better today?”

Mother smiled, as if talking to herself, yet also as if speaking to her daughter. “I am better, I am better… By the way, why is Morris still not back?”

“Father has not come home yet?” Heidi froze when she heard this, a faint worry rising in her heart. “He should have been here earlier. The place he went is closer than the Cathedral, and he would not have been delayed for half a day like me…”

“Maybe the car broke down on the way,” Mother said slowly. “His driving skills have never been anything to praise. Come, let us wait for him together.”

Heidi hesitated, then nodded and followed Mother back to the table. Soon she noticed the rich dishes laid out there. They were not the few simple dishes usually made by the temporary maid the family had hired.

“Did you cook this?” Heidi looked up in surprise. “It has been so long since you cooked.”

“Yes, it has been a long time. I could not even find where the ingredients were. I had to ask that maid to help me find many of them, and I do not know how it tastes,” Mother said with a faint smile. “Luckily, I still remember the general steps.”

Heidi listened, her gaze dropping to the food on the table. She could not help picking up her fork, wanting to taste a bite. But just as she raised her hand, Mother’s voice came from the side. “Wait until your Father gets home before we eat.”

Heidi’s movement stopped at once.

She had not heard that sentence in many years either.

Just then, a faint sound suddenly came from near the door. It sounded like the flapping of some large bird’s wings, mixed with soft crackling. Heidi had just begun to wonder what it was when she heard the sound of someone taking out a key and turning the knob. The front door opened not far away.

Father was back.

Morris stood blankly in the doorway. The dizziness caused by AI teleporting him straight from the Vanished had not yet faded. The rolling, chaotic sensations made his head spin so much that for more than ten seconds, he thought he was hallucinating.

He saw his wife sitting by the dining table, waiting for him to come home and eat.

Then he realized it was not an illusion.

The sacred miracle he had prayed for from Subspace eleven years ago had finally, after this crossing of flame and history, become fixed on this side of the Veil. Something he had not dared to hope for even in his dreams had come true.

After standing like a statue for a long moment, Morris finally moved. He took a step forward, then walked faster and faster.

On the Vanished, he had shared the flesh of the Deep Sea Spawn with the retainers, learned Listening rite knowledge from a Subspace shadow, and become a member of a secret society. Just a short while ago, these things had weighed on his heart like a heavy burden. But suddenly, that weight seemed to vanish. In all of this, he seemed to glimpse the most reasonable explanation.

The fulfillment of any sacred miracle required a price to be paid. Now that price had fallen on him in the gentlest, warmest way.

It was time to accept it gladly.

His wife rose from the table, and Morris pulled her into a tight embrace.

“I can finally see you…” The old scholar’s voice was low, as if he feared that Heidi might overhear yet also feared that his wife would not. “I…”

“All right, the child is watching. You will have plenty of time to explain to me what happened. There is no rush right now.”

“Oh… oh, you are right, you are right.”

Morris answered in a bit of a panic. He let go of his wife and turned his head, and saw Heidi looking at them in surprise.

“Ahem… I came back late. On the way… the car broke down. I will have to find someone to tow it back tomorrow,” Morris explained awkwardly, then quickly changed the subject. “Are you all right? At the Cathedral… everything was fine?”

“Except for being badly frightened and full of confusion, I am unharmed, just like everyone else,” Heidi answered, then looked her father up and down. “But you… why do I feel you are acting strange? Did something happen on the way back?”

“What could happen to me?” Morris said at once, as if afraid Heidi would steer the topic toward what he had been doing lately. Right after that, he noticed the rich dishes on the table.

The old scholar’s expression instantly became complicated.

“I… already ate before coming back,” he said hesitantly. “On the ship… at Mr. Duncan’s place.”

The ugly, terrifying “fish” appeared in his mind.

At the Feast of Subspace, he had been as nervous about the fish as that strange Abyssal Hound. But under Mr. Duncan's gaze, he had still forced himself to eat the flesh of the Deep Sea Spawn. He did not remember very clearly what had happened afterward.

He only remembered that it had been truly delicious.

Right now, he felt he could not eat another bite.

But his wife's voice came from the side just then. "I made this myself."

"Mother has not cooked in many years," Heidi quickly added. "She felt a bit better today, so…"

"Then I will have some more." As soon as Morris heard that, he sat down at the table before his daughter could finish her sentence. The first thing he did was pick up the soup bowl and pour down a big gulp.

"How does it… taste?" his wife asked expectantly from the side.

"A little… salty," Morris said hesitantly. Then he raised the bowl again and gulped down several more mouthfuls, swallowing as he laughed. "Salty, very salty… Your cooking is always this salty…"

"If you think it is bad, then do not eat it!"

"I never said it was bad…"

"Then shut your mouth and eat. Why are you talking so much at the table?"

Heidi looked up and glanced at her father, then at her mother.

She had not heard this kind of conversation in many years. After all these years, it seemed that nothing had changed.

So she smiled, lowered her head, cut off a piece of fried steak, and put it into her mouth.

It really was a little salty.

…

Uncle had already gone to bed and was sleeping very soundly. It seemed he had not had a good sleep in a very, very long time, so much so that he had started nodding off halfway through their conversation.

Vanna slowly walked toward her bedroom.

She had already changed into a simple home dress and tied her hair into a ponytail. After taking off her scarred armor and putting down the greatsword, the battle worn Inquisitor drew back all her killing intent. She now looked like a young lady who, like any ordinary person, had her own life and her own joys and sorrows.

At home, she did not hide her feelings or her worries, so Uncle had clearly seen how heavy her heart was. But during their talk just now, he had not asked anything.

The two of them had also, with silent agreement, avoided mentioning the Subspace divine blessing.

It was clear that Uncle did not want to add to her burden.

But Vanna knew very well that the burden in her heart just now was not only that so called Subspace divine blessing. It was not even about her own life and death.

She returned to her bedroom, closed the door, went to the dressing table, and took from the drawer the ritual dagger with the ornate patterns.

This was a sacred relic of the Deep Sea Church. It was also the gift that Valentine, the bishop, had personally blessed and given to her after she received baptism.

This sacred relic marked the beginning of her faith in Gamona, the storm goddess.

Chapter 222: Wavering

As always, Vanna calmed herself and silently recited the sacred passages from Storm Canon. Then she took from the drawer a half-burned Inscribed Candle, set it by her side, and lit it on the candlestick.

A small, bright flame danced at the tip of the candle. A soothing scent spread slowly as the oil evaporated. Vanna drew in a gentle breath, then, without hesitation, dragged the dagger across her arm.

Blood seeped into the fine patterns on the dagger, as if the blade absorbed it. A brief pain came from her arm, but it did not even last a few seconds before it turned into the faint itch of a closing wound.

Vanna could even hear the soft sound of cells regenerating and blood congealing. She watched as the wound on her arm healed quickly, while the faint sound of waves seemed to echo by her ears.

She looked again at the ritual dagger in her hand. After a slight pause, she held the bloodstained blade over the burning candle and let the flame lick the tip.

“Please hear this Listening Rite, Master of the Storm, Gospel of The Deep Sea, Maiden of the Still Sea. Please hear this Listening Rite. Your follower needs guidance…”

The flame crackled. The blood on the dagger ignited in an instant and turned into a hazy glow that floated along the blade.

This was the sign that the channel had been opened.

A Saint could, using blood as a guide, a special Prayer, and a special ritual, build between herself and the God a channel far more stable and direct than what an ordinary priest achieved in Prayer. This special power and “favor” was exactly what set a Saint apart from the rest of the Clergy.

And as for how stable and how direct this special “channel” truly was…

In a sense, it was almost the same as speaking directly with a god.

The soft sound of waves rose again, growing clearer as if it echoed right inside her mind. Vanna felt the air around her grow damp. Even her nose seemed to catch a faint salty tang. Then her thoughts suddenly blurred, and the scene before her changed.

Her familiar bedroom vanished. Around her stretched endless, gently surging dark-blue seawater. Faint blue lights rose and fell in the depths, as if hundreds of mysterious light sources glowed within The Deep Sea. Vanna felt as if she stood at the center of some vast, shadowy Deep Sea domain. In the rippling light before her, a blurred figure slowly emerged.

It seemed to be a Lady in a long dress. Behind her, vast hazy Shadows spread in all directions. The Lady’s face was hidden behind a veil. The Shadows behind her coiled and wove together like countless chains, or like the outline of some much larger “body” that lay beyond Mortal reason. The figure in the dress was only a small part of that immense body—the one small part Mortals could still bear to perceive.

Vanna drew in a slow breath and tried to steady her heartbeat.

As a Saint, seeing the storm Goddess Gamona’s phantom or avatar form during a special ritual was nothing unusual. But when she thought of how shaken she had been today, and of the almost heretical doubts in her heart, she still could not help feeling nervous.

The mysterious blurred figure seemed to draw a little closer. “She” did not speak, but Vanna felt a “thought” appear directly in her mind.

The Goddess’s phantom was telling her to speak.

“I…” Vanna hesitated for a moment. At last she seemed to make up her mind and spoke directly: “I survived because of Subspace. Why did you still choose me as a Saint and grant me your divine blessing?”

The blurred figure did not move at all. Vanna did not dare to push. She knew that, even though she saw only a projection, that projection pointed straight to Gamona herself. The question she had just asked was a huge risk —

It already went beyond what was proper for a Believer. But she truly wanted to know the answer.

She waited in anxious silence. She did not know how long had passed before a thought suddenly dropped into her mind as if planted there—

“…There is no difference…”

“No difference?” Vanna froze. This answer, cut off at both ends, was even harder to understand than a broken, obscure prophecy or revelation. She instinctively felt that this reply should have other “context” around it, information she had failed to grasp and so could not hear. That thought made her ask again before she could stop herself: “No difference in what? I don’t understand. Do you mean that, even knowing I was once blessed by Subspace, you still chose…”

But Vanna did not finish. The Deep Sea vision around her suddenly lurched and roiled. The gentle, bright lights in the depths went dark one after another. The Goddess’s phantom was on the verge of collapse in the blink of an eye. Vanna felt herself being “pushed” out of the channel. Before the connection was completely cut, she barely sensed a few faint words:

“…Time is short… about to… reach the threshold…”

The connection broke completely.

Vanna felt as if she had been thrown back into the Mortal Realm. Her heart pounded. A near-suffocating pressure made her gasp for breath. She lifted her head and looked around. All the visions had vanished. The dagger had fallen onto the table at some point. Only the Inscribed Candle still burned quietly, its flame flickering, unsteady.

She did not know how long she stared at the flame before she finally looked away. She picked up the fallen dagger and slowly put it back into the drawer.

In her mind circled the only fragments she had received during that brief exchange.

“There is no difference,” and, “Time is short, about to reach the threshold.”

She still had no idea what the first meant. The second sounded more concrete, but it only left her more confused.

Was the Goddess telling her that something was about to happen? Was this a warning that the time to prepare for something was running out? What did “threshold” mean? What was about to reach it? Another crisis? Another disaster on the level of a Mortal Realm invasion?

Was it connected to the crisis Pland had just survived?

Vanna’s thoughts spun. This Prayer had not calmed her at all. Instead, she felt even more uneasy than during the day.

But suddenly, a strange color flickered at the edge of her vision, and her chaotic thoughts stopped at once.

The flame dancing on the Inscribed Candle had, at some point, taken on a faint ghostly green.

In the next second, she snapped her head up toward the dressing table and the oval mirror upon it.

Captain Duncan's figure had appeared within the frame, watching her with a calm gaze.

"Are you all right?"

The dark, imposing figure spoke. The question came very abruptly.

"You?" Vanna jolted and shot to her feet. Then, as if something occurred to her, she added: "Were you the one who disrupted my ritual just now?"

"ritual? I think you misunderstood," Duncan said in the mirror, shaking his head with an easy tone. "I suddenly sensed your aura in extreme turmoil. I thought there was still some troublesome enemy left in Pland, so I came to check… but it seems I was rash."

Sense her aura in chaos… so he came to check on her?

Vanna's mind filled with question marks. She even wondered if she had misheard. Then she recalled the first time she had seen him in the mirror and, by reflex, grew wary again: "Did you drag me into a dream again?"

"You're still in the Mortal Realm, you don't need to worry about that," Duncan said casually. "So I strongly advise you not to leap in here swinging like last time—you really will turn your own room into a mess."

"…I am not some brute who only knows how to jump in swinging," Vanna muttered. Talking with this ghost captain was exhausting. His words and actions always went beyond the records, and every time she was caught off guard like this, she found herself relaxing her guard without meaning to. "Besides 'coming to check on things', what else do you intend to do? I thought… you had already left for good."

In the mirror, Duncan frowned, as if the young Inquisitor's tense hostility gave him a headache. "You really could relax a little. And maybe be a bit more polite. I have indeed left, but distance in time and space doesn't mean much to me. Also—no matter how you look at it, I just protected your city-state. Don't you think you at least owe me a word of thanks?"

Vanna stared hard at the ghost captain in the mirror. After a few seconds, she suddenly stepped forward and actually bowed her head. "Thank you very much for your help. At least in this matter, Pland was under your protection."

This frank gratitude caught Duncan off guard. He had thought this young lady's head was as hard as her muscles. The surprise actually made him a bit embarrassed. "It… doesn't have to be that serious. I was just saying."

"Our positions may be different, but no one can deny that you protected Pland," Vanna said, lifting her head with a serious face. "Countless people survived the disaster today. Setting aside my duty as an Inquisitor, I should thank you for that."

She paused there, then quickly straightened her expression. "But that does not mean I will relax my vigilance toward you and the Vanished. We still do not know what your goal is regarding the civilized world… and until that is clear, I will…"

"That's enough, I understand," Duncan cut her off. He looked at the young Inquisitor with a half-smile. Her words and attitude were far from polite, but this almost overly straightforward nature made it hard to dislike her. "Then let's talk about something else… You seem to be in trouble?"

Vanna met Duncan's gaze. After a few seconds, she drew a quiet breath. "Sorry. It has nothing to do with you."

“…Nothing to do with me, but I’m curious,” Duncan said calmly. “Whether you admit it or not, you cannot shake off the brand I left on you, Vanna. I can feel how bad your state is right now—maybe I can help.”

Chapter 223: Deepening Understanding

To be fair, Duncan was truly sincere at this moment. He admired this Inquisitor’s firm will and blunt nature. He admired how she had acted in the disaster. Even aside from that, he valued Vanna as a special Node very highly.

If not for a string of coincidences, it would have been very hard to plant such a Node among the Church’s top people. Building even the most basic “connection” with such a person was harder still.

Vanna was very straightforward. Because of that, she would not deny Duncan’s merit in protecting Pland. No matter how awkward she felt, she would treat this favor from a Lord fairly.

But Duncan’s sincere attitude would sound more or less terrifying to anyone else.

A bond that could not be cut, like The curse. Subspace Shadows that could invade her thoughts at any time. A higher being so powerful it could reverse a corruption in history, yet with unknown aims—if not for Vanna’s iron will, anyone else would have failed their sanity check several times over by now.

Vanna steadied herself and met Duncan’s gaze without flinching, though her heart stayed tense. Rationally, she still did not dare to believe every word this ghost captain said. Even if he truly had protected Pland, there might be some more terrible scheme behind it—history was full of such schemes. But emotionally…

Her feelings kept telling her not to trust reason too much.

"…What do you really want?" Vanna drew a slow breath. She was questioning him again, but this time there was more than defiance and wariness in her tone. There was seriousness. She wanted to talk properly with this legendary captain and listen carefully to what he had to say. Even if they could not be Friends, they did not have to be enemies for the moment.

After she said this, she paused, then added quickly: "And don't say something like 'get some fries' again… I want to hear something serious."

"…'Get some fries' was serious," Duncan said helplessly. "With lots of ketchup, if possible."

Vanna: "…?"

"I'm trying to improve the food on my ship. Isn't that obvious?" Duncan suddenly laughed. None of Vanna's reactions surprised him. He moved a little in the mirror, as if sitting down on something, and continued in a very relaxed posture: "Vanna, what do you think a captain like me does most of the time?"

"What you do most of the time?" Vanna blinked. She did not notice that their tense conversation had already turned… calmer. Once the figure in the mirror sat down, the talk that followed felt almost like two Friends chatting. "I… never really thought about that…"

"Exactly. You haven't. No one ever thinks about that. A terrifying ghost captain only has to be 'terrifying'. I'm supposed to spend twenty-four hours a day plotting world-shaking schemes. That would fit the story people tell about me. But in reality?"

Duncan spread his hands as he spoke.

“I have a very, very large ship to manage, and a lot of troublesome people on that ship. My Crew Members are always causing a commotion, turning the deck upside down every now and then. The food on the Vanished is another headache. But the biggest problem is hot water. I’m thinking about installing a boiler on board. Do you have any recommendations?”

“I don’t know much about boilers… Wait, no, that’s not the point,” Vanna answered without thinking. Halfway through, she realized something was wrong. She stared wide-eyed at the ghost captain in the mirror, whose half-smile seemed full of teasing… and amusement at her. “Why are you suddenly telling me all this? And… um… are you serious?”

Duncan shifted his posture. He looked into Vanna’s eyes, and his expression slowly grew serious. “Vanna, have you noticed? I’m not as frightening as you imagine. The unknown is the source of fear. Now you know a little more about me.”

Vanna did not speak for a moment. She could no longer keep up with this captain’s pacing and had no idea how to respond.

But after a short silence, she let out a slow breath and tried to change the subject. “…You took away the fragment of the Sun. That also removed another great danger in Pland. I should thank you for that as well.”

The corner of Duncan’s mouth twitched almost invisibly. “…It was nothing. I have a hobby of collecting things.”

But in truth, he wanted to say that he had already sent the fragment of the Sun back to Pland. Nina had first been excited to spend the night on the ship, but then she found she could not sleep anywhere but her own bed…

Duncan was afraid that if he said that out loud, Vanna would leap in swinging again on the spot…

Vanna did not notice the tiny change in his expression. She only nodded lightly and went on: “Order in the city-state is gradually returning. The lingering corruption caused by the Ender has fully faded. And those cultists who tried to summon the Black Sun… have become, just as they wished, fuel for the flames. I hope you are satisfied with that outcome.”

“It’s fine. They’ll show up again sooner or later anyway,” Duncan said offhandedly. “Heretic worshipers are the breath of an Eldritch God. As long as those ‘sources’ are not destroyed, you can never wipe out the cultists completely—just keep cleaning them up the next time you see them.”

Vanna listened thoughtfully to every word, her expression only slightly curious. “It sounds like… you have a very bad relationship with those heretic worshipers.”

“You’re trying to gather intelligence,” Duncan said with a smile. “This is a rare chance in a hundred years to learn directly about ‘Captain Duncan’ and the Vanished—but you can just ask.”

Vanna was speechless for a moment, her face a little awkward. But soon she heard the ghost captain’s frank answer from the mirror: “I don’t like those cultists. I don’t like the Suntists or the Ender. As for the Annihilators who worship the Abyssal Lord… I don’t know them well, but most of them are probably the sort of madmen who annoy me.

“So you can report that straight up the chain. Say that the Vanished is an enemy of all three major cults, and that, whenever conditions allow, Captain Duncan will gladly destroy any cultist who appears before him. That bit of information should be useful.”

“…Thank you for your answer.” Vanna hesitated for a moment, then still nodded very earnestly.

“Anything else you want to know?” Duncan asked again.

Vanna pressed her lips together.

Of course she did. But when it came to the wavering of her own faith and the matter of Subspace, she did not know if asking this ghost captain was the right choice.

In the end, she still did not mention her present confusion and doubt. Instead she asked a question related to herself in a roundabout way: "…I want to know whether Subspace responds to Mortal wishes—and what price is needed for the answer to that question."

Vanna deliberately stressed the word "price" at the end. She knew this question was completely different from their earlier talk.

Their earlier conversation had not touched on any knowledge in the supernatural realm. But this question… was an attempt to seek forbidden knowledge from a Shadow that had returned from Subspace. That was already a dangerous move.

She was not afraid to pay a price. She only wanted to know what that price would be.

"No need to be so tense. There is no price," Duncan said with a laugh in the mirror. "Because I'm really not close to them."

Vanna: "…Huh?"

"Why does everyone think I know all kinds of secrets about Subspace?" Duncan rubbed his forehead, a little helpless. "It's true that I've been there, but I wasn't doing a population survey in Subspace. You live in a neighborhood—does that mean you know every single person on the street?"

Vanna nodded. "I do."

Duncan: "…"

Vanna realized at once what she had just said. A little embarrassed and a little slow on the uptake, she added: “Of course, there might be people I don’t know so well… All right, I get your point.”

“I can’t answer your question, but I can see it’s tied to how bad you felt just now,” Duncan said, his expression turning serious again. “Has something from Subspace latched onto you?”

Vanna gave Duncan in the mirror a strange look.

Duncan thought for a moment, then added: “I mean besides me…”

“I don’t know.” Vanna shook her head. She opened her mouth as if to say more, but in the end said nothing.

“All right. It seems you still have some concerns. I understand,” Duncan said, not at all offended. “But if something from Subspace really is giving you trouble, you can ask me for help—at least in that realm, I can do something for you.”

Vanna fell silent. After more than ten seconds, she suddenly broke the silence. “Why?”

“You’re asking why I’m willing to help you?” Duncan’s voice came from the mirror. To Vanna it still sounded stern and a little gloomy, but now there was a touch of warmth and sincerity in it. “Maybe because we once fought side by side in Pland—Vanna, I admire your resolve and your courage.”

The figure in the mirror stood up.

The ghost captain seemed ready to leave.

Vanna let out a small breath of relief. She could not even say whether it was caution or simple nervousness at work right now, but his intent to leave did make her relax a little.

But just as Duncan’s figure was about to fade completely from the mirror, she seemed to recall something and suddenly spoke: “Wait, one more thing.”

Duncan turned his head slightly. “Hm?”

“In the future…” Vanna stumbled over her words, took a moment to gather them, then spoke with some hesitation. “I mean, if you plan to ‘appear’ again, could you maybe not do it so suddenly…”

Duncan did not answer at once. His face was wrapped in the Shadows deep in the mirror, and she could not see his expression.

After a few seconds, Vanna finally heard his voice reach her ears: “Next time, I’ll knock.”

Chapter 224: The Captain Never Left

The figure in the mirror had really left. He did nothing extra; just as he said at the start, he had only come over to “take a look at the situation.”

Vanna stared warily at the mirror for a long time before she finally confirmed this and truly relaxed.

Then she fell into a brief spell of self-reflection and uneasy suspicion.

The suspicion came from an Inquisitor’s professional habits. It was hard for her to truly trust a “person” like Captain Duncan, who carried a century of terrifying legends and was tied to Subspace. Even if he did seem rational and friendly, and had indeed protected the city-state of Pland, it was still hard. The self-reflection had a simpler cause—

She realized that during her talks with Captain Duncan, her vigilance had gradually weakened.

This was a weakness she should not have shown. She had never thought something like this would happen to her.

In the end, it was because she had fallen into wavering and self-doubt. She had lost the purity of her faith, and that had opened holes in her mind.

Vanna examined herself for a long time. In the end, she let out a soft sigh.

No matter what, the city had survived safely. She would report tonight’s events to Bishop Valentine, including… her own wavering.

The young Inquisitor’s sigh faded into the darkness together with the extinguished light.

…

On the second floor of the antique shop in the Lower City, Duncan pulled back his gaze from Pland’s great Cathedral. Looking at the night view of the city-state, with lights in countless homes near and far, a thoughtful look appeared on his face.

He did not know what had happened to Vanna, but one thing was clear. The young Inquisitor’s mental state had just gone through a brief yet dangerous shake. That wavering had even touched his senses directly, forcing him to project himself into the Mortal Realm to see what was happening to Vanna.

Thinking back now, the aura he had felt on Vanna then was faintly familiar. It hid deep in her spiritual world, wrapped around her. If he tried to tell it apart carefully, it felt a bit like…

…like that strange feeling he had when he stood in the hold of the Vanished and, through the cracks, watched the chaotic lights and shadows outside the hull.

It was Subspace.

And judging from the question Vanna had suddenly asked him at the end, her trouble was probably really related to Subspace.

Duncan tapped the windowsill with his fingers without thinking, guessing at the truth.

Before leaving, he had reinforced the mark he left on her. That power should be able to help her resist any coming corruption when needed. But the key question was this: why would a high-ranking Saint like Vanna suddenly show a trace of Subspace on her?

Duncan’s thoughts spread out. He suddenly connected this to some other clues—or rather, to some “knowledge.” Under certain conditions, the souls of Believers in the Four Gods were more easily corrupted by Subspace than Mortals. After they were corrupted, their souls could even directly generate a rift linking the Mortal Realm to Subspace. In that small Cathedral in the Sixth District, the first invasion had started from the Shadows of that Nun’s soul…

Would something similar appear on Vanna? If so, what lay behind this strange, counterintuitive phenomenon?

After a moment of thought, Duncan let out a breath and turned away from the window.

In any case, he should pay more attention in the future to this special “Node” that was Vanna. Right now Vanna still did not trust him, this “ghost captain,” so of course she would not take the initiative to tell him all her secrets. That meant he had to put in more effort on his side.

On the way back to his bedroom, Duncan heard the giggling voices of two young girls coming from the nearby room. It was Nina and Shirley.

Even though they had already returned from the Vanished to the city-state, they still seemed excited, especially Nina.

That child did not seem to have any psychological Shadows left by the eerie, frightening ghost ship, nor any uneasiness about the future. She was as cheerful as always, maybe even… a bit more cheerful.

Was it the influence of the Sun’s fragment? Or was it because she herself had a strong ability to accept new things?

Duncan grew thoughtful. He suddenly felt as if he had discovered some unexpected “talents” in Nina.

The veil of night hung low, and the cold, pale radiance of the World's Wound lit up the wide deck of the Vanished.

Light footsteps broke the silence on the ghost ship under the night. A figure in a gorgeous long dress, silver hair draped over her shoulders, walked up to the helm at the stern.

Alice lifted her head and looked at the captain holding the wheel himself. The glow reflected in her light violet eyes, making them shine: "Captain! Where are we going next?"

"We don't have a destination for now. We'll just leave the busy route between the city-states," Duncan lowered his head to glance at the doll. "You look to be in a good mood."

"Yeah, yeah!" Alice nodded happily. No matter how elegant and noble she looked, the eager way she nodded made her seem a bit silly. "The ship was so lively today! It's the first time I realized that just having a lot of people together can be so fun…"

"It's not always 'fun' when you bring people together—but that might be hard for you to understand right now," Duncan said offhand. "Also, control how hard you nod. You scared them half to death today when your head fell off."

"Oh, oh…" Alice hurriedly held her head with both hands, then suddenly looked a little worried. "Then they… won't stop coming because of that, right?"

"That worry is unnecessary."

Alice answered with another "oh," then stayed quiet for less than two seconds before asking again: "Then… can I still go to the city-state to play in the future? This time I went there, I didn't even get to really see the world before all that… messy stuff happened. It made me feel dizzy."

Duncan's gaze swept across the sea, then returned to Alice. "Of course you can. Tomorrow I can have AI send you to the antique shop—I still need you to help over there in the store."

"Really?" Alice's eyes clearly lit up. She seemed surprised. "I thought… we wouldn't go back to the city-state much anymore. After all… it felt like you had finished what you needed to do over there."

Duncan did not answer right away. He stayed silent on purpose for a few seconds before suddenly asking: "Do you think I only pay attention to Pland because I have some task I must do there?"

Alice froze for a moment, then slowly scratched her head. "I… don't know."

Duncan smiled and shook his head, gently letting go of the wheel.

Soft creaks came from all over the Vanished. The spirit form sails on the mast furled in a little. The ship shifted into the "cruising state" under Goathead's control.

"We only solved the trouble caused by a group of cultists," Duncan stepped down from the helm and walked toward the captain's cabin, speaking casually to Alice as he went. "As for Pland… I think that city-state has a connection with me."

The captain walked away. Alice stayed where she was, puzzling over his words for a while. Then she looked in the direction he had gone. "…As expected of the captain. So deep…"

Duncan came to the door of the captain's cabin. He looked up and saw the words "The Lost Ones" carved on the doorframe, reflecting the dim radiance from the World's Wound.

He drew in a slow breath to steady his mind, then put his hand on the doorknob.

He gently pushed it open.

Hazy, twisted mist appeared before his eyes. Duncan stepped forward and felt the familiar instant of weightlessness and slight dizziness. That sense of dislocation, as if he were crossing endless time and space yet also arriving at his destination in a single moment, flashed by. Then everything around him grew quiet.

The never-ending wind and waves of the Boundless Sea and the faint creaking of the Vanished faded away. The salty sea breeze quietly vanished. A familiar smell filled the air, from the room he had lived in for many years.

Zhou Ming opened his eyes and looked at the unchanging scene in his studio apartment.

As always, the first thing he did after coming back here was check the general state of the room. He checked whether anything had changed while he was gone, whether there was any sign that the thick fog outside the window had thinned, and whether the strings and bits of paper he had left on the window and windowsill had been moved.

Even though he knew it was pointless, he still treated this series of “checks” as a task he had to complete.

After he finished all of that, the second thing he did was walk to his desk.

Zhou Ming lowered his head and calmly looked at the thing on his desk.

A city-state of Pland, like a scaled-down model, sat quietly on the desktop.

It was exquisite and faithful. Every tiny detail was vividly reproduced. It might even match every paving stone and every lamppost of the real Pland.

In other words, this was the real Pland shown in his apartment in some kind of “projection” form.

Its appearance here was exactly what he had expected.

The fine flames that had once leaped and burned on the desk had finished the last carving of this “collection piece.” Now this perfect masterpiece stood before its master.

Zhou Ming let out a soft breath, slowly sat down by the desk, and studied the delicate “model.”

Compared to the “model” of the Vanished, this “city-state” was clearly much larger, but it certainly wasn’t a simple scaled-up version. Its size seemed just right to fit into a single compartment on the shelf, as if it had been made exactly for that spot.

And in this lifelike city model, he could not see any trace of residents.

It seemed that the “people” living in the city-state could not form projections here.

Zhou Ming grew thoughtful and, after pondering and studying the model of Pland again and again for a long time, finally let out a light breath. He picked up the large “collection piece” with both hands and carefully placed it on the nearby shelf.

After he set it in place, he stepped back two paces and quietly admired his new collection.

The Vanished had already sailed far away from Pland, but the captain… had never left his loyal city-state.

Chapter 225: The Late Sunrise

After putting his new “collection piece” in place, Zhou Ming did not leave the room as usual. Instead, he sat down in the chair opposite the shelf, looking at the Vanished and Pland on it while he fell into thought.

He was trying to sum up and understand what these “collection pieces” meant.

All along, this studio apartment and the world beyond the door had been completely cut off from each other. Only he could pass through that door. Nothing from either world could cross the fog barrier in the doorway. He had tested this many times.

In a way, the models of the Vanished and Pland that appeared in the room had already broken that rule. They clearly had a link to the world beyond the door, and their nature obviously had… “supernatural properties.”

“supernatural” was not supposed to be a concept that appeared on this side of the door.

The two collection pieces both followed a common rule. They were things that had been completely burned by the spirit form fire and then consciously “claimed” by him.

Zhou Ming thought quietly and slowly summed up the pattern. In the end, he decided that “burning” and “claiming” were indeed the two necessary conditions for a collection piece to appear.

The White Oak had once also been burned to ashes by the Vanished's flames, but at that time he had not actively tried to claim that ship. He had not placed any influence or "orders" on the White Oak. So after the burning, that ship only left behind a strong mark and did not form a matching "collection piece" in the room on this side of the door.

The city-state of Pland had been burned away by spirit flame, and in the burning he had actively taken control of the city-state and carried out purification, even treating it as part of the Vanished. So Pland had become a collection piece here.

Then… what use could this transformation have? What meaning did these things, turned into collection pieces, have for him?

Zhou Ming's gaze fell on the model of Pland. Then he slowly closed his eyes.

A breeze was blowing over the Harbor district in the southeast of the city-state. Small waves lapped at the shore. The clock tower in the Fourth District had just chimed for the last time, and the steam factories in the Upper City were roaring as they ran.

He opened his eyes again. Things were just as he had expected.

He could sense the state of the entire city-state, down to any building and any streetlight. Although he could not sense the parts that belonged to the "people" in the city-state, the true body of Pland lay before him just like that lifelike model, fully displayed in his mind.

This feeling… was just like his control over the Vanished.

Zhou Ming grew thoughtful and rubbed his chin with his fingers without realizing it. Once he understood just how far his influence over the city-state reached, he naturally began to use the Vanished as a reference.

The Pland of now could already be seen as another Vanished. So whatever he could do on the Vanished, he could undoubtedly do in Pland as well.

He could order every clock tower in the city-state to ring for him, order the city-state to sink into the Spirit Realm, and even…

Zhou Ming stopped rubbing his chin.

…even order the city-state to sink into Subspace.

Zhou Ming's eyes narrowed. He quickly pulled back and crushed that terrifying thought that had suddenly appeared, but even though he suppressed it, his heart still pounded.

He really could do that, because he could also make the Vanished do it. Subspace was right there. He could clearly sense the "position" of that chaotic dimension. That "promised land" that the Enders longed for yet could never reach felt to him almost like going home…

And not just that. When that frightening idea had just popped into his mind, he immediately felt a faint call, like the strange urge some people feel to jump when they stand on a cliff edge. He had just felt that same urge!

With just one thought, one command, one moment of giving in to that urge, one careless slip, he… could reach the place that was calling him.

At the same time, he would drag down with him anything swept up by him, ruled by him, or corrupted by him, all falling together.

Zhou Ming took a deep breath and slowly stood up from the chair.

The world was right to be deeply afraid of the Vanished and Captain Duncan. People should be afraid.

Zhou Ming gave his collection shelf one last, long look, let out a heavy breath, then turned and walked toward the apartment door.

On the table that held the enchanted sea chart in the captain's cabin, the dark wooden carving of Goathead heard the sound at the door. It lifted its head and saw Duncan's tall figure appear at the doorway. Its eyes, carved from obsidian, lit up at once, and it immediately began to chatter fluently: "Ah! The great captain has returned to his loyal First Mate! Your achievements are known to all, your mighty power makes the Boundless Sea…"

Duncan said nothing. He sat down beside the chart table and silently watched Goathead babble on, his expression calm.

In the end it was Goathead who began to feel awkward first. Halfway through its "blah-blah-blah," it could not help stopping. "Uh… Captain, don't you usually say 'shut up' at this point?"

Duncan's face stayed calm. "I just suddenly got curious about how long you could keep talking if I didn't tell you to shut up."

Goathead perked up at once. It seemed not to hear the teasing in Duncan's words at all, or it heard and pretended not to. "Then you hit the nail on the head! Your loyal First Mate here is always learned and well-informed. Even if we only talk about recipes on the Boundless Sea, I can go on from morning to night. If you are interested, we can start with the one hundred and thirty-seven types of butter cookies—"

"All right, shut up," Duncan quickly cut him off, shaking his head helplessly. "I thought you at least had some concept of feeling awkward."

Goathead shook its head, its neck creaking. Then its pitch-black face finally turned fully toward Duncan, and its empty eye sockets stared at his face. "Captain, you look like something is on your mind. We just finished an unprecedented feat. What could still affect your mood?"

“An unprecedented feat…” Duncan muttered softly, then shook his head. “You can feel it, right? The connection between the city-state of Pland and the Vanished now.”

“Of course!” Goathead answered at once, not forgetting to flatter him. “I never thought there would be such a day—your might is shocking. This time your prey is an entire city-state! So where is the next target? Shall we go to Lunsa first, or Cold Harbor? Or maybe Frostholm as well—”

Duncan waved his hand, and Goathead fell silent at once.

“I’m not interested in ‘prey’ for now. I just want to tell you that I don’t have the energy to watch such a huge place all the time. If you sense something that shouldn’t appear stepping into Pland, you can alert me—of course, only if you have the spare strength. Your main job is still to look after this ship.”

“With pleasure!” Goathead said at once. “That’s easy for me. I definitely won’t let you down…”

Duncan nodded lightly. Then his gaze swept over the Chronometer Clock on the nearby wall and shifted to the window.

Before he knew it, the night had already passed.

A few seconds later, Duncan suddenly turned his head. “What time is it now?!”

Goathead froze for a moment, not quite sure. “It should… be morning, right? The Sun should be rising.”

“…The Sun has not risen,” Duncan said in a deep voice, his expression unusually serious. Then he suddenly turned his head again, staring hard at the ticking Chronometer Clock. “…Sunrise should have been fourteen minutes ago.”

Goathead fell silent at once. Duncan's eyes stayed fixed on the hands of the Chronometer Clock as they moved step by step, and on the mechanical disk at the top of the clock that marked the Sun's rise.

In this world, the "Sun," the super Vision numbered 001, rose every day at a perfectly precise time and set at a perfectly precise time. The Vanished's Chronometer Clock was linked to the coordinates on the enchanted sea chart and could precisely show at what hour and minute Vision 001 would leap above the sea in the current waters. Since Duncan had come to this world, none of this had ever gone wrong.

Today, the Sun had not risen on time. An ordinary person might not have noticed this change yet, but Duncan had, and the instant he noticed it he suddenly felt a huge… unease.

He did not even know where this unease had suddenly come from.

"Maybe… we just need to wait a little…" Goathead's voice sounded again then. It seemed a little nervous too. "You see, the weather at sea is always unpredictable. Maybe something is blocking—"

But Duncan was not listening to what Goathead was saying. He was still watching the Chronometer Clock. In the next second, however, a faint ray of golden light suddenly appeared at the edge of his vision.

That ray of gold had shone in through the window.

Duncan turned around at once, took a few quick steps to the window, pushed it open, and looked out over the distant sea.

The Sun had risen. The huge glowing orb, bound by two layers of rune rings, slowly climbed into the sky as always. Its blazing light shone over the entire Boundless Sea and at the same time drove away the cold, pale cast that the World's Wound left on this world.

He looked back and checked the time one last time.

Today’s sunrise was fifteen minutes later than usual.

Why?

Was it the aftershock of the disaster in Pland? Was it related to the “Creeping Sun Wheel” that the Suntists had summoned? Was it tied to Nina’s awakening and control? Or… was it the sign of another anomaly still to come?

Duncan went back to the table, his thoughts running wild in spite of himself. He knew he might be worrying too much, but after just going through that historic corruption crisis in Pland, he was now especially alert to every unusual sign.

“Maybe it’s just the influence of the weather at sea. Look, the Sun still came up,” Goathead said beside him. “Sometimes large areas of thick fog can refract the light and make—”

“The sunlight in Pland was also fifteen minutes late,” Duncan quietly cut Goathead off. “The weather over there is clear, and the sea is calm. What was late wasn’t the sunlight. It was the Sun itself.”

“…What the hell.”

Chapter 226: The Shaken

Hurried footsteps broke the silence of the great cathedral. Archbishop Valentine, who had been assigning tasks to a Deacon at his side, heard the sound and looked up. He saw Vanna walking straight toward him.

The Archbishop waved for the Deacon and the attendant to step back for now. His gaze fell on Vanna: “I thought you would rest at home for a few more days.”

“Unfortunately, it seems I do not have that luxury,” Vanna shook her head, her expression slightly grave. “What happened? I saw many priests rushing about, and I heard a group of ascetic Monks were sent down into the Stargazing Well… Is it related to today’s sunrise?”

“Yes,” Valentine nodded, his face solemn. “Today’s sunrise was fifteen minutes later than usual—and it was not a local Anomaly in the sky delaying dawn. I have received Psychic Transmissions from other city-states and from communication Nodes at sea. Everywhere in the world, they observed the same Anomaly.”

“…This world was exposed to the World’s Wound for fifteen extra minutes…” Vanna’s brow slowly furrowed. “Are there any damage reports yet?”

“No. A single delayed dawn is not enough to cause trouble. Fifteen minutes of veil of night is still within the city’s margin of safety,” the old Archbishop shook his head. “What truly worries us is that the whole world saw the same phenomenon. That means the problem is not on the surface or at sea."

"…It means the operation of Vision 001 itself has changed." Of course Vanna knew what the old Archbishop was worried about. "There is no notice from the tomb of the Nameless King?"

Valentine shook his head lightly.

"There has been no movement at all. So this might only be a small… 'shift', not a fundamental change in Vision 001. But… I fear most people will not be reassured that easily. We at least need to see the Sun set normally today, and see the Sun rise normally tomorrow, before we dare to relax a little."

Vanna fell silent, thinking. After a moment she asked: "Have the ordinary people in the city been affected?"

"For now, there is no great unrest," Valentine said. "Some people did not even notice that fifteen-minute delay, and the citizens who did notice probably do not understand how serious it is. I have already sent a letter to City Hall, asking them to assess whether we should later issue comforting, mental guidance notices. Right now the impact is still limited. If the authorities explain too eagerly, it may instead unsettle the public—especially after the great disaster we just went through."

Vanna listened quietly to the old Archbishop's analysis and did not interrupt. As an Inquisitor who put most of her energy into combat missions, she knew she was not an expert on such matters. She only showed a thoughtful look from time to time, which made it clear that she was not as calm as she appeared.

Valentine saw the faint worry between her brows: "What are you thinking about?"

“I am just a little emotional,” Vanna sighed softly and shook her head. “Every time there is an supernatural disaster, I feel more how fragile the world we live in really is… The city-states, the Holy See, the ocean-going warships, everything we are proud of, all seem to stand on a thin, fragile layer of ice. If any crack goes unnoticed, we will vanish from this world…”

“That is exactly why we must always remain vigilant and strong,” Valentine said in a low voice, and he met the young Inquisitor’s eyes with a steady gaze. “Vanna, you rarely talk like this… What happened?”

Vanna fell silent. After a few seconds, as if making up her mind, she said to Archbishop Valentine: “There are two things. The first is… I met that ‘Captain Duncan’ again yesterday.”

Valentine’s eyes first grew grave, but after a moment he let out a soft sigh: “In fact, that was within expectations.”

He paused, then went on: “We still have no way to deal with the mark that ghost captain left on you. Now even the entire city-state of Pland may already be in contact with that captain. It was only a matter of time before he came to you. What did he say to you?”

“…Mostly small talk,” Vanna said, sounding slightly strange.

“…Small talk?” This time Valentine finally raised his brows in surprise. “You mean, the captain of the Vanished, the Shadow who returned from Subspace, the ‘Duncan’ who reversed historical corruption and took away a fragment of the Sun—he sought you out just to have small talk?”

“I knew you would react like that—I could hardly believe it myself. Honestly, if he had told me he had a plan to conquer the world, I would have believed him, but…” Vanna sighed. Then, over the next ten minutes or so, she told the old man every detail of her conversation with Duncan the previous night.

Valentine rubbed his forehead as he listened to Vanna's account. This old Archbishop, who had not wavered even in the face of a Doomsday crisis, now showed undisguised trouble and weariness on his face.

But after that brief look of confusion, he still raised his head. His tone was somewhat complicated as he said: "Vanna, since last night I have been pondering a question."

"What question?"

"…You are the one who has spoken with Captain Duncan directly twice. In your view, does that 'ghost captain'… seem like an Intruder from Subspace?"

"You… what do you mean?" Vanna's expression shifted slightly as she asked carefully. "The Vanished falling into Subspace and returning has clear…"

"I am not doubting that," Valentine cut in. "Of course I know the records of the Vanished returning from Subspace. I am asking you to recall: what state should a person be in when they are completely affected by Subspace? And… is it possible for a true Subspace Intruder to talk to people rationally, and in doing so not cause uncontrolled corruption?"

This time Vanna hesitated. She could not answer as quickly as before. After several seconds of doubt, she finally spoke: "Judging from all the cases and our basic knowledge of Subspace… that is impossible."

"When we perform a Sanity Check on those corrupted by the deep layers, we use a simple and effective rule of thumb—anyone who can still speak rationally is savable, or at least not completely transformed," Archbishop Valentine nodded. "Subspace corruption is extremely deadly. Because of this, in history there has never been a Subspace-corrupted person or Intruder who stayed clear-headed. Madness is a mark they cannot erase.

And perhaps… we can apply this simple rule to the Vanished and its captain as well."

"…You mean that 'Captain Duncan' is very likely still holding on to his humanity?"

"Or has taken it back," Archbishop Valentine corrected calmly. "In the early records, there are clear reports of the Vanished launching indiscriminate attacks, and of Captain Duncan falling into madness. At that time he clearly matched the standard of a Subspace Intruder."

Vanna thought it over, and the more she thought, the more disbelief showed on her face: "Is this possible? After being completely transformed by Subspace corruption… to somehow take back one's humanity, this…"

"If it were impossible, how would you explain the Captain Duncan who 'chatted' with you?" Archbishop Valentine gently cut her off. Then he paused and reminded her: "Do not forget the Clause Zero Law."

Vanna froze for a moment, then reacted: "There are always Anomalies and Visions that do not fit our understanding or go beyond our definitions…"

The great cathedral fell silent again. No one knew how long that silence lasted before Valentine suddenly spoke: "But we still cannot use this to treat the Vanished and its captain as harmless, do you understand?

"After all, that ship returned from Subspace. Even if that captain has taken back his humanity, it is hard to say from what kind of viewpoint he now looks at us… 'mortals'."

"And we also cannot make a rash judgment on our own. We must report all the information we have to the Pope, Her Eminence, and see how she views this matter."

Vanna straightened her expression and nodded at once, her face solemn: "Of course. I understand that very well."

Then she paused, her expression a little odd: “Talking about such things in this holy cathedral really… puts pressure on the heart. In the past, I might have branded myself a ‘Heretic’ for it.”

Valentine only let out a noncommittal sigh, then asked again: “You said there were two things. Besides meeting that ghost captain, what is the second one?”

This time, Vanna stayed silent for much longer. She seemed to struggle with herself, then finally, under the gaze of the statue of the storm goddess Gamona, she gathered all her courage and said solemnly to the old Archbishop: “I… should confess.”

“Confess?” Valentine looked at her in surprise. “Why do you need to confess?”

“I wavered—though I am still devout, I cannot deny my moment of weakness,” Vanna took a deep breath and admitted bluntly. “After that great fire, I began to question my faith.”

She laid out her doubts about the Goddess and the shakiness of her own belief. Aside from keeping back the secret her uncle had told her, she did not hide anything.

The old Archbishop did not speak for a long time.

Vanna watched the old man’s face with some unease, yet this time she found she could not read Valentine’s attitude at all.

He seemed lost in thought, as if he wanted to speak yet held back, and there was no blame in his eyes.

After what felt like a long time, Vanna finally heard his voice reach her ears.

“Vanna, you came to me to confess… then who should I go to for my confession?”

A trace of surprise finally appeared in Vanna’s eyes.

“Now, there are two whose faith has wavered in this great cathedral,” the old Archbishop turned and gazed quietly at the statue of the storm goddess. The cold stone figure looked down on him, as silent as always. His voice carried a strange calm. “Vanna, can you feel it?”

“Feel what?”

“…The Goddess is still blessing us.”

Chapter 227: The Aftershocks Remained

The wavering of a devout believer often came twice. The first time was when they began to doubt their own faith. The second was when they had already doubted, yet the God still sent down divine blessings.

Noise—fine layers of noise, sometimes near, sometimes far, faint yet undeniably there—started to sound in Vanna's mind, like ringing in her ears. She recalled again the projection of the Goddess she had seen in the vision, and those incomprehensible words the Goddess had spoken to her. She no longer accepted it all without thinking, as she had before. Instead she began to think seriously, to ponder the meaning of those words, even to try to guess Gamona's… intention.

The more she thought, the clearer that fine noise in her head became, making it hard to focus.

But suddenly all the noise vanished. She shook her head in a daze and found herself meeting Archbishop Valentine's concerned gaze.

"Are you all right?" the old man asked, a little worried.

"I… am fine," Vanna tapped her forehead lightly, then looked at her elder with a strange expression. "You also…"

"When I rang the last bell, I wavered… There is nothing to hide in that. In the end, I did not have a flawless will like the Saints recorded in the temple," Valentine shook his head and spoke frankly to Vanna. "I wondered why the corruption and infiltration of those Enders could reach such a level. Why even the protection of the Great Cathedral could not stop the sacrificial rite of those Heretics of the Sun—why the crisis had spread for more than ten years, and yet the Goddess never warned us even once…"

He fell silent, then turned around and gazed quietly at Gamona's statue. The cold stone figure looked down on him, as silent as always.

"When I woke up again, I was filled with shame. I knew I had committed the greatest error named in the Storm Canon: treating the God's protection as a cure-all and so letting my own will waver. But even so, these doubts had already taken root, and they remain even now."

"…The enemy infiltrated from within and broke through the walls. They planned for many years. It was a sneak attack that was hard to resist," Vanna was silent for a moment, then spoke calmly. "Heretics always strike when there is a weakness. That does not mean the Goddess's divine authority can be easily overturned."

"I understand that," Valentine smiled. "That is why I say that even if I have wavered a little, I am still devout. The Goddess truly protects our world. Her mercy is real. It is just that… I have begun to think a bit more than before."

"Thought gives birth to heresy, Archbishop Valentine," Vanna said with a very serious face, but then she sighed, as if talking to herself. "It is the same for me."

"Then let us treat this as a trial," Valentine said softly. "For both of us."

Vanna said nothing more. She only walked to the statue of the Goddess, bowed her head slightly, and offered a silent benediction as she always did.

Not long after, footsteps suddenly broke the silence in the great cathedral.

Vanna snapped out of her benediction and looked toward the sound. She saw a middle-aged priest in civil robes striding over. The priest first saluted the statue, then handed a document to Valentine: “Archbishop, this is the report you requested.”

Valentine nodded his thanks and took the file. After quickly flipping through a few pages, his expression became visibly strange.

“What is it?” Vanna asked at once, curious when she saw his face. “What does it say?”

“…It is the initial survey of the city’s situation after the disaster… from City Hall,” Valentine frowned, as if hesitating. But in the end he simply handed the file to Vanna. “See for yourself.”

Vanna took the file in puzzlement. From the first lines she knew what it was —a preliminary damage report, something she knew well. It checked whether any parts of the city-state were missing or changed after the disaster, whether there were people missing or “additional” people, whether any areas still held residual supernatural power… The first part held nothing special. It basically stated that all parts of the city had been reset to their state before the disaster. But the later pages instantly told her why Archbishop Valentine’s expression had looked so odd.

“…In the dock district, several merchants report large quantities of French fries mysteriously disappearing. The loss report even lists ketchup…” The young Inquisitor lifted her head with a blank expression and looked at Valentine, whose face was just as blank. “…Seriously?”

“Maybe you should personally take a team and ask about it?” Valentine’s mouth twitched. “In theory, no one would dare falsify a report like this.”

Vanna held the report in her hands for a long time without saying a word.

After holding it in for a long while, she finally muttered: “Why would something like this appear in such a serious report…”

Valentine’s face stayed blank: “An entire company of Guardians has been watching those fries on the dock—what do you think?”

Vanna: “…”

“…In short, the ‘items’ mentioned in the report are the only known loss in the city so far,” Valentine sighed. Then he seemed to hesitate again, and finally looked Vanna in the eyes. “Next time you meet him, why not ask directly?”

Vanna blinked: “Ask? Ask who?”

“…What do you think?”

Vanna: “…”

After a moment, the young Inquisitor finally rubbed her forehead: “I feel like my thoughts are starting to break apart. Let me confirm—we were supposed to be discussing very serious matters here, right?”

“I cannot keep up either,” Valentine said, face stiff.

Vanna had no words, but a strange thought suddenly came to her—if this was also one of that ghost captain’s “effects”, then he really was terrifying in a certain sense.

Just then, more footsteps suddenly sounded at the door, cutting off Vanna and Valentine’s thoughts again—a priest hurried to the statue.

“Archbishop, Inquisitor, there is news from the Harbor district…”

The priest bowed and began to speak quickly, but halfway through, Vanna heard the words “Harbor district” and could not help interrupting him:

“Stop. We already know about the fries. You do not need to report that twice!”

“…Fries?” The priest stared in confusion at the Inquisitor, who was usually so calm and dignified. “What fries?”

“Ah… you were not going to report about the fries?” Seeing his reaction, Vanna felt a sudden wave of embarrassment. She quickly coughed twice to cover it up. “I thought it was another report… Never mind. Go on. What happened in the Harbor district?”

As she spoke, she could not help sighing inwardly: [It is fine as long as it is not about fries—at least it does not involve that terrifying ghost captain again.]

The reporting priest nodded, face stern: “News from the Harbor district: The Sea Mist is requesting permission to enter port—Tyrian Abnomar hopes to make contact with the Great Cathedral as soon as possible. He brings news related to the Vanished.”

Vanna immediately erupted into a fit of coughing loud enough to shake the hall.

The priest jumped at the noise: “…Lady Inquisitor?”

“I am fine,” Vanna finally managed to stop coughing after great effort. Ever since the Vanished had openly made a circuit around the city-state, she felt as if nothing in this place was quite the same. She could not say exactly how, but it seemed that many things around her were changing—she even wanted to blame the fifteen-minute-late sunrise on that ghost ship. “The Sea Mist? I know we did send a letter to its master, but it never arrived…”

“The Sea Mist did arrive, and it seems it was already near Pland’s coastal waters before the ‘disaster’,” the priest nodded at once. “But according to the message from the ship, it ran into the Vanished by accident in the eastern waters and fought a fierce battle. Its engines were damaged and it had to undergo repairs. Only last night did it regain the ability to sail."

"It fought a battle with the Vanished?!" Vanna's expression finally turned stern as she grasped how important this was. She turned to Valentine: "I need to go there myself."

"Very well," Valentine nodded at once. "The Sea Mist is a special ship. It is indeed 'one of ours', but its crew may still cause fear and unease among the ordinary people on the docks. If you personally lead a team to receive them, you should be able to calm the people's nerves."

Vanna gave a brief answer and strode out of the great cathedral.

The Sea Mist had come—arriving a bit later than expected, but the huge warship wrapped in legendary glory and fearful tales of the curse still reached the city-state of Pland that had sent the distress call, just as agreed. Now the awe-inspiring Ironclad Warship was slowly approaching the pier reserved for large vessels, guided in by mental guidance officers on the docks. Some people who had heard the news gathered near the harbor, watching the steel giant with tense curiosity.

Soon, the people near the docks realized that this mighty Ironclad Warship had reached the Harbor only after a brutal battle.

It was covered in scars. Three of its six main guns were simply gone. All along the hull, there were terrifying gaps where something had torn whole chunks away. A third of the bridge had been destroyed, and a dreadful wound ran from the side of the bridge all the way down to the main armored belt. Even near the waterline, on the ship's flank, several horrible holes could be seen.

Damage like this would have been enough to sink an ordinary warship several times over.

Yet The Sea Mist still floated stubbornly on the waves. The holes in her belly seemed alive. Soft, metal-sheened substance had sealed the leaks tight, and the seawater that had seeped into the lower decks was being pushed back out. The Sea Mist's pumps had already shut down, so the water was actually oozing straight through the sides of the hull, as if… a person were sweating.

It was an advanced Ironclad Warship, and also a cursed ship full of Anomalies. Everyone standing near the docks could clearly see the "living" traits the ship displayed. Their curiosity gained a new layer of horror, and whispers spread everywhere among the onlookers.

Only when several imposing Steam Walkers appeared on the docks, and Vanna's tall figure came into view, did many people finally quiet down.

Chapter 228: The Pirate Lord Enters the City-State

The Steam Walker stopped in front of the pier. Vanna stood on the shell of the spider-like machine and lifted her head to study the legendary vessel before her, the ship reputed to be an Unsinkable Warship.

It was unsinkable, not invincible. Perhaps this ship really was hard to sink, but that did not mean it could not be beaten until it was covered in wounds.

To the naked eye, it was clear that the Sea Mist had gone through a brutal battle. Of course, if she thought back to how the Vanished had looked completely unscathed when she saw it from the top of the Great Bell, one could also say that this Ironclad Warship before her had simply been beaten up one-sidedly. Vanna did not really know much about ships, but she did know how unbelievable it was for a vessel in this condition to still drift safely into the Harbor.

And this was already after the Sea Mist had spent a full day and night using its powerful “unsinkable” ability to repair itself.

Memories of the Vanished surfaced in her mind, along with the curse-like connection between herself and Captain Duncan. Vanna felt a headache coming on. She rubbed her temples and jumped down from the Steam Walker to the ground. At the same time, she saw that a long gangplank had been lowered from the side of the Sea Mist not far away, and several figures were appearing on it.

At their head was a one-eyed man wearing a stern captain's uniform. His slightly wavy black hair framed a face that resembled Duncan Abnomar's by a few parts out of ten. Yet compared to that ghost captain with the suffocating presence, Captain Tyrian, now walking toward the pier, looked rather tired.

Behind this famed pirate captain were several attendants. Their skin was deathly pale, and the expressions on their faces were like frozen plaster statues, faintly carrying some inhuman quality. Yet overall, they were not as terrifying as the horror tales made such beings sound.

Vanna had heard many rumors about the Sea Mist. Because it more or less still counted as a ship belonging to Human civilization, the stories about it were naturally richer and more detailed than those about the Vanished. And in those tales, what people mentioned most often were the Undying Sailors under Tyrian Abnomar.

It was said that these Sailors were the subordinates Tyrian had taken with him when he defected and left Frostholm. Some of them were even veterans who had belonged to the Vanished's fleet a century ago. Like their captain, they had been affected by Subspace. The curse clinging to the members of the Abnomar family had leaked onto their followers, turning them into ageless, undying Living dead.

They could not die within the dimensions of the Mortal Realm, nor could they enjoy the warmth of the Mortal Realm as the living did. They could not feel a moment of peace in the world of the living, yet they could not step through the Gate of Rest belonging to God of Death Bartok either.

In other rumors, people said these Living dead Sailors no longer held any attachment to the mortal world or to their former companions. Only certain ancient and powerful oaths bound them, forcing them to serve their Master, the eldest son of the Abnomar family, for all eternity.

Vanna stared fixedly at those figures as they stepped onto the soil of the city-state of Pland and, led by Tyrian, walked toward her.

Living dead. Strictly speaking, they already counted as subjects of God of Death Bartok, and Bartok, along with the other Three Gods, belonged to the camp of the True Gods. So these Living dead Sailors were allowed to step onto the soil of the city-state. That did not mean, however, that an ordinary person could accept these horrifying “former compatriots” so easily. And given how closely these Living dead Sailors were tied to the Abnomar family’s curse, Vanna had to keep a constant eye on their every move.

Only… this city-state of Pland, which had just been burned through completely by the Vanished’s flames, was it really so different from these Sailors who had gained eternal life because of the curse?

This troubling question popped up in Vanna’s mind despite herself, and while she was distracted for just that moment, the one-eyed pirate captain had already come to stand before her.

Tyrian took off his captain’s hat and bent slightly in a bow as he said: “Greetings, Inquisitor.”

He was surprised by Vanna’s youth and her height of a meter ninety, but he did not show it at all. His manners were so proper that he looked nothing like a terrifying Pirate Lord, but rather like a naval Commander still loyal to some city-state. “Thank you for coming to receive us in person.”

Vanna quickly shook off her distraction, looked at the man before her, who seemed to be around thirty, and said: “It is good to meet you, Captain Tyrian.”

She instinctively compared him to the “Captain Duncan” she had seen and found that he was not as tall as Duncan and lacked some of that suffocating authority. “You answered Pland’s call for aid. For that alone, the arrival of the Sea Mist deserves my personal welcome.”

Tyrian let out a sigh and said with a strange look: “Yet in the end we did not really come in handy.”

Then he instinctively lifted his head to look around the Harbor, as if searching for something.

Vanna had a vague idea, but she still asked casually: “What are you looking for?”

“Forgive my boldness, but did you receive the message we sent before making port?” Tyrian asked, a bit tense as he looked around. “We ran into the Vanished on the way. We tried our best to intercept it, but that ship still…”

“Your father has already been here,” Vanna said with a sigh. “He left just yesterday.”

As soon as she spoke, the Pirate Lord standing opposite her froze like a stone statue. Even the plaster-cold, rigid faces of the attendants behind him twitched.

“I… I did not quite hear that,” Tyrian finally reacted after a few seconds, staring at the young Inquisitor before him with a look as if he had seen a ghost. “Inquisitor, did you just say my father was here yesterday…”

He put particular emphasis on the word “father”, as if he feared Vanna might be making some deadly joke on that very point.

“The situation is complicated. We will need to explain it carefully,” Vanna sighed again. “The Vanished did appear, but what happened was completely different from what we described in the letter we first sent you. The city-state of Pland has just gone through a great… upheaval. Please come with me. Bishop Valentine is already waiting in the great Cathedral. We urgently need all kinds of information, and I imagine you also have countless questions that need answers."

Tyrian felt that all the contingency plans he had worked out on the way here had just been thrown into chaos. He followed after Vanna almost in a daze, walking toward the Steam Walkers from the great Cathedral. A black Steam Car prepared specially for guests was already parked by the roadside, bearing the emblem of the Deep Sea Church.

As they walked toward the car, Tyrian suddenly spoke in a self-deprecating tone, perhaps to break the awkward mood, perhaps to ease some nameless pressure. For some reason, whenever he looked at Vanna he always felt a faint but constant pressure. "To be honest, I thought you would stop me in the dock district," he said. "After all, under normal circumstances, the city-state authorities either refuse a pirate entry or simply prepare a noose for the pirate."

"This is not Frostholm. The northern city-states' warrants against the Sea Mist do not reach as far as Pland, unless one day you make a truly 'big scene' and earn yourself a joint warrant from the entire Boundless Sea," Vanna said casually. "Before that happens, as far as Pland is concerned you are just a captain who kindly offered aid. And…"

As she spoke, she turned her head to glance at the Sea Mist. Even covered in scars, the ship still radiated a mighty presence.

"And honestly, even in the Northern Seas, is there really any city-state that could slip a noose around your neck the moment you made landfall?"

Tyrian thought about it, then laughed.

"When I go ashore, the city Guard Corps politely call me the boss of the 'Sea Mist Venture Company' and, whenever anyone questions it, they advertise my visit as a commercial exchange between the city-state and the Sea Mist fleet," he said. "You know, pirates have a saying: the lowest-level warrant keeps the small-time pirates awake at night, a city-state-level warrant makes the Pirate Lords sit on pins and needles, and the highest-level warrants… are used by the person named on them to wipe tables and sword hilts."

The Pirate Lord paused, then said calmly: "Aside from Frostholm, I can set foot on any northern city-state's land with a clear conscience."

Vanna raised her eyebrows: "Aside from Frostholm?"

"Ray Nora, Her Majesty, ordered me to leave Frostholm," Tyrian said, the hint of a smile disappearing from his face. "She has not rescinded that order."

Vanna glanced at him and saw that, without her noticing, the Pirate Lord's expression had turned unusually serious.

She did not say anything more. She simply stopped at the corner and pointed to the guest car beside them: "Please get in, Captain Tyrian."

With that, she turned and jumped onto a nearby Steam Walker, standing on it as imposingly as ever.

Tyrian, meanwhile, turned and got into the car with several of his attendants.

The moment the car door closed, he let out a long breath.

"Captain," one attendant, noticing his reaction, could not help looking over curiously. "Are you all right? I felt you were a bit… tense just now. You are never that stiff even when dealing with other famous captains or city officials."

"I do not know why, but whenever I spoke to that young Inquisitor I kept feeling a… hard-to-describe pressure," Tyrian said. He did not hide his feelings in front of his most trusted aides. “It was completely different from dealing with officials of other city-states. I did not feel such a strange pressure even that time we passed close by the Death Sanctuary on patrol.”

“Really?” The attendant frowned in puzzlement. “I did not feel anything… though that Inquisitor is indeed quite tall and looks rather formidable…”

“Not that kind of pressure,” Tyrian shook his head. “All right, do not keep talking about it. The power of a high-ranking Saint is extremely strong. She can hear what you are saying.”

At that, the attendant clamped his mouth shut at once.

Tyrian let out a small breath of relief and looked out the carriage window at the slowly shifting scenery of Pland with a complicated expression.

In his childhood, he and Lucretia had once stayed briefly in this city-state, but that had been a century ago. Now this Sea Jewel had become a completely unfamiliar land to him.

Chapter 229: The Blood-Seeking spirit compass

The Ironclad Warship lay quietly at anchor in Pland's Harbor. Above the warship, the flag of the Sea Mist fleet unfurled in the sunlight, fluttering in the wind. Its emblem was a cluster of ice crystals as sharp as blades, with a crack running through the center. The ice crystals were the symbol of Frostholm; the crack was the mark of a self-exiled rebel.

After the famed pirate captain and his attendants left, no one else disembarked from the warship. The Sea Mist was like a silent iceberg, lying quietly at anchor. Its towering, imposing hull and prow blocked all curious gazes from the docks. At the same time, a city-state Guard Corps detachment arrived from a nearby station and sealed off the road leading to the pier to keep unrelated people from approaching.

Only after a Constable personally came to disperse them did the gawkers gathered near the docks finally begin to drift away.

First Mate Aiden stood on the Sea Mist's bridge, quietly watching the activity on the pier.

He had not gone ashore with Tyrian. Whenever the captain left the warship, the First Mate had to stay on board to temporarily hold the captain's authority, in case anything went wrong.

"Those city Guard Corps look awfully nervous," a Sailor muttered beside him. "Are they afraid we will go ashore and start pillaging? I thought the Guard Corps of the Sea Jewel, Pland, would be a bit stronger than the useless lot up in Frost Sea."

Aiden did not even turn his head. He said: "If they did not come out to keep order, you would complain that Pland's Guard Corps did not even have the courage to go out and block the streets. If they really sent you to fight their Steam Tanks, would you go?"

"…I would not go. I do not want to be carried back onto the deck in a bucket again," the Sailor hurriedly shook his head, then looked toward the direction where the Steam Walkers had just left. "The captain went off with them… He will be all right, yes? That tall young woman looks hard to mess with. I do not think the captain could beat her…"

"We did not come here to fight. We came here by invitation. Invitation, understand?" Aiden finally could not help giving the Sailor a sidelong look. "You – and the rest of you – can you adjust your mindset a little? Have you forgotten the captain's usual lectures? We are now the Sea Mist Venture Company. Raiding does not last. Doing business makes money faster than robbery, does it not?"

"Then when do we go raiding?"

Aiden thought for a moment, a ray of sunlight glinting off his polished bald head. "Naturally, when the other side refuses to do business…"

Several Undying Sailors nodded one after another, acknowledging the First Mate's wisdom. They fell quiet for only a few seconds before one Sailor, whose whole left skull had caved in, could not help glancing toward the city-state and mumbling: "Can we go ashore and have a look? Pland… I have heard that in this city…"

"Do not even think about it," Aiden cut him off at once. "The captain ordered that no one is to leave the Sea Mist without permission. You lot of misfits would scare people to death if you went ashore. Pland is not the north. Hardly anyone here has seen a talking corpse."

"So the captain only picked the ones who look the most alive to go ashore, right?" the Sailor with the caved-in skull said resentfully, lifting a hand to support his head. "I think I look all right, actually. If I just covered this part with half a shell and put on a hat…"

"Shut it. Without the captain's orders, no one sets foot on land!" Aiden shot the chatterbox Sailor a fierce glare. "If you truly have nothing to do, go below and see whether those poor bastards who were plastered to the deck earlier have come back to life. If they have, tell them to report in…"

A faint clicking sound suddenly came from not far away, cutting off Aiden's orders.

Everyone on the bridge heard the faint clicking. Several gazes turned at once toward the source of the sound, and the Sailor who had spoken first spotted where it came from.

Beside the captain's seat stood a strange machine made of a mass of gears, connecting rods, and spirit compass needles. The machine now sat quietly, but several of its needles still trembled slightly, as if showing that a moment ago it had suddenly moved.

"Did this thing just move?" A Sailor standing closest walked carefully over to the delicate, complex machine, staring at the spirit compass needles that had already gone still.

Aiden walked over as well. His gaze fell on the hemispherical little bowl at the center of the machine. A bit of dried blood remained there, a trace left from the last time Captain Tyrian had used this device.

The bald First Mate's brow furrowed bit by bit.

As the captain’s most trusted subordinate, Aiden knew this device very well.

Anomaly 203, the Blood-Seeking spirit compass, was a brass machine of complex structure and unknown principles. It had once been part of the Queen of Frostholm’s collection. Now it belonged to Captain Tyrian.

Among the ranked Anomalies, this machine counted as one of the more “positive” types. Blood could be poured into the small central bowl, and after absorbing the fresh blood it used a series of spirit compasses to indicate the location of the user’s blood relatives. The priority of its indications was linked to the closeness of the blood relation, the physical distance, and the user’s own intent.

Compared with most Anomalies that carried direct malice and could become lethal merely through improper storage, the Blood-Seeking spirit compass was relatively safe to keep. It did not require any special sealing conditions. But once activated, the device revealed a far more sinister side.

First, once blood had been poured into it, the user would be constantly tempted by the spirit compass, developing an urge to keep feeding it blood. Those of weak mind might even bleed themselves to death in the process. Second, though the Blood-Seeking spirit compass could indeed help the user find their blood kin, it often “smuggled in misfortune” during that process, guiding events toward worse and worse outcomes as the user and their relatives drew closer.

In the cases Aiden knew alone, Anomaly 203 had once guided a father to the son he had lost for many years, only for the two of them to somehow kill each other by mistake the moment they met.

Yet these negative effects had never mattered much to Captain Tyrian. His will was strong enough to resist the Blood-Seeking spirit compass’s “call to offer blood”. As for the misfortune that came when blood kin drew near…

To begin with, the captain and Miss Lucretia would never meet while Anomaly 203 was active. Second, the Abnomar father and son had always been “a loving father and a filial son”.

Even the Blood-Seeking spirit compass could not produce a “reunion” more Plague dusk than two curse warships meeting and immediately blanketing each other with fire.

For the past half century, Captain Tyrian had often used the Blood-Seeking spirit compass as a kind of “warning device”, using it to determine whether the Vanished had returned to the Mortal Realm.

Aiden and the Sailors gathered around Anomaly 203. Several pairs of eyes were fixed on the ancient spirit compasses around the brass device, each one decorated with complicated patterns.

Its gears and needles had fallen completely still.

“…Maybe it just wanted to stretch a little,” a Sailor with a hole in his forehead said cautiously, as if trying to ease the tension. “After all, this thing is usually completely motionless…”

Aiden glared at the Sailor. “If you cannot make a decent joke, then do not make one.”

“Or… should we wipe away the blood in the middle?” another Sailor, shriveled like a mummified corpse, spoke up. “Otherwise I keep feeling as if this thing is about to wake up at any moment.”

“No,” Aiden shook his head. “The captain gave strict orders. The blood in the center of the spirit compass cannot be wiped off by hand. We have to wait seventy-two hours and let the spirit compass absorb it on its own.”

“…What happens if we wipe it early?”

“No one knows. It is hard enough to work out the correct way to use an Anomaly. Who would be full and bored enough to test all the wrong operations?” Aiden said casually. “Unless you want to try. We will count it as a contribution to Human civilization.”

“No, no, no, I was just saying.”

Aiden snorted coldly.

Click, click.

At that moment, the Blood-Seeking spirit compass suddenly made that faint mechanical sound again. The conversation between the First Mate and the Sailors broke off at once. Aiden immediately looked toward the machine and saw its gears begin to quiver. Several spirit compass needles around its edge jerked violently, and then all of the needles suddenly pointed toward the waters around Pland.

The Blood-Seeking spirit compass fell silent once more, and this time it seemed truly unlikely to move again.

All of its needles were now avoiding Pland itself.

Aiden and the Sailors looked at one another.

“…I told you it just wanted to stretch a little…”

“Be quiet.” Aiden cut the Sailor off, but his eyes stayed fixed on Anomaly 203 as he replayed what he had just seen in his mind.

All the needles had turned to random directions outside Pland, yet he was certain that in one brief instant the Blood-Seeking spirit compass’s needles had all pointed in the same direction, toward the city-state of Pland itself.

That moment had been extremely short, so short that anyone might suspect it was just a coincidence during the needles’ aimless spinning. But to Aiden, it was as if the spirit compasses' many "eyes" had just caught sight of their target and then, in terror, jerked their gaze away.

And now, with all of Anomaly 203's needles pointing only to the waters near Pland, the situation looked to Aiden more like a clumsy attempt at covering something up.

He suddenly remembered something the captain had once told him.

Anomaly 203 sometimes behaved like a living thing. It did not always run in a purely mechanical way.

This thing could feel fear.

"Something is wrong… There is a problem with this city-state!" Aiden realized all at once. "We have to tell the captain what is happening here."

"But did the captain not order that we are forbidden to go ashore?"

"We will send a message first," Aiden said quickly, looking toward one of the Sailors. "Go, bring Polly here!"

The Sailor ran off at once. Not long after, he ran back to the bridge. A huge parrot with mottled tail feathers perched on his shoulder, rubbing its beak against the back of the Sailor's exposed skull.

"Polly, we need you to carry a message," Aiden called loudly.

The parrot immediately stopped tormenting the Sailor, lifted its head, and stared at the First Mate: "Polly can carry a message."

"Go to the great Cathedral of the city-state. Look for the captain's aura and tell him this: the Blood-Seeking spirit compass pointed to Pland. The city-state is not safe."

Chapter 230: Cozy Daily Life in the Subspace Nest

The large parrot with its brilliantly colored tail feathers beat its wings as it left the Sea Mist, streaking over the docks at surprising speed and flying straight toward the city-state.

“First Mate, what do we do? Are we just waiting here?”

On the bridge of the Sea Mist, a sailor watched Polly’s distant figure, then turned to the silent Aiden and asked.

“…We can only wait for now.” Aiden lowered his head and glanced at the deck under his feet. He weighed things quickly, forcing his cold mind to run as fast as it could. “Not only because of the captain’s order, but also because of the Sea Mist’s current condition.”

That second half of his words quickly calmed the few men who had still been a little restless.

The captain had gone ashore with only a few trusted aides, leaving his First Mate and all the other sailors on the ship. The official reason was that most of the Sea Mist’s Undying sailors looked strange and frightening, which could easily cause unrest and hostility inside the city-state. But Aiden knew the real reason very well.

Because not long ago, the Sea Mist had just run into its own flagship.

The ship was in bad shape now, not only because its hull was damaged, but because the ship’s “soul” was restless. The Sea Mist’s boiler kept shuddering, strange hollow sounds echoed through the small Cathedral, and the pressure in the steam pipes still had not fully stabilized. The ship had indeed returned to “this side”, but it was hard to say whether it would fall into a runaway state again.

When the ship was unstable like this, the sailors who had served on her for over half a century were its “anchors”. The Sea Mist’s iron anchor let her rest on the sea’s surface, while the Undying formed an Anchor of Humanity that kept her steady in the dimension of the Mortal Realm.

Aiden did not dare reduce the number of sailors on board. After vaguely sensing how strange Pland’s situation was, he dared even less to let the Sea Mist’s crew wander into the city-state at will. That could easily cause a “jolt” and wake the ship’s barely calmed “soul”.

Likewise, he did not dare let the Sea Mist signal the city-state of Pland directly, whether by whistle, bell, or a telegraph to the city’s authority. He feared he might alarm some power hidden inside Pland.

Sending the parrot Polly with a message was the lowest risk plan he could think of. He only hoped that once the captain got the news, he would hurry back, that nothing had trapped him yet, and that it was not too late.

Of course, he also could not put all his hopes on “waiting”. If the captain still had not returned after a day, he would have to send a small part of the crew ashore to take the risk.

Aiden frowned tightly and cast his gaze toward the pearl-like city shining under the sunlight. He replayed every detail of the captain leaving with that city Inquisitor, trying to find anything wrong that could explain Anomaly 203’s abnormal behavior just now.

…

Duncan, who was sitting by the counter turning the pages of a newspaper, suddenly stopped and looked thoughtfully toward the window.

Alice, who sat next to him pretending to flip through a paper as well, noticed and asked curiously: “Mr. Duncan, what are you looking at?”

“…I suddenly felt like something glanced this way,” Duncan muttered with a frown, unsure. “But it vanished the moment I blinked.”

“Oh oh, I know. That’s called a ‘Champion’s Shiver’! Mr. Goathead told me about it,” Alice said happily. “He said the stronger you are, the easier it is to feel gazes or even thoughts aimed at you, and someone as strong as you will be getting shivers all the time…”

Duncan set the paper down and looked at Alice with no expression: “He really said that?”

Alice’s smile froze a little. “…I figured out the last part myself.”

“Don’t waste time on that kind of useless reasoning.” Duncan said it casually, then focused a little and started looking for the source of that sudden shiver.

He did not treat that fleeting feeling as a hallucination. After living so long in a world full of the uncanny, he had formed the habit of paying attention to every sudden intuition and digging to the bottom of it.

Duncan’s senses spread quickly, reaching toward the city’s edges. In a moment, Pland appeared in his mind with clear outlines, just like the Vanished did. Just as he could feel the Vanished’s “texture”, he began to feel the complex “touch” this city under his feet sent to him. Among all those sensations, one message stood out, the sharpest and most abrupt.

In the southeastern Harbor of Pland.

“…Tyrian’s ship?” Duncan was a bit surprised when he sensed the source of that aura. “Why is he here?”

Then he recalled his earlier clash with that ironclad warship, the position it had been in back then and the intent it showed in battle. After a brief moment of thought, his expression grew a bit odd.

The Sea Mist had appeared near Pland and taken the initiative to attack the Vanished… Was it actually “reinforcements” that Pland’s authority had called in, meant to intercept him?

Duncan vaguely guessed the cause and effect in his mind, but only felt both amused and annoyed. He did not know whether to sigh first over this “loving father and filial son” relationship, or over Tyrian’s dedication as reinforcements. After being beaten by the Vanished until his ship almost sank, the man had still stubbornly made it to Pland. What kind of spirit was that?

It definitely was not a spirit of “duty bound to protect world peace”.

Most likely, it was the spirit of “nothing is more fun than fighting with your own dad”.

“Mr. Duncan, you’re spacing out again,” Alice’s voice sounded at his side once more. The doll tilted her head slightly as she looked at him. “Do you want to go out?”

“No.” Duncan shook his head while keeping his senses on the Sea Mist. Because that ship had not yet become one of his “collections” like the Vanished and Pland, he could not sense its details. But thinking of his “connection” with the Sea Mist and with Tyrian, he had already started searching for the position of his “eldest son”. There was no point explaining such complicated things to Alice, who would not understand anyway, so he did not bother. He only frowned when he saw the doll tilt her head. “Don’t tilt your head. It will fall off.”

Alice quickly nodded in small jerks. “Oh, oh.”

Just then, footsteps sounded behind the small door behind the counter. The door opened, and a small figure slipped out.

“Mr. Duncan.” Shirley patted the dust off her skirt and greeted Duncan with a proud look. “The storeroom is all cleaned up! All that junk you told me about has been piled onto one shelf!”

“Mm, nicely done.” Duncan kept part of his attention on the Harbor while he turned and nodded to Shirley. “You still have some dust on your shoulder.”

“Oh.” Shirley turned and brushed the dust away, then looked at Duncan a little nervously. “Mr. Duncan, what… do we do next?”

When she spoke with Duncan here, her expression was clearly not as terrified as it had been on the Vanished. She was still obviously tense, and that tension would not go away in a short time. But compared with the beginning, she was clearly much better now.

Clearly, at least in her mind she knew Duncan meant her well. As for that lingering tension, they would have to fix Dog’s nerves first.

Duncan nodded, then let his gaze slide over to Alice, who was still messing randomly with the newspaper even though she could not read a single word.

Illiterate.

Then he looked at Shirley across from him.

Another illiterate.

And there was Dog, hiding in the nearby Shadows, not showing himself but unable to hide his presence.

Also illiterate.

He had brought this trio in to help at the shop, and not one of them could even keep the books.

Duncan sighed inwardly, then remembered an earlier idea and his old line of work.

“Come on, you all sit here. Shirley, sit on Alice’s right,” Duncan said as he dragged a chair over to the counter. “Dog, squat behind the counter… stop hiding, I see your shadow. All of you come here. I have a plan.”

Shirley quickly obeyed and sat down. Alice finally put down the newspaper she could not read and looked over curiously: “Ah, what plan?”

“Nina is still out buying things. We have nothing better to do, so I’ll teach you to read,” Duncan said cheerfully, standing up and straightening his clothes. “You can’t stay illiterate forever.”

Shirley had never expected Captain Duncan’s serious “plan” to be this, and she froze on the spot. Alice, on the other hand, was full of curiosity; even her eyes seemed to light up. Dog, who had been crouching dutifully behind the counter, lifted his head to look at Duncan, then at Shirley, his dog head full of question marks: “But I’m just a dog…”

Duncan lowered his head at the words, but before he could say anything, the Abyssal Demon suddenly shuddered. Its whole upper body straightened. “But I can try to be a dog with culture. I have the passion and confidence…”

“Then that’s fine,” Duncan said in a pleased tone. He kept his attention on the Harbor while he reached under the counter and pulled out a few blank notebooks, handing them out to his “students”. “These will be your letter books. We’ll start from the most basic letters…”

Shirley took the notebook from Duncan with a dazed look.

Then she became even more lost.

Letters and spelling were a door to a completely incomprehensible New World.

After only a few minutes, Shirley confirmed one thing: swinging Dog around and fighting cultists was easier than this!

But Duncan clearly did not care much about Shirley’s pained expression, or rather, he was long used to that kind of look.

He only felt joy, the joy of a wanderer in a foreign land suddenly touching something familiar and doing something he was used to.

But the happy time did not last long. When Shirley was stumbling over writing the fourth letter, a clear bell and light footsteps suddenly sounded at the door, cutting off this little “Subspace Shadows passing on knowledge to the retainers” class.

Nina’s cheerful voice came from the doorway: “Uncle Duncan! I’m back!”

Duncan lifted his head from the pleasant lesson and saw Nina pushing the door open. Then he noticed that something else was flying in behind her.

“I saw AI on the way back,” Nina said happily. “AI seems to have brought a friend!”

“A friend?”

Duncan frowned slightly, then saw AI flying into the shop behind Nina. Right after the pigeon came a large parrot with brilliant tail feathers…

Duncan: “…?”

Chapter 231: Reliable Messenger Polly

AI flapped into the shop, landed proudly on the stair railing, puffed out his chest, and let his little beady eyes dart around.

The large parrot with the colorful tail feathers flew in right after him and landed on the counter by Duncan's hand. It strutted along the counter, head held high, as if it were at home.

Duncan stared in disbelief at this stranger that had flown in from who knew where. The big parrot lifted its head and looked right back at him without the least bit of shyness. After a long moment, it suddenly flapped its wings and let out a loud, sharp cry: "Ah! Polly!"

"Your name is Polly?" Duncan asked curiously. He did not expect a real answer. Parrots only repeated things, after all. But to his surprise, the bird actually nodded at his question and flapped its wings. "Polly! Name is Polly!"

Duncan's expression went blank for a moment. Then he turned to AI, who was still standing on the railing and looking down proudly at the first floor. "Where did you find this… 'friend'?"

"A friend came from afar," AI said at once, flapping his wings. One eye looked at Duncan, while the other drifted toward the window. "Since he's here, let him stay!"

Nina asked curiously from the side: "What does he mean?"

After learning the secret of the Vanished and Duncan, Nina had of course also learned that AI could talk. She had been very shocked at first, but now she had calmed down. Still, just like everyone else, she had a hard time understanding the strange lines the pigeon came out with from time to time.

“He probably means he doesn’t know where the parrot came from either,” Duncan translated for AI with some imagination. Then he turned to look at the parrot, then the pigeon. After holding it in for a long while, he finally could not help himself. “AI… I don’t mind you making friends, but have you noticed you’re not even the same species? At least find yourself a pigeon…”

“The sea holds all rivers, true greatness comes from tolerance,” the Pigeon Spirit cried, tilting his head and staring straight ahead. “Tolerance!”

Duncan: “…”

He often found himself pondering life and doubting his own sanity when talking with AI, wondering whether he and this bird spirit were even on the same channel.

This feeling, that nothing matched up yet somehow they could still communicate, was really something.

At this point, Shirley, Dog, and Alice were all drawn over. The three of them crowded around the counter, staring at the fearless big parrot. Alice even reached out and poked its wing in curiosity. The parrot only hopped aside twice to dodge a little, then tilted its head and stared back at the doll, big eyes and small eyes glaring at each other.

“What is this?” Alice looked at Duncan curiously. “It looks completely different from AI.”

Shirley answered right away: “Of course it’s different. This is a parrot. AI is a pigeon.”

“What’s a parrot?” Alice asked the question from her soul. “Can you eat it?”

“No.” Shirley shook her head, then asked the doll in turn, “You don’t even need to eat. Why are you always asking that?”

“I’m in charge of cooking for the ship… for Mr. Duncan!”

The chatter around the counter rose in a jumble, but Duncan did not join in. He only looked thoughtfully at the big parrot that called itself Polly. For some reason, he felt the bird looked faintly familiar, as if he had seen it somewhere not long ago.

“Where did you come from? Why did you come here?” he asked suddenly.

During the earlier exchange, he had already sensed that this parrot could actually communicate with people to some extent. Clearly, it did not have an ordinary origin.

The big parrot turned its head and tilted it. “Polly! Go, send message!”

“Send a message?” Duncan froze for a second, and his expression grew a bit more serious. “What message?”

The big parrot tilted its head as if thinking. After rummaging through its memories, it opened its beak, but before it could say anything, AI suddenly flapped over and yelled at the top of his lungs: “Get some fries!”

The big parrot jumped in fright. “Ah! Polly!”

“Get some fries!” The pigeon landed in front of the parrot and nodded with a very serious face. “Get some fries.”

“Polly?” “Get some fries!”

The two birds went on talking like that, until Duncan had to cut in: “Stop. AI, shut up. Polly, what message are you sending, and to whom?”

The big parrot clearly froze. After several seconds, it rocked its body back and forth hesitantly. “Get some fries.”

Duncan: “…”

He suddenly realized something. Whatever message this parrot had been supposed to deliver, it had obviously forgotten it completely…

But then Polly seemed to dig some useful scraps out of its remaining memory. It suddenly hopped up and flapped its wings hard: “Tell the captain, tell the captain! Tell… get some fries!”

Right after that, the big parrot flapped its wings and flew straight toward the door, still shouting “Get some fries!” Before anyone could react, it had already rushed out the door, into the sky, and was speeding toward Pland’s Upper City.

Nina tried to stop the parrot, but she was too late. She could only watch its figure fly farther and farther away with a regretful face, then turn back muttering: “Ah, it flew off.”

Duncan did not answer. When he heard Polly shout the words “tell the captain”, his expression had suddenly turned serious. At the same time, he remembered why the parrot had seemed faintly familiar.

He had indeed seen this bird before, when the Vanished and the Sea Mist overlapped in passing, in one of the Sea Mist’s cabins.

“AI, chase that parrot.”

…

“That is roughly the situation.”

In a quiet reception room somewhere in Pland’s great Cathedral, the old Bishop Valentine, dressed in plain clothes, spoke to Tyrian, who sat on the sofa across the coffee table.

“In the end, the Vanished took away the fragment of the Sun, stopped the creeping Sun Wheel from descending, and wiped out the effects of the historical corruption on the city-state, though we still cannot be sure of your father’s intent…”

Tyrian’s expression was both subtle and stiff.

He could no longer remember how many years it had been since shock had left his thoughts stuck like this. He understood every word the old Bishop said, but even in his wildest and strangest dreams, he had never imagined something like this could happen.

“The Vanished really just left like that? It looked like it came here just to save the day?” The famous pirate captain sounded full of disbelief. “It took the fragment of the Sun… and then? That was it? It didn’t do anything else?”

Valentine and Vanna exchanged a look. Both their faces held a mix of helplessness and hesitation.

At this point, it was really hard to say the words “your dad robbed half the city’s fries” to Tyrian’s face.

“…Nothing else,” the old Bishop said at last after much hesitation. He still could not bring himself to say it. He shook his head and sighed. “I know you are confused, Mr. Tyrian. We are as confused as you are. If even you don’t know what your father wants, then we know even less.”

“He stopped counting as my father a century ago,” Tyrian said slowly, shaking his head with a deep voice. “He is only a copy, torn apart by Subspace and then clumsily stitched back together. There is no trace of humanity in that empty shell…”

Tyrian suddenly stopped. For some reason, he recalled those few seconds when the Vanished and the Sea Mist overlapped, and the cold, distant words he had heard then.

“I’m busy.”

The Pirate Lord felt a sudden hesitation.

Was there really no humanity inside that body on the Vanished? The voice that had spoken to him back then, and the aura he had felt from that figure… were those really just the hollow, mad echoes of Subspace?

As Tyrian drifted off in thought, the young Inquisitor’s voice suddenly came from the other side, breaking his wandering thoughts: “Whether Captain Duncan still has ‘humanity’ is exactly what we are going to discuss next.”

“Hm?” Tyrian looked at Vanna in confusion. “What do you mean?”

“In fact…” Vanna hesitated, then turned to exchange a glance with Bishop Valentine before nodding lightly. “We have had more than one exchange with your father recently.”

Matters related to the Vanished were classified, and speaking with Captain Duncan was even more so. None of this should have been revealed. But Tyrian’s identity was so special that these rules clearly no longer applied.

“Exchanges? With my father?!” Tyrian was indeed shocked and almost jumped up from the sofa. “Is this some kind of bad joke?”

“Please calm down. This is a very serious matter, no one would joke about something like this after the city-state almost fell,” Vanna said calmly, looking at Tyrian before pausing slightly. “Strictly speaking, I am the one who has had several exchanges with your father. And from what I observed, ‘Captain Duncan’ no longer matches the description in the records.”

Tyrian sensed how serious she was and quickly calmed down. His own expression grew especially grave. “Miss Inquisitor, how did you establish contact? Why did he seek you out? And… what did he say?”

“At first, it was an accident… no, thinking about it now, it may have been a deliberate arrangement by your father,” Vanna said as she gathered her thoughts and recalled. “I came into contact with the ‘flame’ he left behind and used it to establish the connection. As for why he chose me… sadly, no one knows…”

Vanna left out the details about the mark placed on her and the corruption that could not be cleansed, summarizing it vaguely as “establishing contact”. Then she told the pirate captain in front of her the details of her talks with Captain Duncan.

The man who, in theory, knew Duncan Abnomar best.

Chapter 232: Tyrian’s Memories

After listening to Vanna’s account, Tyrian fell silent for a short while.

Without seeing it with his own eyes, he still could not work out from these few words what plans that Ghost who had returned from Subspace now had, or how he had gone through such changes. But one thing was certain – the “Captain Duncan” Vanna described was definitely not the mad Monster the Sea Mist had encountered on the Frost Sea half a century ago.

Nor did he much resemble the great explorer, the Father from a century ago that Tyrian remembered.

“Captain Tyrian,” after the reception room had been quiet for a long time, Vanna finally spoke, breaking Tyrian’s thoughts. “What do you think?”

“I… can hardly believe this really happened, but since it has, we have to accept it for now,” Tyrian said, his brow slowly furrowing as he thought. “From what you described, he did seem to be clear-headed, sane, and still human. But his power… that curse-like flame… it has become stronger as well.”

Vanna nodded: “I don’t know if that emerald flame was the curse or not, but it was indeed very powerful.”

“That flame was connected to Subspace,” Tyrian said. “He gained that strange power after he fell into Subspace, so calling it the curse is not wrong.”

“…So if that flame is even stronger than what you saw half a century ago, that means Captain Duncan’s connection to Subspace has grown deeper than before,” the old Bishop Valentine mused. “So he has not broken free of Subspace’s influence, but sunk into it even further – yet at the same time, he somehow recovered?”

“…That didn’t fit what we knew about Subspace.” Tyrian shook his head.

“Followers of Rahm often say one thing,” Valentine said. “The only thing we know about Subspace is that we never know enough about it. For thousands of years, aside from the Vanished, nothing from the Mortal Realm has ever entered Subspace and then returned to this world. And apart from a few indirect observations and the mad scribblings left by the insane scholars of the ancient kingdom of Critt, no one knows what truly exists inside Subspace… Any ‘laws’ we think we have summed up about that place are in fact meaningless.”

At this point, the learned old man paused and sighed slowly: “We cannot even be sure that Subspace is actually a ‘place’ at all –

“Sixteen hundred years ago, the mad scholar Belmin was devoured by something invisible in front of a crowd after reading an ancient scroll. Before he vanished, he shouted, ‘Subspace is the shadow on the back of the world.’ That one sentence drove one hundred and forty-two witnesses insane. Yet, taking the madness of those one hundred and forty-two people as sacrificial victims, that single piece of information became the greatest step we have taken in millennia toward understanding Subspace.

“Even now, scholars are still trying to build a theoretical model of Subspace from Belmin’s last cry… And your Father not only actually went into that place, he even came back to our world with his mind intact.”

“Yes. Year after year they study, and year after year people die. The dead are quickly replaced, and the studying continues… So I actually had a lot of respect for those death-defying scholars of the Truth Academy – purely in a good way," Tyrian sighed and shook his head, then his voice grew a little lower. "So now my 'Father' may have become a valuable specimen? A specimen that truly went into Subspace, and can still be reasoned with?"

"That's only wishful thinking," Valentine spread his hands. "We cannot expect 'Captain Duncan' to cooperate with mortal research. And even though he is rational now, we cannot rashly assume that his reason is still on the side of humans. If he is a lucid Intruder from Subspace, that would be far more terrifying than those mindless chaotic projections."

For a moment Tyrian said nothing, as if he had fallen into deep memories and thought. After an unknown time, he suddenly spoke: "Before his last expedition, there was a period when he seemed anxious and unsettled… No, to be precise, it felt as if he had been anxious about something for a long time, and had been making many… chilling preparations for it."

Valentine immediately exchanged a look with Vanna, and both of their faces grew serious.

This might have been the first time in a century that anyone had heard these crucial secrets from the mouth of Captain Duncan's descendant!

Vanna could not help asking: "What was he anxious about? What was he preparing for?"

"The world's Doomsday." Tyrian raised his head and spoke calmly.

Valentine frowned slightly: "Doomsday?"

"I know it sounds a bit cliché, like the crazy talk of those doomsday prophets who pop up every year. But this really was the thing that kept the greatest explorer in the world a hundred years ago awake day and night."

Tyrian let out a soft sigh and went on.

“From the day Lucretia and I took over command of the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star, he would bring it up from time to time.

“He seemed to think our world had some kind of… countdown, or some limit of time. On the surface, the mortal world looked calm and peaceful, but he believed that countdown was already close to the End. Once the time came, everything would quickly fall into collapse and termination, and no one would be able to change or stop it. And he believed… our era was the last tick of that countdown.”

Valentine frowned: “To be honest, I don’t think our world counts as ‘calm’…”

“But in my Father’s words, he called the present mortal world ‘the last pastoral age’.”

Vanna thought for a moment and asked: “So he fell into Subspace while trying to find a way to stop this ‘countdown’?”

“No. He wanted to search for Anomaly 000 – he believed Anomaly 000 could end the world’s distortion and jam that countdown. For that purpose, he passed through the ‘Eternal Veil’ at the end of the world.”

Valentine was startled: “He passed through the Eternal Veil?!”

“Yes… But I could only confirm that he did enter that fog. I don’t know if he truly managed to ‘pierce through’ it,” Tyrian said. “Back then he refused the escort of all the guard ships. All I knew for sure was that he came back from there alive – already tainted with madness. As for falling into Subspace… that happened afterward.”

Valentine and Vanna fell silent at the same time. After a while, Vanna took the initiative to break the silence: “Then did he find that so-called Anomaly 000? You know, in theory…”

“In theory there is no Anomaly or Vision numbered zero, I know. And he did come back with nothing,” Tyrian said calmly. “So I have always thought that when he decided to search for Anomaly 000, he was already not quite sane.”

Vanna thought for a moment and asked: “Then do you know why your Father first came to believe the world had a ‘countdown’? When did he get that idea? Did he come into contact with something, or… discover something?”

Tyrian thought carefully for a while, then said, a little unsure: “I… am not very certain. It was too long ago. But I vaguely remember that he once received a few people aboard the Vanished and talked with them all night. The first time he mentioned the world’s Doomsday to us was after that day.”

“He received a few people?” Valentine immediately grew serious. “What kind of people were they? What was the situation then?”

“They all wore coarse gray-white robes and were barefoot. As I remember… they were very thin, the kind of thinness that looks like the result of long ascetic practice, as if they had gone through a very long journey. They appeared on the Vanished during its voyage, as if they had already arranged with Father to come aboard as guests,” Tyrian said slowly. “After they talked all night, Father said the guests had left. But I never saw them leave the ship. It was as if they vanished into thin air.”

Valentine’s expression turned a bit odd: “Enders? That sounds very much like…”

“Your Excellency Bishop, do you think that after living a hundred years I wouldn’t recognize a Ender?” Tyrian shook his head lightly. “I suspected the same thing, but those people were definitely not the Enders we know.

They were rational and friendly, and there was no trace of madness on them."

"Rational and friendly?" Valentine blinked and said thoughtfully, "I have indeed never heard of any rational Ender… Did those people have any other traits?"

This time Tyrian thought back for much longer. After several minutes he suddenly raised his head: "One of them spoke a few words to me. I don't clearly remember exactly what, just ordinary greetings. But I remember they called themselves 'humble seekers of the Way', and also…"

Tyrian paused and looked around: "Do you have a pen?"

"Yes." Vanna quickly took some paper and a pen from the side. "Here."

Tyrian took them, lowered his head, and drew a pattern on the coffee table. Valentine and Vanna both leaned over curiously.

They saw a hexagonal emblem. At its center was a broken, cross-shaped pattern. When Tyrian drew that cross, his lines clearly hesitated, as if his memory of it had already grown blurry.

"It was roughly like this. One of them wore a charm amulet with this emblem on it. That charm amulet seemed very important. He would not let me touch it, only said it was their guidance and protection on the path they sought."

Vanna frowned and studied the pattern for a long time, then looked back at Valentine: "You have seen more things. Do you recognize this?"

"…Never," Valentine also studied it for a long time, then shook his head hesitantly. "It doesn't look like any known religious symbol, nor like anything the classical city-states used."

"Is that so…"

Vanna muttered softly, her eyes still fixed on the sheet of paper.

The strange pattern on the paper was reflected in her eyes.

Reflected there along with it was also a tiny cluster of faint, ghostly green flame, almost impossible to see with the naked eye.

Chapter 233: The Family curse

Bishop Valentine put away the sheet that showed the strange emblem.

“None of us recognize this pattern. It is likely from a very ancient era, or from a secret society that has never exposed itself,” the old Bishop said as he folded the paper away. “We might find some record of it in the archives. I’ll also contact some friends in the academic world and see if any of them know it.”

Vanna’s gaze returned to Tyrian. She looked curiously at the pirate captain before her: “Before your Father had that secret talk with those strange ‘ascetics’, was there anything else unusual about him? For example, did he suddenly obtain some mysterious book, or explore some hidden ruin?”

“That’s hard to say,” Tyrian shook his head. “You should know that a century ago, he was one of the greatest explorers in this world. Dealing with all kinds of strange relics and secret places was his daily work. He spent almost all his time with the very things you just mentioned, and back then Lucretia and I had only just started helping Father with a few matters. We had very little chance to learn in detail about his ‘collection’. And besides…”

Tyrian paused here and let out a soft sigh.

“Back then Lucretia and I had no idea what would happen later. Those strange ‘Visitors’ were odd, but Father often received all kinds of strange guests. By the time we noticed that his state was getting worse and worse, almost a year had passed since that ‘private talk’. It was impossible to go back and investigate anything then.”

Vanna nodded lightly. Just then, a loud bell and the blare of steam whistles suddenly came from outside the window, cutting off the conversation in the reception room.

“The dusk Bell has rung,” Bishop Valentine looked up toward the window. He saw the Sun, bound by twin rings of runes, slowly sinking below the sea’s horizon. In the sky, the faint outline of the World’s Wound could just be seen. “Let’s stop here for today.”

Then he drew back his gaze and nodded to Tyrian: “If you don’t mind, you can rest in the Great Cathedral tonight. We have already prepared dinner and quiet guest rooms for you.”

“Then thank you,” Tyrian agreed gladly, then added, “I plan to stay in this city-state for a few more days. A hundred years ago I lived here for a short time, and I’m quite interested in how it has changed.”

“Of course,” Valentine smiled. “The Sea Mist is already a friend of Pland. We are always ready for our friends – stay here as long as you like.”

Vanna rose from the sofa and nodded to Tyrian: “I’ll take you to your rooms.”

With this special meeting over, Tyrian left the reception room with Vanna and joined several accompanying sailors who had been resting in a nearby room. Together they walked toward the depths of the Great Cathedral.

“I didn’t expect Your Excellency the Inquisitor to personally lead the way,” Tyrian said casually on the way to the guest rooms. “For a ‘pirate’, this is quite an honor.”

“Only a ‘pirate’?” Vanna glanced back with a faint smile. “Your identity is not that simple – son of Duncan, general of the Queen of Frostholm, Commander of the Sea Mist Fleet. If all the pirates on the Boundless Sea were like you… then we would have no need for any city-state authority."

"…Being a 'pirate' is just a convenient identity. It makes it easy for me to cause trouble for certain people on the Frost Sea. And they like this identity too; it lets them issue more wanted notices so they can pretend they are still useful," Tyrian said lightly. "But all those titles you just mentioned are things of the past, Your Excellency Inquisitor."

After a brief silence, Tyrian went on: "I have never told an outsider this much about 'him'. I hope you understand that."

"Of course," Vanna nodded slightly. "If I were in your place, I also wouldn't want to reveal my family's… 'curse' to outsiders. Sorry, I can't think of a better word."

"It's all right. It really is a curse," Tyrian sighed. "If not for the strange and bizarre events in Pland, and for you bringing up his anomalous condition just now, there are some things I truly wouldn't want to remember."

As he spoke, his gaze unconsciously swept across Vanna's eyes. A second later, he lowered his eyes without meaning to.

That faint, elusive pressure appeared again, even more obvious than what he had felt at the docks.

Thinking of how this young Inquisitor had recently communicated with 'that person' several times, Tyrian even began to have some frightening guesses about that indescribable pressure.

Vanna noticed his odd behavior.

"You look a bit stiff, Captain Tyrian," she asked very directly. "Do I make you nervous?"

“No, Your Excellency Inquisitor,” Tyrian shook his head, then spoke a bit hesitantly. “I just suddenly thought of what you said earlier. You said you have spoken with my Father several times… Besides talking, did he ever give you anything else? For example, power?”

Vanna’s steps stopped suddenly.

“Why do you ask that?”

“I meant nothing else by it,” Tyrian suddenly realized that his question might sound offensive to a devout and steadfast Saint, and hurried to explain. “I just wanted to remind you, my Father… the power he brought back from Subspace is very strange and very hard to remove. Like other chaotic corruption from Subspace, that power is extremely corrupting. If you are contaminated too deeply by it…”

“Thank you for the warning.” Vanna took a deep breath and thanked him sincerely.

But in truth she thought his warning had come a little too late – Captain Duncan’s influence was far more serious than anyone imagined. Now she could only hope that the next time the captain came to her, he would at least knock on the door…

Tyrian had no idea what was going through the Inquisitor’s mind. He only felt that the air had grown rather awkward. But the awkwardness did not last long – Vanna was the first to break the silence.

“I’m curious about one thing,” she suddenly asked. “About that ‘countdown’ your Father mentioned before he went mad… Do you know anything more about it? Did he ever mention any other details?”

When she asked this, what rose in Vanna’s mind was the time she had communicated with Gamona, the storm Goddess, and the hard-to-understand words the Goddess had spoken to her –

Time is limited. The threshold is near.

Back then she had not understood that sentence at all. Now, hearing Tyrian talk about the ‘countdown’, it suddenly seemed deeply connected to it!

Tyrian met Vanna’s gaze.

After a few seconds of silence, he spoke in a low voice: “In his last days, he once suddenly said something to Lucretia. He said – ‘Our world is nothing but a pile of dying embers’.”

The corridor had reached its end.

“Thank you for leading the way,” Tyrian nodded to Vanna. “I’d like to spend some time with my subordinates now.”

Vanna snapped out of her thoughts. Tyrian’s last sentence still echoed in her heart. She nodded without thinking and took her leave of this Pirate Lord.

The door of the guest room closed. Only when everything around him grew quiet did Tyrian truly breathe out in relief.

He replayed his last conversation with the young Inquisitor, and that faint pressure he had felt from her. Only now did a belated sense of dread slowly spread through him.

In a daze, he remembered the last moment when his eyes had met the Inquisitor’s…

In that instant, he had actually felt as if he were standing under his Father’s gaze!

“Captain, are you all right?” A sailor who was also his trusted aide looked at his boss with some concern. “You’ve been on edge ever since you came ashore.”

“…I’m fine,” Tyrian pulled himself together and waved at his subordinates, then walked toward a nearby table. “Bring the things here.”

A sailor immediately stepped forward and put a carrying case from the Sea Mist onto the table. Tyrian used the key to open the box, revealing what was inside.

It was a complex lens array device, made of many small lenses and curved linkages. At its center sat a large scrying crystal.

“Watch the door. Don’t let anyone disturb me.” Tyrian ordered his subordinates.

After several sailors had left, he finally focused his attention on the scrying crystal. He gently adjusted the angle of one of the lenses and called softly: “Lucretia.”

After quite a while, the array of lenses began to tremble and turn. The scrying crystal at the center started to glow faintly. Amid the crackle of interference noise, Lucretia’s blurry figure appeared inside the crystal: “I’m here.”

“Why is it so blurry?” Tyrian frowned. “Where are you now?”

“I… am at the border…” Lucretia’s voice came from the scrying crystal, full of crackling interference but still barely understandable. “The environment… here… the interference has grown stronger. I’ll… adjust… Is it better now? Can you hear me clearly?”

The interference finally faded, and Lucretia’s figure slowly grew clearer.

“The environment here has changed a bit. The Spirit Realm is causing strange disturbances to the Mortal Realm,” the voice in the scrying crystal explained. “What is it, Brother? The Radiant Star is passing through an unstable sea area. If it’s nothing important…”

“I’m in Pland right now,” Tyrian got straight to the point. “The Sea Mist was badly damaged in a battle with the Vanished, and something seems very wrong with this city-state too.”

The figure on the other side of the scrying crystal froze.

A few seconds later, Lucretia’s slightly tense voice came through: “You really ran into the Vanished? Are you all right now?”

“…To be honest, I took quite a beating, but I’m all right for now,” Tyrian’s voice was low. “The problem is… something seems off with ‘him’.”

“Something is off with ‘him’?” Lucretia frowned. “You saw him up close?”

“Yes.”

“Then…” Lucretia opened her mouth, hesitating a little. “This time, the one you saw – was he our ‘Father’?”

“…Not entirely.”

Chapter 234: A Harmonious Family

Tyrian had to spend a lot of effort explaining to his younger sister the strange changes that had happened to Father, and the bizarre things Father had done in Pland.

“I can feel that he is no longer that frenzied, chaotic Subspace husk from half a century ago. There seems to be ‘humanity’ and ‘reason’ in that body now, but that feeling is also very strange to me… I don’t dare be sure what exactly is inside his shell,” Tyrian said slowly with a frown. “He still seems to recognize me, but aside from that bit of recognition, I have no idea how much of him is still the Father we knew. He… changed a great deal.”

The black-haired woman on the other side of the scrying crystal stayed silent for a few seconds, then said: “But it at least sounds better than how things were half a century ago.”

“…You could say that,” Tyrian said in a low voice. “Half a century ago, I stood on the bow of the Sea Mist, looking at that figure and wishing it was not him. Now, seeing him again, I am only confused about whether it really is him… In any case, the Vanished did not bring a great catastrophe this time like it used to.”

Lucretia did not respond. She only thought for a moment, then suddenly brought something up: “Do you remember what I told you last time? Lunie suddenly malfunctioned, then said that ‘Old Master’ was looking for me… Now it seems our Father really is planning something.”

“What would he plan?” Tyrian frowned. “To continue the last expedition he failed to finish back then? To gather the Vanished Fleet again?”

“I don’t know.”

Lucretia said this calmly.

At the same time, a patch of interfering shadows suddenly appeared again in the scrying crystal. Right after that, some of the automatically running magic devices behind Lucretia seemed to malfunction. Faint popping noises came from there, and a group of automata rushed up to check the equipment, looking thoroughly flustered.

“What’s going on over there?” Tyrian suddenly grew a little worried. “Do you need to deal with that pile of equipment behind you first?”

“Don’t worry. The automata will take care of it. It’s just a small problem, nothing worth mentioning compared to the real storms on the border,” Lucretia said calmly, not even glancing back at the chaotic scene. “I’m almost past this unstable sea area.”

“What are you exploring this time? You aren’t planning to rush straight into that fog, are you? Let me remind you, the border is not a safe place…”

“I’m tracking something. It suddenly appeared near the border and plunged into the sea with enormous energy, but the instruments on the ship didn’t have time to capture a clear image of it,” Lucretia still looked just as calm. “Don’t worry, it’s on the inner side of the Eternal Veil. I am not reckless enough to challenge that thick fog yet. Mm, once I find it, I’ll send you the recording. If it’s a material thing that can be cut up, I’ll slice off a piece as a souvenir for you.”

As soon as Tyrian heard that, he waved his hand: “No need. None of the souvenirs you send over are ever not cursed. I still want to sleep a few more nights in peace.”

Lucretia did not mind. She just followed up casually: “Then did you buy that Spirit Realm lens for me?”

Tyrian froze for a moment. His tone suddenly turned a bit unnatural: “That… might take a few more days. You know, you need luck to get that thing…”

“You forgot?”

“Of course not. The suppliers I know all ran out, and the four great Churches do have some, but the paperwork is too difficult…”

“You forgot, didn’t you?”

“I’m doing my best,” Tyrian said with a serious face. “There should be a solution other than robbery.”

“Then it seems you really did forget.” On the other side of the scrying crystal, Lucretia nodded to herself, her tone calm as though she had expected this. “It’s fine. You’re very busy, and it is a hard favor to ask…”

As Tyrian listened to his younger sister, you could see the relief appear on his face. Then he heard the rest of the sentence coming from the other side of the scrying crystal: “Then I’ll ask again the day after tomorrow.”

Tyrian: “…”

The pirate lord wiped his forehead and seemed about to say something, but just as he opened his mouth, the sound of wings flapping suddenly came from outside the window, cutting him off. A moment later came the tapping of a beak on glass.

“Hold on, something’s happening over here,” Tyrian said quickly as he looked up. A look of surprise came over his face. “Polly?!”

He hurriedly stood up and opened the window, letting in the big parrot with the brilliantly colored tail feathers. Polly flapped its wings as it landed on the table with a flutter, shouting loudly: “Polly!”

Tyrian sat back down at the table, looking at the big parrot in confusion: “Why are you here? Did you sneak off the ship, or did Aiden send you?”

“Ah! Aiden sent Polly!” The big parrot spread its wings and bobbed its head up and down as it squawked: “Polly came to deliver a message, an important message! Aiden said… Aiden said…”

The parrot stalled, stuck for words. After quite a while, under Tyrian’s stunned divine gaze, it finally screeched: “Get some fries! Get some fries!”

Tyrian: “…?”

Lucretia on the other side of the scrying crystal also heard the commotion. Her puzzled voice came through: “Brother, is Polly hungry?”

“…No. It should be carrying some other message, but someone tampered with it.” Tyrian reacted at once. As Polly’s master, he knew this big parrot all too well, and he also knew Aiden’s personality just as well. His expression quickly turned serious. “Polly, did something happen on the ship?”

The big parrot tilted its head at its master and repeated “Get some fries” several more times, the meaning completely unclear. Then it suddenly stopped, as if it had finally remembered something. It cried out excitedly: “Blood-seeking spirit compass!”

Tyrian frowned slightly: “The Blood-seeking spirit compass?”

“It points at the city-state!” The big parrot beat its wings hard and yelled excitedly: “The Blood-seeking spirit compass, it points at the city-state!”

Tyrian suddenly froze, then reacted at once. His expression changed, and he snapped his head up to stare at the scrying crystal in front of him: “Lucy, he is…”

“Brother, leave Pland immediately.” Before Tyrian finished, Lucretia had already reacted on the other side of the scrying crystal. Her voice grew urgent as she said: “This could be a trap!”

But Tyrian did not respond at all to his younger sister’s urgent warning. He sat there rigid, like a frozen statue, eyes fixed straight ahead.

“Brother?” Lucretia’s voice now held confusion. “Didn’t you hear me?”

“Lucy, he is…” Tyrian finally broke the silence in a low voice. “…right across from me.”

The voice in the scrying crystal went quiet.

Tyrian stared fixedly ahead, at the other side of the table. On the wall over there, the surface of a decorative mirror with an oval frame was rippling with faint green flames. Amid the flickering fire, a stern figure stood in the mirror, calmly turning his divine gaze this way.

“First,” the figure in the mirror spoke. “This is not a trap. I am just as surprised that you came here.

“Second, I’m done with my work, so I came to see what you two are busy with.”

Tyrian still sat up straight, saying nothing. In the scrying crystal, Lucretia was just as stiff, but she could not see what was happening on the other side, and could only hear the voice. That made her even more uneasy, and she could not help whispering: “Is he really there?”

With no expression, Tyrian grabbed the box on the table and turned the scrying crystal and the lens assembly toward the other side: “Say hello to Father.”

As soon as Tyrian moved, Lucretia’s voice grew louder and more hurried: “No, no, no need to turn it, I just…”

She had already been turned.

Through the magic crystal sphere, she saw Father hanging on the wall.

Duncan also looked through the mirror surface at the woman inside the crystal sphere.

This was his first time seeing her, and in the mind of this body, aside from a faint impression of affection and nostalgia, he had no memory at all of being with her.

But that faint remaining sense of warmth and nostalgia still slowly spread through his heart. He had felt something similar when he saw Tyrian, but facing Lucretia now, that feeling seemed to carry a faint extra trace of… guilt and regret.

Was it because he owed her more? Or because of that last gift he never managed to send?

Duncan did not know. After all, those were not his own memories and feelings. It was only because of the identity he held now that he followed along, nodding to Lucretia: “Long time no see, Lucy.”

“Uh…” Lucretia’s expression grew unusually flustered and lost. This sea witch, who always presented herself as calm and mysterious, had finally run into something even harder to understand than the ever-changing border. She was so nervous and cramped that it felt as if she had gone back many, many years, back to that afternoon when she broke Father’s navigational instruments for the first time. “I… long time no see…”

After that, the room fell into an oppressive silence. Duncan only watched the pair of children in front of him in silence, his divine gaze on them. That wordless pressure seemed to pass through the scrying crystal all the way to the distant border of the Boundless Sea. Lucretia desperately searched her mind for a topic to break this quiet, and after holding it in for a long time finally blurted out: “Your… your frame suits you quite well…”

Duncan: “…Hm?”

“I mean, this patterned frame you have now really matches your presence…” Lucretia tried to patch it up in a panic. “Restrained, understated, and…”

“…Huh?”

“Especially when you’re hanging on the wall…”

Even Duncan was stunned: “What exactly are you trying to say?”

Lucretia finally turned her head a little to the side, as if trying to find where Tyrian was, muttering under her breath: “Help me out…”

Tyrian sighed, pushed the carrying case that held the scrying crystal a little to the side, then stood up and stepped between the crystal sphere and the framed mirror: “You came to us. Is there something you need?”

Chapter 235: Across Time and Space

Across the illusory mirror surface and the flames, Duncan could still clearly observe Tyrian and Lucretia's reactions from beginning to end: tension, vigilance, and a faint trace of fear.

From the angle of a "family reunion", the atmosphere really did not qualify as good.

But he did not mind. He had expected this long ago. Being able to meet Tyrian in advance while the situation was still under his own control already fulfilled his goal for today. Meeting now to lay some groundwork might keep them from falling into a panicked mess the next time they suddenly ran into each other. All the more so when today even came with a "buy one, get one free".

He had not expected Lucretia to be there as well.

And just now, while he hid in the mirror, he had also listened to the exchange between Lucretia and Tyrian. He learned that his last attempt to contact Lucretia through Nilu had not been without effect. Even though he had not received a reply on his side, there had been a reaction on Lucretia's. That bit of information counted as an unexpected gain.

Steadying himself, Duncan kept his usual calm expression as his gaze slowly swept over Tyrian and the scrying crystal on the table beside him: "I thought a father did not need any special reason to look for his own children."

Tyrian’s eyes widened slightly for a moment, but he quickly forced that flicker of emotion down. He lowered his voice and still watched the man in the mirror warily: “You should know this is the Great Cathedral. Even you should at least show some regard for the deity behind this holy place.”

“Yes, this is the Great Cathedral. Of course I know.” Duncan’s tone stayed calm. “I watched it burn to ashes with my own eyes, then reshaped this place from shattered history. If the deity behind this Cathedral is watching, then that one actually owes me thanks.”

Tyrian instantly had no idea how to respond to that.

But this feeling of suddenly not knowing what to say in a conversation with Father was not unfamiliar to him.

Even a hundred years ago, when the Abnomar surname had not yet been entangled by the curse, he often fell silent in front of Father. Father had always been too imposing and obsessed with those mysterious and terrifying matters, while back then Tyrian had not been someone good with words.

And back then, whenever father and son fell into an awkward silence, it was always the livelier Lucretia who broke the deadlock.

“Your… your sanity has broken free from Subspace’s influence?” The voice of the sea witch came from the scrying crystal. Just like a hundred years ago, she broke the awkwardness between Father and her elder brother. “Did you come back this time to continue… your expedition plan?”

Duncan looked toward Lucretia. Under his calm exterior, his mind was racing.

This was a crucial meeting. In this meeting he had to lay a foundation for the future, to prepare cover and explanations in advance for the many doubts that might be exposed later. If possible, he wanted to make everything that would change about the Vanished and himself from now on seem natural to these siblings.

Fortunately, he already had a draft prepared before he came.

“Subspace left an extremely deep mark on me. Perhaps for the rest of my life I will never be able to completely shake it off,” he began slowly, controlling his tone and expression. “There are many things I no longer remember clearly, including even my understanding of the Mortal Realm and… the way I perceive it. I am trying to get to know this world again, and after learning that you still exist, I believe you may be a key step in rebuilding that understanding.”

He paused here before going on: “But as you said, Lucy – at least, my sanity has returned.”

This was the most effective explanation he could think of to deal with hidden dangers and prepare for the future.

To keep the Vanished stable, he had to play the role of Captain Duncan well. Even after reaching a tacit understanding with Goathead, he could not abandon this identity. So he had to continue this performance in front of Lucretia and Tyrian. But no matter how skilled the performance, there would still be flaws, especially when he knew almost nothing about these two siblings. The most effective way, of course, was to prepare a scapegoat in advance.

And then put all the blame on Subspace.

After all, every weird thing in this world had something to do with Subspace. That place was practically the ultimate scapegoat, and it would not mind taking one more.

On top of that, he had deliberately stressed that what had gone wrong was not just his memory, but also his understanding and way of perceiving the Mortal Realm. That was enough to explain almost everything odd about him.

The rest could be left to Tyrian and Lucretia's own imagination.

In the scrying crystal, Lucretia clearly froze for a moment after hearing Duncan's words. She seemed to be carefully studying Father's expression, trying to confirm whether what he said was true. Beside her, after a brief silence, Tyrian suddenly asked: "So your actions in Pland before were only to save this city-state?"

A smile appeared on Duncan's face: "Purely out of goodwill."

"…But the bishop and inquisitor in the city do not seem so ready to believe that," Tyrian said in a low voice. "Especially that inquisitor… she is extremely wary of you."

"Oh, that much I could feel," Duncan nodded. "She tried to jump down and cut me twice in a row, and failed both times."

Tyrian once again had no idea how to follow that.

Duncan paid no attention to Tyrian's silence. Instead, he turned his gaze toward the daughter in the scrying crystal and asked, as if casually: "Is Lunie with you?"

"She is." Lucretia nodded, then beckoned to the side. Soon, a clockwork doll dressed in a maid outfit appeared in the scrying crystal.

Duncan looked in some surprise at the clockwork automaton in front of him, which no matter how he looked at it did not match Nilu at all: "…Why does she look like this?!"

"I made a few small… modifications to Lunie," Lucretia said, her expression a bit odd as she tried to guess why Father had suddenly changed the subject. "Why did you suddenly ask about her?"

“…I found Nilu,” Duncan said calmly. “In a doll shop. You did not take her with you back then, and she was never sold.”

Lucretia could not help letting out a soft exclamation: “Ah…”

Some distant memories seemed to rise up in the sea witch’s mind. Her expression suddenly grew complicated.

The slight change in her face did not escape Duncan’s eyes.

This was about enough. The groundwork had been laid, and saying more might even weaken the effect.

Duncan’s voice came out of the mirror: “I am leaving.”

Lucretia and Tyrian did not react for a moment. Tyrian spoke without thinking: “Leaving?”

“I still have many things to do,” Duncan said lightly, his eyes finally resting on Lucretia. “I will keep Nilu with me for now. If there is a chance in the future, I will give her to you.”

As his words fell, his figure already began to fade quickly. The ghostly green flames around the edge of the mirror vanished quietly like an illusion, leaving Tyrian and Lucretia no time at all to speak again.

The room fell quiet again. For several minutes after that, neither Lucretia nor Tyrian spoke.

In the end, it was Lucretia who took the initiative to break the silence: “That just now… really happened, right?”

“It wasn’t a hallucination.” Tyrian shook his head with a bitter smile. “Did you ever think all this would happen?”

“…Not even in the strangest dreams,” Lucretia said. Then she suddenly asked, sounding a little tense: “What do you think about all this?”

“You mean…”

“What he just said.” Lucretia spoke with a serious face. “Do you think it is true? Father said he has lost most of his memories, that he even needs to get to know this world again. He also said Subspace’s influence is deep and impossible to get rid of completely… but then he said he has regained his sanity…”

“…To be honest, I don’t dare believe a single word of it, including the part about ‘regaining sanity’,” Tyrian said in a low voice. “Before we have more proof, I would rather believe this is a plot of Subspace.”

“Subspace has no plots,” Lucretia said calmly. “Only humans understand plots.”

“…And what about a human who has gone through Subspace’s baptism?” Tyrian drew a slow breath and shook his head. “When the chaos in Subspace gains intelligence, it will be more terrifying than pure chaos… Of course, things might not be that bad. I also hope sacred miracles have truly appeared. But for now… we should stay observant and wary. You have been working on the border for years. You should know better than I do how necessary that caution is.”

“I understand.” Lucretia was silent for a few seconds, then nodded lightly. Right after, she lifted her gaze again and looked at the oval scrying mirror with a bit of nervousness. “…He really left, right?”

Tyrian thought for a moment, then stepped forward, took the mirror down, and set it face-down on the table.

“I can’t help feeling Father makes me even more nervous than before.” The pirate lord, famous across the seas, muttered under his breath.

Lucretia’s voice immediately came from the scrying crystal: “That’s because he just beat you up. Of course it leaves a deep impression…”

Tyrian turned and glanced back with a blank face: “You’d better watch out. Who knows when Lunie might suddenly start speaking with Father’s voice.”

The scrying crystal went dark at once.

…

In the captain’s cabin of the Vanished, Duncan let out a long breath and went over his exchange with that pair of children.

There should not have been any major omissions.

After he finished reviewing it, he casually picked up paper and pen from beside him and began sketching from memory.

After a few strokes, a hexagonal emblem appeared on the paper.

It was the same strange symbol Tyrian had shown earlier in front of Vanna and Bishop Valentine, the mark carried by those odd ascetics whom Captain Duncan had hosted a hundred years ago.

Through Vanna’s eyes, Duncan had obtained this unexpected piece of information!

Putting down his pen, Duncan looked thoughtfully at the strange hexagon and the broken cross structure inside it, thinking about where he should start to unravel the secret of this symbol.

But suddenly, his gaze froze.

He saw a damp mark suddenly appear on the edge of the paper, as if an invisible stream of water had soaked one corner of it. Then, in the middle of that wet stain, a faint pattern slowly emerged.

It was a single word.

Thank you.

Chapter 236: Hidden Contacts Are a Local Custom

“Thanks.”

It was a very ordinary word, yet it made Duncan’s breath stop for a moment.

He was sure that word had not been on the paper just now, and there had not been that patch of paper blurred by moisture either. All of it had appeared out of thin air right before his eyes.

He stared hard at the new mark on the paper. Around him, a ghostly emerald flame already started to rise. His awareness swept across the whole ship in an instant, to make sure no uninvited “guest” had appeared on board —but he found nothing.

Where had this word come from? Who was sending a message to him? And why?

To be honest, at this moment he felt a bit of what the people he scared must have felt. For example, Vanna back then, when she did a jumping slash at the dressing mirror in her dream; and Tyrian and Lucretia just now. But it was only a bit. Next time he would still do the same.

Right now, the key point was why a single word had suddenly appeared on this sheet of paper.

Duncan frowned hard. Suddenly, a flash of insight lit up in his mind. He thought of one detail. Just now, while he had been talking with Tyrian, he had joked and said:

“If the God behind this Cathedral is watching, then She owes me a thank-you.”

Duncan’s expression turned strange. His first reaction to this idea was that it was completely absurd. How could a joke like that ever come true? But after that reflex, he could not help following the thought along that path. The more he thought about it… the less calm he felt.

He lowered his head and looked at the damp corner of the paper. After a moment of hesitation, he picked up the fountain pen at his side and wrote a few words in the drier part along the edge of the water stain:

“Storm Goddess?”

After writing, he waited patiently, like a commander who had just pressed the big build button and was waiting for the results. He kept his eyes on that damp patch, full of hope. In the end, the water almost dried up, and no reply appeared.

The other side seemed to have left a message and then slipped away—or maybe had simply read it and chosen not to answer.

Absurd and bizarre thoughts kept popping up in Duncan’s mind. He had stayed in this spooky world for so long, yet this moment still felt stranger than anything before. Even the calm mood he had worked so hard to cultivate was hard to hold. But after he waited a long time and still got nothing, he slowly put down the pen and let himself settle bit by bit.

He stood there and thought for a while. Then he got up and pushed open the wooden door to the enchanted sea chart room. By the chart table, Goathead was, as always, staring at the mist-shrouded enchanted sea chart. It turned its head at once when it heard the door open.

“There wasn’t any anomaly on the ship just now, was there?” Duncan asked at once, not waiting for it to speak first.

“On the ship? There was no anomaly on the ship,” Goathead froze for a second and answered on reflex. Then it seemed to sense something. “What happened? I’ll search the whole ship right away…”

“No need. I’ve already checked once. I just came to you for a second confirmation,” Duncan waved his hand. He steadied himself and decided not to mention the strange words on the paper for now. “I just met with Tyrian and Lucretia—they happened to be contacting each other.”

Goathead felt that the captain’s mood was a little odd at this moment. But since Duncan had no wish to explain, it wisely did not ask. After hearing Duncan’s words, it only sighed a bit: “Many people in the world guessed that Tyrian and Lucretia had a cold sibling relationship. Their proof was that Tyrian worked as a pirate deep inside the civilized seas, while his younger sister was doing great deeds of adventure and exploration on the border of civilization, and the two never met… But now it seems that the world’s random guesses are just guesses in the end.”

“In my view, their relationship is pretty good. Especially when they faced me together. That kind of tacit understanding was clearly built since childhood, from growing up together, and from a childhood scarred by their father’s beatings,” Duncan shook his head. “As for why they’re far apart now… they just chose different paths in life.”

“Ah, the sighs of an old father,” Goathead said in an exaggerated tone. “Did your talk with your pair of ‘children’ go smoothly?”

“…I think it went quite smoothly,” Duncan thought for a moment and nodded slightly. “I believe I have fully shown my goodwill and have planted, at least roughly, an impression of rationality and ‘returning to humanity’ in their minds. I also laid some groundwork for later contact. At the very least, the next time we run into the Sea Mist, we shouldn’t have to cover each other with fire. That’s the first step toward family harmony.”

Goathead stayed silent for a moment, which Duncan found strange: “Why aren’t you talking this time? You usually talk a lot.”

Goathead spoke in a low voice: “Calling it family harmony just because you’re not firing on each other… that is too powerful. I don’t know how to comment.”

Duncan also did not know how to answer that. He could only spread his hands wordlessly. After a short silence, Goathead asked: “From the sound of it, you are already preparing for the next meeting with Tyrian? Why have you suddenly become so active about this?”

“Because he once served the Frostholm Queen,” Duncan said calmly. “And I’m now curious about that part of his past.”

“Is it because of Miss Alice?”

“A little,” Duncan said offhand.

Then he shook his head, turned, and went back to his room. He found the sheet of paper he had been sketching on and tore off the corner that had been soaked and had words appear on it. Then he returned to the chart table in the enchanted sea chart room: “I have something to show you.”

He placed the strange hexagonal pattern in front of Goathead.

“Have you seen this before?”

Goathead’s neck creaked as it turned. It lowered its gaze and stared curiously at the pattern on the paper. Then it shook its head: “No. What is it?”

“You haven’t seen it?” Duncan frowned. After he made sure Goathead did not seem to be hiding anything, he slowly spoke: “…More than a century ago, several ascetic monks once visited the Vanished. One of them carried a charm amulet with this pattern on it."

Goathead fell silent for a moment, then spoke softly: "Oh, then that was outside my 'field of view'."

Duncan instantly understood what it meant.

At that time, Goathead had not yet been on the Vanished.

Goathead was not one of the ship's original "crew". It had only served on the Vanished for a century. To be exact, it had appeared on this ship only after the ship crashed into Subspace.

This ship, and this "first mate", hid many secrets. This was one of the few mysteries that Duncan had slowly probed and actually managed to solve.

Duncan said nothing for a while.

He had always been very curious. Curious about how Goathead had come to this ship. Curious why it had become the "first mate" here after the real Captain Duncan had gone completely mad. And… curious about its connection with Subspace, and the countless secrets it knew behind the scenes.

But sadly, Goathead never spoke of these things. Even the few times when Duncan tried to probe a little, it changed the subject in a stiff and obvious way.

That attitude was a hint. It could not say it. If it did, something big and bad would happen.

Duncan pulled his thoughts back and set aside the jumble in his head for now. After thinking for a moment, he nodded to Goathead: "Then keep steering. I need to take care of a few things."

"Of course. At your service, always!"

Duncan put away the paper and turned toward his cabin. He had only walked halfway when he suddenly heard Goathead call from behind: “Captain.”

Duncan stopped and glanced back: “Hm?”

“You can always trust your loyal first mate.”

Duncan did not speak, but he gave a small nod. Then he stepped into his room.

…

Morris had tossed and turned in bed for a long time before he finally sat up.

His wife slept soundly beside him, soft and steady snores rising now and then. The glow of the World’s Wound shone in through the window and spread a sheet of night light across the bedroom floor.

Everything felt like a dream, yet everything was real.

Morris rarely had insomnia, but ever since his wife “returned”, he almost could not fall asleep. And he knew very well why.

Because he was afraid.

He was afraid that if he fell asleep, this dream-like Mortal Realm would really turn into a dream. He was afraid that all these sacred miracles were only his own wishful thinking, just like when he prayed to Subspace eleven years ago and got nothing but an illusion that would pop with one poke.

Because of this fear, he did not even dare to pray to Rahm casually. For many years, even when he had chosen to distance himself from the Church, he had never broken the habit of daily benedictions in his life. But now, because he instinctively avoided the effects of the Eye of Truth’s divine blessing, he even forced himself to stop praying.

Morris let out a light breath and let the cold night air clear his sleepy mind a little. Then he got up, put on a piece of clothing, and stood quietly by the bed, looking at his sleeping wife.

He had done this often in the past two days.

But this time, after he watched for only a short while, his head suddenly felt faint. Right after that, a vague calling and a hazy, dignified figure rose in the depths of his mind. Morris shivered at once and realized what was happening.

The captain was calling him.

The Old Scholar took two deep breaths and woke up fully. Then he walked quickly to the storage room that connected to the master bedroom. He turned on the electric light in the cluttered room, and his eyes went at once to an antique mirror placed in the corner.

Along the edge of the mirror, ethereal spirit form flames slowly floated up. The captain's figure was just beginning to appear within.

For some reason, this was a scene that should have filled an ordinary person with fear, yet it suddenly gave Morris a strange sense of steadiness.

From those floating flames and that solemn figure, he found a sense of "reality". Just as pain could prove that one was alive, this was proof that the sacred miracles had truly happened, proof that the present moment was not false.

Morris walked up to the antique mirror and bent down slightly: "Captain, what do you need of me?"

Duncan saw Morris and the cluttered background behind him. At once, his mind gave him a picture of a middle-aged office drone hiding in the storage room to play games, terrified that his wife would find out…

The next second, he straightened his face and shook off that silly image. He spoke to Morris with a serious expression: “I need you to investigate something. It may have to do with history or some hidden organization.”

“What kind of thing?”

“A mysterious symbol. It once appeared on the amulets of a group of ascetics.”

Chapter 237: The Sleepless

The flames in the mirror faded, and the solemn figure slowly vanished into the darkness, but the mysterious symbol Captain Duncan had shown him still stayed clearly in Morris’s mind.

Morris left the storage room. He glanced at his sleeping wife, then went to the writing desk under the window. He took out paper and pen. By the cold glow of the night outside the window, while his memory was still sharp, he sketched that mysterious, strange symbol.

Then the well-read Old Scholar frowned at the pattern on the paper and sank into brief thought.

Even a scholar who had passed the harshest exams at Truth Academy was completely puzzled when he saw this symbol. There was only one thing he could be sure of: this thing was definitely not a mark used by any city-state, Church, or official group, and it did not fit any rune rules used in occult studies symbolism.

According to the captain, this was the badge carried by a few ascetics who had visited the Vanished a hundred years ago, and now, he had suddenly become interested in that badge.

As the captain’s retainer, Morris did not plan to pry into the captain’s secrets, but he was very curious about those mysterious ascetics. What kind of “people” would carry such a strange charm amulet, and could suddenly draw Captain Duncan’s attention after a hundred years?

After thinking for a long time, Morris let out a slow breath. He folded the paper carefully, put it into the drawer of the writing desk, and locked it with care.

He planned to wait until the Sun rose tomorrow, then go to the study and look through the books on ancient city-states and secret societies. The God of Wisdom had given His believers exceptional memory, but even the best memory had gaps. Maybe there was a record of this symbol somewhere in his collection.

If he could not find clues in his own books, then he would go search the big city libraries and the archives at the Upper City university. He had left his university post many years ago, but his old network and influence were still there. Borrowing a few rare volumes would not be a problem.

If all of Pland still had no record of it, then he could only write letters and send telegrams to old friends in places like Lunsa. A few of his old friends were quite knowledgeable in history and occult studies. Maybe they could help. Even if they could not, the universities and research institutes behind them could.

One way or another, this was the first task the captain had given him. The captain had granted the sacred miracle of True Resurrection, and now he finally had a chance to be of some help.

As Morris made these plans in his heart, the restless mood caused by his insomnia quietly faded away. He felt as if he had returned to his first days at the academy, full of energy and fighting spirit for a clear goal. And along with that fighting spirit…

Came the long-lost drowsiness.

…

Tyrian had been tossing and turning in bed for hours and still felt no trace of sleepiness.

He could no longer remember how many years it had been since he last had such serious insomnia. As the commander of the Sea Mist Fleet and the captain of the Sea Mist, he had always had strong self-control and a good routine. He could fall asleep and wake up with machine-like precision—except for today.

All kinds of thoughts and scenes rose and fell in his mind. Mixed among them were countless yellowed, trivial memories: flames burning in a mirror, his gloomy and solemn father, the expedition ship that had once set sail amid cheers and praise, the silhouette of a warship returning from Subspace…

There was even that clash near Frostholm between the Sea Mist and the Vanished, and the words the Frostholm Queen had said to him at the start of the Abyssal Trench Project—

“There are horrors beneath the Deep Sea, but there must also be every answer beneath the Deep Sea.”

Tyrian turned over and sat up in bed.

He looked toward the nearby wall. The mirror that had hung there had already been taken down and now lay face-down on the table, still and quiet. A lighter oval mark was left on the wall. The suitcase that held the scrying crystal and set of lenses sat at the foot of the bed, locked again. Every place in the room that had a mirror or a smooth, reflective surface had been covered with cloth.

But those white sheets over the mirrors only made the room feel even gloomier and stranger. Under the cold glow of the World’s Wound, the room looked like a place where wraiths gathered.

But Tyrian was not afraid of ghosts. He had an entire ship of living dead sailors, a living warship under the curse, and several secret bases that produced eerie visions all year round. Compared to his father, ghosts were nothing to be afraid of.

He paced back and forth in the quiet, eerie room for a few minutes. Then his eyes fell on the suitcase at the foot of the bed. After a little hesitation, he picked it up.

Polly had already flown back to the ship to report that everything was fine. As a captain, he could not very well run next door to wake up a subordinate to play cards with him. He might as well see what Lucretia was doing.

Maybe she was suffering from insomnia, too.

He turned on the electric light and set the case on the table. When he opened the lid, the scrying crystal, wrapped by a complex lens array and a set of curved connecting arms, appeared before him. Tyrian reached out, but before he could even activate the lenses, the device began to hum. The scrying crystal at its center lit up at once.

In just a moment, Lucretia's figure appeared in the scrying crystal.

The "sea witch" in a gauzy dress, with black hair falling over her shoulders and an air of mystery around her, now only looked at her elder brother with a tired face.

"Brother, I can't sleep."

"If you can't sleep, you can pass the time with your dolls, or go work on your magic experiments," Tyrian said with a straight face, still trying to sound serious. "I'm working on the Sea Mist Fleet's future development plans…"

"But your hair looks like you've been rolling on the pillow for four hours," Lucretia said quietly. "Is that a new pose for drawing up plans?"

“…”

Tyrian was silent for a few seconds, his face full of fatigue: “Do you have any good ideas for treating insomnia? Use your clever witch’s mind… Forget it, pretend I didn’t ask.”

The two siblings fell into an awkward silence for a moment. Then they chatted idly about a few things, both of them purposely avoiding something important. But little by little, the topic still began to drift toward a certain direction.

“…I just made a few ‘adjustments’ to Lunie,” Lucretia said. “I strengthened the protection on her joints, and I added a small container for storing holy oil and some protective charm script next to the sphere that holds her ‘soul’.”

“You think that can block Father from contacting you through ‘Nilu’ next time?”

“No. But it might keep Lunie from freezing up completely next time,” Lucretia said with a hint of helplessness. “She was actually scared by that last freeze. We just had a serious talk about it.”

Tyrian was a little curious: “Talk? What did you and your doll talk about?”

“She told me not to be nervous. I told her to take it easy.”

Tyrian: “…”

They fell silent again, but this time it did not last long before Tyrian suddenly said: “Actually, I was just thinking about something.”

“Thinking about what?”

“Do you still remember what Father said at the end today?” Tyrian said slowly. “He said he had found Lunie’s sister, ‘Nilu’. He also mentioned that doll had never been sold…”

Lucretia's eyes changed a little: "You mean…"

"It means that shop is still there. Do you still remember where that doll shop was?" Tyrian's face grew serious. "All I remember is that it was somewhere inside Pland."

Lucretia frowned slightly and fell into memory. Tyrian went on, slowly: "If Father really 'bought' Nilu from that doll shop, then that reveals a key piece of information: before he met the historical corruption in Pland, he had already set foot in this city-state in some way, and had even been moving around here in the open…"

"Have you thought that this might be a clue Father revealed to us on purpose?" Lucretia suddenly said. "Now you've thought of all this, but maybe this is exactly what Father wants you to investigate."

Tyrian was quiet for a few seconds before he spoke: "I have considered that. But even so, you know I won't let this clue go."

"…I only vaguely remember where the shop was," Lucretia said. "It should be at the edge of the Upper City, near a crossroads by the southern subordinate district. The shopkeeper was an elven lady… When I saw her a century ago, she already seemed quite old. But given an elf's lifespan, the owner of that shop is probably still her."

Tyrian gave a small nod and quietly memorized the information Lucretia gave him.

…

The sea had picked up a little. The Vanished rocked gently in the waves. Duncan sat at the chart table, studying the mist-covered enchanted sea chart in front of him out of sheer boredom.

His body in the city-state of Pland had already gone to sleep, but this "true body" on the Vanished barely needed rest. As a result, the night voyage had become a very boring stretch of time. On top of that, night was not suitable for reading, and the sea was not suitable for reading either, so he could not even bring over the light reading he had bought in Pland to pass the time. The boredom only grew.

After all, he could not treat exploring the ship as a fun game every day. No matter how big the Vanished was, exploration had an end.

“I’m almost tempted to walk the Spirit Realm knocking on glass, and call Vanna and Tyrian up to play cards,” Duncan sighed in his boredom. He lifted his eyelids and looked at Goathead. “Vanna is another matter, but Tyrian is most likely not sleeping tonight…”

“If you really do that, he won’t sleep tomorrow night either,” Goathead said at once. “But honestly, your idea is very attractive. It has both full horror value and great entertainment value. Who are you planning to knock on first?”

“I’m just talking,” Duncan shot Goathead a glance. His eyes passed over the enchanted sea chart again. Then, all of a sudden, he seemed to remember something and jerked his head up. “How long until sunrise?”

“…About three hours,” Goathead estimated. “If it rises on time today.”

Chapter 238: The Radiant Star's Pursuit

There were still three hours before the Sun would rise from the far edge of the sea. The relatively safe and stable daylight would replace the unsettling veil of night – if the Sun really rose normally at all.

Duncan glanced at the mechanical clock hanging not far away. Its hands were ticking along at an unhurried pace.

Goathead's voice suddenly sounded: "Are you planning to wait for sunrise? There are still three hours left."

"…Sitting here for three hours doing nothing is even more boring than staring at this enchanted sea chart that is almost blank," Duncan shook his head. He stood up, rolled his shoulders, and slowly walked toward the bedroom. "I'll go rest for a while. If I still haven't come out before sunrise, you can just call me."

"Happy to serve you."

Duncan nodded, pushed the door open, and returned to the bedroom. He casually threw the sheet of paper covered with mysterious emblem patterns onto the table, then walked toward the bed not far away.

This body of his almost did not need rest, but every now and then he still took a short nap before dawn came – not to ease any real fatigue, but simply so he could "get up and greet the sunrise".

It let him keep a feeling of being “alive” aboard the Vanished, so he would not slowly lose his own humanity on this ghost ship. Even though he did not know whether there was really any danger of that, once he had noticed that the Vanished was not as stable as he had imagined, he had been consciously keeping up this habit of “maintaining human ways of living on the ship”.

Duncan lay down and closed his eyes. In his ears he heard the low whisper of wind and waves from the sea surface. Under his body he felt the constant slight rocking of the great ship. Bit by bit, he forced himself to relax.

…

On the Radiant Star, in the captain’s quarters that were arranged with a distinctly feminine touch, Lucretia, wearing a silk nightgown, suddenly sat up in bed.

Her hair was a bit messy. Her face showed a trace of fatigue and irritation. As she sat up, she was still holding a huge stuffed rabbit doll half as tall as a person, its shape comical yet faintly eerie.

The doll was pieced together from pink and blue fabric. A scar ran across its face, and its jagged mouth was smeared with a strange, blood-red color. At the moment Lucretia sat up, the stuffed rabbit doll twitched a little, then slowly turned its head. Its button eyes looked toward its mistress, and from its cotton-filled body came a little girl’s voice: “Mistress, I thought you had finally fallen asleep…”

Lucretia glanced at the clock beside her and spoke in a slightly annoyed tone: “I slept for a few dozen minutes at best and then got scared awake by a bad dream… What time is it now?”

“Two hours before sunrise,” the stuffed rabbit doll said as it jumped down from its mistress’s arms to the floor. It hopped over to the cabinet, used its soft plush paw to open the door, took out the captain’s treasured wine, poured a small glass, and held it up to Lucretia. “You could still sleep a bit more – this will help calm your mind.”

Lucretia took the glass and drained it in one gulp, but she still stood up: “No need. Lying there will only make me more irritated… Help me get ready.”

“All right, Mistress.”

The stuffed rabbit doll with the little girl’s voice answered crisply. It took the glass from its mistress’s hand and put it away, then began hopping around, tidying the bed, clearly very used to the routine.

At the same time, Lucretia snapped her fingers, and the lights in the room came on. She let out a slow breath, dragged her steps over to the dressing table, and tapped a drawer beneath the mirror with a fingernail. At once, the drawer slid open.

A wooden toy seaman jumped out. The seaman wore a navy uniform from an ancient age and held a tiny command sword in his hand. He first bowed to Lucretia, then stood on top of the drawer and waved his sword, shouting sharp little orders.

A whole crowd of toy soldiers rushed out of the drawer. They quickly formed up and did a roll call, then ran to the side to pick up a comb, a hand mirror, a water cup, and a toothbrush. Lined up in order, they ran nimbly onto Lucretia’s body or the back of the chair behind her and began carrying out their mistress’s morning wash.

Lucretia sat listlessly in front of the dressing table and let the dolls fuss around her. She herself was fighting the fatigue and pressure brought on by a sleepless night and wild thoughts. At the same time she absentmindedly turned over matters related to the Vanished. After quite a while, she took a deep breath and forced her mind to clear.

Just then, a faint thread of golden light slipped in through the crack in the curtains not far away and fell into the sight of this “sea witch”.

Lucretia saw that ray of light. At first she did not react, but after only two or three seconds her eyes suddenly narrowed. She quickly looked toward the mechanical clock at the side.

There was still one hour before sunrise.

This was not the time for the Sun to rise!

She suddenly stood up.

The toy seamen had a brief moment of confusion, then, as if long trained, they packed everything away while reforming their ranks. The stuffed rabbit doll, which had already finished tidying the bed, noticed its mistress’s movement and hopped over: “Mistress, it looks like it’s getting light outside!”

“It’s not time to get light yet,” Lucretia said quickly as she strode toward the window. “Where are we right now?”

“We’re still sailing along the route we set last night,” the stuffed rabbit doll answered at once. “We’re already close to the place where that big thing fell last time!”

The moment the stuffed rabbit finished speaking, Lucretia yanked open the thick curtains and then opened the window, which was reinforced with a fine metal mesh.

A thin, hazy fog floated over the sea outside. This was the most common sight in the border region. Deep within that fog, a vast patch of faint golden light was quietly drifting on the surface of the sea. For the moment, it was impossible to tell how far it was from the Radiant Star.

A massive glowing monster floated on the surface of the sea.

Lucretia stared hard in that direction, then took a deep breath. Her body suddenly turned into a flurry of flying colored paper. The colored scraps rushed out through the open window, swept across the deck, passed through stairwells, and flew into the wheelhouse on the upper middle deck.

Inside the wheelhouse, Lunie, a clockwork automaton dressed in a maid's uniform, was at the helm. She sensed her mistress at once. As the colored scraps flew in and swirled, Lunie had already let go of the wheel. In the next second, Lucretia's figure condensed out of the paper and reached out to take the helm.

"Mistress, I was just about to send someone to fetch you," Lunie said as she stepped aside. "That patch of golden light suddenly appeared out of the fog. From the position, it should be the fallen relic we've been tracking."

"Bring us up to full speed. All hands on standby. Have the stern ready to dive into the Spirit Realm at any time," Lucretia said quickly. "Are our reserves of Aetheric Dust and Witch Oil full?"

Lunie answered just as fast: "Reserves are full. Your orders have already been passed on."

Lucretia nodded, and at once the Radiant Star awakened completely under her command.

Large numbers of clockwork sailors, automata, and ceramic soldiers rushed to their posts. The special paddle wheels on both sides of the hull began to spin faster and faster. That engine system, which looked behind the times, slowly unleashed power greater than any modern screw engine and pushed the ship's speed up quickly. At the back half of the ship, the ghostlike “original hull” became even more vague and unreal. Strands of blackness as thin as hair spread from the stern out into the surrounding waters. Seen from afar, it looked as if a black wake were stretching out behind the Radiant Star.

Under Lucretia’s own hands, the whole ship showed a form where magic and machinery coexisted, where beauty and grace were mixed with horror and ugliness.

As the Radiant Star’s speed rose further, the huge golden glowing orb floating between the thin fog and the sea surface finally came into clearer and clearer view before Lucretia’s eyes.

At the same time, its true, ever-growing scale revealed itself.

Even Lunie, the clockwork automaton, slowly widened her eyes and could not help letting out a soft gasp: “Heavens… Mistress, what is that?”

Lucretia did not answer. She only stared fixedly ahead at the giant golden phantom that was slowly emerging from the mist, already as large as a small mountain.

It was so big that from any single angle it was almost impossible to make out its full shape. It was so solemn and perfect that it did not look like anything humans could have built.

A huge and intricate golden geometric body floated quietly on the sea. Its entire mass glowed with a soft, soul-stirring pale gold light. Its height was more than three times that of the Radiant Star’s tallest mast. Its two sides stretched out like fortress walls. The upper half slanted slightly outward like a terrifying cliff. There were no extra bumps or details on its surface. Every part of it seemed seamless and whole.

As they got closer, Lucretia and Lunie began to see more details of the enormous thing.

“It looks half transparent,” Lunie said curiously as she leaned close to the broad viewing window. “It looks… like a glowing piece of stained glass?”

“…No, it doesn’t seem like it’s just transparent…” Lucretia shook her head. She stared ahead without blinking, as if she had noticed something wrong at the edges of the huge glowing geometric body. At that moment, a small black dot suddenly flew out of the nearby fog and entered her field of view.

It was a seabird – even on the Boundless Sea, even in this border full of strange phenomena, creatures like that still existed.

In fact, because they did not have complex intelligence like humans, these “wild animals” tended to live even better than those brave and powerful explorers in the eerie border waters.

Lucretia’s gaze was drawn to the seabird. She noticed that the poor thing seemed to have had its mind scrambled by the golden light on the sea. In its panic, it flew straight toward that glowing “mountain”.

Yet the next second, the expected violent crash and fall did not happen. The bird flew right in, into that slightly slanted “cliff face”.

A little later, in the corner of Lucretia’s eye, she saw that same bird fly out from another direction, looking completely unharmed.

Lunie had also seen it. The clockwork automaton muttered in surprise: “… Is that a phantom?”

Chapter 239: fallen relic

The Radiant Star’s speed slowly dropped. In the end, the ship stopped carefully on the sea a few hundred meters from the glowing, half-transparent “cliff face”.

But compared to the size of that colossal object, a few hundred meters was almost nothing. To Lunie, it still felt as if the Radiant Star had already come right up against the cliff. The towering geometric body before them loomed like a mountain, pressing down with a crushing sense of scale. If an ordinary person stood here… they might already be struggling to breathe.

“…It’s really spectacular,” the clockwork automaton could not help saying as she craned her neck. “And it’s very beautiful.”

The thing really was both spectacular and beautiful. Ignoring its strangeness, it could have been called a magnificent wonder, enough to give a great artist the greatest inspiration of a lifetime, or enough to make a poet compose countless verses.

It looked like a sharp-edged mountain carved from clear pale golden amber, or like an especially regular geometric iceberg. It drifted in the water, surrounded by a misty glow. The thin fog in the area slowly flowed along its surface, tracing out a dreamlike aura.

And all signs showed that this thing really was as “dreamlike” as it appeared. It had no solid body. Even though it clearly existed there, it seemed to be nothing more than a massive shadow.

“Mistress,” Lunie could not help turning her head. “What do you think this thing is?”

“…I don’t know. I only know that it fell from the sky.” Lucretia admitted frankly. She recalled the scene when the Radiant Star had first begun to track it. It had been the day before yesterday, in the last few hours of daylight. While on patrol, the Radiant Star had seen a huge, hazy glowing orb suddenly fall from the sky, tear through the clouds, and vanish into the depths of the border sea. From that moment on, she and her ship had been following it.

But aside from the obvious fact that it had “fallen from the sky”, she knew nothing about this phantom visitor from beyond the world.

Lucretia carefully studied the base of the huge geometric body and confirmed one more thing:

This thing was light, very, very light. It floated on the sea, with only a small part of its lower half dipping into the water. Yet that slight sinking still showed that this “phantom” thing did have some mass and was not just a flat shadow.

Having at least some mass meant it could be bound by matter in the Mortal Realm… With the Radiant Star’s power, maybe they could even tow it away.

Could they drag it back into the territory of the civilized world and assemble a truly professional team to study it? The Explorers’ Association would likely be happy to help…

But that was only theory. How could they actually do it? How do you drag a gigantic phantom that things could pass through? Or… was there some solid core deep inside this glowing geometric body, and that was where its mass came from?

Lucretia’s thoughts raced. Lunie’s voice sounded at her side: “Should we try exploring the inside?”

“We start with caution.” Lucretia spoke as she lifted her hand and bit her finger. A drop of blood welled from her fingertip and slowly floated forward. Halfway there, it suddenly burst with a “pop” into a dramatic cloud of smoke.

When the smoke cleared, another “Lucretia” appeared in the wheelhouse – but it was only a ghostlike phantom. She wore a torn, deathly white long dress. Her face was stiff and grim. Her whole form was half transparent, drifting eerily in midair.

Lucretia nodded to the phantom. Without a word, the ghost turned around and flew toward the “mountain” a few hundred meters away.

Lunie watched, slightly tense, as the ghostly double swept over the foggy sea and then slipped without a sound into the inside of the “mountain”.

Nothing happened.

“Mistress?” Lunie looked back at her master. “What is inside?”

“Light and heat. Very warm, but not scorching. Bright, but not blinding… Inside there is no wind or waves. The sea surface below seems even calmer than ‘outside’,” Lucretia said, speaking slowly as she carefully sensed the information coming from the phantom double. “For now it looks like at least the shallow layer of the ‘mountain’ is safe. I’m speeding up toward the inner part.”

Lunie nodded. Though she was only a clockwork automaton, she had a “soul” closer to that of a human than any other crew member on the ship. At this moment, she could not help feeling nervous. She reached back and turned her own key twice to relieve the tiny shiver running through her inner parts from the tension. After that, she waited for a long time before she finally saw her mistress's expression change.

Lucretia frowned slightly and looked up ahead.

"I've reached the deepest part," the "sea witch" said. "There is a core."

"A core? What kind?"

"A huge stone sphere," Lucretia said, looking a bit puzzled. "Or at least, it looks like it's made of some stone-like material. Gray-white, with many regular grooves on the surface. About ten meters in diameter, floating in the air above the sea…"

As she spoke, Lucretia furrowed her brow and focused, as if she were giving new orders to the ghostly phantom that had entered deep into the glowing geometric body. Then she went on: "It can be touched. It's solid."

"It's solid…" Lunie froze for a second. Years of working together let her understand at once what her mistress meant. "You want to… drag it back?"

"The elven scholars of Lightwind Harbor should be interested in this thing," Lucretia said calmly. "The lines on the stone sphere's surface have a clear pattern and hide a complex geometric structure. I guess… someone good at mathematics could see something in it."

"Then how are we supposed to 'drag' it back?" Lunie stared at her mistress in disbelief. "With a rope or a chain? We do have spare anchor cables on the ship, but they might not be long enough – the projection of that glowing orb is too big. The distance from here to its core probably already exceeds the limit of the cables…"

Lucretia silently watched the glowing "mountain". After half a minute, it was as if she had made up her mind: "We'll go in and pull it."

"…Are you serious?"

“My curiosity is up.”

“…All right, you are serious.”

…

Duncan lay asleep in the captain’s quarters of the Vanished and had a short yet bizarre dream.

It was unbelievable. This body of his hardly needed sleep at all, much less dreamed. In fact, ever since he had come to this ship, he had never once “dreamed”. The body in Pland had experienced some scattered and messy dreams, but none had ever been as clear or as deeply etched in his memory as this strange short dream.

In the dream, he saw meteors – meteors that appeared suddenly in broad daylight.

He stood at the bow of the Vanished. The whole ship was dead silent. He could not hear Goathead’s nagging in his mind. He could not hear Alice’s daily racket on the deck as she fought with buckets and mops. Even the entire Boundless Sea was silent, with no waves and no wind.

The whole world seemed to have fallen into deathly stillness. In that silence, a huge glowing orb fell from the sky – also silent and soundless.

glowing orbs fell one after another, striking the calm surface of the Boundless Sea. They were enormously huge fallen relics, yet they did not stir up even the slightest ripple, as if one phantom were falling onto another. Those glowing orbs gradually began to fall like rain and finally turned into a terrifying and grotesque meteor shower. Countless glowing orbs slowly covered the entire sea surface, surrounding the Vanished in a field of radiance.

Yet as the countless glowing orbs fell, the sky grew dimmer and dimmer. By the end of the dream, as the meteor shower slowly faded, the sky had become pitch black.

At the end of the dream, Duncan raised his head and saw that only a single dark red, mottled, horrible hole remained in the heavens, like an ember not yet gone cold in the dark. It hung there like a dying eye, quietly staring down at all things in the world.

Duncan snapped his eyes open. The deep impression left by that absurd nightmare still burned strongly in his mind.

He was shocked that he had actually dreamed on this ship, and even more shocked by the strange scenes he had seen in the dream.

A silent world, silent meteors, a sky of dead darkness, and that terrible hole in the heavens, staring down like an eye… Why would he dream of something so strange? What did this dream mean?

Duncan slowly calmed his breathing and sat up in bed, rubbing his forehead in irritation.

On this eerie Boundless Sea, on the Vanished, he could not bring himself to believe that a dream was just a simple dream. Something must have affected him, or his own “intuition” must have sensed something, for him to see that scene in his sleep.

As he brooded in agitation, he frowned slightly.

Was it related to the “World Countdown” he had just learned about? Was it connected to the “truth” of the world’s Doomsday that the “Captain Duncan” from a hundred years ago had touched?

Was it just his mind connecting the dots after suddenly learning all that, or was it the remaining memories in this body stirring up again? Was his contact with Tyrian and Lucretia related to this dream?

Duncan tapped his forehead lightly with his fingers, then reached toward the bottle on the cabinet beside the bed, planning to use a bit of alcohol to steady his nerves. But just as he stretched out his hand, his gaze swept across the Chronometer Clock on the wall not far away, and his movement stopped.

The hands on the Chronometer Clock had stopped.

They had stopped at the moment when there was still one minute before sunrise.

Outside the window, everything was dim. He could not see the glow of dawn, yet there was also no cold light from the World's Wound.

The flame of the oil lamp in the bedroom was the only "living thing" still burning calmly, but the light it cast seemed faintly pale, making the room's illumination feel a bit strange.

Duncan's gaze moved calmly over all of this, taking in every unusual detail.

Something was obviously wrong… Was he still dreaming?

He quickly ruled that out. With his mind clear again, Duncan could still tell whether he was dreaming or not.

He frowned and held himself back from the impulse to open the window and look at the outside of the ship. Instead, he got up and walked to the wooden door of the bedroom.

He would go to the enchanted sea chart room first and see if Goathead knew what was going on.

He opened the door to the enchanted sea chart room and looked toward the chart table where the enchanted sea chart and Goathead should have been.

Goathead was not there.

Chapter 240: An Impossible Sight Ahead

Goathead was not there.

This was even more unbelievable than that absurd, eerie dream.

Duncan stood frozen in the doorway for a long time before he slowly came back to his senses. Then he drew the sword at his waist and moved forward, fully on guard.

Goathead really was gone. Only the enchanted sea chart and a few odds and ends lay on the familiar chart table, and the spot where Goathead had once sat was nothing but bare tabletop.

Duncan stared at the empty tabletop for a few seconds before slowly looking away. Then he lifted his head and looked around.

Even more wrong-looking details came into view.

Everything in the room looked mottled and old. Cracks of different depths covered the walls and pillars. Many items were missing from the nearby shelves; almost nothing was left but bare frames. The wall that had once held a decorative tapestry now showed only a suspicious, black stain. Beside that stain was a window, filthy and grimy. Outside it was dim and chaotic. Now and then, a suspicious glimmer flashed past.

It was as if some very fast-moving shadows were darting through the air outside the glass.

The whole enchanted sea chart room felt as if it had been abandoned for many years. Time had ruined most of the furnishings here, and some rough force, more dangerous than time itself, had left those deep and shallow, dark marks on every wall, the ceiling, and the floor.

Duncan even pinched his own thigh again, unable to stop himself, wanting to make sure once more that he was not dreaming.

The sharp pain and his clear thoughts reminded him at the same time that this was not a dream, but the Mortal Realm. A Mortal Realm that felt… very strange to him.

The feeling from his first step onto the Vanished surged up again. Surrounded by endless weirdness, Duncan felt his brow slowly furrow.

But compared to that first time on this ship, he adjusted much faster now. After a few deep breaths, he was completely calm.

After all, he now had many strange experiences that he could never have imagined in the first half of his life. The experience he had gained dealing with this eerie world, and the control and confidence he had in his own power, meant he was no longer that confused rookie from before.

Now the only thing that truly worried him was that his fear that the Vanished was unstable and would run into trouble sooner or later seemed to be turning into fact.

This ship had changed in some abnormal way.

Duncan walked another circle around the room. He checked the now-empty shelves, looked over the walls that were nothing but grime, and glanced at the corner where two wooden chests had once stood. Most things were gone. Aside from the chart table, the place had almost become an old, ruined empty room.

But one more thing still sat in its original place: the Oval Scrying Mirror with the ornate patterned frame.

Duncan walked to the mirror and cautiously looked into it.

No terrible scene appeared. The mirror did not show a bloody hell or any twisted, deformed face. It was just very dirty. Dark stains covered the glass, yet in the cleaner patches he could still see his reflection normally.

Duncan did not stay before the mirror for long. He went back to the chart table and let his gaze sweep over the enchanted sea chart.

In the next second, his eyes suddenly froze.

The enchanted sea chart had changed too!

The fog that had once covered almost the whole chart had almost completely vanished. With the mist gone, clear and complex sailing routes showed on the parchment.

Duncan leaned in without thinking, trying to make out the details on the enchanted sea chart, but he soon sensed that something was wrong.

Lines crisscrossed the enchanted sea chart, routes tangled over one another. Yet he could not see a single meaningful mark or place. It looked more like a mess of lines drawn at random, recording a muddled sleepwalk. Between those lines there were no islands, no city-states… nothing at all.

He could not see Pland, could not see Lunsa, could not see Cold Harbor or Qingfeng… Most of those city-state names were still strange to him, but at least he knew they existed and should definitely appear on this enchanted sea chart now that the mist was gone.

Duncan’s frown grew deeper. After he realized there was no landmark at all on the enchanted sea chart that he could use, he slowly straightened up and tilted his head, listening for any sound outside the window.

There was no movement outside. No wind, no waves. Only silence… just like that strange, brief nightmare.

The lines on the enchanted sea chart marked the sailing track of the Vanished. Those tracks updated themselves as the ship drifted. So the lines now marked on this mist-cleared, crisscrossed enchanted sea chart… from which dimension of the Vanished's voyage were they taken?

Duncan let out a soft breath. Then, as if he had made up his mind, he turned with sword in hand and walked toward the captain's cabin door. In theory, beyond that door lay the deck of the Vanished.

He gripped the handle, took a deep breath, and pushed the door open.

The Vanished sailed through a dark, hazy chaos. Everywhere he could see, the deck and the structures on the ship were in ruins, long since abandoned.

At least, beyond the door it really was the deck of the Vanished.

Duncan stepped out through the door. His boots landed on a deck full of pits and cracks, as if it were close to collapsing. A harsh creak sounded at once, breaking the suffocating stillness.

He moved forward carefully at first. Only after he confirmed that the deck only looked ruined and was not actually about to cave in did he dare to walk a bit more boldly. Then he lifted his head to take in the surroundings of the Vanished.

Before his eyes stretched a barren, boundless expanse of chaotic space. Dim shadows hung everywhere. Between those shadows, gloomy, blurry currents of light appeared from time to time and then slowly faded. Now and then a strange flash or stream of light would suddenly flare bright, like a blind bolt of lightning that lit up the distant void. In that brief flash, he could faintly see some huge things floating in the emptiness, as if they were slowly turning and writhing.

The moment he saw those dark lights and flickering streams, Duncan could only curse in his heart.

This scene… looked a bit familiar.

It was exactly the same as the view beneath the hull of the Vanished—Subspace!

Duncan almost swore out loud. The corner of his mouth twitched twice. He thought that the thing he feared most would always be the first to happen. Not long ago he had been worrying that Subspace was too cursed and seemed to be calling to him, and that he needed to find a way to avoid touching it. Yet now, with just one blink, he had somehow ended up on a Subspace drift—how had he suddenly ended up here?!

But after the first wave of panic, he quickly calmed down and held back the urge to turn around and run back into the captain's cabin.

He still could not be sure this really was Subspace. It only felt very similar to what he had seen outside the hull of the Vanished. And if this place truly was Subspace… then hiding back in the captain's cabin would be pointless.

Besides that, he soon noticed something suspicious about his own condition.

He stood there, looking up at the scenery of this supposed Subspace, and felt no discomfort at all. His mind did not feel corrupted, and he heard no strange sounds. Yet by the "common sense" of this world… humans were not just unable to enter Subspace. Wasn't simply looking at Subspace supposed to drive a person mad on the spot?

But he did not feel even the slightest discomfort.

Not only did he feel fine, he could still clearly sense his body back in Pland and sense Nina, Morris, Vanna, and the other "marks" he had left in the Mortal Realm.

Even if he, as a “ghost captain”, had some special traits and some resistance to Subspace, he still should not have been this… safe in a place like this, right?

Puzzled by his own state, Duncan even started to doubt whether this really was the so-called Abyss of World’s End. Then he steadied himself and walked toward the railing at the edge of the deck.

He came to the ship’s side and leaned out to look.

As he had expected, there was no sea beneath the Vanished. The ship seemed to be floating in space, surrounded by the same void in every direction.

He stood at the edge of the deck, gazing at the hazy, massive shadows in the distance and the streams of light that flared from time to time, and carefully planned how he should get out of this situation.

First, he had to confirm whether this place really was Subspace. Second, he had to look for and confirm whether there was still any link between here and the Mortal Realm.

Since he could come here, that meant there had to be some place that reconnected this space with the Mortal Realm. But that place did not have to be in the bedroom where he had woken up. He had already checked both the bedroom and the enchanted sea chart room and found no trace of any such “passage”.

After a moment of thought, he formed a rough plan. He turned away from the rail and walked toward the hatchway in the middle of the deck.

Just then, something caught the corner of Duncan’s eye, and he stopped without thinking.

He lifted his head and looked toward where his peripheral vision had just flicked. A slightly bright arc of electricity was slowly fading in the distant darkness. In that dying glow, he could faintly see some huge, lump-like thing slowly drifting over the Vanished.

Duncan stared hard. At that moment, another “flash” appeared. It was like a long, winding bolt of lightning that stretched across the high sky and lit up an enormous patch of “heaven” in an instant.

Duncan finally saw a hint of the giant shape’s outline—and his breath caught at once.

It was a piece of land… or rather a shadow of broken land. Its scale was unimaginably huge, large enough to trigger a fear of giant things in anyone. Its uneven outline looked as if some vast force had torn it straight off a planet and then hurled it here.

On that upside-down land he could even dimly see mountains, rivers, and some other lines that looked even stranger and more unsettling. But all of it had lost color and life. The entire “continent” was only a flat gray-black. The rivers lay frozen in the gullies of the earth. It looked like a rough model stripped of every shade of color, sealed into a lump of motionless amber in time and space.

This huge fragment of a celestial body moved slowly over the Vanished, showing Duncan some bleak, ancient image of doomsday.

Chapter 241: The Other Side

The whole continent hung upside down, slowly moving over his head. Its huge, gloomy shadow covered four-fifths of his view. The pressure from that sight was shocking. Even Duncan felt almost suffocated and could not help wanting to look away.

But he forced himself not to. Instead, he made himself keep his head raised and studied that upside-down fragment of a star even more closely.

He did not know what this place was, how he had come here, or how he was supposed to get back. That was exactly why he had to watch every strange thing and gather every bit of information that might help.

Did that hanging celestial wreck actually exist? Or was it only a terrible illusion? Was it the corpse of some broken world, or just something twisted out as a projection by the warped time and space of Subspace?

The upside-down land drifted along a slanted path, moving closer and closer to the Vanished. Duncan suddenly grew tense. He noticed that the ship beneath his feet seemed to be moving right along the edge of that “continent”. The two might actually collide!

But just as the continent drew nearer and the stern of the Vanished was about to brush a broken mountain on its edge, Duncan suddenly felt the deck under his feet tremble.

Right after that, he seemed to hear faint cries coming from nowhere. Harsh creaks rose from every part of the old, damaged ghost ship. The sounds broke the stillness on the Vanished. In the next second, the huge hull under his feet began to turn ever so slightly. With a distance that was narrow and then narrower still, the upper works of the Vanished slid past the broken peak.

Duncan stared in shock at the ship's movements and listened as those ghostly cries and creaks slowly faded back into silence. Then, all of a sudden, something seemed to flicker at the edge of his vision. He jerked his head up and looked at the broken mountain at the edge of the upside-down continent—

By now the Vanished had slowly moved past the mountain's middle line. The ship's worn masts almost brushed the dark, shadowy peak. Now Duncan could see what lay behind the mountain.

He saw a cliff, jagged as if it had been torn apart by brute force. A huge humanoid being leaned against that cliff. "He" was almost as tall as the whole mountain. His limbs were long, thin, and pale. His head was swollen and misshapen. A single giant eye was set in his pitted face. That eye was half open, half shut. Filthy fluid seeped from it and hung in midair, frozen like drops of amber.

This one-eyed giant had clearly been dead for countless years, yet the body that remained still seemed to radiate some soul-gripping pressure and power. There were no clear wounds on "him". It looked as if he had died from sheer exhaustion. Even in death, his hands still braced hard against the cliff behind him, his fingers driven deep into the rock.

The colorless black continent and the pale, one-eyed giant dead on the cliff at its edge, all in this dark, chaotic Subspace and lit by that long streak of "lightning"—this stark black-and-white scene burned itself deep into Duncan's mind.

After that, the flash that had lasted so long finally began to fade. It had cut across the center of the continent and now slowly shrank from that center.

In Duncan’s sight, the upside-down land gradually fell back into darkness.

But he still kept his head raised. He knew the continent had not fully moved away yet. Its last far edge was still drifting slowly above the Vanished. He almost felt he could hear a deep rumble as that vast weight rolled over his head. He knew it was only his imagination, yet that phantom roar kept echoing in his mind, like the last sigh of a dead world left behind in Subspace.

At last Duncan lowered his gaze and slowly looked around at the vast chaos beyond the ship’s rail.

From time to time, streams of light and shadow rose and faded. Bright flashes now and then tore through the dark. In this murky void, those flashes and flows sometimes lit up things—lumps of every size, nameless shadows.

Duncan drew in a slow breath and looked down at the ship under his feet—the Vanished, so different from the one he knew, ruined in every part.

He closed his eyes a little and tried to communicate with this ship, just as he had with the intact Vanished in the Mortal Realm, to understand this ghost ship drifting in Subspace.

But in the next second, he snapped his eyes open.

He could not feel the ship. It was not that he could not talk to it. He could not sense its existence at all!

The moment his awareness spread out, he “felt” the ship beneath him vanish. There was no deck, no masts, no cabins. He even felt as if he were drifting alone in this vast chaos. The huge emptiness and the distorted sense of things that followed shattered his focus at once.

Duncan stared in surprise at the ship’s structure around him, then lifted a foot and stamped on the deck, as if he could not believe that the ship carrying him might only be a phantom.

Or… was he the one who was a phantom?

For a moment, Duncan's mind filled with tangled thoughts. Then he shook his head and walked toward the door that led down below the deck.

He decided to keep going with his plan of exploration.

No matter what was going on with this ship, no matter why it seemed "nonexistent" to his senses, it was at least holding him up now. It did not show any wish to throw off or reject its "captain". That gave Duncan the drive and confidence to keep exploring.

He went down the steps and entered the open hold below the deck.

He opened several cabins in a row. Inside each one was the same old, broken scene. Suspicious black stains mottled the walls and ceiling. Every room was empty. Some of these had clearly been storerooms stuffed full of things in his memory, but now they held only damaged walls and support pillars.

He even went and found the cabin where Alice had lived. Of course, it was just as empty. For some reason, that actually made him feel relieved.

Rather than meet familiar people or things here, he much preferred that they did not appear in this creepy, terrifying place.

After leaving Alice's room, Duncan went straight through the crew quarters and the dining area, heading deeper into the ship.

When he crossed the middle deck of storerooms, he paused for a couple of minutes before the stairs that led farther down.

On the Vanished in the Mortal Realm, he had explored those areas before. He knew that below lay the cabin of light-and-shadow Inversion and, deeper still, the “broken bilge”. But during that exploration, he had carried a special consecrated lantern.

That consecrated lantern had helped him expand his senses and reveal in advance the twisted, warped corners of the cabins that were dangerous.

But here, he had not found that lantern.

After only a short hesitation, Duncan still chose to go on.

Things here had changed so much from the Mortal Realm that even if he found the consecrated lantern, it might not work in the cabins below. Besides, the lantern’s main power was to extend his senses. But in his senses this ship did not exist at all. What good would it do to push that sense out several times farther?

Duncan simply raised the sword in his hand and slid his fingers lightly through the air above the blade. A faint green flame flared along the edge, giving him a little light.

Using the sword as a lamp, he went down the steps and walked forward slowly.

A broad, dark cabin came into view.

This was the cabin of light-and-shadow Inversion. In the Mortal Realm, oil lamps had burned everywhere in this room, but the light from the lamps and the darkness in the corners followed the rules of an Inversion of light. The places with more light had been darker, while the corners with no lamps had shone brighter.

Duncan looked around.

Here there was no light-and-shadow Inversion. There was only a flat, chaotic dimness. The spirit form flame burning on his sword did not trigger any strange Inversion effect. It simply lit up the area in a normal way.

Duncan couldn’t help muttering under his breath: “…This place is a lot more normal.”

Then he walked carefully across the empty space and kept going until another staircase came into view.

This staircase led down to the bilge of the Vanished, the place that had been broken into pieces.

Standing before the stairs, Duncan drew in a soft breath and stepped down.

A door appeared at the foot of the stairs.

Duncan lifted his head without thinking and looked at the doorframe. He still remembered the words that had once been written there, saying that this was the last door at the bottom of the ship.

There was nothing on the frame now.

There was no warning left for those who came after, no message to guide the way. It was only an ordinary wooden door, standing slightly open as if welcoming visitors to step inside.

Duncan was not very surprised. He only drew back his gaze in silence, gripped his burning sword with one hand, and slowly pushed the door open with the other.

On the other side of the door lay another dim place, an old, damaged cabin.

But it was whole.

Duncan stepped inside and at once noticed the intact walls all around. Though the place was worn and shabby, there was not a single gap in the hull here, and of course nothing could be seen beyond it.

The bilge in the Mortal Realm had been shattered into pieces, but here it was whole?

A strange feeling rose in Duncan’s heart as he kept walking. After only a few steps, he suddenly stopped.

In the hazy depths of the cabin ahead, an old, heavy door stood alone.

Duncan felt his heart suddenly speed up, then hurried forward. The door’s shape came clearly into view.

It was exactly the same as the door in the bilge of the Vanished in the Mortal Realm!

Duncan came up to the door and noticed at once that it stood slightly open —a narrow gap leading inward.

Through that gap he could just make out what lay beyond.

It was a shattered cabin. Faint light floated inside it.

Duncan turned his head sharply and looked at where he stood.

An ancient, damaged cabin, dim and full of dust, abandoned for who knew how long—just like what he had seen through the crack of that door when he and Alice had once explored the Vanished’s bilge.

At last Duncan confirmed the guess he had held from the very beginning—

This place was on the other side of the door.

Chapter 242: Zhou Ming

He was now on the “other side” of the door.

After he confirmed this, Duncan could not help moving closer to the crack of the door, carefully watching the scene on the other side.

It made him think of what had happened after he explored the bottom hold last time. Back then he had rushed straight back to his studio apartment to check what was beyond the crack of the door. The same state of mind, the same scene.

But just like last time, there was not another “Duncan” on the other side, thrusting a sword this way.

Duncan frowned slightly.

He was now on this side of the door and had seen with his own eyes how things were here. He had even searched the whole ship, and during the search he had not found anything wrong.

Then what exactly was that thing he had seen through the crack of the door at the bottom of the ship in the Mortal Realm, the thing that had tried to disguise itself as him?

Duncan frowned again and turned to look around the empty, dim cabin. It seemed he wanted to find here the thing that had once disguised itself as “Zhou Ming”. He remembered that back then he had thrust his sword at what was beyond the crack. But if this really was Subspace on this side, such a simple strike should not have been enough to kill the other party. There should at least have been some trace left behind.

However, there was nothing. No trace at all.

After searching carefully once more, Duncan finally began to doubt his judgment back then.

What he had seen through the crack of the door might have been only an illusion shown by Subspace, a phantom that only he at that moment could see. That fit the trait that “Subspace showed reflections of the mind”.

Except this still could not explain why that phantom had not affected his mind in the slightest, and why he had been able to deal with it so easily.

Duncan shook his head lightly and put these doubts aside for the time being. He could not help feeling a bit of emotion in his heart. Subspace really was a place full of mysteries.

Then his gaze returned to the door.

On this side, the door was open a little inward into the frame. At the bottom of the Vanished in the Mortal Realm, that door was open a crack outward. The two states matched each other.

On the other side was the world of the Mortal Realm, that familiar ship, the Vanished.

It seemed he had found the passage on this ship that linked Subspace and the Mortal Realm. In theory, if he pushed the door open here and stepped out, he should be able to return to the Mortal Realm.

Duncan put his hand on the doorknob, and a faint smile appeared on his face.

Then he gave it a gentle pull and closed the door.

It was surprisingly easy. He remembered that when he and Alice saw this door in the Mortal Realm, they had tried to close it. They had found that the whole door seemed cast into the very space, so solid that no matter how hard they pushed, it did not move at all. Yet on this side of the door, closing it only took a light pull.

With a small click, the door shut tight. Duncan quietly let his gaze rest on the now closed door. Only after a few seconds did his expression tense for a moment, then slowly relax. His heart seemed to react half a beat late and only now suddenly began to pound.

During those two seconds of closing the door, he had emptied his mind and thought of nothing. He had not thought about returning to the Mortal Realm, had not thought about being trapped here, had not thought about any consequences. He had only given himself one strong hint: “This door is dangerous.” Then he carried out the action without a moment of hesitation. Only after the door closed completely did he allow the emotions he had forced down to surge up, and he let out a long breath.

This might truly be an “exit” that connected to the Mortal Realm, but he must never really push this door open.

He had no clear proof, but a strong instinct kept warning Duncan that the way back to the Mortal Realm was definitely not as simple as pushing this door open from here. This was a lure, a trap. He had already gone through one lure in the lowest hold of the Vanished in the Mortal Realm. This was the second time, more hidden than the first and even harder to guard against.

Duncan’s eyes grew deep as he fixed his gaze on the door. Then he swept the blade in his hand, which burned with spirit form flame, across the door panel. ghostly green flame leaped up and almost at once engulfed the entire door. Yet after a fierce burst of burning, the door still stood there quietly, as if it had not been affected at all.

Duncan slowly furrowed his brows.

Facing something that clearly belonged to the supernatural realm, his spirit form flame had failed for the first time. Yet it was not because this door was extremely solid. On the contrary, from the feedback of the flame he had not felt any resistance at all.

He had not even felt the door's existence.

Just like this ship, in his senses the door did not exist.

Yet this door could not possibly be nonexistent. Even if the ship really did "not exist", the door still had to exist. It could even put on him such a complex influence as "luring him to open it" and clearly held supernatural power. Something like that absolutely existed here.

Great confusion filled his head, and Duncan found it hard to sort out his thoughts. He checked around this door again and searched the entire cabin, but found no clue that could answer his questions. As time slowly passed, he could only give up for now.

He could not waste all his time in this strange place. Since this "exit" at the bottom hold carried great hidden danger, he should look for another way out.

While he was thinking, something suddenly came to Duncan's mind.

He turned at once and walked toward the stairs that led to the upper cabins. He hurried through the dark, empty cargo hold and the crew member quarters higher up, went through the gloomy wooden door that connected the upper deck and the cabin, and came out onto the deck.

The old, broken Vanished still drifted in chaotic darkness like outer space. From time to time, currents of tangled light and shadow around it lit up the huge, terrifying Shadows of floating fragments that drifted past at different distances. Some of those fragments looked like shattered land. Some looked like huge twisted creatures. Some could not be recognized at all, only heaps of pure “debris” that had already lost all color and shape. They were horrible to look at.

But Duncan did not focus on those giant floating things. He walked straight across the empty deck and returned to the door of the captain’s cabin.

The door of the captain’s cabin stood quietly there, just as it had when he left.

Duncan lifted his gaze. On the doorframe, in the dim light, he could faintly see several familiar words.

The Door of the Lost Ones.

Sure enough, just as he had expected, the special mark on this door was still there.

Duncan steadied himself and put his hand on the doorknob.

If there was anything on this ship that meant the most to him, this door came first.

This door connected to everything he was familiar with. It had also brought him his first and greatest mystery in this world.

Duncan applied a little force and pushed the door inward. With a soft creak of the hinges, the Door of the Lost Ones opened easily, just as he remembered. On the other side of the door was the thick fog he knew so well.

After a short hesitation, Duncan stepped forward.

The feeling of passing through dense fog rushed over him. Then came a brief sense of weightlessness and chaotic dizziness. Very soon it all faded away, and Zhou Ming slowly opened his eyes.

He did not return to the studio apartment he had lived in for so long.

He was standing in darkness.

Zhou Ming lowered his head and saw that he indeed had the body he once had as an “Earth human”. Then he turned around and saw the door he had come through standing quietly there. It stood in the darkness without any support, still open.

When he looked around, he saw only endless darkness. It was an extremely pure black, as if all things had died and as if the universe itself no longer existed.

Zhou Ming quickly summed up a new piece of experience. On the “old and broken Vanished”, pushing open the Door of the Lost Ones did not send him back to his familiar studio apartment. It led into a strange, pitch-black space.

Such an extreme darkness was enough to make an ordinary person feel huge pressure and even fear. Zhou Ming knew this. Yet for some reason, he felt no resistance while standing here. Instead, he felt a strange and inexplicable relaxation and ease.

He did not know where this eerie feeling of relaxation came from. But in his mind he knew his state was not quite right. The conflict between reason and his senses made him even more cautious, and he tried taking a step forward.

Even though everything here was black and seemed empty, there was ground beneath his feet. When he stepped out, he still felt the solid sensation of stepping on something real.

Zhou Ming lowered his head and looked at the place where his foot had landed. At that moment he suddenly saw faint ripples spreading out under his feet. In this pitch-black place, something other than darkness appeared. Inside the ripples, words emerged.

Chinese characters he knew well.

“His age?”

“Around thirty five.”

There were just these two lines of words. They looked like a question and an answer.

Zhou Ming’s expression changed slightly. Then he tried stepping forward again. Sure enough, the instant his foot landed, new ripples appeared in the darkness. They were still Chinese, still a pair of question and answer.

“His occupation?”

“A middle school teacher in language and literature, who liked to read in his spare time.”

Zhou Ming felt his heart pounding. He changed direction without thinking and took another step in the darkness.

“His height?”

“Around one meter eighty. He is not very strong, but in good health.”

Zhou Ming stopped and quietly watched the ripples under his feet spread. The gray white Chinese characters within them became clearer and clearer, then faded and disappeared as the ripples spread out.

He did not know how long he stood there before he finally took a deep breath and stepped forward again, slowly but firmly.

Words rippled out with his step.

“What does he look like?”

“Like this.”

In the darkness, a sudden light appeared. Something seemed to condense into shape in that light. Zhou Ming suddenly saw a figure appear before him, a figure exactly the same as himself.

His heart almost skipped a beat, and he stepped back half a pace without thinking. That backward movement made him realize that what stood before him was actually a mirror.

The figure was his reflection in the mirror.

Then he lowered his head and looked at the new ripples caused by his half step back. In the ripples, words appeared.

“His name?”

“Zhou Ming.”

Chapter 243: Return

Zhou Ming stood in front of the mirror, quietly letting his gaze rest on his reflection.

The mirror world was so clear and so real that if he had not reached out and touched a cold, hard surface, he would have suspected that another self was truly standing opposite him.

After a long time, he finally drew his gaze away from the mirror and looked at the vast darkness around him.

How big was this space? If he kept walking outward, could he walk to infinity? What was the nature of this dark space? Why did it appear here, behind the Door of the Lost Ones? What connection was there between this Door of the Lost Ones in Subspace and the Door of the Lost Ones in the Mortal Realm? And, most important of all…

What were those words that appeared in the darkness?

Zhou Ming walked away from the mirror. As he left, the mirror quietly faded, and the figure within it vanished into the darkness. With his steps, more pale words appeared in the dark, describing everything about him.

They were like an extremely detailed personal file, a dossier recorded in some crucial database, though he had no idea what it would be used for.

Zhou Ming felt that even his power of imagination was not enough. He tried to find a reasonable explanation for what he saw, but no matter how he reasoned, in the end it all looked like wild fantasy.

He even started to feel that there might be a “Doomsday shelter plan”, and he was someone who had hidden in the shelter without knowing it. That studio apartment was his protective fortress, and the words appearing in this dark space were the registration dossier he had filled out before entering the shelter…

In the darkness, his thoughts flowed out of control. But after an unknown time, he suddenly gathered up all his wild ideas.

“…I have wasted enough time.”

He muttered the words softly.

There were no more clues here, only phantoms that could shake his mind. Whether this dark space really hid a huge secret, or whether it was just another scheme and lure from Subspace aimed at him, he should not stay here and get lost in it.

Zhou Ming took a slow breath and let his mood gradually calm. Then he decided to run one last test and one last exploration in this dark space before he left.

He walked toward the distance, cautiously and carefully moving away from the door.

More words appeared under his feet. Their content was similar to before, but more detailed and more formal, more and more like registration data used in an official setting.

As Zhou Ming silently memorized these words, he kept turning his head from time to time to confirm his distance from the door and to make sure he had not lost his sense of direction in the darkness.

He grew more and more cautious as he walked. In the end, each step moved him forward only a dozen centimeters.

Suddenly, he noticed a change in the words appearing under his feet.

“The situation of ?#%… whether % @#?”

“?@* was probably between 355 and *&, and there might be &…% of %&…”

The words began to grow messy. The sentences became strange and hard to understand. The once clear and smooth records turned into something he could hardly read at all.

Something stirred in Zhou Ming’s heart, but he did not stop moving forward. He only walked even more carefully. As he kept going toward the edge of the darkness, more words surfaced in the dark.

They became stranger and more chaotic, and the confusion grew at an exponential rate. At first he could still see a few meaningful words in each sentence, but soon it reached the point where several sentences did not contain a single readable character. After that, he could not even see the “nonsense symbols” anymore.

What emerged from the darkness was no longer words and symbols, but a series of twisted, leaping lines, restless points of light, and even trembling projections that seemed to almost break the rules of geometry.

As he walked forward, chaotic lights and shadows that a mortal mind could hardly understand appeared in the darkness. They looked like unspeakable reflections at the edge of the universe and turned into a path that stretched out under his feet.

At last, even the chaotic lines and jumping points of light disappeared. Nothing new appeared.

Zhou Ming stopped at once.

He had not yet lost his reason. He had not become obsessed with the constant search toward the unknown.

He looked back. The door he had come through had almost shrunk to a hazy point of light, but it still stood quietly in the darkness.

Zhou Ming turned around decisively and started back. No matter what else lay deeper in the darkness, the moment the information beneath his feet came to an end, he knew he could not go any farther.

He walked back faster than he had come. It did not take long for him to cross that empty darkness and return to the Door of the Lost Ones that led to the Vanished.

When he laid his hand on the door, the solid touch gave Zhou Ming, who had been wandering and exploring in the darkness for a long time, a strange sense of steadiness. Then he took a light breath and stepped through the door.

A slightly cool sea breeze blew against his face. The bright daylight that suddenly filled his vision made Duncan a little uncomfortable for a moment. The faint rocking under his feet and the sound of waves crashing at his ears reached his senses a fraction of a second later. Perhaps he had stayed too long in a place of total silence, because when the sound of the waves appeared, it felt almost like thunder.

Duncan suddenly froze.

He checked his surroundings and saw the familiar Vanished, the familiar Boundless Sea, and the Sun hanging in the sky, bound by double layers of runes.

He had returned to the Mortal Realm.

This unexpected situation left him a bit dazed. Just a second before he stepped through the door in that darkness, he had still been thinking about how to keep exploring the “broken Vanished” to find a way back. He had not thought that going through the door from there would send him straight back to the Mortal Realm. What was the rule behind this?

To return from that “broken Vanished”, which seemed to be in Subspace, to the Mortal Realm, did he only need to use the Door of the Lost Ones as a transfer point?

He turned around thoughtfully and saw that he was standing before the captain’s cabin. The Door of the Lost Ones stood quietly in the sunlight, and the words on its frame shone in the bright sky.

Duncan’s thoughts suddenly became very active.

There were many doors on the Vanished, but only three were special. The first was the Door of the Lost Ones. The second was the gloomy wooden door deep in the cabin that led to the lowest hold, marked with the words “The Last Door”. The third was the door standing in midair at the center of the lowest hold, which connected Subspace and the Mortal Realm and could perhaps be called the “Door of Subspace”.

Yet on the “broken Vanished”, both the Last Door that led to the lowest hold and the Door of Subspace had the marks on their frames wiped away. Only the Door of the Lost Ones in front of the captain’s cabin kept the exact same appearance in both the Mortal Realm and Subspace.

Now it seemed that this “consistency” might have pointed to the true “exit” from the very beginning.

With a faint answer forming in his heart, Duncan let out a breath, then stepped forward and pushed open the door of the captain’s cabin.

After he crossed the threshold, he confirmed that there was no darkness on the other side, but his studio apartment. Everything in the room was normal.

Then he returned to the ship again and, this time, pulled open the door of the captain's cabin.

There was the familiar enchanted sea chart room, the familiar tasteful furnishings, the familiar table, and on the table, the familiar Goathead.

For the first time in his life, seeing Goathead still resting properly on the table gave him a sense of reassurance.

As soon as Goathead heard the sound at the door, it turned its head at once. A creaking noise of wood rubbing on wood came from its neck as it asked: "Name?"

"Duncan Abnomar. It's me, I'm back," Duncan said at once. He had already guessed that the other party would ask for confirmation. This Goathead could sense whether he had left the Vanished and might even sense certain "changes" in him to some extent. Its "name checks" seemed random on the surface, but there was a faint pattern to them. "I went very far away."

"Ah, Captain, you finally came back!" Goathead cried in an exaggerated and eager voice. It was as noisy as always. "You suddenly left the ship completely, and you really scared me! When you walk in the Spirit Realm, at least you leave your body here. But just now all your presence disappeared… and now you are coming back from the deck? Where did you go?"

All presence gone? Completely left the ship?

Duncan's eyes changed slightly for a moment.

So he really had entered that place that was likely Subspace with his true body, not with the "projection of consciousness" he had first assumed.

He raised his head and looked into Goathead's pitch black eyes. After a slight hesitation, he said: "Don't be scared when you hear this."

“Ah, do not worry. Your First Mate is not only loyal and brave, but also brave and loy…”

“I went to Subspace.”

Goathead: “…?!”

It took a full half minute before the thing suddenly let out a cracking sound, its neck almost twisting off, as it cried: “Cap… Cap… Captain? You said you…”

“I went to Subspace, if I did not go to the wrong place,” Duncan said as he walked into the captain’s cabin and casually picked up the consecrated lantern from the nearby shelf. “Wait for me for a moment.”

Having said that, he did not wait for Goathead to speak. He grabbed the consecrated lantern and left the captain’s cabin, almost rushing through the deck and the layers of cabins straight toward the lowest level of the Vanished.

He passed through the Last Door and came to the shattered lowest hold.

Between the gaps in the hull at the bottom, everything still looked dim and chaotic. Within the limited field of view he could not see many details, only the turbulent currents of light and shadow and occasional flashes jumping and flowing in the darkness.

And the most dangerous Door of Subspace stood quietly at the center of the cabin.

The door was tightly shut, with not even a crack.

Chapter 244: A Corner of the Veil

Duncan walked up to the door and checked its state again, still not at ease.

The Subspace Gate really was closed now. He had indeed gone to the other side of the door before, and with that simple push over there, he had fully sealed this massive door that could hardly be shaken in the Mortal Realm.

He let out a soft breath and lifted his head to look above the door.

That line of mysterious, ancient script still stood out clearly on the frame: “This door leads to the Vanished.”

“Leads to the Vanished…” Duncan could not help recalling what lay beyond the door. He thought of that Vanished that sailed in Subspace, the ship that looked as if it had been abandoned and decaying for countless years. Suddenly he had a faint understanding of the words on the frame.

The words on this door were true. Beyond it really did lie the Vanished, another Vanished – the twisted projection, in Subspace, of the Vanished that existed in the Mortal Realm.

Duncan picked up the consecrated lantern, turned, and left the lower hold. Without stopping, he passed through the cargo hold and upper structures under the Inversion of light and shadow and returned to the captain’s cabin.

“Ah! Captain, you are back!” Goathead was still a bit dazed here. The first thing it did when it saw Duncan return was start nagging: “Why did you suddenly leave like that? Just now you said you went to Subspace? You cannot joke about that! You…”

“I closed the Subspace Gate in the bilge,” Duncan said casually as he put the consecrated lantern back in its place. “I just went down again to confirm it from this side.”

Goathead’s words stuck in its throat at once, and there was another sharp crack from where its head met the table.

Duncan could not help glancing at it: “Take it easy. Do not end up with the same problem as Alice.”

Goathead did not care about the teasing in the captain’s tone. It did not hide its shock at all: “You closed that door?! You mean… you closed it from the Subspace side?”

“What else?” Duncan asked back. “Isn’t that door impossible to close from this side? Why else would I go to all that trouble?”

“Y-you… just for that?” Goathead actually sounded a bit incoherent now. “You entered Subspace, then came back to the Mortal Realm, just so you could close that door from the other side? That… that is not some ordinary wooden door to a store room or junk closet, and you just… closed it like that?!”

Duncan’s mood suddenly improved.

He just stood there happily watching Goathead, watching this creature who usually nagged so much it could boil someone’s brain fall into a stammering mess. Goathead shook on the table like it had been put on vibrate, going crack, crack, crack the whole time. Duncan’s face stayed calm, but inside he was almost laughing himself sick.

Duncan knew he had not explained everything yet and that he had let Goathead misunderstand a few things. But mainly, he wanted to see this thing’s tongue get tied. This was the joy of the Boundless Sea’s number one troublemaker.

Along with that joy, the slight oppressive feeling brought on by exploring the ruined Vanished and that dark space also weakened a lot.

But in the end, Duncan still spoke up. After all, it was about Subspace. Some things had to be made clear to avoid risks later. And Goathead knew many hidden things; its knowledge might be useful.

“I know you are anxious, but don’t be. Let me finish first,” Duncan said. “I did close that door, but going into Subspace this time was an accident. I also need to hear what you think.”

“An… accident?” Goathead stiffened. Its tone shifted from shock to extreme seriousness in an instant. “Please, tell me. What exactly happened?”

Duncan told Goathead how he had fallen into a light sleep and, when he opened his eyes, had entered Subspace. Of course, he left out the details of his exploration in that pitch-black space, and focused on the door in the bilge and on the sights he saw when he looked out at the chaos from the deck.

After all, by now, other than his “true name” and “origin,” there was not much he needed to hide from Goathead anymore. And hiding his true name and origin was not so much because those secrets were especially important, but because the Vanished’s stability had to rest on this “anchor” called Captain Duncan.

Goathead listened to Duncan’s account in utter silence, taking it very seriously.

Then it said that it had no idea what was going on either…

“From what you described, that was indeed Subspace,” Goathead said frankly. “But I have never heard of something like this. You entered there directly in your sleep… and then came back safe and sound. You must understand, even though Subspace is a grave threat to the Mortal Realm, that does not mean it is an easy place to reach. Its danger lies more in its corruption that seeps in without warning.

“Cracks in the mind, shaken faith, a wrong sacrificial rite – any of these can let the power of Subspace infiltrate. But ‘infiltration’ and going in like you did to ‘explore’ are completely different ideas.”

Here it paused, then turned its head. Its hollow black eye sockets stared straight at Duncan.

“Captain, are you sure you were not affected over there? You really… do not feel like anything was left in your head?”

“No,” Duncan spread his hands, utterly calm. “Do I look like I am out of my mind? I feel completely normal.”

Goathead suddenly had nothing to say.

Duncan spoke in a thoughtful tone: “You are always worried that the Vanished will fall into Subspace again. I actually thought falling in was easy…”

“That… is a relative idea,” Goathead explained with some difficulty. “Falling downward from the Mortal Realm is very dangerous, but even the Vanished will not ‘fall’ so easily. ‘It is dangerous if you fall’ and ‘it is easy to fall’ are not the same thing. And… how should I say this… in most cases, the unfortunates who plunge into Subspace… the process and feeling of them entering Subspace are completely different from yours. It is an extremely painful and terrifying process, and it often does not end simply with death…”

Duncan thought for a while after hearing this, then shook his head: “I really did not feel anything like that…”

Goathead held back for a long time, then finally let out a sigh.

Duncan was even a bit shocked. For the first time ever, this chatterbox did not say anything and only sighed!

Duncan thought about it and asked, very seriously: "…Should I be acting more serious?"

Goathead said: "…You truly live up to your title as the moving calamity of the Boundless Sea…"

It was completely flat, with no emotion at all, like it was reciting a line from muscle memory.

"Then let us drop this topic," Duncan said, waving his hand when he saw this, and he changed the subject at once. "What were those huge shadows I saw in Subspace? Those broken lands, the wreckage, and that pale one-eyed giant… what are they?"

Goathead suddenly fell silent. Almost half a minute passed before it slowly spoke: "As you saw… they are just wreckage."

"Just wreckage?" Duncan frowned. "That is not an answer. Wreckage of what? Where did it come from? From when? All of that…"

"Wreckage of worlds," Goathead said. "All those that did not live until today became twisted shadows in Subspace in the ancient past."

Duncan froze for a moment, then repeated in a low voice: "Wreckage of worlds?"

Goathead went silent again. It seemed to be hesitating, weighing something. In the end, it lifted its head slightly.

"Do you think the Boundless Sea is vast?" it asked. "Do you think… the Mortal Realm we live in now is still wide?"

Duncan blinked, then suddenly reacted: "You are saying… everything in the Mortal Realm now…"

“Yes. It is what was left over after the fall,” Goathead said softly. “A little bit of insignificant scum, with a few stubborn colonies clinging to it.”

Duncan stared, then suddenly thought of something: “Is this the truth behind the Great Annihilation?”

“It is only one tiny part of it,” Goathead said, its voice low. “The full truth of the Great Annihilation has been buried in the long river of time. There is no point trying to piece its whole shape back together.

“In your words, there is a ‘Horizon Limit’ there. All information lies on an unknowable, unseeable shore. Only if there were some truly all-knowing, all-powerful great being that could instantly grasp all secrets from Subspace to Abyssal Deep Sea, then to the Spirit Realm and the Mortal Realm, and then roll them back ten thousand years, could it know what exactly happened during the Great Annihilation – but what would be the point even then?

“I know what else you want to ask, but sadly this is all I know, and I cannot promise all of it is true. I do know some things related to Subspace, but even so-called ‘truth’ may already have been twisted into something else after Subspace’s influence. Cause and effect and the order of time have no meaning there. As for my own broken knowledge… even I do not know how much is real memory and how much is just shadows left over from the process of leaving Subspace.”

Chapter 245: A Serious Problem

Duncan fell into silent thought.

This was the first time Goathead had told him so many secrets about Subspace, and it was also the most open conversation the two of them had ever had.

Before today, Goathead had always shown huge resistance to anything about Subspace. It avoided the topic whenever it could and never answered Duncan's roundabout questions head-on. Back then, its attitude seemed not only to be about worrying over the Vanished's stability, but also about worrying over "Captain Duncan's" stability.

But today, its attitude had loosened – after the captain ran over to Subspace to close a door and then came back like nothing had happened.

It seemed it had finally relaxed enough to dare say what it knew.

Goathead said it did not know much and could not guarantee the truth of its information. But for Duncan, even the things it had just said were enough for him to mull over for a long time. They not only went beyond his current understanding of Subspace; they might even go beyond the research level of the scholars of the current civilized world.

After thinking for a long time, Duncan finally lifted his head. He looked at Goathead's eyes, deep in thought: "So you actually knew that much."

"I know a little, more or less… but I truly never meant to hide it from you," Goathead said. It even sounded a bit nervous. "For things related to Subspace, the less you know the better, because many times knowledge itself is corruption. But now, it seems, the great Captain Duncan clearly does not need to worry about that…"

"I will take that as sincere praise," Duncan said casually. Then he looked Goathead up and down again, unwilling to let it go. "Is this really all you know? No more details? Like the identity of that pale one-eyed giant…"

"You are really making this hard for me," Goathead said helplessly. "To be honest, my memory… actually has some problems. A lot of things were forgotten 'over there'. What I have left now is only these rough impressions."

Duncan silently used his gaze, staring into Goathead's eyes. After a long time, he withdrew his gaze.

Goathead had indirectly admitted something else. It truly had not been one of the original "crew" of this ship. It had come from "the other side," from Subspace.

Was it that, when the Vanished broke away from Subspace, it "brought" something out with it, and that something later became Goathead? Or had Goathead deliberately hitched a ride and escaped from Subspace? Was it a deal?

For some reason, the image of that pale giant who had died at the edge of a celestial fragment rose again in Duncan's mind.

Subspace was packed with the wreckage left after the Old World shattered, but those things seemed to be more than just wreckage. Goathead seemed to have come from Subspace, yet it had reason and thought and could even talk. So, were there others like it in Subspace? Or… if it went back to Subspace, would Goathead become something else, something… like that pale giant? Was that why it resisted "going back" so much?

Many questions rose in Duncan’s mind all at once, but in the end he did not ask them outright.

Because he knew that when questions pointed directly at Goathead itself, and might also point toward “Captain Duncan,” the other side would never answer. It involved the stability of the Vanished in the Mortal Realm.

So he let out a small breath and stood up, showing that this topic was over for now.

Bright sunlight came through the window and fell on the simple, classical furnishings of the captain’s cabin. It made the floating dust glow softly.

“I missed the sunrise today,” Duncan said suddenly. “Did the Sun rise as usual?”

“Yes, the Sun rose on time at dawn,” Goathead answered at once. “It seems yesterday’s delayed sunrise was just an accident. Vision 001 is still operating normally.”

“For something like Vision 001, once it has a problem even once, the fear will be carved into people’s hearts forever,” Duncan said with a slight shake of his head. “Those who noticed the ‘fifteen minutes’ will probably never greet sunrise as lightly as before. Wait… do you remember what time sunset was yesterday?”

“Sunset?” Goathead thought for a moment, then spoke, not very sure. “Sunset should have been on time. It wasn’t affected. Why are you asking… ah!”

“You figured it out,” Duncan said, pulling his gaze back from the window. “Yesterday the Sun delayed sunrise by fifteen minutes, yet it set on time. That shows one thing.”

“It crossed the sky faster than usual yesterday…” Goathead finally reacted. “Vision 001… can consciously adjust how it operates?”

“At least yesterday it deliberately sped up to make sure it carried out ‘sunset’ at the correct time,” Duncan said in a low voice.

Goathead’s tone was a bit hesitant: “Then is that… good news? It means Vision 001 has some self-repair ability. Even if it has a small fault, it is still consciously making sure the world runs smoothly…”

Duncan did not answer.

Goathead seemed optimistic, but Duncan did not relax at all because of Vision 001’s “self-adjustment.” Instead, after confirming that the Sun had actively sped up for a day, he felt even more tense.

Because he knew a simple truth. When a vast, ancient, and unattended system suddenly starts using its reserve resources to repair itself, it often does not mean that the problem will be solved. It is a sign that the problems have piled up to a dangerous limit.

Duncan could not help walking to the window. He pushed it open all the way, leaned out, and looked up at the huge glowing orb shining down on the world, and at the two rings of runes that circled the glowing orb.

The light from Vision 001 was very bright but not blinding. Duncan could even just barely look straight at it.

But all at once, his gaze froze.

He stared hard at the Sun, at the runes on the edge of that ancient Vision. He studied them carefully and finally confirmed that he was not seeing things.

On the outer ring of that double circle of runes, hidden under the radiance, there was a slightly dimmer spot. If you looked closely, it was like a faint… gap.

…

In Pland, inside the antique shop, Duncan sat behind the counter, watching over Shirley, Alice, and Dog as they copied letters. Suddenly he lifted his head. Under the surprised stares of his three students, he walked quickly out of the shop and onto the open space in front, then tilted his head back to gaze up at the sky.

After a long time, until this fragile human body felt dizzy and his eyes were swimming, Duncan finally closed his eyes and lowered his head.

Nina, who had been helping teach Shirley and the others to read, ran out in worry: “Uncle Duncan, what is wrong?”

Duncan raised his head and gently ruffled Nina’s hair.

“Nothing. I just came out to look at the weather.”

“Look at the weather?” Nina looked up in confusion at the clear sky. “You could just look out the window from inside the shop. It is such a sunny day… ah, is something going to happen again?”

As she spoke, Nina suddenly lowered her voice and leaned close, grabbing Duncan’s sleeve like a little conspirator: “Did you think of something on the ship? Are we going on an adventure?”

“Adventure, adventure. There is not that much danger lying around,” Duncan said, half laughing, as he glanced at this young lady who had been dreaming of an “exciting new life” ever since she learned about the Vanished. “Stop wishing the world would fall into chaos. Isn’t a peaceful world nice?”

Nina stuck out her tongue in embarrassment. At the doorway, Shirley, who had slipped over out of curiosity to see what was happening, went a bit blank after hearing Duncan’s words. She stared for a while, then turned to whisper to Dog, who was hiding in the shadows: “The captain says he likes world peace.”

Dog did not react at all.

Shirley frowned and repeated herself. Then, from an angle hidden by the doorframe, she gave a little tug to the chain fused into her arm: “Dog, did you not hear me?”

Dog’s voice finally came from the shadows: “I am reciting the alphabet. Do not bother me while I am studying.”

Shirley: “…You really got into it?!”

“Of course. Mr. Duncan is going to check the homework later… even Miss Alice is more serious than you are!”

Shirley froze: “Homework? What homework?”

But Dog did not answer.

Because Duncan was already coming back to the doorway with Nina, and Shirley’s last mutter had landed right in his ears.

“Homework is the thing that will make me quite angry if you do not do it,” Duncan said, smiling as he looked at Shirley, whose whole body suddenly went stiff. “Copy the alphabet ten times when you go back.”

Shirley was about to cry: “Th-then you could just hit me instead…”

“Really?”

Shirley jolted upright: “No, no, I will go copy the alphabet right now!”

Duncan shook his head. He told Shirley, Dog, and Alice to study on their own for now and asked Nina to supervise them. Then, after one last look at the sky outside, he stood by the shop window and sank into thought.

Vision 001… really had a serious problem.

Chapter 246: Warm Days

Ever since the ancient kingdom of Critt vanished, Vision-001 had risen from the Sea of Blood, taking the place of the Sun of the Old Era and shining upon this world in the age of the Deep Sea.

For ten thousand years, this huge luminous core ran as if it were eternal. It not only brought light and heat to the world, but also gave daytime its stable order. Without it, there would be no city-state civilization as it now existed. The entire world would have been shrouded in terrible Eternal Night, and the mortal beings who had lost the protection of the ancient kingdom of Critt would probably have faded away in some distant age without a sound.

No one ever thought that Vision-001 would one day go wrong, just as no one ever stopped to wonder whether the Boundless Sea might someday dry up.

Yet now it seemed that this “eternal” Sun was not truly eternal.

First, sunrise was delayed by fifteen minutes. Then, a tiny gap appeared on the rune rings, almost too small for the naked eye to see. All these unsettling signs pointed to one thing: the lifespan of Vision-001 was actually limited.

Duncan stood beside the shop window, silently watching the bright daylight spill over the street, while his tangled thoughts churned like a storm.

He knew he was not the only one to notice the Sun’s abnormality. There were many clever people in the world. An ordinary person might not pay attention to the changes above their head, but in every city-state, within the authorities and the Church, there were certainly people watching the world's greatest Vision at all times. By now, someone must have noticed the changes in the Sun. What would they think? How would they respond? Did anyone know what had really happened?

He also thought of those deranged Suntists, the ones who worshiped the ancient, true Sun. They spent all day muttering that Vision-001 in the sky was a sinful "False Sun," and that the Sun would one day fall. Did they know the Sun really was having problems?

Or were the changes in Vision-001 actually related to those Suntists and the Sun-spawn behind them?

To be fair, Duncan did not think much of those Suntists. In his eyes, whether it was an ordinary cultist or a somewhat stronger Sun-spawn, they were all about the same—ready to explode at the slightest spark. But the great fire in the city-state of Pland had reminded him that while ordinary cultists might not amount to much, the "Creeping Sun Wheel" behind them held a very high rank. On top of that, there was the group of elusive Enders stirring up the waters, and bizarre, insidious things like historical corruption and Mortal Realm overlays that no one could easily guard against. Who could say for sure that those Suntists did not have the ability to affect the operation of Vision-001?

Duncan let his thoughts wander for a long time and finally decided that he still needed to get in touch with Vanna when he had the chance. She was a high-ranking member of the Church and should be very clear about the Church's movements. He could discuss the matter of the Sun with her.

At the same time, he could show a bit of goodwill and prove that he cared about public security in the city-state.

Of course, next time he went over, he had to remember to knock.

Thinking this, Duncan split off a portion of his attention to check on the situation at the great Cathedral. Then he suddenly froze.

He sensed that Tyrian had left the great Cathedral and was moving toward the southern part of the Upper City.

After roughly confirming Tyrian’s direction, Duncan frowned slightly.

He thought of another part of his plan.

After a brief moment of thought, he raised his head and looked toward the counter.

Alice was leaning over next to Shirley, gripping a pencil and writing very, very seriously in a notebook of blank white paper.

Bright sunlight was shining through the antique shop’s glass window, slipping past the old-fashioned displays on the shelves to pour into the shop. sunlight fell on the golden-haired doll’s shoulders, as if coating Alice in a warm, gentle glow. sunlight also fell on the counter and the doll’s pen tip, giving the entire scene an indescribable softness and hint of mystery.

If this had been an oil painting, it would have needed a name—something like: A Beautiful Doll Writing Quietly in the Warm Afternoon sunlight.

Even Duncan was a little dazed by this perfectly timed play of light and shadow. He walked over and glanced down, and saw that Alice was earnestly copying some letter or another. Who knew where she had started writing it wrong; by now, the entire sheet was covered with little circles packed together into a solid mass.

Noticing the captain coming close, Alice immediately stopped. She happily held up the notebook to show Duncan: “Mr. Duncan, look at what I wrote~”

Duncan: “…”

He held back for a long moment, looking at Alice's simple, joyful smile, with the image of that oil painting still lingering in his mind. In the end, he could not bring himself to voice his doubts. He only managed to keep his face straight and give a stiff nod: "There… is progress."

Even though he could not tell what it was supposed to be.

Alice was delighted. It seemed she needed only that single bit of praise. Then she looked into Duncan's eyes with curiosity: "Do you have something for me to do?"

Duncan was taken aback: "How did you know I had something I wanted you to do?"

"You always look like this when you have something for me," Alice said, gesturing at her own face. She seemed to be trying to imitate Duncan's expression just now, though no one could really understand her performance. "What do you want me to do?"

"You're going to a place, together with AI," Duncan said as he put his expression in order. Looking at Alice's carefree smile, he thought of what he was about to do, and his mood unknowingly grew much lighter. "Bring someone here."

"Bring… them here?" Alice looked completely puzzled. "What does 'bring' them here mean? Do I need to knock them out and tie them up?"

"Where did you even learn that?!" Duncan immediately glared at the doll. "Come with me, I'll tell you what to do…"

…

Compared to a hundred years ago, the city really had changed a great deal.

Electric lines, new models of gas street lamps, smoother and wider roads, taller buildings, and countless factories and pipes. Scholars and engineers had brought a power that could push civilization forward, and that power had made the city-states change at a speed far beyond the past. This change even made Tyrian, who had seen many storms in his life, feel a natural sense of amazement.

But in this city-state, some things still faintly resembled what he remembered.

After getting out of the car and thanking and taking his leave of the Church staff who had accompanied him, Tyrian walked along the streets on the edge of Pland's Upper City with several sailors he had brought from the Sea Mist. Looking at the roads and shops on both sides, strange yet somewhat familiar, he could not help the hint of nostalgia on his face.

"Captain," one sailor asked curiously, looking at his boss, "what are we here to find?"

"A shop," Tyrian said casually, his gaze searching among the street-front buildings that carried a strong Central City-States style. "A doll shop. The sign has a bit of an elves' style."

"A doll shop?" The sailor sounded a little shocked. "I didn't know you were into that."

Tyrian gave his subordinate a silent look. "I have my reasons."

Another sailor hurried over when he saw this: "Captain, maybe you should silence him first… If you're worried, you can silence all of us. After you finish browsing, you can clean us up however you like…"

"…I'm starting to regret bringing you lot."

The sailors burst into giggles, but while they joked, their eyes kept sweeping over the nearby buildings, searching for the shop that matched the captain's description.

Tyrian only shook his head, looking at the subordinates he had brought with a hint of helplessness.

Outside of battle, this was how he and his subordinates always interacted. Most people could never imagine that the legendary “Iron Vice Admiral” would be so easygoing among his own men. But Tyrian knew very well why.

These people had followed him through life and death for half a century. In the mortal world, there was no bond stronger than a loyalty and trust that had lasted fifty years.

Just then, a sailor’s voice suddenly came from the side, interrupting Tyrian’s thoughts.

“Captain, look, is it that one? That ‘Doll Gallery’ across the street… the name’s pretty unique.”

Tyrian looked up and at once saw a familiar line of words among the old street-front shops: Rose Doll House.

The sign had changed, the front door had changed, and even the facade had been redone, but the shop’s name was the same as ever. Elves were sentimental. Even when they lived in human city-states that changed at a frantic pace, they rarely changed the names of their shops lightly.

Tyrian suddenly felt a little dazed. Faded memories rose in his heart. He seemed to see that afternoon long, long ago, when his father went to the harbor on business and he took his young little sister and slipped out of the house. The two siblings wandered through the bustling great city-state until they stumbled, all mixed up, into that shop…

Then they briskly spent all the small change they had stolen from their father’s cash box. His little sister had a whole day of happiness, and he could no longer remember whether he had been beaten afterward.

No matter what, in Tyrian’s century-long stretch of cold memories, it was one of the few fragments that glowed with simple warmth.

“That’s the one,” the pirate lord said softly. “‘Doll Gallery’ is an elves-style name. It just means a doll shop.”

With that, he stepped toward the shop that seemed to occupy a special corner in his memories.

Chapter 247: Returning to an Old Place

A clear chime rang with the opening of the door. Afternoon sunlight fell into the old shop that was almost completely filled with all kinds of dolls. Behind the counter, an elven shopkeeper who had been carefully adjusting a doll's frame heard the sound and looked up. She saw a tall, black-haired man with an eyepatch over one eye stepping into the shop.

The elf old woman looked at this guest with some puzzlement. No matter how she looked at him, he did not seem like the type who came to buy dolls. But after a moment of confusion, she still smiled and greeted him. She simply did not recognize that this tall, one-eyed man was the same child who had brought his little sister to her shop to buy something a century earlier: "Ah, welcome to the Rose Doll House. Feel free to look around."

Then she paused for a second and added casually: "A guest like you is not very common."

Tyrian slowly let his gaze travel around the shop.

All kinds of dolls. Shelves and a carved staircase that both looked quite old. A warm, calm atmosphere, and the smiling old woman.

The faded pieces of memory gradually fit together, becoming familiar scenes and slowly overlapping with what he saw now.

This was definitely the place. Lucretia's directions had been right.

It was normal that the elven shopkeeper did not recognize him. Compared to a hundred years ago, he had changed far too much.

Tyrian adjusted his expression slightly, trying to make his face look a bit softer. Half a century of drifting and raiding on the Frost Sea had turned him into a man with a cold, hard face. He knew there was always an aura around him that made ordinary people uneasy, and that aura had clearly affected the kindly shopkeeper. She greeted him with a smile, but there was doubt and a little wariness in her eyes that she could not hide.

“I’d like to ask about something,” Tyrian said. He had no idea whether his expression adjustment had worked. He could hardly remember how an ordinary person was supposed to look and speak when walking into a shop. “Have you ever sold a doll called ‘Nilu’ here?”

He thought for a moment, then added two more lines: “A one-third-scale doll, about this tall—classical court style, with a very fancy dress.”

The elven shopkeeper froze for a second and answered with some hesitation: “We did… have a doll like that. It sat in the shop for many years, and someone bought it a little while ago. But why are you asking about it?”

“What kind of person bought it?” Tyrian felt his heartbeat speed up. He had not expected to find a lead so easily. His father really had gone and bought that doll openly from a shop. “About when was that?”

The old shopkeeper was clearly startled by Tyrian’s overly intense reaction and grew even more cautious. “I’m sorry, I can’t give out information about my customers. That’s a rule of our trade.”

Tyrian was stunned. He had not expected that answer. He thought quickly, hesitated for two or three seconds, as if he had made some decision, and then said: “…You didn’t recognize me?”

“Recognize… you?” The old shopkeeper frowned and looked him up and down with puzzled eyes. “I don’t remember serving any guest like you. Most of the people who buy dolls from me are women, or young men picking gifts for their lovers, or fathers picking gifts for their daughters.”

“That’s because the last time I was here was a very, very long time ago,” Tyrian said with a strange little smile. “Do you remember a pair of siblings who took away a doll called ‘Lunie’ from here a hundred years ago?”

The old shopkeeper froze for a moment, then slowly opened her eyes wide, staring at Tyrian in disbelief. “Ah, you’re…”

“I know you probably won’t believe me, but I have something that can prove who I am,” Tyrian said. His thoughts were moving quite fast. As he spoke, he reached into his coat and pulled something out. “Elves like you are well informed. You should have heard of me… take a look at this.”

The old elf woman took the piece of paper from him with a doubtful expression. When she opened it, she first saw a large portrait printed on it. Below that were the words of a wanted notice, the bounty, and the official mark of the city-state of Frostholm…

“I have a bit of a reputation,” Tyrian said very seriously. “Strictly speaking, my whole family is fairly well known… though maybe not in a pleasant way.”

The old shopkeeper: “…”

After a long moment, the elven old woman finally managed to control her expression. She looked up at Tyrian and, in a peculiar tone, forced out a line: “So it really is you.”

Tyrian also realized that something about this felt off, and he answered with an awkward smile: “It’s me.”

The old woman thought for a bit more. “So many years have passed… and there are that many zeros after your name now…”

Tyrian twitched the corner of his mouth. “The bounty… is a bit high. But it’s just for show. They add another zero every four or five years anyway. No one is ever going to collect it.”

“…You’re the first pirate lord I’ve ever met who carries his own wanted poster around and uses it as ID,” the elf old woman said. Her expression finally looked normal as she folded the wanted notice and handed it back while muttering, “I did hear that the Sea Mist had docked. I was thinking I’d go down to the harbor to watch the commotion when I had time. I didn’t expect you to show up first. How’s your little sister?”

“She… is living even more freely than I am,” Tyrian said. Then he gave the old woman another odd look. “I thought you’d be scared. That’s how most ordinary people react when they see me—even outside the Frost Sea.”

“I’ve seen plenty of strange things in my time. You’re not the only pirate lord out there. Besides, the city-state already issued a notice saying the Sea Mist is a guest invited by Pland. Whatever happened up in the Northern Seas has nothing to do with us,” the old woman muttered as she walked back toward the counter. Her muttering soon turned into nagging. “But I still have to say this, you know. Being a pirate forever is not proper work. It’s not a business you can keep doing, and it doesn’t sound good to others. Look at your little sister. At least she has a lifelong honorary title at the Explorer Association. Of course, I’ve heard your relationship with those northern city-states is quite complicated…”

Tyrian’s head started buzzing at once. He felt he had now truly experienced the calm and ease of a long-lived race, and he had to cut off the old woman’s lecture in a hurry: “The Sea Mist fleet is already changing.

Retaliation and raiding against the northern city-states are things of the past. These days we mostly rely on collecting protection fees…”

Before the old woman could react, he decisively ended that topic and dragged things back by force: “Can you tell me now who bought that doll?”

“Oh, it was a middle-aged man who looked about your height… maybe a bit shorter. He was quite thin, like his health wasn’t very good,” the old woman said without further fuss. “But I don’t think you’ll find him. There are so many people in Pland. Were you hoping to bring back the other doll you couldn’t buy back then for your little sister? Ah, that’s such a pity. If you’d come earlier… wait, I just realized—how did you know someone bought ‘Nilu’?”

Tyrian did not answer her question. He only frowned without thinking.

Someone shorter than him, slender, and in poor health… That could not be his father.

Could it have been one of his father’s subordinates?!

After regaining his humanity and sanity, had he already started picking out new subordinates? What was he planning? Was he trying to rebuild the Lost Home fleet?!

Tyrian’s thoughts raced in all directions. Only when the elf old woman called his name twice did he snap back to himself. Then something else came to mind, and he quickly asked: “Besides buying the doll, did that guest say anything else? Did he take anything else with him?”

“What did he say…? We just chatted a little, very normally,” the old shopkeeper said, thinking back. “He seemed like a guest who really liked dolls. He cared a lot about repairs and upkeep, and he learned quite a bit from me. Oh, right, he also bought a wig and matching hair accessories, which seemed to be for his own doll.”

Tyrian’s expression froze. “…A wig? What kind of wig?”

“Long, straight golden hair, full-size. I remember it quite clearly,” the old shopkeeper said. Then something else occurred to her. “Oh, and I still have one that’s almost the same. You can take a look.”

As she spoke, she had already turned around and slipped into the storage room under the stairs to search.

Tyrian wanted to say it was not necessary to go to the trouble, but he did not have time. Just then, a strange knocking sound came from nearby and drew his attention.

It sounded like someone knocking on the shop window.

Tyrian turned his head in surprise and looked toward the source of the sound.

He saw a beautiful lady with golden hair down to her waist standing outside, gently tapping on the glass.

At first, Tyrian did not react. But when he saw the lady’s face clearly, he went rigid on the spot as if struck by lightning.

That lady’s features… were exactly the same as Frostholm’s queen, Ray Nora, from half a century ago!

Chapter 248: The Invitation

The shopkeeper of the Rose Doll House had been rummaging in the storeroom for a long time before she finally found what she wanted. But when she squeezed back out, she saw that the “guest” who had been standing at the counter was already gone.

“…So impatient…” After she confirmed that Tyrian had left, the old woman could not help muttering, “No wonder the younger sister became a scholar, while the brother ran off to fight wars…”

Tyrian had no way of knowing what that elderly elf madam was grumbling about behind his back. By then, he had already rushed out of the doll shop and stepped onto the street outside.

He stood in the open space in front of the shop and looked around, but he still could not find any trace of that blonde lady.

The sailors who had stayed outside to wait saw their captain come out and look around. They hurried over and said: “Captain, we’re over here.”

“I wasn’t looking for you,” Tyrian said quickly, his eyes still sweeping the nearby streets and alleys. “Did any of you see a lady with long golden hair standing by the window just now? About… half a head shorter than me, wearing a purple dress.”

The sailors looked at one another. Then all of them turned to Tyrian with the exact same stunned expression.

Tyrian frowned: “…What is that look supposed to mean?”

“Captain…” One sailor gathered his courage and spoke, sounding hesitant. “Love at first sight is a good thing, but I think a romance that crosses city-states is…”

Tyrian looked calmly at his subordinate and said: “If you keep talking, I’ll stuff you into The Sea Mist’s six main guns one by one and fire you in six different directions.”

The sailor fell silent on the spot.

Tyrian had already started thinking quickly.

He was certain he had not seen wrong. Just now, outside the window, there really had been a blonde woman whose face was exactly the same as Her Majesty Ray Nora of Frostholm, knocking on the glass.

In a crowd, if it were only someone whose features were somewhat similar to the Queen of Frostholm, Tyrian would not have reacted much. Over a half-century of life, he had seen plenty of people with similar faces. But the woman knocking on the window was different.

She had obviously come for him.

A woman who looked almost exactly like the Queen of Frostholm appeared near this doll shop as if she had planned it, knocked on the window to draw his attention, and then ran off the moment he appeared. This whole chain of actions sent a very clear signal.

Tyrian frowned slightly. It felt as if something faint had flashed through his mind. He raised his head and looked at the men he had brought with him: “All of you, go back to the Cathedral first.”

“Huh?” The sailors froze. One of them spoke in surprise: “But…”

“No buts,” Tyrian waved his hand. “I have some things to deal with. You leave first.”

Another sailor still could not hold back and said: “But, Captain, the few of us…”

Tyrian’s expression turned serious: “That’s an order.”

“But we didn’t bring any money,” the third sailor finally finished his sentence. “We don’t even have enough for the carriage fare—getting from here to the Cathedral isn’t close.”

Tyrian: “…”

A moment later, the “Steel Vice Admiral” threw a pouch of small coins at his subordinates and almost ground the words out between his back teeth: “You lot, get lost.”

The sailors left. Tyrian finally let out a small breath of relief. He glanced around, thought for a moment, and then walked toward the quietest corner of an alley within sight, where he silently waited for the other party to appear.

If his guess was right, she would come out on her own. He had just dismissed the men he brought in order to send a clear signal that it was “safe to meet.”

And things went just as he expected.

He waited in that deserted alley for less than a moment before he suddenly heard footsteps nearby. He looked up toward the sound and saw the blonde lady with the Queen of Frostholm’s face stepping out of the shadows not far away.

Even though he had already seen her once through the shop window, Tyrian still could not help feeling shocked now—it was just too similar.

He had indeed seen people with similar faces before, but this degree of resemblance… already went far beyond common sense, beyond imagination.

Precisely because of this extreme similarity, Tyrian's first reaction after that instant of shock was caution and wariness. He stared at the mysterious blonde lady as if she were a dangerous person who deserved his full attention. In that careful observation, he also noticed a few strange details.

Her movements carried an elegance and restraint that did not belong to an ordinary person. Her face was delicate and flawless, yet lacked a certain… "living breath." An ordinary person might not notice anything, but as a captain who commanded a legion of Living dead, Tyrian gradually sensed from her a trait that felt very wrong on a living being.

"Incredible," the blonde lady spoke just as Tyrian's wariness grew. "You actually came. So luring someone out is this easy."

Even her voice was exactly the same as the Queen of Frostholm's.

Tyrian felt no joy or excitement at all. Instead, he grew even more guarded: "…Who are you?"

"My name is Alice," the blonde lady said with a calm smile.

"…I'm not asking your name." Tyrian frowned. "I'm asking what you are, and what you intend to do. Why did you insist on meeting me?"

"Captain wants to see you," Alice answered very seriously, responding to his question point by point. "He said that while you stay in the Cathedral, there are too many people around, and it's hard to discuss many secret matters. So he had to lure you somewhere quieter so you could talk."

A mysterious captain wanted to talk about secret matters and sent someone to lure him out.

Tyrian frowned, but for some reason, he actually felt more relaxed inside. He had been a pirate on the Frost Sea for half a century. He had seen far too many situations like this. Compared to Her Majesty Ray Nora of Frostholm suddenly coming back from the dead to look for him, a secret meeting and conspiracy between captains was what he was more used to.

But he still had no intention of going along with it.

“I’m not interested in people who hide their heads and show their tails,” Tyrian said casually once he recognized this “scene.” “Go tell your master this: if he wants to meet the captain of The Sea Mist, he can come openly and find me at the Cathedral. If it’s shady business he can’t show in the light, then sorry. Outside the Frost Sea, The Sea Mist only does legal work.”

When he finished speaking, he was ready to turn and leave. But the blonde lady who called herself Alice suddenly said: “You don’t want to know who I mean when I say ‘captain’?”

“Hmm?” Tyrian frowned. “Who?”

“Your dad,” Alice said honestly.

Tyrian’s expression changed at once: “Sorry, that joke is not funny at all. Excuse me.”

Alice thought for a moment and said: “Ah, Captain also said you might react like this, so he has another invitation plan…”

Tyrian was just about to turn and leave, but when he heard that, he instinctively hesitated: “Another…”

He had only muttered a couple of words when he suddenly felt the air around him change. A surge of warning rushed up inside him. He jerked his head toward the source of the feeling, and saw only a little girl standing there. He did not even know when she had appeared. She swung her arm in a wide arc and threw something at him.

It looked like a dog.

For less than a second, Tyrian felt he still had a chance to dodge. Even though the other side had launched a sneak attack, and even though that strength and speed were clearly extraordinary, he still felt he could avoid it. But in the same instant he tried to move, he found that all his limbs had stopped responding. It was as if countless invisible threads had wrapped tight around his bones and muscles. He lost control of his own body.

The only thing he managed to do was to barely turn his head and glance at the blonde lady, who was smiling harmlessly. In the next second, a hideous dog head swelled to fill the edge of his vision.

With a loud bang, the Pirate Lord flew several meters away and did not move again.

Shirley stared at the result, a little dazed.

"…He just went flying like that?" She looked at the chain in her hand, then at Tyrian, who had been smashed away. As she walked over to check on him, she muttered: "I thought there would at least be a fierce battle. So this is the legendary Pirate Lord… I didn't smash him to death, did I?"

"I don't think so," Alice also walked over. She looked at the unconscious Tyrian and muttered with Shirley: "Captain said Tyrian is a child who can take a beating."

"Why didn't he dodge just now?" Shirley squatted down, picked up a stick, and poked Tyrian's face. "Even those Enders earlier could dodge a few times at least…"

"I don't know," Alice shook her head. "I don't know how to fight."

Shirley thought for a moment and then had a new worry: "…If Captain sees his son's head swollen like this, will he be angry?"

"I don't think so," Alice shook her head again. "Captain said that if he doesn't cooperate, you should hit him with Dog and make him spin like a top…”

“Did he spin just now?”

“I think… he did. He spun a lot of times in the air.”

Shirley finally relaxed and clapped her hands: “Then it’s fine. I’ll call AI over to move him.”

Chapter 249: The First Step Toward Honesty

Tyrian felt himself wrapped in darkness. In that darkness, his senses rose and fell. It was as if some invisible force was pulling him, carrying him through a dimension that lay between the Mortal Realm and illusion.

He tried several times to open his eyes, but could only see a faint green glow and shadows rushing past in the dark. After struggling to make sense of it, he realized that what he saw was a bird’s-eye view of the city-state below.

It seemed something was carrying him through the sky.

That single thought flashed through his mind, and he lost consciousness again.

When he could once more feel his body, he had already been placed somewhere stable. A cold, hard feeling came from beneath him, like a bare concrete floor. Dim light shone around him, like cheap bulbs used to light a warehouse. A blurry figure sat beside him, leaning closer as if looking at him curiously.

Tyrian’s mind finally cleared.

But he did not open his eyes at once. Instead, he kept pretending to be unconscious while carefully sensing his surroundings. He tried to judge where he was from the dampness in the air, the tiny sounds near his ears, and what little he could see through his barely opened eyelids.

He had just managed to hear a bit of faint traffic noise and had just confirmed that he might be in a building facing a street, when a voice he had heard right before blacking out suddenly sounded beside him. It was a voice that was all too familiar in his memory: “You’re awake. Your eyelids are moving.”

Tyrian’s heart lurched. He knew he had been found out, so he could only open his eyes helplessly.

Then his whole body stiffened. The person he saw left him shocked and at a loss.

He saw Ray Nora, Queen of Frostholm—exactly the same as in his memory, and not the blonde lady from before whose hair color had clearly been different.

The silver-haired “Queen of Frostholm” sat upright on a chair beside him. Her expression was calm and indifferent as she gazed at Tyrian lying on the floor. Tyrian stared blankly for several seconds before suddenly snapping to his senses and jerking himself upright.

A sudden wave of pain in his head almost knocked him back down, but the pain sharpened his mind, driving out the last bit of dizziness left from his fainting spell. First he confirmed that he was truly awake. Then he quickly looked around, trying to figure out where he was.

All he saw was a warehouse packed with shelves and wooden crates. High and low racks were crammed with old objects whose exact ages and origins were impossible to tell. The worn crates were piled in somewhat messy stacks along the walls. There were no windows in his field of view, so of course he could not see outside. The only door stood behind the chair where the “queen” was sitting.

It looked like just a warehouse. There was no way to judge where in the city-state it might be.

Tyrian's gaze came back and finally stopped on the "Queen of Frostholm."

But after that first wave of shock and excitement, the Pirate Lord's first true reaction, once he calmed down, was doubt. He thought of the blonde lady he had seen earlier and the things she had said. His brow furrowed: "You are not Her Majesty Ray Nora. Who are you really?"

"I said already, my name is Alice," the silver-haired woman on the chair answered with a smile. "Ah, if you mean my hair… I disguised it before. Captain said my real appearance might cause trouble in the city-state."

She mentioned the captain again.

The first time she had brought up this "captain," Tyrian had only felt a bit confused. Now, when he heard that title again, his first reaction was a strong sense of wariness and danger. He was sure this was not some bad joke, and not some stupid trap set up by a captain who hated him. Behind all of this, there really might be his terrifying father.

Tyrian slowly stood up. He watched the silver-haired woman who called herself Alice with full caution and said in a low voice: "Is it really him?"

"Yes. He has something to discuss with you," Alice said. She rose from the chair and walked to an antique mirror nearby. "Captain, he's awake."

In the next second, pale green flames rose along the edges of the mirror. Tyrian thought he heard a faint, unreal crackling sound. The mirror surface suddenly turned black, and a familiar, dignified figure slowly emerged from that darkness.

"Tyrian, we meet again," Duncan's voice came from inside the mirror.

“…Yes, we meet again,” Tyrian replied, hesitating. Even though they had already met once, speaking again with a clear-minded, rational father still made him feel extremely awkward. “Why did you use this method? I thought you didn’t mind contacting me in the Cathedral.”

“We can catch up in the Cathedral, but it’s not suitable for certain private topics,” Duncan said unhurriedly. His gaze swept past Alice. “There are some things I don’t intend to let Gamona listen in on. You’ve met Alice already. You should have a lot you want to ask.”

When Tyrian heard his father mention the Storm Goddess Gamona, a strange look crossed his face. But very soon, his attention was drawn back to Alice, whose face was exactly the same as the Queen of Frostholm’s. After frowning and thinking for a moment, he suddenly remembered something. His expression changed sharply: “Earlier, the Explorer Association sent a warning to all captains on the Boundless Sea. They said Anomaly 099 was out of control…”

“As you can see,” Duncan said with a smile, “she is standing right in front of you.”

Tyrian immediately gave Alice, who wore an innocent smile, a quick, startled glance, as if he had only now noticed the inhuman traits hidden within that overly perfect face, and the decorations on her body that clearly served to cover her joints. In the next heartbeat, he instinctively raised a hand to touch his own neck.

As one of the most experienced captains on the Boundless Sea, and as someone who paid close attention to any information related to the Queen of Frostholm, Tyrian knew very well what Anomaly 099 was like.

His movement did not escape Duncan’s eyes.

“Relax a little,” the voice from the mirror said. “Anomaly 099 is under control now.”

“…The doll in the container has awakened and is freely moving about outside, and you call that ‘under control’?” Tyrian kept a wary eye on Alice’s actions as he spoke to Duncan. At the same time, his neck felt cold. “How did you do it? How did you make an Anomaly with such a low number work for you, and even suppress her decapitation instinct?”

“Alice is a friendly doll. She isn’t as terrifying as people think—at least, not when she’s by my side,” Duncan said casually. “But you, I thought you would first bring up the Queen of Frostholm. As far as I know, you served by that queen’s side even longer than you served in the Vanished Fleet.”

Tyrian slowly realized what Duncan was getting at. He watched the figure in the mirror with wary eyes and said: “You want to learn things related to Her Majesty Ray Nora from me?”

“Do you feel resistant to that?” Duncan asked. “Do you not want to talk about it?”

“…I still don’t dare to fully believe in your ‘humanity,’” Tyrian said quietly.

Duncan was silent for a few seconds before he spoke again in a low voice: “Do you know what my first plan was?”

“Your first plan?”

“To have Alice disguise herself directly as Ray Nora, Queen of Frostholm,” Duncan said. “To pretend she had truly resurrected, or to act out a wraith projection, or even to step straight into your dreams—that would all be very easy for me.” Duncan met Tyrian’s eyes. “I could guarantee that you wouldn’t be able to tell truth from lies, and that, under mental guidance, you would say many things. I could easily get the information I wanted that way.”

A chill ran down Tyrian’s back.

He believed every word his father said. He believed that his father could indeed do these things, and he knew that he himself would definitely fall for it. Even if he noticed something off in some small detail, it would only be after he had already given away a great deal of information.

Because even just now, after already seeing the “blonde Alice” ahead of time and knowing that the person in front of him could not possibly be Ray Nora, he had still almost believed that this was truly the Queen of Frostholm resurrected.

Tyrian lowered his eyelids slightly without even thinking, as if this could keep his gaze from directly meeting his father’s. He asked in a low voice: “Then why didn’t you do it?”

Duncan gazed quietly at Tyrian.

Why else? Because Alice could not remember a script that long and could not act through a scene that complicated. The moment the other side tried to trick her with a random question, she would panic. And if she forgot her lines, she would, without a second thought, start shouting for help from her captain—save save save—seventeen saves in a single second.

She was useless to a degree that was hard to believe.

“Of course it’s because I don’t want to deal with my own children through deception—even though I’ve already forgotten many things,” Duncan said with a serious expression and a low voice.

Then he paused and added: “I also don’t want to use that kind of ‘farce’ to insult the sovereign you once served. Although I don’t know her well, from that brief ‘meeting once’ I had with her, Ray Nora seemed to be someone worthy of respect.”

“Clap clap clap clap—”

Hearing such a righteous answer from the captain, Alice immediately began to applaud. She had barely understood anything the captain had said.

Duncan and Tyrian both turned and stared at this doll with strange expressions.

“…Was I not supposed to clap?” Alice shrank her neck, peeking carefully at the captain in the mirror. “I just thought the captain was right…”

A wave of tiredness washed over Duncan. He sighed and said: “…As long as you’re happy.”

At the same time, Tyrian suddenly realized a small detail hidden in his father’s earlier words, and he was struck with shock:

“You met Her Majesty Ray Nora?!”

Chapter 250: Beneath the Surface

Tyrian took a few seconds to realize that Duncan had just mentioned a “brief encounter” with the Frostholm Queen. His shock showed plainly on his face.

Duncan was not surprised by this reaction. He only shook his head lightly and said: “My ‘meeting’ with her was very unusual. It did not happen on the normal timeline. You can think of it as me stepping into a crack in history and seeing Ray Nora once, as a bystander. In normal history, I never had any contact with the Frostholm Queen.”

Tyrian frowned, as if trying to understand what those difficult words meant. Then his eyes flickered. He drew back all his emotions, looked up at Duncan, and asked: “Why are you interested in the Frostholm Queen? Is it because of that ‘one meeting’? Or because of this Doll who calls herself ‘Alice’? Did she tell you something?”

“Alice doesn’t know anything about the Frostholm Queen. Her memory is as pure as blank paper,” Duncan said calmly. “I’m interested in the Frostholm Queen because everyone says the Frostholm rebellion back then happened because Ray Nora’s conspiracy with the Vanished was exposed. Don’t you think it’s quite normal for me to become curious after hearing that rumor?”

“…Colluding with the Vanished.” Tyrian’s voice was low, his eyelids lowered so no one could read his feelings. “Yes. That was the charge they pinned on Her Majesty Ray Nora.”

“Judging by your reaction, that charge really was a frame-up,” Duncan’s voice came from the mirror. “So the Frostholm rebellion back then was a complete conspiracy, and the crimes they gave Ray Nora were entirely made up?”

As he spoke, he watched Tyrian’s reaction.

But Tyrian did not answer at once. He frowned slightly and asked back: “Does this truth matter to you?”

“It does,” Duncan said, his face serious. “From a certain point of view, I am half an involved party.”

Tyrian clearly froze for a moment, as if unable to argue with Father’s answer. Then he sighed with a helpless smile and shook his head: “There really was a conspiracy behind that rebellion, but if I have to be strict about it, the name the Rebels used was not completely fake…”

“Oh?”

“The Frostholm Queen never colluded with the Vanished. But she did… carry out some research in forbidden fields. Once those research projects were made public, even without the rebellion, she probably would have had a hard time keeping her position as City Lord.”

Duncan’s eyes grew deep. After a few seconds of silence, he suddenly spoke: “It was called the ‘Abyssal Trench Project’, right?”

Tyrian jerked his head up in shock.

“I know much more than you think,” Duncan said quietly.

“But all data related to the Abyssal Trench Project has already been destroyed. Even the traitors who exposed it back then were purged and executed by the Rebels themselves…” Tyrian said in disbelief. “Everyone was convinced that even the name of the project itself had already been tainted by the curse's corruption, and the last people who knew the truth all passed away long ago…"

"Oh? All the records were destroyed?" This time Duncan was the one who felt surprised. He had thought the matter might be highly classified, but he hadn't expected it to be buried this extremely. "Even every eyewitness is dead?"

Tyrian hesitated. He knew that time better than anyone, and of course he knew why the project was buried. After a brief silence, he still began to speak, slowly:

"This forbidden project was stained with too many things tied to the curse, Subspace, and mental corruption. Even the Rebels back then didn't dare speak lightly about the information they had found.

"But in fact, the name of this project was made public once, and only once. That was at the final execution ground, when the Rebels announced the Frostholm Queen's crimes and spoke those words aloud. On that very day, Seawatch Cliff of the Frostholm city-state suffered an unprecedented, terrifying collapse. The entire cliff, along with a quarter of the city, fell into the Boundless Sea. Everyone who heard the words 'Abyssal Trench Project' without exception turned into Restless Souls in the Deep Sea.

"Back then, the Rebels had actually prepared a whole series of follow-up propaganda around the Abyssal Trench Project. They planned to make it widely known, without exposing its forbidden parts, to completely erase the Frostholm Queen's influence in the Northern Seas and to stress the righteousness of the rebellion. But after the great collapse of the cliff, all those plans were scrapped at once. As I just said, they were sure that even the name 'Abyssal Trench Project' had already been corrupted by the curse. So they destroyed every piece of material related to it, including the name itself.

“That’s why I am especially curious… through what channel did you learn the name ‘Abyssal Trench Project’?”

Tyrian finally stopped dodging and met Duncan’s eyes. Ever since he had heard that half-century-old project’s name from Duncan’s mouth, the turmoil in his heart had not settled. For a moment, he even truly began to suspect that there really had been some “collusion” between the Frostholm Queen and the Vanished.

“I told you, I have ‘watched’ some things from the cracks in history,” Duncan said openly, and asked again: “So what exactly was the Abyssal Trench Project? Why was this project so secret and forbidden that even you… still sound a little afraid when you mention it?”

Tyrian’s face grew solemn. After a long silence, he finally spoke in a low, slow voice: “Simply put, it was an exploration project. But unlike those explorers who chart new routes on the edge of civilization, the Abyssal Trench Project explored the Deep Sea.”

“Exploring the Deep Sea?” Duncan frowned. “You mean the Spirit Realm, the Abyssal Deep, and Subspace? If it was only research in those fields, that hardly deserves the word ‘forbidden’, does it? It is dangerous, yes, but research like that has always been legal in every city-state. The Truth Academy even has a dedicated research group…”

“I’m not talking about the Deep Sea as a concept in occult studies,” Tyrian said, gently shaking his head. “I mean the Deep Sea in the true, natural sense. The Deep Sea that lies right in front of all of us, that everyone pretends not to see, does not touch, and does not dare to touch.”

As Tyrian spoke, he suddenly asked: “Father, have you ever wondered about this: beneath our city-states, beneath these sea islands that now carry all of civilization… what does it look like?”

Duncan did not speak.

But under his calm surface, a wave had already risen in his heart.

He really had never thought about that question. Or rather… he had not even realized it was a question that needed asking.

In this world, people were used to using names like “Spirit Realm”, “Abyssal Deep seas”, and “Subspace” to talk about the “depth” of the world. That model of the world’s structure did explain how things worked to some extent. But in truth, it was only an interpretation built on the concepts of occult studies. Strictly speaking, it only described the world’s “dimensional” structure, not the physical structure of the Mortal Realm.

What Tyrian was talking about now clearly was not that conceptual, occult studies-based model of dimensions. He meant the water itself, physically, from the sea surface downward.

In the classic “Mortal Realm–Spirit Realm–Abyssal Deep–Subspace” model, the Deep Sea that Tyrian spoke of lay on the very first layer: the Mortal Realm. Yet this Deep Sea, which belonged only to that first layer, seemed to be a complete blank in human understanding.

Duncan had never considered this question because he carried a set of “common sense” in his mind. He took it for granted that beneath the city-states there must be raised geological structures in the sea, like undersea mountains or uplifted volcanic craters. Deeper down, there would of course be a seabed. But when he carefully recalled everything he had learned since coming to this world, he realized… humans had never done any real research into the underwater world beyond two hundred meters in depth.

“Clearly, you never thought about it either,” Tyrian’s voice suddenly came, cutting off Duncan’s thoughts. “And before I met the Frostholm Queen, I had never thought about it either. The Boundless Sea covers the whole world. Our city-states are isolated islands floating on the surface. The protection of the Gods laid a solid foundation for the Mortal Realm, and the light of Vision 001 gives us safe, stable daylight. As for what lies under the surface… why should we care? The Deep Sea zones in the Spirit Realm, the Abyssal Deep, and Subspace already give us enough of a headache."

As Tyrian spoke, he gently shook his head.

"But Her Majesty Ray Nora told me this question was important, as important as the secrets of the Spirit Realm, the Abyssal Deep, and Subspace. Right under our feet, beneath the city-states and the sea surface, in our Mortal Realm itself, there is such a vast unknown area. She was full of the spirit of exploration. She could not accept that such a huge region within her rule remained shrouded in ignorance."

Chapter 251: Abyssal Trench

Listening to Tyrian's story, Duncan fell into brief thought. After half a minute, he looked up, speaking slowly: "So, to satisfy her desire to explore, she launched the 'Abyssal Trench Project'. And the real essence of this project was not exploring Subspace at all, but simply… diving into deep water in the literal sense?"

He paused there, feeling that there was something very strange about all this: "But if that's all, how did this plan end up connected to the Vanished? The Subspace the Vanished went to and the Deep Sea the Frostholm Queen wanted to explore are two completely different things. Those Rebels shouldn't be so confused that they can't tell them apart…"

Tyrian did not answer directly. Instead, he suddenly threw out a question: "Don't you find it strange? If it was only diving into the water to explore the sea conditions under the city-state, how could that be called 'forbidden'? Harbor builders and coastal fishermen often have to dive for their work. In safe waters, it is very common to go down a dozen meters or even several dozen. So why did the Frostholm Queen's 'Abyssal Trench Project' become taboo?"

Duncan's gaze grew more and more serious: "…How deep did you dive?"

"Very, very deep. I don't know what depth the Queen herself reached in the end, because I'm not a scholar. I only took part on the edges as a naval commander, and in the later half of the project I was no longer directly involved. But as far as I know, before the plan started to become… 'not right’, their manned submersible had already reached at least one thousand meters below the surface, and they kept breaking that record.”

A thousand meters underwater…

Duncan quickly sorted through what he knew in his mind. On Earth, that number, which did not look impressive at first glance, was already the maximum diving depth for many advanced military submarines. Most military submarines could only dive four or five hundred meters. As for those “extreme Deep Dive records” of several thousand or even nearly ten thousand meters, they were almost all done by specially built Deep Dive craft for short periods. The demands on the equipment were extreme, and those dives were usually unmanned.

But the Frostholm Queen’s manned submersible back then had already reached the threshold of “one thousand meters”. With this world’s industrial level half a century ago, even with some help from supernatural powers, that was already a staggering number.

And behind that staggering number… there was clearly something even more shocking.

Tyrian had just mentioned that in its later stage the project had started to become “not right”. Duncan did not overlook that phrase.

He looked at Tyrian, his gaze darkening: “I want to know the details of the entire exploration project. Tell me everything you were involved in.”

Maybe because he had already answered many questions, and had adapted to this way of talking, Tyrian did not hesitate for long this time. He sank into his memories and spoke slowly:

“…Aside from Frostholm’s Abyssal Trench Project, the recorded normal diving depth for humans, or the ‘safe water depth’, is one hundred and fifty meters, and even that is limited to nearshore waters. Our plan also started at that depth, and everything went smoothly up to three hundred meters.

“It was already very, very dark there. sunlight from the surface could not pass through such a heavy layer of water. The powerful lamps on the submersible could only light up a small area. To see the ‘shape’ of the island under the city-state, and to avoid as much as possible some dangerous ‘creatures’ in the open sea, such as Deep Sea Spawn, we had the submersible dive along the coastline and keep close to the island’s nearshore zone. I still remember how the explorer described the scene after coming back up…

“He said the underside of the island looked like an ugly, rough pillar, covered in thick layers of calcareous deposits. Some strange creatures lived in the pits and hollows of that crust. Aside from the ‘pillar’, there was nothing else around, only darkness.”

“A pillar under the island?” Duncan could not help interrupting Tyrian. “Not a gradually widening supporting structure, but a single pillar?”

“Yes. At least, that is how it is under Frostholm,” Tyrian nodded. “Is there a problem with that?”

Duncan shook his head: “…No. Go on.”

Tyrian gathered his thoughts and continued his earlier memories: “That scene was at about three hundred meters, which was also the first submersible’s limit. After we realized that depth was far from enough to explore the Deep Sea, the Queen ordered the scholars to build a second submersible. That submersible was very successful. It dove straight down to eight hundred meters. And through half a meter of high-strength glass, the explorer saw… still the pillar, a straight pillar.

“Of course, compared with the radius of the city-state itself, that ‘pillar’, already at least eight hundred meters long, was still very short in proportion. Rather than a support column, it was more like a neat, disc-shaped base holding up an island.

“After that, we built a third submersible. Because of technical limits, its improvements over the second were quite small. It had to dive very carefully to challenge the second submersible’s record. And it was during that slow descent, meter by meter, that we discovered something.

“The ‘pillar’ beneath the city-state was actually only eight hundred and fifty meters ‘long’. Below that, there was nothing.

“The whole structure floated in the sea.”

Tyrian stopped and looked up into Duncan’s eyes: “Now you understand why I said it was more like a disc-shaped base than a pillar, right?”

Duncan frowned tightly. He did not speak. In his mind, he quickly sketched out the whole structure according to Tyrian’s description.

In the Deep Sea era, people “huddled” inside their city-states. These sea islands had first struck Duncan as cramped and narrow, but in fact, as fully functional, self-sustaining places to live, the city-states had to have a certain basic size. There were some small islands, but most of the major cities with real names had a “base radius” of more than ten kilometers, even several tens. As the largest city-state in the Frost Sea in the past, Frostholm would not be any smaller.

To match that huge structure on the sea, its underwater “base” was “only” eight hundred and fifty meters deep. When the explorers first saw the underwater part of the city at three hundred meters, stretching straight down into the Deep Sea, they instinctively imagined it as a pillar reaching straight to the “seafloor”. But in terms of proportions, that “pillar” was more like a thin disc.

The vast city sat on top of that “disc”.

Just as Tyrian had said: the whole structure floated in the sea.

But once he pictured this model, a huge doubt rose in Duncan’s heart.

Were all city-states like this?

If every city-state was like this, a rootless “floating thing”, how did they stay so stable? If the stability of a city-state itself came from its sheer size, what about the stable relative positions between city-states? How could that be explained?

The Boundless Sea rolled with endless waves, yet these “floating islands” had never shifted their positions. Why?

Duncan voiced his doubts, but Tyrian only shook his head: “We wondered about that too, but in the end we never figured it out. And compared with what happened later… the question of how city-states float on the sea stopped mattering.”

“What happened later?” Duncan could not help asking. “What happened? What did you actually see in the Deep Sea?”

“Later… the third submersible kept pushing the depth limit. We spent nearly two years raising the record from eight hundred and fifty meters to nine hundred and fifty. As you can imagine, during that descent the submersible gradually moved away from the city-state’s ‘base’. Remember what I said at the beginning? To avoid trouble in the open sea, we had the submersible dive in the ‘nearshore safety zone’ close to the coast. During that whole process, it stayed pressed against the city-state and its underwater ‘structure’. But as the dive went on and the explorer got farther from that ‘base’, things started to go wrong.

“Auditory and visual hallucinations. It felt like strange lights appeared in the water. It felt like someone was knocking on the hull outside, even turning the handle of the hatch. The deeper they went, the worse these things became. Even explorers with special training and strong wills began to feel tremendous pressure during every dive. And the protection given by the Holy Oil, holy books, and scripture cloth they carried grew weaker and weaker.

“Of course, up to that point, everything was still within what we expected. Exploring the unknown always comes with trials of will. Scholars who explore the seas of the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep often face similar troubles. So we continued, only strengthening the explorers’ Mental Ward to the strictest standard.

“The problem came when we tried to push from nine hundred and ninety meters to one thousand.

“The third submersible suddenly sent an emergency signal to surface at once. Then it rushed upward like a mad thing, blowing all the ballast water. The explorer inside seemed not to care at all that such a rapid ascent could kill him. When he burst back to the surface, that explorer was already mad. When the hatch opened, he roared and shouted under the sunlight, as if trying desperately to describe something terrifying to us. After a long flood of chaotic, incomprehensible words, he spoke one single clear sentence:

“We all died down there.”

Chapter 252: The Deep Sea’s Silence

The city-state floated rootless on the Boundless Sea. Beneath its “850-meter-thick” foundation stretched dark water that seemed to have no end. The deeper you dove into the Deep Sea, the more you heard strange noises that could not be understood, and saw lights and shadows that made no sense.

The first explorer who went past a depth of one thousand meters rushed madly back to the surface and then went insane. The only sentence he left to the world was:

“We all died down there.”

That was what happened from the start of Frostholm’s Abyssal Trench Project up to the point when things began to turn wrong.

Duncan fell into a brief silence. He suddenly realized that even without going deep into the Spirit Realm or the Abyssal Deep, even just within this world’s Mortal Realm, the dangers and eerie anomalies hidden in the Boundless Sea were not lacking at all. After that short pause, he asked:

“What happened to that explorer later?”

“He died soon after. The rapid ascent and decompression killed him. After shouting and raving for a while, he died of a vascular embolism. At least, that was the cause on the Mortal Realm level.”

“There was only one person in a submersible?” Duncan asked again.

“It could only hold one person. Of course, that made the mental pressure much greater for the explorer, but we had no choice. On one hand, the technology back then was limited. On the other hand, that kind of exploration was not suited for a group. Under the Deep Sea, it is hard to be sure what might replace the companion beside you in the next second, and it is hard to know whether the voice you hear is real. So it was better to dive alone. At least that way, you did not have to suspect that there was someone else in the submersible.”

“The Deep Sea, darkness, loneliness, leaving the civilized world behind and facing bizarre unknown waters directly… any of that could have driven the explorer mad,” Duncan said, slowly shaking his head. “But that is not the important part. What matters is… this still is not enough to explain why the Abyssal Trench Project later became an absolute taboo.”

He turned his gaze on Tyrian’s eyes and went on: “So far, what you have told me is only an expedition that had an accident. Explorations like this happen every year. The Truth Academy even actively funds and encourages scholars and explorers to do such things. That is not a taboo, and it should not be tied to the Vanished at all.”

“…Yes. If the project had stopped at one thousand meters, none of the later things would have happened,” Tyrian said, shaking his head as he sighed over the past. “After the accident with the No. 3 submersible, Her Majesty Ray Nora once ordered the exploration to be stopped for a time. But a few days later, something happened, and things… slowly became strange.”

Duncan frowned: “Something?”

“At the edge of the sealed test waters, the No. 3 submersible shot up to the surface.”

Duncan froze for a second, then reacted: “A second No. 3 submersible?!”

“Yes, a second one,” Tyrian nodded. “It broke the surface right in front of the navy soldiers and started flashing light signals, asking for help to open its hatch. The well-trained soldiers panicked for a moment, but they still quickly followed standard procedure. They dragged the submersible onto the work platform and aimed twenty-seven rifles, two quick-firing guns, and a flamethrower at its hatch. Then a brave priest stepped forward, sprinkled holy water, and opened the lock.”

Tyrian paused for a moment, then slowly said: “The hatch opened, and a human who looked… very much like the explorer walked out.”

Duncan’s face grew dark: “Very much like?”

“The face and outline were similar, but the height and weight were different. He wore a Frostholm navy uniform, but there were many problems in the details of the clothing. More importantly… the person who came out of the submersible walked on land only for a short while before he died. He did not even have time to say a single word. When the soldiers undid ‘his’ clothes, they found that his flesh and the uniform seemed to have grown into one thing, and his body was covered in large and small wounds that no one could understand.

“After that, doctors and scholars from the Church examined the corpse together. The Queen of Frostholm seemed to have personally gone to see the dissection as well. But the results of the examination were never published. Or rather, before they had time to reveal anything, a third ‘No. 3 submersible’ appeared.”

Even Alice, who had been silent at the side and only listening in fascination, could not help speaking now: “There was a third one?!”

Tyrian glanced at Alice without thinking. His expression looked a bit strange. He clearly was not used to someone who looked exactly like the Queen of Frostholm standing here and shouting in surprise. But he quickly adjusted his expression and nodded lightly: “A third, and not just three. After that, every twenty-four or forty-eight hours, another ‘No. 3 submersible’ would come up from there…”

Alice listened to this bizarre story in shock. She thought for a moment and suddenly blurted out: “So you just had to wait there, and you would get an endless supply of submersibles? By the way, are those things called ‘submersibles’ very expensive? Are they worth more than cultists?”

Just a second earlier, Tyrian had still been sunk in his memories of the past. Now Miss Doll snapped his train of thought in an instant. He stared with his mouth half open, unable to pull his mood back: “We… never thought about that at the time…”

“Do not mind her. Her way of thinking is different from others’,” Duncan said to Tyrian with a serious look after glancing at Alice. “Go on. What happened after that?”

Tyrian finally came back to himself. After sorting his thoughts, he continued: “When the third submersible came up, it also flashed light signals asking for the hatch to be opened. This time the soldiers had some experience. They dragged the submersible into an even more heavily protected area, and the priest set up a large number of extraordinary wards in advance before opening the hatch. And this time… what came out was a swollen, twisted humanoid monster that no longer looked like an explorer at all.

“That monster also could not survive more than three minutes in the air.

“The fourth submersible had a mass of constantly writhing flesh climb out of it. This time, there was not even a trace of a human outline left.

“When the hatch of the fifth submersible opened, nothing came out. The soldiers on the scene went up to check and saw only a suspicious puddle of dark red sludge in the cockpit. That sludge carried a faint sign of life.

“The sixth submersible held only a small amount of black, fibrous, dried material. It looked like an unfinished nervous structure, or a dried specimen of blood vessels…”

As Tyrian went on, Duncan’s expression grew more and more serious. Even Alice at his side seemed to sense the change in mood and sat up straight.

In that ever more heavy and solemn air, Tyrian slowly said:

“The seventh submersible, which is also the last one I know of, was empty inside.”

“Empty?” Duncan lifted his eyebrow slightly, then shook his head. “That is even more unsettling.”

“Yes. Empty. So it was even more unsettling. The whole matter had completely entered a runaway state. We had to find a way to end it,” Tyrian said in a deep voice. “But thankfully, the No. 4 submersible was finally finished. It was originally designed as the follow-up model to the No. 3. After the ‘one thousand meters’ incident, the project was paused, and its construction stopped as well. But as more and more ‘No. 3 submersibles’ floated to the surface, the queen ordered the No. 4 submersible to be assembled as fast as possible and decided to use it to find out what had really happened in the water one thousand meters below.”

Tyrian paused, as if his memories had a few gaps. He gathered his words before slowly going on: “I cannot remember all the details of the No. 4 submersible. It was finished in a rush, and the Frostholm navy only handled part of it. I only know it was larger than No. 3. It could hold three people and had a sample bay. The scholars had planned to use it to collect samples from the Deep Sea, if there were samples to collect.

“The day after the seventh ‘No. 3 submersible’ appeared, the No. 4 submersible built by Frostholm was put into the sea. Inside it sat a scholar, an officer, and a powerful priest. At that point, we could no longer worry about the dangers of ‘multi-person exploration’. Preventing an eighth ‘No. 3 submersible’ from appearing was the first priority.

“The No. 4 submersible dove all the way down and soon reached the depth of one thousand meters. The priest inside used spiritual power to stay in touch with the surface. Maybe because the new submersible had better performance, they went down very smoothly and confirmed the sight of the city-state’s ‘foundation’ that the earlier explorer had reported. But soon, the link began to cut in and out. After they reached a depth of one thousand meters, the small cathedral on the sea platform almost could not hear a thing from the Deep Sea.

“But fifteen minutes after the link was broken, the priest on duty in that small cathedral suddenly heard a sound from the Deep Sea again. First they heard a scream. It was the priest in the submersible. In a terrified voice, he screamed to warn the others. He said: ‘Don’t look! Don’t think!’ Right after that came the officer’s voice, a roar. And then, a deafening blast.”

Tyrian raised his head and turned his gaze to Duncan.

“The No. 4 submersible detonated its explosives,” the Pirate Lord said slowly. “They had packed the sample bay full of high-energy charges to deal with ‘the final dangerous situation’.

“Then everything ended. The No. 4 submersible never came back up, and no more ‘No. 3 submersibles’ ever appeared before anyone.”

Chapter 253: Frostholm’s Great Uprising

Tyrian’s story finally reached a pause, but to Duncan, this bizarre tale ended far too abruptly.

“Everything ended? It really just ended like that?” He could not help looking across the mirror at the Pirate Lord, his tone full of doubt. “One submersible, with a bay full of explosives, diving down to one thousand meters, solved a ‘runaway’ extraordinary phenomenon that was still getting worse? Let us not even talk about how much power those explosives could unleash at that depth. Just from the view of the supernatural field… could an explosion like that really destroy a supernatural studies phenomenon?”

“We could only think so,” Tyrian said. He was clearly not surprised by Father’s question. “In truth, no one knew what really happened in the water one thousand meters below. No one knew what the No. 4 submersible saw there. Our only link with the deep was the fragment of perception the priest shared with us through psychic echo… a scream, a roar, and a blast. Those tiny shards were nowhere near enough to piece together the truth.

“But in fact, after the No. 4 submersible exploded, there really were no more ‘No. 3 submersible’ replicants rising from the Deep Sea. So we could only assume… the matter was resolved.”

“The matter was resolved…” Duncan frowned and shook his head. “Fine. Let us assume it was resolved. Then the Abyssal Trench Project…”

“The Abyssal Trench Project did not end. That is exactly what was most wrong about it,” Tyrian said bluntly. “After something like that happened, after we paid such a heavy price and finally dealt with the strange crisis around the No. 3 submersible, we should have reviewed the Abyssal Trench Project and stopped that dangerous scheme. But Her Majesty Ray Nora pushed back against all opposition. Not only did she announce that the project would restart and the No. 5 submersible would be built, she even raised the priority of the Abyssal Trench Project to the very highest level, and she spent an unusual amount of manpower and resources on it.”

Duncan’s gaze suddenly grew deep. He faintly sensed that the real “runaway” part of this matter might have begun here. The queen’s “crime” and that rebellion in Frostholm half a century ago all came from this point.

He turned his gaze on Tyrian’s eyes: “From the sound of it, you did not support your queen at the time.”

“I argued with her. We fought bitterly over it. That is why I say that after the depth of ‘one thousand meters’, I was no longer directly involved in the Abyssal Trench Project,” Tyrian said slowly, his voice low. “After that, I felt the whole thing was sliding toward danger.

“But thinking back, I should have done everything in my power to stop the Queen of Frostholm, not avoid her. I trusted her too much and did not realize that she could make mistakes as well.”

“You believe the Queen of Frostholm really did make a mistake?”

“The Abyssal Trench Project brought a chain of crises to Frostholm and gave her enemies an opening. That ever more extreme exploration finally even cost Her Majesty Ray Nora her life. At least from that point of view, it was a mistake.”

“…After Ray Nora insisted on pushing ahead with the Abyssal Trench Project, what else happened?”

“After that, I did not take part in the project directly, so I do not know much. But from what I heard now and then, the plan did not go smoothly, and… the strange and horrible events kept getting more frequent and more serious,” Tyrian said calmly. “The No. 5 submersible was completed. It used the most advanced engineering techniques and the toughest materials of the time, but every dive it made was accompanied by all kinds of accidents. It was as if something in the dark was blocking humans from going any deeper into the sea…

“People working on the project started going mad. Some were injured for no reason. Some vanished and then wandered back into the city in a daze. The explorers who dove in the submersible became suspicious and violent. They were no longer the careful, respectable scholars and soldiers they had been, but more and more like grim, eerie fanatics. It was even said that the No. 5 submersible itself began to change during those dives. It showed changes no one could understand, and its inner workings became more and more like some kind of… living thing.

“The strangest part of all was that even with all these changes, even as the whole project grew more and more terrifying, the Abyssal Trench Project still went forward without the slightest hesitation. No one involved in the project, no one who lived with madness and accidents every day, and not even the people who were already frequently injured and traumatized, backed out. No one questioned or resisted the orders from above. It felt as though…”

Tyrian stalled. He seemed unable to find the right words to describe the atmosphere back then.

Seeing this, Duncan spoke softly: “As though the Deep Sea was calling them.”

“Yes. As though the Deep Sea was calling them,” Tyrian said, startled. He nodded at once, then gave Duncan a strange look. “That is a very… accurate description.”

“Do not think too much about it. Go on.”

Tyrian looked away and gathered his thoughts again: “That was how it was. The whole project seemed to be called and pushed by some power. It even felt as if the ‘project’ itself had grown some kind of will and was stubbornly marching toward the Deep Sea, while the people working on it had all become cells in that huge will.

“And in that kind of atmosphere, the No. 5 submersible unknowingly passed the depth of one thousand meters. I do not know how deep it finally went. All I heard was… it was an astonishing number, very, very astonishing. From the view of engineering, from the view of materials, from the level of technology at the time… it was a number that should have been impossible.

“The Deep Sea embraced the Abyssal Trench Project. The Deep Sea accepted the No. 5 submersible. That ever stranger machine and its ever stranger crew moved easily through the dark Deep Sea at several thousand meters as if they had gone home. But in the waters around the Abyssal Trench Project… strange incidents grew more and more common.

“Merchant ships began to see ‘reflections’ of themselves near the surface, ships that looked exactly the same as their own. Thick fog began to fall again and again over the eastern part of Frostholm. In the fog drifted shadows that looked sometimes like ships and sometimes like giant beasts. The city-state also began to see… ‘strangers’. A great, great many strangers. They gathered near facilities tied to the Abyssal Trench Project and all claimed to be part of the project. The number of these strangers was even larger than the actual number of people working on the project.

“In such a situation, rumors… in truth, they could no longer be called rumors. Sayings began to spread everywhere. At first people only said the Queen of Frostholm was doing some suspicious research. Soon, people said she was studying Subspace. After that, they said the Queen of Frostholm was colluding with Subspace, and that she had already reached an agreement with the great leader in Subspace, Captain Duncan…”

Tyrian let out a slow breath and spread his hands. “And after that, you know what happened. The Frostholm Great Uprising that shocked the whole North.”

The little storeroom piled high with “antiques” fell silent for a time. No one knew how long had passed before Duncan’s voice slowly came from the mirror: “It is understandable that people linked this to Subspace. But dragging the Vanished into it… that really took too much imagination.”

“In fact, it was a very normal chain of thought. That line of thinking was even related to me,” Tyrian said with a bitter smile and a shake of his head. “After all, I am your son, and I just happened to serve the Queen of Frostholm, and I had been part of this terrible project in its early stages. You should know, people who love conspiracies always have the strongest imagination.”

Duncan did not comment. After a brief silence, he said again: “Looked at this way, that Great Uprising really was not without cause. The Abyssal Trench Project that Ray Nora insisted on pushing was too dangerous, and from what you describe… her mental state at the time was not quite right either.”

“That is exactly what I wanted to add a few words about,” Tyrian said suddenly. “I know that all signs suggest the Queen of Frostholm had already lost her reason. She looked like a madman led on by something, stubbornly walking one single path. But I know that she… was always clear-headed. Very clear-headed, very rational, and fully aware of what she was doing."

"Oh?"

"I argued with her, but I was still the general she trusted. I could meet her up close. In fact, the other city-state officials could too. They all knew that the queen had never gone mad and that she had no plan to destroy the city-state or threaten the world. Yes, they knew… but they became afraid, and they hesitated. Some of them were bought off, some were lured away. They were not as firm as I was.

"But I know that maybe the other people in the Abyssal Trench Project were indeed being slowly affected by something. She, however… she clearly resisted that influence and was using it in reverse."

"You mean the Queen of Frostholm actually had a clear and 'safe' plan, and she was confident she could finish it, but she did not tell anyone. She did not even explain it to you," Duncan said, looking at Tyrian with a thoughtful gaze. "And you still trusted her without question? Because you believed that even if something under the Deep Sea threatened the city-state, everything was still under Ray Nora's control?"

"In your eyes, that kind of trust must seem too blind."

"Whether it is blind or not is your business," Duncan said, shaking his head. "I only mean that the Queen of Frostholm clearly did not manage to keep 'everything under control'. She died in the hands of the rebels in the end, and the Abyssal Trench Project was buried completely. Things did not unfold the way she planned."

"…I really could not argue with that."

Tyrian let out a helpless sigh.

Chapter 254: Perhaps It Was Not Over Yet

By this point, Duncan finally understood the whole story of the Abyssal Trench Project, which had been sealed away for half a century. He now knew why it was seen as a taboo, and why even the Rebels who had started the Frostholm uprising were deeply afraid of it—they truly had every reason to be afraid.

Even though the whole thing had taken place from beginning to end within the Mortal Realm, once the situation entered a runaway state, it clearly went beyond the order of the Mortal Realm. Beneath the Deep Sea lay a completely unknown terror. Even in the end, no one ever figured out what it really was. People only kept falling into madness, and the entire project only sped up, as if it was sliding toward an abyss.

There was the endless Deep Dive, the strange mood that slowly spread, and the Queen of Frostholm's later behavior, which was almost like shutting herself away from the world… To be fair, even Duncan himself, looking at this chain of facts, would instinctively think that Ray Nora had truly been tempted and controlled by something. He would even suspect that the Queen of Frostholm had joined hands with Subspace.

In such a situation, it was not just that Frostholm already had hidden opponents of the Queen inside its walls. It was not just that many city-states in the Frost Sea already held ill intentions toward Frostholm and the Queen’s rule. Even if the northern situation had once been steady, under such pressure, undercurrents would still have risen with time.

But Tyrian kept stressing that Ray Nora had never been influenced by anything. He firmly believed that the Queen of Frostholm had stayed clear-minded until the end, and had protected the city-state until the end.

Duncan could not say for sure whether Tyrian’s judgment was right, but he tended to believe it, because… he had also seen that Queen of Frostholm in the fragments of history.

She had even calmly and rationally asked him: “Please don’t corrupt history.”

At least from that one meeting, the Queen of Frostholm in those days had not looked like some terrible madman controlled by Subspace.

But it was exactly because of this that Duncan felt even more curious. He could not figure out what kind of motive would make a clear-headed city lord make those withdrawn and extreme decisions. What could drive her to keep pushing the Abyssal Trench Project at all costs, even when she knew there was something wrong with it? And what reason could make her lock all those secrets in her heart and say nothing, not even in front of the navy commander she trusted the most?

After thinking for a long time, Duncan found that all the questions pointed to one thing in the end: what kind of “secret” had the Queen of Frostholm learned in the Deep Sea?

“…After the Frostholm Great Uprising, you never returned to that city-state?” Duncan raised his head and looked at Tyrian as he asked.

“No. Her Majesty Ray Nora once ordered me to lead my direct troops out of Frostholm. At that time, the Rebels had already joined forces with other northern city-states, and they had gathered an entire fleet on the outer sea,”

Tyrian said. His voice grew especially low; it was clearly a past he did not want to bring up. “…But if I had disobeyed the order and stayed, Frostholm would have had one more unit still loyal to the Queen. Those Rebels would never have broken through the defenses of the Harbor so easily…”

“So in later years there were rumors that you actually took part in the uprising, and that you were even the one who let the Rebels into Frostholm,” Duncan said as he shook his head. “Have you ever thought about why the Queen of Frostholm gave that order back then? Did she leave you no other instructions?”

“…I was confused by it for many years,” Tyrian said honestly. “The Queen gave no further orders. She only told me to leave with my troops. I once thought that maybe she wanted to leave a force behind to avenge her in the future, but… that made no sense. She forbade us from ever returning to the city, and the Rebels took the city. If we could not go back, how could we avenge her?”

“You could raid the Rebels’ fleets on the outer sea and intercept every merchant going in and out of Frostholm. You did that for many years.”

“Yes. That was the only thing I could think to do, and it was also the only way to keep the Sea Mist Fleet alive… At that time we did not even have a home port,” Tyrian said, shaking his head. “But now we have slowly stopped those raids.”

“Why?”

“…Because the last Rebel leader is dead now. He died of old age,” Tyrian said with a bitter smile as he spread his hands. “We did everything we could to hunt down those Rebel leaders. When we caught one, we hanged him from the mast, then threw the body onto merchant ships bound for Frostholm. So they got smart. They all hid inside the city and did not step beyond its walls for decades. I could only watch as they lived out their lives in peace, until everyone who had taken part in the uprising had left this world."

Duncan did not speak for a while. He stayed silent in thought for a long time before he suddenly said: "All of your soldiers are 'Living dead', right?"

Tyrian answered without thinking: "Yes. Everyone knows that."

"They also all took part in the Abyssal Trench Project, directly or indirectly?"

"I took part in that project. They were my direct troops, so of course they took part too," Tyrian said offhand. Then he frowned slightly. "Have you thought of something?"

"You all took part in the Abyssal Trench Project, but unlike the others involved, you did not become insane and twisted in the later stages. After 'one thousand meters', the Queen of Frostholm quarreled with you and pushed you out of the project. Then, on the eve of the Rebel assault, your Queen ordered you to lead your direct troops away from Frostholm…"

Duncan spoke slowly as he thought. In the end, his gaze fell on Tyrian, and his voice grew low: "You are right. That Queen of Frostholm may really have wanted to leave a force behind. But she did not seem to leave this force to avenge herself…"

Tyrian slowly showed a stunned look. Just as he was about to ask something more, the figure in the mirror shook his head lightly and said: "Don't ask me. If you can't figure it out yourself, I can't either. I only said what I thought, from the view of an onlooker."

After that, the room fell into a brief silence. After who knew how long, Duncan's voice sounded again: "Tyrian, we have talked long enough this time."

The Pirate Lord, who was still lost in thought, looked up at these words. He stared at the Father in the mirror in some surprise, as if he only then realized something. A complicated, shocked look appeared in his eyes.

He seemed to have just realized how much he had told the other side, and realized that, without noticing it, he had fully grown used to the mood of this conversation. Even a century ago, he had rarely had such a long talk with the Father. As for the bit of wariness he had felt when he first woke up here… it had already vanished at some point.

“I…” He tried to speak without thinking, but a sudden sting came from his forehead. He could not help touching his brow. “Ah… that hurts…”

“…The child didn’t know her own strength. I hope you won’t hold it against her,” Duncan’s voice came from the mirror. “Do you need some salve?”

“No… no need,” Tyrian said. His expression was a bit strange as he waved his hand. He could not help thinking of the last scene he remembered before coming here: that strange little young lady, and that thing that had flown at him through the air… something like a dog. Then he suddenly reacted: “Wait, I remember now. That wasn’t a dog. That was a Abyssal Hound!”

He looked toward the mirror, disbelief in his eyes: “Is that also one of your subordinates now? An… Annihilator?”

When he said the words “Annihilator”, he sounded a little unsure. He clearly did not dare to claim Shirley’s true nature. He had seen Annihilators before, but this was the first time he had seen one rush in swinging a contracted demon like a club…

“She is doing some work for me,” Duncan said with a faint, unreadable smile. “But if you ever get the chance to meet her again, I suggest you don’t use the word ‘Annihilator’ in front of her. She dislikes it very much.”

Tyrian made a muddled sound of agreement, then looked around the room without thinking. His eyes finally fell on Alice, who already seemed to be spacing out beside him.

Alice quickly snapped back to herself and looked at Tyrian in curiosity: “Why are you looking at me?”

“Nothing,” Tyrian said as he pulled back his gaze. Something complicated, some feeling, hid in his eyes. In the end he looked at the mirror that was still burning with flames and asked, not very sure: “Then I… can leave now?”

“Do you want to stay for dinner?”

Tyrian quickly waved his hands: “Ah… no, that won’t be necessary…”

“Very well. Then I’ll have my messenger send you…” Duncan in the mirror nodded. But then he suddenly frowned, as if something had come to him. “Wait. I just thought of something.”

Tyrian tensed up a little without meaning to: “Something?”

“Strictly speaking, it’s two doubts about the same thing,” Duncan said. His face grew serious again as he stared at Tyrian. “Do you remember what you just mentioned, about several ‘replicas’ of Submersible No. 3 surfacing one after another?”

“Of course,” Tyrian said with a nod. “Counting the first original and the six later replicants, seven ‘Submersible No. 3s’ surfaced in total.”

“I have two questions,” Duncan said slowly after putting his thoughts in order. “First, was that first submersible that surfaced back then… really the original?

“Second, was the seventh submersible that surfaced really empty inside?”

Chapter 255: A Brief Farewell

Half a century after the Abyssal Trench Project had ended, Tyrian finally once again felt a chill that had flowed on from that project all the way to this very day.

Those Submersible No. 3s that had surfaced one after another seemed to appear before his eyes again. Along with them, his mind brought up the careful soldiers, the stern priests, and the Queen of Frostholm standing there with a cold, silent face. He seemed to see again the hatches of those submersibles opening. Out of them came mad explorers, came humans that looked right but were not, came swollen, twisted monsters, squirming, shifting chunks of flesh, dead and eerie sludge, dried and suspicious black fibers, and… the empty cabin of the seventh Submersible No. 3.

“At that time, the platform had extremely strict protections. There were many priests and Guardian Wardens on site,” Tyrian said, frowning as he recalled. “But… I have to admit, your question is a bit frightening.”

Duncan did not say anything. After a few seconds he suddenly asked: “How did you deal with those ‘Submersible No. 3s’ in the end?”

“Except for the first one that surfaced, the ‘genuine one’, the other six replicants were all thrown into the Crucible. They were melted down into ingots in the holy fire, then poured into the sea. Even though they were a huge pile of metal, no one dared to keep them,” Tyrian said, his tone a little hesitant. “But if it’s as you say, and even the first one wasn’t the ‘genuine one’, then things would be…”

“Where was the first one kept?”

“If you’re asking where it is now, I don’t know,” Tyrian said, shaking his head. “The Rebels should have destroyed everything related to the Abyssal Trench Project. But no one knows how they destroyed those materials. Maybe they just took them apart and reused them?

“But if you mean in the time before the uprising… after it was retired, Submersible No. 3 was kept in a warehouse in the Harbor district.”

Duncan stayed silent for a few seconds, then let out a light breath: “I understand… Tyrian, thank you for being willing to tell me so much. No matter what, this information has greatly satisfied my curiosity.”

Tyrian, however, looked heavy-hearted. Looking back after so many years to analyze that Abyssal Trench Project again, he had sensed far too many chilling details in it. The project itself had always been full of strange things, but this backward glance into the secret brought a kind of unease that seemed to seep into his bones even more than actually living through it had. The doubt Father had raised about the Queen of Frostholm’s last order made him faintly feel that this old case, which should have ended fifty years ago, had in fact never really ended.

But no matter what, today’s talk was over.

Father had no intention of keeping him here.

Suddenly, the sound of flapping wings came from the side. Tyrian looked toward the sound and saw only the shadow of a bird, wrapped in ghostly green fire, flash through the air. In the place where that shadow passed, bright green flames roared up. The fire rose and twisted, and in the blink of an eye it formed a swirling doorway.

Father’s voice came from the mirror beside him: “Walk through it. You’ll be sent to somewhere near the Grand Cathedral—I think you won’t tell anyone what has happened here."

"Of course. I've never been an informer."

Tyrian answered, then looked at the flaming doorway. He seemed a bit hesitant, but in the end he made up his mind and stepped forward. Yet just before he crossed the door, he stopped again. He couldn't help turning back to look at the doll in a Brother's robe, standing quietly beside the mirror.

"Anomaly 099…" he muttered under his breath, almost to himself. "It's really too similar…"

"They say Anomaly 099 first appeared on the Frost Sea, near the waters where the Queen of Frostholm was executed and fell into the sea," Duncan's voice sounded from the mirror. "I have the same suspicion as you. But even Alice herself can't explain her origin. Just as you said… there are far too many things in the Deep Sea that we can't understand."

Tyrian looked thoughtful. After a moment of silence he suddenly spoke: "It looks like this doll enjoys staying by your side."

Duncan answered lightly: "At first she clung on and refused to leave, but later I found she could be useful."

Alice's answer was far simpler. She laughed happily and nodded as she said: "I like being by the captain's side. He's amazing!"

Tyrian looked in some surprise at the expressionless Father in the mirror, then at Alice, whose face was exactly the same as the Queen of Frostholm's, though in every way but her looks she was nothing like the Queen. After a moment, he suddenly laughed.

It was a kind of lightness and joy that came straight from his heart.

Then he turned around and stepped into the flaming doorway without any hesitation.

The warehouse grew quiet again.

Alice looked toward the direction where the fire had faded, then turned to look at the mirror beside her. After thinking for quite a while, she suddenly blurted out: “Captain, why was he smiling at us just now?”

Duncan replied casually: “How would I know?”

Alice made a confused little sound, thought again, then blurted out another line: “You were talking about Frostholm and that trench thing just now… does it have anything to do with me?”

This time, Duncan did not casually make something up to fool the doll. He thought about it very seriously, then said in a deep voice: “It might.”

“Then can I understand it?”

“It’ll probably be hard.”

“Oh, then I won’t think about it for now,” Alice said, scratching her head. She then smiled and looked at Duncan in the mirror: “Anyway, if there’s anything I need to do or help with, just tell me what to do.”

“I will.”

“Mm!”

…

A flash of fire passed through a dark alley. A moment later, a drowsy Tyrian walked out of the alley and saw the tall doors of Pland’s Grand Cathedral not far away.

“It really did send me nearby…”

The Pirate Lord muttered a line, then lifted his hand to tap his head, which still felt dull from the blow that had left him dazed. But he accidentally touched the swollen spot and sucked in a sharp breath of pain at once.

That little girl's strength was a bit too scary… That was a Abyssal demon heavier than two or three grown men put together!

Thinking of how he had gotten the wound on his head, Tyrian couldn't help grumbling to himself. At the same time, he couldn't help feeling curious.

His own Father was indeed gathering a new crew. At least from what he had seen so far, Father had already taken control of Anomaly 099 and had a strange girl who could summon Abyssal demons and wield great power working for him. But that was clearly not all.

Even if he had learned this only yesterday, it would have been more than enough to make him extremely wary, even to the point of wanting to warn the city-states and the Church. But right now, he had no desire at all to "inform" on Father to the Church.

Now his head was full of thoughts about the Abyssal Trench Project.

Tyrian walked toward the Storm Cathedral. After only a few steps, he saw several figures appear at the cathedral doors and jog toward him.

They were the sailors he had sent back earlier.

Their captain had vanished for a whole day after leaving them only a single line of explanation. That had clearly made his men uneasy.

In a moment, the sailors reached Tyrian. Before even coming to a full stop, one of them began to babble: "You're finally back, sir! The Sun is almost down. Where did you go?"

Another sailor saw at once that something was off about Tyrian and gasped: "Captain, your face is hurt… and how did your head swell up that much?!"

Tyrian had known he couldn't hide how battered he looked. He had hoped his healing ability, which was far beyond that of an ordinary person, might let him recover before he returned to the Grand Cathedral. But it turned out that, even if that strange girl still had a lot to learn about handling Abyssal demons, wounds made by Abyssal demons were still very troublesome. It had already been half a day, and his head was still swollen.

“…I tripped on the way.”

After holding it in for a long time, Tyrian still could only brush it off with that clumsy excuse.

He really couldn’t bring himself to admit, in front of his own men, that this was the result of “Dad-inflicted damage”—especially when Father hadn’t even done it himself. The one who had hit him was just a little young lady whose head barely reached his chest.

“Tripped?” The sailor who had spoken first looked at his captain in confusion. “Then your fall was a bit… too advanced. It’s like you used your head to beat Pland’s walls and streets to death…”

Tyrian stared at this sailor with a deep look and said, word by word: “I. Tripped. On. The. Way.”

The sailor shivered and came to his senses at once: “Oh, oh, right, yes. You clearly just slipped by accident. I’ll put some medicine on it for you when we get back…”

“Enough. I don’t want to discuss this right now,” Tyrian sighed as he walked toward the cathedral doors. “Let’s go back first. I need a good rest today. Then it’ll be time to set out for the north.”

“Go back north? We’re not staying here a few more days? You were still planning to…”

The words “Abyssal Trench Project” surfaced in Tyrian’s mind again. He waved his hand: “Enough. It’s time to go back. There’s still work to do in the Frost Sea…”

The sailors looked at each other, then in the end nodded and obeyed their captain’s decision.

But Tyrian suddenly stopped walking again.

He hesitated for a moment in front of the main doors of the Storm Cathedral, touching the swollen areas on his face and head.

“Let’s go back through the side door.”

Chapter 256: The Swift Bell Rang

After Tyrian returned to his room, he ordered his men to leave one by one, but his mood did not settle just because the room had fallen quiet.

His long talk with Father still lingered in his mind. Memories of the Abyssal Trench Project wrapped around his thoughts as if they were out of his control. From time to time, fragments from half a century ago flashed before his eyes—the rugged Diving Apparatus, the sea cliffs where cold rain never stopped falling, the silent Guard Corps on the platform, the priests' low benedictions in the rainy nights, the brightly lit yet always eerie coastal laboratory, and the Frostholm Queen's gaze, always fixed on the sea and hiding all secrets.

Tyrian shook his head. For some reason, he suddenly thought again of that Doll who called herself "Alice"—Anomaly 099, who had completely slipped free of her seal and now moved freely in the mortal world.

A "controlled" Anomaly. A Doll who could think and talk like a human, who even had her own joys, anger, sorrow, and happiness…

She was so much like the Frostholm Queen, yet she was definitely not the Queen herself. Even though her existence and the way she appeared in the world easily made people think of some kind of "return" of the Queen, Tyrian could feel that inside that Doll… there was not the slightest trace of Ray Nora's will.

If he had to put it into words, Tyrian felt that Alice was more like a replica whose outer appearance had been restored to perfection, while the inside was completely twisted.

Just like those “Number Three” Submersibles that had surfaced one after another back then.

Tyrian’s expression changed slightly, and the comparison that rose in his mind brought a thin chill with it.

He sat in the room and poured himself a glass of strong liquor, using the alcohol’s warmth to thaw his cold thoughts and soothe his restless mind. After quite a while, when he felt a little better, he finally looked up at the ornate carrying case by the bed.

After a slight hesitation, he carried the case to the table, opened the lid, and activated the complex array of lenses and the crystal set at their center.

The scrying crystal lit up. Countless flickering points of light appeared within it, along with a buzzing noise that set one’s teeth on edge.

Only after a long time did he finally see Lucretia’s figure faintly appearing among the flashing lights, along with her blurred voice. Another two or three minutes passed before the sound and image barely grew clear, and his younger sister’s voice reached his ears: “Can you hear me?”

“It’s clear now,” Tyrian said with a nod. “Why is the interference on your side worse than before…? What’s around you? sunlight? It looks a bit strange…”

He noticed faint bands of pale golden radiance drifting in the background behind Lucretia. It looked as if brilliant evening clouds were pouring through a window into the room. Yet the quality of that light was far warmer and brighter than sunset glow, and the way it spread and hung in the air felt not quite like sunlight, which made it all the more striking.

Tyrian knew his younger sister often operated along the border, where strange phenomena happened all the time and were often dangerous, though Lucretia always managed to turn danger into safety. Even so, he still could not help but worry.

“Ah, I picked up something odd on the border, but I’ve already checked it carefully. It’s harmless,” Lucretia answered casually. “The thing probably fell from the sky. It can project a very wide halo of light… I’m using the Radiant Star to drag it back for study.”

Tyrian frowned without thinking. “You’re always picking up strange things on the border. Have you already forgotten how a mass of humanoid smoke dragged you straight into the depths of the Spirit Realm last time?”

“I’ll be careful. I’m always careful—accidents just happen from time to time. That’s exploration; accidents are inevitable.” Lucretia waved her hand, then suddenly seemed to notice something. She stared fixedly at Tyrian’s face. “Brother, what happened to your face and head?”

“…I fell.”

“But it looks more like you repeatedly slammed your head into a city wall,” Lucretia said with a frown. “You can’t fall and turn out like this without a two-hundred-meter running start and one resolute headbutt. You were attacked.”

Tyrian’s expression stiffened for a moment. Then he shook his head helplessly. “Sometimes I really wish you weren’t this smart.”

“Who attacked you?” Lucretia ignored his attempt to change the subject. Her expression grew very serious. “You’re in the city-state of Pland. You have no enemies there, and the city’s authority would never sit by and let a ‘guest’ be assaulted… Ah, and just now you refused to admit you were attacked and said you fell…”

As she spoke, Lucretia suddenly stopped. She seemed to think of something; her expression changed at once, and her eyes began to flicker as she watched the area around the scrying crystal.

Tyrian knew what that look meant as soon as he saw it. Before she could speak, he shook his head. “Don’t worry. He’s not here.”

“Seriously… he hit you?” Lucretia’s eyes widened in shock. “Wait, wasn’t he supposed to be outside the city-state? And why would he…”

“He’s not here. It was one of his subordinates,” Tyrian said, rubbing his forehead in frustration. “Relax, we didn’t actually fight. These injuries are just a small accident. He wanted to talk to me about something, and I was a bit too wary.”

“Subordinate?!” Lucretia was startled. Her first instinct was to ask how strong that subordinate was and what weapon it took to beat the Iron Vice Admiral into a pig’s head, but then she caught the second half of Tyrian’s sentence. Her gaze changed. “…He sought you out again so soon. What happened?”

“He’s become interested in some old business about Frostholm,” Tyrian said casually. “But you don’t need to worry about that. I’m calling because I want to ask about something else—Anomaly 099. You know of it, don’t you?”

“Of course I do. I also know it was snatched away by the Vanished. That news spread throughout the Explorer Association. Not long after that, the Deep Sea Church issued a notice. Anomaly 099’s name changed from ‘Doll spirit coffin’ to just ‘Doll’… A lot of people had uneasy guesses about what that meant.”

Tyrian lifted his eyelids and looked at Lucretia with a grave expression. “Then do you know why its name changed from ‘Doll spirit coffin’ to just ‘Doll’?”

Lucretia’s fine brows furrowed. She seemed to faintly realize something.

“I’ve seen her,” Tyrian said at last, letting out a breath and dropping the pretense. “That ‘Doll’. She calls herself Alice, and she has already awakened from the spirit coffin. She is now serving at Father’s side. Just like the rumors say, that Doll looks exactly like the Frostholm Queen, but her personality… is completely unexpected.”

“That information is completely unexpected as well,” Lucretia said softly. In the strange golden glow, her eyes seemed to faintly shine. “You mean Father ‘released’ Anomaly 099 from the spirit coffin, let that dangerous Anomaly roam freely outside, and she now willingly follows Father? She can even have a conversation with you?”

“It sounds impossible, but it’s the truth,” Tyrian said with a nod. “She can speak and think, and she has emotions like a human. She even… seems to have a good relationship with Father. But I don’t dare assume it’s a kind of ‘friendship’ humans can understand. After all, one of them is a ghost who returned from Subspace, and the other is an Anomaly entity with a number under one hundred.”

Lucretia stayed silent. After a brief pause, she finally raised her head. “So what is it you want to ask?”

“About the circumstances when Anomaly 099 was first discovered. You were on the scene back then.” Tyrian fixed his gaze on his younger sister. “I want the most genuine information from you. You know I and my fleet never go near Frostholm. We missed the original site.”

Lucretia thought for a few seconds. “Back then… I did happen to be in the waters where it happened. But the first ship to haul up Anomaly 099 wasn’t the Radiant Star. It was a coastal fishing vessel called the Charvin. Strictly speaking, by the time I received the Charvin’s distress signal and found that fishing boat drifting in a runaway state, it was already the second scene. So

I can’t be sure what things looked like the moment Anomaly 099 was first brought aboard—I can only tell you what I saw on the Charvin at the time.”

Lucretia paused, recalling the scenes she had witnessed.

“When I found that ship, there were almost no living people left on board. Of the twelve crew members including the captain, eleven had already been decapitated—only one sailor remained, half mad with fear. He babbled to me about the ‘cursed wooden chest’ they had hauled up.

“He said they couldn’t throw the chest overboard, because it was alive and moved all over the ship. They couldn’t destroy it either, because it had enormous strength and was incredibly tough. The sailors with their little self-defense weapons simply couldn’t deal with it…

“You can find most of this part in the public records of the Explorer Association. But there is one detail… that isn’t recorded there, and you might find it interesting.

“Within the first half hour after Anomaly 099 was hauled up, the sailors on the Charvin heard several faint clicking sounds coming from inside the chest. It sounded as if… something inside was taking shape.”

“Faint clicking…” Tyrian murmured, his brow furrowed. He seemed about to ask something more, but just as he opened his mouth, a sudden, rather urgent bell rang outside the window and cut him off.

He looked up in surprise. The bell sounded clear and rapid under the darkening sky. He listened carefully for a moment, then muttered to himself, not entirely sure, “That’s not the dusk Bell… It sounds like the Swift Bell.”

“The Swift Bell…” Lucretia’s voice came from the scrying crystal. “I heard seven short peals. If I remember correctly, that bell means the Nameless King’s Tomb is sending a message?!”

Chapter 257: “Politeness”

The Swift Bell kept ringing urgently: seven short peals in a row, then after a few seconds’ pause, another seven, three rounds in total.

Tyrian listened hard to the sounds outside the window. He heard voices talking in the corridor and hurried footsteps in the yard outside.

The intermediate and higher-ranking priests were answering the bell. They were setting up defenses at all key locations and preparing for Nightwatch, while the highest-ranking people in the great Cathedral should already have gone to some hidden sanctuary, ready to take part in the Saints’ gathering.

Tyrian was not of the Church, but he had lived for half a century and knew these rules well enough. From the bell’s rhythm and repetition, he could pick out the key information—this was the bell that summoned a Listening Rite, a gathering invitation sent directly from the Nameless King’s Tomb, and it sounded quite urgent.

“Is there another Anomaly or Vision acting up? A new discovery? Or a major change in an old one?” Lucretia muttered thoughtfully. “It feels like it hasn’t been that long since the last ‘summons’…”

Tyrian listened to the commotion outside for a while, then pulled his attention back and shook his head. “This is the Deep Sea Church’s own business. We don’t need to get involved.”

“Mm.” Lucretia nodded lightly, then looked at her elder brother. “Do you have anything else you want to ask about Anomaly 099?”

Tyrian thought for a moment, then shook his head. “No, nothing more—and with the Swift Bell ringing at night, the Cathedral will soon enter Nightwatch. We’d better not keep talking about anything related to Anomalies.”

“All right, then I’ll get back to my own work,” Lucretia said at once. The scrying crystal on the table began to flicker, and her figure started to fade. But just before the link broke completely, she seemed to think of something and suddenly spoke again. “Oh, one more thing. It’s about Father.”

Tyrian hesitated a little. “…Go on.”

“When Father met you this time… did he seem in his right mind as well?”

“He was very lucid, his logic clear. He even seemed…” Tyrian hesitated noticeably at this point, but finally said it anyway. “I can’t be sure, but he was almost… kind.”

“Ah. That’s really good.”

…

Vanna rushed into the great cathedral and saw Bishop Valentine already waiting for her before the Goddess’s statue. She hurried a few steps forward. “Why is there another summons so soon…? This has never happened before.”

“No idea. This time the bell was rung directly under the Storm Cathedral’s control. It would never sound without a reason.” Valentine nodded to Vanna, then turned and walked quickly toward the passage leading to the “Flooded Cavern” as he spoke. “It may be the same as last time. There was a direct change in the list of Anomalies and Visions, and the Tomb’s Gravekeeper is sending out a summons.”

Vanna followed the old bishop’s steps. As she passed the Goddess’s statue, she stopped out of habit and seemed to hesitate for a moment, but soon bowed devoutly as she always did, then turned and continued toward the passage entrance.

It did not take long for them to reach the chamber at the end of the passage —the Flooded Cavern used to build the psychic channel.

The scene in the chamber was as it always was. The stone-block walls were old and perpetually damp. In the center of the room, phantom flames burned in a brazier, and the fine trickle of water and the layered sound of waves filled the air, bringing a strange, quiet atmosphere.

The chamber’s heavy door closed.

Vanna drew a slow breath and stopped before the brazier, lowering her head to fix her gaze on the flames that burned fiercely without any fuel.

She let her thoughts settle little by little, letting her Spiritual Insight slowly synchronize with the Goddess’s guidance. The dancing flames became an anchor that steadied her humanity, filling her field of vision.

This should have been a familiar process, but this time Vanna found it rather difficult.

She tried her best not to picture the flames suddenly turning ghostly green, not to picture a pair of Captain Duncan’s eyes hidden behind them. She turned her head slightly to look at Bishop Valentine beside her and saw that the old man’s gaze was already utterly calm, his breathing even. He had clearly entered the gathering place ahead of her.

Vanna had no choice but to pull her gaze back, take another light breath, and try again to focus her mind, letting her Spiritual Insight align with the Goddess’s guidance.

Fortunately, this time she succeeded.

Illusory seawater surged up and gently wrapped around her. Her senses pulled free from her mortal body and reassembled in another dimension. Vanna felt a brief daze, and then she was already standing in that mysterious, ancient meeting place—the familiar boundless plaza, the broken, age-old pillars standing around it, and the vague human-shaped shadows gathered between those pillars.

One of the shadows quickly drifted toward her. It was Bishop Valentine. “Vanna, trouble getting in? You took quite a long time this time.”

“Couldn’t focus,” Vanna replied casually. Right after that, she noticed a striking figure standing at the edge of the plaza—that figure was solid and clear, completely different from the Saints around her, who were nothing but blurry shadows. It was plainly a beautiful lady in splendid robes.

Of course Vanna recognized that figure.

“The Pope is already here in person?” she asked in some surprise. “Ah, I really… chose the worst time to be late.”

“It’s fine. After you’re late enough times, you get used to it,” Valentine said in an easy tone. “The Pope was already here when I arrived. She might even have been the first one. I imagine she has some special arrangements in mind…”

Vanna listened half-heartedly. For some reason, she kept feeling that solid, elegant figure was glancing in this direction from time to time, and that gaze made her feel rather awkward, even… nervous.

Just then, Pope Helena suddenly turned her head.

She truly looked straight at Vanna for a moment. Then a faint smile seemed to appear on her face, and she gave a small nod.

Vanna froze for a second. She had just started to return the greeting when a deep rumble suddenly cut her off.

She looked toward the sound and saw the flagstone ground at the center of the plaza heave upward. The broken slabs rippled like water, and in moments an ancient, gloomy palace built from pale giant stones rose into the Saints' view.

The Nameless King's Tomb had appeared.

The Saints who had been murmuring to one another fell silent at once. A quiet, solemn mood settled over the plaza. Vanna hurriedly reined in her thoughts, stopped paying attention to the Pope's gaze on her, and fixed her eyes on the palace's pyramid-like main structure, staring at its entrance.

The doors at the entrance opened, and the towering Gravekeeper stepped out.

Wrapped head to toe in the shroud, one side of his body charred and the other side bound in chains, he looked just as he had last time. This terrifying being, a mix of mortal flesh, iron shackles, and the curse of death, walked straight toward the Saints gathered in the plaza.

The choice had already been made.

In the next moment, he strode without hesitation past every other shadow in the plaza and stopped right in front of Vanna.

The Gravekeeper lowered his head, his single eye calmly turning its gaze on the Saint before him:

"You may enter the tomb chamber."

He raised his hand and passed over a quill and a sheet of parchment, waiting for Vanna's response.

Vanna, however, froze for a moment—and almost all the Saints did the same.

The Gravekeeper had chosen the same Saint to enter the tomb twice in a row.

This had never happened in the past countless years.

Of course, there was no explicit “rule” that the Gravekeeper could not choose the same Saint twice in a row. But over all these years, he had always picked different Saints in two neighboring summons. It had almost become an unwritten rule. Even if a Saint who had entered the tomb last time came again to the gathering, it was only to obey orders and make sure the Listening rite ritual was complete.

No one had expected Vanna to be chosen again.

Vanna stood there stunned for several seconds while the Gravekeeper patiently held out his hand and waited. At that moment, the feeling of being watched came over her again. She instinctively followed it and looked up—right into Pope Helena’s deep gaze.

Vanna’s heart tightened, and she guiltily shifted her eyes away. Only then did she notice that the Gravekeeper was still waiting. The ancient caretaker, terrifying as he looked, lowered his head without joy or sorrow and held the parchment and quill out a little farther.

“Me again?”

Vanna asked without thinking, and regretted it as soon as the words left her mouth—how could the Gravekeeper bother answering such pointless questions?

But right after that, she heard a hoarse, low voice speak from in front of her. “Yes. You again.”

Vanna could not help being a little shocked. She looked up at the Gravekeeper’s somewhat savage face and finally reached out to take the parchment and quill.

The Gravekeeper seemed to give a tiny nod as he straightened up and said:

“Please write down what you hear on it.”

Vanna nodded without thinking, but suddenly felt that something was off.

She couldn’t shake the feeling… that this Gravekeeper had grown a lot more polite?

Chapter 258: No Number

Not only Vanna faintly felt that something was wrong. The nearby Saints also sensed that something was off. These hazy spirit projections looked almost instinctively at the ancient being wrapped in the shroud, its face twisted and terrifying.

In their memories, and in the Church's records, every description of this "Gravekeeper" used words like "cold," "dutiful," and "indifferent." There was never a single line saying that he would ever say "please" to a chosen Listener.

However, Vanna did not have time to think about it. She noticed that the Gravekeeper was still patiently waiting for her, so she quickly gathered her thoughts and nodded: "All right."

The Gravekeeper turned and led Vanna toward the grand, ancient mausoleum palace, leaving the Saints on the plaza watching the two figures grow distant.

The heavy gate of the mausoleum closed behind them, as if it cut off all the sounds of the world. Standing in the cold and silent corridor, Vanna's heart slowly calmed down as well.

This was already her second time entering this mausoleum. Compared with the slightly nervous and uneasy mood of her first visit, she had now gotten at least a little used to it.

She knew what she had to do next. She had to walk straight ahead, pass through the passage lined with messages left by the seniors, enter the deepest burial chamber, and see the body of the Nameless King. After that, she would forget everything she had seen and heard and be sent back out of the mausoleum—while the parchment sheet in her hand would keep the notes she had written herself.

The secrets that could not be taken out of the mausoleum would be torn away. The things that could be revealed to the world would remain. The corruption she suffered during the process of the Listening rite would be safely left behind in the burial chamber together with her “forgetting.”

Vanna steadied herself and stepped forward.

A slightly heavy footstep followed behind her.

The young Inquisitor stopped in surprise and looked back at the Gravekeeper walking after her.

Under normal circumstances, did the Gravekeeper not always leave on his own once the Listener entered the mausoleum?

“Is there… something else?” Vanna could not help speaking. She chose her words carefully and stayed fully on guard.

The Gravekeeper lowered his gaze. The single eye outside the shroud was cloudy. A hoarse voice sounded from his chest: “No. I am only escorting you—do you need an escort?”

That strong sense of wrongness rose again.

Vanna had only entered the mausoleum once before and was not familiar with every detail related to Vision 004, but she instinctively felt that the Gravekeeper’s behavior was not quite right. It was very different from what the records described.

But Vanna did not lose her calm. She reminded herself again and again that she was inside a very highly ranked ancient Vision. Here, even the smallest detail could be a matter of life and death. Because of this, she was extremely cautious and did not dare accept this “extra service” from the Gravekeeper: “I think… I know where to go.”

The Gravekeeper simply fixed his gaze on the “Visitor” in front of him. No emotion showed in his single eye. After a few seconds, he nodded and slowly stepped back: “All right. Please walk straight ahead. When it is over, I will personally escort you out.”

The Gravekeeper’s figure vanished into the corridor.

Vanna stared blankly for a moment and suddenly realized that he had even said “please” and “personally escort you out.”

…Why was this cold, proud ancient Guard so polite today…?

She shook her head and tried hard to push all the messy thoughts out of her mind, afraid that this was some kind of mental disturbance from the ancient Vision. Vanna forced herself to focus on what she should do. At last, she passed through the long corridor and entered the deepest burial chamber of the palace.

Inside the burial chamber, the mysterious headless corpse still sat upright on the tall throne. Pale braziers blazed on both sides. Across from the body of the Nameless King, there was a chair that had clearly been moved there recently.

Vanna’s eyelid twitched.

At that moment, even the always strict and self-disciplined Inquisitor had a rather absurd thought—if she came here again next time, would there be a fruit plate too…

She walked to the chair, sat down carefully, then raised her head and looked at the headless corpse on the throne.

In the next second, Vanna opened her eyes and found herself standing on a vast stone plaza. A chaotic sky covered her vision. In the distance, mysterious light rose from the tops of broken pillars. A rumbling sound came from behind her—Vision 004 was sinking quickly and returning to the underground.

Vanna was still a little dazed, while the Saints waiting on the plaza had already rushed over and gathered around her.

One Saint's phantom carried the familiar presence of Valentine. He came up to Vanna and spoke quickly: "Hurry and see what is written on the parchment sheet."

Only then did Vanna react. She quickly lifted the parchment sheet in her hand.

As expected, this parchment sheet was still incomplete, but compared with last time, when only a little scrap had remained, things were already much better.

The parchment sheet had only been torn in half. Clear writing remained on the other half.

Vanna's gaze swept over the familiar handwriting—

"The Shadows in the dark sea trench have begun to rise.

"The day to set sail.

"Vision Pland."

The Saints looked at each other. Bishop Valentine's phantom raised his head and stared at Vanna in shock. He seemed to want to ask something by instinct, but did not know how to put it into words.

The content on the parchment sheet had a problem. A big problem.

Yet the Listener would not remember her experience in the central burial chamber. The words carried out on the slip of paper were all the information there was. Vision 004 would not answer any extra questions. The only guarantee was that the information on the paper was true and correct.

“The Shadows in the dark sea trench… the day to set sail…” A Saint could not help whispering and looked at his companions in confusion. “The messages that came out of the mausoleum in the past were all fairly clear and direct. It was rare to see such an obscure metaphor…”

“Maybe this is the clear and direct message, and the key part was just torn away,” another Saint muttered. “Compared to that, the last line is…”

“Vision, Pland,” someone said softly.

Vanna’s eyes also locked onto the last line on the slip. Of the three lines, only this one fully caught her attention.

Naturally, she thought of that great fire, that ghost ship, and the Ghost flames that had finally swept across the whole city-state. But right after that, Vanna noticed something else.

“No number…” she said softly in surprise. Then she looked up at Valentine and repeated, “No number?!”

At that moment, she did not even know which point she should be more shocked by first.

Was it that Pland had been defined as a “Vision,” or that this Vision actually had no number at all?

The Saints grew restless. Although they were all high-level Clerics from different regions of the Church, and although they all had firm wills and great power, they still could not help falling into confusion at this moment. Low, uneasy discussions sounded all around. Some Saints who knew them better came over to Vanna and Valentine to ask about Pland's current situation.

This left Vanna a little at a loss—compared with the skilled and steady Bishop Valentine, she was still too young.

Fortunately, the commotion only lasted a short while. The Saints gathered on the plaza suddenly fell silent. Vanna looked up and saw the hazy shadows moving aside of one accord. An elegant lady in a splendid priest's robe was walking toward her and Bishop Valentine.

Vanna and Valentine bowed at once: "Your Eminence, Pope."

"No need for so much ceremony."

Helena, the Pope, ruler of the Deep Sea Church and the Storm Goddess's voice in the mortal world, let her gaze fall on Vanna and then on the parchment sheet. "May I have a look?"

"Of course," Vanna said at once. She hurried to hand over the parchment sheet. "Here."

Helena took the parchment sheet and let her eyes sweep over the words. Then she raised her head and looked at Vanna with a faint smile. "Your handwriting is very nice—much better than in your reports."

Vanna froze for a moment. She had not expected the Pope to suddenly bring this up, and then she felt a little embarrassed: "That report… I wrote it in a bit of a hurry. The city-state was rather chaotic at the time…"

"Understandable. The first time I had to write such a long report, I almost wanted to swallow my pen," Helena said with a smile. "That is why the typewriter is a good invention. Why not use it?"

Vanna's tone sounded a bit strange: "…I always break them by accident, and I am not used to them either."

Helena’s smile grew broader. Then she handed the parchment sheet back to Vanna and said casually: “I have already read all the reports you submitted about Pland’s historic corruption incident—including the part about the Vanished. To be honest, after such a huge upheaval, it is not surprising that the city-state of Pland has become something like a ‘Vision.’

“Although the birth of this Vision was unusual, being ‘unusual’ is exactly the nature of Anomalies and Visions.”

As Helena spoke, she paused slightly. Her expression slowly grew serious.

“It is just that… having no number is a bit too ‘unusual.’”

Chapter 259: After the Coin Flipped

Ever since Vision 004 delivered the first “list” to the world, every Anomaly and every Vision had its own number. No matter how their locations shifted or their traits changed, even when some Anomalies and Visions vanished and some transformed into each other, there was always a matching slot for them on that list.

For thousands of years, this rule never changed.

Because of this, people believed that Vision 004 was, in essence, a “focus” that crossed the order of time and space. All Anomalies and Visions, whether from the past or from the future, had already left their marks in this focus—even if they had not yet been born. Their positions had long been decided.

Yet today, this rule was broken.

A Vision without a number had appeared before the world.

What was even more disturbing was that this Vision was called “Pland”—the pearl of the Boundless Sea, the busiest stop on the sea trade network, and the largest gathering of believers of the Deep Sea Church.

But for some reason, Vanna kept feeling that the calm and reserved Pope in front of her did not seem very worried. When Helena saw that Pland had become a Vision, she was only a little surprised. She even seemed more concerned about the fact that “Pland had no number” than about “Pland becoming a Vision” at all.

Vanna looked at the Pope with some nervousness. Helena was thinking about something. After a few minutes of heavy silence that felt almost suffocating, Helena suddenly raised her head: “Since that ‘disaster,’ how has Pland been?”

“Order in the city-state is being restored. Everyone who died because of the historic corruption, and every damaged place, has been restored—of course, that does not include the people who truly died eleven years ago,” Bishop Valentine said at once. “We checked every corner of the city-state, including every sewer, every factory, every machine, and even every pipe. We did not find any trace of supernatural distortion. The city-state is in a… very, very ‘normal’ state. Oh, except for…”

“Except for the matter with the fries, right?” Helena said calmly. “I saw that in the report.”

Vanna looked a little embarrassed: “It did feel a bit strange to write that in the report…”

“Not strange. After an supernatural incident, every clue should be taken seriously,” Helena said, her face calm. Her eyes fell on Vanna. “Then what about you, Saint Vanna—have you felt that anything is wrong?”

Vanna grew nervous without thinking. She had guessed the Pope would ask her this sooner or later. After all, she had written everything in her report, except the part about her shaken faith.

“I… actually do not feel anything special,” Vanna said. “I have no mental corruption, no Cognitive Distortion. Bishop Valentine even helped me run several tests. The conclusion was that it was just a simple ‘connection.’”

Helena gently clenched her fist and rested it under her chin, as if thinking seriously for a moment. Then she suddenly spoke to the Saints gathered nearby: “Everyone, disperse for now—I have some things to discuss with the two Saints from Pland.”

The shadowy figures on the plaza did not hesitate. They all bowed to the Pope and then faded away one after another. In less than half a minute, the vast meeting place held only Helena, Vanna, and Valentine.

“You are a bit nervous, young Saint—relax a little.”

When the area was quiet, Helena turned to Vanna and spoke with a smile. “You walk on the right path. The Goddess’s favor and grace for you remain as always. You do not need to feel uneasy just because you have touched some ‘dangerous’ power. As defenders of order, dealing with all kinds of dangerous powers is exactly our duty, is it not?”

Vanna took a light breath and tried to keep her voice as calm as possible: “…It is just as you say.”

Helena nodded and turned her eyes to Bishop Valentine: “I saw a point mentioned in your reports. You think that the famous ‘Captain Duncan’ has already regained his reason and humanity, and that there is a chance to communicate with him?”

“Strictly speaking, it is not just that there is a chance to communicate. We are already building that communication—though the start of this matter was not in our plan,” Valentine said with a slight nod, his voice deep. “We still do not know why that ghost captain is especially focused on Pland’s situation, and why he chose Vanna as his contact. But up to now, he has not shown any hostility toward the civilized world.”

“The Vanished’s flames once burned across the entire city-state?” Helena asked.

Valentine nodded again: “Yes. Those flames drove out the historic corruption created by the Heretics and reset the city-state to its state before the corruption.”

“…You could also say that those flames corrupted the entire city-state and corrupted it into a state of never having been corrupted.”

Helena fixed her gaze on Valentine’s eyes and spoke in a steady tone: “On this matter, the line between ‘corrupted’ and ‘not corrupted’ is already very blurred.”

Valentine exchanged a glance with Vanna without thinking.

Right after that, they heard Helena’s voice continue: “This may be the reason Pland became a ‘Vision.’ The parchment sheet did not mention the exact traits of this new Vision, but we can boldly describe it like this:

“Vision Pland: a city completely burned by Subspace flame. Duncan Abnomar’s power shaped this Vision into a normal form. Its distortion lies in the fact that it twisted its own distortion. The whole city-state runs as if it had never suffered corruption. The only fact left by the corruption is that the corruption really did happen.”

Helena stopped and quietly set her gaze on the two Saints before her.

“A coin that was heads up flipped once in the air and landed with heads up again.”

Vanna opened her mouth, as if she was about to say something, but then she saw the Pope in front of her wave lightly, cutting her off.

“But there is nothing bad about that, Saint Vanna.” Helena spoke gently. “Compared with the twisted shapes that most places in our world show, what does a coin that is still heads up after it flips even count as?

“At least, in fact, Pland still exists. Whether this coin flipped once or countless times… is not something we mortals should worry about.”

For some reason, Vanna kept feeling that there was some deeper meaning hidden in the Pope’s words, but she still could not understand it. She only frowned: “Then how should we announce this news? How should we explain to people that they live inside a huge Vision—and still let them live normal lives after they learn this fact?”

“A shocking fact born from a great change should either never be announced, or be announced while the echo of that change is still there and people are most able to accept it,” Helena said in a low voice. “Right now, the citizens of Pland should still not be fully out of the shadow of that disaster. They have not fully sunk back into calm daily life… so announce it as usual.

“But pay attention to mental guidance. Let people understand how very special this ‘Vision’ is—not all Visions are dangerous. Always remember, our world has survived to this day because it still lives under the light of Vision 001.”

“Yes,” Bishop Valentine said, lowering his head. “I will discuss this with City Hall and see how to release this news in the safest way.”

Helena nodded. Her eyes swept over Vanna without meaning to, and she said: “There are also some other matters.”

Vanna and Valentine answered at once: “Please give us your orders.”

Helena thought for a moment: “…They are not that urgent. We will talk about them in detail when we meet in person.”

At first Vanna did not react. Two seconds later, she suddenly realized something: “Meet in person… you mean you are going to…?”

“The great Storm Cathedral has sailed around for many years. It is about time for it to come to shore once,” Helena said, smiling at Vanna. “Make some preparations. The great Storm Cathedral will arrive in Pland within a week—then I can use my own eyes to see what shape this coin looks like after it has flipped.”

The two Saints left.

In the vast meeting place, only Helena’s figure remained.

But only half a minute later, faint flickering lights appeared in the nearby darkness. Then Banster, the tall, thin, aged leader of the Death Church, and Rune, the kindly faced and slightly plump head of the Truth Academy, walked out from the dark and came to stand before Helena.

Banster first turned his head to glance in the direction where Vanna had just left. Then he turned his gaze back to the Pope of the Deep Sea: “It is her? She does not… look very special.”

“But the ruler of the storm chose her,” Helena said calmly. “That is the Goddess’s will.”

Rune, with his rounder figure and kind face, thought for a moment. There was curiosity in his voice: “But why would the ruler of the storm choose her?”

“…No one can guess the storm’s intent.” Helena shook her head lightly and then changed the subject. “Let us not talk about that. Let us first discuss the information that Vision 004 released this time—a Vision with no number. That is far more puzzling than the Vision itself.”

Chapter 260: The Cathedral Ark

In the wide, dim assembly hall, the three Church leaders fell silent at the same time.

After who knew how long, the Servitor of the God of Death, Pope Banster, finally spoke softly: “The law of Anomalies and Visions going off pattern – there will always be Anomalies or Visions that do not follow the rules.”

“Clause Zero is indeed useful, but we cannot use Clause Zero recklessly,” the short, plump, kindly Rune shook his head. “We cannot throw Clause Zero at everything we cannot understand. That would numb us when a real danger appears, and we would miss our chance.”

“You mean… the information from Vision 004 has a problem?” Banster tilted his head slightly. “Vision Pland did not actually lack a number. Its number is simply hidden?”

“Or it may be an entirely new naming scheme,” Rune said in thought. “Vision 004 and Vision Pland themselves have no problem. We just cannot yet understand this new way of naming Visions. The things that happened in Pland lately are very unusual. It is a city-state corrupted by history and then ‘saved’ by the power of the Subspace. Nothing like that has ever happened before…”

“I do not like ‘new mechanisms’,” Banster shook his head, his voice low. “New mechanisms mean new factors we cannot control. We have already sacrificed too much to figure out how the world runs… and this world keeps changing.”

“No one likes them, but the world has always been this cold,” Rune shrugged, then his eyes fell on Helena. “I hope you can gain something in Pland. Use your own eyes to see what really happened to that city-state.”

Helena did not speak for a moment. She only nodded lightly. She seemed to fall into thought. After a long time, she suddenly broke the silence: “There is one more thing. You must have noticed it too – the problem with Vision 001.”

Rune’s expression grew serious. This old man who served the God of Wisdom rarely had such a tense face. “Yes. The Sun-Watching Tower has confirmed that the rune ring at the edge of the Sun… really suffered damage. The missing part is only a small piece of the whole rune structure, but that piece is indeed gone. I am still sending people to watch the state of Vision 001 at all times, but so far we have not seen the rune ring break any further – yet there are no signs of it repairing itself either.”

“In all regions, we have not found any unusual moves from the Suntists,” Banster spoke right after. “I also first suspected that this matter was related to them, but from the intelligence we have now, those Sun heretics themselves do not seem to have noticed the change in Vision 001 yet.”

“That still does not prove this has nothing to do with the ‘Creeping Sun Wheel’,” Helena said in a low voice. “The Creeping Sun Wheel is one of the oldest beings in this world, and those Sun heretics at best are only mold growing under its influence. Their connection with their own deity is not as close as they like to believe.”

“We will keep watching those cultists and the ‘Sun spawn’ behind them,” Banster said slowly. “And those Enders as well… No matter what, what happened in Pland must not happen again.”

Helena nodded slightly. Then she saw light and shadow ripple in the darkness as the figures of the two popes grew faint and dissolved into nothing.

She turned back and glanced at the place where the Nameless King's tomb had sunk. Then her own figure slowly faded from the assembly hall as well.

The next second, Helena opened her eyes in the Mortal Realm.

She stepped out of the secret chamber, and two attendants came forward. Helena waved a hand, signaling the attendants to leave on their own. Then she walked alone through the long corridor toward the upper deck of the Cathedral Ark.

A towering Cathedral sailed across a vast, dim sea. Its three spires and its many tall towers and bell towers pointed straight at the sky, their tops lost in drifting mist. The lower half of the Cathedral Ark was heavy armor, huge pipes, and rough mechanical structures that connected to the deck area.

An ark-like giant ship, its lower half an iron fortress, its upper half a holy Cathedral – this was the true headquarters of the Deep Sea Church, the "Great Storm Cathedral" that patrolled the Boundless Sea.

Helena walked out from a corridor covered in sacred reliefs and stepped onto a terrace on the upper deck. She quietly looked down at the towering wonder of engineering beneath her feet.

This Cathedral was actually quite new. In fact, the hull had been finished only thirty-five years ago, and its upper structures had been completely built just twenty years ago. Scholars from the Academy of Truth helped design the Cathedral Ark's vast power system and complex control mechanisms. At least so far, all of it was running very well.

Before this Cathedral Ark was finished, the Great Storm Cathedral had been much smaller than it was now, and its cruising endurance on the Boundless Sea had been much shorter.

The Storm Goddess did not mind her believers using the help of other faiths to build her holy sanctuary. None of the Four Gods minded such things.

In fact… the Four Gods did not care about anything that happened in the mortal world at all.

Helena took a slow breath and looked at the thin mist around the Cathedral Ark. That veil of mist and the murky, dark texture of the surrounding water showed that the whole ark was sailing in the gap between the Mortal Realm and the Spirit Realm. From this position, most ordinary ships sailing on the Boundless Sea could not see any trace of the Great Storm Cathedral.

After quietly standing in the cold wind for a while, Helena reached out and took from her side a piece of wood that had been carefully carved by hand into the shape of a wave.

She silently recited the name of the Storm Goddess Gamona and threw the wave-shaped charm amulet, carved from “Sea-Breath Wood”, far out into the sea.

“The faith of the Saint you are watching has already begun to waver,” Helena’s divine gaze rested on the spot where the charm amulet hit the water, and she spoke softly, as if to herself. “But her human side does not seem stained – she is still human.”

The waves rose and fell gently. It was as if invisible whispers sounded softly within the murmur of the sea. Helena tilted her head and listened for a long time, then nodded slightly: “So this is good enough… yes, I understand.”

After rolling and bobbing on the surface for a long time, the Sea-Breath Wood charm amulet flipped once and sank silently into the Boundless Sea.

Pland, inside the antique shop.

The morning sunlight was just right. Bright sunlight shone through the freshly wiped shop window onto the shelves of all heights, so that the fake antiques on the shelves seemed to be coated with a faint layer of gold. Nina hummed a cheerful tune in a minor key as she happily wiped the “goods” on the shelves. From time to time she peeked out to look at the few figures by the counter.

Alice and Shirley sat there, frowning over a stack of letter cards. Dog hid in the shadows beside the counter, holding a pencil in his paws and trying to copy the word list from memory.

Nina found it a very strange thing. To this day she still did not understand how Dog managed to hold a pencil with his paws.

After almost falling asleep for the third time, Shirley let out a huge yawn and put the letter cards in her hand down on the counter. She looked up at Alice, who was still completely focused: “Aren’t you sleepy at all?”

“I’m not sleepy,” Alice raised her head and answered honestly. “I don’t know what ‘sleepy’ feels like – I only sleep when it’s time to sleep.”

“…I’m really curious what it feels like to be a doll with a soul,” Shirley muttered. Then she carefully looked around and, like a thief, glanced up toward the second floor before lowering her voice. “Hey, why hasn’t Mr. Duncan come down today… and when I saw him this morning he also looked very preoccupied.”

Alice put aside the letter card she had just memorized, picked up another one she had already forgotten, and started again. Absent-mindedly, she said: “He’s thinking about the secrets in the Deep Sea.”

“Thinking about the secrets in the Deep Sea?” Shirley froze for a moment. “What do you mean?”

“I don’t know. That’s what he said,” Alice gave a small shake of her head. “Why don’t you go ask him? He should be happy to teach you a few things…”

Shirley opened her mouth and was just about to say something when she suddenly heard Dog’s panicked voice coming from the shadows beside the counter: “If you want to get yourself killed, don’t drag me along!”

“I never said I was going to ask,” Shirley glared in the direction of the voice. “I haven’t even finished my alphabet yet…”

She had only said half the sentence when a crisp jingle of a brass bell suddenly sounded from the door.

Dog vanished without a trace at once. Alice smoothly set the letter cards aside and looked up toward the door: “Welcome. May I… Eh? Mr. Morris?”

It was Morris who had come so early in the morning. The old scholar wore a dark winter coat and a thick bowler hat, and tucked under his arm was a hefty-looking old book. After he came in, he first greeted Alice and Shirley by the counter, then looked toward Nina, who was tidying the shelves nearby: “Is Mr. Duncan here?”

“He’s upstairs,” Nina nodded, looking curiously at the old gentleman. “Do you need something from him?”

“I think I’ve found the origin of that symbol,” Morris said happily, lifting the old book he had brought. “It’s unbelievable. It actually appeared in a document about the ancient kingdom of Critt – and in such an inconspicuous place!”

Chapter 261: The Mysterious Symbol

Nina was just about to run upstairs to call him when Duncan appeared on the stairs.

He had heard the noise from downstairs.

“Mr. Duncan,” Morris came to the foot of the stairs and looked up at the “captain” who was gazing down. “I found that symbol you showed me in a document on the ancient kingdom of Critt… or at least something very close to it.”

Duncan noticed the faint bloodshot in Morris’s eyes and his slightly swollen eyelids. Clearly, the old scholar had put in a great deal of effort to find these materials. Yet there was also a trace of excited light in Morris’s eyes, and his spirit seemed abnormally bright. It was the look one only had when deep in research and finally gaining results.

Duncan glanced at Nina, Alice, and the others downstairs and gave a small nod: “You look after the shop.”

Then he looked at Morris: “Come upstairs and tell me.”

The old gentleman, still clutching the big book, stepped onto the stairs. The old wooden steps creaked under his feet. He followed Duncan to the master bedroom on the second floor – this was his first time in this place.

By the standards of a dwelling for a Subspace shadow, this bedroom seemed a bit plain. But considering Mr. Duncan’s special “hobby” of playing the mortal, this simple room actually looked quite normal.

Morris carefully controlled his movements, satisfying his curiosity without making any extra probing. Duncan pulled over two chairs from the side and motioned for the old gentleman to put the big book on the desk by the window.

“Tell me what you found,” Duncan said after he sat down. “What does that symbol actually stand for?”

“As for its meaning… I still have no clue for now. I only found what is most likely its source,” Morris steadied himself, opened the valuable-looking volume, and turned to a page marked with a bookmark. “Do you see this spot? It appears here.”

Duncan frowned slightly. On that page was a picture, a finely drawn hand illustration showing part of a large building that looked like the main gate of a palace. The symbol with the hexagonal frame and the shattered cross structure appeared in the relief above the gate, at the very center of the whole image.

As for the content of the relief itself… it seemed to be just patterns whose meaning could not be seen.

Just as Morris had said downstairs, the symbol was in a very inconspicuous place. It was only a small decorative detail in the illustration, taking up less than a tenth of the whole picture, and it had not been specially marked.

It was really impressive that Morris could find this book among piles of documents and then find this tiny corner inside it.

“I had a vague impression of it, like something I glimpsed a very long time ago. Thanks to the divine blessing of the God of Wisdom, that ‘impression’ could still work today and let me find this ‘little thing’,” Morris explained. “This illustration is a copy. Its original first appeared in a study on architectural ruins of the ancient kingdom of Critt. That document is not in Pland at the moment, but I believe some of my friends in the academic circles can help a bit…”

“Of course, even without the original, the material recorded in this book is still very useful. It says that this hand illustration shows a lost ruin that once stood in the border seas. The ruin was on a nameless barren island, and that island mysteriously vanished into a thick fog around New City-State Calendar year 223. Before it vanished completely, several expeditions managed to land there and examined the form and age of the ruins. They confirmed it was a product of the ancient kingdom era of Critt. Judging from the surface patterns and reliefs on the buildings, the whole facility should have been some large complex with both academic and religious meaning…”

As Morris spoke, he pointed to the written description on the page next to the illustration. On the slightly yellowed pages, Duncan could see notes the old scholar had written years ago.

“Reliefs with hard, deep lines and the large number of diamond shapes in the patterns are features of the architecture of the ancient kingdom of Critt. They favored heavy lines and a style that felt powerful. The main bodies of their palaces and buildings were mostly various rectangular prisms or pyramid shapes. This structure fits those features perfectly…”

As he listened to Morris’s explanation, Duncan slowly let his gaze move over the pictures and the lines of text. His attention returned to the hexagonal pattern at the center of the relief above the main gate, and his brows furrowed slightly: “There is no specific explanation about this symbol.”

“…Sadly, this document is only a general introduction. It does not go into detailed analysis of every detail in the ruin,” Morris shook his head. “But that is only to be expected. The ancient kingdom of Critt is ten thousand years in the past. The ruins it left are few and mostly badly damaged. Add to that the loss or ‘corruption’ of all kinds of materials, and the knowledge left for later generations to study is already fragmented. It would be very hard to find an article written just to study some pattern on a single gate from that ancient kingdom…”

“An academic or religious facility, a badge at the entrance…” Duncan rubbed his chin in thought. “Why would a group of ‘ascetics’ living ten thousand years later carry a charm amulet from the ancient kingdom era of Critt?”

He turned his head and looked at Morris. “Do you think it is possible that there are ‘Critt descendants’ who have passed down a bloodline for ten thousand years?”

“…Someone once said that a careful scholar should not blindly deny any possibility, no matter how small the chance. But from my own point of view, I really think this is impossible.”

Morris spoke cautiously while thinking.

“A group like those ascetics, likely very few in number and acting in extreme secrecy, would have had to survive the great chaos after the fall of the ancient kingdom, live through the Age of Strife and the old city-state wars, and pass their line down for a full ten thousand years without ever breaking and without being discovered… If that possibility is true, then I would rather believe they are a secret cult founded only in recent times. They may have happened to discover some ancient documents or similar ruins and then took some symbol from the Critt period as their own mark. That possibility is still higher.”

Duncan listened to the old gentleman’s thoughts and only gave a noncommittal grunt, then let his eyes move over the lines of text again.

In the material, some passages were clearly quotations from the original document. They recorded the scattered words left by the explorers who had gone there more than a thousand years ago:

“…It stands in the center of the island. The main building and its surrounding annexes almost fill the whole island. It feels as if the island exists only for this structure…”

“…The main material of the structure looks like stone, but it is tougher than stone, with a pale color. A soldier tried to chip off one of the wall bricks with an ice axe and only succeeded after using great force… When the axe struck the brick it gave off exaggerated sparks, and the broken surface of the brick had a silver-gray sheen.

“There are several small islands near the main one, all very desolate. The plants are sparse, and even insects are rarely seen… There are no remains of any buildings. Perhaps there were some once, but they were too small and have been eaten by time…

“…On the evening of the third day, while the launch circled the island, we found that a collapsed section which had been above the water was somehow already submerged, yet there was no sign of a rising tide… Fog began to gather over the nearby sea. The priest had a bad feeling. After offering benediction to the God of Death Bartok and seeking revelation, he advised that we leave the island at once.”

Duncan looked straight at the end of this quotation and saw that the author of the document had recorded this:

“On the seventh day after this expedition withdrew, the thick fog cleared. Another team reached that sea area, but could no longer find the nameless island.”

Duncan could not help feeling a little regret.

“So it was swallowed by the fog just like that…” he sighed softly. “It sounds like the result of a border collapse.”

“It does look that way – but back then, the Holy beacon technology had not yet matured, and there were no precise means of observation. Several Anomaly phenomena, including border collapse and the ‘fog-eating’ phenomenon, were very easy to mix up.”

“The Fog-Eating Phenomenon…” Duncan searched his memory for a moment and found the relevant knowledge. He had been cramming this kind of common sense from books recently. “If it really was the Fog-Eating Phenomenon, then this island might briefly show itself again in similar thick fog later. But it seems no records of that sort were ever passed down.”

“That’s true. But it’s also possible the related records were simply lost.”

Duncan made a sound in response and, almost without thinking, let his fingers brush over the illustration, over the tiny shattered cross mark on it.

“In this drawing… there shouldn’t be any chance that the copyist ‘added things as he liked’, right?” he asked suddenly, uneasy.

“I don’t think so,” Morris answered at once. “This is very rigorous academic material. The artist who drew the illustration and the scholar who compiled the original document were both respected authorities known for their care. When they left these records, they would rather leave unclear parts as they were for later generations than make ‘extra touches’ without evidence. Or, to put it another way, even if they did make adjustments, they would certainly explain the situation in the notes.”

“So it can be trusted as real…”

Duncan murmured this softly, lost in thought.

Chapter 262: Captain Duncan’s Gift

In the hefty volume that Morris had brought, only a tiny section had anything to do with that mysterious symbol. Even there, the symbol was just a very inconspicuous detail. The author of the document did not spend a single word explaining the symbol or the relief patterns around it.

Duncan and Morris could only analyze the details shown in the manuscript’s illustrations. They tentatively decided that the Shattered Cross enclosed in a hexagonal outline was a religious symbol, or an academic emblem, from the Ancient Kingdom Era.

Duncan slowly closed the big book.

From a rational point of view, Morris judged that the ascetics who had visited the Vanished a century ago could not be descendants of the Ancient Kingdom. The chance that a group of hermits had kept a ten-thousand-year lineage alive through the chaotic, dangerous era of the Deep Sea was almost zero. From a strict academic standpoint, he could not make that kind of assumption without more evidence.

Yet Duncan still felt, on instinct, that those ascetics had to be closely connected to the ancient kingdom of Critt. They held that mysterious badge and treasured it, which meant they knew what it signified.

Of course, a guess was only a guess. Without evidence, it was all empty talk. For now, unless that group of ascetics appeared before Duncan again, no one would ever figure out where they came from.

Duncan suddenly looked up and asked: “How many Critt ruins that have been found and are still preserved reasonably well are left in the world now?”

“There are very, very few ruins that have been found. You can count them on one hand. As for those that are preserved ‘well’… that depends on what you mean by ‘well’,” Morris said. “For people who study the Ancient Kingdom, finding a big pit that can be confirmed to be related to Critt, or finding wall bricks more than ten meters long still joined together, or even just a few stone doors fallen on the ground, all of that already counts as being preserved very well.”

At this point, the old scholar could not help letting out a soft sigh: “Under normal circumstances, ruins left within a city-state’s territory almost never survive. We do our best to keep written and visual records of them, to describe and record every tiny detail. Then we store any objects that can be studied inside research facilities. In the end… the ruins themselves are leveled, filled in, and turned into part of the city.”

Duncan thought for a moment and murmured to himself: “Land you can stand on is as precious as gold.”

Morris nodded: “We study history. We preserve history. We try to remember what came before as the years pass. But we cannot let the things of the past squeeze out the space we need to live.

“The New City-State Calendar has almost reached two thousand years. In the days when explorers were most active, new islands were still being discovered, and unknown wilderness and ancient ruins kept entering our sight. But in the last one or two centuries, such ‘discoveries’ have almost vanished.

“The ‘new islands’ from back then slowly turned into one city-state after another. There is only so much land to stand on in the Boundless Sea. The few ruins that are left are either on lonely islands where people cannot survive because the environment is too harsh, or they are covered by supernatural forces, or they sit on the edge of dangerous Visions. Even the Four Gods Church can only survey such places a little and then seal them away on the enchanted sea chart."

Duncan stayed silent for a long time, but his attention still fell back on that symbol and the primary document behind it. He asked: "You just said a friend of yours in academia might be able to find more material related to this symbol?"

Morris nodded: "I have a friend in Lunsa who specializes in the history of the Ancient Kingdom. He was my classmate when I studied further at the Truth Institute." Morris pointed at the big book on the table. "He gave me this book many years ago. I remember he also mentioned some related documents back then. I have already written to him, but I do not know when his reply will come."

Duncan let out a breath: "Then we will wait patiently. Let things follow their own course."

After that, he and Morris talked about many more things related to the ancient kingdom of Critt: about those scattered discoveries, those vague and strange legends, those half-true, half-false ancient scrolls that made it impossible to tell whether they belonged to the Mortal Realm or to pure myth.

After this long and pleasant talk between host and guest, it was time for Morris to say goodbye and leave.

"When I left, I promised my wife I would go home for lunch," the old scholar said with a smile on his face. "If I go back too late, I am afraid my wife and my daughter will scold me together for half the day."

Duncan could not help laughing: “It sounds to me like you enjoy it.”

Morris nodded cheerfully, put on his hat, tucked the big book under his arm, and went downstairs with Duncan.

Nina was behind the counter, counting a few banknotes. Alice watched curiously beside her. Shirley had vanished at some point, probably run out to play.

As Duncan came down the stairs, Nina was patiently teaching the clueless Alice about money: “Look, this one with the golden corner mark is a Sola. Here is the face value… These coins are ‘Peso’. The number on the front is the value… And you must not bite them, they are dirty!”

Duncan glanced at the money in Nina’s hand and raised his eyebrows slightly: “Looks like business was decent today. We usually do not have this much.”

“Yes, I don’t know why, but business was really good today,” Nina said happily, waving the banknotes at Duncan. “It seems to have something to do with Alice?”

Duncan froze when he heard that: “Has something to do with Alice?”

“That was what an old madam said when she left just now,” Nina said with a squinting smile. “She said the shop had gained a shop assistant who looked just like the young miss, and it made all the things on the shelves seem real.”

Duncan: “…?”

He silently looked at Alice. Alice stared back at him in confusion.

However, the doll had no idea what was happening. She was still trying hard to remember what the banknotes looked like and to learn how to count money.

“I really did not expect Alice to be able to have this kind of effect here,” Duncan remarked after a while, sounding thoughtful. Then he suddenly turned to Morris: “Do you want to take something with you when you go back?”

“Ah?” Morris was a little surprised. “I… did not have that in mind when I went out…”

“No charge. Think of it as my thanks for your work in searching for the documents,” Duncan said with a smile. He walked over to the counter, reached up to the shelf, and took down a crystal pendant. It was exactly the same as the one he had given Morris earlier as a “free gift”, because he had bought a full crate of this kind of pendant when he stocked the shop. “I remember you mentioned that your daughter’s pendant was damaged. I will give you this one.”

Morris looked at the pendant in Duncan’s hand. The beautiful crystal, a product of modern industry, swung lightly in the air, its surface reflecting shifting lights. Yet the first thing that came to his mind was the incredible story Heidi had told him after she came back:

how she had stayed clear-headed while the city-state crumbled, how she had watched two threads of history split and one of them be wiped out, and how she had been protected by the Amulet.

Only now did he slowly realize that Captain Duncan had already offered his goodwill back then.

That dagger worth three thousand four hundred Sola had been only a trivial gift. The real treasure had almost been overlooked right before his eyes.

Duncan smiled and said: “I hope this charm amulet can keep bringing Miss Heidi good luck. Take it. You have earned it.”

Morris reached out solemnly to take the crystal pendant and thanked him. But Duncan seemed to think of something again and muttered, looking thoughtful: “If you only take this pendant back, your daughter will definitely nag you again, and this time your lady will join in. Wait a moment. I will find you something real so you can explain yourself properly to your wife and child when you get home.”

As soon as Morris heard that, he waved his hands again and again: “No need, no need, you really do not have to do this for me…”

But Duncan had already turned away and started rummaging through the pile of odds and ends beside the counter. He did not even look up as he muttered: “No need to say more, I understand… Ah, found it.”

As he spoke, he came back to the counter carrying the “real thing” he had found and dropped it onto the countertop with a heavy bang.

The sudden noise made Alice jump. She quickly reached up to hold her head.

Morris stared, dumbfounded, at the item Duncan had placed on the counter.

“This is…” The old gentleman did not quite understand.

“An antique,” Duncan said with a straight face, looking at the old gentleman in front of him. “There are not many genuine items in my shop, but this one is absolutely authentic.”

“It looks like a cannonball?”

“Yes. From the Vanished. The condition is excellent. If you found a muzzle-loading smoothbore with the right caliber, you could even fire it,” Duncan said happily, patting the big iron ball on the counter. “More importantly, the shell still has the full foundry stamp and the caster’s personal mark on it. Honestly, it is even rarer than that dagger from last time. It is yours.”

Morris looked at the shell, then at Duncan, his expression growing stranger and stranger. For a moment, he truly did not know whether bringing home a cannonball or a glass pendant would be more likely to raise his wife and daughter's blood pressure. But faced with Mr. Duncan's warm, eager smile, he swallowed all his words in the end and calmly accepted this… "gift".

"Thank you… very much for your kindness."

Chapter 263: The Knock

Morris left, still wearing a strange look, carrying a cannonball that had a hundred years of history.

Duncan stood behind the counter and watched the old gentleman's back as he left, a pleased smile on his face.

"You really gave the cannonball to Mr. Morris," Alice muttered beside him.

"You really gave the cannonball to Teacher Morris…" Nina muttered after her.

"I do not like cannonballs," Alice whispered. "I especially do not like them."

Nina asked curiously: "Why?"

Alice said with a very serious face: "Because the captain once gave me eight cannonballs…"

"Stop bringing that up," Duncan's voice suddenly came from the side. He looked helplessly at the resentful Alice and at Nina, whose curiosity was clearly stirred. "Where did Shirley go?"

"She said reciting the alphabet was making her dizzy and she needed to go out and get some fresh air," Nina said, sticking out her tongue. "But I guess by now she has already run off to the next street."

"As expected," Duncan sighed. "With Shirley's level of education and personal manners, it is already amazing that she manages not to swear in front of me every day…"

As he spoke, he turned his head to look out the window. Through the clear shopfront glass, the everyday, peaceful street scene of Pland came into view.

People bustled along the road. The citizens busied themselves with their own lives. The Lower City was still quiet today. The brief malfunction of Visions 001, the tiny chip in the Sun's rune ring that was almost invisible to the naked eye, the Deep Dive operation in the far north that people had already forgotten, the mysterious symbol left by the ancient kingdom of Critt… all of it seemed very far away from this sunlit street.

He narrowed his eyes slightly. After a long time, he murmured to himself: "So Tyrian really is going back early…"

…

At the harbor southeast of the city-state, the huge ironclad warship the Sea Mist was already ready to set sail.

After only a few days of "self-recovery", the warship that had once been badly damaged by the Vanished had now mostly healed. The many wounds and cracks on her armored belt and deck had completely closed, leaving not even a trace of damage. The Undying sailors hurried back and forth between the pier and the ship, carrying aboard the supplies and farewell gifts that Pland had generously provided.

The tall Vanna arrived at the pier to personally see off the captain of the Sea Mist.

"We did not expect you to leave so soon," Vanna said. "The Archbishop was ready for the Sea Mist to stay as our guest for at least two weeks."

Tyrian rubbed his forehead lightly: "I also thought I would stay here for a long time… but some accidents happened. There are some matters in the north that I have to go back and deal with."

This sounded like only an excuse, but Vanna had no interest in digging into the parts others did not want to say. She just looked at Tyrian with some concern, her brows knitting slightly: “Forgive my rudeness… Captain, is your face swollen?”

“A small accident, just a small accident.” Tyrian quickly waved his hand. Inwardly he thought that it was lucky he had had another day to recover. If this Inquisitor had seen him yesterday, he really would not have known how to explain a head that had grown a whole size larger.

Then, as if to keep the awkwardness from dragging on, he hurriedly changed the subject: “My days as a guest in Pland were very pleasant, and I am grateful for your gifts.”

“As long as you like them,” Vanna said with a smile, nodding. Then she looked up with some curiosity at the towering side of the Sea Mist and at the main gun turrets visible from the side. “I had heard about it, but seeing it with my own eyes still feels unbelievable… This ship really ‘healed’ just like that, and even those main guns that had been completely erased have… ‘grown back’?”

Tyrian looked back at his warship. His gaze fell on the three new main guns that had clearly just regrown and still looked a little smaller than the others. A proud smile appeared on his face: “The Sea Mist knows what it is supposed to look like. It always tends to keep itself in the best condition. But those main guns still cannot really be used yet. They are still small. They need to grow for a few more days before they can fire full-charge, standard-caliber shells like the other guns.”

Vanna stared for a moment. She kept feeling that there was something wrong with the way he smiled at his ship’s main guns and the tone he used when he spoke about them, but she could not tell what exactly was wrong…

Luckily, she was not the kind of person who would get stuck on such details.

At three twenty in the afternoon, accompanied by a long, deep whistle of steam, the ironclad warship with its towering bow slowly picked up speed and left the city-state.

Vanna stood on the pier and watched the warship until it slowly turned into an unremarkable black speck on the horizon. Only then did she let out a soft breath, turn around, and get into the black steam car that had been waiting nearby for a long time.

The subordinate in charge of driving lifted his head and glanced at the weary look on the Inquisitor's face in the rearview mirror: "You seem very tired?"

"Things keep coming one after another. Paperwork takes far more effort than fighting heretics with a greatsword," Vanna said as she rolled her shoulders and neck, then slumped down in the back seat without any concern for her image. "And I have also been suffering from insomnia lately."

The steam core gave off a low vibration and hum. Gears and connecting rods began to move briskly. Listening to his commander's complaints, the subordinate could not help smiling: "But at least the city-state has been peaceful lately. No heretics, no monsters, no unlucky people trapped in the veil of night. The Guardians on night patrol have not run into any twisted phenomena inside the veil of night for several days in a row… There is always sunshine after a storm, right?"

Vanna listened to the subordinate's sigh and, after a while, said slowly: "Indeed. The nights lately have been calmer than ever. Even in the Lower City, where the darkness usually hangs the heaviest, and in the sewers, no noises have come from there anymore."

“Isn’t that a good thing?”

“…Of course it is a good thing,” Vanna said softly. Then she shifted her posture on the seat and closed her eyes: “I will take a short nap first. Wake me when we get to the Cathedral.”

“Yes.”

By the time the subordinate answered, Vanna already felt herself slipping into a drowsy, light sleep. The mechanical sounds of the car and the noises outside the windows slowly faded away.

She really was very tired. She had not rested properly for many days.

Order in the city-state had fully returned. All the follow-up work was moving towards its end in an orderly way. The paperwork was finished. The reports to the Cathedral and all the contacts with City Hall had gone smoothly. And behind this “everything going well” lay days and days of exhaustion.

After sending off the Sea Mist, this special “Visitor”, she could finally relax a little.

At least before the Storm Cathedral arrived in Pland and before she had to receive His Eminence the Pope, she should be able to rest for a few days.

A soft night breeze suddenly brushed across her cheek, carrying a faint cool and fresh scent. Along with it came the sound of waves beating against a ship’s hull.

Vanna snapped her eyes open.

She now found herself in a strange room.

Everything she saw was elegant, classical decoration. Gorgeous tapestries hung on the walls, their style like something from the last century. Dark-colored shelves and a wine cabinet stood in the corners. A thick woven carpet covered the center of the room. On the carpet sat a carved sitting table and high-backed chairs, and right now she was sitting in one of those chairs.

Vanna sprang to her feet, then bent her body slightly like a beast about to fight, keeping watch on everything around her.

The next second, she saw the window not far away. The window stood open. When she had fallen asleep it had still been daytime, but now the scene outside showed the veil of night hanging low. The chilly night wind blew in through the window. A cold, clear light spread across the windowsill. In that light she could faintly see the rolling surface of the distant sea and the shimmering reflections on the waves.

The gleam was fine and broken, like quicksilver.

Vanna's gaze fell on the scene outside without her willing it. Then she seemed to notice something, rushed to the window, and lifted her head to look at the sky.

Something… something she could hardly understand appeared there.

It was a glowing round object. It looked like the main body in the center of the Sun, but it was neither dazzling nor burning. Instead, it hung quietly in the sky like a glowing disk that carried a hint of coolness. Faint patterns could be seen on its surface. The whole glowing orb seemed to give off a strange feeling of peace and stillness.

Vanna stared blankly at the eerie glowing orb. For a moment she felt as if her own thoughts had sunk into stillness along with that clear light. Her mind stayed blank for an unknown length of time before a sluggish question finally rose in her head: "What was that?"

Was that the Sun cooled down?

Where had the World's Wound gone?

Then she drew back her gaze and looked around this strange room again.

Where was this place?

Outside was a rolling sea. Around her was a room she did not know. Outside the window was a bizarre sky and a bizarre celestial body. Thinking about everything she had gone through in these last days, the answer did not seem hard to guess.

But this time felt different from before. This time… she did not see that terrifying ghost captain.

Vanna thought this, but as if to answer her thought, in the next second she suddenly felt a presence draw near.

“Knock, knock, knock.”

Someone knocked on the door.

Chapter 264: The Captain’s Warning

To be fair, Vanna had hardly been afraid of anything in her whole life, but Captain Duncan Abnomar always seemed able to bring her all kinds of “unexpected situations”.

The room was sealed inside a dream. Outside the window stretched a boundless dark sea. A strange glowing orb hung high in the sky, and under the silent veil of night, someone knocked on the door.

Vanna almost reacted on instinct. She wanted to call her greatsword into the dream and leap toward the doorway with a heavy chop. Luckily, she held back that impulse at the last second.

“Knock, knock, knock.”

The knocking kept coming, unhurried and steady, full of patience and politeness.

Vanna took several deep breaths. She had no idea what kind of expression she should be wearing, so she simply kept her face tense and tried to make her voice sound normal: “Please come in.”

With a soft click, the handle turned. The dark wooden door was pushed open from outside. A very tall, imposing figure appeared before Vanna and stepped into the room.

Behind that figure there was only pure darkness, like the very edge of the dream—and beyond that edge, nothing at all existed, only void.

Duncan walked into the room and gave Vanna a friendly smile: “Good afternoon, Vanna—this time I did knock.”

Vanna said nothing. She just watched the ghost captain walk in. She watched him go to the liquor cabinet by himself, take out a bottle and two glasses, then slowly walk to the table and sit down in one of the armchairs.

“Not coming over to sit?” Duncan raised his eyebrows and glanced at the young Inquisitor still standing by the window. He gestured toward the empty seat across from him. “The look on your face is not very good.”

Vanna hesitated for a moment, then finally walked over with a strange expression. She sat down carefully while watching him pour the drink. After a long pause, she sighed: “Do you not think this is actually even more frightening?”

“Is it?” Duncan looked at Vanna with some surprise. Then he glanced around at the dream he had spent quite a while setting up—the warm, everyday furniture, and the glass in his hand that was meant to show friendliness. Not very sure of himself, he frowned. “Then next time I can try a brighter color scheme…”

“I do not think it is a color problem…” Vanna felt even her eyebrows twitch. But then something came to mind, and she sighed with a helpless little smile. “All right, at least I can tell I really did feel your ‘goodwill’… This goodwill is a bit scary, but I can more or less believe it is real.”

Duncan pushed a glass toward her: “Sounds like a good thing.”

“Thank you.” Vanna took the glass and looked at the clear liquid with its faint golden?red tint. She hesitated for a long time, then set it aside for now. After that she raised her eyes and looked at the captain across from her: “This is another dream—is this one of the rooms on the Vanished?”

“It is based on one of them, but not completely. I arranged it according to my own taste,” Duncan said slowly. “I am actually not very good at Dreamweaving. I prefer to enter an existing dream directly. But you were sleeping very uneasily. Your dreams were broken and chaotic, so I prepared a place where you can rest properly.”

Vanna did not care much about Duncan’s last sentence. She turned her head to glance out the window and asked the biggest question in her mind: “That glowing thing in the sky outside… what is it? Is that also one of your ‘personal tastes’?”

Duncan fell silent for a moment. His gaze turned to the window. Under the pale light he stayed quiet for a long time before he sighed softly and shook his head: “You can say that. I do not really like the pale, icy glow of the World’s Wound. It is not gentle, and it feels full of malice. As for what you see now… you can call it the ‘Moon’.”

“‘Moon’…” Vanna slowly repeated the strange word that sounded like it was taken straight from some unknown language. “That is a very awkward name to say.”

“You are interested in it?” Duncan looked at Vanna with a faint, amused smile. “Then I can tell you the story behind that name…”

Before he even finished, Vanna shivered all over and sat up straight: “No! Thank you!”

“…All right, it is always like this.” Duncan shrugged, not really bothered. “They are only very ordinary things. They have nothing at all to do with Subspace.”

“Sorry. I do believe you are very friendly, but… just think of me as cowardly,” Vanna said awkwardly. After so many meetings and the chain of events they had gone through, her wariness and guarded attitude toward this ghost captain had already changed quite a bit without her noticing. But even so, from a logical, rational point of view, Vanna still did not dare to listen lightly to ‘knowledge’ coming from the mouth of this man who had returned from Subspace. “Let us talk about something else instead. Why did you come to me?”

“Two things.” Duncan met Vanna’s eyes with his gaze. “First, I want to thank you all for taking care of Tyrian these last two days. It seems he had a rather pleasant stay in Pland.”

“Captain Tyrian?” Vanna’s heart jumped. She suddenly realized something. “So you have been watching this whole time…”

“Yes, I have been watching this matter,” Duncan said, his tone full of feeling. “He wandered in the north for many years and picked up bad pirate habits. Most of the time he only has a group of undying sailors for company. His social habits are very unhealthy. And because of that old business in Frostholm, you cannot help worrying about his mental state. To keep him from turning into a reclusive, bitter cynic, he needs some healthy and orderly relationships…”

Duncan was basically just making things up as he spoke. He only wanted to further shape his image as someone who had “regained humanity, reason, and clarity”, so it would be easier to deal with Vanna and the “orderly civilization” behind her. But Vanna did not take this as nonsense. She sat there stunned, listening to this ghost captain ramble like an old Father lecturing his child. After a long while she finally squeezed out a sentence: “You… actually care about him a lot…”

Duncan stayed serious: “Family members caring for each other is the first step to maintaining harmony in the family.”

“…But you almost blew the Sea Mist into a pile of scrap iron,” Vanna reminded him carefully.

Duncan kept the same serious face: “Proper discipline and mental guidance are the second step.”

Vanna: “…”

Weird, off, and full of strangeness—Vanna felt more and more that her conversation with Captain Duncan was filled with an indescribable sense of oddness. Yet somehow, in the middle of this strange and mismatched talk, she truly felt… that this ghost captain was becoming more “flesh and blood”.

She had to shake her head and push this sudden thought aside for now: “Then what is the second thing you mentioned?”

“The second thing,” Duncan straightened his expression and became a little more serious, “is about the Sun—have you noticed the change in it?”

At some point, the sound of the waves outside the window had grown quieter, like distant murmurs. The breeze blowing into the room also became faint and thin.

When she heard him mention the Sun, Vanna’s eyes changed a little: “Do you mean the sunrise that was delayed by fifteen minutes, or…”

“The outer rune ring. There is a gap in it,” Duncan said. “From the look on your face, you all noticed it too.”

Vanna stayed silent for two or three seconds, then nodded lightly: “It is hard not to notice. Even though it is a flaw barely visible to the naked eye, for thousands of years there have always been watchful eyes on the running of Vision 001. The Church noticed this disturbing change at once.”

“The Guardians never relax… that makes my opinion of you a bit better,” Duncan said, then suddenly asked, “What do you all think about it?”

“…That depends on what feedback the Storm Cathedral gives,” Vanna replied in a strict, by?the?book tone. “Here in Pland, we can only report what we have observed. We are not a research facility, and we cannot think of any way to intervene in the running of Vision 001.”

She paused to think, then shook her head slightly, not very sure: “Maybe even the Storm Cathedral will not give any clear feedback. Vision 001… its running affects the whole world, and its abnormal state has alarmed more than just the Deep Sea Church.”

While she spoke, Vanna seemed to realize something and raised her head to look at Duncan: “You suddenly came to talk to me about this. Does that mean you know something? Do you know what went wrong with Vision 001?”

Duncan did not answer right away.

He could not help recalling that short, strange dream he had once had.

In that dream, gigantic glowing orbs fell like a meteor shower. The whole world slowly sank into darkness. In the sky there was only terrifying, dreadful darkness left, shaped like a hollow… or like a dying eyeball.

At the time, he had not understood anything from that dream. But now it felt as if he had glimpsed a trace of a prophetic vision in it.

“Even I cannot be sure, Vanna,” he finally broke the silence and calmly met Vanna’s eyes again, his gaze steady. “But I think this is only the beginning.”

A chill slowly spread across her back. Vanna felt she had seen something extremely disturbing in his eyes: “Only the beginning?”

“I still do not have enough proof, but I suspect that Vision 001 actually has a ‘service life’,” Duncan said solemnly. “What the ancient kingdom of Critt left to later generations was not an eternal shelter, but only temporary peace. The Sun above our heads… is very likely about to break down.

“As for when the proof of this will arrive…”

Duncan paused for a moment, then said slowly:

“Maybe huge fragments will fall from the sky, and that will be the ticking of the countdown.

“More likely, the first fragment has already fallen, only it fell outside the sight of the civilized world.”

Cold and unease spread in her heart. Vanna lowered her eyes a little to hide all the changes in them. Her hand slowly picked up the glass beside her, and she raised it to her lips without thinking, as if she wanted to use the alcohol to steady her mood.

She took a sip, frowned a little, and looked up at Duncan: “There is no taste…”

“Of course there is no taste,” Duncan laughed and raised his glass to her in a small toast. “Because you are about to wake up.”

Vanna’s eyes flew open.

She was still sitting in the moving steam car. The tall tower and main building of the Cathedral had appeared in her view.

She panted slightly and heard her subordinate’s voice coming from the front: “Ah, you are awake. Perfect timing, we are almost at the Cathedral.”

Chapter 265: The Sea Witch and the Frontier Relic

A faint golden light spread out and covered the entire sea, filling every part of the space around the Radiant Star.

This oddly shaped magic warship sailed forward wrapped in light. The front half of the hull was running at full power. The paddle wheels on both sides thundered. Many magic devices fixed on the deck kept projecting flickering light grids into the air around them. These devices, all designed personally by the Sea Witch, kept scanning the surroundings during the voyage to collect important data.

The back half of the ship was hazy like mist. It looked like the phantom hull of a ghost ship, sometimes solid, sometimes almost transparent. The ghostly structure faded in and out with the rise and fall of the surrounding light. Many ghost?like sailors moved about on that half?transparent deck. They watched the depth of the Spirit Realm while making sure the Radiant Star itself stayed stable.

The crew on the front half and the back half of the ship were clearly divided. Each group had its own work and only talked or moved between the two sides when it was necessary.

Lucretia stood at the very front of the ship, on the top deck that was in its “blooming” state. This place was like an open terrace. It had the best view on the whole ship and let her see the state of the sea very clearly.

Two thick chains extended from the middle of the Radiant Star. They stretched back over the gently heaving sea and wrapped around a huge stone sphere floating dozens of meters behind the stern.

That stone sphere floated several meters above the surface of the sea. It looked weightless, yet the creaking of the chains from time to time, and the fact that the Radiant Star was moving very slowly even with its power at full output, both proved that dragging this thing was far from easy.

Lucretia watched that stone sphere for a long time before pulling her gaze back and rubbing her eyes.

The endless halo around the stone sphere was not actually harsh on the eyes, but staying under this boundless radiance for a long time still made them a bit uncomfortable. The mysterious bumps and grooves on the surface of the stone sphere were even more dizzying if she stared at them for too long.

Aside from this slight dizziness, however, the stone sphere and the surrounding light mist seemed to have no other harm. Looking at them with a gaze did not damage the mind, and moving closer did not bring any eerie, terrifying whispers. For a strange relic picked up on the frontier, this was very unusual.

Lucretia had wandered on the frontier for many years. She had seen many things that could easily lead mortals into madness. Compared to those, this stone sphere that projected gigantic geometric illusions was truly the safest oddity among all the Frontier Relics.

Footsteps came from the side, and the voice of the clockwork automaton Lunie sounded: “Mistress, there is a report from the boiler room. The engine power cannot be increased any more. This is already the top speed.”

“…Not even one third of our normal cruising speed,” Lucretia sighed. “This big ball looks like it is just floating, but dragging it is really this hard.”

“It is very strange,” Lunie tilted her head, making a confused expression like a human. “We tried all sorts of methods, but we still cannot measure its exact mass.”

“At least we can still drag it. We are slow, but we will tow it back in the end.”

As Lucretia spoke, she turned to look at the bow. Because the chains were only so long, the Radiant Star was now sailing inside the gigantic geometric form projected by the stone sphere. Outside the bow there was only endless radiance. She could not see a normal sea at all.

But she was not worried the ship would lose its way, nor that it would hit reefs or islands.

The stern of the Radiant Star was sailing in the Spirit Realm, and the Spirit Realm was not affected by the stone sphere. Her Ghost sailors on the stern lookout posts and in the enchanted sea chart room could observe the sea conditions and guide the route, making sure the Radiant Star stayed on the correct course.

For ordinary ships this would be unthinkable, but for the Mistress of the Radiant Star, this was something she handled with ease.

“Has Lightwind Harbor received our message?” Lucretia asked with a slight turn of her head. “How did they respond?”

“They have received it,” Lunie answered right away. “A research team made up of a mathematician, a Rune Scholar, and an Occult Specialist is already prepared at the harbor, and people from the Explorer Association are there as well. But I also told them that the Radiant Star is very slow right now, so they will have to wait for a while…”

“It is more than just waiting a while.” Lucretia looked at the golden light covering the sea and could not help pressing her lips together. “Tell them this time I did not find some little trinket—its body is small, but its range of effect is huge.

“Have them choose a proper handover point in the Nearshore Waters, at least two or three nautical miles from the harbor. Otherwise they will have to be ready for the whole harbor district to be covered in endless daytime.”

Lunie lowered her head a bit: “Yes, Mistress. We will pass a lighthouse facility in fifteen minutes. When we do, I will send another telegram to Lightwind Harbor.”

Lucretia made a quiet sound of agreement. Then, as if something came to mind, she suddenly gave a self?mocking little laugh and shook her head.

The doll Lunie looked at her in confusion: “Mistress?”

“It is nothing. I just suddenly thought of some things from long ago,” Lucretia said softly. “Lunie, did you know that I used to scold Father often when he came back from an expedition?”

“Old Master? You scolded him?”

“Yes. I scolded him for always picking up strange things outside,” Lucretia said, as if falling into her memories. She spoke slowly while she thought. “Sometimes he would find a broken stone in the frontier and get so excited he would study it for ten days or half a month, and he would drag my brother and me in to study it with him.”

She turned around and stared in a daze at the chains stretching back from the stern and the stone sphere at their end.

“Now I have picked up a ‘big stone’ and brought it back… I wonder what he would think if he knew.”

Lunie did not know how she should respond to her Mistress. She stayed silent for a moment and then finally said: "…You rarely talk about the Old Master."

"Maybe because so much has been happening lately," Lucretia shook her head. "Let us not talk about this. I am a bit tired. What time is it now?"

"It is already late at night," Lunie nodded. "You really should rest."

"Already late at night?" Lucretia said in surprise, then waved her hand. "Dragging this thing makes it daytime for twenty?four hours straight. My sense of day and night is all messed up… You keep an eye on the ship. I will go rest."

Before she even finished speaking, her figure suddenly broke apart into countless colorful pieces of paper. They fluttered away with the wind, flying toward the captain's cabin.

…

Even after she returned to the Cathedral and evening prayer ended, Vanna still looked troubled and lost in thought—and there was no way such a mood could escape Bishop Valentine's eyes.

When the bishop asked, she did not hide the "meeting in a dream" she had had with that ghost captain on the way back from the harbor.

In the small prayer room connected to the side hall, Valentine quietly listened to Vanna's entire story.

"…I am not surprised that 'he' visited," the old bishop said calmly. "The whole city?state of Pland has already gone through some sort of transformation. Whether we accept it or not, we and the land under our feet have now formed a bond with the Vanished that cannot be cut. I talked about this with your uncle. Do you know what he said?"

“…What did he say?”

“Behind Pland now stands a Master in the Shadows, like the ‘Ten Cities’ described in The Golan Cantos. In those verses there was an Uncrowned King, an unnamed High Regent, a formless but very real ‘owner’ standing in the shadows of those cities. This Master does not declare his authority to the city?state, just like you do not declare to the coins in your pocket that you are their Master—and when you take those coins out, you also do not think about asking their opinion.”

Vanna showed a thoughtful expression: “…‘Ten Cities’ is said to be the most chilling part of The Golan Cantos. It describes how ten city?states were slowly taken over by an invisible ruler and transformed into Shadows. And even when the long poem ends, the writer never describes that ruler even a little bit. He only hints at the Invisible King by describing the atmosphere, customs, and environment in those cities. I have read it, but I was still young at the time. I could not understand why the Lords enjoyed talking so much about the fear in that poem.”

She shook her head lightly.

“But I think at least Captain Duncan is not doing what the ruler in ‘Ten Cities’ did. He is not trying to turn the city?state into some… unspeakable breeding ground. At least for now, he has not shown any malice.”

“That is true. He has not shown any malice. He even went out of his way to warn you,” Bishop Valentine nodded slightly. “The problem with Vision 001 has already caught the attention of the Churches of the Four Gods. But from what I know, the main opinion of the Churches is still to wait and see when Vision 001 will ‘return to normal’. But if the warning Captain Duncan gave is true…”

The old bishop stopped. After a moment, he let out a soft sigh.

“Then our world is facing very big trouble.”

Chapter 266: Spread of Thought

Vanna stood up and walked to the statue of the Goddess in the small prayer room. The statue stood on a high platform, and bright candles burned quietly all around its base.

Bishop Valentine's voice came from behind her: "We should send this warning to the Storm Grand Cathedral, and, if possible, to the other Churches and city-states as well. But that brings us to the source of the warning. If we want it to be convincing, we must give the Churches of the other Three Gods reasons they can accept. Simply saying 'a Saint received a revelation in a dream' is not enough.

"Her Holiness the Pope already knows about your connection with Captain Duncan. She has issued no reprimand, so it looks as if she has tacitly allowed it. But if the other Churches learn the truth… their reactions will be hard to predict, especially on the side of the Church of Death."

"Because of the Viseran Thirteen Isles…" Vanna muttered softly. "The Church of Death is unusually wary of the Vanished."

Valentine sighed: "That's right. The Viseran Thirteen Isles, the sacrifice that was dragged into Subspace by the Vanished. A century ago, they were the largest archipelago city-state under the control of the Church of Death. For the followers of the Death God, those thirteen islands held a place equal to what Pland is today for the Church of the Deep Sea.

"It is troublesome. After a hundred years, it is no longer just about hatred. It is also the natural distrust humans feel toward a runaway state disaster. If they find out where this warning came from, they might instead start by treating the whole matter as some kind of conspiracy."

Vanna did not speak for a moment. She stayed silent for several seconds before suddenly saying: "The Storm Grand Cathedral will arrive soon. Maybe Her Holiness the Pope will have her own way of handling this."

"I hope so," Valentine muttered, not very confident. "In any case, the Four Gods Church is already paying attention to the situation with Vision 001. It just seems we still are not taking it seriously enough. If the Church of the Deep Sea can take the lead and raise its priority, I think that would at least achieve the effect of this 'warning'."

Vanna slowly nodded. Then she lifted her gaze and fixed her gaze on the statue of the Storm Goddess Gamona. After a long moment, she whispered a soft benediction: "…May you shelter us."

…

On the Vanished, at the stern deck, Duncan had just finished his inspection of the whole ship and was ready to return to his room to rest.

The Vanished needed a full inspection from time to time, especially the lower decks. The compartments flooded by the Boundless Sea needed the captain's intimidation and comfort to stay stable.

During this round of inspection, Duncan had focused again on checking the "door of Subspace" down in the bilge, making sure the door still stayed tightly shut.

That made him feel a bit more at ease.

But alongside this ease, a faint uneasiness still pressed at the bottom of his heart. He still did not understand how he had fallen asleep in his cabin last time and then somehow entered the "other side" of that door.

He had stumbled into Subspace without knowing how, and then spent half a day on another Vanished within Subspace. In the end, he had found a way to return safely, but as long as he could not figure out the mechanism by which he entered Subspace, he could never fully relax.

And the time he entered Subspace had been right after something went wrong with Vision 001.

The Sun had gone wrong, there had been that strange dream, and then he had entered Subspace. The three events followed one after another so closely that it was hard not to suspect some hidden connection behind them.

Duncan stood in front of the captain's cabin, holding the consecrated lantern in one hand. He took a quiet breath in the cold night wind.

Maybe it was exactly this uneasiness that pushed him to send that warning during his earlier Dream Communion with Vanna. He still was not sure how much his bizarre dream reflected the Mortal Realm, but after dealing with supernatural Visions so many times, he at least had one clear lesson: an ordinary person might be allowed to treat a dream as just a dream, but if "Captain Duncan" had a dream… then he must never treat it as just a dream.

Now he only hoped his warning could make the Four Gods Church focus more attention on the problem of Vision 001.

He knew he was not an expert in the supernatural field. Even if he wanted to study Vision 001, he had no way to start. What he could do… was draw the true experts toward this problem.

A warning coming from "Captain Duncan" was without a doubt enough to make many people take it seriously.

Duncan gathered his thoughts and put his hand on the handle of the captain's cabin door. But before he opened it, another matter suddenly came to mind.

The Abyssal Trench Project that Tyrian had mentioned to him.

Duncan frowned slightly and thought for a moment. Then he directly pushed open the “door of the Lost Ones”.

Swirling thick mist appeared within the frame.

He stepped into it.

After a brief dizziness and a sense of space and time twisting, Zhou Ming opened his eyes and saw his familiar studio apartment. Everything here was still the same as before.

He steadied himself and, as always, first checked the windowsill, the desk, and other spots. After making sure nothing here had changed, he walked to the far end of the room.

On the plain storage shelf, the delicate “models” of the Vanished and Pland still sat quietly in their original places.

Zhou Ming walked over and picked up the “model” that represented Pland. Holding this “collection”, which felt neither too heavy nor too light in his hands, he went to the desk nearby, sat down, and carefully examined the structure of its “base”.

He had never thought about this before. He had to admit that “what lies beneath the city-state” was not only a blind spot in many people’s thinking in this world, it was also a blind spot in his own.

All he saw was a very smooth bottom.

Below the sea level around the city-state of Pland, the model simply ended. The bottom surface was so smooth it looked as if it had been sliced off with a sharp blade.

Zhou Ming fixed his gaze on the base of the model and fell into deep thought.

If it were just a “model”, then of course such a neat, flat underside would be normal. But he knew this “collection” was no ordinary model. It should be the “reflection” or “projection” of Pland in the Mortal Realm, placed in this room. What it showed… should be the complete form of Pland.

No matter what lay under the city-state, whether it was an endlessly long pillar or a thin base like a flat cake, it should still have some kind of structure, not simply end the moment you went below the sea surface.

Was it because he had not burned the city-state thoroughly enough when he used fire on it back then? Or because…

He had “ignored” that part?

Zhou Ming frowned slightly. His fingers tapped the edge of the desk without thinking. Then he pulled himself together, held his hand over the model, and let his mind slowly spread outward.

In the city-state of Pland, inside the antique shop, Duncan had just said goodnight to Nina and Shirley. He silently returned to his room, walked to the window, and quietly looked out at the night scene of the district, where lamps shone everywhere under the still veil of night.

veil of night lay heavy over the city. Almost all the residents had gone home. The streets and alleys were extremely quiet. Only a few moving points of light could be seen deep in the slightly darker lanes. Those were the patrolling Guardians and the glow from the consecrated lanterns in their hands.

Duncan slowly closed his eyes.

The entire city-state of Pland then appeared in his mind from a clearer, more direct vantage point.

Crowded residential districts. Steam factories that never slept. Quiet commercial streets. Damp coastal roads. The gas lamps along the sidewalks. The pipeline systems that crossed whole neighborhoods…

In one part of the city, a Guardian squad walked out from a narrow alley, heading to check the next gas and steam node.

A young squad member holding a consecrated lantern looked at the still, silent street ahead and muttered with a bit of feeling: “Looks like it’s another peaceful night… Honestly, I’m not used to nights this quiet.”

The squad captain glanced at his subordinate: “Don’t relax. Anything can happen during veil of night. Watch the darkest places.”

“Yes, I understand,” the squad member straightened up quickly, but still could not help saying: “But don’t you think it really has been quiet these last two days? I heard that in the latest patrol records there hasn’t even been a single—”

A faint green shimmer suddenly flashed at the edge of his vision, making the squad member stop without thinking.

It seemed the light from a distant gas lamp changed for an instant. It was so brief and subtle it was almost impossible to catch.

“Did you see something flash just now?” The squad member’s hand went to the Runic Steel Sword at his waist as he spoke in a low, serious voice. “The gas lamp seemed to flicker.”

Another squad member spoke at once: “I saw your consecrated lantern flicker too.”

The squad members all turned their eyes toward the captain.

The captain only frowned, clearly thinking about something. After several seconds, this veteran Guardian shook his head: “Keep patrolling. We’ll report it to the Cathedral when we get back.”

The Guardian squad left that place.

And the same kind of thing was happening all over the city.

Green light passed through flames. Invisible gaze flashed in the dark. Duncan’s thoughts flowed through the entire city-state and then slowly sank deeper.

In that detached yet clear “sense”, Duncan let his consciousness sink bit by bit, exploring the structure of the city-state beneath the surface of the sea.

In the apartment room, Zhou Ming suddenly opened his eyes.

A faint scraping sound reached his ears.

He picked up the “collection” in front of him and stared fixedly at the underside of the Pland city-state.

A rough and complex new structure was “growing” bit by bit on the bottom of the “model”.

Chapter 267: Beneath the Darkness

The bottom of the “model” was growing.

As Zhou Ming–Duncan’s thoughts spread, the structure that represented Pland’s Undercity slowly surfaced in his mind. The parts that appeared in his awareness now turned into corresponding new parts on the “collection” itself.

It was something rough, like a disk of rock, growing at a speed visible to the naked eye. It covered the entire underside of the Pland city-state and then began to extend further, showing more bizarre details—layers of sediment built up over hundreds of years, small spiky growths like fine thorns, and between those layers of sediment, twisted, coiled… strange protrusions.

It felt like the coarse skin of some echinoderm, or the ugly outer layer left on rock after strong acid had corroded it.

At last, the growth stopped.

The “model” that represented the city-state of Pland now had a disk-shaped base at its bottom.

But Zhou Ming frowned.

He could feel that his awareness spreading through Pland had not stopped. It was still extending “downward”.

In the darkness, in the cold, in a Transcendent Perception beyond the ordinary five senses and six faculties, he felt his spirit continue to sink like mercury seeping into soil. He clearly sensed his “gaze” pass through thick layers of concrete, soil, and rock, and then pass through some extremely dense “shell” that was neither metal nor stone, until it sank into icy seawater. Then it kept going down, and down.

In only the blink of an eye, he felt he had plunged into a pitch-black Deep Sea, passing the 850-meter-thick base and following some invisible but real “path” as it stretched rapidly downward.

And after that, how far did it go? One hundred meters? Two hundred?

Zhou Ming could not be sure. He only knew his perception was still spreading downward. He had already moved beyond the range of the city-state of Pland, and no new structure appeared on the “collection” in his hands, yet his thoughts still flowed along some invisible “medium”.

His first reaction was, of course, tension. He instinctively tried to control this trend of falling toward the Deep Sea. But before he could do anything, that constant “falling” suddenly stopped.

It was as if he had crashed into some invisible “limit” or reached the end of the “medium”. His perception finally settled in deep water at some depth beneath the city-state and stayed there.

Zhou Ming felt his heart pounding. It was the feeling of suddenly falling, only to be yanked to a stop halfway down by a rope. The sharp rise and drop shook him. It took him nearly half a minute to calm down and steady his breathing and heartbeat.

Then he composed himself again, slowly picked up the Pland model in front of him, and looked at the thick “rock disk” spreading outward under its base.

The structure was rough and ugly, yet overall it was fairly regular. Its underside was a jagged broken face. It felt… as if it had been forcibly snapped off from something else, or as if its growth from top to bottom had been interrupted, leaving behind an ugly break.

The inside of the disk was a murky, chaotic mess, impossible to sense clearly or see through.

But Zhou Ming did not focus on the disk base itself. Instead, he looked at the empty space under the base.

A part of his extended “consciousness” now hung suspended at that spot.

Zhou Ming closed his eyes slightly.

In the next second, the distant perception suddenly grew stronger.

He felt he was in the dark, icy Deep Sea. An immeasurable volume of seawater wrapped around and pressed down on him layer after layer. The pressure was so real that it felt as if even his consciousness was being restrained and bound. He tried to open his “eyes” in that darkness, but he saw only endless nothing.

As time passed, tiny specks of light seemed to appear in that emptiness.

Were they some kind of plankton in the Deep Sea? Some school of glowing fish? Or something else?

Zhou Ming struggled to make it out for a long time before he realized… he was looking at the bottom of Pland.

He was “looking up” at Pland and seeing the underside of that rough disk base. In the extreme darkness, there were a few small glowing structures on that base.

He still could not tell what they were. With only pure mental perception, across such a vast distance and through such thick seawater, the information that could reach him was far too vague.

After that, Zhou Ming slowly adapted and tried to shift his attention in another direction—toward the deeper seabed below.

All he felt was endless emptiness and endless darkness.

There seemed to be nothing in the Deep Sea.

But after a while longer, he suddenly sensed something faint.

Something enormous, utterly still, maybe even as huge as Pland itself, lay sleeping in that boundless darkness.

Zhou Ming could not see it or hear it. The extreme darkness and silence hid every detail of that giant presence. Yet he could be sure that something was there, motionless and dead-quiet, as if it had existed since ancient times.

He did not know how long passed before he finally pulled back.

In the end, he still could not “see” what actually lay in the Deep Sea directly beneath Pland.

But he faintly understood one thing—

That vast structure hiding directly under the city-state was probably the reason Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm had stubbornly pushed the Abyssal Trench Project half a century ago.

There was something under Frostholm. There was something under Pland. Under the other city-states… there was probably something too.

Zhou Ming let out a slow breath, stood up, picked up the Pland city-state model, and walked to the storage shelf at the far end of the room.

The model now had a “base”, but it could still fit into the cubby on the shelf —as if, from the very beginning, both the model and the cubby had left enough space for it.

But before he put the model back, Zhou Ming's eyes fell again on the space under the base, and a trace of doubt rose in his heart.

His awareness could spread through the city-state, but in the Deep Sea, his awareness had clearly gone beyond the physical limits of this model. Its physical base ended after 850 meters, yet his awareness had continued downward for another hundred or two hundred meters. How did those last hundred or two hundred meters extend? What was that invisible medium?

Zhou Ming slowly put the model back onto the shelf.

…

The Sun once again rose into the sky as usual.

In front of the antique shop in Pland's Lower City, on the small open space, Duncan watched Nina ride a bicycle in a cheerful circle, then pedal up and down the street before finally stopping steadily in front of him.

"Uncle! I'm already really good at this!"

Nina planted one foot on the ground, her face bright with excitement and pride.

Duncan smiled a little: "Not bad. You really are getting good at riding—but you stopped with your wheel on my foot."

Nina quickly looked down and, in a panic, rolled the wheel off his shoe: "Ah! I'm sorry!"

"It's fine." Duncan waved his hand with a smile. Then he let out a breath and lifted his head to look at the street in the sunlight.

The city-state was the same as always.

Under the street bathed in sunlight, the deep darkness and massive Shadows below felt like something from another world. They had not affected people’s daily lives at all.

But ever since he finished his exploration of what lay “beneath” Pland, he could not help thinking of that cold, dark Deep Sea, and of the vast structure he had sensed in it.

It made him drift off in thought again and again.

He even could not help wondering if the queen of Frostholm half a century ago had been the same. Had she also found some way to glimpse the secrets in the Deep Sea… maybe even more than he himself had seen?

“Uncle, you’re spacing out again?”

Nina’s voice came from beside him, cutting off Duncan’s wandering thoughts.

“Are you all right? You’ve been distracted since this morning.”

“I’m fine,” Duncan waved his hand quickly. Then he looked toward the end of the street, as if to change the subject: “But speaking of which, Alice still isn’t back.”

“She just left not long ago,” Nina said casually. “And you don’t have to worry so much, do you? She only went to buy a newspaper. It’s not like she has to cross half the city. She shouldn’t get lost, right?”

“I really can’t relax,” Duncan sighed. “This is her first time going out alone in the real sense—even if it’s only to the newsstand at the corner.”

“I think it’ll be fine,” Nina thought for a moment and answered very firmly. “Before she left, I went through it with her many times. How to tell people what she wants to buy, how to get change, how to say thank you after taking the newspaper… She learned all of it.”

“I hope so,” Duncan sighed. “It’s just that when she first came aboard the ship, even going to the kitchen to get a plate meant getting hit with a frying pan.”

Nina froze for a second: “I don’t think you can treat those two things as the same…”

While they were talking, Alice’s figure appeared at the edge of their sight.

The doll girl was hugging a newspaper to her chest. Her face shone with a bright smile. She held her neck stiff and ran toward them in little jumps, shouting as she ran: “Mr. Duncan! I got the newspaper!”

Nina laughed: “See? I told you Miss Alice would definitely be fine!”

But when Duncan saw the way Alice ran, he was instantly alarmed. He hurried forward to meet her and shouted: “Don’t run! Slow down!”

As the saying went, you worry about exactly what ends up happening. In the time it took him to say that, he watched Alice trip and go down flat on her front less than five meters away from him, sprawling across the ground.

Yet the very next second, the doll bounced back up as if nothing had happened. She patted off her skirt, picked up the newspaper from the ground, and walked over to Duncan with a beaming smile: “Newspaper!”

Duncan did not take the newspaper right away. Instead, he stared in disbelief at the doll girl whose head was still attached. After a long moment, he finally managed to say: “…You fell that hard. How did your head not come off?”

Alice kept that confident, neck-straight pose, her face glowing with pride: “I found a good way to reinforce it!”

Duncan eyed the doll suspiciously: “A good way?”

Alice said: “I used glue!”

Duncan: “…?!”

He stared at her in shock for two or three seconds, then could not help asking: “Who taught you that?”

“Shirley!”

Chapter 268: Alice with the Firm Head

Looking at Alice, who stood there with her neck stuck straight and a very confident pose, Duncan's mood fell apart all at once. Then he suddenly realized what was wrong with that silly posture. It was not confidence or pride at all. Her neck had simply set in place and could not move anymore.

But the doll herself still did not seem to notice how serious the problem was. She still looked very pleased with herself, grinning as she handed the newspaper to Duncan, clearly overjoyed that she had managed to go shopping alone: "Here you go, the newspaper, and I even remembered the change!"

Duncan finally took the newspaper with a blank face. Two or three seconds passed before he reminded this silly girl: "Alice, try nodding."

"Eh? Why?" Alice froze for a moment, but still obeyed the captain's order at once. Her head only gave a tiny wobble in place. A strange sound came from the area of her neck, and then she could not move it at all.

After two seconds of stunned silence, the doll finally reacted and cried out: "Mr. Duncan! I can't move! Help, help!"

Duncan gave the doll a tired look, then turned and walked toward the antique shop: "Stop yelling out here. We'll look at it inside."

Alice hurried after Duncan in a panic, with Nina, who was also a bit confused and at a loss, following behind her. The three of them went through the door of the antique shop. Walking last, Nina turned back, carefully closed the shop door, and did not forget to hang up the “Closed for a Break” wooden sign.

Duncan casually tossed the newly bought newspaper onto the counter. He was just about to check Alice’s condition when his eye suddenly caught a headline on the front page.

His attention was drawn back to the paper at once.

There, in the largest bold letters, was printed:

“The Storm Grand Cathedral Will Arrive at Loyal Pland at Noon Tomorrow – May the Glory of the Storm Ruler Bless Us All”

The Storm Grand Cathedral? The Deep Sea Church’s mysterious “headquarters at sea”? Goddess Gamona’s Envoy was coming to this city… was it because of the recent historical corruption incident? Or because of the Vanished? Or both?

Duncan frowned and picked up the newspaper, his gaze scanning the front-page article.

Alice, meanwhile, circled around anxiously. She had finally realized that pouring glue into her neck joint had not been a wise move. When she saw that the captain had no time to care about her, she turned her plea for help toward Nina: “Miss Nina, help me, save save save save save…”

Nina was flustered too. She stepped up and grabbed Alice’s head, trying to shake it from side to side, and found that the glue had already fully hardened: “This… this won’t come off at all! Just one look and you can tell it’s fast-drying glue!”

“Think of something,” Alice sounded like she was about to cry. She held her head with both hands. “Miss Nina, don’t you study repairing machines and stuff? You know how to fix those complicated steam cores. Fix me.”

“I don’t know how to repair dolls!” Nina was also on the verge of panic. In the end she turned her pleading eyes to Duncan. “Uncle, please think of something. Miss Alice’s head is completely glued in place…”

Duncan finally put down the newspaper and turned to look at the two noisy young ladies beside him. His eyes landed on Alice: “How much glue did you pour in, and what kind was it?”

“One bottle, about this big,” Alice said, holding out her hands to show the size. “I found it in your room, a small brown glass bottle.”

“…You poured in the whole thing?!” Duncan’s eye twitched. “That big a bottle, how did you even manage that?”

“I first took my head off and set it upside down, poured the glue inside and shook it a bit, then just stuck it back on,” Alice said, sounding like she might cry. “Shirley said that would be nice and secure…”

Duncan stared at her, dumbfounded. He could feel the beautiful doll’s deep sorrow, but dolls had no tears. All her sadness could only flow silently inside her hollow heart—very poetic words, if you ignored the detail that “the doll was heartbroken because she had glued her own head in place.”

Duncan sighed, tossed the newspaper aside, stepped up to unfasten the lace around Alice’s neck, and checked the hardened superglue around the joint. After a moment of silent inspection, he turned to Nina: “…Where did Shirley go?”

“She… said an hour ago that her head hurt from memorizing vocabulary, so she went out for some fresh air,” Nina said, shrinking her neck. “Do you think she ran away because she feels guilty?”

“I doubt she thought that far at all. These days the only thing she really thinks about is how to skip class,” Duncan sighed and shook his head. “No, it’s completely dry. It’s been at least half an hour. That’s fast-drying glue. You can’t pull it off by force now.”

“Then what do we do?!” Alice looked at Duncan in panic. “When I comb my hair I have to take my head off. I can’t comb my hair while wearing it.”

“…So after your head got glued in place, that was the only thing you worried about?” Duncan glared at Alice, then wearily waved his hand. “Enough, stop looking so miserable. The glue is strong, but it doesn’t stand up to heat or water. Soak it in hot water. It will soften after a while.”

Alice looked as if she had been saved, and Nina, who had been worrying beside her, reacted at once. She rushed forward to grab Alice’s hand: “I’ll take you to the bathroom. I can boil water really fast now!”

The Sun fragment and the doll with the glued head thumped up the stairs together. Duncan could only sigh helplessly and pick up the newspaper he had set aside.

According to the public statement, the Storm Grand Cathedral was docking in Pland for a routine stop and maintenance. Pope Helena would briefly visit the Pland Grand Cathedral during this time and discuss some Church matters with the Archbishop and the Inquisitor. The newspaper did not mention the historical corruption incident or anything related to the Vanished at all.

But even if the paper did not say it, anyone with eyes could guess that the Deep Sea Pope was coming because of those two major events.

Duncan did not care about belief in the Storm Goddess, but he still wondered what kind of effect this would have on him.

Or rather, could he take this chance… to gather some information?

He still remembered that earlier “thank you,” which had most likely come from the Storm Goddess herself. Even without that, he was curious about the deities of this world, and he was interested in that great Storm Grand Cathedral that was said to sail the Boundless Sea all year round.

On the other hand, he was also very curious whether the Storm Goddess's highest representative, after coming here, would sense something strange about the city-state of Pland—and whether they would discover his "Subspace Shadows" hidden inside it.

Things were getting interesting.

Duncan put down the newspaper and sat beside the counter, rubbing his chin in thought.

The antique shop was very quiet. He could faintly hear the noise from Nina and Alice in the upstairs bathroom. The clearest sounds were Nina's excited exclamations:

"Wow! These joints are amazing… so pretty!

"Miss Alice, can your wrist really turn three hundred and sixty degrees… it really can?!"

"Miss Alice, there's a keyhole on your back. Huh? You don't know what it's for either?"

"Is it okay if water gets into the keyhole? Oh, then I'm relieved…"

Duncan rubbed his brow, starting to get a headache.

He began to suspect that those two upstairs had already forgotten all about the actual problem.

But soon the sounds upstairs quieted down. Then there was a rush of hurried footsteps thumping toward the stairs, and Nina's voice followed: "Uncle Duncan! It's not working! Please come look, it won't come off at all!"

“…?”

Duncan went upstairs full of confusion. He saw Nina standing in the hallway with a helpless face, then looked past her toward the bathroom at the end of the hall and saw Alice awkwardly peeking out.

Then the doll stepped out, dripping wet, wrapped in a bath towel. Her head was still solidly stuck.

“Captain, it still didn’t work,” Alice said, face long with despair.

“It didn’t loosen at all,” Nina muttered. “We rinsed it with hot water for a long time.”

Duncan looked at Alice, then at Nina, who was nervously twisting the hem of her clothing. After a long moment, he finally sighed.

“Use boiling water.”

“Huh?” Nina jumped in shock. “R-really?! Can Miss Alice handle that…”

“She once deep-fried her own head in oil. She’s not scared of a bit of heat,” Duncan spread his hands. “At this point, hot water isn’t enough. We still have some hope if we cook it in boiling water.”

Nina’s eyes went a little blank. She tried hard to picture the procedure, then said with some hesitation: “Boiling water is easy. I can make it fast. But… we don’t have a pot that big, and we don’t have a tub deep enough to soak her whole body. To get her head fully under water, Miss Alice would at least have to squat in it, right?”

As she spoke she waved her hands around. Even though she always had top grades at school, at this moment Nina still felt her imagination was struggling to keep up with the pace of the Mortal Realm.

But Duncan clearly did not share Nina’s limits in creative thinking. He just glanced at the nearby gothic doll wrapped in a towel and looking pitiful, then turned to Nina and said: “That’s easy. Just find a big basin. Let her go in headfirst… at worst I’ll hold her.”

Nina pictured it. The scene did appear in her mind, but her tone grew extra hesitant: “I still feel Miss Alice seems kind of pitiful like that…”

“Pitiful my ass!” Duncan finally lost his patience and swore for the first time in ages. “She let an illiterate girl talk her into pouring a whole bottle of glue into her neck joint. Let this teach her a lesson!”

Chapter 269: The Subspace Nest Was Still Cozy Today

“Are you really sure this will work?”

Nina still felt uneasy as she looked at the big basin of water set on the dining table. She glanced at the nervous Alice beside her, then at Duncan’s blank face, and muttered under her breath.

“If this still doesn’t work, we’ll have to use solvent. But that stuff is corrosive. I don’t know if it will damage Alice’s body,” Duncan said crossly as he looked at the gothic doll, who had changed back into her normal clothes but still had a stiff, unmoving neck. “Or she can just keep that posture forever.”

Alice panicked at once and waved her hands: “No, no, let’s try the boiling water first!”

Nina’s gaze went back and forth between Alice and the basin several times. At last she gave a small “oh” and slowly reached her hand into the cool water.

She controlled herself very, very carefully, as if she were trying to pluck a single grain of sand from the desert. She guided that flame that burned deep within her soul, her mental guidance, outward into the water. For a sunlight young lady whose heart burned at six thousand degrees, this kind of precise control was not easy. But in all the free time she had over the past days, she had been practicing this fine control. By now she had improved a lot. In a short time, she succeeded.

The water boiled.

Alice turned to look at Duncan. Duncan looked back at Alice.

Then, without hesitation, he pushed the doll's head down into the basin of boiling water.

"Let's cook it a bit longer," Duncan said helplessly as he held Alice by the shoulders. "But if you feel anything uncomfortable, stop right away."

Alice answered at once: "Glub glub glub… glub."

Duncan thought for a moment, then looked up at Nina: "I'm guessing she doesn't feel anything wrong."

Nina just stared wide-eyed at the scene in front of her. After a long time she could not help muttering: "I still think this looks really creepy…"

Duncan sighed. He did not need to say it—he himself felt the scene was so bizarre it was almost unwatchable. In the dim, narrow second floor of the antique shop, an uncle and a niece were pressing a gothic doll's head into a basin of boiling water. The key part was that this gothic doll even raised her hands and stuck out her thumb from time to time to show she was fine…

Anyone who saw this at first glance would go report it to the constable.

If they took a second look, they would go call a Church guardian.

Right then, footsteps suddenly sounded from the stairs, and Shirley's voice drifted into Duncan and Nina's ears: "I'm back! Mr. Duncan, Mr. Morris came again, I told him to come straight up…"

The next second, Shirley appeared at the door—and her voice cut off.

In the somewhat dim room, Duncan and Nina stood quietly by the basin of boiling water. Nina's hand still rested in the basin, keeping the water at a rolling boil, while Duncan pressed down on Alice's shoulders, holding the gothic doll’s head under the water. The doll did not move at all. Only the bubbling sound of boiling water filled the room.

Duncan and Nina lifted their heads at the same time and looked at Shirley standing in the doorway.

Then Morris appeared, right behind Shirley.

The scene in the kitchen-slash-dining room reflected in the historian’s eyes.

The old gentleman thought for a moment and understood at once—oh, it was the Subspace Shadows and the Sun fragment stewing Anomaly 099.

Morris nodded. He decided that today the antique shop was as normal as always.

“Holy—!” Shirley finally let out a delayed scream. She almost jumped up, staring in horror at the scene in the room. But then she hurriedly clapped a hand over her mouth, as if trying to shove the swear word back in, and let out a muffled, confused mumble.

“What are you yelling for?” Duncan glared at the jumpy girl at once. “Wasn’t it your idea to have Alice pour glue into her neck?”

Shirley instantly understood what was going on. Her first instinct was to turn and run, but under Duncan’s gaze, she did not dare move at all.

“I… I just said it casually. I didn’t think she would actually do it,” Shirley said, her voice shaking. “What normal person would believe that…”

Duncan heard this and was about to say something, when he suddenly felt Alice’s body sway. He quickly let go, and saw Alice shoot upright from the basin with a splash.

Only her body rose.

Her head was still cooking in the basin.

“Ah, it worked,” Nina said in surprise.

Alice’s body stood there in a daze for a few seconds, then began to feel around for her head with both hands. Her head floated up and down in the basin, making gurgling cries for help: “Help… glub glub… help… glub…”

Nina hurried to fish Alice’s head out and clumsily helped her put it back on. When they heard that familiar soft “pop,” everyone at the scene let out a long breath.

Alice turned her head from side to side. Her neck still felt a bit stiff, but it did move. She immediately grinned and looked at Duncan: “Captain! I can move again!”

“Take her to dry her hair. Her collar’s wet too, help her dry it,” Duncan said with a sigh as he looked up at Nina. Then he glanced at Shirley, who looked like she was about to die of panic, wanting to run but too scared to move, and said sharply, “Copy the alphabet twenty times later, and copy each new word twenty times.”

He ignored Shirley’s sudden “world-ending” expression, and turned to Morris: “What happened? Is it something new about that symbol?”

Morris might not have fully recovered from the eerie, chaotic, and absurd scene just now. He stared blankly for a second before reacting and speaking: “Ah, no, it’s not about the symbol. I suddenly got some news from a friend at City Hall today, and I thought… you might be interested.”

“News from City Hall?” Duncan frowned. “Tell me in detail.”

A few minutes later, Morris finished explaining what he had learned early that morning.

“Visions–Pland…” Duncan sat at the table, his expression slightly serious as he repeated the term. Then he looked at Morris. “When will this be announced to the public?”

“They haven’t decided yet, but likely in the next few days,” Morris said with a nod. “From a normal point of view, Pland is still in the aftermath of the recent disaster. Most citizens’ ability to accept bad news is still high. If they announce the city-state’s transformation into a Vision now as one of the conclusions of the disaster’s aftermath, it might not cause too much chaos. But if they wait until the city is completely calm and everyone has been living peacefully for a long time, then announce it, it could cause a new wave of panic.”

Duncan nodded lightly and did not answer. In his mind, he could not help recalling the news he had just read in the paper.

The Storm Grand Cathedral was coming to Pland.

Changes to the register of Anomalies and Visions were issued outward from the major Churches, so the Storm Grand Cathedral must be the first to know about the situation.

“A city-state turned into a Vision and still running as usual. That’s already very strange. But what’s even stranger is that this new Vision has no number,” Morris added. “Do you… have any thoughts on that?”

Of course Duncan had noticed the problem of this unnumbered Vision. But what opinion could he have? His knowledge of occult studies was not even as good as Dog’s…

He definitely could not say that out loud. So he only paused for a moment, then shook his head calmly: “I have no opinion. The ‘codes’ of the Anomalies and Visions that the Churches publish mean nothing to me and make no sense to me.”

“This…”

Morris opened his mouth, then thought of the green flames that once burned across the entire city-state, of the collapsing Black Sun, and of Anomaly 099, who had just been held under boiling water but behaved so obediently.

All of these seemed the same to Captain Duncan. They were just… "everyday problems" that needed a bit of handling.

No one needed to care what each speck of dust they swept up every day was called.

"All right, then it really doesn't mean much to you," the old scholar said, looking at Duncan with a touch of awe. Then he hesitated again and slowly chose his words. "Also, even though there shouldn't be any doubt, I still want to confirm. It was you who transformed Pland into a Vision… right?"

Duncan tilted his head a little: "Do you have any doubts about that?"

"No, I don't doubt it. I'm just curious what plans you have for this city-state," Morris said, still choosing his words carefully, trying to make himself as clear as possible. "You transformed it into a Vision because you want to…"

"I have no wish to control this city-state's fate, and I don't intend to interfere with anyone's future," Duncan said, cutting him off with a small shake of his head. "If I have to say anything…"

He paused, turned, and looked out the window, at the peaceful scene on the street.

"I rather like this place. So I hope it can stay safe in the future."

…

Inside the Storm Grand Cathedral, Vanna suddenly stopped in the middle of a conversation with Heidi and turned her head with a puzzled look.

"What is it?" Heidi asked, curious as she looked at her friend.

“I seem to have heard a bell ring just now, and someone whispering to me,” Vanna said with a frown. “I must have heard wrong.”

“You definitely heard wrong. I didn’t hear anything,” Heidi waved her hand. “You’ve been too stressed lately. Do you need me to give you a…”

“No!” Vanna quickly cut her off. “I feel like my mental state is just fine. And if I really run into a problem, I can handle it myself. You know that priests are half psychiatrists.”

“Fine, fine, if you don’t need it, you don’t need it. No need to be so tense,” Heidi muttered helplessly. “Right, where was I just now?”

Vanna thought for a second and reminded her: “You said your father went to the antique shop and bought a shell back, and now you’re very worried about his mental state…”

Chapter 270: A Letter from Afar

Earlier, Father went to the antique shop and stayed there for a long time. When he came back, he was holding an artillery shell. Then he solemnly put that thing in the best spot on the antique shelf and, every few days, he would go and carefully polish it.

Every time she thought about this, Heidi worried a lot about the Old Gentleman's mental health at home.

"I'm serious, you have no idea how strange it looks," the young psychiatrist could not help sighing again. "He treats it like a treasure and says it's a very, very special antique. Every day, before he even washes his face, he has to wipe the shell first. And my Mother just refuses to care about it. If I say a couple of things from the side, she just says: 'Your Father only has this one little collecting hobby, don't bother him.'"

Vanna really did not know how to comment on this. She knew nothing about antiques. The deepest impression she had of antiques in her whole life was when, as a child, she practiced a jumping chop with a toy sword and smashed Uncle's vase. She still remembered the beating from that day. So now, after holding it in for a long time, she only managed to say in a dry voice: "…Mr. Morris is a well?respected history scholar and collector. I think there must be something special in his taste for collecting."

"That still doesn't explain hugging an artillery shell like a treasure – even if the shell is real," Heidi sighed. "That shell is definitely real. At least it's solid. It's heavy, really heavy."

Vanna did not speak for a moment. She seemed to be thinking. After a while she suddenly said: “Let’s talk about that amulet instead. Did Mr. Morris get you another amulet just like the old one?”

“Yes, that’s the one,” Heidi nodded. As she spoke, she reached into the front of her clothes and pulled out the ‘crystal’ pendant hanging at her chest. “You’ve seen it. I used to have one exactly the same, but it was destroyed in the last ‘disaster’. The friar who registered me back then analyzed it and said it might have been an item that accidentally picked up supernatural power but usually hid its own special nature…”

Vanna looked at the ‘crystal’ pendant that Heidi had taken out. Her expression seemed thoughtful.

“Do you feel something is wrong?” Heidi could not help asking.

“…After the disaster, the Cathedral was short on people, but we still sent someone to investigate that antique shop,” Vanna said slowly. Her eyes never left the pendant. “The result was that everything was normal. From the shop’s supply channels to the Shopkeeper’s own identity and background, there were no problems at all. Everything was written clearly in the city archives. The thing with the pendant really did seem like a coincidence.

“But I still can’t help caring about it… Heidi, do you remember? I once went to that antique shop with you.”

“Of course I remember,” Heidi nodded. “To be honest, I really have some fate with that shop. The Shopkeeper saved my life at the City Museum. The Shopkeeper’s Niece is also one of my Father’s students. And my previous pendant just happened to come from that shop…

“But you said it yourself. The Church investigated in secret and found nothing wrong.”

Vanna did not answer. After thinking for a moment, she held out her hand: “Can you let me take a look?”

Heidi did not think much of it. She simply took off the pendant and handed it over: “Sure, here.”

Vanna took the crystal pendant, which still held a trace of body heat, and lifted it up to study it carefully in the sunlight. After a long time, she spoke as if talking to herself: “There’s no supernatural aura at all.”

“Right, it’s just an ordinary charm amulet. It’s not even real crystal, it’s glass,” Heidi said. Then she looked a little more seriously at the friend in front of her. “Vanna, you’re a bit too tense. I know it’s your occupational habit as an Inquisitor, but I really think… that Shopkeeper is a very good person. You shouldn’t suspect him.”

“I’m paying attention, not suspecting,” Vanna said, returning the pendant to her friend. “I just always feel that something is off about that antique shop. But I’m not looking at it the way an Inquisitor looks at a Heretic.

“Still, you have a point. Maybe my nerves are a bit too tight.”

Heidi put the pendant back on. Then she glanced at the mechanical clock hanging to the side: “Ah, it’s already this late?!”

“You’re leaving?”

“I have to go,” Heidi said as she stood up and picked up the little case she had put next to her earlier. “I have an appointment this afternoon – that captain who stayed here at the Cathedral in Quarantine Observation for quite a few days.”

Vanna frowned and thought for a moment, then quickly found the matching memory: “The captain of the White Oak? I remember his name is Lawrence… did he run into trouble?”

“He’s a captain who runs back and forth on the Boundless Sea, and he’s at that age,” Heidi said. “It’s completely normal for someone like that to need a psychiatrist’s help.”

She seemed to think of something and her expression grew a bit complicated. But she quickly shook her head. “Compared to most captains his age, Mr. Lawrence is actually not in bad shape. I can’t say more. That’s the patient’s privacy.”

“All right. I wish your work goes well.”

Morris did two things as soon as he came home.

The first was to hug and kiss his Wife.

The second was to carefully wipe the artillery shell on the antique shelf.

He still felt a bit strange in his heart when he brought this thing back, but he knew this strange ‘collection’ had a special meaning.

It stood for his connection with the Vanished. It also stood for Captain Duncan’s “goodwill” toward his Retainers.

That unbelievable ghost captain always chose all kinds of strange ways to show his goodwill. This included, but was not limited to, soup boiled with Deep Sea Spawn, an artillery shell stamped with a steel mark from a century ago, and tutoring the less educated Retainers in reading and writing. At first, Morris felt this was a bit odd, but now he had already adjusted his mindset perfectly.

Whatever Captain Duncan said was right. Whatever Captain Duncan did was normal.

With this mindset, Morris felt he had completely adapted to the atmosphere of the new team.

Footsteps sounded behind him.

Morris did not turn around. He already knew it was his Wife.

“You’re about to polish it so much it could reflect a person,” the dignified old lady said with a smile as she looked at her Husband. “Didn’t you say before that antiques should not be polished too often?”

“But this isn’t an ordinary ‘antique’, Mary,” Morris turned his head and smiled at his Wife. “It is part of the sacred miracles.”

The old lady looked up and studied the two special pieces on the antique shelf – a dagger and an artillery shell. After a moment, she suddenly asked: “Will you tell our Daughter the truth later? About these ‘sacred miracles’, and about… your new ‘identity’.”

Morris stopped what he was doing.

There were some sacred miracles that could be kept from others, but not from the one who had gone through the miracle itself.

As the product of a once?incomplete Subspace Prayer, his Wife had lain in bed as an Ashen Humanoid for eleven years. She knew that very well. Now she lived again because of the influence of the Vanished. Of course she would question her own survival.

There was no way around it.

So, after getting the captain’s permission, Morris told his Wife about the Vanished. But he did not tell Heidi.

“…There’s no need yet,” Morris said. “Heidi doesn’t have to come into contact with this for now. And whether we tell her or not… also depends on what the captain wants.”

Just then, the doorbell suddenly rang and cut off the talk between Morris and his Wife.

The old scholar was about to open the door, but his Wife stopped him with a smile: “I’ll go – I haven’t moved around for many years. I need to exercise more now.”

She turned and went to the front hall. Short voices came from the door. After a while, she came back to Morris.

“It’s the Postman,” his Wife handed over a letter. “For you.”

“A letter for me?” Morris was a bit surprised. The first thing he noticed was the high?value stamps on the envelope and a few special postmarks. He frowned. “I did write to a few distant friends, but they shouldn’t be replying this quickly… hm?”

His hands suddenly stopped. His eyes fell on the first postmark that showed where the letter had been sent from. His face grew a bit strange.

“Where is it from?” his Wife asked curiously.

Morris was silent for two seconds, then said in a low voice: “…Frostholm.”

“Frostholm? That’s very far away,” his Wife said. She thought for a moment and then added, a bit unsure: “I remember you have a friend in Frostholm, called Brown or Bren?”

“Brown Scott,” Morris said slowly. His tone, for some reason, became especially low and serious, and the motion of the letter opener in his hand grew especially slow. “Just like me, he is a scholar of history and is deeply devoted to the field of occult studies.”

“Oh, right, Brown Scott. I remember he was quite thin and gave people a very strict feeling,” his Wife said with sudden understanding. “You still keep in touch with him? I remember he moved to Frostholm many years ago, but before he moved, you two really…”

“He is already dead,” Morris suddenly said. “He died six years ago in a shipwreck.”

As soon as he spoke, the room fell silent.

Chapter 271: From Frostholm

Morris used the letter opener to carefully open the letter that had come from far away.

On the envelope, postmark after postmark, along with the mark that showed it had undergone purification, quietly told him of an extremely long journey.

With the soft sound of paper being unfolded, line after line of neat, beautiful handwriting appeared in front of Morris. It was indeed the handwriting he knew well from his old friend:

“To my friend and partner in scholarship:

“It seems that many years have passed since our last contact. This distance between us really should not have happened. I feel that in these years I have lived in a daze yet stayed busy, as if I have always been doing things that have no meaning. Only recently did I suddenly realize how much time I have wasted…

“…Many strange things have happened lately. Forgive me, but I find it hard to describe in words the changes in my life… Frostholm is an incredible place. It does not only have a cold and long winter. There are also many things here that are worth our careful study…

“Do you still remember the last time we met and talked about those ancient legends from the frozen seas in the far north? Those topics have entered my mind again recently. I suddenly feel that I have grasped some key point, something that can help us sort out many of the questions we could not solve back then, such as whether there were once city?states upon the frozen sea, and the origin of many mysterious local customs here in Frostholm…

“Frostholm truly is an incredible place, my friend. My mind has become clearer and clearer on this point. There are many mysterious past events in this cold sea that are worth our exploration. I plan to visit some well? respected people in the fields of history and folklore. I also have plans to visit Cold Harbor in the near future. But most important of all, I want to invite you to come here as a guest…

“We have not seen each other for many years, Morris. You said you do not like the cold air of the north, but I think you will like the warm fireplace in my home and the fine wine I have collected. Think about it carefully. We can once again sit beside the glowing fire and talk about those fascinating secrets. Believe me, Frostholm really is an incredible place…

“Won’t you come and see it for yourself? Come to this incredible city?state of Frostholm…

“Your most trusted friend and partner in scholarship,
“Brown Scott, 1900-12-2, written at 42 Hearth Street.”

Morris’s gaze quietly moved over the last line. For a long time, he said nothing.

Only after several minutes did he mutter as if to himself: “It is his handwriting. And those things he mentions really are what we discussed.”

“Today is December 17. This letter was sent half a month ago,” his Wife said beside him, her voice filled with a faint uneasiness. “Considering the distance between Frostholm and Pland, that is a normal amount of time.”

“Yes, the time is normal. The postmarks are normal. What is not normal is that the man who wrote it died years ago,” Morris said slowly. “I still remember the day I received the obituary – that was also a letter from Frostholm. It was written by his favorite Student. She wrote that her Teacher fell overboard by accident while sailing to Cold Harbor. They never even recovered the body."

"…I don't remember this. It happened during the years when I was muddled," his Wife came closer and held Morris's hand. "We should report this to the Church. The content and wording of this letter look normal, but if you dig into it, it is very unsettling."

Morris squeezed his Wife's hand back and let out a slow breath: "Of course, we should report it to the Church… but not only to the Church."

On the Vanished, in the captain's cabin, Duncan braced both hands on the chart table and stared intently at the mist?shrouded enchanted sea chart and the route slowly spreading across it.

The phantom mark that stood for the Vanished moved slowly at the center of the enchanted sea chart. The dense fog around the Vanished faded little by little as the ship sailed forward. At one end of the route, he could see the city?state of Pland, already left behind for the moment. Outside the route, in the thinner mist, he could faintly see another point of light, glowing very slightly.

Duncan fixed his gaze on that point.

That was the Sea Mist.

After that last battle of mutual fire coverage during "Plague dusk", the mark of the Sea Mist had appeared on this enchanted sea chart.

In Duncan's own senses, he could also roughly feel the current heading of the Sea Mist and even its general condition.

This sense was very vague, but it did not seem to fade as the distance between the Vanished and the Sea Mist grew.

Clearly, just like the “Marked” who had once been stained by the flames of spirit form, the Sea Mist, which had taken an artillery shell from the Vanished full in the face, had also formed a connection with him.

But it was only a “connection”, not complete control like he had over the Vanished. So, on the enchanted sea chart, the Sea Mist only showed up as a single point of light and could not clear away the fog covering its sea lanes.

“Are you choosing our next course?” Goathead’s voice suddenly came from the edge of the chart table. “I have about one hundred and forty very useful suggestions. I can…”

“No, you cannot,” Duncan cut him off with skill before he could start rambling. “I don’t need any suggestions. I have my own plan.”

Goathead shook his head, as if he still wanted to say more. But before he could speak, footsteps sounded outside the door, and the door of the captain’s cabin was pulled open from the outside. Alice walked in.

Then the doll girl froze for a second. Before Duncan could speak, she hurriedly turned around, closed the door, and knocked on it.

“…There is no need to knock after you come in. Knocking should be done before you open the door,” Duncan looked at her with a blank face. “Is everything on ‘that side’ cleaned up?”

“Mm?mm,” Alice nodded at once. “The shelves on the first floor are tidied up, the counter and the stairs are all wiped, and the kitchen is cleaned too!”

“Mm,” Duncan answered casually. “Where is Ai?”

“She went to the kitchen after dropping me off,” Alice said. “She kept shouting something about Crazy Thursday while she flew away…”

“She really knows how to enjoy herself,” Duncan said with a small laugh and shook his head. Then he suddenly noticed that Alice’s neck still moved a bit stiffly when she nodded. He frowned without thinking. “Why does your neck move so strangely… did you not clean all the glue out of the joint?”

When Alice heard this, she shook her head left and right. Her neck clearly caught and lagged with every movement.

“I guess… it is a bit like that,” the doll girl said, looking a little embarrassed. “It feels kind of… stuck.”

Duncan’s eyelid twitched. He looked helplessly at the doll, while she held her head with both hands. After a long moment, she let out her trademark laugh: “Hehe…”

“Don’t ‘hehe’,” Duncan sighed. “Come here. I’ll clean it for you. If you don’t clear the leftover glue, it will damage the joint even more. And it bothers me to see your head jerk like that every time you nod.”

“Oh.”

Alice walked over at once, very obedient. When she came to Duncan’s side, she reached up, grabbed her own head, twisted it left and right twice, and then “pop” – pulled it off.

The headless doll held her own head in both hands: “C?c?captain, here… here… for you.”

A faint sense of strangeness rose in Duncan’s heart, but he still reached out and took Alice’s head. Then he pulled a scraper, a brush, and a soft cloth from the small drawer under the chart table. With a sigh, he began to examine the joint of this foolish girl.

He could not help feeling a bit emotional.

He had already become able to face such bizarre scenes so calmly and even take part in them as if it were the most natural thing in the world.

Human adaptability really was a strange thing.

He picked up the scraper and gently scraped away the pieces of glue left in the joint, which were no longer very firm. Duncan lifted his eyelids and let his gaze sweep over Alice's face.

Her silver hair spread out over the chart table. The doll blinked and met his eyes.

She really was beautiful – a face so delicate and perfect that, no matter how strange the situation was, it could make people ignore the weirdness for a moment and silently praise that beauty instead.

It was a pity that, in everyday life, this girl's behavior was ridiculous past a certain limit. So while Duncan admired her pretty looks, he mostly felt regret in his heart that she had a mouth at all…

"Do you feel uncomfortable anywhere?"

"N?no, no, no, just a little, little bit itchy, but it is… it is very light," Alice stammered.

Then she went quiet. Even Goathead beside them fell strangely silent. In the room, only the faint scraping of the tool and the soft sound of waves outside the window remained.

After some unknown time, Alice suddenly opened her mouth again.

She stammered, her tone holding a bit of hesitation and a rare hint of sadness: "C?c?captain, am I… am I very, very stupid?"

Duncan's hand suddenly stopped.

He was surprised that this doll could even have this kind of self?awareness and thought.

But then he simply shook his head with a blank face: “Why are you suddenly thinking about that?”

“I… I?I can never learn the things you?you teach me, and I al?always mess things up, and I… I?I just waste your… your time.”

Duncan stayed silent for a moment, then lifted the scraper again.

“I don’t think you are wasting my time,” he said calmly. “Also, you are indeed a bit stupid.”

“S?s?so that’s… that’s how it is.”

“But that’s nothing,” Duncan went on. “Everyone has things they are good at and things they are not good at. We are only ‘stupid’ in the parts we are not good at. Maybe you just have a few more parts you are not good at.” He glanced at Alice’s eyes. “Do you care about this a lot?”

“I… I?I don’t know. I didn’t… didn’t think about it before, but I am af?af? afraid this will slow… slow your work…”

“Then put away these useless worries,” Duncan shook his head. “You just need to go on living happily. If you run into something you can’t learn, then study it a few more times.”

“W?w?will you t?t?teach me a f?few more times then?”

“…If I have the time.”

Alice blinked. She seemed to think for a moment, then slowly smiled.

“Hehe…”

Hearing that familiar laugh, Duncan could not help smiling as well. He picked up the brush and the soft cloth and began to clean away the dry flakes of glue he had scraped off.

Just then, a distant yet clear voice suddenly sounded in his mind.

It was the voice of Morris.

Chapter 272: Turning North

Duncan paused in his work of cleaning the leftover glue from Alice, as if he were listening carefully to some distant sound. After a moment, he lowered his head again and used a soft cloth to wipe away the bits of debris on the table.

Alice blinked, looking at the captain with curiosity: “C?captain, w?what just h?happened?”

“Morris received a letter from a friend far away, and he is not very sure about what that letter says,” Duncan smiled as he stood up. While he went on cleaning the thin layer of dried glue from the joint in Alice’s neck, he said casually: “He wants me to help him check on the situation.”

“A friend f?far away?” Alice’s head, resting on the chart table, gave out a stuttering voice: “Is h?he in d?danger? Are we g?going to r?rescue him?”

Not much glue was left on the neck joint, and it was much easier to clean than the glue stuck in the hollow of the head joint. Duncan quickly dealt with the bit of dried glue and carefully finished the last strokes of wiping. Then he bent down and lifted Alice’s head, handling her as if she were a work of art, and gently set her back in place.

“We may be going to save someone,” he said softly as he turned the doll’s head left and right, “but we may also be going to help him rest in peace. Either way, we have to sail very far.”

As the doll’s head settled into place, the dull look in Alice’s eyes suddenly became lively. She gave her head a small shake, like a puppet that had just been given a soul, and her speech became smooth again: “Ah, then where are we going?”

Duncan put away the cleaning tools and looked toward the misty enchanted sea chart.

On the enchanted sea chart, the small light that stood for the Sea Mist was moving slowly. It had already sailed some distance away from Pland.

“North,” he said in a low voice, his gaze falling on Goathead. “Raise the jib and the topsail. Turn north—follow the Sea Mist.”

“Aye, Captain!”

……

Heidi set a small brown medicine bottle on the coffee table. About three? fifths of the clear potion inside was still left. In the slowly sinking evening sunlight, the liquid reflected a soft golden glow. In those ripples of gold, tiny bubbles seemed to rise out of it again and again, flickering near the surface without rest.

“This is the last dose. It is a little stronger than the medicines you used before. You can take it when you go to sea, three drops each time—though I suggest you start taking it now as well,” Miss Psychiatrist raised her head and looked at the gray?haired old captain in front of her. “As a captain who has spent half his life on the Boundless Sea, you should take better care of your health.”

“Thank you for the advice, Miss Heidi. I know my own condition,” Lawrence was neither impatient nor very warm. He picked up the bottle in curiosity and held it up in the sunlight to look at the bubbling liquid through the glass. “…It is a very pretty potion. Is it bitter?”

“A little, but mostly it tastes of herbs. I also added some honey to cover the bitterness,” Heidi said. “It will not be hard to swallow.”

As she spoke, she lifted her head and glanced at the sky outside the window.

The Sun was slowly sinking, and its slightly orange?red light shone through the glass window into the living room.

This was the home of Lawrence, captain of the White Oak. As an old and seasoned captain, Lawrence had filled his living room with many items that proved his years at sea—coral specimens taken from shallow coastal waters, models of wheels and ships, totems from distant city?states, and a large rack against the wall. It was packed with awards and souvenirs given by the Explorer Association, the city?state authority, and the four great Churches.

Now all these things that stood for glory and memories were submerged in the slanting sunlight, coated with a layer of golden glow that slowly faded.

It was time to leave. After the Sun went down, it was no longer a good time to go on with mental counseling.

“I should go,” Heidi let out a small breath and rose from the sofa. Her gaze fell on the bottle in Lawrence’s hand. “Please do not forget to take it. It can help you resist the mental strain brought by the Boundless Sea.”

“Thank you. You have already helped me a lot,” the gray?haired Lawrence also stood up, a sincere smile on his face. “I will walk you out.”

Heidi was escorted to the door by the old captain, but before she left, she could not help looking at Lawrence a few more times and saying: “I have one last piece of advice. Your condition is still fairly good compared to other captains your age, but you really have reached retirement age. You should think about handing the White Oak over to a reliable successor.”

After saying what she wanted to say, she did not wait for his answer. She simply gave a small polite bow and said goodbye before leaving.

The figure of Miss Psychiatrist walked toward the car parked at the corner of the street, and Lawrence let out a light sigh and turned back into the living room.

His wife was leaning with her arms folded against the nearby doorframe, looking this way with some displeasure.

She was a tall woman. Though now she was getting old, one could still see a hint of the grace she had in her youth. She stood there as if she were once again standing on the deck of a ship…still that famous female explorer on the Boundless Sea.

But the mood of this former explorer was clearly not very good.

“Day after day, it is either Church inspections or a psychiatrist coming to the door. Just what kind of trouble did you cause out there!” She glared at him and raised her voice. “And what is with that medicine bottle? You never said your mind had gotten so bad you needed drugs just to keep going.”

“It was not as if I wanted to run into that ghost ship,” Lawrence glanced at the bottle in his hand and shook his head helplessly. “But it is fine now. The whole city?state went through the Vanished incident, so no one cares about the White Oak anymore. As for this medicine…it is nothing. After spending so long at sea, it is normal to have the odd hallucination now and then.”

His wife did not answer. She only stared at him for a long time. After several minutes she sighed: “Still not retiring?”

“I want to search a bit more…” Lawrence said, not very sure of himself. “After all…back then there was never any clear news of their deaths…”

“You are going to die out there sooner or later!” His wife raised her voice again and pointed at Lawrence’s nose. “What was that? It was a great storm on the Boundless Sea! A storm like that passes, a ship goes off its route, and an entire crew disappears without contact—that means they are dead! Do you understand?

“Look at yourself. How many years have you been searching? You are long past the age of retirement. The captains who started with you and had some sense have already retired. Now they can at least enjoy the savings they built up over half a life. And those foolish ones who held on like you—what ends did they meet? Drooling in bed? Lying in the graveyard? Locked up in an asylum?

“I am telling you to take this medicine right now. Then tomorrow go do the handover. Give the White Oak to one of those trusted men you trained from when he was young. Come home and live out the rest of your days on your pension. Do not damn well wait until the day you die in some storm too. I cannot carry that worry for you…”

Lawrence listened to his wife’s scolding as her voice grew louder and louder. He only gave a mild smile and did not argue. At last he set the small brown bottle back on the coffee table and said: “Let me search one last time.”

His wife finally fell silent. She stared at the bottle on the table. After who knew how long, she let out a breath that still held some anger and muttered as if giving in: “Where will you search this time?”

“North,” Lawrence said calmly. “The first place. The waters where the Black Oak met the storm. I have just taken an escort job to Frostholm…”

His wife did not say anything. She only waved her hand in silence.

……

Morning sunlight spread over the streets, and Pland was slowly waking from a night’s sleep.

Vanna bent to step out of the car and narrowed her eyes a little in the sunlight. At the end of her gaze she saw the familiar sign of the antique shop she had visited once before.

The shop was already open. A thin, small girl with black hair and a black dress was sprinkling water at the door. Another girl about the same age was hanging the open sign on the front door.

If she remembered right, one girl was named Shirley and the other Nina—the latter was the shopkeeper's niece.

Vanna rubbed her forehead and tried to recall her last visit to the antique shop. For some reason, some of the details now felt strangely blurry.

That only made her more sure she needed to come and take a look today.

A subordinate's voice came from inside the car: "How long will you be away?"

"Within an hour," Vanna answered. "Just wait here for me."

"All right." The young guardian in charge of driving nodded in the car, but still reminded her with some worry: "Please watch the time. Today is the day the Storm Cathedral arrives in Pland. You must attend the welcoming ritual in person. Bishop Valentine asked me to remind you. Also, this stop was not on our schedule…"

"All right, all right. You have already said that several times," Vanna waved her hand, looking a bit helpless. "I know everyone is nervous about the Storm Cathedral docking this time. I will watch the time."

"…All right, then I will wait here for you."

Chapter 273: charm amulet?

A tall figure suddenly blocked the sunlight.

Shirley had just finished sprinkling water on the ground in front of the shop and was carrying the empty basin back when she froze. She looked up and saw, backlit by the light, an inquisitor standing quietly in front of her.

“…Holy crap!!” she blurted out before she could stop herself. Then she suddenly caught herself, coughed twice in a hurry, and tried to put her words together with a very tense face: “Uh, well, you…you…”

Vanna frowned slightly. For some reason, she felt that this small, thin girl was much too nervous every time she saw her. It had been like this the last time she and Heidi came to this antique shop, and it was still the same now.

But she did not think much of it. For many reasons, she was already quite used to this “nervous reaction” when people saw her.

“I remember your name is Shirley,” Vanna said with a smile, trying to put the short girl at ease. “Do not be so nervous. I am only here to look around.”

Shirley quickly stood up straight and nodded stiffly: “Uh…ah! Right, welcome…”

Vanna shook her head in helplessness, stepped past the still?tense Shirley, and gave a small nod to greet Nina, who was watching curiously. Then she headed straight for the antique shop.

When she pushed open the door, the clear sound of a bell rang out, breaking the quiet on the antique shop's first floor. Vanna stepped inside and turned her gaze to the figure behind the counter.

In the next second, she frowned in slight surprise.

In the morning sunlight, a blond woman Vanna had never seen before was sitting behind the counter. She was a very…beautiful lady, with an elegant and mysterious air that felt as if it did not belong to this place, or even to this age. Her profile seemed to glow with a warm light in the sun.

When she heard the sound at the door, the blond woman behind the counter lifted her head and gave Vanna, who was walking in, a curious look. She showed a faint smile, and her voice was soft and a little husky: "Welcome. Take your time and look around?"

Vanna went blank for a moment. For some reason, she felt that this new face in the antique shop should not be here. But in the next moment, she felt that the woman's mysterious and elegant air oddly matched the atmosphere the antique shop gave off…

This place was full of all kinds of old and mysterious?looking things. It seemed right that a lady with a mysterious and elegant air should be sitting behind the counter.

But everything in this antique shop was a replica.

Vanna fixed her gaze on the blond woman behind the counter.

Ah, yes. replicas.

"Excuse me…" Alice looked at Vanna in some confusion. After coming in, Vanna had just stood there staring off into space, and this seemed to go beyond the captain's usual "standard process for dealing with guests." Alice suddenly did not know what to do. "Are you here to buy something?"

Vanna gave a little start and snapped back to herself.

A hazy numbness and dizziness filled her head, making her thoughts break apart. She vaguely remembered that she had just seen something or thought of something, but the sudden confusion wiped away everything she had seen and known in that instant.

In the next second, the sound of gentle waves rose again in her mind. In that sound, even the numbness and dizziness from just now faded from her memory.

She felt as if she had only just walked into the shop, and the young woman behind the counter was talking with her.

“Ah, is Mr. Duncan not here?” Vanna looked around the first floor in curiosity and did not see the antique shopkeeper. “I know him.”

“Mr. Duncan? He went upstairs to put something away. He will be down soon,” Alice did not care much about Vanna’s daze just now. As long as the talk could go on, she felt everything was fine. “Do you want to buy something? Did you reserve something? I can help you look for it—though I may not be able to find it…”

What a blunt way to put it.

Vanna felt strange. Her instincts told her that there was something off about the pretty young woman in front of her, but every time she tried to focus on that thought, it slipped away at once. Even her speech became slower than usual: “I…am just looking. I will wait for a bit. May I ask…are you new? I did not see you the last time I was here.”

“Ah, I am new. My name is Alice,” Alice said at once with a smile. She liked introducing her name to others. “Mr. Duncan asked me to help mind the shop.”

Vanna seemed to sense something faintly wrong. It hid in Alice's reserved yet slightly stiff movements, in that perfect yet a bit too perfect smile, and even in the way she spoke with no breath flowing through her words.

The inquisitor frowned, but she still did not truly catch anything strange.

It was only a new shop assistant. There was nothing odd about that.

Just then, footsteps sounded from the nearby stairs, cutting off the talk between Vanna and Alice.

Duncan's figure appeared on the staircase.

Just now he had already sensed Vanna's arrival. To be sure of this inquisitor's purpose, he had stayed on the second floor for a few extra minutes. Only when he saw that she did not seem to have any special reason for coming did he walk down.

"Looks like we have a special guest," Duncan said to the doll behind the counter. "I will take care of this one. We know each other—Alice, go make some tea."

"All right, Mr. Duncan!"

Alice stood up happily. After answering, she walked toward the small stove on the other side of the stairs. Duncan came over to stand in front of Vanna and greeted this inquisitor he had already met many times with a smile: "Long time no see, Miss Inquisitor."

"Just call me by my name," Vanna rubbed her forehead. "Sorry for coming without warning. I actually have some questions I want to confirm."

"Questions?" Duncan raised his eyebrows. "What kind of questions?"

Vanna steadied herself and thought about how to begin.

Some vague clues pointed toward this plain little shop. Some instinct had led her here. The experience and senses of an inquisitor seemed to stir inside her. Yet the Church had already investigated this place through official channels and had found no anomaly at all. The only reason she really had to support this visit seemed to be her friend's amulet.

"As far as I know, Heidi once had an amulet that came from here," Vanna said slowly. "Before that Mortal Realm corruption disaster, she always wore it."

"Oh, I remember that," Duncan nodded as if nothing was out of the ordinary, with a faint look of realization. "I gave that amulet to Mr. Morris —and in the last two days I sent out another one."

As he spoke, he turned around, took another amulet from the shelf behind him, and held it up in front of Vanna.

"Just like this."

Vanna looked at the antique shopkeeper with a strange expression as he openly took his "treasures" off the shelf like mass?produced goods: "You have many of these charm amulets here?"

"I bought a whole crate. Counting the ones I gave away and sold, twenty? one have gone out so far," Duncan nodded in all seriousness. "Are you interested too?"

As he spoke, he could not help giving the young inquisitor another look.

Vanna felt very strange to him today. She looked a bit absent?minded, and her words came out slightly slow. But more than these surface signs, what felt off was her unstable "aura" at this moment.

Duncan could not say what it was, but this young inquisitor now gave him the feeling that there was another person hidden inside her thoughts, another pair of eyes behind her eyes. She was standing here talking with him, yet deep in her mind something else seemed to be hiding.

Vanna seemed not to notice Duncan's careful gaze. She was only a bit unused to his open way of doing business—though from the start she had known there was nothing truly genuine in this shop: "Uh…no, I am only here to ask about some things. I would like to know the exact supply channel for these charm amulets, and also whether they have ever shown anything special. Have the people who bought them ever reported anything unusual?"

"You mean…"

"Heidi believes that the charm amulet she wore back then gave her real protection and even helped her stay conscious during that disaster," Vanna said briefly, without going into detail. "I think the charm amulet you gave Mr. Morris was very likely touched by some extraordinary power, so I came to investigate. Of course, you do not need to worry. From what we know so far, the influence does not seem to be harmful."

She said this, but left one thing unsaid: an investigation was one thing, but before coming here she had not expected Duncan to have a whole crate of these charm amulets—and to have already sold so many!

Duncan, on the other hand, felt a small jolt in his heart when he heard Vanna's words.

That thing…had really worked? The "gift" he had given away so casually had actually protected that psychiatrist's sense of self?

Why had that happened?

What was the key?

Was it the act of giving the "gift" itself, or was it because that psychiatrist's "inspiration" was unusually high?

Chapter 274: A Pleasant Meeting

At that moment, Duncan went through all the charm amulets he had handed out in recent times. He thought for a long while before finally letting out a small breath of relief.

In his memory, the only charm amulets he had given away as special gifts were the two he gave to Morris. The rest were just ordinary goods, and after all this time, none of the customers who bought charm amulets had come back to report anything strange.

After he relaxed, Duncan could not help falling into thought.

Although the cause of the charm amulet's change was still unclear, the news Vanna brought had clearly served as a warning. It made him more aware, and mentally prepared, for the "weird phenomena" that might appear around him.

From now on… it seemed he could not casually give things to people, nor casually agree to things anymore.

Duncan's brief silence drew Vanna's notice. She looked over at him with curiosity: "Did you remember something?"

"…I went over everything from lately, and nothing seems wrong." Duncan shook his head. His expression stayed calm, but his tone was sincere. "Could it be that Heidi was mistaken?"

"Not likely. She is a senior psychiatrist, she knows something about the supernatural field, and she is very clear about her own mental state." Vanna shook her head. “But the problem with the charm amulet really could have happened somewhere else… Maybe an supernatural item got mixed in with ordinary goods, or maybe something happened in the manufacturing process…”

Vanna spoke slowly, but it did not sound like she was explaining it to Duncan. It sounded more like she was hypnotizing herself, trying to convince herself.

As an Inquisitor, she should not have been lax about a potential supernatural incident, yet in the end her attention still drifted away from the matter of the charm amulet.

The sound of gentle waves echoed in her mind, bringing wave after wave of calm. It also made her slowly forget why she had come here in the first place.

Vanna raised her head and quietly looked around the antique shop.

The girl named Shirley had already returned to the shop. She was putting things on the shelves while carefully glancing in this direction.

Nina was also in the shop helping out.

The blonde woman named Alice bustled beside the small stove.

Mr. Duncan sat behind the counter with a friendly smile on his face.

The noise of traffic on the street outside sounded a little distant. Inside the shop, the kettle was starting to whistle louder and louder. In a corner of the nearby shelf, some shadows seemed to wriggle and jump. The stairs leading to the second floor looked as if they stretched up into endlessly high darkness.

The whole building seemed filled with faint, almost inaudible whispers.

“The tea is ready.” Alice’s voice came from the side. She brought over a cup of hot tea, set it on the counter, and pushed it toward Vanna. “Please enjoy.”

Vanna silently picked up the cup, raised it to her lips, took a sip, and then started to chew. The scalding tea and tea leaves went down into her stomach as she swallowed, without the slightest change in her expression.

Duncan was almost struck dumb by the sight. It was the first time he had ever seen someone so calm while swallowing down Alice’s tea. Miss Vanna really lived up to her title as Pland’s number-one beauty and tough hero; no ordinary person could compare.

After a while, when he saw that Vanna was only looking around and showed no sign of speaking, Duncan finally could not help breaking the silence: “Besides the charm amulet, was there anything else?”

“Ah, sorry, I spaced out for a moment.” Vanna seemed to wake up all at once, then suddenly coughed hard a few times, as if something had gone down the wrong way. She frowned at the empty teacup in front of her, then shook her head. “No, that was all. I only came to ask about this matter.”

“If you are interested in the charm amulets, I can give you one.” Duncan smiled as he pushed forward the charm amulet he had taken down earlier. “You can take it back and study it slowly.”

Vanna looked in surprise at the “crystal” charm amulet in front of her. She stared for a moment before asking: “How much is it?”

“I’ll just give it to you. It isn’t worth much anyway. I usually throw them in as freebies with other sales,” Duncan said with a half-smile. “Or I can make up a fancy product story for you on the spot. Do you want the ancient artifact version or the health?and?wellness version?”

Vanna was left blinking, completely taken in: “You… sell things here like that?”

“Honest business,” Duncan said, spreading his hands. “If I really sold it, the original price would be eight sola. Add a set of health?and?wellness theory and it becomes sixteen. Add a historical story and it’s twenty?two. If you pay twenty?five, I can throw in a black walnut box—the box comes with a promise that the finish won’t fade for half a year. And I can even write you a receipt for two hundred.”

Vanna had lived in the Upper City since childhood. Before she came of age she entered the Church for training, and once she became an adult she went straight to fighting heretics with a sword. In more than twenty years of life, she had never seen anything like this, and she was a little dazed: “A… receipt for two hundred?”

“You can use it as a gift for coworkers,” Duncan said with a straight face. “And young people can give it to their lovers…”

Vanna thought about it seriously, then shook her head: “Then I probably don’t need that—but I can’t just take your things for free.”

As she spoke, she reached into her clothes, took two ten?sola bills from her pocket, and laid them on the counter.

“Eight sola is the original price—the rest is thanks for your cooperation, and for the tea just now.”

Duncan opened his mouth, wanting to say something more, but saw that Vanna had already stood up and picked up the crystal pendant.

“This was a pleasant meeting.” She slowly showed a smile and suddenly spoke in a very solemn tone as she lifted her hand and put the crystal pendant around her neck. “I look forward to next time.”

Duncan felt she suddenly seemed a bit strange and frowned without thinking, but in the end he did not say more. He just nodded politely: “All right then. You’re welcome to come again.”

Vanna gave a slight nod and turned to leave.

She walked straight through the shop, out the front door, and stepped onto the open space in front of the antique shop, then stopped there.

A series of sharp beeps from a horn suddenly sounded from the roadside nearby.

Vanna blinked. Only then did she notice the car parked by the road, and remember that the Storm Cathedral was arriving in Pland today. She hurried over, opened the door, and got in.

“You finally came out,” the young subordinate waiting in the car said as he quickly started the engine. “It’s been almost an hour and a half. I was thinking that if you still didn’t come out, I’d go in…”

“An hour and a half?” Vanna was a little surprised. “I thought… only forty minutes had passed.”

As she spoke, she tapped her forehead lightly. She felt as if she had forgotten something and could not help muttering under her breath: “I left too quickly just now. I don’t think I even said goodbye.”

“You can do it next time. The shop isn’t going anywhere,” the young subordinate said casually. Then, through the rearview mirror, he saw the crystal charm amulet now hanging on Vanna’s neck and couldn’t help being surprised. “Is that a new pendant you bought? That’s unexpected. You usually don’t buy these things.”

“Pendant?” Vanna lowered her head in confusion and glanced at her chest. After two seconds she spoke, her voice a little hesitant: “Ah… yes, I bought it…”

She shook her head, as if fully awake now.

“Let’s drop it. Drive faster. Go straight to the Harbor.”

…

Inside the antique shop, Shirley was the first to run up to the counter. Uneasy, she glanced back in the direction Vanna had left, then turned to Duncan: “Why did that Inquisitor come here? Was she here to arrest me?”

“You’re overthinking.” Duncan looked at the nervous girl, a helpless look on his face. “She came to investigate something else. It has nothing to do with you.”

“Oh, as long as she wasn’t here to arrest me.” Shirley let out a breath of relief, but then couldn’t help muttering, “She felt weird today. She kept talking in bits and pieces.”

“Maybe it’s the pressure from work,” Duncan said casually as he stood up from behind the counter. “Her direct superior is about to arrive, after all.”

Nina came over at this moment. Hearing Duncan’s words, she reacted at once: “Direct superior… You mean the news from the paper before? The Storm Cathedral?”

Duncan nodded with a smile, his gaze sweeping over Nina, Shirley, and Alice. Then he suddenly asked: “Interested?”

“Interested?” Shirley froze for a moment. When she reacted, her face showed sudden shock. “Wait, you’re not saying you want to go…”

“We won’t have much business today anyway. Most people either went to the cathedrals for mass or to the Harbor to watch. Sitting in the shop doing nothing is still doing nothing,” Duncan said, as if it were obvious. “Let’s go have a look. You don’t get to see the Storm Cathedral docking every year.”

As he finished speaking, Nina had already jumped up happily: “Great!”

Alice, on the other side, did not know what was going on, but when she saw Nina so excited, she started clapping too. Only Shirley wore a look like she had seen a ghost: “B?but… that’s the Storm Cathedral! If we go over there, won’t we…”

Duncan looked at her, half smiling: “Won’t what?”

Shirley looked up at Duncan, then lowered her head and thought for a moment. She shook her head hard: “Nothing at all!”

Duncan nodded in satisfaction.

Then he lifted his head, his gaze passing over the street outside, over the city blocks, toward Pland’s Harbor.

In his Transcendent Perception that covered the whole city?state, he could already feel a presence, vast and imposing, slowly approaching Pland.

The Storm Cathedral had arrived.

Chapter 275: The Storm Cathedral

In Duncan’s senses, something with an immense presence was slowly drawing near the city?state of Pland.

His perception could not actually leave Pland’s physical bounds and extend outward, but as that immense presence came closer, he could still sense in an indirect way a kind of “radiance”. It was like a heat source, something that shone with strong light, slowly coming into focus on the Boundless Sea.

A simple gigantic ship would not give this feeling, nor would a group of powerful priests.

Duncan narrowed his eyes a little. In the “darkness” outside the city?state of Pland, that mass of strong light and heat was slowly taking shape.

What it was giving off… was that the so?called power of the God?

A moment later, green flames suddenly flared up from a window on the antique shop’s second floor. Then a plump white dove flew out of the window and quickly crossed the sky.

…

Inside and outside the Harbor in the southeast part of Pland, a huge crowd had already gathered.

The Storm Cathedral, which cruised the seas year?round and almost never made port, was about to dock at the city?state. For any believer who followed the storm Goddess Gamona, this was a once?in?a?lifetime grand event. Whether to show their piety or simply to look upon the Storm Cathedral's majestic form, none of Pland's citizens wanted to miss today's spectacle.

When the Sun rose this morning and the curfew ended, residents living near the Harbor had already begun to gather. By the time it was close to noon, almost every spot near the Harbor that could be used to watch the ceremony was filled.

After that, the area around the Harbor went under traffic control. City Hall no longer allowed more spectators to approach the docks and worked with the Church to guide people to the various sanctuaries.

When the Storm Cathedral docked, mass rituals would also be held at the cathedrals across the city at the same time. On one hand, these rituals were of course to "welcome the Goddess's glory". On the other, they were meant to ease the pressure on the Harbor district and split up the believers.

Beyond the packed crowds, inside the Harbor district itself, lay the "ceremonial area" that the Church Guardians and city constables had temporarily sealed off. The local leadership of the Church and the city's high?ranking officials had gathered there, already prepared to welcome the Storm Cathedral.

After hurrying all the way, Vanna finally reached the Harbor in time.

"You were almost late." Governor Dante, who was waiting at the Harbor to welcome them, glanced at his niece rushing over, his single eye full of helplessness. "On such an important day, you, an Inquisitor, are actually the last to arrive."

"Something unexpected came up." Even as an Inquisitor, Vanna could not keep her usual presence in front of her uncle. With a hint of embarrassment on her face, she said, “I had planned my time well. I should have arrived at least half an hour early…”

“The Goddess will forgive you,” came the voice of Archbishop Valentine from the side. The elder was dressed in full ceremonial robes, holding the long staff that symbolized the city?state’s bishop. A faint smile rested on his face. “There is still some time before the appointed moment.”

Vanna nodded, let out a small breath, and looked around.

The view around the pier was wide. Guardians and constables had cordoned off a fairly large ceremonial area, but once her gaze went past that open space, she could see countless spectators in the distance, a sea of heads.

In all of Pland, nearly three?quarters of the residents were baptized believers of the Deep Sea Church. Even among the remaining quarter, those who had not been baptized still kept a shallow faith in the storm Goddess Gamona under the influence of the city’s atmosphere.

This city?state was the largest gathering place of Deep Sea believers on the Boundless Sea, and the grand scene before them showed that with overwhelming force.

“The arrival of the Storm Cathedral can actually help us solve a lot of problems,” Dante’s voice reached Vanna’s ears. “With this great event, the unrest in the city can quickly settle down, and we can release the news about the ‘Visions’ more gently. Honestly… I really feel relieved.”

“For believers, ‘being under the God’s gaze’ is more comforting than anything,” Bishop Valentine replied. “With the Goddess’s protection and witness, we can show the greatest unity and resilience, and we can face even extreme cases, including ‘the city becoming a Vision’, with calm.”

“Maybe the Storm Cathedral’s arrival is exactly to help us get through this crisis,” Dante said. “It’s just that Her Holiness the Pope has not said so outright.”

“Her Holiness has her own reserve. Besides, every message she sends out has to be guided by the God…”

While her uncle and the old bishop spoke beside her, Vanna’s attention slowly left them. She gazed out at the endless sea in the distance, waiting for that towering Cathedral to appear in her sight.

The appointed time was almost here, yet there was still no sign of that astonishing giant ship on the calm sea.

Yet in the very next second, the corner of Vanna’s eye suddenly caught a momentary distortion on the sea.

The sea water curled, the sky trembled, and the sunlight on the waves suddenly rippled out, turning into layers upon layers of cloud?like veils. An engineering construct almost as large as the entire Harbor district abruptly rose onto the sea’s surface, as if it had crossed straight through dimensions to appear in Vanna’s sight!

It had not fully appeared yet and still looked faint and unreal, but its vast, rolling presence was already sweeping toward them, shaking the heart.

Even as the city?state’s Inquisitor, this was Vanna’s first time seeing this ark?ship with her own eyes.

In an instant, feelings of excitement, thrill, and awe rose in her.

She held her breath without thinking, then looked to her side.

The high?ranking officials from City Hall craned their necks in anticipation. Bishop Valentine and her uncle were staring wide?eyed at the distance.

It seemed that the shock and astonishment were so great that they had forgotten to speak.

After another two or three seconds, Bishop Valentine’s eyes lit up. He raised his staff high and brought it down hard. The sound of the staff’s tip striking the ground rang out like thunder across the entire harbor square.

“Praise the name of the Storm!”

The high?ranking priests gathered near the pier answered in unison: “Praise the name of the Storm!”

Salute cannons fired. Magnificent music followed. Cheers thundered in and around the Harbor; everywhere she listened, the whole place boiled with sound.

Vanna looked out to the sea beyond the Harbor and saw that the earlier strange scene of curling water and shifting light had already settled. The majestic Storm Cathedral had dropped all cover and disguise and was slowly drawing close to Pland’s shore.

The gathered crowd was in a frenzy.

Loud benedictions rang out everywhere, cheers and joy were everywhere, and even small children who didn’t understand what was happening were excited in the crowd. Together with the salute cannons and the music, the noise was deafening.

On the roof of a tower near the docks, Duncan stepped out from a door of flames and quietly watched the scene of noisy celebration and the huge cathedral?ark not far away, a structure that already went beyond the idea of a “ship” and made it hard to imagine how it could even move.

Nina and Shirley were beside him, too excited to sit still, noisily arguing about the structure of the cathedral?ark—Nina starting from the mechanical knowledge she had learned at school, while Shirley relied completely on wild imagination and stubborn confidence.

Alice seemed a bit nervous. She had never seen such a huge thing moving on the sea, and when the steam pipes on the side of the cathedral?ark suddenly vented and the loud whistle echoed through the sky, she instantly grabbed her head with both hands.

Duncan’s gaze slowly moved between the crowd gathered at the docks and the cathedral?ark’s towering triple spires.

He closed his eyes, then opened them again.

He saw countless gray?white phantoms spreading out from within the Storm Cathedral, like invisible tentacles or like ribbons of drifting smoke. These flowing shadows stretched out from every door, every window, even every mechanical seam of the cathedral?ark, rolling out in a mass like storm clouds to cover half the sky above Pland.

He saw those drifting shadows droop downward, sweeping over the gathered crowds and the bell?ringing towers.

The phantoms brushed lightly over the heads of the cheering Pland residents, who were clearly unaware of it.

It seemed no one could see those shadows, not even the priests of the Church who had very high Spirit Sight.

Or rather… was it exactly because they were priests of the Church that they could not see those shadows?!

What were these shadows? What were these invisible tentacles spreading out from the Storm Cathedral?

A huge question gathered in his heart. Duncan’s expression grew more and more serious. Without thinking, he reached his hand out into the air beyond the platform, as if trying to catch one of the phantoms.

At the same time, a gray?white phantom like smoke drifted over and slowly approached his palm.

The strip of smoke thickened a little and wrapped around Duncan’s fingers. In the next second, he actually felt a slight, cold touch, as if he had touched some kind of solid thing.

Then the gray?white “tentacle” snapped back at once, leaving only a cold, hollow feeling behind.

Chapter 276: Swift Judgment

The wisp of “smoke” that had briefly brushed against him faded away.

Yet more of the smoke kept leaking out from the Storm Cathedral. It drifted in the air, gathering and scattering, like a dark cloud drawing together above Pland. Its range grew wider and wider, until it slowly spread over half the city-state.

Duncan still felt a trace of cold on his fingertips. He frowned slightly and looked up at the sky over the city, his mind full of questions.

Those gray-white mists gave him a strange feeling… as if some giant being had lost its body, and its soul had risen within the Mortal Realm, turning into this unbound form. At the same time, it felt as if something behind the Mortal Realm was slowly releasing its own perception, using the fog as tentacles to “feel” the outline of the Mortal Realm.

That second feeling had been especially strong when he touched that strand of smoke.

“Uncle Duncan?” Nina’s voice suddenly came from beside him, cutting off Duncan’s wild thoughts. “Why are you holding your hand out like that?”

“…It’s nothing.” Duncan blinked and spoke softly.

Obviously, Nina could not see the smoke. Shirley and Alice beside her could not see it either, and neither could the ordinary people gathered in and around the docks.

But could the people on the Storm Cathedral see it? Could that woman on the Cathedral, the Pope who sat in command there and was seen as the earthly messenger of the Storm Goddess Gamona, see it?

Duncan quietly cast his gaze toward the vast “ark”, almost as large as the entire Harbor district. He watched it slow at the edge of Pland. He watched as the mechanisms along its side slowly shifted, as if growing limbs, extending a long mechanical bridge that reached out to connect with the piers of the Harbor.

During this process, that shapeless and invisible smoke clearly spread even further.

Duncan did not sense any hostility from the mist, nor did he feel that it was dangerous, so for the moment he did nothing.

…

According to the rites, after salutes were fired and music was played in the Harbor of Pland to show welcome, the Storm Cathedral extended the long mechanical bridge, completing the connection between the Pilgrimage Ark and the city-state. Then a second long, solemn blast of the whistle sounded from the ark.

Huge steam valves turned open. All across the Pilgrimage Ark, relief pipes and whistle devices activated at the same time. Jets of white vapor burst from the ramparts and spires of the Cathedral, shooting into the sky along with the whistle.

The bells of the city-state and the bell tower on the Cathedral ark rang together.

Vanna took a deep breath. Standing in such a solemn, awe-inspiring place, even as an Inquisitor she could not help feeling a little nervous.

After another moment, she saw colorful flags appear along the edge of the Cathedral ark. Right after that, a squad of church knights in special armor appeared on the long mechanical bridge. They rode Steam Walkers along the bridge to the dock. One of them stepped out of the line and came straight to the high-ranking priests.

“Bishop Valentine, Inquisitor Vanna. May the glory of the Lord of Storms be with you.”

The knight commander lowered his head. His whole body was covered in black alloy armor. Pressure pipes and steam valves ran across his breastplate and vambraces. A thick steel mask hid the knight’s real face. Vanna could only see the faint red glow in his goggles and hear the hiss of air mixed into his voice.

Steam was the breath of the god, and steel was the bridge between mortals and god. Behind the faceplate, the hiss in his words carried a sacred tone of preaching.

“May the glory of the Lord of Storms be with you.” Vanna lowered her head and spoke together with Bishop Valentine beside her.

“Her Eminence the Pope invites the two of you aboard the ark,” the knight commander said, his words wrapped in hissing air. “The others, please wait here for a while.”

Vanna looked up in surprise, then instinctively turned to Bishop Valentine, only to see the same puzzled look on his face.

Was this part of the formal rites?

“This is a temporary arrangement by the Pope,” the knight commander explained, seeing the confusion on the two high-ranking priests. “She has some things she wishes to ask you.”

“As Your Eminence commands.” Bishop Valentine quickly smoothed the doubt from his features and bowed his head respectfully.

Vanna also came back to her senses and lowered her head to show she accepted the order.

“Please, priests and city officials, wait a moment. You may also go to the side and rest a little,” the knight commander said, nodding slightly to Dante and the others. “Do not worry. It will not take long.”

Vanna and Bishop Valentine stepped onto the mechanical bridge leading to the Storm Cathedral. The grand Cathedral loomed closer and closer in her sight. At the same time, it gave off an even stronger, almost suffocating aura of majesty.

Just walking toward it made Vanna feel her heart start to pound.

Noticing the hesitation in her steps, Bishop Valentine shook his head lightly. “Relax. This is not your first time seeing Her Eminence the Pope.”

“…Yes. I understand.”

Led by a squad of church knights, Vanna and Valentine crossed the long bridge and walked over the connection deck, which was almost as wide as a dock square. At last they were brought into a huge shaft lift.

Vanna had thought the shaft lift would take her to some place on the upper levels of the Cathedral ark. But inside, she felt the entire car sinking instead.

The descent went on for a long time, long enough that Vanna could not help wondering if the shaft lift went straight down into the sea. Only then did the squeaking of the cables suddenly stop.

The door of the shaft lift opened.

A church knight’s voice came from beside them: “Please walk forward on your own. Her Eminence the Pope is waiting for you ahead.”

Still a little dazed, Vanna followed Valentine out of the shaft lift. Behind them, the metal gate slammed shut with a scraping sound. The two of them looked forward and saw a place almost completely covered in darkness.

They could only vaguely make out a richly dressed figure standing in the very dim middle of the room.

Vanna hesitated for a moment, then took a step forward.

As she stepped out, the soft pop of igniting flames suddenly broke the silence in the dark space.

Pop, pop, pop. Several small bursts sounded in a row as braziers were lit one after another. The firelight instantly drove away the darkness around the shaft lift, letting Vanna clearly see Pope Helena standing not far away. It also showed her, in shock, that this place was far larger than she had imagined.

Even with several braziers burning, the distant space was still drowned in shadow. Vanna could not see where this “room” ended. She could only see the gray-black, slightly rough floor stretching out before her, all the way into the dark. At the edge of the firelight, she could faintly make out huge “pillars”, with many crisscrossing shadows between them. They looked like the pipe system at the bottom of the Cathedral ark, or perhaps its support structures.

Was this the lowest hold of the Pilgrimage Ark?

Why would the Pope choose to receive her and Bishop Valentine down here?

Questions rose in Vanna’s heart, but before she could speak, a gentle yet authoritative voice came from ahead: “You have come, Saint Valentine, and Saint Vanna. Welcome aboard the ark."

"Your Eminence the Pope." Vanna quickly put away the doubts in her heart. After fixing her expression, she saluted together with Bishop Valentine. When the salute was over, she lifted her gaze slightly and asked carefully: "You summoned us here because…"

But Helena did not let Vanna finish. Instead, she suddenly asked a strange question: "Do you know what this place is?"

"Is this… not the Storm Cathedral?" Valentine raised his head and blinked in confusion. "The lower part of the Storm Cathedral?"

"We are indeed directly beneath the Storm Cathedral, but in strict structural terms, this area is no longer part of the Cathedral itself." Helena smiled. In the light of several braziers, there seemed to be a deeper meaning hidden in that smile. "You are standing on the lowest level of the Pilgrimage Ark, in the 'belly' of this giant beast."

She lifted her head, her gaze slowly moving between Vanna and Valentine.

"Here we stand under the gaze of the Lord of Storms, and also at the place closest to the Deep Sea. The Lord's blessing and the Lord's judgment coexist here."

Helena's gaze came to a stop, but she was not looking at Vanna or Valentine.

It was as if she was speaking to the empty darkness.

"After one's faith wavers, is it very hard to keep fulfilling one's duties?"

The expression on Vanna's face froze at once.

Valentine's did as well.

An almost unbearable tension filled this wide, dim space.

After an unknown time, Vanna was the first to react. She took a deep breath. “My faith…”

“I did not ask about your faith.” Helena shook her head. “I asked whether, after your faith wavered, it has become harder than before for you to continue carrying out your duties.”

Vanna was stunned for a moment, as if she had not yet grasped the deeper meaning in the Pope’s words. Beside her, Bishop Valentine looked suddenly enlightened after a brief shock. The old bishop spoke at once: “I have carried out my duties as always. Protecting the city-state and guiding the believers all come from my own heart…”

“Good, Saint Valentine. Your steadfastness moves me. You shall continue to carry out your duties as Protector of the city-state of Pland until the end.

“Saint Vanna, I have also seen your confusion. In light of your actual situation, I must announce the temporary suspension of your office as Inquisitor of Pland.

“This decision takes effect immediately.”

Helena spoke so fast that she finished before Vanna and Valentine could react.

The two Saints on the spot stared at each other.

Valentine: “…?”

Vanna: “…?”

Chapter 277: A New Storm

Vanna and Valentine both stood there in a daze at this sudden turn of events. Pope Helena's "judgment" felt less like a solemn religious ruling and more like something carried out just to reach a set result. The result had already been decided; what they had just said was only a formality.

Such a hasty "ruling" was, of course, hard for Vanna the Inquisitor to accept. Even Valentine at her side could not accept it. They spoke at the same time: "Your Eminence the Pope…"

"Enough, enough. It is not such a bad thing. Life is always full of rises and falls, just like storms are always the hardest to predict." Helena waved her hand, cutting off Vanna and Valentine. "And do not sink into loss so easily, Saint Vanna. Laying down the duties of an Inquisitor is not necessarily a punishment. It only means you are, for now, not suited to this job. Perhaps… the storm has other favor in store for you."

Vanna paused. She seemed to catch a faint hint of something in Helena's tone. But just as she was about to ask, she saw the Pope shake her head at her.

"Let us stop here for now. There are other things I must see with my own eyes before I can decide," Helena said calmly. "Pland… It has been many years since I last set foot on this land myself."

She paused for a moment.

"You two go back to the upper deck first. The shaft lift is ready. I will complete a benediction here. It will not take long. We will meet on the upper deck.”

Before she even knew what was happening, Vanna found herself being “sent” back into the shaft lift together with Valentine. Only when the shaft lift reached the top, when they stepped out of the car and were walking along the corridor toward the upper deck, did Valentine finally break the silence in a low voice: “Vanna, how… do you feel now?”

He really could not think of any better way to break the awkward mood.

Vanna stopped walking.

Valentine stepped a little to the side.

“You stepped away two paces. Are you serious?”

“I am afraid you are serious.”

“You can still crack dry jokes, so it seems you have also noticed how strange this is.” Vanna shook her head and spoke softly. “To be honest, my first reaction was disbelief and refusal. Such a rushed and careless ‘ruling’ feels more like a bad joke, and not something that should come from the mouth of Her Eminence the Pope. But then I went back over her words in my mind, and I keep feeling… she had some deeper intent.”

As she spoke, she let out a light breath. “I think I should be patient and wait —for the ‘special favor of the storm’ that Her Eminence spoke of.”

“Your calm and reason really are far above most people. When something like this suddenly falls on their head, most people would not be able to think it through as quickly as you have,” Valentine said, stepping forward again as they walked. “But more than that, there is something else I care about right now.”

Vanna frowned a little. “Something else?”

“When an Inquisitor is removed, a new Inquisitor has to take over. A post as important as city-state Inquisitor must be personally ‘tested’ and appointed by the Pope. You know that process very well,” Valentine said slowly. “But Her Eminence the Pope did not mention this at all. It should have been a ‘necessary matter’ announced along with your removal, or even in advance.”

Vanna subconsciously frowned again, but did not speak at once. Valentine went on: “Also, she chose to announce your removal in a ‘secret chamber’ known to no one. By church law, the secrets given by the Pope in a secret room must not be spoken by any other mouth, no matter what those secrets are. This serves as a kind of ‘safety signal’.”

Vanna had to admit that, as young as she was, she did not know the Storm Canon as deeply as an experienced priest like Bishop Valentine did. She had not thought of these key points at all.

“You mean…”

“No one will know about your removal,” Valentine said softly, looking calmly into Vanna’s eyes. “And no new Inquisitor will come to take over your post.”

Vanna blinked, her brows knitting. “Then how am I supposed to keep doing my duty in Pland?”

“I do not know,” Valentine said quietly. He lifted his head to look toward the end of the corridor ahead. After thinking a moment, he added, “But I suspect you may soon no longer need to carry out your duties in Pland.”

…

In the vast space below, Pope Helena stood quietly among the dim firelight. After a long time, she finally lifted her head and looked toward the distant darkness.

This was the very bottom of the Pilgrimage Ark, an area that ordinary people almost never had a chance to see and could not even imagine. She called it the “belly of the giant beast”, and in a sense, that was not wrong at all.

Helena started walking. She passed the burning braziers and reached a place that had not been lit by the fire before.

Clusters of flame spread out with her steps, slowly lighting up the whole dark space and revealing what had been hidden.

Vein-like patterns twisted across the floor. From the high dome hung huge tumor-like masses or nerve nodes. Nerve bundles and vascular pillars dangled from the dome, along with great pale supports that looked like bones.

All these things that had been swallowed by darkness now appeared before Helena’s eyes as the firelight spread.

She finally stopped in front of a huge “pillar”.

It was a pillar formed by many complex structures winding and piling together. Its surface was uneven, wrapped all over with nerve fibers and vascular systems like relief carvings. Deep within those nerves, she could faintly see tangled metal wires and silver needles glittering, as if they had crept down from the layers above.

At the top of this pillar, on the dim dome, even more dense hanging organs could be seen. Their surfaces were full of ridges and grooves, looking very much like… brains.

Helena stared at the pillar for a long time. Then she reached out and slowly stroked the ridged grooves formed by the nerve fibers.

“The Truth Academy… truly unbelievable craft,” she murmured in praise. “Who would have thought that a dead Leviathan could be ‘brought back’ in this way…”

As soon as she finished speaking, a low, squirming sound came from within the pillar. A hoarse, old voice then rose from some unknown structure inside it: “First of all, I was not exactly dead from the start. Second, I do not think what I am now counts as ‘alive’ either. Using life and death to describe a Leviathan is not very precise, young lady.”

“…I thought you were asleep.”

“I am asleep most of the time. But today you prayed so formally to Queen Gamona, and you even brought outsiders down here. I felt I should at least stay awake.”

The corner of Helena’s mouth seemed to twitch. “…Then did you like what you saw?”

“I think you are rather heartless,” the hoarse old voice replied again. “She has done very well. In the combined ratings of Inquisitors from all the city-states, none have surpassed her. And yet you just dismissed her. Do not talk about wavering faith as an excuse. We both know that as long as one can keep doing the job, that reason is the least important of all.”

“This is the arrangement of the Lord of Storms.” Helena spoke quietly.

The hoarse old voice paused noticeably before speaking again: “…Oh. Then I have no problem with it.”

Helena shook her head helplessly. “I thought you would at least ask a few more questions.”

But this time, the hoarse old voice gave no reply at all.

He had fallen asleep.

…

On the boundless expanse of the Boundless Sea, the ironclad warship The Sea Mist was cutting through the waves. As the warship slowly “healed” and now ran at full power, the thin layer of icy mist returned around the hull, constantly forming small bits of floating ice on the nearby sea.

Tyrian went to the bow and looked out over the open water ahead.

For some reason, a vague unease had been nagging at him.

At first, he thought it was the lingering “damage from being beaten by his father”, the stress built up from seeing his father several times near Pland’s coast and inside the city. But as The Sea Mist sailed farther and farther from Pland, the unease not only failed to fade, it grew even stronger.

It even left him slowly growing a little irritable.

It felt as if something was about to happen—or had already happened—and that it was very likely connected to him.

As an supernatural, he trusted his intuition in such matters.

Tyrian took a deep breath and pressed his hand on the rail in front of him, frowning in thought.

Just then, as if to confirm his growing unease, hurried footsteps suddenly sounded behind him.

Tyrian turned sharply and saw First Mate Aiden hurrying toward him.

The first mate, usually so calm, now had clear worry on his face.

Tyrian frowned at once. “What happened?”

“The chapel on board just received a Psychic Transmission from home port. Something happened in the waters near Frostholm…”

“Near Frostholm?” Tyrian felt his heart skip a beat and pressed on, “What is the situation?”

“…An ancient diving device suddenly appeared in the waters off Frostholm,” Aiden said, drawing in a breath as he spoke. “It is Submersible No. 3—the eighth one.”

Chapter 278:

The veil of night was sinking deeper, and the cold World's Wound already hung high in the night sky. Under its pale glow, the entire city-state fell into silence.

On the second floor of the antique shop in the Lower City, Duncan stood at the small window at the end of the hallway. He quietly looked out at the silent street, at the uneven rooftops under the cold light, and at the pipes and valves that crossed the district above those roofs.

In another, distant sight, he could see the Vanished crossing the rolling waves of the Boundless Sea. The ship was sailing north through the night, chasing in the direction where the Sea Mist had gone.

Here in Pland, he extended his gaze over the entire city-state. Using that omnipresent sense, he scanned every corner of Pland.

He lifted his eyes a little and saw that the invisible "mists" were still floating above the city.

Those soul-like "smokes" released by the great storm Cathedral had stopped expanding after nightfall. Now they barely covered three quarters of Pland. They rose and fell slowly in the night sky like a thin veil, as if they were…

Taking a leisurely walk through the night sky.

Duncan withdrew his gaze from the sky and turned his attention to that enormous mass of Shadows at the edge of the city-state.

That was where the great storm Cathedral lay anchored.

The enormous Pilgrimage Ark clung to Pland's southeastern Harbor like a dark cloud. In Duncan's senses he could clearly feel the outline of this huge body, but he could not push his probing gaze into the interior of that great Cathedral.

For him, the inside of that great Cathedral was like an empty, dark black hole.

The ordinary ships moored in the Harbor could not block his senses at all. Within a range close enough to Pland, nothing could escape this kind of "touch" from him. Yet this great Cathedral was clearly an exception.

Was it because of Goddess Gamona's "protection"? Or because of some special shielding used by the Deep Sea Church?

Duncan was a little curious, but he did not take any excessive action. He had indeed considered just blasting it once with the green flame to see if he could break the storm Cathedral's defenses, but he only thought about it. After all, they had no grudges between them. There was no need to set fire to someone's house just to satisfy his curiosity.

At that moment, Duncan suddenly felt something. He quickly withdrew his senses from the storm Cathedral and lifted his head to look toward the Upper City.

He gazed thoughtfully at the hills that rose above the surrounding terrain and at Pland Cathedral standing in the night.

…

High in Pland Cathedral, a lounge was brightly lit. Pope Helena lit ritual candles mixed with spices and set the candlestick before a full-length mirror in the corner. Then she tilted her head slightly and looked at Vanna, who had been standing at her side for a long time.

“I heard that the first time you saw ‘him’ in a dream, your first reaction was to leap at him with a full-force jumping slash. What were you thinking at the time?”

A hint of embarrassment appeared on Vanna’s face as she said: “At the time… I didn’t really think about it.”

“When you say ‘I didn’t really think about it,’ it usually means ‘I didn’t think at all,’” Helena said with a smile. “That is actually good. Excellent Warriors usually let action move faster than thought. It is very useful when fighting Heretics and Malevolent Spirits—after all, ‘thinking’ itself can easily become our weakness.”

“…But I only feel lucky that my reckless move didn’t cause any consequences,” Vanna sighed helplessly. “Looking back, he didn’t seem to care about my ‘offense’ at all.”

“He doesn’t care. None of Them care,” Helena said softly. “Higher Beings care about broader, longer things… The good news is, our survival is at least included somewhere in what They care about.”

For a moment Vanna did not respond. Helena looked at this “Inquisitor” who was no longer an Inquisitor, smiling faintly, and said: “Vanna, you must have many questions you want to ask.”

“I want to know… what arrangements you have for me,” Vanna hesitated, then finally spoke. “You secretly removed me from my position as Inquisitor and still have not appointed a new guardian for the city-state. I feel a bit at a loss. I don’t know how I’m supposed to carry out my duty next.”

Helena listened calmly, without the slightest surprise on her face. When Vanna finished, the Pope, who still looked rather young, just smiled and turned to glance out the window.

Through the window framed with wrought-iron patterns, the city streets lit by countless gas lamps looked peaceful and calm.

“It is a very quiet night, Vanna,” the Pope said. “How many incidents of supernatural corruption or eldritch intrusion do you think tonight’s patrolling Guardians will report?”

Vanna froze for a moment, then spoke hesitantly: “…I’m not sure. The city-state really has been relatively safe these days, with hardly any incident reports, but…”

“Zero,” the Pope interrupted. “Tonight there will be zero incidents—just like yesterday, the day before yesterday, and tomorrow as well.”

Vanna opened her mouth.

“You have obviously noticed it too, but you still don’t dare draw a conclusion, do you?” Helena smiled and said: “A city whose nights are no longer dangerous. Even in the temporary darkness after the gas lamps go out, no Shadows grow anymore. The brightest pearl on the Boundless Sea has finally lived up to its name.”

Vanna finally began to catch up: “You mean…”

“Vision-Pland,” Helena nodded lightly. “Inside this large Vision, it seems there are no supernatural corruption phenomena other than Vision-Pland itself.”

“This is your conclusion from observation?”

“Did you think I came here only to let the citizens ‘pay their respects’ on the streets, and to accept greetings from priests and Officials in the great Cathedral?” Helena looked at Vanna with a half-smile. “I have my own ways of observing and judging the changes happening in this city-state.”

Vanna stood there with her mouth slightly open. It felt as if she had countless things to say, yet she suddenly did not know where to start. Messy, tangled thoughts filled her head. She only felt that what was happening once again went beyond her worldview, so much that her old logic could not even find a way to continue the conversation. After who knew how long, she finally blurted out: “So… Pland doesn’t need an Inquisitor anymore?”

“I’m not sure,” Helena said, surprising Vanna. The Pope shook her head, clearly uncertain herself. “This kind of thing has truly never happened before. But at least one point is clear: as long as the nature of Vision-Pland does not change, you really no longer need to work the way you used in the past. The duties of the city-state Guardians will also change greatly.”

Helena paused here, then went on, thinking as she spoke: “Even so, the city-state still needs the protection of Guardians. For now I can only be sure that inside Vision-Pland there will be no ‘naturally occurring supernatural corruption.’ But the threats we face are not limited to natural phenomena. Heretic elements, ancient Spawn, evil creations, those madmen who actively want to destroy the order of civilization will not stay quiet just because Pland has turned into a Vision.

“But overall, one thing is certain: Pland has become much safer.”

Helena stopped. Her gaze stayed calm as she met Vanna’s eyes, and after a few seconds she spoke again in a gentle voice: “Vanna, we are walking a very new path. No city-state and no Church has ever faced a situation like this.

“On the other hand, our world itself… seems to be undergoing some unsettling changes. Whether it is the ‘malfunction’ of Vision 001 or the movements of the Vanished, both are breaking the fragile balance that the city-states have maintained for thousands of years. In such a situation, the Goddess has given only very limited revelation… I can only act within this limited revelation.

“Vanna, you have great talent, and that talent should be placed in… somewhere more valuable. Pland is now in its safest state, but I don’t think you are someone who likes to sink into comfort, are you?”

Hearing the Pope’s words, Vanna instinctively straightened her back at once: “I am always ready to sacrifice everything for faith and justice!”

“Sacrifice everything?”

“Of course, everything!”

“And you would do anything without hesitation?”

“As long as it is the Goddess’s will!”

“Including going aboard the Vanished?”

“Including…”

Vanna started to answer loudly on instinct, but she choked after just a few words and almost lost her breath. Two seconds later she stared wide-eyed at the Pope before her and said: “What did you… just say, Your Eminence?”

“I said that our world is undergoing many disturbing changes, and among all these changes, the Vanished is at least the only one that has shown the possibility of communication and a tendency toward goodwill,” Helena said solemnly. “We need to establish a stable channel of communication with the master of the Vanished, and it is best if it has some official nature. You can consider yourself an Envoy, or you can see yourself as a ‘hostage’—personally I suggest you use the first description, but how you think about it is up to you.”

Vanna listened, dumbfounded. Only when the Pope finished did she finally find a chance to speak: “B-but… is that even reasonable? Going onto the Vanished… Is that what I think it means? Is that even possible?!”

Helena quietly watched the young, flustered “Inquisitor,” as if she had long expected this reaction. After a while she smiled and said: “It is reasonable.”

Chapter 279:

Compared to Vanna’s flustered confusion, Pope Helena remained calm from start to finish. She wore a smile, and that smile even seemed a little pleased.

Vanna, however, could not feel pleased at all—she could not see how any of this was “reasonable”!

“I think… this is far too sudden,” the young Inquisitor was racking her brains. She had no idea why the topic had suddenly veered in such a strange direction, and she was trying her best to make her logic catch up with the speeding carriage. “I understand the need to establish contact with the Vanished, but I think it should be done step by step. And if it is only for communication, we already have a way. That Captain Duncan…”

“He visits in dreams or speaks to you through mirrors, doesn’t he?” Helena interrupted gently. “I know. You mentioned it in your reports.”

“Then…”

“That is not enough,” Helena said with a smile, shaking her head. “That is only ‘conversation’, private conversation between you and Captain Duncan. This kind of channel has neither special status nor binding force. It is far from an official channel between the Deep Sea Church and the Vanished. Vanna, you should understand the difference.”

Vanna’s lips moved a few times. A thousand words surged to her throat, but in the end nothing came out.

She had already confirmed that this was not a joke, nor was it some whim of the “God’s Herald” before her. From Helena’s attitude and eyes, Vanna sensed something carefully thought out, and… some feelings she could not yet understand.

After a while she suddenly asked: “The Goddess’s will?”

“You can understand it that way—if it makes you feel any better.”

“…I understand,” Vanna took a light breath and finally calmed herself completely. She returned to her usual strict demeanor and lowered her head with a serious face. “Then I will obey this arrangement.”

“Go rest first,” Helena nodded lightly. “There is still much to do tomorrow.”

Vanna bowed her head again to accept the order, then turned and left the room.

Helena watched the tall figure of the young Inquisitor disappear beyond the door. Only after a long time did she pull back her gaze. Then she suddenly chuckled and shook her head with a hint of helplessness: “This child… She didn’t even ask how I plan to send her to that ship, and she still tried to pretend to stay calm…”

A steady, imposing voice sounded from the side at that moment, mixed with the crackling of leaping flames: “I am curious too. How do you plan to send her onto the Vanished?”

In front of the full-length mirror in the corner of the room, the flames on several candlesticks suddenly turned deep green. The eerie light lit up the mirror. The surface inside became dark and bottomless, and amid the phantom flames that spread quickly, Duncan’s figure stepped out from the depths of that darkness, quietly fixing his gaze on Helena standing in the room.

Helena did not turn around. Even after hearing Duncan's voice behind her, she still quietly gazed out the window and said: "Ah, you were watching after all."

"I couldn't help it. The abacus you are shaking is too loud. The beads are bouncing right into my face."

"…What is an abacus?"

"It's a Subspace joke," Duncan said with a straight face. After all this time, he had already grown used to occasionally making things up in the middle of a conversation. Watching people's confused reactions had become his greatest joy in the process. As for how the other side filled in the blanks afterward…

Anyway, whenever he spoke to people in this world, they always made up their own explanations.

Helena very wisely did not ask further. She still did not turn around and drew all changes in her emotions back inside. Her tone remained calmly gentle as she said: "You probably don't need it, but I will introduce myself anyway—Helena, a humble servant of the storm Goddess Gamona. I am pleased to speak with you."

"Duncan Abnomar, captain of the Vanished," Duncan replied casually. "I like straightforward conversation, so let's be open—what is your goal, or rather, what exactly does the Deep Sea Church want to do?"

"We are only focused on maintaining the order of the civilized world and responding to all the unsettling changes across it," Helena answered lightly. "You should already have heard what I said to Vanna just now. This world is changing—and in fact, the situation is far more serious than what I told her.

“Many Shadows are drawing close to the dimension of our Mortal Realm. The abnormal behavior of Vision 001 may only be the beginning. The destructive actions of the Ender in Pland may be only one part of another great conspiracy. In the north, some city-states have sent disturbing news. At the borders, the Veil is becoming more and more unstable. Within the borders of civilization, Border Collapse incidents are happening with increasing frequency. And among all these changes, the Vanished may be the only one with which there is hope of rational communication.

“We hope to establish stable, effective communication with you. Just as you want to know the goals of the Deep Sea Church, we… also want to know about the Vanished. Since that is the case, why not build a bridge?”

Duncan frowned and said: “So you confidently arranged for Vanna to become this bridge. It’s a fine idea, but how do you know I will agree?”

“You care about her and have helped her before. From the intentions you have shown, you are also very interested in today’s civilized world,” Helena said. “You have regained your reason and humanity, so you have the need to rebuild ties with the civilized world. In my view, Vanna is very suitable for this role—or would you rather trust some ‘strange Messenger’ randomly chosen by the Deep Sea Church?”

“…True. Vanna at least counts as an ‘acquaintance’ of mine. From your perspective, sending her over is the best way to keep the Messenger safe,” Duncan said slowly. “But even so, are you really not worried that sending Vanna onto the Vanished will be like sending a sheep into a tiger’s mouth? Given the fine reputation my ship and I have in the civilized world, if your actions were made public, people might find it more reasonable to see them as a bloody sacrificial rite.”

Helena fell silent for a few seconds. At last she slowly turned around and fixed her gaze on the mirror where green flames were now rippling.

“That is why this matter will not be made public. Apart from the people of Pland, most people in this world still cannot talk about the Vanished with a straight face. Vanna will become a Secret Envoy. Those who know about this will be limited to the upper ranks of the Deep Sea Church and a small number of City-State Governors—or other necessary informed parties when the situation requires it.”

Helena lifted her eyes and gazed at Duncan’s figure in the mirror.

Shimmering, twisted starlight filled her field of vision.

“As for your ‘sheep into a tiger’s mouth’… I am not worried.”

Indescribable, flowing starlight kept swelling and pulsing across the surface of the mirror, as if trying to break through that fragile layer of glass. Fine black cracks spread from the mirror’s edge and crawled across it, and their presence seemed to fill the whole room. Deep, chaotic roars filled her head, and every roar seemed to carry endless knowledge from Subspace.

“I can hear your voice. Your voice is full of calm reason. I believe you truly have regained your humanity. That humanity is proof that you stand on the side of civilization and order.”

In her sight the mirror seemed to turn into a vortex. The starlit giants inside it had completely lost their shapes. All Helena saw was endless starlight. Broken fragments of light exploded in her mind, but in the next second, gentle waves sounded in her head and reshaped her thoughts that were on the verge of falling apart.

“You are friendly and trustworthy. My God has given guidance, and I believe in my God unconditionally. Since He ordered me to work with you, I will act accordingly.”

The crawling starlight in the mirror overflowed. A stream of light flowed out into the air, stretching and pulsing. It swayed slowly in front of Helena, as if studying prey, yet also as if sniffing the air of the room. The light-shape formed from the writhing starlight leaned to within half a meter of Helena's face, and its countless specks seemed filled with unnumbered eyes.

Through the mirror, Duncan carefully studied Helena's expression. He tried to read the Deep Sea Pope's true intentions from the details of her words and actions. In the end, he found only calm and honesty in her eyes.

After a long time, he withdrew his gaze.

"Then the agreement is made. I will keep a place for Vanna on the Vanished. But in return, once she is on the Vanished, she will be one of my Crew Members. She will act under strict rules whose priority will even stand above her identity in the Church. I hope you understand that."

He did his best to speak with a stiff, imposing air, making the matter sound formal and businesslike.

But inside, he was delighted.

Ever since long ago he had thought that Vanna had a connection with the Vanished. Back then he had already been planning how to coax this high-ranking Cleric onto his ship as a fighter, but he never found a suitable chance or excuse. He had not expected the opportunity to fall from the sky like this.

The Deep Sea Church needed a formal channel to learn the intentions of the Vanished, which would ease their unease. The Vanished also needed a bridge that could communicate with the Church forces of the civilized world, which would help Duncan's future actions. It was something that pleased everyone.

"I understand," Helena nodded slowly. "Then the agreement is made."

Chapter 280: Before the New Recruit Joined

Was what Helena had said really her true thinking? Was the Deep Sea Church's goal really only to build contact with the Vanished? Did this "God's Herald" truly believe in Captain Duncan's humanity and reason the way she claimed?

Duncan did not dare believe it all. Although this female pope's attitude looked very sincere, he had a clear sense of things. He knew the Vanished was famous across the seas and had an impressive "battle record". That fearsome name alone made it impossible for a leader like Helena to deal with him without any guard up—she had to be holding something back.

But caution was not always a bad thing. Choosing to cooperate while staying on guard meant she had a reason she had to work with him. Maybe it was the will of her god. Maybe it was for the Church's interests. Whatever the reason, the olive branch she was offering now was real.

"Since we have already reached an agreement, we should talk about the actual handover and registration process for personnel," Duncan thought for a moment, then spoke to the pope before him from a very reasonable angle. "I think we need some formal documents."

Helena froze at once. Although she was the one who had first raised the matter, she had clearly never thought this far. Her expression now showed some surprise: "Registration… process? What do you mean?"

“Bringing a crew member on board and handing over work is a very serious matter,” Duncan said with a straight face. “The Vanished is an expedition ship with strict personnel management. Your Deep Sea Church is also a proper organization. You send an envoy over and do not even prepare a letter of introduction? And there is also the question of Vanna’s living expenses on the ship, or wear and tear on her personal gear. Whose side should reimburse that? We need to make it clear. Personally I think your side should cover it, at least cover part of it…”

Helena suddenly began to understand what Vanna meant in all those reports where she kept saying “Captain Duncan often does unexpected things”. She had drafted so many plans for dealing with the Vanished, and somehow had never considered this point at all!

“…The Deep Sea Church will of course cover this part of the… ‘budget’,” Helena finally nodded after holding back for a few seconds. “If you need formal paperwork, we can provide it. Or you can provide it—do you have a template on your side?”

“Of course I do. In a bit I can send a messenger to deliver it to you,” Duncan nodded solemnly, his tone very serious. “The Vanished is not some third-rate eldritch god’s lair where you light two braziers, mutter a few words, then shove someone in and call the sacrificial rite a success. We are a very proper employer. Recruitment, rules and regulations, and team-building are all first-class by Subspace standards…”

Helena had been listening with a blank face from the start. Now she could only nod along on reflex. For some reason, she suddenly felt that the twisted starlight in the mirror before her, which kept swelling and shrinking as it squirmed, did not seem quite so dizzying anymore.

She even felt those spinning lights and shadows were a little friendly.

In this slightly dazed state, she finally managed to end her conversation with that ghost captain.

With a soft crackling sound like fire burning, the green flames leaping before the mirror finally faded. Bright yellow-white fire once again rose on the candles. The shifting lights at the edge of the mirror, and the pitch-black cracks that had been everywhere in the room, slowly vanished from her sight.

The stable world of the Mortal Realm appeared before Helena once more.

But she still stared hard at the mirror that had returned to normal, at the reflection that slowly came into view within it.

She did not know how long it took before the trembling lines at the edge of that image finally steadied. Helena then drew in a deep breath, and her tense muscles relaxed bit by bit.

Only now did she feel how the sweat had soaked through her clothes. Her heart was pounding. A hollow, numb ache throbbed in her head.

"…I should remind Vanna to control her curiosity a little in this 'new post'," Helena rubbed her forehead and spoke softly while fighting the dull pain in her head. "Facing Subspace directly… feels terrible."

A sudden crackling sound reached her ears, and a flash of green light entered her sight.

Helena jolted awake, but only had time to see a flicker of green flame flash by the windowsill. She quickly walked toward where the firelight had faded and saw an old parchment sheet lying quietly on the sill.

It was Vanna's registration dossier for the Vanished.

"…He really sent it."

The pope muttered in some shock.

…

The next morning.

“We will be adding a new member.”

In the dining hall of the Vanished, Duncan had gathered everyone on board, including Shirley, who had been helping out in the antique shop, and Morris, the old scholar who had been in the city-state library doing research. Then he solemnly announced this news.

Nina had been holding a handful of fries and feeding the pigeons with great focus. When she heard what Uncle Duncan said, she froze, lifted her head, and stared in surprise: “A new member? Who is it?”

“In a certain sense, she counts as an acquaintance,” Duncan said with a smile, his gaze sweeping along both sides of the table. “You have all met her. Shirley, you and Nina even saw her again not long ago.”

Shirley looked a bit blank. It took her several seconds to slowly realize something, and her expression changed in a way that was visible to the naked eye: “C-could it be that inquisitor…”

“It is her,” Duncan nodded lightly. “Inquisitor Vanna will become a new member of the Vanished, within the next day or two.”

“Clang!”

A loud crash suddenly came from beside the dining table. Duncan calmly looked toward the sound and saw Dog sprawled on the floor in a mess—only a second ago Dog had been sitting on the chair next to Shirley.

Shirley herself had almost fallen off her chair just now. At this moment she glared at Dog and scolded: “Dog, you scared me!”

“I-I-I’m completely dog-dumb here, really, Mr. Duncan, what did you just say—that inquisitor?!” Dog scrambled up off the floor in a panic, ignoring Shirley’s loud yelling beside him. His two bloody, hollow eye sockets stared at Duncan. “Are you planning to tie that inquisitor up and bring her here? Oh, of course I’m not doubting that you could do it. You could definitely tie her up. But making that inquisitor submit won’t be easy. She has clearly gone through very harsh training, and her head is full of faith in the Storm Goddess. I’m afraid ordinary methods could never make her…”

“…Why was your first thought to tie someone to the ship?” Duncan’s eye twitched. “I said Vanna would become our new member. When did I say anything about tying her to the ship?”

“Then how else do you get her here if you don’t tie her up?” Dog was utterly baffled. In his “normal logic”, he could not think of any other reason why a city-state inquisitor would suddenly become a new member of the Vanished. “Oh, you mean you’ll lock her up on the shore first…”

“Can’t it just be normal crew onboarding and a regular transfer of posts?” Duncan looked expressionlessly at the ugly dog head across from him. “For example, the Deep Sea Church writes a letter of recommendation. I write a notice of employment. Then Vanna, through this completely normal process, becomes the ship’s marine squad member and ship’s priest. Don’t you think that sounds more reasonable?”

Dog thought about it and felt that once you put this kind of “reasonable” thing on the Vanished, it became so bizarre it was almost supernatural. He would rather believe that one day he would open his eyes on the ship and see the Abyssal Lord than believe that series of steps the captain had just described. But after holding it in for a long time, he still did not dare say any of that out loud.

Because this was the Vanished.

And on this ship, the captain was always right.

“You are right,” Dog muttered in a muffled voice, his head drooping. “That is very reasonable.”

Duncan nodded in satisfaction. Then he looked again at the people on both sides of the table. After thinking for a moment, he still decided to add an explanation: “This is an agreement between me and the Deep Sea Church. Vanna will board this ship as a secret envoy, and before her mission ends she will serve under me as a crew member. Her status is a little different from yours, but while we are on the ship, everyone follows the same rules. I hope you can all get along.”

“As long as she doesn’t come looking for trouble with me,” Shirley muttered, “I wouldn’t dare cause trouble for her.”

“I still can’t picture how a city-state inquisitor is supposed to just sit still on this ship,” Dog grumbled along. “I have a feeling life is going to get exciting.”

“I am ready,” Morris, on the far side of the table, nodded lightly. The old scholar looked the calmest of them all (Alice, who had not reacted from beginning to end, did not count), and there was even a strange smile on his face. “Though she may be especially shocked when she sees me… But she will adapt. Vanna has been very good at adapting ever since she was a child.”

Nina had not said much from the start. She had just been thinking about something. Only now did she suddenly lift her head: “Uncle, does that mean we are going to have work to do next?”

Duncan lowered his head: “Why are you asking that all of a sudden?”

“Because you specially called all of us to the ship,” Nina thought for a moment. “Miss Vanna hasn’t even come aboard yet, but you called us in advance, so you must have other plans, right?”

Duncan looked at Nina’s shining eyes (with 6000°C burning deep in them). After a long moment, he smiled and patted her hair.

“Yes, we are going to be busy—we are heading for Frostholm.”

Chapter 281: The Taboos of Reading at Sea

After his long talk with Tyrian, Duncan had already told Nina, Shirley, and the others the intelligence he had gathered about the Abyssal Trench Project. But at the time he had not mentioned what voyage the Vanished would undertake next—until now, when a letter from an old friend to Morris finally led to this journey north.

“We are now sailing north along the Sea Mist’s route. In a few days we should reach the edge of the Frost Sea. The scenery there will be completely different from the Central Seas,” Duncan said. “You can spend this time on the ship. Alice has already prepared rooms for you. Of course, if you find it hard to adapt to life at sea, you can return to the city-state—I can call you over when necessary.”

“I-I’ll stay on the ship,” Shirley raised her hand at once. “I can help Miss Alice with some work…”

“You still have to do your homework on the ship,” Duncan gave her a calm look. “And I will supervise you in person.”

Shirley shrank her neck at once: “Ah, then I…”

“You also have to do your homework in the city-state. And it would still be me supervising you.”

Shirley pulled a long face: “Then… then I’ll stay on the ship. I’ll treat it as a change of scenery.”

“I want to stay on the ship too,” Nina looked at Shirley, then at Duncan. Her eyes were bright, and there was a clear eagerness in her voice. “I still haven’t really gotten used to life on the ship. Last time I didn’t even last until night…”

Duncan nodded: “All right. Then you can go back home later and bring the bedding you are used to over here, so you don’t lose sleep in a strange environment.”

“Mm, mm,” Nina nodded again and again. Then she seemed to remember something and asked, a little hesitant: “Then can I also bring my holiday homework and textbooks to the ship? I’m afraid I won’t finish them before school starts…”

As soon as Nina finished speaking, Dog could not help covering his head with his paws: “We are riding the most terrifying ghost ship in history to resolve an supernatural incident, but somehow it is starting to sound more and more like a holiday trip…”

Duncan did not pay attention to Dog’s muttering. He thought for a moment, then spoke to Nina with some uncertainty: “Shirley and Alice’s spelling books can be brought on board, but your textbooks and homework might be a bit dangerous. Reading books on the Boundless Sea is like reading in the city-state after nightfall. It easily draws malice from the Shadows.”

Nina stared for a moment. She calmly analyzed it, thought a little, then suddenly raised a very constructive question that even Duncan had not considered: “Then if something comes out of the Shadows, can’t you just beat it up?”

Duncan: “…?”

Dog and Shirley: “…Right!”

“I never thought of that,” Duncan said after staring blankly for several seconds, his expression turning strange at last. He had to admit that from the very moment he heard Goathead talk about these ‘taboos of reading at sea’, he had fallen into a mental blind spot. He had simply treated it as a rule, just like everyone else, and had not thought about other options. But now… it was Nina, who had only recently stepped into the supernatural, who was showing an unbelievable openness of mind.

Of course Nina was not bound by traditional ways of thinking—for on the very first day this young lady touched the supernatural, what she saw was her Uncle Duncan stomping on a city-state and tearing the Sun in half. The highest level of supernatural corruption in this world had appeared to her as something being pinned down and given a solid beating.

In Nina’s eyes, Uncle Duncan was invincible. If anything caused trouble, she just had to let Uncle Duncan beat it up. Her train of thought was very clear and very simple.

“I need to confirm something,” Duncan suddenly said. Then he got up and left the dining hall.

He grabbed a big book and went straight to the captain’s cabin. With a loud “bang”, he dropped the book in front of Goathead.

Goathead jumped at the sudden noise: “C-captain?”

“What usually happens if you read books on the Boundless Sea?” Duncan asked bluntly.

Goathead paused, then answered on reflex: “Ah, that is obvious. Reading on the Boundless Sea usually draws the attention of certain wills from the world’s deep layers. For example, Intruders from the Spirit Realm, projections of demons from the Abyssal Deep, and even the whispers of Subspace may seize the chance to slip in during this process. They take advantage of the reader's relaxed and unguarded mind to extend their projections into the Mortal Realm, and… What are you doing?"

Duncan had already spread open the big book he had brought from the city-state of Pland, a thick volume about the folk customs of many city-states. He flipped through its contents as he answered without looking up: "So when do those 'Intruders' you mentioned arrive?"

Goathead felt his thoughts starting to knot up, yet still answered on reflex even as they tangled: "U-usually, they should arrive as soon as the reading starts. Very quickly."

Duncan turned two more pages, then raised his head: "Then why aren't they here yet?"

Goathead: "…"

"Nina wants to do her winter homework on the ship," Duncan said to Goathead very seriously. "If you have a way to 'attract' those 'Intruders' you just mentioned, then draw them here. I have something to discuss with them."

"H-how do you plan to 'discuss' things with them?"

"By beating them up. Beating them up again and again until they promise not to disturb Nina's studying," Duncan said. Then he thought for a moment and carefully added: "Of course this is only my idea. I am not sure if it will work. You might be more of an expert in this area than I am."

Goathead's thoughts knotted up again. This time he hesitated even longer than before before he finally spoke: "I think… you may need to 'test' for a while longer."

Duncan: "…?"

“Normally, the Shadows drawn by reading all have the trait of chasing knowledge. That makes them just a little ‘smarter’ than ordinary Intruders,” Goathead’s words at last began to flow smoothly, though his tone was still strange. “Being smart means having some judgment. Even the chaotic Shadows of the Abyssal Deep and the Spirit Realm know how to seek benefit and avoid harm while chasing knowledge. They will not rashly show up in front of you…”

“I see,” Duncan nodded. His gaze moved over the lines of text in the book as he spoke casually. “So, any Intruder bold enough to come to the Vanished will not be some nobody or fool. It will be a powerful Intruder who has great confidence in itself and has weighed the risks carefully. That is actually good. It means I only need to beat one or two of them, and the strong ones will quickly understand the situation. I won’t have to worry about endless harassment from idiots.”

“I believe your reasoning makes perfect sense.”

Duncan did not respond to Goathead’s flattery. He just continued to sink into the book in front of him. He slowly turned the rough pages. His eyes wandered among the sometimes horrifying, sometimes mysterious folk customs of the southern city-states. His mind relaxed, little by little, and sank into the reading.

He waited quietly for the knowledge-chasing Intruders to smell this sweet bait and invade this seemingly unguarded Mortal Realm dimension.

But no Intruders appeared.

“It doesn’t seem to be working,” Duncan raised his head and spoke to Goathead, who was sitting quietly at the edge of the desk. “Do you have any other ideas?”

“Actually… I don’t think you need to cling to this. There are so many taboos on the Boundless Sea. Being unable to read is only…”

“Nina needs to do her winter homework,” Duncan said gently. “She cares about it.”

“You could let someone else do the reading, like Mr. Morris,” Goathead answered at once. “Followers of the God of Wisdom are better at controlling their minds. It is useful whether they are protecting themselves or setting a trap. Those Intruders most likely sensed your aura and did not dare show up. But if we set a trap, it should work.”

Duncan thought for a moment and felt that this was a good idea.

So he picked up the book and went straight back to the dining hall. Everyone was still there waiting. Nina and Shirley were whispering to each other, guessing what Duncan was doing. Alice and Dog were checking each other’s spelling words. Morris sat to the side with his eyes closed, resting. He opened them only when he heard Duncan walk in.

“I need a trap to draw in those invaders who chase knowledge,” Duncan walked straight to Morris and put the Folkways Treatise into the old scholar’s hands. “You read this book. Make your mind look like that of an unguarded scholar seeking knowledge. Lure a powerful malevolent spirit that chases knowledge onto the ship. I want to ‘talk’ with that Intruder, and also figure out what these Intruders really are.”

Morris jumped in shock. He had spent most of his life seeking knowledge on the academic road, and this was the first time he had heard such a crazy, wild idea. Yet the very next second, he saw from Duncan’s eyes that this ghost captain was completely serious.

And this really was the kind of plan only a Subspace shadow as powerful as him would dare to consider seriously.

After the first wave of shock, a strange excitement and sense of expectation rose up from the depths of the old scholar’s heart.

He had to admit that he himself suddenly felt a spark of curiosity.

If he read on purpose and lured a malevolent spirit under Captain Duncan’s watch, on the Vanished with its very special environment… what would happen?

Morris lifted the book in his hands.

Chapter 282: Hunters of Knowledge

The gently rolling waves softly beat against the outer wall of the cabin. From deep within the deck came faint creaks now and then. A lamp burning whale oil flickered quietly not far away. In its bright light, pairs of eyes, curious or expectant, shone.

Morris spread open the book on city-state folklore in front of him. Little by little, he relaxed his mind and lowered the defenses around his will. He let his thoughts open wide to knowledge and allowed the power in the pages to slowly flood his spirit.

He could feel that his unguarded mind was giving off an ever more tempting “scent” on this vast Boundless Sea.

A seeker of knowledge, a rash and unguarded seeker of knowledge, had opened his heart upon the sea. Those hungry Shadows roaming in the world’s deep layers had surely sensed this bait. Those restless, blind Shadows could not resist this lure, yet they still hesitated. Their minds, barely worthy of being called rational and only slightly enlightened by the pursuit of knowledge, felt an instinctive rejection toward the environment on the Vanished. That made them waver.

But they would not hesitate forever. Those things lurking in the Spirit Realm, the Abyssal Deep, and even Subspace did not possess true wisdom.

Morris slowly turned a page. His gaze drifted over the lines of text.

Folklore was what most attracted those Shadows. In folklore, Humans had gathered over long ages their fears, their awe, and their simple understanding of nature. It was roughly processed humanity, sweet emotions bound together with solidified knowledge. It was the perfect feast for hungry knowledge pursuers.

Another page turned. Fine dust between the sheets rose and drifted as they moved. The lamplight slanted through the curving paper, tracing leaping patterns of light and shadow in the narrow gaps between page and ink.

The cabin was very quiet.

The captain stood silently to one side, his gaze resting on the open book. The Sun fragment stood on the other side, watching the movements in the air.

Morris looked at the next line of text and saw the edges of the letters tremble slightly.

The Intruders were drawing near.

The invisible hunter of knowledge finally could not hold back anymore. It had come to the very edge of the Mortal Realm. Its tendrils sniffed at Morris’s mind through the pages, then began to disguise themselves as words. On what had been normal lines of text, strange symbols slowly emerged.

Those were letters that did not exist, describing knowledge that did not exist.

Skilled hunters often disguised themselves as prey. The pursuers of knowledge, when luring a Scholar, also liked to disguise themselves as “knowledge”. Reading them was the first step into the trap.

Morris watched as line after line of unreadable characters rose on the paper. He felt the power seeping out from them, trying to seduce him into reading.

He said softly: “It is here.”

In the next second, the “hunter” hidden in the pages and words suddenly seemed to sense something. A sharp, chaotic scream burst into everyone’s ears. At once the big book’s pages began to flip wildly. The black letters on the pages hopped as if they had lives of their own, struggling as they turned into splashes of ink, trying to tear themselves free from the yellowed paper.

Seeing this, Duncan showed a small smile.

His “fishing” had worked. When dealing with hunters of knowledge, using the Historian as bait had indeed done the job.

A plume of smoke surged out from the pages. The letters that had escaped the paper flowed quickly into the smoke. Howling, the smoke rushed out of the book and spun upward into a whirling cloud of dust. Within that dust, something black began to condense and take shape. In an instant it became a skeletal structure. A heap of chaotic, twisted black bone fragments clattered onto the floor beside the dining table, then in the blink of an eye pieced themselves together into something everyone present knew well:

An ugly, hound-shaped creature built from black bones.

Dog, who had been on full alert beside them, was stunned at the sight. He looked up at the others and said: “I don’t know that one.”

“If you don’t know it, that makes things easier,” Duncan said casually. He stepped toward the Abyssal Hound whose body had only just finished forming and still seemed confused. At that moment the creature finally reacted. It jerked its head up. Red light exploded in its hollow, blood-colored eye sockets. Endless black flames surged into the air from the cracks between its bones as it braced itself to fight back.

But its resistance ended before it even began. The instant black fire rose within the Abyssal Hound, its gaze met Duncan’s eyes. In the next second, every tongue of flame burning inside it was dyed a ghostly green.

This Intruder from the depths of the Abyssal Deep lost control of its own flames in less than a second. It became a sacrificial victim under the captain's gaze. Its chaotic, broken mind probably never even had time to understand what was happening before it was swept up in roaring green spirit form fire. A shrill, mad howl shattered the calm aboard the Vanished. The cracking of flames consuming bone and strange tearing noises filled the dining hall.

A good hunter often appeared in the shape of prey – but a really lousy hunter truly did become prey.

What happened next was more than Dog could bear to watch. Dog's whole body shook into a trembling ball. He hid behind Shirley, hugged his head with his paws, and shivered. He watched the flickering firelight in front of him and listened to the sounds in the room. The red light in his eye sockets flickered on and off: "Ah… oh man, that burning… ah, those bones breaking… ah, that howling… ah, damn, I can't watch this…"

The dining hall grew quiet again.

A pile of shattered bone fragments lay scattered on the floor, with no details left to recognize. Thin blue-grey smoke curled above them. A few remaining green sparks jumped among the remains, devouring the last traces of power this Knowledge Hunter still had in the Mortal Realm.

Duncan frowned. The way things had unfolded was a bit unexpected, and the speed at which it ended was even more unexpected.

He walked forward and nudged the still slightly warm bones with the tip of his boot. Then he lifted his head and looked at Dog in the distance.

"Why was it a Abyssal Hound?"

“I… I don’t know…” Dog shivered at once. Even his voice shook. “I never read a book before, and I couldn’t read. Before I met Shirley I barely had any sense at all. I don’t know why one of my… hometown folks popped out.”

At this moment, Morris stood up. The Old Scholar’s steady voice finally came to Dog’s rescue: “In theory, the Malevolent Spirit drawn when you read a book is random. Most of the time it is an intangible Shadow from the Spirit Realm. But in a few cases, a Demon from the depths of the Abyssal Deep may come out instead. The ‘Abyssal Hound’ already has the meaning of ‘hunt’ and ‘chase’ in its name. In fact, they really are a kind of Knowledge Hunter, and a rather powerful type at that.”

“A rather powerful type?” Duncan raised his eyebrows when he heard this and glanced at Dog, who was still shivering at Shirley’s feet. “Really?”

“Under normal circumstances, if someone at sea is reading a book and a Abyssal Demon suddenly jumps out of it to attack, that person almost has no chance of survival,” Morris said, his expression a bit strange. “In the worse cases, a Abyssal Demon that invades the Mortal Realm by this route can quickly grow and enter a runaway state, then slaughter everyone on the ship in a short time. Not every ship is the Vanished.”

“All right,” Duncan said, nodding. He quickly adjusted the strength scale in his mind. His tone turned a bit odd. “If the strongest Intruders you can summon while reading are hunters like Dog, then it doesn’t seem that dangerous…”

As he spoke, he glanced at Nina: “Nina, you can do your winter homework on the ship from now on. If something really pops out, just beat it up yourself – just be careful not to burn anything.”

Nina laughed at once: “Okay!”

Then Duncan looked at Dog again: “By the way, you really didn’t know you are a ‘Hound that Chases Knowledge’?”

“I didn’t know,” Dog said, shaking his ugly big head. His voice was dull. “I already said, I used to drift around in a daze…”

Shirley frowned and thought for a long time. Suddenly she blurted out: “If that’s how it is, and Abyssal Hounds can’t read just like Dog, then why do they chase knowledge?”

“Alice studies cooking too,” Duncan said offhandedly. “Maybe it’s just a hobby.”

Shirley nodded as if she half understood, then lowered her head to look at her partner. Dog had quietly crawled under the nearby table. He hugged his huge head with his paws and spoke in a muffled voice: “Don’t ask me, I don’t know anything… this place is just too damn scary…”

Duncan could not help shaking his head with a smile. He suddenly felt that after so many people had come aboard, the mood on the ship really was getting better day by day. They already had these pleasant everyday moments. He truly did not know how lively things would become once Vanna came aboard.

With that cheerful feeling and a bit of hope for the future, he stepped forward and kicked the pile of black bones on the floor that were gradually cooling.

This was just a heartless Abyssal Demon. It was nothing like Dog.

“Alice, clean up this pile.”

…

Under the bright, warm sunlight, Vanna, who was walking through the Cathedral courtyard, suddenly felt a chill. She shivered without thinking.

She lifted her head and looked at the little path in the courtyard under the sunlight. After a long moment she let out a deep sigh.

[What has to come will always come.]

Chapter 283: Official Paperwork

Every day before noon, Vanna walked across the courtyard of the great Cathedral in Pland. She followed the little path between the flowerbeds to the sanctuary. The path was one hundred and three steps long. From the sanctuary entrance to the statue of the Goddess took another twenty-seven steps. Ever since she had become this city's Inquisitor, these step counts had become part of her life.

She knew everything inside this Cathedral. She knew every floor tile from the courtyard to the sanctuary as well as she knew her own hands.

In all the days and nights that had passed, she had never imagined that this short stretch of road could feel so hard and so long.

The sanctuary doors opened, and the too-bright sunlight was left behind her. After her eyes adjusted to the dimmer interior, Vanna saw two figures standing before the statue of the Goddess in the center of the room.

Light from the high stained glass windows shone down and spread a soft glow over the statue of the Goddess. Archbishop Valentine and Pope Helena turned their eyes at the same time. In the sunlight, their gaze fell upon the Inquisitor who was walking into the room.

"You are here," Helena said with a small nod. "One minute later than we agreed."

"Sorry," Vanna said as she stepped forward. She bowed her head slightly beneath the statue of the Goddess, then looked at the Pope. "Handing my work over to my subordinates delayed me a few minutes."

“Never mind,” Helena nodded lightly, then glanced at Valentine. “I have already spoken with Bishop Valentine about your situation. He will help you with the handover and arrangements for your duties. You do not need to worry about the city-state. Your uncle has also received the news. He understands the Church’s decision, but I still hope you will talk with him later and ease some of his worries about the future.”

Even though she believed she had made plenty of mental preparations, Vanna’s heart still gave a little jump when she heard the Pope’s words.

A feeling rose within her, something between dream and Mortal Realm, leaving her dazed for a moment. She tried to grasp that feeling clearly and finally found that all of her emotions were summed up in a single sigh: ah, it really happened.

But then she felt confused again, and even a bit absurd. She looked at the Pope in front of her and could not help saying: “You really are going to send me onto the Vanished – of course, I am not doubting your decision, I just suddenly feel that… this is not a matter to treat lightly. At the very least, we should understand Captain Duncan’s attitude. Would he really allow a high-ranking priest to board that ship so casually?”

Vanna felt her wording was a little messy, but she forced herself to sort out her thoughts and went on: “Yesterday it all happened so suddenly. Only after I went back did it strike me that something was off. The Vanished is not some ‘open zone’ that one can just enter at will. How do you plan to…”

“Ah, you finally thought of this question,” Helena said with a smile, shaking her head. “I thought you would only remember to ‘ask for directions’ when it was time to depart.”

Vanna’s eyes widened in surprise. Then she saw Helena take out a rolled parchment sheet from beside her and hand it over with a bright, amused smile.

Puzzled, Vanna accepted the roll and carefully opened it. Her gaze swept over the words written on it, and her expression grew more and more interesting.

“To the servants of Goddess Gamona of the Deep Sea Church… We hereby accept the transfer of one member of your staff required for duty, to be temporarily assigned to a combat post aboard this vessel… In-post treatment will be equal to that of a first-class crew member. The wages and all related expenses for this person will continue to be borne by your institution, to be paid in the following manner…

Captain of the Vanished, Duncan Abnomar, signed at Visions–Pland, December 19th, 1900.”

Besides the handwritten signature at the end, there was also a striking red seal.

Vanna: “…”

The young Inquisitor looked a little stunned. She lowered her head to look at the Personnel Transfer Acceptance Letter in her hands, then raised her eyes to the Pope in front of her. After glancing back and forth several times, her gaze fell on Bishop Valentine.

“Don’t look at me,” Valentine said with a blank face. “I didn’t expect this either.”

Vanna felt her lips tremble: “The signature on this…”

“It’s real,” Helena said calmly. “The seal is real as well. If you go to the City-State Archive and search, you can even find records from a century ago, when the Vanished came to resupply at Pland Harbor. They bear the same seal and the same signature.”

Vanna listened in a daze. She opened her mouth, as if she still had a whole bellyful of words she wanted to say, but Helena spoke first and cut her off:

“You have to admit, this is very reasonable.”

“I…” Vanna raised a hand and pointed at herself, then lifted the parchment sheet in her hand. After a long pause, she finally squeezed out a sentence: “But isn’t this a bit too reasonable?! And when did you…”

“Just yesterday,” Helena said in all seriousness, though a trace of joy hid in her eyes. “Captain Duncan and I discussed your onboarding process in detail. We have always felt this should be a formal, contract-bound personnel transfer. For that, we needed proper paperwork to file.”

The female Pope paused there. Seeing the tangled expression still on Vanna’s face, she spread her hands with a smile: “What else did you expect, Vanna? How else were we supposed to send you to the Vanished? Pile up some bonfires, draw blasphemous symbols all over the floor, then tie you to a stake and send you over as a sacrificial rite? Like certain dark heretics who tie up maidens in damp caves and offer them by sacrificial rite to Subspace?

“Vanna, we are the orthodox Church. We follow proper procedure.”

Vanna’s mouth twitched. She realized that at the start she truly had not thought at all about the details of this “handover”. Now that Helena reminded her, she could see how reasonable the document in front of her was. Yet because the process was so reasonable, the whole thing felt even more uncanny.

All of her anxious guesses about the future were shattered in that instant. She even started to suspect that on the Vanished she would see a rich staff meal, and after the formal dinner there might even be a barbecue on the deck…

This was the Vanished, after all. The Lost Home.

Every bit of that strangeness in Vanna’s eyes was clear to Helena.

“All right. Now that you have seen the document, I trust you have let go of your last bit of worry,” the Pope said with a smile. “Go and rest now, and make some preparations before you set out. There are more detailed notes on the back of the document, including the exact time and method of handover. You can read them when you go back.”

And just like that, Vanna was sent out of the sanctuary in a daze.

After the young Inquisitor left, the sanctuary became quiet. After two full minutes, Valentine finally broke the silence: “In fact, I’m very curious.”

Helena turned slightly: “Curious about what?”

“What exactly has happened that made you suddenly decide to send Vanna onto the Vanished?” Valentine asked, his expression a little serious. “I understand the reasons you gave. They do hold up. But the whole thing still feels… a little rushed to me. You seem eager to establish contact with that ‘Captain Duncan’, and you did not make enough preparations beforehand. What happened?”

“You are a perceptive man, Valentine. You always have been,” Helena said quietly. She looked at the old Bishop who had been loyal to the Church for so many years, then sighed. “This matter will not remain a secret for long. Telling you now will not change anything.”

She paused for a moment, then spoke slowly: “Do you remember the ‘warning’ that Captain Duncan sent not long ago through Vanna?”

“‘Warning?’” Valentine frowned slightly, then quickly thought of something. “You mean the one about Visions 001…”

“The Elven city-state of Lightwind Harbor near the border has recently sent disturbing news,” Helena said with a nod. “The ‘Sea Witch’ Lucretia delivered a gift to them. Can you guess what it was?”

Valentine froze. Thinking of the details hinted at in the Pope's words, he faintly realized the truth. His expression changed at once: "Don't tell me… something really fell from the sky?"

"A fragment of a glowing glowing orb that fell from above," Helena said. "It is pale gold, a geometric body even larger than the Storm Cathedral. We do not yet have solid proof that it is a piece that broke off Visions 001, but…"

Helena did not go on. She only shook her head.

Valentine listened in stunned silence. After a long time, he finally squeezed a few syllables out of his throat: "…Goddess above."

"Our world is going wrong, and things are worse than we imagined. The Vanished is so far the only voice that has given the civilized world a warning – and that warning has now been confirmed," Helena said slowly. "This is Captain Duncan actively showing goodwill. No matter how terrifying that ship once was, we must give a reply now. After all… what is about to fall is not just one city-state, but the Sun above our heads."

"…Can Vanna really carry out this task?" Valentine had set aside his earlier doubts, only to pick up a new worry. "She is actually a somewhat rash person and not very good at… careful, delicate human dealings. If we are sending an envoy 'aboard', she is not the best choice."

"We are not the ones who pick the best candidate, Valentine," Helena said, shaking her head.

She turned around and quietly fixed her gaze on the holy image of the storm Goddess Gamona.

"The ones who play the game decided the pieces' places from the very beginning."

Chapter 284: The Day of Boarding

In the Upper City, near the Cathedral, there was a high platform. It had once been part of the city park, but after the steam core reconstruction project, the original park facilities were moved elsewhere. Only this lonely platform remained here, like a forgotten knight standing on high, watching over the factories and plaza below.

From the platform, one could overlook the entire Cathedral District and the central factory district.

In her rare free time, Vanna came here to relax. When her thoughts would not calm, Vanna also came here to think quietly and sort out her mood.

The afternoon sunlight was good. Even with a light breeze, the platform was not very cold. The gentle sea wind swept across the platform, lifting the hair beside her ear and making it itch a little.

Vanna tossed her long white hair back. She let her gaze rest on the winding, fog-shrouded steam pipes in the distance. After a long time, she finally broke the silence: “I am going away for a while.”

“Going away?” Heidi turned her head in surprise. “Where are you going?”

“I am not sure. It might be somewhere very far away, and I may be gone for a long time.” Vanna looked into Heidi’s eyes. “I cannot reveal the exact route, but I should at least tell you before I leave.”

Heidi blinked, looking a little confused: “But you are the city-state’s Inquisitor. Can an Inquisitor just go off on a long journey like that?”

“I…” Vanna opened her mouth and tried to make her expression look like a smile. “It is an arrangement from the Church. A direct transfer order from the Storm Cathedral.”

“Ah… so that is how it is.” Heidi nodded in sudden understanding. She did not really understand the inner rules of the Deep Sea Church, but once the name ‘Storm Cathedral’ was brought up, there was no need to explain much. “So this is a holy mission, then? Are you being sent outside the diocese to fight Heretics?”

Vanna’s expression seemed to stiffen for a moment: “…In a sense, it does have something to do with Heretics, but it is not a combat mission.”

Heidi did not notice the subtle change in her friend’s tone. She only suddenly sighed: “Sigh, my father also went off on a long trip recently. There was no prophetic omen beforehand. He just suddenly told me he had to go deal with something, and my mother would not let me ask much. Now you are leaving too. It feels like you are all being mysterious.”

“Mr. Morris also went out?” Vanna muttered without thinking, but soon she shook her head, a faintly self-mocking look on her face. “He is probably off visiting his friends in the academic world, or attending some event. A scholar like him gets invitations from universities in various city-states all the time… Anyway, it is not the same place I am going.”

Heidi turned her head, looking at her friend with some doubt: “Why do I feel you are acting strange? You look weighed down. Are you uneasy because you are going far away? You really have not left the city-state much.”

“That is not it. I am probably just nervous because I was suddenly assigned to a task I have never dealt with before,” Vanna said, shaking her head. “You do not have to worry about me.”

“All right then.” Heidi let out a breath. Then, as if she suddenly remembered something, she suggested excitedly: “Right, how about we go to the cinema together? There is a new show out. We can use it to change your mood. You should really get in touch with more of what is popular these days. It might even help you expand your social circle…”

Vanna completely ignored the last two sentences. She only raised her eyebrows with some curiosity: “A new show? What is it about?”

“It is a work by Master Director Sandok, called ‘Borderland Terror’. It is about a small frontier village that falls into Heretic worship. They offer the village’s women as a sacrificial rite to a ‘cave evil spirit’, and in the end, brave guardians wipe out the evil. They say this show even uses a new technology called a ‘sound track’. While the images play, synchronized sound comes out of machines on both sides of the screen…”

Heidi eagerly introduced these ‘trendy new elements’ to her friend, but she noticed that Vanna’s expression grew stranger and stranger. Halfway through, Heidi hesitated and stopped. Then she thought for a moment and waved her hand: “All right, maybe you do not like that one. There is another show, called ‘Nightwatch’. It is about brave guardians entering a secret realm, getting trapped in a Heretic nest, and being forced to rely on their own wisdom and experience to survive inside while trying to hold on to their true selves… You do not like that one either?”

Heidi scratched her hair, rummaging through her memory: “Then I will recommend a book instead. It is a popular novel lately, called ‘Walking with Shadows’. It is about…”

Vanna finally could not listen anymore. Her face was almost turning dark as she cut off her friend’s chatter: “Thank you, but that is really not necessary.”

Then she seemed to realize her tone was a bit harsh. She sighed slightly, rubbing her forehead with her fingers as she explained quietly: “Thank you for caring. But the mission I am about to carry out requires firm will and a clear mind. Before I set out, it is better not to touch too many things that might disturb the heart.”

“Ah, all right. I did not think that through,” Heidi said with an awkward laugh. “I forgot you are a ‘professional’.”

Vanna waved her hand.

After a while, she heard Heidi’s voice again: “My break is almost over. I still have two patients with appointments this afternoon.”

Vanna let out a light breath: “Go back to work. I should start getting ready for my departure too.”

Heidi answered with a soft sound, but before she left the platform she suddenly stopped again. Heidi turned back. In the afternoon sunlight and the breeze, her expression looked a little hesitant: “When you leave… can I see you off?”

“…No. This is a special mission.”

“Then will you write letters back?”

Vanna hesitated for a moment.

She looked at Heidi. The wind blew her white hair, and in the fluttering strands, it felt as if a drifting Veil had already fallen between her and her friend.

“…I do not know,” Vanna said quietly. “But I will… try. Maybe it will not be that strict where I am going.”

“All right, then I will wait for your letters.” Heidi’s face suddenly bloomed with a bright smile. She stepped forward, pulled a crystal pendant from inside her collar, and shook it in the air. Then she pointed at Vanna's chest. "Matching amulets. You will have good luck."

Her friend left.

On the wind-swept platform, only Vanna remained.

The young Inquisitor lowered her head and looked at the small pendant on her chest.

"…Good luck, huh," she muttered softly, her expression turning a little strange. "I hope that antique shopkeeper's goods really can bring some good luck."

A loud peal of bells suddenly rang from the direction of the Cathedral, cutting off Vanna's thoughts.

She looked up toward the source of the sound and saw the huge clock face on the Great Bell tower showing the time. The light of the Sun had already passed the highest point in the sky and was slowly moving toward the west side of the great Cathedral.

She took out the parchment sheet and looked at the words on the back. That was her Induction Brief.

According to the instructions on the Induction Brief, a Messenger would come to pick her up in one hour. Before that, she should go to wait in the central courtyard of the great Cathedral. No unrelated people would disturb the handover.

What kind of Messenger would it be? And how would she be sent onto the Vanished, far away on the Boundless Sea?

Vanna had many questions in her heart, but she still set off toward the great Cathedral.

She had had many plans. Before leaving the city-state where she was born and raised, she had wanted to stroll through her favorite shops, visit the theater once more, go to the Harbor, see a few more friends, and go to the sanctuary for one more prayer…

But there was not enough time. She did not have that much freedom.

In the central courtyard of the great Cathedral, Pope Helena and Archbishop Valentine had already been waiting for her for some time.

“The Messenger has not arrived yet,” Valentine said with a nod to Vanna as she walked into the courtyard. “Are you ready?”

Vanna looked at what she carried.

Besides the greatsword that never left her side, she had only a packed suitcase. She did not own many personal things. Aside from the necessary changes of clothes, the heaviest items in the suitcase were her prayer book and a few Church texts that had received divine blessing.

Those were things she could safely read on the Boundless Sea, and they might help ease the boredom of life on the ship.

“Everything is here,” Vanna said with a nod. Then she looked up at the silent Pope beside her. “I can still pray on the ship, right?”

“Of course,” Helena answered with a smile. “Captain Duncan even promised that you can turn an extra cabin into a small chapel.”

“…Then I will at least have something to look forward to in my ‘crew member life’,” Vanna sighed. “I can hardly imagine what that life will be like.”

Helena opened her mouth, as if she wanted to say something, but just then the sound of crackling flames and beating wings suddenly came from the sky, cutting off the conversation in the courtyard.

The Messenger had arrived.

Vanna looked up in surprise, but she only had time to see a mass of emerald flame falling from the sky like a meteor. A pair of huge bone wings snapped open inside the fire. In the next second, the flames ‘fell’ onto the path in the courtyard and turned into a whirling, rising doorway.

“It is time to go,” Pope Helena said beside her, with both a reminder and a gentle urge.

“Mm.” Vanna gave a small nod. At that moment, she cast aside the last bit of hesitation in her heart and stepped forward.

She took a deep breath and crossed the spinning gate of flame. Her thoughts boiled over in that instant.

What kind of scene would lie beyond the door? What kind of life was waiting for her on that ship? Would she first see that terrifying ghost captain, or some… sailor on the Vanished?

What kind of strange forms would the crew members on that ship have?

The flames roared up and then vanished just as suddenly. Crossing the doorway took only a moment.

Vanna only felt a brief daze, and then damp, cold sea wind blew against her face. The sound of crashing waves came to her ears.

She blinked and patted her forehead hard.

Vanna felt that the teleportation might have gone a little wrong.

Or maybe there was something wrong with her eyes.

Because she saw… Morris standing right in front of her, smiling at her.

Chapter 285: Welcoming the Newcomer

To Vanna, everything that had happened over the past two days seemed to be covered by a filter of unreality. Her life had been turned upside down, so much that it felt like an absurd dream. She often wondered if she had already fallen into an illusion without knowing it—and in this moment, her doubt about herself reached its peak.

She actually saw Mr. Morris standing in front of her, with a smile on his face.

The young Inquisitor squeezed her eyes shut and knocked hard on her forehead. When she opened her eyes again, Morris was still there—and now there was also a tall figure beside the old mister.

It was that gloomy, dignified ghost captain.

“Welcome aboard, Vanna,” Morris said. “I know you have many questions…”

Vanna opened her mouth, but before she could speak, there was a sudden bang beside her. She did not feel any threat in that sound, but it still startled her. She turned her head on reflex and saw a big burst of colorful paper scraps and ribbons flying toward her.

A beautiful lady with silver-white hair down to her waist was staring blankly in this direction. Smoke from spent gunpowder still rose faintly from the tube in her hand.

Vanna: “…?”

Before she could react, the silver-haired lady happily grabbed a second paper tube from the side. She fiddled with it in front of Vanna, lifted it, and pulled the little string on it.

Seeing this, Vanna quickly tried to warn her: “Ah! You are holding it the wrong way…”

Her warning came too late.

The small charge inside the tube exploded with a bang. The silver-haired woman was hit full in the face by the ribbons and confetti that sprayed out. She instinctively threw her head back. Then there was a strange popping sound, and a head rolled down onto the deck under Vanna’s gaze.

Vanna’s eyes went wide. Even with her mental discipline, she almost jumped on the spot. Right after that, she heard a cry from behind her: “Ah! Uncle Duncan! Alice’s head fell off again!”

In the next second, a girl who looked about high-school age rushed over from the side, scrambling after the head that was rolling around on the deck. Another girl came running from another direction, holding the leash of a huge black dog. She joined the chase and shouted: “I told you earlier it was a bad idea to let her hold it!”

“You were too scared to hold it yourself!”

“Even so, we cannot just let Alice handle it alone… Ah, her head rolled down the stairs!”

“A hook, where is a hook… A stick works too…”

“I found a rope! Throw it down, throw it down… Miss Alice, bite it yourself, I will pull you up!”

The deck turned noisy in an instant. The two girls rushed up and down after the rolling head, while the headless silver-haired woman stumbled around in place, completely at a loss.

Mr. Morris, who had been speaking a moment earlier, now pressed a hand to his forehead and sighed nonstop. The air still held the odd smell left by the spent confetti tubes.

Vanna was in a rare state of utter confusion. She stared at the chaos on the deck, strands of colorful paper hanging from her hair and shoulders. She felt she sort of understood what had just happened, but also felt it might be better not to understand at all.

It was a welcome ritual—under any other circumstances, it would have been quite a happy sight.

“You see? I told you I have a very troublesome group of crew members,” the gloomy, dignified Captain Duncan finally spoke. His voice pulled Vanna out of her daze at last. “This ship is always this noisy. But from another angle, your life here should not be boring.”

Vanna’s face stayed blank. Deep inside, her thoughts were roaring like a thousand explosions, but she truly had no idea what expression she should be wearing.

She looked up at the scene on the deck. Nina and Shirley had already ‘fished’ the head out from between the stairs and were clumsily putting it back where it belonged. A fat pigeon had flown in from somewhere and was flapping nearby, loudly shouting something strange like “Little hammer forty, little hammer forty.”

She finally got a clear look at the silver-haired woman’s face and remembered where she had seen it before.

It had been in the antique shop in the Lower City.

Back then, the woman had golden hair. Now that Vanna thought about it, that must have been a disguise.

She looked at Shirley, then at Nina, then at Mr. Morris, who stood nearby with a helpless look and his hands spread. Vanna finally understood everything.

The entire world had already changed in secret, and she was only now finding out.

“How many more ‘secrets’ are there?” Vanna’s mouth twitched at last, and she regained the ability to speak. This respected scholar had been a senior she had known since childhood. Him appearing on this ghost ship was the most unbelievable thing she had seen today. But right now, this senior was also the only person she could think to question. “How long have you been…?”

“Actually, not for very long—only a little earlier than you,” Morris answered with a gentle smile and a light nod. “Heidi does not know about this.”

“Ah, she really looks like she does not know. She was still complaining to me today, saying you suddenly went out to deal with something without explaining anything,” Vanna said in a complicated tone. “Who would have thought… that you would just appear in front of me like this, on the ‘Vanished’.”

“It seems I did leave in a bit of a hurry,” Morris said with a nod. “I should bring her some local specialties from the north as a gift later.”

Vanna pressed her lips together, then turned to look at the master of the ship.

“What other ‘surprises’ are coming?” she asked helplessly. Everything that had happened after she stepped through that gate of flame had shattered all the mental preparation she had been doing since morning. She had never felt this lost and flustered in her life. “Tell me in advance so I can at least be ready for it.”

Before Duncan could answer, Nina already ran over, speaking to Vanna with great excitement: “We are having a banquet tonight! A welcome party for the new crew member!”

“There will be really tasty fish soup!” Shirley shouted from the side. “Fish caught personally by the captain.”

“And then a deck barbecue!” Nina quickly added. “There will be fish, beef, and wheat juice!”

“No alcohol,” Duncan’s voice came from right behind Nina at once. “Not even if you call it ‘wheat juice’.”

Nina’s face drooped at once: “…Not even a little?”

“The sweet fruit wine from last time was already the limit,” Duncan said with a straight face. “Beer is still too early for you.”

“Oh.”

Vanna looked at Nina, then at Duncan. Only after a long moment did she sigh softly: “So that antique shop really had problems—and I did not notice anything.”

“We have always operated legally. The goods are not genuine, but the prices are fair,” Duncan said with a faint, amused look. “As for you not noticing anything… actually, that is a good thing. You know what I mean.”

“Yes. Her Eminence the Pope reminded me to rein in my urge to pry when I am near you,” Vanna sighed again and looked at the ugly, skeletal giant dog beside Shirley. “If I am not mistaken, this is a Abyssal Hound, isn’t it? And this little girl is a Summoner who formed a symbiotic pact with Abyssal demons?”

Dog shook his head eagerly: “Ah, yes, yes, yes.”

Vanna jumped in surprise: “…This demon can talk?!”

“It can not only talk, it can now even spell its own name and do addition and subtraction within one hundred,” Duncan said casually. “Among the crew members of the Vanished, it is considered fairly well educated.”

Vanna stared for a moment, then looked at Alice, who was a short distance away, rolling her neck. She had already noticed the details of Alice’s joints earlier, and now she spoke thoughtfully: “A doll… so that means…”

“Anomaly 099. Its former name was ‘Doll spirit coffin’. Now you people seem to just call her ‘doll’, but she has her own real name, which you should already know. Here, you can just call her Alice,” Duncan said calmly. Then he added, “Do not worry. She is very safe now.”

“Hello!” Alice waved and smiled, her face full of harmless cheer. “I did not scare you just now, did I?”

Vanna reached up and touched her own neck on reflex. Then she managed a slightly stiff smile in return, counting it as an answer to this cursed Doll’s greeting.

Just then, Shirley ran to a wooden barrel nearby and pulled out another paper tube with bright, colorful wrapping. She held it up happily and ran back: “Alice! Alice! There is one more here! Do you want to…”

“Stop playing with those things!” Duncan glared at Shirley. “So who bought them? And why are they not on the purchase list?”

“I…” Nina shrank her neck at once and spoke carefully. “I used my own pocket money to buy them.”

Duncan was silent for a moment, then turned to look at Alice: “Next time they give you some strange thing to play with, come tell me first.”

Alice nodded while picking colorful scraps of paper out of her hair: “Oh.”

Vanna let out another long, deep sigh.

She went over to Morris and lowered her voice: “It is… always like this here?”

“From what I have seen, always,” Morris replied just as quietly. “Sometimes it is even livelier—especially when Miss Alice has some new ideas.”

Vanna: “…”

Chapter 286: transformation

“This will be your room from now on. All the basic daily necessities are here. If you need anything else, you can tell Alice. She will help arrange it for you, as long as she doesn’t forget.

“The room next door is a small storeroom. You can use it freely. It’s fine for prayer or meditation. You are a devout believer, so you should need something like that.

“Do not go to the lower decks. Do not get curious about the locked cabins. Sometimes strange creaks or the sound of ropes rubbing on the floor will come from deep inside this ship. You don’t need to make a fuss. Just leave it alone. If something is really wrong, I will handle it myself.

“When you live on this ship, remember the crew code.

“Do you have anything else you want to ask?”

Vanna stood at the door of the room assigned to her. She looked at the plain and normal furniture in the cabin and still felt a little dazed.

An ordinary bed, an ordinary table and chairs, an ordinary cabinet. Everything was very clean. She saw no suspicious shadows, no bloodstains hidden in the corners, and no blasphemous symbols written on the ceiling or floor. If she did not think about the fact that this place was inside the Vanished, then this was simply a very ordinary cabin.

But if she had to say it, there really were some unusual things here.

There was a special “crew code” on this ship. There was a forbidden “secret place” deep in the cabins. The whole ship was alive. Even the ropes and buckets on deck sometimes made unsettling sounds. These strange details more or less matched her imagination of the Vanished.

But compared to everything she had imagined, these bits of eeriness already seemed gentle and harmless.

“…I remember everything,” Vanna nodded slowly and said to Duncan, who had personally brought her to the room. “For now I don’t have any more questions.”

“Good,” Duncan said calmly. “Put your luggage away. Dinner is about to start. You can skip the barbecue on deck after dinner if you are not interested. That is just Shirley and Nina fooling around. But you must attend dinner. That is the necessary step for a new member joining the crew.”

“Yes.”

Vanna quietly put away her luggage. After a short hesitation, she also left her heavy two?handed sword in the room for now.

No matter what, walking into the dining room with a two?handed greatsword would be far too strange.

She followed Duncan toward the dining room and stayed silent the whole way.

But her heavy, worried look did not escape Duncan’s eyes.

“If you want to ask something, you can ask at any time,” Duncan slowed his steps and turned his head slightly to look at Vanna beside him. “There are actually not many strict rules on this ship. On a long ocean voyage, the worst thing is a crew member hiding things in their heart. The unease and confusion in your heart will be magnified by the Boundless Sea. You never know when they might turn into an uninvited guest.”

Vanna’s heart tightened. She hesitated for a moment and finally spoke: “It’s actually nothing. It’s just that things developed differently from what I imagined. Right now I feel a bit… at a loss.”

“Oh, that is understandable. I can even roughly guess what kind of image of the Vanished you had before,” Duncan said casually. “Having the first day be a lively welcome party instead of a dark, bloody sacrificial ritual feels quite unbelievable, doesn’t it?”

“It’s not as exaggerated as a sacrificial ritual… but the scene I first imagined really wasn’t as peaceful as this.” Vanna seemed to smile a little. In any case, she was a bit more relaxed now.

“That is one of the reasons your Pope sent you onto this ship,” Duncan said slowly. “She needs to know what the real Vanished is like. And I… also need you as a bridge to rebuild contact with the civilized world.”

They reached the dining room.

Under the swaying whale oil lamp, the long table was already covered with dishes. A large tureen of steaming fish soup sat at the most eye?catching spot on the table. The crew stood on both sides of the long table, waiting for their captain. From somewhere deep in the ship came a low, gentle creaking sound, as if this ancient exploration vessel were humming a song as the veil of night fell.

Vanna took her seat at the empty place prepared for her and looked at the food before her, sending waves of fragrance into the air under the warm light.

Alice stood up, filled a bowl with hot soup, and placed it in front of the new crew member.

“Please drink,” the doll girl said politely.

Vanna looked at the bowl in front of her. From her earlier talk with Morris, she already knew the “truth” of this special food and the unique symbolic meaning of this dinner. Now, looking at the pieces of fish swaying slightly in the thick soup, she felt her vision blur for a second, but the blur faded at once.

“Is this my fate?” she could not help muttering.

“No,” Alice shook her head, her face full of simple seriousness. “This is your fish soup.”

Vanna was left speechless, then a smile slowly appeared at the corners of her mouth.

It smelled pretty good.

…

In the great Cathedral of the city?state of Pland, Helena stood quietly in front of the holy statue of the storm Goddess and gazed at the candles burning at the statue’s feet.

The candleholders, covered in complex and delicate patterns, burned quietly. But in Helena’s sight, the flames at their tops slowly rose, then shook, split, spread, and flowed outward.

In the blink of an eye, the hall vanished. The statue vanished. The candleholders vanished. In Helena’s vision, only countless flames remained. Big or small, near or far, high or low, the candles filled the space around her, leaping and burning in a dark, chaotic, boundless void like stars.

Each little flame represented a Saint. They represented the strength the Deep Sea Church had relied on from its peak until now.

Helena raised her head, and the countless flames in her vision moved quickly with her. Many flames drifted far away. Only one bright flame came to her, burning quietly in the darkness.

The Pope gazed at this flame and waited patiently.

In her sight, the flame finally began to tremble. The shaking grew stronger and stronger. Then, in one instant, it suddenly burned fiercely. The flame shot up several times higher, and a pale green light burst out within the fire.

The whole process lasted only two or three seconds.

The flame then calmed down again. It gave off a faint green glow and burned in the darkness, bright and silent.

“…She really completed the transformation,” Helena could not help murmuring softly. She raised her hand without thinking, as if she wanted to touch that quietly burning flame with her fingertip.

But she stopped at the last step.

The countless candle flames in the darkness faded at once. The scene of the cathedral returned to normal.

Helena looked up at the veiled statue of the Goddess that quietly looked down over the hall.

Faint light and shadow flowed across the surface of the statue. The hard stone shell, carved from rock, seemed to gain the softness of living flesh. From under the thick veil, a pale, unreal breath slowly seeped out.

The statue lowered its head. Semi?transparent, spirit?like tendrils gathered out of that pale mist and slid out from the edges of the veil, hanging slowly down in front of Helena.

The tendrils curled and pulsed, waiting for Helena to speak.

“Your messenger has already boarded the ship and was completely transformed two minutes ago. Now she is a part of the Vanished,” Helena said calmly and respectfully as she looked at the tendrils. “But as before, she has still kept her humanity and sanity, and she still maintains her psychic link with the believers.”

The tendrils swayed slightly and gave off a low, strange rustling sound, mixed with the soft sound of waves.

“Yes, I will watch her condition often,” Helena said. “But if her mind really does have problems… for example, if she shows signs of corruption from Subspace, then…”

Two of the ghostly tendrils moved more strongly. In the strange rustling sound, there were strings of mutters no human could make or understand.

“I understand,” Helena let out a soft breath and lowered her head. “I will do my best to pull her back. If things truly cannot be saved, I will also try to let her return to your kingdom with as much of her humanity kept as possible.”

The tendrils swayed gently, whispering in a soothing tone. Then these ghostly limbs turned once more into pale, thin mist and slowly rose into the air.

The mist returned under the veil of the Goddess, and the statue shifted a little and went back to its former pose, calmly looking down at the mortal world.

…

The veil of night hung low. The cold radiance of the World’s Wound already shone high in the night sky.

Pack ice covered the sea. Among the rippling waves, sharp, treacherous edges of ice lurked. The towering bow of an ironclad warship cut through the waves on its night voyage, moving proudly through the endless sea of floating ice.

Large and small chunks of ice seemed to fear the might of the ironclad warship. Before the Sea Mist came near, they had already moved aside. Under the cold light of the World's Wound, a narrow path seemed to open on the sea, and the steel giant moved forward along this path.

Tyrian stood at the bow, staring at the dark, icy sea ahead, his brow deeply furrowed.

"We have already entered the Frost Sea, Captain," the voice of First Mate Aiden came through the night wind. "Around this time tomorrow, we should be back at the home port."

Tyrian did not look back. "Any new news from Frostholm?"

"The spies report that the authority in Frostholm has moved that submersible to Dagger Island near the city?state. There is an old ocean observatory there, and it is now being used as the research site for the 'eighth Number Three submersible,'" Aiden answered. "It seems they still haven't opened the submersible's hatch. Maybe they are being careful, or maybe they are waiting for higher?level orders."

"All right. At least those useless people still have the most basic level of caution," Tyrian let out a quiet breath, but his brow did not relax at all. "Aside from that, any new information?"

"The city of Frostholm is still calm for now. The authority seems to have sealed the news about the submersible. But whether they seal it or not doesn't matter much. Almost no one today knows about the Abyssal Trench Project from half a century ago," Aiden said, shaking his head. "Compared to that, there is another matter that looks unrelated to the submersible, but seems worth attention."

“Another matter?”

“Yes. It’s about… rumors that the dead are returning.”

Chapter 287: Frostholm, Death, and Night Sailing

Frostholm was a very cold place. For eighty percent of the year, this city?state was bathed in the restless, never?ending cold winds of the Frost Sea. Cold air blew constantly from the frozen seas further north, howling past Frostholm’s high city walls and steep seaside cliffs. This chill made many people shy away.

Yet Frostholm was also the largest city?state in the whole Frost Sea. In spite of the cold, the center of this great island held the richest boiling gold mines in the northern region. Boiling gold was the most crucial raw material for the key parts of steam cores. It could even be seen as the industrial foundation of this age. The industrial system built around the boiling gold mines kept this northern city?state running and brought it endless wealth and prosperity.

And death.

At Frostholm, on the edge of the mining district near the city cemetery’s gate, a completely black steam car still idled. Under the bright gas street lamps, several corpse?bearers in thick black robes were lifting a coffin out of the car together. Another tall, thin figure in a black robe stood by the car. This person’s entire face was hidden in the shadows of a wide?brimmed hat. In the crossing shadows, one could see layer after layer of bandages.

A few steps away, a shriveled old man stood by the cemetery gate. His body was slightly hunched, and his whole figure seemed wrapped in heavy shadow. He watched the busy corpse?bearers with a cold expression.

The corpse?bearers from the Church of Death were especially silent. They did not make a sound while moving the coffin. Only a faint bumping noise sounded now and then, making the already gloomy graveyard seem even more eerie and dead.

After an unknown time, the grim old warden of the cemetery finally spoke and broke the silence: “Cause of death?”

“She slipped and fell into a machine shaft,” the tall, thin, bandaged figure answered. The voice was a slightly hoarse female voice that still sounded quite young. “She died on the spot and has already received baptism. The detailed situation is in the transfer documents. You can read them yourself.”

“How long will she stay?” The old man’s expression and tone did not change at all. It was as if he were talking about a stone that was about to be carried into his room.

The bandaged figure looked quietly at the grim old man.

“Three days,” she answered shortly. “Three days of spirit?soothing, then she will be sent into the Great Crucible.”

“That’s really short.” The warden snorted through his nose and looked up at the cemetery gate beside him. The black, carved iron fence stood like cold, sharp thorns under the lamp?light and the veil of night. Beyond this gate, which marked the line between life and death, one could faintly see many neat rows of stone slabs, the narrow paths between them, and deeper in, the blurred shapes of tombstones and small huts.

This was a cemetery, but for most of the bodies sent here, it was not their resting place for long. Aside from a few long?term graves with special meaning, the dead only stayed here for a time. From city officials at the top to peddlers and laborers at the bottom, no one could escape the rules here.

They died and were sent temporarily to the cemetery. Under the gaze of Bartok, God of Death, they slowly calmed down. After a few days at the shortest, or ten days or half a month at the longest, they would be sent into the Great Crucible next to the cemetery. The sins of their lives turned into smoke in the sky. The good they had done was merged into the hiss of the steam pipes. A bit of ash was scattered into the soil of the city?state, and nothing of them remained in the world.

The cemetery would keep only a small headstone for them—very small, and soon buried behind many more.

“The dead cannot take the living’s land,” the bandaged woman shook her head. “For the dead whose dying process was ‘clean and pure,’ three days are enough time for the soul to regain peace.”

“That’s not the only reason, is it?” The grim warden raised his eyes. His dry, cloudy eyeballs quietly watched the “bandaged woman” in the heavy black coat. “You’re afraid the corpses will get up—like in the recent rumors.”

“There is still no proof that the dead in the city are truly ‘coming back to life.’ The few reports we have even contradict one another. But even a short revival as a ‘Restless One’ is something to be careful about,” the bandaged woman shook her head. “So keep a close watch on your cemetery. As for what happens in the city, the Church and the city hall will handle it.”

“I hope things really are as simple as you say, Agatha,” the warden muttered. “I can guarantee that no corpse will walk out of this yard. But the ‘cemetery’ that you and your colleagues must guard is much larger than my little plot.”

The corpse?bearers carried the coffin into the cemetery. Their silent, black?clad figures looked like corpses walking along the paths between the slabs.

They found an empty, prepared stone platform, set the coffin on it, and then stood at the four corners, ready to carry out Bartok’s soothing ritual.

The warden and the black?robed priestess called “Agatha” also walked into the cemetery and came to the platform.

The four corpse?bearers took out talismans of Bartok. They were triangular metal sigils with a door?shaped relief in the center, symbolizing the gate between life and death. They placed these sigils at the four corners of the coffin, recited a short prayer in unison, and then stepped back half a step.

Agatha then stepped forward. She took off her wide?brimmed hat and looked at the coffin on the platform as the cold wind blew.

The gas lamp lit up her figure.

Layers of bandages wrapped her whole body and even covered half her face. In the places the bandages did not cover, one could still see a trace of delicate features and the soft lines unique to a woman. A head of dark brown, slightly wavy long hair hung down her back. In her equally dark brown eyes there was only calm and pity.

“May the favor of Bartok, God of Death, watch over your soul and let you regain peace in your last three days in this world… Your ties and debts to the mortal world are wiped clean today. Lost one, you may travel light on your way…”

Agatha’s low, hoarse benediction echoed through the silent cemetery and slowly sank into the deep night.

The grim?faced warden stood to the side, watching this ritual coldly. At some point, a heavy double?barreled shotgun had appeared in his hands. On the gun’s forearm one could faintly see a triangular sigil that symbolized Bartok, God of Death.

A moment later, the ritual ended. Agatha turned her head to look at the warden of the cemetery. “It’s done.”

“I hope your prayer works,” the warden said, lifting the shotgun in his hand, “though I trust this old partner of mine more.”

“This soothing ritual was carried out by the ‘Gatekeeper’ herself. It should have some effect,” Agatha said calmly. She put the heavy, black wide? brimmed hat back on, nodded to the warden, and then led the corpse? bearers toward the cemetery gate. “We should go.”

Bartok’s followers left. The black steam car moved farther and farther away under the veil of night until its tail lights slowly melted into the night of the city.

The cold night wind blew through the graveyard, over rows of stone platforms and the carved iron fence at the edge. The sullen old warden stood at the gate, watching the direction the hearse had gone. After a long time, he pulled his gaze back and drew his clothes tighter in the wind.

“The living are finally gone. I’m really not used to the cemetery being this lively.”

He muttered to himself as he gripped his trusty double?barreled shotgun and slowly walked toward his small warden’s hut beside the morgue.

A moment later, the old man came out of the hut again. This time, he held one more thing in his hand.

A small, pink?white flower, no one knew where he had picked it.

He went to the newest coffin and picked up a stone from beside it, using it to press the little flower at one corner of the platform.

The night wind blew along the path, making the fragile petals shiver. On the nearby rows of stone platforms, one could see the corners of many slabs pressed with similar little flowers.

Most of the flowers had already withered in the wind.

“Sleep. Have a good sleep. It’s hard to sleep this soundly when you’re alive,” the old warden muttered. “Your family will come greet you tomorrow morning. That’s the rule. Say goodbye to them, then leave in peace. The world of the living isn’t all that good anyway…”

The old man shook his head, bent down to grab his double?barreled shotgun, turned, and slowly walked away.

…

“We’re sailing north. Our destination is Frostholm.” On the deck of the Vanished, Duncan found Vanna staring blankly at the distant sea and called out to her. “I’ve seen you looking off into the distance this whole time, so I guessed you were wondering about the ship’s course.”

“Frostholm?” Vanna was a little surprised. She had indeed been trying to guess the Vanished’s next route, but she had not expected Captain Duncan to bring it up to her on his own. “Why Frostholm? Did something happen there?”

“It started because Morris received a letter, a letter from a deceased friend,” Duncan said as he walked to the rail at the side of the deck. He placed both hands on the railing and looked at the Boundless Sea in the distant night. “But the bigger reason is that I’ve become interested in that place.”

“You’ve become interested?”

“In a sense, Frostholm counts as Alice’s ‘hometown,’” Duncan said with a smile. “Though she herself has no such idea at all.”

“…I don’t know much about Frostholm,” Vanna said. “I only know that its main faith is Bartok, God of Death, though there are also some believers of the storm Goddess. Frostholm's own industry seems very developed, and the biggest pillar of its economy is the boiling gold mines…"

She paused here and then, without thinking, glanced toward the cabins.

"Of course, what Frostholm is most famous for is the rebellion half a century ago. Alice doesn't mind people talking about that, right?"

"She doesn't mind—because she doesn't understand a word of it."

"…All right."

Chapter 288: Touching Frostholm

The sea grew a little choppy.

The cold night wind blew over the water. Rolling waves crashed again and again against the sturdy hull of the Vanished, but the huge ship still kept a steady stance. It seemed to ignore the wind and waves and kept sailing north at full speed.

Under the veil of night, the half?transparent spirit form sails billowed high. Now and then, the ropes and masts gave off tight creaking sounds. The living ghost ship let out a pleased sigh in the wind and waves, but the new member on board looked rather troubled.

From Duncan, Vanna had learned the truth about the Frostholm rebellion fifty years ago. She had learned of the strange and eerie Abyssal Trench Project, and that even now, fifty years later, faint Shadows of that terrible plan still stretched on without end.

Compared with the world?ending great fire that had struck Pland, the Abyssal Trench Project that took place at Frostholm was a disaster on a different level. In the abyssal trench, dark, cold, formless horrors surged. The catastrophe might be about to happen, might already be happening, or might even have already ended. In the cold veil of night, no sound could describe the outline of that unseen terror.

The Black Sun incident in Pland had been a blazing, dazzling war. What happened under the abyssal sea at Frostholm was a silent, twisted nightmare.

“According to Tyrian, the Abyssal Trench Project already ended, and all later effects ended with the death of Frostholm’s queen. But in truth, we have no proof that some supernatural Vision under Frostholm has really stopped running. We do not even know what that thing is. The entire affair was shrouded in mist from beginning to end. And now Morris has received a letter from Frostholm. That letter is a signal, a reminder that something is wrong in that northern city?state.”

Duncan’s deep voice sounded in the night wind. Then he paused for a moment, suddenly turned his head, and looked at Vanna: “Did Helena ever tell you about the ‘disturbances’ in the Northern Seas?”

“Your Eminence?” Vanna froze for a second and then shook her head lightly. “She never said. She only told me to board the Vanished, but she did not actually tell me what I was supposed to do.”

“She did not say…” Duncan muttered softly, but did not stay on that topic. “Then do not think too much about it. Just get used to life on the ship. Do not worry, I will not give you any task that puts you in a difficult spot.”

He raised his head and looked at the deep night and the thin mist spread over the endless sea in the distance.

“It is very late. You should not stand on deck in this cold wind for too long. The night sea breeze is not kind to body or mind.”

Vanna gave Duncan a slightly surprised look—she had worn that surprised look many times over the whole day—then came back to her senses and nodded: “Ah, all right. Thank you.”

As she spoke, she felt around on herself and took a small piece of wood from the pocket of her shirt. It was a wave?shaped charm amulet carved from Sea?Breath Wood. She raised the charm amulet to her lips and softly spoke a few lines of benediction. Then she threw it hard into the sea beyond the ship’s rail.

Duncan watched Vanna’s action with curiosity: “What are you doing?”

“That is a wave?shaped charm amulet I carved myself from Sea?Breath Wood. Believers of the storm Goddess use this way to pray when they go out to sea,” Vanna explained casually. “Sea?Breath Wood is seen as something the storm Goddess favors. Throwing a charm amulet made from it into the sea stands for an ancient sacrificial rite. Saying a benediction as you throw the charm amulet also makes it easier to form a link with the Goddess.”

She suddenly stopped here, then asked, a little unsure: “Do you mind this kind of act?”

“Ah, of course I do not mind. I told you, the atmosphere on the Vanished is more relaxed than you think,” Duncan said at once, smiling as he shook his head. “Morris also prays to the God of Wisdom from time to time.”

As he spoke, he waved to Vanna, then turned and slowly walked toward the captain’s cabin: “I will go back first. You should rest early.”

The sound of the rising and falling waves rushed like a steady roar. Vanna used her gaze to watch the tall figure go farther and farther away. Suddenly she seemed to think of something and called out behind Duncan: “Captain!”

Duncan stopped, but did not turn around: “What is it?”

Vanna opened her mouth. After hesitating for two or three seconds, she finally said: “I want to apologize to you—for my past recklessness…”

“I do not mind,” Duncan said casually. Then he waved his hand and walked off without looking back.

Vanna still stood on the deck, looking a little absent?minded.

Behind her, in the surging sea, the wave?shaped charm amulet carved from Sea?Breath Wood had been tossed up and down by the foam for a long time. Only now did a cresting wave catch it. In an instant, it was rolled down into the depths of the sea.

…

In the captain’s cabin, Goathead raised his head with a creaking sound and looked at Duncan as he walked into the room: “Ah, Captain, have you finished calming the new crew member? Today was truly an unbelievable day. A high?ranking priest of the storm Goddess has become your crew member. I think that can be seen as a kind of war trophy…”

Duncan lifted his eyelids and glanced at Goathead: “Then say that next time in front of Vanna.”

“…I cannot beat her.”

“Then stop talking nonsense,” Duncan said casually. As he walked past the enchanted sea chart, he lowered his head and glanced at it. “Where are we now? What is the situation with the Sea Mist?”

“The Sea Mist is still sailing at full speed, but it adjusted its course twice not long ago. From its position, it may already be near the secret home port of the Sea Mist fleet,” Goathead answered at once. “We should reach the Frost Sea before dawn. Then, if we sail north for four or five more days, we will arrive near Frostholm… Are we going straight there, or moving in secret in the nearby waters?”

“Do not reveal ourselves for now,” Duncan said. “I am not planning to have a ‘warm meeting’ with Frostholm’s Guard Corps yet.”

“Yes, Captain.”

Duncan thought for a moment, then said: “Also, after the Sea Mist stops, move closer and take a look. Without exposing ourselves, scout the position of Tyrian’s secret Harbor and the area around it. For the Vanished, which can hide in the Spirit Realm for long periods, that should not be hard.”

“Ah, of course, that is easy,” Goathead agreed at once. “But… why do you want to scout that secret Harbor?”

“If something really has gone wrong in Frostholm, and it is linked to the secret under the abyssal sea, I think Tyrian will take action. Watching him will be the same as watching Frostholm. If the conditions there are right, we will lie in wait near the Sea Mist.”

Goathead accepted the order at once: “Understood.”

Duncan nodded and walked toward his own cabin.

“I am going to try to ‘probe’ the situation in Frostholm’s direction. Do not disturb me unless it is necessary.”

“Yes, Captain!”

The door of the cabin closed behind him.

Duncan let out a light breath, went to the table, and sat down. He rolled his slightly stiff shoulders and neck.

Ai, who had been resting with her eyes closed by the window, woke up. She flapped her wings, hopped onto the table, tilted her head, and looked at her Master: “Food only, or staying the night?”

Duncan gave the pigeon a sideways glance: “A walk in the Spirit Realm.”

As soon as he spoke, the brass spirit compass hanging on Ai’s chest snapped open with a click. Ghost?green flame rose from inside the spirit compass. In an instant, the scene in Duncan’s sight changed.

He once again came to that boundless, chaotic dark space filled with countless starlights and lines.

Ai’s figure appeared in the darkness. The skeletal bird wrapped in spirit form fire circled and flew around him.

But he did not move at once or touch any cluster of nearby starlight. First he calmed himself, carefully watched the lights that flickered in his view, and felt the faint breaths that came from them.

As expected… as the Vanished moved farther from Pland and closer to Frostholm, the starlights he saw in this space also changed.

Duncan raised his head and sensed his body in Pland. Along that sense, he looked into the depths of the darkness and saw a hazy patch of light far, far away.

He then drew his gaze back from the distance and looked at the bright “stars” that flickered before him.

After thinking for a moment, he moved closer to some of the lights and carefully touched a few.

He did not directly take over the bodies that the lights stood for. Instead, he used this way to read the shallow information behind the lights—emotions, senses, and even broken fragments of surface awareness.

Cold. Nervousness. Fuel prices. Steam supply. City Hall. Frostholm…

After touching a few lights, Duncan withdrew his will.

If he kept touching these lights that stood for “living people,” he might cause panic on a larger scale, and that in turn might draw the attention of the city?state’s Guardians. He still did not want to deal with an unfamiliar Church.

The information he had now was enough. Just from what he read from those few lights, he could already be sure that this patch of starlight belonged to the residents of Frostholm.

At least, it was part of them.

Duncan let his gaze sweep across the dazzling starlight, looking for those individuals whose light was dim and weak, whose life force was fading.

He needed a fated body to serve as a forward post for gathering information.

After a moment, a faint light that flickered in an Anomaly?like way suddenly caught his eye.

“You will do!”

Chapter 289: Coffin and Warden

A dim cluster of starlight with an Anomaly?like flicker drew Duncan’s attention.

That faint light was slightly different from the lights around it. Its weak, unreal glow was like a transparent phantom, and its unsteady flicker made it seem ready to fade away at any moment. Duncan had seen weak flashes in this chaotic space before, but even the weakest of them did not look so unreal and close to vanishing.

He frowned slightly.

A weak light often meant a body that had only recently died. But what did it mean when the light was weak and at the same time almost transparent and unreal?

He stretched out a finger and lightly touched that point of light.

In the next second, he felt his consciousness cross an endless distance at once, leaving the Vanished and falling into a new body. Cold and numb sensations spread through his limbs and bones. Then the numbness slowly faded. He began to feel the touch on his skin and the slow beating of his heart.

But for some reason, this new body felt especially heavy. Controlling it was like moving through a thick Veil. He used a great deal of effort just to move a finger, and the same effort just to force his eyelids open a crack.

Everything in front of him was dark.

[Was this a blind person? Or were the eyes covered?]

Duncan raised his hand by instinct, groping to check his eyes. As soon as he lifted his arm, he felt it hit something hard and cold. He lifted his other arm, and it also bumped into something.

He felt around on all sides and finally realized he was trapped in some kind of… container.

It was a coffin.

Duncan lay quietly in the darkness for a long moment before he sighed: “All right. That is reasonable…”

When you possessed a corpse, ending up trapped in a coffin really was the reasonable outcome. The last two times, when he had possessed bodies without any limit, had been the rare ones.

But why did it have to become reasonable at this time!

A mix of annoyance and helpless amusement rose in his heart. Duncan felt he now understood, at least a little, how Dog and Vanna had felt before when they faced “reasonable developments on the Vanished” and were left speechless. But this was clearly not the time to keep feeling things—he had to find a way to get out of this coffin.

Otherwise, he would have to give up this hard?won fated body, go back to that dark chaotic space, and choose another target to possess. He might very well end up trapped in another coffin.

Duncan began to move his hands and feet, getting used to the senses of this strange, hard?to?use body while he also tried to push open the lid above his head. A moment ago, by knocking on the wood around him, he had judged from the hollow thumping sound that this coffin was not buried in the ground. It was likely only placed somewhere for now. That meant that as long as he pushed open the lid above him, he could get out.

But the coffin lid was harder to deal with than he had thought. The lid was nailed shut and might even have extra locks. The body he now occupied was too “poor in quality.” From the feeling in his limbs, it was even weaker and more powerless than the corpse he had first taken over at the sacrificial rite site in the sewers. Forget forcing open a nailed coffin lid; even moving around a little was hard.

[Just how weak was this dead body?]

“Hey! Is anyone out there? I think I can still be saved! Call a Doctor—if that does not work, a Coroner will do…”

As he pushed at the coffin lid above him, Duncan began to shout in helpless complaint. He did not care if he scared someone or drew trouble. After a short time of adjusting and sensing, he had already confirmed that the state of this body was Anomaly?level bad, completely unfit for long?term use. It was probably a one?time shell, just like the “sacrificial victim” he had taken over the first time. Since it was a one?time shell… there was nothing to worry about.

No matter who he drew here, as long as they could get him up so he could see the surroundings, it would be enough. If he was lucky, he might even gather some information. In any case, the worst that could happen was that he died stuck in this coffin. It would not get worse than that.

He even had time now to let his thoughts wander and wondered if he should ask Alice for tips—how had that Doll managed to escape from a coffin whose lid had been nailed down and wrapped in several layers of iron chains? Just by relying on her natural strength?

In the silent corpse yard of the cemetery, the dull banging and the hoarse, low calls sounded especially abrupt.

The Warden, of course, did not ignore this sudden strange noise.

The door of the Warden’s hut was pushed open. The light of a consecrated lantern lit the small path outside the wooden house that led to the corpse yard. A gloomy old man with a fierce gaze and a hunched back stepped out of the hut. He held the consecrated lantern in one hand and gripped a powerful double?barreled shotgun in the other. His yellow, cloudy eyes stared hard in the direction of the sound.

“…The cemetery is far too lively tonight.”

The old man muttered in a harsh tone. He hung the consecrated lantern on a metal hook at his waist, traced a Triangular Emblem over his chest, then raised the shotgun and slowly walked toward the coffins.

That coffin was still thumping. The dead inside the coffin kept stubbornly knocking on the barrier between him and the world of the living, and as he knocked, he kept asking the people outside to help him get free.

“Is anyone there? Come help me out. I think this is a misdiagnosis!”

“Quiet down!” The Warden held the shotgun ready. The click of the safety being removed sounded especially sharp in the night. The stooped old man stared at the coffin and shouted: “You should be sleeping. You now belong to another world. There is no place for you in the world of the living.”

The knocking inside the coffin suddenly stopped.

Duncan judged the sound outside. It should be an old man, very close to him, and just now there had been a light clink of metal parts, probably from a weapon.

Having someone there made things easier. This way, whether he got out or not, he had another way to reach information from the outside.

“Hello, I want to know what is going on,” Duncan said after clearing his throat. He thought about how to make the most of this body so he could get more information from the person outside the coffin. “I am trapped in this… coffin, but there must be some mistake. I am still alive. Listen, my voice is actually quite strong."

"Breathing is a common illusion for the dead. Attachment to the world of the living is an obsession that your subconscious leaves in the outer layers of your brain. That truly is hard to accept, but Bartok has already prepared a better resting place for your soul," the old caretaker said, staring at the coffin. One hand still held the shotgun, while the other quietly traced the sign of the God of Death in the air. Then he took a small packet of dried powder from his clothes, rubbed some of the powder along the shotgun's barrels, and scattered the rest on the ground. "Lie down and be quiet. You should already feel sleepy. That is the call of the Lord of Death. Obey it. That will be best for both of us."

The doctrine of the Lord of Death Bartok—Duncan silently took note of this. Then he cleared his throat and kept bargaining: "…But I still think I can be saved. What if it is a misdiagnosis?"

The old caretaker with the shotgun frowned. For some reason, he felt that tonight's "Restless One" was not like any he had met in his career. The voice in the coffin sounded a bit too rational and even knew how to bargain. But he soon shook his head and pushed these messy thoughts aside:

"With respect, you slipped and fell from the guardrail of the shaft, dropped straight into a mine passage a hundred meters deep, and the back of your head burst open. The mortician took a lot of work to piece your skull back together. Mister, as I see it, the chance of a misdiagnosis in your case is… very low."

Listening to the voice outside the coffin, Duncan silently raised his hand and touched the back of his head.

"…All right. I admit my injuries sound a bit serious. In this state, this body really is not fit to leave the coffin," he sighed. "Sorry to bother you."

The old caretaker was silent for a few seconds. Then he quietly lit another spare consecrated lantern at his waist and hung it on the wooden post closest to the corpse table, all while saying calmly: “No need to be polite. Compared with most Restless Ones, you are still rather polite.”

“Oh? Do you run into this kind of thing often?”

“Every year, there are always a few corpses that do not want to stay in their coffins. Most of them try to get out in a more violent way. Only a very small number try to solve the problem by talking,” the old caretaker muttered. “But even the ones who know how to talk only speak confused nonsense. The dead always think they can achieve True Resurrection, but in fact… the great door of Bartok is not so easy to cross.”

The old caretaker shook his head and kept talking while watching the flame in the consecrated lantern on the nearby post. He knew the dead had no real reason. That was only the afterglow of a Restless Soul’s obsession. In conversation, that kind of “afterglow” burned out even faster. When the one in the coffin used up his reason, the old man’s “extra work” for the night would be done.

“Restless One, Living dead, True Resurrection—these are three completely different things,” the old man rambled on. “To cross those boundaries, you need amazing power, must bear great pain, and also need a very rare chance. Mister, do not make things hard on yourself. You cannot cross them.”

Chapter 290: Visitor in the Cemetery

He guessed that the place he was in now was a public facility used to store corpses for a while. The voice outside the coffin should belong to the warden who ran this place.

The warden sounded very experienced. He calmly called the strange movement from the coffin a “Restless One” phenomenon and spoke with Duncan in a clear, sensible way. During the whole time, he did not show any panic at all.

The body Duncan was using now seemed to belong to a worker from a mine. The cause of death was a fall from a great height, and the body had suffered serious physical damage.

While he talked with the voice outside the coffin, Duncan quietly summed up this useful information. At the same time, he became even more certain that this body was not very useful.

Even if he did not think about how weak this body felt because of the anomaly, it would still be hard for him to go running around with a caved? in skull. Of course, this world did have “Living dead”. The sailors on Tyrian’s ship included more than a few strange fellows whose skulls were missing a piece or whose hearts were missing a chunk. But even as a Living dead, one could not just walk around openly in a city?state. That did not meet his needs at all.

While Duncan made his plans in silence, the old caretaker outside the coffin kept his nerves tight and never relaxed.

The double?barreled shotgun in the old man’s hands still pointed at the coffin. The herbal powder he had spread on the ground earlier now gave off a pale glow. His voice stayed calm, but his fingers on the gun were already turning white.

He was waiting for the Restless One in the coffin to use up the last of its obsession and reason. He was waiting for that talkative dead man to grow tired and accept the fact of his own death. According to his experience, this usually did not take long. Under the strong soothing effect of the consecrated lantern and the herbs, half an hour was often enough to calm a restless soul.

Normally, the dead would slowly grow dull and muddled as they talked. Very soon, they would even forget how to speak at all. Normally, the voice in the coffin would turn into vague muttering, then into hoarse rambling. Normally…

So why did the one in this coffin seem more and more energetic the more he talked?!

“You know where I am right now? Ah, of course I know this is a place for keeping corpses. I mean where it is exactly… You know, I couldn’t see anything around me when they brought me here.

“How’s the weather today? It should be pretty cold, right? I think I can hear the wind outside. Frostholm nights are hard to get through…

“What time is it now? Have you eaten? Do you have any coworkers with you?

“Any news in the city lately? I don’t really remember what happened before… Oh, right, do you know someone named Brown Scott? I think he’s a folklore scholar or maybe a historian. He lives on Hearth Street. A friend of mine knows him very well…”

Fine beads of sweat slowly appeared on the old caretaker’s forehead. He could swear to Bartok that in all his long career he had never seen such a strange case. A restless corpse, after having a “Gatekeeper” from the Church of Death personally perform a soul?calming ritual on it, and under the strong soothing of the consecrated lantern and the herbal powder, showed not the slightest sign of going to sleep. Instead it was waking up more and more, like a living person!

This could not help but make him think of the troubling rumors that had been spreading through the city?state lately. He thought of all those stories about “the return of the dead”.

Had the boundary that Bartok, God of Death, had set between life and death really developed a gap?

“Mister,” the old caretaker tightened his grip on the shotgun. His tone grew a bit more serious as he said: “You’ve said enough. If I were you, I’d quiet down right now and go back to proper sleep as soon as possible – otherwise, when the Sun comes up, you’re the one who’ll suffer.”

Duncan thought for a moment inside the coffin, then said helplessly: “I’d really like to cooperate with you, but I honestly can’t fall asleep right now… How about you help me open this lid and then give me a good medicine for calming the mind and helping sleep?”

“Now you’re asking for too much…”

The old caretaker spoke in a low voice, but just then, a sudden, harsh pounding on the iron gate at the cemetery entrance cut him off.

Who would visit at such a late hour of the night?

The old caretaker looked in shock toward the source of the pounding. He saw several figures in black coats standing under the streetlamp outside the tall carved gate. The glow from the gas lamp fell on them, stretching their shadows long and wrapping their backs in a halo of light.

One of the figures raised a hand and showed something in the lamplight.

It was a triangular metal sigil, the symbol of an envoy of Bartok, God of Death.

The old caretaker’s heart gave a little jolt. He turned back without thinking and glanced at the brand?new coffin.

The voice inside the coffin had gone quiet for the moment.

After a short hesitation, the old man turned and walked quickly toward the cemetery entrance.

With a clatter of loosening chains and the creak of turning hinges, the tall cemetery gate swung open.

The old caretaker lifted his head and studied the figures under the streetlamp with wary eyes.

Three men and one woman, all wearing thick, pitch?black coats and equally heavy wide?brimmed hats. They stood in silence in the night wind. Their clothes and their quiet stance made people think of a Crow standing by a gravestone at midnight.

While the old man was looking up at these uninvited guests, the uninvited guests were also studying this gloomy old gravekeeper. Very soon, a shorter man stepped half a step forward, lifted the triangular sigil in his hand, and spoke in a solemn voice:

“The peace of death will in the end shelter you and me. By order of the city’s Cathedral, we have come to take away one of the dead. He should have just been sent to this cemetery.”

“priests of the God of Death?” The old caretaker felt a flash of doubt. He frowned slightly at the triangular sigil in the man’s hand. “Gatekeeper Agatha left only a few hours ago. She didn’t say any other priests would be coming here to guide the dead. And… it’s midnight. This is not a good time to guide the dead.”

“Special case. This dead man needs to be taken somewhere safer,” another person among the visitors spoke. It was the woman. She was of medium height, her facial lines were hard and cold, and her lips were very thin. “Please cooperate. It’s a matter of life and death. There can be no delay.”

When the old caretaker heard the words “special case”, his heart moved. He thought again of the talkative voice in that coffin, and at once all his doubts faded.

It seemed the Restless One in that coffin really was unusual, and the Church had already noticed. He did not know how the priests at the Cathedral had made their judgment, but in any case, the experts were here now.

The old man did not like outsiders disturbing his cemetery, but since the other side held the proper emblem of the God of Death and claimed to be official priests, there was no need for him to stand in their way.

He only hoped this trouble would end as soon as possible tonight.

“Come with me,” the old man muttered. He turned and stepped aside, opening the way into the cemetery. “You came at just the right time.”

“Just the right time?” One of the tall, broad?shouldered men in black was about to follow him in. He paused for a moment at those words. “Why do you say that?”

“That corpse has already started to get restless. Ha, muttering and rambling, talking nonstop, the more we talk the more awake he gets. I’m starting to think he’ll cross the First Threshold and turn into an Undying – and that would be a real problem. The nearby residents wouldn’t like that at all,” the old caretaker said, shaking his head. “Nobody likes the Undying. People in Frostholm like them even less. It makes them think of that battleship cursed by the curse. That ship was full of Undying…”

As they listened to the old man grumble all the way, the four people in black traded quick glances, as if a bit surprised.

But soon, the thin?lipped woman shook her head slightly, signaling them to hold back for now.

The other three nodded a little and kept following the old caretaker in silence. The short man who had shown the Church emblem earlier casually tossed the sigil onto the ground.

The emblem fell without a sound. The moment it touched the earth, it turned into drifting black dust and blew away on the wind.

The group soon crossed the narrow paths of the cemetery and reached the morgue where the dead were stored for a time.

Plain coffins sat in neat rows on raised platforms, lying silent in the night wind. The consecrated lantern the old caretaker had hung on a post earlier still burned with a steady flame. The herbal powder on the ground still gave off a faint pale glow.

Seeing that these sealing measures were still working normally, the old caretaker clearly relaxed a little. He then took two steps forward and pointed at the newest coffin: “This one. The one you’re looking for. It was brought in tonight.”

The four people in black exchanged a look. The thin?lipped woman walked up to the platform and frowned slightly as she looked over the coffin in front of her: “…So this is it…”

“Probably,” Duncan said casually from inside the coffin. “Who are you?”

The woman’s eyes widened a little at once, as if the voice from the coffin had startled her. The other three men clearly jumped as well. They looked at each other nervously, and the tall one could not help but mutter under his breath: “Something’s not right…”

“What’s not right?” The old caretaker seemed to have very good hearing. He asked curiously: “Is it too much for you to handle?”

“No, we’re here to take care of it,” the woman in black answered right away. Then she glanced at her three companions, as if weighing her words quickly, and nodded to the old caretaker: “From here… we’ll need you to step aside for a while.”

Chapter 291: Seeing Through

When he heard this priest of the God of Death, the old caretaker did not cooperate at once like an ordinary gravekeeper. Instead, he frowned in displeasure: “I’m the cemetery’s warden. I’ve never heard of any operation in a cemetery that needed the warden to leave.”

“Special case, old mister,” the short man in black stepped half a step forward. His tone was serious and sincere. When he saw the stubborn look on the old caretaker’s face, he finally sighed. “Fine, I wasn’t supposed to tell you this. This corpse is to be sent to the Silent Cathedral.”

“The Silent Cathedral?” the old caretaker blurted out. “What in the world…”

“Severe unknown corruption, possibly related to something deep in the mine. We have to carry out a special purification ritual. The fewer living people at the scene, the better,” the short man said gravely. “It’s not just you who has to step aside. One of my colleagues and I will step aside with you as well.”

As he spoke, the tall, broad?shouldered man in black also stepped forward and silently came to stand beside the short man.

The old caretaker looked at the two black?clad priests in front of him, then at the woman in black who stood by the corpse platform. She had already taken herbs and holy oil from her bag and started laying out a temporary altar on the open ground in front of the platform.

“All right. If it involves the mine and corruption, then it’s not my job anymore,” the old man finally gave up his stubbornness. He shrugged, put away the shotgun, and turned toward the cemetery path. Then he looked back and called to the tall and short men in black: “Come. I’ve got some hot tea in my little hut. You can warm up by the fire. The cemetery at night is even colder than outside.”

The two men in black exchanged a look, then followed the old man and said casually: “Thank you for the hospitality, old mister.”

The old caretaker and the two men in black left. By the corpse platform, only the thin?lipped woman in black and the other, thin and silent man remained.

And one coffin, now quiet.

Duncan lay quietly inside the coffin. He thought over his talk with the warden and tried to guess where these uninvited guests had come from.

This landing trip to Frostholm really was not like the last time in Pland. It did not look very smooth, but it had its own kind of fun.

The only thing that displeased him was this body’s poor performance.

He lifted his hand inside the coffin and watched a tiny green flame dance at his fingertip, lighting up the cramped space.

Luckily, the fire of his spirit form was not affected at all.

In the wavering green light, he saw cheap, low?grade planks, coarse linen lining, and the coffin lid covered in dense runes. In the middle of those runes sat a triangular sigil – it should be the mark of Bartok, God of Death.

Those runes and that emblem were clearly not some “fine handmade work”. They were probably stamped on directly by machine. The effect was about the same anyway.

Duncan pricked up his ears again and listened carefully to the sounds outside the coffin.

The coffin was thin and not well sealed. He could clearly hear people talking outside. Just now, he had heard the warden and two of the visitors walking away. Now he heard faint rustling sounds, as if the people who had stayed behind were moving around near the coffin.

What are they going to do?

The woman in black stopped arranging the altar in front of the corpse platform.

She stood up and glanced toward the path where the warden had left. After she made sure the stubborn old caretaker had gone far away, she spat on the ground, then walked toward the coffin.

She stepped right over the “altar” she had just set up, not caring about it at all. The herbal powder and the clay dish that held the oil were kicked aside with one careless swing of her foot.

The silent man in black had already reached the coffin. He gave his gatekeeper’s cane a shake. A metal hook popped out from the end of the cane, turning it into a crowbar.

“Hold on,” the woman in black raised a hand to stop her partner, then came up to the coffin and knocked on the lid with her knuckles. “Still there?”

“Ah, yes,” Duncan answered at once. “Do you need something?”

The woman in black frowned, looking a bit puzzled, but her face quickly turned blank again. “Do you know who you are?” she asked.

“…No idea,” Duncan lied smoothly. “In fact, I’m still confused. I don’t know how I ended up here. Just now, a warden from the cemetery told me I’m already dead and will be burned in three days… What in the world happened? And who are you?”

“Ah, we’re here to help you,” the woman in black said lightly. “You don’t want to be burned, do you?”

“Of course not. Frostholm’s winter is really cold, but warming up in a crematorium sounds a bit too challenging. Are you going to let me out?”

“Your jokes are as cold as this night, mister,” the woman in black laughed. “Of course we’ll let you out. Then you only need to come with us, and you won’t have to worry about anyone giving you trouble again.”

“Then thank you very much,” the voice in the coffin said politely.

The woman in black put away her smile and stepped back half a step. She nodded to the silent man holding the crowbar: “Pry it open.”

The silent man stepped forward at once. With a squeak and creak of wood, the not?so?sturdy coffin was soon forced open. Then he gave the lid a push with the gatekeeper’s cane, shoving the dark board all the way aside.

The plank slid off the platform and fell heavily onto the gravel.

The woman in black raised a finger in a hush gesture. At the same time, a hoarse, low murmur came from her throat, a sound that did not seem human at all.

As she made this gesture, the coffin lid hit the ground without making any sound. In the blink of an eye, the heavy plank turned into drifting black dust and disappeared silently into the veil of night.

Then the man and woman in black lifted their heads and looked into the now wide?open coffin.

A pale man with large hands and feet, wearing a dark brown coat, sat up inside and looked back at them in curiosity.

After a long moment, a faint smile appeared on Duncan’s face. He sighed softly: “Ah, things do seem to be getting interesting.”

“What did you say?” The woman in black frowned. Then she quickly hardened her face and spoke in a low voice that seemed to carry a strange power: “Climb out and leave this place with us at once.”

“No hurry,” Duncan said, still sitting in the coffin. He smiled and shook his head. “The chains on you are really something – and your Abyssal demons are quite something too. I thought only Dog came with that kind of thing.”

The man and woman in black both froze. The next second, they showed clear shock. The thin?lipped woman even took half a step back without thinking. She stared hard at Duncan sitting in the coffin, shock and caution in her eyes: “You can see through our disguise?!”

“Disguise?”

Duncan raised his eyebrows and let his gaze sweep over the two in front of him.

The woman wore a dark dress. Her face was thin and mean. Between her neck and collarbone, a pitch?black chain grew out. The chain was clearly part of her body, as if it extended straight from her bones. Its end was linked to an ugly monster bird, its whole body twisted together from black bone plates.

Black smoke rose from the monster bird. It perched steadily on the woman’s shoulder. Two bloody holes in its skull stared fixedly at Duncan, and every single bone plate on its body trembled faintly.

The other was a thin man in a thick gray?blue coat. A chain stretched straight out from his throat. The other end was linked to a huge jellyfish floating in the air. The jellyfish seemed to have no real body at all. Its whole form was made of drifting smoke. Deep inside it was a blood?red core that kept swelling and shrinking, writhing like a heart.

Black chains and eerie, smoke?wrapped creatures, bound together in a symbiotic pact.

Clearly, two Annihilators.

And both cultists now looked shocked.

“Ah, right, disguise,” Duncan said at last, as if the word had only just clicked in his mind. He then slowly rose from the coffin and carefully climbed down from the platform. His movements were very slow, because this body really did not work well. “Dog seems to have a talent for messing with perception and helping people in symbiotic pacts hide their identity. So this is your common trick, huh? But with all due respect, your disguise skills are really not that reliable. I haven’t seen a single time they didn’t go wrong…”

“Stop!” The woman cultist finally came back to her senses. She suddenly retreated several steps, then raised her hand and pointed at Duncan. The words that came from her throat seemed to mix with another low, rasping voice, as if another spellcaster were speaking through her: “I strip you of the ability to move. I order you to stop where you are!”

Duncan had just stepped off the platform. He took two more unhurried steps forward and looked curiously at the woman in the distance: “So this is the so?called ‘spell’ that Annihilators borrow from the mouths of demons?

“Well, to be fair, it is a bit more elegant than Shirley.

“But from the look of it, it still doesn’t work as well as Meteor Dog – at least that one can make me jump.”

Chapter 292: Ignorance Is Bliss

The spell they cast through the symbiotic pact, using the forbidden knowledge shared by the Abyssal Demons, did nothing at all. Compared to a corpse that had woken early in its coffin, this bizarre failure of the spell shocked the two Annihilators at the scene even more.

Besides, the Death-Omen Bird was one of the Abyssal Demons whose Spells were strongest in the first place.

The gaunt, sharp-faced woman in the black dress stared in disbelief at the Revived One standing calmly in front of her. Black chains spread from her collarbone, and uneasy smoke drifted over their surface. At the same time, she sensed something wrong with the Death-Omen Bird bound to her by the symbiotic pact. The Abyssal Demon kept sending out signals of extreme danger. It even wanted to cut off its link to its Master and retreat back to the Abyssal Deep.

She finally reacted. She grabbed the chain at the Death-Omen Bird's feet with one hand. Her other hand closed on empty air as she stared hard into Duncan's eyes: "Something is wrong… you are not this dead man… who are you?"

Duncan looked at the woman, then at the silent man standing not far away, still keeping his distance and gripping the crowbar-like Gatekeeper's cane. He said: "You tell me who you are first. Let me guess… first, you two are obviously not Envoys of the Death God. You fooled that Warden with… hmm, so?called 'disguise tricks'. You came for me—or rather, for the body I am using right now. I'm not wrong, am I?"

The woman in the black dress parted her lips. Her mouth moved as if she were saying something, but Duncan did not catch it. The next second, she suddenly raised the right hand she had been holding in the air. Her low, muffled murmur turned into a strange shriek!

The Death-Omen Bird Demon perched on her shoulder spread its wings at the same moment. Under the control of the symbiotic pact, the Abyssal Demon had to fight against its instinctive fear and launch an attack at Duncan.

A heavy pressure suddenly fell. Then the ground underfoot began to shudder and twist in an unnatural way. The earth around Duncan rippled like liquid, and several huge black thorns, like bone spurs, shot up from the soil and coiled toward him.

Yet Duncan made no move to dodge. Mainly, this awful temporary body really could not handle any nimble response. He only watched calmly as the thorns reached him and wrapped around his body.

Then a grand spirit form flame rose from the thorns. In an instant, the thorny growth conjured by the spell turned into a field of pitch?black ash. Tiny leftover sparks drifted away on the wind.

“I told you, you might as well swing that bird on your shoulder and smash it into me. That might actually startle me.”

Duncan sighed helplessly, but as soon as he finished speaking, he felt something wrong with his body.

He raised his hands without thinking. The next second, he stared in shock as crack after crack opened on them.

These were not wounds from the thorns just now, but splits that appeared on their own. Under Duncan’s gaze, the cracks kept spreading, as if this body’s skin and flesh had suddenly lost all life and elasticity and were drying and splitting in the cold, dry air.

Very little blood seeped from the cracks. Instead, dry, broken fragments kept falling from the wounds onto the ground. In just a few seconds, Duncan clearly felt this already weak body grow even more fragile.

He watched the strange change on his body in surprise. Then he lifted his head and looked at the woman in the black dress: “Is this also the power of a spell? It worked this time?”

The woman in the black dress still had not recovered from the shock of the thorns failing so completely. Her face had gone very pale, and the Death-Omen Bird on her shoulder drooped its head weakly. But when she heard Duncan’s words, a slight smile suddenly appeared on her face: “Ah. It seems this body is almost at its limit… that will make you much easier to deal with.”

“At its limit?” Duncan asked without thinking. He seemed to have guessed something from her tone and words. But just as he was about to say more, the woman in the black dress spoke in an icy voice: “Do it.”

As soon as she finished, the thin, quiet man beside her moved. Expressionless, he looked at Duncan. The Abyssal Demon floating in the air beside him, shaped like a Smokewisp Jellyfish, swelled and shrank. A mass of dark substance, spitting thick smoke, spat out from its body and shot at Duncan like a cannonball.

But the “acid shell” turned a faint green halfway there. Before it even touched its target, it broke apart and vanished without a sound.

Duncan watched the mass of darkness burst apart, helpless: “I told you, that thing doesn’t—”

He did not finish. The smoke and sparks in midair faded away, and when they cleared, he saw the silent man not far away already raising the Gatekeeper’s cane at him. The Gatekeeper’s cane had split open. A dark, wide gun barrel jutted out from the break.

“Bang!!”

Fire burst from the barrel, but the sound did not travel beyond the mortuary slab. The woman in the black dress had already raised a finger in a hush gesture.

The large?caliber bullet tore through the air, making only a low rumble inside the silenced area. Duncan’s eyes tracked the last part of its path, but he did nothing. He only glanced from the corner of his eye at the silent man who shared a symbiotic pact with the jellyfish?like Demon.

In the next second, his vision fell into brief darkness.

The special bullet’s impact ripped his head to pieces. Everything above his neck was gone.

Duncan’s body swayed. It stood there for a moment as if thinking, then lifted a hand and touched the space above its neck. When it found nothing, the body raised its hand toward the woman in the black dress and the silent man and gave them the middle finger. After that, it fell straight backward.

The woman in the black dress stared fixedly at that strange and terrifying headless body.

She had watched her companion blow its head apart with one shot. Then she watched the body raise a hand to touch the missing head and make that bizarre gesture. No body that had lost its head could move like that.

Whatever it was, the thing that had taken this body had not died. It had only left. This was only a temporary banishment.

Knowing it would be dangerous to stay, the woman in the black dress had already decided to give up tonight's operation. She looked up at her companion at once: "We're leaving. We'll signal the other two after we get out of the graveyard. Something is very wrong tonight…"

The silent man holding the strange Gatekeeper's cane did not move for a moment, as if he had not heard her.

He simply stood there. On the black chain that rose from his throat, a tiny green spark of fire flashed and vanished.

That ember had already flowed along the chain into his flesh.

His heart had already been burned to ash.

"Hey, did you hear me?" The woman's voice came again, stern and impatient. "We need to leave. If that Warden notices, there has been way too much noise tonight!"

The thin man with the Gatekeeper's cane nodded and slowly turned around.

"What was with you just now?" The woman in the black dress stared at her companion, then quickly looked away. "All right. We have to leave at once, Duncan."

"Of course," Duncan said with a smile. "This is no place to linger."

The woman in the black dress nodded and started to turn toward the path. But at the instant she began to turn her head, the Death-Omen Bird that had been resting on her shoulder suddenly let out a sharp, eerie scream. The bony plates all over the Abyssal Demon rattled, and black dust and smoke billowed from it. Then it whipped its head around and locked its gaze on Duncan, its wings twitching as it made a series of strange clicking sounds.

Behind Duncan, the jellyfish?shaped Abyssal Demon suddenly burst into roaring flame. In the thick black smoke and fire, the bodiless jellyfish

Demon burned away in seconds, as if from nothing. The chain that linked it to its symbiotic pact partner gave off a harsh clatter and fell to the ground as a pile of broken links.

The woman in the black dress stopped dead.

Through the chain between them, she felt the Death-Omen Bird's immense fear and its warning that brushed right against death.

She even vaguely sensed the Death-Omen Bird's visual signal. When the Demon on her shoulder turned toward Duncan, a sharp pain like a spike pierced her brain. Her retinas seemed to burn, and indescribable twisting light and shadow filled her reddening, darkening vision.

Ordinary Abyssal Demons had no heart. They moved only by instinct. When great danger appeared, they would not, like Dog, worry about their Master's mental health.

"Ugh—" The woman in the black dress let out a low cry. In pain and dazed, she stumbled back two steps and grabbed the nearby streetlamp for support. She stared in horror at the thin figure standing in the crisscrossing light and shadow under the lamp, a figure both familiar and strange: "You… what are you?"

Duncan glanced at the ugly skeletal bird on her shoulder [much uglier than AI], then turned to look at the little patch of black ash on the ground behind him. He sighed with regret.

"Ignorance is bliss," he said, shaking his head. "You were not blessed with much."

Chapter 293: Hunt and Escape

The moment Duncan said the words “Ignorance is bliss,” the woman in the black dress reacted.

But this time, she did not try any more useless attacks. She grabbed the chain at the Death-Omen Bird’s feet with one hand, swept her other hand behind her, and summoned a veil of hazy black mist in the air. Then she turned and ran toward the graveyard gate.

She no longer cared about the partner whose body had been taken, or about the other two companions still dealing with the Warden. The strange events of this night had already gone beyond what she could understand. Even as an Annihilator who had signed a symbiotic pact with a Abyssal Demon, she was close to the limits of her reason and courage.

She had to get away, as far and as fast as possible. She could not stay any longer under the unseen, unspeakable gaze of those Intruders, or remain in the company of those terrible Shadows.

Duncan frowned. He had not yet fully adjusted to the body he had just taken. He could feel that this body was clearly healthier than the one from the coffin, but it was still hard for him to keep up with her as she fled.

Even so, he still set off after her. As he walked, he casually tore apart the strange black mist she left in her path, got used to his new body, and kept his eyes on her fleeing back.

Under his gaze, the gas streetlamps the panicked woman passed began to flicker. A smear of deep green suddenly tainted their once steady, bright flames.

The lamps corrupted by the Flame Usurper were like invisible footsteps. They followed the fleeing cultist's shadow, spreading quickly toward the graveyard gate and scattering more and more green sparks along the way.

But just as the green flames from the lamps on both sides were about to catch up with the cultist, the strange bird built from black bone plates suddenly shot into the air with a shrill scream. Its skeletal wings flung clouds of smoke across the night sky. Its sharp cry seemed to rip open a small patch of space and time. Duncan saw dark cracks suddenly split open in the shadow beside the cultist. Those blurred, twisted cracks then merged into a huge black hole.

The skeletal bird screamed in mad terror and hurled itself toward the dark opening that had appeared from nowhere. The chain that extended from its feet snapped straight. With a harsh clatter, the woman in the black dress was yanked toward the hole.

"Damn it! Stop! You bastard! You beast!" The cultist thrashed and screamed, her voice breaking with sheer panic and despair. "No, no! Don't! Don't take me to the Abyssal Deep… help, help! No! No—"

With one last scream, the cultist was dragged by the chain into the black void. The hole closed with a howl and vanished into a trembling field of Shadows.

The faint green glow from the lamps on both sides fell on the now?empty graveyard path.

"That was a very special escape route," Duncan said, a little stunned by the sudden scene. After a moment, the corner of his mouth twitched. Something seemed to come back to him. "Wasn't this how Shirley and Dog ran off back then too…? But as I recall, she wasn't scared at all at the time."

Duncan frowned and stared in the direction where the cultist had vanished. He thought about it for a moment, but learned nothing, so he had to look away.

As he withdrew his gaze, the lamps on both sides, stained green, quickly returned to normal. The crisscrossing dim lights drew back through the darkness like retreating tendrils and gathered again at his feet.

A faint crackling sound reached Duncan’s ears.

Puzzled, he looked toward the sound, only to find it came from his own body. The soft crackles rose from all over him. Thin streams of black smoke seeped and curled out through the gaps in his clothes.

For a moment, Duncan was a bit confused, unsure what new problem this was. Then he yanked open his shirt at the chest and finally saw what was happening to this body.

His flesh was slowly turning into some kind of black, charred material. His shrunken skin was already full of gaps, and black smoke and ash rose from those gaps like smoke from a pile of burning wood.

If he had not undergone the “open your heart” Baptism at the very start, this strange and frightening sight would have shocked him badly. But by now, he was used to such weird and uncanny things, so he stayed very calm and even reached up to touch his neck.

The change seemed to begin at his throat—the place that had once held a symbiotic pact with a Abyssal Demon, where the chain had been attached.

Duncan at once thought of the jellyfish?shaped Abyssal Demon that had just burned itself up out of nowhere.

After he had taken this body, the “jellyfish” had gone on strike as if it could not bear the pressure. Now this cultist’s body was starting to collapse from the point where the chain of the symbiotic pact had been. Could it be that as soon as the Demon in a symbiotic pact died, the body tied to it would fall apart as well?

Was this a trait of Annihilators?

Duncan jumped to the most likely guess and even thought of Shirley and Dog. Did those two have a similar link between them?

He could ask Shirley about it properly after he got back.

But first, he had to decide what to do right now.

Duncan looked helplessly at the body that was breaking down faster and faster. He could not help thinking of the shell he had used when he first climbed out of the coffin.

That body had fallen apart in the end too, even if for a different reason.

"…Why is it so hard to find a usable body?" he sighed, complaining about his bad luck. "Things went much more smoothly back in Pland."

He lifted his head and looked at the iron fence at the edge of his sight. Ahead was the graveyard gate. Past the gate lay a long stretch of cold, empty road. Beyond that empty stretch was the bright and bustling city.

The civilized world of Frostholm was right in front of him, but this collapsing body would struggle to make it that far. And even if he did drag himself into the city, with smoke leaking from him and bits of him falling off as he walked, he would never be able to quietly gather information. What he would do for sure was draw the attention of the patrolling Guardians at once.

He looked back at the graveyard.

There were plenty of bodies lying in the mortuary. But first, there was no way to know if the next one would also be poor quality. Second, opening the boxes took work.

This was blind?box shopping in the truest sense, and he had already gone through enough tonight.

After a brief weighing of options, Duncan raised his head and looked toward the lights at the other end of the path.

That should be the Warden’s cottage.

He remembered that two other cultists had disguised themselves as priests of the Death God and gone to that cottage with the Warden. The Warden might seem stubborn and unfriendly, but at least he was loyal to his duty.

cultists were not such decent people.

He started down the path toward the lights at the end.

…

There seemed to be some noise outside.

In the warm cottage of the Warden, the kettle on the stove was hissing. A gas lamp beside it filled the room with bright light. The Old Caretaker slowly arranged the jars and bottles on a wooden shelf. His trusty double? barreled shotgun hung from an iron hook beside the shelf.

Two men in black clothing watched the old man’s movements inside the cottage. One stood by the door. The other stood by the window.

But their attention was clearly not all on the Warden.

They were listening for movement from the graveyard gate, waiting for a certain signal.

They never got the coded message of “job done, withdraw.” Instead, they only heard some faint, strange noises drifting from the path outside.

The last unclear scream was especially unsettling.

“Did you hear something?”

The Old Caretaker suddenly stopped and looked up at the window, now dark and grimy with age. He tilted his head, listening to the sounds outside. In the night, there seemed to be nothing but the hollow murmur of the wind.

“Nothing,” the tall, broad?shouldered man at the door said at once when he heard the Warden. He felt uneasy too, but keeping the Warden honestly inside the house mattered more right now. “It was probably just crows.”

“Oh, crows,” the Old Caretaker muttered. “Crows are very annoying things. They steal your food and then stand proudly on a branch, laughing out loud at you… I hate thieves the most, and awful uninvited guests. Crows have both of those traits.”

The two men in black exchanged a confused look, feeling that this stubborn old man had suddenly started talking nonsense.

The Old Caretaker did not seem to notice their reaction. He just went on: “By the way, do you know why I followed that Lady’s advice and brought you two to my cottage?”

The shorter man in black seemed to grow vaguely wary and fixed his eyes on the Old Caretaker: “Why?”

The Old Caretaker finally found what he wanted among the many jars. As he twisted off the lid and sprinkled some crushed herbs into the stove, he said casually: “Because, usually, two people are easier to deal with than four.”

Chapter 294: Deathbed Hallucinations

A strong herbal scent filled the room.

No, it did not slowly spread. It appeared in their senses all at once—as if that thick scent had already filled the space long ago, but this fact had always been kept outside the Mortal Realm. Only now, as the old caretaker finished speaking, did this ever?present smell suddenly reveal its existence to the uninvited guests.

The two men in black reacted almost instantly. The shorter one jerked up his hand and pointed at the old caretaker standing by the stove. A low, hoarse cry came out of his throat, strangely like two voices overlapping. At the same time, the other man quickly pulled a few dirty paper slips from inside his coat and hurled them into the air.

The low, hoarse cry turned into a faint, visible ripple, like the shock wave from an explosion, and swept out in all directions from the old caretaker. The paper slips scattered with a rustling sound into countless shadowy fragments. The moment they hit the floor, they turned into a mass of black poisonous insects, snakes, and scorpions, which swarmed toward the stove while making a sickening scraping sound.

The old caretaker stayed hunched over and quietly watched those vicious attacks rush straight at him. He did not try to dodge at all.

The shock wave tore apart the shelf beside the stove. With a huge crash, every bottle and jar on it shattered. It also smashed the burning stove, snuffing out the flames that had been sending up the thick herbal smoke. The black swarm of insects and scorpions crawled over the old man’s body and began to madly gnaw at his limbs and flesh.

The old caretaker was swallowed almost at once. His bent, withered body fell to the floor and turned into a mess of filthy blood and torn cloth.

It all happened in just a few seconds.

Only when the warden was lying on the ground and the still?warm ashes from the stove had spilled everywhere did the two men in black finally exchange a tense look.

The same confusion showed on both their faces.

“That’s it?” The tall, broad?shouldered man stared at the remains on the floor in disbelief and said to his companion: “Those graveyard wardens you always hear about in stories, all strange and dangerous… so they’re actually this easy to deal with? Or is this old guy just the weakest of the wardens?”

The shorter man did not relax at all. He still stared fixedly at the spot where the old caretaker had been standing, and at the same time swept his gaze around the cramped hut from the corner of his eye. His brows drew together bit by bit: “Strange… Do you smell that? The herbal scent is getting even stronger. It’s like someone is burning incense right beside us… No! We have to leave, now!”

The short man seemed to suddenly understand something. He rushed toward the wooden door of the hut at once. But when he reached out and shoved hard, he found the door did not move at all. It stayed as unmoving as a wall. The old, rotten?looking planks under his hands felt as solid as cast iron.

An old, grim voice rose in the hut: “One kind of Deathbed Hallucinations: you think you’re trapped in a room, the way out stands right in front of you, you try to go through that way, but you can’t find how to open the door.”

The sudden voice made both men in black jump and also fed the fear that had already been rising in them. That kind of fear often turned into helpless anger. The short man gave up trying to force the door. He turned and shouted into the empty air: “I don’t care where you’re hiding!”

As soon as he spoke, layer after layer of ghostly ripples appeared around him. In those ripples, you could faintly see an ugly bird?shaped monster standing on his shoulder, stretching its neck and shrieking—that was a Death-Omen Bird demon.

The shriek of the Abyssal demon overlapped with the short man’s roar. A semi?transparent shock wave swept across the whole room in an instant!

The roar of splintering furniture and shattering ornaments rose together. In the blink of an eye, the warden’s small hut was left in ruins. Almost everything inside was smashed to pieces by the invisible wave. Only the space around the other man in black remained intact. The tall, broad man had raised a barrier around himself. While he blocked the leftover force of the wave, he quickly scanned the surroundings, trying to spot the twist of air that would show where the warden was hiding.

He had already guessed the warden’s trick—it was hallucination.

Some strong hallucinogen had been burned to cause visions.

The warden had used both extraordinary power and the herbs to hide himself and play tricks in the hut. But if his voice was still here, then he had to be nearby as well. As long as they swept through the whole house, that old bastard would have to show himself.

But he found nothing. The shock wave tore apart everything in the room and churned the air, yet it still did not force the warden out.

“Another kind of Deathbed Hallucinations: fear and anger are magnified. You feel a fierce helplessness. Sometimes you even feel as if you’re all? powerful, as if you’re about to overturn life and death itself—but that illusion usually fades in a very short moment, and then you fall into emptiness and an even greater terror…”

The old voice echoed through the hut. For some reason, the two men in black suddenly felt that it had gone thin and drifting. It sounded now near, now far, like light and shadow behind a curtain.

“A demon’s aura… Now I know who you are. You’re two Annihilators. Your disguise is good. You fooled my eyes, but not my intuition,” the old caretaker went on. “Why are you here? What are you trying to do?”

“The Holy Lord has given us courage and a pure essence!” the short man shouted. He forced his faith in the Abyssal Lord to press down his fear and slowly sank into a fanatical mood of sacrifice. “You stupid worldly replicas can gloat all you like! But you can only be proud for one moment!”

When he finished, the cultist suddenly pulled a pitch?black dagger from his coat and, without the slightest hesitation, stabbed it into his own heart!

“The Holy Lord gives me power beyond life and death!”

Knowing there was no hope and that he could not match a graveyard warden with his own strength, the cultist chose to offer his heart to the Abyssal Lord as a sacrificial rite. He meant to fully release the power he had gained from his symbiotic pact and make one last desperate try.

But the death he expected did not come.

He did not feel the sharp pain that should have followed when the dagger pierced his body.

He did not even feel his own heart.

The Annihilator raised his head in shock and looked at his companion. But he only saw that the other man was already lying on the floor. A huge hole gaped open in the man’s back, and all his blood had long since drained away.

In the last few seconds, as his vision darkened and his thoughts grew muddled, he recognized that terrible wound as the result of a double?barrel shotgun fired at close range—his companion had died long ago. The moment they stepped into the warden’s hut, the man had been shot from behind and killed by the old caretaker.

And what about him?

The short Annihilator lowered his head and saw that he was actually sitting in the chair in the center of the room.

A red?hot fire poker was driven cruelly through his chest and belly. Thin curls of smoke still rose where metal met flesh.

He remembered now. He had lost a brief but fierce struggle and had been killed with that poker—just ten seconds ago.

“So that’s it… a person can’t… die twice…”

The cultist muttered, his head lolled to the side, and he stopped breathing for good.

“The Deathbed Hallucinations are over. May your souls now scatter and vanish, with no blessing and no suffering.”

On the chair across from him, the gloomy old caretaker sat quietly, watching the cultist who had finally stopped breathing. He muttered in a flat voice, his face expressionless.

By his hand lay his trusty old double?barrel shotgun. All around him, traces of the brief struggle still marked the room.

The old man sat and panted a few times. Once some strength returned, he reached for the shotgun, pushed on his knee, and rose from the chair.

“I’m really getting useless… Two heretics left me in such a sorry state, and in the end I didn’t even manage to ask them anything,” the old caretaker grumbled. He stepped over the tall corpse on the floor and the other body that had fallen from the chair, then walked toward the wooden door with the shotgun in hand. “There are two more problems outside. I hope I’m not too late.”

He reached the door and was just about to open it when his hand suddenly stopped.

A strange aura was drawing near.

Sharp wariness flashed in the old man’s eyes. He tightened his grip on the shotgun, and in the next second a knocking sound came from the other side of the door.

Knock, knock, knock—

In the cold, silent winter night, the sudden knocking sounded almost shrill.

The old man did not answer. He simply stared hard at the dark, aged wooden door.

The knocking went on, very patient.

The thing outside was not a living person.

The old man narrowed his eyes. In his sight, a pale, dim outline stood outside the door. Twisted, chaotic light and shadow moved around it, but he still could not see what the thing really was.

It was not alive—but it was definitely not dead.

What was it?

“Please open the door. Thank you.” A polite voice spoke from outside.

The old caretaker slowly raised the shotgun and, through the door, aimed at the hazy outline beyond.

But before he could pull the trigger, a light click reached his ears.

The door… opened on its own.

A rush of dazzling, twisted starlight poured in.

Chapter 295: Departure

Oh no.

At the first glimpse of that warped radiance, the old caretaker realized that through his own carelessness he had fallen into extreme danger. On this freezing winter night, some unimaginable, unnameable being had come knocking at his door—and even worse, just a few minutes ago he had burned powerful incense to dig secrets from the souls of the cultists.

That incense was strong enough to build a Deathbed Illusion in the minds of the dead, shaped exactly as the caster desired. It could also greatly expand the caster’s range of perception and sharpen the mind. With its help, he had managed to pick out the aura of demons from the Abyssal Deep from the faintest ripples of thought in the two cultists.

But the side effect was that his Spirit Sight had been pushed to a higher level for a short time. Because of that, he now faced the visitor’s true form almost defenseless.

The brilliant, twisted starlight churned wildly outside the door, faintly sketching a huge, giant?like presence. A roar like ten thousand overlapping howls rampaged through his mind, every cry as if it would tear his soul apart. The old caretaker stood stiff as stone as he watched one strand of starlight reach toward him. At its tip, the light suddenly blossomed, and it seemed that countless eyes rolled and turned inside it.

Duncan looked at the old man holding the shotgun in front of him, then leaned to glance past the old man’s shoulder.

He saw the two bodies on the floor, already lifeless.

The cultists had been dealt with. This old man, who looked so frail, clearly had more strength than Duncan had expected.

“Looks like you’ve already taken care of the trouble. That’s good,” Duncan said with a smile and a small nod. “I came to help, actually. I was worried you might be in danger…”

As he spoke, he lowered his head to glance at his current state and quickly added: “Ah, I know I look a bit scary right now, and very suspicious. There are complicated reasons for that—the situation was urgent, so I had to borrow a body on short notice, and its quality isn’t very good. This body is slowly falling apart. But don’t worry, old mister, I’m not a bad person…”

In the booming roar inside his skull, there seemed to be fragments of human language mixed in. A few understandable words, tangled with a flood of vast knowledge, rushed through all his senses. In that invisible storm, the old caretaker faced the star?bright giant and realized the visitor was speaking to him.

The nameless being who had come in the winter night seemed to want to talk to him.

But he could not make out anything clearly.

There was only one thing he knew for sure—he was the graveyard guard.

He could not let such a suspicious being stay on land meant for the dead to rest.

The old man’s muscles were locked, but he still slowly raised the double? barrel shotgun in his hands. Under the crushing mental pressure and the wild disturbance in his thoughts, he aimed the barrels at that “individual” who felt as powerful as a deity.

“Leave,” he mumbled. Then he raised his voice: “Leave! Do not disturb them!”

Duncan frowned.

But he soon understood the old caretaker’s fierce reaction—after all, in his current state he really did not look like a good person.

His whole body was smoking. His skin was splitting inch by inch. Every move he made scattered half a pound of coal dust. The fact that the old man only pointed the gun at him and did not fire at once almost proved that the shotgun was probably empty…

“I should be going,” Duncan nodded and stepped half a pace back, not offended at all by the old man’s anger. “I just came to confirm how things were.”

He could feel that this body’s collapse had reached its limit. His spirit, projected from the Vanished, was slowly peeling away from this shell that was about to fall apart.

“This was my first visit today. Things were quite chaotic, and a lot of accidents happened,” he said to the old caretaker with a small smile. “But talking with you earlier was rather pleasant. I hope next time we can meet in a calmer, steadier setting. Goodbye.”

His spirit withdrew from the shell. The body, which had already died from demonic backlash during a symbiotic pact and had been crumbling ever since, finally gave out completely. Once Duncan stopped forcing it to hold together, it toppled backward, and the moment it hit the floor it shattered into a heap of dry, cracked charcoal.

The unnameable being suddenly left. It had really gone.

The old caretaker felt the huge pressure in his mind vanish at once. The maddening noise disappeared too. The twisted starlight before his eyes faded in a blink, and a hollow ringing rose up to take its place. Wrapped in that constant ringing, he lifted his head and looked around. In the light of the gas lamps, the graveyard paths stretched away into the distance. On both sides of the paths, overlapping shadows seemed to hide countless twitching and jumping shapes. Near and far, the biers looked piled with twitching limbs and crawling shadows. Pairs of eyes blinked in the dark, each pair almost human yet not quite.

He shut his eyes tightly and silently repeated the name of God of Death Bartok. A few seconds later, he opened them again.

The strange scene in his vision was still there, but it was slightly better than before. At least now he could see more of how the Mortal Realm ought to look. He could see the lines between the path and the biers.

It was an echo of madness—the good news was that it was not madness without end, and not madness that would last forever.

The old caretaker looked down the path and saw a pile of bizarre charcoal scattered by the roadside. Then he looked toward the distant bier, but he could barely tell what was really there.

The pale light of the World’s Wound shone on this world.

His long experience turned into a clear judgment. He did not know how long his madness would last. If he kept moving around in this state—his judgment weakened and his mind ready to worsen at any moment—it could only lead to unpredictable results. He was not even sure that, the next time he raised his gun, he would be aiming at the living instead of the dead.

The unnameable being had left. From the view of a Higher-Order Entity, it had done no harm to this place at all. That meant it might be some sort of friendly existence. So at least for a while, nothing else was likely to invade the graveyard.

Any further investigation would have to wait until the Sun rose.

After thinking for a moment, the old caretaker turned and went back into the hut. He quickly locked the door and, while fighting the dizzy spell and ringing in his ears, locked the windows as well. Trusting his memory, he picked out herbs and Holy Oil from among the blurred shadows and writhing things his eyes showed him, and sprinkled them in the four corners of the room. Only after he finished did he walk to the center of the room. He pushed the still?warm corpse off the chair and onto the floor, sat down himself, hung a Death God badge on his chest, held the double?barrel shotgun in his arms, and quietly waited for daylight.

…

In the captain’s cabin of the Vanished, Duncan let out a slow breath and glanced to his side.

AI was tilting its head as it studied him. Then it suddenly spoke: “Our warrior is fighting the enemy… The battle is going terribly for us!”

“Alice is fighting something again?” Duncan listened to the sounds outside. From the deck came faint clanging and the doll girl’s occasional exclamations, but that kind of noise had long since become part of daily life on the Vanished, so he did not pay it much attention. He only shook his head: “Let her be. She’ll quiet down after fighting for a while.”

He rolled his slightly stiff neck and lifted his head to look out the window.

Dawn had not yet come. The Boundless Sea was still wrapped in darkness.

At the far end of that darkness lay Frostholm.

This rushed trip to Frostholm had not gone well. He had not even found a body he could use for long, and in the end he had not managed to leave the graveyard at all.

Still, even if things had gone badly, his efforts had not been for nothing.

Duncan thought back over his time in the graveyard and sorted through the information he had gained.

The Annihilators who followed the Abyssal Lord—that was the part that most deserved attention.

Four cultists had disguised themselves as priests of the God of Death, sneaked into the graveyard during the strictest hours of curfew to steal a corpse, and even given up their lives for it… That was no small matter.

It was easy to foresee that, after sunrise, what had happened in the graveyard would come to the attention of the authority in Frostholm and the local church, and it would stir up at least a small wave among the church's guardians.

And of course, the "dead man" who had climbed out of a coffin would also draw the local church's eye.

That temporary body…

Duncan's brows slowly drew together.

That corpse clearly had something wrong with it. It was not only that four Annihilators had risked everything in the middle of the night to steal it. The real problem was the strange way it had later "broken apart."

Duncan looked down at his own hands.

He still remembered very clearly how that body had collapsed. This was not his first time using a corpse, but it was the first time he had seen such a bizarre disintegration. Back in the sewers of Pland, even that sacrificial victim with no heart had never shown anything this strange.

At the same time, Duncan recalled one line the cultist had let slip without thinking:

“This body is almost at its limit.”

Those Annihilators clearly knew something. They had already been expecting the body to fall apart.

Duncan raised his hand and slowly rubbed his chin.

While he guessed at the cultists’ goals, he also thought about something else.

Were these unusual things… somehow linked to that “friend of True Resurrection” that Morris had mentioned?

Chapter 296

Pland’s southeastern dock district held a beautiful white steam?turbine ship that was undergoing its final overhaul and inspection.

After a long period of mooring, the White Oak was finally ready to set out again. This time it was going to carry numerous commissioned goods from the city?state of Pland, sail along the central sea lane and the northern route, head all the way north, pass by Cold Harbor, and reach Frostholm.

It was not a short voyage, but for an exploration vessel specially modified and built for fast long?distance runs, a route that lay mostly within safe waters posed little challenge. Its powerful steam core would ensure surging thrust, and the newly refurbished shipboard Cathedral was also enough to anchor every crew member safely in the Sanctuary World.

Both the sailors busy on the pier and the sailors hurrying about on deck looked rather relaxed.

In the White Oak’s aft machinery compartment, the Chief Engineer and the assistant artificer were overseeing the sailors as they finished the last checks on the steam core.

This mighty machine was as large as a house and was fixed to the ship’s main supporting frame by a sturdy steel skeleton. It consisted of three spherical vessels arranged in a row along the ship’s length, wrapped in a web of complex pipes, valves, and linkage devices. An iron catwalk hung halfway up the three vessels so that sailors could inspect the steam core’s operation and carry out necessary maintenance.

At that moment several sailors were busy on that iron catwalk. They had opened the heavy hatches on the spherical vessels and taken out a few dim metal rods that had been completely spent. Then they fixed several new rods—pale gold, as thick as a forearm and nearly a meter long—into the slots inside the hatch doors, triggered the mechanism, and watched as the rods were carried into the centers of the vessels.

Those were catalytic media made of Boiling Gold. They were the source of the steam core's fierce power and one of the key safeguards for its stable running. Just like the priest's prayers and incense rituals near the steam pipes, the Boiling Gold media inside the core could, to some extent, repel certain malicious forces and keep the machine from suddenly "going mad" after long continuous operation.

The squeak of pulley blocks and hinges rang out again and again. Two of the sailors were handling things a bit roughly, and the burly, bald Chief Engineer immediately shouted: "Careful! Don't damage those Boiling Gold catalysts! Those things are as soft as breadsticks—break one and the captain will eat you alive!"

"If you mean the breadsticks Head Chef Finley bakes—then you should be worrying about the chutes and catches in the steam core instead!" A sailor on the catwalk laughed, but even while joking, his movements still grew more careful.

"Once we get to Frostholm, I have to suggest to the captain that we buy a batch of high?grade Boiling Gold catalysts locally—the Boiling Gold over there is as cheap as the stones on the ground," the assistant artificer muttered nearby. She looked to be in her thirties or forties, with arms as strong as any man's and work clothes stained with grease. "The Adventurer Association's supply channels are daylight robbery."

“That depends on whether the clients and the Church agree,” the Chief Engineer said as he shrugged. “Half the cargo holds on the White Oak are special ‘sealed vaults’. A lot of what we’re carrying this time is raw materials and semi?finished components for sacred relics ordered by the Church. That stuff is very sensitive. Every crate of supplies brought aboard has to match a strict manifest. The Gray Crow ran into trouble before because some idiot secretly brought a barrel of mead onto the ship. It loosened one of their sealed vaults, and two Shadows got out and killed half the people on board…”

“I know, so when the time comes I’m only going to give the captain a suggestion,” the assistant artificer waved her hand, then frowned slightly. “But speaking of the captain, he still hasn’t shown up. He usually isn’t late.”

“The captain will come,” the Chief Engineer said. He paused for a moment, then repeated, as if to stress it: “The captain will come—he hasn’t retired yet.”

…

“You really should retire,” his wife said. She leaned against the nearby doorframe with her arms folded, staring at him with a dark expression and the same sharp eyes she had in the old days. “Don’t wait until I have to go on board and drag you off by the ear before you realize how serious your condition is.”

Lawrence did not answer. He only faced the mirror and quietly straightened his captain’s uniform, then checked his neatly combed hair. He solemnly picked up the hat lying next to him, placed it on his head, and only then let out a soft breath.

“Thank you, Martha, but I have to go,” the old captain said in a low voice. “The White Oak is waiting at the Harbor.”

His wife watched him quietly with her gaze. The harsh words were gone, the constant nagging was gone. Only that long gaze remained, and silence.

After an unknown length of time, she finally sighed softly: “All right then. Be careful and come back early—and don’t run into any more weird things.”

“I hope not.” Lawrence sighed helplessly and turned away from the mirror.

“Did you bring everything?”

“Everything.”

“The house key and your charm amulet for going out?”

“I have them, I didn’t forget.”

“Take a small prayer book with you. It helps.”

“Got that too,” Lawrence said. He bent down, picked up the small suitcase by the door, and patted it. “And a few pages of handwritten prayers, plus a Sacred Candle I got from the great Cathedral.”

His wife opened her mouth, as if she still had something to say, but Lawrence turned around with a smile: “I’ve packed everything. I’m not old enough to be losing things yet.”

His wife fell silent for a moment and let out a slow breath: “Your medicine.”

Lawrence’s movements froze in place.

“Your medicine. Don’t forget it,” his wife repeated.

Lawrence’s lips trembled slightly twice. His gaze slowly shifted to the side.

On the small low table by the door, a brown glass bottle sat quietly. sunlight spilled across the bottle, and he could faintly see the clear texture of the liquid inside.

After a long silence, Lawrence picked up the bottle of medicine. Several more seconds passed before he finally pulled out the little stopper.

He looked up at Martha and saw his wife still leaning against the doorframe, arms folded as she watched him—just like in his memories.

“Safe travels,” she mouthed.

“I’m heading out,” Lawrence answered in a soft voice. Then, following the psychiatrist’s instructions, he let a few drops of the medicine fall into his mouth.

The strong taste spread through his mouth, and his wife’s figure quietly faded away in the sunlight.

Lawrence silently pushed the stopper back into the bottle, then opened the small suitcase and tucked the remaining medicine into a spot where it would not get bumped. While he arranged his things, he muttered under his breath: “That psychiatrist is full of nonsense… This stuff is bitter as death. There’s no ‘herbal fragrance’ at all.”

The old captain, who had spent half his life drifting on the Boundless Sea, finished preparing all he needed for the trip. He let out a quiet sigh, picked up the suitcase, and stepped out of his home.

…

After finishing a full day’s work, Heidi finally got home before dusk. She pushed open the door, took off her coat, and the first thing she did after walking into the living room was flop onto a chair in a most unladylike way and let out a deep sigh.

Her mother was sitting by the warm fireplace, sorting through a few letters. When she heard her daughter come in, she turned her head slightly: “You’re a grown young lady now. Try to watch your manners a little—a lady doesn't behave like that."

"Let the lady rest a bit. This lady has spent all day dealing with bizarre nightmares and rambling seafarers," Heidi said. She slumped in the chair and weakly waved a hand. "A ship had a mechanical failure out on the Boundless Sea and was stuck offshore for almost twice its planned time. Several sailors were carried off the ship trussed up like dumplings—it was a complete disaster."

She sighed at that, shook her head, and commented: "Making a living on the Boundless Sea really isn't easy."

Her mother looked up from the letters: "That does sound terrible. All the more reason you shouldn't be slumped there. Go upstairs and take a bath first, relax a little. The water's already heated."

"All right, fair point," Heidi muttered. She finally mustered the strength to get up from the chair and started toward the stairs, but then stopped, suddenly curious: "And those letters are…?"

"Water, power, gas, all kinds of bills—odds and ends," her mother said casually, her tone calm. "Your father used to handle this, but he's out at the moment, so I'm dealing with it."

"Right. I don't want anything to do with that stuff," Heidi said, waving her hand as she headed upstairs.

Her mother quietly watched her daughter go upstairs, then pulled her gaze back and let it slide over the letters in front of her.

Most of them really were bills.

But two of them were real letters—and one of those came from a place beyond ordinary people's imagination.

It was a letter from Morris, delivered this afternoon by a Messenger wreathed in green flames.

The letter carried a special spell from the God of Wisdom, to keep any outsider from peeking at its true contents.

The old woman smiled as she looked at the familiar handwriting:

"…We're on our way to Frostholm now. There's not much scenery to speak of along the way. Only the occasional small floe on the sea and the distant cold mist are a bit interesting…

"…Nina was working on her winter break homework in the dining room today, and a strange Shadow jumped out of her textbook. Everyone rushed to beat it up. It was quite lively…

"…Before lunch, the captain went fishing again—you know, for that kind of 'fish'. This time it struggled very fiercely. It was a thrilling scene. The captain said lively fish taste better, but honestly I couldn't tell the difference…"

The old woman smiled, set this letter aside for the moment, and picked up the other letter she had just opened.

This letter, however, came from Frostholm.

The sender was Brown Scott.

Chapter 297

Madam Mary, Morris's wife, stared at the envelope for a long time before taking up a letter opener from the side and carefully slitting it open.

A thin folded sheet of paper slid out of the envelope. Before unfolding it, Madam Mary first noticed the uneven marks pressed into the back of the sheet.

They were the traces of handwriting—someone had pressed so hard with the pen that the strokes were clearly ridged on the back.

The person who wrote this letter must have been in a state of extreme agitation.

Sitting by the fireplace, the old lady adjusted her posture slightly, put the letter she had already finished reading onto the small round table beside her, and glanced at the date stamp on the envelope from Frostholm in her hand.

The sending date on this letter was December 5th.

It had been mailed on the third day after the first letter—in just three short days, the already "deceased" Brown Scott had written this second letter.

Madam Mary unfolded the paper. A few lines of scrawled, tangled writing came into view—nothing like the elegant, neat script in the first letter that folklorist had sent her a few days earlier. In these few short lines, the page was filled with the writer's deep unease and terror:

"My friend, something… is wrong. I don't know how to explain it to you. I'm very confused right now, I can barely even think. My mind is being disturbed by something, my memories… Don’t come to Frostholm! In any case, you must not come to Frostholm! Even if you later see other things I’ve written to you, see other kinds of invitations, you must not come to Frostholm!

“There’s a huge conspiracy here.

“Don’t come to Frostholm!”

There wasn’t even a signature at the end of the note, and even the stamp on the envelope had been stuck on crooked.

Madam Mary stared at those few messy lines, and she could almost picture it: a folklorist whose mind had already cracked under a terrible tear in his understanding, using the last of his reason to write down these words, then staggering out into Frostholm’s bitter wind and struggling to hand the letter over at the post office.

She slowly folded the paper again and slid it back into the envelope.

It was a disturbing letter. The whole affair was soaked in a dreadful atmosphere from beginning to end. Under normal circumstances, it would have been enough to send its recipient running to the Cathedral to seek refuge.

But Madam Mary’s gaze drifted instead to the small round table beside her, to the family letter from the Vanished lying there—

“…The Deep Sea spawn really do have a unique flavor, far fresher than ordinary fish. The captain has mastered a special cooking technique, and Anomaly 099—Miss Alice—has learned its essence. I might have to try it myself…”

The old woman quietly tossed the letter from Frostholm into the fireplace beside her and watched as it burned quickly in the bright flames, turning to ash.

“They’ve already left…”

She murmured softly, then rose, took ink, a steel pen, and writing paper from the nearby shelf, and began to write a letter—one that would be delivered to the antique shop in the Lower City.

…

Church staff in black coats were walking all over the cemetery, examining every trace that remained here. Every path, every coffin, every lamp post had been marked and sampled, in the hope of reconstructing what had happened in this place last night.

“Gatekeeper” Agatha, however, stayed inside the warden’s hut. Sitting opposite her was the gloomy, stooped old caretaker.

After an unknown amount of time, the young woman—her body bandaged over in most places—raised her head and glanced out the window. She saw the Sun already sinking, and a faint reddish glow was spreading across the sky over the whole city?state.

Evening was approaching. The Guardians she had brought had already been working in the cemetery for several hours, and the old caretaker in front of her had also sat in silence for several hours.

Strictly speaking, the old caretaker wasn’t only silent—he remained in a state of near total mental closure. He did not move, did not speak, did not respond to any outside stimulus. From the moment the Church Guardians received the report and arrived here, he had been sitting quietly in that chair, like a breathing statue of flesh and blood.

A guard in black pushed open the wooden door of the warden’s hut, came over to Agatha, and bent down to whisper a report. She nodded slightly: “Understood. Send the samples to the great Cathedral first. Keep the scene as it is. Tonight may be crucial—we need people to stand watch.”

The black?clad guard nodded and accepted the order, but before he left, he couldn’t help glancing at the old man sitting motionless in the chair. Seeing those turbid eyes, as if frozen in place, the young guard’s face showed clear unease: “How long is he… going to stay like this? Is he really going to be all right?”

“It’s a protective mental shutdown. He’s using it to fight off and clear out the corruption in himself—and maybe to protect us as well,” Agatha said quietly. “The Gravekeeper must have come into contact last night with something far beyond imagination. It’s like he clawed his way back from the edge of madness… But don’t worry. He’s an experienced Warrior. He’s already managed to stabilize his condition. He’ll be fine.”

She paused, then added: “As for how long this state will last… that’s hard to say. It might end in the next second, or it might last until this time tomorrow. It depends on how long he was exposed to that terrible corruption.”

The guard thought for a moment and lifted his head to look out the window. Through the somewhat grimy glass, he could see the Church staff hurrying along the paths outside.

Then he drew his gaze back and looked at the two corpses in the hut—two intruders who had already been confirmed as Annihilators. They had obviously died at the old caretaker’s hands. Because the situation was still unclear, and in order to protect the scene, the bodies had been left where they fell.

They couldn’t be the reason for the old caretaker’s mental shutdown. Even the Demons behind them, in full runaway state, did not have that level of impact.

So what had done it? Some more powerful Abyssal Demon? A higher? ranking priest behind the Annihilators? Or something else altogether?

The black?clad guard voiced his questions, but Agatha only shook her head: “No. It’s probably something even more bizarre and dangerous.”

“Why are you so sure?” the guard asked without thinking.

“Because at the scene there were only traces left by a few heretic cultists, plus a pile of carcass fragments that appear to be from ‘Restless Ones’, with no remaining supernatural reaction at all,” Agatha said calmly. “No observable traces left behind means…”

“It means last night’s visitor didn’t do anything. It merely existed in this cemetery for a brief moment, and that alone was enough to push this old man to the edge of mental collapse.”

The old man’s voice suddenly sounded inside the hut, cutting across the exchange between the guard and the Gatekeeper. Agatha immediately turned toward the sound. Her usually blank face showed a faint smile at last: “You’ve come back to us. Good.”

“I wouldn’t dare say I’ve completely recovered,” the old caretaker said slowly. He was gradually steadying all the shifted perceptions that came with reopening his mind. He looked into Agatha’s eyes, consciously blocking out the leaping afterimages behind her. “But at least I can still tell which parts belong to the Mortal Realm and which parts belong to madness.”

“That’s enough,” Agatha nodded. “What happened yesterday?”

“The corpse you sent here suddenly grew agitated. It said a lot of things, clear?headed as if it were alive. Then four Annihilators came into the cemetery, wanting to take that Restless One away—they used the power of Abyssal Demons to disguise themselves. Their skills were polished; they were veteran Summoners. They slipped past my eyes, but not my instincts.

“I lured two of them here and killed them—that’s those two on the floor. I was just about to head back into the cemetery to deal with the other two when the unexpected happened.”

The old caretaker lifted his head and looked toward the door.

“An indescribable… Visitor came,” he said. “I looked into Its eyes for a while—it may have only been a few seconds. My sense of time was broken, so I can’t be sure.”

“An indescribable Visitor?” Agatha couldn’t help frowning. “Can you be a bit more specific?”

The old caretaker tried hard to recall.

Only a jumble of chaotic light and an overwhelming roar surfaced in his mind.

His hurried mental shutdown had erased the temporary corruption he had suffered, but it had also washed away some useful memories.

“No. All I remember are chaotic lights and noise,” the old caretaker shook his head. “And even if I could accurately describe what I saw, it wouldn’t mean anything to you. What I see isn’t necessarily real, and even if it is real, it isn’t necessarily the same reality other people see. As humans, our ways of perceiving things are far too limited.”

“All right, then that’s our whole answer,” Agatha nodded. “An indescribable Visitor came to the cemetery at the final stage, but didn’t take any active destructive actions… Are you sure you want to use the word ‘visit’ in the report? It’s a neutral term, even leaning friendly.”

“I’m sure,” the old caretaker replied calmly. “I spoke with It, though we barely managed to exchange anything at all. The Visitor did try to communicate. That’s a signal that’s neutral, leaning friendly.”

“Understood. I’ll record it that way,” Agatha nodded again. “And then? Anything else?”

“After the Visitor left, I vaguely saw that It left something behind… on the path by the door,” the old caretaker said, thinking as he spoke. “But I couldn’t make it out. My vision was already badly damaged by then, and my cognition was in chaos. I’m not sure…”

“If you mean a pile of remains burned up by backlash from Abyssal Demons, we’ve found it,” Agatha interrupted calmly. “If we’re right, that should be the Visitor’s… ‘vessel’.”

Chapter 298: PTSD

Outside the caretaker's hut, on the path leading to the mortuary, the heap of charcoal that barely kept a human shape still lay where it had fallen. Several Church Guardians were preparing to move the remains into a wooden crate, but when they saw the Gatekeeper and the graveyard's caretaker appear, they stopped what they were doing.

Gatekeeper Agatha pointed at the charred remains and said: "The one you saw yesterday should be him. Of course, what is left here now is only a shell. The 'Visitor' who once occupied this shell has indeed left."

The old caretaker walked up to the remains and bent his head to examine them for a moment, his brow slowly tightening: "He was…"

"If I'm not mistaken, he was one of the four cultists who disguised themselves as priests last night," Agatha said calmly. "This shell died from the backlash of a symbiotic pact with a Abyssal demon."

The old caretaker fell silent, his face severe. He seemed to be thinking about something. Two minutes later he suddenly looked up and said: "The body you sent last night…"

Agatha nodded and raised her hand to point in another direction: "Over here. But its condition… is even stranger."

Led by the Gatekeeper, the old caretaker came to an open patch at the edge of the mortuary grounds. This was where they stored processed "samples" and other key evidence that would be sent back to the great Cathedral.

The old caretaker stared in shock at what Agatha pointed out to him.

It was a heap of glass jars of various sizes.

“You mean… this is the corpse you sent yesterday? The ‘Restless One’ who chatted with me in the coffin for half the night yesterday?”

The old man stared at the pile of jars for a long time before he finally could not help turning suspiciously to Agatha. “Just one night ago, he was still lively enough to knock on the coffin lid!”

“Yes. But when the Guardians found this pile of stuff, all we could do was use shovels to gather it up and pack as much as we could into jars. Only the outline it still kept at the time and the spot where it was lying can prove that this really is the dead we sent to the graveyard last night,” Agatha said, shaking her head. “As you can see, it is a semi-solid… sludge, with only faint traces of biological tissue left. And even those last traces are quickly transforming into more sludge as time passes.”

She paused and pointed at one of the largest jars.

“There used to be a few bones in here. Now there is only this strange, sticky substance.”

The old caretaker frowned and stared hard at the bizarre matter inside the glass jars.

It had no trace of organic structure left. It was dark red mixed with black and gray, like silt from the bottom of a river.

If he did not know that the Gatekeeper would not lie to him, he would never have been able to connect this stuff with the Restless One who had babbled in his coffin yesterday.

“All right, the dead turned into sludge. Strange things always like to come in batches,” the old caretaker finally sighed. “But now that it’s come to this, how am I supposed to explain it to this dead's family? They'll come to the graveyard to say goodbye to their kin, and I'll have to tell them that yesterday a few Annihilators sneaked in to make trouble, and something like a Subspace shadow showed up, so somehow their family member turned into a few jars of liquid?"

"Oh, you don't have to worry about that. Their family won't be coming to trouble you," Agatha said expressionlessly, shaking her head. "They have already finished the farewell ritual at Cemetery No. 4 next door. The miner who fell into the well will be sent into the furnace on schedule."

The old caretaker blinked, and his expression suddenly turned serious: "You forged a body to deceive the dead's family?"

"We haven't sunk that low," Agatha said calmly.

"Then…"

"We found another body. At noon today, we discovered a worker who had fallen to his death in that pump shaft. He was identical to the body we sent here last night."

The old caretaker stared, his expression going stiff.

After a long moment, he finally came back to himself and instinctively turned his head toward the nearby platform, where the simple coffin they had delivered to the graveyard last night still rested.

Then he looked back at the sample area, at the heap of glass jars that were terrifying to look at.

"…In the name of the God of Death, what on earth did you send here yesterday?"

"We will investigate," Agatha said. Her face rarely changed, but now it looked more serious than usual. "The only thing we can be sure of now is that the body sent to Cemetery No. 4 should be the ‘real’ one. It showed no agitation and did not collapse or dissolve. The corpse we sent here yesterday… was tampered with by extraordinary power.”

The old caretaker did not speak for a while. He just looked troubled. At that moment, a black?clad Church guard came down another path and walked straight up to Agatha.

The guard gave Agatha a quick, low?voiced report, then handed her a thick piece of card.

Agatha glanced at what was on the card. Her expression did not change. She just nodded slightly: “Understood.”

“What happened?” the old caretaker asked casually.

“Do you remember there were four heretics who entered your graveyard yesterday?” Agatha raised her head and handed the card to the old man. “You took care of two. One turned into charcoal outside your hut. Now we have found the whereabouts of the last Annihilator.”

The old caretaker took the card and saw that it was a photograph.

On some concrete ground somewhere lay a heap of remains in which one could only vaguely make out a human shape. The remains were clearly charred—just like the pile of charcoal at the door of the caretaker’s hut.

Obviously, it was the backlash after a symbiotic pact with a Abyssal demon was severed.

“It was that woman…” The old caretaker frowned and looked up at Agatha. “She is dead? How did she die? Where?”

“Two blocks away. In full view of everyone, this pile of remains suddenly dropped into the middle of a crossroads,” Agatha said. “A Death-Omen Bird demon also appeared at the same time, clearly already in a runaway state.

That demon lasted less than a few seconds in the Mortal Realm before it collapsed and vanished. The bystanders at the scene called the constables."

The old caretaker thought for a moment and shook his head lightly: "I'm not an expert in this field. Just tell me what you think."

"My view is that this heretic probably also saw the 'Visitor' you met last night. The eyes of Abyssal demons find it easier to see the 'truth', so her Death-Omen Bird went insane and, in its madness, dragged its master down into the depths of the Abyssal Deep," Agatha analyzed calmly. "Judging from the remains, this heretic was torn apart by other Abyssal demons before the backlash from the symbiotic pact killed her. That is the typical outcome of falling into the depths of the Abyssal Deep without protection."

The Gatekeeper finished speaking calmly and let out a soft breath.

She fixed the old caretaker with her gaze.

"I feel… that something is turning its gaze on our city. The days ahead may not be peaceful."

…

Duncan arrived at the restaurant before dusk.

He did not know when it had started, but somehow the restaurant had become the place where the crew gathered in their spare time.

As soon as Duncan entered, he saw Morris marking Nina's homework, while Nina sat at another table not far away, supervising Shirley, Dog, and Alice as they spelled words.

Vanna sat near the restaurant window, carefully reading a Church book.

The atmosphere looked rather good.

Duncan walked straight over to Morris and casually handed him a letter: “A letter from your wife.”

“From Mary?” Morris put down his pen, looking a little surprised at the letter the captain handed over. He took out the small letter opener he always carried and opened the envelope while muttering: “I wrote in my letter that there was no need to hurry to reply.”

“Anyway, the ‘postage stamp’ only costs a few fries,” Duncan said with a smile. “See what it says. Maybe it’s something urgent.”

Morris nodded, took out the letter, and skimmed it quickly. As expected, he frowned without thinking.

“What does it say?” Duncan asked, curious, then added: “If it’s personal, you don’t have to tell me.”

“…The second letter from Brown Scott has arrived. It was sent only three days after the first one,” Morris did not hide it, though his tone sounded odd. “His mental state in the letter was clearly not right. Mary was worried that the letter carried something unclean, so she burned the original, but she repeated what it said. Brown was extremely anxious and urged me not to go near Frostholm.”

“…It seems your friend sensed a bit of the truth,” Duncan said thoughtfully. “Unfortunately, when I went to investigate Frostholm, it did not go very smoothly, and I wasn’t able to find out anything about your friend.”

“Ah? You went to Frostholm to investigate?” Morris was startled and couldn’t help crying out. “When did you go?”

“Just last night,” Duncan did not hide it. After all, everyone here was his own people. “I borrowed a body. It’s just a pity I couldn’t find out much. It wasn’t this troublesome last time in Pland.”

As soon as he finished speaking, he suddenly heard a soft thump from not far away.

Duncan and Morris looked toward the sound at the same time and saw that the book in Vanna’s hands had fallen to the floor.

Vanna the inquisitor had a rather odd look on her face.

Morris asked worriedly: “…Vanna, are you all right?”

“She is fine,” Duncan waved a hand and answered for Vanna. “She just has a bit of PTSD.”

Chapter 299: Undying Amusements

The captain often came out with strange phrases whose meanings were obscure and whose word?making was wild, but the crew of the Vanished usually took it in stride.

After all, there was an even more baffling pigeon on board. The captain and the pigeon always communicated smoothly, which proved that the bizarre words were not the captain’s problem.

The problem lay with the mortals, whose limited experience made it hard for them to understand.

In any case, anything they could not understand, they simply treated as a Subspace dialect.

Morris did not ask what “PTSD” meant. He just silently digested the information the captain had revealed. Duncan did not hold back and told them about his experience in the graveyard the previous night.

He mainly wanted to hear the opinions of the “professionals”.

Duncan’s story quickly drew the attention of the others in the restaurant. Nina was the first to come over, followed by Shirley, Alice, and Dog. In the end, even Vanna, who had been sitting quietly by herself, could not resist her curiosity and drifted over to the long table to listen in.

“Annihilators…”

Once Duncan finished, the first to frown was, of course, the most knowledgeable, Morris. “Why would they be interested in corpses…”

“Annihilators aren’t supposed to be interested in corpses?” Duncan asked curiously.

“They’re not necromancers,” Morris said, shaking his head. “Annihilators follow the Abyssal Lord. They study knowledge about demons and summoning. They have no interest in the flesh and blood of the mortal world. Not just no interest—really, you could say they despise and loathe it. They are convinced that mortal flesh is weak and filthy, and that the demons in the depths of the Abyssal Deep and the Abyssal Lord are the ‘primordial form’ that truly possesses pure sanctity. How would a bunch of heretics like that end up stealing corpses from a graveyard?”

Listening to the old scholar’s explanation, Duncan also frowned.

Annihilators despised the flesh and blood of this world and followed “beings in the Abyssal Deep that possessed pure sanctity”? They even believed that Abyssal demons and the Abyssal Lord had that “pure sanctity”?

Although he had known from the start that the cultists in this world each believed in something more twisted than the last, the Annihilators’ determination to challenge the limit of aesthetics was a bit too twisted even for them!

Duncan couldn’t help looking toward Dog beside the table. Shirley had dragged the creature over here. Now it lay on the floor, holding a vocabulary book in its two paws and studying it intently, its ugly skull of bare bone bobbing back and forth.

Noticing the captain’s gaze, Dog jerked its head up at once, its fierce bones crackling all over.

“Pure? Sacred?” Duncan looked at the Abyssal Hound with a strange expression. “Even the primordial form of life?”

Dog froze: “…Huh? What?”

“I can’t imagine it,” Duncan shook his head. “The world those Annihilators see must be completely different from that of ordinary people.”

He was just speaking offhand, but Shirley reacted at once: “Who knows how their brains grow. I’m not an Annihilator.”

“No one said you were,” Duncan said mildly.

“Tsk, tsk. I don’t know about anything else, but that woman cultist who ran off is definitely dead by now,” Shirley smacked her lips and added: “dead without even a complete corpse left.”

Duncan had not really thought about what might have happened to the cultist who ran. Hearing Shirley’s words, he was taken aback: “Why do you say that?”

“She was dragged into the deep sea of the Abyssal Deep by her own symbiotic pact demon,” Shirley explained casually. “Annihilators, tsk. No matter how much those idiots worship the Abyssal Lord, no matter how tightly they tie Abyssal demons to themselves, once they go into the true depths of the Abyssal Deep, they’re still treated as humans. Those uncontrollable demons only recognize auras. They’ll tear her to pieces.”

“Other Abyssal demons will tear her apart?” Duncan muttered. Then he suddenly remembered something. “Wait, I remember you and Dog once ran away using a similar method. You jumped into a rift leading to the Abyssal Deep right in front of me.”

At the mention of that glorious escape, Shirley’s expression also turned a bit odd, but she quickly waved it off: “That was different. When Dog takes me running, it does everything it can to protect me. It tries to muddle my aura, and if it really can’t, it starts a big fight with the other Abyssal demons. So every time we use that trick to run, it ends up covered in injuries.

“Other Abyssal demons are a different story. Like the one you just mentioned, it won’t protect its master. Right, Dog?”

“That’s a Death-Omen Bird,” Dog lifted its head and answered Shirley, glancing carefully at Duncan as it spoke. “Ordinary Abyssal demons really won’t actively protect their masters. They have no ‘heart’ at all. They only act together with Annihilators because the symbiotic pact binds them. Once they reach the deep sea of the Abyssal Deep, they go into runaway state at once. That cultist is doomed.”

“So that’s how it is.” Duncan rubbed his chin and muttered thoughtfully: “No wonder that fellow looked so reluctant when she was dragged in…”

Just then, Vanna, who had been silent on the side, finally could not hold back. She moved a little closer to the long table: “Those heretics… other than trying to lead you out of the graveyard, did they do anything else?”

Duncan looked up at Vanna, and she hurried to add: “It’s probably professional habit. I’m very concerned about those heretics’ goals. Like Mr. Morris just said, normal Annihilators have no interest in mortal flesh, which makes those cultists who appeared in the graveyard even more suspicious.”

“Now that you mention it, you do remind me of something,” Duncan said, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. “Not long after the body I was occupying left the coffin, it began to ‘fall apart’ in a very strange way. The skin and muscle cracked and crumbled off like dried mud. Those cultists seemed to have expected it.”

Vanna frowned slightly. She thought for a long time before something occurred to her: “So the key is the shell you were occupying at the time.”

“Do you mean…”

“Annihilators have no interest in mortal flesh. But what if that wasn’t ‘flesh from the mortal world’?” Vanna raised her head and looked Duncan in the eyes. “In fact, it might not have been ‘flesh’ at all.”

Listening to Vanna’s analysis, Duncan looked thoughtful: “Oh… then this is getting interesting.”

…

After a long absence, the Sea Mist finally returned to her home port.

At the edge of the secret island shrouded in pack ice, turbulent currents, and mist, the proud bow of an ironclad warship lay moored steadily at the end of the pier. Undying sailors bustled about in the cold wind and thin fog. Some checked the condition of the ship. Others counted cargo or directed the cranes on shore as they hoisted heavy crates from the hold to the dock.

The Sea Mist had returned from the warm Central Seas. This time she brought back no news of victory, but she did bring gifts and specialties from afar: fine wine and souvenirs that Pland’s authority had given to the “Sea Mist Venture Company”, along with tobacco, cloth, and handicrafts the captain had bought with his own money. For a cold, shut?in hidden island, such things were treasures.

Although the Undying had already left the world of the living, they still had their own personalities and emotions. They also needed a life of a certain quality. They needed entertainment and pleasures, and in some ways they needed such things even more than the living did.

Their souls always felt cold and hollow, so they needed the warm creations of the civilized world all the more to fill those empty spaces.

First Mate Aiden stood at the edge of the deck, carefully stuffing fine tobacco from Pland into an old?fashioned short?stemmed pipe. He lit it with a lighter, clamped the mouthpiece between his teeth, and took a deep, satisfied draw.

Then he held his breath and gave a little push.

A hazy cloud of smoke seeped out from his crew uniform's collar, cuffs, and pocket seams on his chest, shrouding his entire upper body in white smoke.

Aiden turned his neck, glanced at the smoke around him, then pulled open his collar and took a look inside.

The bullet hole in his chest was still curling with thin wisps of smoke.

"Warm tobacco can fill the emptiness in the soul. But the holes in the body are another matter, aren't they."

A hoarse, dark voice suddenly came from behind him. Aiden turned and saw a pale, withered old man standing at the edge of the deck. The old man wore a priest's robe. One side of his skull was caved in, and the half of his body on that side looked as if it had been soaked in seawater.

It was Will, the Sea Mist's shipboard priest.

After muttering, the old priest raised a small bottle to his mouth and took a swig.

Thin trickles of liquor leaked from the cracked side of his cheek where his skull had caved in.

Aiden watched the old priest for a moment, then suddenly said: "Want me to teach you a trick? You could make that bottle last for days…"

"Tricks don't help," the old priest shook his head. "Mostly it's just disgusting, and by the third time it starts to taste sour."

Aiden shrugged, raised the pipe, and took another deep drag. He held his breath again, and once more his whole body was wrapped in smoke.

"Being Undying isn't so bad, really. I couldn't play like this when I was alive."

“…It’s nice to have such an easy heart,” the old priest couldn’t help sighing.

Chapter 300: Days on the Vanished

Aiden returned to the bridge. Tyrian was waiting for him there.

“The unloading went smoothly. In about an hour we can finish moving everything from the cargo hold to the Harbor warehouses,” the bald First Mate reported in high spirits. Every fold in his clothes still gave off a strong smell of tobacco. “The sailors who stayed on the island really like those ‘local specialties’ you brought back.”

“There will be a gathering tonight. Join us if you feel like it,” Tyrian said casually. Then he could not help looking at Aiden a few more times. He frowned and twitched his nose. “Did you smoke so much you set yourself on fire?”

“…Maybe a bit too much,” Aiden said, touching the tip of his nose in embarrassment. “Tobacco from Pland is always… hard to put down.”

“Try to watch it. Right now you smell like a piece of bacon,” Tyrian shook his head and gave the reminder, then stopped paying attention to that matter. He changed the topic. “Lately I often hear the sailors talking about Frostholm.”

“The news has already spread,” Aiden’s face grew a little more serious when he heard the captain’s words. “The dead coming back to life. No matter where the rumor started, what it says is enough to get the sailors talking. After all, everyone here is Undying.”

“Undying…” Tyrian repeated the word softly. “So, is everyone hoping to really live again?”

“To be honest, anyone with a bit of sense knows that is impossible,” Aiden shrugged. “An ordinary person might still like to imagine that kind of thing, but the more Undying a person is, the more they know that True Resurrection can only be a rumor. Death God Bartok is real. His gate only lets people go in, never out.

“And we only stay in the mortal world as so-called ‘Undying’ because our souls have already been twisted and changed, so we can no longer pass through that gate. Everyone understands very well where the boundary between life and death lies. After all, when we were all near death back then, we each wandered in front of that gate.”

Tyrian nodded lightly. He thought for a moment before speaking again. “Then why is this topic causing so much discussion?”

“Because real True Resurrection will never appear, everyone is guessing whether those so-called revenants are actually all… ‘living dead’,” Aiden grinned. “You know, most city-states do not like living dead, and Frostholm dislikes them more than most. They even treat them as ‘the curse on the outer sea’.

“Strictly speaking, we should not put the debts from half a century ago on the heads of the people of Frostholm today, but everyone still likes watching the authorities of that city-state run around in a panic.”

Tyrian raised an eyebrow. “Watching for fun? If this really has something to do with the old Abyssal Trench Project, it is more than just fun.”

“You are right, and I understand that,” Aiden said. “But for now, most ordinary sailors just want to enjoy the show first. Anyway, the first unlucky ones are the people of Frostholm. When the fun gets too big, they will think about other things. That is just how Undying think, especially when Frostholm is involved.”

Tyrian stared at Aiden in silence. After a while he could only wave a hand helplessly.

“…True Resurrection would mean passing through Bartok’s gate and then coming back out, and Frostholm’s main faith is the God of Death,” he said, with a serious face, instead of arguing more about whether it was right to hope the trouble got bigger. “In theory, in Frostholm, the rules of life and death should be even tighter and more stable. Now there are rumors spreading there about the return of the dead. That is very wrong.

“I am more inclined to think that some other kind of supernatural power is behind this.”

“Then we will have to see how the quiet Cathedral over there reacts,” Aiden said. “I heard the current Gatekeeper of the Cathedral is a new recruit named Agatha, a young lady without much experience. I do not know if she can handle this kind of trouble.”

Tyrian did not answer. For some reason, he suddenly thought of another young person, someone who had shown powerful strength and could calmly negotiate several times with his terrifying Father, a high-ranking priest.

Pland’s Inquisitor Vanna.

If it were that Inquisitor, who was strong enough to be a little frightening… dealing with a few small troubles about True Resurrection would probably not be a problem at all.

…

A slightly fishy, salty wind blew against her face, carrying a chill that the Central Seas never had.

Vanna sat on a wooden barrel near the rail and looked up at the endless sea in the distance. At the far edge of her vision a thin mist spread, and it seemed there were faint, blurry icebergs hidden deep inside the fog.

The Vanished had already entered the Frost Sea. They were now very, very far from Pland.

The young Inquisitor lowered her head again and kept carving the piece of wood with a small knife.

She was using Sea-Breath Wood to carve a new wave charm amulet.

Life on the Vanished was actually far better than she had first imagined. None of those frightening or strange, twisted things had happened. There was a normal schedule, decent food, clean and private living space, and noisy but rather interesting fellow crew members. From some angles, the living conditions on the Vanished were even better than those on normal ocean-going ships.

Because they had AI, the “Messenger”, the ship could always get fresh ingredients. Because there were many “living” facilities on board, the Vanished almost never suffered the kind of trouble that came from equipment breaking down. But the greatest advantage of this ship was not even that.

Its greatest advantage was… safety.

Yes, safety. It was hard to believe, but after living here for a few days, Vanna finally accepted this unbelievable truth of the Mortal Realm: there was no ship in the world safer than this terrifying ghost ship.

Because Captain Duncan was here, even Intruders from Subspace did not dare come to this ship and make trouble.

On the Vanished, people could freely talk about Subspace. They could freely read any book. Morris had asked AI to bring a big pile of folklore and history books from Pland. Once he began reading, he could sit there for most of the day.

To hurry on their way, sometimes the captain even had the Vanished sink into the Spirit Realm and race through those dark, terrifying Anomaly seas at full speed.

No Shadows from the deep layers ever appeared. Even if something really popped out, it only became part of the crew's daily fun.

Or an extra dish at dinner.

All in all, life on the Vanished was actually not bad.

But she still needed some time to get used to it.

The small knife cut deep grooves into the wood. Shavings fell bit by bit, and her slightly restless heart slowly calmed down.

Footsteps came from behind. A lively voice suddenly sounded beside her. "Miss Vanna, what are you doing?"

Vanna looked up. Nina was staring curiously at the half-finished charm amulet in her hand and at the few finished charm amulets placed on another wooden barrel.

"These are charm amulets offered to the storm Goddess Gamona," Vanna said with a smile. She knew this girl in front of her, who looked so ordinary, had a shocking identity, but after spending a few days together she no longer felt surprised by any crew member's background. "Throwing a Sea-Breath Wood charm amulet into the sea counts as making an offering to the Goddess."

"Oh!" Nina nodded in sudden understanding and looked at the charm amulets on the barrel with wide, amazed eyes. "I think I heard about this in school before, but this is the first time I have seen one. You made so many!"

"Actually…" Vanna started to speak, then hesitated a little. She looked at the bright sparkle in Nina's eyes, then slowly lifted the lid of the barrel.

“Not just these few.”

Nina froze for a moment. She leaned over, peeked into the barrel, and stayed frozen.

After a while she lifted her head and looked at the Inquisitor in front of her.

“Miss Vanna… are you super bored on the ship?”

“Not really,” Vanna said, her expression a little awkward. She also felt that carving a whole barrel of charm amulets in just a few days was a bit much. “I just… might need a little more time to adjust.”

“Oh.”

Nina nodded, then moved to the side of the barrel. She squatted down and started staring at it in a daze.

No one knew what she was thinking about.

Vanna put down a new wave charm amulet and quietly put away the knife.

“Miss Vanna, you are not carving anymore?” Nina asked.

“…I have run out of material.”

“Then ask AI to bring some more?”

“That will not be necessary…” Vanna waved an embarrassed hand. She was just about to say more when a strange, low rumbling sound suddenly came from the direction of the sea and cut her off.

It sounded as if something was moving under the water and rushing upward with a mass of bubbles.

At almost the same time, a creaking sound came from the direction of the Vanished’s mast. The next second, Vanna saw the spirit form sails above the ghost ship adjust their angle a little. The huge hull followed, changing its posture and course.

Nina ran to the rail, eyes wide as she stared at the distant sea. She suddenly pointed and shouted: “Look, look! Miss Vanna! Something came out!”

Vanna followed the direction of Nina’s finger.

She saw a large patch of foaming waves. The chaotic, uneven water swelled up like a small hill in the distance, and a huge shadow slowly rose within the foam and currents, coming up to the surface.

A high mast, a rusted bow and smokestack, a torn and broken deck…

It was a ship.

Chapter 301: Boarding the Ghost Ship

A ship had “risen” from the sea in a shocking way and now stood in front of Vanna and Nina.

The waves on the surface had not yet calmed. Layers of turbulent water spread outward with the rusted ship as their center. Seawater kept pouring down from its corroded smokestack and deck structures, making loud, harsh sounds. The ship rocked slightly between the waves. Slanting sunlight fell across its deck, spreading a strange, unreal color over it.

Nina stared with her mouth open. After a few seconds she finally reacted and began shouting. “Ah! A ship! A ship! A ship suddenly popped up!”

Then she suddenly turned to Vanna, speaking so fast her words almost ran together. “I am going to tell Uncle Duncan!”

Before her words even finished, the girl had already turned and rushed across the deck like a gust of wind, running toward the stern.

Vanna still stared hard at the strange ship that had suddenly risen from the sea. She studied its old, decayed marks and every detail on its hull.

She noticed a line of large letters on one side of the bow. The letters were badly covered by rust and grime, so they were very hard to read, but she still managed to sound them out.

“The Obsidian.”

The noise from this mysterious ship suddenly appearing on the sea was great. Of course Nina and Vanna were not the only ones who noticed it. In just a short time, the others who had been resting in their cabins came out and gathered on deck.

Morris, Shirley, Dog, and Alice all came in surprise to the bow, looking out at the strange ship in the distance and guessing where it had come from. Very soon, Duncan also followed Nina out onto the bow deck.

“Mr. Duncan,” Vanna said at once when she saw him, “there are no signs of living people on that ship. It might be a… ghost ship.”

Her expression looked a little strange when she said the words “ghost ship”.

“One of our own,” Duncan replied casually, then lifted his head to study the ghost ship that looked only about half the size of the Vanished. The first thing he noticed was the smokestack structure on its upper levels. “Looks like a steamship… can you guess its rough age and origin?”

“There is no need to guess,” Morris said from nearby. The old scholar gazed toward the distant sea with a complicated look in his eyes. “I saw its name. The Obsidian. A fast steam cutter, sunk six years ago off the coast of Frostholm.”

“Huh?” Shirley, who had been craning her neck, looked at the old gentleman in surprise. “Old gentleman, you know that ship?”

“Brown Scott had his accident on that ship,” Morris said, his voice a bit low. “But how… how did it suddenly appear here? And in this way…”

Alice listened to the others talking. She looked up at the Obsidian in the distance, then turned her head back to look at Morris and Duncan. After thinking hard for a bit, she finally asked, “Captain, is this normal? Will a sunken ship just float back up out of the sea?”

“Of course this is not normal,” Duncan gave the silly girl a look. “This is called a ghost ship. And I suspect it is not just a ghost ship.”

As he spoke, Goathead’s voice suddenly sounded in his mind. “Captain, should we fire two shots to test it? The cannons say that from this angle and distance they feel a bit hungry and cannot help wanting to throw a few shells over…”

“Tell them to hold it!” Duncan cut Goathead off without hesitation. He thought for a moment, then turned to the people beside him. “We have to go over there and see what is going on.”

“We are going… onto that ghost ship?” Shirley shrank her neck at once. “Is that not a bit reckless? I am not scared of other things, I am just afraid that ship will suddenly sink again. It popped up out of nowhere, after all…”

“AI will bring us back,” Duncan said, giving the young lady a calm look. “Of course, if you do not want to go, you can stay here. I am not forcing you.”

Shirley opened her mouth, but before she could speak, Dog broke the silence first. “We will go, we will go! Serving the captain is our duty! We would be happy to!”

Shirley froze, then began complaining silently to her partner. [Dog, can you please have some principles…]

[How is seeing the situation clearly and taking part in group activities not a principle?] Dog answered with confidence in the mental link. [The big boss is leading the team, so we do not have to worry about safety. Of course we should do our best to show what we can do…]

[What I mean is, can you leave the chance to hug the big thigh to me next time? You grab it every time…]

Dog thought for a while. […Shirley, can you please have some principles?]

Duncan did not care what Shirley and Dog were talking about while they stood there in a daze. He knew that when these two “people” went quiet, they must be whispering in the mental link again. Instead, he looked up at the others. “Are you coming along?”

“I am going!” Nina raised her hand first. She even looked a bit excited. “It is a ghost ship. I only heard about them in stories before. I have never seen one with my own eyes.”

“The Vanished is also a ghost ship,” Duncan had to remind the young lady, then looked at the others. “What about you?”

“There might be clues on that ship about what Brown did before his accident,” Morris nodded. “I will go with you.”

“I will go too,” Vanna said. “A ghost ship phenomenon is very likely connected to heretics or evil corruption. I have some experience with that.”

“I am not sure,” Alice said after thinking for a bit. She looked at Duncan. “But I want to stay with the captain.”

“Then we will all go. Treat it as seeing more of the world,” Duncan said casually. He waved toward the mast not far away, calling down the pigeon that had been sunning itself with closed eyes high above. “AI, take us over to that ghost ship.”

A ball of ghost-green flame suddenly rose from the Vanished. A moment later, a huge skeletal bird soared into the air and flew toward the Obsidian, which rocked gently on the waves in the distance.

The deck of the Vanished grew quiet.

The quiet lasted for a short while. Then the small boat hanging near the side of the Vanished began to creak sadly and sway.

It was a shuttle boat, normally used to quickly move people between two ships when they were close together on the sea.

Two coiled ropes lying along the edge of the deck began to rustle as they moved. They slid like snakes over to the shuttle boat and lifted their ends to pat its hull.

Goathead, who had stayed behind in the captain's cabin, of course sensed what was happening near the deck. It sighed softly and spoke to the old fellows it had worked with for a century. "Maybe you little boats should practice paddling around in the sea yourselves…"

The shuttle boat creaked even louder…

On the other side, AI did not land on the Obsidian right away. Under Duncan's command, she circled several times in the air over the ghost ship. Only after she roughly confirmed that there were no moving targets anywhere on the ship did she land on a section of deck that looked clean and stable.

ghostly green flame burst into the air, and Duncan's group stepped out of the fire.

A strong, dirty smell rushed into all their noses at once. It was the fishy stench of seawater, mixed with some other rotten odor that was hard to name.

Nina was the first to wrinkle her nose after stepping onto the deck. "Ugh… it smells awful up here…"

"Not every ghost ship is as clean and tidy as the Vanished, and not every one has unlimited fries," Duncan said to Nina with a smile. "If this ship really is the Obsidian from back then, it has been soaking in the Deep Sea for six years."

As he spoke, he looked around at this steamship that gave off an eerie feeling from every corner.

Rust, broken edges, mottled stains. It might once have been a pretty and advanced mechanical cutter, but now it was only a heap of dead steel and wood.

The strangest thing, though, was that as a ship that had just risen from the sea, there was no seawater to be seen here.

The deck was dry.

Even in many of the dents on the deck, those places that should easily hold pools of water, everything was dry.

Vanna had clearly noticed this too. She squatted and rubbed the ground with her fingers, frowning.

She still remembered the scene when this ship came up out of the sea. A huge amount of water had poured off the Obsidian, like endless waterfalls washing over every corner of the ship. Judging by common sense, there should not be a single dry place on this ship.

“Vanna,” Morris said, turning around after he had quickly checked the area around them. “Do you feel any trace of heretics or evil corruption?”

“…No,” Vanna said, slowly shaking her head with a frown. From the moment she had stepped onto the deck she had been watching for this, always feeling for any wave of supernatural power. “There is not the slightest supernatural aura. But that only makes it stranger. The dry deck is clearly not normal, and behind any abnormal phenomenon there should be some supernatural power at work.”

“Then it might be an supernatural power beyond what you can sense,” Duncan said casually, then started walking forward. “Anyway, if something really is hiding on this ship, as long as we look around enough, it will show itself."

Nina quickly ran a few steps to catch up with her Uncle Duncan. "What if something really jumps out?"

Duncan stopped and turned back with a smile. "Then we try talking sense first…"

Chapter 302:

The deck of the Obsidian was small and easy to take in at a glance, so the group quickly finished searching the whole area and found nothing suspicious.

Apart from the places that should have been damp and full of puddles now being oddly dry, the Obsidian's deck looked no different from that of an ordinary wrecked ship. It was heavily rusted, uneven, and damaged in many spots, but overall it had not yet reached the point of total collapse.

After checking the deck, Duncan decided to go inside the ship and take a look.

They soon found a large door that led into the cabins.

It was a rust-covered iron door set into a white wall. The handle had rotted badly, and the lock had long since been ruined by seawater. The whole door was shut tight and clearly could not be opened by normal means.

Morris stepped forward to check the door, then gave up on opening it normally. He turned to the others and said: "We might have to use a bit of force."

"I'll do it," Vanna volunteered before anyone else could speak. "Everyone step back a little so you don't get hit by debris."

Shirley and Alice quickly did as they were told and backed far away. Duncan hardly moved. He only stepped aside two paces so his clothes would not get dirty, then watched Vanna with curiosity. He saw the sturdy woman walk up to the big rusted door and then… casually knock on the door panel with her hand.

A sharp hum rang out, and the center of the iron door simply shattered into a gaping hole. The solid, heavy steel broke into countless fragments that flew in all directions, and dust billowed from the opening.

Then Vanna reached out and tugged at the edges of the hole a few times, tearing the remaining steel plates from the frame as if she were ripping paper. She tossed the pieces aside.

Shirley and Dog stared, dumbfounded, for a long moment before they finally blurted out together: "…What the hell, is she even human?"

Of course Vanna heard them. She turned her head and smiled: "I work out regularly."

Shirley's mouth twitched. She muttered under her breath: "This has nothing to do with working out anymore…"

Duncan also admired Vanna's simple and brutal solution. But he had already seen this fearless maiden fight her way through an entire city, so he did not react much. He only raised his head to look at the smoke-filled doorway and asked: "What is it like inside?"

Vanna waved a hand, waited for the dust to settle a little, then leaned in to look. Her expression immediately turned strange.

A few seconds later, she stepped back and turned to Duncan: "Inside… there's another door."

"Another door?" Duncan froze for a moment, then walked over in a few quick steps to see for himself. Sure enough, another rusted metal door stood right there, only a few meters behind the one they had just broken.

Yet the space between the two doors was not a corridor, nor a foyer, nor any kind of designed safety buffer. It was just an empty space, with no equipment or furnishings and no extra windows, only bare walls and a ceiling that, for some reason, looked crooked and skewed.

"…I am not sure if this is the Obsidian's normal layout," Morris said after coming over for a look. He shook his head. "Before this, I only knew of the ship. I had never seen it in person."

Duncan frowned slightly, then quickly nodded to Vanna: "Open that door too."

Vanna stepped forward at once and repeated the process, smashing the second door. Then she leaned in again, and turned back with a stunned look: "Inside… there's another door."

"Another one?!" Even Shirley was surprised this time. She forgot about keeping a safe distance and dragged Dog over. "Whoa… there really is another one?!"

Behind the second door was a third door, with the exact same layout and the same strange little "compartment" in between.

If there had only been a second door, they could still have explained it away as some special design of the Obsidian. But now a completely useless, senselessly eerie third door had appeared… It was hard to brush this off as just "an advanced design concept" for the ship.

"The structure of this ship is wrong," Duncan said. He looked back at the two doors behind them, his expression turning a bit more serious. "Whether it's normal or not, it should not have a layout like this… Vanna, open this door as well."

"Alright." Vanna did not hesitate. She stepped up and punched the third door. This time she stopped after opening a large hole and did not bother to clear the remaining steel from the frame, because she could already see what was inside through the gap.

“Cap…tain,” she said, still not quite used to the title. Her expression turned even stranger than before. “It’s a wall inside.”

“A wall?!” Duncan’s eye twitched. He looked through the hole and saw exactly what Vanna had described.

There was indeed only a wall opposite the door, less than half a meter away. It was almost pressed right up against it. The space between the door and the wall was meaningless and too narrow to hold anything.

“How could a ship be designed like this?” Nina muttered in confusion. “Three doors, and behind them is just one wall… Then where are the cabins? How are we supposed to get into them?”

Duncan did not answer. He only looked quietly at this oddly structured “overlapped area”, his eyes thoughtful, as if something had occurred to him.

After a moment, he nodded to Vanna: “Keep opening it.”

Vanna stepped forward at once. She first kicked away the remaining lower half of the third door, then slammed her fist into the strange wall. A much larger hole appeared with a thunderous boom.

“It’s a corridor,” Vanna said after taking a look inside. She turned to the others as she spoke.

“Great,” Shirley breathed out in relief. “Finally something that looks normal…”

“It’s upside down,” Vanna went on before Shirley could finish. “The ceiling is under our feet, and the floor is over our heads.”

Shirley muttered: “…What the hell.”

As Vanna had said, behind the wall there was only an upside-down corridor. Just like the three repeating doors, there was nothing normal about the layout inside this ghost ship at all.

“This ship has been twisted…” Even a well-read scholar like Morris looked a bit lost now. He stared in disbelief at the corridor beyond the wall and muttered to himself: “What could have warped the Obsidian into something like this…”

“Think about it another way,” Duncan cut off the old scholar. “Is this really the Obsidian?”

Morris looked up sharply, staring at Duncan in shock: “You mean…”

“We are near Frostholm, and something terrible once happened in the Deep Sea beneath Frostholm,” Duncan said casually. He glanced at Alice, who was looking around curiously. “Do you remember what Tyrian said back then about the ‘Abyssal Trench Project’?”

“I remember, I remember,” Alice said, nodding quickly. “And a whole bunch of submersibles and so on…”

“It’s enough that you remember that much,” Duncan said as he pressed down on Alice’s head. “Stop nodding. You’re starting to wobble.”

Then he raised his hand and knocked on the wall beside him.

The metal bulkhead gave off a hollow thump under his knuckles.

“It looks normal on the outside, but inside it’s a complete mess. Crude imitation and copying, internal spaces stacked together in the wrong way. This should not be the real Obsidian, though it’s hard to say which ‘number’ Obsidian this one is.”

Alice had no idea how much of that she actually understood. She only drew out an “Ohhh” and nodded slowly in a very serious way. It was Vanna, standing beside her, who reacted quickly: “But I remember you once said that back during the Abyssal Trench Project, only the crew members inside those rising submersibles were distorted during the copying process. The submersibles themselves were copied correctly. You guessed back then that this kind of error should be limited to people or other living beings…”

“Yes, it was limited to humans or other living bodies, at least it was like that half a century ago, when the Queen of Frostholm was still alive,” Duncan said slowly. “So the situation is clearly worse now. The copying is no longer limited to Submersible Three, and the distortions have spread to inanimate matter. Whatever lies in the Deep Sea under Frostholm has clearly started moving again after fifty years of silence, and its range and intensity are far beyond what they were half a century ago.”

Shirley blinked as she listened. Everyone on the Vanished had heard the story of the Abyssal Trench Project from the captain, so they all knew how strange and cursed it was. That made her mutter without thinking: “I… I’m starting to get nervous…”

“Think about it another way. The captain is the one investigating this. I don’t think we’re the ones who should be nervous,” Dog whispered too. “Stop scaring yourself. My heart rate is going up with yours.”

Shirley froze: “Dog, you have a heart?”

“I’m a demon with a heart!”

“A heart and ‘having heart’ aren’t the same thing. Isn’t your chest cavity empty?”

“…What if it isn’t? Maybe there’s something in there jumping around.”

“Want me to dig it open and check?”

“No way.”

Duncan paid no attention to the increasingly morbid whispers beside him. After making a quick guess about the ghost ship’s condition, he turned his attention back to the corridor, which might lead who knew where.

After a brief moment of thought, he stepped toward the large hole Vanna had made: “Let’s go in and see what’s going on.”

Chapter 303:

Duncan had Ai perched on his shoulder as he was the first to pass through the hole and step into the upside-down corridor. The others followed one after another behind him, and this time Vanna took the rear, in case of a sudden ambush.

The group moved carefully along the corridor. Everyone watched their surroundings at all times and studied every feature of the corridor as they went.

Once they entered the corridor, they did notice some details they had missed at the entrance.

The corridor was not just upside down. Distortion and strangeness were everywhere.

Doors of all kinds of mismatched sizes were set haphazardly into the walls on both sides, some upright, some upside down. round portholes appeared from time to time, but the other side of the glass was either a wall or yet another door or window. Strange geometric bulges jutted from the walls and floor, looking like pieces of rooms from somewhere else that had been fused into the corridor in the wrong way.

The inside of the Obsidian felt like the innards of a huge beast after a terrifying doctor had butchered and rearranged them. All its organs were twisted and piled together at random. Rooms overlapped, doors slanted, exits and entrances linked to this corridor, which seemed to be the main passage, in utterly random ways. And at the far end of the corridor… who knew what might be lurking in the dimness.

The ghost ship was very quiet. Only the sound of their footsteps rang out as they struck the “floor” that should have been a ceiling. The sound echoed through the hull, and there seemed to be something else mixed into the echo.

Nina and Shirley looked somewhat nervous. Alice, on the other hand, seemed fine. It was not that the doll was brave; she simply lacked common sense. All her experience with ships and sailing came from the equally cursed and bizarre Vanished, so she did not think there was anything here worth fearing.

They walked on for who knew how long. The long corridor seemed to stretch endlessly into the dark, and the area ahead looked dimmer and dimmer. Duncan poked the pigeon on his shoulder: “Light.”

Ai let out a sharp cry at once: “Take up this battle axe of the Sun! Embrace the glory of combat!”

As the pigeon shouted, bright green flames rose over its body. The blazing fire quickly drove away the darkness in the corridor.

Vanna stared in shock at the scene and whispered to Morris in front of her: “This pigeon… can be used like this?”

Morris sounded very calm: “The captain does this all the time. When the pigeon is not with him, he uses himself as a light source.”

Vanna stared: “…?”

But this time, before she could once again lament the gap between the legendary Captain Duncan and the one in the Mortal Realm, a sudden noise cut off everyone’s movements.

“Thump, thump, thump…”

It sounded like a dull knocking, from behind a nearby door.

Everyone stopped at once. All eyes turned to where the sound had come from.

It was a blue door, with the words “Captain’s Cabin” written on it.

On a normal ship, the captain’s cabin could never be in a place like this. But on this ghost ship, where everything was already in chaos and all the cabin entrances were piled together at random, any door could appear anywhere.

“Thump, thump, thump…”

The knocking came again, louder than before and now a bit urgent.

It sounded as if a survivor of a shipwreck were hiding behind the door, and after hearing movement in the corridor, had started pounding on it in panic to call for help.

Vanna silently reached back to grip the greatsword on her back. Shirley lifted the black chain in her hand. Nina slipped behind Alice, and Alice raised her arms to cover her head.

With a blank face, Duncan walked up to the door.

The dull knocking continued without stopping.

But Duncan did not seem about to open the door. He only bent his fingers and knocked twice in return.

The knocking inside stopped at once, as if the one making the sound was taken aback. After a few seconds of silence, a hoarse, low voice suddenly broke it, coming from behind the blue door: “Is… someone out there?”

“Yes,” Duncan said calmly.

“Ah, that’s great! I am the captain of the Obsidian. I don’t know what has happened on the ship, but I am trapped,” the hoarse voice said at once. “Kind sir outside the door, what is your name? Could you help me open it?”

“Just call me Duncan,” Duncan said. At the same time, he pressed a hand down behind him to signal the others to stay calm. “Before I open the door, I want to confirm something, are you really the captain of the Obsidian?”

“Of course! My name is Cristo Barbelli. You can check my name and identification number at the Harbor Office. My papers are right here in the room,” the voice answered at once. “But… for some reason this damned door will not budge at all, and I really have no way to come out and prove my identity to you…”

“Next question,” Duncan said. He ignored the rambling behind the door and went on: “What year is it?”

“This year?” The voice inside clearly froze for a moment, probably thinking the question was odd, but still answered: “Why, it’s 1894, of course. Is there something wrong with that?”

Duncan glanced back at Morris, and the latter gave a slight nod.

1894. That was the year the Obsidian was lost at sea.

Thinking of that shipwreck, Morris suddenly stepped forward and asked: “Excuse me, Captain, do you know if there is a passenger named ‘Brown Scott’ on your ship?”

“A passenger?” The voice behind the blue door sounded a bit unsure. “I cannot remember the name of every passenger on board, but… are you talking about Brown Scott? Ah, I remember now, that one I do know. The folklorist? He is a man of some repute. I spoke with him several times. I recall he is a rather thin gentleman, with his hair and beard always neatly kept. He has studied the funeral customs of various city-states, and he is very interested in the frozen seas north of Frostholm…”

Listening to the voice behind the door, Morris nodded slightly and said to Duncan in a low voice: “No discrepancy.”

“His mind is clear, his memory intact, and he can state his name accurately,” Vanna, who had been silent until now, suddenly said. “But that does not rule out an evil creature that has absorbed human memories and emotions and is using them to set a trap. Such things are not rare on ghost ships.”

“Oh, that does not really matter. As long as it truly has that captain’s memories, it’s enough,” Duncan said carelessly. “Monsters can talk reason first too. If reason does not work, we use physics. One way or another, it will understand.”

Vanna stared for a moment. “…That is true.”

Duncan put his hand on the blue wooden door’s handle.

“I’m going to open the door now, Mr. Barbelli,” he said to the person inside.

Then he turned the handle. Unlike the other completely rusted cabin doors they had seen, this one showed no signs of damage. As he turned it, he heard the soft click of the lock turning at once.

The door opened.

Under everyone’s slightly tense gaze, Duncan pushed the door open.

A twisted, upside-down room appeared before them.

All the walls were crooked, and the ceiling slanted as if it were about to collapse completely. The room’s original furnishings had been randomly fused into the nearby walls and floor, as if buried in wood and metal. Only broken halves of tables and chairs stuck out here and there. On the wall facing the door there was an especially large hole, and beyond it was only darkness. It was impossible to tell where it led.

The twisted room itself was empty.

Duncan swept his gaze over the empty room, but the next second he heard Captain “Cristo Barbelli’s” voice coming again from behind the blue door: “Ah, did you open the door? I think I felt it move, but it still does not budge in my hand… Is something wrong with my senses or my perception? Could you help me? I may have been stuck out at sea for too long and started to show some bad symptoms. If there is a priest willing to lend a hand, that would be even better…”

Duncan frowned.

He stepped into the warped room and slowly turned the door around to look at the back of the door panel.

He saw “Cristo Barbelli”.

There was a mass of something, clinging to the door like a half-melted, broken wax figure. In the sagging, twisted shape he could vaguely make out an arm pressed flat against the door panel, a few strands of tissue connecting to the hand, and a large lump of “body” whose true form could not be seen at all.

This horrible, twisted thing had fused with the door. When Duncan’s gaze fell upon it, it was still swelling and shrinking slightly, squirming as it spoke in a hoarse, low voice from somewhere inside its structure:

“Ah, I cannot see you. Have you come in? The room may be a bit messy. There was a big tremor earlier, and I have not tidied up since… My sight seems to have some problems, but they are not too serious. The worst part now is that I cannot move my body. I think I have forgotten how to control my hands and feet. By the way, did you bring a doctor?”

Chapter 304: Sludge at the Bottom of the Hold

That was the “captain” of the Obsidian, Cristo Barbelli – a tangled mass of matter that almost no longer made anyone think of a human body, a heap that had floated up from the Deep Sea… a replica.

He seemed completely unaware of his own condition, and his mind also seemed a little broken.

He did not know time was passing, and he could not sense the twisting of his own flesh. After losing all sight, most of his sense of touch, and all ability to move, he still seemed far too calm, as if he was trapped in some strange dullness.

That faintly squirming, swelling mass of living tissue kept making a low, hoarse sound. “Cristo Barbelli” greeted the people who came into the room, asking about the current state of the Obsidian and asking what had happened.

Nina saw this strange and terrifying scene. She let out a low cry, then quickly forced it down, covered her mouth with one hand, and instinctively backed away two steps.

For a seventeen-year-old girl like her, this scene was a bit too much.

“The Obsidian had an accident, but we still don’t know the cause,” Duncan said. Facing this so-called Captain Cristo’s questions, he answered while quickly thinking about how to deal with him. “We were just passing by.”

“Ah, that is terrible… I have been trapped here all this time. I have no idea what is happening on the ship,” the mass of tissue stuck to the door let out a regretful sigh. “Is everything else still all right? What about the crew members and passengers? Did you find them?”

“…No, but we did not find any bodies either. They might already have escaped,” Duncan said casually. “Only this room was locked. We heard you knocking.”

“I kept knocking on this door. It is the only thing I can touch in the dark,” Captain Cristo said. “Storm Goddess Gamona preserve us, I hope everyone else is safe…”

The northern city-states were the domain of the God of Death Bartok, but on the Boundless Sea, the Storm Goddess’s divine authority was beyond doubt. No matter their homeland or faith, all captains prayed to the Storm Goddess when they went to sea.

As they listened to his prayer, Vanna and Morris both frowned.

This thing, which was clearly a twisted product, could still say a deity’s name correctly, and could even pray in a clear, sane way?

Duncan had clearly noticed this too. He also thought of what he had learned earlier from Tyrian about the Abyssal Trench Project.

During the Abyssal Trench Project’s runaway state, the “No. 3 Submersibles” that kept surfacing from the Deep Sea had all produced replicants that crawled out of them with no reason and no ability to communicate.

Even the first replicant – even that “replica” that looked the closest to humans – had only let out a few vague, muddled whispers.

That had been an important piece of information from the very beginning. Based on it, Tyrian had judged that those extraordinary manifestations in the Deep Sea near Frostholm during the runaway state could only copy replicas without reason or souls. Yet this twisted entity in front of them, although its thinking and understanding seemed a bit off, clearly had normal reason and memories, and could even speak smoothly with others.

Where was the problem?

Was it because the Obsidian was not, as they first guessed, the same kind of replica as the “No. 3 Submersible”? Was the source of the twisting on this ship something else altogether? Or had the Deep Sea’s extraordinary manifestations near Frostholm changed in the past half century, so that the replicas it now created had begun to develop minds of their own?

Or…

Duncan quietly looked at “Captain Cristo,” who was stuck to the door.

Or maybe the captain’s own mind really was inside this mass of tissue – his soul had somehow been shoved into this twisted replica.

The more Duncan thought about it, the more he felt this was the most likely explanation.

“Are you still there?” Maybe Duncan stayed silent for too long, because Cristo’s voice came again from inside the tissue. “Can you help me get out of here? Or is my condition actually very bad? Is it… severe nerve damage?”

Duncan let out a sigh.

He knew he had to tell the man the truth, even if it was cruel.

Cruel things on the Boundless Sea were beyond counting.

But just as he was about to speak, Vanna’s voice suddenly came from the side and cut him off: “Mr. Cristo, your condition is indeed not good. We cannot move you for now. You may need to stay here a bit longer – after we finish searching the other areas, we will think of a way to help you."

Duncan gave Vanna a questioning look. She raised her hand and pointed at the wall on the far side of the room.

There was a huge hole in that wall. On the other side of the opening was a sloping passage that led to somewhere unknown, dark and eerie inside.

Duncan understood what Vanna meant at once.

This ship still had far too many unexplored areas. Before they figured out what had happened to the Obsidian, they could not be certain what this "Captain Cristo" really was or where he had come from.

It was best to calm this strange "replica" for now and finish searching the whole ship before deciding what to do with him.

Duncan gave a small nod.

A professional was a professional. That sharp sense for danger clearly came from dealing with too many heretics and malevolent spirits.

"All right… I understand," Cristo said. His voice carried some regret and unease. "I will wait here. But how long will you be gone?"

"Maybe a few hours, but we will come back as soon as we can," Vanna said. "Please don't worry, we will not abandon you. Your condition is not good, but nothing serious will happen in the short term. Stay still, stay calm, and wait a while."

"Then… fine. Come back soon."

The squirming, swelling mass of tissue quieted down.

He seemed very anxious about his condition, but after Vanna's reassurance, he became surprisingly cooperative and calm.

Was the “captain” always like this by nature? Or was this calmness also a sign of his twisted thoughts and understanding? Duncan had no way to know.

Now, everyone’s attention turned to the big hole in the wall at the far end of the room.

Of course a normal room would not have such a hole, and would not have a crooked ramp hidden in that hole. This opening was clearly another result of the Obsidian’s twisted inner structure.

It looked deep and long. Where did it lead?

Duncan walked across the upside-down, jumbled room to the hole, leaned forward, and peered inside. He saw only darkness stretching down into the hollow, and a slanting passage that seemed to be pieced together from corridors and several twisted staircases. The passage extended downward. From time to time a draft of air blew up, as if there were more passages or a larger space at the bottom.

He stepped in. The others followed close behind.

The pigeon AI, wreathed in spirit form flames, once again became the search party’s torch. In the light of the spirit form fire, the corridor, already deep and gloomy, looked even stranger.

“The twisting down here seems even worse than above…”

Morris lifted his head and glanced at the shadowy ceiling where the light and dark crossed, speaking in a thoughtful tone.

Above the passage, they could vaguely see all kinds of tangled structures: stair railings, doors from who knew where, machine parts, pipes and wires, and even tables and chairs.

If the upper decks still held some vague trace of a normal layout, then this ramp leading deeper into the Obsidian was like a heap of junk made by grinding everything up and sticking it back together. It was a crisscrossing nightmare that stretched down into the steel giant's inner organs.

"It seems the closer you get to the replicant's center, the worse the copying accuracy becomes," Vanna said, then added, "If this ship really is a replicant similar to the 'No. 3 Submersible'."

"When we get back, I will have to talk with Tyrian," Duncan said from the front. "He may be very interested in what happened to the Obsidian."

"But I think before that, he will first be scared half to death by you," Vanna could not help muttering. "I have spoken with him. He has some serious shadows in his heart."

Duncan slowed down and looked back at Vanna.

Vanna instantly felt a bit awkward. "Did I say something wrong?"

"No." Duncan laughed. "I was just thinking that you can finally talk to me like a normal person. This feels right."

Vanna opened her mouth, as if she wanted to say something more, but at that moment, the light from AI in front of them suddenly dimmed. Right after that, their field of view opened up.

The passage had reached its end.

Below them was indeed a wide-open space.

"A cargo hold?" Morris frowned as he looked at the broad, dim place ahead. He saw a flat, open area. Compared to the twisted ramp they had just come down, this place was almost impossibly "orderly," yet he could not tell what this space had originally been used for.

“Don’t tell me the deepest part of this ghost ship is just an empty cavity,” Nina muttered nervously as she looked around. “Did everything get piled onto the upper two decks?”

No one could answer her.

Alice looked around curiously and walked forward a few steps.

“Eh?”

Miss Doll suddenly stopped and let out a short cry. She stared in shock at the floor under her feet and began wiping her shoe on the ground beside her.

“I think I stepped on something!” She turned back and said to Duncan with an innocent look. “It’s sticky and kind of gross…”

“Sticky?” Duncan frowned and quickly walked to Alice’s side. He looked down at the spot she had just stepped on.

He saw a dark patch of matter that looked like sludge. In the middle of that black, sticky stuff, he could still faintly see Alice’s shoe print.

But the shoe print was vanishing fast.

The “sludge” was squirming!

It was alive!

Chapter 305: 6000°C and a Heartbeat

Alive.

Once they realized that what Alice had stepped on was not sludge at all, but some kind of living tissue, most of the people present felt their skin crawl.

Duncan simply thought the things writhing on the floor were… disgusting.

Right after that, he heard Nina's voice from not far away: "There's some here too!"

"And over here!" Shirley cried out next. "A huge patch, and it's still moving!"

All over this mysterious, empty space lay those black, sludge-like "substances" that could slowly squirm.

"They're all over the place…" Vanna had silently drawn the greatsword from her back. She frowned as she surveyed the vast "hold" and spoke in a very serious tone. "Goddess preserve us… what are these things?"

Morris forced himself to ignore his disgust. He squatted by a patch of slowly moving "sludge" and used his folding knife to lift the edge of the sticky "mud."

"I have never seen anything like this, nor read of anything like it in any book," the learned old scholar said, full of unease and confusion. "It looks like something living, but it feels just like mud, and… I do not sense any trace of a mind in it."

"It is somewhat similar to something Tyrian described from one of the 'No. 3 Submersibles'," Duncan said casually. At the same time, he raised his head and looked toward the deeper part of the hold.

Nina had walked to the edge of the group. In the dim light cast by AI's ghostly flames, a patch of sludge that looked especially "lively" was slowly rising and falling in a hollow in the floor. Nina stood beside the hollow, bent down, and watched the disgusting substance with curiosity.

She felt a little nervous, but her curiosity was even stronger than her nerves.

In the next second, the sludge suddenly stirred!

It was as if it was answering Nina's gaze, or like some blind, stupid creature that had finally been disturbed by this group of uninvited guests. The flow of the mud sped up all at once. A great amount of gas surged out from inside it, and bubbles rolled across its surface. Nina jumped in fright. Before she could react, the sludge suddenly… stood up!

Like a lowly soft-bodied creature that suddenly grew bones, the black, sticky mass straightened up out of the hollow. Its surface hardened, set, and changed color at high speed. In the blink of an eye, it took on a shape almost like a human. In the next instant, its top split and formed something like a head, and even grew a face.

It was a face that looked seventy or eighty percent like Nina's!

"Wah!" Nina cried out in fear. Even though she was brave, cheerful, and strong, she was still only a teenage girl. Faced with such a terrifying and bizarre sight, she was badly shaken. Her mind went blank on the spot. Without even thinking, she raised her hand on instinct to slap that awful thing away from her.

That slap had a temperature of 6000°C.

Shirley was the closest. She only heard Nina's startled cry, then a deafening boom. A blinding flash of searing light filled her and Dog's vision. With that flash came a shockwave of heat, like standing at the rim of an erupting volcano.

Nina had only slapped once, and it had been a very short slap.

But the fireball from that slap almost melted and vaporized a whole spherical space with a twelve-meter radius in front of her.

Duncan turned his head just in time to see the blazing ball of fire in front of Nina vanish quickly in midair. In front of her, glowing streams of molten metal were flowing where the metal had melted. The girl still seemed dazed. She was standing there, rooted to the edge of that terrifying molten pit.

"What happened?" Duncan hurried to Nina's side and put a hand on her shoulder. The leftover heat still rolled and shimmered around him.

"Just… just now that sludge suddenly stood up, and it turned into me, and I… I got scared…" Nina finally came back to herself. She hunched her shoulders, still pale with shock, and pointed toward where the strange thing had been. "So I hit it…"

"And then?"

"And then it was gone," Nina said with a miserable face, still a little frightened. "I didn't hold back. This whole area turned into molten iron."

Duncan looked blankly at the molten pit in the floor and the streams of metal running down the nearby wall. Then he looked at the still-nervous "fragment of the Sun."

Whatever that thing was that had jumped out to scare Nina, it was clearly the one that got hurt the worst. A 6000°C slap like that… even an eldritch god from Subspace would be left with lifelong shadows from it…

Still, he reached out and ruffled Nina's hair, comforting the young lady who had just been badly frightened: "Don't be scared. It's fine. You already slapped it out of existence…"

As he spoke, he turned and looked at the others, who were all shaken.

Shirley was hugging Dog and shaking like a leaf. Morris was quietly thumping his own chest. Alice had just picked up her head. Only Vanna stayed the calmest. She looked at Duncan and shrugged.

"I will never again walk up behind Nina and start talking to her suddenly," said the Inquisitor who had once slaughtered her way through an entire city-state, in a very solemn tone.

"It was just a small accident," Duncan said helplessly as he rubbed Nina's hair. Then his gaze went back to the patches of sludge that Nina's "Sun punch" had not reached. A second later, his expression changed slightly. "Wait, something is wrong with these things."

At Duncan's warning, everyone finally noticed the changes in the sludge all over the hold.

All the sludge had stopped moving.

These things that had been twisting and shifting like soft-bodied creatures only moments ago had all frozen. They had become dry clumps, like mud that had lost its water. At the edges of every clump, tiny branch-like protrusions stretched outward, as if something had tried to escape from inside the mud and left marks pointing in the direction it had fled.

Vanna's eyes swept around the hold at once. In only a few seconds, she noticed that the marks reaching out from the edges of the sludge all seemed to point the same way.

Toward the deepest part of the dark hold.

“There is something in that direction.” Vanna spoke at once and gripped her greatsword tighter.

At the same time, Duncan also turned his gaze toward the deepest darkness.

A thin line of ghostly green flame stretched quietly out from under his feet. When it touched the dry clumps of “sludge” on the floor, it flared up bright at once, turning into one bonfire after another. The “campfires” spread across the hold in moments, lighting many places that had been in darkness.

Duncan watched the spreading fires and confirmed his first guess in his heart – these sludge-like things were condensed from extraordinary power.

As the spirit form flames spread, this wide hold that had been too large for AI’s firelight to brighten fully finally revealed more of its secrets.

They saw distant bulkheads scarred and pitted as if burned by acid or gnawed by some corrupt creature. They saw ropes, pipes, and suspicious dark red bundles of fibers hanging from above. They saw even more sludge clumps that had already lost all life. And at the very deepest point of the hold, they saw—

A huge, blurred mass crouched there in an unsettling posture. Its edges still seemed to be slowly writhing.

Duncan paused for a moment, then strode toward that giant, twisted heap.

He did not let his spirit form flames corrupt and burn the mass. He knew it was also “extraordinary firewood” that he could burn, but before he understood what it was, he did not want to destroy any clues.

The others hesitated for a moment, but when they saw Duncan already walking forward with big strides, they quickly followed behind him.

“Thump—”

Just as Duncan had gone halfway, a sudden sound made everyone stop without thinking.

Morris looked up toward the source of the sound and realized that the dull thump, like a heartbeat, was coming from deep inside that several-meter-high dark heap.

Duncan stopped as well. He stared at the strange mass and felt the flow of its aura.

It did not give him any sense of danger.

So he took a few more steps forward.

“Thump… thump…”

The heartbeat-like sound became clearer and stronger than before. The edges of the mass writhed more obviously, and even its whole surface began to rise and fall.

Duncan frowned. At that moment, he suddenly heard Shirley’s voice behind him:

“Dog, Dog, what’s wrong with you?!”

Chapter 306: Remains in the Depths

Dog staggered forward on unsteady legs for two steps, then finally stopped. Thick, pitch-black smoke and dust rose from the gaps in its bones. Every bone plate on its body trembled as if in spasm, and in its blood-red eye sockets, the light flickered on and off.

Such an obvious reaction from this Anomaly naturally startled Shirley. She stopped at once, grabbed Dog's huge skull, and shook it while calling his name in a panic. She called seven or eight times before Dog finally came back to his senses. Dog slowly raised his head and let out a hoarse, low sound from its throat: "Why did I suddenly… feel like I can't move my legs…"

"Are you alright?" Duncan also walked over at this time. He frowned as he looked at the Abyssal Hound, whose state was clearly wrong. There was some concern in his voice as he asked: "Does anything hurt?"

"I… don't feel sick," Dog's skull swayed as if it could fall asleep at any moment. "I just feel like I don't have any strength, and… I really don't want to go near that pile of stuff."

"You really don't want to get close?" Duncan turned his head and looked at that strange thing at the end of the room, which still slowly writhed in the firelight like a hill of sludge.

Was that weird "sludge" affecting Dog? Some kind of instinctive suppressive force?

Dog’s strange reaction drew everyone’s attention and also pushed Duncan into thought. The first thing he thought of was whether Dog’s strange “senses”, which far surpassed those of humans, had once again noticed something invisible.

But judging from Dog’s reaction, Dog did not seem to have “seen” any kind of Anomaly.

“The Abyssal Hound counts as a rather powerful bloodline among Abyssal demons. They rarely end up like this just because they face the pressure of a strong individual,” Vanna squatted down and, without any hesitation, patted Dog’s bone plates. Then she turned and glanced toward the end of the room. “Besides, that thing hasn’t released any aura of pressure at all…”

“You can take out ‘rather’,” Shirley muttered to the side. “Dog is already really strong…”

“I’m not strong, not strong at all,” Dog quickly shook his head. “Isn’t this place a bit too creepy? Maybe we should come back next time?”

“There won’t be a next time. This ghost ship may not stay here obediently, waiting for us to explore it over and over,” Duncan shook his head. “But you really aren’t in any condition to keep going.”

Dog was clearly under the influence of some unknown power. If he kept forcing Dog toward that thing, it could lead to unpredictable results. The best choice now was to send Dog and Shirley back to the Vanished for the time being.

Duncan waved to the side. AI immediately flew over, circling in the air while squawking: “Who is calling the ship… It’s a trap! Abandon ship!”

“You take Shirley and Dog back to the Vanished first,” Duncan ignored the noisy bird. He pointed at Dog, who was sprawled on the ground, and at Shirley, who looked very worried. Then, after thinking for a moment, he pointed at Nina as well. “Take Nina back too.”

“Ah?” Nina did not react at first. “Why do I have to go back? I feel fine right now!”

“That thing just now tried to copy you. It was interrupted by you, but we don’t know how that mass at the end will react when you get close,” Duncan explained simply. “In a situation like this, it doesn’t hurt to be extra careful.”

Nina listened carefully, then nodded obediently at once: “Ah, alright, I’ll go back then.”

Duncan had prepared a lot of words to persuade her. After all, Nina was a curious young lady and had always looked forward to this kind of adventure. He didn’t expect her to agree so quickly, which left him a bit surprised, but soon he just smiled and shook his head.

She was still so sensible.

The undead bird’s flames roared through the cabin, taking Shirley, Dog, and Nina out of the Obsidian.

But the space did not fall into darkness because AI left. The bonfires Duncan had lit with that dry, sluggish sludge as fuel still burned, lighting up this gloomy, eerie place.

That strange mass at the end of the cabin still lay there, quietly writhing as if half-asleep, as if lurking in a dream.

But as soon as Duncan turned his gaze back on it, a clear “thump” sounded from inside that mass.

“The children are gone,” Duncan let out a gentle breath and walked toward the dark mass. “Now it’s time for the adults to solve this problem.”

His steps did not hesitate at all. As he moved closer, the mass that had seemed to be in a dormant state reacted at once. The writhing at its edges grew more obvious, the swelling and shrinking of its surface became more frequent, and the beating sounds from within grew faster and louder.

When he was ten meters away, it had already turned into a clear rhythm of a heartbeat –

Thump, thump, thump – the clear, powerful heartbeat echoed again and again, ringing through the wide, dim cabin.

But aside from the constant heartbeat and the ever-stronger writhing on its surface, the thing did not show any other reaction.

Even when Duncan stood right in front of it, it only kept up this “full of life” state.

“Goddess… what on earth is this blasphemous thing…”

Vanna spoke with her brow tightly furrowed, unable to hide the disgust in her voice.

Now that she was close enough, she could finally see the true shape of this mass more clearly. It did not have any outline that a living creature should have. Its surface flowed like mud, yet from time to time questionable bumps rose beneath that mud, like half-melted organs or suddenly swelling blood vessels and bundles of nerves. At the same time, as it kept making heartbeat sounds, it showed some traits that looked like responses to outside stimuli – traits that, in the end, still just turned back into blind, pointless squirming.

From the day she became an Inquisitor, Vanna had seen more heretical evil than she could count. Yet the level of blasphemy and corruption in this thing still shocked her deeply.

Even Alice at the side looked a little dazed. The doll stared at the pile of flesh for a long time before finally saying: “It doesn’t look like something you can cook…”

Vanna’s eyes widened at once as she stared at Alice – she was shocked yet again.

Morris, on the other hand, showed the carefulness and curiosity a Scholar should have. He seemed to ignore the discomfort and resistance in his heart. He stepped closer to the mass and studied it for quite a while. Then, as it swelled and writhed, he suddenly noticed something: “There seems to be something wrapped inside!”

“Inside?” Duncan was slightly startled. Right away he noticed what Morris had seen: near the edge of the sludge, there was a small strip of something that looked like a torn piece of clothing.

Was this constantly writhing sludge just a covering layer?

Realizing this, Duncan immediately reached out his hand and pointed at the writhing mass.

The many bonfires burning around the cabin instantly stretched out thin lines of flame. Streams of spirit form fire almost gathered onto that “living mud” in the blink of an eye.

The spirit form flames blazed up at once.

The fire was fierce, yet under precise control. Duncan ordered the flames to only burn away the black sludge and not harm whatever lay inside. Under his conscious pushing and control, it took only a few seconds for that disgusting writhing mass to be burned away completely.

The thing that had been buried deep under the sludge finally appeared before everyone’s eyes.

“This is…”

Morris stared at the scene in front of him in shock.

A human, a middle-aged man, leaned against a pile of wreckage and lay among the embers left behind by the spirit form flames. His eyes were wide with rage, as if in his final moments he had been fighting some fierce enemy with his life. Yet one of his hands covered his mouth in a death grip, as if he had been holding back some immense terror. His body was in a horrifying state –

More than half of his body had been dissolved by something, broken down into a structure that made one’s skin crawl.

Only one heart was left, exposed outside his open chest cavity, beating slowly yet strongly.

Thump… thump… thump…

The heartbeat, filled with some powerful will, echoed through the whole cabin.

So the heartbeat Duncan had heard on the way over had been coming from this heart.

But this human was clearly long dead. His heartbeat did not mean any life at all.

“A human?” Vanna instantly furrowed her brow again, watching the middle-aged man who had died in the deepest part of the Obsidian with great caution. “Is this also a replica created by the Obsidian?”

“His twisted, mutated body structure matches the traits of a replica, but something about it still seems off…” Morris muttered under his breath. He carefully prodded the remaining parts of the corpse’s limbs with his Gatekeeper’s cane. Studying the scattered scraps of clothing, he tried to figure out what they had looked like when intact. “These clothes… they look like a uniform.”

“It is a uniform,” Duncan suddenly said. He seemed to have noticed something. As he spoke, he bent down, ignoring the terrifying remains, and felt around near the still-beating heart. From a strip of torn cloth, he took off a small object.

It was a small metal badge.

On it were written a title and a name.

“He was the captain of the Obsidian, Cristo Barbelli,” Duncan looked at the badge and said calmly.

—

Chapter 307: The Chunk of Flesh

On the small metal badge, Cristo Barbelli's name and the title of captain of the Obsidian were stamped into the surface.

The badge made the atmosphere in the cabin turn quiet and eerie all at once. In the wide, silent space, only the thump-thump of the heart could be heard.

"His name was Cristo?" After a long time, Alice finally broke the silence. She scratched her hair, looking puzzled. "But the 'person' we saw behind that blue door also said his name was Cristo, right?"

"If this ship came from Frostholm and the Deep Sea, then everything on board could be twisted replicas. Any pile of Twisted Entities here could be Cristo, or anyone else who had been on the Obsidian at the time," Duncan said lightly, his gaze falling on the middle-aged man on the floor, who lay with his eyes wide and his hand over his mouth. "The key is this… this corpse is obviously very special."

"You suspect he is the original?" Vanna caught on quickly. She stared at Duncan in shock. "But… the whole ship is obviously a twisted copy. How could the original be here?"

"…Everything we know about Frostholm and the Deep Sea comes from Tyrian's limited memories. And even what Tyrian knew was only some early-stage information from the Abyssal Trench Project. The project never truly revealed the secrets below one thousand meters under the sea," Duncan shook his head. "We know very little about the seabed around Frostholm. Our conclusions about how these replicas work could easily be wrong. Maybe the originals are hidden inside the replica shells. Maybe every single replica is a piece cut from the original. It's even possible that beneath the Deep Sea, there is no real difference between replica and original at all."

As Vanna listened, she couldn't help glancing at Alice beside her.

But Alice didn't think about any of that. She only stared curiously at "Cristo Barbelli" on the floor. After pondering for a while, she suddenly asked: "Why is he covering his mouth?"

"People often act like that when they're afraid," Morris said casually. "Nothing strange about it."

But before he finished speaking, Duncan's voice suddenly cut in: "No, it is strange… He wasn't doing it because of fear."

Morris looked at Duncan in surprise. He saw Duncan crouch down beside the twisted, frightening corpse, even leaning close to its face as if he wanted to study something.

Thump, thump, thump.

Cristo Barbelli's heart kept beating. As Duncan leaned closer, it seemed to beat even faster and stronger than before.

Duncan noticed the change in the heart, but most of his attention stayed on the captain's face. After studying it carefully, he suddenly found something.

"There's something in his mouth."

"There's something in his mouth?" Morris was startled. Then he saw Duncan reach out, trying to pry the corpse's hand away from its mouth.

The resistance in that hand surprised Duncan.

The corpse was still covering its own mouth with all its strength, as if even after so many years of death, it was still consciously resisting something.

Duncan did not use much force at first, and he actually failed to pull the hand away. He knew that if he really tried, he could easily crush the will of the dead. But before he used more force, a thought came to him and he suddenly stopped.

“Mr. Barbelli, if you were guarding some secret, you can let go now,” Duncan looked into those wide, furious eyes and spoke in a calm voice. “You can leave what comes next to me.”

The hand loosened.

Underneath was a mouth with clenched teeth – but a second later, those jaws relaxed too.

Vanna and Morris exchanged shocked looks. Then they saw Duncan reach out again and feel around inside Cristo’s slightly open mouth.

A soft and slightly disgusting sensation met his hand. Duncan frowned, pushed down the discomfort in his heart, and pulled out the lump he had found in the dead man’s mouth.

It was a chunk only as big as a thumb, dull in color, with faint blue threads running through it. It was very soft to the touch. When Duncan squeezed it, it felt… like some kind of meat.

Meat that had been bitten off from some larger being.

“What is that?” Alice was the first to lean over in curiosity. She clung to Duncan’s arm and stared at the unmoving, blackish-blue chunk of flesh in his hand. Then her face twisted in disgust. “Ugh… I don’t like it…”

Duncan glanced at Alice in surprise. This doll, who was cheerful all day long, rarely showed such quick and clear disgust toward anything.

Right after Alice spoke, Vanna also frowned: “I sense a very disturbing aura from it. It reminds me of certain corruptions that float up from the deep layers of the world into the Mortal Realm.”

“My instincts tell me it’s best not to stare at it too long,” Morris added quickly. “This is probably a warning from the God of Wisdom. Don’t you feel anything when you hold it?”

“Feel? No,” Duncan squeezed the flesh in his hand. “The texture is a bit gross, but I don’t feel the kind of extreme reaction you’re describing.”

“Oh, that’s normal. Your rank is different from ours,” Morris said, not surprised at all. Then he went on: “But one thing is certain. What you’re holding definitely doesn’t belong in the Mortal Realm. It should be the most important clue on this ghost ship…”

He stopped halfway through his sentence.

Because everyone heard it: the beating of that heart in the air was fading fast.

Duncan lowered his head and looked into Cristo’s chest, which had been opened by corrosion and distortion. The heart that had been beating so strongly just moments before was now turning gray-white. In a few seconds, its thumping weakened almost to nothing. Then, under his gaze, the heart suddenly burst into flame and turned to ash in the blink of an eye.

At the same time, a low, hoarse voice that sounded strangely familiar rang in everyone’s ears. The voice had no clear source. It sounded almost like the whole ship was sighing: “Ah, so that’s how it was…”

Vanna reacted first: “It’s the voice from behind the blue door!”

Duncan looked down at the remains on the floor and saw the “captain Cristo” melting like wax. The corpse, which should have been washed away by the sea six years ago, seemed to be making up for those lost years of decay all at once, turning into jagged bone fragments almost in an instant.

He made his decision at once and turned back the way they had come: “We’re going back the way we came.”

Their speed on the way back was much faster than when they had been exploring.

The group moved quickly through the wide, dead, eerie cabin, back through the twisted sloping passage. It didn’t take long for them to return to the “captain’s room” with the blue door.

The door was half open. Behind it, the living tissue that called itself “Cristo Barbelli” still clung quietly to the wooden boards.

Vanna stepped forward. Almost at once, the mass of tissue seemed to sense the movement around it. Its surface began to writhe as it spoke in a hoarse, low voice: “Ah, you are back.”

“…Captain Cristo,” Vanna steadied herself and tried to keep her voice calm. “We have a few things…”

But before she could finish, “Cristo” cut her off: “I already know, lady – I remembered.”

Even though she had a faint guess in her heart, Vanna still couldn’t help asking: “You… remembered?”

“If you mean my own death, then yes, I remembered, though only part of it,” Cristo said in a low voice. “I died, didn’t I? Of course I died… The Obsidian has sunk. We met a storm and icebergs. We went down, kept sinking into endless darkness. There was no way I survived.”

Duncan stayed quiet for a few seconds, then suddenly stepped forward: “Do you know what happened in the depths of this ship?”

“The depths?” Cristo’s voice sounded puzzled.

“Do you remember the details of your death?” Duncan asked again. “Did you fight something? After you sank into the Deep Sea, did anything else happen on the ship?”

Cristo fell silent, as if deep in thought. After a moment, the living tissue spoke again with a hint of regret: “Sorry, I don’t remember those details. I only remember… the ship was sinking, sinking all the time. It was a very, very long process. Everyone died. I should have died too, but I kept drifting in the dark. It was cold around me and very dim. It felt like I was looking for something in the dark. I don’t know how long that confusion lasted – and when I had memories again, I was already knocking on this door.”

Duncan exchanged a look with the others.

“Captain Cristo” had no reason to lie.

This captain had only realized that he was already dead. He did not remember what had happened in the deepest parts of the Obsidian. He didn’t know that “another him” had died in the eerie space at the bottom of the ship, and he knew nothing about the chunk of mysterious flesh.

The trail seemed to have broken.

But Duncan lowered his head and looked at his palm – the dark chunk of flesh still lay quietly there.

He had already gained something very important.

Chapter 308: Dog’s Fierce Reaction

Inside the room with the blue door, Duncan and the others stayed silent. The twisted mass of living tissue stuck to the door panel also stayed silent for a long time.

After an unknown stretch of time, Duncan finally broke the silence: “Is there anything else you need us to do for you?”

“I do not think I have any regrets,” Cristo’s voice came from the door. “I cannot think of anything to ask for either. Good Samaritan, what could you do for a restless soul who has been dead for so many years?”

“What about your family?” Vanna could not help asking.

“Family…” Cristo clearly hesitated, as if some memories had only just appeared inside this twisted ‘body’. “Oh, right, my family… my wife and daughter. They live in Frostholm, at the end of Hearth Street…”

Cristo mumbled softly, his voice growing lower and lower, as if he was about to fall asleep. But all of a sudden he woke up again, and his voice became a little clearer: “Ah… if you ever get the chance, go and see them for me. Carry a message back. Even though they should already know what happened to the Obsidian.”

“Is there anything special you want us to tell them?” Vanna asked.

This time, Cristo thought for a long time. Just when Vanna thought he was going to fall asleep again, the squirming mass of flesh suddenly spoke: “I cannot think of anything. I cannot even remember what they look like anymore… Just tell them good morning for me. Tell them I left with no real regrets and not much pain. That is all."

"We will pass it on, if they are still at that address," Duncan said with a light nod. At the same time, his gaze fell on Cristo's body – that faintly writhing, swelling mass of flesh.

It was not an illusion. The living tissue was slowly losing its vitality. Cristo's mind seemed to be leaving this body bit by bit, and a thin layer of dull gray was spreading along the edges of the mass.

All these changes were probably related to that heart deep inside the Obsidian that had stopped beating.

It was time to leave.

"We should go," Duncan said calmly.

"It is about that time…" Cristo's voice became lower and more blurred, but it was still clear enough to hear. "Then I wish you a smooth voyage ahead. Just leave me here. A captain should stay with his ship."

"…In fact, we are going to sink this ship before we leave," Duncan hesitated for two or three seconds, then still chose to tell him what would happen next. "Captain Cristo, you can probably guess. The Obsidian has already been corrupted. We cannot let this ship keep drifting on the Boundless Sea. It is a threat to ordinary sailors."

Cristo stayed silent for a moment, then spoke softly: "Thank you, Good Samaritan."

Duncan watched this captain for a few seconds and nodded quietly, ready to turn and leave.

But just as he was about to step past the door, Cristo's voice suddenly sounded in his ear again: "Among you… is there a believer of Death God

Bartok?”

“…I am sorry, no,” Vanna shook her head. “Why do you ask?”

“Ah, I was only hoping that a believer of Death God Bartok could help me with a soul-sending prayer,” Cristo said. “After everything that has happened, my soul is no longer clean. I doubt I can pass through Bartok’s gate of life and death. If there was a soul-sending prayer, maybe my soul could disperse a bit faster… But if not, then forget it. Life rarely goes the way we want, does it?”

Vanna and Morris instinctively glanced at each other. After a brief pause, Morris spoke: “We are clerics of the Storm Goddess and the God of Wisdom. We will pray for you after we leave – though for a believer of Death God Bartok, it may not have much effect.”

“I do not know much about Death God Bartok,” Duncan said as he stepped forward and took the hand stuck to the door panel. “But if this is a dying believer’s greatest wish… then I hope you get what you wish for.”

“…Thank you, Good Samaritan.”

No more sound came from the squirming mass of flesh. Its movements grew slower and slower. The gray of death had spread across it. He was not completely dead yet, but his last bit of life was no longer enough to support a conversation.

Duncan nodded silently to the captain of the Obsidian, then stepped through the door.

They left the Obsidian’s captain’s cabin, passed through the twisted, upside-down corridor, went through the three nested doors, and returned to the deck of the ghost ship.

The sun was already leaning toward the west.

With a heavy beat of wings, the undead bird wrapped in blazing flame flew over from the direction of the Vanished and circled above Duncan and the others.

Pale green fire rose from the Obsidian, then turned into a falling star and flew back to the nearby Vanished.

A moment later, the Vanished slowly adjusted her position. The gunport shutters on one side of the hull all lifted, and one dark cannon muzzle after another slid out through the firing slits.

The cannons roared. Fiery meteors fell like rain. In the ever-tilting sunset, now faintly the color of blood, the Obsidian was wrapped in raging green ghost-flame almost in the blink of an eye. In a series of spectacular bursts of fire and explosions, she took on water, broke apart, and sank.

The ghost ship that had been completely corrupted by extraordinary power sank into the Deep Sea in a very short time, leaving only a few swirling whirlpools on the surface.

At the edge of the Vanished's deck, Duncan faced the sunset and fixed his gaze on the place where the Obsidian was going down, watching the ghost ship until her very last moment.

Only after she had fully vanished beneath the waves did he pull back his gaze and look at Vanna and Morris, who were standing behind him.

"Sailing long-distance on the Boundless Sea is one of the most dangerous jobs in this world, and deep-sea captains are in the most dangerous position of all," Morris said with a hint of emotion. "More than half of all deep-sea captains meet bad ends. Even those who manage to retire alive and settle on land rarely blend into the life of ordinary people. Most of them suffer under the curse and mental anomalies. Hallucinations of sound and sight and even broken memories haunt them all their lives. My daughter Heidi… deals with things like that all the time."

Duncan did not respond to the old scholar's sigh.

After all, from the view of ordinary people, this ship, the Vanished, and he himself, 'Captain Duncan'… were also examples of those who did not meet a good end.

His 'bad end', though, was a bit more intense than most.

"How are Shirley and Dog?" Duncan suddenly asked.

"I just went to see them," Alice raised her hand at once. "Dog said he is fine now. He is studying Nina's primary school textbooks. Shirley said Dog needs someone to look after him, so she is napping beside Dog."

"…A Abyssal Hound chasing knowledge and his illiterate master," Duncan's mouth twitched as he started toward the cabins. "I will go check on them."

He went straight to the cabin that Shirley and Dog shared and knocked on the door, only to find it was only resting against the frame. He pushed it open and saw a certain dog sitting on his hind legs at the desk, holding a little primary school vocabulary book between his front paws and reading it with great interest.

And on the bed behind the dog, Shirley the illiterate was sleeping like a log.

Duncan's mouth twitched again. He had already heard Alice describe this, but actually seeing such a strange scene still felt uncanny. Dog heard the sound at the door, looked up, and said: "Oh, Captain, you… ah, crap!!!"

He did not even finish his greeting before the Abyssal Hound suddenly let out a cracked, metallic scream. Then the whole dog shot up from the chair with a bang, almost jumping to the ceiling.

There was another loud crash as the black chain linking Dog and Shirley snapped tight. Shirley, who had been sleeping soundly on the bed, was dragged into the air and slammed hard into the nearby wall with a heavy thud.

“Dog, are you crazy?!” Shirley, knocked dizzy, bounced to her feet as soon as she hit the floor and lunged at Dog. “What are you doing, suddenly…”

She finally noticed Duncan standing at the door, and also saw Dog’s terrified look.

“Dog, are you okay?”

Shirley and Duncan spoke almost at the same time.

“I am fine, I am fine… no, no, I am not fine…” Dog still had not fully recovered. He was trembling all over, his eyes darting around. He seemed to want to look in Duncan’s direction, but his instincts made him avoid it. After holding it in for a long time, he finally squeezed out: “Captain, are you carrying something… in your left pocket…”

“Something?” Duncan froze, then reacted. He reached into his left pocket and took out a small metal case that he had once used to hold tobacco.

He opened the metal case. Inside lay a thumb-sized, dark, strange piece of “flesh”.

“I-I-I… what the…!” Dog became even more nervous the instant he saw that thing. He shot into the corner of the room in one bound. “W-w-where did that… come from?!”

“From the deepest part of the Obsidian,” Duncan said with a frown. “Why are you reacting like this? From this thing you…”

“The Abyssal Lord! The Abyssal Lord’s presence!” Dog was shaking so hard he might as well have been set to vibrate. “This is the Abyssal Lord’s flesh and blood!”

Chapter 309: Dog’s rotten Luck

This time Duncan really stayed stunned for several seconds before he understood what Dog meant – not because he did not understand the words, but because he needed a moment to digest this shocking fact.

“Are you sure?” He picked up the little gray-black chunk of flesh with faint blue in it from the metal case and squeezed it between his fingers. “This thing is a part of the Abyssal Lord?”

“You… you are still squeezing it?!” Dog’s voice went sharp as he watched Duncan’s far-too-relaxed actions. “Do you not feel the vast pressure and power coming off it at all?”

“No,” Duncan shook his head, then added, “And it is not just me. Vanna and Morris did not react much either. They only felt that it was dangerous or unsettling, but nothing like what you are doing.”

As Duncan spoke, Dog had already crouched low to the floor without noticing. He lay beside the desk in a pose of total alertness. The blood-red glow in his eyes flickered brighter and dimmer. After a long time, he muttered: “It does seem to have lost its vitality… or maybe you are suppressing its vitality, but I cannot tell. I am a Abyssal demon. I have an inseparable link with the Abyssal Lord. In my eyes… there is only endless shadow and pressure.”

“It is probably related to your nature,” Duncan said as he snapped the tobacco case shut and casually put it back into his pocket. He noticed Dog relax a lot as he did. “I will put it away first. You might feel a bit better that way.”

“Th-thank you, Captain,” Dog finally stopped shaking quite so hard. He wobbled to his feet but still looked badly shaken, his eyes fixed on Duncan’s pocket. “You just said… that flesh was brought out from the deepest part of the Obsidian?”

“Yes. And it came from the mouth of a mortal,” Duncan said with a soft sigh. He told them what had happened after Dog and Shirley were sent back to the Vanished. “We found this sample of flesh in Cristo Barbelli’s mouth.”

After hearing the full story, Dog’s shock was written all over his face.

He lifted his head and met Shirley’s eyes. For half a minute, neither of them spoke. After who knew how long, Shirley finally smacked her lips and broke the silence: “So you are saying… that captain named Cristo… bit off a piece of flesh from a deity before he died… By the way, does the Abyssal Lord count as a deity?”

“For mortals, there is no difference. ‘Like a deity’ is a very broad concept,” Dog said slowly, his tone serious, shaking his head. “I… still cannot believe it. I cannot imagine how he did it. Mortals in front of the Abyssal Lord do not even have the strength to move a finger, let alone fight back or resist… And besides, how did he even see the Abyssal Lord?”

“Did the Obsidian once enter the Abyssal Deep’s Deep Sea?” Duncan frowned at once. “After she sank off Frostholm’s coast, she did not simply keep sinking in the Mortal Realm’s Deep Sea, but was teleported away? Or… is the Deep Sea beneath Frostholm actually connected to the realm of the Abyssal demons?”

“I do not think that is possible,” Dog said at once, shaking his head hard. “I have never heard of any place in the Abyssal Deep’s Deep Sea being directly linked to the Mortal Realm's dimension. If there really was a leak between those two places, in six years the city-state of Frostholm would already have been torn apart by the demons pouring out. The Obsidian sank six years ago."

Duncan thought for a moment.

But he had far too little information now. No matter how much he tried to reason it out, it was hard to find a convincing explanation.

Only one thing was certain: the piece of "flesh" brought out from the Obsidian was quite dangerous. It was best not to take it out casually.

Of course, he had thought about burning it at once or loading it into the Vanished's main gun and firing it into the distance. From the feedback he felt when he touched the flesh, Duncan believed this thing could also be used as "extraordinary firewood" and burned up by spirit flame. But after a short weighing of the options, he still decided to keep it for now.

In case it turned out to be useful one day.

As he thought, Duncan's attention returned to Dog.

The Abyssal Hound had calmed down a bit. He was now purposely not thinking about the "Lord's flesh". He already looked much better.

"Are the other Abyssal demons like you?" Duncan asked.

"Huh?" Dog did not react at first. "You mean…"

"Abyssal demons all come from the 'Lord'. You told me before that powerful Abyssal demons even live right beside the Lord," Duncan said, his gaze resting on the blood-red eyes in Dog's sockets. "But you react like this when you get close to the Abyssal Lord's presence. Then how do you all usually live beside the Lord? Do you just shake like that every day?"

Dog froze. He clearly had not expected the captain's imagination to jump that far, or in such detail. But after a brief silence, he still shook his head and admitted: "Normal Abyssal demons… would not react like I do."

"Oh?"

"Sanity is the precondition of madness," Dog sighed. "Only those with wisdom understand fear. Only those with humanity can tell human from beast. I turned away from the 'path' of normal Abyssal demons, so I lost the right to stay near the Abyssal Lord."

Shirley blinked, then suddenly realized something: "Dog, did you just say something really deep and meaningful?!"

"Sanity is the precondition of madness…" Duncan ignored Shirley's loud exclamation and only repeated the words under his breath, thoughtful. "So now you cannot return to your 'homeland', but you also cannot cut off your link to the Abyssal Lord. You can no longer get close to the Lord's presence, yet you are extremely sensitive to that presence?"

Dog hugged his head and sighed: "…That is about right."

"Then you really are unlucky."

Dog sounded close to tears: "Under normal circumstances, no one would suddenly wave a piece of the Lord's flesh in front of me and squeeze it, okay… This is supposed to be the safe, stable Mortal Realm dimension!"

"That really was my mistake," Duncan said, apologizing with genuine sincerity. "I did not think of it before."

"No, no, no, please do not apologize to me!" Dog was startled and scrambled under the desk. "If you just toss out an apology, Subspace might latch onto me again…"

“…All right,” Duncan said, stunned for a moment before a strange smile came to his face. He shook his head and turned to leave. “Then I will not bother you. Keep reading.”

Shirley hurried to her feet to see him out, but Duncan suddenly stopped again and turned back to look at her.

“You should learn from Dog. He can already read primary school stories. You still spell your own name wrong three times out of five. Do you not feel embarrassed?”

Shirley answered without shame: “Dog is a demon who chases knowledge. Of course he learns fast! How can I compare to him?”

“First, that is not how you use the phrase ‘chases knowledge’. Second, even if Dog is a demon who chases knowledge, you do not have to walk in circles around knowledge all day,” Duncan said, sounding a bit helpless. “In a few days I have to arrange an exam for you two. I want to see how much you have actually learned.”

After leaving those words, he turned and walked out of the room, closing the door behind him.

After he waited at the door for a few seconds, Shirley’s wail of despair and string of curses rang out, just as he had expected.

A cheerful smile appeared on Duncan’s face.

He set off toward the captain’s cabin.

…

Night grew deeper.

In the Sea Mist Fleet’s home port – sealed and hidden by fog, drifting ice, and strange, chaotic currents – Tyrian walked slowly along a small road by the edge of the docks.

The cold night wind blew in from the sea. The sound of waves breaking on the shore rose and fell. The cold, dim glow of the World's Wound soaked the whole island, and from somewhere far off in the air came the faint roar of a noisy gathering in the harbor square.

The sailors were holding a party. They used wine, tobacco, and loud instruments to drive away the hollowness left in the world by the dead, and they used a whole night of noise to burn off their cold, endless energy. But for Tyrian, such gatherings were still too noisy.

They were not good for calm thinking.

Another set of footsteps followed behind him.

It was his loyal first mate, Aiden. Right now, he still smelled like a strip of bacon, but now there were hints of cinnamon and clove mixed in.

The smell made Tyrian sigh to himself. People from Pland really had a lot of tricks when it came to tobacco.

"You can go join the party in the square," Tyrian said suddenly. "You do not have to walk with me in this quiet place."

"I am waiting for the second half of the night," Aiden said. "They invited twelve Bardica dancers from Cold Harbor – they have real stamina."

"…"

"Captain?"

"In weather this cold, they are coming to dance on an island full of Living dead pirates, and in the middle of the night, no less. Be honest. What kind of damned price did you people offer them?"

"Actually, not that much," Aiden said, rubbing his shiny bald head with a grin. "When the Sea Crow went out on business last week, she happened to rescue the ship of ‘Scimitar Martin’. You know, Martin controls a quarter of the theaters and troupes in Cold Harbor…”

Tyrian: “…”

The commander of the Sea Mist Fleet stood in the night wind for a few seconds in silence, pinched the bridge of his nose, and then let his expression return to normal.

“Let us talk about the situation on Dagger Island instead.”

“Yes, Captain.”

Chapter 310: Pirate Island Under the veil of night

Ever since the eighth “No. 3 Submersible” was salvaged in the waters near Frostholm and brought to the nearby Dagger Island, The authority of the city-state had turned that island into a military restricted zone. The two nearby stretches of The route were no longer open to civilian traffic.

This, of course, stirred up all kinds of guesses. It was not only the locals of Frostholm who were speculating. Shipowners who had been forced away from Dagger Island, and the pirates and explorers nearby, were guessing too. They wondered what had happened on that island and what secret Frostholm’s authority was hiding there.

Many of the rumors even sounded detailed and serious, ranging from “researching a new type of weapon” to “holding a dangerous ritual” and so on—yet none of them were reliable.

There were not many people left in the world who still knew about the Abyssal Trench Project.

“It is getting harder and harder for our people to gather information on Dagger Island,” Aiden said with a serious face. The two of them were walking along a path at the edge of the harbor district. He turned to Tyrian as he spoke. “They have changed the level of blockade on that island. They are watching every inch of the shoreline now. It is no longer possible to get close by diving.

“As for the informants and inside men we bought or controlled, they have all been transferred away from key posts recently. They have not been exposed, but now all supplies and personnel movements for Dagger Island are handled entirely within a special list under The authority. We cannot get our hands into it anymore.”

“So it has become a full military forbidden zone…” Tyrian stopped walking. “Did they find something on that ‘No. 3 Submersible’? Or did they already open the hatch?”

“Hard to say.” Aiden shook his head. “The last time we managed to get information from the island, we saw an order issued by Frostholm’s authority. The order clearly stated that the hatch of the submersible was not to be opened, and any samples scraped from its outer hull had to be thrown into the incinerator after research.

“From that order, at least, we can see that the Governor of the city-state is still being cautious. But that was already several days ago. No one knows if anything has changed by now.”

“If they cannot reach a firm conclusion for a long time, and then a few dangerous, strange lab accidents happen, the wisest thing Frostholm’s authority could do would be to throw the submersible straight into the Crucible and stop all research. That is what we did back then.” Tyrian frowned. “But they are still locking down Dagger Island… That means they must be trying to dig some secret out of that submersible.”

“In theory, the higher-ups in Frostholm should know about the old Abyssal Trench Project. At the very least they should know how dangerous and terrifying the Deep Sea is.”

“Knowing is one thing. Understanding is another.” Tyrian shook his head. “Later generations can hear the stories of their elders from books and from word of mouth, but unless they go through it themselves, it is very hard for them to imagine that kind of fear and helplessness.

“When facing an supernatural runaway state, humans’ greatest strength is that we can ‘forget’. Our greatest weakness is also that we can forget.”

Aiden glanced at his captain. After more than ten seconds of silence, he finally spoke: “Captain, should we take some more… active measures?”

“More active measures?”

“Make contact with Frostholm’s authority and warn them, or, to be more direct… have the fleet strike Dagger Island and seize that ‘No. 3 Submersible’ for ourselves,” Aiden said plainly. “With the current garrison on Dagger Island, they should not be able to withstand a strong assault from the Sea Mist Fleet.”

He paused for a moment, then added: “Otherwise, if we let those people who know nothing hammer away at a twisted replicant that floated up from the Deep Sea, who knows when they will cause a huge disaster. It is hard to feel at ease.”

Tyrian fell into a short silence.

A moment later, he shook his head. “Even if we launch a successful surprise attack on Dagger Island, can you be sure we will find the No. 3 Submersible before Frostholm’s main forces react? That island is not small. If we take too long searching, we will have to face a City Navy several times our size.

“The Sea Mist is strong, but it is not invincible. Besides…”

He trailed off. In his mind, the face of Frostholm’s Queen appeared.

The next second, Tyrian forced himself to stop his wandering thoughts—he almost let another face, identical to the Queen’s, rise up in his mind.

“It is nothing,” he said, shaking his head. “I still need to think this through.”

“Then you should make up your mind soon.” Aiden nodded. Just then, a peal of bells rang from the direction of the harbor square. The First Mate looked up toward the sound. “Ah, it’s past midnight… Captain, why don’t you go to the square and join the fun? Adjusting your mood might help you make your decision.”

“I will pass,” Tyrian refused at once, shaking his head. “I am not interested.”

“It would be good to show your face once in a while.” Aiden egged him on with some enthusiasm. “You do not get to see Badica dancers every day—their dancing is more graceful and lively than a blacktail cliff swallow crossing a storm…”

“That is exactly what I am not interested in.” Tyrian spread his hands helplessly. “And honestly, if I showed up at the gathering as the captain, would the sailors really still be able to let loose?”

“Sure they would. Why wouldn’t they?” Aiden said casually. “You know how thick their faces are—hard as iron, and they grow back after you hit them…”

Tyrian: “…”

In the end, Aiden still failed to persuade his stubborn captain. He went alone to the harbor square to join the night’s celebrations.

After midnight, Pirate Island was still boiling with noise.

The sleepless, tireless Undying had endless energy, and there were no curfew rules on this island that had been reshaped and shrouded by supernatural power. Their celebrations could last an entire day, from sunrise to sunset, and from sunset back to sunrise again.

The high platform at one side of the square had already been turned into a stage.

Temporary wooden walls blocked the cold wind from the sea, and the braziers burning around the stage pushed back the chill of the winter night —Undying no longer feared heat and cold, but the human guests who had come to Pirate Island tonight still needed careful protection.

Young maidens from Cold Harbor were dancing passionately between the bonfires and the cold wind.

Their skirts flew, the dancers spun, the bonfires snapped and leaped in the darkness, and the sound of waves rolled on ceaselessly in the distance. The terrifying Undying were roaring beneath the stage. On mist-shrouded Pirate Island, a rare, noisy veil of night had fallen over the world.

Tyrian stopped in an inconspicuous corner at the edge of the square and looked toward the stage.

He had not come to join the gathering. He was on his way back to his quarters and was only passing by.

The weekly seafarer gathering was a “custom” that had existed back when they were still part of Frostholm’s navy. Even after leaving Frostholm, this habit had been kept within the Sea Mist Fleet.

Half a century had passed. Many things had changed, and many things had not.

Watching his old subordinates making a racket in the square, Tyrian slowly showed a faint smile. Then, all of a sudden, that smile faded a little.

He looked at the stage, at the dancers upon it. Their movements were passionate, their jumps were like startled birds, but their eyes were slightly dull and numb.

They had probably drunk in advance a potion brewed from several herbs and a small amount of supernatural catalyst. It was not a rare thing.

The potion's power could let them resist the cold to a certain extent, but it also affected their awareness and thoughts.

It could keep them from feeling fear, leaving only the instinct of dance in their minds for a time.

Clearly, the masters of these dancers did not want their tools to ruin their peaceful business relations with Frost Sea's pirate leader because they were afraid.

Tyrian clicked his tongue.

This was actually very common. Anyone who dared to do business among pirates and even sent people onto Pirate Island used similar tricks. After all, the Church and The authority would not get involved in their gray trade. Ordinary people had no choice but to come up with "home remedies" to fight the shadows and horrors on the Boundless Sea.

The life of pirates and "risk-taking speculators" had never been like in adventure tales, where horror was full of romance.

In a way, forcing the dancers to drink the potion was also a kind of protection for them.

Tyrian just felt it spoiled the mood—he had thought that "Cutlass Martin" would have improved after so many years, but it turned out the man was still running his "Frost Sea entertainment business" with the same old tricks from ten years ago.

He shook his head and was about to leave.

Just as he was turning away, a faint crackling of flames suddenly reached his ears.

That strange yet familiar sound of fire made Tyrian’s heart tighten at once. He almost lost his footing. Then he stared hard toward where the sound had come from.

Pale green flames were jumping on a nearby wall covered in ice. As the light spread, the ice in the middle turned black, as dark as the veil of night, and a tall, imposing figure stepped out from within it.

“Good evening, Tyrian,” the figure said. “I hope I am not disturbing your rest.”

Tyrian stared at the figure in the ice for a long moment before he finally managed to keep his expression under control and answer the greeting: “Goo… good evening, Father. Why did you suddenly…”

“There are some things I want to discuss with you, and I also wanted to see how you have been lately,” Duncan said offhandedly. “What are you doing?”

As he spoke, he raised his head. His gaze passed over Tyrian’s shoulder and landed on the distant stage.

On the young maidens who were still wearing thin dresses in the cold wind.

“…Impressive.”

“It is not what you think!”

Chapter 311: Intelligence Exchange

An old father, worried about his children's daily life, came by to see what his son was doing at home.

His son, at half past midnight, on a frozen island base in the middle of the sea, had set up a stage so he could watch a dozen young ladies dance belly dances.

The old father suffered a mental shock.

For a moment, Tyrian was completely stunned. To be honest, his feeling of horror right now, and the waves crashing through his mind, even surpassed what he had felt a few days ago when he heard that another "No. 3 Submersible" had appeared near Frostholm.

The pirate captain, famous all across the Frost Sea, stiffly shuffled a step to the side, even trying to use this clumsy method to block Duncan's line of sight. But then another nearby ice-covered wall lit up at once, and Father simply stepped over into that mirror surface, still looking toward the stage.

"Aren't they cold?"

Tyrian answered without thinking: "…They are, but they can endure it with a special alchemical draught…"

"Tyrian." Duncan turned his eyes back, looking at Tyrian, who was now frozen in place like an ice sculpture. "Do not be so tense. You have long been an adult. You are free to have any daily hobby you like. It is just that…

this hobby is a bit beyond what I expected. Does your younger sister know?”

“It is not what you think!” Tyrian could not help shouting again—this time his voice held more helplessness, even a touch of despair. “And please do not mention this to her! If you ever get a chance to contact her in the future…”

“Oh, so she does not know.” Duncan nodded. “Indeed, it is better not to let Lucretia know about this sort of thing.”

Tyrian: “What do I have to say for you to…”

Duncan laughed.

Of course he could see the expression on Tyrian’s face and had heard what Tyrian had just cried out. He simply found it amusing—being able to see this kind of reaction on the Frost Sea’s number one pirate lord was not easy. It would be a real shame to miss such a fine scene.

The moment he saw Duncan smiling, Tyrian understood.

First, he was startled.

Father was teasing him. It was a slightly mean, yet long-lost kind of joke.

Next, he forced his shocked expression away and made his face serious again—just as if his previous loss of composure had never happened.

“If you have watched enough, then let us talk business,” the pirate lord sighed, sounding rather helpless. “I do not believe you came to see me in the middle of the night only to play this kind of joke.”

“I ran into a ship.” Duncan dropped the smile as well and spoke directly. “The Obsidian. Do you remember that name?”

“The Obsidian?” Tyrian frowned, first thinking over the well-known ships on the various routes and finding nothing, but then his expression changed. “You mean the Obsidian? I only know of one Obsidian, and it should have sunk already…”

Just as Duncan had expected.

No one knew the ships in this cold sea better than a pirate lord who had ruled the northern region for half a century. And if it was a vessel that had sunk in a sea disaster, it would leave an even deeper mark in Tyrian’s mind.

Because a ship lost to a sea disaster was seen as the worst of omens on the Boundless Sea. Captains could ignore other ships if they wished, but they would still go and find out the names of the ships that had sunk, what cargo they had carried, what they had done, and where they had gone.

“That is the one—the wreck that sank six years ago,” Duncan said with a nod. “It has appeared on the surface again, completely turned into an uncanny thing. Its cabins are twisted and jumbled together. There is living mud spread all over it, and… a ‘captain’ who is human and yet not human.”

When Duncan finished, Tyrian’s eyes had already opened wide. After a short moment of thought, the pirate lord’s face grew full of shock and solemnity.

He did not question it, because he knew his Father would not lie to him at a time like this or about a matter like this—Duncan would not do something so pointless.

Even so, it was still hard to believe. What he was hearing had gone far beyond what he had imagined.

“Does it sound familiar?” Duncan’s voice came from the ice, wrapped in the cold of the Frost Sea itself. “It is a bit like the situation with the ‘No. 3

Submersible’, only worse. That is a replica that returned from the Deep Sea. Not only the people inside, but the ship itself has been twisted.

“You took part in the Abyssal Trench Project. I want to hear your judgment.”

“My judgment…” Tyrian opened his mouth, then suddenly realized something else. “Wait. Where did you encounter that ship?!”

He suddenly remembered that the Obsidian had sunk near Frostholm. In theory, its replica should also surface in the waters around Frostholm. How did Father end up running into that ship?!

Duncan smiled faintly in the ice.

“Are you standing somewhere high enough?”

“High enough?” Tyrian looked around, confused. “The ground is fairly high here. The harbor district as a whole is on high ground…”

“Do you have any buildings blocking your view to the southwest?”

“No.”

“Good. Look in that direction and wait a bit.”

Tyrian instinctively turned to look southwest.

There was a gentle slope there, tilting slightly toward the sea. Most of the main housing in the harbor district stood along that slope. At the far end lay the shoreline. A few kilometers beyond, dense mist and chaotic currents circled the secret home port.

Something flickered inside the fog.

Pale green flames rose and shone like a ghost within the mist.

Tyrian blinked.

After a while, he heard a muffled boom—distant and hazy, yet clearly not an illusion.

That was the sound of old muzzle-loading smoothbore cannons firing.

“You are in the Frost Sea…” Tyrian felt his muscles tightening. A strange cold, subtle yet all-pervasive, seemed to be slowly wrapping around him. He hesitated, then turned back to the ice where Duncan’s figure stood. “You… found this place?”

“It was not easy. Your island is surrounded by heavy fog and drifting ice, and there are wild currents crashing everywhere,” Duncan said with a light smile. “But the Spirit Realm is calm and has safe routes.

“Do not worry, I will not sail the Vanished right up to your island. That would make your subordinates nervous. The Vanished will hide in the mist around you.”

Tyrian thought it over and suddenly felt that this last sentence was even more chilling—that was worse than just bringing the Vanished straight into the Harbor!

But in the end he did not dare say that out loud.

He was afraid that if he did, the next day when he opened his eyes he would really see the Vanished’s flagpole planted above the harbor district.

“Your expression is tense and gloomy,” Duncan’s voice came again. “Have I brought you trouble?”

“Ah, no, that is not what I meant!” Tyrian said in a rush, forcing his face to relax. “It is just that everything is so sudden, and I am still not used to… dealing with you.”

He paused, then hurried to speak again before Duncan could answer: “Why did you suddenly come to the Frost Sea? It cannot be just to give me a ‘surprise’, can it?”

“Something happened,” Duncan nodded. “A person who should have been dead for many years suddenly wrote to me from Frostholm. That caught my attention. After I arrived here, I soon saw the Obsidian again, which confirmed my guess.

“Now I suspect that the shadows left behind by the Abyssal Trench Project are starting to stir under Frostholm.”

Abyssal Trench Project…

The muscles in Tyrian’s face twitched, and many memories rose in his heart —some from half a century ago, some from much more recent days.

The news Father had suddenly brought was like a sharp blade, cutting open a Veil that had only been lifted a little before. Tyrian suddenly realized that what was happening now was far from as simple as he had thought.

It was not just a single “No. 3 Submersible”. Not just a single Dagger Island. Beneath Frostholm and the Deep Sea… it was not only the Abyssal Trench Project that was waking up.

“Your suspicion is probably correct,” he said in a low voice, his expression complicated. “Something is really going wrong under Frostholm. The Obsidian you met is not an isolated case. Do you know? Not long ago, The authority of Frostholm salvaged something in the nearshore waters.”

There was silence from the ice for a few seconds. Then Duncan spoke: “Looking at your face, I think I can guess what it was.”

“Yes. The No. 3 Submersible. The eighth replicant.” Tyrian nodded. “It has already been taken to a barren island near Frostholm called Dagger Island. The authority has turned the whole place into a military restricted zone. They want to figure out the secrets of the replicant.

“And that is not the only news. Recently, there have been rumors all over the city-state that the dead are rising. They say the dead are tearing free from their graves, and people who died or went missing many years ago have suddenly appeared on the city streets.

“But there are opposite rumors saying those people are only ordinary residents of the city-state, and that over-strained Church Guardians are just grabbing random passersby outside of curfew hours.”

Tyrian shrugged.

“Because of the tight information blockade, it is now very hard to find out what is going on at Dagger Island. As for Frostholm itself, I do have some eyes there. According to their reports, strange things really have been happening in the city lately. There are many unfamiliar faces going in and out.

“But as for the dead truly returning to life… I do not think that is very likely.”

Chapter 312: An Invitation from the Old Father

No one understood the boundary between life and death better than Tyrian and his Undying sailors.

God of Death Bartok had a gate that anchored the line between life and death. Simply put, as long as a living soul passed through that gate, it reached the world of the dead, and that gate was one-way. In other words, as long as a soul had not passed through it, then no matter if it was a brief corpse awakening or a lasting Undying curse, it did not count as a true “return from death”.

“There are many people in the world who mix up ‘Undying’ and ‘the dead’. Some even think the former slipped through a loophole in the God of Death’s gate,” Tyrian turned his head and looked at the noisy sailors in the square as he spoke calmly. “But in fact, their souls were rejected by that gate because of corruption, so they got stuck on the boundary between life and death. If you follow the strict definitions of the Church of Death, the ‘Undying’ actually still belong to the world of the living.”

Duncan did not speak for a moment. Instead, he recalled his experience in that graveyard.

He had awoken in a coffin and been called a “Restless One” by the graveyard warden. A group of Annihilators had come to steal the corpse, and they had seemed sure that the body would act strangely. Then the shell had suddenly collapsed on its own, as if it had “reached some limit”…

“Frostholm might not have seen a true resurrection of the dead, but people most likely did see the dead walking in the city,” Duncan said slowly after a moment of thought. “It is very likely that a group of Annihilators were behind these events. We just do not know how deeply they have infiltrated the place, or what they are trying to do.”

“Annihilators?” Tyrian was startled. He had not expected this matter to suddenly connect back to cultists again. “How are you sure it is related to them?”

“They once tried to take a corpse from the city-state’s graveyard,” Duncan said. “They looked well prepared, and they had even expected in advance that the body would move—although the final situation turned out to be a little different from what they expected.”

Tyrian listened in a daze. Then he looked suspiciously at his Father: “How… do you know all this? And in such detail…”

“That corpse was me.”

Tyrian: “…What?”

“Just an evening walk. I happened to run into some corpse thieves,” Duncan did not explain in detail. “That is not important. What matters is whether these so?called ‘return of the dead’ incidents are again related to that Deep Sea under Frostholm.”

“The return of the dead and the Deep Sea?” Tyrian frowned. He had never linked these two things before, and now that Father suddenly brought it up, he could not help feeling puzzled. “Why do you say that? Between these two things…”

“It is simple. The body I was ‘temporarily using’ showed a strange collapse at the end,” Duncan said. “During that collapse, its state was very similar to the ‘replicas’ you described from the Abyssal Trench Project.”

“The state during the collapse?” Tyrian sounded shocked, then confused. “But… the replicas from the Abyssal Trench Project came from the seabed more than a thousand meters down. How could the dead in the city-state have anything to do with that place…”

He stopped. His expression grew complicated and heavy. After a moment he finally looked up: “Could it be that this ‘copying’ power has already spread inside the city-state, and the cultists you mentioned are the ones pushing it? But the Annihilators should have nothing to do with the Deep Sea…”

While Tyrian muttered to himself, Duncan suddenly thought of another thing.

In the deepest part of the Obsidian, inside “Captain Cristo’s” mouth, there had been that small piece of flesh that carried the aura of the Abyssal Lord.

If that ghost ship really came from the Deep Sea beneath Frostholm, and if that Captain Cristo—whether he was a replica or the original body—had truly come into contact with the Abyssal Lord… then the Annihilators in the city-state were connected to the Deep Sea.

Tyrian looked curiously at the figure in the ice: “Father, what are you thinking about?”

“How much do you know about the Abyssal Lord? And about the Annihilators?” Duncan suddenly raised his head and asked. “How much contact have you had with them?”

“Not much contact at all,” Tyrian said. “The Annihilators are not as elusive as the Enders, but they also act low?key and move in secret. They are obsessed with studying knowledge about demons and ‘purifying’ themselves through that knowledge. They normally do not get involved with outsiders.”

Tyrian shook his head, then went on: “As for the Abyssal Lord… I have heard that His rank is equal to that of a deity, but He does not have a deity’s divine authority. In the few records that describe Him, He is a huge mass of flesh, crawling at the deepest part of the Abyssal Deep. With countless tentacles, He guards a great rift that leads to Subspace. But some say He is actually stuck in that rift, sealed there by some great power…

“Information in this area is always vague and strange,” he continued. “After all, mortals in the world almost have no way to observe the Abyssal Deep directly. All research on it is based on indirect observation of its projections in the Spirit Realm, and on soul interrogation of some Annihilators.”

Speaking of this, Tyrian could not help asking, with some curiosity: “Why did you suddenly bring up the Abyssal Lord?”

“In the deepest part of the Obsidian, I found a small piece of flesh,” Duncan said. “It is very likely from the Abyssal Lord.”

Tyrian: “…What?”

The number of times he had been stunned tonight had clearly already surpassed his old Father’s reaction earlier, when Father had seen twelve Badika dancers performing on the stage.

“I know you do not believe it, but it is true,” Duncan said. He could easily see the disbelief on Tyrian’s face. “I have a Abyssal demon with me. It can help identify it.”

Tyrian still sounded a bit dazed: “A Abyssal demon? To help identify it?”

“A Abyssal Hound—you have seen it,” Duncan said offhandedly. “Though you only saw it for a moment.”

Tyrian froze, as if he remembered something, and quickly reached up to touch his forehead.

Duncan nodded: “Yes, that one.”

Tyrian no longer knew what to say.

Duncan lifted his gaze instead, looking past Tyrian’s shoulder toward the square.

After several rounds of dancing, even the dancers who had taken potions in advance should rest.

“We should end our talk,” Duncan suddenly said. “This matter seems more complicated than either of us thought. It is hard to reach any real conclusion just by talking through a sheet of ice like this.”

“You mean…”

“I will send a messenger over,” Duncan said. “The messenger will bring you to the Vanished. There, we can talk more easily, and you can see with your own eyes what I brought out from the depths of the Obsidian.”

Go aboard the Vanished?!

Even though it sounded like a calm invitation, Tyrian still could not help feeling a sudden chill and tension.

He tried hard to control the change in his expression, but the brief flicker in his eyes did not escape Duncan.

“If you do not want to, I can also come directly,” the voice in the ice said softly. “But then you will first have to prepare your subordinates.”

Tyrian’s expression grew a bit tense.

Should he go to the Vanished himself, or let the Vanished sail into the Sea Mist Fleet’s base?

Either option felt like a challenge to his life’s limits.

But after a short weighing of the choices, he made a decision with his reason.

“Send the messenger,” he said. “It will be easier if I go over there.”

Tyrian looked calmly at Father in the ice.

Reason told him that if Father had truly regained his humanity, then even the Vanished, which had returned from Subspace, was not a deadly forbidden place in theory.

What was there to stop him from going?

If he went alone, then only he needed to prepare himself mentally. But if he let the Vanished sail straight into the home port, then he would not be the only one who needed that kind of preparation.

He only had to fight back a bit of instinctive nervousness.

“That is good,” Duncan nodded, seeming quite satisfied with Tyrian’s answer. Then he stepped back half a step, and his figure quickly dimmed and blurred in the ice. “I will leave first. There are still things I need to do. I will let you know before the messenger sets out.”

Tyrian bent slightly before the ice, which was slowly returning to normal. Only when the last trace of green flame faded did he straighten up again.

Then he steadied himself and turned to walk toward the square.

In the square, the late?night noise had not yet died down. The Undying sailors were either eating and drinking heavily or laughing and talking without restraint. Some rough men near the stage were trying to whistle at the dancers on it—but because their mouths or throats leaked air, they could only make ridiculous sounds.

On the stage, the dancers had already finished their performance. Under the supervisor’s command, they stood in a row, as if waiting for the order to dismiss. The cold wind blew through the gaps between the bonfires and the windbreak boards. A few of the young women seemed to be trembling a little, and in their dull, numb eyes, a touch of lively expression slowly began to appear.

The effect of the alchemical potion was fading. Their normal feelings were about to return to their minds.

Two of the young women slowly showed a bit of curiosity on their faces, but in the eyes of most of them, fear was slowly appearing.

The whole square was full of strange?looking Undying. Even with mental preparation in advance, this was not a scene an ordinary person could easily endure.

First Mate Aiden ran out. He had been watching the stage the whole time. Now he went straight to the highest point in the square and, with his cracked voice, shouted at the still noisy sailors: “Break it up, break it up! The dancing is over! The ones who look the scariest, cover your faces. If you are missing arms or legs, crawl under the tables yourselves. The young ladies are leaving—clear the path beside the stage… Waylon! Get under a table! Just seeing your face makes me jump!”

The sailors in the square roared in response. Those who needed to cover their faces covered their faces, and those who needed to hide hid. They bustled about, noisy and laughing. On the stage, the dancers’ supervisor at first looked a little at a loss at the scene. Then she reacted, gave Aiden a hasty and awkward bow, and quickly led the girls down from the stage.

The girls whose faces showed tension and fear tried hard to hide behind the others as they hurried toward the temporary quarters arranged for them.

Two very bold young ladies even stopped on purpose, blinking as they looked curiously at the Undying in the square.

One girl, passing by Aiden, tilted her head up and said something to him with a bright smile. The First Mate instantly became completely embarrassed and almost fell off the platform.

The dancers from Cold Harbor left the stage.

Aiden finally noticed Tyrian, who had come into the square.

Chapter 313: Debt Cleared

Aiden jumped down from the platform and walked over to his captain. When he noticed how serious the captain's expression was, Aiden's face immediately turned solemn as well.

"Captain, what happened?"

"An invitation I cannot refuse," Tyrian looked around and then sighed. "Tomorrow or the day after, I may need to leave here for a while."

Aiden's eyes went wide at once: "A message came to the island? Just now? And… how can there still be an invitation on this Frost Sea that even you cannot refuse?"

Tyrian sighed again: "…It is my Father."

Aiden blinked and held it in for a long time before asking: "…How long will you be gone, roughly?"

"I should be back soon. One or two days," Tyrian said. He did not notice the subtle change in the First Mate's tone. His mind was full, and he truly had no extra energy for other talk. "A messenger will come to the harbor to take me to the Vanished. Do not announce this matter for now. While I am 'gone', you will take charge of everything."

Aiden lowered his head at once and accepted the order: "Yes, Captain."

Then the First Mate paused for two seconds. He seemed a bit hesitant. He could not help glancing around, then leaned closer to Tyrian and muttered: "Is he… somewhere nearby?"

Tyrian thought for a moment and patted Aiden on the shoulder: “the Vanished is hiding in the mist around us.”

He could almost see Aiden’s muscles tightening bit by bit.

“…Captain, after not breathing for so many years, I finally remember what ‘cold’ feels like today,” First Mate Aiden said, his voice now very careful. “Are you sure the old Captain… just wants to meet you?”

“I do not know, and I do not want to know. My gut just tells me this trip should be safe,” Tyrian said in a low voice. Then he looked back toward the square, at the sailors who still did not want to leave and planned to drink and gather until sunrise, before turning again to the First Mate. “But the other sailors may not see it that way. You know what I mean.”

Hearing the captain’s serious words, Aiden slowly nodded.

He knew what his captain was worried about.

The Sea Mist Fleet was huge. Aside from a few ordinary people who had been hired with money or contracts as outer members, most of the fleet’s crew were Undying like Aiden himself. Strictly speaking, these Undying sailors could be divided into two groups—

One large part were former members of Frostholm’s navy. These soldiers, who had once sworn loyalty to Frostholm’s queen, had all been ordinary people at first. Only after Frostholm’s rebellion did the loyal ones who stayed in the ranks get gradually transformed into what they were now.

In half a century of endless fighting, in constant clashes with the rebels, death and the power of the Sea Mist’s curse slowly turned them into the “Undying sailors” they were now, and made them part of the Sea Mist Fleet.

The other, smaller group of sailors were the true “original core” under “Steel Vice Admiral” Tyrian. They had once been members of the Vanished Fleet.

Duncan Abnomar was their “old captain”. They had seen with their own eyes the Vanished’s transformation and fall. They had personally lived through this stormy century. They had once followed Tyrian in swearing loyalty to Frostholm, and then watched Frostholm itself turn upside down in great upheaval. The sailors who had been loyal for a full century were called the “First Generation”, and those who had served for half a century were called the “Second Generation”.

Aiden himself, and that half?baked old priest with a dent in his head, Will, were both members of the First Generation.

A century of experience let Aiden see many things hidden beneath the surface.

The Vanished and “Captain Duncan” did not mean the same thing to the two groups of sailors. The same news, when placed before them, would trigger reactions that were complex and hard to control.

And right now, even Captain Tyrian himself did not dare be sure what the Vanished and the “old captain’s” true state was, much less whether that state would really remain stable for long.

So before things became clear and the situation was fully under control, the news that the captain was going to the Vanished could not be spread. Otherwise, the island would definitely turn into a pot of boiling chaos.

Just then, Tyrian’s voice came again, cutting off Aiden’s thoughts: “… Tomorrow morning, send the dancers back to Cold Harbor.”

“Send them back tomorrow?” Aiden did not know why the captain suddenly brought this up. “Are you not satisfied with them?”

“The Vanished is nearby. For now, it is better not to let ordinary people come close to this island,” Tyrian shook his head, casually giving an excuse. After all, “shocked by my own father” was not a reason he could say out loud no matter how he thought about it. He paused, then added: “But what you said just now reminded me of something. If we just send them back like this, that mean ‘Cutlass Martin’ may very well make things hard for the girls… Later I will write a letter. You give it to the dancers’ supervisor.”

Aiden lowered his head at once: “Yes, Captain.”

“Mm,” Tyrian nodded, then seemed to remember something. “Right, when I came over just now I saw one of the dancers stop and say something to you. You looked completely at a loss… What did she say to you?”

Aiden looked a bit embarrassed for a moment: “She said my head shape was very sexy…”

Tyrian silently looked at the First Mate’s shiny bald head.

“…The dancers from Cold Harbor really are passionate and bold—their temperaments are warm, and their taste is very bold.”

…

Darkness, solitude, cold, silence.

A barren plain stretched into the darkness as far as the eye could see. There were no plants and no animals, only jagged strange rocks and crumbling ruins that had weathered and rotted for who knew how many years. They lay collapsed in the gloom, silent forever. From time to time, weird lights flashed across the sky and drifted through the dark, sometimes lighting the plain, sometimes casting mottled, twisted shadows on the ground.

A hollow black figure trudged across the plain.

He did not know how long he had been walking, and he did not know the name he had when he set out. He only remembered that he had started this journey a very, very long time ago, and the faint impression left from that time told him that he should have reached the end long ago, and should already be resting in some peaceful place.

What had delayed this journey? What had forced him to keep trudging across this plain?

The vague, hollow shadow tried to think, but soon those broken thoughts were swallowed by a greater emptiness, and he could only follow his instincts and keep walking forward.

But suddenly, his steps faltered.

Had he tripped over something? Or been bumped by something unseen?

The hollow shadow lowered his head and looked at himself. He saw that a few colors seemed to be appearing on his vague body.

He lifted his head and kept walking.

More colors appeared on him, and more solid details showed on the surface of his body, which had been rising and falling like mist.

Clothes appeared on this human?shaped black mist. It was a seafarer’s uniform.

He slowly gained a face—that of a middle?aged man with black hair.

His steps slowly became steady and light, and at some point the jagged stones under his feet had become much smoother.

More and more memories began to surface in this soul.

First came his name, then the moment of his death. After that came the bright, sunny days of his youth, the blurry, childish memories of childhood, and the tiny, warm flashes of light from when he had been in swaddling clothes.

He trudged toward the end of the plain. In the darkness, shadows of all sizes sometimes appeared and merged into him without a sound.

They seemed to be pieces that had once been torn and split off from him, now returning one by one to their proper places.

Suddenly, the figure stopped at the end of the road.

Cristo Barbelli raised his head in confusion and saw that he had somehow walked onto a great avenue. Ancient stone pillars stood silently on both sides of the road, and at its far end a huge, majestic gate, covered in old and complex patterns, rose out of thin air.

The gate stood open, but the inside stayed hazy, and he could not see any details on the other side.

Only a strong urge rose from deep inside this soul—to pass through that gate and rest on the other side.

The middle?aged man in a captain’s uniform walked forward without thinking. There was no one around him, but he felt as if countless other souls were walking this road at the same time, also heading toward that gate. Every moment in the mortal world, the dead were setting out on their way. It was just that, before this lonely gate between life and death, the souls did not seem to be able to see one another.

Yet just as he was about to touch the gate, Cristo stopped.

A tall figure suddenly appeared in front of the gate and blocked his way.

It was a warden, wrapped from head to toe in bandages, wearing a dark, ornate robe and a hood, and holding a long staff in one hand.

This was the gatekeeper here.

Cristo looked at this almost three?meter?tall “giant” with some fear. Memories from when he had been alive surged up, letting him remember how to speak to others: “Are you… the master of death?”

“No,” the gatekeeper spoke. A hoarse, deep voice came from under the bandages. “I am only His envoy.”

Cristo sounded a little sad: “I am not qualified to cross this gate, am I?”

He remembered more things.

Including the details of his own death.

But the solemn gatekeeper only lowered his head and looked quietly at the soul at the gate for a moment. Then he moved slightly to the side: “Please, go in. Your debt is cleared.”

Chapter 314: On Dagger Island

To the east of the city-state of Frostholm, at the far edge of sight from the sea cliffs, you could see a tall rocky island. It was long and narrow, curved like a thin saber or a strange dagger. Jagged rocks and barren sand covered the whole island, so the people of Frostholm simply named it after its shape and called it Dagger Island.

On the vast, endless sea, land was the most precious foothold. No matter how barren or narrow a lonely island was, people would still try every way to make use of it. Dagger Island was no exception.

The island had fresh water, but no land that could be farmed and no ground wide or flat enough to build a real settlement. It could not serve as a stable place to live or grow grain, and it had no useful plants or animals. But the island had once held a small deposit of Boiling Gold, so the people of Frostholm built a mine and a refinery there.

When that tiny amount of Boiling Gold was finally dug out, the island served for a while as a transfer harbor. Later, after the Frostholm rebellion, the routes around the city-state were adjusted. The harbor on the island was turned into a special storage site, used to keep dangerous things that had to be kept far from the civilized world.

As the years passed and the world rose and fell, this barren, rock-covered island changed hands many times. Now it was controlled by the Frostholm military and had become a secret “temporary research base”, used to study the strange thing that had been dredged up from the Deep Sea.

The sealing apparatus used to store dangerous objects, together with the tight security on the island, gave strong protection for this kind of research.

At noon, a mechanical cutter came from Frostholm and drew near the military harbor on the hollowed side of Dagger Island. The tall flag flying on the mechanical cutter showed that it belonged to the Frostholm navy.

After a series of complicated and strict checks, tests, and registration steps, the fast ship named the Sea Swallow was cleared to dock. As the steam core's roar slowly sank to a low growl, it came to rest beside the pier and lowered a gangplank from the rail.

Several soldiers in blue-black naval uniforms walked down the gangplank first. After them came a tall, broad-shouldered officer with short gray hair.

A few military personnel stationed on the island were already waiting on the shore.

The burly officer with gray hair took in the situation around the pier, then walked ashore along the gangplank. The waiting personnel at once stepped forward and saluted. One of them said: "General, you are twenty-five minutes later than scheduled. This needs to be recorded and explained—you must go to the registry in person."

"Mm." The burly officer, the general they had called him, nodded. He did not feel that a normal officer saying this to a general like him was any kind of offense. This was a special research facility. Strict approval rules were normal and reasonable safety demands. "We will go now… How are things on the professor's side?"

"Professor Merson is in the 'Chamber'," the man who came to receive him said. "He made a discovery while running tests on the new batch of samples. Under special test conditions, the material scraped from the surface of that thing seems to show strange properties. But the details will have to wait until we get into the ‘Chamber’.”

“All right, take me to the registry first.”

…

Not far from the military harbor of Dagger Island, on the inner side of the bay, research work was still going on in tense, busy order inside a strong building made from reinforced concrete and huge blocks of stone.

This gray, dull-looking structure was the so-called “Chamber”. It was also one of the best-protected and strongest laboratories on the island.

The hall inside the building was brightly lit.

It was a large hexagonal room. Each wall had been poured from the toughest concrete, and symbols and religious signs with meaning in occult studies were carved along the tops of the walls. Huge cloth bands covered with scripture hung down from the ceiling, crossing and overlapping in the spaces between the light of the gas lamps. Steam pipes crisscrossed above the hall. Some valves hissed softly, while incense devices burned quietly in the corners, their holy smoke slowly blending into the air.

Researchers in short robes worked busily all over the hall. In the very center, a metal device about five or six meters across, round and swollen like a Great Bell, hung from heavy chains. The surface of the metal was mottled and old, as though it had spent ages soaked in seawater. The complex valves and fittings at the top were enough to show its purpose.

It was a diving bell.

Directly under the hanging diving bell, the center of the floor held a huge circular grate. Its diameter was much larger than the long axis of the bell. Through the grate, one could faintly see a striking red glow deep underground.

A very tall, very thin old scholar with neatly combed silver hair stood in front of the diving bell, watching a few assistants carefully scrape samples from its surface.

A clergy member in priest's robes walked slowly behind the assistants. This priest carried a brass censer in his hand. Pale incense smoke rose from the brazier with a soft whisper, like a murmur of benediction, and drifted through the air.

"Professor, General Belazov has reached the harbor," one assistant came over and said from behind the tall, thin old scholar. "After he finishes the necessary registration and handover, he will come here to see you directly."

"Oh… Belazov. I got the message that he would come in person. It seems City Hall is finally getting a bit nervous." Professor Merson, whose silver hair was so neat not a strand was out of place, sounded slightly helpless. "Let him come… How are the samples that came to the lab this morning?"

"They went through the final round of tests. Now we can be sure that, even though that stuff looks like rust, it is not any material we know," the assistant answered. "And as time goes by, its properties keep changing. It feels… as if that thing is still in some kind of evolution, so it never shows a stable set of traits."

"Mm."

Professor Merson nodded slightly, but his eyes stayed on the diving bell hanging in midair.

The outside of the diving bell was badly eaten by rust, but the round hatch on its side was still easy to see. The hatch was tightly shut. From the time it was brought into this "Chamber", it had never once been opened.

On the other side of the diving bell there was a round window. A very, very thick plate of special glass was set there. For some reason, the inside of the window was covered in filth. Black grime almost coated the whole pane, so that no one could see what was inside the diving bell at all.

They could only just make out a messy hollow space, and something that looked like liquid.

What was inside the diving bell?

Professor Merson himself had wondered this more than once. But no matter how curious he was, he never had the slightest thought of opening the hatch.

The year the Abyssal Trench Project began, he had been sixteen.

He had learned what things one could be curious about, and what things one had to treat with care.

As he thought, the assistant's voice came from behind again: "Professor, do you think the people above will order us to open that hatch?"

"Honestly, I do not want to get that order at all," Professor Merson shook his head and turned to look at his assistant. "Courage and the spirit of exploration let humans survive on the Boundless Sea. But once those two things cross the line, they turn into recklessness and death."

The assistant blinked. Then the assistant blinked a third and a fourth eye.

"But our progress is too slow—and if it is really like you said, what if another submersible comes up?"

Professor Merson thought for a moment, then slowly shook his head. "If that really happens, opening the hatch will not be all we have to do. We will have to be ready to face the Deep Sea itself."

The assistant looked as if the meaning was only half clear.

This assistant was still too young. But then again, after half a century, how many people could still understand the horror of the Abyssal Trench Project?

Professor Merson lifted his head and looked at the busy figures around the diving bell.

Some of those figures did not seem quite the same as when they had first come to the island.

Some others now and then gave the old professor a faint sense of strangeness.

It felt as if many unfamiliar figures had quietly appeared in this research facility.

But that was not strange. Personnel changes in a research team were very normal, especially in a complex, special project that needed many experts. Everything looked very reasonable.

The clergy member holding the brass censer walked over and nodded slightly to Professor Merson.

The censer in his hand opened its eyes a little and secretly studied the old scholar’s face.

The strange scent of incense drifted through the air.

“Today’s Blessing rite is complete,” the clergy member said softly. “I will come again at this time tomorrow to give a benediction to the machines.”

“Thank you for your hard work, priest %?&%@*.” The old professor smiled and nodded, calling him by name as if it were the most natural thing in the world. “If not for the pile of trouble that is sure to come this afternoon, I should buy you a drink.”

“You should greet the general first,” the priest said with a laugh. “He is the big shot sent by Frostholm to ‘watch over’ this place.”

Chapter 315: Deeply Shocked

General Belazov arrived at the Chamber.

The moment he stepped into the large building of reinforced concrete and stone foundations, the burly gray-haired soldier felt a solemn, heavy, and eerie air, as if something pressed down on him. That feeling came from the rune carvings he saw everywhere inside the building, and from the many closed doors along the halls.

The runes were part of the safety measures of this building. They were designed to resist supernatural forces from outside and keep unwelcome Visitors from entering. Behind each closed door lay a deep passage. At the end of such a passage might be the sealing room of some anomaly, or a warehouse of dangerous samples, or researchers who had fallen into a temporary madness, or ancient documents that were forbidden to touch yet could not be destroyed.

Walking inside this building felt like wandering in the crack between the Mortal Realm and a mad abyss. It felt like standing on some invisible front line, looking out at another treacherous world. Even an ordinary person with no supernatural power or gift of Spiritual Insight might feel their nerves tighten and the hair on their arms stand on end.

“…Are the safety measures here really enough to make sure ‘that thing’ does not cause trouble?”

General Belazov followed a military scholar who led the way. As they passed a black alloy gate, he could not help asking.

“The Chamber is the most secure building on Dagger Island. Every room here has its own security and supernatural barrier. Under every item with a danger level above three there is a direct shaft down to the Crucible. And even if we ignore all the supernatural barriers, this building alone, by its sheer structural strength, could withstand a full-force attack from a Saint-level enemy,” the scholar who led the way said with pride. “Unless some Elder Gods stretch their power into this place, it is absolutely safe.”

He paused, then went on: “And besides, even though ‘that thing’ feels strange in every way, it is much more ‘stable’ than we first thought. You could even say well-behaved.”

“Stable? Well-behaved?” General Belazov frowned and spoke without thinking.

“Yes, though it is not very strict to say it that way,” the scholar nodded. “That thing has been hanging in the center of the Chamber for many days. Usually, objects that strange show some sign of being ‘alive’. They affect their surroundings in one way or another. But it has never shown anything like that. It has not released any substance or leaked any power. It shows no traits beyond the dimension of the Mortal Realm. Even though the samples scraped from it have some odd physical traits, those traits are limited to the physical. Compared with most dangerous objects of the same level, it is as quiet as a rock.”

“…That is an interesting case. I will report it to the city-state’s governor.” General Belazov said it in passing.

A researcher in a blue coat came walking quickly from the other side and hurried past them. As he passed the general, he nodded to him in respect, but his steps did not slow.

From inside that blue coat came the faint sound of some soft-bodied creature squirming its limbs.

“Everyone here is in a hurry,” General Belazov said casually.

“Yes, the Chamber is like this every day—we do more than just analyze that diving bell,” the scholar guiding him said with a shrug. “We also have to monitor other things in the facility. Please do not mind everyone’s lack of manners.”

“It is fine. I do not care much about such rules,” the general said, then frowned slightly. “Is it just me? There seems to be a strange smell in here. I have smelled it since I came in. It is like the smell from some… aquatic creature.”

“This is Dagger Island’s bay—the ventilation system of the building is directly connected to the outside. It is normal to have a smell like that. Add to that the smell from disinfectant and the settling pools, and it is normal for you to smell all kinds of strange things,” the scholar said, then sighed. “We have always wanted to apply for funds to repair the vents, but the answer from above is always, ‘As long as it works.’”

The general made no comment on that. He only lifted his head and looked toward the end of the corridor.

Professor Merson was already standing at the doorway.

…

Tyrian took one last look at his coat and hair in the dressing mirror. Then he stepped away and walked over to a nearby shelf, where a few items lay.

He hesitated for a long time over what to take with him.

Should he bring his sword? His pistol? His amulet?

Weapons would likely be useless. He could not count on a single sword or pistol to keep him safe on the Vanished. Besides, he was going there as a guest. Bringing weapons would not only show bad faith, it might even anger his father.

The amulet did not have any real effect, but bringing it might offer some comfort. However, he did not know what his father's attitude toward the Gods was now. Did his father hate them? Or just look down on them?

The greatest pirate lord on the Frost Sea was, for the first time, struggling this much over the simple act of "going out."

He was going to the Vanished—he was going back to the Vanished.

That was where he had spent his childhood. Most of the warm memories in his life were there. The parts he did not want to recall or face were also there. After staying away for a full century, he now suddenly found that he could not even imagine what he would look like when he set foot on that ship again.

Just then, the voice of his first mate, Aiden, came from outside the door and cut off Tyrian's thoughts: "Captain, are you ready?"

Tyrian frowned and shouted toward the door: "Almost. Don't rush me."

"I mean, you really should hurry," Aiden's voice came again, this time with clear tension in it. "For Her Majesty the Queen's sake… the envoy is already here!"

The envoy was already here.

Tyrian froze, and only then noticed what was odd in Aiden's tone. He hurried to the door and pulled it open.

Aiden's voice was still going: "Captain, if you don't open the door, I'll… ah, thank the heavens, you finally opened it!"

Tyrian stared at the scene in the doorway.

His loyal first mate stood there with every muscle stiff. On top of Aiden's smooth bald head stood a terrifying skeletal roc wrapped in green flames. The roc's whole body threw off fire. Flecks of spirit form flame kept falling from it, now and then landing on Aiden.

In the bird's chest, a brass spirit compass floated in midair. It was his father's property.

Anomaly-022, Spirit Realm spirit compass.

"Captain, could you please stop staring and first let this bird get off my head…" Aiden's voice shook. "These flames keep falling on me…"

The skeletal roc tilted its head, as if studying Tyrian carefully. Then it suddenly opened its beak and spoke in a strange female voice: "To Chenghua Avenue, across Twin Immortals Bridge… get on! Plenty of seats, big seats! Everyone move back a bit… peanuts, drinks, mineral water!"

Tyrian almost jumped at that string of calls. The first thought in his mind was:

[How could Father's envoy sound like this?]

Then he began to wonder what those strange phrases were supposed to mean—but no matter how he thought about it, he could not figure it out.

He did notice that Aiden was about to faint.

"Let's go," Tyrian said, shaking his head. He forced all the random thoughts out of his mind and stopped thinking about how he should face his father once he reached the Vanished. Instead, he decided to leave everything to his ability to adapt on the spot. He looked at the eerie skeletal roc. "How are we __"

Before he could finish, the huge bird stomped on Aiden's skull and sprang into the air. Then it dove down from above. With a rush of cold green flame filling his sight, Tyrian heard a strange shout right beside his ear: “Your dad’s here!”

The next second, he felt the world spin. It was as if every sense in his body was being taken apart and put back together. Right after that, he felt himself suddenly thrown up into some great height. He rushed through darkness and cold. Time seemed to pass for a very long while, or maybe only for an instant, and then the strange dizziness and feeling of being peeled apart vanished without a trace.

The solid feel of ground under his feet returned. The darkness and weightlessness were gone. sunlight shone through thin mist and fell on his body. As his familiar five senses came back, the view before his eyes steadied and slowly became clear.

A tall figure stood right in front of him.

But it was not his father. Compared with his father, this figure was too slim. It looked more like a woman.

She looked a bit familiar.

Tyrian blinked hard and finally focused his vision, seeing the face before him clearly.

White hair fell over her shoulders. A scar marked her left eye. She was tall, strong, and beautiful.

Vanna looked at the pirate lord with a strange expression, then awkwardly turned her head to glance at a few people nearby who were obviously waiting to watch a scene.

At last she sighed and said to Tyrian: “Captain Tyrian, I know you have many ques—”

Before Vanna could finish, Tyrian suddenly stepped back half a pace and stared, wide-eyed, at the lady inquisitor in front of him.

“He shot Pland down?!”

The greatest pirate lord on the Frost Sea was deeply shocked.

Chapter 316: Going Home

The mood on the deck suddenly became a bit awkward. An unspeakable silence hung between Vanna and Tyrian. The shock on Tyrian's face had not yet faded, while Vanna was already covering her forehead with her hand.

The silence was finally broken by a voice from not far away. A few meters off, Shirley nudged Nina with her elbow and said: "See? I told you his first words would definitely be that—you owe me two scoops of ice cream."

"Fine, fine, you guessed right," Nina muttered. "Two scoops it is… I'll buy them for you when we get to Frostholm."

Shirley's eyes went wide at once: "I'm not stupid! Eating ice cream in a place that's dozens of degrees below zero? We'll wait until we're back in Pland!"

Tyrian blinked and only then noticed the other people on the deck, and how the mood here was subtly different from what he had imagined. First he saw the girl named Shirley, whom he had met once before. Then he saw, by her feet, the Abyssal Hound that had once knocked heads with him, lazily basking in the Sun. A little farther to the side stood another young lady who looked sixteen or seventeen, and an elderly gentleman with graying hair and a gentle, scholarly air.

Everyone was smiling.

Behind them were the deck, rail, masts, and sails of the Vanished.

The yellowed, broken scenes from his childhood, the memories of him and his sister fooling around, every happy and unhappy impression, seemed to float up bit by bit from some dark, forgotten cave, slowly gaining color again in the sunlight shining through the thin mist.

There were some new faces here, but this was still the ship in his memories —not the gloomy, ruined, twisted ghost ship he had first imagined.

At least, the deck still looked just as familiar.

Tyrian knew he was spacing out, and he knew he ought to say something at a time like this, but he could not stop his thoughts from wandering. He knew he had had this habit since childhood. Every time he stared off into space on the deck, Father would always appear out of nowhere and scold him from behind—

“Tyrian, what are you daydreaming about here?”

The pirate captain visibly flinched. For a moment, the confusion between memory and the Mortal Realm made his thoughts freeze for two or three seconds. Then he slowly turned around and saw a tall, imposing figure standing behind him.

It was not a phantom in a mirror, not a blurry outline seen across a distant sea full of cannon fire. They were standing face to face…

“Sorry, Father,” Tyrian blurted out. “I was a bit distracted.”

Duncan frowned slightly.

He was not sure if it was just his imagination, but in that instant he felt Tyrian’s state was somehow strange, very different from the impression left by their last few encounters, and yet faintly familiar. Soon, though, he let it go.

After all, this was their first face?to?face talk after a hundred years apart, and also Tyrian’s first time back on this ship. It was normal for him to react like this.

At the same time, Vanna, who had been silent for a long while out of embarrassment, finally spoke: “Captain Tyrian, I should explain who I am here. First of all, it is not what you think. I came to the Vanished by order of the Church…”

“By order of the Church?” Tyrian was even more confused than before. He suddenly turned his head to look at his Father: “You…”

“I did not bring down the Church—watch where your thoughts are going, Tyrian,” Duncan cut him off before he could speak, already knowing what he was thinking. “Do I need to stress it again? I am no longer an enemy of the civilized world. You should face me more calmly, not like you are on guard against some calamity that might start destroying things at any moment.”

Tyrian said: “I… I’m sorry.”

“I accept your apology—let’s talk as we walk,” Duncan waved his hand and started toward the stern. “We have a lot to discuss. Why Miss Vanna is here, what happened with the Obsidian, and that dagger?shaped island.”

Then he turned back and waved at the onlookers nearby: “Anyone not involved, go mind your own work. Stop crowding around here.”

Still a bit dazed, Tyrian followed behind Duncan toward the captain’s cabin he remembered, while Vanna walked silently on the other side.

The scenes in his memory and the sights before his eyes came together and broke apart, sometimes overlapping, sometimes clashing with sharp, jarring differences.

From the very start of his return to the Vanished, everything already seemed to have slipped away from its old track and from his expectations.

Tyrian looked around without thinking. He studied the state of the ship, searching for things that matched his memories, and also searching for a figure who, in theory, should be here.

Of course Duncan noticed his little movements: “Are you looking for Alice?”

Tyrian paused, then remembered that this was the doll girl’s name—he had always thought of her as “Ray Nora”: “Ah, yes. Is she on the ship?”

“She is, but she should be busy in the kitchen right now,” Duncan nodded. “Alice is in charge of the food on the ship. You can try her cooking today—we have fresh vegetables and fish that were just caught. You don’t often see that on an ordinary long?distance voyage.”

“The food…” Tyrian repeated the word without thinking and almost said, “So Father eats regular meals too.” The next second, a series of startled cries and hurried footsteps suddenly came from not far away, cutting off his wandering thoughts.

“Help help help help help help help——”

That was Alice’s scream.

Tyrian turned in shock toward the sound and saw that doll girl who kept calling him “brother” running across the deck not far away, shouting at the top of her lungs with a kitchen knife raised in her hand. Right behind her bounced a wooden barrel, hopping up and down. The barrel was full of carrots and greens.

Duncan watched, expressionless, as Alice ran back and forth across the deck, as Nina and Shirley rushed over to help and failed, until it turned into three people and one dog racing around the deck, chased by a barrel of vegetables. Then he patted Tyrian on the shoulder.

“Sometimes, it gets a bit lively around here.”

Tyrian turned back with a blank look, the corner of his mouth twitching: “…Are the ingredients on this ship maybe a little too fresh?”

“It’s because of the barrel—it has its own ideas about how vegetables should be stored, so it often has… differences of opinion with Alice.”

“You don’t need to help?”

“No. Alice has a big heart.”

“But it looks like she’s asking you for help…”

“It’s fine. I have a big heart too.”

Tyrian’s expression seemed to freeze. Even as a pirate leader who commanded a whole Undying fleet, he still could not quite keep up with the Vanished’s daily pace.

Duncan was not surprised at all. He just patted Tyrian’s shoulder and said: “You need to learn to get used to it. If I helped every time Alice shouted for help, I would never get anything else done. As it turns out, her ability to adapt and her life force are both quite tough.”

Tyrian still wanted to say something, but they had already reached the captain’s cabin.

In all his childhood memories and in his memories as an adult, this had always been the most impressive place on the whole ship.

When he was a child, Father’s captain’s cabin was a mysterious and slightly scary room. He and Lucretia could fool around in most parts of the ship, but they were strictly forbidden to step into this place. Even the kindest sailor on the ship would block the two siblings at the door without mercy.

After he grew up, Father's captain's cabin became a place that made people tense and where they had to stay serious. Even after Tyrian and Lucretia each became captains of the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star, they still felt nervous by instinct whenever they stepped inside. Here, Father drew up all his great plans of exploration. Here, he marked on the enchanted sea chart the islands and Visions newly found by the Vanished fleet. Here, he planned and directed the entire fleet. Most of the time, he and his younger sister only listened and carried out orders.

Father did not like other people's suggestions. In his memory, Father was a decisive and stubborn man.

The door opened, and the slightly dim interior, compared to the deck outside, came into Tyrian's view.

The next second, his gaze went to the edge of the chart table, to the black, eerie Goathead there.

The black Goathead, with its wooden texture, creaked as it turned. Its pair of hollow, deep obsidian eyes fixed on the visitor who had just stepped inside.

"Hello, nice to meet you for the first time, Mr. Tyrian."

Tyrian was startled and turned his head without thinking: "This is…"

"This is the current First Mate on the Vanished. You can trust him," Duncan introduced. "You can just call him Goathead."

"First Mate?" Tyrian blinked, then turned back to look at the strange "wood carving." Pushing down the odd feeling in his heart, he accepted Father's words and tried to greet it: "Hello, Goathead… Mister?"

Goathead shook its neck, as if about to say something, but the next second Duncan, very used to this, cut in first: “Be quiet. Stay silent while we are talking.”

Tyrian glanced at Duncan in surprise.

“When you talk to it, you must get used to cutting it off ahead of time—do not let it talk freely. That is my advice.”

Hearing Father’s warning, Tyrian’s expression quickly grew serious.

If even the mighty “Captain Duncan” treated this so strictly and carefully, then this Goathead really must be as strange and dangerous as it looked.

Naturally, Tyrian took Goathead to be some kind of extremely dangerous Anomaly, and keeping its mouth shut was clearly part of the sealing rules for that Anomaly…

Chapter 317: Facing Terror

Everywhere on this ship carried the colors of his memories—but the longer Tyrian stayed aboard, the more he realized that many things here were still different from what he remembered.

For example, the objects that seemed alive and ran all over the ship.

For example, the sails that had lost their solid form and now drifted around the masts like misty veils in a spirit form.

And for example, the unfamiliar First Mate in the captain's cabin—the strange carving Father called "Goathead."

He sat opposite the chart table, looking at the things in the room that were both familiar and not. Many of them still matched his memories, only now they carried many mottled traces of time. Father sat across from him, talking about what had happened between the Deep Sea Church and the Vanished. The Inquisitor from Pland sat by Father's side, adding details from time to time.

The way things had changed was far beyond what he had expected.

"A… Secret Envoy," the pirate lord repeated the term Vanna had just used. His tone was strange and his expression was subtle. "The Church is acting… with more boldness than I imagined."

"To be honest, it surprised me at first too," Duncan said with a smile. "That Pope is a… very hard person to read. I do not know how much of what she says is from her true heart, and how much is for the Church's interests and under the guidance of the storm Goddess Gamona. But in any case, how this matter has developed fits what I wanted—I do need a bridge who can talk with the Churches of the Four Gods, and a helper who is good at dealing with cultists."

"Dealing with cultists…" Tyrian showed a thoughtful look. "I still remember you mentioned those Annihilators, and the clues you found on the Obsidian…"

"Bringing you here is exactly for this," Duncan nodded lightly. Then he took out the tobacco tin from his clothes, opened the lid, and showed what was inside to Tyrian. "This is the clue I found deep inside the Obsidian—the flesh of the Abyssal Lord."

Tyrian held his breath. He knew that with Father here it should not be dangerous, but at the moment the box opened he still felt a bit tense without meaning to. Right after that, he saw the "chunk of meat" inside, only the size of a thumb.

An unspeakable fear and sense of rejection rushed up in his heart almost at once. It was like the instinctive bristling of hair when a person, unarmed, suddenly met a wild beast in a narrow path. The lump of flesh only lay lifeless in the metal box, yet he still felt as if he were being stared at, locked on by some living existence with huge power and a towering will!

Tyrian almost snapped his gaze away at once. When he came back to himself, he realized that cold sweat was already running down his forehead.

"Are you all right?" Duncan noticed his state and frowned a little. "Why is your reaction even stronger than Morris and Vanna's?"

Still shaken, Tyrian blurted out: "They didn't react this strongly?"

"We felt resistance and danger, but it wasn't that intense," Vanna said at once from the side. "What did you feel just now?"

Tyrian calmly told them what he had felt in that brief moment. Then he frowned at the piece of flesh again as countless thoughts rose in his mind.

“I don’t know if it’s my imagination, but I kept feeling this thing… was staring at me just now,” he said. “As if it were still alive… or something ‘behind’ it was casting its gaze here.”

Duncan and Vanna exchanged a glance at once.

Bringing Tyrian here had indeed been the right choice. Without actual contact, some clues in the details really would have been hard to bring to light.

This piece of flesh, suspected to be a fragment of the Holy Lord, showed a special reaction to Tyrian’s approach and gaze!

“Could it be because you took part in the Abyssal Trench Project back then?” Duncan thought for a moment and spoke his guess. The Abyssal Trench Project was, as far as he could see, the biggest special factor in Tyrian’s past connected to this matter.

Tyrian did not speak for a moment. After recalling and thinking for a few seconds, he raised his head: “Can you be sure that the Obsidian really went to the Frostholm Deep Sea?”

“I can’t, because there is no direct proof. But my intuition tells me it returned from there,” Duncan said honestly. “The traits the ship showed are far too much like the ‘replica’ you described.”

Tyrian said nothing for a while. He only stared at the small black iron box on the table, as if weighing and hesitating. After who knew how long, he suddenly spoke: “Can you let me look at it one more time?”

“Are you sure?” Duncan looked into Tyrian’s eyes. “This could be dangerous. If it really was the Abyssal Trench Project that made you and this thing connected, then every contact you have with it will only strengthen that link."

Tyrian stayed silent for two seconds, then suddenly showed a slight smile: "…On your ship, things shouldn't get as bad as they possibly could, right?"

"…If something really does come out, I will deal with it," Duncan nodded slightly and pushed the small tin box, which he had just taken back, toward Tyrian again. "Act carefully. Give a warning at once if anything happens."

Tyrian nodded, took a light breath, and again fixed his gaze on that piece of flesh from the Abyssal Lord.

Almost in the blink of an eye, that feeling of rejection and tension rose in his heart again. The sense of being gazed at from afar by a towering existence slammed hard into his senses. The link built by an supernatural power washed over his mind like a huge storm wave. His survival instincts almost made Tyrian shut his eyes at once.

But this time, he forced himself to fight his instincts. He did not look away, and he did not try to break or push back the will that was rising in his mind.

And in this longer stretch of holding on, he finally confirmed what he had only vaguely sensed before—

The will and power coming from this "Holy Lord's flesh"… actually held no malice.

All the fear, danger, and rejection he felt came only from the natural awe brought on by such a vast power. The gaze hidden on the other side of the flesh… was actually just a pale, exhausted look.

Tyrian's heart stirred. He raised his head, ready to tell Father what he had found.

Yet in the next second, he found that around him was only dark chaos—the familiar cabin and the people in the room had vanished from his sight at some point.

He stood up in shock and reached for a weapon by instinct, only to realize that he was unarmed. He carefully looked around, trying to see things in this dark chaos, but it felt as if a black veil covered his sight. Even when he held his hands in front of his eyes, he could only see vague shapes.

There was a strong mental interference. Something was using mental guidance to disturb his consciousness.

But he still did not feel any malice.

Tyrian stood in the darkness, a little lost. Suddenly, he thought he heard a sound.

There was a faint rustling behind him. Something huge was moving. A slightly cold breath drew close to the back of his neck.

Tyrian’s heart tightened at once, and he whipped his head around.

A huge, strange limb stretched out toward him in the dark, black?brown with faint blue lines running through it.

The limb was like a tentacle, yet it was hundreds of meters long. It lifted in the darkness like a soft pillar. The shapeless bulge at the end of the tentacle came to less than a meter from Tyrian’s face. Farther away along that limb, in the direction the tentacle stretched from, an even larger, even more unspeakable structure was slowly rising out of the dark!

It was like a mountain, like a city, like some twisted thing that could drive a mortal mad in an instant. It almost should not have been shaped by the world of the Mortal Realm at all, nor could it be any God’s creation made in a sane mind. It was like some soft?bodied creature from the Deep Sea, like a mix of sea star and squid, but in the next second its smoky, mist?like surface surged. Countless more tentacles, limbs, eyes, and throats grew from it, and they changed without end.

In that short moment, Tyrian's eyes were open as wide as they could go. A roaring storm of thoughts shook in his head. He did not even know if he felt fear right now, and for a time he could not judge his own emotions at all. He only stared as the tentacle stretched toward him and gently waved in front of him, as if it wanted to talk to him, to pass on some message. But he could not understand any of it in that mountain?high, sea?like flood of information and roaring.

Eyes opened on the surface of that tentacle—many, many eyes. Tyrian met those eyes, and suddenly he seemed to finally "hear" some message he could understand from them, and from the huge, mountain?like "body" in the distance—

"…Run."

Boom!

A terrifying roar exploded in his mind. It felt like some huge repelling force was tearing his spirit loose and hurling it back into the Mortal Realm. Tyrian almost blacked out on the spot. Just as he thought his soul was about to be torn into pieces in this endless dark chaos, a dim green flame suddenly appeared in his sight.

The flame rushed toward him with a howl and wrapped tightly around him.

All the horrifying images vanished in the fire.

Before he could react, those terrible "visions" and sounds had already faded like a dream—he was back in the captain's cabin of the Vanished.

Chapter 318: Gradually Warped

For the next whole minute, Tyrian stayed sunk in the brief confusion and dullness brought on by that huge impact. His eyes could hardly focus. Countless noises surged in his mind, and his thoughts rose and fell like a lone boat in a storm—but even so, his reason stayed clear.

He knew it was those spirit form flames that had appeared in the darkness that had guarded his mind, keeping it from being corrupted by the power of the Abyssal Lord.

After a while, he slowly managed to steady his breathing. Since he had not suffered too strong a mental corruption, the visions in his head faded quickly. At the same time, he heard a calm voice from the other side: “Looks like you’ve recovered.”

Tyrian lifted his head and looked at the tall figure on the far side of the chart table: “Just now… you were the one who pulled me out?”

“You stared at it for too long. Vanna said you were falling into a nightmare,” Duncan said casually. “Luckily, I’ve been doing a bit of research on this whole ‘Dreamwalking’ state recently.”

“Nightmare…” Tyrian rubbed his brow without thinking. “Did I really look like I’d fallen into a nightmare just now…”

“It sounds like you had quite an unusual experience?” There was some curiosity in Duncan’s tone.

He had indeed made an emergency entry into Tyrian's mental world just now, but it had been different from what he usually saw after using the power of walking the Spirit Realm to enter someone else's dream. This time, after he intervened, he had not "seen" anything at all. Tyrian's "nightmare" had been nothing but darkness.

It seemed the "source" that had created the nightmare had already left before his arrival. That only made him even more curious about what had just happened.

"I… met an existence that is hard to put into words," Tyrian said with effort as he recalled what he had seen. He carefully described the images. "I can't give its exact form, and I don't dare recall all its details, but I suspect it was the Abyssal Lord…"

Tyrian told them everything he had seen and heard in that darkness, and added many details about what he had felt in his own spirit. Aside from being unable to clearly recall the full outline of that mountain-like mass of Shadows, he held nothing back.

After listening to Tyrian's account, Duncan frowned at once: "You're saying that being, which was most likely the 'Abyssal Lord,' said only one sentence to you, and it was to tell you to 'run'?"

"Strictly speaking, it was the only sentence I could understand," Tyrian said, spreading his hands. "It seemed to say a lot to me, but everything was drowned in the huge noise. In the end it seemed to give up and picked the shortest word. I only barely heard that word…"

Duncan sounded thoughtful: "So when a person's inspiration is too high, they actually can't hear the Elder Gods' muttering…"

Tyrian did not react at first. "Father, what did you say?"

“Ah, nothing. It has nothing to do with this,” Duncan waved a hand and turned his attention back to the matter at hand. He thought for a moment, then looked at Vanna. “Do you think Tyrian met the Abyssal Lord? Do you think it told him to ‘run’ in order to protect him?”

“From Captain Tyrian’s description and his own feelings, even if it was not the Abyssal Lord, it was at least some kind of heretic deity,” Vanna answered at once. “But as for what that word ‘run’ meant… I am sorry, Mr. Duncan, I don’t dare make a rash judgment.”

She paused, feeling that answer was not responsible enough, then added: “Information on the Abyssal Lord has always been scarce. Even the data held by the four great Churches is limited.

“The mainstream view at present is that the Abyssal Lord is a huge single entity at the very center of the Abyssal Deep domain. It has no ability to move and does not actively project power into the Mortal Realm. It cannot communicate and seems not to think at all. It is like…”

Vanna tapped her temple, as if struggling to find the right word to describe such an existence. Seeing this, Duncan spoke offhandedly: “Like a lump of slime mold sunk in the Abyssal Deep, down in the Deep Sea? Alive and huge, but just a clump of fungus that doesn’t think or move?”

“…You might be the only person in the world who would describe the Abyssal Lord as slime mold,” Vanna said with a strange look, but she still nodded slightly. “Yet it is indeed as you say. If the information we wrung out of those demons’ souls and from the cultists’ mouths is correct, the Abyssal Lord is such a ‘silent heretic deity.’

“The only thing it does is constantly divide more Abyssal demons from its body, or absorb those Abyssal demons that die in their fights.”

Duncan could not help rubbing his forehead. “…Why does that sound exactly like some kind of fungal carpet tumor…”

The captain was talking in that incomprehensible “Subspace dialect” again.

But Vanna was already used to this. She skillfully ignored the words she did not understand and naturally let the topic go on: “Overall, the Abyssal Lord can actually be considered a relatively harmless heretic deity, because at least it has never shown any tendency toward corruption of the Mortal Realm.

“But even so, in the classification used by the Churches of the Four Gods, it is still placed in the category of ‘Eldritch Gods.’”

“So regardless of any subjective will, its very existence is a danger?”

“Yes. Whether it’s the Abyssal demons split from its body, or those Annihilators who sign pacts with the Abyssal demons and go mad in spirit, all of them are mortal enemies of the civilized world.”

Duncan did not speak. He fell into thought for a while.

For some reason, what he thought of at that moment was the “Black Sun” that had supported the False Corona and hung dying in the flames.

But he only made that connection in passing and did not make any judgment on the true nature of the Abyssal Lord. The reason was simple: he did not have enough evidence. He would not draw casual conclusions about something he had not personally come into contact with.

Tyrian rubbed his brow. All the noise in his head had faded. What remained was only a faint dizziness and a tiredness like he had stayed up several nights in a row. While Vanna talked about the information on the Abyssal Lord, he also had his own thoughts.

“No matter whether that word ‘run’ showed goodwill or not, one thing is certain. The condition of the Obsidian was clearly the result of being affected by the Lord’s power. Now Annihilators are already active in the Frostholm city-state, and they are most likely here because of this,” Tyrian said slowly. “If the influence I just suffered really has something to do with those who took part in that plan back then, then now even the Abyssal Trench Project has been pulled into it.

“Pushing the logic further, I think what we most need to pay attention to now is that ‘Dagger Island.’ It is the lingering aftershock of the Abyssal Trench Project that has continued to this day since half a century ago.”

“The eighth ‘Number Three Submersible,’” Duncan said in a low voice. “How much do you know about the situation on Dagger Island?”

“That place is now a military forbidden zone. Even with the strength of the Sea Mist Fleet, we can’t easily get close,” Tyrian said. “The Vanished should be able to force a landing by relying on its special nature, but even then it wouldn’t be easy to find that Submersible in a short time. The island is large, the research facilities are complex, and in a serious emergency the military personnel on the island might simply order it destroyed…”

The more Duncan listened, the more wrong it sounded. He quickly cut off the pirate lord: “Stop, stop. When did I say anything about charging straight in?”

Tyrian froze, then understood at once. “Sorry, Father, I thought…”

Duncan waved his hand, signaling that there was no need to explain. “Forget that. Just tell me in general what you know about Dagger Island’s situation. It might come in handy.”

“All right. About that little island…”

…

Belazov looked seriously at the diving bell hanging in the middle of the hall.

He had already been in this research facility for two days, and during those two days he had spent half his time in this hall, dealing with this diving bell.

He was not a professional researcher. He did not understand mechanical matters, and he did not know what meaning the long string of physical and chemical tests the scholars ran on the samples had.

He stayed here for one reason only: this mechanical device, wrapped in an air of mystery and with such a strange background, had stirred up his curiosity.

An irresistible curiosity.

As a Frostholm native not yet forty years old, he had not personally lived through that great event half a century ago. But as one of the upper officials of the city-state, he at least knew about the Abyssal Trench Project from the classified files.

The Number Three Submersible took the most important place in all those files. It was the part of the entire Abyssal Trench Project that made people’s skin crawl the most.

It was covered in rust. Filth filled both its inside and outside. It hung obediently from an iron hook like a chunk of scrap metal and looked very ordinary.

Professor Merson stood beside the General and explained the safety measures of this laboratory.

“…The sling below leads straight down to the Crucible. If an emergency happens, the hook will release at once. The Submersible will smash through the grating and fall into the Crucible.

“If, after the release device is triggered, the Submersible still doesn’t fall into the channel, a linked mechanism will start. This entire room will unhook from the ‘sealed chamber’ frame and slide along a chute into a cave behind the bay. That cave is filled with nitroglycerin.”

“And the people in the lab?”

“We have thirty seconds to evacuate. After that, the evacuation passage will lock,” Professor Merson said. “But if it really is the worst-case scenario… the highest person in charge, which is me, can also choose not to open the evacuation passage.”

Belazov gave a small nod and slowly walked to the front of the diving bell.

He looked at the round glass window covered in grime and curiously peered inside.

Murky dark red sludge churned faintly inside the Submersible. Something shaped like an eyeball pressed up against the window. Through the gaps between the smears of filth, it met Belazov’s gaze.

After a long moment, the General drew back his eyes. “It’s pitch-black inside. I can’t see a thing.”

“Yes. We haven’t opened its hatch yet,” Professor Merson nodded. “Naturally, we can’t clean its interior either.”

General Belazov smiled. “That is how it should be.”

—

Chapter 319: Hidden Shadows

Belazov finished his inspection of Dagger Island and his supervision of the research work. Now, this military representative had to leave.

By the pier near the Harbor in Dagger Island's bay, Professor Merson had personally come to see him off. The old man looked up at the Sea Swallow as the ship made ready to depart.

Seamen were boarding. Harbor officials were checking the paperwork. Clergy in robes walked near the mooring lines with censers in hand. They gently swung the censers and offered prayers for the ship's mechanical parts.

The weather was clear today. It was a good day to set sail.

Belazov stood on the dock, watching group after group of sailors return to the Sea Swallow. Then he turned back to Professor Merson and said: "Professor, I'm impressed with your work here, but I still have to remind you of something—the progress on Dagger Island is slow. Some people back in the city-state are already getting impatient."

"The orders I received were to, under the premise of safety, figure out all kinds of properties of that Submersible, try to decode its material composition, and at the next stage try to understand how it appeared," the old professor said calmly. "We're moving forward according to the schedule.

"If the big shots in the Government Office really have ideas, they can try to find the blueprints the Frostholm Queen left and build a Number Four or even a Number Five Submersible. Sending someone straight down is a lot more convenient than scraping samples in the lab every day."

"They're not going to like that answer—but I'd be very happy to pass it on for you," General Belazov laughed. "They won't have the nerve to build Submersibles. Their expressions will be even more interesting."

Professor Merson shrugged. After a short silence, his tone became a bit complicated. "Even though we joke like that, to tell the truth, I'm also worried about the progress."

Belazov did not speak. He calmly watched this old professor who had lived through the "Queen's era."

"Day after day of scraping samples and analyzing their physical and chemical properties is certainly a necessary part of standard research," the old professor sighed. "But you saw it yourself. What we can get from those samples is very limited.

"Even if we someday really open that hatch, we probably still won't draw many more secrets from the Submersible. The real secret isn't here, General. You know what I mean."

"…It's down past a thousand meters, Professor. Your ideas are a little dangerous."

Professor Merson sighed. "I thought a soldier like you would be more inclined toward dangerous ideas than a scholar like me."

"My duty is to protect the city-state's safety. That mission makes me lean toward a cautious and conservative way of doing things," Belazov said lightly. "So, you actually have some intention of restarting… those 'diving apparatus'?"

"What you really want to say is 'restart the Abyssal Trench Project,' isn't it?" The old professor gave a short laugh and shook his head. "Relax. I'm not that reckless yet.

“But there’s a fact we can’t avoid. The key to this whole matter lies in the deep water, and a diving bell replica sitting in a lab can’t unlock any mysteries. We might really need to think about a ‘reserve plan.’

“It doesn’t have to be an active descent, but if a ninth or even a tenth replica really floats up to the surface, we should at least have some ways to respond.”

“…I’ll pass your suggestion to the Government Office,” Belazov said after a brief pause and a light breath. “Before a clear order comes down, the sealed chamber project will go on as usual.”

The old professor nodded. “Thank you.”

The Sea Swallow left.

The steam-powered fast ship cut through the gentle waves, leaving a spreading wake across the Boundless Sea. Dagger Island’s steep and winding coast slowly shrank in the distance and soon sank into the thin mist so common over the Northern Seas.

On the deck, Belazov withdrew his gaze from the island and turned toward the captain’s cabin.

Although Dagger Island was not far from Frostholm’s main island, the voyage would still take several hours. During this boring trip, he needed to organize his thoughts and carefully consider how to report the matter of the Number Three Submersible to the city-state’s administrators—and how to mention Professor Merson’s final suggestions.

The Abyssal Trench Project… This old case from half a century ago had left an influence so deep and terrifying that it had slowly turned into a taboo people did not even question. But now, new replicas had already begun surfacing from the Deep Sea. They probably truly should take more active measures.

A seaman was waiting near the captain's cabin. He nodded to the General and reported: "The steam core is running normally. We'll arrive at Frostholm's First Harbor in four hours."

Belazov gave the somewhat unfamiliar seaman a glance and nodded lightly. "I need to rest for a while. Don't disturb me unless something important happens."

"Yes, General."

Belazov returned to the captain's cabin and sat down at the desk. He listened to the low mechanical sounds coming from deep under the floor and let out a quiet breath.

Soon, he would be back on the main island.

He steadied himself, opened the desk drawer, and took out the notebook he had placed in the hidden compartment ahead of time.

This trip to Dagger Island had brought no Anomaly, and the return voyage was also going smoothly, but some procedural matters still could not be skipped. That was an order, and also his duty.

He opened the notebook. The first line on the page came into view:

"Even if everything is normal, you must confirm your own sanity and judgment. Even if there is nothing suspicious around you, you must still verify the following content."

Belazov turned the pages and carried out a series of steps with great skill.

The sound of turning paper kept echoing through the room—

"You are left-handed. Confirm this now…"

“Recall a color, then turn to the next page… It should be blue or black.”

“Keyword: dagger. Imagine it. Confirm whether the image in your mind matches the picture on the next page.”

“Your name is Belazov. Try to spell it once in the blank space on the next page.”

“For this departure, the accompanying personnel have been reduced. There are exactly thirty-two people on the ship, yourself included. If the headcount is clearly off, immediately conduct a roll call.”

“The deputy you brought this time is Benjamin Yorden. He has a burn scar by his right eye.”

Belazov kept turning the pages and doing the simple checks or subconscious repetitions. Suddenly, his movements stopped.

His gaze rested on the last line on the page.

“A burn scar by his right eye…” Belazov silently repeated the sentence. A strange doubt floated up in his mind.

Right eye?

He slowly closed the notebook and put it back into the hidden compartment. His expression stayed calm as he stood up and pushed open the cabin door.

“Benjamin!” he called his adjutant’s name.

A middle-aged officer quickly stepped out of a nearby room and came up to Belazov.

“General?”

Belazov looked at Benjamin’s face.

At the center of that face was his eye. One eye, and only one.

A faint sense of wrongness thumped in his heart. Belazov's rational mind told him that something about what he was seeing was not right, yet a hazy Veil seemed to drape over his thoughts. He could not say exactly what the problem was, and everything still felt very reasonable.

That faint deviation in his awareness made the General grow more alert. He stared at Benjamin for a long time, trying hard to find the source of his unease, until the adjutant's voice sounded again: "General? Is something wrong?"

"…Benjamin, how many eyes should a person have?" Belazov suddenly asked.

The adjutant froze at once, as if his mind went blank at the question. Seeing this, Belazov spoke quickly: "Forget that question. I just asked without thinking—go back to your room and rest. I'll go take a look below."

The adjutant blinked. Although he was puzzled, he still nodded. "Yes, General."

The one-eyed human named Benjamin returned to his room, and he did not seem to show any Anomaly. Belazov watched his back. First he let out a breath, then turned around and quickly walked toward the end of the corridor.

He knew he had been a bit reckless just now. Once he already had doubts, he should not have asked such a strange question of someone who seemed "not quite right," even if that person was one of the adjutants he trusted most.

But without that question, he could not have confirmed whether the oddness he had faintly sensed really existed.

Now, he had his confirmation.

Something was wrong on this ship. Some… hidden, dangerous thing had come aboard.

He hurried along the corridor and reached the seamen’s mess.

The mess was full of sailors. The soldiers all looked tense and confused at the sudden appearance of the General.

Belazov’s gaze swept over every person there. Then he waved to them and quickly headed for the bridge.

There were people here as well.

There were many people on the deck too.

For this trip, the Sea Swallow’s personnel had been reduced. There had been exactly thirty-two people aboard when they left, including himself.

The number was wrong. Very, very wrong.

Yet the thought that “everything is normal” kept jumping around in his mind, as if fighting against that sense of wrongness that now lay plainly before him.

Belazov stood at the stairs leading down to the engine room, his expression calm as he cast his gaze down the sloping passage.

His torn awareness was still struggling, but he no longer needed to care about the fine differences between the two forces in his mind.

There were still more than two hours until they reached Frostholm’s main island.

The ship was sailing in a straight line toward the city-state.

He took a slow breath and stepped down toward the engine room in the deepest part of the ship.

Chapter 320: Protocol Twenty-Two

The last corridor leading to the engine room was hot and dim. The endless mechanical vibrations and roaring sounded as if they wanted to drill into a person’s skull. The lights on the walls seemed to have trouble with the air currents, and the flames inside their glass covers shook and flickered.

But all of this was nothing compared to the growing sense of wrongness and tension pressing down on him, and the dizziness from his thoughts slowly tearing apart.

Belazov controlled his steps and controlled his expression.

The closer he came to the deepest part of the Sea Swallow, the more he forced his stride to stay steady, his face as calm as usual.

Several crew members were standing in the corridor talking. They wore strange leather “coats”. The skin on their faces folded in heavy wrinkles, and their voices sounded like a low buzzing noise.

Belazov walked toward them. His mind told him that these crew members were soldiers under his command, but he could not remember their names at all.

“General?” One soldier stepped up, looking at Belazov with curiosity. “Do you have any orders?”

“I’m just here to check on the engine room,” Belazov answered this unfamiliar soldier with a calm face. “Stay at your posts.”

The soldier looked at him, then saluted and stepped back. “Yes, General.”

Belazov walked through them with his usual steady stride. He could feel those soldiers' eyes rest on him for a moment, but they soon turned away.

Were they really his soldiers? Were they really crew of the Sea Swallow? Or were they that hidden thing? Or some kind of servants? Had they noticed something? Or were they already on guard? In the next second… would these soldiers whose names he could not remember suddenly throw themselves at him?

Belazov pushed all these thoughts down into his heart. He kept them buried until he reached the entrance to the engine room and opened the unlocked gate.

Even harsher machine noise rushed out to meet him.

The steam core was running at full power. Inside the spherical container, amazing, surging force was brewing. The complex pipe system hissed along the ceiling of the engine room. Huge connecting rods and gears were spinning quickly in the steel frame at the far end of the chamber.

The machine was running very "happily" – so happily it almost felt manic.

It was as if a restless soul was pushing those heavy steel gears into a wild spin, driving the ship at its limit toward the cities of the civilized world.

Even the hissing from the steam pipes seemed to be mixed with vague, whispering voices.

Belazov's body swayed a little, but he quickly steadied himself and walked toward the steam core.

A priest stood before the valves, swinging a censer. He suddenly turned his head and looked at the General who had just stepped into the engine room. The Church badge on his chest seemed to be stained with oil, making the holy symbol on it blurred and unclear.

“General?” The priest looked at him with curiosity. “Why did you suddenly come here? This place…”

“I came to take a look… at the state of the steam core,” Belazov said, and his gaze fell on the censer in the priest’s hand.

The little ball of flesh hanging there swayed gently in the air. A pale eye opened on its surface.

He raised his head again and looked at the running steam engines and the hissing pipes.

The steam leaking from the pipes carried a faint red tinge. The edges of the rapidly spinning gears were blurred and twisted. It seemed something was living inside this huge system of machinery, and its malicious soul had replaced the holy steam that should have been there.

The machines were already under corruption. They were in a state of desecration – this thought rose in Belazov’s mind for a second, then was blown away like smoke.

Even so, he still walked toward the control console of the steam core. Even though this huge “steel heart” now looked completely normal to his eyes, he slowly reached out his hand toward the controls.

“General,” an artificer with oil on his clothes suddenly walked over from the side and raised a hand in front of the control levers. “Please don’t touch these. Machines are sometimes very fragile.”

Belazov lifted his head and gave the artificer a look.

The artificer only met his gaze calmly.

Then, all of a sudden, the artificer’s lips moved slightly.

Belazov frowned a little and read several words from the movement of those lips:

“The machine is possessed. It cannot be shut down or destroyed.”

Belazov froze for a moment. Then he saw the artificer turn sideways. While the man adjusted the levers, his lips continued to move, very slightly.

“The priest cannot be trusted… the situation is in a runaway state… Protocol Twenty-Two.”

Protocol Twenty-Two?

Belazov’s heart tightened, but soon he knew what he had to do.

The artificer understood the ship’s “heart” better than anyone.

He turned and left the engine room. He did not go to any other compartment. After leaving the lower corridor, he kept his calm posture and went straight back to his captain’s cabin.

On the way, soldiers stepped up from time to time to greet him. Some gave him a faint sense of familiarity. For others, he could not even recall their names.

There had to be clear-minded, normal humans among these soldiers. But Belazov had no way to tell who they were, and no time to contact or test the thirty humans on board one by one, not counting himself and the artificer.

He locked the cabin door from the inside, went to the safe beside his desk, and began to turn the dial. With the crisp clicks of the lock, his fingers turned even paler from the force he used.

With a soft sound, the latch opened and the safe door swung aside.

Belazov’s gaze slid past the compartment that held documents and settled on the Red Button at the bottom of the safe.

Beside the button, a small line of words was written: Protocol Twenty-Two, for use only in extreme situations.

Belazov reached out toward the button – and at almost the same moment, he heard a knock at the door: “General, are you in there? We have received orders from Frostholm that require your personal handling.”

It was his adjutant’s voice.

A trace of doubt suddenly rose in Belazov’s heart.

What if he was wrong?

What if there was nothing wrong with the ship at all, and the only problem was himself? What if he had suffered a mild corruption that caused his thoughts and memory to twist, that made him hear things and see things that were not there along the way… If that was true, then he was about to bury everyone on this ship because of his own frayed nerves.

“General, are you in there? We have received orders from Frostholm…”

The knocking grew slightly more urgent than before.

But in that knocking, Belazov suddenly woke up. He suddenly realized that those thoughts did not really match his own nature. He was not someone who would hesitate at the very last step of an action.

Someone was pouring “impurities” into his thoughts.

“That damn heretic scum!”

Belazov no longer felt even a trace of doubt. He pressed the Red Button at once.

After a very short delay, a terrible explosion swept through the entire ship. The mechanical cutter Sea Swallow was suddenly wrapped in flash and flame. Under the horrifying force of the high explosive, it was torn into pieces.

The burning wreckage of the Sea Swallow floated on the sea for a while. Driven by the currents, it drifted slowly toward the waters north of Frostholm. Then its floating finally reached its end. The red-hot wreckage began to sink faster, as if dragged down by some invisible power. Its speed grew quicker and quicker, until it vanished completely from the surface.

…

At the same time, in the city-state of Frostholm, near Cemetery No. 3, an Old Caretaker in a pitch-black coat, his back slightly bent, was slowly walking back from the city.

He had just gone to buy some daily necessities on a nearby street. It was now close to dusk, and he had to return to his “post” before the shift change.

The road leading to the cemetery was deep and quiet. Few people walked there, but even so, a resident from the nearby blocks would sometimes pass along this path.

Whenever they noticed the Old Caretaker’s figure, they would unconsciously adjust their steps and keep a bit of distance from this hunched, gloomy old man.

They did not hate this warden. They simply felt a natural fear. It was not only because the area around the cemetery was eerie and strange, but also because of the old man’s lonely and cold nature. Even in the whole cemetery district, compared with the other wardens who were more or less gloomy, the Old Caretaker of Cemetery No. 3 could be called the most frightening of them all.

He had held this post for so long that even he seemed to have taken on a bit of the air of the dead.

That had even given rise to some frightening rumors. People often said they had seen pale lights floating above the fence after nightfall, and that those lights were the warden’s soul, long separated from his body. Others said that this terrifying old man lay down in a coffin at midnight, stopped breathing with the dead, and woke again only when the Sun rose the next day.

These eerie, chilling stories wrapped themselves around the cemetery and its warden. Yet the strange, withdrawn warden seemed to never care. In fact, he almost never dealt with the nearby residents. Aside from trips like today to buy the things he needed, he spent most of his time in the small warden’s hut inside the cemetery and usually only dealt with the Church’s corpse-bearers.

He saw nothing wrong with this.

Keeping the living away from the world of the dead, so the first would not suffer harm from too much curiosity, and the second could enjoy peace after death and take their last road in quiet – that was his responsibility.

He guarded the cemetery, and he guarded the city outside the cemetery as well.

The old man raised his head and looked toward the cemetery gate not far away, then stopped walking.

Today, something was a little different.

There was a small guest.

Chapter 321: A Snowy Day

A small figure stood at the cemetery gate. It was a girl of about eleven or twelve, wearing a dark brown wool coat and a black skirt, with warm little winter boots and thick gloves. She seemed to have been waiting at the gate for a long time. Snow had started falling over Frostholm in the evening. A fair amount of snowflakes had already gathered on the gray knitted cap on her head, and faint warmth rose from her in the twilight snow.

The girl lightly stamped her feet where she stood and sometimes leaned forward to look down the slope opposite the cemetery. When she saw the warden appear, she broke into a smile at once and waved hard in his direction.

“…Here she is again.”

The Old Caretaker could not help muttering when he saw the girl. There was a trace of impatience in his tone, but he still quickened his pace a little and walked up to her.

“Annie,” the old man said, frowning as he looked at the young lady in front of him. “You came here alone again. How many times have I told you that a cemetery is not a place for a little child like you to come by yourself, especially when it is close to dusk?”

“I already told my mother,” the girl called Annie answered with a grin. “She said it’s fine as long as I go home before curfew.”

The Old Caretaker quietly watched the smiling young lady in front of him.

Most people here did not like the cemetery wardens. They liked it even less when they had to come close to this eerie and dangerous place. But the world always had its exceptions – for example, a young lady who was not afraid of him.

“Grandpa Caretaker, has my dad been brought here yet?” Annie tilted her head back. Snowflakes fell at dusk, and in that falling snow she looked up at the hunched old man in black with full expectation. The cloudy eyes that made most people feel afraid did not make her nervous at all.

“…No,” the Old Caretaker answered as he always did. His voice was as cold and hard as the wind circling in the graveyard. “He will not arrive today.”

Annie did not look disappointed. She smiled as usual. “Then I’ll come and ask again tomorrow.”

“He won’t come tomorrow either.”

Annie still lifted her head. “But he will come one day, right?”

This time, the old man who always sounded so cold finally fell silent for a moment. Only when snow landed on his eyebrows did his cloudy, dark eyes move slightly. “The dead will always gather in cemeteries and, beyond that gate, enjoy peace forever. But it may not be in a cemetery of this world, and it may not be this particular cemetery.”

“Oh.” Annie answered softly, but she did not seem to take the words to heart. She only turned her head, glanced at the locked iron gate, then asked with curiosity: “Can I go inside and take a look? I want to warm myself by the fire in your little house…”

“Not today.” The old man shook his head. “Cemetery No. 3 is in a special state. Church Guardians are stationed inside. It is not open to visitors today. You should go home, young lady.”

“…All right.” Annie nodded, a little disappointed. Then she reached into the small bag she carried and took out a small package wrapped in rough paper. She held it out to the old man. “Then this is for you. My mother baked these cookies. She said I shouldn’t always be causing trouble.”

The old man looked at the thing in her hand, then at the snow on her clothes.

He reached out, took the cookies, then casually patted her wool cap, brushing the snow from it. “I’ll accept them. You should go home early.”

“Okay, Grandpa Caretaker.”

Annie nodded with a smile. She straightened her scarf and gloves, then started toward the little path that led back to the residential districts of the city.

But she had taken only a few steps when the Old Caretaker suddenly turned and called to her: “Annie.”

“Eh?”

“Annie, you are twelve years old now,” the old man said. He stood in the twilight and looked calmly into the girl’s eyes. “Do you still believe the words I told you when you were six?”

The girl stopped and stared at the cemetery warden in a daze.

The dead would all come to this cemetery. No matter how they had wandered and been scattered in life, Bartok’s Hall would be the place of their final gathering.

Those words were written in the scriptures of the Church. But when they faced that same line of teaching, adults and a six-year-old child would always have different understandings.

Twelve-year-old Annie stood there for a long time, staring. The black-clad cemetery warden stood at the tall, locked gate like a cold iron statue. Snowflakes fluttered between them. The chill of winter filled the dusk.

Then suddenly, Annie smiled. She waved at the old man and said: “Then just think I’m here to see you. My mother says older people need someone to talk to now and then.”

The young lady turned and ran off, light as a small bird as she flitted along the path where snow was starting to gather. She slipped once at the end of the slope, but she got up at once, patted the snow and dust from her skirt and warm pants, and hurried away.

“…Older people…” The Old Caretaker watched the girl’s receding figure. Only when she had run far away did he start to mutter. “This child has picked up some bad tricks.”

“Breaking a child’s hope is a bit worse than that,” a young, slightly hoarse woman’s voice suddenly came from the side, cutting off the Old Caretaker’s grumbling. “You didn’t need to say those words just now. A twelve-year-old child is already starting to understand what she should. Sometimes we hard-hearted grown-ups don’t need to tear every truth open in front of them.”

The Old Caretaker turned and saw a black-clad “Gatekeeper”, Agatha, already standing at the cemetery gate without him noticing. Bandages were wrapped under her black clothes, and the gate that had been locked a moment ago was now open.

He shook his head. “Let her keep hoping that her father will be sent to this cemetery, and then let her come alone to this cursed place on a snowy, freezing day?”

“Is that so bad? At least when you talk to that child, you look like you still have some warmth.”

“…That doesn’t sound like something a Gatekeeper should say.”

Agatha shook her head and said nothing. She turned and walked along the inner path of the cemetery.

The Old Caretaker followed. He first turned back to lock the gate again, then went to his warden’s hut to put away the things he had bought. After he finished handing the shift over to the day warden, he went to the mortuary area inside the cemetery and found the Gatekeeper, who had already gone ahead.

Compared to before, the mortuary yard was clearly much more empty. Most of the stone platforms were bare now. Only a few of the platforms near the edge still held plain wooden coffins.

Around those few coffins, at least two Church Guards stood by each platform. In the open areas between the platforms, black Gatekeeper’s canes were stuck into the ground. The black Gatekeeper’s cane was the mark of a guardian of the Death God’s Church. They planted the canes into the earth nearby and hung holy consecrated lanterns from the tops. In this way they kept a small area of Sanctum, which could effectively resist the forces of corruption that came from Higher Beings.

dusk had deepened, and the snowy weather made the sky far darker than on a normal day at this time. In the steadily darkening cemetery, the consecrated lanterns hanging from the tops of the Gatekeeper’s canes burned quietly like ghostly fire, filling the place with a still, eerie atmosphere.

“We have done quite a lot of preparation here, but it seems our ‘visitor’ has no plans to return anytime soon,” Agatha said casually when she saw the Old Caretaker arrive. “Are you sure that ‘visitor’ really mentioned the intention to come again?”

“You should trust the hypnosis skills of a professional psychiatrist,” the Old Caretaker said, shrugging. After a short pause, he added, “I can’t remember most of what happened that day. Those buzzing noises are also slowly fading from my mind. But after several rounds of hypnosis, I can recall a few things… The clearest of them is that the ‘visitor’ did reveal an intention to visit again before leaving.”

Agatha stayed silent for two or three seconds. After thinking, she said softly: “But there is another possibility. A Higher Being’s sense of time is very likely not the same as a mortal’s. When They speak of returning, it might mean tomorrow, or it might mean several years from now. More likely, it might mean after you are dead, when They reach you in some way that goes beyond life and death.”

“…Can’t you hope for something better for me?”

“This is the conclusion of the Holy See’s advisory council.”

The Old Caretaker only gave a vague grunt in reply. His eyes moved over the black-clad guards in the cemetery and the consecrated lanterns burning quietly on top of the Gatekeeper’s canes.

“…I only hope these arrangements don’t anger that ‘visitor’,” he said at last. “I hope They don’t see this as some kind of insult or trap. In the end, we know far too little about Them.”

“All these arrangements are only for our own protection,” Agatha said. “After all, even though you say you fell into a Spirit Sight runaway state just because you breathed in too much incense, none of us knows whether that ‘visitor’ has any tendency to actively release spiritual corruption. If we want to face a high-ranking supernatural, we must at least make sure of our own sanity.”

The Old Caretaker neither agreed nor denied it. After a short moment of thought, he suddenly changed the subject. “Those samples you took away earlier – have you found any conclusions?”

“Do you mean those cultists, or that heap of ‘corpses’ that melted into sludge?”

“Both.”

“As for those cultists, there isn’t much to say. They were claws of the Cult of Annihilation, supernatural individuals who had already formed deep symbiotic pacts with demons. Their strength was impressive. An ordinary Church Guard would be in great danger fighting any one of them. Sadly, those heretics clearly lacked good luck. As for that ‘sludge’…”

Agatha paused here, and her expression turned a little strange.

“Their ‘evolution’ has in fact not stopped even now. By the time I left the Great Cathedral, those things were still showing new forms and properties. In the recent period, they even briefly took on states similar to metal and stone. The feeling they gave… was almost like a certain thing those Annihilators often mention in their heretic teachings.”

The Old Caretaker slowly furrowed his brow. “You mean… ‘elements’?”

“The true essence, the purest and holiest matter, the ‘drops of reality’ that the Abyssal Lord gifted to the mortal world – that’s how those heretics describe it.” Agatha’s voice held open disgust and mockery. “Such beautiful words, put in their mouths, are simply sickening.”

Chapter 322: Another Blind Box, Same Old Place Again

Listening to the open disgust in Agatha's voice when she spoke about the Annihilators, the Old Caretaker showed almost no change in expression. Most of his attention still stayed on the latest report.

The "samples" taken from the graveyard had shown properties in the lab that looked very much like what those cultists described as "elements".

No matter how insane those Heretic cultists were, no matter how twisted and inhuman their doctrines sounded, as a member of the Church of the True Gods, the Old Caretaker still had to study their information. He had to understand their mad teachings and their highly corruptive system of knowledge.

And within the Annihilators' whole set of Heretic dogma, everything always circled around one core:

The Abyssal Lord, and the many "sacred miracles" created by the Abyssal Lord.

The Annihilators believed that the mortal world blessed by the Gods was not a "peaceful paradise" at all. In truth, it was a land that had already been deeply corroded and completely twisted, a "place of exile".

They claimed that the light and prosperity of the Mortal Realm were illusions woven by the Gods, and that the true destination of Mortal souls, and the “uncorrupted Mortal Realm”, were not here at all, but in the deep layers of the world – the domain of the Abyssal Deep.

On that basis, they believed the Abyssal Lord and the demons around Him showed the purest, most original, and least corrupted form of this world. They claimed that only by purifying their filthy flesh could Mortals “return” to the Abyssal Deep and go back to the original land.

But the mortal world was sealed by the Gods. There was a barrier between the “twisted Mortal Realm” and the “true Mortal Realm” (that is, the Abyssal Deep Sea). The Mortal body of flesh and blood was the physical form of that barrier.

As long as a Mortal’s soul was trapped in this shell and endured a lifetime of constant corruption, it would be impossible to return to the Abyssal Deep.

So, the Abyssal Lord would send down sacred miracles called “elements”.

The Heretics believed this holy substance was the foundation of all things at the birth of the world. The Lord’s Blueprint for shaping the Mortal Realm was hidden at the microscopic level inside elements.

Only elements, they said, could fight the curse in the flesh of all living beings in this world and let Mortals return to their “pure form at the dawn of creation”.

About this substance called “elements”, the Annihilators described it like this:

“…It will show all the properties of everything in this world and remain in an endless cycle of evolution. It represents all the plans and the Blueprint the Abyssal Lord used when shaping the Mortal Realm, and shortsighted Mortals will never be able to measure any exact property of elements…”

The Old Caretaker suddenly raised his head and stared into Agatha's eyes: "Do you think that is 'elements'?"

Agatha answered without a second of doubt: "elements is just nonsense made up by those Heretics. It is very likely just some new substance that our current system of knowledge cannot explain yet. Its changing properties might be some kind of natural phenomenon, or some kind of supernatural power – but it cannot be a 'sacred miracle' sent down by the Abyssal Lord."

But in the face of this answer, the Old Caretaker's expression still did not change. He just quietly used his gaze to watch the Gatekeeper: "Do you think that is 'elements'?"

When he asked a second time, Agatha finally fell silent for a short moment. After two or three seconds, she let out a light breath: "But I have to admit, at least in terms of properties… the samples we brought back match those Heretics' description."

The Old Caretaker raised his head and looked toward the mortuary not far away.

The light snow that had begun after nightfall was slowly growing heavier. Snowflakes were drifting down from the dark night sky. One gatekeeper's cane after another stood in the dim graveyard, and the consecrated lanterns on top of each cane lit the falling snow around them, adding a faint, hazy texture to everything.

His gaze passed through the drifting flakes and the lantern light and fell on an empty slab not far away.

There had once been a special corpse placed there.

"Those samples used to be a person – at least they used to look like a person," the Old Caretaker spoke as if to himself. "You led the team that brought him in. You should remember."

“Of course I remember,” Agatha said softly. “Very few bodies ever need a Gatekeeper to transport them in person. And that body fell into the deepest part of the mine. That is the deepest place in this whole city-state. Any dead brought up from there… are special.”

“But his level of ‘special’ still went beyond everyone’s expectations,” the Old Caretaker said as he turned his head and looked at the young Gatekeeper. “You found the real man who fell into the shaft the very next day, so that corpse was clearly only a ‘replica’ of the real dead… a replica made from elements. No wonder it drew the attention of those Oblivion Heretics.”

“Maybe it didn’t just draw their attention. Maybe the whole thing was their doing from the start,” Agatha shook her head. “We suspect that mine accident was caused by the cultists. Their goal was to use a sacrifice in the depths of the mine to make a ‘replica’, like some kind of sacrificial ritual. But clearly, something went wrong with their plan. That was why the replica was accidentally found, and even carried here to your cemetery.”

The Old Caretaker shrugged: “And it also drew the notice of an indescribable ‘visitor’.”

“…Yes, an indescribable visitor,” a flicker finally passed over Agatha’s always-calm face, and her tone became careful. “To this day we still do not know what He wants.”

The Old Caretaker looked up at the sky. After a moment of silence, he spoke: “It is late.”

The graveyard fell silent for a time. An unspeakable strangeness and quiet hung over the paths and platforms, soaked into the night wind that carried the swirling snow.

Everyone was waiting – waiting for an indescribable visitor, or for a safe and uneventful sunrise.

No one knew how long that silence lasted. Just as Agatha was about to urge the Old Caretaker to go back to his hut and rest, a series of light tapping sounds suddenly broke the night.

A clear, low voice came from one of the nearby coffins:

“Why did you stop talking?”

The sudden voice in the quiet graveyard startled even the well-trained Church guards for a moment. Agatha even felt as if the snowflakes drifting in the lantern light froze in place for two seconds. The next second, all the Guardians quickly moved to surround the coffin that had just spoken. Their boots thudded densely on the snow.

Agatha almost turned into a pale blur in an instant. She moved as if she had teleported to the side of the slab and stared hard at the coffin that had made the sound. Only after taking two deep breaths did she manage to keep her voice as calm as possible: “Are you… the visitor from the other day?”

“Sorry for dropping in. I hope I did not frighten you,” Duncan said from inside the coffin. He thought for a moment, then greeted them in a casual tone. “I did come once two days ago, but some cultists made trouble at the time, so my contact with the warden did not go very smoothly.”

Footsteps came from the side. The Old Caretaker, eyes dark and wary, carefully approached the coffin. He swept the dark wood with the corner of his eye in a quick glance, then pulled his gaze back at once.

Even though he had not fallen into runaway spirit sight this time because of the incense, and even though he had taken a potion beforehand to resist mental corruption, the psychological shadow from their last “contact” was too heavy. Even as a battle-hardened veteran, he looked very cautious at this moment.

“…Have you been here this whole time?” After calming down a little, the Old Caretaker finally broke the silence.

“Since you started talking about that ‘elements’,” Duncan’s voice came from the coffin. “I felt like I was hearing some very interesting news – but you suddenly stopped.”

Agatha lifted her head and exchanged a shocked look with the Old Caretaker.

Her lips moved slightly, but her voice went straight into the Old Caretaker’s mind: “Is this visitor… always this easygoing?”

The Old Caretaker shrugged and also moved his lips slightly: “How would I know?”

The two Church priests finished their short exchange. Then Agatha waved her hand lightly to the people around them.

The black-clad guards who had gathered around the coffin quietly stepped back a little. They did it to avoid letting their overly cautious reaction look like a challenge in the eyes of the “visitor” who had descended into this corpse.

Duncan, lying in the coffin, had already sensed all the auras around him. He had been lying in there for more than just a few minutes. From the moment the Old Caretaker and the young woman started talking about “elements”, he had been patiently and curiously listening in.

Now, as he felt the people around him move away, he laughed and said: “There are quite a lot of people here tonight.”

“…We have no wish to offend you,” Agatha answered at once, very carefully. For now she still could not tell what kind of being this “visitor” really was. But at least he had not shown any open hostility. When dealing with a high-ranked, non-hostile “godlike” presence, showing enough courtesy was the first step to communication. “All these arrangements are only to protect our own sanity.”

“Oh, I understand. People often start having problems in the head when they are talking to me. To be honest, it can be pretty troublesome,” Duncan said with a light smile in his voice. “It is good that you know how to protect yourselves.”

Agatha frowned slightly.

She had dealt with many supernatural beings before, including cruel and vicious ones, as well as chaotic and dangerous ones. But this was the first time she had met one who chatted with her like this.

“May we know what kind of being you are?” After a moment’s hesitation, she finally gathered her courage and asked.

Duncan lay in the coffin and thought seriously.

He remembered the brilliant record of the Vanished dragging the Viseran Thirteen Isles into Subspace, and he remembered what he had learned from talking with Morris and Vanna about the link between those thirteen islands and the death cult.

“I am just the Nameless Traveler. Do not be curious about my real name – that will be better for both of us.”

Chapter 323: At Death’s Door

After thinking it over, Duncan still decided not to reveal his identity for now. After all, he now knew the details behind the glorious “battle record” of the Vanished back then.

A century ago, “he” had sunk the largest faith center of the death Church in one go, and in the most terrifying way – by dragging it straight into Subspace.

If you put it in modern terms, it was about the same as blowing up Pland right in front of Gamona and scattering its ashes on the spot.

He figured that if he suddenly said the words “Captain Duncan” right now, the people outside the coffin might start shouting slogans and rushing in to die for their faith on the spot. By then, it would not matter what he tried to say.

He had seen how fierce loyal Believers could be. Back then, Vanna had no deep hatred for him at all, yet she had still greeted him with a flying cleave the moment they met. And the death God Believers here had held a blood feud with the Vanished for a full century…

But this awkward dodge from Duncan sounded very different in the ears of Agatha and the Old Caretaker.

The young Gatekeeper and the aging cemetery warden instinctively exchanged a look.

“This is a kind of protection,” Agatha said in a low voice. “The name of a high-ranked supernatural being carries power.”

The Old Caretaker nodded slightly: “A friendly existence. At least for now.”

Agatha steadied herself and set these thoughts aside. Her gaze returned to the coffin, but a new doubt rose in her mind: why did this visitor always choose the dead as a “medium” to make contact with the Mortal Realm?

Did that mean… he was a being who held power in the domain of death?

Yet as a high-ranking priest of the God of Death, she had never heard of such a being in the field of death. A single avatar form that could make a battle-hardened cemetery warden like the Old Caretaker fall into temporary madness the first time they met – an supernatural of that level could not possibly leave no trace at all in the records.

Even with all these questions in her heart, Agatha did not show it. She used a calm and proper voice to ask: “May I ask what your purpose is in coming here?”

“I was passing through, and then I noticed this city-state is wrapped in shadows,” Duncan casually repeated the cover story he had prepared long ago. “Those shadows bother me.”

“Shadows?” Agatha frowned. She quickly thought of the disturbance that had taken place in this cemetery earlier and reacted at once. “Do you mean those Annihilators? Their activities…”

“They are not worthy of being called shadows. The true shadows stand behind them,” Duncan said slowly. He knew the young woman’s voice outside represented the Church’s influence in the upper levels of Frostholm. Guiding her mind was really the same as warning the authorities of Frostholm. He had already prepared a whole package of things to report.

“Have you really noticed nothing? The Abyssal Lord’s power is spreading beneath your city…”

“What did you say?” For the first time, Agatha’s calm expression showed a hint of a runaway state. All the plans she had formed in her head up to now had not included anything like this. “The Abyssal Lord?! His power is spreading under the city… what does that mean?”

Jumping straight from Annihilators to the Abyssal Lord behind them… that was a completely different level of trouble!

“Here is a suggestion. Why not widen the scope of your investigation?” Duncan did not directly answer her question. He just continued: “The Annihilators active in the city are only small ripples before a great wave. Something much larger is lurking under the surface.

“Take a close look at the Deep Sea, look at an old Deep Dive plan that almost everyone has forgotten, and look at the things that have recently risen from the Deep Sea. All of these are connected.”

Agatha and the Old Caretaker stared at each other.

The young Gatekeeper could not connect too many points at once. But the Old Caretaker, who had lived through a certain era himself, instantly thought of something.

“Do you mean… the Abyssal Trench Project?” the old man blurted out. When he said the words “Abyssal Trench Project”, his voice clearly paused for a moment. “Why would you know that…”

He broke off halfway.

It was not so surprising for a very high-ranked Higher Being to know about some secrets among Mortals.

Agatha’s eyes widened slightly. Her gaze moved quickly back and forth between the Old Caretaker and the coffin. Then she stopped and quickly whispered to the old man beside her: “I have to warn City Hall… something might happen near Dagger Island.”

“You had better go now,” the Old Caretaker answered just as quickly under his breath.

While the two of them talked quietly, Duncan’s voice suddenly came again from the dark coffin: “Then my warning has been delivered. I will not stay any longer.”

Agatha froze, then spoke without thinking: “You are leaving already?”

“I still have some things to do,” the voice in the coffin said. It sounded a little rushed. “If I get the chance, I will come visit again.”

When he finished speaking, the coffin went completely quiet.

The visitor had left, and he had left quite suddenly. Agatha and the Old Caretaker were a bit stunned. They had not expected that the mysterious “Visitor” would come this night only to say a few sentences, only to deliver a warning.

Such a sudden arrival and sudden departure made him seem even harder to grasp in their eyes.

While the two in the graveyard were still in shock, Duncan had already returned to that dim, chaotic, strange space.

He really had left in a hurry. In his first plan, he had meant to stay in the cemetery a bit longer. He had even thought about climbing out of the coffin to have a formal meeting with the cemetery warden and the Gatekeeper named “Agatha”.

But just now, while he was walking in the Spirit Realm, he had suddenly sensed something odd.

In the endless dark, star-filled space, Duncan looked up. His gaze fell not far away.

The countless tiny stars that represented the living beings of Frostholm were twinkling in the void. Among them, one star’s flickering was showing a strange change and releasing a strange aura.

Duncan moved closer and used his gaze on that “star”.

Its light was fading quickly, as if a living life was rapidly slipping away. But at the edge of that dim light, something else was quietly drawing near, trying to tangle with that star.

After a moment of thought, Duncan reached out toward that light.

…

On the cold sea completely covered by the veil of night, a few pieces of wreckage that had not been swallowed by the vortex were bobbing up and down in the waves, drifting north toward Frostholm under the push of the currents.

One larger piece of wreckage had broken away from the other fragments like a lone canoe. On this piece of wreckage, a huge, almost unrecognizable body suddenly twitched twice.

The body wore a torn military uniform. Horrible burn marks covered it everywhere. The flames had left shocking scars all over. The hair on the head had been burned away, and the face was so ruined it was hard to tell what it had looked like before.

The left arm was twisted in a strange angle, clearly broken by some enormous impact. Both legs were bent out of shape, skin split open and flesh torn.

Yet almost no blood flowed from those wounds – the heat of the explosion had already cauterized them all.

The injuries were terrifying, but this body… was still alive.

Belazov tried to open his eyes. He tried several times and felt as if he tore some part of his burned eyelids before he finally managed to see a faint, blurry patch of light and shadow.

Slow, muddled pain spread through every part of his body. It felt as if a rusty saw had shredded all the organs in his chest into tiny pieces. But all these sensations blended together in a strange numbness, so that he could no longer tell which feeling came from which part of his body – he could not even be sure if his limbs were still connected to his torso.

He knew his nervous system had probably collapsed. All his organs were failing fast. The last bit of adrenaline in his body was working as hard as it could to keep his brain going. He had not really survived the blast – he had only not died yet.

Fragments of memory slowly rose up in his mind. He still remembered what had happened on Dagger Island. He also remembered noticing something odd on the ship and activating “Protocol Twenty-Two”.

He felt a little surprised. In an explosion like that, he had not died on the spot. Somehow, he still had one last breath left. He could even look back on his life as he lay dying.

Maybe it was because the captain’s cabin was especially strong and blocked some of the blast. Or maybe it was because he had failed to save the thirty-one normal crew members who might have been on that ship, so he had to suffer all this pain now, as punishment for his failure.

But none of that mattered anymore.

He could just barely see the wreckage floating on the nearby sea. From this, he could tell that the Sea Swallow had been completely destroyed. The main structure of the ship should already have sunk into the depths.

He no longer had the strength to worry about whether those sunken remains would bring some new, unpredictable disaster. He had done his duty. He had done all he could to keep his oath of loyalty. Everything else was already beyond him.

Belazov slowly let out a breath. In the tearing pain in his chest, he calmly waited for the door of God of Death Bartok to open before him.

But the first one to meet him was not death’s Envoy.

Under the cold glow of the World’s Wound, a tall young man in a blue coat, holding a gatekeeper’s cane, had somehow appeared at the edge of the drifting wreck.

A length of black chain stretched out from the back of the young man’s skull, drifting upward into the air through a cloud of smoke. At the end of the chain floated a strange creature made of what looked like smoke and dust, its outline like that of a jellyfish.

Chapter 324: Critical Intelligence

In the last clear moment of his life, Belazov saw the figure standing at the edge of the wreckage.

The man’s tall, thin, and slightly pale face was reflected in Belazov’s pupils. At the same time, he also saw the black chains floating in midair, and at the end of those chains, the Abyssal demon—“Smokewisp Jellyfish”.

After a brief moment of shock, Belazov finally remembered one scene after another. He remembered this figure. He remembered those moments that had always been blocked from his conscious mind. He remembered that when he set foot on Dagger Island, this tall, thin heretic had been standing on the shore. When he entered the “secret room”, the heretic had walked at his side. When he returned to the Sea Swallow, the heretic had been standing inside the cabin…

Belazov’s eyes went wide. The charred skin on his face seemed to crackle as it split. He wanted to shout, wanted to speak, but only a low hissing came from his chest. At the same time, the tall, thin figure with the pale face finally lowered his head and looked down at the dying General.

“I admit I was careless,” the tall, pale man said calmly. His voice almost held no emotion at all. It was as if he was not speaking to a person, but muttering to a piece of rotten wood. “When you were walking around the ship, I only thought you were checking on the posts and positions—General Belazov, I must admit, your acting was excellent.”

Belazov only stared at him, eyes locked on the man. Fury boiled in his chest, but he could no longer drive this once-strong body to move.

“What a pity. You were just about to become an Envoy,” the tall man said with a hint of regret, shaking his head. “You would have brought the Lord’s radiance into the city-states, freed the mortals tormented by filth, and allowed the first paradise to descend upon this dirty, twisted Mortal Realm. Such a glorious chance, and you threw it away… you were only a step away.”

“Her… etic…” Belazov finally squeezed a trace of sound out of his chest. His teeth and bones scraped with a harsh creak. “You… will never lay your hands on…”

“Save your strength, General,” the tall man said, stepping forward. He looked down at the body lying in the center of the wreckage, already half among the dead. “Calmly accept your death. The Lord’s divine blessing will let this pitiful shell of yours be born again—you’ve wasted your chance to become an Envoy, but the merciful Lord still won’t abandon your suffering soul…”

With that bewitching whisper, the tall man slowly reached out his right hand. The Smokewisp Jellyfish floating behind him rose and writhed in response. From its gauzy, mist-like body, a growing red glow began to seep out. The blood-red light reflected in Belazov’s darkening pupils as his body grew colder and colder. His consciousness seemed to fade away completely, no longer reacting to the outside world at all.

“That took more work than it should have,” the tall man said, shaking his head. At last there was a trace of feeling in his voice. “Damn it. If it weren’t for that Queen… tsk.”

A sticky, eerie sound of writhing and sliding began to echo. The seawater surging around the wreckage started to bubble with abnormal black foam.

In the foam, strange, mud-like material slowly rose up and spread bit by bit toward Belazov’s corpse.

But just one second before that mud-like substance touched the body, it suddenly stopped.

Even the seawater around them seemed to freeze in place.

The tall man stared in shock. He instinctively tried again to connect with the Smokewisp Jellyfish, hoping to use the power of a Abyssal Deep spell to complete the next step of the ritual. But in the next second, he saw the General’s lifeless body suddenly move.

“Your vitality really is stubborn,” the tall man said, frowning despite himself. “Wouldn’t it be better to calmly accept your fate, General Duncan?”

“No.”

The big body lying at the center of the wreckage, almost burned to charcoal, opened its eyes again. Duncan looked at the cultist, his gaze carrying a calm gaze, a gaze that saw straight through the Abyssal demon bound to him by a symbiotic pact. “Continue. ‘If it weren’t for that Queen’—what comes after that?”

The tall man blinked.

Something was wrong.

He did not know what had happened, but in that instant all his instincts suddenly screamed. A terrible sense of danger seemed to pour out of his soul and flood his mind. He stared at the body whose eyes had opened once more. His instincts told him to step back, but his legs refused to obey.

Then the tall man finally noticed the strange changes in Duncan’s body. Duncan’s breathing was steady and strong. His voice was low and calm. His eyes were full of life. The man who had been dying just a moment before now seemed to have regained all his vitality.

The General even sat up.

"'If it weren't for that Queen'—what comes after that?" Duncan rose slowly to his feet. In this tall, burly body, he could even look down at the cultist. He stared into the cultist's eyes and spoke with steady seriousness: "The Queen you mentioned… you mean the Frostholm Queen, Ray Nora?"

As he spoke, Duncan's gaze slid past the cultist's shoulder and fell on the Smokewisp Jellyfish floating in the air behind him.

The jellyfish had already begun to react.

Abyssal demons could sense things that mortals could not. Even without eyes, nose, or mouth, that cloud of smoke clearly "saw" the truth inside the burned shell before it. It trembled, and the trembling grew more and more violent. Threads of black shadows leaked from its edges, prying at the passage between the Abyssal Deep's Deep Sea and the Mortal Realm.

Duncan could not help feeling a bit helpless. If not for this Abyssal demon, it would have been easier to keep pretending to be a dying General and squeeze more information out of the cultist.

"Who are you?!" The cultist finally reacted. The intense wrongness he felt and the constant danger signals from his symbiotic demon were enough to show how serious the situation was. Even if he could not understand what had happened, he knew that the soul inside this shell was no longer the original one. "If you are only passing through, I have no wish to clash with you…"

"Getting polite all of a sudden?" Duncan raised an eyebrow. This cultist was sharper than the two he had met in the graveyard. "Then why don't you tell me what you and your fellow believers are planning to do? And how that connects to the ‘Queen of Frostholm’?”

As he spoke, he suddenly lifted his head and looked at the Smokewisp Jellyfish floating in the air: “Don’t run.”

The Smokewisp Jellyfish suddenly shook hard. The black cracks spreading out around it shattered at once, breaking apart with a harsh tearing sound.

Abyssal demons were chaotic and dull, but driven by instinct, they still seemed able to “understand” a warning.

Only now did the tall man realize that his symbiotic demon had just tried to open a passage to the Abyssal Deep. A wave of late-coming terror clutched his mind. But he no longer had the time to communicate with his demon—because the “outsider” occupying the General’s body was looking at him with a calm, icy gaze.

“I… am just a nobody,” he said, lifting his head to meet Duncan’s eyes. He seemed to force a smile onto his face. “I don’t know the entire plan. You…”

“Then who does know the entire plan?” Duncan asked, expressionless. “Where are they hiding?”

“My fellow believers… they…” The tall man spread his hands, his expression twisting into something between a smile and a smirk. “They will be glorified because of me—”

Duncan’s brow twitched. Before he could react, a violent surge of energy erupted from inside the cultist’s body. In the next second, the cultist’s body swelled as if filled with air and exploded into a ball of fire.

Duncan only had time to raise his hand. The ghostly green flame formed the Veil, blocking and transforming the flames and shock wave that rushed toward him. When the explosion faded and the surface of the sea grew calm again, the cultist had already turned to ash.

Only a ball of black smoke drifting in the air remained—that was the Smokewisp Jellyfish, which quickly fell apart and vanished after losing the medium of its symbiotic pact.

Duncan stared, stunned, for a long moment before he came back to his senses. He could only look at the bits of debris floating near the wreckage and let out a sigh: “These crazy people really are ruthless… If they weren’t so brainless, they wouldn’t have ended up believing in a cult.”

As he spoke, he shook his head.

The cultist had already blown himself to pieces. No amount of regret would change that. Still, even though he had not gotten more clues from the man’s own mouth, Duncan had already gained plenty of useful information by “possessing” Belazov.

And among all that information, the most useful thing was without a doubt the cultist’s final mention of the “Queen”.

From the sound of it, the Frostholm queen who had died in a rebellion half a century ago… had caused great trouble for some operation of the cultists. That trouble had lasted all the way to the present. Even now, they still had to spend much more effort whenever they acted.

Duncan raised a hand and rubbed his chin, then lifted his gaze in thought.

Night had grown deep. The pale light of the World’s Wound shone faintly over the distant sea. At the end of the water, he could see the lights of the city-state’s coastline.

He did not know where Dagger Island lay, but it was clearly not far from Frostholm’s main island.

He might as well use this body to go to Frostholm—its appearance was a bit tragic, but at least it would not fall apart halfway like the last body.

Duncan let out a breath and walked toward the edge of the wreckage. At the same time, he called for AI in his mind, ready to have it carry him to the nearby shore.

But in the next second, he suddenly stopped.

He lowered his head in surprise.

This body… refused to follow his order.

Chapter 325: Handover

A weak yet strange power was resisting Duncan’s command over the body.

It was even trying to drive him out of it.

This power seemed to have been there from the very beginning, but it only became stronger and clearer after Duncan had the thought of going to Frostholm.

Duncan stopped in surprise. Even though that resisting force was still there, he still managed to shuffle step by step to the edge of the wreckage and look down at the now-calm sea.

He spoke softly: “I thought you had already faded away. Normally, after the heart stops beating, the soul leaves quickly.”

Then he fell quiet, feeling that faint but stubborn power. After a short silence, the body’s lips moved twice: “Leave…”

Duncan slowly closed his eyes.

On the oil-streaked sea, the body’s reflection was suddenly wrapped in a layer of ghostly green flame. In the flame, the ruined face flickered, then shifted into Duncan Abnomar’s stern, deep features.

“Hello,” Duncan said in the reflection on the sea, his gaze fixed on the body standing at the edge of the Sea Swallow’s wreckage. His voice was calm. “I think this way it will be easier for us to talk.”

The ruined body stood rigid and straight. The last trace of Belazov’s mind stared at the face in the water and at the ghostly green fire around it. His lips trembled again and pressed out the same stubborn word: "…Leave."

In the water, Duncan seemed thoughtful. "You're not asking me to leave your body. You are telling me to stay away from Frostholm?"

Belazov's body stayed silent. The body that should already have been fully dead still stood there, firm and unmoving, refusing Duncan's command to return to Frostholm.

"…You're the first to resist me—at least, the first to resist strongly enough that I can feel it," Duncan said calmly. "But you should know this weak resistance is meaningless. You're only burning out your soul faster. At most, you'll slow me down by a few seconds."

Belazov's body remained motionless, as if truly dead. But in those half-open eyes, a tiny spark of light still lingered.

"…I take that back. Your resistance does have meaning," Duncan said at last with a sigh. "Go in peace. I am not an enemy of Frostholm. I came here to help your city and your people."

He then fell silent for a few seconds. Looking at the still figure, he thought for a moment, then spoke softly: "Reinforcements have arrived."

Belazov's body swayed slightly, twice. Perhaps Duncan's words really reached him, or perhaps the last stubborn bit of his soul finally faded. The burly body lifted its head one last time toward the distant city lights. Then it fell straight backward with a crash.

Duncan sat up and roughly straightened the burned scraps of cloth on his body. Then he looked down at his hands.

That faint resisting force had vanished.

A whirl of spreading firelight suddenly appeared beside him. The sound of beating wings came from the vortex-like gate of flame. The huge skeletal bird rushed out of the spinning fire and circled over the nearby sea.

Almost at the same time, Goathead's voice sounded in Duncan's mind: "You didn't need to 'negotiate' with him. That was only a weak mortal soul."

"Weak, but worth respecting," Duncan said as he reached out his hand. AI flew to his side at once. The blazing ghostly green flame at Duncan's side rose and twisted, forming a doorway. "I'm heading to Frostholm, and I'll focus most of my attention there. You'll command the Vanished. And tell Alice to prepare some bandages and a large coat. Have her wait for my orders."

The spirit form flames roared outward. Duncan's body merged with the fire and, in the next second, turned into a column of burning light beside AI. Then a meteor-like streak of fire rose from the sea and shot straight toward Frostholm in the night sky.

…

At the same time, in the warm southern seas, lay the technical city-state of Lightwind Harbor, ruled by elves.

It was still deep in the night. Most of the city was covered under the endless veil of night. But on the eastern edge of Lightwind Harbor, a hazy and gentle glow still shone on the buildings and streets. Elegant, sharp-topped towers and houses with tall, steep roofs, full of elven style, were bathed in that glow. Vines hanging between the houses and the trees growing in the narrow spaces between lots looked lush and green.

This dreamlike scene in the Mortal Realm could make one think of the landscapes described in the elves' ancient books—those old scenes woven from forest dreams and strange tales.

Of course, such a sight was not a natural part of the city's scenery. The warm glow covering the eastern districts came from the sea near Lightwind Harbor.

A mountain-sized geometric structure, shining with endless golden light, was floating quietly on the sea near the elven city-state. Even though its outer boundary was still more than ten nautical miles from the city, the strange radiance it released was enough to change the light over almost half the city.

At the edge of this giant geometric body stood the temporary research facilities built by the city-state's authority. Enormous floating-barge harbors drifted on the calm sea. Steam and smoke spurted up from the engines along the edges of the floating platforms. Complex mechanical work towers were busy loading and unloading cargo from the ships moored inside the harbor. Small fast boats were constantly running back and forth between the floating base and the glowing geometric structure, never resting.

Those small boats went deep into the interior of the luminous geometric body. They carried supplies and personnel to the research ship near the "core stone sphere", or brought back important data.

All of these complex, busy, and efficient processes were calculated and coordinated by the giant steam-powered Sorting Engine in the center of the floating base.

At this moment, a "magic warship" very different in style from the local vessels was moored beside the elven-built floating base.

It was the sea witch Lucretia's ship, the Radiant Star.

Clockwork doll Lunie walked lightly up to the upper deck of the Radiant Star. Her mistress was standing on the deck, looking toward the tall and delicate central tower of the sea base.

“Mistress,” Lunie said as she stopped behind Lucretia and bent in a small bow, “the research team led by scholar Taran Ael has already returned from near the core stone sphere. They are now resting in the base. When do you plan to meet him?”

“In the afternoon,” Lucretia said without turning her head. “Let that elven scholar rest a bit more. Ever since we dragged this luminous core to Lightwind Harbor, I haven’t really seen him rest. I’m actually worried he’ll drop dead on my ship.”

Lunie thought for a second. “We could meet him in the sea base instead. We don’t have to let him come on board.”

“…Lunie.”

“Here.”

“Your sense of humor has improved.”

“Thank you for your praise.”

The corner of Lucretia’s mouth twitched. She glanced again at the tall tower in the center of the base. Jets of mist were spraying from the relief pipes on both sides of the tower’s top. That meant the power system of the Sorting Engine was automatically balancing its load. It seemed Master Taran Ael had indeed brought back a large amount of useful data this time.

“Elves really do have outstanding talent in mathematics and machinery. Dragging that thing to Lightwind Harbor was the right choice,” Lucretia said softly. “Only here can we gather a research team of this size at any time, and only here can we provide facilities at this level.”

“Morka could also do it,” Lunie said. “After all, that’s the headquarters of the Academy of Truth. The number of scholars there and their research conditions are even better than here.”

“It’s too far, and too close to the Central Seas—and I don’t plan to let the Radiant Star drag a giant ‘Visitor from Beyond the Sky’ along the main shipping lanes,” Lucretia said, shaking her head. “It would spook those inland city-states that haven’t seen any real storms. And besides, the Four Gods Church is still guessing that this thing is a fragment that fell from Visions 001. An object on that level… is best studied on the edge of civilization.”

Lunie thought it over, then bent a little lower. “Your judgment is most careful.”

Lucretia showed no reaction to the doll maid’s flattery. She only stood there, quietly thinking about something else. Suddenly, she seemed to sense something, and her expression changed slightly.

“I need to step away for a bit. My dear brother is looking for me.”

As soon as she said this, the sea witch turned into a swirl of colorful paper scraps, whirling over the deck like a small storm. She spun through an open window in the distance and flew back into the captain’s cabin.

On the table in the center of the cabin, a lens-and-scrying-crystal device with a complex frame was already glowing faintly and giving off a soft vibration.

Lucretia’s body reformed from the colorful scraps of paper. She walked up to the crystal device and raised her hand to activate the image inside the crystal sphere.

The face of “Steel Vice Admiral” Tyrian appeared in the scrying crystal. The background behind him did not look like any of the rooms she was used to seeing.

“Brother?” Lucretia frowned. At first, she did not pay much attention to his surroundings. “Why did you suddenly call me?”

Tyrian smiled in a mysterious way. “Guess where I am?”

Chapter 326: Close Siblings

Lucretia did not know for a moment how to respond to her elder brother. In the middle of the night, instead of sleeping, he suddenly contacted her across thousands of miles with an Arcane Scrying Orb, just to make this kind of joke.

But very soon, this “Sea Witch” faintly sensed that something was wrong.

Her straight-laced elder brother would never do something like this under normal circumstances. Unlike her, who always moved around alone, her brother had an entire fleet to manage. Also, the room behind him was clearly not on the Sea Mist, yet it looked a bit… familiar?

Through the scrying crystal, Tyrian noticed the change in Lucretia’s expression.

He had specially gone back to the home port to bring the scrying crystal onto the Vanished for this very moment.

“You definitely won’t believe this.” The pirate captain let out a breath and stepped two paces to the side with a smile, letting the scene of the cabin fall right in front of the scrying crystal and the lenses. “I am in my own room—my ‘own room’.”

Lucretia heard the deliberate emphasis in his words and looked at the image in the scrying crystal. At first she seemed confused, then thoughtful. Finally, shock and tension filled her eyes. She lost the calm she had at the beginning and suddenly stood up: “You…”

“As you can see.” Tyrian came back in front of the scrying crystal and spread his hands with a wry smile. “A lot of unexpected things happened in between. The final result is… I came here.”

Lucretia stared blankly at the scrying crystal for a full six or seven seconds. Then she frowned a little and slowly sat back down in her chair.

“I will help you take good care of the Sea Mist Fleet,” she said calmly. “And your twenty-seven bank accounts in Cold Harbor, Morka, Mormenzo, and Zarbustro, as well as the sixty-two treasure caches in the northern seas.”

This time it was Tyrian who jumped up in front of the scrying crystal.

“How do you know…” The pirate lord stared at his younger sister in the scrying crystal in near horror, but the next second he reacted. “You left a mark on the Sea Mist?”

“I do not need such a stupid method,” Lucretia said calmly. “Your way of hiding things was never very clever. From childhood until now, did any of the snacks you hid ever last until the end?”

Tyrian’s expression stiffened for a moment. Then he sighed helplessly: “I thought those hiding places for the treasure were all pretty secret. After all, nothing has ever happened to them for so long…”

“Anyone who owns a fleet as large as the Sea Mist Fleet—no matter if he puts his treasure in the city center, that is still ‘a pirate hoard no one can touch’.”

“I can’t outtalk you.” Tyrian waved a hand, skipping over this slightly awkward topic. “It seems you are not very worried about my safety.”

“I was worried at first, but if you really were in trouble, you would not be in the mood to joke with me,” Lucretia said, still looking indifferent. “So, what exactly happened? Why are you on the Vanished? Father, he…”

“He found my secret Harbor. Maybe you were right—I was never good at hiding things.” Tyrian sighed again. “There have been some problems around Frostholm. Something under the Deep Sea is stirring and drew Father’s attention. Now he has come here in person to investigate and approached me directly.”

Lucretia frowned: “So you have already seen him. I mean face to face.”

Tyrian spread his hands: “Do you even need to ask? I am already on the ship.”

Lucretia fell silent. She seemed to be hesitating about something. After a long time, she finally asked out of nowhere: “…How is Father now?”

“He is now… better than we ever imagined.” Tyrian carefully chose his words, trying not to let his answer be too affected by the absurd things he had experienced on the Vanished. “He really regained his humanity—and he has become even gentler than the man we remember. He talked a lot with me. About the Sea Mist Fleet, about the Frost Sea, about you and me. He also told me some things… related to Subspace. Of course, only in broad strokes.”

“You even talked with him about Subspace?!” Lucretia’s mouth clearly twitched. “Are you sure you are still normal?”

“I was not the one who brought it up on purpose.” Tyrian shrugged. “I just asked a casual question. I asked why the lower deck was locked. Then he told me that the entire lower structure of the Vanished is soaking in Subspace. The main reason the door is locked is to stop people from accidentally falling in.”

Lucretia drew in a quiet breath. Even Tyrian could clearly see her pupils trembling.

“Shock, tension, a sense that it is unbelievable, mixed with the thrill of seeing a whole new world, right?” Tyrian said with a bitter smile. “I understand how you feel. I already went through it once.”

Lucretia did not speak again. She seemed to fall into deep thought.

For less than a second, she even seriously wondered whether her elder brother had already been tainted by Subspace corruption, and whether the person now sitting in front of the scrying crystal was already a madman.

No one knew how long passed before she finally broke the silence again: “What is Father… doing now?”

“I don’t know. He went back to the captain’s cabin. The others on the ship said he is going to use some special methods to investigate the city-state of Frostholm. I did not ask about the details.”

“There are other people on the ship?” Lucretia asked in surprise.

Tyrian opened his mouth. He seemed about to answer, but a sudden knock on the door cut him off. Then he got up and left the front of the scrying crystal. From the sounds coming from off-screen, Lucretia only heard a few vague voices.

It seemed someone had come to deliver something to the room.

A moment later, Tyrian came back into view. There was now a plate in front of him, holding a freshly baked apple pie.

Lucretia’s startled cry came from the scrying crystal at once: “You even have apple pie over there?!”

“The ship now also has hot water and fresh supplies from Pland,” Tyrian said casually. “I know it is hard to picture. In fact, Father even mentioned that he plans to install a steam core on the ship. Then the hot water supply can be twenty-four hours, and we can add a Generator Array…”

As he spoke, he spread his hands again: “The good news is that, from the look of it, Father will no longer mind my modifications to the Sea Mist.”

Lucretia: “…?”

…

The bitter night wind swept along the coast. A faint streak of green flame flashed across the sky and fell in an instant into a deserted corner near the Harbor before anyone could notice it.

Out of the fire stepped a tall, broad figure. His entire body had been burned beyond recognition, a terrifying sight.

Feeling the cold night wind against him, Duncan drew in a deep breath on the soil of Frostholm.

Strictly speaking, this body’s physical structure no longer had the ability to breathe. But he could still feel the air flow into his chest, then leave again, steady and powerful.

“Frostholm…” Duncan lifted his gaze and looked at the part of the city lit up in the distance. Then he shook his head, walked slowly to the shore, and found a still pool of water. By the light spilled from the World’s Wound, he looked at the face now reflected there.

“With this appearance, the constables and guardians really would pin me to the ground the instant I show up.”

The water reflected a hulking, frightening figure. He was full of grim authority, yet also the sort of sight that would send someone running to call the police at first glance.

It was hard to imagine that the original master of this body had still held on to his last bit of clarity by sheer will in his final seconds.

“Belazov, hm… may your soul rest in peace.” Duncan looked at the reflection in the pool and said a last farewell to the former owner of this body. Then he raised his head and looked not far away.

AI was standing on a nearby chunk of broken stone. It spread its wings and let out a loud coo.

Duncan waved his hand, and the dove instantly turned into a stream of flame and vanished into the night sky in the blink of an eye.

Through the link built deep in his mind, he could tell that it had instantly returned to the Vanished.

Just as in the earlier tests—once a round-trip beacon had been set up, AI could use a kind of “teleportation” to cross vast distances in a blink and appear right at any beacon.

Duncan lowered his head and looked at the body he was now using.

The “avatar form” he used when walking through the Spirit Realm was exactly the kind of round-trip beacon that AI could use as a fixed point.

As he confirmed this, he also remembered the temporary body he had taken on his first night in Frostholm.

That body had been extremely weak and able to sense Anomalies. Soon after leaving the coffin, it began to fall apart on its own. At the time, he had no chance to run more tests. But thinking back now, that body had indeed never given him any feedback about “setting up a beacon.”

“One of the traits of a replica, maybe…” Duncan muttered thoughtfully. “Because it is not a complete Mortal body, it cannot carry power?”

While he was still thinking, a crackling burst of flame suddenly cut off his train of thought. Right after that, a door of ghostly green flame appeared out of thin air on the shore beside him.

AI had returned from the Vanished.

Duncan turned to look at the fiery door floating in the air. Three figures were slowly appearing within the glow of the flames.

These were the “helpers” he had asked AI to bring from the Vanished.

Chapter 327: Going Ashore in Disguise

Stepping out of the flaming doorway were Alice in full disguise, Vanna in ordinary clothes, and Morris in a dark gray coat, holding the Gatekeeper's cane.

Duncan needed Morris's learning to help him understand this city and to search for the whereabouts of that "Brown Scott." He needed Vanna's professional skills to track down cultists and, if possible, to establish contact with the local church. As for Alice…

He actually did not need her very much. But Alice wanted to come and take a look. On the other hand, since Alice was wearing the face of Frostholm's Queen, Duncan felt that bringing her along might be a bit of fun.

The ghostly spirit form flames faded quickly into the air. AI turned back into a white dove and landed on a branch nearby. In the cold wind of Frostholm, Morris pulled his thick coat tighter and looked up toward the brightly lit districts. Alice looked around curiously, while Vanna had already noticed the hulking figure standing in the dark.

It was a body that looked terrifying at first glance. That posture of returning from the flames was in no way something a living person should still manage. But this body stood there in the shadows with steady calm, watching them with a peaceful gaze, and the tatters of clothing clinging to it showed what identity this body used to have.

A vague, hard-to-describe “connection” rose in her heart. Vanna fell into a brief daze, then was already sure that this stranger she was seeing for the first time was the captain.

“Mr. Duncan,” she said as she walked up to him, unable to stop herself from giving him another quick once-over. She knew that the captain only used borrowed avatar forms when moving through a city-state. But when she saw the condition of this avatar form, she still could not help frowning a little. “This body of yours…”

“In fact, it is in pretty good shape—only the outside might be a little scary,” Duncan said in a low voice. “Finding an avatar form that is both sound and ‘compatible enough’ is all luck. This body is still better than that ‘sacrificial victim’ you saw in the sewer.”

Vanna instantly remembered some things she did not want to recall. The corner of her eye seemed to twitch, and her voice dropped: “…I would rather not think about that.”

Duncan smiled and lifted his head to look at Alice, who was still peering around everywhere. He waved to her: “Stop staring and come help. Did you bring everything?”

Alice finally came back to herself. She hurried over to Duncan in a few quick steps and lifted the small suitcase in her hand: “I brought it, I brought it! Clothes and bandages… wow! Captain, your face is really dark…”

Duncan ignored the doll’s loud exclamation. He casually took the suitcase from her, opened it, and checked the things inside: a long black coat suitable for hiding the details of his body, with a wide high collar that could cover his face and neck once it was turned up; a matching black wide-brimmed hat; gloves; shoes; some bandages; a bit of cash; and a neatly folded city-state map.

Duncan raised his eyebrows. The things were even more thorough than he had expected.

To get used to this new body, he had been focusing most of his attention on this side and had not paid much attention to what was happening on the ship. When he had Goathead pass a message to Alice, he only said to prepare clothes and bandages. As for the other things, including the cash… that did not seem like something Alice's head would come up with on its own.

"Mr. Tyrian helped prepare them," Alice explained on her own before Duncan could ask. "He heard that you were going to move around in the city-state, so he had me bring these things along too. Oh, right, he also told me to tell you that the map is the newest one. The red marks are the Sea Mist Fleet's secret contact points. There are some lines… some line-thingies…"

"Informants—human members on the Sea Mist Fleet's outer ring," Duncan said casually, with a hint of emotion in his tone. "He said he would never set foot on Frostholm's land again… but his eyes clearly never left this city. He is only one step away from walking in himself."

"Oh, right, informants," Alice said, nodding quickly. Then she leaned over the suitcase again and asked: "Will these things be useful?"

Duncan nodded slightly: "All of them. Tyrian really put some thought into this."

As he spoke, he picked up the bandages and handed them to Vanna beside him: "Give me a hand—you know how to do this, right?"

When Vanna saw what lay in the suitcase, she already knew what Duncan meant to do. She took the bandages, but before wrapping them around the captain, she still asked, not quite reassured: “Will this really work? I feel it is still a bit too eye-catching…”

“We just need to cover things up. I do not plan to settle in Frostholm in this body,” Duncan said, cooperating with Vanna’s movements. “I only need to walk down the street without drawing the constables. If we run into a situation where it is really hard for me to move, I will need you and Morris to handle it.”

“Alright.” Vanna nodded. Her hands were already moving quickly as she began wrapping the bandages around Duncan. Her motions were skilled. It was clear she had done similar things many times.

On the front line against heretics and malevolent spirits, treating wounds was as normal and inevitable as breathing.

Alice watched Vanna working and looked eager to join in: “Can I help?”

Duncan tilted his head a little and glanced at the doll, who was a bit over one meter sixty. Then he looked at Vanna, who was about one meter ninety.

Then he lowered his eyes to his own current body, which must have been over one meter ninety as well.

“Forget it. If you tilt your head back, it will fall off,” he said, turning down the doll. At the same time, he reminded her, not quite at ease: “Remember, this is a city-state—and Frostholm at that. Keep your disguise in order. It is not just your wig and head that must stay on. Do not take off the veil on your face either. Got it? That face of yours here might scare anyone over fifty half to death.”

Alice answered at once: “Got it!”

Duncan nodded slightly, and his gaze shifted back to Vanna.

To move around and act in an unfamiliar Frostholm, she clearly could not keep that eye-catching armor-and-greatsword look. To move more easily in the city, she now wore everyday clothes.

She had on a gray, fitted women's long coat, with black boots and trousers below. Her gray-white hair still hung loosely down her back as usual. She looked as bold and sharp as ever, but without the armor and greatsword, her presence seemed a little softer.

Even so, with her one meter ninety height, any hope of really blending into the crowd was very slim. Her outfit might avoid direct questioning, but it would never be truly low-key.

While he was thinking, the bandages had already reached his face, wrapping layer after layer around his ruined head.

In the end, his entire face was covered, except for his eyes and a small patch of relatively intact skin near his left eye.

Then he put on the long black coat with the tall collar, as well as the shoes, gloves, and wide-brimmed hat.

Luckily, this body was very broad and solid, almost the same size as his true body, so everything fit quite well.

Duncan gave his clothes a final straightening and carefully fastened the coat buttons all the way to the last one.

He could not see how he looked now, but he could easily imagine it.

A long black coat covering his whole body, a wide-brimmed hat and raised collar hiding his face, black leather gloves, and the faint glimpse of layered bandages in the gaps between hat and coat.

He thought for a moment, then turned to the young Inquisitor standing quietly to the side: "Vanna, tell me honestly…"

Vanna sighed: “Constables and guardians with little experience will probably stop you on sight to question you.”

Duncan was silent for a moment: “…What about the ones with a lot of experience?”

“They will call for backup.”

Duncan: “…”

“Alright, it is not actually that bad,” Vanna said, suddenly laughing a little and shaking her head. “That only applies in the core districts with high security levels—places with strong guard forces. In ordinary districts, you probably will not run into trouble. That is my guess based on what I saw in Pland. Frostholm should be similar. The only real concern is probably just your bandages…”

“The bandages might actually be the best part of the disguise.” Before Vanna finished, Morris spoke up beside them. “They might save us a lot of trouble.”

Duncan glanced over at him: “Oh?”

“Frostholm mainly worships the God of Death. Customs and symbols related to death are its special traits. Devout believers even add bandages and similar things to their clothes on purpose. priests also have such elements in their everyday vestments,” Morris said, thinking as he talked. “At most, people may see you as a rather odd Death believer.”

Hearing this, Vanna blinked: “These details… I had no idea. I only know the doctrines and taboos of the other Three Gods Church branches.”

Morris laughed: “It is hard to know the exact customs of each city-state without studying them.”

Duncan looked at the old scholar: “Is this what that ‘old friend’ of yours shared with you?”

Morris went quiet for a moment and let out a soft sigh: “Yes. Brown Scott was an excellent folklore scholar. He spent his life traveling between many city-states in the central and northern regions, especially Frostholm and Cold Harbor. He wrote me many letters describing the strange customs and beliefs of these places.”

Chapter 328: Sailing to Dagger Island

After they finished their disguises and preparations, Duncan turned his gaze toward the bright, bustling city district.

Vanna judged the state of the city from her own experience: “It is curfew now. There will be Guardian patrols on the streets, but in the outlying areas the patrols will be weaker. Even in a developed place like Pland, the Guardians in the Lower City cannot watch every corner. Usually, the security standard in the outer districts is: ‘If an supernatural runaway state occurs, the nearest squad must be able to reach the scene within twenty minutes, and casualties should not spread to the nearby blocks if it can be helped.’”

“The Sea Swallow exploded in the coastal waters near the city. No one on board survived. That kind of thing cannot be hidden. By now the Frostholm authority should already be busy, but they will probably not be able to reach any conclusion for a while,” Morris said from the side. “We should give them a warning.”

“Oh, that is easy. I am good at all kinds of anonymous reports, and they usually make the local offices very nervous,” Duncan said casually. “But besides giving a warning, we also have to run our own investigation. This whole thing is strange. I can smell a mood in it that feels a bit like what we saw back in Pland. Whatever those cultists are doing… it is probably not small.”

As he spoke, he reached out and picked up the map Tyrian had prepared for him.

The map was very detailed, with all kinds of special marks. It was clearly not something sold to the public inside the city-state. Without a doubt, the Informants Tyrian had planted in this city had contributed a lot to this map.

Duncan quickly found two places that deserved attention: Hearth Street on the edge of the inner city, and a cemetery area that lay even closer to the inner-city core.

His gaze fell on the special block marked as the cemetery district. The whole area was numbered from one to nine, split into nine cemeteries. They almost encircled the Cathedral district at the center of the city-state, laid out in a rough ring. It really did not look like the usual planning of an ordinary city-state.

Was this also because of the faith needs of the God of Death Bartok?

“We will go to Hearth Street first and visit your ‘old friend’,” Duncan lifted his head and glanced at Morris. “After the curfew ends, you and Vanna can find somewhere to stay in the city. Alice and I will make a trip to Cemetery No. 3.”

“Cemetery?” Morris blurted out without thinking.

“Do we not want to give the city-state’s authority a small warning? We cannot just walk up to City Hall or the Cathedral and knock on the door to file a report,” Duncan said with a small smile. “We only need a channel that can pass the message along, and in Cemetery No. 3 I happen to know such a channel.”

Vanna spoke without thinking from the side: “Getting the message there is one thing. What matters more is making them take it seriously…”

Duncan turned his head. A confident smile was on his face: “Do not worry. They will take it very seriously.”

Under the cold, silent night sky, a White Dove flew out from the Frostholm coast into the colors of nightfall, beating its wings toward the lights of the distant city.

At the same time, far away on the Vanished in the Frost Sea, the door of the captain’s cabin finally opened.

Duncan’s figure appeared on the deck.

In the clear, chilly night, he moved his arms, legs, and shoulders a bit, feeling the strange sensation of one mind controlling several bodies at once. Only after the sense of delay slowly faded did he let out a light breath.

He had just spent some time getting used to his new body in Frostholm. Compared with his first clumsy attempt at “splitting his attention” back in Pland, he actually adapted more quickly and smoothly this time, even though he had added one more body.

In just a short while, he was already able to handle affairs on the Vanished while still keeping his actions in Frostholm under control.

Steadying his thoughts a little, Duncan asked in his mind: “Where is Tyrian?”

Goathead’s voice sounded at once: “He is near the aft helm deck. Do you need me to call him?”

“No need. I was going there anyway,” Duncan shook his head, then gave a casual order: “Adjust our course to Dagger Island. Full speed.”

“Yes, Captain!”

Creaking sounds rose from the taut ropes and masts, and the crash of waves against the hull broke the quiet of the night as the huge ship shifted its heading. Tyrian, who was standing at the stern deck and gazing into the distance, was startled by the sudden movement. He looked up in surprise and saw the dark wheel on the high bridge slowly turning. Under the faint glow from the World's Wound above, it looked as if an invisible person was standing there at the helm.

Even though this was not the first time he had seen such a scene since coming back aboard this ship, Tyrian could not help but frown a little.

Many parts of the Vanished were still the same as in his memories, but the ship kept reminding him, through all kinds of small details, that it was now a ghost ship that had been baptized by Subspace.

While he was lost in thought, Tyrian heard steady, powerful footsteps coming from nearby. He turned toward the sound and saw Father's figure appear on the deck under the veil of night.

"Did the sudden movement scare you?" Duncan had noticed how Tyrian had been staring at the wheel. He spoke with a faint, amused look. "Goathead is steering."

"I know. I have already seen it twice," Tyrian came back to himself and his face returned to normal. "I am just still not quite used to it. The Sea Mist also has some 'living' traits, but compared with that, the 'liveliness' of your ship is a bit too much."

"It brings unexpected convenience," Duncan said offhand.

Tyrian did not argue. After he watched the ship's movement for a moment, he could not help asking: "the Vanished is speeding up and changing course. What are you going to do?"

"I came to tell you that we are heading to Dagger Island."

"Dagger Island?" Tyrian froze for a moment, then reacted at once. "Something has happened there already?!"

“A Frostholm military ship exploded and sank on its way back to the main island. It had made a short stop at Dagger Island, and when it returned it had already become a carrier of corruption,” Duncan did not hide anything. “Now I suspect that the situation on Dagger Island may already have reached a runaway state. For some unknown reason, the whole alert system on the island has not reacted at all, and the Frostholm main island has not received any abnormal report.”

“…Penetrating corruption. Something has silently punched through the defenses on Dagger Island,” Tyrian understood at once, but right after that came strong disbelief. “But that… the defenses over there should not be that easy to pierce…”

“No defense system is flawless. Besides, corruption comes from the Deep Sea and is more likely tied to the Abyssal Lord,” Duncan shook his head. “The Frostholm authority should already be alarmed by that warship’s self-destruction, but I do not have much faith in them. I had better go take a look myself.”

“…Then what about me?” Tyrian thought for a moment and roughly understood what Father meant. “What do you need me to do?”

“I will send AI to take you back later. Bring your crew and stand by near Frostholm,” Duncan said after a brief pause, already having decided in his heart. “Prepare for the worst case.”

“The worst case?”

“The warship that suffered corruption sank, and it sank with an Anomaly speed,” Duncan said as he spoke, drawing useful memories and information out of the new body he had just taken over. “It was as if something under the sea was dragging it down…”

Tyrian’s expression slowly changed. A heavy look rose in his single eye. “You mean…”

“Since the Frostholm rebellion ended, half a century has passed. Let us assume that the ‘thing’ disturbed by the Abyssal Trench Project has never actually slept during those fifty years, but has been active all along, even consciously gathering strength,” Duncan looked toward the distant sea, his calm voice brewing a storm. “Tyrian, how many ships do you think have sunk into the waters near Frostholm in the past fifty years? Under that city-state… how many things might be hidden now?”

The deck fell silent.

Under the quiet, freezing veil of night, the Pirate Lord suddenly shivered.

…

A White Dove flew into the city. Deep in the cold, empty streets under curfew, a flash of ghostly green fire passed by.

A patrol squad of Guardians had just left this spot, and the citizens of the city would not come out at this hour of the night. No one noticed the sudden flicker of flame in the shadows of the alleyways, and no one noticed several strange figures stepping out from those shadows.

An old-looking house stood at a corner of Hearth Street.

It had gray outer walls, a dark sloped roof, a black front door, and a gas lamp with ironwork carvings fixed to the outer wall. It was a typical northern city-state building, and it looked like someone had been living here recently.

Morris took two steps forward and, by the light of the gas lamp, checked the house number beside the door.

This was indeed the residence Brown Scott had mentioned in his letter.

“I will go check first with Morris,” Duncan said to Vanna and Alice behind him. He wore a long black coat and a wide-brimmed hat. His voice came out from under the thick bandages, low and muffled. “You two wait nearby. Just do not alarm the patrolling Guardians.”

They did not need many people to check what was going on inside a house, and if this “Brown Scott” really was inside and able to talk, bringing too many people would only create more chances for trouble. After all, Duncan had not come tonight to cut down everyone in his way. He had come to gather information.

Chapter 329: Student

Alice and Vanna hid in the dark at the corner of the street. They would wait there for orders and keep an eye on the area around the building.

Duncan and Morris walked up to the building with the black front door.

The inside of the building was very quiet. That was only natural. The Sun had not yet risen, and this world's nights were never fit for an ordinary person to be out and about. Most normal people did not have much "night life" after nightfall. Going to bed early and waiting for morning was the rule.

But would a "replica" that had returned from the Deep Sea keep the same schedule as an ordinary person?

Duncan raised his head and noticed a clear button in the corner of the doorframe. He reached out and pressed it twice.

Faintly, they could hear the sharp, urgent ring of an electric bell from inside the building. In the stillness of the night, the bell sounded especially harsh.

"Maybe we should not be knocking on doors during curfew," Morris rubbed his forehead. His tone held a bit of doubt. "If we disturb a neighbor, it will draw suspicion."

"But your friend may not be able to wait much longer. It is better to be early," Duncan said calmly. "Do not worry about the rest. Making the Church suspicious or alarming the city-state authority is all just part of life. You should get used to being a member of the Vanished."

Morris opened his mouth but did not say anything. Duncan reached out again and pressed the doorbell twice more.

At last, they heard hurried footsteps from inside the building, along with the sound of something being knocked over. Then the light in the living room came on, and soft light spilled out onto the street through the nearby window.

The lock clicked. The black door opened a crack, and a wary eye peered out. At the same time, a young, nervous voice asked: “Who is it?”

It sounded like a young woman.

Duncan and Morris exchanged a glance. Duncan looked a little surprised, while Morris looked thoughtful, as if he had remembered something.

“Are you Galina?” Morris asked carefully. “Is Brown Scott Mr. at home? I am a friend of your Teacher’s.”

As he spoke, he turned toward Duncan and lowered his voice, speaking quickly: “That might be Brown Scott’s student. I heard him mention her.”

Duncan nodded in understanding. At the same time, the young woman behind the door clearly hesitated after hearing Morris’s words. Only after a moment did she speak again: “Sorry, it is very late, and Teacher is sleeping. Could you come back after sunrise?”

Morris frowned. The situation was not what he had expected. He had not thought that, six years after Brown Scott’s death, the man’s student would still be living in this house. But after a short pause, he found the right words. “We arrived too late and have not found a place to stay yet. Also, your Teacher wrote me a letter earlier. He invited me here.”

The old scholar paused for a moment, then went on: “My name is Morris Underwood. Your Teacher should have mentioned me.”

The voice inside fell silent. “Galina” seemed to be searching her memory. After several seconds, she spoke again: “Then… please wait a moment. I will open the chain.”

The sound of metal clinking and chain scraping came from behind the door. The person inside opened the safety chain that hung on the inner side, and the door finally swung open. In the warm, bright light, Duncan saw a tall, slightly strange figure.

She was only a few centimeters shorter than Vanna. Her height, almost one meter ninety, was striking. Unlike the tall but still slender Vanna, this young lady in the doorway had strong, powerful muscles visible all over her body. But what drew the eye even more than her height was her skin, which was gray-white like stone and traced with faint golden lines.

Aside from these obvious nonhuman traits, however, her face was no different from that of an ordinary young human woman. It even looked a bit… delicate.

Because she had just been woken from sleep in the middle of the night, this stone-like young lady wore only a loose nightgown. Her brown hair lay a little messy down her back. She held on to the doorframe and studied the two uninvited guests at her door with cautious eyes.

Just as Duncan was curiously looking her over, she was also looking curiously at Duncan: a broad-shouldered Visitor in a black coat and a wide-brimmed hat, with no facial features visible between the folds of clothing, only layers of bandages.

Even if people in Frostholm were used to “bandages,” this Visitor was still a bit too intimidating.

The muscles on her body tensed in a way that could be seen with the naked eye.

“Ah, I forgot to say,” Morris’s voice suddenly broke the tense, awkward mood. He turned to Duncan. “Brown’s student Galina is a Senkin. They really are not very common in the northern city-states.”

Then he looked back at Galina standing in the doorway: “This is Mr. Duncan. He is…”

“Morris’s friend, a traveling explorer. He is very interested in Mr. Brown Scott’s research, so he came by while passing through,” Duncan said first. “I hope we are not causing you any trouble.”

“…Teacher is resting. I do not know when he will wake up, but he did mention that Mr. Morris might come visit,” Galina said. Her soft, hesitant voice did not match her tall, strong body at all. It carried a kind of timid lack of confidence. When she spoke, she did not dare meet Duncan’s or Morris’s eyes. She muttered as she stepped aside. “Please come in. It is cold outside.”

Morris thanked her and stepped into the house with Duncan.

The turning of the hinges broke the silence of the night. The black door closed, and the street outside fell quiet again.

Just inside the entrance was a plain living room. The furniture looked like it had already been in use for at least ten or twenty years. One side of the living room opened into the kitchen and dining room. On the other side was a staircase leading up to the second floor. Under the stairs they could see a narrow door that likely led to a basement or wine cellar.

Under the bright electric light, no suspicious dark corners could be seen in the room. Everything in sight looked warm and… ordinary.

Duncan and Morris did not show too much curiosity. They only gave the room a quick look, then sat down in the living room under Galina’s guidance. The tall Senkin lady went into the kitchen and began busily making tea and preparing some snacks.

“Would you like some sweet pancakes and sausages? That is all we have right now…” Galina called from the kitchen to her guests, her voice carrying a hint of apology.

“Just some hot water is fine. No need to trouble yourself,” Morris waved a hand. When Galina came back over, he asked a seemingly casual question, “By the way, have you been living here all this time?”

“Yes, I have always lived here,” Galina nodded. “Teacher went away on a trip for a while before. He gave me the key and asked me to look after the place for him. So I moved in from my old rented place and have stayed ever since. He came back recently, and I stayed here to keep taking care of him.”

“He went away for a while?” Morris frowned without thinking. “When was that?”

“…About five or six years ago,” Galina thought for a moment and answered without much certainty. Her face held a touch of shame. “I can never remember times very well. Teacher always scolds me for that.”

Morris and Duncan exchanged a look.

“When did Mr. Brown come back?” Duncan asked, as if in passing.

“About a month ago,” Galina answered in the same casual tone one used for small talk. “He came back all of a sudden and said he was tired from traveling and needed a good long rest… Oh, it was after that that he mentioned inviting Mr. Morris over as a guest.”

“I was very surprised when I got his letter,” Morris went on smoothly. “He had not contacted me in many years. The last news I received from him, many years ago, was that he was going to sea by ship… Ah, I think it was a small mail steamer called the Obsidian?”

As he spoke, he watched the person in front of him closely, without seeming to.

But Galina showed no reaction at all when she heard “the Obsidian.” She only thought for a moment, then shook her head: “I do not know about that. He did not tell me much when he went out…”

Her tone and expression as she answered were perfectly normal.

But her answer itself was clearly wrong.

She did not know which ship her Teacher had taken when he left!

For an ordinary teacher-student relationship, that might not mean anything. But her bond with that folklore scholar was clearly more than that. Brown Scott had trusted this student enough to hand over the key to his own home, and she had lived here for six full years. After “coming home,” Teacher had let her keep caring for him without any doubt. With a relationship that close and trusting, Brown could not possibly have left without telling Galina his travel plans.

Galina calmly met the Visitor’s eyes. Her expression was quiet and peaceful.

It was as if everything happening around her was only natural.

Chapter 330:

Morris made full use of his way with words. In the calm, casual talk, he used hints and side questions to confirm many things with Galina.

During the talk, he and Duncan slowly confirmed the state of this female apprentice.

All the memories about the shipwreck Brown Scott had suffered six years ago, and everything related to her mentor’s death after that, had completely vanished from Galina’s mind.

No, it was not only the memories that had vanished, but the whole chain of understanding that went with them.

A person’s death set off a chain of reactions. It included ripples in one’s social circle, the handling of affairs after death, a long period of remembrance and emotional swings, and all the tiny changes that would have built up in this house over six years. That was not something you could fix by simply deleting and replacing a piece of memory.

Yet in Galina’s understanding, “Brown Scott died in a shipwreck six years ago” had never happened at all. No trace of the follow-up chain of events remained either. She only felt it was natural that she had lived in this house for six years, quietly waiting for her teacher to return. And now, in her eyes, her teacher had already come back and was resting in the room upstairs.

The kettle’s sharp whistle suddenly sounded, cutting off the talk in the sitting room. Galina stood up at once and walked toward the kitchen: “Sorry, I need to turn off the stove.”

While the Senkin lady was away for a moment, Duncan looked up at Morris on the sofa opposite and said: “Her cognition has been interfered with.”

“We should check the whole building,” Morris said in a low voice. “If Brown really is here, he must have left something while he was still clear-headed. He even wrote me a second letter not long ago. At that time he had clearly already noticed some of the truth.”

“…Let Galina rest for a while,” Duncan said softly.

Morris nodded. While they spoke, Galina had already come back from the kitchen. She carried a large tray with warming ginger tea and some biscuits. The lady with stone-like gray-white skin set the tray on the coffee table, looked up at the two guests and said: “Thank you for waiting. Have some ginger tea to warm yourselves.”

“Thank you,” Morris said as he pointed to the sofa beside him. “Galina, sit here first, sit properly. I need to tell you something.”

“Ah… all right, Mr. Morris.” Galina felt a little strange, but faced with her mentor’s close friend, she still sat down at once as told. “What do you want to say?”

Morris fixed his gaze on Galina’s eyes and said: “Lomonosov Inequalities.”

Galina’s eyes snapped wide open. A vast flood of knowledge, memories, and logical problems instantly covered all her thoughts. Before she could even grasp the rough outline of this “storm of information”, a strong, self-protective drowsiness was already rising in her mind.

She silently fainted. Her snoring was steady, and her sleeping posture looked peaceful.

Duncan watched this with no expression. After two seconds of silence, he asked: “How long will she sleep?”

“Depends on intelligence. Heidi slept for twelve hours that time. Galina should sleep longer,” Morris shrugged. “Folklore scholars usually are not that good at mathematics.”

For a moment Duncan did not know what to say. After a long pause he finally asked: “Why did you use this trick on your own daughter?”

“Heidi insisted that her hypnosis skills had already surpassed mine, and a father sometimes has some strange competitiveness.”

Duncan thought for a moment and felt there was no need to continue this topic. He stood up and looked at the staircase leading to the second floor.

“Now we can take a proper look. If Galina did not lie, her teacher should be in the bedroom on the second floor.”

The old stairs creaked. Bright electric lights lit up the corridor on the second floor. Morris and Duncan climbed the stairs and began to search for the folklore scholar who had “returned to the Mortal Realm”.

The layout of the second floor was not complicated. A straight corridor connected every room, and most of the doors were not locked. Duncan and Morris quickly checked most of the rooms, then stopped in front of the last door on the left side of the corridor.

It was the only locked place on the whole second floor.

Morris stepped forward and tugged the doorknob. His brows furrowed slightly. “Locked. Bolted from inside.”

“Locked from inside?” Duncan felt a faint wrongness, then remembered something. “Galina just said she brought food to her teacher’s room every day…”

“Impossible. This door has not been opened for many days – a week or more,” Morris said at once. His eyes slowly swept over the door in front of him, and faint light seemed to ripple in his gaze. “The lock also shows no sign of damage.”

“…So Galina only ‘believes’ she brings food to her teacher’s room every day, but in fact her teacher has not opened this door for many days,” Duncan said. He glanced back at the stairs leading down to the first floor. “The cognitive interference has kept going.”

Morris did not speak. He only raised his hand and gently knocked on the pale yellow door.

There was no answer from the room.

“Brown, it is me,” Morris called. “If you are inside, open the door. No matter what state you are in now, you do not need to worry. We can solve the trouble you have run into.”

There was still no answer.

Duncan quietly set his gaze on the door. He only felt that the situation… was not surprising.

In the end he gave a soft sigh. “Let me do it, Morris. We are probably still a step too late.”

Morris’s expression stiffened for a moment. He seemed to want to say something, but his lips trembled twice and he still said nothing. He only silently stepped aside.

Duncan did not use any fancy method. He just stepped forward and rammed the door. The ordinary wooden door, already not very solid, broke its lock with a loud bang and swung wide open.

A room almost completely wrapped in darkness appeared before them.

There was no light on in the room. The window facing the street also seemed to be blocked by something, so even the street lamps outside could not shine inside. Only the light spilling in from the corridor lit a small patch near the door. In the shadows beyond, they could vaguely see some dim shapes covering the ceiling and floor.

Duncan stepped into the room first. He raised his right hand, and in his palm he held a cluster of ghostly green spirit form flame. With his other hand he felt for the light switch beside the door.

When the light came on, everything in the room finally became clear.

“This is…” Morris, who followed him in, saw the scene inside and cried out softly in shock.

Patches of some gray-black, mud-like substance lay all over the room. They covered the floor, corrupted the walls, and even clung firmly to the ceiling. In some places half-melted “mud” drooped down from the filth on the ceiling and hung in midair. They looked like twisted, swollen blood vessels, or some strangely shaped stalactites.

In an instant, Duncan thought of the scene he had seen in the hold of the Obsidian back then.

These strange, horrifying “mud” patches looked almost exactly the same as the situation in the Obsidian’s lower hold.

The muscles in Morris’s face tightened.

To be honest, from the very beginning he had not believed that his “old friend” had really returned to the Mortal Realm. He knew that behind this affair there had to be some kind of runaway state supernatural manifestation, one of those manifestations of the extraordinary, maybe even tied to the Deep Sea’s curse. But even though he had faintly expected it before they opened the door, seeing this scene with his own eyes still hit him hard.

“The Deep Sea’s replicas… it seems they all end up like this,” Duncan’s voice broke Morris’s daze. “In the end we still came a step too late. It is a pity.”

Morris blinked, then shook his head hard, as if to shake out the tangled thoughts in his mind. He walked deeper into the room, carefully stepping around the clumps of “mud” on the floor, and after a while stopped by a table.

This table was also covered in mud, and the largest heap of mud was piled between the table and the bed.

“…He wrote two letters. At least at that time he still had some sanity,” Morris said softly. “He must have noticed his own Anomaly…”

“His sanity lasted at least until the moment he locked this room from inside. After that he could no longer control what happened,” Duncan said as he came to the desk. He watched the hardened mud around them with a thoughtful look. “These replicas from the Deep Sea do not all seem the same. Some have no trace of sanity at all. Some even keep their original memories and can live for a while like an ordinary person. And some… are like the captain of the Obsidian, twisted completely into a monster, yet keeping his soul from beginning to end.”

“Like some kind of unstable experimental product?”

Morris said this offhand, and just then something suddenly entered his sight.

There was a sheet of paper. It was pinned under the edge of a hardened lump of mud that faintly held the shape of an arm.

“This is…” The old scholar’s eyes went wide. He gave a soft cry and carefully pulled the paper free. “Mr. Duncan, look at this!”

Duncan moved over at once. On the dirty paper, a few words that were no longer very clear came into his view.

“To the investigator, the following are the changes that happened to my body in its final stage:”

Chapter 331:

The paper was crumpled, and many parts had been corrupted by the gray-black “mud”. The writing on it was blurred and broken. But after Morris carefully worked on it, many sentences still recovered to a state that could barely be read.

“Brown Scott” had recorded the strange changes that happened to him in the last clear stage of his mind:

“…Around four in the morning, twelve hours after locking the door. The growing tinnitus and bouts of vertigo already affected my movements badly. I could only write something when my condition was slightly better. There seemed to be bleeding under the skin. I saw bruises appear for no reason…

“Half past six. My internal organs seemed to roll, as if the structures inside my body had lost all order and each had its own will, moving around on its own. I did not feel pain. Even the dizziness eased a lot… Fear began to fade. Clearer and clearer memories appeared in my mind…

“Around seven. I clearly remembered the details of my death and became more and more sure that the real me had long since died. My left leg broke for no reason – or perhaps a section of bone in the middle suddenly dissolved and vanished.

“Eight fifteen. The left leg began to dissolve. First the skin split open on its own. Then the tissue inside flowed out like some gray-black liquid. Those liquid parts that left the body seemed to have a life of their own, crawling on the floor and even climbing up the walls… For a time I worried whether the boards I nailed over the window could block these strange and terrible substances. But later I found that once they left the body, they quickly lost their activity. Even while they still had activity, they seemed to consciously avoid sunlight… This may be very important information, so I record it here…

"…The heart stopped beating, yet consciousness still continued. I could feel that this body no longer worked by the normal physiological rules of humans at all. I tried to cut a wound. There was no blood in it, only gray-black viscous matter slowly flowing out… What material is this body made from now?

"The entire lower body began to dissolve. It took some effort to fix myself in one place and keep writing these words. I now cannot feel any pain. There is no breath, and the heartbeat had long since stopped. Now and then I can hear a buzzing noise, as if the substance that makes up myself is resonating… More and more of the viscous matter left the body, making a complete mess of the room…

"…I hope Galina will not be frightened when she cleans the room… Even though, as I write this name, I can hardly recall Galina's face in my mind.

"Half past ten. The thing I feared most began to happen. My vision quickly weakened. The world grew darker and darker. I have to feel along the edge of the paper and try to keep the writing below as clear as possible…

"Cannot tell the time now. It is probably between eleven and twelve. I heard a sharp, strange sound. It lasted about five minutes. After that, all the discomfort began to go away, and my sense of the remaining parts of the body also quickly weakened. I can faintly feel everything below the chest sinking down…

"Maybe another hour passed,"

The writing stopped here.

No one knew if the recorder's consciousness had finally reached its end, or if, after losing most of his senses, he could no longer place words on the paper. In the end this dead man left only a sudden full stop to the mortal world.

Morris stayed silent for a long time. After who knew how long, he finally spoke in a low, almost self-talking voice: "Ah, it really is his handwriting."

"Do you need some time alone?" Duncan gave the old mister a calm look. "I can wait outside."

"No need. I already mourned him once," Morris shook his head slightly. "I just did not expect to see his academic record again six years later. All this material is useful, right?"

Duncan did not answer at once. He leaned closer to the hardened, frozen "mud" and studied its edges with a thoughtful look. Then he picked up the record Brown Scott had left and carefully examined the places along the edge where the paper had been fully soaked by the mud.

The edges were blurred and uneven. The boundary between paper and mud seemed to have vanished, even showing signs of partial fusion.

"Have you found something?" Morris noticed what Duncan was doing.

"…elements," Duncan raised his head. "The Church in Frostholm is studying this substance. They think this sticky stuff left after a Deep Sea replicant collapses is in nature very close to the 'elements' spoken of by the Annihilators."

Morris was stunned for a moment, but by now he was somewhat used to the captain always having some new clue from who knew where. So he did not bother to ask where this information came from. After a short thought he said: “I know this term ‘elements’. If you want to study the history of cultists, you can never avoid their mystical talk.”

He paused, as if sorting through the knowledge in his mind, then went on: “Just as the Suntists firmly believe that the true ancient Sun will save the world sooner or later, the Annihilators have a similar ‘salvation prophecy’. They preach that on some day in the future, the Abyssal Lord will awaken from sleep and in rage destroy this mortal world that the gods have twisted and deceived. The Abyssal Deep Sea that stands for the ‘true present world’, will then rise from the depths of the world and once again become a paradise where mortals can live. Before that day comes, ‘elements’ will first gush out in great quantity. elements is the keystone of the world, the blueprint of all things. It will cover everything and restore the world to its true form…”

Listening to the old scholar, Duncan stayed silent for a few seconds, then raised his head: “Gush out in great quantity… from the Deep Sea?”

Morris did not answer for a moment.

“I am more and more interested in those Annihilators now. But rather than their so-called ‘salvation prophecy’, I am more curious how they have built ‘contact’ with the place a thousand meters under Frostholm at this moment,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “replicas come from the Deep Sea. The Obsidian and that submersible off Dagger Island were both like this. But a group of mystical Annihilators… how do you think they are touching a power a thousand meters under the water?”

“…Even for a powerful city-state, building a submersible that can travel to a thousand meters in the Deep Sea is not a simple matter. At the very least, it is not something a band of cultists could master,” Morris said in thought. “But they can use some indirect ritual to guide the Deep Sea’s power mentally, or to contact the Deep Sea’s… ‘mighty beings’.”

“So Frostholm must have a larger Cult base, a hidden place where they can hold large rituals,” Duncan said slowly. “It would be enough for them to keep stirring the power in the Deep Sea, creating replicants in the city-state and even invading Dagger Island.”

As he spoke, he raised his head and looked around the room. The only window was nailed shut with boards, and the ceiling, walls, and floor were all covered with dried mud that had lost its life. Every mark here seemed to tell, without words, of a shocking struggle and a decision to die.

And in his perception, the Vanished was already under sail, heading toward Dagger Island and Frostholm’s main island.

“Maybe in the end we still have to give the cultists here a little ‘Vanished shock’.” He said this softly. He rubbed his fingers together, and a small tuft of ghostly green flame fell from his fingertips, dropped to the floor without a sound, and quickly melted into the air and disappeared.

Of course Morris saw this, but he said nothing. He only gave the table beside him one last look.

That was where Brown Scott had last “worked”. Perhaps he had only been a short-lived replicant, but when that ever-collapsing body bent over the desk and wrote furiously, it still held a noble soul.

“…How do we deal with things here?” The old scholar raised his head and looked at the captain. “The marks in the room, the data Brown left, and… Galina downstairs.”

“We have already gained enough clues. Leave the rest to the people of Frostholm,” Duncan said calmly. “Keep the room as it is. Leave that letter in a visible place on the table, then prepare a denunciation letter. As for Galina…”

Duncan paused.

“The cognitive interference attacking Galina has clearly not ended. Even after the replicant in this building vanished, she has shown no sign of waking up. She even still believes her teacher is resting in the room. That means the ‘source’ that causes the interference is not her teacher, but something still active, hiding deep in the city-state. If we do not destroy that source, she will never truly recover.”

As he said this, he frowned slightly, as if he had thought of more.

“And we also do not know how many ‘Brown Scotts’ and how many ‘Galinas’ are still in this city-state.”

Morris’s expression froze. “You mean…”

“Rumors of the dead returning spread through the city, yet at the same time completely opposite news reached Tyrian,” Duncan glanced at Morris. “This city-state has probably been riddled through by replicants and cognitive interference like a sieve.”

Chapter 332: The Tailing Duo

In the whole house, aside from the last room where Brown Scott had been, they did not find anything that could be called an Anomaly.

In fact, even that room the gray black sludge had corrupted no longer held any trace of the supernatural. Aside from the visual shock brought by those bizarre sludge-like masses, there was not the slightest supernatural power left anywhere in the building.

Everything that did not belong to the mortal world had vanished along with Brown Scott.

On the first floor of the house, Galina still slept. The tall Senkin woman, her skin like stone, leaned in the corner of the sofa. Her sleeping posture was calm and gentle, her face relaxed.

In her dreams, she was still a student studying under her Teacher, still living quiet, ordinary days. Her learned and kind Teacher had just finished many years of travel and had recently returned home, ready to tell her many, many stories about faraway places.

“If only Heidi were here. She would mix some potions that would at least make this young lady feel a bit better when she woke up,” Morris lowered his head to look at Galina on the sofa, his expression a little complicated. “I can tell she was very close to Brown.”

“…The gloom will pass,” Duncan said. He fell silent for a moment, rummaged in his pocket, and took out a small crystal pendant. He brought it to his lips and whispered something to it, then pressed it into Galina's hand. "Have a good dream. Everything will get better."

Morris quietly watched what Duncan did. After a long time, he finally could not help speaking: "You even brought those pendants over here?"

"…I stocked up too many last time. I had half a box left that I really couldn't sell. No one even wanted them as gifts," Duncan said. His face looked expressionless (mostly because the bandages hid it), and his tone was flat. "So I figured I'd hand them out while traveling later… do you want one?"

"No, thanks," Morris hurriedly waved his hand. "This kind of feminine jewelry doesn't really suit me."

"Oh, right."

…

The night wind blew through the dark, deathly quiet alley. In the faint glow cast over from the gas lamp at the corner, Vanna watched the surroundings with sharp, alert eyes.

Alice stood at her side and tried her best to mimic her, looking around as well, but it was obvious Alice had no idea what Vanna was actually watching for.

"The street is so quiet. There's no one at all," probably because she was not used to such a silent, oppressive place, the doll finally could not help speaking. "Miss Vanna, what are you always looking at?"

Vanna answered in a calm tone: "Any supernatural beings that might appear, or suspicious shadows clinging around that building, if there are any."

"Huh?" Alice froze for a moment. "Will there be?"

“…What do you think Mr. Duncan asked us to stand by out here for?”

Alice thought about it and said: “Because he thinks I get in the way?”

Vanna said: “…You’re right.”

Vanna felt it would be hard to explain anything clearly to this solid wooden head, so she simply chose not to.

But she herself understood very well why they were keeping watch here.

A “replica” that had returned from the Deep Sea had been moving around the city-state for many days, and that replica had been living in the building not far away. The Annihilators who followed the Abyssal Lord could not possibly ignore that.

It was even possible that they had been the ones pulling the strings behind this whole affair.

Mr. Duncan and Mr. Morris had gone to investigate the situation inside that house. They were there to investigate, but also to bait a trap. Would any cultists be watching this place? Would the power that had sent “Brown Scott” back make a move tonight? Would shadows lurk in this street? If uninvited guests appeared, would those shadows still stay put?

Vanna controlled her own breathing and heartbeat, drew in her presence and power, and when she had confirmed that the street was still quiet, she once again hid herself beneath the building’s shadows.

Then she saw Alice beside her suddenly think of something and lean forward. The next moment, the doll raised her hands, cupped her own head and gave it a shake, then popped it off with a little “pop”. With one hand on the wall and her head held up in the other, she leaned out at the corner and swayed it back and forth toward the street.

Even a battle-hardened Inquisitor could not stop her eyes from twitching at that sight. Vanna stared, lowered her voice, and said: “What are you doing?!”

After Alice finished wobbling her head at the corner, she heard Vanna’s voice, hurriedly pulled her head back, and popped it back into place with another little “pop”. She looked completely innocent: “I was checking what was happening across the street…”

“Next time you have a plan like that, at least tell me in adv—” Vanna glared at the doll across from her, but halfway through the sentence she swallowed the rest, waved a tired hand, and said: “Forget it. Never mind.”

Alice looked completely baffled, but just as she was about to speak, she seemed to sense something again and could not help glancing outside: “Miss Vanna, I keep feeling… like someone is nearby, but I can’t see anyone.”

“Someone nearby?” Vanna became alert at once. She did not relax just because Alice usually seemed unreliable. Instead she tensed every nerve, sensing the aura around them as she asked in a low voice: “Where?”

“Just diagonally across, under that street lamp,” Alice whispered as well. To show how careful she was being, she even crouched down while she pointed toward the mouth of the alley. “But I only saw the strings, not the person.”

At first Vanna did not react. She only looked in the direction Alice was pointing. Two seconds later she suddenly froze, turned back to stare at the doll, and said: “Strings? What strings?”

“The strings on people, of course. Everyone has them. They float from their bodies up into the sky,” Alice said, gesturing as she spoke, her tone completely matter-of-fact. “There are some behind the head, and on the hands and feet too…”

She suddenly paused, then added: “Oh, right, Mr. Duncan doesn’t have any – though he is Mr. Duncan, so that’s normal…”

As Alice talked, her voice finally grew hesitant and trailed off.

Slow as she was, she finally noticed the strange look on Vanna’s face.

“…You can’t see them?” The doll hesitated and came up with the only explanation she could think of. “Uh, then I won’t laugh at you. The captain said people’s eyes aren’t all the same…”

“…I can’t see them, but this isn’t the time to talk about that,” Vanna snapped fully awake and forced her attention back to the street lamp not far away. “Are those strings still there?”

She knew what mattered most right now.

Alice could see invisible “strings” floating on human bodies, and she had always taken it for granted that this was normal and that everyone else could see them too. Because she took it so much for granted, this fact had only just slipped out now because of an offhand remark. This might well be the special power she had as Anomaly 099, or it might have some deeper, stranger explanation behind it. But either way, none of that was something they should be studying right now.

Someone was hiding nearby, and now he – or they – had already been exposed to the doll’s sight. That was what mattered.

“They’re still there, and they’re swaying a little side to side,” Alice whispered, glancing up at the area around the lamp across the way. Then she frowned. “Ah, it looks like a few of them are gone?”

“A few are gone?” Vanna’s heart gave a sudden jolt. The next second, vigilance surged up inside her. Years of battle-honed instinct and the crisis premonitions granted by the Goddess exploded together in her senses, making her snap her gaze toward a certain point deeper in the street.

In a patch of eerie shadow where the street lamps could not reach, darkness writhed and suddenly took shape.

In almost an instant, a gaunt, skeletal phantom appeared there. Right after it, a deformed freak linked to that skeletal shadow by chains also emerged –

It was a person, or at least the outline was still human. Yet his body had long since twisted and swollen into a horrifying state. His skin looked as if it had been scorched by fierce fire, charred and curled. His bones had grown out of order, forming broken plates along the surface of his body. Sharp bone spurs jutted and spread from his back, like the remains of some Deep Sea monster. Where his face should have been, there was only a hollow depression, within which a dim red glow flickered.

With just one glance, Vanna knew what this thing was. It was an Annihilation Priest who had already entered a deep symbiotic pact with Abyssal Demons and “purified” his own body to an extreme degree.

Annihilators regarded their flesh-and-blood bodies as cages forged by the gods. The way they pledged loyalty to the Abyssal Lord was by constantly using the power of Demons to reshape their own bodies, “purifying” their forms. This process gave them more and more Demonic traits and made them less and less like humans.

Once an Annihilator had purified himself far enough, his limbs mutated to a degree that even a temporary Transmutation spell could no longer turn him back into human shape, and he could no longer move among human society. He then had to rely on lower-ranking cultists to serve and feed him.

In return, however, he gained far greater power, as well as a stronger, more direct connection to the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea.

These cultists really were watching this place!

The thought flashed through Vanna’s mind, and in the same instant her body leaped high into the air.

To be able to move freely inside the city-state, she had not brought that steel greatsword of divine blessing.

But for a loyal priest of the Storm Goddess, a “sword” was not such an inconvenient thing.

The air compressed. Moisture gathered. The breath of sea and wind condensed in her hands into a blade of solid ice – just barely enough, but usable.

“Heretic!”

Chapter 333: Taking Action

With a fierce, exhilarating leaping strike that gathered the northern chill and the thunderous power born of the storm, and with a sense of pressure finally being released, Vanna’s body soared high. An icy blade had already formed in her empty hands, and in the cold radiance of the World’s Wound, the Vice Admiral’s sword came crashing down.

The air tore open. The nearby airflow twisted into blazing heat under the violent impact. By the time the blade had fallen halfway, it even began to take on a plasma-like texture, like roaring flames coiling around the ice-forged edge. The sight of ice and fire interwoven was so eerie and magnificent that even the cultist who looked like a Demon visibly froze for a moment.

For this Annihilation Priest, this should have been a successful ambush. He had noticed the uninvited guests ahead of time and used a spell to hide his own aura. His Demon body, fused by a deep symbiotic pact, could even let him completely stop his breathing and heartbeat for a short time. Yet this concealment that should have been flawless somehow got exposed and alerted his target.

The prey that should have been his target had now turned into a ferocious beast striking back – and that beast’s strength far exceeded his expectations.

The massive blade wreathed in great force came crashing down. The Annihilation Priest had no time at all to counterattack. He could only throw everything into a strange, piercing shriek. Compressed inside that scream was a powerful spell. Layers of black bone plates and rocklike shields rose up from all directions in an instant to block Vanna's falling path.

At the same time, the Abyssal Demon made of jagged bone shards moved under the drive of the pact to stand in front of its master, opening its mouth toward Vanna as it prepared to unleash a powerful corrosive breath.

Only at this moment did the shape of the skeletal Demon fully condense out of the shadows – it was actually a Abyssal Hound, a size larger than Dog.

Vanna had no intention of slowing down or dodging.

"Boom!"

A thunderous crash shattered the peace of the veil of night, laced with a string of tooth-grinding, sharp, tearing noises.

With one leaping chop, Vanna smashed the energy barrier and rock shields that the Abyssal Deep priest had summoned, along with the Abyssal Hound's corrosive breath and half of the Demon's dog-like head, all into flying shards.

The shock wave swept through the alley like a cutting gale, clearing away dust and smoke in an instant. The Abyssal Hound, now with only half a head left, shrieked as it was flung backward. The symbiotic pact chains dragged the Annihilation Priest with it for more than ten meters. They rolled along the ground together for a long while before finally stopping and struggling to get back up.

The heretic priest's twisted, mutated body trembled violently. The backlash from the symbiotic pact when his Demon was badly wounded made it hard for him to think. That deformed body hunched in the dimness, and for a moment it was hard to tell which one was the Demon and which had once been human – him, or the Abyssal Hound beside him.

The Abyssal Hound beside him staggered to its feet as well. Even with half its head cut off, the Demon's powerful vitality still kept it from dying. It let out a muddled low growl toward Vanna, while the damaged bone plates on its body clattered down one after another.

Vanna walked forward with no expression, casually tossing aside the long ice sword that had already shattered into pieces from the impact.

That thing had been meant to be disposable from the start, made just for a perfect, full-score leaping chop. Now it had fulfilled its mission.

The Annihilation Priest across from her barely lifted his head, struggling with all he had to clear his mind. Obscure, difficult Demonic whispers spilled from his mouth.

The power of a spell condensed into form. A twisted mass of bone and stone laden with rot appeared in the air in front of him and howled toward Vanna like a cannon shell.

Vanna raised one hand and caught the "shell" by force. She ignored the wisps of smoke that quickly rose from her palm and moved forward at the same pace. With her other hand she grabbed the half-head of the Abyssal Hound, which still seemed a bit dazed, and casually stuffed that "rotting projectile" into the neck cavity exposed by its missing skull.

The Abyssal Demon struggled wildly on instinct. Yet the strength that could have flipped a Steam Tank could not budge Vanna's arm. In its thrashing, it tore off the rest of its own head, while the "rotting projectile" it had summoned with its own power had already been forced into its own belly by Vanna. The bone plates layered inside the Demon's body gave off a crisp, continuous cracking sound, then quickly filled with bright light.

Vanna lifted a foot and kicked the soon-to-explode Demon away. Then she grabbed the Annihilation Priest beside it and casually yanked him up, holding him in front of her like a shield.

In this lightning-fast exchange, the latter had no idea what was happening.

With a thunderous bang, the Abyssal Hound she had kicked away exploded violently in midair. Bone fragments raked through the alley like shrapnel, and the Annihilation Priest in Vanna's hands was instantly riddled through like a sieve.

But he was not dead yet. He only convulsed and curled up under the fierce, sudden pain.

The entire clash had been very short.

"Your symbiotic pact Demon is dead. Judging by how far your body has mutated, you have about six minutes of life left," Vanna said. She tossed the Cult priest onto the ground and set her boot on the place that was probably his head. "I know your sort would never say a word even if someone left you alive, but I still decided to try. You have three minutes to give your last words. That will decide the way you spend the other three minutes dying."

On the other side, Alice at the entrance of the alley understood even less. She only stared wide-eyed as she watched Vanna trade a flurry of blows with a suddenly appearing enemy, casually smash a hideous thing that looked like some distant relative of Dog, and then leave the attacker seemingly on the verge of dying.

She had no idea what had just happened, but it was obvious that Vanna was very strong.

So the doll grew excited, clapping her hands hard: "Miss Vanna, you're amazing!"

But in that moment of distraction, she seemed to forget that a few "strings" were still floating under the street lamp across the way.

The air near the entrance of the alley twisted.

A second attacker had been hiding in the shadows.

Vanna's fight with the Annihilation Priest had been too swift. What happened in the alley had gone beyond what the attackers expected, and the priest's companion had not had any chance to help. Now this hidden second cultist had just arrived – at a very bad time.

With the twist of the air, a short but sturdy figure appeared near Alice. He had rushed here in a hurry, only to see Vanna deep inside the alley already stepping on the Annihilation Priest's head.

The cultist froze for a moment. He looked up at the brutal scene inside, then over at the blonde woman beside him, who had just reacted and was now looking his way with a curious expression.

The next second, the short, stocky man turned and ran without the slightest hesitation.

But he had only taken two steps when a voice sounded from behind him: "Hey! Wait!"

He suddenly felt as if something had yanked him. That pulling force tugged at every joint in his body, making him hang in place as if a huge power were dragging on him.

The cultist turned his head in shocked fear. He saw black smoke rising in the air beside him. The Abyssal Demon that shared his symbiotic pact seemed to want to struggle out and manifest to fight back, but something held it down in the shadows so tightly that it could not take shape at all. He turned his head further and saw the woman with long golden hair in a dress looking at him, her hand stretched into the air as if she were grabbing something invisible.

“Don’t go yet,” Alice said. She held on to the “strings” and stared at the cultist who was trying to run, doing her best to make her expression look a bit intimidating. “The captain said people like you are all bad. We can’t just let you go – you’ll go hurt other people.”

Not far away, the Annihilator who had just run out of the alley now hung frozen in midair in a bizarre, almost comical posture. His head had already twisted back to a frightening angle. He stared in fear at the blonde woman at the alley mouth. Driven by his instinct to survive, he seemed to break free of that “pulling” sensation just a little, and at once he put all his strength into flicking his wrist.

A prepared piece of rune paper slipped out from his sleeve.

“Choose life… and devour…”

He forced the words out with difficulty, his throat mixing them with obscure Demonic whispers. The pre-stored spell activated. The rune paper burst into flame before it even hit the ground and began to seek out targets to attack according to its master’s command.

Within a certain range, every living person.

The rune paper burned away quickly in the flames. Nothing happened.

The cultist stared, eyes wide, watching this in terrified disbelief.

Alice also widened her eyes not far away, watching the scene in confusion.

She had neither breath nor heartbeat.

And she had no idea what had just happened.

But she belatedly reacted soon enough – that cultist had apparently tried to kill her just now.

She felt a little scared, so she tugged hard on the “strings” in her hand: “The captain said when I go out, I have to protect myself.”

The cultist’s body went completely rigid at once. The little bit of “freedom” he had just managed to regain was stripped away, and even his wrists and lips could no longer move. A strange numbness began to spread. He felt his body quickly growing stiff, cold, and… no longer like flesh and blood.

The world in his eyes went dark.

But in the next second, something seemed to appear within that darkness.

A hollow, deep voice that seemed to come straight from a chest cavity sounded in his ears –

“Ah, a new Attendant has arrived.”

Chapter 334: Alice Manor

The new attendant had arrived.

It was as if that single sentence triggered some kind of mechanism. With a low, muffled rumble sounding in his ears, countless vague shapes suddenly appeared in the darkness before the Annihilator's eyes. Faint light of unknown origin flickered into the air, lighting up a broad yet ancient and elegant hall inside an Anomaly.

He stared with wide eyes. The hall was as splendid as a royal palace, yet it also looked as if it had been abandoned for decades. At the far end, a curved staircase spiraled upward, linking the high gallery and platform. Huge pillars stood dimly in the gloom, and fine draperies hung from their tops, swaying gently in a breeze that came from nowhere.

Dark, hollow windows lined the walls around the hall. Each opening looked like the gaping maw of some great beast. No light shone outside them, and the windows themselves were sealed tight by crisscrossing steel bars. Enormous oil paintings hung between the windows. The canvases showed no clear figures or landscapes, only eerie, colorful patches that made the skin crawl.

The Annihilator stared in shock at the scene before him. Then he suddenly realized that the restraints on his hands and feet had vanished at some point. He took two steps forward and felt his body return to his control. Instinctively, he called out to the demon that had formed a symbiotic pact with his soul.

However, only a hollow howling echoed in his soul. The Abyssal demon that had been with him for many years now felt as if it had never existed at all. Nothing answered his call.

“Attendant, step forward. Come to the end of the carpet.”

The low, muffled voice rang out again, this time coming directly from inside his head.

“Who is it?!” The Annihilator looked around in terror at the grand yet empty and uncanny mansion hall, but he saw no one.

He raised his head again and looked to the far end of the hall. A dark red carpet stretched from his feet into the distance. At the far end of the carpet stood the staircase, spreading along a graceful curve like a pair of wings that joined the second floor.

For some reason, the moment he looked that way, his legs started to move on their own. As if obeying the voice he had just heard, he walked toward the end of the carpet and stopped a few meters short of the stairs.

A figure suddenly appeared there.

It was a body dressed in a black formal suit – a body with no head.

The body stood straight in front of the stairs. The suit on it was perfectly neat. A folded handkerchief peeked from the breast pocket, and a thin gold chain of a pocket watch hung from the other side. In one hand, it held a brass bell. The other hand stretched forward. In that pose, it looked exactly like a trusted butler welcoming a new recruit into the manor.

But he had no head. On that body in the black suit there was only a bare neck, like the joint where a doll’s head should have been.

“W-Where… where is this place?!”

The new attendant spoke in a trembling voice. He could no longer remember why he had come into this sealed mansion, nor could he remember his own name or past. All he felt was a primal fear, and a strange wrongness that was slowly corrupting his heart. He looked at the headless butler in front of him and forced himself to ask his question. As his voice rang out, whispers and the feeling of unseen eyes turned toward him from every side.

In shock, he turned his head and looked around the hall.

Figures in attendants' and maids' uniforms were hurrying about. They were clearly the servants who took care of this huge mansion. Whenever these servants passed the foot of the staircase, they paused, as if curiously eyeing the new recruit.

Low voices of conversation came from deep inside their chests – because every one of these servants had no head.

Above their necks there was only a smooth round knob, like the joint piece of a doll, with a texture somewhere between wood and porcelain.

The new attendant stared in disbelief at the servants moving back and forth in the hall, feeling dazed.

Had there been this many people here before? When he first came into this hall, had it really been so busy?

"This is Alice Manor, and you are the new attendant here," the butler's dull voice suddenly said, snapping the new attendant out of his daze. "Come with me. Your post from now on is upstairs."

The new attendant nodded without thinking and stepped after the headless butler. Without meaning to, he glanced down and saw that, at some point, he too was wearing an attendant's uniform – just like the footmen in the hall.

His mind grew more and more muddled. More and more of his memories were drawn out of this body, as if they were “no longer needed” – impurities that only got in the way of him carrying out a servant’s duties in this mansion.

With every step he took up the stairs, his hesitation and doubt grew weaker. At first, he still vaguely remembered that he did not belong here. Then he only remembered that he seemed to be trapped in a strange mansion. By the time he was only a few steps from the second floor, all he remembered was the butler’s instructions to him –

He stepped onto the last stair, lifted his head, and looked at the platform before him and the corridor running along its inner side.

A few servants were walking along the corridor. Even though they had no eyes, the new attendant could still feel their gaze on him.

“Why is everyone looking at me?”

“Because you are the first servant here who still has a head,” the butler stopped, turned around, and there seemed to be a hint of a smile in his voice. “And it has been many years since we last had a new recruit.”

“What am I supposed to do?” the new attendant asked carefully.

“Serve our Mistress and become one of us here. You will naturally know what you should do. But before that, you should go and greet the Mistress first…”

The butler slowly raised his arm and pointed at a black door at the end of the corridor.

“Go on. Push that door open and pay your respects to the Mistress.”

The new attendant nodded and turned to walk toward the door.

His steps were steady, and his expression slowly became calm. The way his limbs moved little by little grew as stiff and mechanical as those of the servants in the hall. He reached the door and raised both hands. His calm gaze swept over his wrists, which had already turned into round joints. He pressed lightly, and the door swung open.

The puppet took a step forward.

Inside the elegant bedroom, which could almost be called enormous, a gorgeous large bed stood in the center. Patterned curtains and tasseled drapes hung down around it. A silver-haired doll lay quietly on the bed, deep in dreamwalking sleep.

Beyond the bed, at the far end of the bedroom where a wall should have been, there was only a wide, boundless darkness. It seemed to lead into some distant, deep space. There, floor, walls, and ceiling all broke apart in jagged pieces. Chaotic shadows of darkness and countless tiny lights far away slowly rose and fell, turning into strange, shifting illusions of light and color. They stirred silently at the end of the bedroom and murmured faintly in the dark.

That surging darkness and those tiny lights looked like the doll’s bizarre, colorful dream, yet also like some formless thing trying to invade the mansion, held back outside the Mortal Realm by the doll’s sleep.

The new attendant, now turned into a puppet, stood in the bedroom doorway. Its eyes were dull as it stared at the beautiful doll sleeping soundly on the bed and at the heaving darkness behind her. Then it bent at the waist and bowed deeply to the Mistress.

Several bright threads stretched out from its limbs, drifting in the air for a moment before vanishing from sight.

The new attendant stayed bent at the waist and slowly backed out of the room. The door of the chamber where Alice slept slammed shut before it with a deep, solemn boom.

But there would never again be any change of expression on this attendant's face.

Still bent over, the puppet took a handkerchief from its pocket and gently dusted the ornaments near the door.

…

"Thud -"

"Crash -"

The sound of a heavy object hitting the ground rang out at the mouth of the alley. The Annihilator who had just tried to run suddenly dropped from midair. He hit the ground with a loud noise, and his body shattered at once into dozens of pieces like porcelain. Even his clothes were no exception.

There was not a trace of blood on the broken porcelain pieces. It was as if he had always been nothing more than a fired doll, and that a body of flesh and blood had only been his lifelong illusion.

Alice jumped in fright. "Waaah!"

A gust of wind roared behind her as Vanna rushed to the mouth of the alley. She stared, dumbfounded, at the scene before her, then after a long moment turned to the doll at her side. "This… was you?"

"…I don't know," Alice blinked and slowly glanced back. "Um… probably?"

"What do you mean, probably?!"

“I mean I grabbed his strings and then pulled a bit – he struck first, I got a little scared…” Alice babbled, waving her hands as she spoke. Her explanation worked wonders; in just a few sentences she made Vanna even more confused. “Did you get that?”

“…Not at all,” Vanna shook her head, then glanced toward the depths of the alley. There, a charred lump of remains was still giving off thin black smoke. “Damn it. The priest I dealt with never opened his mouth in the end, and yours just shattered. We did not get any information at all.”

“So that means the captain is going to be unhappy?”

“We don’t have time to worry about that. We need to leave,” Vanna said quickly. “We made too much noise. Even if this isn’t the city center, the night patrols should already be on their way.”

As she spoke, she raised her head and looked at the mansion not far away.

Chapter 335: No Longer Real

The fight in the alley had been fierce but short. From the moment the two cultists' movements were exposed to the end of the battle, only a few minutes had actually passed. But Vanna believed that in those few minutes they had made enough noise to draw the night guardians over.

Of course, whether in terms of position or strength, she was not afraid of Frostholm's guardians – but this was not the time to start extra trouble.

Just as she was wondering how to signal Duncan, who had gone into the building, that dark, heavy door happened to open.

Duncan and Morris appeared in the light.

In the next second, Duncan strode quickly toward the alley where Vanna and Alice were. Morris, meanwhile, turned back to close the door and traced patterns in the air above it, patterns that looked like ancient letters, as if he were offering a prayer to the God of Wisdom to call on some extraordinary power.

"I sensed the commotion outside," Duncan came to stand before Vanna and Alice, glanced up at the alley, frowned slightly, and asked quickly, "What happened?"

"As we expected, there were indeed Annihilators watching this place – Alice noticed their traces, and we fought with them for a short time," Vanna answered at once. "Both heretics are dead, no one escaped. But the noise from the fight may have drawn the guardians. They will be here soon."

“Alice noticed them?” Duncan glanced in surprise at the doll girl beside him, then saw the strange look on Vanna’s face and realized what had just happened was probably much more complicated than it sounded. He did not press for details, only nodded quickly. “No time for talk now. Get ready to move.”

“I have already erased the traces we left,” Morris had finished cleaning up and walked over. “When Galina wakes up, she will forget everything from the past twenty-four hours. Even a very skilled psychiatrist digging through her memories should not be able to recover much.”

“Good.”

Duncan nodded slightly. He did not actually care much about hiding his tracks, but having fewer people get in the way at the start of an operation certainly was not a bad thing.

Then he raised his hand and made a calling gesture into the darkness.

The flapping of wings broke the stillness of the night. The White Dove that had been perched on a nearby rooftop swooped toward them. A second later, a ghostly green flame flashed through the alley, and only the sound of beating wings was left, fading away into the veil of night.

The streets and alleys fell quiet again. Only after a few more minutes did a series of hurried footsteps and the swinging light of consecrated lanterns appear on the distant street.

…

Ai did not go very far – in fact, it only flew to the next block and found a place to land near an old factory.

It was a small corrugated-iron hut that no one lived in.

The metal hut leaned against the old factory. One of its windows had a hole, not too big and not too small. Ai slipped through the gap into the hut. As the spirit form flame flared up, the figures of Duncan and the other three appeared inside.

Vanna quickly looked around. Thick dust lay over the old hut. In one corner there was a plank bed and a simple table with chairs. A pile of odds and ends lay heaped on the other side of the room. The cold wind howled outside, and the hole in the nearby window let out a whining sound in the gusts.

“It is for pump-room maintenance workers to rest in. Outside inspection periods, no one usually stays here – though I don’t know when the inspection period is, at least today this is a place we can use for a while,” Vanna said as she walked to the window. She looked outside through the dirty glass. The old factory not far away stood silent in the veil of night. The lights in the plant were clear, and she could hear the sound of machines running inside. “The factory is still operating. A factory that runs day and night like this will certainly have a priest on duty. If an extraordinary fight breaks out in the nearby streets, the plant’s alert level will go up as well.”

“That won’t be a big problem. We just won’t light anything. They won’t be able to sense us here anyway,” Duncan said casually. “We’ll stay here until dawn before we move again – is that all right?”

As he spoke, he glanced at the three people in his view.

Alice was a cursed doll. Vanna was a strong, beautiful maiden. Even Morris, the older gentleman who looked the weakest, was an extraordinary who commanded many kinds of divine magic. In terms of strength, Duncan did not need to worry about them. He only wondered if the cold winter night in this northern city-state would be too harsh on an old mister like Morris.

“Don’t worry,” Morris obviously noticed Duncan’s glance. He smiled slightly and drew in front of his chest the Sacred Sigils granted by the God of Wisdom Rahm. “Until just two years ago, I often went to explore ancient ruins and cursed wasteland realms at the edge of dangerous seas. The conditions there were far harsher than here. Scholarly research has never been easy work, especially when it deals with history.”

Duncan thought for a moment and felt that the old mister was right.

In this world, being a historian or a folklorist really was a tough job. Even scholars who preferred to stay at home needed a few powerful tricks up their sleeves. After all, they ended up fighting the very things they were researching every so often. cursed books and bewitched relics were not the sort of things that sat quietly in display cases.

All the more so for an all-rounder scholar like Morris – Duncan suspected the man had probably mastered hand-to-hand combat and survival in the wild long before he ever turned to studying history…

“We could also get in touch with the informants Captain Tyrian placed in this city,” Vanna said at the side. “They should be able to help arrange lodging and provide information…”

“I’ll contact them, but not yet,” Duncan waved his hand, then his expression grew a little more serious. “From today on, whenever we deal with anyone in Frostholm, we have to be ready to examine them carefully. That includes the so-called ‘informants’ Tyrian mentioned.”

Vanna froze for a second, then realized what he meant. “You have confirmed that ‘Brown Scott’…”

“He was a Deep Sea replica, and he had already broken down on his own. We were a step too late and only found a few clues he left behind,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “But we had more or less expected that. Besides that, we saw a female apprentice in that house whose memory and understanding were in complete chaos – she is an ordinary person."

Vanna's expression immediately turned serious as well.

"She is Brown's student, named Galina. In her memories and understanding, all parts related to her mentor dying in a shipwreck have already been completely erased," Morris said from the side. "And in the captain's and my judgment, this kind of thing… may no longer be an isolated case in Frostholm."

"From a little more than half a month ago, Tyrian started to receive strange and contradictory reports," Duncan continued. "Sometimes the reports said there were cases of 'the dead returning' in Frostholm. Sometimes they said it was all rumors and that the so-called dead had been normal residents of Frostholm from the very start. At times, these completely opposite reports even came from the same informant. At first, Tyrian thought this was the authorities of Frostholm controlling the flow of information, that the church was stepping in to reduce the impact of the strange events on the residents. But now it seems… it is very likely caused by confusion in people's minds."

"Captain Tyrian's informants are spread all across Frostholm… you mean this is a corruption of cognition and memory that covers the entire city-state?!" Vanna realized how serious this was. "Then right now in this city-state…"

"No one can say how many people are replicants and how many are originals. And that's the lesser problem. replicas shouldn't escape my eyes. Once I meet them, I can tell quickly. The real trouble is the ordinary people who are already not normal…" Duncan said. He paused, thought for a short moment, then shook his head. "In short, the informants Tyrian left in this city are no longer that reliable. Some of them may already have been replaced. Some may have had their minds twisted. Some might even now be eyes and ears for the Annihilators… when we contact them, we must be cautious.”

Vanna nodded solemnly – but in her eyes, a spark of joy was slowly rising.

A cold, mysterious northern city-state. Residents constantly being replaced. The spies once planted in the city no longer to be trusted. Ordinary citizens who looked harmless and normal slowly growing warped memories and minds. Unreliable voices filling the whole city as corruption spread under the surface –

This was good, because everything here fell right back into her area of expertise.

Eliminating heretics. Purifying corruption.

She was beginning to understand another reason Pope Helena had sent her to serve aboard the Vanished.

Pland, where the Church had already secured a peaceful veil of night, no longer needing a inquisitor like her. But as long as she stayed with the Vanished, she would always have a stage where she could fully use her talents.

Duncan gave Vanna a strange look.

“Is it just my imagination, or did your mood suddenly get better?”

“Ah, I just thought about how I can keep hunting heretics. That made me a little happy.”

Duncan opened his mouth, but for a moment he did not know how to comment on this young inquisitor. Very soon, though, he turned his attention to something else.

He looked at the doll who was standing nearby, lost in thought.

“Morris and I have finished reporting our progress. It’s time to talk about what happened on your side.”

Chapter 336: Doll and spirit coffin

From the very beginning, the world in Alice's eyes had seemed completely different from that of an ordinary person. Yet no one had noticed this until today.

Not even Alice herself had realized it.

Duncan had heard from Vanna about the battle in the alley and about how Alice had acted in that fight. From the moment she sensed the hidden enemy through the "floating lines" to the moment she turned a fleeing Annihilator into a shattered porcelain doll, the whole thing had astonished Duncan.

Now all eyes were on Miss Doll, who had been confused from beginning to end.

"…So you really can't see the lines…" Alice finally reacted. She scratched her head, looking innocent. "I thought this was common sense. After all, that stuff is floating above everyone's heads and limbs…"

Duncan stared into Alice's eyes, his expression especially serious: "Let me confirm something. Everyone has these 'lines', right?"

"Yeah, everyone does, except you, Captain," Alice answered at once.

Duncan thought for a moment, then asked: "…Is it just my real body that doesn't have them, or this body I'm using now as well?"

"You don't have them in this body either," Alice answered honestly, then added: "And the body you had in Pland didn't have them either…"

Duncan nodded lightly. His thoughts raced, one guess after another rising and falling in his mind.

In Alice's eyes, lines floated on everyone in the world, yet not on him, and not even on the bodies he occupied. So these "lines" were not attached to flesh and blood. They must have symbolized something more essential. A soul? Or a personality?

When she was close enough, she could easily "grab" the lines on other people and use them to bind or attack her enemies. What was this ability? Was it something she had always possessed as Anomaly 099 but had never shown, or was it a mutation that appeared after she became one of the Vanished?

Duncan kept thinking, his gaze never leaving Alice's face. Even this slow-witted Doll finally felt awkward. Alice subconsciously twisted her neck and said: "Captain… you keep staring at me… I'm getting really nervous."

"Oh, sorry." Duncan came back to himself and blinked, easing the pressure in his gaze. Then he turned thoughtfully toward Vanna: "As far as I know, Alice's official designation has been changed to Anomaly 099-Doll, right?"

"Yes. Her original name was Doll spirit coffin." Vanna nodded at once. She had already guessed what Duncan meant. "You mean Alice's power is also related to this change?"

"Maybe. From the start, spirit coffin and Doll have represented different powers. The former is a symbol of death, so it has that simple, brutal decapitation ability, while the latter is the power to control humanoid husks. That fits the idea of a 'Doll'," Duncan said slowly. "Before, Alice was the 'contents' of the spirit coffin, so the combined form of Anomaly 099 showed only the traits of the spirit coffin. But now the Doll has become the main part of Anomaly 099, so her original ability has been released."

“spirit coffin and Doll each have different powers…” Morris, who had been silent at the side, muttered. “That is a very likely guess.”

Duncan felt a bit emotional inside.

He had always thought that the great power of Anomaly 099 had vanished. After Alice’s wooden box underwent the transformation, she had only been a somewhat eerie but merely animated and thinking cursed doll, weak, timid, and foolish to an extreme. He had never expected her to show such a strange ability today. He really did not know how to put it.

She really was worthy of a number within the first hundred, even if by the standards of the Vanished she was still very weak.

Alice clearly did not think that much. As Duncan and the others talked, her gaze kept shifting back and forth, looking at this person and that. It took her quite a while to barely understand part of what was going on. Then her face grew a little uneasy, and she carefully looked over: “…Captain, did I do something bad?”

“No, it was a good thing.” Duncan shook his head at once. “You were very brave, and you protected yourself well. cultists are never innocent.”

“Then…” Alice thought for a moment and lifted her hand, gesturing as she spoke. “Then is my ability a bad thing?”

Duncan looked quietly at the Doll. After a long moment, a faint smile suddenly appeared on his face: “It’s a good thing.”

Alice still did not quite understand.

“You can control it, right?” Duncan asked.

“Sure.” Alice waved her hand. “It’s very easy.”

“Then it’s a good thing,” Duncan said with a smile. “Having power is never bad. Losing control is the problem. Now you can help me even more,

Alice.”

Miss Doll finally smiled. She swayed from side to side with extra joy: “That’s great. Everyone suddenly looked so serious, I thought things were really bad…”

Duncan simply reached out and gently patted Alice’s hair.

She was swaying a bit too much; her head was almost about to fall off.

At the same time, his thoughts did not calm down.

Even though he now knew about Alice’s ability and had roughly guessed that Doll and spirit coffin each carried their own symbolism, that did not mean all the mysteries were solved. On the contrary, it only made him more aware that the Doll in front of him still hid many secrets.

He had spent quite some time with Alice. Because of those days together, he had grown used to this Doll making a fuss on the ship and to the way she ran back and forth in front of him all day while still seeming harmless. He had almost forgotten that, before becoming the cook among the Vanished, this Doll had first been Anomaly 099, a strange thing that rose from the cold Deep Sea after the death of the Frostholm queen.

In a sense, she and those eerie, twisted replicas actually shared the same origin.

But she was completely different from every other replica that had appeared so far. There was no way there was no reason behind that.

For some reason, he suddenly thought of something an Annihilator had said after the explosion of the Sea Swallow:

“If not for that queen…”

Duncan shook his head and pushed his tangled thoughts down for now. He looked up at Vanna.

“What happened tonight proves one thing. The replicas in the city really were the work of those Annihilators. And those cultists are not only acting in the shadows, they are also secretly watching the replicas they released into the city. That kind of observation looks a lot like they are collecting data.”

“From my experience, this is preparation for a bigger move. The replicas in the city are only the beginning, and the corruption on Dagger Island is probably another, larger testing ground.” Vanna nodded. “They also tried to transport the corruption from Dagger Island to Frostholm proper. Even though we stopped that operation, it already shows their plan has reached a very critical stage.”

“It doesn’t matter. I’ll step in, but first I need to know which gutter they’re hiding in,” Duncan said casually. “Killing a few cultists or priests, or even wiping out a few gathering places, is meaningless. The experience in Pland proved that.”

As he spoke, he raised his eyes. Through the gaps in his bandages, his gaze passed through the dirty window beside him and landed on the rows of spires and eaves of Frostholm.

“…Where are you hiding?”

The wind grew stronger. The second snowfall began. Snowflakes drifted down through the veil of night, and the distant streets turned hazy, as if they had sunk into fog.

The snow fell almost all night. Only when the Sun rose and the afterglow of the World’s Wound faded in the sunlight, when golden-red light spread along the streets into the city, did the falling snow slowly come to an end.

The cemetery’s heavy, solemn iron gate creaked open. The Old Caretaker, wrapped in a thick coat, hooked the latch that held the gate in place onto the fence and glanced toward the street leading to the city.

Everything in sight was covered in deep snow. The distant streets had lost their shapes and edges under the thick white blanket, turning into a featureless expanse.

Steam pipes above the blocks spewed white mist. Heat from the steam cores was being sent to key nodes to melt the ice and snow on network hubs and power stations. Large snowplows rolled out too. These hulking machines, belching thick white smoke and roaring in a low rumble, drove along the streets to clear the main traffic routes.

Since the Visitor had left, the cemetery had returned to its quiet. No more anomalies disturbed the dead. But neither the cemetery's Warden nor the Guardians sent by the Church had relaxed after that.

In the second half of the night, an express dispatch had been sent to the Warden's hut through the high-pressure steam conduits. The express dispatch came from City Hall. Its content was strange: it ordered all supernatural defenders in the city to raise their alert level, but did not say what they were supposed to watch out for.

Not long after that, Agatha seemed to have received some information as well. She sent a squad to Hearth Street, and those Guardians still had not returned.

The wind and snow in the second half of the night had been fierce. The howling wind and swirling snowflakes had felt like a prophetic omen of something.

The Old Caretaker pulled his coat tighter.

"This damned weather…"

Chapter 337: Guest

The Old Caretaker did not like days when the snow kept falling. It was not only because the cold made his already overworked joints ache, but also because this kind of snowy day always reminded him of things from long ago.

Things that were not very good.

Like the rebellion fifty years ago. Like the great freeze thirty years ago. Like the huge collapse in the southern district seventeen years ago. When it snowed this hard, it was never a good sign.

The old man rubbed his hands together and looked back at the cemetery, which was also buried under snow.

Snow blurred the edges of the cemetery paths. On the white ground, only footprints traced the route to the morgue and the Warden’s hut. The gas lamps had gone out. The dark lamp posts stood in the snow like dead tree trunks, looking very lonely.

Several steam cars were parked on the open ground in the cemetery, already buried in snow. The black-clad Guardians were struggling to clear the snow off the cars and trying to open a path through the drifts wide enough for the vehicles to pass. They looked quite bedraggled.

They had to finish before the snow froze hard and the road became even harder to clear.

A gust of howling wind swept past. Gray smoke rushed in with it, and Agatha's figure stepped out of the wind and smoke. The young Gatekeeper came to stand beside the Old Caretaker and said: "Half the people will withdraw today. Only two squads will stay behind to help you ward the cemetery."

"They could all leave, for all I care. Then I could have some peace." The Old Caretaker lifted his eyelids and glanced at the Gatekeeper. "Keeping so many people here is a waste."

"It is not a waste of manpower. And you do not need to worry that I am short on people."

"I am not that free that I would worry about you," the Old Caretaker grumbled. Then, as if casually, he added: "You sent an elite squad out in the second half of the night. Did something happen in the city?"

Agatha looked at the old man: "You still care about things outside the cemetery?"

"I'm just asking. Say it or not, as you like." The Old Caretaker shrugged.

"…There was trouble on Hearth Street. A battle broke out between high-level supernatural individuals, and the disturbance was not small. The patrolling Guardians hurried there but arrived too late," Agatha said slowly. "Right now we can only be sure that one side in the fight were Annihilators. They died very miserably, and one of them died in a bizarre way that does not fit any supernatural power we know of."

The Old Caretaker's eyebrows clearly twitched, and his tone grew more serious: "Hearth Street?"

"…Don't worry. No innocent citizens were hurt," Agatha said. She seemed to know what he was worried about. "But from the squad's report, there is more than one strange clue there. I may have to go there myself to see what is happening."

The Old Caretaker said nothing, only nodded lightly, but his eyes had already become serious.

Agatha was a young Gatekeeper, but even so, her title as Gatekeeper had been earned through strict training and harsh trials. As the Church's highest representative in the city-state, her actions alone showed how serious and urgent a situation was.

The situation on Hearth Street was probably not as calm and simple as her current tone made it sound. It was definitely more than a single supernatural fight. An elite Guardian squad had gone to investigate, and in the end the Gatekeeper herself had to go handle it. It was no small matter.

But that was something outside the cemetery, not something a retired Gravekeeper like him should pay attention to.

Let the young Gatekeeper and Guardians deal with it.

After quite a bit of effort, the Guardians finally cleared away the snow and started the steam cores of the cars. Two dark gray steam cars drove out of the cemetery and soon disappeared down the path toward the city blocks.

The Old Caretaker watched the two cars leave, shook his head, and got ready to go back into the cemetery.

But just as he was about to turn around, he caught sight of a small, familiar figure at the end of the path out of the corner of his eye.

A little girl in a thick coat was walking toward the cemetery with some effort.

The Old Caretaker stopped at once. He watched the little figure walk closer, his face looking a bit angry. The little figure also saw the old man standing at the cemetery gate. She stopped by the roadside, lifted her face, and waved her arms happily, then kept trudging toward him, sinking deep with every step.

At last, she reached the tire tracks left by the two steam cars that had just departed, and her steps finally became a little easier. She bent down to pat the snow off the hem of her coat and the legs of her pants, then came to the cemetery gate and grinned up at the old man, whose face was stern and even a bit angry.

“Grandpa Caretaker, I’m here again!” Annie greeted the Old Caretaker happily.

Today she wore a thick white coat and matching white boots, with a white knit hat on her head. She almost seemed about to melt into the snow-covered city around her.

“You came out in this weather, and to a place like this!” The Old Caretaker glared, his tone very stern. “You’ll make your family worry.”

“I told my mother I’d be back soon today,” Annie said with a smile, her face red from the cold. “School is on break. I wanted to go play with my friends, but none of them wanted to go out, so I came to see you!”

“…Staying at home like your friends would still be better than running to the cemetery when the roads are buried in snow.” The old man’s tone was cold and hard. “The cemetery is closed today. There is too much snow inside. Go home.”

But the girl acted as if she had not heard. She only craned her neck to look past the old man, then lifted her face with hope: “My dad…”

“He didn’t come,” the old man said bluntly. “In weather this bad, even if there really were a burial planned, it would be postponed.”

Annie froze for a moment, but she did not look very disappointed. She pressed her lips together: “Then… I’ll come ask again when the weather is better… He will come someday, right?”

The Old Caretaker quietly gazed into the child’s eyes. For a brief second or two, he even felt a touch of regret, regret that six years ago he had made that promise to this child, that “your father will come back here”. In the end, his heart back then had still been a little too soft.

After a silence that felt very long, the old man finally spoke: “…Maybe, someday in the future, you will hear news of him.”

That was already as gentle as he could make it.

A twelve-year-old child should have understood those words by now.

Annie blinked and let a small smile appear on her face. Then she reached into the little bag she carried with her and took out a small package, which she handed to the old man.

“More biscuits?” The Old Caretaker raised his eyebrows.

“It’s ginger tea powder. I helped my mother make it, and we added herbs to drive out the cold and warm your stomach!” Annie said proudly. She stuffed the packet into his hand before he could refuse. “You are always guarding the cemetery all by yourself, and now it’s snowing again. It must be very cold at night, right?”

The old man looked at the thing in his hand.

He did not need it. The potion supplies that the Church gave the cemetery Warden were ten times more effective than this. His Warden’s hut, which looked so flimsy, was actually filled with protective runes and special materials. It could block far more than a bit of cold wind. Even if a runaway state really broke out in the cemetery, that little house could stand like a steel fortress and hold back the shock from outside.

“Thank you.” He accepted Annie’s gift. Maybe he had not smiled for too long, because the curve at the corner of his mouth looked a bit stiff. “This will be very useful to me.”

Then, right after that, his expression turned cold again.

“I’ve taken your gift. Now hurry home, and try not to go out these next few days.”

“Why?”

“…The city hasn’t been safe lately,” the Old Caretaker said seriously. He thought of what Agatha had just told him and of the supernatural incident on Hearth Street last night. “Go back and tell your mother to go out less in the near future. If anything feels wrong, ask the nearest Cathedral or Constable for help. Annie, this is very serious. Do you remember it?”

Annie seemed startled by the old man’s suddenly stern tone. She froze for a moment, then hurriedly nodded: “I… I remember.”

“Good. Then go home,” the old man said with a sigh, clearly dismissing her. “While it’s still…”

He lifted his head, and the second half of his sentence cut off.

Some time, a very tall, broad-shouldered figure had appeared near the cemetery gate and was now looking this way. The figure wore a long black coat and a wide-brimmed hat. Bandages wrapped the face, hiding every detail of the body under cloth and hat.

Beside that towering figure stood another person, a petite lady in a rich dark purple long dress. Her golden hair fell like a waterfall. She wore a soft hat, and a veil covered her face so her features could not be seen, yet she gave off an air of elegance and mystery.

But almost all of the Old Caretaker’s attention was on the tall, broad-shouldered figure. He stared in that direction, his eyes feeling as if some invisible force had pinned them in place. A faint noise began to thrum in his mind, and tiny shakes and distortions appeared at the edges of his vision. These were clear signs that his mind was being lightly corrupted and disturbed.

The experienced Old Caretaker realized at once what was happening. It was that “Visitor”.

Because he had met this unspeakable guest many times, and had once fallen into madness under the influence of incense, he had formed a certain link with the other party.

But this was only a shallow and almost harmless link, so the Old Caretaker did not lose the ability to act as badly as before.

He could still move. So he reached out and pulled Annie behind him.

“Child, don’t look over there.”

Chapter 338: What a Coincidence

Annie did not know what was happening—she had only just seen two strangers standing at the cemetery gate when the slightly hunched figure of the Old Caretaker blocked her view. The old man's somewhat tense voice reached her ears: "Child, don't look over there."

The young lady grew a little nervous: "Grandpa Caretaker, what's wrong?"

"Don't move, don't speak, it's fine." The old man spoke softly, his gaze still fixed on that burly figure. One of his hands hung at his side, blocking Annie's restless line of sight, while the other pressed against his chest—there he wore a charm amulet that, if necessary, could trigger the alarm for the whole cemetery.

The burly figure walked toward them.

All the old man's muscles tensed.

"Good morning." A deep voice came from beneath those thick bandages, like an echo from a tomb. "This should be my first formal visit."

He spoke in clear language and his manner was very friendly. Just like in their previous contact, this unspeakable Visitor showed a friendly stance.

But not a single muscle in the Old Caretaker's body dared to relax. He had thought before that this Visitor would come again sooner or later, and he had imagined what kind of situation it might be when they spoke. Yet he had never expected the other party to appear so openly at the cemetery gate, standing across from him and greeting him like this. He also did not know whether Annie behind him would be affected by this Visitor, so he could only stand between them as much as he could and think quickly about how to respond.

The old man's tension was plain to Duncan.

He looked even more nervous than at their first meeting—was it because of the child he was shielding behind him?

"Relax a little," Duncan said, with a hint of amusement in his voice. "I have no hostility at all—and I certainly won't harm the child behind you."

"I know you are friendly, but your very existence can affect an ordinary person," the Old Caretaker said carefully, trying his best not to offend the Visitor before him. "This child has never received any supernatural training."

"Oh, then she is actually quite safe," Duncan said. "She can't see it. You should understand that as well."

The Old Caretaker fell silent for a moment. He understood what the other meant, and he knew that Annie, as an ordinary person, should not be affected by certain supernatural powers the way he was. But he still did not relax. He only asked carefully: "What are you here for this time?"

"That lady priest is not here?" Duncan glanced with some curiosity toward the cemetery. "I have some rather important matters to tell her."

"She just left," the Old Caretaker said, becoming even more cautious now that the other had mentioned Agatha. "What do you want with her?"

Then he paused and added: "I can reach her at any time. The cemetery's Warden is also clergy and can contact the Great Cathedral and the Gatekeeper directly."

“Ah, that is good. It saves me some trouble,” Duncan said as he raised his hand and reached into his pocket. The motion clearly made the cemetery’s Warden nervous, so Duncan shook his head with a small chuckle: “Don’t be nervous. If I truly meant harm, I would not need to raise my hand.”

As he spoke, he had already taken a sealed letter from the pocket of his coat and held it out to the old man.

“Pass this to the Gatekeeper named Agatha, or send it straight to your Great Cathedral,” Duncan said casually. “It is only a message. As long as the message is delivered, it will do.”

A… letter? It was actually a letter?!

The Old Caretaker stared in shock at what the other had taken out. He accepted it without thinking, then finally came back to himself. He blinked in confusion. He had never imagined that an unspeakable visitor would descend in the flesh upon the cemetery just to hand him a letter.

He turned the envelope over for another look.

On the back, he could see the mark and number of some small local printing shop—this was not any ritual secret letter formed by supernatural power. It had been bought at a newsstand on the corner, and might well have been picked up casually that very morning.

The old man raised his head. His slightly cloudy, yellowed eyes were full of doubt and questions.

“Just making a small contribution to the safety of the city-state,” Duncan said with a smile. Sadly, his friendly expression was hidden by his bandages. Then his gaze passed over the Old Caretaker and fell on the young lady hiding behind him. “Did I scare you?”

“No.” Annie shook her head, peeking carefully through the gaps between the old man’s fingers at that tall, burly figure across from her. “I am very brave.”

“I have a niece. She is very brave too,” Duncan said, looking at the old man. “This child is…”

“She only wanted to visit the cemetery. She is an ordinary person who has nothing to do with the Church,” the old man said at once. Now that he realized Annie really had not been affected, he relaxed a little. “I was just trying to persuade this child to go back. The weather is dreadful today.”

“It is easy to slip on snowy days,” Duncan nodded. He looked at the little girl and asked casually: “What is your name? How old are you?”

The Old Caretaker’s heart tightened. He wanted to warn Annie, who had never come into contact with supernatural powers, not to speak. After all, giving one’s name to a high-ranking supernatural being of unknown origin was very dangerous—

But he was a step too late.

“My name is Annie,” the girl said without much caution. “Annie Barbelli, I am twelve years old!”

The gate of the cemetery suddenly fell silent.

Duncan quietly watched the young lady who was poking her head out from behind the Old Caretaker. His gaze fell on her eyes, and on the faint resemblance in her brows and features to Captain Cristo Barbelli.

He had only asked a casual question, yet he had not expected… such a coincidence.

The crunch of footsteps on snow came from the side. Alice looked in surprise at the young lady who had called herself “Annie Barbelli”, then turned her head toward Duncan: “Ah, I remember the surname Barbelli. Wasn’t that…”

Duncan slowly bent down until his gaze was level with the girl's. He tried to make his tone as gentle as possible: "Your surname is Barbelli?"

Perhaps because the mood had suddenly changed, Annie looked a little nervous. She shrank back behind the Old Caretaker: "Y-yes."

"What is your relationship with Captain Cristo Barbelli?"

"He is… my dad." Annie spoke in a low voice. Then she grabbed the Old Caretaker's clothes without thinking and looked up at him, as if seeking help.

But the old man did not react. He only looked stunned, as if something had occurred to him. With an expression of disbelief, he looked at Duncan, then looked in alarm and doubt at the young woman with the veil and golden hair falling over her shoulders.

"You are Captain Cristo's daughter—and you and your mother live on Hearth Street?" Duncan asked the young lady again.

Annie nodded in a hurry, then seemed to react: "You… know my dad?"

"…I have met him, though we are not very close," Duncan said softly. "He asked me to look in on you and your mother. I have not yet had time to visit you, and I did not expect to meet you here."

Annie's eyes widened in shock.

The Old Caretaker was just as surprised.

"My dad…" Annie opened her mouth but could not think what to say for a long time. After struggling for quite a while to find her words, she finally asked in a small voice: "He really is dead… right?"

Duncan nodded gently.

“Th-then… will he still be sent here?” Annie hurriedly asked again. “The lords say that those who believe in the God of Death will have their souls return to Bartok’s cemetery after they die, and then be led to that great gate. Grandpa Caretaker told me this cemetery is…”

As Annie spoke, her voice slowly grew quieter.

In truth, she had stopped believing those words the old man had told her long ago.

She was already twelve years old.

Duncan suddenly reached out and rubbed Annie’s head. A few unmelted snowflakes fell from her thick wool hat and mixed into the snow on the ground.

“Captain Cristo was an outstanding man, truly outstanding—he has already reached Bartok’s realm and is resting there now.”

Annie lifted her head and blinked.

She still did not really understand what Duncan’s words meant. She did not even understand what kind of being this tall, burly figure in front of her was.

But the cemetery’s Warden beside her reacted at once.

The old man suddenly pressed down on Annie’s shoulder to keep the child from speaking further. Then he raised his head and met Duncan’s gaze: “What you said… is that really what happened?”

“…I believe so,” Duncan said after thinking for a moment. He did not truly know what that so-called gate of the Death God Bartok was, nor did he know exactly what humans experienced after death. But in front of a child, he knew what he should say—and it was also what he sincerely hoped was true. “I personally saw him off.”

The Old Caretaker’s pupils shrank slightly, but he quickly hid the change in his expression.

“I should be going as well,” Duncan said. He glanced at Annie, who still did not quite understand what was happening, then looked at the cemetery’s Warden. “I still have many things I would like to say, but there is much I must do. We can meet again when there is a chance.

“Also, do not forget that letter.”

The Old Caretaker blinked. Before he could speak, the eerie green flame before his eyes flared once and vanished.

Chapter 339: Agatha's Investigation

The Visitor left as suddenly as he had arrived.

The cemetery's Old Caretaker stood there in a daze. He stared at the place where the flame had faded, his mind still full of all the information the other had revealed in their brief conversation. Only when Annie tugged at his sleeve beside him did the old man suddenly come back to himself.

He lowered his head and saw Annie looking at him uneasily. In the girl's eyes there was not only helplessness, but also tension and confusion.

Perhaps she already understood what it meant to part from someone forever, but she could not yet fully understand what had just happened.

The Old Caretaker bent down, his aged, stiff joints aching slightly in the winter cold. He reached out and brushed the snow from Annie's shoulder as he said: "Annie, do not be afraid. Nothing bad has happened."

"Grandpa Caretaker…" The girl's lips moved as she tried to find words, but she did not know where to begin. "That person just now…"

"Do not ask too much and do not think too much. Just like the textbooks say, do not pry into knowledge that is not open to mortals—you only need to know that that was a Visitor. He bore you no ill will. Now He has left, and any connection between you and Him ends here."

"Then my dad…"

“Your father may have done something very great—beyond anything any of us can imagine,” the Old Caretaker said softly, placing his hand gently on the girl’s hair. “Annie, do not worry anymore. He no longer drifts on the sea. He has gone to a better place. Go back and tell your mother. She has been waiting for this news for a long time.”

Annie pressed her lips together. After hesitating for a long time, she asked quietly: “This time… it is real?”

“It is real,” the Old Caretaker said with a smile. “You are no longer a six-year-old child.”

Annie nodded, half understanding, then said goodbye to the cemetery’s Old Caretaker. She turned and walked toward the little path that led back to the streets, following the ruts in the road that had not yet frozen into ice. She walked slowly in the direction of home, slowly blending into the silver-white backdrop of the city.

At the cemetery gate, the Old Caretaker watched the path for a long time. Only when Annie’s figure vanished at the corner did he let out a soft breath.

The child had not slipped and fallen this time.

Then he raised his hand and pressed lightly against the item in his pocket. A letter that seemed to hold countless secrets lay there in silence.

A letter from an unspeakable visitor. Even material that looked ordinary might carry unimaginable knowledge and mysteries. What did this letter really mean?

The Old Caretaker’s expression grew serious. He turned and went back into the cemetery, waving a hand behind him. The heavy iron gate creaked shut.

The cemetery would not open again today.

…

Agatha looked sternly at the scattered fragments on the ground. The cold wind that kept blowing from the mouth of the alley stirred her long hair and seeped through the gaps in her clothing and bandages. In that bone-chilling air, it felt as if the terror and despair of the two Annihilators at the moment of death still hung, frozen.

Several black-clad Guardians were working nearby. The team that had first come to deal with the scene had already sealed off both ends of the alley, and people were investigating clues in the nearby lanes as well. The evidence work went on in an orderly way, but the confusion in Agatha's heart had not eased.

What kind of power could shatter a person into pieces like a porcelain doll?

So far, there was no known divine magic or heretic spell that could cause such an effect. Even the many kinds of spells used by Abyssal demons did not produce anything this strange.

The young Gatekeeper lifted her Gatekeeper's cane and nudged one of the fragments with its tin tip. The pale shard, like a piece of porcelain, turned over on the ground with a crisp sound.

It flipped over, showing about half a face, including the lips, the bridge of the nose, and one eye.

Even broken as it was, it clearly held the cultist's look of terror in his final moment.

And… a faint, eerie smile?

Agatha frowned. She could see that the lips on that porcelain fragment curved in a suspicious way, as if a calm, peaceful smile had just begun to appear and then been frozen in place. That tiny curve, together with the terror filling the single eye, made the face even more uncanny and disturbing.

After thinking for a moment, she shook her head and walked deeper into the alley, toward another “scene.”

A heap of remains, almost burned to charcoal, lay piled up in the alley. Around the remains she could see traces of fierce fighting and explosions. The area of damage was large, but the battle itself had clearly been one-sided—and the style of fighting was completely different from that pile of fragments at the mouth of the alley.

One of the priests examining the scene straightened up from beside the remains, took off his gloves, and nodded to Agatha: “An Annihilation Priest who has completed deep purification. Judging from the degree of flesh distortion, his strength was not low. In theory, even if he ran into a full twelve-person Guardian squad, he might still be able to kill his way out. Yet he was taken down quickly—and we can hardly see any trace of a counterattack.”

Agatha frowned slightly: “Can you tell what kind of opponent he faced?”

The priest shook his head: “The simplest and most brutal kind of attack—pure physical force. That actually makes it hard to judge the other side’s identity. But we did find some traces of water-vapor anomalies condensing nearby. That may be our only clue.”

“Condensed water vapor… only that little trace?” Agatha said softly. She glanced back toward the mouth of the alley. “Two completely different styles of fighting.”

“Yes. One is simple and brutal, the other eerie and dangerous. What they have in common is that both are very powerful—the heretics at priest level had no chance to fight back at all,” the priest said with a nod. “The only good news is that they are clearly enemies of the Cult of Annihilation.”

“The enemy of our enemy is not necessarily our friend,” Agatha said, shaking her head. “Besides, they clearly prefer to act from the shadows—they do not want to show themselves. That alone is reason enough to be wary.”

She paused, then asked: “What about the investigation of the nearby residents?”

“The nearby residents heard the sounds of battle, but most did not dare to peek. From what they say, we can only estimate the time and how long it lasted—it happened sometime after one in the morning and may have lasted less than three minutes.”

“That is all? Nothing else?”

“We have no more information for now,” the priest said, spreading his hands. “I have already sent people to go door to door, including the alleys further away, to see if we can find any reports of strangers. But Hearth Street is a very large district. I doubt we will get results in a short time.”

Just then, a set of hurried footsteps sounded from nearby and cut off the conversation between Agatha and the priest.

A Guardian with short brown hair hurried into the alley and came to the priest’s side to report.

“Inside a building?” The priest frowned at once as he listened to his subordinate’s report, then looked up at the house standing diagonally across from the alley.

Seeing this, Agatha asked at once: “What is it?”

“We found something in house number forty-two,” the priest said at once. “There is a Senkin woman inside who was attacked by an supernatural power and fell into a deep sleep. And on the second floor of the house, we found a room corrupted by something uncanny.”

…

At Cemetery No. 3, inside the Warden’s little house, the Old Caretaker carefully locked the door, then walked to the writing desk in the corner with a serious expression.

He had already instructed the Guardians outside to keep watch around the hut and lay down plenty of protections in the open ground around it—but that still was not enough.

After reaching the desk, he took incense, essential oils, candles, and powdered herbs from the drawers and began to arrange a powerful altar.

He lit the candles in their appointed places and added essential oil and herb powder to them. Then, with the breath of incense, he blessed the whole desk. He set the censer in the middle of the candlesticks and built the altar according to its symbolic pattern. He carried out all this work with practiced ease, every motion as if rehearsed hundreds of times.

This was the skill a veteran should have.

A few minutes later, the altar was complete.

The Old Caretaker let out a quiet breath. He looked at the pale flames burning on the candlesticks and at the thin incense smoke, almost solid, gathering above the desk. He could feel the power of the God of Death Bartok briefly descend upon the little house. The strength of divine blessing lingered around the desk, stabilizing the order of space and time here and holding his own mind steady.

When dealing with unspeakable knowledge, no amount of careful and complex preparation could be too much.

He slowly sat down and finished a benediction in his heart. Only then did he solemnly take the letter from his pocket.

The old man examined the envelope.

This was what that unspeakable Visitor had given him. The Visitor had told him to pass it on to Gatekeeper Agatha, but had also said that it was enough if the message reached the Great Cathedral in Frostholm. In all that, he had never said that others were forbidden to open the letter.

If all that mattered was sending the message, then he could read it first and then convey it.

After all, the cemetery's Warden was the first line of defense on the way to the Great Cathedral.

The old man let out a gentle breath. Once he felt fully prepared, he picked up the letter opener at his side and carefully slit open the seemingly ordinary envelope.

A folded sheet of paper slid out of the envelope.

With an expression more solemn than ever and a resolve almost like martyrdom, the Old Caretaker slowly unfolded the paper—

The words "denunciation letter" leapt into view.

The Old Caretaker: "…?"

Chapter 340: Sinking into the Spirit Realm

The Warden’s cottage grew quiet. A strange stillness seemed to solidify in the air. The Old Caretaker even had an illusion. He felt as if even the altar set up on the desk – the candle flames, the incense smoke, and the faint Spiritual Insight power in the air – had all paused for a moment.

Was it an illusion?

The old man lifted his head in confusion. He saw the flames on the candlestick flickering, but it was as if they had only started to move at the moment he looked up.

He stared at the pale flames for a long time. Then he slowly shook his head and lowered his gaze back to the letter in front of him. He read the words with a strange feeling he had never had in his life.

But after only a few lines, he no longer cared about that sense of wrongness and embarrassment. The contents of the letter were making him realize how serious the situation was.

There was a warning that the city-state was being infiltrated by the power of The Deep Sea, evidence of large-scale activity by Annihilators, a guess that the lord of the Abyssal Deep had invaded the Mortal Realm, and… a warning about Dagger Island.

The Old Caretaker stared fixedly at the lines of text in his hand. Suddenly he felt that the uneasy mood spreading through the city-state at last had an explanation.

He did not know whether he should trust this “report” from some unnameable being, but one thing was beyond doubt – he had to inform the Gatekeeper at once, and inform the Cathedral.

…

Agatha bent down and carefully examined the Senkin lady who lay asleep on the sofa. The woman still slept soundly, completely unaware that a crowd of Guardians had gathered in the room. From time to time she even let out faint, uneasy murmurs in her sleep.

She could still talk in her sleep. That meant her mind had not been damaged in the “attack”, and the uninvited guests who had entered the house earlier had not meant her harm.

Agatha let her gaze sweep over Galina. This Senkin miss had a body that could almost be called hulking. Most Senkin were like this. They were born with powerful bodies and skin as tough as stone. After a simple check, the young Gatekeeper saw that the muscles on Galina’s body tightened now and then. Together with the uneasy mutterings she had heard a moment ago, it seemed this Senkin lady was not having a peaceful dream.

A priest in a gray-white coat stood nearby and reported to Agatha: “No external wounds, no signs of mental corruption, and no traces of a fight. On the surface it looked like normal sleep – but she could not be woken. Considering there is no damage to the locks and the kitchen shows signs of recent use, our first judgment is that the ‘intruders’ were invited into the house.”

“…They might be acquaintances, or guests who had gained her trust,” Agatha murmured. “What about the situation on the second floor?”

The priest nodded and said: “We have already collected many samples. We also found a Final Record. The person who left it should be the source of those… anomalous substances in the room. Based on other clues we found in the house, the one who left the record should be named ‘Brown Scott’. He was a folklorist.”

“A folklorist?” Agatha frowned. “Have you checked his background?”

“We have already sent people to the nearest Resident registry to pull his file, but we have not heard back yet.”

“Stay here and watch over this lady first,” Agatha nodded. “I will go upstairs and take a look.”

“Yes, Lady Gatekeeper.”

On the second-floor study, the Guardians had already finished the first round of recording the scene and gathering samples. When Agatha arrived, her subordinates were trying to clear away the dried “mud” hanging from the shelves so they could move the many books in the room.

In places where an supernatural runaway state had occurred, any books left at the scene were very likely to be corrupted by supernatural power. Moving these books away and sealing them for later study was a necessary part of procedure, even if doing so might “damage the scene”.

Agatha’s gaze fell on the dried gray-black sludge.

These things… reminded her of the samples they had collected in Cemetery No. 3, those strange substances that seemed to be elements.

She also saw the Final Record the priest had mentioned earlier. It lay in the most eye-catching place on the desk.

At first glance, Agatha judged that this manuscript had already been handled. Its surface showed clear traces of cleaning, and the work had been done very carefully.

This was not something ill-intentioned intruders would do. It was more like the work of a “professional” who, like her, had come to investigate for a proper reason. Thinking of the lady sleeping on the first floor, Agatha already had some early guesses in her mind.

A mysterious third party who at least did not seem to be an enemy. Were they the same people who had fought the Annihilators in the alley outside?

If so… then this third party’s power deserved close attention.

As all kinds of guesses and deductions spun in her mind, Agatha slowly let her gaze move over the lines of the Final Record. As those words, soaked with resolve, courage, and awareness, came into view, the Gatekeeper’s eyes grew heavy and solemn.

The Master who had left this record had actually kept clear consciousness and memory.

After a short silence, Agatha took a light breath. She carefully set the Final Record back on the desk, then lifted her Gatekeeper’s cane with one hand and slowly drew its tin tip across the floor.

The sound of metal scraping on planks rang out. Pale flame burned at the cane’s tip and left the same pale glowing marks on the floor. As the flame and glowing trail spread, the sound of the Gatekeeper’s cane against the floor began to change. It grew low and slow, as if a thick barrier was forming in the air, bit by bit sealing off the space around her.

Soon Agatha had outlined a triangle large enough for an adult to stand in. Inside the triangle she drew the rune of the God of Death Bartok. Then she stepped into the center of the triangle, set the Gatekeeper’s cane at her side with one hand, and reached toward her own eye socket with the other.

A fresh, living eyeball popped out of her eye socket and fell into her palm.

In an instant, the area around her grew quiet. All sounds from the Mortal Realm were shut out beyond the triangle by an invisible barrier. Then, in the silence, countless whispers rose up, as if hundreds of unseen watchers were crowding around the triangle and chattering endlessly at the Gatekeeper.

Agatha lifted her hand, palm up, and used her own eyeball to scan the surroundings.

Everything in the room, including the busy Guardians, the dust motes drifting in the air, and the hands of the Chronometer Clock on the wall, froze like amber. As they froze, their colors quickly faded and sank into gloom. A strange pale glow spread in from outside the window, shone through the boards nailed over it, and cast a wavering light over the room.

In this eerie, pale, motionless space, only Agatha in the center of the triangle still kept the appearance and colors of a living person. Her eyelids stayed shut as she held up her eyeball in her left hand, sweeping it around while she spoke calmly: “I wish to speak with the dead here.”

The countless irritating whispers around her suddenly grew much weaker. Agatha turned her left hand to make her eyeball look toward the desk not far away.

That was where the folklore scholar Brown Scott had last worked while leaving the Final Record. In theory, if a soul had truly lingered here, some trace of its afterglow should still be wandering in that place.

Even though the “mud” all over the room showed that what had once been here was very likely just a “Monster” condensed out of supernatural power, that Monster had clearly held some kind of humanity inside. On that point, after reading the record, Agatha was sure.

Yet beside that empty desk, she found nothing.

There was no afterglow of a soul, no projection shaped by lingering thoughts, not even a tiny glimmer that might mean leftover Spiritual Insight. There was only a colorless desk with black matter piled on it, and fine wisps of smoke rising from the matter.

Agatha's eyeball slowly swayed in her palm.

The Gatekeeper was thinking.

Was it because too much time had passed since death and the soul's afterglow had already faded? Or because the thing that had stayed in this room had only been a replica, and so had no real humanity, only imitated memories and a false personality? Or… had that soul already passed through Bartok's gate and entered the place of rest?

The last guess seemed especially impossible. From the state of the room, even if Brown Scott's soul had once stayed here, it had already suffered severe corruption. And a corrupted soul could not pass through that gate.

So where had the soul gone?

The low whispers around her rose again, even louder and more annoying than before.

The Shadows of the Spirit Realm were growing restless. They did not like this sudden intruder. Even for a powerful Gatekeeper, it was best not to stay at this depth for too long.

Thinking this, Agatha raised her Gatekeeper's cane and struck it twice on the floor.

The tin Gatekeeper's cane made a thunder-like boom when it hit the floor.

"Agatha, Gatekeeper of the mortal world, wishes to speak with the Gatekeeper of the world of the dead."

Chapter 341: Threefold Questioning

The Gatekeeper’s words carried great power. With the thunderous echo of the tin Gatekeeper’s cane striking the floor, her voice spread in layers through this strange, chaotic depth of the Spirit Realm.

In a moment, the unseen Whisperers in the room fell silent again. The whole world sank into a brief stillness. Only a few seconds later, a deep rumbling sound came from far away, as if a huge body were walking toward her with heavy steps.

Agatha raised her hand and turned her eyeball to face the direction of the sound. There, in her line of sight, was the window nailed over with layers of boards. Pale light shone in the cracks of the window. Suddenly all the light trembled and then dimmed, as if something huge had come to stand before the window.

The next second, the crisscrossing boards shattered without a sound. Countless gray-black splinters flew out silently, then stopped in midair near the window, as if frozen in amber. A giant appeared outside the window.

The giant wore a black robe that stood for death. The body under the robe was wrapped in bandages. Only the eyes in his head gave off a dim yellow glow. He stood outside the building, his size almost equal to the whole house. Then the giant bent down slightly so that his head was level with the second-floor window. He turned his head. No expression could be seen on the face covered by bandages. Then he raised his hand and held out three fingers to Agatha.

“Threefold Questioning.” The giant’s voice sounded like thunder.

Agatha froze for a moment when she saw this giant.

This was not the Gatekeeper she knew. The Gatekeeper she usually spoke with did not have such a huge body. The one before her was clearly a higher Envoy. Why would this Envoy answer her call?

But she soon pushed down her doubt. All the goings and comings of the Envoys followed the will of the God of Death Bartok. There was no need for her to dig into this. The most important thing now was to find out what had happened here.

“I am looking for the soul that last lingered in this house,” she said, pointing with her Gatekeeper’s cane at the empty desk not far away. “He may have been corrupted, but now his whereabouts are unknown.”

“That soul has left. He has already entered the realm of rest. A great power has erased his debts. corruption is no longer a problem.”

The death Envoy outside spoke in a thunderous voice, then folded down one finger. Two questions remained.

Agatha paused and at once caught the word “great power” in the Envoy’s answer. She quickly weighed her thoughts and asked her second question: “Where did that great power come from? Who erased that soul’s debts?”

“The Flame Usurper.” The Envoy’s eyes, murky and yellow, seemed to flicker. When he spoke this term, there was a clear tone of warning. Then he folded down another finger.

As Agatha heard the words “Flame Usurper”, a wave of dizziness hit her. At once she realized that she was touching some kind of “knowledge” from the deep layers of the world, something never revealed to the mortal side.

But she did not lose her composure. When one spoke with the Gatekeeper on the other side, it was normal to brush against dangerous knowledge now and then. She might be young, but she had experience in this. Since the Envoy outside chose to tell her this word, it meant the term was at least within what she could bear.

If it had truly been a taboo-level question, the Envoy would have warned her.

Agatha steadied herself and took a light breath, then asked her third question: “Who is the Flame Usurper?”

“Humans.”

The Envoy outside said this, then folded down his last finger. His figure vanished in a roaring gust of wind, giving Agatha no chance to speak further.

The wooden splinters that had been scattered and frozen in the air suddenly flew again and in a flash rejoined into their original shape. The window was sealed once more. The hazy pale light spilled through the cracks and fell on the slightly stunned Agatha.

The young Gatekeeper stood there in a daze. For the first time in her life, after speaking with the Gatekeeper on the other side, she felt at a loss. The answer to her last question still hovered clearly in her mind, but she had no idea what that strange answer meant at all.

Humans? What kind of answer was that? Did it mean the Flame Usurper was a human? That a power the death Envoy called “great power” came from a human?

What kind of “human” would that be?! Was that still a “human” at all?!

The noisy sounds rose again. In the air beyond the triangle, countless unseen watchers seemed to be stirring. The noise broke off Agatha's thoughts. The eyeball in her palm turned, and she saw strands of pitch-black matter like hair spreading outside the triangle, growing thicker like ink dropped into water.

The Spirit Realm had begun to push this unwelcome guest out.

She shook her head and lifted her hand to put the eyeball back into its socket. At the same time she picked up the Gatekeeper's cane and gave it a gentle sweep, scattering the pale flame that traced the triangle on the floor.

In an instant, the Spirit Realm faded. Sound returned. Color and light filled her vision again. She was back at the busy scene with the Guardians, and her subordinates were still working around her in tense, orderly fashion.

Agatha rolled her eye a little, then reached into her coat pocket and took out a small bottle. She pinched open the cap, tipped back her head, and dropped two drops of eye medicine into her eye socket.

The dry, uncomfortable feeling quickly faded.

A subordinate came over. He waited until Agatha put away the bottle before stepping forward to ask: "Did you find any clues?"

"The soul has already left. The Gatekeeper on the other side confirmed that it passed through Bartok's gate and entered the place of rest," Agatha said calmly. "…That is all. There are no more clues."

For safety's sake, she did not mention the term "Flame Usurper" to the subordinate.

This word clearly held power and even pointed straight at extremely dangerous deep layers knowledge. She did not know what might happen if she spoke it aloud. It would be better to go back and study the texts carefully first.

The subordinate clearly noticed that Agatha was hiding something. But as an experienced Guardian, he asked nothing, just nodded and went back to his work.

Just then, footsteps sounded in the corridor outside, interrupting Agatha's thoughts.

A Guardian in charge of watching over the downstairs came in and said: "Lady Gatekeeper, that lady has woken up."

The young Senkin had woken up?

Agatha at once put her thoughts aside and quickly went downstairs, where she saw Galina, now awake from her sleep.

The strong lady with stone-like skin sat on the sofa, holding a cup of calming herbal tea the priest had mixed by hand. Her eyes looked a little blank as she stared at the table in front of her. Only when Agatha sat down across from her and lightly tapped the table did she slowly react.

The young Gatekeeper said: "Hello, my name is Agatha. You should know me." At the same time she carefully watched the state of the person across from her. "Do you know what happened?"

The apprentice holding the herbal tea spoke a little slowly: "I… my name is Galina." Her eyes were still a bit unfocused, as if she had not fully shaken off her sleep. "Sorry, Lady Gatekeeper, my head is still a mess. I feel like I had a very, very long dream. In the dream I kept doing math problems without stopping, proving them again and again. All the studying I did growing up put together was never this tiring…"

"Doing math problems?" Agatha paused, then asked with a thoughtful look: "Do you remember how you fell asleep? Before you fell asleep, did you receive anyone, or do anything in particular?"

Galina frowned slightly and seemed to be trying hard to recall. But after a full half minute she still shook her head in apology: “Sorry, I don’t remember. I don’t even remember anything from yesterday afternoon until now. If these Guardians hadn’t told me, I wouldn’t even know… that something happened at home.”

Agatha frowned deeply.

Memory being covered, deep layers sleep, and “doing math problems” – this sounded rather like the power used by the Clergy of the God of Wisdom.

But the God of Wisdom was also one of the four True Gods. Why would that God’s priests do such a thing?

They were not heretics.

There were simply too many things today to feel confused about.

Agatha rubbed her temple, a little headache creeping in.

All sorts of tangled lines knotted together in her mind.

The strange and suspicious battle marks in the alley outside, the recent cultist activity in the city-state, the elements and the suspicious accidents in the mines, the weird events in this house, the message brought by the death Envoy…

Galina looked at the Gatekeeper in front of her with some nervousness and said: “Excuse me…” Although Agatha looked very young, she was still the highest-level Church Herald in the city-state, and Galina could not help feeling uneasy. “My teacher, is he all right?”

“Your teacher?” Agatha looked a little puzzled.

“He should be upstairs. His name is Brown Scott,” Galina explained quickly. “I was a bit confused when I woke up and forgot to say. He needs quiet…”

Agatha froze at once.

Chapter 342: Morris’s Trick for Getting Approved

When Duncan and Alice went to the cemetery together, Morris and Vanna were not idle either. Early in the morning, they went to the citizen Help Center in the southern part of the Upper City to carry out something Duncan had asked them to do.

They had to find a stable and legal place to stay in the city-state of Frostholm and, if possible, one or two identities they could use openly.

After all, they might be active in this city-state for a long time. They could not live like cultists, hiding and running every day.

Since the informants Tyrian had left in the city were no longer reliable, Morris decided to figure out a solution himself.

Frostholm’s citizen Help Center was a huge domed building. Two long side wings stretched out from the main body. It was called a citizen Help Center, but in truth the building also received visitors entering the city-state and handled a huge amount of third?party agency work. Almost everything could be done here, from registering house rentals and sales, to issuing temporary passes, to hiring short-term maids, gardeners, and laundry workers. The long side wings were packed with all kinds of registration windows and offices, and the giant domed hall was always noisy and crowded. In this, it was very different from Pland.

As soon as they stepped into the great dome, a wave of heat hit them. Frostholm’s special high?pressure heating system drove away the winter chill, and bright electric lights hung high under the dome, lighting the whole building.

The place had only been open for a short while, but many people had already poured in. citizens looking for short?term work or registering property rentals and sales moved between countless windows and counters. The roar of voices mixed with the constant “click” and “hiss” from air? driven tube lines starting up again and again. Vanna clearly was not used to this kind of environment. She carefully avoided the streams of people around her and muttered softly to Morris: “In Pland, you don’t put job counters and housing counters in the same building.”

“You have to think about the cost of heating big buildings, and how long it takes to refit a heat?pump exchange station,” Morris shook his head and said, “Most of this city’s basic public facilities were left over from Frostholm’s Queen era. But that glorious age is over. After the Great Uprising, Frostholm barely recovered seventy or eighty percent of its strength with the Boiling Gold industry. Starting from scratch to replace all the underground pipe systems and steam?power networks the Queen left behind is not a simple job.”

“So they just keep making do like this?” Vanna’s eyes went wide. “These are half?century?old antiques!”

“What else can they do?” Morris sighed. “On one side there is the city’s decline. On the other side there is population pressure. Then there was the collapse of the sea cliffs back then, which cut down the livable area. Facilities from fifty years ago may be a bit cramped by now, but they barely still work. Since they still work, they keep using them. This isn’t only Frostholm’s problem. Many old industrial city?states are like this. Lively cities like Pland are the minority.”

Vanna fell silent.

This was not a field she was good at thinking about.

While they talked, Morris had already found the location of the migrant registration counter on the dizzying map of lines above the hall. He and the tall Vanna threaded their way through the crowd and finally reached a relatively quiet counter.

A long wooden counter stood against the wall, divided into several sections by iron bars. Behind each section sat a clerk in a gray?blue uniform. Their faces were as stiff as the iron bars beside them, and it was clear they planned to keep that expression until the end of the workday.

“We need a residence permit, and we also want to find a short?term rental,” Morris said as he came to one of the sections. He sat down on a squeaky iron chair and spoke to the sallow?faced middle?aged man inside: “We landed today.”

“Which pier?” The middle?aged clerk with the sallow face lifted his eyelids and glanced at the old man opposite him. When he noticed that a one? meter?ninety lady was standing behind the old man, he froze for a second, but he quickly went back to an official tone: “Show me the pier certificate and your tickets.”

Vanna frowned and looked down at Morris.

Morris’s face stayed calm. He spread his hands and said: “We lost them. Maybe we dropped them when we left the pier, and that ship has already left.”

The clerk in the section stopped what he was doing at once. He looked up, his poker face tinged with displeasure: “That won’t do. We must have the certificate. Go back to the pier and get it reissued.”

“But I have something else,” Morris said. As he spoke, he reached into his coat and took out a folded document and a small booklet with a dark red cover, which he passed over. “They should work as legal identification.”

The clerk waved his hand on reflex: “No pier certificate, no deal. Nothing else can—”

He saw the mark on the small booklet and stopped talking. Then he reached out, opened the folded document, and ran his eyes over it.

His poker?face expression changed at once.

“An academic transit pass issued by the Truth Academy and the Boundless Sea Navigation Council,” Morris said, “allowing the holder to stay and visit in all city?states under the protection of the True Gods. During the stay, the local city?state university under the Truth Academy serves as the guarantor.” He then pointed at the red booklet. “This is my credential. A dual certificate in degree and theology from the Truth Academy. My rank is Professor.”

The sallow?faced middle?aged clerk stared in a daze for a moment, then slowly lifted his head, looking a little lost: “Uh… good morning, Professor Morris… It’s a pleasure to meet you. Of course your identity is legal…”

Relief showed on Morris’s face.

But the clerk paused again. He seemed to struggle with himself for a moment, then stiffened up and said: “But… I still need to know which ship you came on. That’s… the rule.”

Morris’s newly relaxed expression turned a bit awkward. Next to him, Vanna rubbed the bridge of her nose and quietly turned her head away.

Morris sighed and looked at the middle?aged clerk in front of him, who was clearly nervous yet still staring straight at him.

“You already know which ship I came on,” he said with a sigh. A faint light flickered in his eyes. “Issue the certificate.”

The clerk froze. His eyes seemed to go blank for a second. Then he lowered his head and started working the clicking Punch?Card Machine. He fed the punched card into the pneumatic tube line container beside the counter.

A moment later, along with hisses and clicks from inside the pipes, a card returned from some approval office deep in the building and dropped back into the counter unit.

The clerk slid the punched card into a small reader, checked the receipt number and anti?forgery code, and then finally began to fill out the contents of the certificate form. Without raising his head, he said: “All I can do here is issue this certificate. You need to take it to the west wing, to window A?12. They should have short?term rentals that match your request there.”

“Thank you,” Morris said as he took the finished document. He paused, then added quietly: “I’m sorry.”

With that, he and Vanna hurried away from the counter and walked toward the next window.

“This is the first time I’ve done something like that,” after they had walked a short distance, the old gentleman lowered his voice and said, “I really wanted to handle it through normal paperwork…”

“We came here on a ghost ship that has no place in this world. You know normal procedures will never solve that problem,” Vanna also spoke softly. There seemed to be a bit of laughter in her tone. “Desperate times, desperate measures.”

“…What do you think the odds are that Mr. Duncan gets a legal ship registration certificate for the Vanished?” Morris asked.

“What do you think?” Vanna replied.

“…All right,” Morris sighed and looked at the certificate in his hand. “Let’s just hope Heidi never finds out about this. Next time we run into something like this, I’d rather forge a fake ticket first.”

Vanna watched the sighing Morris with a half?smile. Ever since she was little, this was the first time she had seen such a troubled look on the face of this old scholar, who was always known for being “rigorous in study and strict with the rules.” It actually seemed… quite interesting.

At the same time, Agatha had just finished a field investigation and had not yet made it back to the great Cathedral when she received an urgent report from a subordinate, sent from Cemetery No. 3.

Sitting in the steam car, Agatha looked at the letter that had just been handed to her. Her eyes slowly went blank.

It was a denunciation letter—from that indescribable visitor.

She had just left, and right after that, this letter had been delivered to the cemetery.

Should she sigh over this near miss, or over that visitor’s strange behavior?

She put away the letter, her mind racing.

Unease spread in her heart. One matter suddenly felt urgent.

“Turn. Go to East Harbor.”

The subordinate driving in front was a bit surprised and asked: “We’re not going back to the Cathedral first?”

“Plans have changed. East Harbor first,” Agatha said firmly. “I have a bad feeling… Something may be trying to land while it has the chance.”

The driver was completely confused, but the habit of obeying orders made him press down his doubts at once.

At the next intersection, the black steam car slowed and turned, then sped toward the Harbor district in the eastern part of the city?state.

Chapter 343: Return

In the military administration zone of the Harbor in eastern Frostholm, many people had not slept all night.

It had been more than twenty?four hours since the Sea Swallow lost contact. Even when the Harbor Cathedral sent an Aetheric Call to the priest aboard the Sea Swallow, there was no reply.

All the clues and traces pointed toward a bad outcome.

Inside the harbor office, a middle?aged man in a Frostholm navy commander’s uniform sat behind his desk with a dark face. A few other commanders sat on chairs around the room. The room was not very big, and the air inside was heavy and oppressive, as if it were brewing a storm.

“We still haven’t found any trace of the Sea Swallow. We searched three times from the point of its last signal back toward Frostholm’s main island. There was nothing on the sea,” said a civilian officer with short light?brown hair, shaking his head.

“The most optimistic guess is that the Sea Swallow’s communications system failed and something happened to the ship’s priest, so the ship went into a runaway state and drifted off the route. But honestly, that’s way too optimistic,” another officer sighed. “A ship that size, even in a runaway state, couldn’t drift out of the search area in such a short time. The more likely case is that the Sea Swallow had a serious accident and already sank. A coastal patrol boat reported hearing faint explosions and seeing distant flashes in the night. That may have been the Sea Swallow.”

“A ship that big would still take hours to sink, right? We sent out search teams as soon as the Sea Swallow lost contact,” the civilian officer with light?brown hair frowned. “And there was that corruption?tainted fuel slick on the sea. How could all those traces vanish so cleanly? What, did the whole ship just drop straight to the bottom in an instant?”

“…We should send people to Dagger Island to confirm the situation,” another female officer said. “Maybe the Sea Swallow never sailed toward Frostholm’s main island. Maybe it got stuck near Dagger Island for some reason…”

“Dagger Island is in a special state right now. Sending people ashore takes a lot of paperwork…”

“Then just try to make contact. That paperwork is simpler. The governor’s office can sign off in half an hour at best…”

The discussion in the room went on and on, until a calm voice from behind the desk cut everyone off: “Protocol Twenty?Two.”

The room fell silent at once. The officers who had been talking lifted their eyes and looked at the middle?aged man behind the desk, the one with thinning hair and a stern face.

“It may be that Protocol Twenty?Two was activated,” the Harbor’s defense commander, Lister, said in a low voice. “The situation might have been too urgent, or there was a risk of a memetic leak, or the Sea Swallow had fallen completely under someone else’s control, so no message could come back. Though that still doesn’t explain why the Sea Swallow’s wreckage disappeared so cleanly.”

In the office, the officers looked at each other. The words “Protocol Twenty?Two” pressed down on them, making the already heavy mood even more suffocating.

In that weighty silence, Commander Lister paused for a moment, then went on: “I know General Duncan. If the Sea Swallow really ran into an supernatural corruption it could not resist, he would use Protocol Twenty? Two without hesitation. So in the next stage, our job is not only to keep searching for possible traces of the Sea Swallow. We also have to figure out what attacked and corrupted that ship. If there really is an attacker, it may not have a physical form. That would be a huge threat to Frostholm.”

“An attacker…” The female officer who had spoken earlier grew more serious. “If this attacker really exists, do you think it wasn’t destroyed along with the Sea Swallow’s Protocol Twenty?Two?”

“One of the basic rules when dealing with an supernatural disaster,” Lister said slowly, “is that unless you have enough strong, direct proof, you always assume the enemy is still there. Whether it’s an supernatural object or an supernatural phenomenon, its ‘vitality’ is always frighteningly strong.”

The officers exchanged looks again. One of them spoke up, hesitating: “Then about Dagger Island…”

“I’ll submit a request for an investigation to the governor,” Lister said as he slowly rose and braced his hands on the desk. “The Sea Swallow had its accident on the way back to the main island, and when it left Dagger Island it did report that the inspection work there had gone smoothly. But now the ship has had an accident, which means the situation on Dagger Island is also in doubt. Next, you will—”

The defense commander did not finish his sentence. Sudden hurried footsteps sounded in the hallway, followed by a sharp knock at the door that cut him off.

Lister frowned and said: “Come in.”

A secretary pushed the door open, saluted the commander behind the desk, and said: “Commander, Gatekeeper Agatha is here.”

“Gatekeeper?” Surprise clearly showed on Lister’s face. “What is she here for?”

“She says it is about the Sea Swallow. The situation is urgent.”

“Let her—” Lister started at once, but before he finished speaking, an Ashen Wind swirled up in the hallway outside. The pale, dust?like Ashen Wind rushed into the room and quickly spun around the office. Agatha stepped out of the Ashen Wind. She held the tin Gatekeeper’s cane always carried by priests of the Death God. The gaze that showed between her bandages was serious, with a hint of apology.

“Sorry, Colonel Lister. The situation is urgent. I came in as soon as I heard your answer,” Agatha nodded and said. “I want to know how far your investigation into the Sea Swallow’s whereabouts has gone.”

Lister showed no displeasure at Agatha barging into the office. A good soldier knew what mattered most, and the city?state’s Gatekeeper had many special rights in emergencies. For this lady to appear in such a hurry clearly meant things were too urgent for polite formalities.

“We still haven’t found any trace or wreckage of the Sea Swallow. We currently suspect that General Duncan used Protocol Twenty?Two and the Sea Swallow has already sunk,” he said gravely. “Next, we plan to widen the search area, look for signs of the attacker in the open sea, and prepare to investigate Dagger Island.”

“Your guess about Protocol Twenty?Two is correct. The Sea Swallow was indeed invaded and corrupted by an supernatural force. The ship has already fulfilled its duty with honor, but you must not rush to investigate Dagger Island," Agatha said quickly. "That island may already be in a full runaway state."

"Dagger Island is in a runaway state?" The muscles in Lister's face clearly twitched. "What information do you have?"

"…The source of the information is not convenient to reveal for now," Agatha hesitated. "But it is very reliable. I haven't had time to report to the great Cathedral and City Hall yet, because that might delay things. Colonel Lister, I hope you will immediately seal off all routes around Dagger Island. No ship is allowed to approach, and nothing is allowed to leave that island —most of all, nothing is allowed to land on Frostholm's main island."

"Lady Agatha, I must remind you—this does not follow procedure," Lister said, his tone growing more serious. "I'm willing to trust your judgment as Gatekeeper, but you should know every rule was written in lives. Sending out the navy to seal off Dagger Island is no small matter. I need clearer orders and explanations."

"At least this won't make things worse," Agatha took half a step forward. "I've already sent people to the great Cathedral. Follow?up orders will come soon."

Lister opened his mouth as if to say more, but just then a sudden, sharp bell rang from a corner of the room, cutting him off.

The Harbor's defense commander glanced at Agatha, then turned and quickly walked to a small side table. He pressed a button on the table.

Moments later, hissing air and a rapid, growing clatter sounded inside a copper tube fixed to the wall near the table. With a light metallic bang, the tube shook. A latch at the end of the pipe popped open and a bit of white vapor puffed out.

Lister opened the latch, flipped up the cover, took out the capsule inside the tube, and pulled out the slip of paper. He glanced over it, and his face changed at once.

“What is it?” Agatha asked, curious.

“A ship has appeared in the Nearshore Waters and sent a request to enter the harbor,” Lister slowly lifted his head. His face was grim. “It’s the Sea Swallow.”

The room fell quiet at once.

The officers looked at each other. Agatha’s gaze turned solemn in an instant. Lister stayed silent for a few seconds, then suddenly said: “To the docks.”

The Sea Swallow had appeared. After being missing for more than twenty? four hours, it showed itself again to the people of Frostholm and sailed straight toward the military pier of East Harbor.

From the watchtower on the East Harbor pier, they could already see the outline of the steam cruiser. It grew larger on the horizon, steam rising above it like clouds.

“Silhouette and bow flag match… It’s the Sea Swallow.”

A junior officer lowered his telescope and spoke in a complicated tone.

Lister still did not move. He kept his gaze fixed on the dark shape on the sea that was slowly drawing closer and did not say a word for a long time.

The faint sound of the whistle drifted over, with a special rhythm of pauses.

“Second?round signal. The Sea Swallow is requesting entry to port,” the junior officer turned and looked at Lister. “Commander…”

“Sink it.” Agatha, who had been silent this whole time, finally broke the silence.

Chapter 344:

“Sink it.”

Agatha kept her eyes locked on the ship that was moving steadily closer across the sea. Her voice was as cold and hard as ice.

The junior officer beside her looked stunned, as if he could not believe what he had heard: “Ma’am, what did you say?”

“Sink it.” Agatha did not answer the young officer. She only turned her head toward Colonel Lister and repeated: “That is the ‘raider’, a massive source of corruption. I do not know what it really is, but it is definitely not the Sea Swallow.”

As she spoke, she paused. Her fingers tightened on the Gatekeeper’s cane until her knuckles turned a little white: “I will take responsibility for this decision.”

Lister said nothing. The muscles in his face were tight, and for a long time he stood in the cold wind like a statue frozen in place. Only when the whistle sounded again in the distance, clearer and louder than before, carrying a disturbing note of urgency, did he suddenly break the silence: “Lady, are you sure your source is reliable?”

“…I trust my own judgment, Colonel,” Agatha drew a slow breath, her voice rough and a little husky. “And I will take responsibility for it.”

“You cannot take responsibility. You are the Gatekeeper, but you are not the direct overseer of the Harbor system,” Lister said calmly. Then he turned around and looked out toward the distant sea.

“Sink that ship. I will take responsibility for this decision.”

Far out on the sea, the ship that had suddenly appeared, the “Sea Swallow”, was still racing ahead at full speed. Its tall prow cut through the waves. Its flags snapped and cracked in the wind. The funnel at midships spewed out great billows of white vapor. Within those clouds, it seemed as if countless hidden howls rose and fell in a constant, snarling uproar.

At the Sea Swallow’s stern, the broken wake heaved and crossed over itself. Deep within the layers of foaming spray, black, sticky matter spread with the waves like blood pouring from a giant beast’s body, drifting in fine strands that rose and sank with the swell.

“Woooo-”

The whistle sounded again. More great sheets of white vapor burst from the top of the Ironclad Warship. High-pressure Tathagata steam from the Deep Sea seemed to scream as it tore through the sky.

Shapes moved along the Sea Swallow’s rail. Figures walked back and forth, busy and hurried. They wore the uniforms of the Frostholm navy and did the tasks that seamen on a warship were supposed to do. They stepped over the jagged cracks that split the deck. They stepped over the sticky, writhing substance underfoot and the swollen nodules that crossed the planks like thick, tangled veins.

Melted-looking black sludge kept dripping off the bodies of those seamen. Some of the seamen suddenly fell where they stood and sank into the nearby structures of the ship, becoming one with steel and planks. At the same time, new seamen kept separating themselves from the deck or the ship’s side. They wriggled, crawled, and staggered away, to scrub the deck, to handle the flags, to turn on the lights…

They were going home. The Sea Swallow was going home.

But far away, in the direction of the Harbor, the heavy platforms of the Coastal Guns had already started to move. One after another, the armored doors set into the cliffs, sea walls, and the Harbor's reinforced concrete outer walls opened up. Dark cannon barrels pushed out. Massive gun mounts slowly turned under the drive of gears and linkages.

Deep underground, the Shaft Lift creaked as it ran, sending shells up from the buried magazines to the giant guns above. At the same time, rapid bells and whistles rang out in and around the Harbor, urging all ships still outside the Harbor to clear the area at once and pushing every facility within the Harbor into a state of battle readiness.

The Sea Swallow seemed to feel something. Even before the air-raid sirens on Frostholm's main island began to sound, it had already started to speed up.

Steam gushed. The whistle screamed without pause. The whole ship seemed to be howling from the inside out. Seamen on the deck broke into a run. In the white vapor above the funnel, streaks of black and dark red appeared before anyone knew it.

The ship was accelerating. It was already a fast steamship, but now its speed rose to the limit. It raced across the wide, endless sea like a giant beast wrapped in rolling thunder. The roar of waves split by its bow grew, little by little, into a wild scream that shook the whole ocean.

At that moment, the Coastal Guns on Frostholm's main island opened fire.

Like thunder bursting apart overhead, the huge coastal guns spat flame and noise. Their terrible power shook the air. A first full volley of standard armor-piercing shells roared out. The pointed shells screamed through the sky and lit fierce fire-lines across it, then fell onto the distant sea after a long arc of flight.

Shells plunged into the water. Columns of spray shot up everywhere. Tall and short water plumes rose all around the Sea Swallow and turned the sea far away into a drifting, spreading fog bank. A few shells grazed the Sea Swallow, but its speed did not drop at all.

The shock of the Coastal Guns' fire even made the platform under Agatha's feet tremble. She could feel the whole lookout tower quiver slightly under the feedback of that salvo. At the same time, she heard someone giving a report beside her.

"The hit rate in the first volley is low. That ship is too fast. It is faster than any speed on record!"

"Open free fire. Switch to armor-piercing incendiary shells. Keep firing until the target sinks," Lister said with no expression. "The stationed fleet is to stand by. If we still cannot stop that ship at the coastal warning line, the fleet will attack. Even if they have to ram it in the end, they must stop that ship outside Frostholm!"

"Yes, Commander!"

Lister's face was dark as still water. While the roar of the guns kept rolling, he stared hard at the rising water plumes and smoke on the distant sea, and at the "Sea Swallow" that was still speeding toward Frostholm. There was no hesitation left in his eyes.

From what he could see now, he could already be certain that this ship was not the Sea Swallow he knew.

Faced with the bombardment from Frostholm's main island, that ship had not slowed down. It had not sent the proper signal flags or signal lights.

Instead, it kept speeding up, pushing past the limits of its own design… That was not a warship of Frostholm. That was a Monster.

A Monster disguised as a thing of the mortal world.

All the Coastal Guns began to howl. In the roar of continuous fire, armor-piercing incendiary shells drew countless bright lines across the sky and fell like crossing rain into the waters around the Sea Swallow. Huge columns of water shot up one after another. In the forest of water plumes, the ship that kept shrieking and roaring rushed straight ahead like a wild beast driven mad.

As the distance shrank and the barrage was corrected again and again, shells finally began to land directly on the Sea Swallow.

Massive blasts tore its armor open. They smashed its masts and peeled whole sheets of deck plating from the hull. Black, mud-like sludge gushed from under its fake shell like blood. It poured down on the sea in a dark rain.

“God of Death above! What is that thing?!”

Through their telescopes, the people on the lookout tower could now just make out the twisted, strange shapes under the Sea Swallow’s shattered deck. Someone could not hold back a low cry.

Lister only watched with a grave face. The muscles at his jaw were still tight.

The ship did not slow down.

Even after the Coastal Guns had ripped apart its stern deck, blown off its funnel and bridge, and blasted the compartments that should have held its ammunition and steam core, it still did not slow down.

The Coastal Guns kept howling. Salvo after salvo of deadly shells crashed down. A huge number of guns focused their “attention” on a single enemy ship that never tried to dodge. In a very short time, they poured an uncountable number of shells onto the Sea Swallow. For any normal ship, this would already have been fatal.

Even if it did not sink, it should at least have stopped.

But it was still running at full speed.

Soon, the other people on the tower also noticed what was happening on the sea, and tension began to spread.

“Keep firing, until it vanishes from the surface of the sea,” Lister said through clenched teeth. Then he suddenly turned to Agatha at his side. “Lady, please inform the Cathedral as soon as possible. If we cannot stop it on the Harbor side, we may need to…”

“Do not be so quick to give up yet, Colonel,” Agatha shook her head before he could finish. “The attack is working. It is fading.”

As she spoke, she looked out over the distant sea. In the eyes of the young Gatekeeper, a pale light flickered gently.

What her eyes reflected was not the Mortal Realm, but the Spirit Realm.

Agatha saw the twisted black silhouette breaking apart. On the chaotic sea, crooked lines of light and shadow were peeling away from that shape at great speed.

The barrage from the Coastal Guns had not directly “killed” the replica, but it was driving it toward some critical point. It was about to collapse on its own.

Agatha blinked. The brief image of the Spirit Realm faded from her sight, and the clear world of the Mortal Realm returned to her eyes.

The Coastal Guns kept firing. Soon, more gunfire sounded from not far away.

That was the fleet inside the Harbor. It had finally finished its preparations and joined the interception.

The roar of the battleships' main guns became the final straw that broke the "Sea Swallow". When even more armor-piercing incendiary shells rained down on the ship that was already beyond recognition, it finally began to fall apart.

First its deck and outer hull tore away in huge sheets, exposing the twisted, dark structures inside. Then the whole ship writhed and ripped from bow to stern, as if it was trying to tear itself into pieces. The thing that had once looked like the Sea Swallow now flung out endless black muck as it snapped apart.

Its whistle finally fell silent. The strange, sharp wails slowly died away.

It began to slow down. As it spread vast patches of dark filth across the sea, it also melted and caved in on itself.

This terrible, eerie attacker that had tried to charge into the civilized world finally came to a stop only a few nautical miles from Frostholm's main island.

Chapter 345:

The “Sea Swallow” had stopped.

By the time this terrifying charger came to a halt, it had almost turned into a heap of wreckage under the constant bombardment. Its original hull structure was completely gone. There was not even a single intact stretch of deck or superstructure left. Broken hull plates and inner matter were scattered across the sea like spilled garbage. Between the shattered remnants floated slowly spreading pools of black sludge. Patches of fire still burned among the fragments, and thick, dirty smoke rolled up into the sky.

Along the path where the Sea Swallow had once charged, the water was filled with that strange, mud-like substance. The ominous black color drew a band across the sea that ran for more than ten nautical miles, like the slime trail a soft-bodied creature might leave when crawling ashore. It rose and fell slowly with the waves and wind, refusing to disperse.

The howling of the Coastal Guns had fallen silent. The harsh smell of powder smoke hung over the whole coastline. Lister kept his gaze fixed on the burning wreckage out at sea. Only after a long time did he dare to believe that thing had really stopped completely, and he broke the silence with some hesitation: “Is it over?”

“…It might also be only the beginning,” Agatha’s voice was slightly hoarse. Pale light flashed now and then in her eyes. Even though the “Sea Swallow” had stopped moving, she still watched the scenes in the Spirit Realm over and over, unwilling to relax until she was sure nothing in those remains was still drifting toward the city-state. “Do not forget, the Sea Swallow only went wrong after it returned from Dagger Island.”

Lister’s expression grew very ugly.

“When was the last message from that island?”

“Just a few hours ago. The telegram said everything on the island was normal,” Lister said, brow deeply furrowed. “The Spirit Realm link with the Cathedral has also been steady the whole time.”

“…Seal off Dagger Island, Colonel. From this moment on, do not trust any message that comes from that island,” Agatha let out a long breath. “I will return to the main Cathedral at once. I believe a stricter blockade order will be issued very soon.”

“Thank you for your help, Lady Agatha.”

“Everything is for the peace of the city-state,” Agatha said softly. She recited a short saying from the Sacred Tome of Death. “All things in order.”

…

Half an hour earlier.

Thunder-like booms had rolled in from far away, one after another, each volley denser than the last. From the direction of the sound, it seemed to come from the coastline on the eastern side of the city-state.

Duncan lifted his head and looked toward that part of the sky. Through the haze, he could faintly see clouds rising in that direction.

“What was that sound?” Alice nervously touched her head and looked at Duncan in confusion. “Was that thunder?”

“It sounded like heavy guns,” Vanna, standing to the side, had already gone a little pale. “The Coastal Guns? What happened? Why would there be a full volley from the Coastal Guns…”

A thoughtful look came over Duncan’s face. The first thing he thought of was the denunciation letter he had handed to the Old Caretaker. Right after that, he thought of the direction where Dagger Island lay.

[Did I really guess right?]

The sound of wings suddenly came from nearby. A fat, plain-looking pigeon burst out of the shadows of a nearby building, flapped hard, and flew quickly into the distance.

“No need to worry. I sent AI to go check,” Duncan said. Then he raised his head and looked at the slightly old house in front of them. “Now, keep telling me about this place.”

Morris cleared his throat at once and went on with the introduction that had been cut off. The distant rumbling still rolled now and then, but since the captain was so calm, there clearly was nothing to panic about. “Vanna and I picked this house out of four rental options. The other three were either too close to the city center, which would make it hard for us to move around, or they were in poor condition and unfit to live in. This one is old too, but the landlady has taken good care of it. It is quite clean inside.

“This house is Number 44, Oak Street. Next to it is Hearth Street. The landlady has another home over on Hearth Street, so she will not come here and bother us in normal times. There is a small lane linking the two blocks, and the small Cathedral sits on a little square between them, a bit of a walk from here…

“We signed a short-term lease. The average daily rent is higher than for a long-term contract, but we can move out at any time. Right now we have paid half a month in advance. Vanna and I have already met the landlady.

She is a rather kind and well-bred lady. When she learned I am a traveling scholar, she very generously brought over some basic daily supplies…”

Duncan listened to the old gentleman’s careful explanation while he studied their temporary lodging.

It was a detached house with the typical style of a northern city-state. The gray-white outer walls were a little rough, coated with porous plaster that kept in heat. The building had two floors. Its windows were fairly narrow. A black front door stood under a wall lamp and beside a mail slot. The roof was steep and high, covered with black tiles so that snow would melt and slide off easily. Steam and gas pipes ran out from the thick main pipes that crossed above the street, then followed the gable down into the building.

It was not a luxurious home, but it was more than enough as a temporary base. It was even a little more spacious than the small two-story building in Pland that had held both shop and lodgings.

Letting Morris and Vanna handle the problem of where to stay had clearly been the right choice. No one else on the ship could have managed it.

Morris stepped forward, took the key from his pocket, and opened the front door. Duncan followed him in with Alice right behind.

Inside the door was an entryway for taking off shoes and outerwear. Beyond that lay a fairly roomy parlor. The walls were covered with light-patterned wallpaper that had yellowed a little with age. The dining room opened directly off the parlor. Another bedroom sat beside the dining room. A staircase to the second floor faced the front door. It seemed that most of the bedrooms were on the upper floor.

The floorboards felt a bit loose underfoot and gave off a soft creak that spoke of passing years. Plain tables and chairs shone faintly in the sunlight.

There was hardly any dust to be seen. On the dining table sat a bright bouquet of flowers in vivid colors. It was clearly made of cloth or plastic.

“That was from the landlady as well. They say it is a custom here in Frostholm,” Morris explained. “The landlord gives new tenants a bouquet that will not wither in winter. It stands for health and safety.”

“Every place has its own little customs,” Duncan said with a small smile. “This place is not bad. And it is away from the main street, so it should be pretty quiet most of the time.”

As he spoke, he looked up toward the second floor. “We could bring Nina and Shirley over here to do their homework. They have already started complaining that they are bored on the ship.”

The corner of Vanna’s mouth twitched. “…Shirley is probably really bored, but I doubt she wants to come into the city to do homework.”

Duncan waved a hand. “It does not matter. She should put in some effort anyway. Dog can already more or less read the newspaper, and Shirley is still fighting with the spelling of twelve common vegetables. I am deeply worried about her future. At this rate she will not even be able to catch up with Alice.”

Alice, who was in truth not doing much better than Shirley, scratched her hair and gave a harmless-looking grin. “Hehe…”

Duncan’s face stayed blank. “I am not praising you. The fact that you and Shirley together do not know more words than a dog is nothing to be proud of.”

Alice froze for a moment, as if she were seriously trying to figure out whether the words she and Shirley knew together actually added up to more than Dog’s vocabulary. While she was stuck on this question, the faint rumbling from far away finally began to fade.

“The sound stopped…” Vanna tilted her head, listening to the distance.

Duncan did not speak. Through the hazy mental link, he sensed what AI was seeing far away.

After so much practice and adjustment, the bond between him and AI was now much tighter and clearer than at the very start. When he focused enough, he could even share AI’s sight and some of its other senses. He could also use AI as a relay to send out a portion of his power without moving his true body at all.

In the Harbor district on the eastern side of Frostholm, the chubby White Dove stood on top of a tower. One round little eye watched the smoke-covered sea, and the other looked back toward the Harbor itself.

The soldiers running back and forth across the Harbor and the spreading black “oil slick” on the sea were reflected in its eyes, where green fire flickered softly.

“There is no need to worry for now,” Duncan pulled his distant “sight” back and gave Morris and Vanna a slight nod. “There was an invasion, but the people of Frostholm have already stopped it.”

Vanna’s face changed at once. “An invasion?!”

“If I am not wrong, it came from Dagger Island. The people of Frostholm should already have realized how serious the problem is. Whatever is on that island will not find it so easy to get out again,” Duncan said in a calm tone. “Tyrian has already reached the waters near Dagger Island. His sea-fog fleet will make the authority in Frostholm even more tense. In any case, once the whole city goes under martial law, the Annihilators hiding in the city will have to move. When that happens, it will be much easier to smoke them out.”

Just then, a knock at the door suddenly sounded, cutting off their talk in the parlor.

Duncan looked toward the door in surprise. They had only just moved in. A guest already?

“I will get it,” Morris said, and he walked to the door. When he opened it, a surprised sound came out of him. “You are…”

A small young lady in a thick white coat and a knitted hat was standing at the door.

Chapter 346: Blockade

The young lady standing at the door looked at most eleven or twelve years old. She was short and wore a warm, thick white coat, and a bit of steam rose from her wool hat—she seemed to have run all the way here. When she saw Morris she was still out of breath, but a bright smile soon bloomed on her face.

“You’re Grandpa Morris, right? Mother asked me to bring this,” she said as she held out her hand and passed over a key. “It’s the basement key. Mother said she forgot to give it to you when she left.”

“Ah, thank you, little young lady,” Morris said, coming back to his senses. He took the key and nodded. “Come in and warm up for a bit?”

The young lady was just about to speak when Duncan’s voice suddenly sounded from behind Morris, with a hint of surprise: “Annie?”

Looking past the old scholar’s shoulder, Duncan gazed in some astonishment at the girl standing in the doorway.

It was Annie Barbelli, the girl he had seen earlier at the cemetery gate—the daughter of Captain Cristo Barbelli of the Obsidian.

Duncan already understood what had happened. He did not know whether to call it a coincidence or to sigh over how “small” the city-state was. After going around in circles, he had met the Obsidian captain’s daughter again. The temporary lodging that Morris and Vanna had spent a whole day finding… turned out to be Annie’s family home.

Annie also saw the tall, broad figure that suddenly appeared in front of her, and her eyes instantly widened.

The unexpected situation left the young lady a bit at a loss. She stared blankly for several seconds before she finally reacted and greeted him clumsily: “Ah, it’s the uncle from the cemetery gate… you… hel-hello?”

Her last greeting was clearly hesitant. She was obviously remembering what had happened at the cemetery gate, remembering that strange sight when Duncan left and flames soared into the sky. Duncan had not thought much of it at the time, but that scene had clearly left a deep mark in the young lady’s mind.

Even though she was still young, Annie knew that it had been the power of the supernatural. Knowledge of such things had long been written into every city-state’s textbooks and spread through the common education for all citizens. A basic understanding of supernatural powers and simple protection skills was the foundation that allowed ordinary people to live safely in this world.

But Annie still could not tell what kind of power it was. Her textbooks had never talked about it. Grandpa Caretaker at the cemetery had not explained it to her. When she went home and told Mother, Mother also told her nothing.

It felt like a secret that a small child was not supposed to touch yet.

Annie stared blankly at Duncan standing opposite her. Grandpa Caretaker’s earlier warning still echoed in her ears, and it made her instinctively uneasy. But then the tall figure suddenly stepped to the side, and his voice, which sounded a bit frightening yet carried a trace of warmth, said: “Come in and rest for a while. It’s starting to snow again outside.”

Only then did Annie belatedly turn her head to look back. She saw swirling snowflakes falling from the sky once more. A few flakes rode the wind down her collar, cold as ice against her neck.

She walked into the house as if pulled by unseen hands, looking around in a daze.

The sister with the beautiful blond hair and noble air was also standing in the living room, beside the dining table, watching them with curious eyes.

She had taken off her veil. She looked very beautiful—almost the most beautiful person Annie had ever seen.

“Mother said I shouldn’t bother the tenants,” Annie said, rubbing the dirt and melted snow from her little boots on the mat at the entrance, still speaking hesitantly. “She said Grandpa Morris is a Grand Scholar, and it would be very rude to make trouble…”

“You’re not bothering us. We were just thinking about learning a bit more about our new place,” Morris said at once, having more or less guessed the situation. “And it’s snowing again outside. It’s not safe for you to run back along the little paths. Rest here for a while. Later Vanna will walk you home.”

Annie looked up at Vanna, who was like a little giant, and nodded without thinking.

Then she looked toward Duncan. She hesitated for a few seconds before she spoke: “So… so you also need to live in a house?”

“Of course I live in a house,” Duncan said with a laugh. As he led Annie toward the sofa in the living room, he added casually: “You run around outside all by yourself. Doesn’t your Mother worry?”

In his view, Annie really ran around too wildly. She had not only gone to the cemetery alone early in the morning, but now, in this awful weather, she had run through the alleys between blocks to bring a key to new tenants whose background she did not even know. That was truly worrying.

“It’s not that bad. Everyone around here knows me. Mother says half the people on these two streets were Dad’s friends,” Annie said, not caring at all. She sat down on the sofa, braced her hands under her thighs, and swung her body back and forth. “And Mother is usually very busy. She has to keep accounts and fill in forms for people. When she has time, she also goes to help at the little cathedral. I’ve gotten used to running around.”

Duncan thought for a moment and asked: “Then… when you went home, did you tell your Mother what I told you?”

“I told her,” Annie said with a nod. Then her expression turned a bit strange. “At first she said I was talking nonsense. Later I told her what Grandpa Caretaker at the cemetery said. Then she went back to her room alone… When she came out, it looked like she had been crying… but she smiled and told me we would have fried fish fillets and sausage stew for dinner, because today is a day worth celebrating.”

She stopped swinging her body and looked a little confused. She raised her head to look at Duncan and said, curious and hesitant: “I feel like… I don’t really understand.”

“It’s all right. You’ll understand sooner or later,” Duncan said with a smile. “Some things are too complicated for you right now.”

“Uncle, you talk just like Grandpa Caretaker. He says that a lot too,” Annie muttered. Then she shook her head, as if she had thought very seriously for a while, and looked up again. “Uncle, do you… not want to be bothered by people?”

Duncan was curious: “Why do you say that?”

“Because of the way you dress—and because you suddenly disappeared when you left. Mother says that is the style of the secret staff from the Grand Cathedral, or of the hermits in those societies… I think that was the word, ‘style’.”

For a moment Duncan did not know how to answer the young lady. But she clearly did not wait for his reply. Annie thought to herself for a bit and then suddenly said: “I won’t just go and tell anyone. Grandpa Caretaker reminded me too. He told me to act as if I never met you and not tell anyone except Mother.”

Duncan let out a silent laugh, but before he could speak, Annie went on: “Then can I tell Grandpa Caretaker? Tell him… you’re living in my family’s house?”

Morris and Vanna, who had come over by the sofa to listen in, could not help looking at each other when they heard the young lady’s words. Alice at once turned her eyes to Duncan.

They all felt that something about this was not quite right.

However, Duncan only stayed silent for a few seconds, then nodded slightly with a smile: “You can. I don’t mind.”

…

At the same time, near the eastern Harbor, the work of collecting samples from the wreck of the Sea Swallow had already begun.

Several light, fast boats left the docks and carefully approached that patch of sea where foul “sludge” and a few tongues of flame still floated. Each boat carried a priest and a sacred relic, as well as nitroglycerin charges for emergencies.

On shore, the Harbor garrison was also ready to receive them.

An empty warehouse had been chosen as a temporary transfer facility. priests and Guardians who had rushed over from the higher Cathedral had already finished the purification and countermeasures for the whole area. Before leaving, Gatekeeper Agatha had left behind a squad of elite trusted aides to guard against accidents during the collection of the wreck samples.

Lister stood on the pier, watching the situation on the sea. Several of his trusted subordinate aides stood nearby, keeping an eye on the progress of the salvage work.

“Are we sure bringing those things ashore won’t cause any problems?” one trusted aide asked, unease in his voice. “Of course, I am not questioning the Gatekeeper’s judgment, but those things… a few hours ago, they were rushing toward Frostholm Island at a terrifying speed. Are they really ‘dead’ now?”

“Lady Agatha made repeated deep checks in the Spirit Realm. These things are no longer active,” Lister said calmly. “They really can be ‘killed’. Judging from Lady Agatha’s attitude and how she handled it, I think the Grand Cathedral may already have dealt with similar things before.”

“Similar things? They have already appeared inside the city-state?” a junior officer said in shock. “I… I never heard any news like that…”

“If you haven’t heard, that only shows this matter should not be made public yet, or at least not yet. The Grand Cathedral and City Hall have their own judgment,” Lister said with a shake of his head. “In any case, Lady Agatha is trustworthy. She would not risk the city-state’s safety. What we need to do is follow the experts’ judgment—the priests know much better than soldiers how to deal with such strange things.”

The trusted aide fell silent. But just then, another burst of hurried footsteps sounded, and a soldier came quickly up onto the pier.

“Commander!” The soldier trotted over to Lister, saluted, and handed the Defense Commander a document that had just arrived through the Pneumatic Tube System. “Orders from City Hall.”

“Looks like the formal order to seal off Dagger Island has arrived,” Lister said as he took the document. But when he saw what was written, his expression suddenly changed.

One trusted aide noticed. “Commander? Is something wrong?”

“…It is indeed an order to block sea routes, but not to seal off Dagger Island.” Lister’s face grew grim, and his tone became especially serious. “Strictly speaking, it is not only Dagger Island. The order demands that all routes in and out of Frostholm be sealed, and all garrison troops go into battle readiness.”

“Seal… the whole main island of Frostholm?!”

“The Sea Mist Fleet has appeared in the nearby waters,” Lister said, drawing in a slow breath. His face looked even darker than the sky. “The entire Sea Mist Fleet.”

Chapter 347: The Silent Grand Cathedral

The Sea Mist Fleet had come, out in full force.

For a full half century, this famous curse Fleet had always hung like a blade over the heads of the people of Frostholm. It was the legacy of Frostholm's Queen, the shadow that never faded after the Great Uprising fifty years ago. It stood upon the Frost Sea like a sheer iceberg, its cold, hard hull hiding the unfathomable mind of the undying pirate general within.

Whenever people of Frostholm spoke of it, they could not help lowering their voices.

Almost everyone who knew history understood that the Frostholm rebellion fifty years ago had not succeeded because of "justice" or "blessing". The ragged rebels who rose up back then had been able to defeat the strongest royal fleet in history for one main reason: the Queen's most powerful main fleet had simply not been on Frostholm's main island at the time.

No one knew why the Sea Mist Fleet had left back then, just as no one knew what truth Frostholm's Queen had learned from the Deep Sea in those days. People only knew one thing: to this day, that fleet still acted in the Queen's name.

For half a century, the powerful Sea Mist Fleet had wandered through these Northern Seas like a ghost. Some city-states had tried to wipe out or reclaim this fleet, but they had never succeeded. On the other hand, although the Undying captains of those cursed warships roamed the Frost Sea, most ships that met them only needed to hand over money to avoid disaster. Compared with the losses from fighting the Sea Mist Fleet head-on, that “toll” was more like a kind and cheap tax. The northern city-states would rather pay for peace than risk themselves to repay Frostholm’s fifty-year-old debt.

But the people of Frostholm themselves knew that the Sea Mist Fleet would one day return. It was like a curse, and had even become a “prophecy of legend” that many Frostholm people grew up hearing again and again—

As long as the flag of the Sea Mist Fleet still flew, the Queen of Frostholm had not finished ruling this city-state. As long as the Sea Mist’s engines still turned, the reckoning for that Great Uprising fifty years ago would sooner or later fall upon this city.

The curse and the rumors passed from mouth to mouth had far-reaching effects. Under these stories, year after year, the cold shadow of the Sea Mist Fleet had only grown more frightening. Even well-trained professional soldiers could not ignore that pressure.

Lister’s fingers tightened slightly on the document until his knuckles turned a little white.

And as his words fell, a strange and heavy silence settled over the whole pier.

This Defense Commander knew that information about the Sea Mist Fleet did not need to be kept secret. That huge fleet was sailing openly right beside Frostholm, and it was still drawing closer to the main island and Dagger Island. By the time the Sun rose tomorrow at the latest, residents living near the coast would only need to open their windows, raise a telescope toward the southeast, and they would see those hazy ship silhouettes. This news would spread through the city-state very soon.

“The Sea Mist Fleet… the Sea Mist Fleet suddenly appearing, could it be connected to what happened on Dagger Island?” one trusted officer said. “Could it be tied to that ‘Sea Swallow’ that appeared out of nowhere?”

“I would rather they were connected. Then at least we would only face one problem,” Lister said through his teeth. “The worse possibility is that we are looking at two separate troubles…”

Another trusted officer sounded nervous: “Will the Sea Mist Fleet strike while the iron is hot? While Frostholm’s main island is being threatened by some unknown power…”

“It is too early to make any judgments. Carrying out the orders is our first duty,” Lister said, cutting off his subordinates’ wild guesses and speaking quickly. “Arrange the blockade at once. Send martial law signals to the nearby city-states and ships along the route. All Coastal Guns positions are to stand by… We may be in serious trouble.”

…

In the heartland of the Frostholm city-state, just like in most seafaring city-states, the solemn, towering Grand Cathedral stood on the highest ground at the very center of the city.

The locals called it the Silent Grand Cathedral, or simply “the Grand Cathedral”.

It was an ancient and solemn building, almost entirely made of gray and black bricks. Clusters of slender buildings and all kinds of spires formed its body. Whenever the heavy winter snow flew, those layers of spires became hazy against the snowy sky, like rows of tombstones in the mist or black swords pointing at the heavens.

When outsiders first came to Frostholm and saw this Cathedral, their first feeling was often that it was too gloomy and oppressive, even a little frightening. But for the people of Frostholm, who almost all believed in the God of Death Bartok, this black Grand Cathedral held only solemn dignity and holiness.

The locals firmly believed that the many spires of the Cathedral were bridges between the realm of death and the mortal world. When the days of heavy snow came, the God of Death's envoys would hide among those spires and rooftops. With eyes that saw through all things, they would cast their gaze over the city-state and guide back to rest those undead who had lost their way for all sorts of reasons.

Thus the people of Frostholm saw the first day of heavy snow as "the day when long-lost restless souls set out on their way". On that day, they would close the cemeteries and pause all funerals for new dead, so as to leave the roads wide and clear for those long-lost restless souls, letting them reach the Silent Grand Cathedral in time.

Today was one of those days of heavy snow.

The nearby cemeteries were closed, and the Grand Cathedral no longer allowed anyone but the Clergy to go in and out. The cloister paths in the courtyard, where snowflakes kept falling, were quieter than ever. Other than the sound of boots on snow, even the soft patter of snow slipping from the treetops could be heard clearly.

Agatha, wearing a wide-brimmed hat and dressed all in black, passed through the Cathedral's courtyard gate. She walked through the long audience hall and then deeper inside, until she reached the Meditation Chapel where the Bishop stayed.

As in Pland, Frostholm also had two top spokespeople for the Church. The "Gatekeeper" was the guardian of the city-state's security and mainly handled worldly affairs. The city-state's Bishop mainly took charge of clerical work and of dealing with the higher powers of divine authority.

Inside the Meditation Chapel, candle flames flickered in rows of niches along the walls. The pale light from countless candles made the room quite bright. At the far end of the chapel stood a high stone platform. Yet on that platform there was no statue or chair, only a simple black coffin with an ancient look.

That was where the city-state's Bishop stayed.

Agatha stepped up onto the platform, looked down, and said: "I'm back."

The coffin stayed completely silent.

Agatha waited patiently for a few seconds, then raised her voice a little: "Bishop Ivan, have you heard the news that the Sea Mist Fleet has appeared?"

There was still no movement inside the coffin.

Agatha frowned and lifted her head to look around. After hesitating a little, she finally raised the Gatekeeper's cane and tapped it beside the coffin: "Are you there?"

She tapped three times in a row. At last, a hoarse, elderly voice came from inside the coffin: "I am. Stop knocking. Show some respect for the elderly."

Agatha lowered the Gatekeeper's cane: "…Did you fall asleep while meditating and giving benediction to the God of Death?"

"I was too deep in my meditation to hear any voices from the mortal world."

"But your snoring carried through the coffin lid into the mortal world."

"Ah? Was it that loud?"

Agatha sighed: "You really did fall asleep, Bishop."

The voice in the coffin fell silent at once. A few seconds later, a faint scraping broke the quiet. The dark coffin lid slid a little to the side, but only enough to leave a narrow crack. The old, raspy voice came again, now clearer: “Your heart is in turmoil, Agatha. It seems things are not going well in the city-state.”

“On my way back to the Grand Cathedral, I received the news that the Sea Mist Fleet is approaching the city-state,” Agatha said slowly. “I’m afraid this news will soon…”

“The Sea Mist Fleet should be left to the navy and the people at City Hall to worry about. Your concern is the balance in the supernatural field and the peace within the city-state,” said the voice of Frostholm’s Bishop, Ivan Romonso, from inside the coffin. “Tell me about the situation inside the city first.”

Agatha nodded at this and set the news of the Sea Mist Fleet aside for the moment. Her expression grew serious.

“A new site of ‘elements’ corruption has appeared at 42 Hearth Street. From various signs, we judge that a replica made of ‘elements’ lived in that building for a long time, until it collapsed and vanished not long ago. In addition, we found a commoner there who had clearly suffered cognitive interference…”

“cognitive interference?” Bishop Ivan cut off Agatha’s report. “What kind of cognitive interference?”

Agatha gathered her thoughts and said: “After checking the population records for the local block, we found that the replica’s ‘original person’ actually died in a shipwreck six years ago. But during all the time the replica was active… the female apprentice who lived with it never noticed this obvious Anomaly. Even after the replica collapsed and vanished and our investigators entered the scene, she still believed her teacher was just resting upstairs."

Agatha paused here, then went on: "And… our discoveries do not end there."

"They don't?"

"There is a third force—identity unknown, but very strong. They seem to be investigating the elements as well. One of their combatants killed two rather powerful heretic priests in a nearby alley. Their investigator searched that building before our elite Guardian squad arrived. Sadly, we found no clues at all and cannot even confirm where this third force comes from."

The coffin fell silent. The quiet lasted for who knew how long before Ivan's voice sounded again: "Is there any other news?"

"Yes," Agatha took a soft breath. "Do you still remember the 'visitor' who appeared in Cemetery No. 3?"

"…Has He appeared again?!"

"Yes. He appeared again, and not only appeared—He also left behind a… 'denunciation letter'."

Chapter 348: Bishop Ivan’s Secret

Agatha took out the denunciation letter. At a glance it looked like it was written on the most common kind of stationery, slipped into an envelope made by some small local factory in Frostholm, even the ink looked plain and cheap. It had been sent to her from Cemetery No. 3. To be honest, if she did not know that the Old Caretaker would never play this kind of joke on her, Agatha would never have believed that this thing had come from an indescribable higher supernatural being.

She could not sense any supernatural power from the letter at all. But after running a few simple tests, she had already confirmed that it really did come from that higher supernatural.

From inside the dark coffin came the faint rustle of cloth. The heavy lid finally opened, slowly. A strange incense smell drifted out as a body wrapped in bandages, like a mummy, slowly sat up from within.

This was Bishop Ivan of the city?state of Frostholm. Many years ago he had lost most of his body in an accident, but Bartok’s great power had kept his life going to this day. Most of the time he had to stay inside the “spirit coffin” in the Hall of Meditation, and he only appeared in public during major rites. Even so, he was still the most popular and trusted bishop in Frostholm’s history.

His achievements and vast knowledge in the field of the supernatural were beyond doubt.

He sat up in the coffin and took the denunciation letter from Agatha. The only left eye showing outside the bandages stared at the letter for a long time. He stayed silent for a long while.

Agatha finally broke the silence: “Bishop…”

The well?traveled, well?read archbishop spoke in a muffled voice: “Give me a moment.”

Agatha waited a bit, then asked: “Have you calmed down yet?”

“…You are sure this is the one?” Bishop Ivan raised his head. Confusion flickered in that slightly yellowed eye. “Did you…”

“It really looks very ordinary. But when I tried to look at the words on it through the Spirit Realm, I lost fifteen minutes of memory on the spot,” Agatha said. She knew what the bishop wanted to ask and nodded with a serious face. “It is wrapped in power that Mortals can hardly imagine. This simple appearance… might just be that Visitor’s personal taste.”

Bishop Ivan stayed quiet for a moment, as if he still needed time to recover, then slowly spoke: “What this letter talks about… is disturbing. You have already seen that ship, the Sea Swallow. If what the letter says is true, then the Sea Swallow is only the beginning. Even the runaway state of Dagger Island is only the beginning. Whether it is the cultists in the city or the corruption caused by elements, whether it is the Sea Swallow’s return or the Anomaly on Dagger Island, everything points to the Deep Sea, to the Abyssal Trench Project from half a century ago.”

“I have already sent a warning to City Hall and applied to review those secret files that have been sealed for half a century. After that I will go to the Cathedral library. I have also assigned people to strengthen the search across the whole city and arrest those hiding cultists,” Agatha said. “But that is still not enough. We at least have to confirm what is happening on Dagger Island right now. The greater source of corruption seems to be on that island."

Bishop Ivan thought for a moment and let out a light sigh: "If everything points to the Abyssal Trench Project… then the Sea Mist Fleet now appearing near Frostholm also seems easier to explain."

"…You think all of this is part of the Queen of Frostholm's plan from back then?" Agatha frowned. "Is the Sea Mist Fleet here today because of some order she left to that 'Steel Vice Admiral'?"

"I am not sure," Bishop Ivan shook his head. Then he suddenly looked up and met Agatha's eyes. "Agatha, in your understanding, what kind of figure is the Queen of Frostholm?"

Agatha hesitated, thinking as she spoke: "She was once a great ruler. But after a brief period of brilliant rule, she was tainted and lured by the power in the Deep Sea, and fell into a dangerous 'Mad King'. Because of her stubborn will, Frostholm formed a link to the horrors in the Deep Sea. Her terrible plan still has to be sealed away even after half a century, forbidden to be known by any ordinary person. Her life was both tragic and dangerous."

"A very standard answer. As someone of the younger generation who also has enough clearance to read some of the files from fifty years ago, your summary is quite good," Bishop Ivan said with a nod. Then his tone shifted. "But you did not really live through any of it."

Agatha said nothing. She just quietly watched the archbishop in front of her.

"I lived through it. That year, I was twenty?six, just an ordinary bishop at a small Cathedral in the dock district. You know that? That little Cathedral stood right beside the test site of the Abyssal Trench Project. I even held blessing rituals for some soldiers and officers. Later I found out that those soldiers and officers came to the Cathedral for divine blessing because they were going to come into contact with the ‘Submersible’.”

Ivan spoke slowly, his voice low. From under the crossing bandages, he let out, bit by bit, those old things that could not be told to ordinary people.

“After the rebels broke into the palace, most of the data about the Abyssal Trench Project was sealed. Then came the sea?cliff collapse at the decapitation site, which caused panic and led to even more files being destroyed. So even for a ‘Gatekeeper’ like you, with clearance, what you can access is only the shallowest part. If I tell you now that, on the night before the city Guard Corps rose in revolt, the Queen of Frostholm came to that little Cathedral and asked me to perform a soul?sending ritual for her… what would you think?”

Agatha’s eyes widened at once.

“She was called the ‘Mad King’—and yes, in the last few months her behavior was no different from madness. Even when the whole plan had fully entered a runaway state, when people were going missing, dying, or going insane every single day, she still kept pushing the project forward. She even sealed the palace chambers, locked up the last ministers who dared to advise her, ordered the gendarmes to close the Harbor, and had anyone trying to flee Frostholm arrested… After all that, the uprising that followed was only natural. There was no way she could end well on the throne as queen…”

“Yet even so, I still believe she was never truly ‘mad’… She was very clear?headed, even…”

Ivan suddenly stopped. Maybe those old memories weighed too heavily on his mind, or maybe he was searching for the right words to describe the strange feeling he’d had back then. After a few seconds, he finally went on:

“It even felt like she was the only one in the whole city who was still awake.”

Without noticing, Agatha had leaned forward: “Why do you say that?”

“She walked into the Cathedral without any attendants. Her eyes were clear, as if she already knew her fate. She went by herself to Bartok’s statue and lit incense for herself. Then she came over and patted me on the shoulder—like this.”

Bishop Ivan raised his arm, as if re?creating that moment from half a century ago.

“She patted me and said: ‘Wake up. You’re the only one in this whole city still keeping your eyes open—come help me with something. I’m about to die.’”

Agatha suddenly felt her breath catch, like the pause in breathing between sleep and waking. In the next moment she could not help lifting a hand to her forehead. Her heart was pounding. She did not know how she was supposed to react. After a few seconds of silence, she could only ask the most direct question in her mind: “You’re the only one still keeping your eyes open in the whole city… what did she mean by that?”

“I still have not fully figured it out,” Bishop Ivan sighed, his voice muffled under the bandages. “She told me to wake up—but I was already awake. And after that, she did not explain anything. She only ordered me to follow instructions. She lay down on the mortuary slab, just like the dead, and then… I performed the soul?sending ritual for her.”

“How can you hold a soul?sending ritual for someone still alive?” Agatha stared at him in disbelief. “Did that ritual… really work?”

“Of course the living cannot undergo a soul?sending ritual. I only followed her orders and carried out the whole procedure. Naturally, nothing happened after the ritual ended," Bishop Ivan shook his head. "I thought the ritual had no meaning. But the Queen of Frostholm seemed to have already reached her own goal. She left just like that. Before leaving, she told me one thing…"

"One thing?"

"She told me not to speak of what happened that night, or the rebels would surely take my life. When she said that, there were still a full twenty?four hours before the first units of the city Guard Corps attacked the armory."

Agatha fell silent. After an unknown time, she finally spoke in a low voice: "You never told me any of this before…"

"I have never told anyone," Bishop Ivan said softly. "At that time I was just a small bishop."

"But later you became the city?state's bishop. No one can put you on trial for 'complicity' from back then anymore. This secret…"

"I planned to take this secret to my grave. Why would I tell it?" Bishop Ivan raised his head. His cloudy yellow left eye rested on Agatha with a quiet gaze. "I know this matter is no small thing. The Queen already knew about the rebels' move and even accepted her own death. That fact alone could shake many people. But apart from its shock value, it has no meaning. The Abyssal Trench Project would still remain sealed. For most citizens, the city's stable order is what matters most. No one cares what a queen who has already been executed thought or did in her last moments. And there is another, more important reason…"

Bishop Ivan paused for a moment and let out a gentle breath.

"A more important reason is this: the Abyssal Trench Project was over. The Queen's era was over. Everything had settled. At least… that is what I have thought for the past fifty years."

Chapter 349: Snow, Fog, and Secrets

In the dark coffin, the old bishop wrapped in bandages like a mummy finally told the secret he had hidden for half a century. After that came a long silence.

Agatha’s voice broke the stillness: “But it is obvious this matter is not over.”

The old bishop did not answer, so Agatha asked again: “In your view… the strange signs that keep appearing in the city?state now, and the Shadows on Dagger Island… were those also inside the Queen of Frostholm’s calculations?”

“The Queen was not a god. She might have predicted ahead of time that rebels would try to stop her ‘mad’ actions, but she could not have predicted what would happen here fifty years later,” Bishop Ivan shook his head. He was still trying to recall the details of that night, but the time was too far away, and many things were blurred. “I honestly no longer remember everything the Queen said to me that night. During the soul?sending ritual she seemed to keep talking to me, but you know, a ritual needs full focus, and you also have to inhale incense beforehand. I… really cannot remember what she said.”

He paused and spread his hands in a helpless way: “Under normal conditions, the dead lying on the platform do not chat with the priest performing the ritual about how the ritual feels.”

Agatha stayed silent, thinking for a while before she suddenly spoke: “Can you tell me more about what it was like back then? Before the Abyssal Trench Project ended completely… what else did you see in that Cathedral?”

“…In my memory, that day it also snowed heavily, just like this year. And for a long time, all kinds of snowfall almost never stopped. The snow often covered the streets around the small Cathedral so much that people could not see the edges of the roads. Many people fell because of that,” Bishop Ivan recalled quietly. His low, dull voice seemed to pull the mind straight back to that winter half a century ago. “People who slipped and got hurt often came to the Cathedral for help—because the clinics in the district were already packed full.”

“At that time, the Abyssal Trench Project had already caused great unease in the city. It was not yet a taboo subject like it is today. The core parts were secret, but ordinary people still knew there was this ‘exploring the sea’ plan. So people who came to the Cathedral often told me about the ‘strange things’ they thought they had seen…”

“Strange things?” Agatha could not help asking.

“Yes, strange things. Some said they saw lights in houses that had been empty for a long time. Some said a familiar neighbor went out one day and suddenly looked like a different person. Some said they saw the cemetery gates open at midnight, and people who had been buried in the day walk right out of the graveyard at night. All kinds of stories like these, frightening and bizarre, came both day and night. At the time, the most ominous thing in the city was the Abyssal Trench Project, so people threw all these abnormal signs onto that Project. And then… they began to throw them onto the Queen of Frostholm as well.”

“People who were buried in the cemetery calmly walked out,” Agatha repeated. She frowned as she listened, as if it reminded her of the present. “And lights appearing in empty houses, this… this sounds…”

“It sounds a lot like that forged corpse in Cemetery No. 3, and the room you saw at 42 Fireplace Street, doesn’t it?” the old bishop said slowly. “But unlike back then, you have clear evidence now. You even collected evidence that might be elements. Back then, the city had only rumors. Every day someone came to tell me about some eerie thing they had met, but the Guardians ran all over the place and always came up empty.”

“Always came up empty?” Agatha asked.

“Yes. When residents filed a report, of course we had to send people to investigate. Even fifty years ago, we already had strict procedures like that. I sent many people to look into those horror stories. The Gatekeeper of the Great Cathedral even went to investigate in person, like you do now. But we never found anything. Aside from the citizens being nervous, the city?state itself was actually running as normal. In contrast, the test site of the Abyssal Trench Project was being fully sealed off step by step. All the terrible things were happening inside that sealed zone.

“As for what exactly happened there… you must have seen it in the archives. replicant Submersibles that kept appearing. Unregistered strangers coming and going. Explorers who died in the Deep Sea.”

Agatha fell silent for a moment. Her thoughts raced. For some reason, she felt a trace of wrongness in the old bishop’s story, something… off that no one had noticed for half a century.

“So you mean that even though the Abyssal Trench Project caused panic back then, in fact all the Anomaly events were limited to the test site. The city?state itself kept running as usual. People were under great mental pressure, and the city had trouble because of the Queen’s extreme decrees, and people kept reporting Anomaly events. But from the point of view of supernatural power, the ‘corruption’ from the Deep Sea never really crossed the cordon around the test site?”

“…At least that is how it is in my memory,” the old bishop nodded lightly, then shifted his tone. “Of course, even so, I am not trying to defend the Queen of Frostholm. Even if the city really did stay normal, her Abyssal Trench Project had already stretched Frostholm’s economy and everyone’s nerves to the breaking point. Even if the Abyssal Trench Project had stayed under her control and had never gone into a runaway state, that re… uprising was still bound to happen.”

But Agatha seemed not to care about what the old bishop said at the end. She only thought for a bit, then shook her head: “Let us focus on what is in front of us, Bishop Ivan. About the situation in the city right now, and this denunciation letter in my hand, I want to know what you think.”

“You found traces of Annihilators in the city and evidence that they were pushing things from behind. That is actually a good thing. When supernatural corruption breaks out, the most frightening thing is not finding the enemy, but not finding any enemy at all.”

Bishop Ivan spoke slowly, then lifted the letter in his hand.

“This denunciation letter you brought also mentions that. It suspects that the Annihilators in Frostholm used some secret ritual to contact the power of the Deep Sea, causing Deep Sea corruption to spill directly into the city? state. So we should find the place where those cultists held their ritual.”

Agatha’s gaze met the one eye showing from under the old bishop’s bandages: “Do you think… this ‘Visitor’ who wrote the denunciation letter can be trusted?”

“At least every matter mentioned in the denunciation letter now has some evidence behind it. Even the parts that we cannot yet prove make sense logically,” Bishop Ivan nodded. “Of course, I cannot say for sure whether the being who wrote the letter can be trusted. A higher supernatural’s moods and view of the mortal world are not the same as those of Mortals. We can never deal with Them by using human emotional logic.

“All I can say is this: when They happen to act neutral or friendly for the moment, we can work with Them or even actively cooperate. But when They suddenly feel this is boring and decide to turn on us, we should not feel doubt or surprise. Remember that in this world, the only higher supernatural beings we can truly trust and give our loyalty to are the Four Gods. Everything else is neither enemy nor ally.”

The old bishop’s words held the wisdom of half a century. Even though their ranks were equal, Agatha lowered her head slightly in respect.

“Next time that Visitor appears, I will try to approach Them and see what Their attitude is.”

“That would be best,” Bishop Ivan said with a nod.

Agatha thought for a moment, then looked again at the letter in the old bishop’s hand.

“Then for now, we only have one last hard riddle left.”

Following her gaze, Bishop Ivan’s eyes also fell on the last part of the denunciation letter.

The rest of the letter was easy enough to understand, but that last section was different. Neither the cemetery warden who had first received it, nor Agatha and Bishop Ivan now, could grasp its deeper meaning.

The two people who spoke for the Church’s highest will in the city?state leaned together. Three eyes showing from under the bandages stared hard at the end of the letter.

That indescribable, mysterious Visitor had left a puzzle in Their secret letter.

“…What do these numbers even mean?” Bishop Ivan asked, hesitating.

Agatha slowly shook her head: “I don’t understand it either.”

“…Maybe we can ask a Diviner to work it out, or invite experts in mathematics and occult studies to calculate it together. It might be a Secret Cipher pointing to the city?state’s future.”

“Makes sense.”

…

On the edge of the Upper City, at No. 44 Oak Street beside Fireplace Street, Duncan stood at the narrow window at the end of the second?floor corridor, looking out at the veil of night as it slowly came down.

After a long time, he suddenly turned his head and looked at Vanna, who was spacing out beside him: “Do you think they have sent the payment by now?”

Vanna snapped out of her daze, completely confused: “Huh… what?”

“Go to the bank for me tomorrow and see if they have sent the money,” Duncan said with a serious face. “I left an anonymous account in that denunciation letter. I use it just to collect whistleblower bounties.”

Vanna stared at him: “…Huh?”

Chapter 350: Sea Mist Surrounds the City

After nightfall, small snowflakes began to fall again, drifting through the air. In the hazy, fog-like darkness, the cold light of the World's Wound was mostly covered by clouds. Only a few patches of its chaotic glow seeped through the gaps. Street gas lamps lit up one after another along roads and alleys, shining on the snowflakes in midair and giving the city a quiet mood very different from Pland.

Vanna stood at the narrow window and stared at the night outside for a while. Then she sighed and said: "I'm sure they didn't send the money… and by now they have probably gathered a group of experts to crack the 'secret cipher' you left in that letter."

Duncan turned his head: "Is it really that serious?"

Vanna looked at her temporary boss with a very serious face: "…Did you explain in the letter what that string of numbers was for?"

"No, but isn't that the standard format for a denunciation letter?" Duncan answered with full confidence. "You just attach the account number at the end of the denunciation letter and City Hall will transfer the money. That's how it works in Pland. And I've heard many places don't put any special note in front of the account number, to make it sound more subtle and reserved—I thought I should be a bit reserved too."

Vanna stared at Duncan for a long time. In the end she could not help letting out another sigh: "Ah…"

Duncan thought for a moment. At this point he actually had a bit of self-awareness, so his tone became a little awkward: “I guess… it is kind of hard for them to understand?”

“It’s good that you understand that,” Vanna said with tired patience.

Duncan lowered his head and thought more carefully: “…It’s not a good idea to send a second letter now, is it?”

“You… should put your hopes on them figuring out what that denunciation letter was for as soon as possible,” Vanna said, rubbing her brow. She felt that she had once again discovered a surprising side of Captain Duncan. This powerful and terrifying captain… actually had such a clear and funny personality.

Duncan did not care what Vanna was thinking. He only asked, as if casually: “You took Annie home today. How is everything at her place?”

Vanna nodded at once: “Everything at Annie’s home was normal. There were no signs of supernatural manifestations or corruption. We also found no trace of Annihilators nearby. None of the neighbors looked suspicious. Madam Belloni… our current landlady… also seems like a…”

“Stop, stop,” Duncan quickly raised a hand before she finished. “I’m asking about her home life, her living situation. I’m not asking you to report along the full heretic investigation procedure. Control your occupational disease.”

Vanna froze for a second, then realized what she was doing and coughed twice: “Ahem, sorry, that’s… my work habit. Everything is fine over there. I only stayed for a short while and talked with Madam Belloni a little, but it was enough to judge the basics. After all, six years have passed. She and her daughter have already walked out of the shadows of that year.

“Now Annie goes to a public school in the city-state. Madam Belloni makes money by renting rooms and also has some clerical work, enough to support the family. Besides, they are the family of a ship captain. Frostholm's authority does give support to such bereaved families, just like in other city-states. Overall… you don't need to worry about them."

Duncan listened quietly and nodded.

Vanna hesitated for a moment, then finally could not hold back: "You don't mind Annie talking about what's happening here… is that really okay? It might not be long before that cemetery warden knows you're living openly in the city. Then the matter will be reported to the Cathedral right away. The Gatekeeper and the Bishop will both be alerted."

"And then?" Duncan turned his head and asked in a calm voice.

"Then… there will be some trouble," Vanna said. Under Duncan's divine gaze, her tone suddenly lost some confidence. "The intervention of the city-state's authority might…"

"How exactly would they intervene?" Duncan asked with a smile. "Send a squad of Guardians to arrest us? Or have that Gatekeeper come talk to me personally? And what would I care about them? Am I afraid of exposing my whereabouts? Or am I afraid of hostile actions from the authority?"

As he spoke, Duncan spread his hands.

"I didn't bring the Vanished over, did I?"

Vanna opened her mouth. She felt something was very wrong about all this, but she really could not think of how to respond to such a calm stream of words from the captain. After holding it in for a long time, she only managed one line: "Why do I feel like you just think this might be fun?"

"Yes."

Vanna: "…"

Duncan chuckled and turned his gaze back to the night outside the window. He did not care about the wonderful expression that flashed across the inquisitor's face. After enjoying the night view in silence for a few minutes, he suddenly said: "Vanna, I'm starting to feel you are less and less like an inquisitor—under normal circumstances, when someone mentions the Church and the authority of a city-state, shouldn't your first reaction be 'reliable allies'?"

Vanna's mouth clearly twitched. A thousand words seemed to rise in her heart, but in the end not a single one came out.

At the same time, outside the city-state of Frostholm, out on the vast Boundless Sea shrouded by the veil of night, a huge fleet was slowly reducing speed and patrolling at low speed amid cold frozen mist and encircling floes.

The proud steel bow of the Sea Mist rose out of the darkness. Her navigation lights cast a glow along one side of the hull. More lights spilled down from that same side, lighting up the black sea surface below. In the rippling waves, faint reflections could be seen rising and falling.

They were fragments of drifting ice.

On the Frost Sea, every captain had heard a saying—

When thin mist suddenly appears, when ice floes emerge from the fog and slowly lock your ship in like chains, then be ready. The Sea Mist has arrived.

The Sea Mist had arrived now. The entire Sea Mist fleet had arrived.

Tyrian stood high on the bridge and looked into the distance through the wide windows.

From this distance, there was no way to see the city-state of Frostholm itself. But in the dark background, he could still see a faint glow floating in that direction. That was where the city lay.

In truth, the Sea Mist fleet was heading toward Dagger Island, and Tyrian had no plan at all to set foot on Frostholm's main island. But for the people of Frostholm, who had lived under tension for half a century, there was no difference. As long as the flag of the "steel Vice Admiral" appeared on the nearby sea, it was enough to rob them of sleep and peace.

He could almost picture the chaos among Frostholm's garrison troops right now.

Footsteps came from the side. First Mate Aiden walked up next to Tyrian. The rough-faced, bald giant looked very pleased: "Captain, the Sea Crow and the Fjord have left the formation with their escort vessels. They should reach their planned positions in twelve hours and lock down the routes. The Sea Mist herself has lifted the blackout—those Frostholm folks can forget about getting a good night's sleep."

Tyrian nodded with a slight smile and let his eyes sweep over the sea around the Sea Mist.

In the darkness, the whole Boundless Sea was silent. Only the Sea Mist, with her blackout lifted, floated there, as eye-catching as a gas lamp in the night.

Normally, warships on night missions had to keep a strict light blackout. Unnecessary lighting could expose their position and also make it easier to confuse friendly light-signals.

But the Sea Mist simply showed herself to the world, bright and open, like a provocation aimed straight at Frostholm.

Tyrian was not worried at all that this would push Frostholm's City Navy into rash action, nor was he afraid of some "accidental discharge" starting a battle.

In this world, aside from the Vanished, no one could beat the “living ship” Sea Mist in a night battle. And on the other hand… if Frostholm’s navy was foolish enough to attack today, the six other warships hidden around the Sea Mist would immediately teach them a lesson.

Of course, Tyrian’s showy behavior was not only about venting or taunting Frostholm. His more important goal was to carry out the task his father had given him—

Make the city-state of Frostholm nervous. The more nervous the better. It would be best if they closed off the whole main island and blocked all routes in and out.

From what he had observed so far, that goal had already been reached. Frostholm’s garrison navy had sealed the Harbor and sent out signals to neighboring city-states, asking them to suspend shipping.

Everything was going just as his father had planned.

At that moment, a voice came from a copper tube nearby. Aiden walked over and spoke a few words with the post on the other end, then came back to Tyrian with a smile: “Captain, looks like the Frostholm people can’t sit still—there’s a small boat on the sea nearby.”

Tyrian raised an eyebrow: “A small boat?”

“Yes. It doesn’t seem to have any weapons, and it’s showing a signal lamp with three yellow and one white light. It looks like they’re afraid of causing any misunderstanding,” Aiden said. “The boat is carefully staying outside the range of our searchlights. It seems they want to observe us without making contact or showing hostility.”

“Observation… at least they still have some self-control,” Tyrian said with a shrug. “Let them watch. If they come too close, fire a warning shot.”

“Yes, Captain.” Aiden accepted the order, but before he turned away, Tyrian suddenly called out: “Wait.”

“Do you have other orders?”

“Send them a light-signal,” Tyrian said.

“A light-signal?” Aiden was startled. “What message?”

Tyrian’s lips curled up. The Pirate Lord who had a fierce reputation across the Frost Sea now wore a playful, mischievous smile: “Message? What message—just flash at random.”

Aiden: “…Huh?”

“Let the signalman flash whatever he wants,” Tyrian said happily, rubbing his chin. “Give Frostholm’s expert advisers a small ‘problem of the century’.”

A wide grin quickly spread across Aiden’s face. Even his bald head seemed to shine.

“Yes, Captain!”

Chapter 351: Sealed City

For the protectors of Frostholm, this night was doomed to be sleepless.

The dark clouds over Dagger Island were still coiling overhead. The strange, returned wreck of the Sea Swallow was still moving back and forth on the water outside the Harbor. And right at this critical moment, the Sea Mist fleet, wrapped in countless dreadful legends, had come to the city-state's doorstep.

The Undying fleet bearing the curse had already finished gathering. It stayed in silence at the edge of the coastal waters. No one knew why they had come. No one knew what they would do next.

Harbor Defense Commander Lister had slept for less than an hour around midnight before he once again appeared in his command office. There he met several other commanders with tight faces and a confidential secretary who had just hurried over from City Hall.

The secretary, a man in a fitted blue coat and gold-rimmed glasses who looked barely over thirty, stood up at once when he saw Lister. Beads of sweat glistened on his forehead: "Colonel, the Governor wants the newest and most accurate information—does the Sea Mist fleet have any chance of launching an attack?"

"If that is all the Governor wants to know, then yes. There has been such a chance every single day for the past half century," Lister said. He took out a vial of stimulant essence and relied on the sharp scent to push back his fatigue, then glanced at the confidential secretary. "The Sea Mist fleet did not appear today for the first time. It has always been there. Frostholm and that ‘steel Vice Admiral’ have never had a peace treaty.”

The general commander was clearly in a bad mood. The secretary realized at once that his question was pointless and quickly changed his wording: “How prepared are we?”

“All coastal guns are in battle configuration. The fleet under General Galton is forming an interception line to the north and northwest of the Sea Mist fleet. They have plenty of fuel and full magazines. Although we just lost a brave Rear Admiral in the Sea Swallow incident, the Frostholm navy is still fully prepared to defend the city-state,” Lister said solemnly. “For more detailed information, my superiors should already have reported to City Hall.”

As he spoke, he looked past the secretary at a few subordinates standing not far away: “What is the situation on the Sea Mist fleet’s side now? Any anomalous moves?”

One commander stood up at once: “Yes, Commander. Something is off. You should take a look at this.”

Hearing this, Lister’s brow furrowed. He walked quickly to the long table in the middle of the room and stopped before a report that had only just been delivered.

“What is this?”

The harbor commander stared in confusion at the sheet full of symbols and marks.

“It’s a light-signal,” the subordinate commander said. “A light-signal from the Sea Mist.”

Lister’s expression went a bit blank. The stimulant essence seemed to stop working for a moment. He looked at the dizzying rows of pause marks and messy notes, and his head actually began to spin. After a long while, he muttered: “What on earth… Is the Sea Mist fleet using some very new light-signal system? Or some kind of classical code?”

He suddenly looked up at his subordinate: “Where is the Military Advisor?”

“They’re in the next room studying this, along with several signal experts and cipher experts we just called in. A few scholars who study classical naval history and the Undying phenomenon are also on their way.”

Lister pressed his lips together, stared at the jumble of symbols for a few seconds, then lifted his head and looked at the worried secretary.

“No one is sleeping tonight.”

“I agree, Colonel,” the secretary said softly.

…

Duncan had slept very well the previous night.

Most of the time, his main body did not really need sleep, but proper rest still helped him keep his energy up and eased the strain of controlling several bodies at once—even if that strain was not much for him.

He simply liked to keep a normal schedule, like an ordinary human.

The snow outside the window had stopped, at least for the moment. No one knew how long the clear sky would last. It stretched over the entire city. Vision 001 was slowly climbing from the edge of the city toward the top of the sky. Along the rim of the brilliant Sun Wheel, a faint golden sheen from twin runes shone with great radiance.

That missing little section of the rune ring was still there, and still clearly visible to the naked eye.

Duncan stood at the window and stared at the chipped Sun Wheel and rune ring for a few seconds. Then he pulled his gaze back and rolled his shoulders.

He went down to the first floor.

Alice had already made breakfast. Simple toast, fried eggs, and vegetable wraps were not exactly a feast, but from them you could tell the doll's cooking skills were slowly getting better. Vanna and Morris were sitting at the table eating. When they saw Duncan come down, they both stood up.

"Just eat. Don't mind me," Duncan said, waving a hand.

The breakfast looked good, but this body could not enjoy it.

Though all his bodies were "temporary shells," the one he used in Pland's antique shop was very different from this one in Frostholm. The Pland body had also been taken over after death, but because it had only minor damage and he took it over in time, it now was almost no different from a living person.

But the body he used in Frostholm had already lost most of its inner functions.

It was more like a corpse driven by some mysterious power. In nature, it was closer to a real corpse than the Undying under Tyrian's command.

Duncan himself could not explain the principles behind it, but this world had far too many strange things. He had long since stopped worrying.

Weird was fine. He was the biggest "weird" thing in this world anyway.

"There's a fresh paper next to the sofa," Morris said at the table. "You might want to take a look. There's news you'll be interested in."

"Oh?" Duncan walked to the sofa and saw the morning paper that had just been delivered. It still smelled slightly of ink. The sheets were stacked neatly. He picked them up, sat down on the sofa, opened the paper, and quickly found the article Morris had mentioned.

Alice came over with a clacking sound, stuck her head over the back of the sofa, and peered at the paper in Duncan's hands with curiosity: "What does the headline sa—"

Click.

A round head fell onto Duncan's newspaper and then rolled down onto his arm.

The head flipped over. Alice lay on her back, face up, looking straight at Duncan. She blinked innocently: "Hel… hel… help…"

"Can you please try to learn something?" Duncan sighed and picked up Alice's head with almost resigned skill. He straightened the golden wig tied down with a cord and the silver hair underneath, then pressed the pretty head back onto the custom-built doll body her "Brother" had made. "Even Dog can read the paper now, and you can't even understand the headline?"

Alice hurried to hold her head steady and muttered in embarrassment: "It's just four or five words I don't know…"

"There are eight words in the headline," Duncan said, glaring at her.

The illiterate doll: "…Hehe."

"It's a warning notice from City Hall," Duncan sighed. He felt that arguing seriously with this silly girl was nothing but exhausting, so he pointed at the words on the paper and read them one by one for Alice. "Notice to citizens, reduce going out—then the article tells Frostholm residents not to go near the coast in the near future. They should avoid gathering on public roads, be ready at all times to cooperate with inspections by constables or Guardians, and the curfew level has been raised. Now, except for Church staff and people who hold special night work permits, no one is allowed to leave their home at night."

Alice walked around the sofa and sat down next to Duncan. She leaned over to stare at the words on the page. Her head turned wherever his finger moved. After reading the whole thing once, she finally lifted her head in confusion: "What does it mean?"

"It means Tyrian has put on enough pressure," Duncan said calmly. "Next, unless something unexpected happens, Frostholm's external traffic will be sealed. That way we don't have to worry about the city's corruption leaking out. The Annihilators hiding here will no longer be able to contact the outside world.

"On the other hand, the denunciation letter I sent seems to have stirred up the Church. A higher curfew level and strict travel bans mean tighter heretic screening. More Annihilators will slip up."

"Then… is the whole thing solved?" Alice asked, eyes wide with surprise. "Will all the bad people be caught?"

"How could it be that simple?" Duncan shrugged. "Catching a few Annihilators is only the beginning. As more of them are caught, their method of connecting with the Deep Sea might be exposed. That's when the real problem will finally be dug out."

As he spoke, he folded the newspaper and set it aside.

He had skimmed the remaining articles. There was nothing else worth much attention.

"Then… what are we going to do next?" Alice asked.

"Since Frostholm's authority is busy, we should go out and move around too," Duncan said, standing up and looking toward the dining room. "After breakfast, we'll go out—we're going to say hello to an 'informant' working under Tyrian."

Chapter 352: Informant and the Underground Waterway

After two days of continuous snowfall, a brief spell of clear weather seemed to sweep away the gloom hanging over the city-state, and Frostholm woke once more as it always did. Snowplows and de-icing machines started clearing the snow from the main roads. The old high-pressure gas pipes and power grid once again passed their test, and the factories and public transit systems started running again.

All kinds of traffic and machine noises swelled with the sunrise.

However, beneath this slowly awakening surface, a strange and tense atmosphere was spreading through the city. Even the ordinary people were finally noticing the change in the air.

It began with the news in the papers. The emergency control notices suddenly issued by City Hall made those with sharper noses sense something was wrong. Then came all kinds of rumors from the waterfront districts, stories of the Sea Mist Fleet appearing near the city-state. The news spread quickly. Soon, all sorts of true and false reports were being traded on every street corner.

Recently, the city’s security forces had been redeployed again and again. Guardian units were gathering around several cemeteries. Grim stories were coming out of certain neighborhoods. Mixed into all this were the strange tales that had been circulating in the city for a month already, about the return of The dead. All these unsettling things seemed to suddenly pile together and begin to quietly spread through the city.

On the Boundless Sea, city-states were like crowded pigeon coops. Vast stretches of water lay between one city and the next, but between one person and another they were almost within arm’s reach. There was nothing harder than sending news from one city-state to another, and nothing easier than spreading news inside a city-state.

Even so, life still had to go on. The worrying rumors only spread through the streets and alleys, while the citizens still went out and went to work as usual. At most, they talked a little about the city’s strange mood while squeezing onto the bus or chatting in a tavern. A bit of pressure was not enough to disrupt the running of a city-state.

In the end, the people of this world were already used to living under a shadow. To them, odd and uncanny things happening in the city were normal. cultist sabotage and the occasional veil of night freaks crawling out from somewhere were just part of everyday life. A city that stayed peaceful and quiet even after nightfall was what would seem abnormal to them.

At the junction of Cemetery No. 4 and Oak Street, a small tavern named the Golden Flute was growing lively.

Most of the citizens heading from the district to the factories for work in the morning would pass that corner. As a cheap, public-facing tavern, the Golden Flute was the best place to stop before going on shift. It did not only serve alcohol, it also offered decent coffee and simple breakfasts, perfect for filling the stomach and driving away the cold. Chatting with a few people over breakfast here counted as a bit of leisure before the tense and busy workday began.

The waiters moved busily between the round tables. The shop assistant worked behind the bar, greeting guests. Warm yellow light fell from the ceiling and drove back the winter chill. A middle-aged man with a long, thin face and dry, yellowish hair sat in a chair not far behind the bar, idly turning the pages of a newspaper while watching the room out of the corner of his eye.

The tavern was a bit noisy. Rough jokes and unrestrained curses broke out from time to time. Most of the people eating here were not “upper-class citizens” by any standard. They were mostly ordinary people heading from the Lower City to work in the industrial ring. They gathered here and used the little time at breakfast to talk about what was happening in the Lower City or in the factory districts, or to give their own crude opinions on the city’s recent changes.

Their views were shallow and dull for the most part. No one important cared what these people thought of the city.

As long as they did not start a fight in the shop, everything was fine.

The middle-aged shopkeeper with the sallow hair turned the newspaper to the next page and yawned in boredom.

Then he felt the room go a little quieter around him. A moment later, it seemed as if something was blocking the light from above.

The shopkeeper looked up and saw a tall figure standing in front of him.

The newcomer wore a pitch-black coat that made one think of the coming of the veil of night. A high collar covered most of his face. A wide-brimmed hat pressed down like a dark cloud, shutting out all prying gazes from the outside world. In the few gaps between hat and collar, the only thing visible was layer upon layer of bandages.

A stern gaze hid under the low shadow of that hat.

An oppressive pressure rolled off him, something you could feel just from looking. The middle-aged shopkeeper’s heart seemed to miss a beat almost at once. Panic rose in his eyes before he could stop it. His first reaction was to mistake the man for clergy from the Death sect. Those devout priests loved this kind of “bandage outfit,” which always felt excessive to ordinary people. But then he noticed the man in black was not wearing the Church’s Triangular Sigil, nor was he carrying the special Gatekeeper’s cane issued to Guardians.

After a brief moment of panic, the shopkeeper forced himself to calm down. He saw that three more people stood behind the tall figure: a young lady almost as tall as he was, a kindly looking old man, and a blonde woman with a veil over her face, whose bearing was noble and mysterious. Thoughts spun quickly in the shopkeeper’s mind.

These guests were here for him. Judging by their outfits, they were certainly not harmless. The heavy pressure they carried made even him feel short of breath. Were they secret constables from the central districts? Or people sent by some other power out on the Frost Sea? Why had they come to him? To threaten him, recruit him, or… ask for a favor?

He put the newspaper down beside him, stood up calmly, and looked up at the man in black: “Who are you looking for?”

“Mr. Nemo Wilkins,” Duncan said. He had noticed the panic and tension in the middle-aged man’s eyes. It was clearly the result of being crushed by his aura, and that was on purpose. Duncan was watching the man’s reactions. The most genuine flashes of emotion that surfaced under pressure helped him judge whether someone had been affected by cognitive interference or memory correction. “Is that your name?”

“Everyone here knows my name,” Nemo Wilkins said with a nod. He waved lightly at the shop assistant nearby. “You’re here for me then? But I’m only an honest, law-abiding businessman…”

“Recently the sea has been foggy, and the wind has been very cold,” Duncan said slowly as he reached into his coat and took out the city map prepared by Tyrian himself. “We need a good strong drink to warm our stomachs—preferably something that could even warm a dead man’s guts.”

At the moment he heard the phrase “the sea has been foggy, and the wind has been very cold,” Nemo’s breathing changed, just slightly. His gaze then fell on the city map.

This “shopkeeper” hid his emotions and the changes in his eyes extremely well. In fact, aside from that tiny moment when his breathing and heartbeat shifted, it was impossible to see anything odd about him from the outside. But even such a small reaction did not escape Vanna’s eyes.

“Looks like he’s the one,” Vanna said softly.

Duncan nodded slightly and put the folded map away. “Do you have any seats upstairs?”

“The seats upstairs are full,” Nemo said, shaking his head. “Come with me.”

With that, he stepped out from behind the counter and led his uninvited guests toward a door beside the stairs.

The tavern was still full of voices. Even if someone noticed the movement by the bar, no one paid enough attention to figure out what was going on.

Duncan and the others followed behind Nemo the shopkeeper. They passed through a rather low wooden door and entered a passage that seemed to lead to the storage room at the back of the shop. Halfway along, they turned through another door and started down a sloping ramp. They walked downhill for quite a long distance. Only when it felt as if they had already gone far beyond the area under the tavern did they stop in front of a dark wooden door.

“This place is really deep,” Morris muttered.

“Caution never hurts. This city doesn’t welcome anyone connected to the Sea Mist Fleet,” Nemo Wilkins said as he walked toward the door. “Enemies are everywhere—even now, half a century later.”

“How did you dig out a place like this right under The authority’s nose?” Vanna’s attention was different from the others’. As an Inquisitor, she cared more about how a “gray middleman” hid inside a city-state. “To dig such a long tunnel under a tavern, where did you take all the stone and dirt? And how did you hide the noise from the digging?”

Nemo Wilkins turned his head slightly and glanced at the towering white-haired lady, his tone carrying a hint of amusement: “Simple—there was no need to dig. This was already part of Frostholm’s underground waterway.”

As he finished speaking, the dark door swung open. With a creak and groan, the glow of gas lamps shone into Duncan’s eyes.

Along with the light came the faint, distant sound of running water from somewhere unknown.

Duncan looked past the open door and saw a particularly wide “hall.” It seemed to be the junction of old sewers. Corridors stretched away into the darkness in the distance. Tables, chairs, beds, and shelves had been set up in the corners of the hall. It even looked livable.

A fair number of people could be stationed here.

—

Chapter 353: The Second Waterway

“This is a safe place. At least for the past fifty years, the Frostholm authorities have never known that such a secret lies beneath their feet,” Nemo Wilkins said as he stepped into the hideout buried deep underground. He turned to Duncan and the others as they followed him in, his tone plainly proud. “These old sewers crisscross beneath the city. Most sections have already been abandoned, so they’re dry and safe. Some branches lead up to the higher-level pipe systems, but all the connecting points are secure. Even if one or two of them are discovered, City Hall cannot search the entire underground structure—they simply don’t have the manpower.”

As he spoke, the “tavern boss” walked over to a nearby concrete wall and turned a valve on one of the pipes. A faint hiss of gas came from somewhere far off. More gas lamps lit up at once, and the lamps that had already been burning grew brighter.

“In fact, City Hall is already doing pretty well just keeping the city’s basic functions running,” he went on, turning back around with a crooked grin. His long, thin face carried a trace of mockery. “As for what was hidden in the sewers half a century ago… only the old Artificers who once served Frostholm’s queen could really say.”

“…This is a facility left from the Queen’s era?!” Vanna immediately picked up on the truth in his words. Her eyes widened slightly in surprise. “These underground waterways… how did you manage to hide them?”

Nemo shrugged. “I wasn’t around for the chaos fifty years ago, but my grandfather talked my ear off about it all his life. He told me that the Frostholm queen once built a vast underground system beneath the entire city-state. At first it was meant to ease the pressure of land use and lay the groundwork for the city’s long-term growth. These underground structures included the most advanced underground waterways in the world at the time, power conduits, an electrical grid, and a whole transport system. The ‘sewer’ you see here is the deepest part of it. Strictly speaking, it was originally named the ‘Second Waterway,’ because above it there was a First Waterway—that’s the sewer system Frostholm still uses today.

“When the Great Uprising broke out, the city didn’t fall immediately. Even though the Rebels later claimed they ‘completely destroyed the mad Queen’s Guard Corps in a very short time,’ the truth was different. For a full seventy-two hours after the queen’s palace—now the civic center—was taken, the fighting continued. The loyalists who stayed in the city retreated from the surface into the underground. The crisscrossing subway stations and power conduit networks were full of people killing each other.

“The Rebels who had broken into the city center announced victory. The newspapers ran stories about the change of regime. citizens hid at home, uneasy and afraid. The subway stations were sealed. People lay on the ground near pipe shafts, listening to all kinds of unsettling sounds rising from the deep.

“All of this lasted until the day of the execution. The roar of the collapsing sea cliff shook the whole city and finally ended the last resistance underground.

“After that, the Queen’s Guard Corps blew up all the vertical shafts leading down to the Second Waterway and shut the gates that connected it to the First Waterway. Later there were more small skirmishes and intentional collapses. In the end, the entire Second Waterway was completely cut off from the upper levels."

As he spoke, Nemo Wilkins lifted his head to look at the heavy dome overhead. His gaze seemed to pass through layers of steel, concrete, and stone to sweep across the busy streets of the city-state above.

"In truth, the new government set up by the Rebels wasn't completely ignorant of these sewers," he said. "They knew about Frostholm's underground world. But so what? Knowing it exists is one thing. Doing something about it is another.

"The sea cliff collapsed. The city suffered heavy damage. After the civil war, it took Frostholm decades to recover. Boiling Gold became the city's only remaining economic pillar. The 'number one city-state on the Frost Sea' was reduced to a few glorious pages in history books. Even today, the city still relies on the pipe system the Queen left behind.

"Under those conditions, who had the resources to search the huge network deep under the city? The cost of reopening the shafts and refurbishing the Second Waterway was unacceptable for the new government. And with Frostholm's population and urban footprint both reduced after the war, the First Waterway alone was enough."

"If it works, just make do," Vanna murmured without thinking, recalling something Morris had said not long ago.

"Exactly. If it's enough, you make do. This city is already full of wounds. It really can't take another big shake-up," Nemo said with a smile. "Besides, for a city this big, a bit of 'moss' growing deep in the sewers isn't such a big problem. Heretic cults, spawns of darkness, veil of shadows, Anomaly objects from the runaway state… there are plenty of things hiding in the gutters. Any one of them is more worth the authority's and the Church's headaches than we are."

Duncan had barely spoken, just quietly listening to this “Informant” ramble on. Now he finally broke his silence: “Such a huge underground facility, and from what I see, it still has gas and power. There’s no way you’re maintaining all this on your own, right?”

“Of course not,” Nemo Wilkins said with a laugh. “We have a few people, scattered all over the city. Some are even in certain departments of City Hall. Most of them are descendants of the Queen’s Guard Corps, like me. A few others passed General Tyrian’s tests and were confirmed as loyal, trustworthy brothers and sisters. But they’re not suitable for showing themselves in public.”

“…Tyrian told me he’d planted a few ‘informants’ in Frostholm. That was modest of him,” Duncan said, unable to stop himself from shaking his head. “That kid has buried quite a lot of strength here…”

Nemo heard the way Duncan referred to Tyrian as “that kid.” His expression froze for a moment, but he did not say anything.

While they talked, Morris was carefully studying the underground world around them. His gaze moved over the towering dome and the abandoned pipes crossing high overhead, then to the many valves and side branches that had clearly been installed later on the nearby walls. After a while, he suddenly asked: “Do you still control the entire Second Waterway?”

“Strictly speaking, only a small part of it,” Nemo said with a regretful shake of his head. “I’d love to say the whole underground kingdom is under our command, but we simply don’t have enough people, and the scale of the Second Waterway is beyond imagination. Right now, we control only about one fifth of the abandoned sewers. The rest are either cut off and unusable because of collapses, covered in toxic sewage, or corrupted by dangerous forces that make them hard to enter.”

“corrupted by dangerous forces?” Vanna’s brow furrowed at once. Her professional instincts started pounding.

“Sometimes, illegal supernatural who are being hunted flee into the sewers,” Nemo said. “If they die down here, they can cause large-scale corruption. But more often, it’s the darkness itself breeding monsters. This is, after all, a vast underground world. The gas we secretly draw from the upper pipe network is nowhere near enough to light the entire Second Waterway. When the light isn’t enough… some places fall into darkness, and then they stay in darkness forever.”

Vanna stared, at a loss for words. For a moment she even felt short of breath.

Coming from prosperous Pland, and being one of the protectors of order in a city-state, she truly could not imagine a city actually allowing such a situation to exist. A large-scale underground facility left in darkness for years, to the point that it was already starting to breed shadows that could not be purified—this was acceptable?

Yet the facts before her showed that it did exist, and Frostholm had lived like this for half a century. Nothing “too serious” seemed to have happened.

“We can’t rule out the occasional unlucky mortal who wanders down here and simply vanishes, or that the Guardians’ casualty rate at night is higher than in other city-states,” Nemo added. “But people are used to it.”

He clearly saw the shock on Vanna’s face. He had already guessed that these visitors were outsiders and knew exactly what she was so surprised about.

“Every few years, they clear out a few dangerous spots in the First Waterway and the subway branches,” he went on. “From time to time they flood the underground with incense and Sacred Bone Ash. They raise the Guardians' death benefits a little. They have the Gatekeepers run a few more patrols. Most ordinary people still live reasonably well… That already counts as a good situation."

He paused for a moment, then turned his head with a smile. "Believe me, most city-states aren't much better. They never have been, from ancient times to now."

Duncan and the others looked at one another, not sure what to say. After a brief and awkward silence, Vanna was the first to speak. She turned to Morris and asked: "What is your assessment?"

"No signs of cognitive interference. His thoughts and memories should be clear," Morris replied to Vanna. His gaze remained fixed on Nemo Wilkins. In the old scholar's eyes, a faint silver light slowly faded away.

Nemo blinked and showed a puzzled expression. "What are you talking about?"

Duncan turned his gaze on him, quietly fixing him with his gaze. "Mr. Nemo, congratulations. You have not been affected by cognitive interference."

Chapter 354: The Infiltrators

Nemo Wilkins suddenly felt a faint dizziness, as if some invisible force had brushed across his mind. It was as if he had just woken from a strange, shallow dream. In that late moment of alarm, he jerked his head up and looked, tense and wary, at the elderly Mr. who always wore a gentle expression and seemed cultured and harmless.

Morris gave this informant a friendly, polite smile.

But Nemo suddenly broke out in a cold sweat. Only now did he remember that from the moment they had entered the secret passage, the old man's gaze had almost never left him. A power that felt as if it were rifling through his mind and combing through his memories had been wrapped around his thoughts the whole time. He had been unconsciously answering every question these uninvited guests asked, and had almost exposed the situation at the other contact points in the city-state!

Even if these uninvited guests held Captain Tyrian's token and knew the passphrases, he still should not have been so careless! After all, these people had appeared out of nowhere today. By the rules, he should have tested them more.

The rapid changes on the informant's face did not escape Vanna's eyes. She stepped forward, her solemn expression carrying a touch of earnestness as she said: "Mr. Wilkins, relax. We are not enemies— The token and passphrases we carry do indeed come from Mr. Tyrian. We only ran some tests on you just now out of necessary security concerns."

“Tests… what tests?” Nemo stared at the people before him, full of wariness. “Who exactly are you people?”

“In short, we suspect that a large-scale Cognitive corruption has begun to spread through the city-state. This corruption makes people unknowingly form false memories, lose an accurate understanding of the Mortal Realm, and even become accomplices of heretics without realizing it. We cannot be sure whether the informants Mr. Tyrian left in the city are all still reliable, so we have to run tests,” Vanna explained seriously, then shifted the topic. “As for who we are… you did not receive any message from Mr. Tyrian?”

“The captain did not explain in detail. He only said you were a few people he could trust,” Nemo answered cautiously. “Forgive my doubts— He never made such baffling arrangements before.”

Morris thought for a moment, then understood and looked at Duncan: “Oh, then it might be because he did not have your explicit permission. He probably did not dare reveal who we are.”

Permission? Captain Tyrian did not dare reveal their identities?

Hearing Morris’s words, Nemo’s expression instantly turned a little strange. He instinctively looked at the bandage-wrapped, black-clad weirdo. Nemo clearly wanted to ask something, but did not know how to begin.

Duncan did not dwell on it. He only nodded lightly: “Since we have confirmed this informant is fine, there is no need to hide it.”

As he spoke, he looked at Nemo and pointed at himself: “I am Tyrian’s father.”

The Sea Mist covert agent named Nemo Wilkins froze for a few seconds. Then his thoughts seemed to scramble in some strange way, and he suddenly glared: “Do not insult the captain!”

Duncan: “……”

The air turned awkward for a moment. Vanna and Morris both could not help pressing their hands to their foreheads. Only Alice glanced left and right, as if she still had not caught up. She looked very serious as she said to the informant: “It is true.”

Nemo clearly still wanted to speak, but this time, before he could open his mouth, Morris stepped forward and patted his shoulder: “Young man, think it through before you talk— The great ‘Steel Vice Admiral’ Tyrian also has a father.”

Only then did Nemo Wilkins finally notice the subtle shift in the mood and catch up with the earlier conversation. At once he recalled the old tales about the Abnomar family, about Captain Tyrian’s family, about the Vanished, about that Restless Soul wandering Subspace. When he lifted his head to look at Duncan again, his eyes were clearly different.

“I came back from Subspace,” Duncan said, watching him, his voice calm. “I am here to help Tyrian deal with a bit of trouble.”

Nemo stared for a moment. His eyes rolled back, and he toppled over.

But Vanna seemed ready. Before the informant hit the ground, she grabbed his arm with one hand. With the other, she pulled out a whole bottle of Mind-Clearing Essence Oil, flicked off the stopper, and poured it straight into Nemo’s nostrils.

The informant practically shot straight up.

“Ah… ah… ah-choo! Ah-choo!” Nemo was fully awake now. His nose was full of the fierce smell of the ointment. He sneezed several times in place before it finally eased. With snot and tears running down his face, he lifted his head, sniffled, and said nervously: “I… I…”

“Sorry— I forgot ordinary people are not as tough as Guardians,” Vanna said, a little embarrassed as she hid the glass bottle in her hand. “But do not worry. This stuff will not harm your body."

Nemo took a handkerchief from his pocket. As he wiped the tears and snot from his face, he forced himself to calm down. With eyes full of fear and hesitation, he looked at Duncan: "It… it is really you? Then… then what can I do for you…?"

"You are already working for me," Duncan waved his hand. "Do not be so tense. Just tell me more about Frostholm."

"Al… alright," Nemo nodded again and again, then sneezed a few more times before settling down. "What else would you like to ask?"

"Are you currently in contact with the other informants in the city?" Duncan asked. "How do you usually communicate? Do you gather in this sewer system, or use more hidden channels?"

"We seldom gather," Nemo said as he rubbed his nose. "It is mainly for safety— Many of our members have close ties with the Upper City, so they need to stay hidden. Most of the time, we trade information through various secret channels, like coded messages in newspapers, specific meeting spots, or by relying on 'couriers' for one-way contact.

"In fact, even we do not know how many of 'our own' there really are in the city. Most informants only know their direct superiors and subordinates, or a few 'fellows' in the same area. The full list is only in the hands of Captain Tyrian and Mr. Aiden. I count as the 'handler' for my tier, so I hold a few more names than most, but even so, it is no more than ten people…"

Listening to Nemo, Vanna could not help nodding slightly: "A very cautious and efficient way to stay hidden. Most cultists who play games with the Guardians are not this professional."

"After all, it is the result of Tyrian's work over half a century," Duncan said offhand at the side. Then he looked at Nemo again. "Are you the only one stationed at this contact point?”

“There are two more,” Nemo nodded. “One has the nickname ‘Crow’. He should be patrolling the nearby tunnels right now. The other is an old man who spends most of his time in the abandoned pipe crew room. I do not even know his real name. We all call him ‘Old Ghost’.”

Duncan exchanged a look with Vanna and Morris.

Nemo Wilkins did not seem affected by any cognitive interference, but the same might not be true for the people around him.

“Let us go say hello too,” Duncan nodded. “Where is this pipe crew room?”

“Right over here,” Nemo said, raising his hand to point to the right side of the fork ahead. “It used to be the temporary rest area for the maintenance workers on the Second Waterway. I will take you.”

The informant strode ahead, and on the way he began to tell Duncan and the others about this “Old Ghost”.

“…He is already over seventy this year, almost the oldest among us. My grandfather used to work with him, back in the Queen’s era…

“Old Ghost’s head is not very clear, but when it comes to gas pipes and the connecting sections of the Second Waterway, he never makes mistakes. The extra gas line we added here was done by him and his crew. They secretly tapped a branch off the main line above. It had to be safe and also not be discovered. That is not the sort of job just anyone can handle…

“Old Ghost rarely goes up to the surface. He spends most of his time down here. Sometimes, after he drinks, he boasts to us about the old days. He says that decades ago he was the engineer for the Second Waterway, and the Queen even gave him a medal in person— But to be honest, very little of what he says is believable. I have seen that medal of his. It is just a piece of iron with nothing on it. It is obvious he picked it up from some dark corner…

“Ah, most likely he breathed in too much toxic gas when they retreated into the Second Waterway back then— Did I tell you? Fifty years ago, when the last Queen’s Guard Corps pulled back, they sealed the Second Waterway. The vertical shaft collapsed, and some of the poisonous gas drifted down from above. A few Artificers loyal to the Queen rushed in to plug the leaks. Old Ghost seems to have been one of them. They say his mind has not been quite right since then.

“If he suddenly starts shouting about the Queen later, do not mind it… He does not mean anything by it.”

With Nemo Wilkins chattering the whole way, Duncan and the others soon walked past the fork and reached a rusty iron door near the sewer junction.

Nemo stepped forward, knocked on the door, called inside, and then pushed it open: “Old Ghost, we have guests.”

As soon as he finished speaking, a hoarse but very loud voice came from inside the room—

“Ah, the Queen has come to inspect!?”

Chapter 355: The Disturbance Deep in the Abandoned Waterway

As the old yet booming voice rang out, Duncan heard a series of clattering noises from the hut, as if someone had stood up in a hurry and bumped into a pile of junk. Then came approaching footsteps, and an old man appeared in the doorway. He was hunched over, with sparse white hair, a dull gray coat, and a face covered in deep wrinkles.

The man called “Old Ghost” stood inside his little administrator’s hut, bent at the waist. His somewhat cloudy eyes swept over the people outside. Duncan could not tell whether the old man had even seen them clearly before he lowered his head and muttered in a hurry: “The Queen has come to inspect… I did not even get ready… Those assistants are getting more and more unreliable, and the messengers too…”

“Old Ghost!” Nemo had to raise his voice to cut off the old man’s rambling. “The Queen is not here! The Queen is not coming back! We have guests today— They are important guests Captain Tyrian arranged. Stop muttering. They came to see you.”

As he spoke, Nemo turned his head, his face apologetic as he said to Duncan: “Sorry— As you can see, he is a bit unhinged. He often suddenly slips back into things from decades ago. But do not be fooled. The moment he deals with pipes and valves, he becomes clear-headed at once.”

“Clear-headed? I am clear-headed!” In the time it took to say that, Old Ghost’s eyes suddenly shifted, as if he had come to his senses. He looked over Duncan and the others and muttered: “Guests. Strange faces can still make it down here… Did you check their tokens and passphrases?”

“We checked. Of course we checked,” Nemo said at once, sneaking a careful glance at Duncan. “They are honored guests. Just treat it as if… as if Captain Tyrian were here in person.”

“Oh, then come in. There is not much to see here anyway,” Old Ghost grumbled as he moved aside. “Just some old junk, if you do not mind it.”

Vanna turned to look at Morris. Morris kept his eyes fixed on Old Ghost.

A moment later, Morris shook his head and spoke very softly: “Hard to judge— His mind is not very sound to begin with, and his memory keeps cutting in and out.”

Duncan heard Morris’s quiet report. His expression did not change. He simply followed the muttering old man inside and stepped into the abandoned staff rest room.

The room was not large. A single gas lamp lit it brightly. As expected, it was piled high with all sorts of things. Aside from a bed in the corner, everything in sight was sagging shelves and crates on the floor, stuffed full of mechanical parts, spare valve sets, and work tools.

Even a skilled acrobat would come out of here with serious injuries.

“So messy,” Alice muttered quietly as she looked at the chaos in the room. “I really want to tidy it up…”

“Ah, my deepest apologies!” Old Ghost, who had been moving through a pile of clutter, turned at once and bowed, bent low. “Your Majesty the Queen, I have been neglecting my duties lately. This place is a bit of a mess…”

Alice froze: “Huh?”

Duncan’s eyes also changed slightly. But just as he looked at Old Ghost, ready to say something, the old man suddenly grew hazy again. He straightened up while muttering to himself: “Strange, where did I put my kettle… How can guests come and not even get a sip of water…”

Duncan and the others looked at one another.

“You do not need to look for your kettle. Our guests only want to ask you a few things,” Nemo said at this point. “About the current state of the Second Waterway, and about yourself. They are here to investigate.”

“Investigate?” Old Ghost stopped at once and turned around, his expression suddenly grave. “General Tyrian still needs to investigate his own troops? Has there been a traitor? Is it in our sector? Or over in the central district? I knew they had been acting strange lately…”

“There is no traitor, but other infiltrators might be under threat from some kind of supernatural corruption,” Vanna stepped forward then, and almost tripped on the junk on the floor— For her height of one meter ninety, this cramped chaos was truly a challenge. “Have you been in touch with people from other sectors recently? Has anyone shown any Anomalies?”

“Anomalies? Not quite to that point. But the handler over in the central district keeps saying there are gurgling sounds in the abandoned pipes over there, as if someone is trying to bring the Second Waterway back online,” Old Ghost waved his hand. “You have seen the state of the Second Waterway. The things built in the Queen’s time are solid, but it has still been abandoned for so many years. There are many sections down there we simply cannot approach. Sometimes the underground river seeps into the cracks in the rock and brings strange noises with it. That is normal…”

The old man’s words kept drifting off topic, and Duncan had to speak to drag the conversation back: “This central district you mentioned… Is that the same area where the Boiling Gold mine is?”

“Boiling Gold? Ah, yes, Boiling Gold, all in that area— The Cathedral is there, the Queen’s palace is there, and the mine is there as well. That mine is deep, several hundred meters at least,” Old Ghost sat down on his bed. As he talked, he suddenly slapped his leg. “Ah, right. The sounds must be coming from one of the levels of the mine. The Second Waterway runs quite close to it there… I told you, the handler in that sector is just too nervous, always jumpy…”

The old man started muttering to himself again, but this time Duncan did not interrupt. He had already sunk into thought.

He recalled how he had first come to Frostholm, and the first body he had used here— A worker who had fallen to his death in the Boiling Gold mine, plunging to the lowest level of the shaft. When the search party finally brought him up, what they found was a replica made of elements.

And now Old Ghost had mentioned that the handler hidden in the central district had heard strange sounds in the pipes of the Second Waterway. It sounded as if something was surging inside them. The Second Waterway in the central district lay very close to one of the levels of the Boiling Gold mine.

Considering that both were “antiques” left over from the Queen’s era fifty years ago, Duncan even suspected that their relationship was more than just “very close”.

Those pipes might even all be connected!

He quickly noted down this clue in his mind, then asked: “From here, is there any way to reach the underground of the central district directly? How do you usually meet with that handler?”

“From here? No, that will not do. There is a passage in between that is pitch black. It was corrupted long ago. The other routes have all collapsed. You have to go from the surface, but the surface is crawling with the Rebels' lackeys now. You must be very careful…" Old Ghost muttered, then suddenly cried out: "Queen's Guard Corps! The Rebels are here, blow up the shaft, quickly!"

The old man shot up from his bed and stared around in panic, as if the Rebels would storm this place in the very next second. Then he suddenly stopped, and his gaze fell on Alice.

"Oh, I was mistaken. The Queen is safe and sound…"

Alice flailed in a bit of panic and waved her hands: "I… I am not the Queen…"

Duncan looked at the old man by the bed, his gaze deep. But the old man grew dazed again. After a few seconds, he stared blankly at Alice: "Young lady, who are you?"

"Old Ghost, you really are senile now— This is not just the fumes from back then, even your eyes have gone bad!" Nemo's voice suddenly cut through the eerie moment. Nemo nodded to Duncan with an apologetic look. "Sorry. Old Ghost is usually a bit scatterbrained, but he seems worse than usual today. He has not dealt with outsiders for a long time. Seeing you got him excited and he mixed up all those old memories."

"…It is fine," Duncan said calmly, drawing his gaze back from the old man.

He did not care much whether the old man had truly seen a trace of Frostholm's Queen in the disguised Alice. Was it a brief moment of clarity in a muddled mind? Had he seen through the disguise? Or was it just tangled memories? None of that mattered.

If this half-mad old man really saw a faint shadow of Frostholm's Queen in Alice, and felt a moment of peace in his heart because of it, that would be a good thing.

Just then, Nemo seemed to remember something. He frowned: “Strange. Why has Crow still not come back?”

“Crow? He went to check the northern corridor,” Old Ghost waved. “That fellow is a slow one. He always dawdles outside for half the day before he comes back.”

But Nemo’s furrowed brow did not ease at all: “…No. Even if he drags his feet, he should be back by now. The lights over there break down all the time. His consecrated lantern cannot last that long… Old Ghost, when did he leave?”

“Two or three hours?” Old Ghost thought about it and seemed to grow serious as well. “Now that you say it, it really has been quite a while.”

“I have a bad feeling. Crow has been deep in the waterway for too long,” Nemo’s tone finally grew heavy as he raised his head to look at Duncan and the others. “I have to go find him.”

Chapter 356: A Record

The people who should have finished their patrol and returned to the base still had not come back, and it made Nemo feel a bit uneasy.

Duncan spoke up: “Let’s go together.”

He also wanted to walk through this abandoned and mysterious “Second Waterway” and see whether some secret was hidden in this ancient legacy left by the Queen of Frostholm. “With more people, we can look out for each other.”

Nemo glanced, a little surprised, at the burly man in front of him, the “legendary captain” who sometimes made people feel a heavy pressure just by standing there.

To be honest, he still felt as if he were in a fog, as if none of this was real. He had heard the stories that the legendary “Captain Duncan” had returned from Subspace. The Sea Mist had even gone on a special long voyage because of it not long ago. But having Captain Duncan stand right here in front of him was another level of horror altogether. It was the sort of thing where, if he ran to the graveyard and told his dead Grandfather about it, the old man would jump out of the coffin just to tell him to shut up.

Yet it really had happened.

But after this brief contact, Nemo found that this “Captain Duncan” was not as terrifying as the legends said.

He was rational, could talk, and treated people politely. There were several “assistants” following him, and those assistants did not look like puppets controlled by some evil demonic magic.

Now, Duncan had even taken the initiative to offer his help.

This left Nemo a bit at a loss for a moment, but he soon nodded. Compared to figuring out what kind of temper his direct superior, his own old man, might have, the matter of Crow still not coming back was what really could not be delayed.

“I’ll go too,” Old Ghost’s voice came over just then. The old man walked to a nearby storage rack and rummaged through a heap of random “junk.” He found a safety oil lamp he could hang on his chest and a crowbar, then took a coil of rope from another rack and slung it over his body. He stepped toward the door: “No one knows the routes down there better than I do. If that kid really lost his way at some fork, you’ll need the wisdom of an old man.”

Clearly, this old man who drifted between confusion and clarity was in a good state again.

Duncan said nothing. He only signaled for Nemo to lead the way. The group left the Administrator’s little hut, passed back through the wide “junction” from before, and started along a sewer branch heading north to look for Nemo’s subordinate who had still not returned.

Once they passed that junction and went deeper into the “Second Waterway,” Duncan finally realized just how enormous this project really was—and how powerful the city-state under the Queen of Frostholm had been fifty years ago.

Wherever he looked, the walls were solid and the corridors lofty. This so-called “sewer” was almost like a grand underground palace. The crisscrossing network of passages was clearly not meant only for drainage. It likely had military uses, served as shelter, or even left room for underground factories. Above the wide corridors, pipes spread in every direction. Many of them had rusted badly or even snapped and fallen after years of abandonment, yet they still hinted at how magnificent this system must have been when it was first built.

On both sides of the corridor they sometimes saw large pipe openings and rusted grates. The drainage channels along the edges of the floor had long since dried up. Because this underground waterway had only been in use for a short time and had then been abandoned for many years, there was nothing here but a stale, moldy smell. There was no stench strong enough to be truly unbearable.

Even someone as well-traveled as Morris could not help clicking his tongue in admiration while walking through such an unbelievable facility. But along with his praise, the old scholar suddenly felt a bit puzzled.

“Even if this was built for the city-state’s development a hundred years into the future… this sort of massive underground system is still a bit exaggerated, isn’t it?” he said. “Pland’s sewer system is already considered advanced, but compared with this place it is still far behind. And this was built fifty years ago. Did Frostholm really need such a huge ‘Second Waterway’ back then?”

“The Queen had her own plans. Her judgment was always right,” Old Ghost, walking in front, spoke up as soon as he heard Morris’s doubt. “Her Majesty was a born Psionic. She could always see things ordinary people could not, and she could even see the future of the city-state. She relied on that judgment to make Frostholm strong, and we believed that everything she planned would be useful one day.”

Duncan suddenly frowned.

“A born Psionic?” He looked at the old man carrying the rope and the crowbar. “You’re saying the Queen of Frostholm could, to some extent, predict the future?”

“She said she couldn’t, but we all believed she could. Otherwise, how do you explain those unbelievable decisions she made?” The old man turned his head, his expression firm. “Anyway, that the Queen had supernatural senses is certain. Everyone from our time knew that.”

Duncan looked at Morris beside him. At this moment, Morris also looked thoughtful. He lowered his voice and said: “There aren’t many historical records about the Queen of Frostholm. Most of the information was lost in the rebellion, or was deliberately hidden or altered. In what little I know, there is no record that ‘the Queen was a born Psionic’ or that ‘the Queen had prophetic powers.’ The documents only say that she was extremely intelligent and had a flexible political touch.”

Duncan listened and silently glanced at Alice, who was walking obediently at his side.

She was not intelligent at all and had no idea what “political touch” even meant. She had not yet learned how to spell the word.

Alice noticed the captain’s gaze. She quickly turned her head away, her eyes curving as she smiled.

“…Records can be incomplete, especially when rebels would certainly hide many things on purpose. I’m quite willing to believe that the Queen of Frostholm did indeed have some special traits,” Duncan said, pulling his gaze away and trying to erase Alice’s silly smile from his mind. “It’s just this enormous ‘Second Waterway’ in front of us… What exactly was she thinking when she decided to build such an unbelievable thing back then…”

No one could answer Duncan’s question. At that moment, Vanna suddenly noticed something strange in the distance.

“There’s someone lying on the ground over there!” she called out, pointing ahead.

Everyone looked in the direction she indicated. Sure enough, they saw a figure in a blue coat lying on the ground.

The group ran over. Nemo reached down and turned the person over. A pale face came into view.

“…It’s Crow,” Nemo said. His expression instantly darkened, then he slammed a fist into the floor beside him. “Damn it!”

Vanna crouched beside the already dead young man. She seemed to notice something off about the body. After a closer check, she suddenly frowned: “He… drowned?”

“…Drowned?” Morris was shocked. Then he noticed the wet coat and the unnaturally swollen, waterlogged skin. But when he looked around, he only saw dry floor everywhere nearby. The only trace of water was the damp patch under Crow’s body.

Vanna leaned in even closer. After examining the body for a while, she raised her head: “The smell of sea water. He drowned in the sea.”

“There’s no sea water here. Even the underground river nearby is fresh water,” Old Ghost said as he came up from behind. When he saw the dead Crow, the wrinkles on his face twisted even tighter. “Poor young man. He must have been caught by the rebels, drowned, and then dumped here…”

“Whether it was rebels or not is uncertain, but the corpse being dumped is very possible,” Morris said gravely. “This is clearly not where he died… Hm?”

He seemed to notice something, so he reached into Crow's coat pocket and felt around. He pulled out a piece of paper that had also been completely soaked. A small corner of it had been peeking out earlier, which had caught his eye.

Everyone's gaze fell on that sheet of paper.

Morris pinched the paper between his fingers. Because it had been soaked, it was very fragile, so he unfolded it with great care.

There was writing on it. The ink had been blurred by water, but the words had not fully dissolved.

With the extra light from Old Ghost's oil lamp, Duncan tried to make out the text. The content, however, was baffling. It was a series of broken, incomplete lines:

"…The council of the lost Elder Kings met again and again. The first plan was set. Most of the people in the ashes received protection. They were to stand up in the light and warmth…

"…But the Elder Kings began to argue again. They saw a clan hiding in the shadows…

"The abandoned ones, their flesh would melt in the light. They could not receive divine blessing from the newborn world. The king of this clan came to the council of the lost Elder Kings and asked for the same protection. But what they wanted would be terribly harmful to the others in the ashes, so the lost Elder Kings could not agree. Thus they were abandoned.

"They went into the shadows, imprisoned themselves in the dark places, yet could not fully die. They cried out and searched bitterly for the protection of their homeland, but could not obtain it. So they fled deeper into the darkness. They did not like the dark at first, but only in darkness could they escape the poisons of this world. And so they lived in the dark for a very, very long time…”

(Under Doomsday, twin moons hung in the same sky and Anomalies lay everywhere. The main character possessed a Probability-Twisting Gift, the O-03 Probability Dice. After he was framed, he set out on a path of revenge and a search for the truth.)

—

Chapter 357: replica

The content on the paper was fragmented. It seemed to hide some vague metaphors. Reading it carefully only made it feel stranger. Even someone as well-read as Morris, a Grand Scholar, had gone over those lines again and again and still found no clue.

What were the lost Elder Kings? What was the abandoned clan? Who were the people in the ashes, and what was the “protection” that kept appearing in those lines?

Duncan frowned tightly. His gaze swept over the ink that had blurred slightly after being soaked in water. Some of the words recorded there stirred faint associations in his mind, but they refused to form any clear line of thought. He only felt that… this did not seem like meaningless mad rambling. Those almost religious paragraphs seemed to be talking about something connected to this “Deep Sea era.”

Or perhaps, about something from before the Deep Sea era.

“Is this Crow’s handwriting?” Vanna suddenly asked. She looked up at Nemo standing beside her.

“It’s his,” Nemo said. He crouched down, studied it, and nodded with certainty. “He always drags out the last stroke at the end of a sentence. No one else has that habit.”

“What did he believe in?” Vanna asked again. “Aside from the Orthodox faith, did he ever come into contact with any other spiritual guidance? It doesn’t have to be heretical. Secret societies and academic retreat circles, those gray groups count too.”

“He was a devout believer in the God of Death. He had been since he was a child. Other than the Cathedral of Bartok, I’ve never seen him go to any other gathering,” Nemo said, thinking back as he spoke. “As for societies or academic retreat circles… that’s even more impossible. With his brain? A guy who had to spend three extra years in remedial classes just to graduate from a public high school in the Lower City? Even if he wanted to join those circles, they’d have to want him first!”

“…A devout Orthodox believer who never touched any spiritual guidance outside the faith in the True Gods… that makes this very interesting,” Vanna murmured. She looked at the paper in Morris’s hand and pressed a knuckle to her chin. “The style of these passages clearly carries the traces of the classical Age of City-States, or even the earlier Dark Age. And it’s the typical style of Sacred Script. That isn’t something a person who barely managed to graduate from a public high school could just imagine on his own. And Crow kept this right on him. That means he cared a great deal about what was written on it.”

Duncan did not speak. He had been thinking quietly and now suddenly reacted: “So this might be something he copied from somewhere else.”

“Copied?” Nemo froze, then he also caught on. “You mean Crow might have stumbled into some place, and this text… is ‘clues’ he copied down there?”

“Maybe even he didn’t know what these things meant. But this was the most suspicious and most important information he saw in that place,” Duncan said with a slow nod. “And unfortunately, he may have drawn his death to himself while copying it.”

“He stumbled into some place…” Vanna slowly stood up. She crossed her arms, thinking as she spoke. “Then that place must have been completely unfamiliar to Crow, and the environment might have been very strange. So strange that he couldn’t quickly figure out where he was. He could only hurry to record what he saw as clues. On the other hand, he might have been discovered and killed soon after he finished copying, so he had no time to explore further. Otherwise, he would have had a chance to note more distinctive details to describe the environment he saw.”

As she spoke, she lowered her head again to look at the drowned body, her brows knitting together.

“Where exactly did he go? And how was he sent back? A soaking wet corpse would have left some trace while being moved…”

Nemo lifted his head and looked around.

In the dry sewer corridor, there was no sign at all that a body had been dragged through.

“Maybe we should follow the route Crow usually took on patrol and go deeper. He might have left traces before he wandered into that place,” Morris said. He raised his head and looked into the depths of the corridor. “He usually walked in this direction, right?”

“Yes,” Nemo said with a nod. “This corridor leads toward the Upper City. But there’s a stretch where the lighting is unstable and sometimes gets swallowed by darkness. Short periods of darkness don’t cause much trouble, but some… unpleasant things can appear. So it needs regular patrols to find shadows that have just started to grow.”

“Then let’s go take a look. If we go soon, we might still find clues,” Duncan said with a nod. “And if something really has crawled out over there, we can deal with it at the same time.”

No one objected.

The group said a brief farewell to Crow's body and prepared to move deeper along the sewer corridor. Before they passed the young man's corpse, Nemo and Old Ghost both lowered their heads at the same time.

"Wait here for us. We'll come back to get you," Nemo said.

Old Ghost bent down and, from who-knows-where, fished out a triangular amulet. He tucked it into Crow's chest: "Don't go wandering off, kid."

Duncan watched in silence as they said their goodbyes. Only after Nemo and Old Ghost were done did he turn and lead the group onward.

"When we go back, we'll tell Captain Tyrian what happened here," Vanna said suddenly as they walked. "That young man won't die without anyone knowing why."

"Thank you," Nemo said quietly. His mood was clearly bad. A heavy sadness clung to him. "That kid… he never really did anything great in his life. But this time, Captain Tyrian and Captain Duncan will remember him. I guess that counts as some kind of honor."

"Did he have family?" Morris broke the silence with a soft question.

"Family? He hasn't had any for a long time. He grew up in an orphanage. When he was a teenager he left the orphanage and came to be my apprentice," Nemo said, shaking his head. "The head of the orphanage said they picked him up off the street, in a trash bin at the corner. When they first brought him back, he was really only as long as a crow from head to toe…"

"An abandoned child," Old Ghost muttered. There was something like anger in his voice. "When the Queen was still here, she would never have allowed such a thing. Abandoning a baby would get you thrown in jail! And now people have sunk so low they can throw a child into a trash bin… That kid was tough, though. When he first came to us from the orphanage he was so scrawny. A teenager, but skinny like a monkey. I worried all the time he'd catch a chill one winter and die of it. But he lived… he lived…"

The old man suddenly stopped, as if he had jammed mid-sentence. Then he shook his head, his mood falling: "In the end, he still didn't live."

The atmosphere in the group grew especially heavy. Even the usually dull Alice could feel the weight pressing down. She looked around in confusion, then hesitated and walked over to Old Ghost, as if she wanted to comfort him: "You… don't be sad."

Old Ghost looked up at Alice in her wig and veil and stared blankly for a moment. Then he gave a hard sniff: "Your Majesty, you have to do something about this…"

Alice stared at the old man, completely at a loss.

But her awkward confusion did not last long, because the team suddenly stopped.

The corridor ahead lay under dim, gloomy light. Two gas lamps that seemed to be malfunctioning were set into the walls. Their weak glow could barely push back the darkness ahead. Vanna raised her head and cast her gaze toward the boundary of light and shadow on the floor. Her expression slowly grew more serious.

"There's someone lying there…"

Her voice was low.

A thin-looking figure lay unmoving by the drainage channel at the edge of the corridor. Because the air here did not circulate well, the gas lamps burned weakly. Their faint glow fell across a thick blue coat that looked very familiar.

The group walked up to the fallen body. When Duncan saw the face, he felt no surprise at all. It was Crow.

Unlike Duncan and the others, who had half expected this, Nemo and Old Ghost were only left stunned when they saw that face. There was even a trace of fear.

“Crow?!” Nemo’s voice trembled. He stared at the person on the ground, instinctively taking half a step back. “How… how can this be…”

“It’s a replica,” Duncan said calmly, cutting off Nemo’s cry. From the first glance, he had been certain that this body was a replica formed from elements. Around the “corpse,” patches of thick black goo had already started to appear. The breakdown had begun.

There seemed to be differences between replicas too. Though all of them were formed from elements, some replicas could move around the city-state for ten days or more, while others started to fall apart before they ever reached the graveyard. And this particular replica… was breaking down even faster.

From Crow’s disappearance until now, only a few hours had passed at most.

Thoughts raced through Duncan’s mind.

If Crow really had stumbled into some dangerous and eerie place—like the lair of the Annihilators—and if he had copied that suspicious Sacred Script there, then the process of copying him must also have begun in that place.

And now his replicant lay here, in this area he patrolled so often.

They were heading in the right direction.

Perhaps the source of the replicant was somewhere nearby!

Chapter 358: The End replica.

After hearing from Duncan and the others what a replica was, and that no one knew how many replicas had already appeared in the city-state, and that their corruption and cognitive interference might already have spread across large areas, a terror that he could not hide appeared on Nemo Wilkins's face.

Even Old Ghost, whose mind went clear and muddled by turns, felt the horror behind this bizarre phenomenon. He kept muttering about the Queen and the Queen's Guard Corps, his face full of anxiety and restlessness. Only after a long time did he finally quiet down.

After that, what Nemo felt was anger.

He could not accept that "Crow", who had followed him for so many years, had died so inexplicably. Even more than that, he could not accept that someone had made a replica of him, and that this replica was lying right in front of him. This was clearly an insult to the dead.

"There are shadows of Annihilators behind this matter. The Guardians in the city should have already started a large-scale hunt. There should be some progress soon," Duncan noticed Nemo's shifting mood and said, "but even if they find those Annihilators, it probably won't solve the problem at its root. The real source is what hides behind those cultists."

"What hides behind those cultists?" Nemo snapped out of his anger as if suddenly waking up. He seemed to think of something at once. "Behind them… don’t tell me this involves a God-level being?”

Vanna answered him: “replicas are pouring endlessly out from beneath the Deep Sea, and even the Frostholm Queen fifty years ago could not resolve this crisis. Do you really think something like that is something a bunch of cultists can pull off?”

“There are clues that this already involves the Abyssal Lord,” Morris went on. “His power, and even parts of His body, may have already appeared in the Mortal Realm. But as for the details, you had better not ask.”

For ordinary people, taking in too much information that pointed toward Gods was not a good thing.

Nemo heard the faint warning in the old scholar’s tone. He became clear-headed at once and nodded hard: “I understand… I won’t ask.”

He did not want to get strangled to death in his sleep by one of the Abyssal Lord’s tentacles just because he had heard something he should not have heard.

Vanna bent down and examined the “Crow” lying on the floor.

This replica looked vivid and lifelike. At least on the surface, it still kept almost exactly the same appearance as the real person. Only along its edges did foul black “mud” slowly seep out bit by bit. It looked as if the collapse had only just begun.

This was Duncan’s first time seeing, from an outside angle, the process of a replica going from complete to collapsed. This information was also very valuable to him.

He reached out and turned over the pockets of “Crow’s” coat. Earlier, the sheet of paper with the mysterious Sacred Script text had been in this pocket.

The pocket was empty, and its inside was also slowly disintegrating.

Vanna stretched out her hand. Water vapor in the air quickly condensed into an ice blade, and a dagger appeared in her hand. She used this hastily shaped dagger to lift the clothing near “Crow’s” chest and saw that the inner layer of the clothes had turned into a strange fluffy texture. Fibers and clumps stuck together in a blur, merging with the deeper flesh and skin.

“That sheet wasn’t copied… the inside of the replicant shows a typical chaotic state… there’s no blood…” Duncan muttered to himself. He reached out again, wanting to touch the black sludge slowly wriggling on the floor nearby, but he saw it suddenly shrink back, as if it were alive, retreating to the side. “These things haven’t solidified yet, but their writhing is slowing down.”

He slowly stood up and let out a quiet sigh: “There’s nothing else to check. Purify it and remove any future trouble. Vanna, step back a bit.”

As soon as Vanna heard this, she quickly retreated several steps and dragged the still-confused Alice back with her. Old Mr. Morris also backed away with them.

Seeing this, Nemo and Old Ghost also moved back. They had no idea why Vanna and the others suddenly grew so nervous.

Then they found out.

A tuft of ghost-green flame suddenly appeared at Duncan’s feet. In the next instant, the flame leaped toward the nearby “replica” like a predator that had smelled its prey. The blaze surged up, and the sharp crackle of supernatural firewood burning sounded again and again. The corpse formed from that strange black sludge was burned to ash almost instantly. As the flames burned, the gas lamps on the walls, along with the consecrated lanterns that Old Ghost and Nemo carried, all seemed to take on a ghostly green hue!

The entire process actually lasted less than a few seconds, yet Nemo was already soaked in cold sweat. When the flames had surged up, overwhelming terror flooded his body and mind. He even felt as if his soul was about to resonate with that fire and burn on its own. By the time the flame vanished, he honestly felt as if he had just escaped death.

Duncan turned his head and looked at the people who had almost hidden all the way to the far corner on the other side of the corridor: “It’s burned… why are you hiding so far away? Taking just a couple of steps back would have been fine.”

“I have psychological shadows from that thing,” Vanna said very directly.

Duncan: “…”

He stood there awkwardly for a moment, then touched the bandage near the bridge of his nose and turned to walk deeper down the corridor: “Ahem. Let’s go. Let’s see what’s ahead.”

The others followed after Duncan. Nemo walked a few steps, still shaken, watching the broad back of the man leading the way. Only after a moment did he glance at Old Ghost walking beside him and ask: “Do you think… Captain Tyrian might also be very afraid of his Father?”

Old Ghost seemed not to hear him. He just walked on, a rope hanging from him and a crowbar in his hand, his steps slow, his gaze a little dazed as he looked ahead. Nemo had to call him twice before he suddenly muttered out of nowhere: “That fire… I’ve seen it before…”

Nemo froze: “You’ve seen it? You mean you’ve seen flames like that? Where did you see it?”

But Old Ghost did not answer again. Rope still on his shoulders and crowbar still in hand, he shuffled forward like he was sleepwalking. Then he seemed to suddenly remember something. He hurried to catch up to Duncan and Alice at the front and mumbled as he went: “The Queen is up ahead. Move, move…”

Nemo watched Old Ghost’s back, scratched his hair, and could not help muttering: “Alright, another episode…”

No one knew how much time passed before the group stopped again.

There was no road ahead.

A mass of collapsed boulders and half-melted steel wreckage was piled together, completely blocking the way forward. It looked as if it had been there for half a century.

“This is the end of the corridor,” Nemo said, pointing at the collapsed area. “This was blown up when the Queen’s Guard Corps retreated back then. The whole collapse probably stretches for several hundred meters. There’s no way anyone could pass through.”

“So this is the end… but we didn’t find anything at all along the way…” Vanna frowned and looked back in the direction they had come. “We didn’t even see any marks left by that replica when it moved.”

Duncan said nothing. He walked up to the collapsed ruins and carefully examined the piled stone, concrete, and steel, his brow tightly furrowed and his face silent.

Seeing this, Alice came closer: “What are you looking for?”

“Possible gaps or tunnels,” Duncan said casually. “People can’t get through, but a fluid like mud can seep through very small holes.”

“You suspect… that replica seeped through this collapsed zone first as fluid elements, then condensed into human shape and fell over on the corridor side?” Morris quickly understood what Duncan meant, but the image he formed in his head gave him goosebumps. “That sounds… truly chilling.”

Duncan did not reply. He took two steps back and tilted his head to look up at the completely sealed-off end of the corridor.

There were indeed no signs here.

All along the way, they had seen no trace of any Anomaly.

So how had that replica appeared in the corridor? Where had “Crow” gone before that, and how had he gotten through?

…

On the vast, endless surface of the Boundless Sea, a thin fog had risen.

A steamship with a handsome white hull sailed through the mist. Its bow cut through the fog drifting over the sea, and its stern left layer upon layer of fine ripples behind it.

Captain Lawrence, wrapped in a thick coat, came up onto the deck. He stared into the distance in a daze at the fog-covered sea, the faint line of the horizon, and the silhouettes of icebergs rising and falling in the mist.

It was daytime, and the Sun hung high in the sky. Yet the sunlight neither dispersed the fog over the sea nor drove away the chill in the sea wind. He only felt that cold slowly seeping through his coat, like it was drilling into his bones and soaking into him bit by bit—like his whole body was gradually sinking into icy seawater.

“The northern temperature… really isn’t friendly to an old man like me who was born and raised in the Central Seas.”

Lawrence could not help muttering this to himself.

His First Mate, Gus, walked over from the side. He was a tall, thin middle-aged man with slightly curly brown short hair. Hearing the captain mutter, Gus laughed and said: “Frost Sea is always like this. There’s more fog here than anywhere else, and sometimes it fogs up even in the daytime. The air is full of chill, and there’s sudden snowfall in the city-states… outsiders have a hard time getting used to it.”

“I originally planned to stay in Frostholm for a while longer. But now, once we finish the necessary work, we had better head back quickly. Staying here too long will make a man sick.” Captain Lawrence shook his head. “The fog’s having more and more impact. In an hour, we’ll have to check the heading again.”

The First Mate nodded at once: “Yes, Captain. I’ll make arrangements in a bit.”

Lawrence grunted in agreement, then asked: “Has there been any reply to the signals we sent to Frostholm?”

“Not yet,” the First Mate answered. “But that’s normal enough. The Harbor work efficiency in northern city-states is always like that. Once we get closer, they’ll have to answer our docking request.”

Chapter 359: Stargazing

The White Oak still moved forward through the thin mist. The surging output of its steam core drove its huge, efficient propulsion system and pushed it quickly across this fog-covered stretch of sea.

At some point the sky grew darker. The cold wind over the water felt even more unpleasant. Lawrence pulled his coat tighter, decided that he had been standing in the wind on deck long enough for one day, and turned back into the bridge.

A young priest in a black robe trimmed with silver and blue stood by the machines, giving a benediction. He lightly swung the censer in his hand, letting smoke coil around several control consoles. When he saw the captain enter, he stopped and gave Lawrence a polite nod.

He was the ship’s priest for this voyage, Jensen. Lawrence was not familiar with this young priest. In fact, most captains who transported Anomaly items often had to deal with unfamiliar clergy. The priests on their ships were sent directly by the city-state Cathedral and replaced often. Usually, a ship’s priest would only complete two or three voyages with the same vessel. This constant changing, of course, was for safety.

After all, ships carrying dangerous goods could not avoid exposure to supernatural forces. As the ship’s “supernatural shield”, the priest would bear almost all the pressure from supernatural interference. That pressure came from the items on board, and also from the mental strain that built up among the crew during the voyage—even the Mortal Realm influence from every crew member’s dreams each night would be fed back into the priest’s daily benedictions and rituals.

But shipboard priests were still mortals. If they stayed under a specific kind of supernatural influence for too long, they would inevitably be affected and changed by it. After several long voyages, they would begin to lose their sharp sense for supernatural corruption, and might even become a crack through which Subspace could invade. So, after some time, priests who served at sea had to return to land and stay for a while in certain Cathedrals, undergoing purification and a reshaping of their Spiritual Insight. Most of them could recover afterward and would then be assigned to other ships as voyage priests again. Those who carried lasting spiritual problems could only stay far from the sea and spend the rest of their lives as priests on land, continuing to serve the Church.

In a sense, these respectable priests were also consumables of seafaring.

Then again… who was not a consumable in seafaring?

“Mr. Jensen, how are the machines?” Lawrence nodded to the young priest and asked with concern.

“Operating well, Captain,” the young priest said in a calm voice. “I just came back from the lower engine room. The whole power system and the steam pipes are all in good condition.”

Lawrence nodded with satisfaction. After exchanging a few casual words with the young priest, he walked to the wide windows at the front of the bridge and looked out.

It was gray outside on the deck. The sky was dimmer, and thick, blurry clouds covered the heavens. A hazy light wandered between the clouds and fell weakly on the sea. The weather was not very good, but they were already not far from Frostholm, so they probably would not be trapped by a storm or anything else too nasty before reaching the city-state.

Lawrence suddenly frowned and looked at a crew member seated at a console not far away: “Is Frostholm still not responding to our signals?”

“No,” the crew member in charge of monitoring the telegraph system said with a shake of his head. He wore headphones and held a pencil in one hand. A small machine in front of him glowed with an orange-yellow light. “We also haven’t received any reply to our signals. But judging by our position, we’re already close enough to contact Frostholm’s Harbor directly.”

“…That’s not quite right.” The old captain finally felt a trace of unease. He raised his head again and looked into the distance, his expression growing steadily more serious. “At this time, at this position, we should already be able to see Frostholm’s coastline…”

He suddenly turned his head and looked at his First Mate: “Has the route been checked?”

“Just checked it. Our position is correct.”

Lawrence frowned. After a moment, he drew in a quiet breath: “I’ll go confirm it myself. Get the stargazing room ready.”

The First Mate clearly hesitated when he heard this. Before he could speak, the young priest Jensen stepped over and said to Lawrence: “Captain, at your age it’s not really suitable for you to enter the stargazing room…”

Lawrence glanced at the priest but did not speak.

He understood what the man meant. Entering the stargazing room meant taking on a certain amount of corruption. The light and shadow from the layers between the Abyssal Deep and the Spirit Realm put pressure on a person’s mind. As an old captain who had spent most of his life wandering the Boundless Sea, his mind was no longer as normal and whole as it had been when he was young. While observing the stars, he might very well lose himself.

But in many cases, only older captains had enough experience to see tiny hints of drift in a ship's course from subtle changes in the starlight. Young navigators with healthy minds could not do that.

"I'll finish as fast as I can," Lawrence said at last after they stared at each other for a few seconds. His expression was very serious. "I suspect the ship has gone off course, but there's also drift in the stargazing room. I have experience with recalibration."

Faced with Lawrence's firm attitude, the ship's priest could only sigh and step aside: "…You are the captain. The captain is the law on a ship. I'll prepare the protection."

Lawrence nodded, then looked once more toward the bow.

In the direction where he should have been able to see Frostholm's coastline, there was still only the vast, endless sea and a boundless veil of mist.

He pulled back his gaze and walked toward the passage leading to the stargazing room.

He left the bridge, went down a corridor, and stepped onto a stairway that led to the lower decks of the White Oak. After passing through several connecting compartments and doors, he reached the place where the stargazing room was located.

It was in the lowest level of the ship.

Lawrence stood before the door while the ship's priest, Jensen, began to work. The young clergyman added special incense and holy oil to the censer as he chanted obscure scripture. He swung the chain in his hand so that the scented smoke slowly spread around Lawrence. Then he took out a small ritual knife marked with many storm runes and used it to cut a line through the air in front of Lawrence, symbolizing the arrival of the protection of Goddess Gamona of Storms.

The White Oak's navigator had already hurried over after hearing the news. He was a young man with a slightly pale face who looked a bit uneasy. When he found out that the captain was going to enter the stargazing room in person to confirm the route, he grew so tense he almost tore the buttons from his clothes.

"Relax a little," Lawrence noticed the navigator's reaction and smiled, comforting the young man instead. "It's not necessarily your fault. The Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep are full of unpredictable changes, and the Spirit Realm lens isn't always reliable. Star charts shifting is normal. You just lack experience. That's normal too."

"I… I checked it over and over. Our route is fine," the young navigator blurted. "But…"

Lawrence waved his hand: "I'll figure out what's going on."

"Captain, the blessing is complete," the ship's priest said from the side at that moment. "You can enter the stargazing room now. But remember, don't stay too long. Don't use the gaze for too long. If you haven't come out in fifteen minutes, I'll go in to fetch you."

"Ten minutes will be enough." Lawrence straightened his clothes and spoke calmly.

Then he let out a soft breath, stepped up to the metal door inlaid with holy silver filaments and carved with storm runes, and pushed it open.

A dimly lit cabin came into view.

Lawrence closed the metal door behind him and quickly took stock of the stargazing room.

The room had no windows. That metal door was the only way in or out. There were no extra furnishings inside, and the only piece of equipment was a cylindrical device about a meter in diameter set in the center of the room.

It looked like an altar, but around its cylindrical base were many cranks, linkages, and mirrored parts. By its side stood a small platform where a person could stand. That was the navigator’s place. At the top of the cylindrical device was a transparent, inward-curving component.

It was a crystal lens held up by a very complex set of struts and rods. The crystal lens was bowl-shaped. Its inside looked empty at first glance, but when his vision focused on it, it seemed as if he could see ripples shining in the lens.

Those ripples were like a basin filled with seawater.

Lawrence stepped up onto the small platform beside the cylinder and looked at the lens in front of him.

A ship sailed across the vast Boundless Sea, and there were almost no landmarks on the water to use as reference. The city-states were islands scattered here and there. Once a ship missed its destination, the sailors would lose themselves on the endless sea. In such a world, navigation became a very important art.

Vision 001, the Sun, was a very useful marker in the sky. Using the Sun to confirm a ship’s direction was one of the basic skills of navigation. But the sky did not always show the Sun, and sometimes the Sun alone could not provide precise enough positioning. When that happened, how could sailors be sure they were still sailing along the right route?

The answer, of course, was to look at the stars.

Stargazing was an essential skill in modern ocean voyages.

Lawrence lowered his head and slowly bent down until his entire face sank into the hollow of the large crystal lens.

The stars were in a place very, very deep down. To see them, a sailor needed not only clever instruments, but also a sound mind.

Chapter 360: Docking

Captains who sailed on the Boundless Sea, especially those who used modern technology for navigation, were of course no strangers to the “stars”. The vast Starry Sky that hung between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the Spirit Realm could give ships extremely precise guidance. Even when a ship entered waters twisted by an Anomaly, the stars could still point out the correct course. They could even lead those who lost their way inside certain “Visions” out of danger and back to the Mortal Realm.

Of course, other professions also dealt with the Starry Sky. Scholars studied it, hoping to break the mysteries of the world’s deep layers. Diviners watched it to guess at the paths of fate for all things in the mortal world. Some secret societies even treated the Starry Sky as a source of knowledge and revelation. They used dangerous methods that walked on the edge of sanity to pry into it, hoping to grasp secrets about Demons without falling into the Abyssal Deep.

Those dangerous societies often ended as food for Abyssal demons, or became potential “allies” of cultists of annihilation. Because of this, such secret cabals were always key targets for the Churches of the city-states and for the authority.

But no matter what, the profession that had the closest tie to the Starry Sky, and used all kinds of Spirit Realm lenses most often, was still the captains who sailed on the Boundless Sea.

Lawrence had drifted on this vast and hostile sea for half his life. He knew many things about the Starry Sky, including both the methods of observing it and the dangers that came with it.

He lowered his head and pressed his face deep into the hollow of the Spirit Realm lens – everyone knew you had to bow your head to look at the stars, that was common sense. Then he began to softly recite the name of the God he believed in, letting that name resonate with the blessing the priest had just placed upon him.

As the mysterious power slowly spread, his Spiritual Insight and faith both rose. First he heard a faint sound, as if water was gathering in a basin and drawing near him. He smelled the salty, fishy scent of sea water, and in the next second, he felt that his whole face was already submerged.

New Navigators who observed the Starry Sky for the first time often panicked at this point. The illusion of “drowning in water” could shake their minds, and that would let unnecessary Shadows slip into their heads. That was why a new recruit’s first round of Stargazing always needed someone by their side to help. The main task of this helper was to drag the new Navigator away from the Spirit Realm lens before they mutated into a pile of writhing meat. This “adaptation” process often took several weeks.

But for Lawrence, this was no problem at all.

He knew the “sea water” that flooded over him was the power of the storm Goddess Gamona. A god would not harm a Believer. Now, he could open his eyes.

Lawrence slowly opened his eyes.

The sky full of stars and the endless darkness filled his vision at the same time.

He looked down. Below him the darkness was boundless. The deep gloom of the Abyssal Deep stretched out without end. At the edge of that space, chaotic ripples of light moved and rolled. That was the faint projection of the Spirit Realm in the deep layers of the world.

Between that darkness, countless fixed and dense points of light floated. They gathered into clumps or wisps of light of all sizes. Some looked like clouds, some like whirlpools, some like rivers. These endless points of light covered the old captain's sight in a spectacular way, outlining some mysterious pattern that Mortals had not yet understood.

And in the depths of that grand, veil-like Starry Sky, in the gaps between some of the "clusters" of light, he could faintly see some chaotic Shadows that were different from the darkness around them. They looked like shattered islands, spread in a radial pattern and floating deep inside the starlight. Dim, pale "rivers" stretched between them. Just one glance could make a person dizzy and trembling with fear.

That was a "depth" even deeper than the Spirit Realm, the terrifying homeland of Abyssal demons – the Abyssal Deep Sea.

The Starry Sky was a layer of Veil that floated between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the Spirit Realm.

Lawrence kept strict control over his gaze. He did not let himself gaze too far down toward the Abyssal Deep, so he would not attract the attention of those chaotic, dull-minded Demons. At the same time he focused his mind and began to search for his own position within the Starry Sky.

He found it – a dim projection, like a lost and wandering soul, floating somewhere among the stars.

Lawrence fixed his gaze on that projection and studied it for a long time, then could not help but frown.

His own position… was already in the coastal waters near Frostholm?

The old captain’s heart tightened. He started to move his hands by feel and found the control lever on the side of the lens array device. He carefully adjusted the machine. At once the many small lenses set into the side of the cylinder began to work, changing the angle at which Lawrence observed the Starry Sky.

After checking again and again, he confirmed that he really was in the waters near Frostholm – close enough that he should already be able to see Frostholm’s main island with the naked eye.

At that moment, Lawrence felt a sudden blur before his eyes.

The Starry Sky image full of countless points of light flickered once and suddenly turned pitch black, then returned to normal in the next instant.

Lawrence was startled. His first instinct was to adjust the control lever again to reset his view, but long years of experience stopped that instinct. He jerked his head up instead.

A flicker in the Starry Sky image might be a fault in the Spirit Realm lens. No matter what the reason was, once any Anomaly happened in the middle of Stargazing, you had to leave the gaze at once.

This was a safety rule countless predecessors had paid for with their lives.

Lawrence rubbed his brow and raised his wrist to look at his watch. Only a few minutes had passed.

He began to check the whole lens array device. He planned to do another round of observation only after he ruled out any fault and confirmed it was safe.

But just as he was about to open the outer shell of the machine, a knock on the door suddenly cut him off.

“Captain!” The voice of the First Mate came from outside the door. “Captain, have you finished your observation? We received a signal!”

Lawrence frowned a little. After a short pause, he put down what he was doing, walked quickly to the door, and opened it. The First Mate was standing there.

“We received Frostholm’s reply,” the First Mate said. He first glanced into the Stargazing room, roughly made sure there was no sign of an Anomaly, then looked back at Lawrence. “The clearance for near-coast passage and permission to enter the harbor have both been granted.”

Lawrence still frowned slightly. For some reason a faint sense of strangeness rose in his heart. Thinking of the discordant feeling in the Stargazing room just now, he asked in a serious tone: “Can you see Frostholm’s main island?”

“We can already confirm it by sight,” the First Mate nodded. “The fog on the sea has cleared. Our course drifted a little, but it was a very small deviation – and we already corrected it.”

Lawrence glanced back into the Stargazing room, his expression heavy.

“Captain?” The First Mate finally noticed the odd look on the old captain’s face and grew nervous. “Did you find something?”

“There was something wrong with the Stargazing room just now. And according to my observation, we should have been in the waters near Frostholm quite a while ago. There should be no situation where fog or route drift stops us from seeing Frostholm,” Lawrence said in a low voice. “Have an artificer check the Spirit Realm lens array. See if the equipment has a problem. I will go up and take a look.”

“Yes, Captain.”

Lawrence quickly left the bottom deck, went up the stairs and along the corridors, and passed through layer after layer of compartments on the White Oak. Soon he reached the upper deck.

He did not return to the bridge. Instead, he stood directly on the forecastle deck and looked into the distance.

A large city-state lay straight ahead of the White Oak. The coastal buildings and harbor facilities of the city were clearly visible. The fog had scattered. Gentle waves rose and fell over the sea. Thick and thin clouds mixed in the sky. Light spilled down through them, brightening the distant water and the city.

It really did look like Frostholm. There was no sign of any Anomaly.

Lawrence frowned and looked up at the sky.

Aside from somewhat heavy clouds, there was no Anomaly there either.

After a moment, he left the deck and returned to the bridge. At the same time, the sailor at the telegraph machine happened to receive another welcome message from Frostholm’s harbor.

Lawrence looked at the note the sailor wrote down.

“The harbor is open. Welcome to Frostholm.”

Lawrence blinked and suddenly felt he might be a bit too tense. A minor fault in the Spirit Realm lenses plus the fog that had lingered over the sea earlier had probably just magnified his anxiety. In truth, everything here clearly looked normal.

“We dock.”

“Yes, Captain.”

…

Duncan and his group left the “Second Waterway” and said farewell to Nemo in the secret passage that connected to it.

Before that, they had searched for a long time in that collapsed and blocked corridor. In the end they still found no clues. They did not find more of the “mud”, nor did they find any cracks or marks where the “mud” might have seeped into the hallway.

Of course, they did not find the mysterious place where Crow had once lost his way.

It seemed the trail had broken off.

“Old Ghost and I will give Crow a proper burial. Please tell Captain Tyrian that Crow died like a true warrior – he was a member of the Sea Mist Fleet we can be proud of.”

In the secret passage, Nemo took off his hat and bowed slightly to Duncan.

“I will tell him,” Duncan said. He looked at the “informant” before him with special solemnity. “And this investigation is not over.”

Nemo raised his head and met Duncan’s eyes.

“Crow left very important information. He definitely went to some place, and that replica could not have just appeared in the Second Waterway out of thin air,” Duncan said slowly. “I will keep digging. If I have to, I will search this whole city-state, brick by brick, grass by grass, clod by clod.”

Chapter 361: No Trace

Nemo suddenly felt a shudder in his heart.

In that moment, he felt that what this fearsome “ghost captain” had given him was not just a simple promise, but a statement of something that had already become a fixed fact in some day yet to come.

He did not know where this feeling came from. He only knew that he lowered his head without meaning to and spoke with a kind of awe he could not even describe: “As you say.”

Duncan nodded, then moved his gaze as if by chance and looked at Old Ghost, who stood not far away, leaning against the wall and staring blankly.

The old man was no longer muttering about the Frostholm Queen, nor mumbling about the Second Waterway and Rebels. He only stared into space, as if his mind was drifting in some time and place that the world had almost forgotten.

In the old man’s muddled memories… did the Queen of Frostholm still rule this place?

Duncan drew back his gaze, called to Alice, who was also spacing out beside him, and left toward the exit of the secret passage with Vanna and Morris.

Soon they returned to the surface. After leaving the Golden Whistle tavern, they stepped back onto the busy streets of Frostholm.

The setting sun was slowly dropping toward the distant rooftops. The brilliant and mysterious twin rune rings in the sky had just touched the tips of a few spires in the Upper City. Visually, it looked as if the towers built by Mortals were holding up the chains that bound the Sun, making the Sun Wheel hang above the city.

dusk was near, and curfew time was coming. Because of the stricter new curfew order, everyone hurried home or toward the nearest nightfall Sanctuary World. In the middle of this rushing crowd, Duncan's group, walking at an easy pace, looked quite out of place.

But not many eyes landed on them. Everyone was busy.

"What do you think about this?" Vanna moved up beside Duncan and spoke in a low voice. Because they were about the same height, she could lean in close.

Duncan's face did not change: "You mean the origin of that replica?"

"It seemed to appear out of nowhere. The ways Morris and I used to investigate could not find any trace of how it moved. Even you did not find a clue," Vanna said, nodding lightly. "And we always believed that even these strange replicas had to move in some 'normal' way. They should have a source and a process of moving from place to place…"

Duncan slowed a bit and tilted his head: "You mean those replicas might have some kind of spatial power that lets them ignore the dimensions of the Mortal Realm and appear directly at a chosen place?"

"That is my suspicion."

Duncan gave no clear answer. A few seconds later, he suddenly said: "Have I ever told you what happened the first time Alice came aboard the ship?"

"No," Vanna blinked. "Did something happen when she first came aboard?"

“The doll’s spirit coffin kept returning to the Vanished. I threw her into the sea three times, and she and her wooden box came back to the ship three times,” Duncan said slowly. “Guess how she came back.”

Vanna thought for a moment and said, not very sure: “By relying on… the power of the curse? Some kind of ‘recurrent gift’ of Anomaly 099? Also a spatial kind of power?”

“No. She rowed back on the coffin lid, very fast,” Duncan said in a calm tone. “Then she climbed straight up along the hull of the ship with a lot of strength. Because she rowed too fast, I did not catch her the first two times. I only grabbed her on the third try.”

Vanna: “…”

The young Inquisitor and Morris both turned their heads at the same time. With a strange look in their eyes, they stared at the doll Miss, who was glancing around at the side. Feeling their gaze, Alice turned her head and gave them an innocent smile.

“I am not ruling out the idea that those replicas use some kind of spatial teleportation to appear directly inside the city,” Duncan went on lightly. “But logically, if they could Teleport straight into the city, then why did the Sea Swallow have to sail all the way from the outer sea instead of just appearing in the harbor?”

“I am more inclined to think the replicas still need normal means of movement. That replica in the sewers only looked like it ‘appeared out of thin air’ because we overlooked something. It is like how normal people would never guess that the real reason a cursed doll keeps ‘coming back’ is simply that she swims very fast and is very strong.”

He paused for a moment, then added, deep in thought: “It is more likely that the place Crow ‘strayed into’ also came from the same kind of ‘overlooked’ path.”

Morris, who had been quiet the whole time, suddenly reacted: “Some kind of passage that exists but cannot be observed? Or a rift that opens only at times?”

“Hard to say. But this matter is definitely tied to those cultists,” Duncan said. “What Crow recorded on that sheet of paper caught my attention. It did not all sound like rambling ‘Heretic thoughts’. It sounded more like a description of real events, written in words modern people cannot easily understand. That kind of record has always suited the taste of cultists.

“Maybe we really should bring Dog and Shirley here. The eyes of Abyssal demons might be able to see something in dimensions outside the Mortal Realm.”

…

A gust of gray wind swept into the door of the harbor defense office. From the Ashen Wind, Gatekeeper Agatha stepped through.

Behind the desk, Colonel Lister looked up at the Gatekeeper who had appeared in his office: “This time you even skipped the usual notice.”

“Sorry. It is an urgent moment,” Agatha said. Then she noticed the two heavy dark circles on Lister’s face. “You did not sleep last night?”

“I was not the only one awake,” Lister said with a bitter smile, shaking his head. “We spent the whole night trying to crack the mysterious signals from the Sea Mist Fleet. The cryptographers and mathematicians almost started hitting each other with chairs. It is the first time I learned that refined scholars can also start cursing each other’s relatives when they argue.”

Agatha stayed quiet for a moment, her gaze turning a bit strange. After a while, she said: “Soon the Cathedral may ‘borrow’ a few Scholars from you, especially in cryptography and mathematics.”

Lister froze: “Why?”

Agatha’s expression did not change much – half her face was covered in bandages anyway: “To crack another playful secret left to us by another being with a bad sense of humor.”

“All right, looks like your troubles are no less than mine,” Lister sighed, then pulled himself together. “Let us talk business. Why did you drop by so suddenly? What do you want to know?”

“The state of the lockdown,” Agatha said. “Normally the Cathedral should not interfere with city defenses, but things are special now. I cannot rest easy.”

“I understand,” Lister nodded. “Do not worry. All of Frostholm is now completely sealed. Even if there are places not fully covered, with such a huge Sea Mist Fleet gathered in the nearby waters, no one would dare move in or out casually. We have temporarily frozen all departure permits and informed nearby city-states and ships on the outer sea to stay away from Frostholm. Every docking request we have received so far has been rejected.”

“Good. At least that stops the problem from getting worse,” Agatha said with a light breath. “What about Dagger Island?”

“It is still under lockdown, until the Cathedral gives us further ‘professional advice’,” Lister said, his face growing more serious. “Up to yesterday, the island continued to send back regular reports saying ‘all normal’. Even after the city stopped sending supplies and cut off all communication replies, there was no other reaction from them.”

“Do not relax your guard. The Sea Swallow incident proved that the corruption on that island is actively trying to move into the city,” Agatha said sternly. “That ‘thing’ will not just sit there quietly. The Cathedral is already preparing a force made up of Deathsworn and penitent Monks, but unsealing the powerful sacred relics will still take some time."

Lister nodded. He seemed about to say more, but before he could speak, hurried footsteps sounded from the corridor outside.

A harbor soldier appeared at the office door.

Lister looked up at him. The soldier's face carried a hint of haste. "What happened?"

The soldier straightened up and reported quickly: "Report, Commander. A ship that was scheduled to dock at Frostholm has not appeared on time."

"Not appeared on time? That is meaningless," Lister frowned. "All routes around the city are sealed right now. Of course no ship will dock."

"Report, Commander, it is not that it failed to dock – it has not appeared at all!" the soldier quickly explained. "That ship was supposed to arrive today. We were already prepared to send it the notice about the city's lockdown, but it never contacted us. We just talked to Cold Harbor again. Cold Harbor confirmed that the ship completed its resupply and inspection there as normal. But after it approached the waters near Frostholm, there has been no more word from it!"

Hearing this, Lister's expression finally turned grave. He drew in a slow breath and rose from behind the desk: "What is the name of that ship?"

"The White Oak!"

Chapter 362: The Sinking Island

Agatha stepped forward and spoke in a serious tone: “Where did that ‘ship that never arrived’ come from?”

“It departed from The Harbor, Pland, took on supplies once at Lunsa, then again at Cold Harbor,” the soldier who had come to report answered at once. “Frostholm was supposed to be its final stop—until the resupply at Cold Harbor, everything about that ship was completely normal.”

“Damn it…” Colonel Lister pressed hard on his forehead, his mood clearly very bad, and said: “We already have more trouble than we can handle… and now another ship vanished just as it was about to reach Frostholm… We barely have the energy to deal with our own city, let alone anything outside its borders…”

Agatha turned her gaze on the Defense Commander and spoke in an especially grave tone: “But as you said, Colonel, it vanished when it was just about to reach Frostholm—so we cannot rule out that it was also affected by some kind of supernatural Vision.”

Lister looked up: “You mean…”

“Frostholm is being tainted by some sort of supernatural power. Anomaly cases keep breaking out in the city. The Sea Swallow incident proved that this ‘strangeness’ is not limited to the main island. Now another ship, the White Oak, has gone missing at the edge of our coastal waters. I have reason to suspect that a ‘Visions’ event on a scale far beyond what we imagined is covering the entire Frostholm region—not only the land under our feet, but also a large stretch of the surrounding sea."

Lister braced his hands on the table. After a few seconds he suddenly looked up: "We need to widen the blockade and warn every nearby city-state. Frostholm's corruption is spilling outward. A simple physical blockade may not work at all."

As he spoke, he suddenly stopped. He bit his teeth, clearly torn. Agatha of course noticed: "What else is troubling you, Colonel?"

"…I'm afraid we have to talk to that Pirate Lord," Lister said, his face dark. "Though I personally, really, really do not want to do it."

"You mean… Tyrian Abnomar?" Agatha's tone also changed a little. Though she served as the city's Gatekeeper, she was still a native of Frostholm, raised on horror stories about the Sea Mist Fleet. "If you don't go to sleep, Captain Tyrian will come during the thick fog and carry you away" was the deepest childhood memory of every Frostholm native under fifty. Agatha was no exception. "Do you think he will agree to talk with us?"

"Not necessarily a negotiation, but at least a conversation," Lister said, lifting his eyelids and fixing his gaze on the Gatekeeper before him. "He arrived here at the most sensitive possible moment, yet he has not taken any further action. I once suspected he was linked to the 'replicas' appearing inside and outside the city, but now he looks more like he is simply sealing off this region—just as we are. We have to send someone to speak with him, at least to figure out what he intends to do."

"…Legend says he is a cursed man, cold and mad, whose breath is as icy as the winds over the Frost Sea, and whose gaze can freeze the sea itself," Agatha said softly. "Who could serve as this 'Envoy'?"

“Those stories are exaggerated. Anyone with a bit of access can find out that the Sea Mist Fleet has fairly normal channels of contact with many powers on the Frost Sea. That so?called ‘Sea Mist Venture Company’ even has an ‘office’ in Cold Harbor. That Pirate Lord is simply especially cold toward Frostholm,” Lister sighed softly. “The Envoy problem will be solved. Our city has never lacked for brave soldiers, and besides…”

He suddenly stopped, lifted his head in thought, and looked toward a certain direction outside the window.

“Lady Agatha, did you just hear something strange?”

“A strange sound?” Agatha frowned and also raised her head to look outside. Almost at the same time, she too heard some distant, low, odd noise.

It sounded like a continuous humming, yet it was unlike any sound she knew of in the natural world.

It came from the direction of Dagger Island.

On the Frostholm Nearshore Waters, an Ironclad Warship with a white hull and three main guns cruised slowly along, flying the Queen’s flag. A short, stocky captain stood at the bow, watching the distance through a spyglass. He wore a Guard Corps uniform from half a century ago, the kind once issued by the Queen. Yet there was a gaping hole in his abdomen, so wide you could see straight through him. The torn cloth around the wound floated in the air as if soaked in seawater, and now and then a string of bubbles appeared from nowhere.

He was a member of the Sea Mist Fleet, captain of the powerful warship Sea Crow, Nixon.

He gazed toward the small island in the distance, with its winding shoreline.

On the sea in that direction, a few small, dark shapes prowled back and forth.

They were Frostholm's navy ships. They blocked off Dagger Island from the other side, and at the same time watched every move of the Sea Crow and the other nearby Sea Mist vessels with great care.

"Those ships are really annoying," a Sailor strolled up beside the short, stocky Captain Nixon and said: "Can we fire a few shells at them to say hello?"

"No, unless you want General Tyrian to stuff you into the engine room and churn you for twenty?four hours," Nixon said without even turning his head. "We are not here to fight the people of Frostholm. In the General's words, for now we stand on the same side as they do."

"Fine," the Sailor shrugged. "They're blocking the other side of Dagger Island and we're blocking this one. Not bad 'cooperation,' I guess. But if those guys lose their heads and really come too close, they can't blame us if our guns 'misfire,' right?"

"If they misfire, you'll be the first one we launch," Nixon glanced back at his subordinate, then turned his eyes again to the distant island. "Dagger Island… tch. I still remember standing guard on it back in the day."

"Back then it still had Boiling Gold to mine. There was even a town on the island," the Sailor sighed. "Ah, those good days are gone for good."

Nixon frowned, as if he wanted to say something more, but suddenly he seemed to hear a sound. His expression turned serious at once.

A strange buzzing sound… reached his ears.

"What's that noise?" The Sailor beside him reacted at once, his face tense. "Did those Frostholm ships make it?"

“I don’t know, but the Frostholm ships aren’t doing anything suspicious…” Nixon quickly raised his spyglass. “They don’t seem to know either… wait, Dagger Island is shaking!”

He jerked the spyglass down and stared in shock at the distant sea.

A hazy shroud of mist was rising from the direction of Dagger Island. The deep humming came from there, boring into his thoughts and churning his mind. He saw the island come alive. Blurred tendrils spread from its edges, rising and writhing within the mist, stirring the surrounding sea and fog again and again. The island itself slowly sank, while countless huge Shadows rose on its surface, looming in the fog like giants getting to their feet.

Nixon froze for a moment, then hurriedly raised his spyglass again, wanting a closer look at what was happening on the island.

Yet just as he was about to do so, a thunderous boom suddenly rang out from that mist?filled stretch of sea. It was followed at once by countless rapid explosions. Smoke billowed up over the island and blended with the surrounding sea mist. Flashes and pillars of fire shot into the sky, clear to see even without a spyglass.

Dagger Island had been detonated. Every installation on the island was blowing up, and every so?called “ultimate safety measure” pointed to the same answer: Protocol Twenty-Two, Nitroglycerin charges.

Nixon stared, dumbstruck, at the scene. It took him a moment to grasp what had happened, and then what he saw next once again went beyond his imagination.

Dagger Island was sinking, like a warship whose hull had been blown open, dropping fast amid the chain of explosions.

“The island is sinking?” came his subordinate’s shocked cry beside him. This Sailor, who had served on ships for more than half a century, had never seen such a sight. “The people of Frostholm… blew Dagger Island to the bottom? They can sink an entire island?!”

“Nonsense! There’s no such explosive in the world—how could an island be ‘blown’ to the bottom?!” Nixon barked on instinct, but the sight before him swallowed the rest of his words.

Dagger Island really was sinking, and the pace only grew faster. In the end it reached an unbelievable speed. One minute he could still see two?thirds of the island above the water. A minute later only a small hilltop remained. A few seconds after that… the island had vanished from the sea’s surface.

The thin mist faded. On the Frost Sea, there was no sign of Dagger Island anymore.

“Not even a whirlpool…”

Captain Nixon swallowed hard and muttered in disbelief.

The distant sea was still calm. In theory, an island sinking would create a terrifying maelstrom, big enough to swallow the greatest warships in the world. Yet in fact… no whirlpool appeared at all.

It was as if… the island had not sunk, but melted into the sea.

Chapter 363: Martha

“Smack!”

The papers in his hand slammed onto the desk. Lister sprang up from behind it—he almost jumped to his feet. The Harbor District Defense Commander stared wide?eyed at the subordinate in front of him: “Say that again?! What happened to Dagger Island?!”

“Dagger Island… Dagger Island has disappeared!” The soldier who had come to deliver the news stammered. Even as a well?trained Warrior, he could hardly control himself in this situation. “Just now, we saw a series of explosions on Dagger Island, likely the last people on the island blowing up the remaining facilities… After that, the fleet on patrol nearby watched with their own eyes as the island sank quickly and vanished from the sea’s surface…”

“The fleet wasn’t affected?” Lister frowned at once. Something felt wrong.

“No,” the soldier shook his head. “While Dagger Island was sinking, it hardly disturbed the surface of the sea. The report from the front says… it looked as if the island quietly melted into the water.”

Lister’s expression grew especially grim. He stayed silent for a few seconds, then looked up at the Gatekeeper still standing in the office: “Lady Agatha, in your knowledge, is there any known divine magic, sacred miracle, or supernatural item that can cause a phenomenon like this?”

“No,” Agatha shook her head without hesitation. “An Anomaly of this scale is already beyond the category of spells. It should be classed as a divine miracle—or some sort of Visions event.”

“…Whatever the case, we’re in deep trouble. The investigation hasn’t even begun. We still know nothing about what was really happening on Dagger Island, and now the whole island has vanished from the sea. City Hall will not like this news,” Lister said, brows tightly furrowed as he tapped the tabletop with his fingers. Then he seemed to think of something and snapped his head up to look at the soldier. “Right—how did the Sea Mist Fleet respond?”

“They’re still in their old positions and haven’t crossed the near?sea warning line,” the soldier answered at once. “But after Dagger Island disappeared, two of their fast boats briefly approached that stretch of sea. They stayed there for about ten minutes, then hurried back.”

“Sounds like they were observing the situation… It seems this caught them off guard too,” Lister said slowly. “Damn it. Looks like we really do have to talk to that Pirate Lord.”

“The Cathedral will act as well,” Agatha went on. “At this point, the plan to explore Dagger Island is meaningless. We will shift our strength to a full sweep inside the city. Our Guardians have already found leads on the Annihilators and several possible meeting sites. I will personally lead a team to deal with them.”

“I hope you gain something, Lady Gatekeeper,” Lister said, lifting his head to look at the black?robed priestess of the Goddess before him. “This matter is in a runaway state. We need help from the supernatural field more than ever, and the Cathedral’s investigation has already been moving far too slowly.”

“We will do everything we can.”

Agatha nodded lightly, then lifted the Gatekeeper’s cane and tapped it twice on the floor. With the sound of the cane striking the boards, her figure suddenly turned into a swirl of Ashen Wind, which coiled once and sank into a pale fissure that opened out of thin air on the floor.

Lister watched the place where Agatha had vanished. Only after the fissure closed did he sigh and drop heavily back into his chair. At the same time he told the soldier: “Go out and close the door.”

Next, he had to write an express dispatch to City Hall as quickly as possible, to try his best to explain the strange madness that had taken place right on the city’s doorstep.

…

At the harbor, the city’s staff were using mental guidance to bring ships to the docks. Men and women in black or blue uniforms stood on the concrete piers, each busy with their own tasks in the icy wind. They hardly spoke to one another, silent and absorbed in their work.

A little farther away, several other ships lay moored. They seemed to have been here for some time. Only a few people moved about on their decks. Their loading and resupply work had already finished; they were likely waiting for the next round of departure paperwork.

Farther still, one could see the main road leading into the urban district. The wide street stretched toward the tall buildings in the distance. The gas lamps lining the road had not yet been lit, but because it was nearly evening, there were not many people in sight. Only a few carriages hurried along the darkening street.

Lawrence stood at the edge of the deck, gazing at the city’s buildings in the distance.

This was not his first time in Frostholm, but it had been many years since his last visit. The long gap, and the way memory faded with age, left him unable to recall what the city used to look like. Now, as he stared at the distant spires and towers standing in the dusk, he felt only a deep sense of unfamiliarity.

Still, the White Oak had at last docked safely in this city?state. The weather had been especially bad all along the way, but in the end they had not run into any storm or other disaster.

Footsteps came from behind him. The old captain turned and saw his First Mate.

“The inspection is almost over,” the First Mate said. “Everyone asked me to check if we can go into the city today. After this whole trip, they’re sick of being stuck on the ship.”

Lawrence looked up at the sky. The World’s Wound had not yet appeared, but the last glow of daylight was already fading away. He frowned and shook his head: “It’s too late. After nightfall there’s a curfew in the city. There’s nowhere worth going if you land now. Everyone stay on the ship and behave yourselves. In a while I’ll go to The Harbor’s administration office and handle the remaining paperwork. Tomorrow morning the others can come ashore.”

“All right, I’ll pass that on,” the First Mate said with a smile, then casually asked: “But you’re going alone? Want me to send a couple of people with you?”

“No need. I can already see The Harbor’s office door—it’s right by the pier,” Lawrence waved a hand and pointed toward a light not far on shore. “Once The Harbor inspectors leave, check every hold on the ship again, especially the lower deck that stores the sacred relic and the sealed vaults. Make sure no careless fool has tampered with the safeguards.”

“Yes, Captain.”

The First Mate left. Lawrence drew a shallow breath of the night air. The biting wind from the Northern Seas poured into his lungs and made him shiver awake.

The old captain shook his head, grumbling a little about the awful weather here, then walked toward the nearby stairs.

A figure stood at the top of the stairs, arms folded, watching Lawrence calmly from within the crisscross of dim lights.

Lawrence hesitated and stopped. After studying her for a moment, he spoke, unsure: “…Martha? Why are you here too?”

“If I were you, I wouldn’t be asking questions right now. I’d be leaving at once,” the female mariner said. She folded her arms and turned her gaze on the old captain, her tone tinged with helplessness. “Your guard has slipped, Lawrence.”

“Martha, I…” Lawrence stepped forward half a pace without thinking. He faintly felt something was wrong, but countless words stuck in his throat. He could only reach out to her clumsily. “I’ve missed you a bit… How have you been lately?”

Martha did not answer him. The female mariner only gave him a calm look, her gaze seeming to focus on somewhere far beyond him. In the soft sea wind and the sound of gentle waves, she slowly began to hum:

“Hoist the sails, hoist the sails, the sailor who left home keeps moving on…

“In the wind and waves, in the noise, only a single board stands between us and death.

“Reef the jibs, spread the mainsail, cast off the ropes, hold tight to the rail—we have come to the middle of the sea…”

Martha’s voice grew lower and lower until she finally stopped. Her eyes refocused on Lawrence, and in a voice that sounded almost like she was talking to herself she said softly: “Lawrence, be careful. You have come to the middle of the sea.”

Lawrence drew in a sharp breath. The cold air jolted his mind awake. At once he seemed to remember something. He grabbed at his chest and fumbled in his pocket, fast but clumsy.

Martha took a step and slowly walked toward him.

“Lawrence, how did you get so old?” The female mariner reached out her hand. Her hoarse voice held a trace of gentleness. She still looked young. Though her face carried a few marks left by life at sea, she was just as beautiful as in Lawrence’s memory. “It’s been many years, hasn’t it? You’re not young anymore… and neither am I…”

“Martha…” Lawrence’s throat worked. He felt his fingers were about to touch the little bottle, yet he missed it again and again.

He could almost smell Martha’s scent—the familiar trace of lemon. It had always been her favorite fragrance.

His hand found the little bottle.

“Martha…”

He took it out and held it in his hand, but his feet felt rooted to the deck. He watched the woman from his memories reach out to him, just like in his countless dreams. That hand carried a familiar warmth as it slowly brushed his hair. He saw the woman from his memories smile, as if she meant to tell him about all the longing of their years apart…

“Martha, I’m sorry.”

Lawrence clenched the vial and poured the bitter medicine into his mouth.

Martha vanished.

Chapter 364: Sneaking Away

Martha disappeared, as if she had never existed in the first place.

Yet the warm touch still lingered at his temple, and the faint lemon scent still hung around his nose. It seemed she had never come, yet also had never left.

Lawrence felt his fingers tremble. He lowered his head. It took several tries for him to screw the tiny cap back onto the bottle. Then he spent a long time putting it back into the inner pocket of his coat. His heart pounded wildly. Even when he faced a great storm, his heart had never beaten like this.

Reason came late, like waking from a long dream. He realized that just now he had brushed past madness and had almost sunk into a lasting state of delusion. For a captain who had drifted on the Boundless Sea for most of his life, once he fell into such a state, he would never regain his sanity. Yet at this moment he felt neither relief at having survived nor fear from facing that madness.

He only felt a distant sadness and regret.

And this distant sadness and regret were a warning. They meant that deep in his heart he no longer resisted the “madness” itself.

Lawrence drew in a deep breath and tried to throw all those thoughts that tangled around his mind out of his head. He glanced to the side. The White Oak lay under his feet, and a whole ship of people were waiting for him to take them back to Pland.

This was not the time to fall into madness.

The old captain sighed and said: “I really should retire…” He slowly started toward the stairs in front of him. But after only a few steps, he suddenly stopped, his face turning a bit grim.

He remembered the scene from when “Martha” had appeared just now. He knew such “memories” were dangerous and might make her appear again, yet he could not help thinking about them. He had suddenly realized that some of the things “Martha” had said to him were very hard to ignore:

In his memory, Martha’s voice sounded again: “Lawrence, be careful. You have come to the middle of the sea…”

Her voice went on: “If I were you, I would not have any extra questions now. I would leave here at once… Your guard is down…”

Lawrence repeated these two sentences in his heart without thinking. He knew very well that what had just happened was only a hallucination born from broken memories and shaken perception. Even so, he could not help taking those two sentences as some kind of warning. Martha might not exist, but had he sensed some danger deep in his intuition? Were these two sentences his own subconscious trying to warn him?

The old captain looked around and carefully checked the White Oak again. Everything he saw looked normal. Then he lifted his head and looked at the nearby city-state of Frostholm.

Frostholm also looked normal. The nearby Harbor district seemed quiet and peaceful. Lights had already begun to shine in the city blocks not far away. Farther out, a high sea cliff looked down over the ocean, its outline hard and strong under the dim sky.

But a faint sense of wrongness rose in him, unstoppable like a tide climbing in his heart. With that feeling came a soft sound of waves by his ear. It overlapped with the real waves around the White Oak. At first he did not tell them apart, but soon he realized that this sound rang directly inside his mind.

The sound of waves… was it a warning? Was the blessing of the storm Goddess Gamona taking effect?!

Lawrence's eyes hardened. He at once gave up the idea of going ashore and spun around, rushing toward the bridge. The cold night wind howled past his ears, cutting at his nerves like a blade.

The First Mate on duty at the bridge saw Lawrence appear so suddenly and looked shocked. He rose from his chair, hurried over, and said: "Captain? Weren't you going ashore…"

Lawrence spoke quickly: "The situation has changed. I feel something is very wrong… How long have we been docked here? Has anyone slipped ashore?"

The First Mate answered at once: "No. You already ordered everyone to stay on the ship. They have all been behaving. Also, we have been docked here for several hours."

Lawrence nodded quickly: "Good, no one went ashore. Fire up the steam core. We are leaving this Harbor."

The First Mate froze for a moment and said: "Huh… what? Leave this Harbor? We just…"

Lawrence cut him off: "Something is wrong with this place. I can't explain it, but I have a very bad feeling. Remember when the Stargazing Room had a problem earlier? And before that, when we could not contact Frostholm? From that time on, everyone's guard has been dropping. Something… is affecting all of us."

He spoke fast, and at the same time he knew how abnormal his order was. Aside from the faint wrong feeling in his gut, he had no proof that his command was right. The White Oak had just finished a long voyage. Both the crew and the machinery needed repairs and rest. In such a situation, his order to leave port was almost nonsense.

Besides, leaving port had to be coordinated with the Harbor authorities. Reigniting the steam core without reporting it was a serious violation. He would have to bear the consequences of his decision.

But the fierce sense of alarm thumped in his heart, and the sound of waves in his mind grew louder and louder. The blessing of Gamona warned him not to keep in contact with the Harbor, not even to say a single extra word.

The First Mate fixed his gaze on the captain in front of him. After nearly half a minute, he suddenly stood straight and said loudly: “Yes, Captain!”

On a ship, the captain’s word was law.

A captain who lost his mind could take the whole crew to their grave. But with much higher odds, an experienced captain could save everyone on board from danger.

The order quickly spread through the ship. The confused sailors were pushed to move, and soon their trained reflexes had them ready to set sail again.

Fresh Boiling Gold catalyst was inserted into the steam core. A deep mechanical vibration woke in the depths of the White Oak. The sailors quietly loosened the mooring lines along the rail and pulled the gangplank back onto the deck. Lawrence stood on the bridge, watching the movements on the pier through the wide glass windows.

Some figures moved about on the pier. Under the dim light of the gas lamps, their shapes looked vague and unreal. A few loading vehicles drove past a little farther away, leaving long, heavy shadows on the road.

They seemed not to notice at all that a ship had reignited its steam core in the darkness, and nothing suddenly appeared to block the White Oak as it quietly prepared to leave.

Things were already better than he had imagined. In Lawrence's worst fears, he had even worried that at the very moment the steam core flared back to life, hundreds or thousands of sea monster tentacles would suddenly rise from the waters around them and drag the White Oak straight under.

Lawrence quickly spoke to the First Mate beside him: "Keep the lights under control. Do not sound the steam whistle." He stepped up to the helm and took the wheel with his own hands. "I will steer myself. Keep the boiler at high pressure and be ready to overload at any time."

The First Mate answered: "Yes, Captain."

Though doubts still lay in their hearts, everyone on the ship carried out the old captain's orders without hesitation. Lawrence could feel the steel giant under his feet slowly starting to move.

The whole ship kept its lights under strict control. The propellers below the water began to turn. The White Oak slowly pulled away from the Harbor, and the churning of the water grew louder. Everyone grew tense, and every gaze turned toward the city-state beside them, now wrapped in night.

Lawrence felt sweat in his palms.

But the city showed no sign of any Anomaly. Even though the White Oak's movements could no longer be hidden, no one came to check on them.

He glanced at the radio console beside him. The telegraph machine was as silent as death.

In theory, the Harbor authority should have sent an urgent message by now. The Harbor official on duty would be demanding to know why the White Oak was leaving port so suddenly. But nothing happened.

This instead strengthened Lawrence's resolve and made him believe his judgment was right.

There really was something wrong with this place!

The power of the steam core rose a level. The propellers spun faster and faster. The White Oak left the dock area at growing speed. Open sea appeared in front of the bridge, the surface glittering with faint waves of light.

Lawrence took a deep breath and gripped the wheel hard: "Bring her to full speed!"

…

A gust of Ashen Wind swept across the courtyard and took shape in the front hall of the great Cathedral. Agatha stepped out of the Ashen Wind. She hurried through the porch and the main hall and came to the "Meditation Hall" where the city-state's Bishop Ivan stayed.

The statue of the God of Death Bartok stood quietly at the far end of the hall. A dark coffin lay on the platform at the statue's feet, its lid standing open. Bishop Ivan, who usually rested in that coffin, stood beside it now and looked up toward Agatha.

This Bishop looked like a mummy, his whole body wrapped in bandages with only one eye showing. Today he wore a black robe edged with gold and held a tin staff in his hand. As Agatha came closer, he spoke first: "I have already heard about what happened on Dagger Island."

Agatha nodded and said: "I can see you plan to chair the meeting yourself. Can your body handle it?"

Bishop Ivan raised his hand. Pale gray mist seemed to drift slowly from the gaps in his bandages.

He said: “As long as either the body or the will can hold on, that is enough.”

Chapter 365: The Child Sharing a Secret

Agatha knew that Bishop Ivan's life had been near its end many years ago. Under those tight bandages, almost no flesh-and-blood body remained. What kept him standing here, aside from the sacred miracles bestowed by Bartok, was only a stubborn soul.

Few people knew what had really happened to this Bishop's body. Even Agatha, as a Gatekeeper, only knew that it came from an "accident" many, many years ago. Bishop Ivan never spoke about the truth of that "accident", not even in front of her.

Naturally, Agatha did not take the initiative to touch this secret.

Bishop Ivan's mood was clearly heavy. He stayed silent for a long time before suddenly saying: "We are facing a crisis."

Agatha nodded: "Yes, Bishop Ivan. I will do my best to find the truth and break the plots of those Annihilators."

But Bishop Ivan shook his head: "No, you do not understand. The 'truth' of this crisis may already lie beyond our understanding and imagination, Agatha. The activities of those cultists may be one part of this crisis, but they are not all of it. I have a feeling…"

Agatha frowned slightly: "A feeling?"

"It is a similar air. It is like fifty years ago… Before that chaos broke out, the whole city was filled with a mood very close to today," Bishop Ivan said slowly. “The city-state looked normal on the surface, yet strange details showed everywhere. It was as if we were suddenly living inside a dream where truth and lies were hard to tell apart. From time to time we would glimpse horrible scenes at the edge of that dream, yet the sad minds of Mortals refused to understand any of it. That kept us from seeing the reality right in front of us… Do you feel that? As if… distortion is right before our eyes, and we keep them shut.”

“I do not understand…” Agatha said, a bit unsure. “Do you mean cognitive interference? That this interference has already affected our judgment?”

Bishop Ivan did not answer her. After several seconds of silence, he suddenly brought up a topic that seemed unrelated: “Agatha, have I ever told you about the ‘last Queen’s Guard Corps’ from fifty years ago? Have I ever told you about the ‘Second Waterway’ deep under the city-state?”

“Second Waterway?” Agatha paused, and some information rose in her mind. “I know a bit about it. It was part of a huge underground system the Frostholm Queen built for the city-state. But when the Queen’s era ended, that unfinished project was abandoned. Now, because of heavy cave-ins and a lack of funds, it still lies abandoned down there. Most people do not even know it exists.”

“Yes, abandoned,” Bishop Ivan said with a shake of his head. “Only a Gatekeeper like you, or an old relic like me, still knows about it.”

“And what about the ‘last Queen’s Guard Corps’?” Agatha asked. “Why did you suddenly bring that up?”

“The last Queen’s Guard Corps was the unit that refused to surrender even after the rebels broke into the Queen’s palace. They used the city’s underground systems to fight on to the end,” Bishop Ivan said in a low voice, as if sunk in memory. “Their final stand was at the entrance to the Second Waterway. After that, they blew up all the connecting shafts and were buried underground. The reason I mention this today… is that I suddenly remembered a rumor from that time."

Agatha's expression grew serious at once: "A rumor?"

"It is said that when the shafts were blown up, the soldiers who were attacking underground suddenly heard strange sounds from deep below. In the ground that had already fully collapsed, the last Queen's Guard Corps suddenly began to shout, as if charging at someone," Bishop Ivan recalled slowly. "For a long time after that, people often reported hearing shouts and charges from deep under the city. In the end, a rumor took shape. It said the 'last Queen's Guard Corps' had turned into a mutated legion in the depths. Every day they fought in the dark with boiling rage in their hearts. They were only waiting for the moment when the New Order, built by traitors, became most fragile. Then they would pour out from underground and settle the old accounts…"

Agatha's face grew grim: "The New Order's most fragile moment… Just now you said we are facing a crisis beyond understanding, and the city feels like it did fifty years ago. Do you mean this is the most fragile moment? That legendary Queen's Guard Corps will pour out from underground? Do you think that rumor is true?"

"I do not believe that rumor. The Queen's Guard Corps was wiped out long ago. I saw it with my own eyes. Even if…" Bishop Ivan stopped for a moment, as if something had come to mind, then shook his head. "Even if a few survivors did live for a time in the Second Waterway back then, they could not have lived to this day. A handful of living descendants would not be able to shake the rule of the city-state, even in the crisis we face now."

Agatha did not speak for a moment. After more than ten seconds of silence, she suddenly said: "The legend of the 'last Queen's Guard Corps' may be false. But it is true that there are large uncontrolled zones under Frostholm.

What you fear is not the Guard Corps that vanished fifty years ago, but something else hiding in the Second Waterway?”

“We have been searching the whole city for a long time. We have caught quite a few Annihilators, but they are all small fry, and most do not have strong hiding skills,” Bishop Ivan said with a nod. “There is no way they alone could have created so many ‘replicas’, so much ‘elements’ and ‘corruption’ in the city, much less caused the disturbance on Dagger Island. Now it seems the ones we caught are more like stragglers leaking out of a large nest. By now, most parts of the city have been searched more than once. If there is any place we have not checked… it can only be the depths underground.”

Agatha thought for a moment and then said, not very sure: “But records say that most sections of the Second Waterway have collapsed badly. The tunnels are cut off from each other and form a dead web of passages. On top of that, there are toxic ‘corruption’ substances and wide areas of darkness. It should be impossible to live down there. Annihilators are still living people. Aside from the few priests who are turning themselves into Abyssal Demons, most of them still need the normal living conditions of Humans… How could they stay hidden in such a place for long?”

“We should at least look,” Bishop Ivan said slowly. “Start with the collapse points around the Boiling Gold mines.”

Agatha thought it over and nodded slightly: “Then we will need City Hall to cooperate. Protective gear, underground machines, professional engineers… the great Cathedral does not have these things in stock.”

“I will talk to them,” Bishop Ivan said with a nod. “Make a list of the people and equipment you need. I can find a way to get them for you.”

“All right. I will give you the list before noon,” Agatha said without holding back. “Before the people and supplies are in place, I need to have a good ‘talk’ with the Annihilators we have already caught and see if they can cough up anything useful…”

…

As night faded and the sky grew lighter, Vision 001 began to rise from the edge of the city-state. The splendid Sun Wheel climbed into the sky bit by bit. The double rune rings swept over the tall spires and roofs. sunlight brought warmth and drove away the cold that had built up through the night.

At the gate of Cemetery No. 3, the heavy carved iron gate creaked open. As it swung, it swept the snow on the ground and left two arcs like spread wings. The Old Caretaker, wrapped in a worn coat, stood in front of the open gate. He took a deep breath and looked at the now clear sky.

The sky was clear, but for some reason even this bright morning did not calm the restlessness in his heart. The Old Caretaker looked toward the city streets. The distant sound of carts and horses reached his ears, faint yet noisy, like the uneasy wind from last night.

Even the clear sky now looked almost fake to him.

He muttered a few complaints under his breath, then looked toward the slope before the cemetery.

The wrinkles on the old man’s face relaxed a little. But the next second, they all twisted back again, and his brow furrowed tight.

He had seen a small figure appear on the slope, trudging up toward him with great effort and energy. When the figure noticed his gaze, it even stopped on purpose and waved happily in his direction.

The Old Caretaker’s face went stiff.

He waited for her to come closer. Only when Annie began brushing the snow from her pants and boots did he speak, looking displeased: “You again. I had a whole quiet day yesterday and thought you were finally going to stay home for once. And now here you are again?”

Annie stuck out her tongue: “I wanted to come yesterday too, but Mother said there was too much snow on the road. She said we had to wait until the snowplows cleared the main street before going out…”

She did not wait for the old man to answer. She took out a small bag with practiced ease and held it out: “Biscuits!”

“…I eat biscuits every day now,” the old man said. He glanced at what she offered, his eyelid twitching, but still reached out to take it. “Thank Lady Belloni for me.”

Annie laughed happily.

The Old Caretaker gave the girl a sideways look: “Anything else? The cemetery is not open for visits today.”

“Nothing. I just want to talk to you,” Annie said with a grin. “Do you know? We have some new guests staying in our house. Guess who they are?”

A twelve-year-old child was really not good at holding back a secret.

“I am not interested,” the Old Caretaker said, feeling baffled. He waved his hand impatiently. “The house is yours. You can rent it to whoever you want. What does that have to do with me?”

“It is that tall uncle wrapped in lots of bandages and dressed in black!” Annie did not mind the old man’s answer. Her smile grew even brighter, and her tone held a strange pride. “The one who was at the cemetery gate last time… Grandpa Caretaker, are you all right?”

Chapter 366: A Case

Annie left in high spirits. She looked as if she did not suspect anything at all – in the end, Annie was only a small child.

The Old Caretaker stood at the cemetery gate for a long time, staring in the direction Annie had gone. Only after who-knew-how-long did he suddenly shiver and come back to himself. His fingers trembled slightly as he reached to the pocket on his chest, took out a vial of medicine, and poured it into his mouth.

He felt much better.

“This matter is far too strange… I must report to the Cathedral at once… God of Death above… this matter is far too strange…”

The old man muttered under his breath, then turned and hurried toward the Warden’s hut. After he went inside and shut the door, he went straight to the old, ordinary-looking desk beside the bed. When he opened a hinged panel on the desktop, an intricate set of pipes and valves appeared underneath, along with buttons and levers.

Several metal capsule chambers lay quietly in a compartment beside the pipes.

The old man took a sheet of stationery from the desk drawer, sat down, picked up the fountain pen at hand, and began to write a report at great speed. Then he rolled the report up and stuffed it into a Metal Capsule Cartridge. After that, he opened a section of pipe hidden in the desk, and set the capsule into a slot.

“May Bartok bless this pipeline and the air rushing through it… may the valves run smoothly, without jamming, losing pressure, or exploding – and may the sorting and dispatch center’s Sorting Engine make no mistake.”

The old man finished this brief benediction, then pressed a button beside the pneumatic tube line. When the green light inside the hidden compartment lit up, he pulled the lever beside the button.

A strange gurgling sound came from deep inside the pipes, like air being blocked. But the sound faded quickly. The normal hissing of the pneumatic tube line, and the faint whoosh of the capsule racing along inside, followed right after.

The old man glanced at the pipe with some concern and muttered: “… surely it’s not because the letter mentioned a Higher Being and that somehow affected the machine…”

After a while, two green lights lit up, showing that the express dispatch had reached the higher sorting center. Only then did the Old Caretaker finally relax and close the cover of the hidden compartment.

…

Alice walked down the street with a large paper bag in her arms, looking curiously at the buildings around her. She studied this city that was completely different from Pland, and watched how people here lived.

In the paper bag were the things she had just bought from the corner shop – some vegetables, eggs, a block of rock-hard frozen butter, and two pieces of mutton. They were the ingredients for today’s lunch.

Alice could already go out and buy things on her own. She was not very skilled, and sometimes she got the change wrong, but she was working hard to learn all of this – she made progress every day, even if it was not much.

She lowered her head a little. One arm held the paper bag, and with her other hand she felt inside and pulled out a slip of paper to check what was written there.

Crooked letters covered the slip. It was today's shopping list. Part of it was written in words she already knew how to read and write. The rest was made up of simple little drawings. She had written the list herself, and it had taken a lot of effort.

She planned her own menu for each day, decided what ingredients she needed, wrote her own shopping list, and went to the shop herself. She tried to calculate the change correctly, and tried to get home on time. If she managed all that, the captain would be pleased.

Alice would be pleased too.

After making sure the list and the contents of the bag matched, the Doll put the slip away, satisfied, and went on toward their temporary lodgings on Oak Street.

But when she was only halfway there, a burst of commotion from a street corner suddenly drew her attention.

She raised her head toward the noise and saw a dozen or so people gathered beside an old-looking residential building. Some of them were pointing up at the upper floors. Everyone was talking at once, and she caught words like "that woman is crazy", "poor thing", and "even the Church is alarmed".

Alice could not help slowing her steps, slower and slower, until she finally stopped, staring toward that direction with great hesitation.

That was… a lively scene. The captain had said she must not rush into lively crowds, because if her head fell off in a place full of people, the commotion would be far too big.

But things over there really did look interesting. And what they were talking about… also sounded like something the captain would be interested in.

Alice struggled with herself, and, while struggling, she shuffled a little closer. Then a little closer again.

[I'll just go see what's going on… I'm helping the captain collect information… this isn't idly joining a crowd, this is very serious crowd-joining…]

Alice used all her wisdom to talk herself into it, and she succeeded.

One hand pressed on her head and the other held the paper bag. The Doll soon squeezed in beside the gathered crowd and joined them in looking up at the residential building in front of them.

Unlike the small two-story house the captain had rented, this building was even older and more cramped. The narrow windows and the gas pipes clinging to the outside wall looked crowded and messy. It seemed that many separate tenants lived inside this structure.

The people around her were all talking at once. Alice listened for a long time and still did not understand what was going on, so she carefully tapped the shoulder of the person next to her and asked very politely: "Excuse me… what happened here?"

The person beside her jumped in fright. But when he saw the speaker was only a veiled young lady, he relaxed, pointed up, and said: "A woman went crazy. She insists she killed her own husband, and she even tried to strangle her own child… first the Constables were alarmed, and now even people from the Church are here. I think this is no small matter."

As soon as he finished, another person next to them spoke up: "Since even the Church is here… maybe it really is something not very good?"

“…Let’s hope nothing major happens,” a woman in the crowd muttered. “I live right below them. If something really happens, we’ll have nowhere to go…”

“No matter what it is, we should go to the Cathedral today and have a priest perform an exorcism. It’s always better to be careful.”

The crowd started talking over each other again, and soon the topic drifted back into things Alice could not understand. Her mind wandered among the noisy voices, and her gaze slowly drifted up into the air.

Weightless strands floated in her vision. More thin threads stretched out from the nearby residential building, drifting in the air like hair in the wind, quietly stirring the sky.

Alice suddenly blinked.

She had just noticed that some of the lines floating above the city looked especially unreal and transparent. They even flickered like electric lamps with a bad connection.

…

A faint smell of mildew hung in the old residential building. Somewhere in the worn-out pipe system there was a small leak, and the sound of dripping water reached the ears from time to time. Black-clad Guardians, holding Gatekeeper’s canes and consecrated lanterns, crowded into the living room and made the already narrow space feel even more cramped.

A long-haired woman with tangled hair curled up in the corner of the sofa like a frightened animal. She lowered her head and sometimes muttered unclear sentences.

Two Guardians stood beside her, closely watching over this woman whose mind had lost its balance.

The Guardians were searching the house for lingering clues. They had already been working here for two hours.

Just then, a gust of Ashen Wind blew down the corridor, passed through the open front door, and spun into the living room.

The Guardians all stopped what they were doing and bowed to the gray-white whirlwind.

Agatha stepped out of the vortex and into the room. Her gaze swept across the living room.

“How is the situation now?” She lifted her head and looked toward the highest-ranking Guardian at the scene.

The captain of the Guardians was a sharp-looking woman with black, ear-length hair. Faced with the Gatekeeper’s question, she stepped forward at once and said: “We collected a small amount of ‘mud’ from the floor in the washroom. We have confirmed that it matches the samples we collected before.”

“elements…” Agatha said softly, then frowned. “A small amount? How much? Is that all?”

“About one test tube,” the short-haired captain said, lifting her hand to show the rough amount. “That is all of it. We have searched the whole building from top to bottom. Only a little remained on the washroom floor.”

Agatha fell silent for a moment, then turned her head to look at the long-haired woman curled in the corner of the sofa.

“She is the one involved?”

“Yes,” the Squad Captain said with a nod. “She rents this place. We checked her history. Her background is clean and she has no criminal record. She works as an assistant accountant at an office nearby. Her husband used to work in the Boiling Gold Mine. Records show he died in a mining accident three years ago.”

Boiling Gold Mine… a mining accident…

Maybe because of recent events, those words drew Agatha’s notice at once. She steadied herself, then walked over to the woman who was still muttering on the sofa.

“Lady – I am the city-state’s Gatekeeper. You are safe now,” Agatha said in a calm, deep voice, quietly calling on her power to soothe the mind. “Tell me, what exactly happened?”

The long-haired woman stopped trembling when she heard the voice. She mumbled something under her breath, then suddenly lifted her head.

A pair of bloodshot eyes, still full of fear and madness, locked onto Agatha.

“He came back, he came back… I killed him, I killed that monster… in the bathroom! It melted in the bathroom!”

Chapter 367: The Shelter Left Behind

Those eyes were bloodshot, and inside them madness and terror surged, impossible to fully suppress. Even though the Gatekeeper's words had soothed the woman's mind and pulled her back from the edge of collapse, they could not smooth away the Shadows fear had left in her thoughts.

Agatha had seen that kind of gaze many times. She simply met it calmly, using her own eyes to help the woman settle a little more before she spoke: "The 'he' you just mentioned – you mean your husband, do you not? He returned home again. But you know he died several years ago."

The woman's shoulders shook hard. She lowered her head and clutched her own hair, as if she did not dare look Agatha in the face. She only repeated over and over: "He came back… he came back… but I knew it wasn't him…"

"How did you kill 'it'?" Agatha frowned slightly. "Do you still remember the details?"

As she spoke, she reached into her coat and took out a small vial of potion. She opened the cap with one hand, and a scent that calmed the mind slowly spread out, filling the air around them.

The Gatekeeper's potion began to work. The long-haired woman's breathing grew much steadier. She raised her head a little and peered out through strands of her hair. Her voice was very low: "I… I hit the back of that thing's head with a hammer from behind, and then it fell down. But even though the back of its head caved in so much, it didn't die. It struggled and got up again. I kicked it farther inside and then shut the bathroom door… it knocked on the door and let out horrible shouts. It was early in the morning. It screamed for ten minutes before it stopped…"

The woman fell silent, then took a few seconds to steady herself before she went on: "Later, I quietly opened a crack in the bathroom door… and that thing was gone…"

Agatha nodded lightly. In her mind, she pieced together what had happened while she asked her next question: "Then how did 'it' appear? Do you remember how he 'came back'?"

"I… I don't know," the woman said, shaking her head in fright. "He… it suddenly appeared at home. The front door was locked, but I heard sounds in the living room. I came out from the bedroom and saw that thing… it was wearing the clothes my husband had on when he was buried, walking back and forth in the living room. There was a sound in its body, like rotting slime moving around…"

Agatha's expression grew serious. She turned her head, and before she could even speak, a Guardian nearby reported: "We have already checked the entrances to the house. None of the doors or windows show any sign of forced entry, and every window is locked from the inside."

The doors and windows were sealed. The locks were untouched. The replica had simply appeared in the resident's home.

Compared with open "invasion" or "attack", this kind of thing that seemed to appear from thin air made Agatha even more alert.

And today's case had more to worry about than that.

Agatha lowered her head and looked at the woman on the sofa again.

She remembered the cases she had handled in the days before this one, especially the one at 42 Fireplace Street – the folklore Scholar who studied the return of the dead, and the female apprentice who had suffered severe cognitive corruption without even realising it. In such classic cases, the survivors had been completely unable to tell that the “replica” in front of them was not the real person.

But this woman had seen through it.

She had not been affected by cognitive corruption?

“Lady,” Agatha said at last, choosing her words with care, “how did you realize that ‘monster’ was not your husband?”

“Do you even need to ask? My husband… he died years ago. That thing was wrong in every way. How could it be my husband?” The woman grew excited. “Besides… besides, that thing walked toward my child… my child. He pointed at that monster and called it dad. He… he was being controlled by that monster. It must have controlled my child. He…”

“You believed your child was being controlled by a monster, so you grabbed him by the neck?” Agatha’s brow drew together again. “Do you understand that at the time you…”

“I didn’t grab his neck! I was just trying to pull him back, I didn’t grab him!”

The woman became completely agitated. She even jumped up from the sofa as if she were about to pounce at the Gatekeeper. The blood in her eyes flooded back, and the same fear and madness returned so strongly that her reason seemed to vanish. The Guardians nearby reacted at once and moved to restrain the poor woman who had lost her sanity, but Agatha was faster.

The Gatekeeper lifted her Gatekeeper’s cane and lightly tapped the woman’s forehead.

The woman fell asleep on the spot.

“She is terrified,” the black-haired captain said, shaking her head. “For an ordinary person, something like this really is…”

“No. It isn’t simple fright. It is another form of sanity corruption. She is in a temporary state of madness and has only kept the most basic ability to talk,” Agatha said, still shaking her head. Her brow remained tightly furrowed. “She has not been affected by cognitive and memory interference. We do not yet know the exact reason, but she clearly saw the true nature of that ‘replica’. For an ordinary person, ‘seeing the truth’ itself is a kind of damage.”

As she spoke, she raised her head and looked around this small dwelling.

“Where is the child?”

“He has been taken to a safe place for now,” the captain replied. “He was badly frightened and also suffered brief suffocation. He may not be able to answer questions.”

“Good,” Agatha said. “Keep the mother and child apart for the time being. Make sure they are under proper watch and get mental support, especially the child. Comfort him. If either of them remembers any useful information, report to me at once.”

“Yes.”

Agatha nodded, then walked through the living room into the small washroom that also served as a bathroom.

Marks left by the Guardians’ forensic work were still visible on the floor near the shower head.

The replica had once been locked in this bathroom. In the end, though, it had left behind less than a single test tube of “sample”.

That was very strange.

replicas might be mysterious in nature and their origins might be unknown, but at least one thing was clear: they were made of a certain amount of physical matter. Even if they broke apart, that material would not simply vanish into nothing.

Agatha frowned and paced twice around the cramped washroom. Suddenly she stopped, her gaze fixed on one spot.

In the corner, at the opening of a rusted drainpipe.

She moved quickly to the drain, tapped the cast-iron grate with the tip of her tin Gatekeeper's cane, and stared down into the dark hole.

The darkness inside the pipe had no visible end, as if it buried all truths.

"…No way… damn it."

Agatha drew in a sharp breath. She had just realized a possibility, and that possibility made her hands and feet go cold.

"Evacuate this building. Move all residents to the Cathedral in this district and to the public shelters nearby," she said as she hurried back into the living room, speaking at great speed. "Contact the district municipal office. Close off this building… no, close all secondary pipelines connected to this building, including both sewage and water lines. Send a team immediately to the nearest sewage treatment plant to check the settling tanks and filters."

The Squad Captain was startled by this string of orders, but she did not ask any questions. Her training to obey orders took over at once, and she snapped to attention: "Yes, Lady Gatekeeper!"

After finishing her orders, Agatha walked back to the sofa where the sleeping woman lay.

Why had this woman not been affected by cognitive and memory interference, and instead seen the truth of the “replica”?

Even now, Agatha cared very much about this question.

At that moment, a Guardian who had been searching other rooms suddenly ran into the living room, holding something in both hands.

“Lady Gatekeeper! We found this!”

Agatha turned at once. She saw that the Guardian was holding a small plaster statue that looked quite old.

It was a profile bust of the Frostholm Queen.

“A statue of the mad Queen?” another Guardian whispered at once. “I did not expect to see one here.”

Agatha’s expression grew solemn. She stepped forward and took the bust, which was a little over ten centimeters tall, then carefully examined the details.

“It is a genuine piece from back then. There is a special anti-counterfeit mark on the base,” she said after a brief check, then raised her head. “Where was this placed?”

“In a hidden compartment at the back of a closet,” the Guardian who had found it reported at once. “We also found coins from the Queen’s era and a commemorative album. It seems someone here is still secretly remembering the Frostholm Queen.”

Agatha did not speak for a while. She only stared at the plaster bust in her hands.

Frostholm Queen… even half a century later, there were still citizens in the city-state who secretly remembered the Queen. That fact itself did not surprise her.

That had been a glorious age, and she had been a great Queen. Fifty short years were not enough to erase every trace of the Queen's era from the city-state. Some old people who had lived through that time, and their children and grandchildren, were still deeply marked by it.

There were, here and there among the people, a few who still supported the Queen. Fifty years ago, such secret acts of remembrance would have been enough to earn a hanging. Today, however, the bans in this area had grown much looser. During her years as Gatekeeper, Agatha had heard of such things more than once.

In most cases, when it was only a private "collection of memorial items", today's Guardians and Constables would not pursue it too harshly. Sometimes they even pretended not to see, or only gave a verbal warning.

This family had only collected a bust of the Queen, a few coins, and an album. That alone was not anything serious.

But when she linked it to the strange event that had just taken place in this home, Agatha could not help thinking more deeply.

In this case, the person involved had not been affected by cognitive interference. Instead, she had seen through the truth of the "replica". Could it be… connected to these Queen relics left in this house?

Chapter 368: Chance Encounter and Reunion

Agatha checked the hidden compartment that held the Queen's profile statue. It was just as her subordinate had reported—it was only a private spot for secretly commemorating the Frostholm Queen, with no trace of any supernatural power left behind.

She looked at the things that had been taken out: the plaster statue, the commemorative coins, and the booklet.

Fifty years ago, this would have been worth a noose.

But that terrifying era that kept everyone's nerves taut had already passed. The Frostholm authorities now had to think about the city-state's long-term stability and their own image of fairness. They could not launch a big purge just because of secret public acts of remembrance. These harmless commemorations usually only earned a warning now, at most a fine.

And even warnings and fines were matters for the constables—the secular regulations and laws were not the Cathedral's responsibility.

"This is not something we should interfere with," Agatha shook her head. "Sort out this part of the situation and notify the public security authority. Let them handle the follow-up. But we need to take these souvenirs back and examine them, in case something… is hidden inside."

"Yes."

After she gave a few more simple instructions for wrapping up the scene, Agatha rose from the sofa and let out a quiet breath.

There were too many matters waiting to be handled. She could not keep wasting time here.

“Remember to keep tracking the investigation at the sewage treatment center and to monitor the pipe system in this area at all times,” she told her subordinate at last, then turned and walked out of the room.

Outside was a narrow corridor. The old staircase stretched forward under dim lights. Two other households had quietly opened their doors, peeking at the commotion here, several pairs of slightly panicked eyes watching from the crack.

Agatha waved at those eyes.

“Go back inside, pack a few things, and wait for instructions. This area needs to be evacuated for a while. Don’t worry, we will solve the problem here as soon as possible. You will be able to come home again very soon.”

After saying this, Agatha did not bother about the residents’ reactions. She started down the stairs toward the exit on the first floor.

She did not use Ashen Wind to hurry along, even though she usually liked doing that. Today her thoughts were in a mess. All kinds of tangled matters filled her mind. She felt she needed to sort them out, and walking slowly would help her think.

At the same time, she also wanted to sense the traces left in this whole building, to see if she could detect any other spots stained with elements corruption.

Lost in thought, she walked down the old stairs to the exit and stepped out into the open space in front of the residential building.

The stale, moldy smell vanished at once. The fresh, icy air lifted Agatha's spirits. For a moment she even felt an illusion—as if she had just walked out of some dark, damp burrow and into the sunlight.

The crowd that had gathered in front of the residential building had already scattered. Only a few curious passersby lingered at a safe distance, pointing and whispering. When Agatha appeared, those onlookers quickly left as well.

No. Someone was still here.

Agatha frowned. She saw a young woman with long blond hair and a veil over her face, clutching a large bag in her arms, still standing in the open space in front of the building. She looked like she was spacing out.

"This area is sealed off. Please do not linger," Agatha walked over and reminded her in a slightly stern tone. "Are you a resident here?"

The veiled blonde seemed startled, jolted awake, and turned to look at Agatha. She pointed at herself in confusion: "Are you talking to me?"

"Of course. Who else is here?" Agatha frowned. For some reason, she could not help paying attention to this stranger. She was sure she had never met the woman, yet her features looked a bit familiar, as if Agatha had just seen her not long ago. "Are you a resident here?"

"Ah, no, no," Alice quickly waved her hands and pointed into the distance. "I live over there, pretty far away. What happened here? I heard someone died?"

"The Guardians are handling it," Agatha said casually, still puzzled. The blonde woman's reaction was a bit odd. Had she really not recognized the city-state's Gatekeeper standing in front of her?

Alice, however, did not notice any change in the eyes of the black-clad, bandage-wrapped woman before her. She only thought this outfit looked very interesting.

It looked a lot like how the captain dressed now.

But the captain had told her not to comment lightly on other people's appearance, and not to say too much about herself to strangers—the first was not polite, and the second was not cautious.

Alice still could not spell those two words, but she felt sure the captain was right.

It was time to say goodbye.

So she waved at Agatha and said in a cheerful tone: "Then I'll be going! Thank you for answering my questions!"

The veiled blonde left just like that, looking delighted, but Agatha felt only strangeness as she watched her back.

What was this person even here for?

She had lived in this city-state for more than twenty years, yet she had never seen anyone like that—someone who radiated a simple, nameless happiness from head to toe, who spoke with no wariness at all, whose smile held not the slightest shadow.

Agatha frowned, then suddenly froze. It was as if she only noticed some odd detail after the other woman had already left.

"No breathing or heartbeat…?!"

The young Gatekeeper jerked her head up and looked toward the direction the blonde had gone. She moved to chase her almost without thinking, but just as she was about to step forward, a flurry of hurried footsteps suddenly interrupted her.

A black-clad guard came running over, holding up a sheet of intelligence. His expression looked quite anxious.

“What is it?” Agatha asked sharply before he could speak, frowning. In her heart she could not help muttering—things were chaotic enough already. Please, let nothing else happen.

“An urgent express dispatch from Cemetery No. 3,” the guard said, straightening up and speaking very quickly. “A clue about the mysterious ‘Visitor’. This is the original report.”

Agatha’s breathing clearly stopped for a beat. Then she snatched the letter from his hand, shook it open with one motion, and let her eyes race across the words.

The young Gatekeeper fell silent. She stood there without moving, frozen in place, not reacting for a long time.

The guard looked at his direct superior with some concern. After a few seconds, he could not help speaking up: “Gatekeeper, this matter…”

Agatha slowly turned her head and looked into her subordinate’s eyes: “If someone suddenly told you that a being comparable to the Elder Gods had descended to the city-state in person, and that the way He walks the mortal world is by going to the citizen Assistance Center and renting a two-story house with a terrace… how would you react?”

“…I would go to the nearest Cathedral for some counseling, or find a well-known psychiatrist,” the guard answered honestly.

“You are not wrong. Unfortunately, I am already the highest-ranked representative of the Cathedral in this city-state, and psychiatrists cannot solve the problem of an Elder God descending,” Agatha sighed, slowly folding the letter away. “Every single matter is important. Every single matter’s priority has to be at the very front… ah.”

She lifted her head and looked toward the place mentioned in the report—Oak Street.

It happened to be in the direction where that strange blonde woman with no breath or heartbeat had gone.

…

Nina ran excitedly around the whole house, then darted into the kitchen to examine the cookware, which was clearly much better than anything they had at home in Pland.

Shirley and Dog wandered all over the living room and dining room on the first floor, pretending to “inspect” the place. Whenever they stopped, they had to comment on the furnishings around them.

They had been stuck on the Vanished for so long that they were about to burst.

Ai perched on the nearby dining table, its whole body buried in a huge pile of fries. Today was its great feast day.

Duncan sat on the sofa in the living room, watching all this with a smile. All his smiles were hidden behind thick bandages, but Vanna, standing beside him, suddenly had a strange feeling… At this moment, Captain Duncan’s eyes looked like those of a kind old father.

Vanna quickly shook her head and pushed that ridiculous thought aside. She looked at the two young ladies running all over the house (and the dog).

“There is an empty room upstairs reserved for you two. Did you go look at it?”

“We did, we did!” Nina trotted over, nodding again and again. “It’s great. It’s even a bit bigger than my room back in Pland!”

“This place is really not bad,” Shirley ran over too, her smile extra bright. “If I’d known you were settled this well in the city-state, I would have come over two days ago. It’s so boring on the ship! There’s nothing to do every day…”

Duncan slowly turned his head: “The homework I leave you every day is enough to keep you busy for three hours. How could you have nothing to do?”

Shirley instantly realized she had said the wrong thing and shrank her neck at once.

“You wrote it for her?” Duncan lowered his head a little and looked at Dog, who was trying hard to hide in the Shadows.

Dog’s head almost disappeared into his shoulders: “I… I was just practicing more for myself, so I wouldn’t waste your hard work teaching me…”

Duncan laughed out loud, sounding truly pleased.

“Relax. I brought you here to have fun, not just to scold you,” he waved a hand, then looked up at the Chronometer Clock on the wall. “Alice will be back soon. There is at least an hour before dinner. Shirley… make up some homework. Start from page sixteen of the vocabulary book.”

Shirley’s wail rang in Vanna and Morris’s ears for the first time in a long while.

Chapter 369: The Gatekeeper Pays a Visit

Duncan sat on the sofa in the living room, relaxed, reading the morning newspaper he had bought on the street. From time to time he turned his head to glance at Shirley, who was hunched over the coffee table, frowning as she wrote, and at Dog, who lay beside her, fully absorbed in a copy of Abridged Modern History of the City-States. The sight filled him with a quiet sense of peace.

In this strange and eerie world, he had finally found a bit of familiar rhythm again.

On the other hand, bringing Dog, Shirley, and Nina over also fulfilled an idea he had been turning over in his mind for a long time—Captain Duncan's little classroom had finally reopened.

He turned his head to the other side of the coffee table. Nina had pulled over a small stool and sat there, carefully working on her winter break homework. Morris sat beside her, supervising, occasionally correcting some small mistakes for his student.

"You are a responsible teacher," Duncan said to Morris. "Nina is lucky."

"She is a hardworking child. I don't want to delay her life," Morris smiled. Then he glanced at the homework spread in front of Shirley, and his expression grew a little complicated. "But I did not expect you to be so good at… teaching others."

Duncan raised an eyebrow: “Oh?”

“The study plan you set for Shirley, Alice, and Dog is very reasonable, even… somewhat professional,” Morris said, sounding a bit hesitant. “I also saw the test papers you prepared for them earlier. They were quite professional as well. That was a bit… beyond what I expected.”

The old mister chose his words very carefully. He really did care about this. When he first heard that Duncan was enthusiastically going to teach the three illiterates on the ship how to read, the picture in his mind was not vocabulary cards, vocabulary books, and multiplication tables. The first image that surfaced went straight toward Eldritch God retainers gathering on a ritual field to touch forbidden knowledge. Yet what he actually saw was the fearsome Captain Duncan pulling out a stack of literacy cards…

How to put it… He had more or less grown used to Captain Duncan’s mild, friendly manner in private now. But whenever he thought about a being from the Subspace Shadows seriously giving people lessons—literacy lessons, at that—that awkward feeling still surged up uncontrollably.

Duncan of course understood what the old scholar meant, but he had no way to explain. He only smiled and waved a hand: “Perhaps I once had a dream of being a teacher.”

Morris did not know what to say for a moment. Duncan leaned over to glance at Shirley’s maddening handwriting and could not help sighing: “It is a shame the progress of these three students is so uneven. It is really a headache.”

Morris thought for a bit and nodded: “Indeed. I feel Dog could almost camp out in some library and teach himself all the way to graduation now, yet Shirley is still wrestling with common vocabulary. Alice… Alice, she…”

Duncan sighed again: “Ah, Alice works very hard, but she is Alice.”

The learning progress of the three illiterates on the ship was nothing like what he had imagined at first. He had thought that, since she had a sharper mind, Shirley's pace would be faster, yet she was still half illiterate. Her unwavering determination to slack off and her despairing attitude toward study were the main reasons. Alice, on the other hand, worked harder than anyone, but the doll miss's head simply did not seem suited for reading and writing. In the end, the most advanced of the three illiterates turned out to be a dog. With astonishing diligence and understanding, Dog could not only read literary works on his own now, he could even solve three-variable quadratic equations…

There were countless Abyssal Hounds chasing after knowledge—now it seemed only Dog had actually caught up.

To be fair, this was the greatest stain on Duncan—or rather Zhou Ming's—entire teaching career.

Just as he was thinking this, Alice, who had gone out to buy groceries, finally came back—almost twenty minutes later than expected.

"I'm back!"

The doll miss opened the door and stepped inside. As she put down the things in her hands, she craned her neck toward the living room and called out. With one glance she saw the study ace, the study slacker, and the study dog doing homework by the coffee table, and her face lit up with delight: "Nina! Shirley! Dog! You're here?"

"We came this morning. I've already been doing this damn… already been making up homework for half the day…" Shirley lifted her head, eyes brimming. "The captain said I have to copy everything from page sixteen in the vocabulary book onward all over again…"

“Three times,” Duncan said calmly from the side. “Don’t quietly trim two-thirds off your own assignment.”

Then he ignored Shirley’s reaction and looked up at Alice: “Why are you only back now? Did you run into trouble?”

“Ah, no, no!” Alice waved both hands quickly. “There was just some commotion… I didn’t go watch the commotion! Something happened, and I investigated it…”

This doll truly could not lie and was not good at making excuses. In just a few sentences she exposed the fact that she had wasted time watching the commotion on her way home.

“Investigated?” Duncan looked at Alice with mild surprise. He did not intend to pursue the matter of her “watching the commotion”, even though he had indeed warned her not to wander around on the way. That was only a small thing. What he cared more about was… that the usually scatterbrained Alice had just said the word “investigated” with such a serious expression.

Even if it was just an excuse she had made up on the spot, he still cared a great deal about what this doll had gone to investigate.

“On that street nearby, there was a household where they said someone had died. People from the Church had all gone over,” Alice immediately began telling Duncan what she had seen on the way. “A woman said she killed her husband, and the onlookers were saying the man of the house had gone out before that or something… Ah, right, right, I also saw a woman whose clothes looked a lot like yours! She was wrapped in bandages too…”

Duncan listened, a bit dazed, to the doll’s rambling, point-less story and barely managed to figure out what had happened. Then he noticed the last part, about the “bandaged woman”. He frowned slightly and was just about to ask for details when he saw Vanna, who had been feeding the pigeons at the dining table, suddenly stand up.

“Stranger approaching,” Vanna said quickly. “Clergy.”

Duncan immediately waved his hand, signaling Alice to be quiet and put her veil back on. Dog, who had been squatting by the sofa, slipped back into the Shadows in the blink of an eye. Ai flapped its wings and hid on a nearby cabinet. Morris rose from the sofa and went to the door.

“Don’t be nervous. It is only a guest,” Duncan remained quite calm. He waved at the somewhat tense Vanna and Morris, then walked to the door and pulled it open.

A young woman in a long black coat, bandages wrapped around her body, wearing a black round hat and holding a Gatekeeper’s cane, stood outside. Her hand was still raised, ready to knock.

She seemed frozen in place.

Duncan looked the young lady up and down, then glanced down at himself.

“Ah, matching outfits,” he said casually.

“That’s her, that’s her,” Alice, standing slightly behind Duncan, saw the visitor clearly now and eagerly leaned over. “The black-clothed woman I told you about, the one I saw on the way back from buying groceries…”

Alice’s voice jolted Agatha out of her daze. The muscles on her face twitched slightly. It took her quite an effort to drag her gaze away from the tall, broad figure before her and look toward the source of the sound.

The blonde woman with no breath or heartbeat, whom she had met not long ago, now stood inside the house, watching with curious, delighted eyes.

She really was here.

Agatha took several deep breaths, trying to calm her racing heart. The faint ringing in her head slowly faded. The darkness and double vision that came from suddenly staring into the Truth finally retreated from before her eyes. At last she let out a quiet breath. In her chaotic mind, she remembered why she had come.

A slightly stiff smile appeared on her face: “I… did not mean to disturb you. I only came to check on the situation. You…”

“Come in,” Duncan said calmly, nodding and stepping aside to open a path. “It is quite cold. Let’s not talk at the door.”

Agatha froze for a moment, not reacting at first.

Seeing this, Vanna, who had been silent before, could not help frowning. She stepped forward and looked at the newcomer: “You rushed over here knowing exactly what this place is. Don’t tell me you never thought about what would happen once the door opened?”

“Have some sympathy,” Morris said quickly at her side. “Anyone’s mind would be a mess the first time they met the captain. The higher your Spirit Sight, the worse it is. This young lady is clearly all tangled up.”

When Vanna heard this, she immediately recalled her own first day aboard the Vanished and decided the old mister was right.

While Vanna and Morris were talking, Agatha finally came back to herself. Her mind was still somewhat chaotic, but reason had taken control again. Thanks to Duncan’s deliberate restraint, her sanity had not been too badly shaken. As soon as she recovered, she hurriedly nodded: “Sorry, I was a bit distracted.”

Then she looked at the path Duncan had opened. After a brief hesitation, she finally stepped forward.

She knew what this place was.

She knew that the towering figure before her was, in essence, an indescribable being who had descended into the city-state, with a rank very likely comparable to the Elder Gods.

She knew that with this step, she was entering a “descent site”.

But from the moment the door had opened, there had been no room left for regret.

Behind Duncan, Morris watched the tense young lady step inside. He tilted his head slightly toward Vanna and whispered: “She’s a bit better than you were.”

Vanna muttered softly: “That wasn’t my fault. The captain’s first Dreamwalking was too terrifying.”

Morris nodded: “That’s true…”

Vanna added: “But the second time, I was much calmer.”

Listening to the two of them muttering behind him, Duncan finally could not help turning his head: “You weren’t much better the second time either. Quiet down. We have a guest.”

Chapter 370: Agatha Understood

Nervous and curious, Agatha quietly looked around the place.

It looked like a completely ordinary home. Most of the furniture seemed a bit old, but everything was tidy and clean. The air in the room was fresh, as if the windows had been opened not long ago to let the wind through. From the direction of the kitchen came the sound of water heating, like a kettle coming to a boil.

This did not look like a “descent site” at all. It was simply a normal residence.

Of course, Agatha knew from the start that this had originally been just an ordinary house. Until a few days ago, it had still been listed on the citizen Help Center’s register as a property for rent. She had only thought that… since an indescribable Visitor had chosen to make this his temporary residence, shouldn’t there be something special about it?

But she had not found anything.

“Tea? Or some coffee?” Duncan came over to Agatha’s side and asked casually.

Agatha jolted back to herself. She stared in surprise at Duncan, now sitting opposite her, and only after a heartbeat understood what he meant. She hurriedly waved her hand: “No… thank you, I’m not thirsty.”

“No need to be so tense. Just treat this like your own home,” Duncan smiled as he sat down on the sofa across from her, speaking in a relaxed tone. “Let me think… If I’m not mistaken, you should be this city?state’s Gatekeeper? At a time like this, someone who comes knocking on the door is unlikely to be an ordinary Guardian.”

“Gatekeeper Agatha,” Agatha nodded at once, trying her best to look calm. “You knew I would come?”

“You were sure to come. If not you, then some other high?ranking member of the Church,” Duncan said lightly. “Annie will tell the Gravekeeper about me, and the Gravekeeper will report the situation to the Church. All I had to do was wait here to meet the upper ranks of this city?state’s Church.”

Agatha adjusted her posture a little and studied the burly figure before her with a more solemn gaze, as if trying to divine the truth: “I want to know… your real purpose. Who are you, really, and why have you come to Frostholm?”

“Didn’t I say already?” Duncan raised his eyebrows. “I came to solve the problems happening here. I thought I made that quite clear in the denunciation letter.”

Agatha opened her mouth, clearly still having trouble accepting such a simple answer. After two or three seconds, she spoke, hesitant: “Is it really… just that?”

“If you need a darker motive and a more complicated conspiracy before this feels reasonable, I can make one up on the spot,” Duncan said offhandedly. “What style do you like? world?ending Doomsday, or a monarch descending to conquer the world?”

Agatha’s body visibly tensed.

“Ahem, you scared her,” Vanna suddenly coughed twice behind Duncan. “This Gatekeeper will take you seriously.”

“Will she?” Duncan turned his head a little, puzzled. “I thought the joke was obvious…”

“In my experience, yes,” Vanna sighed helplessly. “In this line of work, people’s nerves are always tight. They can’t take jokes.”

For a moment Duncan did not know what to say. Agatha, meanwhile, looked in confusion at the extremely tall woman. Ever since she had entered the house, she had felt that woman’s eyes fall on her, intentionally or not, as if… as if Vanna was watching something with interest.

But that was not important. What mattered was that she had confirmed the Higher Being before her had only been joking with her—cruelly and in a very frightening way.

“Please forgive my sensitivity,” Agatha said sincerely. “Recently the Anomalies in the city?state have been growing more and more severe. Everyone’s nerves are on edge. I even, at one point, suspected…”

She hesitated and did not finish, but Duncan smoothly took over: “At one point you even suspected me? Don’t be so tense, that’s reasonable. My timing was a little too perfect, and the first time I came here I ended up dealing with Annihilators and ‘replicas’.”

Agatha did not answer. She only looked a bit embarrassed.

“I want to know how far your investigation has gone,” Duncan went on, not minding her reaction. “Any leads?”

Agatha hesitated, unsure whether she should reveal too much of Frostholm’s internal information to this Visitor of mysterious origin. After a moment, choosing her words, she spoke: “After we received your warning, we did capture some Annihilators, but we gained almost no useful information. Those heretics who formed deep symbiotic pacts with Deep Sea Demons have extremely strong minds and usually choose self?

destruction at the last moment. The few we took alive are all peripheral figures who know nothing about the full plan…

“Even now, all we can confirm is that the frequent replica phenomena in the city are indeed the work of those heretics, and that they have built a hidden and vast nest somewhere in Frostholm. As for the exact location of that nest… we still have no clue.”

She paused, then went on: “As for Dagger Island, which you mentioned in that letter… what is even more troubling is that it has already vanished.”

“I know,” Duncan said calmly.

“You already knew?” Agatha asked in surprise. “That news should still be sealed…”

“I have my own channels for information in the mortal world,” Duncan answered in the same light tone. “Even without leaving the city?state, I know some of what happens on the open sea.”

Those channels were, of course, Tyrian. After all, Dagger Island had vanished right in front of the Sea Mist Fleet, so Tyrian would naturally report it to the Vanished at once.

But even having learned this shocking news at the first moment, Duncan could only be shocked along with everyone else. He too had no idea how such a large island could simply vanish into thin air.

According to what Tyrian had reported, the island had not sunk so much as seemed to melt directly into the sea. Before it disappeared there had been a series of massive explosions, as if the people on the island had activated something. But beyond that, there was no further information.

Information was scarce. The way it vanished was far too strange, and it left behind no trace or clue. Dagger Island had gone from one riddle to an even greater one. No one knew what had happened there, let alone where the island had gone.

“Do you know where Dagger Island went?” Agatha’s voice broke into Duncan’s thoughts. The city?state’s Gatekeeper raised her head and looked at him with sincere eyes. “Do you know what happened to it?”

Duncan thought for a moment. He felt that if he admitted he had pondered it for an entire night and still not figured it out, it might hurt his image. So he fell silent for a bit, then stretched out his hand and pointed toward the floor.

“Down?” Agatha froze for a second. “You mean Dagger Island really did sink into the sea… but the eyewitness reports said there were no whirlpools on the surface like when an island sinks…”

Duncan had no idea how to answer. He was just as curious how such a huge island could simply vanish!

So he simply kept his hand extended, still pointing at the floor.

“You don’t mean Dagger Island… You mean the clues are beneath our feet?” Agatha seemed to suddenly understand. Almost at once she recalled her most recent conversation with Bishop Ivan and remembered the matter of the “Second Waterway” deep underground!

City Hall and the Church had already searched the entire city?state. Strict curfews and repeated large?scale sweeps should, in theory, have been enough to root out many hidden cultists, yet the Annihilators they caught were always just a few marginal figures. Every place where people could hide—the First Waterway, the subway, service shafts—had already been searched, with no clues at all…

The city?state was only so big. If there were no traces of those heretics in any of the places above, then the Second Waterway was the only possibility left.

Those collapsed sections, those caves sunk in darkness, those shafts and pipes covered in corruption… They might indeed be unfit for living beings, but what if that group of Annihilators had really survived down there?

Of course, searching the Second Waterway had always been part of the plan. She had just never dared to confirm whether this search, which would demand such staggering resources, was truly worth it. Now, she had finally found the strongest support for that action—a friendly Quasi?Divine Being had plainly indicated that they had to look downward.

“So that’s it—I understand now. Our direction is correct,” Agatha suddenly stood up, her tone filled with sudden realization and joy. She looked at Duncan across from her. Her attitude became especially sincere and respectful, and she bowed deeply. “I understand now—thank you very much for your reminder!”

Duncan still kept his hand pointed at the floor, staring a little blankly at the bandaged woman who had suddenly become so excited.

[What did she just understand?]

“We will immediately start the next stage of the search. This time we will dig out those heretics’ nest by the roots,” Agatha said with full confidence, not noticing Duncan’s dazed look, and soon moved to take her leave. “Then I won’t waste your time any longer—excuse me for disturbing you this time, I will be going.”

“Uh… all right,” Duncan stood up half a beat late and said without thinking: “Take care on your way…”

Agatha thanked him, turned, and walked toward the door. Then she suddenly seemed to remember something and stopped.

Alice, who had been about to get up to see her off, almost bumped right into her.

Agatha's gaze swept over Alice, but this time she did not pay much attention to the blonde woman with no heartbeat or breath. For a Quasi? Divine Being, it was perfectly normal for followers at his side to be a little unusual. It was nothing to be shocked about.

She turned her head back toward Duncan.

"Please rest assured. I will order the Church's Guardians so that no one comes to disturb you," Agatha said very seriously. "I hope you can live comfortably in Frostholm. If there is any new development, I will come in person."

"Ah, that would be very good," Duncan laughed, quite pleased. "I really don't want anyone coming to bother me."

Agatha nodded and turned toward the door again. She had only taken two steps when she once more seemed to remember something and stopped.

"One more thing. I almost forgot." The Gatekeeper pressed her temple in some embarrassment and looked at Duncan as she spoke.

Duncan looked puzzled and said: "Oh?"

Agatha hesitated, then finally asked the question that had troubled her and many others for a long time: "About the 'Secret Cipher' you left at the end of that denunciation letter… what does it actually mean? Forgive our shallow wit. We have tried to decipher it for a long time and still cannot understand the riddle you left."

Duncan was silent for a moment, then said: "…Ah?"

Chapter 371: Anomaly Aura

When she reached the street, the icy wind swept through the open space between the buildings and blew against her face, bringing Agatha fully back to her senses.

Yet in her mind there still echoed that string of questions that had almost shattered her worldview and rebuilt her understanding—

“In Frostholm, you don’t give bonuses to helpful citizens who actively report cult clues?

“You never used a bank account? Do you people in the Church never deal with ordinary life?

“You didn’t see that was a bank account number?”

Agatha had never imagined that the biggest loss of composure she would ever suffer while dealing with an supernatural being would happen under circumstances like this.

And she was quite sure that Bishop Ivan of the Grand Cathedral, and that group of Cryptographers and Divination masters who were still gathered in the Cathedral desperately studying the ‘Secret Cipher’, would react almost the same way she had when they found out the truth.

Footsteps sounded nearby. Several subordinates who had been waiting in a sheltered spot near the building stepped out. One black?clad guard noticed the distant look in Agatha’s eyes and grew worried at once: “Are you all right, Gatekeeper? In that house…”

Agatha raised her hand and cut the subordinate off. She glanced back once, then lifted her Gatekeeper’s cane and slowly walked toward the steam car not far away, speaking as she went: “Do not disturb the residents of that house. Inform the Cathedral in this district and have the Guardians keep their distance from here—the Silent Cathedral will take over all contact with this place directly.”

“Yes, Gatekeeper,” the black?clad guard bowed his head at once to take the order, then could not help asking, “Do you… need to rest a bit?”

Agatha’s steps paused for a moment. She sighed: “If I could, I would go to the nearest Cathedral to seek mental counseling, or consult a well?known psychiatrist…”

The subordinate froze. “Ah?”

“Never mind, I don’t need rest,” Agatha waved her hand. “Let’s go back to the Grand Cathedral. We have to start the search under the city as soon as possible.”

…

“The Church people have left,” Morris stood by the window, watching the movements on the street outside. When he saw the gray?blue steam car drive out of the intersection, he turned and looked at Duncan. “I thought they would at least leave a few ‘eyes’ behind.”

“A Gatekeeper’s position in the Death Church is equivalent to an Inquisitor in the Deep Sea Church. She has to keep her word. Since she said they would not disturb us, there will naturally be no tricks,” Vanna said from the side. “Besides, she knows those little tricks would be meaningless.”

Duncan lifted his eyelids and glanced at Vanna: “I thought you might talk with that Gatekeeper a bit more. You two are colleagues, after all.”

“…I really couldn’t think of anything worth talking about,” Vanna shook her head. “My status is a little awkward. Whether I speak as an Inquisitor of the Deep Sea Church or as a member of the Vanished, forming ties with Frostholm’s Church at a time like this would only bring trouble.”

Duncan grunted in reply and said nothing more. It was Nina at his side who suddenly broke the silence with curiosity: “That Gatekeeper sister seemed a bit excited before she left, as if she had some kind of plan… What search plan was she talking about? Uncle, do you have any idea?”

Vanna and Morris both looked at Duncan. After a short silence, he nodded slightly.

Although he had been confused at first, by now he had figured it out. Agatha’s reaction showed one thing: after fruitless searches in the main areas of the city?state, Frostholm’s Church had apparently turned its attention to the dark world underground.

The Second Waterway.

In the past, limited by high costs and the practical difficulty of the task, Frostholm’s authority had always let the Second Waterway left from the Queen’s era lie dormant in the depths beneath the city. At most they did some symbolic purification and sealing work in the upper sections connected to the waterway. But now… it seemed they could no longer afford to worry about costs.

Duncan raised his head and said to Vanna: “Go to Nemo’s tavern again this afternoon and warn him. The Church may soon launch operations targeting the Second Waterway. He and his ‘colleagues’ should be careful.”

The Second Waterway was enormous, and in truth Nemo and his “peers” only controlled a small part of the entire sewer system. That part was very well hidden and had been intentionally concealed and sealed off. In theory, the authority and the Church would never notice it. But no one knew how determined the Church would be this time, so it was better to warn him.

“Also, the matter of Dagger Island is worrying,” Duncan added after a brief thought. “The way that island disappeared is clearly abnormal. I’m afraid something else may happen later. Morris, watch all kinds of news in the city over the next few days, especially in the districts near the eastern Harbor. See if any unusual rumors come up.”

Morris nodded. “Understood.”

“We also need to remind Tyrian later, and have him watch for changes in that stretch of sea…”

Duncan rubbed his chin, muttering in thought as he wondered if he was missing anything. Just then he saw Shirley sidle over from the side.

She moved on tiptoe, looking very sneaky.

“What is it?” Duncan asked casually when he saw her.

“It’s not me, it’s Dog,” Shirley waved her hands quickly, then lifted her arm. A pitch?black chain emerged from the air, and Dog, who had hurriedly hidden himself earlier when the Gatekeeper arrived, appeared in front of Duncan. “Dog says he has something to report to you…”

“Something?” Duncan frowned, looking at the cowering Deep Sea hound. “What is it?”

Dog shook his ugly big head, then carefully glanced toward the door before speaking: “I don’t know if I’m sensing wrong. That ‘Gatekeeper’ called Agatha just now… I kept feeling she had a familiar aura about her…”

The room went quiet at once. Duncan’s gaze turned serious. “A familiar aura? What do you mean? Deep Sea Demons?”

“No, not Deep Sea Demons,” Dog shook his head at once. “I can’t really explain it. You know my memories from before I got a ‘heart’ are a bit blurry. But that aura… it reminded me a little of the Deep Sea Lord. Mm, of the feeling I had when I was near the Deep Sea Lord.”

As soon as Dog said this, everyone looked at each other. Duncan’s expression grew stern at once: “Why didn’t you say so earlier?”

“I didn’t dare show myself just now!” Dog hunched his neck. “She’s a Gatekeeper, after all. Of course she wouldn’t be your match, but Frostholm is hunting Annihilators and Deep Sea Demons across the whole city right now. I was afraid that if I showed up, I wouldn’t be able to explain myself and would end up delaying your work…”

Dog’s explanation did make some sense, and Duncan did not press him. Even so, what he reported clearly took everyone by surprise.

Frostholm’s Gatekeeper, Agatha… how could she carry the aura of the Deep Sea Lord?!

“Could it be… that Gatekeeper has already fallen? Or already been corrupted?” Morris said, his face grave. “But she behaved completely normally. There was nothing wrong with her words and actions…”

“Maybe she doesn’t even know?” Shirley said carefully from the side. “Isn’t cognitive corruption the hardest to notice? Especially for the person it’s happening to.”

Duncan said nothing, only looked up at Vanna.

“She didn’t seem like someone who has already fallen or been corrupted, and she was clearly not a ‘replica’,” Vanna said slowly, brows tightly knit as she carefully recalled every detail about Agatha just now. “I didn’t feel any abnormal aura on her at all. Dog, are you sure you weren’t mistaken?”

“I already said I’m not sure I sensed it right,” Dog replied, sounding especially guilty. “It was only a very, very faint aura that made me think of the Deep Sea, that’s all… Maybe it didn’t even come from her herself. Right, didn’t she say they’d caught some Annihilators recently? Even if none of them were important figures, if she’s been dealing with them every day lately, it’s normal for her to pick up a little aura from the Deep Sea on her, isn’t it…”

Duncan still frowned.

Dog’s explanation sounded somewhat reasonable, but he could not shake the feeling that things were not that simple. Would a professional servant of the Goddess, the city?state’s Gatekeeper, forget to perform self?purification after interrogating cultists? Would she really walk around outside carrying the cultists’ aura on her?

Vanna took a step forward: “Should we call that Gatekeeper back and ask about it? Or should we go to her?”

“Neither. If she truly is at risk of falling or has formed a link with the power of the Deep Sea, any direct contact could alert her,” Duncan shook his head, then looked toward the direction where Agatha had left. “I will keep a covert eye on this matter. You must not approach her.”

Covert eye?

Vanna paused for a moment. She was about to ask what exactly Duncan meant by “covert eye” when she suddenly seemed to remember something. Certain memories surfaced in her mind, and she immediately understood.

“You… already left a mark on her?”

“She has already seen me.”

Duncan nodded slightly. In his other field of vision, some distance away from here, a small green flame flickered gently.

It was exactly in the direction where Agatha had gone.

Chapter 372: Deeply Off Course

On the way back to the Cathedral, Agatha was weighed down with worries.

Confirming that the “Second Waterway” was the right direction for exploration counted as good news for her. But the identity of that mysterious being was still hidden in fog, and that left her unable to calm down no matter what. Of course, it was now certain that this being’s attitude toward the city-state of Frostholm was friendly. Yet as the leader of the Guardians of this city, she had to think long-term.

Any upper supernatural’s gaze upon the mortal world was never without a reason. In a sense, their gaze itself was a disturbance that had real effects. How much longer would that mysterious “visitor” keep his gaze on this place? What long-term impact would his stay have on Frostholm? Would the people living in the city-state change under that influence? Did that being know about this influence? Or… did He simply not care?

A small steam core let out a low, powerful growl as the gear-driven vehicle rolled along the old streets of the city-state. The scenery on both sides of the road slid back toward the edges of her vision. The car passed yet another intersection, and its speed slowed a little.

Her subordinate’s voice came from the front driver’s seat: “Lord, are we going straight back to the Cathedral?”

Agatha lifted her head and looked through the window toward the Cathedral.

The Silent Cathedral, as always, quietly looked down over the entire city-state.

At the center of Frostholm stood a mountain, roughly cone-shaped, rising high above the city's heart. Beneath it lay the Boiling Gold mines that brought endless wealth to the city. The Silent Cathedral and City Hall stood together on the mountaintop. The two large buildings shared the highest point in the city-state. No matter where you stood in the city, you could see them.

At least one of them.

The Cathedral was towering and solemn, looking almost holy against the sky. Across from it, City Hall was also an impressive structure. Half a century ago, in the Queen's era, it had actually been a palace. Official records called it the "Winter Court", but more people simply called it the Queen's Palace.

In that age, which people now treated as taboo, the Winter Court and the Silent Cathedral had looked down on the city like a pair of twins. Old stories full of strange charm painted them as two symbolic powers of protection. The Church guarded the city's veil of night, and the royal family guarded its daylight. The two sides supported and upheld each other.

In truth, things were not so different now. The worldly power represented by City Hall still guarded this city—only the Queen's era had ended.

Agatha drifted off a little. Without realizing it, she stared at that mountain, the mountain she had already seen countless times, and at the two buildings that sat on it like a crown. To her, they looked like two giant beasts standing on the peak, while the houses and factories scattered along the slopes were like blood spilling from those beasts, winding down the mountain's sides.

Her eyes started to sting.

“Gatekeeper, are we going back to the Cathedral?”

Her subordinate’s voice came again from the front seat. Agatha snapped out of her daze and blinked. It felt as if a faint buzzing still lingered in her ears, but a second later that lingering buzz vanished, together with the brief memory from just now.

“No, go to the sewage treatment plant first,” Agatha shook her head and said. “That ‘replica’ that vanished in the washroom worries me too much. I have to see it with my own eyes.”

“Yes.”

The steam core roared to life again. The car drew a neat arc at the intersection and turned onto the road leading to the sewage treatment plant.

…

The sky was covered by thick clouds. Dim daylight moved weakly within them, murky and unclear. In the distance stretched endless seawater, with a thin mist drifting over the waves.

Lawrence stood at the bow of the White Oak, frowning as he gazed at the distant view—the same view that had not changed for a very long time.

He turned and looked the other way. That side of the sea was also nothing but endless water. There were no other ships in sight, and not even a hint of any city-state.

Cold wind swept across the deck, tugging at his coat and the white hair at his temples. Lawrence’s frown had not eased for a long time.

“How long have we been away from Frostholm?” he suddenly asked, turning to the first mate beside him.

“A day and a night, Captain,” the first mate answered at once. “We have been at full speed the whole time.”

“Something is wrong… Why do I keep feeling that we’re going in circles…” Lawrence’s face grew solemn as he looked up at the murky light above. Then he seemed to recall something and asked: “Can the wireless telegraph pick up signals from any nearby city-state or the Harbor?”

“Yes,” the first mate nodded, his face also serious now. “But Frostholm is the only one.”

Lawrence drew a slow breath: “What does it say?”

“A welcome message,” the first mate said slowly. “‘The Harbor is open, welcome to Frostholm.’ We keep receiving that same message again and again.”

Lawrence’s brow furrowed even tighter. He said nothing. After a brief silence, the first mate muttered: “It’s like… we’re still circling Frostholm.”

“It’s obvious we’re trapped in this stretch of sea,” Lawrence said in a low voice. “How is the mood on board?”

“Everyone has realized something is wrong, but they’re all staying calm,” the first mate said. He glanced back toward the deck, where sailors were busy at their posts. “They’re good people—we’ve seen ‘strange things’ on the Boundless Sea before. They all believe you can get us out of this, so no one is bothering you.”

Lawrence did not answer. He only lifted his head and looked again at the murky sky.

The first mate noticed this strange action and could not help asking: “What are you looking at?”

“I…” Lawrence rubbed his temples. For some reason he felt a bit dazed, as if he had forgotten something very important. “I’m thinking about our course.”

“Our course?”

“Yes, our course.” Lawrence squeezed his eyes shut and opened them again, trying to recall what he had forgotten while he spoke almost to himself. “Don’t you think… we’ve forgotten something? Our current course… shouldn’t we be checking it somehow?”

The first mate froze for a second, then spoke without thinking: “Check the course? You mean the Stargazing Room? The navigator…”

“Wait, no, not the Stargazing Room,” Lawrence cut him off, as if slowly waking from a long dream. “The Stargazing Room is for checking the route in special cases. It carries corruption and can’t be used too often. There should be an easier, more common, safer method—something you can use in the daytime to confirm the ship’s direction. There should be such a method…”

His words came faster and faster. Then something seemed to occur to him, and he suddenly turned and ran toward the captain’s cabin.

The first mate, completely confused, instinctively followed. He went with Lawrence back to the captain’s cabin and then watched as the older man started rummaging through the room. At last he could not help asking: “What are you looking for?”

“Some kind of instrument. Used in the daytime. To check our course…” Lawrence dug through his things as he spoke quickly. A strong impression slowly resurfaced in his mind. He felt he was about to remember it, about to know what he was looking for… Suddenly his eyes fell on the desk not far away.

A small instrument sat there. It was made of a short telescope tube and several strange marked rulers.

Lawrence slowly walked over and picked up the little device, puzzled, trying hard to recall what it was for.

A moment later, holding the instrument in thought, he left the cabin and stepped out onto the deck. Under the first mate's baffled gaze, he raised the instrument to his eye and aimed it at the sky.

"Captain, what are you doing?" the first mate asked, curious.

Lawrence slowly lowered the device.

A faint green light seemed to flicker deep in his eyes, but neither he nor the first mate standing opposite noticed it.

The old captain's face showed only confusion and shock. He locked eyes with the first mate for a few seconds before speaking in a hoarse voice, slowly: "Do you remember… that in the sky there was something that shone with light and heat? It moved above us on time and on schedule, and ships could use it to check their course during the day…"

The first mate's eyes slowly widened, as if some memory or impression was also waking up inside his mind.

Lawrence turned his head again, staring at the chaotic clouds and the hazy, dim light behind them. Its source could not be seen. The daylight seemed to spread out evenly, with no sign of a clear, intense glowing orb anywhere in the clouds.

He drew back his gaze and stared straight at his first mate: "Where did the Sun go?"

The first mate could only repeat the captain's words in a daze: "…Where did the Sun go?"

"This isn't just getting lost, not a navigation lock, not looping Visions…" Lawrence murmured. "The White Oak has entered an Anomaly space as a whole…”

The first mate slowly lifted his head and looked at the vast sea beyond the rail, his eyes filled with confusion and fear.

But suddenly he seemed to notice something.

A stretch of land had appeared on the sea.

It was a small island.

Chapter 373: “Go to Frostholm”

It was an island with a twisting shoreline and rocky cliffs. A layer of fog covered it, so they could not see what lay on it clearly. They could only vaguely make out the rising and falling terrain, and strange silhouettes hidden in the mist that looked like jagged rocks or collapsed buildings.

It had appeared very suddenly, as if it had popped into existence out of nowhere near the White Oak.

“What is that?” The first mate stared in shock at the island’s outline on the distant sea. The tense fear that had surged up when the idea of the Sun suddenly returned to him had not yet faded, and now another island had suddenly appeared. Even this old seafarer, who had dealt with the Boundless Sea for many years, had a slight tremor in his voice. “An island… Is there such an island near Frostholm? Is there one like that on our planned route?”

“There is no planned route anymore. The White Oak is sailing in a sea of Visions—we have left the Mortal Realm behind. Whatever we see is ‘normal’ now,” Lawrence’s steady voice came, carrying a strange power that calmed the heart. Though just a moment ago he had been shocked by the Sun’s disappearance, the old captain now seemed completely composed. “As for islands… There is a ‘Dagger Island’ near Frostholm, but I’m not sure this is it… It doesn’t quite match the identification chart.”

“What should we do?” The first mate turned to him. “Sail closer, or stay away?”

Lawrence fell silent, weighing things quickly in his mind.

The island had appeared all of a sudden, right after he and the first mate suddenly became aware of the idea of the Sun again. Was its appearance linked to that cognitive correction?

The island was wrapped in fog. Was that fog real, or was it an illusion born of warped perception?

Was the island fixed in place? Could the White Oak really get away from it? If its appearance was some kind of deliberate act, then no matter how the White Oak sailed, it might keep showing up ahead of the ship.

But no matter what, they should not rush toward it if they wanted to be cautious.

“Go around it,” Lawrence said in a deep voice. “Pass it on the left, full speed away.”

“Yes, Captain!”

The first mate hurried to the bridge. Moments later, a loud whistle echoed over the White Oak. Lawrence felt the ship under his feet begin to turn, and deep inside the hull the steam engine roared with surging power.

Many sailors had already noticed the island that had suddenly appeared. Some moved to the rail, staring nervously at the mist-shrouded land in the distance. Under the eyes of them all, the island slowly fell behind the White Oak and drifted farther away.

Lawrence let out a breath and turned to walk toward the bridge as well.

His steps suddenly stopped.

A figure had appeared in his field of view—a woman in a captain’s uniform, with slightly wavy long hair falling down her back. She stood with her arms crossed, a faint smile on her face.

“Do you remember what I told you?” the figure asked, her tone full of helplessness. “You really should retire. Don’t wait to regret it only after I show up on your ship… Lawrence, you’re already old.”

“Martha…” Lawrence blurted out the name. Then he quickly reached into his pocket, wanting to take out that vial of potion.

At the same time, shock filled his mind. Why so fast? Why had the potion’s effect faded so soon? It had been only a day since Martha last appeared… Had the potion’s duration become this short already?

His hand was shaking. His arm was shaking. He finally touched the vial, but just as he was about to open it, a hand suddenly rested on his arm.

At some point Martha had come to his side. She reached out, pressing down on the old captain’s arm, worry on her face.

“The medicine doesn’t work anymore. You know that, deep down,” Martha said softly. “If you drink it now, I’ll go away for a little while, then show up again. If you drink a whole bottle, I’ll be gone longer, but I’ll still come back… Lawrence, the medicine doesn’t work anymore.”

“I… I don’t understand…” Lawrence blinked in hesitation. He looked at the dearest face from his memories, but only felt a cold air spreading through his heart. “I know my condition. That psychiatrist is a skilled expert, so why…”

“Your mind is being affected, Lawrence. Haven’t you felt it? This sea is affecting you,” Martha said gently. It might have been Martha’s voice, or it might have been Lawrence’s own subconscious speaking. Clearly, somewhere deep down, the experienced old captain had already sensed a bit of the truth. “As you stay here, your mind is decaying faster. Be careful, Lawrence. You’re already in the middle of the sea…”

“How do I leave this place?” Lawrence asked without thinking. Without noticing it, he had loosened his grip on the vial.

The small bottle fell to the deck with a clear shattering sound. The half bottle of potion inside spilled out and mixed with the puddles on the deck until they were one and the same.

Lawrence lowered his head, staring blankly at the broken vial.

Martha still held his arm as she spoke softly: “Go to Frostholm…”

Lawrence jolted, as if waking from a dream. He raised his head, but no one stood beside him anymore—only a bit of lingering warmth remained on his arm.

A rush of footsteps suddenly sounded not far away. Lawrence looked up and saw the first mate striding toward him.

“Captain, we’ve already ‘shaken off’ that island,” the first mate said quickly. Then he looked up and glanced around curiously, as if searching for someone. “Where’s the person who was with you just now? Is she also one of the sailors on board?”

“You saw wrong, I’ve been alone…” Lawrence started to say this out of habit, but halfway through he stopped and snapped his head up, staring at the first mate. “What did you say? The person who was with me just now?!”

“Yes. She was standing next to you just now, looked like a lady—but I didn’t see her clearly,” the first mate said, sounding a bit confused. “Did I really see wrong?”

Lawrence’s eyes went wide, so wide that the first mate was almost frightened. After several seconds, the captain finally burst out: “You could see her?!”

The first mate swallowed hard. He had no idea why his captain was reacting like this. “…I really did see her.”

No sooner had he said this than the experienced seafarer seemed to think of something. His face tightened. “Wait, was that an illusion just now? Have I been affected?”

“It was an illusion… but in theory it should have been one only I could see.” Lawrence’s face looked unusually bad. He waved a hand, telling the other man not to panic too much, but his own mind was a mess. “It shouldn’t be like this. It shouldn’t…”

The old captain lifted his head and glanced around in a daze, as if still hoping to catch sight of Martha.

In his mind, everything seemed to have been stirred together—reality, illusions, memories, delusions…

Here, the Mortal Realm and all that was unreal seemed to have no boundaries at all. Illusions that should have been visible only to him now appeared before others as well. False things were becoming real. And the real ones?

Was this stretch of sea real? Was the White Oak real?

What in the world was this place?

Lawrence’s thoughts were in complete disarray, but suddenly a sailor’s shout came from somewhere on the deck, cutting off his wild thinking.

Someone on watch had found something on the sea.

Lawrence and the first mate exchanged a glance, then hurried toward the side rail. Soon they saw what had made the sailors cry out—

An island had appeared off the White Oak’s forward side. It had a twisting shoreline and tall stone cliffs, and the island was wrapped in mist…

The island had appeared again.

“…That island can move…” The first mate swallowed nervously as his worst guess became reality before his eyes. “It has caught up to us…”

“Or it might be that we’ve been circling in place all along, and this sea is filled with ‘the Veil’ that can briefly blind our sight,” Lawrence said in a low voice, his eyes fixed on the island. “It’s even possible that ‘Frostholm’ is right beside us at this very moment…”

The first mate shot the captain a startled look. He had no idea why the old man had suddenly brought up “Frostholm”, but he quickly steadied himself and asked: “Captain, what do we do this time? Go around it again?”

Lawrence fell silent again, thinking fast.

Martha’s soft words beside his ear still echoed in his mind—

“Go to Frostholm.”

That island was certainly not the city-state of Frostholm, but it kept appearing near the White Oak. Perhaps that in itself was a kind of “guidance”.

Not long ago, he had led the White Oak in a hurried “escape” from the strangely unsettling city-state of Frostholm, only to become trapped in this unfamiliar sea. And now, “Martha” was guiding him again, telling him to “go to Frostholm”.

In front of him, an even more eerie island had appeared—twice now it had suddenly shown up beside the White Oak.

What choice was the right one?

“…We sail toward that island.”

Chapter 374: Envoy

Tyrian stood on the tall bridge of the Sea Mist, his gaze passing through the wide windows to the misty, endless sea in the distance.

That had once been the direction of Dagger Island—but now there was only a wide stretch of open water, and a few scout boats still searching for clues in vain.

Dagger Island had been gone for a long time now. Yet neither the people of Frostholm nor the Sea Mist fleet had found anything in these waters.

The Pirate Lord let out a quiet sigh, turned away from the bridge, and walked into his captain’s cabin. On the desk inside sat an antique oval ritual mirror, completely out of place beside the Sea Mist’s advanced fittings.

Tyrian stopped in front of the mirror and looked at his own reflection, hesitating a little.

Soon he pushed that hesitation aside. He reached into a drawer, took out a carved ritual candlestick used for ceremonies, and set it in front of the mirror.

“The Sea Mist calling the Vanished…” Tyrian muttered under his breath. At that moment, he felt like those seafarers who were bewitched by the manifestations on the Boundless Sea and driven into madness, offering up sacrificial victims in their final frenzy to call the horrors in the dark depths. And in truth, this was not so different. The power he was about to call really was the most terrifying force in all these waters.

It just happened that this power was his Father.

The candlestick lit itself. Bright flame danced above the candle, its light and shadow reflected in the mirror. Tyrian watched the tiny flame, a little nervous. It flickered a few times, then quickly turned a ghostly green. He knew his call had been received.

Flame swept across the oval surface of the mirror, while the center turned black as ink. Tyrian's own reflection vanished. A moment later, another figure appeared there: Duncan's true body, still aboard the Vanished.

Duncan was holding a piece of bread. He lifted his head, glanced this way through the mirror, and said: "I was just about to have lunch—have you eaten?"

"Uh… not yet." Tyrian froze for a second and answered, still not quite used to this. Ever since his Father had regained his humanity, he seemed to have changed in small, quiet ways. His greetings had become so different. The good part was that those greetings felt warm and friendly. But Tyrian had gone too many years without speaking so naturally with his Father. He still felt very awkward.

"You should eat lunch on time. It's good for your health," Duncan said casually. "So, what did you need from me?"

"We've already searched the entire sea around Dagger Island and found nothing," Tyrian steadied himself and turned back to business. "The people of Frostholm are still searching, but I think they will also come up empty."

"The Deep Sea swallowed that island. The real problem is below the surface. Searching from above is meaningless. And right now our biggest problem is that we don't have proper diving apparatus," Duncan said, shaking his head. "Also, the city is getting tense. The Church will soon expand their search to the Second Waterway. Don’t worry, I’ve already sent warnings to your informants.”

Tyrian tensed up at once when he heard that the Church was going to search the Second Waterway, but he relaxed again at the second half of Duncan’s words. Then he frowned and asked: “They suspect the heretics’ nest in the city is hidden in the Second Waterway?”

“After all, they’ve already turned the rest of the city-state upside down,” Duncan lifted his eyelids. “Other than the Second Waterway, they have nowhere else to look.”

Tyrian frowned without speaking. Seeing this, Duncan asked: “What is it? Do you have some idea?”

“I don’t think they’ll find any clues in the Second Waterway,” Tyrian said slowly, shaking his head. “My informants don’t control the whole Second Waterway, but they know what it’s like down there and hold several key nodes. If a large number of Annihilators were hiding below and holding some great ritual there… I should have heard something.”

“Maybe they’re hiding very well. Or maybe the ritual they’re holding has already twisted the minds of every informant who noticed anything—either they didn’t notice, or if they did, they were corrupted. That would keep you from getting any reliable information.”

Tyrian nodded slowly. “That does make sense. You already confirmed that there is cognitive corruption inside the city-state.”

“I’ll keep an eye on the Second Waterway as well,” Duncan said from inside the mirror. “I’m very curious where those Annihilators are hiding. If I see your people getting into trouble along the way, I’ll try to help.”

“Thank you very much.” Tyrian bowed his head at once.

Just then, a sudden knock at the door cut off the conversation in the captain’s cabin.

“Someone is looking for you,” Duncan said from the mirror, having heard the noise. “If there’s nothing else, you should go take care of your own work.”

“Okay, Father.”

Duncan’s figure faded from the mirror. The flames along the edge of the fiery surface vanished, and the candlestick in front of the mirror slowly went back to normal.

Tyrian let out a long breath and felt the pressure in his chest ebb away. Then he frowned, stood up, and opened the door: “What is it?”

“A fast boat from Frostholm,” said an Undying sailor with a hole in his head, standing in the doorway and saluting as he spoke. “They’re coming up under flags and light signals saying ‘non-military action’ and ‘request for contact’. Looks like a group of… envoys.”

“Envoys?” Tyrian was startled for a moment, then his face showed keen interest. “Now that is interesting… looks like they really couldn’t sit still.”

“Open fire?” the sailor asked, looking at his captain with some expectation.

“Fire my ass—let them come,” Tyrian glared at him, then added: “Only three people are allowed aboard. If they can’t accept that, they can go back where they came from.”

On the mechanical cutter flying Frostholm’s city-state flag, a man in a neat formal coat and gold-rimmed glasses stood on the foredeck. He nervously took off his glasses to wipe them again and again, then lifted his head to look at the ironclad warship that was growing larger in his field of view.

The Sea Mist came closer and closer. Its raised prow loomed like a mountain floating on the frozen sea, and the sense of pressure grew stronger. All across the surrounding water, small chunks of ice drifted like living things. They swam in the sea, circled the cutter's hull with purpose, and kept ramming the planks near the waterline.

The constant crack of ice throwing itself against the hull set people's teeth on edge and drew their nerves tight.

The confidential secretary wiped his glasses again. In his mind rose the stories told in Frostholm, passing from mouth to mouth. They were all about the curse on the outer sea, the Pirate Lord in the fog, sailors frozen into ice sculptures in their sleep, and a Pirate Lord who ate one small child with every meal.

"We're close enough," the confidential secretary said. He put his gold-rimmed glasses back on, took a slow breath, and spoke to the accompanying officer beside him: "Stop here. If we go any closer, that warship will start shooting."

"Slowest speed, port rudder!" the officer turned and shouted orders to the signal sailor.

The cutter's speed dropped at once. It adjusted its heading a little, slowly turning until it lay parallel to the vast ironclad warship.

At the same time, the officer kept his eyes on the Sea Mist.

He saw flashes of light appear on the warship. Then a seaman stepped out by the rail and waved signal flags toward the mechanical cutter.

"They're sending a signal," the confidential secretary said quickly. "What does it mean?"

"The Sea Mist has accepted our request… thank the gods, this time it's a signal living people can read," the officer let out a long breath. Then he saw a small boat being lowered from the warship's side. "And they're putting a boat in the water to pick us up."

"God of Death bless us… I thought they would just start firing," the confidential secretary said, also clearly relieved. As the first "envoy" sent to negotiate with the Sea Mist fleet, he had already prepared himself to die for the city-state before coming here. Even so, he still felt the sharp joy of someone who had just escaped death.

The small boat from the Sea Mist soon reached Frostholm's cutter. Several Undying sailors in Old Era naval uniforms sat aboard it.

The Queen's emblem on their arms and their uniforms from a bygone age drew every eye. Even more striking than their clothes, though, was the fact that they were Undying.

Two of them had gaping holes in their heads. Another had a hole straight through his chest. Only one seemed to be without visible wounds—yet his swollen, bloated body looked like the corpse of someone who had been soaking in seawater for three days.

The Frostholm seamen on the cutter grew nervous at the sight of these Undying sailors. When they watched them step onto their ship, many showed complex and troubled looks.

The Undying did not seem to care how the living felt. They walked straight toward the person who looked like the highest-ranking officer on deck.

"Who is the envoy?"

"That would be me." The man in the short formal coat and gold-rimmed glasses stepped forward at once. He fought down his nervousness and forced himself not to stare at the Undying sailors' terrible wounds. Keeping his voice as calm as he could, he said: "My name is Eddie Ruhl. I represent the city-state of Frostholm in talks with the Sea Mist fleet."

“A clerk?” The swollen Undying sailor frowned and gave Eddie a slow once-over, his tone mocking. “I thought you would at least send some military men. Has Frostholm’s navy already run out of soldiers with enough courage?”

The officer beside Eddie stepped forward half a pace at once, but before he could speak, Eddie lifted his hand to stop him.

“I am the envoy,” the civil official with the gold-rimmed glasses said, looking at the Undying sailor. “Take me to see General Tyrian.”

Chapter 375: Reflection

Eddie boarded the small boat bound for the Sea Mist. The Undying sailors with their dreadful faces looked him up and down like they were studying a rare beast.

The confidential secretary felt uncomfortable all over, even a little chilled to the bone.

“I really didn’t expect you to insist on coming alone,” the swollen Undying sailor said, sounding almost admiring. “Our captain said he would let three people come aboard.”

“There’s no difference between three and one,” Eddie said, shaking his head. “If General Tyrian allowed me to bring an entire team, of course I would bring all my advisers and assistants. But he only allows three people… so it’s no different from going by myself.”

“You could bring two soldiers along to steady your nerves.” Another Undying sailor burst out laughing. The wind whistled in and out of his holed throat as he did.

“I don’t need help with my nerves. soldiers wouldn’t be any use,” Eddie said, very serious.

His answer made the Undying sailors lose interest. Someone muttered on the boat: “…posing official.”

A short while later, Tyrian met the envoy from the city-state—a man in formal dress with gold-rimmed glasses, hair combed so neatly it might have just been done, a man in his thirties or forties who looked as if he had been drinking tea in an office only a moment before.

He was slick and well-groomed, and he had come alone.

The Pirate Lord, who had been ready for something very different, was surprised. He even felt a little awkward, with his strength having nowhere to go. He had thought the first person to board the Sea Mist would at least be from the military.

Soon, though, he guessed what Frostholm's authorities had in mind.

Relations between the Sea Mist fleet and the city-state were already tense. The two sides had faced each other over a powder keg for fifty years. In such a sensitive moment, sending a few more officers over to talk would do no good at all. Sending a clerk at least showed some goodwill.

This clerk, however, was clearly a little nervous.

On the deck of the Sea Mist, Tyrian looked the "city-state diplomat" up and down. He could easily see the forced calm in the man's eyes and hear the uneven rhythm of his breathing. The man's poise would have been enough to fool ordinary people, but it could not fool a captain who commanded a legion of Undying.

Tyrian could even hear every beat of the diplomat's heart.

Eddie was also studying the Pirate Lord in front of him—the man who had once defended the city-state, and who had now become the source of almost every horror story in Frostholm.

Tall, strong, silent, and stern, with a single eye that held both judgment and cold disdain, every one of Tyrian's glances felt like a verdict.

In front of this Pirate Lord, even breathing seemed hard work.

“General Tyrian,” Eddie said. He took two deep breaths, straightened his back, and met the Pirate Lord’s gaze. “On behalf of the city-state of Frostholm, I offer you our greetings. I’m very glad to stand on this legendary warship.”

“Half a century,” Tyrian said. He looked calmly at the man who was a head shorter than he was. “It took Frostholm half a century to find the courage to speak to me?”

Eddie ignored the provocation in his words and went on: “I came here under orders. The feud between Frostholm and the Sea Mist fleet is real, but that is not what we are here to discuss today. You know what kind of trouble the city-state is facing. We only want to know the purpose of the Sea Mist fleet’s arrival. Captain Tyrian, what do you want, and what do you intend to do?”

“‘General’… spare me that title. I don’t enjoy it,” Tyrian said. He gave Eddie a light glance and walked slowly toward the rail. “As for what I intend to do… isn’t it obvious? I’m blockading this city-state that is about to fall, to keep your mess from spreading and hurting my ‘trade partners’ on the Frost Sea.”

“Trade partners?”

“I think that’s a fair name. They pay the price, and the Sea Mist fleet protects their safety on the Frost Sea,” Tyrian turned his head. “Don’t you think that’s an excellent trade relationship?”

Eddie’s mouth twitched, but he quickly hid the change. He glanced at the Undying sailors around them, then walked slowly to Tyrian’s side and said: “You mean… you simply want to help Frostholm contain this crisis?”

“That’s a bit self-flattering, but if you want to see it that way, I won’t object,” Tyrian said lightly. “I don’t really need you to do anything, as long as you don’t get in my way.”

Eddie fell silent for two seconds, then finally asked with care: “May I know why you are helping us at all?”

Tyrian rested both hands on the rail and did not turn his head. “Is that reason so important?”

“I need a reason. It will help my superiors and my colleagues feel a little easier.”

“Ah, Mr. Eddie, so what you need is a reason that can put people’s hearts at rest.” Tyrian laughed and turned back, locking eyes with Eddie. “Then I’ll tell you the reason—it’s simply my Father’s order.”

Eddie froze.

A moment later, horror crept visibly over his face.

“Looks like you understand,” Tyrian went on. “Yes, my Father’s orders. You can think of them as coming from Subspace. He told me to surround your pitiful little city-state with troops. So go back and tell your superiors that the Sea Mist fleet is carrying out the will of Subspace,” Tyrian said, his tone quite cheerful. “Then they can all sleep like babies.”

The joy on the Pirate Lord’s face was plain. Eddie finally reacted—or thought he did. He let out a long breath and wiped the sweat from his brow. “That joke is not funny at all, Captain Tyrian… I understand. Since you don’t wish to explain further, I won’t ask.”

Tyrian stared at the “Frostholm ambassador” in front of him for a moment, then clicked his tongue.

These days, no one believed the truth.

Still, his mood was very good.

It was fun to watch this deadly serious Frostholm high official jump at every word in front of him.

“You may go, Mr. Eddie,” he said politely. “We haven’t prepared dinner for you aboard.”

Eddie clearly froze. “Ah? Wait, I still—”

“You still have many questions,” Tyrian said, still calm. “About the Sea Mist fleet’s next plans. About Dagger Island. About the Queen and the Abyssal Trench Project in those days. But sadly, I don’t have much to say to Frostholm. You’ve already achieved your goal and finished your mission. Go back and report to your superiors. If anything else comes up later, you can contact us by wireless telegraph. There’s no need to send people anymore. We can hear you on any open frequency.”

Eddie blinked, then quickly understood, and a trace of joy crossed his face. “Ah, all right, Captain Tyrian. Thank you very much for your understanding…”

He stopped there, as if something had just come to mind, then hurried to add: “Ah, wait, one more question—the last question!”

Tyrian raised an eyebrow. “Oh?”

“It’s about… that mysterious light signal you flashed to our scout boat before,” Eddie said, his face a little awkward as he chose his words. “We spent a long time trying to decode it after we went back…”

Tyrian watched him quietly, staring at the envoy until Eddie’s expression grew more and more strained under his gaze. Then Tyrian suddenly smiled.

“The sailors were careless with maintenance. The signal lamp was broken, that’s all.”

Eddie: “…?”

Tyrian finally burst into happy laughter.

Eddie’s face went through a series of changes. His hand brushed over the buttons of his coat. But in the end, he also began to laugh, and soon he was laughing along with Tyrian.

Then Tyrian stopped laughing all at once.

He reached out and slapped the “Frostholm ambassador” on the shoulder.

“They sent a very good man, Mr. Eddie. I almost want to invite you to stay aboard for dinner.”

“But I have to get back to my ship in time,” Eddie said, also stopping his laughter and slowly shaking his head. “Too many people are on edge. We can’t keep pouring all our energy into watching and guessing about each other.”

Tyrian said nothing. He only nodded gently, then held out his hand to the side in a gesture of farewell.

Eddie nodded back, straightened his coat and tie, and started toward the ladder on the other side of the deck.

Just then, something seemed to catch at the edge of his vision, and his footsteps stopped.

The Frostholm envoy walked to the rail in surprise and looked down at the sea. “…Captain Tyrian, what is that?”

“Hm?” Tyrian frowned and followed the line of Eddie’s pointing finger.

He saw it. It was a shadow.

Beneath the surface, at a depth he could not judge, a hazy shadow was crossing the wide space between the Sea Mist and several escort ships, moving quickly away.

The shadow was faint and translucent, like the reflection of a ship cast into the water, yet no structure of the vessel could be seen. Tyrian stared at it for a long time. In the end he could only think that it looked like… the bottom of a ship.

It was as if an upside-down ship were sailing under the surface.

Tyrian lifted his head and looked toward the direction where the shadow was sailing.

That was the direction where Dagger Island had once been.

Chapter 376: Entrenched

The sound of machinery echoed through the plant. Water thundered through the giant pipes, and a sharp, chemical stench hung in the air, strong enough to make one's stomach churn.

Agatha stood by the safety railing and leaned forward to look down into the buffer pool. Filthy liquid churned and rolled in the huge reservoir. Bubbles rose from the surface now and then, along with strange, shifting colors of light, disgusting like the stomach acid of some great beast.

A manager in a light brown coat, his thinning hair plastered to his scalp, stood behind the young Gatekeeper. His face looked tense, and one hand tugged nervously at the button on his chest.

"The drainage from the north side of Oak Street and the area around Cemetery No. 4 all converges here," the manager said. He watched the Gatekeeper's expression as he reported, speaking very carefully. "After we received the order, we cut off all nearby pipe connections at once and checked the alarm devices on every buffer pool. We did not find any sign of blasphemous corruption…"

Agatha listened in silence for a while, then suddenly asked: "How is the sewage usually treated?"

"How is it treated?" The manager froze for a second, then hurried to answer. "First we use high-pressure steam to carry out purification on any possible corruption—you know how it is. The sewage has been in contact with humans and then flows through dark pipes. It is bound to become a carrier for certain things. After the steam purification comes settling and filtration. What you see now is the settling tank. Then we perform a second steam purification. After that purification, part of the water is sent back into the factories for recycling, and the rest… is discharged into the sea."

Agatha gave a small nod and asked again: "Roughly how long does it take for sewage discharged from the north side of Oak Street to reach this place?"

"That depends on the exact route, but usually no more than two hours," the manager answered.

"How long does the sewage stay here?"

"The water in the settling tanks is replaced every seventy-two hours." The manager raised his hand. Under the Gatekeeper's steady questions, he grew more and more nervous. He wiped the sweat from his forehead, but still answered with precision. "The purification and inspection procedures are strictly regulated. They never run shorter than that."

Agatha nodded slightly and quickly worked through the timing in her mind. She compared the hour of the "replica incident" in that townhouse with the sewage treatment schedule. Then she said, half to herself: "So if that thing really escaped through the drainage system, it should still be here…"

"Gatekeeper," the administrator blurted, wiping his shining forehead again. At last he could not hold back his curiosity. "What exactly… happened? Is there corruption spreading through the waste system?"

"…We cannot rule that out," Agatha replied. She glanced at the administrator, then turned her gaze toward the nearby black-clad Guardians who were collecting samples and testing the equipment. "But according to everything we have checked so far, everything here is normal."

“Yes,” the manager said, forcing a weak smile. “Every stage here has an alarm device, built to detect possible blasphemous corruption. The treatment center also has three resident priests. They test water samples every day…”

“Resident priests?” Agatha seemed to think of something and turned her head. “How many resident priests did you say are here?”

“Th… three,” the manager stammered at once, perhaps scared by the sudden edge in Agatha’s tone. “Is… is there a problem?”

“You can only have two priests here,” Agatha said coldly. “The number of resident priests in each municipal facility is strictly regulated. Where did the third one come from?”

The manager’s expression went blank. A new sheen of sweat appeared on his forehead, and fear rose in his eyes.

Seeing this, Agatha lifted her Gatekeeper’s cane and rested it on his shoulder. She crushed the “fear” in his mind by force. Her face grew stern as she said: “Listen. From this point on, you must remain calm. Go bring all the resident priests here. Tell them the Gatekeeper needs more information. Do not show any other emotion. Do you understand?”

The administrator’s mood settled quickly, though he still looked a little nervous. He nodded in a rush. “Yes, I… I understand… I’ll go right away.”

Agatha nodded and withdrew the Gatekeeper’s cane. As he was about to leave, something else occurred to her, and she spoke up at once: “Wait. Not just the resident priests—bring everyone.”

The manager turned back, stunned. “Everyone?”

“Everyone,” Agatha repeated in a low voice. Then, still uneasy, she asked, “Since yesterday, has anyone left this treatment center?”

“No!” the manager answered at once. “When we got the order, it was fifteen minutes before shift change. Everyone working here stayed.”

“Good. Bring them all here. Tell them it is a necessary inspection. Keep your manner relaxed. Do not arouse suspicion. Go.”

The balding administrator turned and hurried away, trying to steady his emotions as he went. Agatha stood motionless by the buffer pool. Only when she saw him vanish through a nearby door did she raise her hand and signal to the Guardians who had already noticed the commotion.

The black-clad Guardians nearby moved at once. On the open ground around the buffer pool they laid out hidden runes. At crossroads and between pipes they sprinkled essential oils and powdered incense, then took up their positions, still looking as if they were merely inspecting the equipment.

While the Guardians worked, Agatha lifted the Gatekeeper’s cane and slowly traced a triangle on the floor around herself, each side about two meters long. Then she stood at the center of the triangle, resting both hands on the cane, and waited calmly.

It was not long before footsteps sounded from the main door. The administrator returned to the hall with a large crowd behind him.

Among them walked three clergy in the Death Church’s guildmaster robes, each wearing a Holy Emblem.

A dozen treatment center workers, led by the administrator, came up to Agatha and formed a loose line. Nervous, they greeted the Gatekeeper. The three resident priests stepped out from the side of the group and saluted her according to the Death Church’s internal etiquette.

Agatha ordered the three priests to spread out. Then her gaze slowly swept over every face.

She felt something wrong.

She saw no suspicious expression or movement. Her senses picked up no unusual aura. Yet Bartok's blessing had already told her that something was off—hidden in these people's breathing, hidden in their heartbeats, hidden even in the Shadows they cast upon the floor.

Agatha blinked and checked again. Everything she saw still looked normal. That only made her more certain.

There was indeed cognitive interference here—and even with a Gatekeeper present in person, that cognitive interference still held.

Was it simply because they had great courage? Or because they did not understand a Gatekeeper's power? Or… was this cognitive interference not under anyone's control at all?

Agatha slowly turned her head, fixing her eyes on the three priests.

She could leave the dozen workers aside for the moment. Among these three priests, at least one was false—but which one?

"Recite Bartok's name," Agatha said slowly. "Let the Death Sovereign's gaze fall upon us and let us tell illusion from truth in this world of dust."

"In the name of the Death Sovereign Bartok," one priest began at once, "may His gaze fall upon us…"

Then the second and the third priest opened their mouths in turn.

"In the name of the Death Sovereign Bartok…"

Three voices sounded one after another, like echoes.

Agatha frowned.

They could speak the god's name. That meant none of them was a mud-born replica, and none was a cultist loyal to a heretical faith. In such a case, the violent clash of belief would have torn their minds apart.

But how could that be? Were all three priests genuine?

Thoughts flashed through Agatha's mind, but her face stayed calm. She nodded to the three. "Next, I need to perform some necessary tests. Please understand."

As she spoke, she reached for her left eye. At once, a living eyeball popped from her socket and landed neatly in her hand.

Agatha raised the eyeball and "looked" at the three priests before her.

The first priest appeared in her sight. He was a thin, elderly man in a linen robe. Black, ink-dark chains extended from beneath his ribs. At the end of the chains, a hound of the Abyssal Deep lifted its head. Blasphemous, filthy power was gathering and taking shape in its jaws.

Heretic.

He dared to stand here in plain sight.

Agatha's face changed slightly, but she had prepared for this. As the Abyssal Hound opened its huge mouth, she slipped aside. Her right hand lifted the Gatekeeper's cane, and pale flames burst into life at its tip.

But before she could burn the heretic, another low, obscure spell-chant suddenly rose beside her.

The eyeball in Agatha's left hand snapped around. In the next second she saw a young man with straw-yellow hair and a high nose raising both hands toward her. Behind him floated a grey-black Smokewisp Jellyfish, as if formed from condensed mist.

That was the second "priest."

A wave of dizziness swept over Agatha. As she tried to steady herself, she heard a third spell being chanted.

At the edge of her vision, a pale woman lifted her hand. A cat formed of bones and mist crouched at her side.

That was the third priest.

All the priests were false.

Roars and the sounds of combat rose from all sides.

The moment the three cultists of annihilation, disguised as Death Church priests, made their move, the Guardians around them reacted and tried to rush to Agatha's aid. But they found their own enemies waiting.

The dozen "workers" the administrator had brought and the nearby black-clad Guardians clashed in a sudden frenzy.

Out of the corner of her eye, Agatha saw those "workers" crack open when they were struck. Thick, muddy filth oozed out of their splitting bodies.

Only the balding administrator broke away and ran toward a nearby pipe, screaming in helpless terror.

The entire sewage treatment center… had only one human.

Chapter 377: Gatekeeper’s Battle

It all happened in an instant.

Three cultists of annihilation, disguised as Death Church priests, launched their surprise attack. Black-clad Guardians rushed in from all sides to help. The dozen staff from the sewage treatment center and the Guardians fell upon each other. All of this unfolded almost at the same time.

A shocking truth revealed itself: this entire treatment center had long since been fully corrupted and replaced.

No wonder there had been no sign of corruption in the settling tanks or any of the pipes. No wonder the elements that escaped through the sewers seemed to have “evaporated.” It already had a lair—right here, beneath the very noses of the city-state’s authority and the Church.

Yet countless mysteries still remained. How could cultists of annihilation, followers of the Abyssal Lord, call upon the name of the God of Death? How had the “replicas” disguised as plant workers slipped past her senses? Where had the real staff gone?

But the Mortal Realm did not give Agatha much time to think or deduce.

The Abyssal Hound’s dark breath, corrosive and full of force, roared toward her. The foul mass of energy passed so close that it nearly brushed her hair, then smashed into a pillar beside the settling tank and blew straight through it. The Smokewisp Jellyfish unleashed spiritual corruption that hammered at her mind. Her movements slowed. Her thoughts dulled. At the same time, the pale woman with the cat-shaped demon raised her hand from afar.

Countless crossing blood-lines appeared around Agatha. One edge of her coat brushed against those red lines, and the cloth at the point of contact instantly crumbled to dust.

This was a carefully prepared trap. No wonder those heretics had meekly gathered here to accept “inspection”—they meant to kill the Church’s Gatekeeper.

“Foolish.”

Agatha spoke lightly and tapped the Gatekeeper’s cane against the floor.

The soft touch of the cane-tip on the ground erupted like a clap of thunder. Waves of phantom ripples spread out from the end of the Gatekeeper’s cane in every direction. In an instant, everything around her fell still.

Darkness swallowed the space around the settling tank. Everything in sight turned grey and black. Those Guardians and “replicas” locked in combat froze where they stood. Only a thin, pale light slanted in from the far-off doors and windows, and from cracks that had appeared in the high roof. It made everything within sight hazy and indistinct.

In the Spirit Realm, Agatha held her eyeball in her left hand and “looked” toward the three cultists of annihilation, who were also frozen in place.

Beside them, the demons bound by symbiotic pacts with the Abyssal Deep burned with black flames. In this world of black, white, and grey, their fire burned in eerie stillness while their smoke rose as slowly as a scene in slow motion.

Agatha lifted the Gatekeeper’s cane and gave a light sweep through the air.

The dim, grey space jolted. At once, all the black-clad Guardians who had been fighting vanished from the Spirit Realm. Agatha raised her left hand, and within the range of the eyeball’s gaze there remained only the three cultists of annihilation and the dozen twisted replicas formed of “elements” behind them.

“Feast,” Agatha said softly.

The beings of the Spirit Realm stirred. The Shadows lurking in the cracks of the world had received the Gatekeeper’s invitation and permission. In a heartbeat, countless shadows surfaced on every “surface” around the settling tank—on the floor, on the walls, along the pipes, even on the high roof.

They were like cheering crowds, like herds of beasts packed together. Massed Shadows surged along every surface, flowing toward the enemies in Agatha’s sight.

Every surface within sight crawled with moving Shadows, a sight to make the scalp prickle. But Agatha only watched it all in silence. Her right eye was open and calm, holding no emotion. Her left eye was tightly shut. In her left palm, the eyeball kept turning, never losing track of even the smallest stir around her.

The first to be surrounded were the replicas. The Shadows surged over them like an incoming tide. In a blink, they had spread across the replicas’ bodies and swallowed them whole, dissolving them in utter silence.

In the next moment, the Shadows rushed toward the three cultists of annihilation and the demons bound to them through symbiotic pacts.

The Abyssal demons sensed danger.

A strange cracking sound came from within their bodies and along their chains. The flames on all the Abyssal demons began to shudder violently. The edges of the cultists’ bodies rippled with the same strange vibration and blur. Inside this domain where all things were frozen, they struggled and “came alive.”

The young man bound to the Smokewisp Jellyfish was the first to break free. He tore himself out of the Spirit Realm's grip and, by instinct, raised his head to look toward Agatha.

Almost at the same time, the thin old man bound to the Abyssal Hound also broke loose. Seeing what his companion was doing, he shouted a warning:

"Don't meet the Gatekeeper's eyes!"

But his warning came too late. The young cultist had already turned his gaze toward the triangle where Agatha stood.

Agatha raised her left hand higher. She held up her eyeball as though offering it to the young cultist.

The heretic's eyes flew wide. His gaze locked onto the eyeball in Agatha's palm, his whole being caught by it. He stared, stunned, almost intoxicated. A quiet, peaceful smile slowly spread across his face.

As if in that moment, he had grasped the true meaning of life and death, and in that truth had found the whole purpose and answer of his existence.

"Ah, how beautiful…"

He spoke in a soft voice, then smiled and slowly fell backward into the tide of Shadows.

He and his Abyssal demon were torn into pieces in an instant by the endless Shadows.

But as that heretic fell, a strange shriek rang out from nearby. A sharp gust of wind pressed in from Agatha's right. She had to turn her body slightly to avoid it. An invisible blade skimmed past her forehead. She turned her head toward the source of the attack.

The pale woman bound to the cat-shaped demon was screaming at her. Her mouth split open like a twisting, inhuman maw. Blasphemous spells were crushed into short, piercing cries. A new blade of wind was already taking shape.

On the other side, the Abyssal Hound had also prepared its next breath.

Agatha seemed to ignore the hound and the thin old man behind her. She lifted the Gatekeeper's cane and pointed it at the pale woman, who had already begun to distort like a demon. At the same time, she raised her left hand again, holding up the eyeball.

The pale woman instinctively tried to avoid the gaze of the eyeball in Agatha's hand—only to be met, in the next second, by a dull gunshot.

The front of the Gatekeeper's cane spat a burst of blinding fire. A heavy silver bullet blasted apart the pale woman's already torn and twisted head.

In the next heartbeat, as the heretic's headless body fell and the Shadows swallowed it, a mass of fiercely corrosive Abyssal Deep breath slammed into Agatha's back and exploded.

Black fire leapt up. Smoke and dust billowed. The hound's breath strike burst behind the Gatekeeper and quickly faded.

Agatha's black coat did not bear a single mark.

She slowly turned and looked at the last remaining cultist—the thin old man.

He stared at her, eyes wide with shock and terror.

"I thought that if you dared to set this trap, it must have been after careful study and planning," Agatha said, calmly fixing the final enemy with her gaze. "But judging by your expression, that is not the case. So… were you three merely expendable pawns?"

The last cultist's fear grew even stronger, and beneath it there was a hint of helpless confusion.

Agatha noticed the change in his eyes.

“Are you looking for this?” the young Gatekeeper said quietly.

The next second, she opened her mouth wide.

A foul mass of viciously corrosive Abyssal Deep breath formed at once in front of her. It shot forward with the same force and along the same path as before, racing back toward the Abyssal Hound at the old man’s side.

The demon sensed the danger at once. It reacted almost instantly, trying to leap aside. But the returning Abyssal Deep breath curved in midair like a shell with eyes. It drove straight into the hound’s skull. After a brief delay, the demon made of piled bones exploded into a rain of fragments.

The thin cultist bound to the demon let out a scream. Even though no attack had touched his body, he crumpled to the ground in agony and could not even crawl.

The tide of Shadows surged toward him in a blink, eager to continue the Feast.

“This one is mine,” Agatha’s voice rang out. At the same time, the heavy thud of the Gatekeeper’s cane striking the floor echoed through the dark space. “Leave.”

The Shadows all around them turned wild at once. Overwhelming malice and a jumble of eerie sounds rolled like waves through the air, battering the whole domain. Some of the Shadows even edged toward Agatha.

Her expression did not change. She simply raised the Gatekeeper’s cane and slammed it down again.

Another thunderous crash rang through the space.

“Begone.”

After a brief, frozen silence, all the Shadows withdrew like the ebbing tide.

Chapter 378: Trapped

The cluster of shadows in the Spirit Realm faded, and the noisy clamor and overwhelming malice that had filled the entire space quickly dispersed.

Agatha raised her left hand and calmly used her gaze on the gaunt heretic lying at the edge of the triangular area. He curled on the ground in pain. The black chains extending from his body were already broken; smoke and dust rose from the shattered links as they crumbled segment by segment into sand-like powder.

Now that the Abyssal demons bound to him by the symbiotic pact were dead, this heretic's life was also about to end—but for the moment, he could still answer a few questions.

Agatha did not really expect this stubborn heretic to cooperate, but she still walked over slowly and stopped at the edge of the triangle, looking down at the dying cultist.

"You actually managed, right under the Church's nose, to completely corrupt and replace a whole piece of infrastructure, even to the point of replacing every priest there… That surprised me," she said slowly. Her voice seemed to carry a low echo from a tomb; the dizzying sound could wear down most people's will. "How did you do it?"

The dying heretic struggled to lift his head, but only showed a trace of a mocking smile. There was no fear left on that gaunt face. "You guess?"

Agatha was unmoved: "Your nest is inside Frostholm, isn't it?"

“Heh…” The cultist’s head trembled. He braced himself and forced his body to roll so he lay on his back on the pale ground, facing Agatha’s gaze from below. “Don’t waste your effort. So what if it is in Frostholm… You won’t find it… The day you find the sanctuary will be the day we succeed, foolish priest…”

Agatha’s face stayed expressionless. She lightly lifted her Gatekeeper’s cane and tapped the tip against the cultist’s chest: “What are you really trying to do? Corrupt the city-state with that so-called ‘elements’? Or do you imagine you can use those ‘replicas’—things that cannot even keep themselves stable—to replace the living people in the city? What connection do you have with the power in the Deep Sea? Is it related to the Abyssal Trench Project?”

A cluster of pale flame flared at the tip of the Gatekeeper’s cane. The fire seared flesh and soul alike. The agony made the cultist’s whole body twitch and spasm, yet the heretic, already lost in fanatical faith, only clenched his teeth until they ground, glaring at the Gatekeeper before him. The clacking between his teeth squeezed out only a chilling, twisted laugh: “Heh… heh… The promised… is about to descend… No one… no one will escape…”

Agatha finally frowned. She slowly raised her arm, and with the Gatekeeper’s cane she lifted the cultist little by little into the air. The pale flame burned his body, already twisted from his long symbiotic pact with the Abyssal demons, so that he dangled like a tattered rag in a fire.

Her voice was icy, like sound drifting through a crypt: “One last question, you heretics… How can you speak the name of the God of Death?”

Within the pale flame, a smile slowly spread across the skeletal cultist’s face. He seemed especially delighted; when he saw the Church’s Gatekeeper puzzled by this question, even the pain brought by the Cremation Fire seemed to lessen by half.

“The Abyssal Lord brought us the revelation… All faiths in this world point to the same place… We who have received the revelation have already stepped past those so-called boundaries… Gatekeeper, do you really think your God is any different from the Holy Lord?”

Agatha’s expression changed at once. The cultist before her had dared to mention the Abyssal Lord in the same breath as the God of Death. Such blasphemy sent anger surging through her. Yet in the flames the cultist showed a final, relieved smile, giving her no chance to question him further. He let out his last breath, and what remained of his body quickly crumbled into ash.

“…Just a madman’s ravings, all upside down and twisted.”

Agatha’s face darkened. She slowly lowered the Gatekeeper’s cane. The anger in her heart was still there, but it did not interfere with her judgment. Once she had reined in the surge of emotion, she immediately began to think.

Setting aside his last remarks, where he put the Abyssal Lord on the same level as the God of Death, this cultist who had been obstinate to the end had actually revealed quite a bit of information she could work with.

They did indeed have a “nest” inside Frostholm, and they called this nest a “sanctuary”. That meant it truly was a place for conducting rituals, which matched the information she already had. The sanctuary had also been “hidden” by some special method, making it extremely hard to find, and he had just said that the moment the sanctuary was found would be the moment of their success… So the way that place was concealed was very likely tied to the progress of their ritual. The closer the ritual came to completion, the more obvious its hiding place would become…

Was it because holding the ritual would inevitably leak some kind of aura? Or because revealing the sanctuary itself was a necessary step for the ritual to be completed?

The cultist had also said, “The promised is about to descend.” That probably referred to the ultimate “prophecy” in their belief system: the power of the Abyssal Lord would overturn the Mortal Realm. The Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea, which now lay in the deep layers of the world, would become the new “Mortal Realm”. Those mad annihilationist cultists had always treated the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea as their promised land. There was no doubt about that.

But how would this process actually be carried out? By simply dropping “elements” into the city over and over? That was clearly not enough… Those “replicas” could barely keep themselves stable for long; how could they possibly corrupt an entire city-state?

Unless… those annihilationist cultists had found a way to keep the “replicas” stable for a long time. Unless they could create such an environment—or… turn Frostholm itself into such an environment…

Agatha frowned, cut off her thoughts, and lifted her head to look around.

She was still in the Spirit Realm. The things around her were lit by the pale radiance spilling through the cracks in the ceiling, making every outline hazy. Faint noises rose again from all directions. The ever-hungry Spirit Realm shadows were starting to stir once more—a single Feast was never enough to keep them quiet for long.

The young Gatekeeper shook her head, raised her left hand, and put her own eyeball back into its socket.

The vague noises around her vanished at once. The hazy lights and the black and white space blinked back into color, and the breath of the Mortal Realm rushed toward her.

Agatha let out a small breath and reached into her clothes for her eye drops, but suddenly her movements froze.

All around her was utterly silent. There was not a single person.

Agatha lifted her head and looked around. She could not see the black-clad guards she had brought, nor the sewage treatment plant administrator who had fled earlier. She could not even see the ash and remains left behind by the three cultists and the dozen or so “replicas”—

In theory, after she destroyed those cultists and “replicas” in the Spirit Realm, their remains should have appeared at the same time in the Mortal Realm.

The silence around her was too eerie. She could not sense the presence of any living person nearby.

Agatha’s brows knit tightly. She rolled her eyes in their sockets, easing the dryness while carefully studying her surroundings, then slowly walked toward the nearby main door.

The slightly rusted metal door was left ajar, as if someone had left in a hurry and not closed it properly.

With creaking sounds, the metal door was pushed open bit by bit.

Beyond the door stretched a long corridor. The gas lamps along it burned steadily and brightly, yet brought none of the warmth or comfort that light should have given.

“Tap… tap… tap…”

The sound of the Gatekeeper’s cane and her heels hitting the floor rang out clear yet hollow in the corridor as Agatha walked forward slowly.

The entire sewage treatment plant was empty.

But she saw no enemies either.

Just like that, she passed straight through the plant area and came out to the open space outside.

The sky was murky. Heavy, chaotic clouds covered the city-state. Only a few weak rays of light seeped between them, just barely enough to show that it was daytime. Every building in sight lay under this dim daylight, wrapped in a cold, deathly, uncanny atmosphere.

Agatha clearly remembered that when she had come to the sewage treatment plant, the weather outside had been bright and clear—the Sun had hung high in the sky and there had not been a single cloud over the city-state.

The Sun?

A trace of doubt suddenly rose in Agatha's heart, and then that hint of doubt tore wide open in her mind into a clear split in her awareness. She suddenly realized something and lifted her head again to study the sky.

Only a sourceless, chaotic glow spread through the sky. There was no celestial body that could be called "the Sun" at all.

Agatha tried hard to recall what the Sun looked like, to recall the very concept of the Sun.

She could not remember. It was as if a heavy curtain had been thrown over her reason, keeping her from recalling what the Sun in her memories had been like. Only one thing remained very clear—there should exist in this world something called "the Sun", something that naturally hung high in the sky, giving off light and heat and shining on all things!

“…cognitive interference, able to affect a Gatekeeper… The intensity is astonishing, and it covers the entire environment…” Agatha murmured to herself. After a brief moment of shock, she quickly calmed down again and looked around once more.

“It’s an Otherworld.”

Chapter 379: Confronting the Madman

Agatha walked along the cold, deserted street. The cityscape she knew so well now seemed filled everywhere with a silent, eerie air. In the shadows between buildings and behind tightly shut doors and windows, it felt as if pairs of eyes were hiding, spying on her.

She was searching for a way out of this Otherworld—or for the culprit who had trapped her here.

Any place that looked out of place might be a rift where it intersected with the Mortal Realm, yet so far she had not found such a rift anywhere in this eerie “Frostholm city-state”.

There was only one thing she was sure of: she had already touched the shadows that had been shrouding the city-state all this time. Whether by accident or by the hidden hand of the mastermind, she had managed to cross the “screen” that had always blocked her sight.

This place that looked like Frostholm yet was not Frostholm had to be the source of the strange incidents that had plagued the city-state lately.

From far away came the sound of wheels rolling over cobblestones, faint jingling of carriage bells, and the noise of doors opening and closing.

Agatha raised her head toward the direction of the sounds, yet saw only an empty street. But a little farther away, she could indeed see shadowy shapes like carriages flashing past at intersections, and figures like pedestrians hurrying across those distant crossings.

There were “people” in this city, but most of the time she could only see distant phantoms. Here she could hear the voices of residents, but could rarely locate exactly where those sounds came from.

It was like a gaudy, distorted, twisted dream.

Agatha’s figure passed through yet another intersection, then stopped in the shadows between buildings.

Blind wandering would only waste her strength and time. She needed to judge her surroundings carefully.

She closed her eyes and let her senses spread out around her, carefully picking out all the details in the environment—sounds, smells, the direction of the wind, and… the warmth of living people.

After a moment, Agatha lifted her head toward a certain direction and started walking that way. Her eyes were still closed, yet she avoided every obstacle in her path as if she could see everything clearly. She threaded through alleys, passed junction after junction and side street, and did not know how long she walked before she stopped in front of a building at a street corner.

Agatha opened her eyes and saw a small restaurant before her. Its lamps were blazing inside, and lively voices came from within.

The sounds were very real. She could feel the presence of living people inside.

Agatha steadied herself and went up to push open the restaurant door.

A clear bell rang as the door opened, and the scene inside the restaurant rushed into view. For a moment Agatha felt dazed. She even wondered if she had already left that strange Otherworld and returned to the normal Mortal Realm.

The restaurant was brightly lit. Guests could be seen eating at tables everywhere, while servers busied themselves back and forth between the tables and the counter. The shop assistant in charge of greeting customers was working behind the counter. At her ears rang the clear clink of knives, forks, cups, and plates, as well as people chatting about the weather, their work, and prices. The cold, deathly air she had soaked up out on the street seemed swept away by this bustling “worldly scene”.

Yet the next second, Agatha noticed something deeply wrong here. Though the diners were eating at their tables, every cup and plate in front of them was empty. Though the shop assistant bustled behind the counter, he only paced back and forth in place, wiping the same cup over and over.

Everyone was like an automaton with its program set in advance, just repeating the actions that ordinary people should have in daily life—only… their imitation was eerily lifelike.

Agatha frowned. Once she sensed the truth, the atmosphere here felt even more uncanny than the empty street outside. But she did not turn to leave. Instead, she stepped further into the shop.

The stranger a place was, the more it meant she was on the right track.

With Agatha’s first step, the lively chatter inside the restaurant suddenly stopped.

All the diners who had been talking closed their mouths at the same time, yet the expressions from their conversations still remained on their faces, and their hands still held the motions of eating. In the wide space, once the voices were gone, only the monotonous clatter of cups, plates, and cutlery remained.

When Agatha took her second step, the clatter of cups and cutlery vanished as well. Everyone in the restaurant stopped moving, as if their power had been suddenly cut off, and froze beside the square tables.

As Agatha took her third step, everyone in the restaurant put down their knives and forks. They rose like zombies and turned their heads, dozens of empty gazes falling on her.

Agatha looked toward the counter in front of her. The shop assistant who had been wiping the same cup at last stopped as well. But unlike the zombie-like diners around him, this shop assistant slowly lifted his head, and when he looked at Agatha there was a faint smile on his face.

The smile even seemed a little friendly.

“Hello, Miss Gatekeeper,” the shop assistant spoke. He was a young man with short blond hair and a rather decent face, wearing a white shirt and a black jacket. He was polite as he talked, as if he really were serving a guest who had just walked in: “I’m very glad you could visit us. What do you think of this delightful city?”

“It seems you’re the one behind all this,” Agatha said calmly, fixing her gaze on the blond “shop assistant” before her. “Finding you was a bit easier than I expected.”

“Or perhaps not as easy as you imagine,” the blond young man laughed. “Would you like something? Contaminated sewage? Bread made of dirt? Or… an empty bowl? We have plenty of those here.”

Agatha had no intention of answering. She simply raised her Gatekeeper’s cane and swept it through the air.

In an instant, the blond young man behind the counter was wrapped layer upon layer in pale flame that appeared out of thin air. Within a few breaths, that shell of flesh was burned to ash by the Gatekeeper’s Cremation Fire.

Only a scattering of gray-white bone ash drifted down and settled on the counter.

Yet Agatha's expression did not change at all, because before the flames had even flared, she had already sensed that there was no living aura inside that young man.

A strange squelching of viscous matter sounded from the side. Agatha turned her head and saw one of the stiffly standing "diners" by a nearby table suddenly begin to tremble all over. In the next second his body melted like wax. Black, muddy substance surged and shifted over his surface, and within a few breaths that diner had changed into a blond young man in a white shirt and black jacket.

"What an unfriendly way to say hello," the blond young man said, brushing dust from his clothes and looking at Agatha with a hint of helplessness. "Miss Gatekeeper, you don't really think that would get rid of me, do you? Do you think I would recklessly expose my true body in a place this dangerous?"

"I know you're not here," Agatha said without changing expression, "but at least this can make you stop your noise for a while."

"All right, all right, it seems you're not in the mood to chat—you're a dull woman. By comparison, that Professor Merson was much more interesting in his final moments," the blond young man said with a shrug. "But that's fine. As long as you stay here quietly for a while, I don't mind if you're a boring prisoner."

The instant she heard the words "Professor Merson", Agatha's expression changed slightly. She thought of the vanished Dagger Island, and of the reports that spoke of a series of explosions there just before the island disappeared. Then she caught the information hidden in the last few sentences he had said.

“What did you mean by those last words?” She fixed her gaze on the blond young man before her and spoke in an icy tone.

“Nothing much, I’m only asking you to stay here as a guest for a while,” the blond young man said, smiling brightly. “You don’t need to worry about the situation ‘up there’—soon, another you will return there. She will gather the guardians just like you did and compile a report based on the actual situation at the sewage treatment plant…

“Don’t worry, she will report everything faithfully, including the corruption at the plant and the replacement of its staff. Then, just as you usually do, she will return to the Cathedral to make her report and speak with Bishop Ivan. After that, she will patrol the city-state, continue handling all the problems it faces, and continue the investigations you failed to finish… Nothing will be delayed.”

Agatha’s face finally turned completely cold. She stared hard at the blond young man before her: “You even made a ‘replica’ of a Gatekeeper?!”

“Is that so hard?” The blond young man slowly withdrew his smile and looked at Agatha with a faintly mocking gaze. “Of course, she doesn’t have your power. But aside from that, she has no flaws. She is even more perfect than any replica we have ever made before—do you know just how perfect? She… doesn’t even know she’s fake.”

Agatha’s face was like frost. The knuckles of the hand gripping her Gatekeeper’s cane turned slightly white. “You can’t fool the Cathedral with a replica—there are countless sharp eyes there.”

“Countless sharp eyes—mortal eyes,” the blond young man said unhurriedly, meeting Agatha’s icy gaze without a hint of fear. “You are overestimating your colleagues. And speaking of replicas… do you truly think that you and the others are any different from the ‘replicas’ you talk about?”

He smiled again and slowly raised both hands, like a preaching Saint revealing the truth of the world: “Miss Gatekeeper, from the very beginning there has never been any such thing as a replica—or rather… we are all replicas. That is the truth.”

Chapter 380: Island in the Mist

The island was getting closer. The thick fog around it, and the silhouettes inside the fog, also became clearer and clearer. Lawrence stood on the foredeck of the White Oak, both hands gripping the rail in front of him so hard that his knuckles had gone pale.

Anyone would have been nervous. Even an old captain who had spent half his life drifting on the Boundless Sea was no exception. What would they find on that island? What were those shadows in the dense fog? Why did the island appear around the White Oak again and again, almost as if it had a mind of its own? And most important of all… what was this stretch of sea, wrapped in so many strange phenomena?

Lawrence took a deep breath. The cold air rushed into his lungs and forced his restless thoughts to calm down. He tried hard not to think about other Anomalies, such as Martha appearing in front of him, and the eerie fact that other people could also see Martha. He knew he had to cut off that line of thought, because all of this was clearly tied to his worsening mental state. If he kept thinking about it, Martha might really become something more than a phantom.

He had no potion left. Even if he had some, the draught had clearly lost its effect.

The steam core was running steadily as the White Oak slowly closed in on the small island with its twisted shoreline. The beautiful white ship glided across the surface of the sea and left a long wake behind it. In the rippling waves spreading out from that wake, a faint ghostly green flashed by for an instant.

No one noticed what was happening at the stern. Everyone on the ship was focused on the strange little island.

The edges of the island were steep and jagged, full of sharp rocks and cliffs. There was nowhere suitable to come alongside. The experienced helmsman did not rashly bring the ship straight in. Instead, he steered the White Oak into a slow circle around the island.

When they had gone about a third of the way around, the sailor in the lookout post suddenly spotted something.

“There is a harbor!” the sailor shouted from the high platform.

A moment later, a small pier came into Lawrence’s view. The facilities deeper inside the pier were covered by fog, so he could not see them clearly, but the part that stretched out into the sea was still visible. That part looked complete, with no sign of damage.

An intact pier meant they could bring the White Oak in to dock instead of using a small boat to land. That would clearly make exploring the island safer. Besides easier supplies and a faster retreat, the few small-caliber escort guns mounted on the White Oak could also provide cover for any operation along the shore.

Lawrence returned to the bridge. Under his command, the White Oak began to move carefully toward the empty pier. Because there were no mental guidance personnel on the shore to assist them, the whole docking process was very slow, but in the end it was completed safely.

Lawrence looked to the far side of the pier. Fog covered the island. Even the nearby pier facilities looked hazy in the mist. He was not sure if it was just his imagination, but he felt that the fog on this island was even thicker than before.

“I don’t see anyone,” the First Mate came to stand beside Lawrence, watching the island as he spoke. “But I can faintly see some lights… they seem to be coming from the harbor buildings.”

“Anything on the radio?”

“No. After we got close to this island, we even lost the Frostholm signal that we were always able to receive,” the First Mate shook his head. “We also got no reply from the light-signal.”

Lawrence thought for a moment. “Go pick twelve sharp and cautious sailors, arm them, and come ashore with me to explore.”

“You are going ashore in person?” The First Mate was startled. “This island looks very strange. If you go yourself, there might be…”

“Risk? I am afraid the risk is the same if I stay on the ship,” Lawrence shook his head. “What is strange is not only this island, but this whole stretch of sea. We are trapped inside a large Vision. Inside the range of a Vision, danger is everywhere. Going ashore at least gives us a chance to find useful information.”

The First Mate opened his mouth, but he had to admit that the captain’s experience and judgment both made sense.

“Alright, I will go get ready.”

After a while, the First Mate picked out twelve suitable sailors from among the crew members. They were all veteran seafarers with many years of experience, men of firm will and devout faith. Together with the First Mate himself, that made thirteen people getting ready to go ashore with Lawrence.

The duties of holding the White Oak were temporarily handed over to the Second Mate.

The rope ladder was lowered to the pier's jetty. Lawrence led his small exploration party down the ladder and stepped onto the mysterious island wrapped in mist.

The solid ground under their feet eased some of the unease in the explorers' hearts. Lawrence stood on the pier, stamped hard on the ground, then turned back and muttered: "At least this concrete is real."

"The lights are that way," the First Mate said. He held a large-caliber rifle in his hands and lifted his head to look ahead. "We can still see them here, but I still don't see any sign of people moving around."

"Do not split up. Do not touch anything you do not recognize. If you hear a voice around you calling to you, do not answer until you know where the voice is coming from and where your teammates are," Lawrence said in a very serious tone. "If you see anything suspicious in the fog, warn everyone at once. Do not open fire on your own and do not break away from the group to explore."

He paused, then swept his gaze over the team he had brought.

Twelve sailors, one First Mate, and himself.

"Finally, remember this. There are only fourteen of us. Before we return to the ship, we may have fewer men, but we must never have more."

The sailors answered at once: "Yes, Captain!"

Lawrence nodded and led the team into the thick fog.

They crossed the pier's jetty and came to an open area. It looked like a place for temporary cargo stacking. Some remains of storage sheds and small lifting equipment were still visible, but aside from these facilities, they still did not see a single human figure.

“This does not look like it has been abandoned for long,” the First Mate muttered as he studied the area around them. “It looks like it was a busy harbor only a few days ago.”

Lawrence stayed silent. He studied the nearby harbor facilities, and suddenly his gaze fell on a metal plaque.

“Dagger Island Harbor Supplies.”

Dagger Island. That was the name of this island.

“This is Dagger Island?” The First Mate came over and read the letters on the plaque, surprise in his eyes. “I have heard of this place… it is a small island near the city-state of Frostholm. It used to produce Boiling Gold, but I heard it was turned into a military facility years ago… is this really Dagger Island?”

“Nothing here can be trusted. We just moored for a while in a place that looked very much like Frostholm,” Lawrence shook his head. “Let’s keep moving. The light we saw should be coming from the harbor office. There might be something there that can answer our questions.”

The exploration party left the pier’s storage area and started up a sloping path toward the lamp shining in the fog. Everyone’s nerves were tight. They watched every shift in the mist around them.

A very light wind blew here and there over the island. It stirred the gray-white fog so it slowly rolled and curled. The strange silhouettes that showed faintly in the distance seemed to move with it, swaying slightly like living things. In that dim and chaotic fog, the lamp grew brighter and brighter and slowly drew closer in everyone’s sight.

The First Mate, walking at the front of the line, suddenly stopped.

“What is this?” The First Mate lowered his head and frowned at a strange pile by the side of the path.

Lawrence held a revolver in one hand and a consecrated lantern in the other. He walked up to the First Mate and finally saw that pile of stuff.

It looked like a heap of gray-black mud. It had already dried. The edges were cracked like scales, but he could still see traces of how it had flowed a moment before it dried.

It was as if a mass of boiling, bubbling slime had suddenly had all its water sucked out in the next instant.

“Silt?” Lawrence frowned and did not dare touch the strange thing. “Why would there be silt here?”

“I think I saw something similar back at the pier, some black sludge,” a sailor said, not very sure. “But back there it was mixed in with a pile of junk, so I just thought it was garbage…”

Lawrence nodded. Right after that, another sailor suddenly shouted: “There is another pile here!”

Lawrence turned toward the voice and saw another heap of black sludge on the other side of the path.

Was this stuff all over the island?

Unease spread in everyone’s hearts, but no one could answer what that mud really was. Lawrence pulled the team in tighter and had everyone avoid contact with the strange “silt.” Then they continued forward into the depths of the fog.

After a while, they finally reached the end of the slope. Just as Lawrence had guessed, this was where the harbor office stood.

A small building of reinforced concrete stood here. Faint yellow light spilled out of its windows, yet no sound came from inside.

The main door of the building was slightly ajar. A plaque was nailed to it. On it were the words: “Harbor General Office.”

Lawrence stepped up to the door and pressed his ear against it, listening for any sound from within. Then he got ready to push it open.

But suddenly, he froze.

On the wall beside the door, a line of marks caught his eye. They looked as if someone had rushed to carve them with a dagger. Together they formed a single sentence.

“Humans have only two eyes!”

Chapter 381: Cannon Fire

When he saw that rough and sharp line of letters, Lawrence and the First Mate both froze.

"'Humans have only two eyes'… why is this carved here?" The First Mate stared at the words for a long time with wide eyes before he turned his head in confusion. "Isn't that just normal? Except for a very few people born with deformities, who doesn't have two eyes?"

Lawrence did not answer at once. He stayed silent for a long time before he finally broke the silence. "Who do you think carved this line?"

"…The natives of the island?" the First Mate guessed, unsure. "Someone used to live on this island?"

"I am not sure about this island, but Dagger Island in the Mortal Realm definitely has people," Lawrence said slowly. He reached out and gently touched the cuts on the wall. The rough, solid feel against his fingers seemed to carry the strong emotion and will of the person who carved the phrase. "Humans have only two eyes. Someone carved this sentence on the wall on purpose. That might mean one thing…"

"It might mean one thing?"

"That on this island there once appeared things that were not 'only two eyes,' things that looked like humans," Lawrence slowly lifted his head and looked into the fog around them and the vague shapes within it. "And they mixed in among humans and could not be easily noticed."

The First Mate drew in a sharp breath and spoke with some hesitation. “Then… where did the person who carved this sentence go?”

“I do not know,” Lawrence shook his head. For some reason, he thought of the black sludge he had seen along the way and of the empty pier, but he pushed these vague guesses aside for now. He put his hand on the handle of the harbor office door. “Stay alert.”

The sound of safeties clicking off came from behind him. Lawrence steadied himself, then pushed the door open with a firm shove.

He quickly stepped to the side so he would not present his body to whatever might be hiding inside. The First Mate stepped half a pace forward, lowering himself into a crouch and pointing his rifle into the room. The sailors behind them raised their guns as well, aiming at the open doorway from different angles.

There was no movement inside the building.

The First Mate took a breath and carefully leaned forward to look through the doorway.

“There is no one inside,” he said over his shoulder. “It is an empty office with the lights on.”

Lawrence waved to the sailors, then entered the room with the First Mate leading the way.

It was an empty office. Several desks took up almost half the space. A few chairs stood in front of them, placed as if people had only just stood up from them a moment before. The electric lights on the ceiling and the gas lamps on the walls were still lit, making the room very bright. On the floor… that same strange, suspicious black sludge could be seen everywhere.

“This disgusting stuff is all over here too…” The First Mate frowned at the black substance on the floor, his face full of disgust. He carefully stepped around the dried mud and came to the desks. His eyes moved over the messy piles of papers and office items. “These things… Captain, do you want to take a look?”

“These are the forms and reports the harbor had to handle every day. Cargo in and out, personnel transfers, facility inspections, and equipment check reports…” Lawrence came up to the desks and looked through a few documents. His brow furrowed deeper and deeper. “The dates… they are from just a few days ago?”

“It feels like people were still working here not long ago,” a sailor said with a nervous gulp. “Then they all rushed to evacuate and didn’t even have time to pack up…”

“Rushed to evacuate?” Lawrence muttered under his breath. His gaze swept across the desk. A half cup of coffee sat there, not yet finished, with a thin layer of dust on its surface. Beside that desk, a patch of black sludge on the floor had already dried. A bit of the black stuff even clung to the chair. His expression grew more and more grim. “Was it really an evacuation…”

The First Mate heard the change in his tone. “Captain, what did you think of?”

Lawrence thought for a moment and was just about to speak when a harsh noise suddenly came from outside the room. It sounded like it came from the direction of the harbor square. It was the electric hiss of a loudspeaker suddenly switching on.

“Bzz…”

The shrill noise startled everyone. The sailors quickly turned their eyes to the window. The next second, a broken, twisted broadcast voice, full of interference, rang out over the whole harbor district. It sounded like an older man's voice. "Notice… we have been touched by corruption… this island… can no longer be saved… Protocol Twenty-Two will be activated… it was an honor to work with you all… we will meet again behind Bartok's gate."

After another burst of static, the broadcast from the square cut off. The First Mate stared in shock and turned back to Lawrence. "Captain, what was that…"

Before he could finish, a thunderous roar boomed from far away.

More thunder followed, one blast after another, like the sky and earth were splitting apart.

The chain of explosions swept across the whole of Dagger Island in an instant and shook everyone to the core. Lawrence almost understood what was happening the moment the blasts began.

That was not thunder. It was explosives. Some facility on the island was blowing itself up.

"Get out of the building!" Lawrence suddenly shouted. He fired his pistol at the ceiling. "There are explosives!"

The sound of his shout was almost buried by the explosion noise, but the gunshot was enough to snap the sailors out of it. They rushed for the door at once.

A dozen men burst through the doorway, ran down the slope, and sprinted toward the open ground. The explosions still rumbled from all directions, as if the whole island was being ripped to pieces. But halfway down, Lawrence suddenly felt that something was wrong.

"Stop!" He halted all at once, firing into the air again as he yelled. "Stop!"

The sailors stumbled to a halt. Then they too noticed what was wrong.

There were only explosions in their ears. In the direction of the blasts, there were no clouds of smoke, no flashes of light, and not even the faintest tremor under their feet.

Only the thunder-like noise echoed over the whole island.

After a while, the sound slowly faded away. The island returned to the same foggy silence as before. It was as if the earth-shattering bombardment had been nothing but a shared hallucination.

“Only sound?” The First Mate stared around in shock, unable to believe it.

“It was an echo,” Lawrence’s heartbeat slowly calmed as he forced himself to a decision. He did not know if he was right, but as captain he had to give everyone an answer. “What we just heard was something that once happened on this island, replaying as a lingering echo in our ears. It was not a real explosion.”

“I was scared half to death just now,” a sailor muttered. “I thought it was a real blast…”

“The closest explosion just now came from that direction,” the First Mate said. He lifted his head to check their surroundings, then pointed to the other side of the harbor square. “Should we go over there and take a look?”

“Let’s go see what is there,” Lawrence decided quickly. “If something really happened here, there should still be traces left.”

The exploration party moved into the dense fog again, now more cautious than before.

After an unknown amount of time, the ruins of a large building appeared before Lawrence.

The building stood at the inner edge of a small bay, backed by a sheer wall of rock. From the damage, it was clear that a massive explosion from the inside out had completely destroyed it.

The First Mate stood on a higher spot and stared at the ruins in shock.

“What kind of facility was this… it is incredible…”

“We should be more curious about what terrible thing happened here, so terrible that they would blow up a facility like this without hesitation,” Lawrence said in a low voice. He took a few steps forward. “If the people on this island…”

“Stop.”

A voice suddenly spoke from nearby, and Lawrence’s feet stopped at once.

“Martha?!”

He snapped his head toward the direction of the voice, calling out in alarm.

But there was only the slowly rising and falling fog there, with no sign of that familiar figure.

“Captain?” The First Mate noticed the captain’s strange reaction. He jumped down from a rock and hurried to Lawrence’s side. “What happened?”

“…An auditory hallucination,” Lawrence answered at once, his face very serious. “You did not hear a voice, did you?”

“We did not hear anything.” The sailors looked at one another. One of them answered for the group.

“We may not want to go any deeper,” Lawrence said with a frown. “We should go back to the harbor first, then…”

Martha’s voice came into his ear again, this time closer. “Go back to the ship. Now.”

Lawrence froze for a moment and forced himself not to look toward the sound. He wanted to keep talking, but a second later Martha’s voice came once more, this time almost at his ear, with a hint of urgency. “Get back on the White Oak. At once – Lawrence, they are coming!”

Lawrence’s eyes widened a little. He spoke without thinking. “Who? Who is coming?”

Beside him, the First Mate grabbed Lawrence’s arm in worry. “Captain, who are you talking to?”

Lawrence did not answer. He suddenly lifted his head and looked toward the direction where the White Oak was docked.

A wave of unease surged in his heart.

The next second, as if to prove that unease right, a heavy, muffled thunder came from that direction.

It was the sound of guns.

“Someone is firing the guns…” The First Mate reacted at once. “We have an enemy!”

“Back to the ship!” Lawrence shouted. He led the team and ran at full speed toward the harbor. In the rush of wind past his ears, Martha’s voice brushed against his ear like a whisper.

“The Sea Swallow is here…”

Chapter 382: Flames Flared Up

Lawrence ran at full speed, yet he still could not help turning his head to look toward the direction of Martha’s voice.

However, he saw nothing but the lingering thick fog over Dagger Island. The voice seemed to ring straight in his mind, urging him again and again to leave the island, to return to the White Oak, to leave this place and go to Frostholm.

Martha was of course not here.

But Lawrence still felt it was some kind of unseen guidance. Maybe it came from his faith. Maybe it came from his subconscious, from clues and instincts he had never noticed. They pushed him toward a way out of this trap.

He ran toward the harbor. Cold wind and fog slapped his face and howled past his ears. His first mate and the sailors surrounded him. Gunfire still rolled from far away. Some blasts came from the distant shore guns, and some from the light escort cannons mounted on the White Oak. The White Oak’s return fire sounded weak compared to the enemy’s attack. It was clearly at a disadvantage.

“Martha” had told him the Sea Swallow was here. But which ship was the Sea Swallow?

The harbor came into view. At the far edge of the fog, the graceful hull of the White Oak still lay moored at the end of the pier. Bursts of fire flashed again and again at her bow and stern. Each cannon blast tore the mist apart.

Out on the nearby sea, huge columns of water rose into the air from time to time. That was clearly the enemy's bombardment.

"The ship is still there!" The first mate shouted with joy when he saw the White Oak. He called out for the captain and also to rally the gasping sailors: "Jason didn't abandon us!"

Jason was the ship's second mate.

"Storm Goddess above! Get aboard and get out of this cursed place!" a sailor yelled. "The White Oak is just sitting here as a target!"

The group rushed toward the White Oak. Figures moved on the ship. The seafarers left on watch had clearly seen the captain's party returning. A rope ladder dropped from the rail. Two sailors at the edge of the deck raised consecrated lanterns and waved them anxiously in the air.

The sailors who had gone ashore sprinted toward the rope ladder.

But suddenly, Lawrence stopped. He yanked out his revolver and fired into the sky: "Stop, all of you!"

The sailors froze at the gunshot and at the captain's shout. Shocked and confused, they stopped and turned to stare at one another. First Mate Gus also stopped and looked at the old captain, puzzled. Less than a second later, the experienced seafarer understood why the captain had suddenly ordered them to halt.

The first mate panted for breath. Amid the endless thunder of the guns, he lifted his head and looked around. His gaze swept quickly over the sailors around him and over Lawrence.

Sixteen sailors stood around him, looking lost. Every face looked familiar. Captain Lawrence watched them with a grave expression.

“How many people did we bring when we set out?” Lawrence asked quickly.

“Besides you and me, there were…” The first mate started fast, but his mind went blank when he reached the number. He paused for a second or two, then remembered. “Twelve sailors!”

Lawrence’s gaze grew heavier as he looked over the group, counting them one by one in his mind.

Deep in his pupils, a faint green light seemed to flicker on and off.

“There are four extra,” the first mate said after finishing his own count. The old seafarer’s face turned very serious. He raised his gun and fired into the air, then shouted: “Everyone, spread out one meter apart! Face the captain! Keep your hands where we can see them!”

The sailors also realized what was happening. Their faces tightened with fear. But they had dealt with the Boundless Sea for many years and were experienced seafarers. They knew what to do at a time like this. Under the first mate’s orders, the sixteen sailors quickly spread out into a line.

The guns on the White Oak kept firing. More and more columns of water rose around the harbor. The enemy called the Sea Swallow seemed to be drawing closer. Lawrence’s thoughts boiled in the roar of the cannons.

They could not stay here. The White Oak was a sitting target in the harbor. Its weak self-defense guns and hull would not last long. But he could not take this group back on board either, because some “things” from the island had clearly slipped into their ranks. If he brought them back, the White Oak would not end any better than being sunk by artillery.

His gaze swept over the sixteen sailors in front of him as he tried hard to spot any strange or out-of-place face. When had the four extra people slipped in? While they crossed the thick fog? In the harbor office? Or in that moment on the island when the explosions went off and the group fell into brief chaos?

The sailors also looked one another over. In that moment, it felt as if no one was trustworthy anymore. Even their own memories and judgment seemed doubtful.

“Captain.” Gus’s voice reached Lawrence’s ears. The old seafarer’s face showed a grim resolve. “The White Oak can’t stay here any longer. You should get on board.”

Lawrence’s face suddenly grew extremely serious. “What do you mean?”

“You take the ship and leave. The rest of us will stay. We will slowly find a way to pick out whatever slipped in and deal with it. When you are safe, you can come back for us…”

Lawrence stared into the first mate’s eyes, his expression dark and silent.

That talk about coming back for them once it was safe fooled no one.

Once the White Oak left the harbor, anyone left on the island would be abandoned for good. The strange events here were plain to see. In such a short time, four unknown “things” had slipped into their ranks. What else could come from staying?

“Don’t rush to sacrifice yourselves,” Lawrence said softly. Suddenly he remembered something, and his eyes changed. “Humans have only two eyes…”

His gaze stopped on one sailor.

Then on a second, a third, and a fourth.

One of the sailors pointed at himself in surprise. He blinked his eyes, then blinked his third and fourth eyes as well. “Don’t I have two eyes?”

Lawrence said nothing. He simply raised his revolver.

The second to raise his gun was First Mate Gus. Then the other sailors seemed to wake from a dream.

It felt as if they had all stepped through a Veil. As the cognitive interference clouding their minds broke, they stared in shock and fear at the figures standing among their ranks, the ones that only looked like humans. One by one, they raised their pistols and rifles.

The four not-quite-human “sailors” were surrounded. They stood there in confusion. Then their expressions turned dull and blank.

It was as if the temporary, copied minds inside them had been struck and shattered. The not-quite-human replicas swayed and looked up one by one at their “captain.”

Lawrence could only let out a long sigh: “You are not members of my crew.”

The next second, under his own stunned gaze, he saw a tuft of pale green fire suddenly bloom in the air.

At first it was only a few sparks. They flickered into view between the twelve real sailors like sparks between the poles of an electrical device. In an instant, those sparks exploded and grew into great sheets of flame. The ghostly green fire of spirit form burned fiercely among the men and then lunged toward the four dazed replicas like a predator that had smelled prey.

The flames roared and crackled. The four replicas thrashed in the blaze, but they had no time even to scream. They turned into patches of black dust, the ash left after burning. It faintly looked like the black sludge they had seen earlier on the slope by the harbor, but it was drier and more powdery.

The sailors were terrified. The instant the spirit form flames ignited, everyone from the White Oak remembered scenes of past horror. They remembered the moment of terror when they met the Vanished on the Boundless Sea. They remembered the shocking sight of a city melted by fire in Pland. They knew this fire far too well.

Why was this fire here?

Was Captain Duncan nearby?

But just as that frightening guess burst in each of their hearts and the sailors began to panic, the fire suddenly went out. It vanished as quickly as it had appeared. When the four replicas turned to ash, the ghostly green spirit form flames disappeared without a trace.

What remained were a group of shaken, terrified sailors, a first mate struck dumb, and an old captain who really felt he should have retired long ago.

“Wh… what was that just now?” First Mate Gus turned his head with effort and swallowed hard. “Captain, that fire, it looked like…”

“It was the Vanished’s power. The Vanished…” Lawrence swallowed and suddenly looked up toward the sea, as if trying to spot that ghost ship. But he saw only the White Oak, still wrapped in thunderous gunfire. The sailors who had been waving the consecrated lanterns at the rail were nowhere to be seen. Everyone had probably already thrown themselves into the battle.

The seafarers on the White Oak were fighting with all their might, buying time for the captain’s group to board.

The Vanished was not here, but Captain Duncan’s fire had appeared before them all.

“Do not panic,” Lawrence said quickly, trying to calm the sailors. “We have already met the Vanished once. The city-state of Pland was even saved by that ship. It might not be a bad thing. Haven’t you heard the rumor? They say Captain Duncan Abnomar has already found his humanity again…”

The first mate made a small gesture of prayer to the Storm Goddess, then asked: “Captain, then should we go back to the ship now?”

“…Go back. Quickly. Before more strange things slip in.”

Chapter 383: Anomaly 077

The cannons roared. Scorching shells screamed down from the sky. Huge columns of water rose again and again inside and outside the harbor. Some pillars almost grazed the White Oak’s hull. The sea churned and heaved. The whole ship shook from the impacts and gave off worrying creaks.

Lawrence and First Mate Gus led the twelve sailors up the rope ladder and, with some scares but no accidents, climbed back onto the White Oak’s deck. Behind them, Dagger Island was still buried in thick fog. Over the empty harbor, a chaotic wind suddenly rose. The fog rolled and twisted in the gusts, as if full of malice, as if angered by uninvited guests.

The boatswain ran over in a rush. The tall seafarer’s face was tight with worry. He clutched a rifle in his hands, even though it was almost useless in a sea battle. He stopped in front of Lawrence, quickly checked the captain’s condition, and finally let out a breath. “Good! You are finally back. We heard thunder-like sounds from the island, and you still were not returning. The second mate thought something had happened to you…”

Scenes from the plaza by the docks flashed through Lawrence’s mind. He remembered the four extra sailors and the sudden green flames. A complicated look came to his face.

Something had happened, and it was no small thing. But this was clearly not the time to explain.

“Leave that for now,” he said, shaking his head. “What is the situation? Where is Jason?”

“The second mate is on the bridge, commanding the fight. We are trading fire with an unknown warship,” the boatswain said quickly. “The moment that ship showed up in the distance, it opened fire on us and has been closing in ever since. The stern took a hit just now. Luckily the damage is not too bad, but we have to get out of here. The White Oak cannot match a warship.”

“Leave this place. Now,” Lawrence said at once.

The steam core gave a low roar as the Boiling Gold catalyst began to release its surging power. The strong propulsion system drove the propellers, pushing the White Oak to speed up and leave the eerie harbor. Between the falling columns of water from the nearby shells, the advanced white-hulled cargo and exploration ship kept accelerating and left Dagger Island behind in the fog.

However, the attacker did not give up the chase.

Lawrence went up to the bridge and watched the sea through the wide side window. At the far edge of the misty ocean, he saw the outline of their attacker clearly. It was a warship that was not especially large. It chased them while the main gun at its bow kept firing, bright flashes stabbing again and again through the dark sky that covered the whole area.

Fortunately, it was a small ship and not a heavily armed battleship. Otherwise the White Oak could never have lasted this long.

Unfortunately, that ship was very fast. Even as the White Oak’s speed kept rising, Lawrence could tell it would catch up sooner or later.

It was even still speeding up.

“We cannot shake it,” the first mate said, his tone close to despair. “It is too fast… and our guns could never match a warship’s.”

Lawrence did not answer. He just thought quickly.

By category, the White Oak was indeed a civilian vessel, but that did not mean it was a sheep waiting for slaughter. As a special-purpose exploration ship that could sail the Boundless Sea for long periods and carry sealed objects between city-states, it had a military-grade steam core and an anti-sinking structure. Its keel, hull at the waterline, and superstructure had all been specially reinforced. In terms of hull strength alone, it was no weaker than a warship of the same size.

What it lacked was firepower. As a civilian ship, it could only mount a few small-caliber guns meant to fight off small bands of pirates or sea monsters. Those guns were no match for a warship’s artillery.

From the look of things, the White Oak would be overtaken sooner or later. Once the distance shrank, the enemy’s shots would not miss so often.

No matter how strong a hull was, it could not last long as a target under constant fire.

A sharp whistling sound rushed toward them from afar. The booming crash that followed cut off Lawrence’s thoughts. His ears rang and the deck shook under his feet. Out of the corner of his eye he saw a fireball blossom along the White Oak’s side as broken metal and deck planks flew apart.

The boatswain shouted: “Hit on the side! Put out the fire!”

Lawrence steadied himself on the rocking deck. His expression changed quickly, as if he had made a decision.

“The cargo manifest,” he said, lifting his head to the first mate who was keeping order on the bridge. “Bring me the cargo manifest.”

“The cargo manifest?” The first mate hesitated for a moment, then understood what the captain meant. His face became very conflicted and grim, but he still obeyed at once and brought a logbook to Lawrence.

Lawrence opened the book and scanned it quickly, then stopped on one line.

“Open sealed vault Two. Bring sealed object Anomaly 077 to the bridge,” he said, looking up and issuing the order. “Prepare a clean shroud and a new noose. Be ready to reseal it at any time.”

The first mate’s face tightened. He had already guessed this might happen, yet he still hesitated. “Captain, this…”

“The situation is urgent. We have no other choice,” Lawrence said sternly. “There is precedent for unsealing a sealed object on board to solve a crisis. If the Church wants to hold someone responsible later, I will explain it to them.”

The first mate seemed about to say more, but under the old captain’s serious gaze he swallowed his words and nodded hard. “Yes, Captain.”

The order was carried out quickly. Several seafarers assigned to handle sealed objects ran to a special section below decks, opened sealed vault Two, and lifted the room’s seal according to Anomaly 077’s containment rules.

Moments later, amid the thunder of the guns, several sailors carried Anomaly 077 onto the bridge and set the item the captain had asked for before Lawrence.

Lawrence lowered his head and stared at the Anomaly the sailors had brought from the sealed vault, his expression very grave.

It was a mummified corpse tightly wrapped in the shroud.

It was Anomaly 077, the Sailor.

Lawrence knew the details of every piece of cargo in his ship’s hold. That naturally included this Anomaly.

Anomaly 077 had first been found on an exploration ship that had mysteriously vanished for three years. It was believed to be the main cause of that ship’s loss. On the outside, this Anomaly looked like a mummified corpse about 1.7 meters tall. When unsealed, it behaved like a living being, able to think and speak with people. Its power matched its “identity” very closely.

As a “sailor,” it tried to influence the ship closest to it, ignoring all environmental conditions, ship types, or control systems. In a short time it could take over all of a vessel’s functions. Once it had full control, it would make the ship perform a random teleportation. In just a few minutes, any ship, no matter its size, would be sent to a random corner of the Boundless Sea under the Sailor’s influence.

But that teleportation was no calm journey. Any ship teleported by Anomaly 077 would appear at the heart of a great storm.

No one knew whether Anomaly 077 chose storms on purpose as the landing points for its teleportations or created a storm just for the jump. The only certain thing was that among the many recorded teleportation events, only a small part of the ships had managed to sail safely out of the storm at the drop point.

Many more ships, and hundreds or thousands of unlucky people, had become Anomaly 077’s victims.

Even so, the information Lawrence had said that Anomaly 077 itself was not hard to handle. Before the teleportation finished, the freed Anomaly would use its power no matter what. But once the teleportation was over, it was easy to seal again. As soon as a new noose was placed around its neck, it would instantly stop moving. Wrap it up in the shroud and it would fall back into sleep. This mummified corpse had no strength beyond that of a human and was not strong in a fight.

At that point, the White Oak’s crew would only need to deal with a storm. And Lawrence and his sailors had faced countless storms before.

Lawrence bent down and slowly laid his hand on Anomaly 077’s shroud.

The crew on the bridge watched the scene with tense faces.

Lawrence took a deep breath and loosened the knots on the shroud.

A faint sound of someone drawing a breath reached his ears almost at once.

The sound came from within the wrapped mummified corpse.

The shroud loosened as if some invisible force had undone every knot in an instant. Anomaly 077’s true form was revealed to everyone. A mummified corpse lay still on the floor, wearing an Old Era sailor’s smock, with thinning hair and a dried, almost skeletal body.

The corpse’s chest rose and fell slightly, and the motion grew clearer and clearer, until Lawrence felt he could hear its heartbeat and breathing.

Anomaly 077 was free. The Sailor had awakened from its seal.

The mummified corpse slowly opened its eyes. Its whole body sat up bit by bit, stiff and creaking, its joints cracking.

“For now, you have the helm of this ship,” Lawrence said through gritted teeth, his expression complicated. “Get us out of here.”

Anomaly 077 sat up straight and slowly looked around. Its gaze finally settled on Lawrence.

For some reason, Lawrence suddenly felt he could see a hint of fear on that dry, frightening face.

Then he saw the mummified corpse actually shiver.

“Don’t… don’t do this!”

A hoarse, frightened cry came from the mummified corpse. The next second, right in front of everyone, it closed its eyes and lay back down, pretending to be dead.

It even reached out, tugged at the shroud lying beside it, and seemed to be trying to sneak the cloth back around itself.

Lawrence: “…?”

The sailors: “…?”

Chapter 384: Metamorphosis

Anomaly 077 ranked in the top hundred. It had once caused dozens of ships and thousands of sailors to die in storms. It had a mind of its own and the traits of a living thing. No matter which city-state it was kept in, it was a dangerous Anomaly that the local Church treated with extreme caution – yet now, right in front of Lawrence, it simply chose to shut its eyes and play dead, refusing to use its power at all.

Lawrence had imagined countless possibilities for what might happen after he activated Anomaly 077. He had even come up with several plans to seal “Sailor” again. But he had never thought something like this would happen.

The old captain raised his head and met the eyes of his First Mate. Both of them felt that the mummified corpse in front of them did not match the descriptions in the reports. At the same time, they both wondered where things had gone wrong.

But before they could think it through, the roar of water pillars from the nearby sea and the sound of the White Oak’s defensive guns firing broke their daze.

This was no time to stand there stunned. The Sea Swallow was almost on them.

They could not win in a straight fight, and they could not outrun it. “Sailor”, with its ship teleportation ability, was already the White Oak’s only hope of escaping this danger.

Lawrence lowered his head and stared hard at the mummified corpse that kept its eyes shut and pretended to be dead. Whatever was wrong with this thing, he had to find a way to make it cooperate and enter runaway state.

“Wake up!” Lawrence reached out, grabbed Anomaly 077 by the collar, and shook it hard. Getting this close to a mummified corpse was disgusting, but he could not care about that now. “I know you have already broken free of the seal. Listen, you are taking the helm of this ship now. ‘Sailor’, don’t you have an instinct to control ships? Don’t you have a tendency to enter runaway state on your own? Do it! Take over this ship and get us out of here!”

The mummified corpse on the floor rattled with a creepy cracking sound as its joints rubbed together under the shaking, but it still kept its eyes shut. Its chest rose and fell plainly though, and no one could miss that.

Meanwhile, the non-stop explosions around the White Oak only made Lawrence more and more frustrated. At last he could not stand it. He reached out and slapped the mummified corpse. “I know you are awake!”

The mummified corpse finally could not keep lying there. It opened its eyes in the middle of all that shaking, but its first reaction was still to dodge away. It tried its best to avoid Lawrence’s gaze while it yelled: “Stop it! Stop it! I will go back to sleep, I will go back to sleep, all right?! You cannot joke about this! This ship cannot be touched, cannot be touched!”

Lawrence did not care what it said. The moment he saw the mummy open its eyes, he yanked it to its feet and dragged it toward the helm.

Several nearby seafarers finally reacted too. The bolder ones rushed forward to help. A few people almost had to pin “Sailor’s” dried-up body to the console by force.

The First Mate shouted at their side: “Press it against the wheel! That way its power will take effect the fastest!”

But Anomaly 077 only kept screaming in a shrill voice, and its struggles grew even more fierce: “Let me go! Let me go!

“You cannot do this! Help, help!

“Who even are you people… have mercy, have mercy!”

“Just touch the wheel once!” Lawrence shouted while he used all his strength to press the mummified corpse onto the ship’s wheel. “It will be over soon!”

“I will not! Help!” Anomaly 077’s strength was shockingly great. Even several burly White Oak crew members could not hold its arms down.

It thrashed wildly and twisted its head, trying to look back toward the spot where it had been lying just now. “Let me go back! Please… just loop that rope around my neck again. One loop is enough. I will lie there quietly and sleep. I will never get up again! Or give me the rope and I will hang myself… just do not make me touch this!”

The bridge fell into chaos. The scene was twisted to the extreme.

Anomaly 077, which had a terrifying reputation among captains and sailors all across the Boundless Sea, was struggling and begging like a victim tied up and dragged aboard. The White Oak’s crew members, who were trapped in a desperate situation, looked like fiends as they pinned the “Anomaly’s” arms and tried to press them onto the wheel.

This was a sight that even the maddest patients in an asylum, in their wildest hallucinations, could not have imagined. Yet it was now happening for real on the White Oak.

Lawrence no longer had the mind to think about how wrong all of this was. He only knew the shadow of the Sea Swallow was getting closer and closer. Its gunnery was growing more and more accurate.

The White Oak's broadside had already taken several hits in a row. Fire burned at the stern. If the next shell hit the engine compartment or the magazine, or even the bridge… it would all be over.

As he thought that, a sharp whistling suddenly reached his ears. Judging by the direction of the sound, Lawrence's mind went blank.

[Not good.]

The next second, a deafening explosion swept over the upper deck. A giant fireball rose right beside the bridge and burst open. The Sea Swallow's shell had hit the side of the White Oak's bridge. This hit was fatal.

The blast wave crashed in. Metal and glass were torn to pieces by the shell's power. The torn wall fragments became deadly shrapnel.

A blinding light filled Lawrence's vision. He saw his First Mate lifted into the air, his body swallowed at once by the onrushing wave of fire. Then it was the other sailors on the bridge.

Then it was himself.

The flames swallowed everything. Lawrence watched the fireball swell and engulf the whole bridge. He watched his own body burn away in the flames. Time seemed to slow down.

He saw it all clearly. He even saw the fire creeping inch by inch through the air, and slowly taking on a strange, ghostly green.

Ghostly green?

Lawrence's mind suddenly went blank again. Before he could understand what was happening, the crimson fireball that had rushed into the bridge turned at once into a sea of eerie green flame.

The sea of spirit form flames licked everything in sight – metal, wood, glass, leather…

Everything the flames burned began to look like a spirit form, turning half transparent.

The crew members who had been swallowed by the fireball all fell to the floor. spirit form flames wrapped around their bodies. Their flesh and bones turned clear and bright like jade. Then, one by one, they got up again as if nothing had happened and stared at one another in shock.

This scene was exactly the same as their first encounter with the Vanished.

It was as if the terrifying sight that had once appeared on the White Oak was playing out again.

A solid feeling under his feet came back. Lawrence jolted awake from his daze and saw that he was already standing at the helm.

At some point, his body had also been covered in roaring spirit form flames.

He reached forward on instinct and grabbed for something. His hand closed around the wheel.

In that instant, he felt it.

He felt everything about the White Oak. From a single screw to a window and a length of rope, every part of the ship appeared in his mind as clearly as if it were a part of his own body.

He had lived on this ship for so many years, but he had never been this closely linked to her.

Along with this feeling, another strong intent flooded his mind. It was as if a voice filled with endless authority was proclaiming his fate.

Now, you are a member of the Vanished Fleet. Go and serve Captain Duncan faithfully.

Lawrence held the wheel in a daze. He sensed the White Oak turning nimbly under the push of his will, and he slowly lined the bow up with the “enemy ship” rushing toward them in the distance.

Anomaly 077 was still there. The mummified corpse had curled into almost a ball beside the console. It shivered as it stared at the rising spirit form flames around it and wailed: “I said I would not touch it, but you forced me to touch it. How would I dare touch it? A Sailor who tries to seize control gets tied to a shell and thrown into the sea! I know the rules on a ship! I am a Sailor!”

Lawrence slowly lowered his head and glanced at “Sailor”. He was still lost and confused and had no idea what had really happened. But his gaze made Anomaly 077 fall quiet at once.

The mummified corpse snapped its mouth shut and carefully stood up. It looked around.

The bridge that had been torn apart by the shell was quickly knitting back together under the burning spirit form flames.

All the crew members stood at their posts. They now looked like ghosts from head to toe, but instinct and the bit of reason they still had drove them back to their stations at once, waiting for the captain’s next order.

“Captain…” Anomaly 077 turned its head and looked into Lawrence’s eyes. “What do you want to do next…”

Lawrence drifted for a moment, then seemed to sense something. He slowly lowered his gaze.

“The Vanished Fleet has been attacked… we strike back.”

“Strike back!” Anomaly 077 shouted at once. “Strike back!”

“Strike back!” The voice of First Mate Gus sounded beside him. Flames rose all over Gus’s body, and crackling fire filled his voice. “The captain has ordered it. Strike back!”

“Strike back!”

The crew on the bridge roared. All across the White Oak, every crew member who had transformed into a ghost “heard” the captain’s command at the same time.

This ship, which had completed a metamorphosis in the flames, moved at once. Its steam core roared. All its guns began to turn. A shrill, howling whistle echoed across the sea.

Under their feet, the ship began to speed toward the Sea Swallow. Almost at the same time, Lawrence saw another shadow at the White Oak’s side.

It was another ship, a warship whose form was almost only a pitch-black outline, shrouded in thick fog and smoke.

Its outline was seven or eight parts similar to that of the White Oak. It was clearly a sister ship of the same class.

That shadowy ship sped up alongside the White Oak. The two ships charged together toward the Sea Swallow.

Through the ever-rising spirit form flames, Lawrence stared in shock at the phantom warship that had suddenly appeared on the nearby sea. He did not know how long he watched before he finally whispered its name, as if in a dream.

“The Black Oak… Martha?”

Chapter 385: The Battle Ended

A shadow wrapped in darkness, a warship that looked as if it had been patched together from smoke, thick fog, and wreckage, sailed side by side with the White Oak. Together, they charged toward the Sea Swallow, which was drawing closer in the distance.

Through the mist that wrapped its hull, one could still faintly see that this ship shared the same origin as the White Oak.

It was not quite the same as in his memory, but Lawrence still recognized it at once. Even though it now looked broken, twisted, and strange, it still tugged at his memories just as it did every time he met it in his dreams.

It was the Black Oak. It was right there, sailing beside the White Oak just like on that last day they left port together in his memory.

A sharp blast of the whistle suddenly sounded and cut off the old captain’s shock and wandering thoughts. The sound came from that phantom ship, as if it was reminding Lawrence that this was no time to daydream.

Shells whistled down from the sky. The Sea Swallow’s bombardment did not let up for a moment.

Lawrence snapped his head back around and saw a fireball slam into the bow of the White Oak.

Flames rose high there, but in the next moment they were swallowed and absorbed by the green blaze that burned all over the ship. A part of the bow was torn into pieces, and burning metal fragments flew in every direction.

Yet in the very next second, the shattered structure began to repair itself, as if time was flowing backward. Under the rising green flames, it returned to how it had been.

Lawrence felt something “drain away”. It was like his strength and life were being shaved off from his “senses”. But that missing part was quickly refilled by the spirit form flames roaring all around.

Right after that, the White Oak’s bow and broadside defensive guns roared. Shell after shell shot out, howling like furious wraiths as they left the barrels. They traced eerie green trails through the air.

Almost at the same time, the Black Oak beside them also began to attack.

As the cannons thundered, flashes burst again and again in the rising black fog. Shells as ghostly as shadows burst from the fog and plunged toward the distant enemy ship.

Lawrence gripped the wheel with both hands and felt the strong tremors that shook the ship with each volley. He felt his senses spreading farther, even flowing along the shells in flight and the seawater churning around the hull, spreading out across the whole sea.

At the edge of his awareness, the Sea Swallow was like a bonfire in the veil of night, shining with a presence so strong it was almost blinding.

Not long ago, that ship had been a hopeless enemy for the White Oak. Yet now Lawrence only felt that this prey looked so fresh… so delicious.

A moment later, the White Oak’s counterattack finally landed squarely on the Sea Swallow for the first time.

With a massive blast and a burst of flame, that strange warship looked as if some invisible giant mouth had taken a bite out of it. A whole chunk was simply “carved away”. In the huge wound that had been eaten out of the hull, the ship’s warped inner structure could be seen clearly.

The attack worked very well, but it was far from enough.

“Full speed,” Lawrence said as he gripped the wheel. His eyes locked on the enemy warship that kept drawing nearer. He already knew what he had to do – or rather, he knew what the White Oak needed right now. “We need to replenish ourselves.”

“Yes, full speed!” First Mate Gus’s voice rang out on the bridge.

The steam core let out an even louder roar. The White Oak, which was already moving at high speed, pushed itself to the limit. It lunged toward the distant Sea Swallow like a swift hunting falcon.

The Black Oak still ran beside them like a reflection, matching their speed and course.

In the distance, the Sea Swallow did not show the slightest sign of changing course or slowing to evade. From the moment it appeared, that ship had launched a blind, wild assault. It was like a runaway state beast without reason.

Even now, after the White Oak had undergone a great change and the situation had turned against it, the Sea Swallow still carried out its first goal with blind loyalty – to attack the enemy.

Two ships rushed toward each other. One was wrapped and shrouded in eerie green flame. The other was covered in twisted, dark, uncanny structures.

They launched a full speed charge at the same time.

The shrill and terrifying howls of their whistles almost tore the sky apart. The growing torrent of cannon fire between the two ships shook the entire sea.

The distance between them shrank fast. Almost every shell they fired slammed into the other ship's hull. Huge explosions tore open their bodies. Burning fragments of steel sprayed across the sea and the sky.

On the White Oak's bridge, Lawrence only stared dead ahead. Everyone else stared in the same direction as he did.

It was as if some force clenched the minds of every sailor on board. Every living being on the ship suddenly lost all fear and all hesitation.

All that was left was a wild hunger for the collision that was coming and could not be stopped.

Then the two ships finally touched.

Like a loose snowball being pressed hard against the red hot wall of a furnace, the Sea Swallow's bow plunged straight into the roaring spirit form flames around the White Oak.

With ear-splitting noise and a roar like ten thousand voices shouting at once, the steel hull that had seemed so solid began to melt away inch by inch in the green flames.

As the "collision" went on, the Sea Swallow vanished into the wall of fire from bow to stern.

It looked as if the whole ship was being swallowed.

Even after the last turret on the Sea Swallow's tail was eaten clean by the spirit form flames, the furious exchange of fire between the two ships did not stop for even a moment.

Then, at last, everything ended.

The White Oak's defensive guns finally stopped their howling. With the enemy gone, the roar of the steam core slowly grew quieter. The spirit form flames that had been surging all over the ship began to draw in. Their aggressive posture softened.

They settled down to burn quietly along the hull.

For a moment, Lawrence felt lost. At some point his hands had slipped from the wheel. He raised his head and looked around the bridge.

The sailors turned one by one and stared at him. Wrapped in spirit form flames, each of them now looked like a ghost. In their hollow eyes, it seemed there was no longer human reason or human feeling.

Lawrence blinked. Just before the haze in his head could swallow him completely, a human figure suddenly appeared at the edge of his vision.

It was a young man.

He stepped out of thin air, walking through the rising spirit form flames around him. He wore the dark blue robes of the Deep Sea Church priest who served on the ship.

The Holy Emblem on his chest shone like burning fire. He strode straight toward Lawrence, grabbed the blazing Holy Emblem at his breast, and slammed it hard against Lawrence’s chest.

Heat spread out from Lawrence’s chest. He felt his tottering mind suddenly steady. Humanity and reason returned to his soul at the same time.

As the captain came back to himself, the sailors on board also woke up one by one. They stared at each other, as if only now remembering the end of the battle just now, remembering the final clash and “collision” between the White Oak and the Sea Swallow.

Some cried out in panic as the fear caught up to them. Some checked their own bodies on reflex. Others raised their heads and fixed their eyes on the young priest who had suddenly appeared on the bridge.

Lawrence frowned and looked at the man in front of him for a long time before he finally spoke in a hesitant voice: “priest… Jensen?”

“It is me. Thank the heavens you can finally see me,” the young shipboard priest panted, out of breath. He looked as if he had just crawled out of the sea. His robes were soaked through, and water still ran down his hair and along his neck as he spoke. “Praise the Lord of Storms for his protection. I have been shouting in your ear for several days now.”

Lawrence still felt as if his mind was not quite clear. It took him several seconds to recall another strange detail from the past few days.

There was supposed to be a shipboard priest on the ship, just as there was supposed to be a Sun in the sky. But during this whole period, he had never seen this young priest at all.

priest Jensen had vanished not only from everyone’s sight, but even from everyone’s memory.

People had even forgotten the basic fact that “there should be a shipboard priest on the ship”.

Lawrence had noticed that the Sun was gone, but only now did he realize that priest Jensen had disappeared along with it.

“…What happened?”

The old captain, as if waking from a dream, slowly turned his head and asked in a low voice.

“I do not know. For the past few days, it felt like I was cut off in a different dimension from all of you,” the soaking wet young priest said with a bitter smile and a shake of his head. “I could see you, but none of you could see me. It was as if I had become an ‘outsider’ on this ship.

“Not until just now, when the whole ship ‘changed’ in the fire, did I feel that barrier loosen. At the same time, I sensed something wrong with your mind, so I tried to use the Holy Emblem to steady your reason.

“Luckily, I made it in time for that last step…”

Lawrence listened to the priest’s story as messy thoughts and guesses crowded into his mind. When he heard the words “something wrong with your mind”, a late fear finally rose in his heart.

He remembered the strange state he and the other crew members had been in during those last minutes of the fight with the Sea Swallow.

He felt as if a cold sweat was about to seep down his back.

But he had no sweat. He was still wrapped in spirit form flames. This ghost-like body of his had not shown any sign of turning back.

Lawrence lowered his head and looked at his arm, which still appeared in a hazy spirit form state. Many guesses had already formed in his heart.

“The Vanished’s ‘favor’, is it…” The old captain shook his head with a bitter look. For a moment he did not know whether to call this a blessing or the curse. “It seems bearing Duncan Abnomar’s gaze really is no simple matter. But at least we survived… if this really is the state of the living…”

As he spoke, he slowly raised his head again. His gaze passed through the nearby porthole and fell on the sea beside them.

The ship cloaked in thick fog and shadows still floated there in silence, like the White Oak’s shadow.

Chapter 386: Return to the Mortal Realm?

The White Oak stopped on the sea. The Black Oak, shrouded in thick fog like a shadow, stopped with her. In the hazy outline of that second ship, it felt as if a hidden invitation was waiting.

Lawrence looked at the ship and hesitated.

First Mate Gus's voice came from the side and pulled Lawrence out of his thoughts. He asked: "Should we… send someone over to take a look?"

Lawrence turned his head and looked at the First Mate who had followed him through storms for twenty or thirty years. He asked: "…You recognized her too, didn't you?"

"…The last time we saw her was also near Frostholm," the First Mate said. He stared at the sea not far away, his tone complicated. Like Lawrence, he was still wrapped in burning green flames, his body faint and unreal like a Ghost. "All these years, we old subordinates all knew about your situation, but none of us dared to bring this up…"

Lawrence was silent for a moment, then spoke softly: "Do you remember, not long ago, when you saw a figure standing on the deck talking with me?"

The First Mate froze for a second, then reacted at once: "That was…"

"It was Martha—the 'Martha' that only I could see all these years," Lawrence said in a low voice. His words made the First Mate's eyes widen bit by bit. "I have seen her on the ship more than once lately. I even heard her voice while we were exploring that ‘Dagger Island’… I always thought it was because this eerie sea was amplifying the hallucinations in my mind, but it seems things are not that simple.”

The First Mate slowly turned his head and looked at the Black Oak, which stayed silent and dead under the fog. After a long time he broke the silence: “This is not a hallucination. She is right here.”

Lawrence pressed his lips together and seemed to sink into thought. A few seconds later he suddenly said: “Send a signal. See how she reacts.”

The First Mate nodded at once: “Yes, Captain.”

A moment later, a set of lights along the White Oak’s rail lit up.

The crew members still in Ghost form turned the shutters in front of the searchlights and sent a string of regular flashes toward the black ghost ship that lay so close by.

Lawrence stood on the bridge and stared hard in the direction of the black ghost ship. He waited for the ship to give some kind of response, yet at the same time he almost feared seeing any response at all.

“Martha… are you there…”

The tension made him grab the handrail beside him without thinking. He muttered under his breath as if talking to himself.

The next second, a wavering point of light appeared on the Black Oak’s deck in the thick black fog. It shone for a few seconds, went out, then lit up again, repeating three times.

“…She answered,” the First Mate said. He turned his head and looked at his captain with a complicated expression. “You can wait here first. I will send a few sailors over to take a look.”

“No, I will go myself,” Lawrence said, waving his hand. His face was growing calm; he had clearly made up his mind. “If this really is some phenomenon caused by my mind slipping into a runaway state, then sending other sailors blindly onto that ship will surely be very dangerous… This is something I have to face, and only I can deal with it myself.”

The First Mate clearly still wanted to say more, but in front of a captain who had already decided, he could only swallow his words in the end. He said: “I understand.”

Lawrence nodded lightly: “Then help me get ready. A consecrated lantern, ropes, weapons, ammunition, and also…”

He stopped suddenly and looked toward the helm not far away.

A shriveled mummified corpse in an Old Era seafarer’s coat was there, inching its way to the side with great care. It used the shadows of the helm as cover and tried hard not to draw anyone’s attention. By now it had almost reached the noose hanging beside it.

Lawrence thought for a moment: “I will take it with me. I can’t leave an Anomaly that has already entered a runaway state on the White Oak, and its condition is far too strange.”

Anomaly 077 stopped at once.

…

At the same time, inside the city of Frostholm, at the sewage treatment plant near Cemetery No. 4, the black-clad Guards still watched every intersection with care. Two Warriors stood guard over the unlucky administrator. The man sat limp beside a pipe near the settling pool. His face was pale and his body still shook a little, but he still tried hard to answer every question the Guardians asked.

“I don’t know, I really don’t know… How was I supposed to tell…”

The only ordinary person left on site, the only living human in the whole treatment plant, was the balding middle-aged administrator. He kept wiping the cold sweat from his forehead. Fear and nerves blended on his face. “Everything here was always fine. I have known those people for more than just a day. They never looked strange in any way…”

“Calm down. You are just an ordinary person. It is normal to be fooled by supernatural powers,” said the black-clad Guard in charge of the questioning. The Guard had to comfort the administrator whose courage had been shattered and kept looking up now and then at the open space beside the settling pool. “The Gatekeeper will deal with those freaks—Lady Agatha will be back very soon.”

The administrator looked up at that open space on reflex. At once, the terrible scene from earlier seemed to invade his mind again. The three “church priests” had suddenly turned into strange faces. Horrible Abyssal demons had stepped out of thin air. More than a dozen treatment-plant workers had turned into twisted human-shaped monsters and had thrown themselves into a furious fight with the black-clad Guards…

The unlucky administrator shuddered all over and squeezed his eyes shut. But the darkness behind his eyelids only brought new fear, so he opened them again, his face still full of lingering dread.

The black-clad Guard beside him noticed all this and could only give him a look of pity.

He had lived in this sewage plant, which had already become a nest of freaks, for so long without knowing anything. Around him had been nothing but hidden, vicious cultists and replica freaks that elementses had already used to replace the real workers. When the truth was suddenly laid bare, the fact that he had not gone mad on the spot already spoke of a very strong mind.

Those workers who had turned into replicas were most likely replaced one by one. Now this administrator was clearly the last one left. If the Guardians had not suddenly broken into this place, his fate would likely have been to be replaced as the next “replica” as well. He could clearly imagine that himself, and that kind of after-the-fact fear was hard to put into words.

After this incident ended, this administrator would probably never be able to come back to work at the sewage plant. Forget work; he would likely need long-term therapy before he could return to a normal life. But that was not something the Guardians had to think about.

Right now the Guardians were more worried about their superior. There was no doubt about Gatekeeper Agatha’s strength. Three ordinary Oblivion priests plus a dozen replica freaks that were only good as cannon fodder could not possibly be a match for that Lady. But even so… she still had not returned.

After a while, even the administrator, who was still in a state of fear and panic, noticed how tense the air on site had become. He looked up at the black-clad Guards who stayed on alert all around and, after hesitating for a moment, could not help asking: “Excuse me… is everything alright with the Gatekeeper?”

“Lady Agatha is in the Spirit Realm. She was worried that a battle between supernatural beings would hurt you, an ordinary person, and damage the sewage equipment here,” a female black-clad Guard said in a low voice. Her steady voice carried a calming strength. “Don’t worry. No heretic can defeat the Gatekeeper of Bartok in the Spirit Realm. She is probably just still following the clues, so her return is delayed.”

The administrator nodded quickly: “O-okay…”

The very next second, a cold wind suddenly swept across the plant. The black-clad Guards serving as Wardens at the intersections all turned at the same time to look at the open space near the settling pool.

The female Guardian who had just spoken let out a breath of relief at once and smiled a little: “Ah, it seems Lady Agatha has already taken care of the trouble.”

As soon as the Guardian finished speaking, one phantom after another suddenly appeared over the open ground by the settling pool. It was as if another space was rebuilding its link with the Mortal Realm. Hazy shadows showed up in the air one after another. In just a few breaths, those shadows quickly turned solid and dropped onto the filthy ground.

They were the bodies of more than a dozen replica freaks that had turned into human-shaped mud, and the cold, broken corpses of three Annihilators.

After they hit the ground, the bodies of the replica freaks quickly “melted” into dried mud that would never writhe again. The bodies of the Annihilators began to burn the instant they returned to the Mortal Realm. In a few seconds, black flames turned them into piles of char. The Abyssal demons that had made a symbiotic pact with them did not even have time to regain solid form before they faded away in the air.

The administrator of the sewage plant stared wide-eyed at this scene that went far beyond the Mortal Realm. For a moment he even forgot the fear in his heart. Then he saw a gray-white whirlwind appear in the middle of the open ground. Smoke and thick mist seemed to churn inside it. In the blink of an eye, a figure in a black coat stepped out, condensing out of the Ashen Wind with a Gatekeeper’s cane in hand.

Agatha, who was wrapped in bandages, raised her head. She looked at the familiar Mortal Realm around her and at her subordinates, who all seemed a little tense.

“The problem is solved.” She gave the subordinates a slight nod. Her low, magnetic voice was as calm and reassuring as ever.

Chapter 387: The Sudden Presence

The heretics and misshapen freaks who had been executed in the Spirit Realm had now turned into embers of wreckage in the Mortal Realm. The severe corruption that had hit the sewage treatment plant had been purified for the moment. But when it came to the Shadows hanging over the whole city-state, this was probably only lifting a corner of the Veil.

The black-clad Guards came back to the Gatekeeper. Agatha quickly counted them and confirmed her subordinates' condition, then let her gaze fall on the slightly balding administrator not far away.

"Has his condition been confirmed?"

"It has been checked. He is indeed a normal human," a black-clad Guard said in a low voice. "But he has been badly frightened, and we can't rule out the chance that his mind has suffered corruption. He will need some time for counseling and observation."

"Hand him over to the local Cathedral," Agatha said with a small nod. "Also tell them that the situation at this sewage plant is very bad. The entire facility will need a full purification and inspection later. They can only restart it after all hidden dangers have been checked."

"Yes, Gatekeeper." The subordinate nodded to take the order, then looked up at Agatha with some worry. "You… did not run into trouble, did you?"

Agatha frowned: "Hm? Why do you ask?"

“You stayed over ‘there’ longer than usual,” the subordinate explained. “Did you find some clue when you looked from the Spirit Realm?”

Agatha kept her brows slightly furrowed, a thoughtful look on her face. For some reason she felt as if she had overlooked something. But when she tried to recall it carefully, she could not find anything wrong. Was this a side effect of staying too long in the Spirit Realm?

She shook her head and reached into her coat pocket for the eye drops she used often. But after a moment’s hesitation she put them away again.

Her eyes did not feel uncomfortable at all. It was as if she had already used the drops before returning to the Mortal Realm.

“Nothing happened,” she told her subordinate. “It is just that those heretics showed up in a strange way, so I spent a little more time ‘interrogating’ them.”

It was a pity she had not gotten anything out of them. Those heretics were stubborn and fanatical. Even death alone could not shake their hard hearts.

But… what exactly had she overlooked?

A vague doubt rose once more in Agatha’s heart, but she did not show any of it in front of her subordinates.

“Are we heading back to the Grand Cathedral next?” a black-clad Guard asked beside her.

“Back to the Grand Cathedral,” Agatha said with a nod. “We have to gather people at once and start searching all of the underground facilities in the whole city. The situation may be worse than we thought.”

…

It was close to dusk. The edge of the Sun was slowly nearing the sea horizon. Its splendid twin rune rings spread a majestic glow over the waters.

In the distance, the city-state's buildings were slowly dyed by the sunset. The whole city looked as if it would melt away into the evening glow.

Duncan stood at the narrow window at the end of the second-floor corridor. His broad frame almost blocked all the light that came in from outside. Through the gaps in his bandages, he quietly cast his gaze on the afterglow of the distant sunset, as if lost in thought.

Sneaky footsteps came from the side. Duncan did not turn his head. He already knew who was coming.

"Finished all your homework?" he asked casually.

Shirley had just opened her door and was ready to sneak down to the first-floor kitchen for snacks. She froze at once. In the Shadows beside her, Dog stuck out his shivering head and muttered in a low voice: "I told you we'd get caught…"

"I… I finished the arithmetic sheet," Shirley said. She ignored Dog's hindsight comment and only shrank her neck, looking carefully at Duncan, who stood by the window like a stern iron tower. "I still have to copy the vocabulary once more, but I'm hungry…"

Duncan could hear pure tension and grievance in the girl's voice. It made him turn his head to look at Shirley, half amused and half helpless. He asked: "Did I ever say you are not allowed to eat if you don't finish your homework?"

Shirley shrank her neck again and did not dare answer.

Duncan sighed, turned fully around with a small smile, and pressed a hand on Shirley's head.

"You really don't like studying?" he said helplessly. "You look as if someone has bullied you."

“I… I get sleepy as soon as I look at a book…” Shirley said nervously. She was still not used to talking with Duncan while he was in this body. The bandages and dark clothes looked even scarier to her than the captain on the Vanished usually did. “I… I’ll go back to my room and do my homework!”

Duncan gently pressed down on Shirley’s shoulder, stopping her from turning back to her room.

“If you’re tired, then rest for a while,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “Don’t study out of fear.”

Shirley gave Duncan a look of disbelief, then nodded quickly, as if afraid the captain would change his mind.

After a few more seconds, she looked at Duncan carefully and could not help asking: “Why do you have to make me read and learn characters… I… I don’t have to take university exams like Nina, and I can’t become some scholar like Mr. Morris…”

This was the first time Duncan had heard this question from Shirley’s own mouth, but it was clear that it had been sitting in her mind for a long time. This orphaned girl had never gone to school and had grown up with nothing but a Abyssal Hound for company. It was no wonder she did not understand the captain’s intentions.

“Because knowledge is useful,” Duncan said. He was silent for a while, then looked at Shirley very seriously. “The knowledge that makes you resist it and gives you a headache is what keeps the whole civilized world running. When you look at the cars driving on the streets, the machines roaring in the factories, and the endless sea outside the city-state, have you never felt curious about how those things work? Have you never wondered what faraway city-states look like?”

Shirley thought about it. She seemed to know what the “right answer” should be, but in the end she still shook her head a little hesitantly: “No. I… I always felt that as long as I could fill my stomach, that was enough. I never thought that far.”

“But you now need more than a full stomach, Shirley.” Duncan bent down and looked into her eyes. “You might not understand yet, but I want your life to be a little more complete. You missed many things in the past. Now that you are a member of the Vanished, those things you missed will be made up for.”

Shirley stared at Duncan in a daze. She still did not really understand what the captain was saying, but from his serious and stern tone she seemed to faintly sense a bit of… warmth.

That warmth felt vaguely familiar.

So she nodded, half understanding and half not, and drew out her reply: “Oh…”

“Good,” Duncan said with a smile, slowly straightening up. “Since you understand, go down and eat something later, then keep working on your homework. I…”

He suddenly stopped.

Shirley was still shrinking her neck, waiting for the rest of the lecture. She looked up in slight disappointment: “Ah? What is it?”

Duncan did not answer her. He just waved his hand lightly, but his gaze had already turned far away. It looked as if he was staring at the opposite end of the corridor, yet deep in his eyes it seemed as if a glimmer from somewhere very far away was being reflected.

He blinked. In one eye, the corridor and ceiling of the house were reflected. In the other eye, it was as if he saw a ship burning with dim green flames, wandering between mist and Shadows.

Out on the sea off Frostholm, in the captain's cabin of the Vanished, which was slowly cruising across the vast ocean, Duncan suddenly lifted his head from the enchanted sea chart on the table.

His sudden movement made Goathead at the edge of the table react at once. The wooden head creaked as it turned its neck: "Ah, Captain, what are your orders? Are you getting ready for dinner? Even though there is no crew available on the ship right now, I am still willing to provide dining services within my ability. What would you like to eat? We can start with southern dishes. Fried meat rolls, fried pork cutlets, fried fish cakes, fried meatballs, roasted bird eggs, steamed bird eggs, boiled bird eggs, stewed bird eggs, pickled bird eggs, smoked bird eggs…"

"Be quiet. I did not look up to hear you recite dishes," Duncan glared at the noisy Goathead, though his expression held a trace of gravity. He raised his head and looked out the cabin window toward the direction of the city-state of Frostholm. He spoke in a thoughtful tone: "The White Oak?"

"The White Oak?" Goathead was stunned for a moment, then suddenly reacted. "Ah, you mean that steamship, the one Alice took before? Why did you suddenly think of it? Do you want to reclaim that trophy? I can provide you with a full set of plans for taking it into the fleet—are you planning to change the sailors on board? That captain should be kept…"

"It is nearby," Duncan said. He did not pay any attention to Goathead's chatter. He slowly stood up from behind the table, speaking as he frowned slightly and felt out a faint but very real link. "Near… Frostholm?"

"The White Oak is near Frostholm?" Goathead finally stopped babbling. His tone was full of shock. "That's impossible… Isn't Frostholm under lockdown right now? And Tyrian's fleet is still blocking the route. If a foreign ship had come near, there is no way he would not have reported it to you."

"…Something is wrong. I can indeed feel the presence of the White Oak," Duncan said thoughtfully. "But its position is hazy, and it seems to keep changing…"

He narrowed his eyes and looked toward the city-state of Frostholm, trying to pin down where exactly that presence, which had suddenly grown strong in his senses, was located.

The White Oak's presence had appeared all of a sudden and had grown strong in a short time, like a flame that suddenly lit up in the darkness and caught his eye. He had never felt anything like this before.

And, unless it was just his imagination, Duncan also felt that the ship's presence had risen and fallen several times, like a light flickering bright and dim.

As he thought, he lowered his head and looked at the wooden Goathead on the table: "Do you know what is going on?"

Goathead thought for a moment and shook his head: "Why don't I list some dishes for you instead…"

"Useless at the key moment." Duncan twitched the corner of his mouth, stood up, walked around the chart table, and stepped out of the captain's cabin.

Chapter 388: Border of the Phantom Image

After leaving the captain’s cabin, Duncan did not go anywhere else. He simply turned around, took hold of the handle of the door of The Lost Ones again, and pushed it inward.

Zhou Ming returned to his room.

He looked around. The familiar scene entered his eyes. Everything in the room was exactly the same as when he had last left it, yet it felt as if he had not come back here for a very long time.

He slowly crossed the entryway. His feet stepped on the worn, scuffed floorboards. As usual, Zhou Ming went first to the tightly shut window. He checked the marks on the windowsill and then checked the state of the window lock. He knew in his heart that doing this was pointless, yet he still finished every part of the inspection with great care. Then he solemnly picked up the diary hanging beside the window and wrote today’s inspection result in a blank space:

No change at any door or window. During my absence, this room was never opened.

After leaving this new record, he let out a small breath and then slowly walked to the desk.

On the desk, tiny green sparks jumped and crackled. The slowly spreading flame was tracing out the outline of some object bit by bit. The whole tracing process was already close to its end.

It was a ship. A steam-powered mechanical ship with a beautiful white hull and tall smokestacks that looked quite advanced.

Zhou Ming watched this quietly. His face stayed calm, with no hint of surprise.

The model of the White Oak had appeared in this room. But… why? Why had it suddenly appeared here? What had happened to that ship?

Zhou Ming raised his head and looked at the nearby shelf. The models of the Vanished and Pland still lay quietly in their cubby holes.

Objects that had been completely burned by the fire of the spirit form, and thus completely brought under his control, would appear on the desk of this little studio apartment as precise scale models. This rule was already confirmed. The Vanished and Pland were both like this. But the White Oak…

Zhou Ming recalled the first time he had encountered that ship.

The White Oak had indeed been burned once by his spirit form fire. The entire ship had even been “swallowed” by the Vanished. But maybe back then his control over the spirit form fire had not been skilled enough. After that “burning,” the White Oak had not turned into a “collectible” on his desk. It had only left behind a mark. That state had lasted all the way until now.

Zhou Ming sat down in front of the desk. He quietly watched the ghostly petals of green flame jumping on the desktop as they traced the very last bit of the White Oak’s outline, his expression thoughtful.

He could be sure that during this recent period he had not paid any attention to the movements of the White Oak. He had definitely never taken the initiative to “trigger” the fire mark on that ship. So this change had not started from his side. It was the White Oak. That ship had clearly run into something, which had activated the mark on it, and even “animated” it so much that the whole ship had now become one of the “collectibles” here.

Zhou Ming narrowed his eyes a little and tried again to locate the position of the White Oak and sense its current state.

A moment later, he opened his eyes. There was a faint heaviness in his expression.

Even here, inside this room, he still could not precisely confirm where the White Oak was. His vague sense only pointed roughly toward the city-state of Frostholm in the world on the other side of the door. And when he tried to confirm the White Oak’s current state, he got a rather strange kind of feedback.

He actually felt that the entire ship was wrapped in seawater.

On the desk, the petals of green flame stopped jumping. The precise model of the White Oak lay quietly in front of Zhou Ming, every tiny detail lifelike.

After hesitating for a moment, Zhou Ming reached out, picked up the model of the White Oak in both hands, and held it up close to study it.

He did not see anything out of place.

After fiddling with it for a while, Zhou Ming shook his head. He realized that he still could not confirm the state of that ship from here. He would still have to go to Frostholm and check the situation there.

He rose from the desk, holding the White Oak in his hands. He planned to put this new “collectible” on the shelf first. But after only a few steps, he suddenly stopped beside a mirror.

He looked at the mirror. In the mirror, what he was holding in his hands was not the White Oak, but a strange warship shrouded in thick black fog and wide swaths of Shadows!

The outline of that ship faintly resembled the White Oak. It looked like a ship of the same design, yet the whole thing had an unreal, phantom-like texture. All over the hull he could see signs of damage and abandonment, as if it had been sleeping on the seafloor for many years. Zhou Ming stared at the ship in the mirror for a moment, then lowered his head. In his own hands, he saw that he was indeed only holding the model of the White Oak.

After a brief spell of shock and thought, Zhou Ming suddenly set the model of the White Oak aside. He quickly walked to the shelf, picked up the models of the Vanished and the city-state of Pland, and tested them one by one in front of the mirror.

There was no change at all in their reflections.

Only the White Oak showed a strange “other form” in the mirror.

Zhou Ming again picked up the model of the White Oak and brought it to the mirror. He watched the dark ship-shadow in the glass, lost in thought.

It looked like the “reflection” of the White Oak in another dimension.

Thinking, he slowly reached out toward the phantom in the mirror.

His fingers only touched the cold, hard surface of the glass.

…

Alone at the oars of the small boat, Lawrence watched as the towering hull of the Black Oak grew larger and larger in his field of vision. The thick fog filled with Shadows slowly closed in around him. The consecrated lantern hanging at the bow struggled to push back the surrounding gloom. It could only sketch out a hazy route ahead for him.

He turned his head and saw that the White Oak had already turned into a blurry phantom in the mist. When he had looked from the bridge of the White Oak, the two ships had seemed so close. But now he felt there was a great gulf between them. That gulf was not a gap of physical distance, but some kind of barrier suspended between the real and the unreal.

And he was now slowly crossing that barrier.

His heart had calmed down. The more eerie it became around him and the darker the surroundings grew, the calmer he felt. It was as if all paths had become clear and fate had shown him every choice. He was going to board the Black Oak, no matter what was waiting for him there.

But it seemed that only he had calmed down. There was another passenger in the boat, and that one did not look calm at all.

“Just let me go back! Put a rope on me, hang me from the mast, anything!” Anomaly 077 chattered. This ugly mummified corpse had been rambling on and on since just now. “As long as you let me go back to sleep, I’ll do whatever you say… Even if you tell me to convert to the Storm Goddess… or the God of Death! I don’t want to keep my eyes open anymore!”

Lawrence finally turned his head. For the first time since they had set out, he answered the mummified corpse: “You can still devote yourself to a deity?”

The mummified corpse froze for a second, then nodded at once: “As long as you let me go back to sleep, I can devote myself to any god you want, even in my dreams!”

Lawrence thought for a moment. A joke that was popular among sailors came to mind, and a smile appeared on his face: “Then you can try devoting yourself to the God of Wisdom.”

Anomaly 077's whole body went stiff. A long time passed before he moved even a little. His shriveled throat squeezed out a few words: "I could start with plane geometry first…"

"You even dare to try the God of Wisdom. Looks like you're really desperate," Lawrence said, shaking his head. He could not help feeling a little curious. "But why are you so afraid? The records I read say you are the kind of anomaly that tends toward a runaway state. But now you're trying everything you can to get back to sleep?"

Anomaly 077 did not answer. He only tried his best to curl up in a corner of the boat and stared nervously at the green flames that were quietly burning on Lawrence's body.

Lawrence lowered his head and looked at his body, which still had not returned to normal. Then he raised his head again: "Is it because of this flame? Or because of the power that this flame stands for?"

Anomaly 077 muttered in a dull voice: "Don't you already know the answer?"

"I didn't expect even an anomaly like you to know the name of the Vanished," Lawrence said, a little moved. "In the records I saw, it said that after you entered a runaway state, you kept your mind and could talk to people. But I didn't think your mind would be this clear… If you weren't a mummified corpse, I would almost think you were a human."

Anomaly 077 lowered his head. He seemed to have accepted his fate and did not say another word.

Lawrence did not pay much attention to this "sailor's" reaction. Right now he had countless riddles to think about. Compared to those riddles, a strange runaway state anomaly whose behavior did not match the records was nothing.

So many unknowns. So many secrets.

How many years had it been since he had last felt this way?

It was as if Adventurer Lawrence had vanished from the world the day he parted from the Black Oak. The unknown and the distant had turned into words from memory, until now.

The moment he saw the Black Oak again, Adventurer Lawrence had woken up once more from deep inside the old captain’s heart.

He raised his head and saw that the towering hull of the Black Oak was now less than a few meters away from the boat. He steered the small boat closer. When he reached the familiar spot from his memories, he stopped and grabbed an oar to bang on the hull.

A rope ladder dropped down from above and landed on the bow of the little boat.

Lawrence turned his head and looked at Anomaly 077, who was huddled in the corner.

“Get aboard, sailor.”

Anomaly 077 got up very unwillingly, head lowered: “Yes, Captain.”

Chapter 389: Stepping Onto the Black Oak

Clinging to the rope ladder, Lawrence climbed up the side of the Black Oak bit by bit. The hull had a dull, dark color, as if it had been scorched by something. At last he reached the deck of the ship.

As soon as his feet touched the deck, he bent over, hands on his knees, and panted several times before his breathing evened out. This made him shake his head with a self-mocking little smile.

He really was old now. He had reached the age where climbing a rope ladder a short way left him needing to stop and rest. In the past…

Another set of footsteps landed behind him. Lawrence put away those stray thoughts and turned to see that Anomaly 077 had climbed up after him. The frightening mummified corpse stood very carefully near the rail and looked quite obedient.

It – or rather, he – had actually cooperated very well all the way here. A terrifying high-level anomaly being this honest was a strange sight indeed. But once Lawrence remembered that this mummified corpse was his only “companion” on this exploration, he gathered up the odd feeling in his heart and made his expression turn serious.

“Did you secure the boat?” He looked at Anomaly 077 and spoke to this special “sailor” the same way he normally spoke to the sailors under his command.

“It’s secured,” the mummified corpse said at once in a hoarse, low voice. Then he raised his head and glanced quickly around them. There was a trace of doubt in his tone. “…It looks like there’s no one on board, Captain.”

“I’m not blind,” Lawrence said calmly as he let his gaze move across the deck.

After they stepped onto the deck of the Black Oak, the eerie thick fog and the texture of Shadows around them were still there, but they did not grow any thicker. Through the drifting mist, he could faintly see the scene on the ship. Everything was just as he remembered. Seven or eight parts of the Black Oak’s layout were almost the same as the White Oak’s. The only difference was that it all had the look of something left to rot for many years. The paint on the railings had peeled and flaked. Parts of the deck were warped and buckled. On the outer walls of the superstructure in the distance, he could even see stains that looked like layers of rust.

If he ignored the strange fog, the whole ship felt like another White Oak – a “version” that had been abandoned and left to drift on the sea for many years without proper upkeep.

And as Anomaly 077 had said, there was no sign of anyone on this ship.

“If there’s no one on board, then who threw down that rope ladder just now?” Anomaly 077 muttered. “And when you ordered them to signal this ship before, it sent back a light signal in reply. Who sent that signal back then?”

“For an ‘anomaly,’ your thinking is actually quite orderly,” Lawrence said, unable to resist glancing back at this “sailor,” clearly surprised. “But don’t you think using ‘logic’ on a ghost ship is a little strange?”

Anomaly 077 shrugged and fell silent.

But Lawrence did not give the mummified corpse a chance to stay quiet. He had not brought this mummified corpse onto the Black Oak just to keep it from causing trouble on the White Oak. He wanted to make some use of it.

“Can your ability work on this ship?” Lawrence stared into Anomaly 077’s eyes. “Can you control this ship?”

“You want me to ‘take it over’?” Anomaly 077 looked a little shocked.

“You are not allowed to ‘take it away’ – but I want you to check whether your ability can work here,” Lawrence said with a very serious face. “Feel it. Find out what state this ship is actually in.”

This “sailor” called Anomaly 077 had an ability whose greatest strength was to control and seize anything that fit the concept of a “ship.” In other words, this anomaly had a sense for and influence over “ships” far beyond human understanding. So… in the eyes of this “sailor,” would the Black Oak show some “special traits”?

Starting from this line of thought, Anomaly 077 might be able to help him uncover the truth here.

The mummified corpse obeyed the order. He stood on the deck and spread his arms, then closed his eyes halfway, as if he were feeling the direction of the wind in the fog. Not far away, Lawrence looked at the familiar parts of the deck with a complicated gaze.

The Black Oak… He was now standing on this ship. How many times had he dreamed of the past and failed to forget the scenes on this deck? How many times had he set sail clutching a stubborn wish to find this ship again? But now, at the very moment he was truly standing here, he could only question everything over and over. He questioned his own judgment. He questioned his own senses. He even questioned the existence of this ship.

The way the Black Oak had appeared was far too suspicious and strange, and the state it now showed was most definitely not normal. Though he did not want to admit it emotionally, reason told him that… this very likely was not the “Black Oak” he had been searching for.

It was only some “phenomenon” created by the supernatural Visions of a runaway state.

Lawrence’s mind was full of tangled thoughts. Only when the “sailor” beside him suddenly opened his eyes and made a confused sound did all those thoughts finally stop.

“What is it?” Lawrence asked at once.

“I… I don’t know how to explain it…” The sailor looked down in shock at the deck under his feet. “Captain, I… I can’t feel this ship’s existence…”

“What do you mean?! You can’t feel this ship’s existence?” Lawrence’s eyes widened at once. He had thought that the sailor’s power might not be strong enough to control this strange ghost ship. He had not expected the other party to give this kind of answer at all. “Then what are we standing on right now?”

“That’s why I don’t know how to explain it…” The sailor seemed startled by Lawrence’s expression, but he still forced himself to go on. “We are standing here. There’s no doubt that it exists. But in my senses, it actually does not exist. At least… at least it is not here…”

Lawrence frowned. He knew that the mummified corpse in front of him had no reason to trick him. This was the other’s true thought at this moment. It was just that… this did nothing to ease the questions in his heart.

After a short silence, he took a breath. One hand lifted the consecrated lantern as he turned his head to look toward a certain part of the deck.

The soft yellow light from the consecrated lantern drifted through the fog, as if it were pointing out an invisible path.

“Captain, where are we going?”

“The bridge,” Lawrence said coolly. “The captain should be on the bridge.”

Before he even finished the sentence, he had already started walking toward the path lit by the lantern. The “sailor” stood stunned for a second, then hurried to catch up, walking with a slight stumble as he asked curiously, “You mean… the captain of this ship? You know the captain of this ship?”

Lawrence’s steps paused for a heartbeat, then he kept walking: “Yes. I know her very well.”

The sailor made a small sound of understanding and then fell quiet again.

A moment later, Lawrence reached the door that led to the bridge.

The red metal door in front of him was slightly ajar, as if it were inviting him in.

“You go open it.”

Lawrence held the consecrated lantern in one hand and drew his revolver from his belt with the other. With a look, he motioned for the mummified corpse beside him to step forward.

“Ah… all right.”

The mummified corpse let out a very human sigh, stepped up to the door, grabbed the handle, and, without seeming to use much strength, pushed the heavy door wide open.

Lawrence leaned forward and looked inside.

The bridge was empty. There was no sign of people anywhere. Only thin mist drifted between the chairs and the control equipment. At the very front, at the helm, the unattended wheel was swaying gently left and right, as if someone were making small adjustments to their course.

“There’s no one here either,” the mummified corpse muttered beside him.

“I’m not blind,” Lawrence said, then stepped onto the bridge.

He lifted the consecrated lantern and used its light to drive away the darkness around them. His gaze slid past the worn, weathered equipment and seats and slowly came to rest in front of the wheel.

The captain should have been standing here.

But there was no sign of the captain.

Lawrence stood there quietly for a while, then let out a sigh. He himself could not tell whether it was from disappointment or relief. “So, you really aren’t here.”

“No. I am.”

A cool female voice came from the side.

Lawrence jumped so hard even the ghostly green flames on his body flared several inches higher. In the next second, he snapped his head toward the source of the voice.

A young-looking woman in a captain’s uniform stood there, arms folded, her slightly wavy long hair loose down her back. She looked at them with a calm expression that held a hint of helplessness.

“Ah, a woman just popped out,” Anomaly 077 said in shock. Then he seemed to realize something and shot a quick look at Lawrence. “Captain, should I stay quiet?”

Lawrence glanced at the mummified corpse. “Yes. Quiet.”

“Yes, Captain.”

Though Anomaly 077's interruption came at the wrong time, it still eased the stiff, awkward air a little. Lawrence used the chance to steady himself. In his mind, thoughts raced over what he should say first – what should his first sentence be?

In the past, he had spoken with "Martha" countless times. In one hallucination after another, they had already spent many, many years together. But at this very moment, Lawrence suddenly realized he was stuck. He could not act as naturally with Martha as he did when he fell into hallucinations.

And this brief moment of hesitation made him suddenly realize one thing.

The Martha in front of him… was a being acting on her own, completely separate from his subconscious.

Chapter 390: Reunion After a Long Separation

For a long time, Lawrence had felt as if he were trapped in a waking dream. He knew better than anyone what had happened to him, and how his mind had gone wrong.

He knew Martha was no longer in this world. He knew the figure who stayed at his side day and night was only a hallucination. He knew all of it, in his subconscious and in his waking thoughts; he was painfully clear about it.

But compared with other captains of about his age and experience, his mental state was actually quite good. On the vast Boundless Sea, there was never any shortage of captains whose minds had twisted and broken. Even with priests aboard to share the burden, this job that challenged the sea always meant taking on far more spiritual corruption than an ordinary crew member. Every captain finished voyage after voyage by fighting against a mind that kept getting worse. In the end, captains often used one line to describe their work:

“We are not sailing along the edge of the abyss. Our lives are sailing straight into it.”

But it was exactly because of his long years of mental trouble that Lawrence had an especially sharp sense for this “Martha”. Right now, he had already sensed that the figure before him was not the same kind of “thing” as the illusions he had seen before.

He could not help but recall that “Martha” who had appeared earlier on the White Oak’s deck. First Mate Gus had seen that “Martha” too. Had the change started from that moment?

Had everything finally crossed some threshold? Had the things he imagined at last come into the Mortal Realm? Or had some unspeakable power read his mind and created this real “individual” before his eyes? Was this a gift full of malice, or a trap dripping with mockery?

“Martha…” Lawrence finally opened his mouth. His throat felt dry, and even his voice turned hoarse. “You are really in front of me?”

“As you can see,” the woman adventurer laughed. “Want to come and touch me? I even have body heat.”

“…You are a real, solid person.” Lawrence took a slow breath and held back the urge to step forward. “But… why? Did the illusions in my head get transformed into some kind of entity here? Is this… the power of this sea region?”

“At least you got part of it right.” Martha shook her head lightly. “It was indeed this ‘sea’ that shaped me and the Black Oak. But I did not come from the illusions in your head. I have wandered here for many years, Lawrence. For many years, this ship and I have been here as part of a huge group of ‘replicas’, drifting without purpose.”

Lawrence was slightly stunned: “replicas?”

“replicas. Some great power in the Deep Sea caused all this. I do not know what it really is, but it has been entrenched here for many, many years, producing countless replicas. Do you remember the Sea Swallow you just destroyed? And that Dagger Island…”

“They were all ‘replicas’?!” Lawrence’s eyes widened. He suddenly realized the vortex he was caught in was even stranger and more terrible than he had thought. “Wait, then that city-state of Frostholm we met before…”

“It was one as well. Everything here is,” Martha said calmly. “That power has long soaked this whole sea region. Anything that stays here and drifts long enough cannot escape being ‘copied’. There are countless blind, hollow replicas wandering in the Deep Sea. What you have run into is only a tiny part of them.”

Lawrence seemed frozen. After a long time, he finally snapped out of it and stared at the “wife” before him in disbelief: “But… you look different. You can even talk to me. Just now this ship even fought side by side with the White Oak…”

Martha did not speak. She only watched Lawrence in silence, her eyes calm and meaningful, her gaze resting quietly on him.

Lawrence stopped talking and slowly came back to himself. He lowered his head and looked at his own body, still as unreal and transparent as a Ghost, and at the faint green flame quietly burning on it.

The Black Oak had appeared after the White Oak completed its “molting” in the spirit form flames.

“You have realized it, Lawrence,” Martha said softly. “Only another, even greater power can fight such a mighty force. Even this sea has no right to touch the spoils of the Vanished Fleet. You and I are both the ‘spoils’ of Him.”

Lawrence listened in a daze, feeling a little unreal. Then his expression changed slightly as he realized something wrong about her last few sentences. That was not something the “Martha” who had said goodbye to him decades ago should have known.

Why would she know about the Vanished? Why would she know that the White Oak was Captain Duncan's "spoils"?

"You read my mind!" Lawrence's eyes suddenly widened. His muscles tensed on instinct. "You are not the real Martha!"

Yet the figure standing not far away only smiled, seeming not to care at all about Lawrence's reaction. Her calm was the same as decades ago. She said: "If what you want is a one hundred percent accurate and 'pure' Martha, I am sorry, Lawrence, I truly am not her. But 'she' is a part of me. Martha's soul is inside me. And another part of me comes from your thoughts and memories. This sea is like a mirror. It keeps reflecting everything that passes across its surface. Thoughts and memories are, of course, included.

"I did not read your mind. Your mind naturally reflected and became part of me. Can you not accept that?"

Lawrence opened his mouth. His expression shifted several times. At last he pulled the corners of his mouth in a bitter half smile and spread his hands: "I do not know. I never even thought about how I should react if I really faced you again. I… I do not know how I am supposed to accept you in this… 'form'. I have not even figured out what kind of being you are."

He raised his head. This old captain, who had not flinched before countless strange horrors on the Boundless Sea, now looked a little lost and at a loss for what to do.

He had never shown weakness in front of anyone, except in front of his wife.

Martha quietly looked at Lawrence, who was no longer young. After a long time, she let out a helpless little laugh: "You are still the same as before. At key moments, you always need my help."

She walked over, raised her hands, and set them on Lawrence's shoulders. Her hands had the warmth of a living person.

"You need to steady yourself and keep a clear head…"

Lawrence frowned slightly, a little puzzled.

"Mr. Sailor, could you step outside for a moment?" Martha turned her head toward Anomaly 077, who had been standing there very quietly. "The Master of the Vanished Fleet will be pleased with your cooperation."

The mummified corpse in the sailor's coat gave a start. Without a word, he turned and left the bridge.

Lawrence seemed to suddenly realize something and hurriedly spoke: "Wait…"

But the bridge door had already closed.

Anomaly 077 quickly ran to the corridor outside the door. He only faintly heard Captain Lawrence's last shout from inside:

"Martha – I am already over sixty this year!"

He did not have the heart to listen to what happened after that.

A moment later, the hinges gave a creaking sound. Anomaly 077 hunched his neck and carefully turned his head. He saw the woman adventurer standing at the door with a light, cheerful smile on her face.

Right after her, Lawrence came out too, baring his teeth in pain. When he saw Anomaly 077 at the door, he immediately shot him a warning look, then quickly covered his head and bared his teeth even more.

Anomaly 077 quickly pulled back his gaze and worked hard to lower his presence like a real corpse.

It was clear that he had taken quite a beating.

“Can you accept it now?” Martha turned her head and asked Lawrence with a smile.

Lawrence held the swollen spot on his head. He did not know why, in a form that was almost spirit form, he could still get beaten up by Martha like this. He only knew that such details no longer mattered: “I can accept it. I can accept it…”

When you drifted on the Boundless Sea, you needed to take things easy about everything.

After all, it now seemed that if he could not think things through, Martha would help him “open up” anyway. The woman adventurer’s bold temper was the same as years ago, but he was already a man past fifty now…

“Then next, we should think about serious business,” Martha said with a smile, folding her arms and leaning against the door. “Staying trapped here forever is not a solution.”

Hearing this, Lawrence instantly put away his tangled thoughts, and his face became serious: “Martha, I wanted to ask you this just now. What exactly is the state of this sea? Do you know any way to leave here?”

“…I really want to answer you, but I am sorry.” Martha was silent for two seconds, then spoke with some regret. “I have wandered here for many years, but in the end, this ship and I are only one of the many replicas trapped here. There is one thing I can be sure of, though. This whole sea is centered on that city-state of Frostholm. If there really is a rift here where this place overlaps with the Mortal Realm, it must be in Frostholm.”

Chapter 391: Reflections

Go to Frostholm.

Lawrence instantly thought of the words “Martha” had told him before. By now he could no longer tell whether that Martha back then had been his own hallucination or the trace of presence leaking from this Martha before him. Only one thing was sure: he should go to Frostholm.

But how was he supposed to get there?

“We have been searching here for a long time,” Lawrence could not help but frown as he spoke. “Ever since we left the city’s Harbor under cover of night last time, the White Oak has never found that city-state again. We followed the same route back, and there was only open sea there.”

“You will not find it by searching like this.” Martha smiled and shook her head. “Lawrence, Frostholm is hiding from you.”

“Hiding from me?” Lawrence froze for a moment. “Why?”

Martha did not answer. She simply raised her hand and pointed at the Ghost flames quietly burning on Lawrence’s body.

Lawrence understood at once. He lowered his head to look at his arm, which was like spirit form, and spoke in a thoughtful tone: “So… that was why we were not stopped when we left the city’s Harbor before. It was not that we sailed away from it. It was that the city sailed away from the White Oak?”

He lifted his head, his expression turning a little strange: “Then what are we supposed to do? The White Oak now is even closer to the Vanished than when we left the Harbor. If that city keeps moving away from me on purpose, how can I ever find it?”

“I will go find it,” Martha said, calm and brief.

“You will go?” Lawrence did not react at first. “You can find it?”

“Of course I can. For many years, my ship and I have always been part of this sea region. Even now that I have left this huge swarm, it will not realize it right away. And from another angle, the way the Black Oak exists now is closer to being the ‘reflection’ of the White Oak. I have not built a direct connection with the Vanished, at least not yet. Frostholm will not hide from me. It is not as ‘smart’ as you imagine.”

Lawrence nodded half in understanding, but he still felt puzzled: “But then only you can get close to it. What about me and the White Oak? The moment we show up, it will definitely ‘run away’ again…”

Martha smiled.

She stepped forward half a step and gently pressed her hand against Lawrence’s chest. With a deep, meaningful look on her face, she spoke softly: “It is simple. Let us trade places. Here, the line between body and reflection is not so clear.”

Lawrence stared for a moment and instinctively wanted to ask what she meant. But before he could open his mouth, he felt a slight push on his chest.

The force was very gentle, yet it made him feel as if the world spun. He only felt himself falling backward. In the instant before he lost consciousness, he felt someone support his back, and Martha’s soft voice sounded in his ear:

“Take a little nap, my love. What comes next is an unbelievable journey.”

Lawrence sank into sleep, but he felt as if he had only slept for an instant before his eyes flew open again. He shouted without thinking: “Martha!”

But what came to his ears was First Mate Gus’s voice: “Captain, you are awake?”

Lawrence finally woke up fully. He pushed himself up, panting hard from waking so suddenly, then looked around. He realized he was lying on the bed in the captain’s cabin. First Mate Gus stood nearby with a worried look on his face, and a few sailors were also in the room.

In a farther corner, he saw a familiar figure: Anomaly 077. The mummified corpse was using a noose to measure his own neck when he thought no one was looking. As soon as he noticed Lawrence’s gaze, he instantly hid the rope and pretended nothing had happened.

“What is…” Lawrence caught his breath and muttered while rubbing his forehead. For a moment, he could not tell whether he was still dreaming or back in the Mortal Realm. What had happened earlier rose and fell in his memory like a vision.

“You are already back on the White Oak. ‘Sailor’ brought you back,” First Mate Gus said at once, raising his hand to point at the mummified corpse not far away. “You have been asleep for several hours.”

“I remember… I remember going to explore the Black Oak, and seeing Martha on it… Did those things really happen?” Lawrence rubbed his forehead hard, then lifted his eyes. “Where is the Black Oak? Where is it now?”

“Your memory is fine. You really did go to that ship. ‘Sailor’ also told us that you saw Lady Martha on it.” First Mate Gus reached out to help Lawrence sit up, but halfway through his words, his expression turned a bit strange. “As for where that ship is now… Captain, things are a little odd. I do not know how to explain it to you…”

“Odd?” Lawrence frowned. “What do you mean?”

“Our ship has lost control. The wheel and the propeller do not respond. The White Oak is drifting like a ghost ship. As for the Black Oak… I will take you to see it.”

Listening to the first mate’s worried words, Lawrence’s expression became serious at once. He pushed away Gus’s supporting hand and stepped after the sailors toward the door.

At the same time, he noticed the changes on himself and on the others.

The spirit form flames that had burned faintly on them had gone out at some unknown time. Everyone’s body had returned to the state of living people. The floor and walls around them no longer looked like they were burning with the same flames as the Vanished. Everything here seemed to have gone back to normal.

First Mate Gus noticed the captain’s gaze and explained: “The flames faded a few hours ago, shortly after you came back.”

Lawrence nodded in silence. The faded Ghost flames were not what he cared about now. He cared more about what had happened to make his usually steady first mate look so hesitant and at a loss.

Soon, he left the cabin with the sailors and came out onto the White Oak’s deck.

In just an instant, he realized how strange the surroundings were.

The air felt damp and cold, as if it had been soaked in seawater. There was no light at all in the sky, only clumps like eerie Shadows floating overhead. There was no wind at his side, yet he felt a cold flow touching every inch of his skin. From time to time, he saw strange traces of currents nearby, like tiny bubbles rising in the air.

Lawrence felt the wrongness of this environment in shock and dimly realized what had happened. When First Mate Gus led him to the rail, he confirmed his guess even more.

“The Black Oak is there.”

First Mate Gus stood at the rail and pointed at the water directly below as he spoke.

Lawrence lowered his head. He saw the “sea” slowly rise and fall. The ripples raised by the White Oak as it moved spread out with a warped, strange texture. On that sea surface, which looked like a twisted mirror, he saw the “reflection” of the White Oak.

It was a black ship wrapped in thick fog and Shadows. A few lanterns like Wraiths burned on it. It was “reflected” below the White Oak and was cutting through the waves.

In that moment, Lawrence finally understood what Martha’s parting words had meant.

Now, the White Oak was the reflection of the Black Oak.

“Captain…” First Mate Gus watched the change in Lawrence’s expression. His years of following the old captain let him sense that Lawrence might already know what this was. “What is going on? Why has our reflection in the sea turned into the shape of the Black Oak? And the ship’s runaway state…”

“We are not in runaway state. We are just sailing after the Black Oak.” Lawrence breathed out softly, a faint smile on his face. “Let everyone rest and build up their strength. We are heading toward a place that can solve every problem.”

“A place that can solve every problem?” The first mate blinked in confusion. “Where are we going?”

“We are going to Frostholm.”

…

The veil of night was slowly falling over the city-state.

Two figures were moving quickly through the streets, which were already under curfew.

One figure was tall and broad, wearing a long black coat that made people think of the veil of night. The other figure was very short. Even under a thick winter coat, the thin body inside was still easy to see.

A gust of cold wind blew by, and the short, thin figure let out a solid sneeze: “Achoo!”

Duncan lowered his head to look at Shirley, who was rubbing her nose: “I told you to wear a scarf, but you would not. Frostholm at night is much colder than Pland.”

“It is so cold…” Shirley pulled her clothes tighter on instinct. Even though the coat was enough to block the chill, she still felt the wind cutting to the bone. She had been born and raised in Pland, and she clearly was not used to Frostholm’s weather yet. “I kind of regret coming out…”

Duncan looked at the young lady with a half smile: “Were you not the one who said you would do anything as long as you did not have to do homework?”

At these words, Shirley instantly lifted her chin, still talking tough in the cold wind: “Yes, I said that!”

“Every part of you gives in except your mouth.” Duncan sighed helplessly, then lifted his head and looked toward a distant alley. “Come on. I do not want to deal with the Guardians on patrol."

Shirley hurried to move her short legs to catch up with Duncan. As she struggled forward, she could not hold back her curiosity: "What exactly are we going to do?"

"Confirm someone's condition," Duncan said casually as he walked.

"Someone's condition?" Shirley raised her face to look at the big captain beside her. "Who?"

"Gatekeeper Agatha," Duncan said lightly.

His gaze passed beyond the veil of night, his gaze fixed on the far end of the street.

In his sight, a tiny cluster of ghostly green flame burned, bright and dim in turn, flickering as if hidden behind a thick curtain.

Chapter 392: Inside the mirror world?

In Duncan’s perception, two Marks that had entered an Anomaly state had already drawn his attention.

One mark, of course, came from the White Oak.

That ship, which he had once reduced to ash with his own flames, still gave off a strong sense of existence. It wandered through his perception like a ball of blazing fire. Yet he still could not pin down its true location. Whenever he tried to locate the White Oak, he got only a strange and hazy result, showing that the White Oak lay somewhere near the city-state of Frostholm, in a zone long since sealed off by the Sea Mist Fleet and the Frostholm navy.

The other “problematic” mark was on Gatekeeper Agatha.

Over the past while, Duncan had suddenly discovered that the mark he had left on Agatha had come under some kind of interference. Under that interference, Agatha’s aura grew several times weaker, and her position began to show the same blur and distortion as the White Oak. When he tried to confirm Agatha’s condition from afar, he was startled to find that her aura would sometimes vanish completely from within the city-state.

Two malfunctioning Marks: one on a ship, one on a person. Different locations, similar states.

That clearly deserved attention.

So he chose to investigate the matter in person after nightfall. He still had no leads on the White Oak, but Agatha's mark continued to move now and then within Frostholm, and it should have been somewhere nearby.

Duncan lowered his head and looked at Shirley, who was peering about at his side.

Dog's senses as a Demon from the Abyssal Deep might be useful. And if there really were Annihilators active in the area, Dog would probably pick up the scent of its own kind.

veil of night deepened. The gas lamps along the street were all lit. Now and then a night watchman's whistle or a dog's bark sounded in the distance, mixed with the sound of waves rolling in from far out at sea.

During curfew, the streets were empty and cold. Even the light spilling from building windows along the road could not drive away the chill of this winter night. Duncan led Shirley through yet another narrow alley, and in his "sight" the tiny flame that represented Agatha still paced back and forth not far away.

"Mr. Duncan, if that Gatekeeper sees me… do you think she'll cut me down with one sword stroke?" Shirley said, mostly just trying to find something to say. "Like when Vanna sees a Heretic…"

"Gatekeepers don't use swords," Duncan said casually. "I heard from Vanna that they use specially made combat Gatekeeper's canes and divine magic in the domain of death to deal with Heretics."

Shirley instantly shrank her neck and fell silent.

Duncan did not mind the young lady's reaction. After they entered another alley, he suddenly stopped walking.

Shirley also stopped at once, tense, her face full of alarm as she looked around. "Did you find something? Is that Gatekeeper up ahead?"

“…She isn’t up ahead. She’s right here,” Duncan said calmly as his gaze swept slowly along the alley. “And she has been here for a while.”

“She’s right here?!” Shirley’s eyes went wide. She felt as if another cold draft blew across the back of her neck. She stared hard into the alley, her heart growing more and more uneasy. “Where? Where is she… I can’t see her at all. Dog, do you see her?”

“No,” Dog’s voice came from the nearby shadows, sounding muffled. “I don’t see anyone, and I don’t feel any aura.”

“Even Dog can’t see her?” Duncan’s brow furrowed slightly. Yet in front of his eyes, the tiny flame that represented Agatha burned quietly a few meters away, faint and unreal.

The Gatekeeper was right here. She had been resting here.

Duncan walked slowly toward where the flame burned, then stopped again.

“Agatha” seemed to sense something. When he was halfway there, the little flame suddenly leaped, then quickly moved off in another direction.

Duncan lifted his head and looked toward the direction in which the flame moved in his perception. Suddenly, a flicker of shadow on the glass window set into a nearby exterior wall caught his eye.

On the glass surface he saw a blurred human figure run past in a hurry. In its outline he could faintly make out Agatha’s shape.

Shirley, who had just raised her head to look around, also noticed the shadow. She almost cried out in fright, but she reacted in time and clapped a hand over her mouth. Only after the shadow flashed past did she look at Duncan and speak in a trembling voice: “There was a figure just now!”

“I saw it. It was reflected in the window,” Duncan said in a low voice, his gaze still calmly fixed ahead. In the place Shirley could not see, he still stared at the tiny flame. It had already passed through the alley, flared once at the junction ahead, then turned and ran in another direction.

He narrowed his eyes a little, as if sketching Agatha's condition in his mind.

She seemed to be breaking out of some predicament. She might have been wounded, or simply exhausted. She had paused here for a brief rest, then headed toward the Upper City. At the junction, something had blocked her path for a moment, but it had not stopped her.

Duncan opened his eyes and let his gaze fall once more on the glass window not far away. Agatha's figure no longer appeared in the smooth pane. It only reflected the faint image of a street lamp in the distance.

"A reflection…" Duncan murmured. "Interesting…"

"Ah?" Shirley still looked completely lost. "What? You already figured it out?"

"Maybe." Duncan gave a noncommittal answer, then stepped up to the window and raised his hand to snap his fingers.

A tiny flame leaped up at his fingertips and lit his figure.

He looked at the glass. In the window he saw the reflection of the flame in his hand. Its dancing light seemed almost alive as it burned quietly in the world of the mirror world.

Shirley watched Duncan's movements in confusion. Then she saw him wave his hand lightly and scatter the flame at his fingertips.

Yet a faint green glow still flickered in her field of vision.

Shirley's mouth slowly fell open as she stared in shock at the scene before her. After Duncan had dispelled the flame in his hand, the spark reflected in the glass window did not fade at all. The reflected fire still burned quietly, as if it now possessed an existence of its own and was burning inside the mirror.

“Wh-what… what is going on?!” Shirley lifted her hand and pointed at the flame in the glass, stammering as she looked at Duncan. “Why is the flame in there still…”

“A Frostholm of the mirror world,” Duncan turned his head slowly, and there seemed to be a hint of amusement in his tone. “It is gradually merging with the Frostholm of the Mortal Realm. A fine bit of ingenuity. Personally, I find it quite creative.”

“mirror world…” Shirley only half understood, but she still repeated the word without thinking. “You mean there’s another Frostholm inside the mirrors? That ‘Gatekeeper’ ran into the world inside the mirrors?”

“Not exactly, but you can think of it that way,” Duncan said calmly. He turned his gaze back to the mirror, watching the reflected flame that still burned there. “There’s a tiny fissure here, but it isn’t enough.”

“Not enough?” Shirley blinked.

“I need a more precise location and a stronger link,” Duncan said as he slowly reached out and touched the illusory flame in the mirror with his fingertip. “This little spark isn’t enough to ignite the world on the other side of the mirror. However…”

He paused, then drew back his hand.

The phantom flame in the mirror suddenly wavered, then slipped away into the depths of the darkness, leaving behind only a faintly glowing trail of ghostly green that seemed to stretch off into the distance.

“It’s already enough to give Agatha a hand.”

…

How many replicas made from elements had she already destroyed? How many avatar forms of that blond young man had she shattered?

After the count passed four digits, Agatha no longer bothered to keep track.

She only knew that the Heretic had not lied to her about one thing. She really was trapped in this bizarre world, and for now there was no hope of escaping it.

The sky was dim and the clouds churned in confusion. In this “Frostholm city-state” without the light of the Sun, the boundary between day and night had disappeared. Only the subtle changes of light behind the clouds and the gas lamps flickering on along the streets hinted that veil of night had already descended.

Agatha moved through a narrow alley, hurrying along while steadying her breath and mending the wounds on her body and mind.

Her black coat was torn in many places from constant fighting. The soft armor beneath it was badly damaged as well. On her shoulder, along her side, and in other places, the bandages and skin underneath were already visible, with thin traces of blood seeping through.

To be fair, the enemies were not strong. Even the avatar forms used by that blond Heretic did not seem particularly fearsome in the eyes of Agatha the Gatekeeper. It took her only a few minutes to dispatch each one.

But they were endless.

The entire city-state served as their raw material and reserve troops. Ordinary methods of battle had no meaning here at all.

Agatha threaded her way through the alley while her mind worked rapidly.

At the same time, she recalled the strange and terrifying sensation from a few minutes earlier.

She had been taking a brief rest in a dark alley when that dreadful aura suddenly appeared within her senses. The pressure it brought… even made her feel as though her heart had stopped beating for a few seconds.

She had not had time to think then and had hurriedly left her hiding place. But looking back now… that terrifying aura did not quite feel like something that belonged to this eerie replica city-state.

What… exactly had it been?

Chapter 393: Inside and Outside the Mirror

Agatha suddenly stopped walking.

At the end of her field of view, something strange at the mouth of the alley broke off her wandering thoughts.

In that corner shrouded in gloom, one disgusting mass of black matter after another was surging up. They seeped out of the ground and the walls nearby like viscous grease oozing from pipes. Amid slimy, sickening sounds, the mudlike clumps almost instantly began to take on human shapes and turned hostile gazes toward Agatha.

“Truly persistent…”

Agatha let out a soft sigh, but her movements did not hesitate in the slightest. Before the sludge had time to fully congeal, she had already raised her Gatekeeper’s cane and leveled it at the nearest mass.

pale flame flared into being out of nowhere and instantly devoured that writhing lump of elements. The power of Cremation Fire turned it directly to ash. A second later, a gray whirlwind rose in the alley. Ashen Wind howled through the human-shaped replicas that were just starting to climb to their feet, carrying a mighty power of erosion and devouring that reduced them to dry, crumbling dust.

Yet more and more sludge seeped out of the nearby walls and floor. More and more human-shaped freaks appeared at the mouth of the alley, blocking Agatha’s way.

As Ashen Wind swept past, Agatha’s form condensed out of the gale. There was a bit more weariness on her face. When she sensed a strange new aura suddenly rising from within the sludge, her eyes grew even more grave.

She looked toward the source of the aura and saw a replica formed from elements writhing and mutating at high speed. In a few seconds, it had turned into a smiling young man with short blond hair, a white shirt, and a black vest.

“Miss Gatekeeper, your stamina is truly impressive,” the young man said politely, nodding slightly. “I wonder if you are still enjoying your exercise here?”

“If you think you can tire me to death with this war of attrition, you are being far too naive,” Agatha’s gaze was icy as she fixed her gaze on yet another avatar form of the young man, steadying her breath. “Death means nothing to me. I can still fight after I die. A Gatekeeper’s soul never grows weary, and the day will come when I find you.”

“Of course, of course. Truly killing one of Bartok’s Saints is not so simple,” the young man laughed, his smile bright. “I never planned to kill you. All I need is to keep you here as long as possible. These hollow shells for you to slaughter are just my hospitality, a little entertainment for you when you’re bored.”

“Then you Heretics have a very peculiar way of entertaining your guests,” Agatha knew he was using every trick he could to delay her, but at least for the moment she did not mind saying a few more words while her strength returned. “I’m suddenly a little curious. Is your true body just as relaxed right now? I can feel that I’m gradually closing in on your hiding place. Every monster you control that I destroy makes your position clearer to me. How many places do you have left to hide?”

The blond young man’s smile finally froze for a moment, but only for a moment. Then he beamed again. “Ah, it seems I overlooked something. Bartok’s watchdogs have always had a decent ‘sense of smell’. In that case, why don’t we make a bet?”

He raised a hand as if making an inviting gesture.

“Let’s bet on whether you find my true body first, or Frostholm becomes the first mortal nation to greet the descent of the Holy Lord. The stakes are your soul and the lives of everyone in Frostholm…”

A blast of pale flame erupted with a roar, sweeping over the spot where the young man stood before he could finish speaking. A second later, Agatha had already turned into a howling Ashen Wind. The gale crashed toward the intersection. The gathered replica freaks surged up at once, trying to stop the Ashen Wind, but under the power of the Death Wind they shattered and fell apart. In the blink of an eye, the Ashen Wind slammed into the blond young man wreathed in pale flame and hurled him straight into a low wall on the far side of the street.

With a thunderous crash, the flames were blown apart by the gale, and Agatha’s figure emerged from the Ashen Wind. She held her Gatekeeper’s cane out straight in her right hand. Its tip had pierced the blond young man’s chest and nailed him firmly to the wall.

“Sorry. I don’t gamble,” Agatha fixed her gaze on his eyes, her expression utterly calm. “The clergy forbid gambling.”

“How amusing…” The cultist pinned to the wall by the Gatekeeper’s cane pulled at the corner of his mouth as foul black sludge spilled from his nose and lips. This shell of a body was dying quickly, yet he seemed to feel no fear or pain. “I hope your composure and confidence last a while longer…”

Life flowed out of the shell. The blond young man’s body quickly crumbled and melted into sticky black matter that dripped down and dried almost at once when it hit the ground. The remaining replica freaks he controlled also ceased moving, reverting to lifeless heaps of elements.

Agatha pulled her Gatekeeper’s cane out of the wall and flicked the foul residue from its tip with a touch of disgust. Then she calmly lifted her head and looked toward a certain direction in the Upper City.

She had destroyed yet another avatar form. As its life drained away, the link between the Gatekeeper and the Heretic hiding in the dark strengthened further.

It felt… closer.

“Composure and confidence… I have always believed in myself,”

Agatha muttered to herself. Then she took a few deep breaths, used her Gatekeeper’s cane to steady her body, and slowly walked in the direction her senses pointed. In a puddle behind her, a wisp of ghostly green flame rose from the reflection on the water’s surface, quietly lighting the dim alley.

In the puddles in the alley, in the windows of nearby buildings, on the metal poles of distant street lamps… on every smooth surface, tiny reflections of the flame could be seen.

…

Candles and lamps burned bright inside the Silent Grand Cathedral. The sound of a Gatekeeper’s cane and heels tapping against the floor broke the stillness of the Meditation Hall. A tall figure dressed in black passed through the dark-toned main doors and came to the dais where a black “spirit coffin” rested.

From within the spirit coffin came Bishop Ivan's hoarse, aged voice. "Agatha, you're back. How is the situation in the Second Waterway?"

"The first team only just reached the western entrance. It will take them a whole day just to clear the connecting shaft and send equipment down," Agatha shook her head and spoke with a hint of helplessness. "You have to be a little patient, Bishop Ivan."

"Oh…" The voice in the coffin fell silent for a moment, then asked, "Then what is the state of the western entrance?"

"…"

After a moment, she sighed. "It's an underground facility that has been abandoned for half a century. What else could it be like? I assembled twelve heavy machine guns and three Steam Walkers. Every bullet carries Holy Oil and a flame divine blessing. I also brought one hundred and fifty fully armed Silent Monks. Only then did we drive back the darkness down there. The good news is that we've managed to establish a first foothold at the crossroads beneath the shaft and restore power and lighting to several connecting tunnels. The next stage of exploration might go more smoothly than expected – if we don't run into more cave-ins and gas leaks."

"You found no trace of the Heretics?"

"Not yet," Agatha shook her head. "But the deeper sections are still unclear. The Second Waterway is enormous, and the collapsed zones cut one another off. Right now we've only secured the first passage in one of those sections. There is one thing, though, that's rather troubling…"

A rustle of cloth came from the coffin. Then the dark lid was pushed open from within, and Bishop Ivan, looking much like a mummy, sat up inside.

"Troubling?" The "mummy's" voice was low. "What happened?"

“At the ends of some of the old pipes, we found signs that someone had repaired and modified them. There were also some suspicious branch conduits stretching off into the dark,” Agatha said with a frown. “We checked the original blueprints in the archive and confirmed that those pipes weren’t in the designs from back then.”

Bishop Ivan was silent for a while, then asked in return, “…What do you think?”

“It looks as if someone continued to maintain the Second Waterway after it was abandoned and made certain alterations,” Agatha said, voicing her thoughts. “The maintenance wasn’t continuous, so many areas were still left to decay after a few years. But deeper in the sewers, there may be things that are still operating.”

Bishop Ivan listened quietly. After a long time, he finally spoke slowly. “The Second Waterway… it’s a vast underground kingdom, large enough to hold countless secrets. Even if you poured every Guardian unit you have into it, you still wouldn’t fill all of its corridors and junctions. So don’t focus too much on those minor traces of modification. Concentrate on hunting the Heretics. Leave everything else for the people at City Hall to worry about.”

Agatha glanced at Bishop Ivan, then nodded thoughtfully.

Bishop Ivan, however, noticed the weariness in the Gatekeeper’s expression. “You look like you haven’t rested. An exploration of this level shouldn’t have left you so exhausted. Are you unwell? Ever since you came in, you’ve seemed preoccupied.”

Agatha parted her lips, hesitated for a few seconds, then spoke. “A little… unsettled.”

Chapter 394: Encounter in the Fog

“Uneasy?” After he heard Agatha’s reply, Bishop Ivan’s tone changed. He stared at Agatha and said: “For a Saint, feeling ill at ease is not a good sign… What happened? When did it start?”

“Right after we came back from that sewage treatment center that was struck by corruption,” Agatha did not hide anything. She knew the old Bishop in front of her was the person she trusted most in the whole city-state. “I keep feeling that I forgot something, as if… I left something there. But I have gone over everything that happened there many times, and I did not find anything wrong.”

“That sewage treatment center…” Bishop Ivan’s voice was low. He of course knew what Agatha was talking about. They had reported that matter at once to the Cathedral and City Hall, and the later investigation and purification work was still going on in full. “I have been watching that case too. The one surviving manager is still in the asylum receiving treatment. The dozen or so original workers of the plant are still missing. And from the sampling reports on site, you should have already Purified all the corruption in the entire facility at that time. In theory, there should be no hidden danger left.”

“But I still feel uneasy,” Agatha admitted. “Even though there is no proof, I am sure I have overlooked something.”

“…Have you checked your own mental state? What were the results of your Cognitive Calibration?”

“Of course I checked,” Agatha nodded. “I did both self Cognitive Calibration and a subconscious check with a psychiatrist’s help. Nothing was wrong.”

Bishop Ivan did not speak for a moment. After a few seconds, he broke the silence with a thoughtful tone: “Then it may be that something inside you is sounding a warning. It may be from your subconscious, it may be from your Spirit Sight, it may even come from your faith.”

“I will go back there and check again,” Agatha nodded. “Before that, I want to go to the prayer room and pray for a while. I hope the Lord can give me some guidance.”

Bishop Ivan gave a slight nod: “Go. I hope prayer can ease your troubles.”

Agatha made a small sound of assent, stood up, and left the platform where the spirit coffin was parked. A moment later, she disappeared beyond the doors of the Meditation Chapel.

The broad chapel fell quiet. Only Bishop Ivan, who looked almost like a mummy, still sat on the edge of the spirit coffin. He watched the direction where Agatha had left, as if lost in thought. After a long time, he finally sighed softly and raised his hand to trace the God of Death Bartok’s Triangular Sigil over his chest: “May the Lord guide us…”

In the silent Meditation Chapel, the candelabras set into the wall niches burned quietly. The flames trembled without a sound, and the smooth black marble floor, polished like a mirror, reflected the light from each stand. Around those flickering flames, it seemed as if many vague phantoms flashed by and vanished.

…

Outside Frostholm, along the border of the Nearshore Waters, a patrol ship flying the Frostholm navy flag was sailing along the prescribed route, patrolling the sea.

A navy commander stepped onto the foredeck and frowned as he looked out at the distant sea. The cold light of the World's Wound poured down from the sky, giving the rippling waves a pale sheen. Between those glints of light, he could sometimes see chunks of floating ice of different sizes. Far away, those chunks drifted in a neat, single direction, faintly forming an invisible "border line".

The commander of course knew what those seemingly natural "floes" really were. They were not chunks of ice at all, but part of the Sea Mist Fleet.

That was the floating ice around the Sea Mist. Whenever that ghost ship under the curse appeared on the sea, such ice would appear around it. They marked that pirate captain's sphere of influence and were also a sign of the power of the curse tied to the Sea Mist. Any ship that dared to approach the Sea Mist without permission would first receive the "baptism" of those floes. In the mild case, its movement would be blocked. In the serious case, it would be frozen solid on the sea, and everyone on board would turn into Restless Souls in the ice.

The Sea Mist often used this method to block sea lanes, stopping merchant ships that passed through its waters and charging them so-called "ice clearing fees". In most cases, that ship did not even need to fire a single shot to finish this shameful extortion.

Of course, for now the Sea Mist Fleet had temporarily lifted its state of hostility with the Frostholm navy. Those floes would not actively spread toward the navy's patrol ships. But their very presence was a kind of warning. The meaning they sent was clear:

Even though this was Frostholm's own doorstep, everything beyond this line was still the Sea Mist Fleet's territory.

The commander in his Frostholm navy uniform gritted his teeth and let out a sigh, trying hard to calm his mood.

The bigger picture mattered most. A soldier should obey his superiors' judgment. The city-state needed safety, and that safety now needed the Sea Mist Fleet.

The lockdown of the whole sea area was above everything else.

"The sea is getting foggy again," a junior officer came up onto the deck and muttered as he looked into the distance. "It's almost foggy every day now."

The patrol ship's commander lifted his head and looked at the sea ahead.

Just as his subordinate said, mist was rising over the sea. The fog, as thin as gauze and as thick as a curtain, was slowly gathering on the surface and spreading around that "ice border". The light of the World's Wound filled the mist and made the area look deathly pale.

"Most likely the Sea Mist is doing this again," the commander said with a frown. "Wherever that ship goes, the floating ice and fog follow."

"The Sea Mist has not moved from its position," the subordinate said. "Maybe that 'Pirate General' just wants to show he is still there?"

"No matter what he thinks," the commander shook his head. "We must not go near the fog or the ice. Frostholm cannot be the first to break the agreement."

"Yes, sir."

The commander made a brief sound in reply, then looked again at the distant layer of fog. A hint of doubt came to his face: "But then again… is the fog a bit thicker than usual tonight?"

The subordinate followed the commander's gaze. The fog spreading around the floating ice really was still growing, and it looked denser than on past days. Deep within the thickening mist, there seemed to be something faintly swaying.

“The fog really is getting thicker…” the junior officer muttered. “Is there something in the fog?”

“…Something is wrong.”

The patrol ship’s commander spoke, then his expression suddenly changed. He quickly grabbed his binoculars and looked toward the thickest part of the fog. After a moment of careful checking, he finally confirmed that something really was moving inside that dense mist. It was very large and was coming closer.

It was a ship!

“It’s a ship, coming from inside the Sea Mist Fleet’s patrol area,” the commander lowered the binoculars and said quickly. “Signal them with lights. The Sea Mist Fleet is crossing the boundary. Tell them to stop at once.”

“Yes, sir!”

The junior officer answered loudly and ran quickly toward the rear of the deck. Before long, the large searchlight mounted on the upper level of the patrol ship lit up and sent a series of light signals toward the thick fog.

However, the warship’s shadow moving inside the dense fog showed no sign of slowing down.

The patrol ship’s commander stared hard at the blurry shadow in the fog. He saw that the other ship was not slowing at all. It was speeding up and charging straight at them. As it came closer, the fog over the surrounding sea also seemed to spread on purpose. In just a short time, the rolling mist had already spread to within a hundred meters of the patrol ship and even started to close in from all sides.

“Damn pirates!”

The patrol ship’s commander could not help cursing under his breath. He turned and ran quickly to the bridge. As he rushed to the control station, he shouted: “Engines astern, turn the ship! That thing is heading straight for us. Any reply from the Sea Mist Fleet?”

“No response to the light signals! No answer to short-range calls either!” A soldier at the nearby console shouted back. “We’re calling the Sea Mist on the agreed frequency, but there’s still no reply from their side… wait, we have a response!”

The communication light on the console suddenly lit up. The automatic recorder started to clatter, and a long strip of punched paper tape slid out of the machine. The signalman grabbed the tape and quickly read the marks on it. A moment later, he looked up in confusion: “The Sea Mist Fleet says they did not cross the boundary. All their ships are still in place.”

“All still in place?”

The patrol ship’s commander stared, then suddenly raised his head and looked out the porthole. The thick fog had already reached the bow of the patrol ship. Even though the helmsman was trying hard to turn, the ship still could not move faster than the spreading, eerie mist. Inside the fog rolling toward them, that hazy shadow was drawing closer and closer.

“Turn! Hard to port, turn!”

The patrol ship tilted hard. The steam core let out a hoarse roar. The rudder and the side thrusters worked together with a force that seemed strong enough to tear the whole ship apart as they tried to swing it around in the fog. In the middle of the violent shaking and the many harsh noises, the patrol ship’s commander held tight to the rail beside him and stared wide-eyed at the sight beyond the porthole—

Out of the suddenly torn-open mist, a huge ship burst forth, almost brushing against the patrol ship’s rail.

It was not part of the Frostholm navy, nor was it a member of the Sea Mist. It was a mottled, rust-covered Old Era warship. The badly damaged paint on its hull and the outdated design of its bow seemed to silently tell of the long years it had gone through.

The patrol ship’s commander stared in shock as the huge vessel brushed past his own ship. It took him several seconds to react. Then he suddenly remembered an illustration and record he had once seen in an old file—

“It’s the Valiant… the warship that sank forty years ago…”

Chapter 395: The Approaching mirror world

On the patrol ship, everyone stared in shock at the huge vessel that had suddenly rushed out of the dense fog. They watched its bow, nearly twice as tall as the patrol ship, slide past almost scraping the rail. They watched its mottled, rusted hull move slowly forward. Above the Valiant there still seemed to hang old, ragged flags. Those strips of cloth, their original patterns long gone, flapped wildly in the night wind and looked like a loosened… shroud.

The patrol ship's commander was the first to react.

"Keep turning, speed up and move away!" he shouted. "Don't let us get caught in that ship's wake!"

Passing this close to a main battleship was extremely dangerous, especially for a small vessel like a patrol ship. The water around and behind a large ship could badly disturb a smaller ship's course. In the violent rolling, any scrape could be fatal.

The steam core began to roar again. By now the helmsman could already feel the terrible effect of the great ship. The patrol ship's hull was drifting and rolling to one side. He had to use all his strength to hold the ship steady in the chaotic currents and to speed away from the huge mass so close by.

The helmsman's efforts were close to failing.

The Valiant’s speed was faster than expected, and the chaotic currents swirling around it were even stranger, beyond anything the helmsman had seen in all his years of experience. He felt as if countless invisible ropes had wrapped around the patrol boat’s rudder and keel down on the seafloor, maliciously dragging the little vessel toward that old warship that looked like a ghost ship.

The whole ship began to creak and groan in a disturbing way, as if something unseen were trying hard to tear it apart.

The tiny gap the patrol ship had won at the start by its sudden turn and full engines lasted only a few breaths. Then the whole ship began to slide toward the Valiant’s stern at a speed the naked eye could see. That rusted “cliff” grew quickly larger in everyone’s view. Many wavering, half-human, half-not shapes appeared near the Valiant’s rail and looked down at the small ship about to capsize with a gaze that made one shiver.

“We’re going to hit! We’re going to hit!”

Someone cried out. The seamen ran at once to the nearest railings or handholds to keep from being thrown overboard at the moment of impact. But at the very instant the side of the patrol ship touched the Valiant’s stern —the latter vanished.

The Valiant was gone. It vanished before all their eyes.

Like a nightmare from which they had been shocked awake, the old main warship that had blotted out the sky a second ago simply vanished in an instant before the soldiers’ eyes. It left only a terrible image and a shaking fear in every heart. On the bridge and on the deck, people looked at one another as if they had just woken from a long dream, not sure where they were.

The fog thinned and faded. The cold light of the World's Wound spilled over the sea. The icy sea wind cleared many minds. On the empty surface, only choppy waves remained, along with drifting fragments of ice far away.

The patrol ship's commander slowly let go of the rail he had been gripping and walked to the porthole to look at the sea outside. A subordinate came to stand beside him and muttered as if talking to himself: "A group hallucination? Was that just an illusion?"

"…It was not a hallucination," the commander said in a low voice. He raised his hand and pointed at a section of rail outside the porthole. "See that? The rail is damaged. We did hit it just now."

"Then where did it go? The Sea Swallow before was not like this… the Sea Swallow never 'vanished into thin air' like that, not until it was completely blown apart. And just now the currents around us suddenly changed. The helmsman could not even control our course…"

The commander did not answer at once. After thinking for a long time, he finally said slowly: "Maybe… we just sailed into some kind of gap. The one that suddenly appeared and suddenly disappeared was not that ghost ship, but us."

Shock and fear flashed across the subordinate's face. He then looked instinctively toward the distant sea and the direction of the city-state of Frostholm. After a few seconds he spoke: "Then… have we now returned to the Mortal Realm?"

"…Call both the Sea Mist and Frostholm Island at the same time," the commander said quickly after a short pause. "Compare their replies and judge our own situation from that. Before we are sure, do not go near any ship that appears in these waters."

"Yes, sir."

…

“They ran into a warship that sank forty years ago? And that warship suddenly vanished just before it hit them?” In the captain’s cabin of the Sea Mist, Tyrian leaned back in his chair and raised his brows after hearing First Mate Aiden’s report. “Now they are still circling in their patrol area, because they are not sure whether they have really returned to the Mortal Realm?”

“Yes. From the signs during their encounter with the Valiant, that patrol ship’s commander seems to think they briefly sailed into an Anomaly sea area. Now they are contacting both the Sea Mist Fleet and Frostholm at the same time to try to use the answers to judge whether the environment around them is real,” Aiden nodded, then shrugged. “I think they might be a bit terrified and jumpy.”

“…No, that is the right kind of caution,” Tyrian shook his head, his face quite serious. “We may not like the Frostholm navy as it is now, but we have to admit that they have truly guarded the city-state for fifty years. In experience with fighting supernatural Visions, they are no worse than we are. That commander’s judgment is probably correct.”

Hearing the captain’s words, Aiden’s face also grew serious at last: “So… they really did briefly sail into an Anomaly sea area that might overlap with the Mortal Realm? And they met the Valiant there?”

“The Valiant… I still remember that ship. When it was first built, the Queen herself came to cut the ribbon for it,” Tyrian said with some feeling. “Do you remember how it sank?”

“Of course I remember. We were the ones who sank it,” First Mate Aiden nodded. “After rebels took control of that ship, they rebuilt it and then sent it to wipe out our ‘defector fleet’. In the very first battle, it was sunk by the ambush you set up off the coast of Frostholm. Several rounds of shelling hit its magazine and fuel stores in turn. It was almost broken in half."

"Yes, broken in half. But the Valiant that patrol ship saw was a whole, intact ship," Tyrian said. "So it is clear. It is a replica, like the Sea Swallow."

"Frostholm has been trying to find where those replicas come from, because they always seem to 'appear out of thin air'…" Aiden said in thought. "Could it be… a hidden overlapping space?"

"Frostholm will get the news soon enough. Their smart ones will work out that possibility. As for us, we do not need to worry for them. We have our own task."

"Are you going to report this to the old captain?"

"Of course. He has been waiting for my new report," Tyrian said. He raised his hand and pointed toward the door. "Go out first and close the door. Do not let anyone else come in."

"Yes, Captain."

…

"Tyrian has reported something new."

In the city-state of Frostholm, inside a temporary residence on Oak Street, Duncan spoke to Morris and Vanna, who sat across from him.

Beside him, Nina was happily reading a history book. Shirley, who had followed Duncan around outside until midnight, was already so sleepy that she was almost falling off her chair.

"Something new?" Morris quickly adjusted his sitting posture. "Did something happen at sea?"

“A Frostholm patrol ship in the southwest waters met a navy warship that sank forty years ago. It seems to be a replica like the Sea Swallow. But the two sides did not fight. After a light collision, that replica warship vanished into thin air right before the patrol ship’s eyes. Right now it is hard to say whether a new replica has suddenly appeared on the sea, or whether that patrol ship briefly sailed into an Anomaly sea area that runs parallel to the Mortal Realm. The second possibility is more likely.”

“…An Anomaly sea area parallel to the Mortal Realm…” Morris weighed this line and his expression slowly grew grave. He looked up. “This seems to confirm what you found tonight…”

“Yes. There is another Frostholm in the mirror. If all the replicas, and even the cultists’ lairs, are hidden inside a ‘mirror world’, that would explain why we could search the whole city and still never find the source of the corruption,” Duncan said slowly. “And Crow, who once vanished without a trace and then returned out of nowhere, the many replicants in the city whose origins are unknown, certain people’s disappearances… all of that can be explained.”

Morris and Vanna looked at each other. In each other’s eyes, they saw the same heavy mood.

“…Ordinary heretics and demons I can handle. No matter how strong the enemy is, if we gather enough people and firepower, we can always wipe them out. But enemies inside the mirror…” Vanna frowned tightly and looked troubled. “I cannot think of a way to deal with them right now. I cannot even figure out how those heretics did it.”

“If this is also part of the Abyssal Lord’s divine authority, then His power has clearly not only spread from the Deep Sea to the surface, but is now spreading on a large scale. This is no longer just the ‘small trouble’ of making a few replicas,” Morris said as well.

The two “professionals” both seemed stuck in their worries. Seeing this, Duncan smiled: “In fact, I have already cast a Fire Seed into the other side of the mirror.”

Morris and Vanna: “…What?”

Chapter 396: Alice of Unknown Material

Duncan had indeed already cast a Fire Seed into the Frostholm city-state inside that mirror world, but he felt it was still far from enough.

He could clearly feel that Frostholm was different from Pland this time. The Fire Seed he had thrown did not spread quickly on the “other side of the mirror”, and his sense of the Fire Seed was faint and disturbed. He guessed this might be because there was a natural barrier between the worlds on the two sides of the mirror, or because the mirror world and the Mortal Realm did not actually match up exactly. The parts that were out of alignment were interfering with his judgment.

Whatever the reason, he needed to find a way to strengthen his link with the Fire Seed, and to strengthen his connection with the White Oak and with Agatha.

While they were talking, Vanna suddenly showed a thoughtful look and said: “Speaking of the mirror world… you are sure you saw the Gatekeeper’s figure in the glass reflection, yes?”

“Of course I am sure.”

“Then that is rather strange…” Vanna frowned. “If she really is trapped in that mirror world world, how is it that the city-state has not shown the slightest sign of it? The High Protector has vanished under odd circumstances. Even if they sealed the news to keep people calm, at the very least the Cathedral and City Hall should be taking some other action…”

She paused, then summed up from her own experience: “Secret searches, a limited lockdown in certain areas, changes in the frequency and pattern of Guardian patrols at night. Even if the news is blocked, details like that can still be observed. But today Mr. Morris and I moved around the city-state for a long time, and we did not see any such changes.”

Nina, who had been reading with her head down, suddenly looked up: “Maybe it’s because the Gatekeeper has only just gone missing. The city-state might not have reacted yet.”

“If that really is the case, then Frostholm is rotten beyond saving,” Vanna said, shaking her head very seriously. “But from what I’ve observed these days, even though this city-state is in a certain state of decline, it’s not that bad in other respects. At least the Church and City Hall still operate in an orderly way.”

“Maybe by tomorrow, during the day, we’ll see a change in the city’s mood,” Duncan said casually. Just as he was about to go on, a heavy weight suddenly pressed down on his arm, cutting him off.

Shirley had slumped over and bumped her head into his arm, and was now snoring evenly.

But the next second, before Duncan could react, he saw the young lady jerk awake straight out of her sleep. Dog, who had been dozing at the foot of the sofa, was flung straight into the air with her movement: “S-s-sor… so… so __”

Shirley never even managed to stammer out the word “sorry” in full. Duncan heard a loud thump as Dog, who had been thrown into the air, landed on the floor. Dog rolled over in one motion and sprang back up, his head buzzing: “What’s going on, what’s going on, are we fighting?”

Then he noticed that the atmosphere around them felt strange. He looked up and saw several pairs of eyes resting on him and Shirley in a very odd way.

“We’re not fighting. Shirley just fell asleep,” Duncan said with a helpless laugh, looking at Shirley, whose whole body was still tense. “It’s fine. Go upstairs and sleep. Minors need enough rest. Nina, you stop reading too. It’s bedtime.”

“Oh.” Nina reluctantly closed the book she was halfway through, stood up, and took the still-nervous Shirley by the hand. The two girls walked hand in hand toward the second floor.

Duncan watched the two girls disappear up the stairs, then turned his gaze back and nodded to Vanna: “Tomorrow you and Morris go to the Upper City and see whether there’s any change in the mood around the Cathedral. If possible, feel out City Hall’s reaction as well. With things having developed to this point, Frostholm’s City Hall has stayed strangely low-key. I’m very curious what they’re actually doing.”

“Alright,” Vanna nodded, then asked with some curiosity: “What about you? What are you planning to do next?”

“I plan to visit the Second Waterway again, together with Alice,” Duncan said offhandedly. “We’ll go look at the corridor where Crow had that incident. Now that we suspect there is a ‘mirror world Frostholm’, and Crow very likely strayed into it back then, we might be able to find some new clues in that corridor.”

As he spoke, something suddenly occurred to him: “Speaking of which, is Alice still in the kitchen cleaning up?”

“Seems like it,” Morris said as he got up and turned to look. “She really has been held up in the kitchen for a long time… her head hasn’t fallen off and gotten stuck in some corner, has it?”

“She never lets people relax… I’ll go check,” Duncan sighed helplessly, then rose from the sofa and headed for the kitchen.

As soon as he reached the kitchen, he saw the gothic doll standing beside the sink. She had not lost her head like Morris had guessed, but she had tilted it back at a strange angle and was staring blankly at one corner of the ceiling.

Alice was so focused that she did not hear Duncan’s footsteps. She only stared dumbly at that empty spot, then reached out with the hand holding the kitchen knife and poked at the air. After that she changed direction and kept poking at the air—like she was trying to catch an invisible fly.

A gothic doll stood in the kitchen with a vacant look, raising a kitchen knife and slicing at the air. The scene was far too eerie, as if at any second a health bar filling the entire screen would pop up over the doll’s head, and an organ-style background music would start playing around them. Duncan finally could not help speaking: “What are you doing?”

“Wah!”

Alice jumped in fright. She instinctively reached up to steady her head—but she forgot she still had a sharp knife in her hand. The next second, there was a soft stab, and she drove the blade straight into her own forehead.

With a sharp crack, her entire head was knocked off by herself.

Even though Duncan had seen this doll’s creepy and unreliable antics many times, he was still stunned. He quickly stepped forward to steady Alice’s swaying body. Then he saw her arms flailing in a panic—the sharp kitchen knife was still in her hand, and its tip was skewering her own head. She waved it several times like that before finally realizing what was going on. Then she hurriedly hugged her head with her left arm and, with her right hand, yanked the knife out of her forehead.

The doll then groped around and tossed the knife aside. With practiced ease, she picked up her head, pressed it back onto her neck, and with a soft pop, everything returned to where it belonged.

“You gave me a fright!” Alice turned her head and looked at Duncan with a slightly wronged expression. But very soon her eyes were drawn to something on Duncan’s arm. “…Captain, this knife looks kind of familiar.”

Duncan’s face stayed expressionless behind his bandages as he grabbed the handle of the kitchen knife stuck in his arm, pulled it out, and casually tossed it aside: “Of course it does. You just stabbed it into me.”

“…I’m sorry!” the doll cried out at once. She rushed over in a fluster to check on him. “Are you alright? Do you need to be bandaged?”

“No need. It’s a corpse anyway.” Duncan’s mouth twitched, but his gaze was drawn to Alice’s forehead.

A moment ago, the doll’s forehead had been split open by her own stab, leaving a great wound there. But now that wound was healing at a speed visible to the naked eye. There was no blood in the cut, only a smooth, jade-like surface, and after just a few breaths it was completely restored.

Alice felt a little awkward under Duncan’s gaze and subconsciously touched her face: “Why are you staring at me…”

“What exactly are you made of?” Duncan frowned and touched the place where Alice had been wounded. What he felt was similar to skin, but cold and without any sense of life. “You just had a hole in your head, you know?”

Alice froze for a moment, then raised a hand to touch her forehead. She answered in a dazed tone: “It healed.”

“I know it healed!”

“…I don’t understand,” Alice shook her head. “I don’t know what material I’m made from either… but it doesn’t seem like wood or ceramic…”

Duncan held it in for two seconds, then tugged at the corner of his mouth. “I really shouldn’t expect any answers from you. Forget it, let’s not talk about that. What were you doing just now? Why were you staring at the ceiling?”

“Threads,” Alice answered honestly. “Some threads suddenly appeared just now. But now they suddenly disappeared again.”

Duncan’s expression changed at once: “Threads?!”

Alice could see special “threads”, and those threads represented people.

“Yes,” Alice nodded seriously. “I was curious why threads suddenly appeared, when there’s nobody else here… But I remembered what you taught me, that I mustn’t grab other people’s ‘threads’ at will. So just now I used the kitchen knife to poke them instead…”

Duncan did not care what the doll had said in the second half of that sentence. His attention was already all on those “threads” that had suddenly appeared and then vanished.

His eyes swept quickly across the kitchen. He looked for anything here that might be used to build a connection to the mirror world.

The glass in the window. The water pooled in the sink. The surface of the knife blade.

Any of these could be used to make a link to the mirror world space, yet none of them showed any abnormal sign.

But Duncan trusted Alice. She would not lie.

At some moment just now, the Frostholm inside the mirror world had overlapped with the Mortal Realm here. Perhaps the overlap had been very, very weak and brief, but it was still enough for the doll to catch the threads drifting over from that other side.

Chapter 397: City Hall

It was snowing.

The spell of clear, fine weather had not lasted long at all before another snowfall came to Frostholm. From early morning, heavy, leaden clouds had pressed over the city-state, and a wild cold wind had blown through the streets without rest. As the time neared noon, snowflakes began to fall in thick, drifting curtains. From the Upper City to the Lower City, from every tower to every cramped alley, the whole city-state was wrapped in hazy, swirling snow.

The sudden snowfall made the streets much quieter.

The screech of a Steam Car's brakes broke the silence of the snowy street. A dark gray car stopped at the front steps of City Hall. The door opened, and Agatha, dressed in black, stepped down and walked toward the tall and solemn building before her, a large structure whose main color was pale gray.

She raised her head and looked up at the soaring main building of City Hall. This classical structure, passed down from the age of the monarchy, still kept the imposing presence of that earlier era. Its towering pillars, arches, and rolling rooflines looked grand no matter when one saw them. Although its name had changed from "Winter King's Court" to the "City Hall" of today, its status in the city-state had never changed.

It still stood as one of the two poles of authority in the city-state, facing the distant Silent Grand Cathedral across the city and together sheltering this city of Boiling Gold. Buildings were history books built of stone. The changing powers and people who passed through them were no more than lines of text on the pages. The Queen's age, and the present system of Governors as well, would in the end become just another passage that history turned past.

Agatha suddenly frowned and raised a hand to pinch her temple.

She knew she had drifted off again, and like some overly sentimental poet she had started sighing over many things. She had been like this over the past two days. For no clear reason, she would slip into wild, pointless thoughts, or sink into a vague unease.

This was not a good sign. As the city-state's Gatekeeper, her state of mind had to stay tightly controlled. "Spacing out" was something she needed to avoid as much as possible.

Footsteps came from the direction of the main door, cutting off Agatha's thoughts. She looked up and saw a senior secretary in a deep blue coat already walking toward her.

"Lady Agatha," the young man who served as the Governor's aide stopped in front of her and bowed respectfully. "The Governor has been informed of your visit. He is waiting for you in the domed office."

"Saving the formalities is fine by me," Agatha nodded. "Lead the way."

On the top floor of City Hall, inside a large office crowned with a rounded dome, Frostholm's current Governor, Winston, sat behind a wide, curved desk.

He was a tall man, a little on the heavy side, wearing an impressive bright blue coat decorated with medals and sashes. The strain of managing a declining city-state seemed to have drained him. His hair had grown so thin it was on the brink of vanishing, and he had been forced to wear a curled wig to cover his scalp. When Agatha entered the domed office, the Governor was fiddling with a delicate brass machine placed on his desk.

The complex device looked like a kind of miniature model. Its tightly meshed gears and linkages were as intricate as a work of art, and under Winston's hands it gave off crisp clicking sounds from time to time.

"I did not expect you to still have time to play with machine models amidst such busy affairs," Agatha said from in front of the desk. "I thought the situation in the city-state would be enough to keep you fully occupied."

"This is not a mere machine model. It is the next generation of minecart traction mechanism," Winston replied, lifting his head with a serious expression. "It can save thirty percent in power, and is more reliable and durable than the last generation. The city's troubles come one after another, but we cannot stop living and developing because of that."

Agatha made no comment.

Governor Winston was deeply in love with machinery and engineering. In his twelve years as Governor, he had poured most of his energy into supporting the engineering design offices and machine works. He had ambitious plans and seemed to hope that technical breakthroughs would solve the city-state's current difficulties, both by upgrading old facilities and by seeking new sources of economic power. But, well…

One could only say his ideas were good, his confidence was strong, and he had worked hard—but the Mortal Realm was full of obstacles.

"Advances in technology will let us upgrade the mining facilities at a cost we can bear, and more practical new machines can be exported to other city-states. Frostholm cannot live forever just by selling Boiling Gold," Winston went on when he noticed the Gatekeeper's flat reaction. He could not help talking more. “The Boiling Gold mines are Frostholm’s foundation, but a pillar built on a single industry is far too fragile…”

“I am not an official in economics or technology,” Agatha had to remind him gently.

“Oh, right, I forgot myself,” Winston said, lifting a hand. He set the machine model aside and looked up at Agatha. “Then let us talk business. Lady Agatha, you seem to have something to say about the exploration work in the Second Waterway?”

“The exploration unit ran into trouble under the connecting shaft in Central District Two,” Agatha said directly. “That passage is close to the bottom of the Boiling Gold mines. Some of its side pipes show signs of having been modified, but the gate leading to the next connected section is sealed. I ordered the exploration unit that they may use force to break through obstacles in the Second Waterway. But my people reported that they saw City Hall’s lead seals and a plaque on that gate.”

“…City Hall’s lead seals and a plaque?” Winston clearly froze for a moment. The surprise on his face did not look fake. “Are you sure?”

Agatha studied the Governor’s expression. Only after a long moment did she say softly: “It seems you truly know nothing about it.”

“That’s a Second Waterway that’s been abandoned for half a century. The last time it was in service was in the age when Frostholm’s Queen ruled this city-state!” Winston threw up his hands, his expression a bit exaggerated. “Even if there are lead seals and plaques down there, they should be from the Queen’s era. How could there be things left behind by City Hall? Lady Agatha, do you think I secretly sealed that gate myself? What would be the point? To store treasure deep underground?”

“You really do not have any reason to do that,” Agatha nodded lightly. “If you actually wanted to hide some treasure, any other place in the city would be more reliable than the Second Waterway in a runaway state.”

“I would rather not hear you seriously spin out that sort of idea,” Winston waved a hand, but his face had already grown solemn. “Isn’t there a date or the name of the person in charge on that plaque? A proper plaque should have that. You should be able to tell very easily who locked that gate.”

“Sadly, all the writing has been corroded beyond recognition. Both the plaque and the lead seals have suffered very serious corrosion. In fact even the gate itself has become unusually fragile. We suspect the acidic environment of the strata near the mines accelerated the aging of the metal,” Agatha shook her head. “We can only be sure that the gate really was locked by City Hall. The Queen’s era would never have used seals of that type.”

Winston stood up. His expression showed a hint of irritation as he paced back and forth behind the wide curved desk. After a long time, he finally stopped and muttered: “If it really was left behind by City Hall, then it must have been a long time ago. It might even have been the very first, or the second city government after the end of the Queen’s era…”

“It seems your predecessors did not pass all their records on to their successors,” Agatha said.

“Or the chaos of those early days caused some of the records to be lost or destroyed,” Winston waved his hand. “But no matter what, it is not normal for there to be a section sealed by City Hall’s order in the depths beneath the very center of the city, and for that section to be part of the Second Waterway. Lady Agatha, we must find out the truth of this.”

“Of course. That is my duty,” Agatha nodded. Her expression relaxed a little. “I did not get the answer I wanted, but having your support is enough.

The exploration will continue. I will find out as soon as possible what lies behind that gate. If there is any new progress, the Church will share it with City Hall at once."

"That will be best," Winston nodded.

The atmosphere in the domed office loosened a little.

"Then I will not stay and trouble you further," Agatha said. "There are still many matters in the Second Waterway that I need to oversee in person."

She exchanged polite farewells with the Governor, then turned and left the domed office.

The Gatekeeper's figure vanished from the room. Only the sound of the Gatekeeper's cane and her heels striking the floor slowly faded away. Winston waited a long moment before letting out a soft breath. Then he frowned in puzzlement.

"…Lady Agatha didn't use the Ashen Wind to travel today…" The slightly overweight middle-aged Governor lifted his head and looked toward the direction Agatha had left. He murmured to himself: "So she can actually walk in and out through the front door like a normal person?"

Chapter 398: Crossing Waterways

Deep in the secret passage that led to the Second Waterway, Nemo held a consecrated lantern in one hand. He walked ahead to lead the way and said in a slightly gloating tone: “Our people already got the news. They pulled out and ‘cleaned’ all the traces down here. The Church’s people are drilling around under the central district and the western district—those spreading shadows should be their headache now.”

“I was worried you would take the chance to cause some trouble,” Duncan said casually. “After all, on the Second Waterway, this is your home turf.”

“We have no reason to do that.” Nemo shook his head. “We serve Captain Tyrian, and Captain Tyrian never wants this city-state destroyed. From the point of view of protecting the city, we don’t really clash with the Church, or even City Hall. Right now the Church’s people are trying to clear out the cultists in the city. We’re not so hot-headed we would do something that helps those cultists.”

Duncan nodded, then asked with some curiosity: “Old Ghost didn’t show up today?”

“Old Ghost…” Nemo hesitated, then let out a light sigh. “Old Ghost’s mental state has been more and more unstable. He’s too old. The Church’s search of the Second Waterway also rattled his nerves. It made him recall the fighting in the sewers back then. To avoid an accident, I had to leave him resting in the tavern cellar.”

The last Warrior who had once served the Queen still could not walk out of that nightmare from decades ago. Duncan could only sigh at that, then he and Alice went on in silence toward the depths of the Second Waterway.

They passed through the secret passage, went through several hidden doors and intersections that seemed to be watched by hidden sentries, and in the end entered the Second Waterway again along a route completely different from last time.

It was clear that, to deal with the search operations of the Church and the authority, the Sea Mist Fleet Informants hidden in the city-state had activated a long-prepared system of disguises and early warnings.

In the end, Duncan and Alice, led by Nemo, returned to that corridor again —the place where Crow had met with his accident.

“I’ll head back now,” Nemo said to Duncan. “Things are tense in the city. There are more and more people watching us. I have to keep an eye on what’s happening above. You should be careful of the Church down here…”

He had wanted to remind Duncan to be careful in case he ran into a Church search team here. But halfway through, he suddenly felt something was off. He swallowed his words for a long moment, then forced out: “Maybe go easy on them. They’re actually not bad people…”

Duncan could not help but laugh. “You don’t have to worry. I know my limits. Go on back. You’ve already been away from the tavern too long.”

“Okay.”

Nemo left quickly, and the wide, chilly underground waterway fell quiet for a moment.

Duncan raised his head and looked at the empty corridor ahead. In his mind, he recalled what it had been like when he came here last time.

The young man called Crow had fallen by the sewage channel not far ahead. He had died on the dry ground, but his cause of death was drowning in seawater. In his pocket, someone had stuffed a record of “Sacred Script” copied from some unknown place.

Now the corridor had already been cleaned. It had probably been Nemo and Old Ghost who did it.

Duncan turned his head and saw Alice following honestly at his side. The eyes that showed from under her veil looked serious—but he knew this Doll was actually spacing out and not thinking about anything at all.

Of course Duncan knew he couldn’t rely on this Doll to discuss or reason through anything. He had brought Alice only because she could see those “threads”—even the threads that sometimes leaked out when the mirror world world drew close could not escape her eyes.

“If you see the threads again, tell me at once,” Duncan said seriously.

“Mm-hmm!” Alice nodded right away.

Duncan walked forward slowly.

In his mind, he was still thinking about Crow.

At the time, he and Morris and the others had guessed that Crow had stumbled into some place by mistake and that was why disaster fell on him. But in the end, they had searched the whole corridor and found no clues. The investigation had hit a dead end. Now, though… it seemed the place Crow had stumbled into finally had an answer.

Most likely, mirror world Frostholm had briefly overlapped with Mortal Realm Frostholm in this corridor. It might have been a crack, or a fleeting reflection on some pool of water. Crow had just been passing by and fell into it by bad luck.

No matter how he had crossed that boundary back then, one thing was clear:

This corridor should be a weak point that connected the mirror world and the Mortal Realm.

…

Underground, it was cold and damp. The air was full of the moldy smell of rot. It felt as if the whole city-state was a corpse that was slowly rotting away—and she was walking inside the organs of this rotten corpse.

Footsteps echoed in the foul-smelling corridor of the sewers. They sounded a bit heavy. Agatha walked forward slowly. At the same time, she used temporary Divination and Spiritual Insight to feel out and confirm the direction, while carefully watching for any change in the air around her.

Her black clothes were badly torn. The soft armor under them and the ritual bandages wrapped around her body were stained with more blood. The damage to her body had passed the point where it could repair itself. She could only use divine magic to stop the bleeding for now. She had no time to think about healing flesh and bone.

The good news was that Agatha felt more and more sure she was moving in the right direction. After destroying more and more replica freaks, after clashing several times with this hostile replica city, she could finally “smell” the Heretics’ presence more and more clearly.

Following this scent, she walked through the streets and alleys of the Lower City, passed through empty, twisted subway tunnels, then crawled into the collapsed sewers. In the end, she discovered this world deep beneath the city-state that had been abandoned for who knew how many years.

Its vastness went beyond what she had seen in the records in the archives, and beyond what she had imagined from those files.

Agatha raised her head and looked at the wide corridor ahead, lit only by dim light. Old gas lamps were set into the walls on both sides. Their flames flickered, starved of gas. The light wavered and jumped inside the glass covers. On the arched ceiling of the corridor, she could see crisscrossing pipes and support beams. Under the shaking light of the gas lamps, everything cast twisting, shifting shadows, as if countless unseen things were crawling in the gloom.

On both sides of the floor ran channels full of filthy water. Sickening black water poured down from grates in the walls and merged into the channels, making a constant rushing sound.

Agatha knew what this place was.

This was the “Second Waterway” under Frostholm—the place she had originally planned to explore with a team.

The only difference from her plan was that she had planned to explore the underground of the city in the Mortal Realm world. Now she was trapped inside a copied Frostholm.

Agatha closed her eyes a little and carefully felt how the air moved. She shut out the filthy stench and relied on her intuition as a Spiritual Insight to search for the Heretics’ location.

She could feel that the longer she stayed here, and the more she dealt with these freaks, the stronger the “link” between her and this replica city became.

Up ahead.

The Gatekeeper opened her eyes. She ignored the faint pain from the wounds all over her body, chose one of the branches in front of her, and went deeper down the corridor.

She suddenly remembered something.

Not long ago, she had visited the being who had descended in Frostholm, the one who might have been an Elder God, or the avatar form of an Elder God. Back then, that being had hinted to her that she should go “underground” to look for clues.

Now, guided by the traces in the air, she was going closer and closer to the Heretics’ lair.

The Heretics really were hiding under the city, hidden in this abandoned Second Waterway—but this “underground hideout” was not under the Frostholm of the Mortal Realm. It was in this strange realm, inside a city copied from the original.

Agatha tugged at the corner of her mouth.

The road twisted, but in the end it brought her back to the starting point.

She had misunderstood the hint of the Descended One and had thought the enemy was hiding in the Second Waterway of the Mortal Realm world. Now, by a strange turn of fate, she had entered this replica city and found clues in this replica Second Waterway instead.

To wander at all the forks and finally walk onto the right path—was that also a kind of luck?

Agatha studied her surroundings.

She had never explored the Second Waterway in the Mortal Realm world in depth, but she did know a few basic facts. She knew that old sewer system had long been abandoned and sealed. All pipes, shafts, and drains that led to the Second Waterway had been closed. In theory, it should be a dry or mostly dry place.

But in the sewer corridor in front of her, she could see flowing sewage everywhere. She could also hear drainage sounds from the pipes around her from time to time.

In this copied Frostholm, the Second Waterway looked as if it was still in regular use. Was this also one of the differences between a replica and the real thing?

Agatha thought about this, then suddenly stopped walking.

Sticky, disgusting slithering sounds came from around her. black sludge was seeping out from the openings of the waste pipes and from the walls covered with black corruption.

Those relentless freaks had come again.

Her body was very tired. Her wounds were aching. The ritual bandages were already torn. The God of Death’s divine blessing was slowly fading. The weakness from blood loss had reached a level she could no longer ignore.

But Agatha only raised her head calmly. Her gaze fell on the twisted monsters gathering in front of her.

“Come,” she said. “Come die.”

Chapter 399: Connection

When the first deformed freak rushed at her with a roar, Agatha only shifted her body a little to the side. At the moment they passed each other, she tapped the monster's limb lightly with her Gatekeeper's cane. The creature burst at once into Cremation Fire. Before that pale flame could hit the floor, she lifted her Gatekeeper's cane and pointed forward. She drew a blinding white line out from the flame. It fell into the junction ahead and spread like flowing fire, burning the ugly monsters there.

She tried her best not to make big movements, to lessen the strain of tiredness and pain. At the same time, she tried to avoid direct contact with the freaks as much as she could, so she would not spend too much of her strength and spirit. She did not know how many endless monsters were waiting for her ahead. She had to save her strength.

She did not resist death. She knew that even after this body died, it could still fight until it became ash. That ash would float in this cursed place and keep purifying these disgusting monsters. She had never feared any of that. But before she embraced death, she still wanted to find out the truth here and do all she could to stop the Heretics' plans.

Along the way, she had been attacked more and more often. The movements of the twisted freaks grew more and more frantic. This had already faintly proved one thing—she had chosen the right direction. The lair of the Heretics lay ahead.

More black sludge seeped from the nearby walls and from the arching ceiling. Every gap and every crack between the bricks here was a breeding ground for these twisted things. Because of the terrain, the way these replicas appeared was becoming more eerie and more troublesome.

A faint hissing sound came from behind her, to the side. Agatha felt a warning rise in her heart. Her body felt slow with fatigue. At the crucial moment, she barely managed to twist around and bring up her Gatekeeper's cane to block.

A sharp stab of pain shot from her shoulder. Sparks burst from the middle of the Gatekeeper's cane. A black-clad figure who also held a Gatekeeper's cane in his hand was knocked flying.

The figure hit the ground, then crawled back up again, squirming like some disgusting soft-bodied creature. He lifted his head. Under his black hat was a face that seemed to be melting, slowly flowing and twisting out of shape. In that horrible face, she could still faintly pick out some familiar lines.

In the next second, that flowing face solidified. It became a young man with clear, sharp features. He looked up at Agatha with a confused expression and said: "Captain? What are you doing here?"

Agatha's fingers tightened around her Gatekeeper's cane until they turned slightly white. Her eyes froze for a second.

Almost at the same time, she heard a voice.

She did not know where it came from. It was as if the whole sewer was echoing. The voice whispered to her:

"Ah, you recognized him. Back when you were not yet a Gatekeeper, your loyal vice-captain covered your retreat from the darkness… You left him there… Take him back with you, how about it?"

Agatha gave no answer. She only walked forward in silence. After three steps, she turned into a gust of Ashen Wind. The wind stopped and gathered in front of the young "Guardian." When her figure appeared again, her tin Gatekeeper’s cane was already buried deep in the chest of the black-clad Guardian.

The young black-clad guard stared at the scene in shock, as if he could not believe he would die at the hands of the “Captain” he trusted so much. Then suddenly, he seemed to understand something. A soft whisper came from his throat: “So it’s finally over…”

“Sorry,” Agatha said softly. “It will be over soon.”

The young black-clad guard slowly lowered his head and let out a small laugh. “Captain, you finally mastered the power of Ashen Wind…”

“Yes. I trained for a long time.” Agatha spoke softly. Pale flame rose before her eyes. The black-clad guard’s body melted and broke apart in the Cremation Fire, turning into a pile of black dust.

“Decisive. Cold. Very fitting for your role as the God of Death’s Saint.”

That disgusting voice echoed again. Agatha turned around and saw more twisted freaks taking shape. replicas surged at her from all directions. Their Master clearly knew nothing of Knightly spirit. Even while he tried to attack her heart, he kept sending these lackeys to attack her.

The sound of exploding flames, of the Gatekeeper’s cane striking back, and of air being torn apart echoed in the underground corridor. While Agatha held off the twisted things, she spoke in a low voice: “These little tricks can only anger me. They can’t slow my steps. On the contrary, anger only makes me find your lair faster. How does that help you?”

“…True enough. You’re angry. You look even fiercer than before. But that’s fine—some emotional fluctuation is quite necessary, Miss Gatekeeper.”

The voice that echoed in the corridor seemed to drift farther away. Agatha’s heart gave a little jolt.

Some emotional fluctuation is quite necessary? What was that supposed to mean?

But there was no one left here to answer her question. The Master of that voice had only one goal: to use cannon fodder to slowly wear down her strength and delay her steps. Now he had gone. The only things left here were yet another batch of monsters that had just “seeped” out from the walls around her.

Agatha’s eyes sharpened. She went to meet her enemies again.

…

“Our Warrior is fighting the enemy!”

A streak of green fire suddenly tore through the gloom of the Second Waterway. The shape of the pigeon, AI, shot out from the flames and crashed straight down onto Duncan’s shoulder. It flapped its wings hard and let out sharp, shrill cries.

The stupid bird that had suddenly burst out, and its piercing screech, made Duncan jump. It almost scared Alice’s head right off.

Duncan had already been searching this dry, empty underground corridor for quite a while. Now he stared and turned his head to look at the Pigeon Spirit burning all over on his shoulder: “What are you screeching about?”

AI tilted its head. Its small eyes stared straight at Duncan. It nodded with a serious look and said: “Our Scout Maiden was attacked! Our Scout Maiden was attacked! The battle is going badly for us… Our Warrior is fighting the enemy!”

Alice came over, holding her head. “Captain, did AI eat something bad?”

AI turned its head and glared at the Doll. It stretched out its neck and pecked twice at her skull, making a hollow “thunk, thunk” sound. Then it squawked at the top of its lungs: “Is that okay, is that okay, is that okay…”

Alice let out a yelp at the pecks, hugged her head, and ran.

Duncan did not pay much attention to the ruckus beside him. The moment he heard AI shout the same thing the second time, his face had already grown serious. Right after that, he looked thoughtfully in one direction.

“You two, quiet,” he said suddenly after a few seconds, breaking the silence. His face looked especially grave as he stared toward a junction on the other side of the corridor. “AI might have sensed something.”

Alice went quiet at once and looked in the direction of Duncan’s gaze.

“It’s the mark I left… It’s that ‘Gatekeeper,’” Duncan said as he stepped forward. “She’s nearby.”

Alice stared at that direction, then suddenly her eyes widened.

“Ah, there are threads!”

The Doll Miss let out a short cry, then rushed over at once—she even ran faster than Duncan. She was like an anxious child trying to grab a balloon that was about to fly away. She ran straight to the junction and then jumped up, grabbing at something invisible in the air.

Duncan only saw Alice run ahead and jump around, trying to grab at the air. Then he seemed to faintly see something appear in Alice’s hand.

They were white, almost transparent, and they bent the light of the corridor just a little… threads.

He walked over quickly. Alice turned her head, and a bright, happy smile spread over her face.

“I caught—”

The Doll Miss’s happy smile lasted only a moment. In the next second, the faint threads in her hand suddenly began to break and snap. They crumbled and faded away quickly in the air, as if they were weathering at high speed.

“Ah!” Alice cried out. “The threads broke!”

Before her cry had even finished, a tall, broad-shouldered figure had already strode up from the side. Duncan reached toward the breaking, weathering “threads”—and a little piece of thread that was about to vanish completely fell into his hand.

In an instant, a layer of ghostly green fire spread along the line.

Duncan slowly turned his head. He looked into Alice’s eyes. In Alice’s wide eyes, a small flicker of ghostly green danced.

“I’ve got it,” Duncan said softly.

…

One twisted freak turned to ash in pale flame. Another had its head smashed by the Gatekeeper’s cane and slumped down like soft mud. Agatha turned her body. The fighting Gatekeeper’s cane in her hand sliced through the air and came down hard toward the last enemy still standing at the junction.

Then her movement suddenly stopped.

It was pure instinct. She had no time to think. Huge fear and awe slammed straight into her mind and froze it. She even felt her muscles and bones let out a sharp, awful creaking sound. A powerful force from her Spiritual Insight—maybe even a direct warning from the God of Death, Bartok—suddenly halted her attack.

She saw her Gatekeeper’s cane stop. It hung there, less than a few millimeters from the head of the last “replica” that had just crawled out of the sludge.

Her eyes opened wide as she watched the human-shaped figure, its whole body made from flowing mud, slowly raise its head. A pair of eyes slowly formed where its head should be. ghostly green flame began to burn along the surface of its body. A deep voice crackled out from within the fire:

“Agatha, need help?”

Chapter 400: Traveling the Waterway Together

Agatha instantly withdrew the Gatekeeper's cane, then widened her eyes, staring in shock and wariness at the "replica" monster in front of her that was slowly raising its head. In that instant, she realized that this monster, whose "mud" body was made of elements, had already mutated.

Some power or will had descended into its body and instantly changed its nature. It had turned into a medium, and in this dark sewer it kept releasing a terrifying power.

Layer upon layer of noise rose up, turning in her mind into countless incomprehensible whispers and roars. Agatha felt trembling shadows spreading at the edges of her vision, and in those shadows it was as if countless eyes opened at once. This was a sign that her spirit was suffering corruption. The exhaustion and mental damage built up from continuous battles had weakened her defenses, leaving her almost unable to resist.

But this corruption lasted for less than two seconds. It seemed the master of that power had deliberately taken control and reined in the might spilling out from this avatar form. Agatha's senses cleared and steadied again, and in that brief clarity she realized the "identity" of the person before her.

"You are… that Descended One…" She rubbed her forehead and spoke hesitantly.

"It's me," that avatar form said. The body of elements sludge still writhed and changed, as if it could not bear such overwhelming power, and it never managed to take on a clear, stable shape. “Just call me Captain—my followers all call me that.”

“Captain?” Agatha frowned. The aftereffects of the mental corruption made her thoughts a little slow. She felt the title was a bit odd, but soon gave up worrying about it. There were countless “captains” in the world. A high? ranking supernatural of unknown origin might call himself “Captain” just for fun. That was not something worth digging into.

“Why are you here?” she asked in confusion.

“I’ve been looking for you for a long time,” Duncan said. “When you suddenly vanished from the city?state, I knew something had happened to you.”

“You were looking for me?” Agatha was a little stunned. Then she quickly lifted her head and scanned the surroundings. “How are things ‘outside’?”

“If you mean the Frostholm in the Mortal Realm, then everything is as usual—as usual to an abnormal degree,” Duncan shook his head. “Do you know where you’re trapped?”

“I… I’m not sure.” Agatha propped herself up with the Gatekeeper’s cane and slowly leaned against the wall. She had finally gained a precious moment of safety and had to use it to recover a bit of strength. “This is another Frostholm, a Frostholm completely controlled by ‘replicas’. There is no Sun here, and the link to the God is very weak. But there are traces of those Annihilation heretics. I was tracking one of them and chased him all the way here…”

She stopped, panting a little, and turned to look at the “Captain”.

“A mirror world,” that temporary avatar form said. “You’re trapped inside Frostholm’s mirror world.”

“mirror world?” Agatha’s eyes widened for a moment. Then she lowered her head, looking thoughtful. “So that’s it… a mirror world…”

“They may have copied the entire Frostholm, including the waters around it. This mirror world is the source of all the ‘replicas’,” Duncan went on. “The trouble is, there are signs that this mirror world and the Mortal Realm are slowly drawing closer. That should be the Annihilators’ real plan.”

Agatha snapped her head up: “You mean…”

“The ‘replicas’ appearing so often in the city?state, the copied Sea Swallow, the vanished Dagger Island, even you being trapped here—all of that is the result of ‘mirror world Frostholm’ drawing closer and closer to ‘Mortal Realm Frostholm’. The Annihilators never meant to invade or destroy this city, Agatha. What they want is to transform the entire city into the ‘kingdom’ from the prophecy.”

“…At some point, the approaching mirror world and the Mortal Realm will collide…” Agatha drew in a slow breath and muttered. She had already thought of that possibility. “No wonder, no wonder that heretic said that when the Guardian found the ‘sanctuary’, it would mean their plan had succeeded… that moment would be the moment the mirror world touched the Mortal Realm!”

“Sounds like you already have an idea,” Duncan said. “You just said you found traces of those cultists here and were tracking them?”

“Yes. I smelled their scent—deep inside this ‘second waterway’.” Agatha raised her head and looked toward some point deep down the corridor. After a brief rest, she had recovered some strength. She braced herself, stood straight again, and slowly walked forward. “There is a heretic. He kept trying to stop me. But the longer he pestered me, the more he exposed his own trail. I feel I’m very close…”

The avatar form under Duncan’s control followed after Agatha.

“I’m very sorry.” Agatha, who was walking in front, suddenly spoke.

“Why apologize?”

“Just now… I almost attacked you.” Agatha’s tone sounded a little embarrassed.

Duncan paused in surprise, then recalled what he had seen when he had just entered this avatar form—the tin Gatekeeper’s cane in Agatha’s hand had been only a few millimeters from his head.

But he thought about it and decided it wasn’t a big deal.

At least it was better than Vanna’s jumping slash back then.

“I don’t mind. I’m already used to it.”

“…Used to it?”

“One of my followers likes to use a jumping slash whenever she gets frightened—sometimes the target is me, though she doesn’t do that anymore.”

Agatha: “…?”

The young Gatekeeper was deeply shaken. She could not help guessing what the daily life of this suspected Elder God was like with his followers, and what kind of outrageous, strange, and uncanny beings those followers were.

She thought about it for a long time, but even with her sanity score almost emptied, she still could not figure it out.

Duncan did not care about Agatha’s sudden daze and thoughts. He just kept walking forward, carefully observing the corridor as they went.

This was the second waterway of mirror world Frostholm—and it was clearly very different from the second waterway in the Mortal Realm.

He stopped and looked ahead, thoughtful, at the sewer corridor stretching on in the dim light.

“Did something occur to you?” Agatha also stopped and looked back at him in confusion.

“In the Mortal Realm, this area collapsed and the passage is blocked,” Duncan said, his tone thoughtful. “But in this mirror world Frostholm, the second waterway is intact. It even looks like it has been in constant use.”

“…Maybe it’s showing how it looked in the Queen’s era,” Agatha said hoarsely. “I’ve already noticed that many details in this mirror world Frostholm look almost like the scenes I’m familiar with, but not quite. It doesn’t look modern.”

Duncan listened to Agatha’s analysis and did not speak for a moment. After a few seconds, he finally broke the silence: “Looks like I may not be able to accompany you for the rest of the way.”

Agatha turned back in surprise.

She saw the Captain’s avatar form gradually breaking apart. The flowing, shifting black sludge that made up his body seemed to be bearing a power that was far too great. Now it was flaking away bit by bit, leaving crisscrossing, web?like cracks on the surface of that body. Between those cracks, Ghost?green flames leapt about, looking as if they were going to spill out of control.

She blurted out without thinking: “Your body…”

“Don’t worry about it. This shoddy replica can’t stably bear my power. It’s only a matter of time before it collapses,” Duncan just shook his head, his tone calm. “It’s already surprising it held together long enough for me to say this much to you.”

Then he waved his hand, stopping Agatha from speaking.

“Your state is very bad. You need more help. I’ll leave some Fire Seed here. That Fire Seed can strengthen the link between you and me. Take it and keep tracking those cultists’ lair—I will keep helping you.”

Agatha stepped forward on instinct, as if she still wanted to ask something. But before she could speak, that avatar form, which had already been pushed to the limit by too much power, finally reached its end.

In a sudden surge of eerie green flames, the elements sludge that formed the avatar form stopped flowing. The fire devoured it and tore it apart, and countless ashen fragments scattered with a roar.

In the center of the charred black elements remains, only a tiny flame the size of a finger was left.

The little flame floated in midair near the ground.

Agatha stared blankly at the flame drifting near the ground. Its ghostly green color made the Gatekeeper wary. She instinctively felt fear and tension. Yet after a moment of hesitation, she still stepped forward and slowly bent down.

“…I hope this is the right choice.”

She spoke softly and silently recited Bartok’s name in her heart. Then she reached out, as if mustering all her courage, and her fingertip touched the tiny flame.

The flame felt like a weightless petal as she lifted it into her hand.

“…I really can pick it up.”

Agatha stared in surprise at the flame resting in her palm. At that moment, she felt a connection between herself and the fire.

It was weak and strange, but real. After a brief daze she came back to herself, carefully cupped the flame in her hand, picked up the battered Gatekeeper’s cane with the other, and stepped toward the deepest part of the second waterway.

Chapter 401: Fog?

In the center of the city?state, at the highest point of Frostholm, the Silent Cathedral stood quietly atop the mountain. The gloomy sky made the solemn, dark building seem even heavier with muted oppression. Its forest of spires stood in the thin mist like thorns and blades, overlooking the entire city.

A tall figure, especially eye?catching among the crowd, strolled across the square in front of the Cathedral, looking around at the sights like an ordinary tourist.

Before long, another elderly gentleman in a dark brown coat, with a gentle, scholarly air, walked out of the crowd and headed straight toward that tall figure.

Vanna saw Morris coming out of the crowd and quietly moved to a relatively secluded spot.

“There is no anomaly on the Cathedral square.” Vanna leaned against a streetlamp and looked at the Cathedral’s main doors in the distance, speaking in a low voice.

“Same at City Hall. At least on the surface, there are no signs that the people there have suffered any mental or cognitive corruption,” Morris said as he wiped his blessed monocle. “But I did notice something.”

“Something?”

“People near the square were talking about the recent sewer exploration operation by The authority. If I’m not wrong, they were talking about the second waterway,” Morris said. “They mentioned Gatekeeper Agatha—that Gatekeeper is personally leading the team.”

“Gatekeeper Agatha?” Vanna’s expression changed a little. “But the Captain said…”

“The real Agatha should be trapped right now in a Frostholm city that has become a mirror world,” Morris said in a low voice. “The one leading the team… is most likely a replica.”

Vanna drew in a deep breath, then suddenly looked up toward the Silent Cathedral.

The majestic building stood against the gloomy sky, its many spires standing in the mist without a sound.

Her expression grew grim: “…The Grand Cathedral shows no sign of anything wrong, so there are only two possibilities. Either the replica has fooled the Grand Cathedral’s eyes, or…”

“Or Frostholm Church is no longer trustworthy. At the very least, something is very wrong inside the Grand Cathedral,” Morris nodded slightly. “Whichever it is, Frostholm Church has clearly lost control of this whole affair—we should leave. We have to tell Mr. Duncan about this at once.”

Vanna nodded silently and walked with Morris toward the exit at the edge of the square. Before leaving, she again looked up one last time at the open area opposite the Silent Cathedral.

That was where City Hall stood, the Queen’s palace that had once been called the ‘Winter Court’. Fog had formed atop the hill. In the thickening mist, Vanna saw that building standing as silent under the sky as the Silent Cathedral. Its spires were tall, its towers crowded together. One high tower after another rose like thorns and blades in the mist, quietly overlooking the city.

Vanna's steps suddenly stopped.

Morris immediately turned his head: "Vanna? What did you see?"

Vanna stared hard at that hazy mist.

As the mist curled, City Hall returned to its original look. It was a palace? like building with all kinds of curved vaults. Around the dignified gray? white main hall stretched long halls like wings, their vaulted roofs rising and falling in a row.

There were no gloomy black spires and no forest of high towers.

"Vanna? What's wrong?" Morris's voice came again beside her.

"I just saw another Grand Cathedral—right where City Hall is," Vanna said suddenly in a low voice, her expression especially grave. "It was only for a moment, but I'm sure I didn't see it wrong!"

"Another Grand Cathedral?" Morris was startled. He instinctively looked across the square, but all he saw was the perfectly normal City Hall.

But he did not doubt Vanna's judgment at all.

"This is not a good sign," the old scholar said in a deep voice, raising a hand to press down his hat. "It seems only you saw that scene. That may be because your Spirit Sight as clergy is far beyond ordinary people. That manifestation appeared directly around the Grand Cathedral. That is proof the corruption is getting worse."

Vanna did not respond. She only frowned deeply and looked toward the city at the foot of the hill. After a long moment, she spoke slowly: "It's getting foggy. Everywhere."

Fog had formed. At first it was only in the central area of the Frostholm city?state. Then the mist began to spread across the whole urban district. It started as faint wisps, then quickly grew thick. In just a few hours, the entire city was wrapped in haze.

“It’s so foggy outside!”

Shirley leaned over the second?floor bedroom window, craning her neck to look at the street. She shouted with a look of surprise on her face.

Dog also pressed against the window, his ugly skull head squeezed next to Shirley’s. After staring outside for a long time, he suddenly spoke up: “The reason for heavy fog in urban areas is usually a large temperature difference between day and night, plus human activity causing water vapor to rise and dust in the air to increase. The moist air between buildings then meets a sudden drop in temperature and forms…”

Shirley listened, completely lost: “Dog, what are you talking about?”

“Dog is reciting the second chapter of The Logic Behind Nature. It’s been reading that book these past two days,” Nina said offhandedly, glancing over from the desk where she was doing homework. “You should try reading some simple books yourself sometimes. It really helps with learning more words—if it’s too hard, you can start with picture books.”

Shirley thought for a moment and said uncertainly: “Are you mocking me for knowing so few words, that after all this time I can still only read picture books?”

Nina had already turned her attention back to her homework: “No, because you really can only read picture books. Stating facts doesn’t count as mocking…”

Shirley’s eyes went wide, as if she wanted to get angry, but the thicker fog outside caught her attention again. She waved her hand. “Ah, I’m not arguing with you about this—come look! The fog outside is really thick! Even back in Pland I never saw fog this heavy…”

“Pland doesn’t have a big temperature difference between day and night, and it’s windy in the morning and evening. It’s not easy for fog to form there,” Nina said without looking up. “I’m not looking. I haven’t finished my homework. The practice papers Teacher Morris assigned are really hard, and the multiple?choice questions are so confusing. I keep feeling I picked the wrong answers…”

“Hey, when you run into a question you can’t solve, just choose C for everything,” Shirley said casually. Then her eyes rolled, as if a new idea had popped up. “Nina, do you want to go out and play? Just nearby, we won’t go far. There’s a pastry shop across the street. In this weather there definitely won’t be many guests. Maybe we can buy cake really cheap…”

“I’m not going,” Nina said. “If you want to go, go by yourself. When Uncle Duncan comes back, I just won’t tell on you…”

She had only said half a sentence when a strange rustling sound suddenly rose in the room, cutting off the two girls’ conversation.

“Did you… just hear something?” Shirley quickly jumped back from the window and looked around warily.

Nina tensed up too. As she instinctively tried to look around, the corner of her eye suddenly caught something strange on the surface of the test papers and books spread out in front of her.

The words were moving, the symbols were spinning, and the clear black ink strokes trembled as if they had come alive. Along the edges of those shaking lines, black shadows spread like spilled ink and quickly filled the whole sheet.

In almost an instant, all the books and papers Nina had been reading began to shake violently. Layered whispers and murmurs mixed with that rustling sound and echoed through the whole room!

“Ah! Your books are possessed!” Shirley cried out. At the same time, she instinctively raised the chain that linked her to Dog. The moment her shout fell, the thing that had followed the scent of knowledge upward toward the Mortal Realm also entered the room!

The black smoke and dust spun wildly. A body condensed and appeared out of the smoke. Fragments of bone scattered across the floor with a clatter and in an instant turned into ugly, terrifying demons—three Abyssal Hounds landed on the floor, letting out fearsome growls. Their chaotic, blood?red eye sockets were filled with madness and disorder!

Then they saw Dog sprawled on the open patch of floor by the window, looking a little dazed.

The Abyssal Hounds looked at one another—Shirley even felt she saw a flash of confusion in the posture of those chaotic, witless “native demons”.

But that did not affect her reaction at all.

The pitch?black chains rattled at once. Shirley raised her arm high. With tremendous force, she swung Dog in a full circle like a flail, and in the next second sent him whistling toward the demon closest to the window!

“I’m gonna beat you to death!”

With a thunderous crash, the two dog heads collided with earth?shaking force. The demon that had just rushed up from the Abyssal Deep Sea, clearly could not compare with Dog, who had been sparring with Shirley for years—whether in skull hardness or in reaction speed.

The first Abyssal demon was smashed to pieces in a single hit.

The second Abyssal demon only had time to open its mouth. Before it could let out a roar, it suddenly felt a surge of intense heat rushing at it.

A streak of flame shot in from the side as Nina raised her leg in a 6000? Degree Flying Kick.

Chapter 402: Pervading

After spending some time adapting to life on the ship, Nina had gotten used to the little problems that came with reading and studying. Those problems included, but were not limited to, shadows surfacing from the Spirit Realm, demons appearing from the Abyssal Deep, and strange changes in the books themselves. On top of that, thanks to all her hard training, her control over her own power had greatly improved.

Specifically, even when she lifted her leg for a 6,000-degree flying kick, she could now make sure she did not set the bedding on the nearby bunk on fire.

A flash of blinding light swept past. Demons from the deep layers of the world turned to ash in an instant under the power of the Sun. The air did not even have time to pick up the stench of burning. There was only the warm smell of blankets that had been dried in noon sunlight.

The last Abyssal Hound that the book had attracted was left alone in the middle of the room. Even though it was a Abyssal demon with a chaotic, almost brainless mind that acted on pure instinct, this terrifying creature still seemed to fall into a brief daze. It could not seem to understand why it had suddenly lost two companions. Now, in front of it, Dog was bending low with the chain in Shirley’s hand and growling. Behind it, Nina walked forward step by step, wrapped in light like a blazing sun.

The terrible pressure from behind it was far stronger than the strange “kin” in front of it.

The Abyssal demon turned its head on instinct and met a gaze as scorching as the Sun.

Nina lowered her head a little. Her hair was now fully dyed with a golden sheen. Harsh light leaked from her seven orifices. Within this Human shell, the power of the Ancient Sun burned. When she turned her gaze on the demon, the bones in the creature's body began to burn under her eyes.

Shirley was frightened. She had never seen Nina angry before. She had even thought that this friend, who was always as bright and cheerful as sunlight, never got mad at all. Now she knew she had been very wrong. Nina was clearly very angry.

Her fury rose like a solar prominence. Even though she held back the heat that was leaking out, the light still felt so bright it could burn a person's soul.

As Shirley grew more and more nervous and finally could not help wanting to speak, Nina at last opened her mouth. Searing plasma flames leaked from the corner of her lips. Her voice boomed:

"My homework!" Her voice even carried grief and rage. "My test papers! My reference books! And Shirley's homework! These mutts tore them all to shreds!"

The wrath of the Sun scared the demons so badly that they lost all ability to move. When Shirley heard what Nina said, she was even more shocked. She almost laughed out loud. "Really? My homework is gone too?"

But in the next second she came back to herself. She hurried to stop Nina, who was about to avenge the homework with a flying kick. "Ah, wait! Leave this demon alive for now! Dog has questions!"

Nina already had her leg raised, but when she heard her friend shout, she still stopped on instinct. She glanced sideways at Shirley. "What is there to ask? It’s just a Abyssal demon that sneaks in to make trouble when people are reading. We’ve already killed a bunch of them on the ship…”

“But it’s daytime!” Shirley shouted.

Nina froze for a moment. Then she suddenly realized.

It was daytime. Even though a thick fog had risen outside and the sky had grown as dim as dusk, in terms of time it was still daytime. It was still the time when Vision 001 covered the world.

At this time of day, the city-states were safe. Reading would not draw in invaders from the dark. So why had these Abyssal demons appeared?

Nina’s gaze (6,000°C) instantly locked on the last Abyssal Hound.

Bathed in the light of a star at point-blank range, the bones all over the demon’s body began to smoke. It struggled on instinct. It seemed to want to open a rift and flee back to the Abyssal Deep. But its instinctive escape was cut off at once.

Dog disrupted the half-formed crack that had just appeared beside the demon.

“Can you get anything out of it?” Nina pulled back some of her power and looked at Dog with curiosity. “Didn’t you say normal Abyssal demons don’t have much mind at all and can’t be talked to?”

“Brainless is still brainless, but if you really investigate, you can still dig out a little,” Dog said as he shook his head. It looked like his head was still buzzing a bit from headbutting the other Abyssal Hound earlier. “They do have memories. And now and then their chaotic thoughts hold a few connected pieces. Don’t worry. Abyssal demons have their own way of ‘talking’.”

“What way of talking?” Nina and Shirley asked at the same time.

“…Not a very pretty one,” Dog muttered. He slowly walked toward the Abyssal Hound that had almost stopped struggling under the blazing sun. Then he lifted his head and glanced at Shirley. “Close your eyes, Shirley.”

Shirley paused for a second, then obediently shut her eyes.

There was a short growl and the sounds of a scuffle. Right after that came the noise of bones being torn, crushed, and chewed. In the tooth-aching creak and crack, the demon’s violent struggle lasted only a brief moment.

After a while, Shirley cautiously opened her eyes again. On the floor in the center of the room there was nothing left but a small pile of black dust that was fading away fast. Dog stood next to the pile. Nina stood across from him, staring blankly for a moment. Only after quite some time did the blazing sunlight around her slowly fade. Then she let out a low gasp: “Wow…”

Shirley guessed what had happened while her eyes were closed. She gave Dog a slightly complicated look. “Actually… I don’t really…”

“You’d have nightmares. I know you,” Dog said, shaking his head. Then he ground his teeth and spat to the side with open disgust. “Ptoo.”

“Did it hurt your teeth?”

“Chewing on a demon that can’t even read is like chewing on a rock. I couldn’t squeeze even a full sentence out of it,” Dog said, clearly disgusted by his illiterate cousin. “And this fellow even ran out chasing after knowledge.”

He grumbled as he showed all the confidence and pride of a cultured dog. Then he lowered his head, as if he were carefully feeling out the information he had just gained from that “talk.”

A moment later, he raised his head again with a puzzled look and glanced at Shirley and Nina. “Strange… The last memories left in this Abyssal Hound say that it has never once felt the suppression of Vision 001…”

Shirley and Nina stared at each other in shock.

“But right now… it’s clearly daytime…”

Shirley muttered under her breath. She slowly walked to the window and leaned out to look.

The ever-thickening fog had already covered every street. The heavy fog and the clouds high above hung over Frostholm like layer upon layer of a Veil. Within that heavy Veil, the daylight had already dimmed to dusk. In the distance, they could not even see the stores on the far side of the main street.

But there was still a patch of light in the sky. That was where the Sun was.

It was clearly daytime. It was clearly Vision 001.

“Nina, look.” Shirley raised her hand and pointed at the sky. “The Sun is right there…”

She suddenly stopped.

Deep inside the thick fog and cloud, that bright patch of light trembled a few times. Then, like a reflection on water, it spread outward and blurred.

It seemed that from the very start, that had not been the Sun at all. It was only a visual afterimage left above the city when the Veil had risen.

Above Frostholm, the Sun vanished.

…

At the same time, in the center of the city-state, deep under the ground right beneath the Boiling Gold mine, lay the ancient, sealed Second Waterway.

The fog in the city had not spread down here. The small changes on the surface did not affect the exploration teams. In this deep, abandoned underground world, the Church’s Guardian troops were busy and orderly as they strengthened the forward base they had just built.

Spider-like Steam Walkers slid through the wide sewer corridors. Their high-powered searchlights swept over every dark corner. The multi-barrel guns on the turrets at the “spiders’” sides shifted their aim by small degrees, ready for any Shadows that might lurk in the side tunnels. Silent Monks in black robes sat behind cover at the crossroads, praying in silence as they rested and gathered strength for the next push. Veteran elite Guardians held the posts and doors at each junction. consecrated lanterns hung at their belts. One hand held a Gatekeeper’s cane. The other gripped a specially modified shotgun or a large-caliber revolver.

Darkness had ruled the Second Waterway for far too long. Working here in this dim place was less an “investigation” and more a declaration of war on a twisted, monstrous kingdom.

The enemy could be anything. The enemy was the darkness itself.

A strange hissing came from a branch corridor in the distance, mixed with the sound of some huge limbs crawling and writhing. Two Steam Walkers stood guard at the junction. They reacted at once. Four powerful flash grenades shot from the front of the spider machines first. Right after that, the Guardians on the walkers swung the rotary guns toward the source of the sound and opened fire in a sweeping burst. In the deafening thunder, that patch of darkness swelled sharply. It seemed something inside had been hurt and was about to show itself.

Twelve Silent Monks in black robes stood up from behind their cover. As one, they raised the Sacred Tomes in their hands. Their bandaged arms stretched out toward the darkness, and they let out a fierce shout.

Pale flames burst out in the dark. Together with the barrage from the Steam Walkers, they burned whatever the formless darkness had been breeding into ash.

The restless darkness fell quiet again. The branch corridor slowly went from pitch-black to dim, then from dim to bright. The lamps pushed their normal light forward to reach the junction and showed what was there.

There was nothing. Only pits and craters of all sizes in the walls.

And a faint, foul smell in the air that quickly faded.

Agatha drew back her gaze from the distant junction.

One branch had been reclaimed. The Guardian troops had driven back another patch of darkness in this underground world. Yet in the vast Second Waterway, this was only a tiny corner.

She was not here to deal with those “junctions.”

“Take me to that door.”

The Gatekeeper turned her head a little and spoke to the subordinate at her side.

Chapter 403: The Depleted Truth

Leading a small team of fully armed Guardians, Agatha left the forward base that the Church troops had built. They passed through several makeshift fences made from simple works and firing positions. Then they went through a junction lit by gas lamps and finally reached the far end of a side corridor.

The gas lamps set into the walls gave off a soft hiss. The old pipe system fed them unevenly, so their light flickered and dimmed. In that unsteady light, they could see a thick, black alloy gate standing silently at the end of the hall.

The sound of the Gatekeeper’s cane and her heels striking the floor echoed hollowly along the corridor. Agatha stopped before the gate. Maybe too much time had passed, because the seal on this door had already failed. There was a narrow gap between the two leaves. The lead seal that had once hung on the latch looked as if it had suffered some unknown impact. Clear stretch and tear marks showed in the middle.

On a plaque at the side of the door, they could see the steel stamp of Frostholm City Hall.

This was what the explorers had found in these depths. It was the strange door in the center of the Second Waterway that she had told Governor Winston about.

City Hall had sealed this place, yet the governor himself knew nothing about the door. All records about it had vanished. It might date back to the chaotic years just after the end of the Queen’s age. The turmoil of that time had let the door and the secret behind it slip out of people’s memories.

Was this the nest where the Annihilators hid? Or was it the riddle that Frostholm’s Queen Ray Nora had left for the world?

Agatha reached out and gently touched the rough, heavy alloy panel. For some reason, her fingertips felt dull and numb. Only the chill under her skin was sharply clear.

“Are we opening this door?” A black-clad guard stepped forward half a pace. “The governor’s permission has already come down…”

“Mr. Winston did give permission, but you can’t just throw open a door that has sat sealed in the dark for years,” Agatha said, shaking her head slightly. “There might be something dangerous locked behind it. I will go over first and check the situation.”

The nearby Guardians understood their commander at once and stepped back.

Agatha lifted her head and looked at the crack between the two leaves. Then she reached forward.

Nothing happened. She frowned in puzzlement.

A black-clad guard glanced over with curiosity. “Is something wrong?”

“…No. Nothing.” Agatha shook her head, then focused again.

At last, a gust of wind stirred in the open space. Her figure turned into a swirl of gray-white mist. The Ashen Wind circled twice before the gate, then slipped into the narrow gap.

“Hold position and keep watch. Wait for the Gatekeeper to return.”

The captain of the black-clad guards let out a quiet breath when he saw Agatha pass through the door. Then he began ordering the squad members to set up firing positions along the corridor.

On the far side, the gray-white whirl of wind passed through the gap and entered a dim space. The wind spun for a moment, and Agatha's body took shape again out of it.

The Gatekeeper looked back at the gate she had come through, then lowered her head to check herself. She frowned without thinking.

Why did the divine magic she used every day feel so stiff today? Even her body's own response seemed a bit slower.

After a moment of confusion, Agatha shook her head and pushed her attention back to the task at hand.

She looked around. The consecrated lantern at her waist cast a dim yellow glow that drove back the darkness around her. It seemed many restless things were hiding in the shadows on all sides, but when she focused her will, the dark quieted again.

She stood in a damp, gloomy passage. Bare earth and stones with a metallic sheen showed everywhere. In the weak light of the consecrated lantern she could also see the beams and supports that held up the tunnel, and some scattered odds and ends lying by piles of rock.

Agatha frowned. This did not look like any part of the Second Waterway. A normal sewer corridor did not have this structure. The space behind this gate… looked more like a mine tunnel that had been abandoned for a long time.

A mine tunnel?

Agatha lifted her head and stared thoughtfully at the damp, dark rock ceiling above. Her gaze seemed to go straight through the thick rock and earth, up and up through layers of passages, shafts, machines, and ramps.

The Boiling Gold mine.

This section of the Second Waterway lay under the center of the city-state. Its underground branches crisscrossed around the Boiling Gold mine. Quite a few sewer lines had even been part of the mine's drainage system in the Queen's era. In some of these, the distance between sewer and mine tunnel really might be only a single door.

She walked slowly along the tunnel, and more and more questions rose in her mind.

This was only a mine tunnel. It did not even seem fully swallowed and twisted by darkness yet. Boiling Gold itself was a holy metal. The tiny traces of Boiling Gold in the rock and soil were enough to resist corruption, like lamps and steam. Why, then, had they gone to such lengths to seal a tunnel like this behind a grand door?

It was locked away underground. Even the current governor did not know it existed. If the order to seal it had really come from the first City Hall after the Queen's age, then what was so special about this place that it had made them so nervous?

And this tunnel had clearly been abandoned. Why? It plainly had not been corrupted. There were no monsters here, no illusions, and no…

Boiling Gold.

Agatha suddenly stopped. Her eyes swept over the working levels dug into the sides of the tunnel. At last she began to understand the source of the wrongness she had felt all along.

There was no Boiling Gold here.

…

At City Hall, on the top floor of the old Queen’s palace, in a domed office, the plump governor Winston, dressed in a blue coat, slowly toyed with a delicate machine in his hands.

The brass model made a soft clicking in his grip. Gears and linkages turned. Every bite and rotation carried a cold, precise beauty.

A creation of wisdom. A crystallization of engineering. A fruit of civilization. The turning of gears was the medal and ribbon of mortal civilization.

Winston set the model down in front of him. He casually used the decorative ribbon on his coat to wipe a smear of oil near the base. After cleaning it off, he nodded slightly, his face full of quiet delight, like a man admiring a work of art.

“Boiling Gold is Frostholm’s blood. The mining machines are the hearts that pump that blood…”

Winston muttered softly as he flicked the tiny brass gears with his fingers. It sounded half like talking to himself and half like speaking to the little machine.

“Fifty years… like a dream, gone in a blink…”

He slowly rose and paced over to the window.

Outside the wide glass panes, thick fog filled the whole city. In the swirling mist, every building and street blurred at the edges, as if they were about to melt into the city itself. Even the lofty Cathedral across the plaza became only a vague shadow in the fog. The many towers and spires looked like giants choking and dying in the haze.

Winston looked calmly at the fog outside the window. He could hear the alarm bells from across the plaza. He could also hear the Guard Corps of City Hall and the Constable units gathering and taking orders on the square below.

Fog this heavy and this strange was bound to draw City Hall's attention. Even without an order from the governor, the city's Guard forces would follow their set procedures and move first. But keeping order in the fog might turn out to be the easiest part of what came next.

Winston stood at the window for a while, then turned toward a spot not far away.

A small round table stood near the window. Thin strands of fog seeped through the cracks and drifted around it. In the smoke-like haze, he saw two things lying on the tabletop.

One was a stack of papers, already yellowed and brittle. The other was a finely made revolver.

The documents were written and prepared in an old formal style. The edges of the fine paper had ornate printed patterns, carrying that special elegance of the Queen's era.

"Boiling Gold Mine Exhaustion Warning." "Investigation Report on the Anomaly Shaft." "Analysis of the Extracted Ore Samples"…

Most of the signatures and dates on the files ran from 1840 to 1845.

The reader and signer at the bottom was Ray Nora.

The revolver was Governor Winston's personal collection, a classic model from twelve years ago. It was still solid and reliable even now. Its well-kept grip and frame shone with oil. It looked as if it could serve another twelve years—or longer.

Winston's gaze moved off the papers and came to rest on the revolver.

He reached out and picked up the heavy steel, feeling its cold weight. He opened the cylinder to check the rounds, then snapped it shut.

His right hand slowly rose. The barrel, once carefully maintained by a Master, pressed against his temple.

A few seconds later, he lowered the gun.

“This pose is not bad. I’ll use this pose when the time comes,” Winston said softly. Then he checked the safety and slid the revolver neatly into the holster at his waist.

Hurried footsteps sounded in the corridor.

“Governor, the fog in the city is getting worse…”

“I know. I’m coming.”

Chapter 404: Crossing

In the damp, chilly corridor of the Second Waterway, the Gatekeeper walked toward the deeper darkness.

The black uniform that represented the city's defenders was already in tatters. The combat Gatekeeper's cane, made with special techniques, was covered in scars. Pain and exhaustion felt like some distant illusion. In her ears there was only the hollow echo from the depths below.

Her blood seemed almost drained, but her heart still beat. Death was so close that she felt the chill of the world of The dead with every breath. In this dark, lonely corridor there were no more Comrades. She had not seen an enemy for a long time.

But something still accompanied Agatha on this road to death: a small flame that was not very bright, but carried a bit of warmth.

Agatha held her left hand to her chest, carefully guarding that cluster of flame that flickered out of thin air, the Fire Seed. The ghostly green fire lit her chin and a short stretch of the corridor around her. She felt, even savored, the little warmth the Fire Seed gave her, because she could feel that the road ahead was growing even colder.

Or perhaps, it was her own body that was growing cold.

Agatha spoke softly to the flame: "I have already passed the Upper City junction and am getting close to the side corridors near the Boiling Gold mine…"

She lifted her head and glanced at a plaque on the wall ahead. The mottled, old metal plate listed the streets of the district above this section of sewer, helping her confirm where she was.

“This whole stretch, I have met almost no enemies, but the road is getting harder to walk,” she went on quietly. “There is a kind of… suffocating cold that is slowing my steps.”

A deep, commanding voice sounded directly in her heart: “Perhaps those cultists have given up using their minions to slow your steps… They are putting all their effort into the final moment.”

“How are things outside?”

“A heavy fog has risen. It covers the entire city. The city’s Guard Corps is keeping order and urging residents to go home. Guardian squads can already be seen at some intersections. They are carrying consecrated lanterns for night patrols, because the thick fog is blocking the power of the Sun,” the commanding voice in Agatha’s heart said. “Fog is rising over the sea around the city as well. It may stretch for more than a hundred nautical miles.”

“…Those Heretics have made their move,” Agatha said softly. “Maybe my actions pushed them, made them act ahead of time…”

“You do not seem to be in good shape.”

“I may be badly hurt,” Agatha kept walking. Her breathing felt heavy, yet her mind was clearer than ever. “But you do not need to worry about me. I am ready to die. I will carry your Fire Seed into their lair, no matter how.”

“I would much rather watch you finish this mission alive, Agatha. Even if you are an Envoy of the God of Death, there is no need to rush to report to Bartok. By the way, that makes me curious. For you priests of the God of Death, is ‘death’… considered a demotion or a promotion?”

Agatha froze for a moment, then tugged at the corner of her mouth: “Your sense of humor really surprised me. Sorry, I truly cannot answer that. I am afraid all the priests of Death since ancient times have never thought about it. If I get the chance… I will think about it carefully.”

“Good. I hope you find the answer.”

The voice in her mind fell silent for now. Agatha let out a soft breath. She did not know if it was an illusion, but suddenly her breathing did not feel as labored as before, and even her steps became a little lighter.

She glanced at the Fire Seed cradled in her left hand, carefully shielded it, and stepped past another junction.

Water overflowed from a nearby drain and formed a small puddle on the ground. The surface was still as a mirror, reflecting the dim dome above the waterway.

Agatha stepped through the puddle. The calm surface rippled in layers, and in the suddenly shattered reflection there appeared a figure in a black trench coat, body wrapped in ritual bandages, holding a tin Gatekeeper’s cane.

That figure walked toward the direction Agatha had come from. In that brief instant, they passed each other.

…

Agatha suddenly stopped and looked back in some confusion at the place she had just walked past. She saw the small patch of standing water there. The surface, disturbed by footsteps, still rippled in layers.

In the disturbed, broken water she could no longer see the reflection from a moment ago, yet Agatha could not shake the feeling that she had just seen something.

It was a figure, somewhat like herself, yet not quite the same. That figure wore a ragged black uniform, body covered in wounds, as if it had gone through battle after battle, and it had been walking toward the deeper part of the Second Waterway.

That was exactly the place she had just left.

She must have stopped a bit too suddenly, because a subordinate's voice came from behind her: "Gatekeeper? What happened?"

"That puddle…" Agatha turned back and pointed not far away. "Was it already there just now? Did any of you see anything strange in it?"

"The puddle?" The subordinate looked back at it, face full of doubt. "It was there just now… but I did not see anything strange."

Agatha said nothing. She fell silent, fixing her gaze on the still-shaking surface of the water for a long time. Only after a while did a trace of solemn thought slowly appear in her eyes.

"Did you see something?" The subordinate could not help sounding a bit worried.

Agatha stayed silent for a moment more before she shook her head lightly: "Do not worry. Everything is fine. Everything… is fine."

The subordinate was still clearly puzzled, but when he saw his superior's solemn expression, he held back his curiosity and quickly changed the topic: "What did you find on the other side of that door just now? You have looked very serious ever since you came back…"

Agatha quickly gathered her scattered thoughts. She lifted her head and looked toward the way she had come. The large door leading to the abandoned mine tunnel had already vanished beyond the junction, but she still clearly remembered what she had found in that dark tunnel.

She had not explored that tunnel for long. After confirming her discovery, she had returned to the Second Waterway the way she came and hurriedly led her team back toward the stronghold. Out of necessary caution, she still had not told her subordinates what she had actually found behind that door.

Even now, she did not know how to explain that shocking and bizarre… "guess" to the black-clothed Guards before her.

After a brief hesitation, she turned and continued walking toward the stronghold.

After they had walked some distance, she suddenly spoke softly, almost as if talking to herself: "Frostholm… what does it use to sustain its existence?"

"What does it use to sustain its existence?" The subordinate was stunned for a moment and did not react right away. After a few seconds he spoke hesitantly: "You mean… the city's economic base? The Boiling Gold business?"

"Boiling Gold is Frostholm's blood. The mine is the city's heart…" Agatha murmured to herself, saying things that only confused the black-clothed Guards. "It seems none of us ever thought about the day when this heart might stop beating…"

Another black-clothed Guard could not help stepping forward, a hint of tension on his face: "You…"

Agatha raised her hand lightly and cut him off.

"Do not think too much yet. Nothing is certain. I did see some things on the other side of that door, but whether I can tell you about them will depend on my discussion with the Archbishop."

She had already calmed down from her earlier unease.

Maybe she had been too nervous. It was only a dried-up, abandoned mine tunnel. For an old mine that had been worked for so many years, it was not surprising for one or two tunnels to run dry. The later decision by City Hall to seal it off was very likely for another reason. Some kind of corruption that had once existed there but had now faded was the most likely explanation.

Jumping to conclusions was a great taboo in any investigation.

Agatha shook her head, yet the brief scene she had just seen in that puddle rose again in her mind.

That battle-worn, bloodstained “self” walking the opposite way in the reflection.

Agatha closed her eyes a little. Her fingers tightened around the Gatekeeper’s cane until the knuckles turned a bit white. But a moment later she opened her eyes again and looked ahead. Her face had already returned to calm.

She still had many things to do.

In silence, Agatha led the Guardian squad back to the stronghold at the underground crossroads, and as soon as she returned, she sensed that something in the atmosphere there was off.

A faintly tense air hung over the stronghold. A priest who looked as if he had just come up from the shaft was talking nervously with the officer in charge of the stronghold’s defense. Several steam walkers that had gone out earlier to clear the side passages had been called back early and now seemed ready to take the shaft lift back to the surface.

Agatha stepped forward quickly, and before she could even ask, the black-clothed Guard commander in charge of this stronghold spoke in haste: “Honored Gatekeeper, something has happened on the surface.”

Agatha frowned: “What is it?”

“Fog. A huge, eerie fog. It covers the whole city and the nearby sea. You cannot even see the Sun in the sky,” the commander reported quickly. “And Malevolent Spirits have appeared in the library and the archives. The scholars on duty managed to suppress them in time, but fear and chaos are spreading through the city. The Archbishop has sent people down to ask you to return at once!”

Chapter 405: Impact and Awakening

Fog was everywhere. The whole world seemed to have sunk into a deep pool of gray-white fluid. Everything in sight had its edges blurred by the mist. The distant city, the nearby roads… all became vague and unclear.

After moving underground for only a short time, the scene on the surface had become something she no longer recognized.

Agatha, who had hurried back to the surface from the Second Waterway, stood at the exit of the transit station and stared in shock at the street. There were no pedestrians on the road at all now. Under the thick fog, even the nearby streetlights were reduced to hazy clusters of glow floating in midair. Besides that, she could only see some dark red lights slowly moving in the mist, mixed with the sound of steam engines at work—warning lights on top of steam walkers, flashing as they moved.

“The city’s Guard Corps and constable units have rushed to every major intersection. Movement between districts is now strictly forbidden. All civilian vehicles are banned from the roads. citizens who could not get home in time are being directed to the nearest shelters,” a Church priest who had come to meet Agatha reported. “Most veil of night Sanctuary Worlds are already full. We can only work with the security forces to divert people into the Cathedral, warehouses, and the nearest subway stations.”

At this point, the priest paused and let out a heavy sigh.

“Sigh… We could have sent more people to places like the library to take shelter, but corruption has started appearing wherever large numbers of books are stored. All the book repositories have been sealed off. The fog rose right when most factories in the city were changing shifts. Too many people were far from home.”

Agatha did not answer. She slowly drew her gaze back from the street and raised her head in thought to look at the sky.

Heavy clouds and the city’s own mist hid the sky. The daylight was as dim as dusk, and in that murky vault she could not see the trace of the Sun.

“It is daytime now…” she said softly.

“Yes, it is daytime, but this strange fog may be interfering with the power of the Sun,” the priest said, face grim and a bit tense. “The corruption that appeared in the library is because of this…”

“Nothing can interfere with the power of the Sun during the day. As long as Vision 001 hangs in the sky, even if clouds block the sunlight and plunge the whole city into a veil of night, the power of the Sun will not weaken,” Agatha shook her head slightly. “In my judgment, this thick fog is not the cause. It is probably only a ‘phenomenon’ triggered by a greater crisis. How are things on the mountain?”

“The great Cathedral is packed with people now,” the priest said quickly. At the same time, several steam walkers with their warning lights on clanked onto the open ground near the transit station exit. Between the walkers was a car bearing the Church’s flag. “Your car is here. Let us go back to the mountain first. We can talk on the way.”

Agatha and the priest climbed into the car. The steam walkers cast strong beams of light into the fog. On the barely lit road, the vehicle set off toward the great Cathedral at the mountaintop, moving much more slowly than usual.

“When the fog rose, many worshippers and tourists were still on the mountain. The great Cathedral sheltered as many as it could. Those it truly could not take in were sent to the old Cathedral next door, the City Museum. City Hall has also arranged Sanctuary Worlds, so at least people were not left outside,” the priest went on reporting to Agatha in the car. “Archbishop Ivan has now stabilized the situation and has not let panic spread inside the Cathedral. Since just now he has been using Psychic Communication to stay in contact with Cathedrals all over the city. So far, no corruption caused by mass panic has appeared…”

A deep mechanical rumble sounded outside the car window. Agatha turned her head toward the direction of the noise.

She saw several long aerial tracks stretching out from above the mountain road, cutting through the thick fog and pointing into the distance. Tall support towers held up the tracks like giants. A black cargo cabin hung from one of the tracks, roaring as it moved into the depths of the mist. The red warning lights around the cabin were like many eyes, blinking nonstop in the fog.

This was the transport system of the Boiling Gold mine. The raw Boiling Gold ore dug out of the mine was carried in those huge cargo cabins along the mountain tracks to the crushing and sorting plants and the great Crucible at the foot of the mountain.

“…The mine tracks are still running?” Agatha turned back in surprise and looked at the priest beside her. “Have the workers not gone to take shelter?”

At the same time, the scene she had just seen deep underground rose in her mind: that ancient mine tunnel that had already run dry decades ago.

“The workers must have gone to take shelter,” the priest said. He looked just as surprised when he saw the cargo cabin on the track, but he still answered with certainty. “The mine Cathedral has already confirmed it. What you see going by now is probably the last batch of ore sent from the tunneling area. It should have been arranged automatically by the Sorting Engine—you know, the Boiling Gold ore that has been mined only stays in the storage yard for a while before it is sent off. It is all set on the program’s punched paper tape. The machines only follow the instruc—”

A disturbing roar suddenly came from the other side of the fog, cutting off the priest’s confident words. Everyone instantly looked toward the source of the sound, but all they saw was another black cargo cabin rushing along the aerial track from the other end—the same track the first cabin had just passed over the mountain road on.

“They are going to crash!!”

The priest only had time to cry out once before the earth-shaking collision happened. The two cargo trains slammed into each other on the aerial track with a terrifying roar and explosion. The side panels of the cabins were torn open, and ore that glowed pale gold poured down the hillside like a rainstorm. Then, as the two cargo trains rocked and swung violently on the track, their drive wheels and guide wheels fell off, axles snapped, and the twisted cabins, spitting sparks and thick smoke, tumbled down into the valley.

A chunk of falling debris from the sky almost scraped the roof of the car Agatha rode in before it smashed hard into the roadside.

Before anyone in the car could react, another teeth-grinding, dreadful sound of metal tearing came again from high above.

The aerial track that had taken the violent impact twisted and warped. Sparks burst from the top of one of the iron towers supporting it. Stretched steel beams and cables snapped with loud cracks, and then an entire section of the track came crashing down from above!

“Get out of the way!”

The priest in the car shouted at once, but even before he spoke, the convoy had already begun to dodge the fallen relic falling from the sky. Several steam walkers scattered at once, and the steam car in the middle of the formation suddenly surged forward. After a few heart-stopping seconds, a terrifying crash sounded from behind Agatha.

She looked back and saw that the broken section of track had already crashed onto the mountain road, completely destroying the main route. Two steam walkers were trapped on the far side of the fallen relic, but thankfully they were unharmed. They moved their long mechanical legs and began to climb the nearby slope instead. White high-pressure steam spurted from the gaps in their armor plates and merged with the surrounding fog.

“Walkers Two and Four cannot get through. They are probably going to climb up to the upper path and circle back to the great Cathedral. We do not need to wait for them,” Agatha said after a quick glance back, making her judgment and giving the order. “Keep going.”

“That was far too close…” The priest beside her could not help wiping the cold sweat from his forehead. “It almost came down right on our heads.”

Agatha did not speak for a moment.

Had that been an accident? Or… malice?

Why would a mine track that should only carry one-way, single-line traffic suddenly have a cargo cabin coming from the opposite direction?

By now the mine’s workers should all have gone to the shelters. In theory, the operator of the track system would also leave after setting up the last train. The final step of attaching a cargo cabin to the track had a safety lock.

If there was already another cabin on the line, it would never depart. A Sorting Engine controlled this entire process, and a properly running Sorting Engine did not make mistakes. Its gears and levers faithfully carried out the program set on the punched paper tape. There was no room for doubt in the mesh of metal.

“The mine’s Sorting Engine may have gone wrong…” Agatha murmured, almost to herself.

And the mine’s Sorting Engine might not be the only thing that had gone wrong. If Malevolent Spirit corruption could appear in the library in broad daylight, then the scope and urgency of this mutation was beyond anything anyone had imagined.

…

Faint police bells from distant streets drifted into his ears. A chaotic, disordered cold wind swept freely through the empty graveyard. Thick fog shrouded everything in sight, and in that unbroken mist it seemed as if countless low whispers overlapped and echoed, like the restless stirring of The dead.

The click of a safety catch being released broke the graveyard’s silence. The faint glow of a consecrated lantern pushed back the Shadows in the fog. A hunched old man gripped his loyal, dependable double-barreled shotgun and stood on the path like a watchful sentry, staring hard at the rows of coffins lined up in the mist.

The whispers were only an illusion—for now, at least. Those coffins still rested honestly on the platforms, and the people in them still lay there honestly. Yet the strange feeling in the air could not fool a veteran’s senses.

He knew something was happening. This graveyard was absolutely not going to stay quiet today. Among the “guests” he “looked after” here, some were slowly waking up.

Chapter 406: Gunfire in the Graveyard

In the graveyard, the Old Caretaker raised his head again and glanced at the Warden’s hut beside him.

He had already reported the restlessness among the dead in the mortuary as an express dispatch to the Cathedral, but there was still no reply—clearly, with the whole city shrouded in strange fog and the sunlight in the sky unnaturally gone, the Cathedral no longer had the spare attention to care about an Anomaly in a small graveyard.

“We can only count on ourselves now…” the Old Caretaker muttered, pulling his coat tighter. The leather armor and metal plates sewn into the lining gave a faint scraping sound. “This fog covers quite a distance…”

The clatter and scraping broke the deathly silence of the graveyard. Under the thick fog, several coffins on nearby platforms seemed to give a faint shudder.

“Considering I stand night watch over you lot every day, you cannot behave yourselves at a time like this?” The Old Caretaker frowned and lifted the barrel of his gun a little. He knew these bodies, laid out properly for days, were suddenly “moving” because of this strange fog, but there was nothing he could do.

He could only wait for them to climb out and then send them off one by one with a shot.

As this thought ran through his mind, a sound different from the restless noise inside the coffins suddenly caught his attention. He froze for a second, then reacted at once and looked toward the path at the graveyard gate.

A small figure stumbled out from the far end of the path. In the dimness, the white coat and skirt looked like a bouncing snowball.

“Grandpa Caretaker! Help me! Grandpa Caretaker! Are you there?!”

The little “snowball” shouted as she ran along the path. Her voice sounded strained, as if she was trying hard to press down her fear and panic.

“Annie!” The Old Caretaker forgot his shock at once and called through the fog to the girl: “Come here! Do not go that way!”

The flustered girl running into the graveyard finally saw the old man standing near the Warden’s hut. For a moment, the fear on her face eased, and she ran toward him at once: “Grandpa Caretaker! I am so glad you are here…”

“Why are you still running around outside at a time like this?!” The Old Caretaker did not bother listening to her joy. He set his face and scolded loudly. Today was not like other days. The danger in this fog was nothing like slippery streets in a snowfall. “Do you know the whole city is under lockdown now?!”

“I got separated from my classmates!” Annie was startled by the old man’s stern face and tone, but she still waved her hands and explained quickly: “We went with Teacher to visit the City Museum. When we came out, we ran into the thick fog. Teacher said to take us to the nearest veil of night shelter, but in the blink of an eye Teacher and the others walked into the fog and were gone…”

The Warden stared wide-eyed: “They walked into the fog and disappeared?”

“Yes, gone, just like that, in a blink,” Annie still looked badly shaken, but she tried her best to explain what had happened. “Then I went to find a place to hide by myself. The City Museum was sealed off. I could not find any Lords on the streets. All the doors were locked. I knocked as hard as I could but no one opened up. Then I remembered Teacher said that if we ran into danger, we should go to the nearest priest, Guardian, or constable. The graveyard is the closest, and I heard you say you are a veteran Guardian…”

As he listened to the girl’s rapid-fire explanation, the Old Caretaker’s expression shifted several times. He realized that, in his panic, he had wrongly blamed the young lady. For someone her age, this child had actually handled things quite calmly. But he could not bring himself to admit it, so he kept his face stiff: “So you came to the graveyard to take shelter?”

Annie nodded hard: “Yes. Everyone says veteran Guardians are stronger than normal Guardians…”

“…But a graveyard is not a good place to take shelter,” the Old Caretaker said in a low voice. “Especially at a time like this.”

Annie looked flustered: “I… I should not have come here?”

“…No. There is no better choice now. If you ran around the streets in this fog, it would be even more dangerous,” the Old Caretaker shook his head. “You hide first—”

Before he could finish, a strange rattling noise nearby cut him off. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw a shadow rise suddenly from the nearest platform. The lid of a cheap coffin was shoved open. A restless arm struggled up from inside, and then the restless dead sat up!

He did not even have time to tell Annie to close her eyes. The Old Caretaker raised his double-barreled shotgun by instinct. With a thunderous bang, the corpse that had just staggered upright fell on its back and rolled off the platform to the ground.

“Ah!”

Annie, hiding behind him, was still only a child. The gunshot made her jump, but more than the gunshot, she was shocked by that corpse that had just sat up in the fog.

“That… that…” The little girl pointed in terror at the platform from before, stammering.

The Old Caretaker started to speak without thinking: “Do not be afraid, that is just—”

“supernatural, volume three, chapter six talked about this!” Annie finally caught her breath and shouted quickly: “Teacher said that in times like this we should at once silently repeat Bartok’s name in our hearts, then use a rosewood branch or a smoke-cured rope to lash the Restless One, and then look for a chance to run to the nearest Cathedral for help…”

The Old Caretaker stared blankly as he listened to the girl’s rapid words. After two or three seconds, he suddenly snapped back, snapped another shell into the shotgun, and turned without looking back to aim at another platform. With another thunderous bang, another Restless One that had just crawled out of its coffin lay back down where it should have slept.

“Your textbooks are different from ours. Back then we only covered that lesson in high school,” he said offhandedly.

Annie hugged her head without thinking. Her small body shook from the shock of the second gunshot. She had recited the textbook fast just now, but her fear and nervousness still showed plainly.

“You hide inside the house,” the old man said. He shielded the girl and brought her to the Warden’s hut. He reached back to open the door and pushed Annie in: “No matter what happens outside, you must not leave. As long as you do not go out, this little hut is as safe as the icon hall in the Cathedral. Do you understand?”

Annie’s eyes opened wide with fear. She kept nodding as she stared at the fog outside. In her sight, the platforms in the fog seemed to come alive one after another. Shadows writhed between them. Invisible howls echoed across the graveyard. Coffins nailed shut split and burst open one after another, and terrifying figures were waking and sitting up from those “beds” that should have been for peaceful rest.

The Old Caretaker pushed Annie farther into the hut, shut the door, then turned and fired again.

The Warden’s hut was sturdy, and wards protected it. But if every dead body in the graveyard really climbed out, then this thin, small Sanctuary World might not hold off all their attacks. Even if it held up physically, the mental shock of the dead besieging it could still pierce the hut’s protection and affect the child.

The more he put down now, the safer Annie would be.

“By the God of Death, I have been retired for ten years!”

The veteran let out a rough growl from his throat. His hands worked the action with practiced ease, throwing out the spent shells and feeding in fresh rounds. In his already cloudy eyes, a fire seemed to burn. He needed almost no aim at all before he had the next unruly “resident” in his sights.

The gun roared. The dead rested. Smoke rose, and souls passed on.

“The Gatekeepers on the ‘other side’ will be busy today. I hope they can handle so many souls setting off early.”

The Old Caretaker muttered to himself, but his hands never stopped. Several Restless Ones had already started moving toward the Warden’s hut.

He loaded round after round, fired shot after shot, sending his “tenants” on their way ahead of time.

More and more staggering corpses appeared around the path.

Those vague, flickering shapes even left the Old Caretaker briefly confused —

Were there really this many bodies in the graveyard? Even if you added up every platform, could they hold so many corpses?

Were they appearing out of this fog out of thin air?!

Bang!

After another gunshot, the Old Caretaker heard a snarl very close by. Without even lifting his head, his left hand slid to his chest, and a short sword appeared in his grip. In the next second, his body seemed to vanish and reappear a few meters away beside the door. The short sword flashed through the air. A corpse fell, and a swollen, twisted head rolled across the ground.

The old man looked down. On that head, there was only one huge eye.

His shock lasted only for a moment. Then he was back at the hut door, raising his gun and aiming at another shadow that was lurching toward him through the fog.

He pulled the trigger, but the gun did not fire. Only the empty click of the hammer sounded.

His eyes changed slightly. He sheathed the short sword at once and reached to the cartridge pouch at his waist with his free hand—it was already empty.

After a brief silence, the Old Caretaker sighed: “That is fine. The numbers are about right…”

He lowered the empty shotgun, drew his short sword again, and looked up at the shapes that were wobbling out of the fog one by one.

A faint creak came from behind him.

The Warden’s hut was being opened from the inside.

The old man turned in surprise and saw Annie peeking out at him.

The young lady clutched a loaded large-caliber rifle in her hands—that was his spare weapon.

At the girl’s feet lay several cartridge pouches and ammo boxes of all sizes.

Scratches showed clearly on the floor. Annie had clearly dragged all that heavy stuff over from the corner with great effort.

“Grandpa Caretaker, use this,” Annie said. She lifted the rifle and handed it to the old man with some effort. “Will it help?”

“…Yes.” After a short silence, the old man nodded, took the rifle, and tossed the double-barreled shotgun to the girl: “Load it.”

Chapter 407: The Curtain Rises

The nonstop thunder of gunfire had already shattered the quiet of Graveyard No. 3. Flames bursting from the muzzle lit the dim fog again and again. Twisted, swaying figures kept emerging from the mist, only to fall one by one under the holy blast of fire and metal—and in the spots where they fell, black, ominous matter was already spreading across the path.

These were clearly no longer just “restless corpses”. They were something more profane and more ominous, and they had to be wiped out here.

The old man’s aim was very good. The deformed things walking out of the fog looked to him like slow-moving insects. Even through the thick mist, he could pick them off one by one.

In truth, he was even better with his short sword and his Gatekeeper’s cane, and had far more experience with them. But the old man knew he had to avoid close combat with the monsters for as long as possible.

He was already very old. A veteran’s experience could not make up for an aging body, and the enemy seemed endless. Once he was caught in hand-to-hand fighting, he would no longer be able to keep the monsters on the far side of the path.

He had to calculate exactly, to kill as many monsters as possible with as little strength as he could, and to buy time. The Cathedral and the city’s authority had to be taking action. Reinforcements would come, from one side or another. This city would not fall in some inexplicable fog like this.

Faintly, other gunshots sounded in the distance.

“Grandpa Caretaker!” Annie cried, handing him the freshly loaded rifle again. She glanced nervously toward the direction of the distant shots. “They are shooting in other places too… is someone coming to help us?”

“That is the Wardens from Graveyard No. 4 and No. 2.” The old man raised his gun and blew apart an ugly head that had appeared in the fog, speaking without looking back: “People will come to help us. Do not be afraid.”

“I am not afraid.” Annie tried to say it loudly, though her voice trembled a bit. The graveyard’s Old Caretaker did not call out the brave front she was putting up.

Because she was already brave enough.

“You really are brave,” the Old Caretaker said. He tried to sound relaxed, even though his arms had already started to shake. “Where did you learn all this? How do you know how to load rifles and shotguns?”

“My Mother has several guns. She hangs them in the bedroom and in the sitting room,” Annie said as she quickly pressed shells into the shotgun’s tube magazine. “The year Dad did not come back, Mother bought a bunch of guns. Mother said she needed to protect the house… ah!”

The spring on the latch of the magazine suddenly snapped open. The sharp metal edge sliced a long cut on the young lady’s finger, and she cried out.

But in the next second, she used another finger to push the spring back into place and handed the loaded shotgun to the old man in front of her: “Here you are.”

The Old Caretaker noticed the blood on the gun and heard Annie’s cry, but after a moment of silence he only tossed another gun behind him: “…Load it.”

The gunfire thundered again.

The black-clad old man, bent with age, stood like a crooked yet stubborn tree, nailed in place amid the dense fog. He and Annie slowly stopped talking. Only silent gunfire remained, and his expression grew more and more grave. He was counting—how many monsters he had already put down, and how many times Annie had handed him a loaded shotgun or rifle.

“Last box of bullets,” he muttered under his breath.

“Grandpa Caretaker, this is the last box of bullets!” Annie cried out almost at the same time.

“I know.” The Old Caretaker did not look back. He silently took down a twisted freak that had almost reached the hut, then beckoned behind him: “Load the shotgun, then put the gun and the rest of the bullets by my feet. You go to my bed. Under it there is a dark brown chest. Inside is spare ammunition.”

“Okay! Dark brown chest, spare ammunition!” Annie answered at once. She pushed the gun and bullets out the door and ran back inside.

The Old Caretaker looked down quietly at the shotgun and bullets at his feet. Then he turned slightly, closed the door with one hand, and drew the short sword from his chest, driving it hard through the outer latch.

Almost at once, he heard hurried footsteps inside the hut, then the sound of the girl pounding on the door and crying out.

“…This is the last time I trick you.”

The Old Caretaker said it softly, then, holding the gun in one hand, fired in quick bursts at the twisted freaks closest to him. He spun around, kicked off the doorframe, and leaped up. His free left hand swept across a corner above the frame, and a pitch-black Gatekeeper’s cane appeared in his grip. Before he landed, he brought the black staff down hard on another monster rising from the fog. As that head shattered and the corpse hit the ground, he landed as well, steady on his feet.

His gaze swept the dense fog before him. The old man swung the black staff hard. Filthy black fluid, like mutated blood, flew from its surface. Then he slammed the Gatekeeper's cane onto the ground. Metal mechanisms clicked. The black shaft shortened by half an inch, and countless sharp blades sprang out from its sides.

When the blades sprang open, it seemed as if countless layered cries and roars from the past burst out with them.

For a heartbeat, the fog-drenched graveyard even fell silent.

The Old Caretaker turned and glanced at the hut door, at the corner above the frame where the hidden compartment lay. Like most veteran Guardians, he had chosen, in the year he retired, to rest the weapon that had followed him for half his life above the last door he guarded. He had never thought that he and this old partner would stand together again in front of that door.

"We guard a door… we are Bartok's Wardens…" The old man's back was still bent. In the cold, dim fog, he slowly turned, his eyes falling on the swaying shapes as he recited the oath Guardians had passed down for generations: "We swear to guard the boundary between life and death. The dead rest because of us. The living sleep in peace because of us…"

The twisted freaks in the fog grew restless. Countless swaying figures began to cross the path, rushing toward the little hut that still stood.

What answered them was the Old Caretaker's gunfire and the whistle of his blade-staff cutting the air.

"If you will not rest, I will send you to rest!"

The sounds of hacking and slashing, of roars, and of rifles and shotguns roaring together made the graveyard tremble at the Guardians' final battle.

Inside the Warden’s hut, Annie curled her small body up by the door, holding her head as she listened to the noise outside.

She began to sob softly, and finally, under the roaring gunfire, her sobs turned into loud, helpless crying.

At twelve years old, she had been tricked by Grandpa Caretaker once again.

…

At the same time, off the coast of Frostholm.

The spreading fog was not limited to the city-state itself. By noon, it had already drifted past the inshore boundary and covered the patrol range of the Sea Mist Fleet.

In such dense and eerie fog, even the curse Fleet, which itself carried an supernatural nature, had to stay on edge.

On the bridge of the Sea Mist, Tyrian stood before the wide viewports, brow tightly furrowed, staring at the wall-like fog over the sea. First Mate Aiden came up behind him and reported in a serious tone: “Up to now, our links with Cold Harbor, Ice Bay, and Pirate Island have all been severely disrupted. We get no response on any band. Our communications with the Frostholm navy and the Harbor district on Frostholm Island are also affected, but we can still barely get through. The fog has spread to at least a hundred nautical miles beyond Frostholm Island…”

“In addition, according to the boats we sent to the edge of the fog, the spread of the fog has stopped and its density is no longer increasing. But every attempt to sail out has failed—all the boats that tried to leave the fog just circled in place and, without noticing, turned back into the depths of the fog.”

“How is the Stargazing Room?”

“They still could not see the proper star chart,” First Mate Aiden said, his face grim. “It is as if a blurry lens has suddenly appeared between the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep Sea. Every star we observe has a double image, and the mental strain from stargazing has risen sharply. It is impossible to observe for long.”

“…It seems the blockade is complete. The city-state of Frostholm and the surrounding sea have already been cut off from the ‘normal world’ outside,” Tyrian said, expressionless, his single eye calm. “Do not waste effort trying to run.”

“A blockade… who put this blockade up?”

“Try using your head once in a while—do you really need to ask?” Tyrian glanced back at Aiden. “The cultists. That bunch of madmen who worship the Abyssal Lord. They are the ones stirring up trouble lately, are they not?”

“I know that.” Aiden stared, his face clearly saying, Is this not a bit much? “But can a bunch of cultists really pull off something this big?”

“A rabble of madmen may not have that kind of power, but the ‘Lord’ they worship is another matter,” Tyrian rested his hand on the rail before him and spoke in a low voice. “The Abyssal Lord… sealing space and time, disturbing the stars… so this is the power of the Elder Gods…”

Aiden swallowed hard without thinking.

“So… this time we are really going to stand against the power of an Elder God?”

“Scared?”

“A little,” Aiden nodded, but a twisted grin still squeezed onto his face. “But there is no help for it. The world is like this. When we went up against the old captain back then, did we not grit our teeth and charge anyway? At least now the old captain is on our side.”

“That is enough. Have everyone get ready,” Tyrian let out a slow breath and waved to his First Mate. “After being away from Frostholm for so many years, it seems we are about to stir up this sea again.”

Chapter 408: The Roar in the Sea Mist

The deep, solemn sound of the steam whistle echoed over the sea. Sacred steam gushed from the ship's core compartment, shaking the tall smokestacks of the Sea Mist and every intricate pipe inside them. As the whistle blared like a war horn, all the sailors moved into action.

Hoists creaked to life, sending propellant charges and heavy shells into the combat magazines beneath the gun turrets. Steam lines roared without pause, driving sacred vapor into key mechanisms and blessed sections of the ship. Sailors ran along the decks and corridors, heading for their battle stations.

When the whistle sounded a second time, the small Cathedral at the Sea Mist's stern rang its bronze bell. The bell, symbol of the Storm Goddess's divine blessing, called Gamona's grace down upon this fearsome warship that the world knew as "The curse".

On the other main battleships of the Sea Mist Fleet, similar bells and whistles sounded in turn. The bells of each shipboard Cathedral echoed through the fog, faintly resonating with one another in some strange way. Their joined peals even began to disturb the Mortal Realm itself, so that the thick mist over the sea seemed to thin and scatter just a little.

At the same time, as the Sea Mist Fleet moved, the Frostholm Navy patrolling the nearby waters also answered. Flags went up, signal lights flashed, and the blast of whistles and the ringing of their own shipboard Cathedrals' bells echoed through the fog in response.

At that moment, the two fleets set aside fifty years of tangled grudges and hatred before the Visions that had come down on everyone. Under the strange and deadly fog that sealed the sea, the navy of the living and the fleet ruled by the Undying had become the only forces that could still rely on one another.

No one knew when the enemy would appear or in what form, but everyone knew that from now on, every unfamiliar ship that showed itself on these waters was an enemy.

Even any so-called friendly ship that refused to answer signals was also an enemy.

The enemy was the sea itself.

Every nerve on every ship was taut as they waited for some change in the fog, waited for new messages, orders, any scrap of information from Frostholm Island itself. No one knew how long that crushing wait lasted. Then Tyrian, who sat in command on the Sea Mist, suddenly felt something strange.

It was as if a gaze had fallen on him, yet it did not come from any clear direction. It felt like a look that crossed time rather than space, cast from the distant past to rest quietly upon him now.

He looked up in shock and instinctively glanced around the Sea Mist's bridge.

First Mate Aiden was talking with the boatswain. The communications officer was exchanging coordinates with the Frostholm Navy. The elderly black-robed priest had already hurried over from the small Cathedral and now sat beside the gunnery officer's station with eyes closed in prayer. With the thick fog blocking all view of the sea, the priest’s Spiritual Insight would be the warship’s greatest reliance when fighting the enemy in the mist.

Farther away, a figure stood quietly by a porthole.

In a daze, Tyrian remembered a scene from fifty years ago. In that yellowed memory, Her Majesty the Queen had personally come aboard this warship. Back then the Sea Mist had not yet grown through those fifty years. It had been older and more weathered in a different way, and the Queen had stood in that very spot, her gaze fixed on the distant sea for a long time.

It was from that place that she had given the order for the Sea Mist Fleet to leave Frostholm three days later.

Now that figure slowly turned its head and gave another order.

“Tyrian, defend Frostholm.”

After half a century, the second order had finally arrived.

Tyrian jerked awake. His heart hammered, and his eyes burned and stung as if he had just stared straight at some knowledge close to the Truth itself. Noise roared in his mind. Before he could even think about whether what he had just seen was an illusion or something else, the urgent alarm bell suddenly rang on the bridge, cutting off all his thoughts.

As the bell clamored, he already caught sight of something on the distant sea out of the corner of his eye. Amid the swirling fog, a massive ship’s silhouette was rising out of the thick mist, as if the sea itself were bulging upward to shape a Ghost from days long past.

The Ghost’s masts stood tall, and its old-fashioned funnels jutted up like coral growths on the back of a sea beast. It slowly adjusted its heading and moved toward the flank of the Sea Mist Fleet.

It was so close they did not even need the priest’s Spiritual Insight to find it.

“Visual contact! Silhouette identified, third-party vessel!” the lookout shouted.

“Open fire,” Tyrian said as he strode back to his captain’s chair, his voice as cold and heavy as an iceberg. “Anything that appears on these waters and is not already on our identification list is an enemy.”

In an instant, the guns roared and thunder crashed.

On the Sea Mist, the three main turrets that had the best angle opened fire one after another. The heavy armor-piercing shells, already primed and waiting, shot from the barrels with a peal like thunder. In the thick fog they became blazing meteors falling from the sky, slamming toward the silhouette in the distant mist.

Almost at the same time as the Sea Mist opened fire, a series of cannon blasts rolled out from that bank of fog as well. They sounded like distant thunder. In a chain of flashing fire, lines of flame tore through the mist and plunged down toward the sea around the Sea Mist.

Tyrian sat quietly in his chair, eyes half narrowed, listening to the distant rumble and calculating the shells’ flight.

It was an old 356-millimeter main gun, four triple turrets… which old friend was it?

The Rune Duke, which had once escorted the Queen? Or the Knight, which had bravely gone down in a storm fighting the Deep Sea Spawn? Or… the Warrior?

The howling of the shells was like the wail of a banshee. Thunder falling from the sky shattered what little calm remained on the sea. Huge explosions threw up waterspouts dozens of stories high, and even the fog hanging over the water was ripped apart by the shockwaves, torn into countless pale, swirling currents.

Not a single shell from beyond the fog landed near the Sea Mist, and the Sea Mist's first salvo was the same.

"It's the Knight. Watch its broadside quick-firing guns," Tyrian said, opening his eyes. His voice was not loud, but it carried clearly to every sailor. "At this range those quick-firing guns can already do real damage. Increase pressure in the steam core and open the distance."

"Aye! Increase steam core pressure! Open the distance!"

Deep within the Sea Mist, its "heart" let out a low roar. The whole ship began to accelerate and slowly turn. On the nearby sea, great sheets of drift ice also began to surge forth, spreading in all directions like some living thing to shape a battlefield favorable to the Sea Mist.

As the ship began to maneuver, Tyrian suddenly noticed fire flaring outside another porthole at the edge of his sight, along with a distant shadow.

First Mate Aiden shouted at once: "Second vessel sighted! No response on radio, not on the identification list!"

Before Aiden finished speaking, another low rumble came from afar.

"Third vessel! Not on the list!"

"Signal from the Sea Crow! They have already engaged multiple enemies!"

"Message from the Frostholm Navy! Fighting has broken out in the waters near the city-state!"

"First and second main batteries prioritize the Knight. Third main battery and long-range secondaries handle any other enemies that enter range," Tyrian said. His voice did not change at all as more and more enemies appeared on the sea. He simply kept his calm gaze fixed on the silhouette within the fog that was still firing and pushing through the ice toward them. “Do not worry about how many enemies there are. Everything unfamiliar that appears on this sea is an enemy. This is only the beginning.”

First Mate Aiden also shouted: “You heard the captain! Whatever shows up out here, we hit it! Even if these old relics have come back to life, they are still no match for the Sea Mist Fleet. Keep firing!”

With the orders from the bridge, all the Sea Mist’s main and secondary guns began firing salvo after salvo. Blazing fire again and again lit up the dark, chaotic fog.

Amid the thunder of guns, more and more unrecognized ships kept appearing on the wide sea.

Just as Tyrian had said, this was only the beginning.

mirror world Frostholm was rising. The border of the Mortal Realm was blurring in the fog. Things that had once sunk beneath these seas were now entering the Mortal Realm in great numbers as replicas.

And from now on, everything that appeared on this sea would be an enemy.

“Let’s raise hell!” Aiden’s hoarse bellow rang across the bridge. The bald giant wore a grin that was almost feral. Clearly he had not enjoyed a fight this fierce in a very long time. “Let out fifty years of pent-up fire, brothers! Show those navy weaklings what the Sea Mist Fleet really—”

Suddenly the noisy First Mate’s voice cut off. It was as if an invisible hand had grabbed his throat. Aiden’s eyes flew wide as he stared fixedly in one direction, and a second later, Tyrian knew why he reacted that way.

Another ship’s silhouette suddenly appeared in the nearby fog and then shot straight across the battlefield at almost unbelievable speed. That silhouette was unlike any of the enemies that had appeared so far, unlike any famous vessel Tyrian knew.

It was a mass of solid black mist, a patch of tangible shadows, a hazy, unreal thing that only vaguely took the shape of a ship. It burst out of the fog like some eerie shadow cast backward out of a mirror, howling as it rushed straight toward them. Yet more than the strange shape of this “shadow ship”, what truly struck the Sea Mist’s crew into instant silence was the “shadow” reflected on the sea beneath it.

It was clearly another ship, one wreathed in eerie green flame, a “ghost ship” that looked even more uncanny and terrifying than a mirage to everyone in the Sea Mist Fleet.

This twin ship, using the sea as a mirror, burst out just like that and howled across the water. One hull raced above the waves trailing billowing black smoke, while the other rushed below the surface streaming pale green flame. It almost scraped along the Sea Mist’s side as it sped past and, in the blink of an eye, had already reached the far side of the battlefield.

Tyrian could have sworn to his Father that he had never in his life seen a large ship move at such outrageous speed.

Chapter 409: Twins

Amid the roar of gunfire, that strange twin ghost ship had cut straight across the fight and thundered past right under the eyes of both sides. Forget the crew of the Sea Mist—Tyrian even felt that the replica warships deep in the fog had all frozen in place for a few seconds.

Then he heard Aiden's voice beside him: "C-captain, that thing that just rushed past seemed to come out of the fog too. Do we… shoot it?"

On the bridge, every pair of eyes turned toward their captain, because the words he had just spoken still rang in all their minds:

Once the battle began, everything new that appeared in this sea would be an enemy.

"…Shoot my ass!" After a few painfully awkward seconds of silence, Tyrian finally glared and snapped, "Can you even catch up to it?! And did you not see that ship's reflection in the sea?"

Aiden shrank his neck at once, a strip of light flashing across his bare scalp. He spoke in a hesitant voice: "I saw it. That reflection… it looked wrapped in spirit flame."

As soon as the First Mate finished speaking, a low rumble came from deep within the Sea Mist's hull, and the whistle above the deck suddenly blared. This former Vanished Fleet flagship, reshaped by supernatural powers, seemed to be responding on its own, confirming the First Mate's judgment.

“Even the ship felt it,” Aiden said, looking around and then turning a complicated gaze to Tyrian. “Captain, what do you think that ship was?”

