Lucretia thought for a moment, and a bold idea popped into her mind: “Then if the Vanished moves away from Lightwind Harbor now, will that temporarily hold back the spread of the Nameless One’s dream?”

“The Vanished is already moving away.”

In the captain’s cabin of the Vanished, Duncan turned his head and looked out the window.

Chaotic, dim clouds covered the sky. The black sea rose and fell silently in the distance. Mist lay over everything. The world held only black and white. Countless twisted, bizarre, half-real shadows flickered in and out within the fog far away, always keeping their distance.

“The Vanished is sailing at full speed in the depths of the Spirit Realm, heading north away from Lightwind Harbor,” Duncan said. “Next I will run a series of tests. They will include moving the Vanished to different places, sinking deeper into the Spirit Realm, and turning the whole ship into spirit form, to see what effect these changes have on the Nameless One’s dream.”

As he spoke, Duncan pulled his gaze back from the window and looked at the mirror beside him.

“But I doubt such actions can stop the Nameless One’s dream from growing. From the messages coming from the city-states so far, this ‘dream’ ignores the barriers of space and acts directly on every Elf. The Sun’s extinction and the Vanished’s activity are only the first ‘triggers,’ not the power that keeps the dream going. What truly sustains this dream is the Elf race itself.

“Still, I will try a few things with Goathead, to see whether changes to him can affect the Nameless One’s dream. Many clues now point in that direction. My current First Mate is that ancient creation deity from Elf legend.”

Lucretia looked surprised in the mirror: “But did you not say that the Goathead on the reflected Vanished told you Saslokar died a long time ago?”

“Is a deity’s ‘life’ and ‘death’ really that simple?” Duncan shook his head slightly. “Even if we do not talk about deities, on the Vanished alone I am not short of people who have ‘died before.’”

Lucretia opened her mouth, but found she had no good way to comment on Father’s followers. In the end she could only change the subject a bit stiffly: “Then what about Lightwind Harbor…”

“My true body will move away from the city for now with the Vanished,” Duncan said. “That is necessary for the tests I have planned. But Vanna and Morris will stay in the city. They will keep watching the Nameless One’s dream. For the time being, I cannot come back easily, but my power can still pass into the city through mirrors. If you run into trouble, you can call me at any time.”

Lucretia nodded. After a few seconds of silence, she spoke again with some hesitation: “When you are far away, you have to use your own avatar form to set up a beacon so that AI can use teleportation, right?”

Duncan glanced at Lucretia in the mirror and nodded: “…Yes. Is there a problem?”

“This… seems a bit inconvenient,” Lucretia said carefully. “When the Vanished was near Lightwind Harbor, you and your followers could travel between the city and the ship at any time. Now that you have to move away from the city, you can only send power through mirrors. Have you ever thought about… stationing an avatar form in Lightwind Harbor?”

Duncan stayed silent for two or three seconds, then shook his head with a serious face: “I do not plan to—for now. You know what my avatar forms need as ‘raw material.’ Unless I happen to run into a fitting situation, I do not intend to create another avatar form.”

Though her suggestion had been refused, Lucretia seemed to relax in the mirror: “All right, Dad.”

Chapter 604: Duncan’s Way of Solving the Problem

The image in the mirror slowly faded, but Duncan still stood in front of it and stayed deep in thought for a long time.

He had never hidden his situation with his avatar form from Lucretia, nor had he concealed the powers linked to those avatar forms. His messenger Ai could move quickly between the beacons formed by his avatar forms, and his power and main consciousness could switch between avatar forms in an instant. This ability was powerful and convenient, but in Lightwind Harbor he had not arranged any such avatar form.

One reason, of course, was that he really had not found a “suitable” vessel. But he had not told anyone the more important reason.

He looked at the mirror in front of him and studied the face he now wore.

He did not know when it had begun, but he had already become completely used to this face that had once been so strange, this powerful body, this stern and gloomy look. It had become the “name” under which he lived in this world.

A soul named Zhou Ming occupied this shell, just as it occupied the other two bodies in Pland and Frostholm. As time passed, he had adapted to all of them, and adapted very well.

He also believed that even if he gained new long-term avatar forms, he would quickly adapt. Whether there was one, ten, or even more, he could adapt.

He found that his mind was far tougher and more… strange than he had imagined. Holding several identities and several lives at the same time did not put much burden on him. The split personality and mental problems he had once worried about had never appeared.

But he still, without thinking, held back the urge to create new avatar forms and suppressed the idea of finding a corpse in Lightwind Harbor to serve as a beacon.

What Duncan worried about was not losing himself because he had too many avatar forms. He knew that the leftover feelings and memories he picked up when he occupied these bodies had only the tiniest influence on him. Those weak wills could not shake his mind in the slightest.

He worried about something else.

If he slowly turned “occupying corpses” into a habit and treated holding many fates in his hands as just a casual “way to get things done”, then someday something worse than “losing himself” might happen. After he had occupied dozens or even hundreds of living lives, would he still handle the “aftermath” of those avatar forms as carefully as he did now?

By then, there might be another Nina, but he would no longer be a responsible Uncle Duncan.

Humanity slipped away without people noticing.

So after he realized this, he decided he must treat the matter of adding new avatar forms with extra care from now on, unless the situation was truly suitable or absolutely necessary.

Of course, temporarily occupying some cultists’ bodies for investigation did not count in this caution. Those were single-use, “daily-disposable” consumables.

A thin layer of black smoke quietly rose in the mirror, and Agatha's figure appeared deep inside the smoke.

Seeing the captain looking into the mirror, Agatha quickly shrank back, pulling her image into one corner of the mirror. Then she looked at Duncan and asked: "Are you still thinking about that 'suggestion' Miss Lucretia just gave you?"

"…Maybe she still has some doubts about me," Duncan sighed softly. "There was a bit of testing in her suggestion. But that is not what I am thinking about now."

Agatha nodded and did not keep asking. She changed the topic instead: "What plans do we have next?"

"It is very simple. The Vanished will keep sailing north on this side until we pass the northern channel of Lightwind Harbor. We will see whether the dream of the Nameless One still appears when we open such a long distance, and see whether that reflected Vanished still shows up in Atlantis's dream. Vanna and the others will keep acting according to the earlier plan. Right now, the most important thing to watch is Rabby. That rabbit is hiding on the ship of the Annihilators, and those cultists will hold a gathering before nightfall today. I am very curious… what they plan to do at that gathering."

As he spoke, Duncan let out a soft breath, and there was a hint of expectation in his expression: "Next, we just wait for more news from Lucretia."

Agatha listened in silence. When the captain finished, she finally could not hold back and raised a question she had been curious about for a long time: "Then if the dream of the Nameless One really appears again without being affected, how will you go to that 'reflected Vanished' sailing in the dark fog? Your true body is staying on the ship right now, and that ‘vine’ will only appear in Lightwind Harbor…”

Duncan smiled as he looked at Agatha in the corner of the mirror: “Do you remember? Last time, the dream of the Nameless One ended early exactly because I touched the vine from the mortal realm and entered that dark space. I took the helm of the reflected Vanished as an ‘outsider’. After I came back to the mortal realm, I told you I had an idea to solve this problem.”

Agatha frowned in confusion and said: “The idea you mentioned…”

Duncan kept smiling and turned his head to look at the view outside the window. In the mirror in front of him, he slowly lowered his head and looked at Agatha, who shared the same mirror surface with him.

The Duncan in the mirror bent down and tapped the now shrunken image of Agatha, who was only about the size of a palm: “This is my idea.”

Agatha froze for a moment. In the mirror world, she lifted her head and saw that the captain had also entered the mirror world. After staring blankly for two or three seconds, she finally let out a soft cry – and then shattered across the floor.

The Duncan inside the mirror sighed helplessly, bent down, and picked up Agatha piece by piece. As he put her back together, he muttered: “You should try to use more flexible thinking when facing life on this ship. When it comes to adaptability, you should learn more from Morris or Vanna – the former can even accept Shirley’s homework notebook now…”

…

Lucretia sat in front of the mirror, spacing out for a while. She did not know how much time had passed before she heard Rabby the rabbit’s voice coming from the nearby scrying crystal: “Mistress, are you worried that Old Master is angry with you?”

Lucretia turned her head: “Why do you say that?”

“Because the suggestion you made at the end sounded like you were testing Old Master, testing whether he still keeps a normal person’s understanding and ‘humanity’. Old Master might care about that…”

“I did not mean to test Father. I just… did not think that much,” Lucretia said casually. Then she frowned and looked at the faint image in the scrying crystal. “But you, you even had the free time to listen in on my conversation with Father – you sound very free.”

“Rabby is easing stress, Rabby is in danger~~ Rabby must finish the task Mistress gave in the best state~~~” The sharp and annoying tone of the stuffed rabbit doll came at once from the scrying crystal. “There are only scary cultists here. They are stupid and ugly. Rabby has to talk with Mistress to keep the right state, to avoid~ eating them~~ all up~~~”

Lucretia ignored the ridiculous, eerie parts of Rabby’s chatter and said with a blank face: “Whatever. I don’t care how you plan to finish the task. If that ‘Saint’ really finds you, don’t expect me to come save you.”

“But Mistress will surely come. Rabby knows~~ you will find Rabby again in the spirit realm, then sew Rabby into a new little doll~~ can it be a little bear next time?”

“You talk too much.” Lucretia casually tapped the scrying crystal.

The rabbit finally quieted down.

…

The massive Visions 001 was slowly sinking. sunlight turned into brilliant evening glow across the waves. The light coming in through the window seemed gentle. After a whole day of rest, the Death-Omen Bird's condition had finally improved a lot.

The time for the gathering was almost here. He could already hear footsteps now and then outside the cabin, and the sound of comrades greeting one another.

The tall, thin man with a harsh face got up from the bed and listened to the sounds outside.

He had spent almost the whole day lying on this bed to adjust his own state and the Death-Omen Bird's state. Now he had had enough of lying there.

The Annihilator named Richard let out a long breath, walked to the wardrobe in the corner, and took out the black hooded robe he needed to wear to the gathering.

He did not actually like this kind of robe. Most dark cultists were used to this outfit and believed that clothes that covered the whole body helped settle the mind and helped them draw closer to the Lord's enlightenment in meditation, but he had never thought so.

This kind of robe was not comfortable to wear, and it was not fit for moving around in the city-states at all. It had an old, stubborn feel. Wearing it made a person feel like one of those exiled prisoners from hundreds of years ago, hiding in holes in the ground and slowly rotting. Its "settling the mind" effect was even more laughable.

How could a truly devout follower need a robe to focus his mind and draw closer to the Holy Lord?

But now, Richard found that he had started to like this outfit.

It did not feel so bad to hide his whole body among his comrades.

He put the robe on and pulled the hood down as far as it would go until it covered his eyes. As a feeling of ease rose in his heart, he sighed softly, then walked to the door.

Before he opened the cabin door, a sudden breeze blew through the room. It felt as if a light body had leaped and pounced over. Richard felt a slight weight on himself, as if something had hung onto his shoulder.

A light voice spoke by his ear: “You took Rabby’s cotton… Now, let us set out.”

“All right, let us set out.”

Richard muttered softly. As his vocal cords and windpipe vibrated, he seemed to feel something in his chest itching, warm and soft…

It was only cotton.

The cotton was growing.

He smiled with relief and reached out to open the door.

Figures wearing the same black hooded robes were walking along the corridor, heading to the gathering hall deep in the ship. They spoke in low voices about the dream of the Nameless One, the Saint, allies, and news about the Ender.

Then Richard and Rabby set out.

Chapter 605: The Gathering

To go from the cabin to the gathering hall, one had to walk down a long corridor and a sloping staircase. It was a very large ship. It could not only hold many cultists but also provide space for all kinds of rituals and ceremonies. To the Annihilators who followed the Abyssal Lord, being allowed to board this ship was itself an honor.

Most cultists did not have this right. They were not allowed to board the ship, and they were not even allowed to know of the ship's existence. They could only hear secret rumors during private meetings with other comrades and hear a few words about this ship coming from other gathering sites:

There is a ship. It carries the Holy Lord's will and lets the Lord's glory patrol the seas. It is a symbol of the sect's lofty work and also the key that will open the next age full of glory…

Wrapped in his black robe, Richard walked slowly along the corridor that seemed to have no end. From time to time he met other black-robed church comrades. Sometimes someone greeted him, but he only gave the smallest response. There were also seafarers in rough cloth smocks walking in the corridor. Symbolic chains hung on their necks. They bowed respectfully and carefully to every black-robed person who passed. These seafarers were also believers of the Holy Lord, but their talent was average. They could not yet bear the power of demons, so they could only handle worldly work here and serve those "priests" who had truly gained power.

The lights in the corridor were not truly dim, but the dark colors and heavy style of the decoration still gave everything an overall gloomy look. On the gray-white walls on both sides were iron-black candleholders carved with complex patterns. Between these decorative candleholders hung classical-style oil paintings. The paintings used large dark areas to outline landscapes unlike the mortal realm and portraits of twisted, strange faces. Dark red drapes hung down from the ceiling on both sides, covering even darker and more ominous corners.

The followers of the Abyssal Deep believed that chaotic darkness was the Holy Lord's "color" and the "base color" of this world's birth. They used this style to decorate their gathering places to try to "draw closer" to the Abyssal Deep Sea, while still in the mortal realm. They believed this could please the Holy Lord.

The dark and heavy style could not hide how rich and well made these decorations really were. Richard knew that building this ship had cost a huge amount of wealth. But there were always people to pay that cost – officials who wished to extend their lives, merchants tormented by illness, nobles tempted by power. Their offerings, when they begged the Holy Lord for mercy, had built everything on this ship.

The Four Gods Church and the various city-state authorities had built a strong set of rules for the so-called "civilized world". These rules were like an iron wall that protected those dull, mediocre ordinary people very well. But no matter how tight the iron wall was, it still had gaps. It had had them in the past thousands of years, it had them now, and it would have them in the future.

The gathering hall was here.

A heavy door stood open at the end of the corridor. Behind it was a very wide and bright hall. A tall dome, held up by thick pillars, rose overhead. Splendid chandeliers with three tiers hung down from the ceiling, and their light filled the whole space.

For practical reasons, this hall could not be kept as dark as other places. So the builders could only show their worship of the Abyssal Lord through various decorations and furnishings instead. The tentacle-like reliefs on the surfaces of the huge pillars, the dark-branch-like paintings on the far wall that stood for the Abyssal Lord, and the many strange-shaped sculptures arranged along the walls all worked together to draw a mysterious, oppressive yet solemn “worship” atmosphere.

Richard walked into the hall and stepped among his comrades. He pulled the edge of his hood down again. Then his gaze moved up to the high platform in the center of the hall.

That was where the Saint stood.

The Saint was already there.

That awe-inspiring devotee, the pure one who was closest to the “Lord” in this suffocating world, the comrade who had gone farthest on the path of the Abyssal Deep, was lifting his eye stalks from the edge of the platform and sweeping his gaze over the cultists gathered in the room.

He took up almost half of the whole platform. His huge body looked like a “crown” woven from thorns. Fearsome black bones crisscrossed and piled up like a bird’s nest on the platform. In the middle of the bones was a huge brain, almost two meters across, slowly squirming. Outside the brain, the bones formed a cage-like structure. Nerve cords stretched out from the gaps of this cage. Their ends formed eye stalks that moved slowly around the outer edge of this “bone thorn crown”, looking around. At the very top of this “crown” hung a pitch-black chain.

That pitch-black chain stretched out from the brain inside the bone cage, floated in the dust-filled air, then returned to the thorn-like bones, forming a closed ring. This form was the sign of the Saint. He had already stepped past the lower stage of a mortal making a symbiotic pact with demons. Now his pact pointed toward himself. Little of his human nature was left. His awe-inspiring form was filled with the pure nature of Abyssal demons.

Richard looked up at the Saint once, then lowered his head in awe.

The Saint was close to stepping over the last step. Only a tiny distance remained before his chain could vanish and he could reach the highest goal of all Annihilators – gain complete purity, enter the Abyssal Deep Sea, and be with the Holy Lord.

But this great comrade still stayed here, stayed in this suffocating mortal realm. He still remembered his duty: to lead the many comrades as dull as himself to carry out that eternal work. Without a doubt, this was worthy of respect.

“Everyone has gathered.”

A deep, old voice suddenly sounded in everyone’s mind. The faint buzz of talk in the hall stopped at once. A serious air covered everything.

On the high platform, the Saint raised one eye stalk and looked toward the hall entrance. The heavy door creaked shut and locked. His voice kept sounding in each person’s mind:

“The Sun is about to set. Three hours from now, the dream of the Nameless One will open again. Before this dream opens, we must confirm the information we already know…”

Richard tensed up without thinking and, with serious focus, entered the Listening rite to the Saint’s voice.

That feeling of heat and itch came again – from his chest. It was as if something under the skin there was gently wriggling, as if fine fibers were clinging and growing between his flesh and bones, slowly spreading.

He even felt those fine fibers spreading onto his lungs and his heart, then boring on into the depths of his body.

Maybe it would not take long before he had enough cotton?

At some point, the weight on his shoulder grew lighter again. In a daze, Richard heard a little girl's voice softly laughing by his ear. But soon the Saint's voice sounded in his mind once more, making his thoughts focus again –

"…We have already carried out several explorations into the dream of the Nameless One. These included small infiltrations by comrades scattered through the city-states, and exploration missions organized by the upper priests. Comrades, you should already have heard the news. In some of these actions… we met setbacks."

As the Saint on the high platform spoke, the "thorn crown" woven of bones gave off faint cracking sounds. Some of his black bones moved. A faint glow gathered along the edges of the bone spikes and slowly flowed into the air, forming a scene that grew more and more clear.

The image formed by the gathered glow finally became clear. It showed a girl in a black dress with short black hair and a decorative bell hanging from her neck. Her body looked somewhat thin, and her face looked a bit delicate and gentle.

The girl looked about fifteen or sixteen. Maybe because she was so thin, her appearance might have been younger than her real age. But one of her arms, together with much of her shoulder and part of her torso, clearly showed a non-human state. At the end of that jagged, fearsome bone structure, a pitch-black chain stretched out. The other end of the chain led to something the Annihilators present knew all too well – a Abyssal Hound.

There was a slight stir among the cultists in the hall. Some whispered about something. Others, who already knew the details, all turned their eyes in the same direction.

Richard felt those gazes fall on him.

He tugged awkwardly at his hood. Inside, pride at having brought back important information tangled with embarrassment and unease.

Luckily, the Saint's voice ended his awkwardness in time –

"…After suffering some losses, one of our comrades finally brought back useful information. What you see here is one of our enemies.

"Do not be fooled by her appearance, believers. She is not our comrade but a being even more fallen and forbidden than a heretic cultist. She controls a powerful Abyssal Hound by unknown means. More dangerous still, her own power seems even stronger than that Abyssal Hound – her methods are cruel, and the way she acts is strange and unpredictable.

"The comrade who brought back this information is one of our outstanding members. He has rich battle experience and no small strength. Even so, he was badly hurt by the enemy's despicable ambush and almost eaten by that strange Abyssal Hound under her command… You must stay alert, because in later actions, comrades who enter the dream of the Nameless One may meet this dangerous blasphemer again.

"What you most need to guard against is this heretic's strange and vicious way of attack. Her way of attacking is…"

The Saint suddenly stopped.

It seemed that even a pure being this strong and wise would run short of words when he tried to describe that female heretic's power.

Richard pulled at his hood again. After he went back, he really should reinforce the hood a little.

Then, in his mind, he heard the Saint’s voice sound again:

“…Her way of attacking is to throw the dog.”

Chapter 606: Bewitchment

Richard believed that, at least for this one second, half the people in the assembly hall were just like he had once been. Their minds had not caught up.

And the other half had already more or less heard about this matter.

The skeletal “crown” on the high platform clicked again. The brain trapped inside the crown-like cage swelled and wriggled, and once more cast its thoughts into the mind of every cultist present:

“Yes, she really did use brute force to wield a Abyssal Hound as a weapon. The act was beyond belief, so absurd it sounded almost comical. But do not look down on her, do not be careless. That strength was far beyond what you can imagine—and she has even more uncanny traits.

“In our most recent operation, this heretic also appeared. She directly caused our ‘allies’ to suffer heavy damage. Current clues show that this heretic could resist the mental power of the Sun’s Remnant Folk. Her inner nature has very likely already shifted away from humans, or she has offered her soul to a higher supernatural being—

“She summoned a kind of emerald flame and used it to burn our allies to death. Those flames were extremely dangerous. The same fire has appeared before in Pland and Frostholm. Our current intelligence shows that this dangerous flame came from that terrifying ghost ship.

“She is a follower of that ghost ship’s captain.”

The Saint stopped. He did not directly mention the name of that ghost ship or its captain, but as soon as his words fell, a slight disturbance ran through the entire hall. The cultists of Oblivion whispered to each other. In their cautious, suppressed quick exchanges, a string of vague code names was brought up with care, and a formless tension spread through the gathering.

Richard, however, let out a breath. At least this time, most people's attention finally shifted in another direction.

After a brief pause, the Saint spoke again from the high platform: "Everyone here knows what happened in Frostholm. We suffered a major setback there. Another Saint died a martyr in the flames, and even now we cannot confirm the full picture of that failure. 'His' power almost erased everything related to the Holy Lord in the entire Frostholm sea region, including our Church brethren and the holy source in the Deep Sea.

"In Pland, the same 'erasure' also took place. The flames burned everything, including the Sun Spawn and the 'Remnant Folk'. All beings related to the incident could not escape 'His' reckoning. The entire city-state was sealed off and then purged. Information was cut off. Everyone who knew the truth vanished under the grinding misalignment of history, and then the Church of the Deep Sea false god took over everything…

"After such a thorough 'cleansing', not much information could leak out. We spent a long time investigating the truth of what happened back then, and in the end we could only confirm that it was that ship and its Master who acted… that Shadow who returned from Subspace now stands on the opposite side from us.

"And now we can be sure that 'He' has taken action once more. His followers directly caused the major losses in our recent operations.

"And He does not have only one follower."

The hall had gone completely quiet. A strange tension hung over everyone's head. The Saint moved the black bones under his body. Under his control, the light-and-shadow illusion floating in the air began to change. The girl in the black dress changed into another person—the famous "sea witch", Lucretia Abnomar.

"The heretic you saw just now has great power and a strange, vicious way of acting. But she is only one of that ghost ship captain's followers, and by no means the strongest one. Current evidence shows that the 'sea witch' has also once again begun to obey her father…"

A buzzing disturbance rose in the hall. The cultists bent close, whispering about the recent rumors spreading inside the sect. On the high platform, the Saint fell silent. He only slowly swayed those long eyestalks, letting his gaze sweep over the followers in the hall.

After who knew how long, a voice finally broke the silence. It came from near the platform, a voice that sounded a bit hoarse: "Saint, we received news not long ago that that fleet has been rebuilt. It seems…"

"It seems the news is true," the Saint's voice rang out in everyone's mind. "Most likely, more 'followers' will appear in that dream next. For now, though, only these two you have seen have clear information attached to them."

The illusion in the air shifted. The "sea witch" and the black-skirted girl took turns appearing in the projection.

"Lucretia, a witch, has mastered many kinds of sorcery and the power of the curse. She is very learned in the supernatural field. She has a powerful servant force and a ghost ship just as powerful. The Nameless One's dream can weaken her strength to some degree, and she should not be able to bring that ghost ship and her army of servants into the dream. But even if you face only her alone, you must stay on the highest alert.

“The female heretic who calls herself ‘Sarah’ very likely uses a false name. Her appearance looks very young, but that appearance may also be false. She has monstrous strength and is an abnormal contractor of demons. We can confirm that she is at least immune to the mental corruption from the Sun’s Remnant Folk. Besides the information I just mentioned, there is another extremely anomalous trait on this heretic. That is the main point I will speak of next—

“The Abyssal Hound traveling with her possesses reason and the ability to communicate.”

At once, commotion rose in the hall again. This time the voices of discussion came from all directions, even more and wider than before.

A Abyssal demon with reason?!

If these words had not come from the Saint’s mouth, the first reaction of the Annihilators on site would probably have been—where did this mad talk come from?!

Richard stood silently among his brethren. He had already expected this reaction.

If Richard had not personally experienced that unbelievable scene, he would never have believed that a Abyssal Hound could speak human words and could calmly talk with him—though that exchange had not been pleasant.

“Saint, are you telling the truth?” A cultist could not help looking toward the platform and asked, summoning his courage. “A Abyssal demon with reason?”

“It is hard to believe, but the evidence is solid.” The pile of bones on the platform slowly writhed. At some point, a faint glow had risen on the surface of the brain wrapped inside the bone cage. It seemed to be some kind of emotional reaction. “So we must pay more attention to this special Abyssal Hound and its contractor.”

The Saint raised his eyestalks one by one. Without anyone noticing, a bright, rousing strength had entered his tone.

“That ghost ship captain’s interference is a challenge for us. I will not hide this danger from my own brethren. But our cause was destined to be full of danger from the first day. We cannot retreat and we will not choose to retreat. Our actions in the Nameless One’s dream will go on, so sooner or later we will deal with ‘His’ followers again.

“These followers are strong, but far weaker than their Master, and they are few in number. If we are well prepared, these ‘followers’ are not invincible.

“And now we can confirm that at least one ‘follower’ carries an extremely important secret. That Abyssal Hound with reason is a mystery we have never seen before on our road to seek the Truth. Perhaps the last piece of the Path of Ascension is hidden on it.

“Find that heretic who calls herself ‘Sarah’. At any cost, capture her and her demons. Comrades, the task is hard and full of danger, but believe me, it is worth your effort. The road that leads to Pure Ascension has finally shown its true form to us. These difficult trials are the proof that this road is the right one.

“Comrades, do not worry. We do not need to face that captain head-on. We only need to find his followers. That is possible… And when our cause is finally complete, when the change of eras ends, even that ghost ship captain will no longer be a threat to us. He will become a mere phantom, left behind in the final second of this Deep Sea era…”

The Saint’s voice echoed directly in the depths of every mind. On the high platform, the throne woven from black bones clicked and clacked. The thorn-like bone spurs and shell-like structures bumped against each other like drumbeats. On the surface of the living brain, layers of hazy light curtains rippled. Along with the bewitching words, the power released from the brain stirred the spirit of everyone in the hall and slowly planted a seed of fanaticism in their hearts—

This seed took root and sprouted. It quickly pushed back the fear and tension that had risen earlier at the mention of that ghost ship and that ghost ship captain. It even turned that fear and tension into some kind of baseless drive, into firm faith and a sense of mission.

Richard lifted his head in a daze and, without thinking, let his eyes follow the Saint's eyestalks as they waved in the air. He also felt the restless heat and impulse thumping in his chest. He felt his own faith grow steadier bit by bit. The fear that had taken root in his heart after seeing those ghostly green flames earlier faded away without him noticing…

Yet at that moment, a soft voice slipped into his ear. It felt as if the voice's master were leaning on his shoulder, whispering right into his ear and drilling the sound straight into his brain: "Ah, he is talking you all into dying… Rabby really feels sorry for you…"

Richard jolted and "woke up" all at once. For an extremely brief moment, he suddenly felt a chill. He felt as if something were spreading along his chest and up his neck toward his brain. He felt that he had just heard a suspicious whisper, and that whisper came from something very dangerous…

But he only blinked, and the warning in his heart scattered like smoke.

He only looked around in some confusion, then raised his head to look at the Saint on the platform.

Why were the brethren around him so excited, so free of fear?

What the Saint had said was in fact true, and his encouragement made sense. But what about the danger in their actions? Had everyone chosen to ignore it?

Richard frowned. He kept feeling that something was wrong. This hazy feeling made him think he was falling into a strange dream. He was clearly awake, yet it always felt as if a lump of chaos and confusion blocked his thoughts, as if… his head had been stuffed with cotton.

But soon he forgot this doubt again, and the new change in the hall drew his attention away.

A sudden wave of “heat” swept across the assembly hall.

Chapter 607: Dark Allies and the Dream-Skull

A sudden wave of heat swept across the hall, as if a beam of strong sunlight had pierced the roof and was moving over the crowd. Yet as this invisible heat appeared, all the gas lamps and candelabras in the hall seemed to suffer some unknown interference and suppression. Instead, they dimmed quickly, as if sinking into shadows.

However, the Annihilators in the hall did not react much to this heat. After a slight stir, they all raised their heads to look at the dome above the hall.

Richard also raised his head. His gaze swept past the gorgeous drapes, chandeliers, and painted ceiling above the hall. They seemed to be lit by invisible sunlight. Patches of light and shadow moved slowly across the surface of the dome. Then that “sunlight” gradually gathered at the center of the dome and finally showed its source there—

It was a sphere. It looked like a blazing Sun, its surface rippling with flames and shedding dazzling light and heat. At the same time, it looked unreal and transparent, as if it were only a projection. Then this small Sun projection slowly lowered in height, all the way down to the front of the high platform in the center of the hall, to stand before the Saint.

Richard heard low voices of talk and muttering nearby. Some cultists quietly voiced their displeasure—the Outer Gods’ envoy had become more and more arrogant, even skipping the usual announcement when coming to this holy gathering place. Some cultists said that the hall should never have been opened to the Outer Gods' envoys at all. Their mere appearance meant a stain on this holy place.

But the Saint's voice suddenly rang out in every mind and ear, cutting off the low buzzing in the hall: "Ah, our 'ally' has arrived."

As his words fell, the small Sun projection that had dropped in front of the platform slowly shed its outer shell of light and heat. That shell, like one cast from light, faded and turned transparent, and what lay within was revealed to every eye.

It was a sphere made from twisted lumps of flesh and countless coiled tentacles piled together. Between the tentacles on its surface were set innumerable eye-like structures—the Sun's Spawn.

The projection slowly stretched its tentacles in the air. One eye after another rolled and turned toward every side. Almost at the same time, another phantom-like figure appeared beneath this Sun Spawn.

It was a human, wearing a black robe with gold trim that marked the priest class among the Suntists. On the face was a Golden Sun Mask shaped after sunlight. This Sun priest's projection fell onto the high platform in the center of the hall, standing before the Saint like a spokesman.

The Sun Spawn in midair let out a deep, muffled vibration. That sound seemed mixed with layers of whispers and noise beyond human understanding. Listening to it made one dizzy.

The figure with the golden Sun mask who stood before the Saint spoke at once, relaying the meaning carried inside those muddled tremors: "I can feel that you do not welcome me."

The Saint raised his eyestalks high. "I hope you can understand. This is the Holy Lord's gathering place. For a long time, we have not allowed the believers or envoys of the Outer Gods to step into such a holy place. But rest assured, our sincerity toward cooperation will not be affected by this."

"It does not matter. I do not care," the Sun Spawn's projection slowly stretched its body in the air and kept making those deep, vague tremors. The Sun priest who appeared with it began translating at once. "We can leave our differences in faith to the next era. dusk is drawing near. We, the races abandoned by the Deep Sea era, must first learn to live together."

"Yes, learn to coexist. When all things are remade, the world will be wide enough to hold our differences," the Saint said in a deep voice. "Is that why you came here, to stress this to me?"

"No, ally. I came to talk with you about the losses we suffered in our last operation," said the masked Sun priest. "I wanted to come to you in the daytime, but that hateful False Sun stayed high in the sky. Now that it has gone down, I have come.

"We lost many of our people, precious people, in that great forest woven by the 'Nameless One's dream'. They were burned by the flames of the Flame Usurper bearer. Even their souls did not return to the sheltering place—I must speak with you about this."

"We also feel deep sympathy and unease over the misfortune of those Sun Remnant Folk," the Saint said. His bone spurs clacked, as if showing some dissatisfaction. "But you were not the only ones whose actions suffered setbacks… No one expected 'His' power to appear there. After all, not long ago that ship was still in the far north. No one thought 'He' would intervene in this matter. His followers had already begun to move. For you to come and accuse us over this is unreasonable and rash, and rude."

"…We do not seek to lay blame on an ally." The Sun Spawn in midair stayed silent for a few seconds. The light around it seemed to draw back a little. It murmured in a muffled way, and the priest on the platform translated at once. “But we must state our position. We are willing to cooperate with your actions in the Nameless One’s dream. Yet if you turn this ‘cooperation’ into one-sided exploitation, then our partnership will end.”

“I understand you, envoy,” the Saint said in a deep voice. “Do not worry. We will not turn a blind eye to this incident. Just now, we already decided to strike back at the followers of the Flame Usurper bearer. One of our next goals is to find the heretic who attacked the Sun Remnant Folk and our brethren, and to seize her and her demons. She is strong and insidious, but we are ready to take some risk to avenge those fallen Remnant Folk.”

“We do not care whether you truly act to avenge them, nor what methods you plan to use against those strong and strange ‘followers of the Flame Usurper’,” the priest wearing the Golden Sun Mask on the platform relayed the Sun Spawn’s words. “Do not forget our first and most basic goal. In the Nameless One’s dream there are things we each need. Work together honestly and cooperate fully. We care only about this. Nothing else matters.”

The Saint stayed silent for a moment. Then his bone spurs clicked, showing a friendly attitude. “Yes, we will each take what we need… We only want that tree.”

The Sun Spawn slowly lowered its height. The countless eyes set between its tentacles fixed their gaze quietly on the brain wrapped inside the bone cage on the platform. “We only want that Sun.”

The unreal-seeming “heat” that covered the assembly hall began to fade. The Sun Spawn floating in midair and the Sun priest standing on the platform both started to dim and dissolve. In just a few seconds, these two uninvited guests left the holy hall.

The hall stayed quiet for a while. Then the gathered Annihilators all let out their breaths. Richard also felt his pounding heart slowly calm down. Perhaps his heart had sped up without him noticing just now, because he even felt a faint ache in his chest.

He was still shaken.

Even though what had come here was only a projection, it was still a projection of the Sun Spawn—that monster split directly from the essence of the "true Sun god", like a demigod. Its very existence was a deadly source of corruption for mortals. The brethren in this hall… in the end, they still had not stepped beyond the mortal realm.

Perhaps only the "Saint" present here could stand against that so-called "Sun Spawn".

"We should never have opened this place to the envoys of the Outer Gods," someone in the crowd said, not in a very low voice. "Once their 'sunlight' shines in here, they become even more brazen."

"That 'Spawn' felt very bad to me," another voice reached Richard's ears. "We cannot understand its mind or its true intent. Every time we need a masked priest to act as a translator. No one knows how much more disturbing information is still hidden behind those translations. When its eyes look at us… it is nothing like the gaze of one thinking creature toward other thinking creatures."

"Those 'Sun Remnant Folk' give me the same feeling. I cannot sense any reason or emotion from them at all… In the end, they are monsters abandoned in the last era… long since degenerated in the dark…"

The low discussions began to spread through the hall. The feelings that had been held down started to echo with each other quickly. Yet just then, the Saint’s voice suddenly sounded in every head, cutting off the Annihilators’ talk at once: “Silence.”

The hall fell silent at once.

“…I know what you worry about,” the Saint’s voice went on, carrying a soothing power. “But we need their strength.”

“Saint,” a nearby Annihilator closest to the platform called out, gathering his courage, “that Sun Spawn and those ‘Remnant Folk’… do you think they will really keep their promises?”

The Saint stayed silent for a few seconds.

“I have never believed those aberrations’ ‘promises’, because they were born in broken oaths from the very start. But at least before they get what they want, they have no reason to break the pact,” he said slowly. “Just as we need them, they also need us. In the time and space woven by the Nameless One’s dream, those aberrations can only ally with us.”

The questioning voices vanished.

Then the chimes that marked the hour rang at just the right moment.

Clang—clang—clang—

The mechanical clock hanging on the tall wall at the far end of the hall rang out with a long, clear tone.

“…Let us end these topics. The time is near. The Nameless One’s dream is about to link to the Mortal Realm,” the Saint’s voice quickly drew everyone’s attention. “Prepare for Dreamwalking. Those who will Dreamwalk tonight, step out and come forward. Get ready to touch the Dream-Skull.”

Richard, standing among a group of black-robed people, reacted at once. He raised his head and saw several other brethren already walking toward the platform, including Dumont, who had come to find him during the day.

He hurried forward as well.

At the same time, several low-ranking cultists in gray robes came into the hall. They pushed a cart cast from a special, heavy alloy, its sides covered with many runes. A black cloth stained with blood lay over the cart, and something seemed to be hidden under the cloth.

“Push the Dream-Skull to the front of the platform,” the Saint ordered.

The low-ranking cultists pushed the cart to the platform in the center of the hall. Two of them took hold of the black cloth on the cart, ready to lift it.

Richard swallowed without thinking. Even though this was not his first time touching the “Dream-Skull”, he still could not help feeling a bit nervous.

That eerie thing made one feel a fear that seeped into the soul every time it was touched, and no matter how many times he went through it, that fear never seemed to become easier to bear.

His firm belief and devout faith could only help him make up his mind to touch that thing. They could not erase the impression left by the fear itself or the instinctive tension he felt now.

Then the two low-ranking cultists lifted the black cloth.

The “Dream-Skull” on the cart also entered Richard’s sight—

It was a black object that looked as if it had been carved from wood… a Goathead.

Chapter 608: Walking with the Reflection

“What did you say? They pushed out a wooden Goathead carving?!”

Duncan’s voice came from the mirror on the dressing table, and he could not hide his shock.

“Yes, a black wooden Goathead,” Lucretia said quickly. She turned her head to glance at the scrying crystal on the table beside her, trying to make out the faint image inside it. The scene came straight from the cultists’ gathering, sent by Rabby. “It looks a lot like the ‘First Mate’ on the Vanished… No, not just similar. It’s exactly the same!”

“What else? After they pushed that Goathead out, what did it do?” In the mirror in front of Lucretia, Duncan’s figure leaned forward slightly. “Is it communicating with those cultists?”

“…No.” Lucretia shook her head as she stared at the blurred image in the scrying crystal. “This Goathead seems ‘dead’… It hasn’t moved at all since they pushed it out. It really looks like just a wooden carving… The cultists are performing a ritual around it. They’re lighting candles and burning incense, and that Goathead they call ‘Dream-Skull’ still isn’t reacting.”

In the mirror, Duncan frowned deeply.

He knew that with Rabby hiding in the cultists’ stronghold, it would bring back a lot of useful information. But he had not expected that rabbit’s report to be this valuable. From the start of the cultists’ gathering until now, he and Lucretia had watched Rabby’s constant messages, and none of them had been as shocking as this scene.

Those Annihilators… actually had a Goathead that was exactly the same as the “First Mate” on the Vanished?!

And from the look of things, that was the reason they could freely enter and leave the Nameless One’s dream?

In the mirror world dimension linked through the mirrors, Duncan stood in the dimness, deep in thought. After a long time, he finally raised his head and let his gaze sweep around him.

This was the world inside the mirror. But according to Agatha, the more accurate description was “the Vanished’s reflection on the border between the Spirit Realm and the Mortal Realm.”

Everywhere he looked, he saw the familiar Vanished. Yet the whole ship was wrapped in a strange, off?kilter air. His gaze passed through the nearby window, and he saw the deck outside shrouded in gloom. The distant sky and sea had a texture close to that of the Spirit Realm. A hazy glow shimmered along the hull. Its outline was disturbed by some unknown force, rising and rippling like a reflection in water.

Behind him was the familiar sight of the captain’s cabin: the enchanted sea chart table, the shelves, the expensive tapestry on the wall, and… Goathead, sitting silently on the edge of the enchanted sea chart table.

All of it lay under a strange darkness. Even with an oil lamp hanging on the wall beside them, even with light shining in every corner of the room, the gloom lingered, branded into the space itself. It refused to fade and constantly reminded anyone who came here that this was not the Mortal Realm.

Only one thing in the room gave off a soft, comforting glow: the Oval Scrying Mirror in front of Duncan. In it, he could see the scene inside Lucretia's room. It reflected the "warmth" of the Mortal Realm.

Duncan turned around and slowly walked to the enchanted sea chart table. He looked at the wooden Goathead lying quietly on the table. It did not react at all to his approach. It was just like… the "Dream-Skull" the cultists were using for their ritual in the hall.

He stared quietly at the dark carving for a moment. Then he reached out and patted Goathead on the head.

If this had been on the other side of the mirror, in the Mortal Realm, that move would have brought a storm of chatter. Goathead would never have let such a chance to talk slip by.

But here, in this "reflection" of the Vanished, Goathead still sat quietly, as if… it had not yet awakened.

Footsteps came from the side. Duncan turned his head and saw Agatha walk up beside him.

"Captain, there are thirty minutes until the Nameless One's dream 'comes alive'," said the lady who "lived" in the mirror world. "From my last experience, when that time comes, the Vanished's reflection will transform into the ship that sails through the dark mist, and this 'wood carving' in front of you will 'come to life' as well."

"…Yes, it will come to life, but it still won't be quite the same as the 'First Mate' I know. That one is another Goathead—and in the hands of those Annihilators, there's yet another," Duncan said slowly, his face thoughtful. "They actually used some Goathead they found from who knows where to enter the Nameless One's dream. It… makes sense, but it was beyond what I expected."

Agatha hesitated, then could not help asking: “Are there many ‘Goatheads’?”

“…I used to think there was only one,” Duncan replied, shaking his head. “It thought so too.”

“I remember you said that the ‘First Mate’ was something you brought out of Subspace. If it came from Subspace… then anything might be possible. Maybe ‘Goathead’ is even a whole race from there…”

Agatha trailed off. Clearly, even she felt that guess was a bit far?fetched.

Duncan did not answer. He just stared at the silent Goathead on the table, which looked like a real wood carving. After thinking for a long time, he murmured under his breath: “Shattered into pieces, huh…”

Agatha heard the captain’s mutter, but was completely confused: “Huh?”

Duncan did not answer her question. He just shook his head slightly: “It looks like we have one more reason to capture those Annihilators alive… This time we not only have to find a way to seize them, we also have to figure out how to take their ship.”

“As long as we know where that ship is, no ordinary vessel can escape the Vanished’s hunt,” Agatha said at once.

Duncan gave the former Gatekeeper a slightly surprised look: “You’re quite confident—you haven’t actually seen the Vanished in battle with your own eyes, have you?”

“But the scriptures of the Death Church are full of terrifying descriptions of the Vanished,” Agatha said, spreading her hands. “They say you once erased a battleship that Pope Banster—His Eminence—had just built, in a single instant… and you did it right in front of a Pilgrimage Ark, in front of an entire fleet. No matter how I think about it, there is no way those cultists built something stronger than a Pilgrimage Ark.”

Duncan’s expression froze for a moment. After two or three seconds of awkward silence, he twitched the corner of his mouth: “I’ll take that as a compliment.”

Agatha seemed to realize how awkward the topic was too. She quickly forced a clumsy change of subject: “Captain, what do you think those cultists are after?”

“Their goal? Do you mean their interest in Shirley and Dog, or their purpose in working with those ‘Suntists’?”

“Both,” Agatha said, nodding.

“Their interest in Shirley and Dog was expected. No Annihilator with a normal mind could see Dog and not be shaken. And judging from that saint’s reaction, the fact that a Abyssal demon can stay sane seems to have some special meaning to them,” Duncan said, recalling the information Rabby had sent. “That saint mentioned ‘the last piece of the puzzle on the Path of Ascension’… That line bothered me.

“As for their ‘cooperation’ with those Suntists…”

Duncan stopped there. He stayed silent for a while, thinking, before he spoke again: “The Annihilators’ goal is the ‘tree’. That is easy enough to understand. It should mean the World Tree Atlantis. And those Suntists are aiming for ‘the Sun’…”

He frowned and lifted his head, as if he were trying to pierce through layers of space and time with his gaze to look at some ‘star’ that hung high above the Nameless One’s dream, existing only in some ancient memory.

“…How are they going to obtain ‘the Sun’?”

The captain’s cabin fell silent. Agatha had no idea how to answer that question. After who knew how long, Lucretia’s voice suddenly came from a nearby mirror and broke the silence:

“Dad, Rabby says those cultists are about to start the last step of the ritual.”

Duncan immediately raised his head and looked at the mechanical clock on the opposite wall.

On its dial, where left and right had swapped like a mirror world, the hands were turning counterclockwise, slowly pointing toward nine o’clock.

The Nameless One’s dream was about to become active.

He withdrew his gaze and glanced again at the enchanted sea chart on the table beside him.

Even in this “reflection” world, the enchanted sea chart here still showed the Vanished’s normal course through the Boundless Sea. Right now, the Vanished was about a thousand nautical miles north of Lightwind Harbor, and it was still sailing north, farther and farther from the city?state.

The “test” was about to reach its conclusion. But Duncan already had a vague feeling that even if the Vanished sailed far from Lightwind Harbor, even if Goathead was taken this far away, the Nameless One’s dream would still appear. Lightwind Harbor would still be wrapped in the dream, and the Vanished’s reflection would still change just as it had before.

Because dusk was drawing near.

Because the Sun was growing gentle, and all that had once been banished would return to the Mortal Realm—just like that “Warrior” who suddenly fell into the Mortal Realm and finally turned into an unspeakable thing. The so?called Nameless One’s dream was only a realm returning to the Mortal Realm from oblivion and exile.

When dusk arrived, all these changes would happen in a way that could not be undone. The Vanished reaching Lightwind Harbor had only sped up the awakening of the Nameless One’s dream.

Just as that “saint” had declared, this so?called “Deep Sea era” was rushing toward its “last second.”

“Lucy, report Rabby’s latest observations,” Duncan said suddenly.

Lucretia’s voice came from the mirror at once: “Yes. The chosen cultists have already gathered around the ‘Dream-Skull’. They’re waiting for the final sacrificial rite…

“That saint is ordering them to bring the ‘blood food’ into the hall.

“…It’s two badly wounded elves.”

Chapter 609: ritual

Today’s blood food was brought into the hall.

Richard stood below the high platform, beside the “Dream-Skull”. He watched as gray?robed congregants pushed two elves forward. Like everyone else, his face stayed calm, but there was a faint hint of expectation in it.

The two elves, one male and one female, wore clothes that were already ragged. Under the torn fabric, their bodies were covered in marks left by many rounds of torment—not only wounds from past sacrificial rites, but also scars from all the “research” and “tests” carried out with the Dream-Skull before.

When they were first brought into the hall, their faces were numb. But when they saw the “saint” and the “Dream-Skull” below the platform, terror still spread from their eyes. They tried to struggle. However, the saint only swayed his eye stalks a little. Under his gaze, the two elves went limp, their whole bodies paralyzed and unable to resist. After that, a gray?robed congregant holding a sharp knife stepped forward.

The ritual dagger had been polished until it shone. Under the cultists’ hidden, devout, eager gazes, the blade cut into the elves’ flesh—the arms, the thighs, the back, all places that would not kill them. It was as if someone had planned to inflict the greatest pain while keeping them alive. The bloodletter cut into the sacrificial victims with skilled, silent strokes.

Yet under the saint’s gaze, the “sacrificial victims” could not even scream or struggle. The man and woman stood stiff as boards as several gray?robed people held them up beside the heavy cart. Only the sudden, twisted contortions on their faces showed the terrible pain they were suffering. Blood poured from their fresh cuts, and as if drawn by an invisible force, it floated up against gravity. Then it all flowed into a series of “blood troughs” built into the upper level of the heavy cart.

The blood flowed along the grooves toward the jet?black Goathead that looked as if it had been carved from wood.

At the moment the blood touched the “Dream-Skull”, a terrible aura and shocking power burst out of Goathead.

The Annihilators closest to it felt the surge at once. Richard felt as if countless layered shrieks and howls drilled straight into his brain. They rushed wildly through his mind as if they meant to tear his soul apart. He saw the jet?black Goathead start to tremble violently and rock from side to side, as if it were about to come to life. A powerful, malicious will, still chaotic and unclear, seemed to wake up inside it. Richard could feel its gaze sweeping across the hall.

The “Dream-Skull” had awakened.

The two elves used as sacrificial victims had already fainted. Gray?robed men acting as “deacons” dragged them aside at once. The gray?robed congregant who held the sharp knife and had carried out the bloodletting himself lifted the ritual dagger high and cried out in wild joy:

“I have been accepted! The Lord will take me in—”

The next second, a terrifying distortion fell on the bloodletter. From beneath his gray robe came the sounds of flesh tearing and bones being ground apart. His clothes bulged as the substance of his entire body was corrupted, twisted, and crushed in an instant. Countless tentacles seemed to sprout from under his robe. His face cracked open in too many places to count, each gap sprouting a writhing tongue. Yet the sharp pain seemed to have nothing to do with him. The fanatic cheered and shouted at the top of his lungs, calling on the holy Lord's name, until his life finally faded and his warped body crashed heavily to the ground.

The bloodletter's "martyrdom" meant the ritual had fully succeeded.

"Take those two 'blood food' down," the saint on the platform ordered at once. "Keep them alive and ready for the next bloodletting.

"Gather the blood flowing out of the troughs and distribute it to the gathering sites in the other city?states. It will be used for their dreamwalking rituals.

"Those who have been chosen, step forward and touch the 'Dream-Skull'. It is time to prove yourselves."

The saint's orders were carried out at once. The two weak elves were dragged out of the hall, leaving two glaring trails of blood on the floor. Other congregants came to the eerie "Goathead" and collected the elves' blood that had touched the Dream-Skull. That blood now held the power to open a dream. It was not as strong as the Dream-Skull itself, but with the help of a ritual it could still guide a user's mind into the Nameless One's dream. It would be a key material for their fellow believers hiding in the city?states when they carried out dreamwalking rituals.

But their core explorers still had to be those "elite priests" who touched the Dream-Skull directly.

Richard took a deep breath, stepped forward, and placed his hand on the Dream-Skull's horn.

The shrieking once again pierced his mind. Terrifying pressure burst out of Goathead as dreadful power swept over him. In that instant, the Annihilator felt his mind tear free of his body. He “saw” his viewpoint rise rapidly while the world around him dimmed. He saw his flesh?and?blood body fall backward and then get caught and dragged away by the believers beside him…

In a daze, he also saw a strange stuffed rabbit doll. The stuffed rabbit doll was tiptoeing behind his body, as if it meant to hide itself in his body’s shadow to avoid the saint’s gaze…

A rabbit? Why is there a rabbit?

Richard felt a brief flash of confusion, but in the next second he forgot all about it.

The Nameless One’s dream opened its doors to him.

…

The transformation happened.

Duncan could clearly feel a change in the “atmosphere”. The scene in front of him did not seem to change much, but he knew that after the nine o’clock chime, this “reflection of the Vanished” had turned into another kind of… “thing”.

The Chronometer Clock on the opposite wall shifted back from its mirrored state. The hands that had been turning counterclockwise now resumed their normal clockwise motion. Other things in the room that had been reversed by the mirror effect also quietly returned to normal. The gloom that had filled the air thinned a little. Outside the window, the hazy deck and rail became clear again. The sea and sky that had looked like the Spirit Realm vanished, replaced by the familiar endless darkness and fog.

This was no longer a “reflection”. Now it was Goathead’s dream, sailing within Atlantis’s dream—another Vanished.

Yet for the moment, Duncan’s attention was not on the ship.

“…Those cultists actually used the ‘Dream-Skull’ by pouring elves’ blood onto that Goathead,” he said, his face twisted with mixed feelings. “And it actually worked…”

Agatha’s voice came from the mirror beside him—after the transformation, she had gone back into the mirror: “From Rabby’s description, it looks less like the ritual ‘succeeded’ and more like the Dream-Skull got provoked and then executed the person performing the ritual—and they treat that ‘execution’ as an honor.

“For now, the elves used as ‘sacrificial victims’ probably won’t be in danger of dying. The cultists will keep them alive as a steady source of blood. But before this ritual ‘matured’, many elves who served as sacrificial victims may already have died on that ship…”

Duncan did not speak for a moment. He only nodded, his face dark. A few seconds later, he glanced at the mirror not far away.

Agatha’s figure was reflected in it, but the mirror no longer showed the image of the Radiant Star in the Mortal Realm. Lucretia’s figure had vanished as well.

She, who had stayed behind in Lightwind Harbor, should have entered the “dream” by now.

“Lucy, how are things on your side?”

“It looks like the Vanished sailing away from Lightwind Harbor can’t stop the Nameless One’s dream from happening. I’m back in this forest already, and Shirley is with me,” Lucretia’s voice sounded in Duncan’s mind. “I’ve also linked up with Rabby. It's still parasitizing that cultist and hasn't been exposed yet."

Duncan stayed quiet for two or three seconds: "…What do you think of the ritual they're carrying out?"

"A bunch of crazy idiots using crazy, stupid methods to deal with fragments of the Elder Gods. Their thinking is wrong, their methods are wrong, and the cost is huge—but somehow they still got part of what they wanted. As a scholar, I don't understand it and I don't accept it," Lucretia said. Her face was tense, and her tone carried a kind of grievance. "It's like a group of halfwits taking sticks to a broken Sorting Engine—banging and kicking it—only to somehow fix the machine. It's just…"

She struggled for a long time and finally squeezed out: "It's a disgrace to all intelligent life!"

Duncan said quietly: "But they did succeed—even if their method looks suicidal."

Lucretia's expression grew even more tangled than before.

Noticing the bitter look on the young witch's face, Duncan did not poke at her further. Instead, he changed the topic without making it obvious: "It seems there really is more than one Goathead. But not many of them have a complete, sane mind. It might even be that only my 'First Mate' does."

He paused for a moment, thinking as he went on: "And precisely because the 'Goathead' in those cultists' hands isn't fully sane, their ridiculous ritual had a chance to work. The Dream-Skull only reacts to outside stimuli by instinct. One of those instinctive responses just happens to help those Annihilators open a door into the Nameless One's dream.

"We still don't know whether they stumbled on this 'operating method' by themselves or were taught it by those rambling Enders. And even if we figure out how the Annihilators ‘dreamwalk’, the way those ‘Suntists’ get into the Nameless One’s dream is still a mystery…”

“Do those followers of the Black Sun also have a ‘Goathead’?” Lucretia blurted out.

“Anything is possible—but my gut says it isn’t that simple,” Duncan said, frowning and shaking his head. “So far, there have only been two kinds of Sun followers who entered the Nameless One’s dream. One is that ‘spawn of the Sun’ that showed up once at the start. The other is those human?like but not human ‘Sun remnants’. Ordinary human priests and Suntists have never appeared there. And whether it’s the ‘spawn’ or the ‘remnants’, none of them are human.

“They are ‘tumors’ of the Elder Gods, with mental structures very different from humans.

“The way those things enter the Nameless One’s dream may be completely different from the Annihilators’ method.”

Chapter 610: Asleep in Twilight

Although they were both heretical cults, the Sun cult and the Cult of Annihilation had very different traits. That meant Duncan had to take their particular natures into account whenever he dealt with these cultists.

The cultists of annihilation were, in essence, humans who gained power and reshaped themselves through contracts with demons. These dark cultists clearly worshiped the Abyssal Lord, but their deity did not actually respond to that faith. So, aside from their blasphemous extraordinary power, the cultists of annihilation were still, as a whole, a mortal group. Their actions and limits still rested on their identity as humans. No matter how loudly they shouted the Lord's name, these madmen did not truly have much to do with the Elder Gods.

If you divided their cult into a kind of tower hierarchy, then from the powerless congregation at the bottom, to the priestly rank who could summon demons, and up to the so?called "saints" at the top who no longer even looked human, every level was trying to climb toward the "truth" that supposedly waited higher up. Yet the Abyssal Lord at the top of the tower had no wish to pay them any attention.

The Sun cult was different. Its structure and power passed from the top downward.

At the very top lay the dying Black Sun. This ailing Elder God, in its near? death sleep, had spawned powerful offspring called Spawn. These Spawn watched over and sheltered the humanoid monsters known as the Remnant Folk, who were actually fragments left behind by the Sun. Below them came the countless half?mad believers of the Sun. These mortal believers had not chosen to worship the Black Sun on their own. Instead, the Black Sun's power had leaked into the Mortal Realm and warped the minds of certain humans, turning them into believers out of nothing.

So, in a sense, the entire Sun cult could be seen as an extra growth on an Elder God, a branching structure of the Black Sun's power and flesh.

When facing the Cult of Annihilation, one had to think of them as humans. When facing the Sun cult, one should first treat "it" as a chaotic Elder God. Every Spawn, every remnant, was one of that Elder God's unconscious, twitching, spasming tendrils in its sleep.

Those tendrils slipped into the Nameless One's dream. Some instinct from a higher layer drove them to steal the "Sun" that existed within the Nameless One's dream. Considering what lay above them, the way these things entered the Nameless One's dream was likely simpler and more brutal than the methods of the Annihilators—and more dangerous.

Duncan let out a soft breath and set those tangled thoughts aside for now.

"After this dream of the Nameless One ends, have Rabby confirm where that ship actually is as soon as possible," he said to Lucretia in his heart. "The sooner the better—so long as you are careful not to disturb that 'saint'."

Lucretia's voice came after a few seconds of hesitation: "Are you… worried about those elves who were used as sacrificial victims?"

"From the dreamwalking ritual, their lives should not be in danger for the moment. But those cultists may carry out other rituals, and there may be more than just those two elves on that ship," Duncan said, his tone serious. "That is one reason. The other is that I am very concerned about the 'Goathead' in their hands. Goathead's nature might really be a 'fragment of an Elder God’. If that is true, then this fragment must not stay with a bunch of cultists. Who knows what new suicidal stunt they will try next?”

He was not sure if it was just his imagination, but as soon as he finished speaking he felt a faint… emotional shift from Lucretia’s mark. The witch seemed to be in a better mood for some reason.

“Understood. I will plan this carefully with Rabby,” Lucretia’s voice sounded again. “I will find that ship within a few days.”

“Mm.”

Duncan answered silently, then breathed out and turned his head toward the enchanted sea chart table.

The pitch?black wooden carving of Goathead was calmly staring this way. It looked completely still at the moment, but it had turned itself once just now.

It had awakened, but had not spoken.

Duncan walked over to the enchanted sea chart table and let his gaze sweep across the surface.

The lush, mysterious forest was now projected on the enchanted sea chart. It had replaced the previous ocean markings and route. The phantom of the ship that represented the Vanished was drifting slowly over the sea of trees.

On the edge of the table, Goathead’s gaze moved slowly, following Duncan’s steps.

After an unknown length of time, the usually taciturn Goathead—honestly, Duncan felt that word sounded a bit strange when used for Goathead—finally broke the silence: “You are here again, friend… You seem to have changed a little.”

“Changed?” Duncan raised his eyebrows. “What kind of change?”

“I cannot say it clearly, but the current you seems to make me feel… safer than before,” Goathead said slowly. “Before, when you appeared here, you made me confused and nervous. I could not understand your existence. But now, although I still do not know who you are, that confusion and nervousness are gone.”

Duncan quietly stared into Goathead’s eyes.

He knew that his method had worked this time.

Before nine o’clock that night, he had entered the Vanished’s reflection through the mirror, just as Agatha had done. After nine, when the transformation happened, he had become part of this “dream ship” along with the changing reflection.

In other words, he had gone from an “intruder” to one of this dream’s “own people”.

After many attempts, he had finally found the real way to enter this place. Now he could act here with his hands free. Whether he explored the ship, took the helm, or steered it into the dark fog, he would no longer wake Atlantis—or Goathead.

“Maybe it’s because we have finally grown familiar with each other,” Duncan said with a smile. Of course he could not tell a mind sleeping inside a dream that the dream existed, so he gave another explanation instead. “That is a good thing.”

“Familiar?” Goathead tilted its head a little, as if Duncan’s words made it think for a short moment. Compared to their last meeting, its hazy, half?asleep state seemed a bit lighter, though it still reacted slowly. “Ah, that does sound like a good thing… We are better friends now.”

Duncan thought for a moment and gave up the idea of going to the bridge to take the helm right away. Instead, he sat down in the high?backed chair behind the enchanted sea chart table.

He looked at Goathead, who stared at him in silence, and then carefully asked a question: “Where is Atlantis now?”

Goathead turned its head, as if surprised by Duncan’s question. It hesitated —something it rarely did. After that almost human reaction, it slowly spoke: “Atlantis is right here. In every place.”

“Right here? In every place? Can you explain that more clearly?” Duncan frowned, then added, “I mean no harm. I just want… to talk to her. I don’t know if you can understand this, but she is in danger. There is a group of people with bad intentions who want to hurt Atlantis. I want to find her before they do.”

Duncan did not know whether that last part of his explanation had any effect, but after a short silence Goathead did speak again.

“…This place is Atlantis,” it said, staring into Duncan’s eyes. “You are already inside Atlantis. You are in her thoughts. You are in her memories. This is both the border and the heartland. But… you cannot meet her.”

From the first half of Goathead’s words, Duncan understood at once, but the last sentence still stunned him: “Why?”

“Because Atlantis has not yet remembered herself,” Goathead said. “Before she recalls everything, she is not a clear, defined existence… and right now, she does not want to wake up.”

“You mean Atlantis now exists as some kind of spiritual form, spread through this dark, dense fog, and because she cannot form a complete sense of self, she is formless at this moment?” Duncan quickly grasped its meaning and then could not help pressing, “Is there any other way for me to see her? Or at least to communicate with her?”

He remembered his past experience when he had taken the helm on this dream ship. He remembered the streaks of light in the darkness and the voices within them. He was sure those were Atlantis's thoughts. Yet those "thoughts" seemed to exist in another dimension and did not answer his calls at all.

This time, Goathead stayed silent even longer than before.

After an unknown length of time, it finally spoke—

"Let her sleep a bit longer, just a little while… It will not take long. Let her settle them down…"

…

A wild, disordered wind suddenly blew past, and drifting sand covered the view in an instant.

But before Vanna could raise her hand on instinct to block the sand, the wind and dust stopped in front of her. A voice came out of the wind: "Traveler, we meet again."

Vanna looked at once toward the source of the voice.

In the slowly calming sand, the figure of the giant came into focus.

He sat among a pile of collapsed, black boulders. Beside him lay the huge, almost exaggerated Gatekeeper's cane. The bonfire that had burned for who knew how long had already gone out. At the giant's feet there was only a heap of ash, still giving off a faint warmth and a few glowing embers.

Vanna lifted her gaze and looked around.

It was the same place where she had said goodbye to the giant before, the same sheltered spot out of the wind, the same bonfire. She had come back to this "place" with perfect accuracy, and the giant looked as if he had been waiting for her the whole time.

“I told you we would meet again soon,” the giant said with a gentle smile, wrinkles crowding his face. “See? The fire is still warm.”

“You’ve been here waiting for me all this time?” Vanna asked, a little surprised. “I thought…”

“It was only a little waiting,” the giant said calmly. “There is nothing left here but waste and desolation, and I have nothing else I need to do. Waiting gives things a bit of meaning.”

He paused, then lifted his head and looked into the distance.

“Since you are here, traveler… if you also have no goal at the moment, I want to take you somewhere.”

Chapter 611: Memories at Dawn and dusk

Vanna wondered where this giant wanted to take her.

Curious and confused, she followed in his footsteps and walked into the endless yellow desert. In the distance, the wind raised the sand into a hazy wall that blurred the line between sky and earth. At some point, the ruined city built from jagged black rocks had vanished into that wall of sand. When Vanna tried to look back, she could no longer see it at all.

The light in the sky grew brighter bit by bit, and the heat of the desert rose with it.

Vanna waved her hand and summoned her greatsword of solid ice. With the Storm Goddess’s protection she fought against the discomfort the desert brought her. At the same time she lifted her head and glanced up at the sky.

The huge crack that shone with an ominous red glow still covered the whole world. She was not sure if it was just her imagination, but the blood?like strands spreading from the edges of the crack seemed a bit wider than the first time she saw them.

She still could not see the Sun anywhere she looked, yet the entire sky kept growing brighter. It gave Vanna the feeling that the very idea of “sunlight” had been branded into some kind of cycle that ran through heaven and earth. Even though the Sun had disappeared, the light and heat it left behind still appeared in this world “on time”.

The giant’s gaze was drawn to the icy greatsword in Vanna’s hand.

He had seen the sword in her hand before, but he had never seen the process of her summoning it. He seemed to find this power very strange.

“Your sword is shaped by a power that does not belong to this world,” the giant said. “This power is very unusual. It can draw sacred miracles even in these yellow sands—I have not seen ‘ice’ for a long, long time.”

“This is an ability granted by the deity I worship,” Vanna said at once. “He is the lord of storms and the sea. Ice is the divine authority that stretches out from storms.”

“A deity who rules the sea?” the giant murmured thoughtfully. “Storms and the sea… We are very, very far from any coastline now, and what people once called the sea has already dried up. But I still remember they once built a splendid city by the sea. The city had pure white walls and many blue roofs. They named that city after a kind of gemstone, and in that city they built the first ship that could cross the great ocean…”

Vanna listened quietly as the giant told her these old, forgotten things. At the same time, she passed what she heard to the others who were acting inside the dream. The heat around her kept climbing, so she lifted her greatsword to her mouth and took a bite from it. While she chewed on the ice, she asked curiously: “And then?”

“Then that city vanished inside a bubble. When the corruption happened, many things changed in ways I could not understand,” the giant said. He lowered his head and could not help glancing at Vanna twice, at the icy sword with a bite missing. “…So that is how it is used?”

“It’s a bit hot here,” Vanna said, a little embarrassed. “I… don’t handle heat very well.”

“Not handling heat is good. Feeling discomfort in your surroundings is proof that you are alive,” the giant said. Then he stopped walking. “We are here, traveler.”

Vanna stopped as well and followed the giant’s gaze. Her expression went blank with sudden shock.

Ahead of them lay a huge… sinkhole, set into the earth like a shocking scar. Somehow, she and the giant had already reached the edge of the pit and now stood only a few steps from the wall.

After a brief daze, she took a careful step forward and looked down into the pit. The walls of the pit shone like glass. The black rock there had melted and cooled just like the ruins of the city before. The yellow sand around the edge had fallen away, exposing ground split into terrible cracks. The pit was enormous. It looked big enough to hold a city?state as large as Pland.

In the center of the pit she could faintly see something tall standing upright. It looked like a tower of incredible size, but now only a twisted, hideous shell remained. Around the “tower” she could just make out melted roads and scattered, uneven piles of stone.

“What is that?” Vanna asked in surprise, pointing toward the tower.

The giant did not answer her directly. Instead, he walked slowly to the very edge of the pit and sat down. He set the huge Gatekeeper’s cane beside him and fell into deep, quiet thought.

After an unknown length of time, he finally broke the silence.

“I have forgotten many things, but I still remember this place,” he said. “After they realized that the entire world was slowly collapsing and that human effort could not save it, they built a great archive here. The pit you see is the archive’s ruin. They tried to leave proof that they had once existed in this world, all inside a single building.

“Everything you can think of—culture, art, history, countless scrolls and crafted objects, seed vaults, and giant statues—was piled into solid, well? protected vaults. They also made huge stone slabs from the most stable materials and carved simple introductions to the world and their civilization into the stone.

“Books decay quickly. Advanced recording devices are prone to failure. Delicate storage media cannot be read directly. But words carved in stone can last for thousands of years, tens of thousands of years, maybe even longer. So those stones were placed at the very center of the archive and treated as its ‘heart’.

“They could not find any method of recording that was safer or more lasting than that.”

“Then… what happened?” Vanna could not help asking, even though she already knew the answer before she spoke.

“The stones turned into bubbles,” the giant said, lowering his head to look into Vanna’s eyes. “In a single second.”

Vanna suddenly felt as if she were choking.

“The artworks melted and flowed like water, seeping into every crack. The scrolls turned into shadows burned onto the walls. The statues sublimated into the air and turned into pale mist. Then the entire building began to sink and shatter, and the whole stretch of land sank with it,” the giant said as he lifted his hand and pointed toward the deep pit. “People gathered there—the last survivors. They wanted to mourn their civilization there and be ready to die with calm dignity. But in truth, even mourning and a calm death were luxuries.

“Right before their eyes, everything they had recorded turned into… unspeakable things.

“This is the Mortal Realm. When the world itself steps into destruction, nothing that is recorded on the ‘world’ can be preserved.”

“Then…” Vanna opened her mouth. After a long time she slowly raised her hand and asked again, “That tower…”

“When the entire building began to collapse, that place was the last safe spot,” the giant said softly. “They ran toward it, just like many, many years before, when the first great fire swept the forest settlements. Back then, they ran down from the trees and rushed toward the safe, open plains. Only this time, the ‘fire’ was going to burn more than the forest…

“In the end only one person reached that place. I do not remember what that person looked like. I do not remember if it was a man, a woman, an old person, or a child.

“That person stopped there and died standing.

“In the last minute before death, that person grew as fast as a rising mountain, as if about to touch the sky. That scene looked as if… the scale had broken, because their ‘science’ told me that a human body could never support a form that large…”

The giant raised his head and looked at the “tower” in the center of the deep pit. Even after such a long, long time, that ancient confusion still seemed to sit in his heart.

Vanna finally knew what it was.

It was the last person in this world.

Her eyes slowly widened. In her shock, she stared hard at the center of the pit.

Even across such a great distance, she could see how enormous the “tower” was. It was taller than the highest tower in Pland and even more grand than the city?state’s great cathedral. How… could it be a person?

Yet little by little, Vanna began to see the chilling details hidden within the tower’s twisted, savage shape. She saw melted, deformed structures that rose like raised arms, and a torso that spiraled and warped. For a moment, she even felt that she saw a horrifying face set into some part of the tower.

But she knew it was an illusion. At such a distance, even if there really were such details on the tower, she could not possibly see them clearly.

Besides, it had twisted so badly that its original shape could no longer be seen at all.

Vanna could not say what she felt at that moment. She only knew that her heart had been shaken, and a flood of questions nearly drowned her thoughts. She stared for a long time at the black “tower”—the last tombstone left by the last person of that destroyed ancient civilization. Then she slowly lifted her head and stared for a long time at the sky, covered by red cracks, where no trace of the Sun could be seen.

After an unknown length of time, perhaps to push aside the heavy feeling in her chest, she suddenly asked: “the Sun… did the Sun disappear at that time too?”

“The Sun?”

Vanna raised her hand and pointed at the sky. “It was not like this before. Where is the Sun that used to shine on this world?”

“Ah, right, the Sun. I almost forgot. It is the Sun…”

The giant muttered softly. His tone carried a feeling Vanna could not understand. Then he lifted his hand and searched inside his ragged robe. After feeling around for a while, he seemed to find something hidden deep within the cloth. He took it out and held it in front of Vanna.

“The Sun is here,” he said gently.

Vanna stared at him, dumbfounded. She stared at the thing he showed her, at the object resting quietly in the giant’s palm, which was only about as big as her own fist…

A glowing sphere.

It shone with bright light and gave off a faint warmth. It seemed to float there, in a dimension parallel to the Mortal Realm.

So… small, and so calm.

“It fell down,” the giant said calmly as he looked at Vanna. “I picked it up.”

Chapter 612: the Sun That Could Not Be Taken Away

Vanna felt that her brain was not keeping up.

She was not unfamiliar with this feeling. Back in her student days, she felt this way every time she listened to Mr. Morris's lectures. But once she reached puberty and successfully let her muscles take over most of the work from her brain, she had not felt this in many years.

Now, that familiar feeling came back again.

She stared at the "glowing little ball" in the giant's hand and blinked several times. Only then did she understand, on a rational and literal level, his words and the thing in his palm. But the emotional part of her was still stunned. This was… the Sun this world once had?

"Do you want to touch it?" The giant looked at Vanna's stiff expression, smiled in a friendly way, and held the "Sun" in his hand a little closer to her. "It is not hot anymore."

Vanna felt that this line was eerily strange in a way she had never heard before, but she did not know how to respond.

After a few seconds of hesitation, she reached out almost against her own will. With a feeling she could not explain, she curiously touched the glowing little ball in the giant's hand.

It was only the size of a fist, a human fist. In the giant's hand it looked like a delicate little bead. On its surface, tiny and intricate structures seemed to be moving. Fine streams of light surged there. Bright and dark regions alternated. From time to time hair-thin rays rose from it and then fell back to the surface.

It felt only a little warm, like water slightly hotter than body temperature.

Vanna felt a bit dazed. She thought of the Sun she was familiar with. Every day it rose from the sea horizon, bearing its brilliant double rune rings. It brought light and warmth to the whole world. It was an enormous “sacred miracle”, an ancient and magnificent “Vision”.

At the same time, she also remembered that the captain had said the Sun had another form, one even more splendid and vast. Not long ago, the captain had started trying to teach his followers some knowledge that came from Subspace. Among that knowledge were the concepts of stars and the universe.

To be honest, Vanna had not really understood the captain’s teachings. Even Mr. Morris and Miss Lucretia seemed not to fully understand them. But there was at least one thing Vanna did understand. No matter what form the Sun took, it should not be a fist-sized little ball.

That warm “little Sun” left her hand.

The giant sat on the edge of the large pit. He placed the “Sun” in his palm, rested his hand on his leg, and lowered his eyes, as if sunk in memory and thought. After a long time, he finally spoke in a low voice: “They were full of wisdom. They were good at using all sorts of methods to explain how the world worked. They were born weak, but they could rely on ‘science’ to fight things far stronger than themselves. I always thought, if they were still here, if they had developed to today, perhaps they could explain what is going on with this ‘Sun’…

“But by the time it fell, the world was already quiet. The last person had already turned into that tower. Those clever minds and all their bold ideas had vanished from this world. And I still do not understand this thing.”

Vanna stayed silent for quite a while, but she was not only silent. She was telling the captain what was happening here.

She told the captain that she might have found the “Sun” those cultists had mentioned at their gathering.

It was in the hand of this giant who called himself a deity, and it looked as if it really could be “taken away”. One hand was enough.

The giant did not seem to care about Vanna’s silence or about her mental communication with some unknown existence. Memory wrapped this lonely former god. He gazed for a long time at the little “star” in his hand, the one that had once shone on this world and on his mortal subjects. After a long while, he spoke again, almost to himself: “I have always been thinking. Thinking about what exactly destroyed this place. It did not happen in an instant, traveler. It had a long process.”

“A process?” Vanna immediately caught that word.

The giant nodded and spoke from within his memories: “At first, there were abnormal phenomena that could not be explained by any knowledge we had. The clouds would suddenly vanish and then suddenly appear again. Flashes with no clear cause formed in the air. The weather went wrong. Plants stopped growing normally.

“Then the abnormal phenomena began to spread to deeper and more unsettling fields, to what you might call the deep layers. Gravity began to shift. In many places, the flow of the Time-Stream broke and skipped.

“During this process, we saw that red light grow stronger and stronger. It was like a crack. It spread in from beyond the sky and seemed to hang fixed above us, covering our world and twisting the starlight in the distance. Some kind of… ‘distorting’ corruption spread through the world, and no one could do anything about it.

“The Archive was founded at that time.”

The giant stopped there and looked toward the tall tower again. He seemed unused to talking with people. He would always stop halfway and sink into thought or drift off. But soon he spoke again:

“That long process had a sudden end. When the Archive was destroyed, I felt for a brief moment that some ‘thing’ touched our world. That thing spent a very long time drawing near, and its slow approach caused that long Doomsday. Its final ‘touch’ was the last arrival and the end of the destruction. Yet after so much time, I still have not figured out what that ‘thing’ was.”

“You said you felt some ‘thing’ touching this world?” Vanna could not help widening her eyes. Without noticing it, she was already using a respectful tone when she spoke to the giant. “You really did not ‘see’ what that thing was at all?”

The giant thought seriously for a moment and gave Vanna a small apologetic look. “I am sorry, traveler. I can see you care about this, but what I have said is already all that I know.”

Vanna pressed her lips together. She had to press down the regret in her heart, then let her gaze fall on the “little Sun” in the giant’s hand.

She could not let this thing truly fall into the hands of the Black Sun’s spawn and remnants.

After hesitating again and again, she finally decided to be a bit more honest.

“There are people with bad intentions. They have already set their eyes on the ‘Sun’ in your hand… I do not know if they will find this place, and I do not know how to explain where they come from to you, but…”

She had only spoken halfway when the giant raised his hand again and set the “light ball” before her. “Do you want to take it with you?”

The giant’s tone was gentle, and he wore a smile.

Vanna froze for a moment. When she realized what he meant, she quickly waved her hands. “No, that is not what I meant. You may have misunderstood…”

“It is all right, traveler,” the giant interrupted Vanna again. He still spoke in that steady, friendly tone. “I can feel your goodwill. Also… I do not think you can necessarily take it from my hand.”

Vanna paused slightly. When she saw that the giant was not joking, she finally hesitated and reached out toward the glowing sphere. This time she was not just touching it. She was trying to pick it up.

The warm feeling came again. Vanna felt that she was holding a solid object. But just as she was about to exert force, that feeling suddenly vanished.

The sphere turned into a phantom and passed through her palm.

She stared in confusion at the Sun she could not pick up.

“I do not know when it happened, but it became part of me,” the giant’s voice came from the side. “Perhaps it was the day I picked it up. One phantom picked up another phantom, and they could never be separated again.

“Traveler, you cannot take it away, so it seems those people with bad intentions you spoke of should not be able to take it either.”

The giant stood up from the ground.

He brushed the dust from his robe and carefully tucked the “Sun” away close to his body. Then he bent to pick up that huge Gatekeeper’s cane. “We should go, traveler.”

Vanna asked without thinking: “Where are we going?”

“To walk around the world. There are still many things here. They may not look like much now, but I want to tell you what they once were and their stories.” The giant turned his head and looked at the distant sea of sand. “You can also tell me on the way where those ‘people with bad intentions’ come from. This world has been dead for many years. I have gone too long without speaking with anyone. This is the first time I have heard… news from outsiders.”

He paused and lowered his head to glance at Vanna. “I had almost forgotten what curiosity was. Thank you for reminding me.”

“Aren’t we going down there to take a look?” Vanna pointed at the tall tower in the center of the pit. “I thought…”

“There is nothing left to see there. What you see from here is all there is.” The giant shook his head and had already turned to walk into the distance. “Come. It will be dark again soon. The day and night here always change very quickly, but perhaps we can reach another ruin before dusk. Once, you could look out over the sea from there.”

Listening to the giant’s words, Vanna looked back at the “tower” once more. She said a silent farewell in her heart, then turned and caught up with the giant, who had already walked more than ten meters away.

…

Duncan sat behind the enchanted sea chart table and kept that posture for a long time. After an unknown while, he finally let out a deep breath.

Vanna had found the “Sun”. She had found it in a very… unbelievable state.

But for some reason, after hearing Vanna’s report, he felt nothing beyond the first shock and confusion. Even that surprise faded quickly, leaving only a feeling of “So that is how it is”.

Maybe it was because he had already seen with his own eyes that ten-meter-wide “Moon”. Or maybe it was because he had long ago seen a “solar prominence” that could hop along the deck. After living for so long in this strange, twisted world, his ability to accept things had been fully trained.

Then only one question was left.

Vanna could not take that “Sun” away.

That was a bit worrying.

Chapter 613: The Ship and the First Mate

At the edge of the enchanted sea chart table, the silent, pitch-black wooden carving of Goathead was quietly gazing at Duncan. Compared to the other Goathead's noisiness, this wordless stare was even more uncomfortable.

Duncan finally could not ignore that gaze anymore. He had to raise his head from his thoughts and ask: "Why are you staring at me like that?"

"I thought you would go 'take the helm' again, like last time," Goathead said slowly. "That feeling… was very strange."

Duncan raised his eyebrows and sounded a bit surprised. "You want me to take the helm again?"

"I do not know. I only felt that it was incredible." Goathead thought for a moment, and some uncertainty entered his tone. "I can sense this 'ship', and I can understand each of its parts, but I do not know how to talk to it. It feels like an old friend of mine, but I have forgotten its affairs, so it ignores me. Yet last time, when you went to the aft deck and held that wheel… I seemed to hear its voice."

"Oh? You heard its 'voice'? What kind of voice was it?"

Duncan showed a curious expression at once. Last time he had left in a hurry and had not had time to hear this Goathead talk about any of this. Now that Goathead brought it up, he at once realized he had overlooked this question. When he took the helm, the Goathead in the Mortal Realm had awakened in shock. So what about this Goathead on the dream side? How had it reacted then?

Goathead fell silent for a moment, as if searching his memories. After nearly half a minute he slowly spoke: “Rather than a voice, it was more like some ‘things’ that appeared directly in my memory. It seemed to be calling me, reminding me not to forget the pact with the ‘captain’, reminding me not to abandon my post… I also saw some images, saw…”

He suddenly stopped, as if that half-asleep state was affecting his thoughts and keeping him from finding words to describe what he remembered. It also looked like he had fallen again into that same pause in thought and had forgotten the topic at hand.

Duncan had to remind him from the side: “What did you see? Was it an image of this ship?”

“Oh, right, it was this ship. But I do not think I was on the ship…”

“You were not on the ship?”

“I was in a very dark place. Empty… everywhere was empty and hazy. A shadow drifted over. It was this ship’s shadow, but it looked like it would soon fade away. Then a vague voice talked with me. I cannot remember what that voice said, but the master of that voice took something from me. After that, the shadow turned solid…”

Goathead spoke in a tone like sleep-talking, slow and disjointed. His words often jumped and broke without logic, like a chaotic dream that showed its bizarre, flickering scenes without any polish.

Goathead paused for another ten seconds or so before adding the last sentence: “…So I became a part of the shadow. That seems to have been a very, very long time ago, but this ship still seems to remember… Strange. Is it that it remembers, or that I remember?”

Goathead seemed to sink back into confusion. As he muttered, his voice grew lower and lower until it turned into a whisper that could not be heard at all. After a brief time of thought, Duncan's expression slowly changed. Sitting behind the chart table, his face grew serious.

Goathead's description was jumbled, with many missing and blurred details. But that did not mean it had no useful information. From those words, Duncan could fully deduce and connect many things.

What Goathead had described seemed to be the scene from a hundred years ago, when the Vanished and the real Captain Duncan Abnomar had taken him away from Subspace.

On the other side, in the Mortal Realm, Duncan had once tried in a roundabout way to ask the other Goathead about this. But that one had always given vague answers, as if it had already forgotten what had happened a century ago. Now it seemed that the information had stayed in the memory of this Goathead in the dream. Or, according to this Goathead's own words, was it the Vanished that remembered it?

Duncan gave a subtle look at the Goathead that had fallen silent again, then raised his head to glance around the captain's cabin.

This place was Goathead's dream, and in the usual sense a dream was the dreamer's "subconscious projection".

But just now, Duncan had suddenly realized something.

This ship might not be only Goathead's dream. The Vanished was alive as well.

The century-long symbiotic pact had bound Goathead and the Vanished tightly together. This bond showed not only in their physical structure but also in spirit. The latter was a living ship. Many "objects" on the ship seemed to have only the most basic life, but as a whole, as the Vanished, its “consciousness” might be far more complex and complete than he had imagined.

Complete enough to take part in this dream in a way beyond imagining.

Duncan slowly placed his hand on the enchanted sea chart table in front of him. He gazed at it for a long time, as if he were looking through the table at the entire Vanished. He thought about the information hidden in Goathead’s description just now, his fingers unconsciously rubbing the rough tabletop.

“Are you trying to use this chance to tell me something?” he asked in his heart.

But he received no response.

Perhaps the Vanished’s “consciousness” was in a state he could not understand. It might have already responded, but no one could understand it.

Duncan thought about what Goathead had just said.

Goathead had said he once drifted in a dark, hollow place where everything around was empty and chaotic. That fit the traits of Subspace very well. He had also said the Vanished appeared before him, looking like a phantom that was about to vanish. Was that the state the Vanished had been in when it first met Goathead?

About to fade away. That meant that when the Vanished had first fallen into Subspace, its state had actually been very bad, so bad that it had already lost its body. In a sense, the ship had already been erased by Subspace at that time. Only a vague voice remained, Duncan Abnomar’s voice.

Then the master of that voice had taken something from Goathead, and only then had the Vanished’s phantom gained a body again. That “something” was the key.

Duncan’s eyes suddenly grew grave. Right after that, he remembered the first thing Goathead had said. The Vanished had reminded him not to forget the “pact” with the captain.

There was a pact, a pact between Goathead and Duncan Abnomar.

What was in that pact? When they met in Subspace a hundred years ago, what agreement had they made?

Duncan Abnomar had taken some “thing” from Goathead in order to reshape the Vanished’s body. The Vanished had taken Goathead out of Subspace and brought him into the stable Mortal Realm dimension.

Those should all have been part of the pact.

But what came after?

Duncan Abnomar had not lived until now. He had already vanished. Inside this powerful body now was a soul named Zhou Ming.

And the Goathead in the Mortal Realm plainly knew long ago that the “captain” had changed.

But it still faithfully carried out the duties of the first mate.

Was that also part of the pact?

The Goathead in the Mortal Realm had said he did not remember his experiences in Subspace. Then did he still remember this pact? Or had he also forgotten the pact, while some kind of “restriction” was still at work, forcing him to keep fulfilling the agreement?

Thoughts spun quickly in Duncan’s mind. After a moment, he suddenly stood up.

The Goathead on the table did not react at all. It did not turn its gaze to follow Duncan’s movement as it had before.

It still seemed sunk in that half-asleep, dazed state. The earlier remembering and thinking had already gone beyond some kind of “thinking threshold” for it.

Duncan did not bother with Goathead. He knew it would recover after a while. Right now, he had more important things to do.

He left the captain’s cabin and stepped onto the stairs leading to the aft deck. Following the familiar route, he reached the steering platform where the wheel was set.

With the experience from last time and with this round of preparation, Duncan did not hesitate anymore. He stepped forward quickly and gripped the heavy wheel tightly.

The next second, under the captain’s hands on the wheel, the whole ship suddenly came alive.

A familiar scene appeared again before his eyes. The huge ghost ship was waking quickly. From all over the ship came the sounds of things coming to life. The rigging tightened. The sails billowed. Ropes and winches gave off creaking noises. At almost the same moment, that vast “root tunnel”, like some passage large enough to hold a giant ship, appeared in front of the Vanished and rushed toward it like a huge whirlpool.

Countless branches, roots, and phantasmal lights drifting in the mist filled Duncan’s sight and surrounded the path ahead of the Vanished. Those warm streams of light climbed onto the deck once more and wandered aimlessly around the steering platform.

“Saslokar, is that you?”

A slightly childish voice reached Duncan’s ears. The streams of light circled around him, as if searching for something, yet also as if they were simply sleepwalking.

“…Saslokar will not be coming.”

Even though he knew the present Atlantis could not hear his voice, Duncan still answered seriously. Then he ignored the phantom lights wandering near him and put all his attention on the ship beneath his feet.

The Vanished was sailing through the darkness, moving quickly inside that huge root system tunnel. Now and then, branch-like splits appeared in the tunnel. Yet the ship seemed to know the route by itself. It did not need the captain to steer. It chose its own course.

Duncan only needed to hold the wheel.

That let him put more of his focus into sensing.

If things were really as he thought, if this ship was both Goathead’s dream and the Vanished’s dream, then somewhere on this ship there had to be parts that were not quite the same as the Vanished that now existed in the Mortal Realm.

Those would be the subconscious reshaping the dream, the replay of memories.

They were things the Vanished was trying to show him.

Chapter 614: Beneath the Fault

Duncan felt his thoughts spreading through the ship. His senses fanned out like a spiderweb, and every part of the vessel seemed to become part of his own body. It went more smoothly than last time, clearer than last time. This ghost ship sailing along the edge of the dream was laying all its secrets bare to him.

His mind began to sink down layer by layer. It went from the tall aft deck, to the cabins below, to the intermediate decks that stored powder and shot, then to the locker that held the anchor chains and the water tanks. It slid along every wall and every pillar, every rope and every consecrated lantern.

The whole ship slowly turned into a fine, detailed “projection” and floated in his mind.

Duncan compared the structure in his mind with his memories, hoping to find something that did not fit. Maybe it would be a beam that was not in the design. Maybe it would be a cabin that had never appeared in the Mortal Realm. Maybe it would be a hidden compartment no one had ever found. That would be where the Vanished and Goathead were misaligned in their fused consciousness.

At first this was only a sudden thought. Duncan had only realized that this ship was not Goathead’s own dream, and that the Vanished’s own “memories” might also be at work in it. So he wanted to look for proof that the latter existed. But as his perception kept spreading across the ship, that “let’s try it” thought grew firm. It was as if an invisible voice was giving him mental guidance and telling him—

There really was something hidden deep inside this ship. The Vanished really wanted to tell him some secrets. In some place that could not be seen from the Mortal Realm, the Vanished still “remembered” things that had once happened in Subspace.

And that hidden memory pointed to one of the core secrets in this tangled dream—the origin of Goathead, and the link between this dream ship and Atlantis.

Was it his own intuition? Or was the Vanished really whispering to him without stop?

A vague idea rose in Duncan’s heart, but he did not get stuck on the question. He focused on his work and searched for any clues that might exist.

It was not easy. Even with the ship he knew best, Duncan did not dare claim he could clearly remember where every single item lay on the Vanished. He could only hope his “intuition” would work in this process and help him find some place that felt wrong.

But he had not expected that he would not need any help from intuition at all. The wrongness was even more obvious and jarring than he had imagined.

Under the third deck, he sensed a large… “perception fault”.

Duncan frowned at once. He gripped the wheel in his hands and looked down toward the place he “saw” in his perception. It was right below him.

The bottom of the ship?

Something suddenly came to Duncan’s mind. He hesitated, then let go of the wheel.

His link with the “helm” broke.

But the perceptions the whole ship sent to him did not stop. He could still feel that this ship was linked to him. The ship still sailed fast through endless darkness and mist, and in the dark space beyond the rails, those vast structures like plant roots and branches still existed and kept flashing past on all sides.

The “flowing light” of Atlantis was there as well, still circling nonstop around the bridge.

Looking at this scene, Duncan had a faint realization. It seemed that once the link was formed, it would not break until this dream ended.

Because he had entered by Dreamwalking through his reflection, he was now also a part of this dream. The actions he took here would no longer be treated as “outside invasions”, and the dream’s own power to repair itself would not easily drive him out or erase him.

After he confirmed this, Duncan let out a breath of relief and quickly left the bridge. But before he went deeper into the ship, he turned back on the aft deck and returned to the captain’s cabin.

Near the door of the captain’s cabin, he saw the old-fashioned consecrated lantern hanging quietly on the wall.

To go down into the lower structure of the Vanished, he needed to carry a consecrated lantern. Even though he did not know if this rule still had to be followed on this “dream ship”, he still chose to act with care.

Agatha’s figure appeared in a nearby mirror. She looked at Duncan with some curiosity and said: “Captain, what are you going to do?”

“I am going to the bilge,” Duncan said quickly. He glanced back toward the chart table. Goathead still crouched there in silence and showed no reaction. “There is something at the bottom of the ship.”

Agatha froze for a moment when she heard this. Her expression turned serious at once.

“We will talk as we walk,” Duncan added at once. “Do not discuss it here.”

As he spoke, he had already taken the old brass consecrated lantern, opened the door, and stepped out of the room.

He strode across the empty deck, which was filled with thin mist. The Fire Seed had already lit the consecrated lantern, and the flame in it gave off a ghostly green light. The drifting fog around him drew back a little in the lamplight, then closed in again behind him. In the light and shadow cast by the lantern, an extra shadow moved quickly at his side, almost overlapping his own.

Agatha’s voice came from that shadow: “The bilge you are talking about… is it the area you usually do not let me go near?”

“Yes,” Duncan nodded. He opened the door that led to the lower deck and went down the stairs quickly with the consecrated lantern in hand. “In the Mortal Realm, the bilge of the Vanished connects to Subspace. Down there is a broken region. Beyond every crack is a scene mirrored from Subspace. If I am not with them, it is dangerous for anyone to go near.”

“…It already sounds dangerous from how you describe it,” Agatha’s shadow seemed to shiver. He could not see her expression, but the shadow clearly grew a bit lighter, as if she was a little nervous. “From how you are acting, it seems that on this ‘dream ship’, the state of the bilge has changed?”

“A structure I have never seen before has appeared there,” Duncan said quickly. He went down the stairs beneath the deck and passed through the empty, dim storage rooms, going deeper layer by layer. “It is not far ahead. The broken region is at the bottom of the last set of stairs…”

After they moved as fast as they could through those dimly lit corridors and stairways, where the atmosphere was eerie and even the light and shadow sometimes showed Inversion, Duncan and Agatha's shadow suddenly stopped.

They had reached the end of the last stairway. The door that led to the shattered region in the bilge stood quietly before Duncan's eyes.

Agatha's shadow "crawled" along the steps to Duncan's side, then slowly rose up the wall. Judging from the outline, she seemed to be watching the door ahead with both care and tension.

"I cannot feel anything on the other side of the door," she said in a low voice. "Even at this distance, I cannot feel it… it is as if the other side of the door is pure 'emptiness'."

Duncan glanced at Agatha, then lowered his eyes to the consecrated lantern in his hand.

The glow from the consecrated lantern lit the area around them in a soft way, but when it fell on the door ahead, it seemed to be absorbed by something. Only about half the brightness remained.

He drew a slow breath, stepped forward, and pushed the door open.

In the Mortal Realm, the space behind this door was the shattered bottommost cabin of the Vanished. It was the structure that floated in Subspace.

But here, what rushed into Duncan's eyes at first was a boundless darkness.

He almost thought he was about to lose his footing and fall into that darkness.

Duncan felt his nerves tighten without thinking. The vast darkness was too strong a contrast with the scenes in the cabins before, and it caught him off guard. But soon, he saw that there were other things inside the darkness.

His eyes slowly adapted, and he saw the huge things that loomed in the dark:

First there was an enormous continuous structure, wide like a road floating in the void. Its two ends rose up slightly. Then he saw clearly many “branches” joined to both sides of that continuous structure. They lined up neatly in the dark and stretched all the way to the edge of his sight, like… ribs.

Duncan stood in the middle of this vast continuous structure. He saw that apart from the “main trunk” under his feet and the smaller branches around it that looked like ribs, there was no sign of any hull wall here at all, not even shattered pieces. Between those “ribs” there was only dark emptiness. Wisps of fog rolled in the darkness and wound through this wide space.

Duncan knew what it was.

At the same time, Agatha’s shadow also “crawled” out through the door and fell beside Duncan’s shadow. She stared in shock at the unbelievable scene in front of them and only reacted after a moment: “Wait, this thing is…”

“The keel of the Vanished,” Duncan said in a low voice, nodding slightly.

“The keel… right, the Vanished is a sailing warship built a century ago. Of course it has a keel…” Agatha spoke in a hesitant way, and her tone sounded a bit strange. “But it looks…”

Duncan did not answer Agatha. Almost all his attention had been drawn to that amazing structure that curved and stretched away in the dark.

This was the first time he had seen the keel of the Vanished. According to this world’s shipbuilding rules, a finished sailing warship would never expose its keel in any visible part of the interior. The “bottom compartment” of the Vanished where the keel could once be seen had already shattered and floated in Subspace, and the keel's structure could no longer be told apart there.

He had never thought about what the keel of this ship would look like.

Now he knew.

He stepped onto that "road" floating in the dark, walked along it, and stopped in front of the first "segment".

The light from the consecrated lantern lit the huge bulging joint in front of him. Farther away lay the next "segment", and more segments after that.

This kind of segmented "jointed structure" clearly did not meet the building rules for a sailing ship's keel. For an ordinary Old Era sailing ship, the keel had to be a single, whole piece of wood. Only then could it endure the waves on the sea.

But Duncan believed that this keel at the bottom of the Vanished, with its many "jointed segments", was surely stronger than any other keel in the world.

Because it was the spine of an Elder God.

Chapter 615: Shattered Secrets

Looking at the keel that stretched forward into the dark, Duncan felt he could already be sure of its origin, and of the “deal” that had taken place deep in Subspace a century ago.

But he kept feeling that he had missed something. He felt this was not what the Vanished wanted to tell him—at least, not all of it.

He lifted the consecrated lantern higher. The flame lit by the spirit flame grew a little brighter. Its gentle glow lit the area around them and made the details on the keel’s surface stand out more clearly. The firelight also shone on the empty regions beyond the keel and spread through the dark mist.

Shapes seemed to flicker in the mist, as if many things were hiding there.

Agatha’s shadow followed. She rose up in the mist and stood dimly at his side. “This… spine, could it come from the great demon god Saslokar of elven legend?”

“The chance is very high,” Duncan nodded slightly. “And I fear only a being on the level of a deity could have a spine like this.”

“Goathead…” Agatha hesitated. Her thoughts seemed tangled, and it took her a long time to find the right words. “I mean all the Goatheads. The one on the Vanished, the one in this dreamscape, the ones in the hands of those cultists, and the ‘Goatheads’ that may still be unknown. What do you think their relationship is with Saslokar?”

She paused, then went on: “That muddled Goathead said that Saslokar died a long time ago, and that it was not Saslokar. But now it seems that ‘they’ all have a close link with the ‘primordial dream’ of the elves. Now we have even found this ‘keel’ at the bottom of the Vanished… You no longer remember how you got this keel in Subspace back then, do you?”

Of course, Agatha did not know that the Duncan now was not the Vanished’s original “captain”. She naturally believed that the one who had made an agreement and signed a contract with Goathead in Subspace a hundred years ago was Duncan. He often said that he had lost many memories while he was regaining his humanity. So she took it for granted that this keel was also one of the memories Duncan had lost.

Duncan did not answer her directly. He only nodded lightly, then thought for a few seconds before speaking in a thoughtful tone: “Perhaps all the Goatheads are parts of Saslokar.”

Agatha was stunned for a moment, but soon understood. “So Miss Lucretia was right to call those ‘Goatheads’ in the hands of the Annihilators ‘Elder God fragments’… And these Elder God fragments are all in different states and cannot understand themselves. Some still remember things related to Saslokar or Atlantis, and some seem to have completely lost thought and reason…”

Duncan stayed silent and just stared at the massive spine before him, lost in thought. After a long time he suddenly spoke. “Let us be bolder with our guess. ‘Goathead’ may be only one form that an Elder God fragment can take. The spine in front of us is clearly another form of ‘Elder God fragment’. And there may well be other forms of Elder God fragments: a tree, a person, a stone, a corpse… all of them could be parts left behind by Saslokar.

“After all, in the old myths of the elves, Saslokar had countless forms. That can also explain why Goathead, which seems to be an Elder God fragment, is small enough to sit on a chart table, while this spine, which is also a ‘fragment’, can support the entire Vanished.”

Duncan spoke of the possibility he had thought of in a calm voice. But the picture it painted was chilling. Even Agatha, who had once been a Gatekeeper, felt a cold shiver when she tried to imagine the state of that great demon god.

She could not help but speak. “What kind of power… could turn a ‘deity’ into this? Into this… torn-apart state?”

She had only spoken without thinking and did not expect any answer from the captain.

Yet after a brief silence, Duncan did speak. He spoke slowly, as if talking to himself—

“…But the second Blueprint also failed. And so, in the second Long Night of the Genesis Protocol, the King of Dreams was torn apart. Part of Him drifted along the border of the Mortal Realm…”

Agatha froze at once. Her shadow quivered a little in the light, and its edges looked a bit blurred. Soon she remembered where those lines came from. “That is written in the Blasphemous Tome…”

Duncan nodded slightly. “Yes. It is the ‘creation myth’ of the Annihilators, the story from before the age of the Deep Sea began. The King of Dreams used His divine authority to create the world, yet in the Long Night He was torn into pieces.”

“Saslokar is one of the lost Elder Kings!” Agatha understood. “This ‘great demon god’ from the ancient legends of the elves is the ‘King of Dreams’ who tried to remake the world in the second Long Night?!”

“I actually had this thought long ago, since Their Divine Authorities are so close,” Duncan said. “But for a long time, the ancient legends of the elves lacked any proof. Saslokar, as a faith element unique to the elven race, has many legends and sacred miracles that go against the records and facts from the other city-states on the Boundless Sea.

“There is also another important point. The elves have the most complete myth system and history of all the races. Yet in their own records, there is never any mention of ‘the King of Dreams trying to reshape the world in the second Long Night’. There is no description of this great demon god being torn apart at the end of the Long Night, not even in doubtful unofficial stories.

“These contradictions kept me from daring to treat the ‘great demon god Saslokar’ in elven legend and the ‘King of Dreams’ from the second Long Night as the same deity. Not until now… when I have seen with my own eyes the fragments left behind by this torn-apart Elder God.”

Perhaps because she was lost in shock and thought, Agatha stayed silent for a long time. Duncan walked forward slowly. Holding the consecrated lantern, he carefully stepped onto one of the joints of the “Elder God’s spine”, then bent down and touched its rough, weathered bone with his hand. It felt as if it had been battered by countless ages, yet it was still tough and reliable.

This spine had brought the Vanished, which had sunk deep into Subspace and was almost completely swallowed and erased by it, back into the Mortal Realm. It had given the ship a new body and carried it for a full century.

His movement suddenly stopped.

A question he had never thought of before, one that had been overlooked for a long time, pushed into his mind and would not be held back. Now that he had seen this “keel” made from an Elder God’s spine and understood in a clearer and more direct way what shocking structure lay at the bottom of a giant ship, Duncan finally thought of this question—

What had the original Vanished used as its keel?!

He straightened up in a rush and looked around at the vast dark space.

The frame of the hull bottom, held up by the keel and ribs, was half lost in endless mist. In the distance he could faintly see broken hull planks and the support structures of the upper levels.

This structure built on an Elder God’s spine was huge and complex. It inspired awe.

But this was not the original Vanished. Not all of it.

The first Vanished had long since been swallowed by Subspace. When Goathead saw it, the ship was already nothing but a faint phantom and the obsession of Duncan Abnomar himself.

The “Vanished” that Duncan knew now was the result of that phantom being made solid again. Its original keel had been replaced with the spine of an Elder God, and only then could it perform the “sacred miracle” of sailing back from Subspace.

Then what about this ship’s original keel?

Duncan was not an expert in shipbuilding. But after living in this world for so long, he had learned many basic facts about ships. He knew how sailing warships had been built a hundred years ago. He knew that only a single piece of wood that had been carefully picked and was extremely tough could bear the burden of the “keel”. The strength and size of that timber set the limit on the maximum size of every sailing warship.

Yet the Vanished was far beyond that size—not just a bit bigger, but twice as big.

The Vanished was the largest sailing ship this world had ever seen. No larger sailing ship had appeared after it. From the structure here in the bilge, the keel part of the Vanished had not used any riveting or splicing techniques either.

Duncan slowly frowned.

The keel was the most basic part of a ship. The way it was built directly decided the rest of the ship's structure. So this "Elder God's spine" before him should only have replaced the Vanished's original keel, and not changed its basic structure on a large scale. That meant the Vanished should have used a single, whole keel, just like the other sailing warships of that time.

But there could not be trees that big in any city-state.

Even if there were, the strength of the wood itself had a limit. At the scale of the Vanished, it would far exceed what a traditional wooden keel could carry.

Unless from the very start this ship's keel had not been ordinary wood, but some kind of… far more unbelievable material.

Over the past century, the Vanished had been one of the greatest taboos on the Boundless Sea. Many things related to it had become topics people did not dare mention. Although the ship had been built in the city-state of Pland, almost no one would talk in public about how it had been built back then.

But now Duncan could imagine that more than a hundred years ago, when work had just begun on this astonishing exploration ship, it must have been a major event.

Fog flowed slowly on all sides. The pale green light from the consecrated lantern soaked softly into the mist, as if outlining many vague shapes.

Duncan looked at the mist coiling around them and not fading. His brows slowly relaxed.

“So this is what you wanted to tell me…”

Chapter 616

Nina and Morris walked along the forest path. Daylight streamed through the thick canopy overhead, casting mottled beams across the woods. At some point a thin layer of mist had risen among the trees, and the sunlight diffused through it, making everything look even more dreamy and hazy.

The elf maiden who called herself “Celine” walked a short distance ahead. From time to time she stopped and glanced back at them, always looking endlessly patient.

“The forest is getting foggy,” Nina looked up at the distant, layered shadows of the trees and said quietly in her heart: “It’s the first time I’ve seen fog here… Uncle Duncan, how are things on your side?”

She slowed her steps, her face taking on the focused look she had whenever she tilted her head for the Listening Rite. Morris, walking beside her, also slowed down and listened carefully to the voice that came from deep within his thoughts.

A moment later, the old scholar’s voice sounded in the mental link: “You mean… the construction records for the Vanished? The old data from the Pland shipyard?”

Then the old man listened for a while longer. He nodded with a serious expression and replied in his heart: “I understand… Those records must still exist, but we definitely can’t get them by normal means. I’ll talk it over with Vanna later and see if we can look for some old friends in the city? state, or maybe approach the Church.”

The voice from the depths of their minds slowly faded.

Nina blinked and looked curiously at her teacher walking beside her: “Why did Uncle Duncan suddenly want the old construction records for the Vanished?”

“I don’t know. Maybe the Captain found something deep inside that ‘Vanished in the dream’,” Morris said casually. “But since he didn’t tell us the details, we’d better not ask on our own.”

Clearly, after serving on the Vanished for so long, the old gentleman had become very skilled at following the safety rules around the Captain.

He paused, then frowned slightly as he watched the white mist coiling through the dense forest, growing thicker with every passing moment.

“The fog is getting thicker…” he said, his expression turning grave. “I don’t know much about forests, but I can’t shake the feeling that something is wrong with this fog.”

Nina thought for a moment, already eager to try: “Should I use sunlight to disperse it?”

Morris glanced reflexively at Celine walking ahead, then quickly waved his hand to stop the young lady’s enthusiasm: “Don’t be reckless. Your sunlight seems to be a very strong stimulus to this dream.”

“Oh…”

And while they were delayed like this, Celine, who walked in front, stopped.

It was as if she could always sense with perfect accuracy the distance between herself and Morris and Nina. Whenever that distance grew too wide, she stopped at once, sometimes even asking about it or urging them on, just like now.

“Did something happen?” The elf maiden looked back in confusion at the two of them muttering in the rear. “We don’t have much time to waste. We have to get back to the Wall of Silence before we run into any corruption phenomena.”

“There’s a lot of fog all around us,” Nina hurried a few quick steps to catch up to Celine and took the chance to ask directly: “Does it get this foggy here often?”

“Fog?” Celine froze for a moment, then lifted her head to look around. A look of sudden understanding crossed her face, and she smiled faintly at Nina. “We’re very close to our destination already… We are almost inside the Wall of Silence.”

“You mean this mist is caused by the Wall of Silence?” Morris’s voice came from the side at once. “Or rather, that this ‘fog’ is itself a part of the Wall of Silence?”

“It’s magnificent, isn’t it?” Celine did not answer the scholar’s question directly. Instead, with a strange, excited joy, she looked around at the dense forest that the mist was slowly swallowing, as if she were the one seeing the Wall of Silence for the very first time. “From here, you can’t even see its full shape, but Atlantis can. From very high up, from the sky, Atlantis’s branches can look down on this wall…

“It closed before her eyes, shutting the whole kingdom away from the corruption outside… We aren’t there yet, there’s still a little distance. Deep in the fog there is another barrier, forged of light. That is the true body of the Wall of Silence, and it’s already very close, just a blink away…”

Celine spoke in high spirits. This “mind entity”, who had seemed especially calm and even a little stiff all along the way, suddenly gained a burst of lively human warmth in just a few seconds. She turned, hurried down the path into the thick fog, and waved to Nina and Morris as she went:

“Come on, keep up with me, we’re about to return to a safe place!”

It was the first time Nina had seen her act like this. She froze for a second before she came back to herself, only to see Celine’s figure already close to vanishing in the shifting depths of the thick fog. She hurried to chase with Morris, quickening her pace, yet for some reason she faintly felt…

That she would not catch up.

Before this, Celine had always waited for her and her teacher whenever they fell behind. The “Celine” that Shirley and Miss Lucretia met had shown the same “behavior pattern”. But this time, Nina felt that Celine would not stop and wait anymore. Celine’s steps held no hesitation at all. She almost rushed into the shadowy trees within the fog, like a traveler returning home after a long absence, like a drop of water going back to the sea.

The elf finally vanished into the boundless fog and never looked back.

Nina and Morris were left staring at each other in the mist?wreathed forest.

After a short while, Morris looked thoughtfully toward the direction where Celine had disappeared. “Her mental signature vanished right at the end of this path, within a few seconds after her figure left our sight.”

Nina thought for a moment, then asked uneasily: “So are we already lost… ? There is fog and trees everywhere, and everything looks the same.”

“We never knew the way in the first place,” Morris said, taking it rather well. “You don’t need to worry about being ‘lost’ in a dream, because in theory, whenever you move around inside a dream, you are lost by definition.”

Nina listened to her teacher’s lecture in a daze and felt it made a lot of sense. “That’s true.”

Then she asked another question: “So what do we do next? Do you need me to ‘fly’ up there and take a look around? I can hold back a bit.”

“Unless we have no other choice, try not to provoke this dream,” Morris said, waving his hand. Then, in the thick fog, he roughly confirmed the direction where Celine’s mental presence had vanished. He raised his hand and pointed toward the end of the narrow path ahead. “We’ll go this way, along the last route Celine showed us.”

“Alright!”

So the two of them, one old and one young, began trudging through the mist and forest that seemed to have no end.

They had only a general direction.

But Nina still remembered what Celine had said before leaving: they were only one step away from the Wall of Silence. In some distant past, the Sanctuary World that Atlantis built for the elves lay just beyond this thick fog.

It was only a blink away.

At some point, the daylight that fell through the gaps in the canopy had grown dim. The mottled beams turned into vague, suspicious shadows in the thick mist. The ground of the forest was rough. The narrow tracks stamped out by beasts on their way to water hardly counted as “roads”, and even those tracks did not appear everywhere. In many places, the fallen branches and leaves made the ground softer and harder to walk than those uneven paths.

And she did not know if it was just her imagination, but Nina felt the ground became harder to walk the farther they went. The plants grew denser and more tangled. Vines and bushes crossed and spread out as if they meant to block the way on purpose. A chill spread through the mist, as if what lay ahead was not a “final refuge” at all, but the greatest shadow in this vast dream.

She suddenly stopped.

In the dense fog, she seemed to see something flash past.

Nina almost unleashed a six?thousand?degree?Celsius slap.

But she managed to hold back that overly radiant burst of sunlight at the last second.

“Just now it felt like something ran past in the fog,” Nina said to Morris, a little nervous. “It gave me a scare!”

Morris glanced at Nina and saw two golden flames flickering deep in the young lady’s eyes. The air around her was slowly settling after a brief, warped distortion.

The old gentleman suddenly looked a little tense as well. He was not afraid that something dangerous might actually appear in the fog. He was afraid Nina would light up the forest with one slap.

After all, this child tended to explode the moment she was startled.

“Did you see clearly what it was?”

“No.” Nina shook her head. “I just felt like it was a very tall ‘person’ who ran past in a flash. But it might not have been a person. The outline felt strange… like it was distorted.”

“…We can’t tell what that was for now,” Morris said with a frown. “But I didn’t sense any mental activity just now, so it is very likely only an illusion born from the fog… We still don’t know how this so?called ‘Wall of Silence’ works, so anything we see inside it is possible.”

He paused, then could not help adding: “The key is that you stay calm, and keep control over your urge to lash out.”

Nina nodded nervously. She kept watching the mist around them and walked a few more steps forward.

Just then, a gust of chaotic wind seemed to blow through the forest.

She felt the fog in front of her suddenly thin out. Right after that, a vague curtain of light, like a warped mirror, appeared at the far edge of the dispersing mist.

That faint glow trembled in the mist, its surface reflecting a twisted view of the forest. Something seemed to lie behind the curtain of light, but it was hazy and impossible to see clearly.

Nina went blank for a moment, then realized they had arrived.

That was the “barrier forged of light” Celine had mentioned at the end of the Wall of Silence.

In the next second, Nina and Morris hurried up to the curtain of light.

A rampart forged from light stood at the border of the fog, grand and imposing, like the very end of this world of forest and trees. It stretched upward into an endless sky and outward to either side into endless distance. Ripples of light slowly flowed across its surface, as if it sealed off the worlds on both sides of the glow and quietly guarded the boundless secrets beyond.

“It’s… so beautiful.” Nina lifted her head in a daze and praised it without thinking.

Morris stepped forward. He had Nina step back a little, then carefully stretched out his hand and touched the layer of light that seemed to have no thickness at all.

And then the Wall of Silence collapsed without a sound.

That light?forged wall, which seemed to link heaven and earth and stretch without end in majestic, solemn glory, shattered like a soap bubble.

Chapter 617

Nina had never imagined this scene would happen. She had pictured changes after Mr. Morris touched the curtain of light, something rushing out of it, or the world around them turning upside down. She had even imagined a loud crack as Uncle Duncan and the entire Vanished fell from the sky. But she had never imagined it would be like this.

That curtain of light, which was likely the Wall of Silence, simply burst like a soap bubble, silent and weightless.

The grand wall of light that formed the barrier cracked into fragments in an instant. The structure that had once seemed to hold up heaven and earth scattered into motes of light in the blink of an eye.

At the moment the barrier shattered and vanished, the whole forest seemed to fall into a brief stillness. A second later, the mist that filled the woods began to flow again. Nina finally came back to her senses and ran over to her teacher in a few quick steps.

“Mr. Morris!” she cried. “Are you alright? How did that thing suddenly…”

“I don’t know…” Morris was clearly dazed as well. The old scholar, who usually seemed steady, reliable, and cultured, actually looked a bit at a loss. The corner of his mouth twitched, and for no reason he recalled the seven rules of archaeology that Teacher Rune had taught him years ago when he was studying at the Truth Academy:

“First, don’t touch things at random; second, handle the surroundings with care; third, don’t touch things at random; fourth, don’t jump to conclusions; fifth, don’t touch things at random; sixth, respect the traces of civilization; seventh, for heaven’s sake, don’t touch things at random…”

The old man lowered his head and looked blankly at his own hand. After so many years, he finally felt that familiar thought again: this absolutely must not reach his teacher’s ears.

But soon those jumbled thoughts were cut off by Nina’s sudden gasp beside him.

“Ah…” Nina could not hold back a small cry. At the edge where the shattered curtain of light had been, in the mist that continued to pour out of the forest, she stared wide?eyed into the distance, at the place that had once been hidden under the Wall of Silence.

Morris instinctively lifted his head and followed Nina’s gaze.

There, the daylight was dim and the sky was murky. Chaotic mist shrouded everything. It was the end of the forest, where wide chains of mountains and hills stretched on. In that endless fog, something vast slowly began to take shape.

At first, Morris thought it was a mountain, a jagged, twisted mountain of strange shape.

Then he realized it was a tree. A giant tree almost torn to pieces, its remains coiled and twisted as they covered the land, leaving its original form nearly impossible to imagine.

The crown that had once been enough to cover an entire plain had collapsed. The trunk had broken and fallen apart. All lush green had long faded from it, as if burned away by fierce fire. Only twisted branches like savage bones remained, jutting strangely toward the sky.

There, the huge branches rose like towers and the broken roots loomed like cities. The dreadful remains formed a wasteland like Doomsday itself. Ash the color of bone and fine dust filled every crack in the ground, spreading a pale, savage field around the giant tree. Morris and Nina stood at the edge of this dead kingdom, as if they stood on the border of the world's Doomsday, gazing at an ancient Day of Ruin.

A light wind blew from above that land of ash, lifting a fine pale dust. It mixed with the thin mist drifting out of the forest and coiled around Morris and Nina.

In the chaotic wind, Nina seemed to hear someone whispering beside her, and the voice sounded a little familiar:

"…Because she knew from the very beginning that the Wall of Silence could not save anyone. She was only a little sapling. When that day came, the only thing she could give them was a beautiful bubble…"

Nina's eyes opened a little wider, and she turned at once toward the direction of the voice.

But there was no one there, only a small tree.

A thin little tree stood there, rooted quietly in dust and ash. Its trunk and branches grew upward in crooked lines, while the outermost twigs drooped and swayed left and right in the breeze. It looked… just like the tree Shirley had mentioned, the one Celine finally turned into.

Every tree in the Nameless One's dream was taller and stronger than this one.

Nina slowly walked over to the little tree. She hesitated for a long moment, then stepped closer, placed her hand on its trunk, and asked softly, testing the words: "Celine?"

The small tree did not speak. Only the drooping branches at the edge of its crown swayed in the wind.

The whisper that had reached her ears just now felt like a mere illusion. At her fingertips there was only the rough, hard texture of bark.

Even so, Nina could not help imagining how that elf maiden, who had led her and Mr. Morris on such a long journey and had been so excited to “go home” in the mists of the Wall of Silence, had walked all the way across the edge of the forest and through that curtain of light. She pictured Celine coming to the border of this land of ash, to this place where she could gaze upon Atlantis’s remains, and quietly becoming a tree.

“Nina, look over here.”

Morris’s voice suddenly came from not far away, breaking off her wandering thoughts.

Nina snapped back to herself at once. She hurried to Morris’s side and looked in the direction her teacher was pointing.

More small trees came into her view. At the edge of the giant tree’s remains, along the line between the land of ash and dust and the forest, on this border of Doomsday, one little tree after another stood in rows, as if they were guarding that field of ash and ruin.

Or perhaps they were guarding the lush forest the dream had drawn beyond the ruins.

The whole area around the ruins was filled with countless nameless little trees.

A breeze blew. The small trees swung their branches and made a very faint sound that left one unsure whether it was the wind or the trees themselves.

Nina stared blankly at the scene. After who knew how long, she could not help murmuring to herself: “So many… Are all of these Celine…”

Morris did not speak. The old scholar only watched quietly as the small trees ringed Atlantis's remains. Then, as if something had occurred to him, he walked up a nearby rise of earth and looked back toward the direction he and Nina had come from, toward the vast forest in the distance.

Mist drifted out of the dense forest and mixed with the ash and dust over the plain, sketching out a hazy "border".

He came down from the rise with a thoughtful look on his face and walked over to Nina.

Nina noticed the expression on her teacher's face. "Mr. Morris, did you find something?"

"…I have a bold guess, 'Celine' is the Wall of Silence." Morris spoke in a low voice.

Nina stared, a little stunned.

"Atlantis created the Wall of Silence and gave it the mission of sheltering the elves. But that was an impossible task. And it seems that from the very beginning Atlantis, as the Creator, knew this. Even so, the Wall of Silence has been carrying out that order all along," Morris said, his expression serious. "I just observed the edge of the forest and confirmed that those 'nameless little trees' are all arranged along the line between the forest and the ruins. There is a faint pattern in how they are placed, like some kind of array, not a random natural spread. That is the mark of careful design."

"Then…" Nina hesitated, then could not help asking, "But we are not elves…"

"But this is not the real Atlantis or the 'primordial dream', either," Morris said, shaking his head. "Don't forget, this is only the Nameless One's dream."

Nina froze for a moment at his words, then quickly understood the deeper meaning behind them.

This was only the Nameless One’s dream.

The era the elves’ Elder Gods had described, the time of the Great Demon God Saslokar who created worlds in the dream, and the World Tree Atlantis that sheltered the elves in that dream, had truly existed long before the era of the Deep Sea.

That age had long since ended, in the Great Annihilation.

What now appeared in Lightwind Harbor was only a massive series of manifestations caused by the Sun’s malfunction and the approach of “dusk”, an “echo” that seemed to be left in the racial memory of the elves.

Within this “echo”, Atlantis and the Wall of Silence would treat every individual who entered this forest with goodwill as an “elf”.

Because the elves had died many, many years ago, long before any sapient races other than elves appeared in this world.

“So what do we do next?” Nina asked.

Morris did not answer right away. Instead he calmed himself and reached out to the Captain in the depths of his mind. He reported everything that had happened here and then waited patiently.

…

Duncan was a little stunned.

He was still with Agatha in the hold of the “Vanished in the dream”, studying that massive Elder God spine. He hoped to find more useful information there related to the Great Demon God Saslokar, or to dig out more secrets about the Vanished itself.

He had not expected that, in the short time when he was not paying attention, Morris and Nina’s team would pull off something this earthshaking.

They had pierced the Wall of Silence, seen the truth inside it, and even seen Atlantis, which had already become a field of remains.

Duncan felt a strange unreality in his daze.

The “Witch” and the illiterate squad were still wandering around in the forest. The Athlete was still struggling alone in the desert. The Historian had already taken his Student to the middle of the map and dug up an Elder God’s grave.

It felt like sending out two investigators at the start of a game and then, three turns later, finding Cthulhu already lying dead on the doorstep.

Duncan shook his head and pushed these sudden wild thoughts aside for the moment.

Morris was still waiting for his instructions.

He lifted his head and looked at the space around him, filled with dark mist.

Saslokar’s spine stretched out beneath his feet. This shattered Elder God seemed to be using it to send him some kind of message. Even the Vanished, built atop that Elder God spine, seemed to be doing its best to show him its “memories”.

Duncan let out a slow breath.

“Approach that ‘ruin’,” he said in his heart. “Investigate Atlantis.”

Chapter 618: Rabby and Little Doll

Several figures in dark coats or hooded robes were moving through the depths of the dense forest.

A faint black dust hung around them. Black symbiotic pact chains stretched out from their bodies. Savage Abyssal demons walked at their sides. Richard and his “brethren” had already been acting in this dream for some time, and according to what the Death-Omen Bird sensed, they were now very close to the “Wall of Silence”.

But the group suddenly stopped.

The mood in the forest had changed in a subtle way. At some point, a thin mist had begun to rise from nowhere, curling through the clearings between the trees. As the mist appeared, the whole forest became even more… “silent” than before.

Dumont frowned. He remembered that when they had first entered the dream of the Nameless One, this forest had still been full of sounds. Unknown birds beat their wings and took off. Unknown beasts roared in the distance. They had never been able to see those birds or beasts, but all those sounds of life had always been there.

Now those sounds had vanished. Only the occasional wind and the faint rustle of swaying leaves remained, making the silence feel even deeper.

Any change in the Nameless One’s dream had to be treated with great care.

“These mists feel a bit wrong,” another Annihilator said softly. A jellyfish like drifting smoke floated in the air beside him. The tentacles that hung beneath it twitched in small, uneasy movements. “My demon senses fear and tension… It is the emotion this ‘forest’ itself is releasing.”

“The Nameless One’s dream does have emotional shifts. It is itself a vast mind,” Dumont said in a low voice. “If its mood suddenly changed, it may mean someone reached the core of that mind… Could someone have found the ‘Wall of Silence’?”

“Would it be our people?” the Annihilator who had a symbiotic pact with the Smokewisp Jellyfish asked.

“We are not sure yet. We cannot reach the other brethren the chapter sent into this place,” Dumont said. Then he frowned and looked toward a figure at the back of the group. That person had been scratching at himself the whole time. “Richard, what are you doing?”

Richard started as if waking from a dream. He realized he had been scratching the skin around his neck and his waist. Puzzled, he raised his hand and saw many tiny white fibers caught under his nails. They looked like…

“Cotton,” he whispered.

“Cotton? What cotton?” Dumont frowned. “You do not seem quite right.”

“No, I am fine,” Richard said at once. He lifted his head and patted down his clothes, which he had mussed up by scratching. “I just feel a little itchy. This mist makes me uncomfortable.”

Dumont nodded and did not press the matter. Instead, he turned his gaze to the others: “We should already be within the influence of the Wall of Silence. According to those so?called ‘Preachers’, this is the ‘gaze’ zone of Atlantis’s mind. If you see or hear anything that was not present in the forest before, you must tell the others at once.”

Listening to his voice, Richard felt a dull irritation in his chest.

Dumont had already started to lead the team with the air of a leader. That arrogant, self?important attitude had always been unpleasant… The group did need someone to give orders, but that role should have been his.

“It really makes one angry…” A light little voice spoke in Richard’s mind. “Rabby thinks this is very unfair. Rabby feels sorry for you…”

“It really is unfair,” Richard muttered under his breath, moving his lips so that only he could hear. “But this is the Saint’s arrangement… and Dumont is indeed capable…”

“Is the most important reason not that all these troublesome people are watching you?” the voice in his head whispered, in a tone of tender concern and easy trust. “If no one were watching, then none of this would be troublesome at all…”

Richard frowned and slowly shook his head, sensing on instinct that something was not quite right. He still hesitated: “But… what should I do…?”

“Be patient. Be a little patient, my lovely Little Doll. Rabby is only telling you about some possibilities. It is not the time yet… The chance will come, when someone is left alone…”

Richard covered his forehead, torn with doubt: “But I cannot… they are all my brethren…”

“Yes, they are all your brethren, my lovely Little Doll. You must not hurt them. Rabby does not wish to see you harm one another—so you have to help them instead.”

“Help them? How do I help them?”

“Have you not noticed? Your brethren… their bellies are empty. They do not even have cotton inside them. How pitiful. No cotton, no warmth. No cotton, no soul. No cotton, nothing at all… You already have cotton, my lovely Little Doll. Give them some cotton too. Rabby can lend you cotton, as long as you… remember to give it back…”

The small, sweet voice in his mind slowly faded away.

Richard blinked and suddenly felt confused. He thought he had just heard someone speaking to him, and even remembered holding a conversation. But with a single moment of distraction, the voice was gone, as if… it had all been an illusion.

He lifted his head and looked at Dumont ahead of him and at the other brethren around him.

How pitiful they were.

“…We will set mark points here,” Dumont said, apparently not noticing Richard’s gaze. He had already begun to assign the next steps according to the plan. “From here, we can already affect the lower layers of Atlantis’s mind. It is a suitable area for deployment.”

The cultists around them all nodded. Then each of them took out the tool used for the ritual—a strange little knife, black as pitch, with a curved blade.

Richard paused for a moment, then reached into his coat as well and felt his own bone shard knife.

It was a small carving knife, only the size of his palm, made from some blackened bone. Strange, intricate patterns covered its surface, and it gave off an ominous air.

Richard remembered that the raw material for this knife came from the bones left behind by Abyssal demons whose summoning rituals had failed. Not every summoning and symbiotic pact ritual succeeded. The failures became nourishment on the altar. Those Annihilators who lacked talent washed the altar with their blood, and the demons that died in a ritual runaway state left behind bone shards that could be used to make tools.

This ought to have been basic common sense for every Annihilator who had advanced to the priest rank. Yet for some reason, when Richard recalled this knowledge now, he felt a strange… sense of novelty.

He shook his head and pushed that odd feeling aside, then looked toward Dumont: “We have to set as many Marks as possible before this dream ends. If we split up, it might be more efficient.”

“…Splitting up means danger,” Dumont said after thinking over the suggestion. He shook his head. “Do not forget your previous failure—brethren who acted alone had almost no power to fight back when they faced His followers.”

Dumont really seemed to be giving a serious warning, with no mockery in his words. Yet Richard felt he saw a hint of scorn in the other man’s eyes, and anger flared up inside him like poison fire.

He felt he had been deeply humiliated.

Yet the next second, that rage like poison fire suddenly went out and was replaced by an icy calm. Richard was surprised at how cool?headed he could be.

He looked at Dumont with an unusually sincere, steady expression, and his words carried a quiet power of persuasion: “Of course we cannot move alone. I mean groups of two or three. That way we can watch each other and still finish the task quickly. And to be honest, even if we do meet those followers and fall into a disadvantage, we can still withdraw from this dream at once. From what I observed last time, those followers do not seem able to come and go in the dream as freely as we do…”

The earnest look on Richard’s face and the calm steadiness in his tone had their effect.

Dumont began to think it over again.

Here was a fellow believer with much Dreamwalking experience. Though his condition had not been very good since the last exploration, his proposal now was clearly well considered and trustworthy, and every reason he gave was sound.

If he kept ignoring or rejecting this advice, it would make him look as if he were deliberately targeting someone experienced. Coming across as petty and narrow?minded would do nothing to help him lead the team.

Dumont felt he ought to accept the suggestion. As a new, half?unspoken leader, accepting advice was also part of building his authority.

Besides, if anything truly went wrong later, the responsibility would be Richard’s.

“Very well. Then we will go in pairs and set mark points along the edge of the mist,” Dumont said with a nod, quickly giving orders. Then he looked at Richard. “Richard, you are with me.”

“Of course,” Richard said with a smile, as if he were very pleased with this arrangement.

Dumont was pleased as well.

“Then let us move out.”

The Annihilators moved at once.

They split into pairs, each carrying the ritual dagger used to leave Marks. The pairs headed off in different directions along the forest paths where the thin mist flowed, and soon vanished into the depths of the woods.

Richard took his own ritual dagger and walked toward Dumont. But he was careful. He knew he still had to wait. He had to wait until the other pairs were far enough away, and until Dumont's attention was fixed on the "work" of setting a mark.

Then he could "help" Dumont.

"Let us begin, my lovely Little Doll," the voice in his mind said.

"Let us begin, Dumont," Richard said.

Chapter 619: The Hunt and the Phantom

The small knife, carved from black bone shards, drew a shallow cut across the rough bark, leaving an inconspicuous mark on the trunk of the towering tree. Then blood was smeared over it to pour spirit and blood power into it—each mark had to be painted with blood three times, again and again…

Richard followed his memory as he worked, carving Marks. With the bone shard knife in his hand, he etched runes that symbolized the power of the Abyssal Deep into the tree trunks and smeared his own blood over them. Then he lifted his head and looked at Dumont, who was doing the same thing not far away.

He walked over, as if he meant to speak to him.

“Each mark is weak on its own,” Dumont said casually when he saw Richard come closer. “But if there are enough of them, they will exert a strong enough influence on Atlantis.”

“Still not enough… far from enough…” Richard muttered vaguely, turning the little bone shard knife between his fingers without thinking.

“It is true that these Marks alone are not enough. But once the process begins, it will only speed up. When Atlantis ‘remembers’ that day, that will be the time to reap the fruit,” Dumont said with a smile, seeming full of confidence in the future. “Those so?called Preachers may not be reliable, but at least this time the information they gave us was useful.”

Richard did not answer. He only lifted his head, staring up at the big tree where Dumont had just left a mark, as if he were quietly admiring the scenery. He looked so intent that Dumont also raised his head without thinking, glancing in puzzlement at the crown of the tree.

“What are you looking at? Is there some—”

Richard suddenly lifted his arm in a pose and at an angle no human joints should ever have been able to make—almost as if his right arm had been folded into three pieces. His hand swung in through Dumont’s blind spot, and he drove the bone shard knife hard into Dumont’s chest.

But the little knife used for the ritual was meant to kill the Undying, so this blow only pierced his skin.

A sharp stab of pain burst from his chest. The sudden, senseless attack left Dumont’s mind blank for a heartbeat, but then he reacted. He slapped Richard’s arm away, clutched his wound with one hand, and leaped back.

Black chains flashed into view, and a hideous Abyssal Hound appeared at Dumont’s back. But before the hound could move, the Death-Omen Bird on Richard’s shoulder dove down. Its great skeletal wings stretched and twisted like shackles, and in an instant they wrapped around the hound. With a chorus of creaking, grinding bone, the two demons tangled together, locked in a struggle that could not quickly be broken.

“Are you mad?!” Dumont stared, eyes wide, at Richard, who was standing not far away with a blank face. “You are trying to kill me?!”

“No,” Richard said, shaking his head. He glanced at the Abyssal Hound that the Death-Omen Bird held in check. A strange, hard?to?name disgust flickered over his face, but he still spoke to Dumont very earnestly. “I only want to help you.”

“Help me?” Dumont was stunned. He looked at Richard as if he were looking at a madman, yet a heavy confusion welled up inside him. The ritual knife was meant to kill the Undying; that sudden strike had only managed to cut him. He honestly did not know how he ought to react. Only one thing was certain: Richard was not in his right mind.

Richard nodded solemnly. “Yes, help you. Your body is empty. I have to help you fill it with cotton. That will make you better.”

“…Cotton?” Dumont repeated the strange word in a daze. “What nonsense are you talking…”

He stopped mid?sentence.

He felt an itch at the spot on his chest where the knife had pierced him.

The faint itch quickly turned into a strange feeling he could not ignore, as if something were growing there, squirming there.

He scratched the itchy spot without thinking. Then he forgot to keep watching the clearly unstable Richard and lowered his head to look at his wound.

The blood had already stopped. On his clothes, stained with a little red, he could just make out some white fluff. The fluff was slowly spreading, as if… it were being formed by the blood itself changing.

After a brief hesitation, Dumont pulled open his collar. He saw the tiny wound closing. Between the writhing, shrinking flesh, cotton was slowly working its way into his body.

The Death-Omen Bird and the Abyssal Hound, still locked together, slowly ceased their struggle. The dull?witted demons knew nothing of hatred or anger; their actions were ruled by the emotions and understanding of the ones bound to them by the symbiotic pact. As the skeletal wings folded away, the two demons returned to their respective masters.

Dumont lifted his head and gave Richard a peculiar look. He remembered that their relationship had never been very good, especially in recent times. They did not have any great enmity, but small frictions between them were common.

That was exactly why, when he had decided they would split into pairs, he had asked to keep Richard with him—he did not want Richard pulling any "little tricks" out of his sight.

He had never imagined that this fellow would do something like this to him.

After hesitating for a long time, Dumont finally spoke, sounding awkward: "You are… surprisingly kind."

Richard smiled. In that moment, the trivial rift between him and Dumont vanished—cotton had mended the brotherly bond between him and his fellow.

"We should help the others as well," Richard said earnestly. "Everyone is hollow inside. They all need cotton."

"Yes, everyone needs cotton…" Dumont still was not used to this new self, and his expression was a little stiff as he spoke, but he agreed with Richard's idea. "We can start with Sariel's group. He is an honest, hardworking man."

"No problem, but we need a plan. People without cotton are not rational. They may not yet understand how important cotton is—just like you a moment ago. We must think carefully about how they will react…"

"Yes. Rabby also thinks you need a plan…"

"We can discuss it as we walk."

"Then let us set out." "Set out." "Set out."

Richard and Dumont lifted their heads at the same time and looked down the mist?shrouded forest path. Then they stepped forward and walked toward the foggy depths of the dream.

Rabby went hunting.

…

The ground, covered in ash and black cinders, creaked underfoot and always felt as if it might collapse at any moment. Fallen, broken branches lay crisscrossed everywhere, more troublesome than undergrowth and vines in any forest.

Nina and Morris moved with difficulty through this vast tangle of wreckage, which seemed to stretch on without end. After a long time, they were still only skirting its outer edge.

“This is even harder to walk through than the forest outside,” Nina grumbled. “At least the forest has little paths trampled out by wild animals… Here it is all ash that your foot sinks into with every step.”

As she spoke, she lifted her foot out of the ash and cinders. Her filthy shoe made her frown.

She steadied herself against a charred branch, pulled off her left shoe, and shook it hard. Several bits of stone and black grit fell out.

“And I feel as if we have been circling the edge of this scorched ground the whole time,” she went on. “Can we really find a way into the center of the wreckage like this?”

“The collapsed crown of the tree is blocking the path to Atlantis’s main trunk… It is troublesome indeed,” Morris said, frowning as he looked at the jagged, overlapping black branches in the distance.

They called them branches, but their size was already beyond what “branch” should mean. The broken limbs that had fallen from the top of the World Tree were truly gigantic. Even the twigs that were small only by comparison were often a hundred meters long, with diameters close to that of a tower. They had crashed down in a tangled heap over this scorched land, forming a structure so huge it was frightening. From a distance, it looked less like a mass of charred deadwood and more like… a gigantic city that had collapsed from the clouds.

With such a mountain of “fallen leaves and twigs” in front of them, trying to force their way through with brute strength was simply not something mortals could do. The only choice was to go around and around, or risk squeezing into the gaps between branches to look for narrow paths that the ash had not yet completely choked off.

“If Miss Vanna were here, she might just charge straight through,” Nina muttered when that thought of “brute force” crossed her mind. “All this wreckage in the way would not be able to block even one of her punches.”

“Vanna does not rely on brute strength alone,” Morris, who had known Vanna for many years as her elder, could not help saying. “And even she, facing something like this, would probably…”

He stopped halfway through his sentence, seeming to hesitate.

A moment later, he shook his head. “Very well, perhaps not. She might really be able to do it.”

“Actually, I could do it too…” Nina muttered under her breath.

Morris gave the young lady a look, as if he wanted to say something. But just as he was about to speak, a light breeze swept over the ashen ground. Dust billowed up, and through the sudden haze he and Nina both saw a vague shadow flicker not far ahead.

It looked like someone standing blankly in the wind… an elf?

Nina froze for an instant, then quickly turned her head. “Mr. Morris, did you just see over there—”

“I saw it,” Morris said before Nina could finish, his expression turning serious. “It looked like an elf.”

“It did not look like Celine…” Nina said, uncertain. “The way it was dressed was more like… more like…”

She hesitated, unable to draw a conclusion for the moment, but Morris gave a slight nod.

“Like a resident of Lightwind Harbor.”

Chapter 620: the sunlight Today Was So Nice

In the ruins of Atlantis, in the wind that suddenly blew across the scorched ground, a phantom appeared that looked like a modern Lightwind Harbor resident.

Nina and Morris both saw the phantom—it was clearly not an illusion.

“There is nothing here…” Morris walked to the spot where the phantom had just appeared, carefully checked the surroundings, and said in a low voice with a frown.

The sudden incident made Nina a little nervous too. She instinctively lowered her voice: “Why did that one just now look like a ghost…”

Morris gave this young lady a strange look: “Do you need to be afraid of ghosts?”

“…Right.”

Nina muttered this only after the fact, and the moment her voice faded, something else suddenly appeared at the edge of her vision.

It was another “phantom”. It appeared in the wind and dust, flashed past between the huge blackened ruins woven from branches. In that brief instant, Nina felt as if she had seen the person’s face clearly… she even felt that face looked a bit familiar.

It looked like the owner of that clothing shop in the western district of Lightwind Harbor, an elf lady who always wore a smile—she appeared in the wind with a blank face, then scattered with the wind again.

“Over here!” Nina reacted at once, grabbed Morris, and ran toward where the second phantom had appeared. Before they even reached that spot, Nina saw something else seem to flash through the mist in the distance.

Phantoms, phantoms of elves, began to appear again and again between the wind and dust. As Nina and Morris went deeper into the ruins, the phantoms appeared more and more often. At first they only flickered past the edges of their vision now and then. Later, no matter which way they looked, they could see one or two hazy figures, like ghosts, flickering in and out of the air.

Without noticing, Nina had already widened her eyes. She and Morris walked across the scorched ground that was covered in ash and black cinders, moving between the huge wreckage of Atlantis. Around them, “Lightwind Harbor residents” wearing modern clothes kept appearing and fading like unstable ghosts. These phantoms wore blank expressions and drifted aimlessly through the dust. They had no reaction at all to Nina and Morris drawing near, and they carried a… chilling feeling.

At last, Nina and Morris stopped in a wide open space.

Phantoms were everywhere around them, phantoms of elves. Mixed in among them were some shadows whose outlines were so vague their race could not be told. Near and far, real and unreal tangled together, flickering in and out. Chaotic winds raised sand and dust, blew through these hollow ghosts, blew through the vast, broken canopy of Atlantis. Under the dim, turbid sky, countless phantoms gathered in the ruins of this legendary “World Tree”, like a strange and horrifying… wraith gathering.

“This time I really am starting to get a little scared…” Nina nervously tugged at the hem of her clothes. The air around her twisted slightly, and hot radiance flickered in her eyes from time to time. “Are these really all the elves from Lightwind Harbor… I even saw that uncle at the corner of Crown Street who sells ‘elf wraps’. He puts that stinking rotten organ meat sauce in the wraps…”

As soon as the words left her mouth, she nervously glanced at that phantom not far away—because she still remembered that whenever she described “elf wraps” like that, that uncle would immediately get very angry and serious and correct her, saying it was actually “a pure traditional sauce with four thousand years of history”. The look on his face would be quite scary.

Yet that phantom simply faded quietly, just like the other phantoms that kept appearing and vanishing around them.

Nina turned her head and looked at Morris: “…Could all the people who disappear from Lightwind Harbor every night be here? Are they all inside the ‘Wall of Silence’?”

Morris had not spoken since just now. He only frowned as he looked around, a thoughtful look on his face. After a moment he suddenly broke the silence: “Atlantis is ‘protecting’ them.”

Nina did not understand at once: “Huh?”

“This is Atlantis’s ‘protection’,” Morris seemed to have figured some things out. “She is trying to ‘gather’ the minds of all the elves to the inner side of the Wall of Silence. She firmly believes this can protect them when the world’s Doomsday comes.”

The old scholar paused here. After a brief thought he went on: “Under normal conditions, every elf who enters the Nameless One’s dream should be teleported directly to this place and become one of the phantoms here.

But the few of us are exceptions. The captain's power lets us stay clear-headed in the dream. That is why 'Celine' appeared to us—Atlantis thinks we are elves who have lost our way outside."

Nina listened in stunned silence, but she quickly understood what her teacher said, and her instincts told her this was probably the truth.

But this could not explain what Miss Vanna had run into—that desert, and that giant who claimed to be a "God", what were those about?

Besides that question, Nina immediately thought of another, even more critical problem.

"Then if the minds of all these elves are trapped in Atlantis's ruins every night… won't something go wrong if this goes on for long?!"

"Of course it will," Morris said, his expression grave. "Outside Lightwind Harbor, a condition called Sleep Sickness has already started to spread among elf residents of other city-states. Inside Lightwind Harbor, the dream's corruption has already begun to leave marks in the Mortal Realm. If this kind of 'protection' keeps going… something big is bound to happen."

Nina opened her mouth, as if she wanted to say something more, but right then the wind and dust rose again before her eyes, and a new phantom appeared in front of her.

It was a middle-aged man whose hair was dry and messy, whose beard looked as if it had not been shaved for days. He looked sloppy and tired. As an elf, a member of a race stamped with "healthy, long-lived, and elegant" as basic traits, that appearance instead gave people the feeling that his health was already at the limit, as if he might drop dead at any time.

Nina recognized this phantom at a glance.

“It is Master Taran Ael,” she said in surprise as she looked at Taran Ael, whose face was blank and who was just as dazed and frozen as the other phantoms. Even though she had already seen other “acquaintances” here a moment ago, seeing this elf scholar still caught her off guard. “He appeared here too…”

“It seems everyone who disappears during the Nameless One’s dream will appear here. That is not surprising,” Morris said calmly. As he spoke, he walked up to Taran Ael’s phantom and looked at him with a slight frown. “The key is to figure out what state these elves in the ‘dreamwalking’ phase are in. They seem to have formed an ever more stable link with Atlantis. It is unlikely we can wake them easily…”

Nina also came closer. She braced herself and poked Master Taran Ael’s arm with a finger: “I remember Mr. Ael was trapped in a dream once before. What method did he use then to wake himself up and save himself…”

Taran Ael’s phantom suddenly blinked.

Nina thought she had seen wrong and lifted her head to look again.

Taran Ael slowly turned his head and shifted his gaze onto her.

Nina: “…”

The next second, a huge fireball rose into the sky above the ruins of Atlantis.

A shocking shockwave shattered the chaotic clouds in the sky. The chaotic winds circling the remains of the World Tree froze for an instant. The terrifying fireball rose like a new star and, in just a few seconds, turned the whole scorched land as bright as day!

But the fireball did not explode directly on the ruins of Atlantis or on the “phantoms” wandering within the ruins.

Her usual hard training showed its effect. At the critical moment, Nina raised her head to the sky—her scream turned into the roar of the Sun. The spewing stellar matter only created a temporary Sun high above the Nameless One's dream that lasted a few seconds. In the grand Coronal Blast, the damage was held to a minimum.

But even such a brief impact sparked a reaction from the Nameless One's dream at once. The forests close to the Wall of Silence howled as they grew madly. The ground trembled under the Sun's light as if it were about to boil. Distant mountains rumbled, and it seemed that if it had lasted even one second longer, Atlantis would have awakened under this otherworldly sunlight. Yet as the fireball in the sky faded, the Nameless One's dream still calmed down at the edge of collapse.

Inside the ruins of Atlantis, the huge cloud of dust raised by the shockwave in the sky had not yet settled when a dusty figure crawled out of a heap of ash—Morris. He slapped the dust hard off his clothes, shook black cinders out of his hair, then dug at his ears before finally lifting his head to glare at Nina: "How many times has the captain told you, stop jumping straight to blowing things up every time you get a scare!"

Nina's whole body still shone with golden sunlight, and she herself had not completely cooled down. Hearing her teacher Morris's words, she scratched her face in embarrassment. Before she could speak, Taran Ael's still-shaken voice came from the side: "Is that how you use 'get scared then blow up'?"

Morris's beard bristled as he glared, his face full of annoyance: "Just say whether it blew up or not!"

It was no easy thing to make this usually refined and calm old scholar lose his composure like this. It was the first time Nina had seen her teacher almost jump up and curse. But compared to this small matter, what shocked her more was Master Taran Ael beside them.

This elf scholar, who a moment ago had only been a dazed phantom, had now turned into a vivid and lively “mind entity”. He stood in the swirling dust. Though the recent impact of the Sun had left him rather disheveled, he was clearly completely awake now.

This Grand Scholar was staring blankly at Nina, who was still glowing, his eyes full of lingering shock.

Clearly, having the Sun blow up in his face the instant he woke up was a bit too much stimulation for a middle-aged man in poor health.

Chapter 621: “Assembly”

The sunlight around Nina finally faded bit by bit. She walked toward Taran Ael in doubt and surprise, as if she was still trying to confirm whether this elf scholar had really “woken up” from his hazy phantom state. After looking him up and down several times, she tested the waters and said: “Mr. Ael, you really woke up?”

But Taran Ael did not answer her. He only frowned slightly, and his face did not look good.

This made Nina suspect for a moment that the fireball explosion just now had been a bit too strong, and this Grand Scholar’s ears had not recovered yet.

But a few seconds later, Taran Ael suddenly reacted. He waved a hand at Nina in a bit of a panic, then rushed to the side and bent over, starting to retch violently.

Nina jumped in fright but did not know what to do. She could only step up and pat this Grand Scholar on the back. When he finally got a little better, she spoke, tense and embarrassed: “Sorry, I must have blown you silly…”

“No… that is not the reason,” Taran Ael said, gasping for breath as he waved his hand hard. Nina’s attempt at concern almost made him choke again. After almost half a minute of panting, this elf scholar finally straightened his back and explained with a pained look: “It is probably the medicine.”

Nina froze when she heard this: “Medicine? What medicine?”

“The medicine that lets me ‘wake up’ in this dream,” Taran Ael said. His breathing had evened out, and he was thumping his chest with his fist as he spoke. “Only I woke up? Did you see anyone else?”

Morris was walking over from the side at this moment. Hearing this, he frowned without thinking: “There are others? What exactly is going on?”

Taran Ael glanced at Morris, then subconsciously looked around at this strange, unfamiliar place. He was clearly still a bit dazed, but he still began to explain earnestly: “Lord Ted Lier, Truth Keeper, organized a small team. I served as the team’s advisor—we gathered before the dream began and drank the ‘Blood Raven’ elixir…”

“Blood Raven Elixir?!” Morris was startled at once. He looked at the man in front of him in disbelief. “Isn’t that a bit reckless on your part?”

Nina did not understand what they were talking about and could not help asking: “Mr. Morris, what is it? What is the Blood Raven Elixir?”

“A kind of magic potion, extracted from several poisonous fungi. Very dangerous,” Morris explained. “It acts directly on the mind. After a delayed effect, it can put a person into a state like death, letting spirit and flesh separate and their senses go out of place. It is used to help read extremely dangerous ‘knowledge’. The people who drink it can, in that sleeping fake death, avoid the deadly stages of corruption or the curse. But because the elixir itself is too dangerous, only after strict review by the Academy, with tight safety preparations and confirmation that it is truly necessary, will the Truth Academy allow such an elixir to be brewed and drunk.”

The old scholar explained this, then could not help glancing at Taran Ael again: “I still have to say it again… isn’t that a bit reckless on your part?”

“But it worked very well. My guess was proven—so long as we force a rather strong case of ‘mental misalignment’, we can wake up inside the Nameless One’s dream, just like a punch-card machine will automatically spit out paper tape that does not meet the standard,” Taran Ael said, spreading his hands. “Of course, the other possibility was that we would be ‘ejected’ directly from the Nameless One’s dream and return to the Mortal Realm. But now it seems… the power of this dream is even greater than we imagined. Even a fake death on the level of the mind can only let us regain clarity inside the dream. If we want to leave this dream, we may still need some other way of shocking ourselves…”

He deliberately paused here, a proud look appearing on his face.

“An advanced application of the ‘Sudden-Death Method’—I was the one who came up with this idea.”

Morris stared, dumbfounded, at this Grand Scholar who was as famous as himself. After holding it in for a long time, he finally squeezed out one sentence: “…How did Lord Truth Keeper agree to a plan like that from you?”

“He did think there were problems with my plan,” Taran Ael shrugged. “But I told him that although the matter was serious, we should still put safety first, so he finally agreed to start with a more conservative plan…”

Morris: “…?”

He had always thought he was already quite radical on the path of scholarly research. Only now did he suddenly realize that in Lightwind Harbor, this elf city-state near the border, the elves who faced the “frontier fields” every day were even bolder.

“Don’t make that face, Morris. I actually know what you are worried about. We are doing something very dangerous, and this does not really fit the code of conduct for a ‘scholar’,” Taran Ael said. He had noticed the change in Morris’s expression, and at last he put away his smile and grew serious. “But we may not have many choices left.

“You have probably already gotten the news. A condition called ‘Sleep Sickness’ is spreading in other city-states. It is clearly tied to the growth of the Nameless One’s dream. And outside my laboratory, a tree that has drilled from the dream into the Mortal Realm is using its crown to cover my roof and balcony…

“So it is time to do some risky things, because this world does not seem to plan on giving us the time to get fully ready.”

Morris fell silent.

Taran Ael once more studied the surroundings. After a moment, he shook his head: “It seems the first thing I have to do here is find the others.”

“The good news is that you should all be within the scope of these ruins. The bad news is that the scope of these ruins is huge,” Morris sighed. “Now I will tell you the first bit of experience for moving in this dream—during a first ‘dreamwalking’, even if you and your companions are in the same room in the Mortal Realm, after you start dreamwalking you will still be scattered at random.”

Taran Ael looked at Morris, and at Nina, who was standing honestly behind Morris.

He did not see the captain’s other followers.

But it was obvious that these “Lost Home followers”, who had already acted several times in the Nameless One’s dream, had gathered a lot of experience with this vast dream.

“I need more guidance.” Taran Ael looked seriously at the two people before him.

…

“What was that just now?!”

In the forest outside the Wall of Silence, a black-robed Annihilator raised his head toward the sky, watching that intense light fade with startled doubt. After a long time he could not help crying out softly.

Yet his companion in the same group could not answer the question either —another Annihilator was also staring in shock in the same direction, unable to make a sound for a long time.

Just now, a huge fireball had risen from deep in the forest. It was definitely not something that should appear in the Nameless One’s dream. It almost shone over the forest like another Sun, tearing apart all the clouds. Its intense light seemed enough to pierce time and space, and in the light and shock of that fireball’s blast, the whole forest had a moment of “restless agitation”.

Plants had grown madly, the ground had shaken, and inexplicable howls had come out of nowhere in the air.

It was as frightening as when a “corruption phenomenon” broke out.

But this terrifying anomalous phenomenon lasted only a few seconds. Before the forest could undergo some irreversible great change, the fireball disappeared as suddenly as it had appeared.

It only left the two Annihilators, who had been carefully setting “marks” a minute earlier, staring at each other in the forest.

After who knew how long, the cultist who had first cried out finally broke the silence again: “That did not look like Atlantis awakening… it was not quite like how those preachers described it.”

“Then it might be some kind of external force…” the other one said, unconsciously lowering his voice. “That huge fireball… could it be those Suntists making trouble?”

“It shouldn’t be. The Saint is watching those Suntists’s every move. They should not suddenly do something that far out of line… And besides, even if they really are going to tear things open in the end, they would not be unable to hold back this early, right? The ‘final moment’ hasn’t come yet.”

The two Annihilators muttered uneasily. After a while longer, they finally, without planning it, thought of the same possibility.

“Could it be…” one of them began, his tone hesitant and uneasy, “could it be his followers again?”

“‘His’?”

“You know who I mean.”

“…What kind of joke is that?” The other Annihilator’s voice grew more tense at once. “That kind of commotion… that kind of commotion…”

He held it in for a long time before finally forcing out the second half: “What kind of monster would have to make a commotion like that… We aren’t really going to have to fight something like that, are we?”

Even cultists who followed the Abyssal Deep seemed to finally feel a trace of fear when faced with a power they could not understand.

But just then, the sound of footsteps suddenly came from deeper in the forest, cutting off the two cultists’ talk.

The two of them turned their heads sharply like startled birds toward the source of the sound, but when they saw the figures that appeared, they let out a sudden breath of relief.

They were their comrades.

It was Dumont, Richard, and the others who had split up earlier to set marks throughout the forest.

“Did you see that huge fireball that appeared in the sky just now?” one of the two could not help saying. “Could that have been the followers of that ghost captain?”

“We saw it. It was indeed very impressive,” Dumont nodded. His voice was as always, carrying a calm that made those around him believe him. “But don’t worry. We will not run into that power. We will all be very safe from here on.”

The two Annihilators looked at each other without thinking.

“Are we getting ready to pull out?” one of them asked Dumont. “It looks like everyone has gathered.”

“Yes, everyone has gathered,” Dumont said with a smile. He walked forward slowly, leading everyone to walk forward with him. “You were the last ones.”

Chapter 622: Howling Shadows

In the area of the World Tree's ruins, now covered in ash and black cinders, Morris, Nina, and Taran Ael had already found several knowledge guardians who had woken from the phantoms.

Just as Morris had predicted, these knowledge guardians, who had in effect just taken their first Dreamwalk, had been scattered to random places across the ruins of Atlantis. Luckily, most of them had not been thrown too far apart. Nina's fireball rising into the sky was very eye-catching, and the scattered knowledge guardians had all come to check it out. That let them regroup quickly.

All except one.

"We still haven't found Lord Ted Lier," a knowledge guardian in a short robe, holding a book and a revolver, came back to their temporary camp and said to Taran Ael, Morris, and the others who were waiting there. "I didn't see the agreed-on marks, and the Aetheric Call didn't get any response."

"Could it be that he still hasn't 'woken up'?" Taran Ael frowned without thinking. "That shouldn't be… I gave him quite a large dose. Even with a Truth Keeper's body, it should have worked smoothly…"

Nina glanced at the uneasy knowledge guardian across from her, then at Taran Ael, who was frowning in thought. She hesitated, but still could not help speaking: "Then maybe the dose was too big…"

Taran Ael froze for a moment. When he reacted, he waved his hands again and again: "Impossible, impossible. I am a careful scholar. How could I make that kind of mistake with a dosage? And Lord Ted Lier is an expert in alchemy. He knows exactly how much potion he can take…"

The more he talked, the smaller his voice became, until he finally added in a doubtful murmur: "…Probably."

Nina and Morris: "…?"

"How much Blood Raven Elixir did you give Ted Lier, exactly?" Morris could not help asking.

Taran Ael thought for a moment, then raised his hand and gestured: "About a bottle this tall…"

Morris stared at him: "…You let him down a whole bottle of the mixture in a beer bottle?! Ordinary people use a dropper for this stuff!"

"Come on, he is a Truth Keeper," Taran Ael spread his hands. "It is really hard to push him into a 'false death' level of mental dissociation. A dose that could make an ordinary person drop dead ten times over only serves to quench his thirst. What else could I do? Lord Ted Lier even purified the potion once more himself. Otherwise, he really couldn't drink that much…"

Morris listened in stunned silence. After a long moment, he muttered with a strange look on his face: "Back when I was in school, this Truth Keeper wasn't this excessive…"

"It is from teaching graduating classes," Taran Ael waved his hand. "First he drank to drown his sorrows, then he used neurotoxins to drown his sorrows. Now I don't even dare guess what he puts in his cup of water after class… Anyway, no matter what, the problem is definitely not the dose of Blood Raven Elixir."

"Lord Ted Lier might be trapped deeper in this dream, in a place even the Aetheric Call cannot reach," a knowledge guardian nearby saw the topic drifting further and further away and quickly cut in. "This place feels very strange. When we split up to search the nearby ruins just now, we found that once we walked beyond a certain distance, we started feeling dazed. Our minds went blank, and there were even short periods of memory loss. Our Psychic Sensing of each other also became intermittent…"

"It really was like that," another knowledge guardian nodded at once. "Selanie even said that for a few seconds she completely forgot who she was, forgot everything about the Mortal Realm. She felt as if she had been born here, and wanted to stay here forever…"

Nina looked at the two speaking knowledge guardians, thought for a moment, and asked: "You are really sure this isn't because the dose was too high?"

"My dosage was absolutely fine!" Before the two guardians could answer, Taran Ael could not hold back. "Miss, please trust the value of a first-class alchemist license, and besides, I am the inventor of the 'Sudden-Death Method'. No one understands it better than I do…"

"The fact that you invented something called the 'Sudden-Death Method' is reason enough for the Truth Academy to take your license away," Morris could not help grumbling. But after thinking it over seriously, he still shook his head. "It probably has nothing to do with the side effects of the potion. What those two knowledge guardians described sounds more like the Nameless One's Dream itself affecting them."

Nina blinked as she listened: "But the two of us have been moving around in there for such a long time, and we never felt anything like that…"

Morris thought for a moment, then raised his head and looked at the distant, majestic remains of the canopy and the phantoms wandering in confusion among the ruins. "Maybe… because in the end, we are not elves."

Nina understood her teacher at once. Taran Ael and the Elven guardians around them also showed thoughtful looks.

After a short silence, Taran Ael slowly stood up. He walked onto a nearby boulder and gazed into the distance with a complicated expression.

The long stretch of charred ruins rose and fell in his view. The grand canopy had collapsed and fallen, turning into mountains and ravines on the ground. Ash covered the land, and dead branches crisscrossed through the ash.

It was like a giant city had fallen from the sky. Broken walls and shattered towers lay scattered everywhere. Bleak memories still clung to this land after its destruction, melted into the wind and drifting dust.

Taran Ael tried with all his strength to imagine what this place had once looked like.

Once there had been a forest here, a lush forest under the shade of the World Tree. The valleys and hills here had been full of life. The giant tree's roots had rippled across the earth, and clear streams had flowed through the valleys. Many living beings had dwelled here, birds, beasts, and elves.

They were his "ancestors", living in another age that he had never seen.

The lush life of that age far exceeded what people of today could imagine. But even harder to imagine than that life might be the order and peace of that time.

It was said that faraway Pland and Frostholm had already gained that kind of peace. But that "Captain Duncan" had said that even the "peace" Pland and Frostholm had now could not compare to the world before the Great Annihilation.

Taran Ael felt his imagination hit a wall.

No matter how he tried, what came to mind were not vivid scenes. Cold words seeped out of the books he had once read and into his memory, sketching only rough, vague impressions in his mind. Only with great effort, through the dream, had he finally learned what a “forest” really looked like. Yet he still could not imagine how birds and beasts had actually lived in that endless green ocean, or how the elves had formed a symbiotic pact with such a “forest”…

People always said that the elves’ ancient books and their stories passed down by word of mouth held the most complete legacy. If one day the archaeology scholars could truly restore the world as it had been before the Great Annihilation, that restored image would surely be sleeping in the libraries of Lightwind Harbor and Morka.

But now Taran Ael realized that image was already gone.

On a day long, long ago, when the seawater had swallowed this world, it had vanished together with the withering of Atlantis.

But… what had destroyed Atlantis? What had truly caused the Great Annihilation?

A blast of scorching wind suddenly blew from nowhere. The wind carried a sharp, unsettling noise, not the broken, irregular gusts that usually slipped through the ruins, but something harsher. It felt full of panic and destruction, a howl that could sweep straight through the mind.

Taran Ael snapped out of his thoughts.

The fierce howling wind almost lifted him off the ground. Taran Ael struggled to keep his footing, only to realize that at some point everything around him had sunk into darkness and chaos. It was as if all the light of the world had suddenly drawn back. The ruins of the giant tree in front of his eyes all turned into warped, uneven shadows, and huge clouds of smoke rose from those Shadows. It looked as if the World Tree had started burning once more. The other knowledge guardians who had gathered at this resting point, as well as Morris and Nina, had all vanished from his sight.

The gale began to howl. Dark sand and dust swept across the burning World Tree. Taran Ael tumbled off the boulder in a mess, rolling several times before he finally stopped when he slammed into a giant “branch”. It was a huge limb, slightly curved like a spine. He had hit its base, and then, without thinking, he looked up at the sky.

The sky was “caving in”.

In the chaos, Taran Ael saw a scene beyond imagination.

Dim red light pierced the clouds. The dark sky was collapsing downward as if some immense thing were pressing on it. The clouds twisted, and even the light in the clouds bent. It was as if some vast Great Terror was slowly grinding down, about to flatten the whole world. The crushing pressure of that Great Terror made Taran Ael feel as if he could not breathe. Even his thoughts froze. And in that suffocating fear, he saw white floating lights.

Specks of white glimmer spread out from the burning ruins of Atlantis. They slowly gathered in the air into streams of light. The glimmers flowed between the giant branches and the scorched ground, and as if sensing something, they gradually gathered before Taran Ael.

Taran Ael’s eyes widened. He felt a warm power in that stream of light, but for some reason, great panic and unease rose in his heart at the same time. He stared at the glow until it gathered in front of him into a hazy ball of light.

The ball of light had no form, yet it seemed to have a mind. It slowly circled Taran Ael, as if curiously observing something.

Then it suddenly stopped.

Taran Ael heard a sharp, howling sound. The howl seemed ready to drill straight into his skull and bore a hole through his brain.

The voice was young, full of great terror and a kind of mad anger.

“No! You are not elves!”

Chapter 623: The Beginning of the Collapse

Taran Ael felt that young yet piercing scream almost chisel straight through his soul.

It was as if some invisible force were tearing his thoughts apart, as if a vast mind were striking his memories. That scream crossed time, space, and every layer of meaning. It echoed again and again in every stage of his life that he could remember. It lasted only a very short instant, yet the pain and chaos of it still far, far exceeded what he had felt when he drank the Blood Raven Elixir, ten times, a hundred times over.

After that, he felt the entire Nameless One’s Dream begin to collapse. The wind roared. The ground tore open. The distant ruins of the World Tree fell in on themselves at great speed. The silhouettes of forests farther away rose and curled, as if gravity itself were rolling backward. Then all of this sank into darkness in just a few seconds. Taran Ael became aware that the dream was melting away, and right after that he sensed the existence of the Mortal Realm. Light appeared at the end of that darkness, flowing and spinning on the far wall like a whirlpool before slowly settling down. Then he heard other people’s voices around him.

He woke up. He woke in the Mortal Realm, in the early morning.

Everyone was waking up.

“What happened… Why did the Nameless One’s Dream suddenly collapse?”

“I don’t know. It was like a blast of wind started… I only remember the land in the distance rolling backward…”

“Is anyone hurt? Is everyone here? What time is it now?”

People were talking nearby, sounding confused. Everything seemed to be in chaos.

Taran Ael fought against the sharp pain in his head. The effects of that scream had followed him back into the Mortal Realm. Now his headache felt so bad it was as if he really might drop dead. After that, the wildly spinning scene before his eyes finally began to steady.

He found himself sitting on a low couch in the corner by the wall. Around him, the knowledge guardians were quickly waking and trying to figure out what had happened.

Someone had already pulled open the curtains not far away. Morning sunlight was spreading along the rooftops of the city blocks. The street outside was still quiet, and only now and then came a few sounds.

Taran Ael held his forehead and slowly stood up from the corner. His thoughts were still in a mess, but after hearing the knowledge guardians talking around him, he forced himself to focus a little: “It might be related to the voice I heard at the end…”

Someone finally noticed the Grand Scholar’s awful state. A nearby knowledge guardian hurried over and caught Taran Ael just as he was about to fall: “What did you say, sir?”

“I think I may have come into contact with Atlantis’s consciousness, but…” Taran Ael frowned as he spoke. Halfway through, he suddenly stopped. He furrowed his brow and looked toward a certain spot in the room. “…Lord Ted Lier hasn’t come back?!”

The others in the room seemed to realize it only then. Several gazes instantly turned to the armchair in the middle.

It was the chair Lord Ted Lier, the Truth Keeper, had sat in when he went Dreamwalking. Now all the personnel who had gone on the Dreamwalk had returned to the Mortal Realm, but that chair was still empty.

After a brief silence, someone broke the quiet in a worried voice: "…Could the Truth Keeper have woken earlier than us and left first?"

"No. That doesn't fit the Truth Keeper's character. And there is a mark on the door. If anyone opened it, it would leave a trace, whether it was opened from outside or from inside."

Frowning as he listened to the voices beside him, Taran Ael gently pushed away the supporting hand and stepped up to the chair.

On the small table next to the chair still sat the container that had held the potion. Seven droppers and a large beer bottle rested there quietly, reflecting the rosy light spilling in from the window.

Faintly, he heard sounds from outside the window again. It seemed like chaos coming from some unknown direction.

Someone cried out in the street. Someone was running in the hallway.

Tree shadows swayed outside the window.

…

Nina jolted awake from the collapsing Nameless One's Dream. When she realized she had returned to the Mortal Realm, she could not help spacing out for a moment.

This time, the way the Nameless One's Dream ended seemed different from before.

This time it was more sudden, more violent, full of a feeling of chaos and breaking apart. It was as if the dream had not “woken up”, but had been torn open from the inside out by some force.

She raised her head and saw Mr. Morris on the other side of the table, also looking thoughtful. Clearly her teacher also felt that something was wrong with how the Nameless One’s Dream had ended this time.

Just then, she suddenly heard Shirley’s voice coming from the direction of the window: “Hey, hey, hey, you two, look outside! Holy crap!”

Nina did not have time to complain about Shirley using crude words again. She stood up without thinking and turned to look toward the window.

Thick shadows of trees swayed outside, filling her sight.

Trees. Trees were everywhere. They were the same tall, lush, unknown giant trees she had seen in the forest of the Nameless One’s Dream. They filled the streets, packed the whole city district, and crowded every inch of her view. The wild flood of green looked like another “Boundless Sea”. Countless crowns of trees rolled together into waves of green, covering the sky between the buildings and even merging with the tallest towers and clocktowers, forming strange, twisted symbiotic pact shapes with them.

It was as if a forest had been directly “laid over” the city-state, as if the dream and the Mortal Realm were merging into one, corrupting each other into a shape beyond understanding.

Vanna, Morris, and Nina came to the floor-to-ceiling window in the living room and stared, dumbfounded, at the scene on the street outside. For a long time, none of them could say a word.

Shirley saw that chaos had already begun on the distant streets.

The residents of the city-state were already waking up in the morning. The shocking changes in the streets clearly went far beyond the old “limits of perception”. The forest that almost covered the whole city filled people with terror. The plants that had merged with the buildings also destroyed the city’s workings on a physical level. People cried out. Some were trapped inside their own houses. Some buildings were almost completely swallowed, and between the thick, tangled trees, only bits of broken walls and roofs could be seen. The fate of the people who had lived in those buildings was now unknown.

A loud bang came from above a nearby block. A steam pipe had burst. High-temperature, high-pressure gas sprayed from the valves, turning into huge billows of white mist between the crowns of the trees. Somewhere else, a water main ruptured at some node. A huge column of water shot up through the street, forming an astonishing “fountain” between the towering trees.

From far away came the sharp, piercing sirens of Steam Walkers. The city-state’s Guard Corps seemed to be trying to take action, and the academy’s knowledge guardians also seemed to have reacted. Nina heard familiar whistles from the street.

Even though everything was still in chaos, even though everyone had only just jolted awake from the dream, the years of training and the strict, complex emergency procedures still took effect. The forces that kept order charged without hesitation into the dense forest covering the city-state.

But at this moment, they faced a challenge far beyond anything they had imagined.

This was a thick forest, full of living plants.

These were things that had only ever been recorded in old, strange legends and in corrupted books.

The elves who lived in the Deep Sea era had embraced their ancestors' homeland in a way no one had expected, that endless green hell.

In a daze, as wind blew across the city-state, it stirred the leaves in the forest. Countless leaves rose in green waves, and between the waves it was as if whispers came from the forest.

"…You are not elves…"

Brightly colored scraps of paper spun and danced through the dense forest. They drifted lightly past the twisted and changed buildings and past the towering trees rising at different heights. The forest wind carried waves of rustling leaves and faint, whispering murmurs.

Lucretia's figure gathered out of the whirlwind of colored paper and landed on the top of a giant tree near the academy district.

She held a nearby branch with one hand and carefully balanced on the treetop, looking out at the streets that were now covered by forest and twisted by the dream.

Lucretia heard that whisper spreading in the wind. She could even feel the indescribable disappointment and anger mixed into it.

"Rabby." She called softly in her heart.

The Nightmare Rabbit's voice soon sounded in her mind: "Rabby is listening~~"

"How are those cultists doing? Was this their doing?"

"Rabby isn't sure, but they look pretty confused too. The dream collapsed faster than they expected… Even the Saint was alarmed. The people who went Dreamwalking were called in for questioning. Rabby almost got exposed… Good thing Rabby split herself up in advance and hid inside their bodies…"

Lucretia frowned.

“Did you still ‘eat’ them all? I remember reminding you to control your appetite.”

“No, no, only the cultists who went into the Dreamwalking realm. Rabby just left some cotton in their bodies. That was to safely and properly finish the task Mistress gave Rabby,” Rabby hurried to explain. “There are still lots of cultists on the ship. Rabby didn’t touch them…”

Lucretia stayed silent for a few seconds. She felt the tension and fear flowing to her along their soul link. Only then did she speak slowly: “Remember my order clearly. It is for your own good. Don’t forget, that ship and everyone on it are my Father’s prey.”

The Nightmare Rabbit’s voice came at once, this time full of barely hidden fear and nerves: “Yes, Rabby understands. Rabby will absolutely…”

Lucretia cut off the link with the rabbit at once.

Then she steadied herself and, a little awkwardly, called another name in her heart.

She soon heard a reply from far away.

“Lucy, I’m listening.”

“Dad, something has happened in the city-state,” this “Sea Witch” said in a grave tone. “It’s a major event in the Mortal Realm, you should come back quickly.”

Chapter 624:

In fact, when Lucretia sent the message, Duncan was already on his way back to Lightwind Harbor—and he was almost at the city-state.

After confirming that even sending the Vanished far away could not stop the Nameless One’s dream from growing, he had made his choice. While he was acting on the “other side” in Dreamwalking, his body that remained in the Mortal Realm had at once chosen to sail back.

A dark, chaotic sky hung over the sea. Dense black “hair” spread across the surface, giving the whole ocean the look of ink that had soaked deep into the water. Faint, hazy illusions flashed again and again across the distant and nearby waves, while the bizarre sights of the Spirit Realm rose and fell at the edges of his vision.

The Vanished’s sails billowed. The ship swept across the sea of the Spirit Realm like a swift gust of wind. The illusions that kept surfacing on the water fled from the huge vessel. Those that could not dodge in time were caught in the streams of pale green flame that leaked from the ship’s sides and were torn into scraps.

Duncan gripped the wheel and stood at the helm platform on the stern deck. He focused on handling the great ship while listening to the messages Lucretia, Morris, and the others sent from Lightwind Harbor.

Agatha’s phantom stood beside him. In the dim, blurred backdrop of the Spirit Realm, she looked like a Wraith with a form that kept shifting.

Morris’s voice came from the other end of the mental link: “…The forest spreading out from the Nameless One’s dream has covered the whole city. It has already started to damage the city’s systems on a physical level. It is no longer an illusion, but real matter. Dense plants have cut off and sealed many blocks. Large numbers of people are trapped…

“Some buildings have been completely swallowed. Whole houses have been replaced by towering trees, and everyone inside is now missing. We don’t know if they are alive or dead…

“Vanna just went out to observe the streets. She confirmed those plants are real and that they are truly destroying the city. What is even stranger is that these ‘products of the dream’ that have broken into the Mortal Realm are not showing any supernatural traits…

“In addition, we tried to use Psychic Resonance to contact the Storm Cathedral and the Academy Ark. The Church has already discovered the Anomaly in Lightwind Harbor. They have sent out the nearest border fleet…”

Duncan listened in silence to the reports from Lightwind Harbor. His face stayed dark and serious.

The Vanished sped up again. With a speed far beyond that of normal ships, it flew over the sea of the Spirit Realm. From deep within the great ghost ship came a muffled creaking, as if it were answering its captain’s command.

The Nameless One’s dream was growing. But this time, the speed of change clearly went beyond everyone’s expectations. Rather than the natural next step of a vast dream expanding, Duncan felt it looked more like… signs of it slowly entering a runaway state.

“Captain,” Agatha’s voice came from his side, “I have a bad feeling. The way things are going, it makes me think of Frostholm.”

Duncan did not answer. He only frowned a little. Without noticing it, he once again remembered what he had seen in the hold of the Vanished.

The massive spine of an Elder God. The Vanished, which had been rebuilt in Subspace and brought back with Saslokar’s divine authority. And… the puzzle of the ship’s original “keel”.

Slowly, all these clues seemed to line up. They pointed at the mutation now taking place in Lightwind Harbor. They pointed at the Nameless One’s dream that was pushing deeper and deeper into the Mortal Realm.

Duncan suddenly faintly understood something.

Everything was connected. Long, long ago, this ship had already been part of the great whirlpool they were now trapped in.

The beginning of that whirlpool might even be traced back a century, to the day Duncan Abnomar decided to build this giant vessel.

“…We must find Atlantis,” Duncan suddenly said in a low voice.

Agatha did not react for a moment: “Captain?”

“The state of the Nameless One’s dream is tied closely to ‘Atlantis’,” Duncan said. His thoughts were growing clearer as he spoke, and his voice sped up. “From the clues we have, I guess Atlantis is sleeping in the subconscious of all elves. Something must have disturbed this sleeping World Tree and sent her state into a sudden decline. We must find Atlantis.”

“Find her? Where?” Agatha sounded lost. “We have already gone to the border of the Nameless One’s dream, but Atlantis exists there without form in that endless darkness. And according to that silent Goathead, ‘she’ now refuses contact and refuses to wake…”

“But that may not be the only way,” Duncan shook his head. Then he called another name in his heart: “Lucy.”

Lucretia’s voice sounded at once in his mind: “I’m here.”

“Do you still remember when the Vanished was first being built?”

“I… I was very young back then,” Lucretia clearly had not expected Father to bring this up. She sounded a bit flustered. “My memories are very vague. At that time the lords didn’t really let me near the shipyard. Brother may remember more. He was already seven or eight, and he often sneaked off to the place where they were building the ship…”

“Tyrian,” Duncan called without hesitation to another name he had left a mark on. “I have a question for you.”

His mind stayed quiet for two or three seconds. Then a burst of chaotic noise rushed through his thoughts. A crowd of stray ideas had slipped through the barrier of consciousness and leaked out, turning into that noise. After that came Tyrian’s panicked, startled voice: “Father? What happened? Why are you…”

“I heard from Lucy that when the Vanished was being built, you often sneaked over there?”

Even across the distance and the barrier of their minds, Duncan could sense the sudden panic on the other end of the mental link.

Tyrian sounded completely stunned: “I didn’t! Don’t listen to Lucy’s nonsense, she…”

Before he could finish, Lucretia cut in at once: “Brother, just admit it. Lightwind Harbor is in trouble. Dad has a serious question for you.”

Vanna’s voice followed right after: “Mr. Tyrian, this is a very serious matter.”

Tyrian fell silent at once. After a moment, he spoke again. He sounded even more confused than before: “…Why is everyone here?”

“Yes, everyone is here,” Shirley piped up. “Dog is here too.”

“Quiet. This isn’t a place to chat,” Duncan said. Watching this group, who had opened a temporary “channel” in his mind through spirit flame Marks and already started to gossip there, he had no choice but to stop them. “Tyrian, do you remember the time when the Vanished was being built? Do you remember where its ‘keel’ came from?”

Tyrian finally heard the seriousness in Duncan’s tone.

Duncan’s mind went quiet.

After a while, Tyrian’s voice came again: “…Honestly, I don’t remember very clearly either. You wouldn’t tell a child only a few years old any deep shipbuilding knowledge. But I still remember that the ship’s ‘keel’ was something you ‘dragged back’ from a bank of fog near the border after one of your sea expeditions…”

“You dragged it back from fog near the border?”

“Yes. It was one of the ‘spoils’ of that trip. You often found things on your expeditions, and those ‘trophies’ earned you a lot of respect and envy from other explorers. But even among all those spoils, that ‘huge piece of wood’ you dragged back from near the border was the most special one. It was so huge that it even went beyond the towing limit of your ship at the time. You had to call in two smaller ships to assist from the sides, and even then it took almost two months to drag it near Pland…

“You chose Pland not just because our family was living there then, but also because that city-state had the largest shipyard in the world at the time.

“Yes. After that, you announced that you were going to build a ship—the greatest and most astonishing exploration ship in the world—using that ‘timber’ you found in the border fog.

“That ship took a full seven years to build. Even with enough manpower and materials, with the largest and most advanced shipbuilding facilities in the world, and with many shipbuilding experts drawn by your amazing plan and gathering in Pland, it still took seven years before it was finished. And only after it was launched and completed its first voyage, and then went through several more years of adjustments and improvements, did it become that ship the whole world watched—‘the Vanished’.

“My understanding of that ship also slowly formed during that time. Even the story of where that ‘keel’ came from was something I only heard halfway through the construction, from other people. Before that, you rarely told me anything about it.”

Duncan listened in silence to Tyrian’s story in his mind. His expression stayed stern for a long time.

This was indeed the first time he had heard any of this. As the Vanished’s current captain, he had only now learned the story of how the ship was built.

But knowing it now was not too late.

After a brief silence, Duncan asked again: “About that keel… what else do you know?”

Tyrian went silent. It seemed he had fallen into his memories.

Duncan did not know how much time passed. At last Tyrian spoke again: “I remember the artificers who helped build the ship once told me that keel was extremely hard to work. It was not like any known kind of wood. Its toughness was unbelievable. And as a ‘strange thing’ that came from near the ‘border’, it also had some disturbing ‘unnatural’ traits. For example, it made strange sounds in the middle of the night. The cuts and marks left on its surface would slowly heal.

“Because of those odd traits, the plan to build the Vanished almost stalled at the first step. No one could shape that raw timber into the form of a keel…

“But later, the artificers found something strange.

“Workers with elf blood could cut that ‘timber’ very easily.”

Duncan spoke at once: “Elves?”

“Yes. After they had wasted almost two months working on that great log, an elven artificer discovered this by accident. In elven hands, that keel that had nearly driven everyone mad with how tough it was became as easy to work as soft wood. So later the Pland shipyard transferred all artificers of elven origin to the Vanished project, and they even recruited extra people from nearby city-states…”

Duncan listened carefully. When Tyrian finished, Duncan stayed quiet for a few seconds, then asked: “Besides that, is there anything else?”

“Let me think…” Tyrian said. He thought for a while before speaking again, sounding unsure. “There is one more thing, but I don’t remember it very clearly. It was when the Vanished was almost finished. By then I was allowed to stay at your side and help with some unimportant work. Once you took me to the dry dock. You had been drinking and seemed in very high spirits. You pointed at the Vanished and said to me…

“‘Tyrian, that is actually just a small branch.’

“To this day, I still don’t know what you meant by that.”

—

Chapter 625:

As he listened to Tyrian’s account, Duncan fell into a long silence and deep thought.

The Vanished seemed to fall silent with its captain. The low creaks from deep in the hull slowly faded. A strange, unreal spirit form feeling settled over the ship as it glided soundlessly across the sea, passing through a world that was just as still.

After a long time, Duncan slowly lowered his head and looked toward his feet.

He could not see it, but he could imagine it. Beneath the stacked decks, deeper even than the broken structures at the bottom of the hold, beyond the border of the Mortal Realm, Saslokar’s spine still lay soaked in the dark Subspace. It had taken the place of the Vanished’s original keel—that keel Duncan Abnomar had once called a “small branch”.

That “small branch” had already gone down with the original Vanished a century ago, sinking into the depths of Subspace in that ancient disaster.

“Father…” Tyrian’s uneasy voice sounded in his mind, pulling Duncan from his thoughts. “Do you have any other questions?”

“One last question,” Duncan said. “After the Vanished was finished, some of the artificers who helped build her must still be alive. I mean the elves who worked on the keel…”

“Most of them should still be alive, but it will be hard to find them in a short time,” Tyrian answered. “After the Vanished ‘incident’, everything related to that ship became taboo, including the construction project back then.

“The artificers who once worked on the Vanished switched trades or left for other city-states. Even the elves chose to hide their names and go far away. The design drawings were sealed up. All the files were treated as sealed objects and locked deep inside the Cathedral…

“People say everything connected to the Vanished was struck by the curse. Captain Duncan’s two children were like this, and so were the people who had built the Vanished and knew its secrets. None of them could escape…”

Duncan did not speak. Tyrian also trailed off and fell silent. In the awkward air that followed, Lucretia was the first to break the quiet.

“The rumors were not just rumors. You can’t blame people then for being so nervous,” the “Sea Witch” said slowly. “In fact, the dock that had once been used to build the Vanished burned down on the second day after the Subspace collapse event.

“The fire burned in a way that went against common sense. It burned everything. It turned steel and stone into ash. But it did not burn the blueprints and files related to the Vanished that were stored in the offices.

“Almost half of the people who took part in the construction suffered nightmares, strange illnesses, and hallucinations in the years that followed. Some killed themselves years later. Some vanished at sea. Some went mad. In their last lucid moments, they claimed they had heard the ‘true voice’. After that, they spent the rest of their lives in asylums. Compared to the others who met with misfortune, those who went mad almost seemed lucky.

“The elven artificers who worked on the keel were the least affected. Maybe their race protected them. They did not seem to suffer from the curse, but the fates of the others scared them badly enough. It was only natural that they hid their names and went far away…”

Duncan listened quietly to Lucretia’s memories and description. After a long while, he spoke in a tone that sounded a bit odd: “But the records of the Vanished’s construction are still kept in Pland?”

“Yes, they are still there as sealed objects. You already talked about this with me and Vanna,” Morris cut in. “As far as I know, those things will not be destroyed—and no one dares to destroy them at will. Because Subspace is involved, the act of ‘destroying’ them might itself create a link between the Vanished and the Mortal Realm…”

“I need those things,” Duncan said at once.

Morris paused for a second, then quickly understood: “No problem. I’ll contact some friends in the city-state of Pland. Those items have been high-risk sealed objects for a hundred years, but in the present situation, the authority should be willing to cooperate with your request…”

“Normal contact methods are too slow,” Duncan cut him off. “Vanna.”

Vanna’s voice sounded at once: “Yes, Captain, I’m listening.”

“You can contact the Storm Cathedral in Pland directly, can’t you?” Duncan asked very seriously. “Tell them to gather all materials related to the Vanished’s construction project back then and send them to the Grand Cathedral.”

“…All right,” Vanna said. She hesitated for two or three seconds, as if to show her loyalty to the Storm Goddess, then agreed very readily. “How are you going to collect the documents? Should I send Ai over? I can warn my colleagues there so they don’t panic…”

“No. I’ll go myself.”

For a moment, Vanna did not seem to understand: “You will go yourself?”

…

In the Lower City of Pland, inside a not-very-large antique shop, Duncan put down the newspaper in his hands. He looked once more at the warm, bright sunlight outside the window. A slight smile appeared on his face: “Drinking tea, reading the paper, and basking in the sun in an antique shop every day… It’s time for things to start moving here too.”

“…I understand. I’ll contact the city’s Grand Cathedral right away.”

Vanna’s voice sounded in his mind, then slowly faded.

Duncan carefully folded the newspaper and set it on the rack beside the counter. Then he walked over to the stairs leading to the second floor and took his coat from the hook.

The Vanished was still racing in silence across the Boundless Sea of the Spirit Realm. Lightwind Harbor had sunk into a dream from which it could not wake. In city-states across the world, more and more elves were falling into deep sleep. But in this small antique shop, the old peace and quiet still remained.

This place felt like a harbor of refuge, apart from the whole world.

But just as Duncan put on his coat and prepared to leave, the door of the antique shop was pushed open. The jingle of the bell rang out, breaking the peace of this refuge ahead of time.

Duncan looked up at the door and saw a familiar figure standing in the sunlight.

“Miss Heidi? Good morning,” he said. He recognized the visitor at the door and greeted her politely. “I’m sorry, the shop is closed today. I’m going out to take care of some business."

"Duncan, Mister… Captain," Heidi took two steps into the shop. She looked at the "shopkeeper" who had just put on his coat and was clearly about to leave. After hesitating for a moment, she said: "I may need your help."

Duncan stopped and looked at her in curiosity: "Hm?"

After the incident with Taran Ael and the elven maiden who had been trapped in a dream, Heidi had already learned the truth about the Vanished. Maybe she had not yet grown used to such drastic changes. For a long time after that, she had hardly ever come to this shop. Duncan had not expected her to suddenly visit today, and even less that she would ask for help as soon as she arrived.

"It's Sleep Sickness," Heidi said. She still sounded hesitant. This was the first time she had come here to seek help after learning who Duncan was, and she clearly felt at a loss. "A large-scale, very sudden case of Sleep Sickness…"

"More elves have fallen asleep?" Duncan frowned. "That is within expectations. The Nameless One's dream went through a violent change at dawn today. Its influence is growing stronger. But don't worry. I'm going out for this very matter."

"It's not only that more elves are falling asleep," Heidi said quickly. "The 'symptoms' this time are also a bit strange. The city's central medical facilities have just taken in a group of patients. I think it is necessary to ask you to look at them… if you have time…"

The more she spoke, the less confident she sounded. Duncan did not know what she had been imagining in the few moments since she entered, but in the end she suddenly blurted out: “To ask for your help, do we need some kind of sacrificial victims?”

Duncan had been thinking about how long it would take for the Grand Cathedral to prepare the things he wanted. Hearing Heidi’s question, he was taken aback: “…Sacrificial victims?”

Heidi thought for a moment, her face filled with embarrassment: “When I wrote to my father, I didn’t dare ask too many details about you. He only said that life on the Vanished was unbelievable and that your attitude toward mortals was friendly. But he didn’t tell me your rules of action or mention what ritual and what sacrificial victims are needed when we ask you for help…”

“Stop, I understand,” Duncan said at once, cutting her off. He looked at the miss psychiatrist with a very strange expression. After a long moment, he finally said: “I don’t want sacrificial victims, and I don’t need any bloody or creepy sacrificial rituals. The Vanished Fleet is a friendly group whose members help each other and care about the public good of the city-states. Didn’t Morris or Vanna ever tell you that?”

Heidi: “…?”

One look at her face told Duncan everything.

He waved his hand and casually took a bronze figurine from the nearby shelf.

An “antique” from the age of the dark city-states. A royal emblem of the old Isom dynasty. Fresh from the factory last week.

“Original price, eight hundred sola. Discount price, twelve. You can buy it at the original price, and that will count as my fee for helping this once. If you don’t mind, let’s go. The Grand Cathedral won’t be able to get what I want ready right away anyway. I can go with you first and see how those ‘patients’ are doing.”

…

“You are sure you want to use these things to build the ‘channel’ for Psychic Resonance?” Morris stared, wide-eyed, at Vanna as she worked busily in the kitchen. At last he could not help speaking up.

Vanna paused for a moment and looked up at the old mister beside her: “Is there a problem?”

“…I think this is very lacking in rigor,” Morris said. His face was tight as he did his best to look serious. “When you perform a sacred ritual to connect with the city-state’s Grand Cathedral, you should at least prepare some proper spell materials…”

Vanna stayed silent for a moment, then lowered her head to look at what she had found in this “witch manor”.

“Holy fire, holy oil, holy spices, and devout benediction. All four elements are here.”

Morris’s eyes flew wide open: “It doesn’t work just because you put the word ‘holy’ in front! You can’t fry some scallions in the kitchen and expect the Goddess to send down her power!”

Vanna: “…”

Chapter 626: Call

To be fair, Vanna had to admit that Morris, the old gentleman, was right.

Fire, Holy Oil, and incense were the three key elements of a sacred ritual. In special situations, you could improvise, but replacing all of them with whatever you could find in a kitchen was still a bit hard to justify.

But she still decided to try.

After all, first, she had already tried it more than once back when she was on the Vanished. Second, she really could not find any better materials in this witch's mansion.

"I really shouldn't have expected a witch's home to have anything like Holy Oil," Vanna sighed and said to Morris helplessly. "I've been careless about my everyday preparations."

Morris muttered under his breath: "I keep feeling that ever since you managed to hold a ritual on the ship with cheap materials, you stopped thinking about preparing proper ritual materials at all…"

Vanna shrugged and pointed toward the window: "Then maybe you could find a way to buy some from the street?"

Morris lifted his head and glanced at the street outside, where tree shadows swayed. Thinking about how chaotic Lightwind Harbor was right now, he decided it was better not to answer.

Shirley, who had rushed over to watch the show, was holding Dog and staring at Vanna's work with interest. She suddenly said: "Why not add some ginger and garlic too?”

Vanna froze, confused: “Why?”

Shirley said: “When your ritual is over, we can ask Lunie to stir-fry two dishes with it—I’m hungry.”

“…Don’t make fun of it so casually!” Vanna finally felt her expression slipping. She glared at Shirley, trying hard to look stern and serious. “This is a solemn ritual. I’m only improvising because of the situation…”

Shirley fell silent, just pulled Dog and quietly edged closer to the door.

Vanna stared, baffled: “…Why are you backing so far away?”

“I don’t really understand you clerics and all this flashy stuff,” Shirley waved a hand. “But my gut says I’d better stand farther away. When the lightning strikes you later, I don’t want your blood splashing on me.”

Vanna: “…”

The Inquisitor tried hard to calm herself and decided to ignore the figures watching at the door. She took a slow breath and focused on the ritual to build a psychic channel.

The flames rose, and the fat began to boil.

No matter what, fire was still fire. At any time, the lighting of a flame stood for the first step of a civilization. It was a sign, a sign mortals showed to the deities, and it had only one meaning—“I am here.”

Long ago, ever since she had just graduated and left the seminary, Vanna had always thought this way—the form of the fire did not matter. The act of lighting it was the meaning.

As one of the most outstanding clerics of the younger generation in the Deep Sea Church, this had been the only thought Vanna had, in all those years, that could be called “not quite in line with doctrine”—and even that was only true for those past years.

Now she had far too many thoughts and actions that strayed from doctrine.

The soft sound of waves echoed in the ears of this Inquisitor who was growing more and more “rebellious.”

She sensed a gaze. A gentle divine gaze fell on her and then turned away. The “channel” opened before her eyes, and from the far end of that channel came the voice of Bishop Valentine.

“Vanna?” The old bishop sounded a bit surprised. “I did not expect to suddenly hear your call… Wait, what is that smell?”

“That is not important, Archbishop.” Vanna steadied herself and spoke in a serious tone. “I have to tell you something, and you must not panic…”

“What is it?”

“The captain will come to the Great Storm Cathedral to see you soon. He wants the construction records of the Vanished—all of them.”

…

Duncan frowned slightly as he stood in the ward with Heidi, looking at the young elf lying on the hospital bed.

“This patient was only admitted this morning. There are dozens more like him now—several elf communities have already started to panic, because no one knows if the next to collapse or vanish will be themselves,” Heidi said softly. “The incident has already reached supernatural corruption level. The cathedral has sent Guardian units to take over those communities, but aside from constantly sending elves with strange symptoms here, they have no good way to deal with it.”

Duncan nodded with a grave expression, then stepped forward and bent down to study the condition of the young elf on the bed.

The elf's whole body had a hazy, unreal look, like a phantom that could fade away at any moment, barely clinging to a humanoid outline on the bed.

This clearly went beyond the earlier cases of Sleep Sickness and was no longer a "symptom" that normal medicine could handle.

"He is disappearing, leaving our Mortal Realm dimension in a way that is hard to understand. This is no longer something a psychiatrist can handle. I used some methods from the supernatural field, but I can only barely keep their minds on this side and slow the process of 'disappearance,'" Heidi said from behind Duncan. "On one patient whose symptoms were lighter, I tried Thought Reading, but I found that their thoughts were being slowly drawn away by something… much larger. It is like a vortex dragging these elves out of the Mortal Realm, from mind to body."

Duncan listened to her description with a deep frown. After a long moment, he spoke as if to himself: "Atlantis is taking them away."

Heidi was stunned: "Atlantis?"

"That is the 'vortex' you sensed. I suggest you stop trying things in that direction," Duncan said, face very serious. "Because it is very likely that this vortex will treat you as an elf too."

Heidi's face changed at once.

Duncan, meanwhile, shifted part of his attention to watch what was happening far away—

The Vanished was already drawing close to the sea near Lightwind Harbor and was preparing to surface from the Spirit Realm.

Vanna had just sent word. She had successfully contacted the Great Storm Cathedral in Pland. Bishop Valentine would prepare everything as quickly as possible and wait for the “captain” to visit.

Inside Lightwind Harbor, things were still in chaos. The thick forest was like a boundless green hell to the residents of the city-state. Even the well-trained Guard Corps and the Guardian troops could hardly deal with something so far beyond imagination—Lucretia was already moving through the city-state, trying to give as much help as she could.

And in the distant northern city-state of Frostholm, Sleep Sickness was spreading just like it was here in Pland.

It was easy to imagine that the spread of Sleep Sickness was not limited to Pland and Frostholm. As the situation in Lightwind Harbor grew worse, it was likely that elves all over the world were facing the same terrible crisis—Atlantis was devouring them.

But why was it like this? Why had the World Tree, rooted in the very memory of the elves as a race, suddenly undergone such an extreme change?

Just then, a faint sound from the bed suddenly broke Duncan’s thoughts.

The elf lying on the bed, who had been in a deep sleep and was slowly turning transparent, suddenly moved. His body twitched slightly, and a low, muffled groan came from his throat.

He seemed as if he were about to wake up.

Heidi noticed at once. She rushed to the bed, as if wanting to check whether this elf was really regaining consciousness. But at that moment, the same thing suddenly happened on the other beds in the ward.

The elves in deep sleep began to twitch one after another, the same muffled groans rising from their throats!

The eerie scene made Heidi’s scalp prickle. She straightened up sharply and looked toward Duncan on instinct. At that very moment, all the muffled groans in the elves’ throats stopped at the same time.

The next second, the sleeping elves opened their mouths at once, as if a single mind had finally linked to all these bodies in the Mortal Realm at the same time. They spoke in clear voices—

“I am Ted Riel. I am now in the deepest part of the Nameless One’s dream.

“I am sending this message to the Mortal Realm through every path I can find. Whoever hears it, please spread it to as many people as possible—

“Atlantis has gone mad.

“She is trying to devour all elves and use that to enter the Mortal Realm and take root and grow again.

“She is not our protector. What she protects is not us.

“We are fighting against Atlantis’s main consciousness and trying our best to slow her spread toward the Mortal Realm—but we are losing.

“We need help. Do everything possible to keep the elves in the Mortal Realm from being devoured by Atlantis, to stop them from vanishing or dying in their sleep. This can slow Atlantis’s awakening. I repeat, we need help…”

The voices in the ward cut off at once.

All the elven patients sank back into “sleep,” as if what had just happened were only an illusion—Ted Riel’s link to the Mortal Realm had been cut off.

“Ted Riel…” Heidi stared for a few seconds before she reacted. “The Truth Keeper from Lightwind Harbor?!”

Panic and horror appeared in her eyes. The short few seconds just now had made her realize how terrible and serious the situation was.

She looked at Duncan, wanting to seek help from this “captain.”

Duncan’s brow knit tight. The sudden change of events and the message from Ted Riel were beyond what he had expected, but after a brief, fast chain of thoughts, he vaguely caught some lines of direction from those words.

“Looks like I have to go,” he turned his head and said to Miss Psychiatrist, his face serious. “Someone has to solve this from the root.”

Heidi spoke without thinking: “Then what about things here…”

“Keep doing what you are doing. Slow down how fast these elves are being ‘devoured,’” Duncan said quickly. “Hold their spirits in the Mortal Realm for as long as you can—leave the rest to us.”

Chapter 627: The “Sample” Preserved Till Today

The terrible “sleep” and disappearance were spreading across the whole world. From the distant Northern Seas to the southern oceans, from the mist-filled eastern borders to the western archipelago, almost every city-state had elves who suddenly fell into slumber, and strange, unexplainable “disappearances.”

And the message Ted Riel sent from the depths of the Nameless One’s dream was also being spread to the whole world through the mouths of those sleeping elves.

Cathedrals rang their bells one after another. Telegraphs and psychic communication began to carry news between city-states. Governors and archbishops shared updates in real time, and the joint monitoring and defense system that the Four Gods Church had only recently created now started up in haste.

People had thought this system would be used to watch the Deep Sea beneath the city-states. No one expected its first real use to be because of a dream that had entered a runaway state.

A whirlwind made of fluttering, colored paper scraps spun through layers of vines, leaves, and rooftops, drilling straight into the governor’s office in the city hall.

Governor Sara Mell, who had been talking with several city hall officials, raised her head at once and looked at the “sea witch” stepping out from the colored paper.

“I suddenly remembered I should come check on city hall,” Lucretia walked over to the large oval desk. “You look very busy.”

“Up to my neck in trouble, Lady,” Sara Mell waved to the city hall officials beside her, dismissing them for now. “I heard you just helped the constable units that were trapped in trouble—thank you very much for your help.”

“How are things now?”

“The city is in chaos. Sixteen districts have completely lost contact. Thick vegetation has blocked every road. A large number of residents are missing. The Security Corps and the Guardians can hardly get into those areas. The steam hubs have shut down. For safety, we also turned off gas for the whole city—thank the gods that at least can still be shut off, but no one knows what we are supposed to do tonight,” Sara Mell said in one breath. “As for outside the city… I imagine you already know what is happening elsewhere. Countless reports are coming in from every channel, but I really do not have any extra energy to pay attention to other city-states now.”

“What about the message from Ted Riel? Do you know about that?”

“Yes, I know,” Sara Mell nodded. “First, two hours ago, we got word from the team that Taran Ael was part of. They said that after the team left the dream, the Truth Keeper did not return to the Mortal Realm. Half an hour ago, I received the latest report. His Excellency the Truth Keeper is trapped in the deepest part of the Nameless One’s dream…”

She stopped, a hard-to-describe, complex look on her face. It seemed she wanted to let out a long sigh, but in the end only the corner of her mouth twitched. “Elves have always been proud of our long, complete heritage. We believe that those ancient tales and myths were once real history, symbols of our old civilization—and now our tales and myths have come to kill us."

Lucretia silently watched the respected governor. After a moment, she finally spoke slowly: "But until last night, the information we had still said that Atlantis wanted to shelter the elves in the Sanctuary World. Even now, I have reason to believe that this 'protection' is still working—only… in a very dangerous way."

Sara Mell's face twitched. "…Yes. Because Atlantis has gone mad."

"I want to see Taran Ael and the other knowledge guards who went into the Nameless One's dream with him," Lucretia said. "I did not find them at the city-state university."

"They are in a quarantine facility under observation and questioning. I will tell you where it is…"

…

The solemn Great Storm Cathedral stood quietly on the highest ground in Pland. The square in front of the Great Cathedral was as lively as ever—on every open day, many citizens gathered here: some entered the cathedral to worship, some came to the nearby facilities to receive divine blessings and treatment, and some were simply here to visit.

Duncan wore a plain brown coat and black trousers. He followed the group of visitors entering the cathedral through the grand archway, then walked deeper inside along the route Vanna had described in his mind.

He passed through the main hall and the prayer aisle open to visitors, then through a side corridor next to the preaching area, and kept going along a route that even many of the cathedral's own staff did not know well.

In his mind, the voice of the Inquisitor sounded: "…Go through that small black door up ahead. After you enter, turn right. After about twenty meters there is a fork, and the path on the left leads to the inner courtyard…

"…This route is the quietest. If you keep going to the end, you will see the side door of the inner chapel. I have already spoken with Bishop Valentine and asked him to wait for you in the chapel. Everything along the way has been arranged. No one will stop you, and the guards on the way do not know who you are… Yes, only Bishop Valentine knows the truth…

"…If you want to come to the Great Cathedral again in the future, you can also use this route. By the way, the room where I used to rest in the Great Cathedral is right next to the chapel. You could also go there… though I know you will not need it…"

Listening to the Inquisitor's voice in his mind, Duncan lifted his gaze.

The inner chapel was ahead. This place was not open to the public and was only for the high-ranking priests of the Deep Sea Church. A plain black wooden door stood quietly at the end of the path, with two fully armed church guards standing tall on either side, like two grim statues.

Duncan walked toward the door.

The guards at the door did not even move their eyes. It was as if they could not see Duncan at all. They kept their serious, forward-facing stares.

This was clearly the result of arrangements made in advance. Duncan could almost imagine what orders the guards along this path had received—

Today, a special guest would visit the Great Cathedral.

Do not listen. Do not look. Do not ask. Do not think.

He gave them a polite smile, then walked past the two guards and gently pushed open the black door covered with sacred sigils.

A faint sound of waves rose and faded in his ears, and a damp, cold breath seemed to appear for a moment and then quickly vanish. Duncan felt as if he had stepped through an invisible barrier, and then he entered a wide, brightly lit room.

Valentine, the highest bishop of the city-state of Pland, was standing in the center of the room.

The thin-haired old man wore a black priest's robe patterned with gold. He stood with his back to the door, facing a statue of the Storm Goddess that filled the room with a mysterious, holy air, and seemed to be in devout benediction. Only when he heard the door open did he turn and look at the special guest standing at the entrance.

It was easy to see that the old man was a little nervous, even though he was trying hard to control it.

"Hello, Bishop Valentine. We meet again," Duncan said with a slight smile as he walked toward him. "But for you, this should be the first time seeing me in this 'form.'"

Valentine examined the "Duncan" who had entered the room with curiosity.

What he saw was only an ordinary middle-aged man in a simple old coat, neither tall nor strong, the kind you could see anywhere in the city-state.

But after only a second, the sharp warning from his reason urged him to shift his gaze away and stop staring at that shell which only looked like a human body.

"I know. This is the avatar form you use when you move through the city-state. I heard Vanna mention it," Valentine lowered his eyes a little. "She also told me about the situation. Everything you asked for is ready."

The old bishop raised his hand and pointed to a large wooden chest next to the statue.

There lay the original records from when the Vanished had been built a century ago, and… one very important “sample.”

Several bright candle stands had been set up around the chest. Now and then, faint illusions rose in the candle flames, showing that they had been given divine blessings. On either side of the chest, Duncan could see stone slabs, iron chains, and other sealing items, clearly also part of the safety measures.

It seemed that even after this chest of “shipbuilding records” had been taken out of the sealed vault and placed here in the chapel watched directly by the Goddess, it was still treated with extreme care. Bishop Valentine had come here ahead of time to keep watch, most likely also to guard against anything inside the chest entering a runaway state.

“…Is it really that dangerous?” Duncan walked toward the chest, then could not help turning his head to ask: “Do these sealing measures actually do anything?”

“In fact, no,” Valentine answered quite bluntly. “Because nothing in this chest has ever actually ‘acted up.’”

Duncan froze for a moment. “Then all this is…”

“For peace of mind,” Valentine said frankly. “Nothing in the chest has acted up, but everyone knows it must have some link, in terms of supernatural, with the Vanished. So we simply used every sealing method we could think of—the version you see here is already simplified. In the sealed vault where this chest was originally stored, there were far more ‘safety measures’ than this.”

Duncan had nothing to say to that.

After a moment, he shook his head, ignored the sudden awkwardness in the air, and stepped forward to open the chest.

The chest was not locked—the lock had already been removed when it was brought here.

“The Vanished’s original design blueprints, technical parameters, and engineering logs… In fact, the full set of records was much larger, but the less important parts were all burned to ash in the shipyard fire back then. Only these were left and sealed in this chest…”

Valentine’s voice came from beside him. The old bishop had walked to Duncan’s side and now looked down into the chest as he spoke in a low voice.

“Of course, I guess what you really want is not just these plans, but… that thing in the middle of the chest.

“The keel sample kept according to the shipbuilding customs of a century ago.”

Duncan’s gaze rested quietly on the gray-black block of wood lying in the middle of a piece of black silk.

It was the “sample” cut from the original keel of the Vanished.

Chapter 628: The curse of the Lost Ones

A century ago, in the age of sailing warships, the shipbuilding artificers of every city-state followed one rule when they built a ship – while they worked the keel, they had to cut a block of wood from the original timber.

They would treat this block the same way they treated the keel itself: charring it, soaking it in chemicals, oiling it, then placing it on the slipway beside the unfinished ship. When the ship was finally completed, this keel timber block would be left behind in the shipyard, kept on land forever.

Usually, shipowners would pay an extra fee so the priests of the city could perform regular divine blessing rituals over the block. Sometimes they would even send it to the Cathedral and ask the Church to store and watch over it there.

At first, keeping this keel sample was part of quality control. Shipowners used it to test whether the keel's material and preliminary treatment met the technical standards of a ship. Later, it turned into a symbol of praying for safety.

People believed that a ship had a soul, and that the keel left on land would bring good luck to the vessel at sea. It was like a lighthouse, letting lost ships find the route back to shore. The blessings that clerics laid upon the keel timber block could also fall upon the ship on its voyage. And if disaster truly struck, that keel left on shore would become a little ferryboat in the world of the dead, carrying the sailors' souls back home.

In the past, once a ship was confirmed lost, the priests of the God of Death would even take out the keel timber block left on land and hold a “funeral” for it. The families of the lost crew members would see that block off as if it were the body of their loved ones, and watch as it was sent into the furnace.

Agatha had once, out of curiosity, described in great detail to Duncan what those death priests’ farewell ceremonies for a keel sample had been like a hundred years ago.

In fact, this custom still survived in a weakened form even now. With the progress of the age, people no longer always chose to keep a ship’s keel sample. Many times, younger captains preferred to keep a section of pipe cut off during the installation of the steam core, storing it either in the shipyard or at the Cathedral.

Duncan quietly let his gaze rest on the block of wood inside the chest.

The Vanished was a ship built a hundred years ago. No matter how special it was now, back when it lay in the shipyard, it had been built under the same rules and habits as any ordinary vessel.

The artificers of that time had kept its keel sample.

Not the Elder Gods spine it carried now, but its original keel – that “little twig” Duncan Abnomar had found in the mist near the border.

Duncan reached out and carefully picked up the plain-looking piece of wood.

He suddenly widened his eyes a little: “No weight?!”

The “weight” that came from the keel sample shocked him. It was too light… so light that the word “light” was no longer enough. Just as he had blurted out, it felt like it had no weight at all, lighter than a speck of dust in his hand.

Yet Duncan clearly saw the deep dent pressed into the black silk lining inside the chest where the block had rested. That mark had been made by the wood's weight.

"Yes, no weight – but only when someone holds it," Bishop Valentine's voice came from beside him. "When we put it on the scale, its weight is 0.7 kilograms. When a living person holds it, its weight is 0 milligrams. But it was not like this at first. According to the records, when it was just cut from the keel timber, it was no different from ordinary wood – I mean in terms of weight."

Duncan frowned. He already had an answer in his heart, but he still could not help asking: "When did the change happen?"

"On the day the Vanished fell into Subspace," Valentine answered. "Many things happened that day. Most of them were only investigated and confirmed after people slowly recovered from the chaos. Besides the keel sample losing its weight in the hands of the living, we also found that, other than this sample, every other piece of wood cut from the Vanished's keel timber had vanished."

The old bishop paused, then explained further: "The original timber you brought to Pland back then was enormous. Even after it was worked into a keel, the leftover cuts were still enough for many other uses. The records say that part of the leftovers was made into various fittings on the Vanished. The rest you left in the shipyard's warehouse.

"Some years later, you took part of that stock again to make the figureheads and steering wheels of the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star. The final leftovers were too poor to use and stayed in the warehouse, until… the day of the accident."

As he spoke, the old man stepped forward and pointed at the large chest in front of Duncan.

“The related records about that are also inside.”

“The Sea Mist and the Radiant Star were built in Pland too? And they used the Vanished’s leftover keel wood? Are their construction records still around?”

“Sadly, the records for those two ships were turned to ash in the great fire at the shipyard that year, together with their keel samples,” Valentine shook his head. “People say that was when the two ships first fell under the curse. The storm the Vanished stirred up in Subspace destroyed the ‘anchors’ those two ships had left on land, and from that moment on, they slowly turned into what they are today.”

At this point, the old bishop suddenly seemed to realize that his words might be a bit off. He hurriedly coughed twice: “Ahem, I hope you don’t mind. These are all just…”

“It’s fine. You’re only stating things that really happened – things I asked you about,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “And my relationship with the children is very good now. That is all in the past.”

As Duncan spoke, he lowered his eyes again to the weightless keel sample in his hand.

Many things finally became clear today.

Everything that had wound around and around, that had once seemed like a chaotic tangle, was in fact just a single loop of thread. And now, the end of that thread had finally fallen into his hand.

“If you still want to know more about what happened back then, I can try to find the elven artificers who worked on the Vanished,” Valentine said carefully, watching Duncan’s expression. “But that may not be easy. After all… things are not going well among the elves right now.”

“I know. I came here to solve that,” Duncan let out a light breath and set his thoughts aside for the moment. He nodded to Valentine. “This is enough. I have what I wanted. I will be taking this chest with me.”

“Of course,” Valentine nodded at once. “In fact… it is better if you take it.”

Duncan naturally knew why Valentine said that. He only smiled, then carefully put the block of wood back into the chest and closed the lid.

He was just about to summon Ai to send the chest back to the Vanished when he noticed a hesitant look on Valentine’s face.

“Is there something else?”

“Uh…” Valentine tensed up so visibly that the change could be seen with the naked eye. He hesitated for several seconds before he finally spoke: “Actually, I have been thinking about one question since just now, but I was afraid you might find it offensive…”

“Say it.”

“…Vanna hasn’t caused any trouble on your ship, has she?”

“Trouble? Why would you say that?” Duncan felt confused. “She is very mature and steady. She is easy to have on board. How could she cause trouble?”

Valentine stared at him for a moment before he finally squeezed out a line: “She didn’t break anything? She is blunt, hard to get along with, very strong, and she had few friends in the city…”

Duncan did not answer right away. He first thought of Nina, who was one surprise and explosion after another. Then he thought of Shirley, who could turn the whole ship upside down over a few test papers, and of Alice, who would stew herself into a soup every now and then. He also thought of that whole bunch of pots, pans, mops, buckets, and even gunpowder cannons on the ship that clanged, chattered, and made a racket day and night…

“She is doing very well,” Duncan said very seriously to the old bishop. “She is already one of the quiet ones on the ship. She only makes a bit of noise when she runs and trains on the deck in the morning…”

Valentine: “…?”

The old bishop still could not imagine what Vanna’s life on the Vanished actually looked like.

But Duncan did not plan to explain further. He quickly summoned Ai, had her teleport the large wooden chest straight to the faraway Vanished, then said goodbye to the old bishop and strode out of the Grand Cathedral.

Inside the brightly lit inner chapel, Valentine stood dazed in front of the holy statue of the storm Goddess. In a blur, he suddenly felt that everything that had happened this morning was unreal.

This holy place had really received a shadow from Subspace – and now that shadow had calmly left.

It felt like a dream.

“…Vanna.”

“I’m here.” The psychic channel was still open, and Vanna’s voice sounded in Valentine’s ear. “Has the captain left?”

“…He just left,” Valentine said.

Perhaps the hesitation and strange mood in the old bishop’s voice was too obvious, because Vanna quickly sensed something was off: “What’s wrong? Did something go badly?”

“That’s not it. I just feel a bit strange…” Valentine said slowly. “Tell me… does this count as the Grand Cathedral being invaded by Subspace?”

Vanna clearly had not expected the old bishop to say something like that. She fell silent for several seconds before she answered, a little unsure: “I… don’t know either.”

Valentine turned his head and glanced at the statue of Gamona standing quietly in the candlelight. “The Goddess does not seem displeased.”

“I don’t think the Goddess would be,” Vanna said with some certainty. “After all, the captain only came over for a visit. If that really counts as an invasion, then the death Grand Cathedral in Frostholm gets invaded by Subspace every Friday… and nothing has happened over there.”

Valentine: “…?”

Chapter 629: Countless Threads

“I don’t think you should call my trip every Friday to the Frostholm Grand Cathedral to collect my cemetery guard wages a ‘Subspace invasion’. That is not very precise…”

On the Vanished, which was sailing through the shallow layers of the Spirit Realm, Duncan checked the large wooden chest that Ai had just teleported from Pland while he spoke to Vanna in his heart.

“It is exactly because I want to be precise that I call it that,” Vanna replied. Her tone was so serious that Duncan could not tell whether the inquisitor was joking. She paused, then sounded even more earnest. “And honestly, I have never understood why you insist on personally using your avatar form to collect that ‘wage’. You know, that ‘Agatha’ in Frostholm is willing to assign a special team of guards for you. Mr. Tyrian has also wanted to arrange a better place for your avatar form over there. But you still insist on warding those graveyards yourself…”

Duncan stopped what he was doing. In a brief silence, he thought of that cold northern city-state – that place where it was always snowing. He remembered the winter graveyard, the quiet streets, a young lady named Annie, and the old caretaker.

“…I like that place,” Duncan said slowly in his heart. “Doing some things an ordinary person would do, in a place I like – that is my hobby.”

Vanna fell quiet for a moment, as if his words had touched her and sent her into thought. Light, quick footsteps came from not far away. Duncan looked up and saw Alice happily walking over from the other end of the deck – she was always that cheerful.

“Captain! Are we almost at Lightwind Harbor? I saw the ship start to ‘rise’…”

The doll suddenly noticed the large chest sitting on the deck.

“What is this?” she asked in surprise as she hurried over, circling the chest and peeking at the things inside. “Is it for me to sleep in… no, that doesn’t look right. What are these?”

“These are very important things, the construction records from when the Vanished was first built,” Duncan said casually, reaching in to pick up the block of wood. “But this is the most important part.”

Alice leaned closer, curious: “What is it?”

Duncan stayed silent for a long time. Only when he saw Alice’s curious and puzzled gaze did he finally speak in a low voice: “Maybe… an ‘interface’.”

He lifted his head and looked out at the distant sea.

The chaos and darkness in the sky were slowly fading. The black “hairs” in the sea were thinning at a speed the naked eye could see. The hazy, ghostly shapes on the water first turned into thin mist, then quickly paled and melted away in the strengthening sunlight. The Vanished was slowing down. Under Goathead’s control, it was rising from the Spirit Realm back toward the Mortal Realm.

“The Vanished has already drawn near Lightwind Harbor. How is the situation in the city now?”

Morris’s voice answered at once: “It is still chaotic, but some guards and constables have made it into the districts. The emergency officials are organizing the residents to save themselves. For now, it doesn't look like things will get worse – but no one can guarantee how tonight will be."

Duncan answered with a quiet "mm", then turned his attention back to the sea.

The Vanished completed its rise. Bright sunlight from the Mortal Realm shone on the deck and masts. Beyond the rail, the sea swelled gently in the breeze, whitecaps flashing with scattered light.

As far as the eye could see, there was nothing.

Duncan blinked. Something felt wrong.

Alice also blinked. Even this solid-headed doll felt something was wrong.

A hazy shadow squirmed up from the deck and slowly stood, staring into the distance. After quite a while, Agatha finally broke the silence on the deck: "Where is Lightwind Harbor?!"

Where was Lightwind Harbor?! Where had that huge Lightwind Harbor gone?!

Duncan stared out at the distance for a long time, then turned his head to look in other directions. He swept his gaze around the sea and finally found something familiar.

A huge, irregular luminous geometric body was floating quietly on the distant water.

It was the fallen relic that had been "anchored" near Lightwind Harbor. But aside from that enormous luminous geometric body, there was nothing on the nearby sea.

Duncan called out at once through the mental link: "First Mate, confirm our position."

Goathead answered immediately: “Aye, captain, I have already noticed it… There’s nothing wrong with the Vanished’s position. The enchanted sea chart shows we are right next to Lightwind Harbor, and that ‘luminous geometric body’ can be used as a reference point… but Lightwind Harbor is gone.”

A sea breeze blew across the deck. The bright southern sunlight reflecting off the water was almost too dazzling to look at.

Far away, a mark formed from the fire of spirit form burned somewhere no eyes could see. Duncan heard Nina’s voice rise from the depths of his mind: “Uncle Duncan, have you arrived?”

“I have,” Duncan took a slow breath, thinking of how to explain the situation. “But Lightwind Harbor is gone.”

Nina: “…Huh?”

Some time later.

The Vanished reached the waters where the huge luminous geometric body floated, and within its range they finally found a trace that proved Lightwind Harbor had once existed.

Duncan found the research station built to study the “stone sphere” at the center of the geometric body. It still remained in the Mortal Realm, but the station itself was completely empty.

Judging from the traces left behind, the scholars stationed there had disappeared at least before dawn. The stoves for cooking breakfast showed no signs of use. Several divine blessing oil lamps that needed to be lit only during the night were still burning, their fuel almost exhausted. This meant that after sunrise, no one had been there to put them out.

After a round of investigation, the Vanished left the luminous core of the geometric body and returned to the patch of sea where Lightwind Harbor should have been, wandering slowly back and forth over the spot.

“The research facilities around the stone sphere are still there. Maybe the ‘sunlight’ that luminous geometric body gives off weakened the power of the Nameless One’s dream. But the staff inside are all gone… It seems that ‘sunlight’ could not completely block Atlantis’s strength.”

In the captain’s cabin of the Vanished, Duncan was analyzing the situation. Not far from him, inside the oval scrying mirror, Agatha also wore a solemn, thoughtful expression.

“This looks very similar to the disappearances in Lightwind Harbor whenever the Nameless One’s dream broke out,” Agatha said as she thought aloud. “But this time, the power of the dream has grown to an unbelievable level. Even an entire city-state with material form has vanished.”

Alice stood beside Duncan. The doll, who usually had such a wide and careless heart, finally looked nervous, even a little afraid. She grabbed Duncan’s arm without thinking and spoke in a hesitant voice: “Then… then everyone who stayed in the city…”

“They are all safe for now. I can still contact them,” Duncan comforted the doll. “Going by the pattern the Nameless One’s dream showed before, as long as the dream disperses, anything that vanished because of it should return to normal.”

Hearing the captain’s words, Alice still felt that something was wrong, but she relaxed a little.

But Duncan knew he had not said everything.

The biggest question now was whether this time the Nameless One’s dream would fade away like before – and whether this might be Atlantis’s “final dream”.

The message Ted Riel had sent from the depths of the Nameless One's dream was very bad.

Atlantis had gone mad. She had changed from an ancient obsession half-asleep in a muddled daze into a powerful being with clear ability to act but no control. That being's goal was clear: to take root and grow once more in the Mortal Realm.

Now that she was awake and insane, would Atlantis still, like in the previous times, unconsciously let the Nameless One's dream come to a quiet end? Or… was the current "disappearance" of Lightwind Harbor the first step for her to enter the Mortal Realm?

Time was running out.

Duncan thought quickly. He placed the keel sample he had found in Pland on the chart table before him, and at the same time considered how to use this piece of wood to establish contact with Atlantis, how to truly reach the deepest part of the Nameless One's dream, and how to discover what truth was hidden in the Veil at the core of that dream.

The Sea Mist and the Radiant Star had already mutated under the curse. The original keel of the Vanished had disappeared into Subspace. The leftover "twig" timbers from back then had been burned to ash in the shipyard fire. The piece before him was probably the last remaining "Atlantis wood" in the world. There was likely only one chance.

Just as some ideas began to form in Duncan's mind, Alice suddenly cried out beside him: "Threads!"

Duncan turned in surprise: "Threads? You see threads in here?"

"Threads… threads everywhere!" Alice's eyes were wide. She waved her hands in the air as she spoke quickly. "They just floated out. They're all over the air… rising up from under the deck!"

“Under the deck?” Duncan froze for a second, then reacted at once. He grabbed Alice’s arm and pulled the doll toward the door. “Come with me!”

Alice did not understand at first. She ran after the captain, shouting as she went: “Hey… hey? Captain, where are you taking me? Slow down, slow down, let me hold my head…”

Alice’s cries cut off the moment she stepped out of the captain’s cabin.

She stood on the deck, staring wide-eyed at the endless sea outside.

The Sun was slowly sinking. In the magnificent glow spreading across the sky, she saw something she had never seen before: countless hair-fine threads rising and drifting up from the whole stretch of sea.

Those threads were not floating up from “under the deck” of the Vanished.

They were floating up from the sea where Lightwind Harbor had once been.

Chapter 630: Academy Ark

There were countless threads there, rising from the surface of the sea like masses of growing hair. They drifted upward into the air as if weightless—and more and more of them were still appearing.

Alice stared wide-eyed at the scene, both confused and shocked. Then a ghostly green flame flashed across her eyes. The same flame flickered in Duncan's eyes, and the "threads" that only the doll could see appeared in his sight as well.

"Are these… the people of Lightwind Harbor?" Alice muttered after a long pause, finally breaking the silence. "Their bodies are gone, but all the threads are still here?"

Duncan did not answer. He only watched the dense, floating threads with a serious face. He could not count them with a single glance, but he could faintly feel that there were too many of them. Even if he assumed each person had five threads extending from them, the number here far exceeded the elven population of Lightwind Harbor. It was as if… all the soul-threads of the elves in the world had gathered here.

Their sheer number made the continuous mass of threads look hazy. They drifted in the wind without a fixed shape, hanging over the sea above Lightwind Harbor like a mist that refused to disperse. It even carried a kind of dreamlike… beauty.

And a horrifying strangeness.

By now, Alice had already recovered from her initial fright. She watched the clumps of threads over the sea with curiosity, looking like a cat that had suddenly seen a pile of yarn balls—unable to hold back, yet still hesitant. She remembered what the captain usually told her, so she carefully pulled her hands back, trying hard not to touch any of the nearby threads. But her eyes darted everywhere, wanting to grab them yet not daring to.

This of course did not escape Duncan's eyes.

"Captain, I'll just touch one, just a little. I won't grab anything… I just want to check their 'state'…" Alice spoke quickly and carefully the moment she noticed Duncan looking her way. She raised her hand and pinched her fingers together, showing how small her "little touch" would be.

Duncan nodded silently and watched the doll's hands very closely.

He certainly trusted Alice—but he did not trust Alice to be reliable.

Once the doll had permission, she instantly looked happy. She then carefully reached out and touched the nearest invisible thread.

A second later, she let out a low cry and quickly let go.

Duncan asked at once: "What's wrong?"

"…Weird thing." Alice stared at the thread in a bit of a daze and muttered in puzzlement.

Duncan frowned when he heard that: "Weird thing?"

"I don't know what it is, but it's not like any of the 'threads' I touched before," Alice said hesitantly, as if trying hard to turn what she felt into words. "I felt something… very, very huge, hiding at the other end of the thread. But that thing was blurry, and it seemed to be changing all the time…"

As she spoke, she lifted her hand and pointed toward the deepest part of that veil-like mass of threads.

“It feels like it’s hiding in there, but I still can’t see it.”

Duncan frowned and looked at that hazy “white mist.” He did not see the “weird thing” Alice described, but he knew what it was.

Atlantis had already begun to condense a mental entity within the racial consciousness of the elves.

After a slight hesitation, he also reached toward one faint thread in his field of view and touched it carefully.

He felt nothing at all—but that did not surprise him.

After all, his ability to “see” the invisible threads right now was only something he had “borrowed” from Alice through the link of the flame. It was natural that he could not use it very well.

“Goathead,” Duncan called inwardly after a brief pause. “Can you feel anything?”

“No,” Goathead’s voice came at once, sounding a bit lost and flustered. “Sorry, Captain, I…”

“It’s fine. This isn’t your fault.”

Duncan cut him off. At the same time, he stepped to the edge of the deck and stretched his hand out over the side.

A wisp of ghostly green spirit-form flame gathered in his palm, then fell into the sea like water. The flame spread silently across the surface and flowed toward the floating invisible threads.

However, in the next second, the flame passed cleanly through every thread. Duncan felt no “feedback” at all, as if… those threads existed in a dimension that could not be disturbed.

He frowned at the sight, but was not very surprised. He only murmured thoughtfully: “…So it really isn’t that easy.”

Just then, a long, mellow steam whistle from the distant sea suddenly broke his thoughts.

Duncan immediately looked toward the source of the sound.

He saw a towering silhouette appear on the far-off sea along with the whistle. It was as if a veil between sky and water had suddenly been lifted, and a colossal mass, about a quarter the size of a city-state, simply “popped” out of nowhere and began moving this way, slowing down as it came.

Then he gradually made out the huge vessel’s shape. Its edges were sheer like cliffs. White high walls ringed its base. On the higher ground within those walls stood buildings of many heights: clock towers, spires, and tall blocks. Those buildings, with their white outer walls and blue roofs, did not look very religious. Instead, they reminded him of the famous city university at the center of Lightwind Harbor—the two shared a faintly similar style.

Around that giant structure, Duncan also saw the silhouettes of other ships. Every one of them was a modern, advanced main battleship, yet in front of that enormous ark-ship, they looked very small. At first, he almost overlooked them.

At that moment, white mist began to rise from above the huge “moving city-state.” The academy buildings on its back spewed massive jets of steam from their rooftops. Soon after, the mellow whistle crossed the distant sea again and reached Duncan’s ears a second time.

The second whistle was some kind of signal, with a faintly friendly tone.

Duncan already realized what it was.

It was Truth Academy's pilgrimage ark and its escort fleet!

He had seen the Deep Sea Church's pilgrimage ark before, and that huge "moving city-state" had left a deep mark on him. He knew that the churches of the Four Gods each had their own giant ark, and their sizes were all roughly the same. The massive thing now rising on the distant sea matched the scale of the "Storm Cathedral ark-ship" he had seen in Pland, and the style of the buildings on its upper decks revealed which side it belonged to.

"Captain!!" Goathead's voice suddenly rang out in his mind, breaking Duncan's thoughts. The first mate sounded clearly shocked and a little tense. "It's a church pilgrimage ark!"

"I see it," Duncan answered calmly. "Why are you so nervous?"

"That's a church pilgrimage ark!" Goathead clearly could not understand how the captain could stay so calm. "That thing is hard to deal with—that ship really has a deity's direct protection…"

"Why would I need to deal with it?" Duncan replied casually. "It's not like I've gone to war with the churches of the Four Gods."

But Goathead still sounded very nervous: "But Lightwind Harbor is gone! That big Lightwind Harbor is just gone!"

Duncan felt baffled: "I wasn't the one who erased it."

Goathead fell silent: "…"

The poor first mate seemed to be completely stuck by the logic and did not know how to continue. Only a jumble of confused thoughts came through. Duncan ignored him, turned, and walked toward the helm on the aft deck, taking direct control of the Vanished.

The huge ghost ship “came to life” at once. The spirit-form sails swelled into being from emptiness, and then the great sailing warship turned with startling grace, heading straight for the distant “pilgrimage ark” that looked like a small city-state.

Duncan did not hesitate at all.

Goathead was startled by the captain’s decisiveness: “Captain?”

“We’re going over to say hello and exchange information. They clearly aren’t just passing by—Truth Academy’s pilgrimage ark must have come because of Lightwind Harbor’s distress signal,” Duncan said offhandedly as he steered the Vanished forward. “I know what’s making you nervous. Over the past century the Vanished indeed had some unpleasant history with the four churches, but you have to look at how things have changed.”

“We’ve already had a lot of dealings with several city-states and their churches. Personally, I think this kind of active, positive contact has worked very well. Remember what Lucretia mentioned? The churches of the Four Gods sent notices to the city-states, ordering every city and every Cathedral to cooperate fully with the Vanished fleet. That means they’ve already noticed the Vanished’s zeal in protecting the civilized world…”

Goathead was left stunned by Duncan’s words, but he still reacted quickly and reminded him worriedly: “But… what if? We’ve never had direct contact with Truth Academy’s pilgrimage ark, and Lightwind Harbor is still in this state. That fleet’s purpose isn’t clear, and if we just sail over like this and there really is some misunderstanding…”

Duncan said nothing. He only smiled and shook his head.

Spirit flame burned over his body, making his form shine like cast light, half-transparent. The Vanished cut through the waves in the “mist” woven from countless threads and sailed toward the distant Academy Ark. Under the rippling surface lay the Vanished's hazy reflection—now slowly wrapped in ghost-green flame. Strands of fire flowed like water through the broken waves, dyeing the whole stretch of sea with a layer of dim green light.

"If there's no misunderstanding, then there's no misunderstanding. If there is a misunderstanding, then it isn't a misunderstanding—so, in short, there won't be a misunderstanding."

Chapter 631: Invitation and Contact

The two sides stopped very close to each other—close enough that landing boats could travel between the large ships quickly.

Duncan watched the massive pilgrimage ark with curiosity. He looked at the academy facilities and the many towers built across its upper levels. He saw lots of figures moving near the walls. Some were probably the Academy Ark's guards and sailors, while others, judging from their clothing, looked like ordinary scholars or apprentices. He also saw steam walkers—large spider automatons climbing along the ark's outer bulwarks. They seemed far more agile than any walking machine he had seen in other city-states, clearly made with a higher level of technology.

Duncan knew that the people aboard that pilgrimage ark were certainly observing the Vanished as well.

Ripples of light shimmered on the sea. A light breeze ruffled the surface, and the sinking evening sun laid a pale gold sheen over the rising waves. Yet mixed into that golden glow were faint streaks of ghostly green. That ghost-green water spread outward from the Vanished as its center, until it reached the edge of the pilgrimage ark—where it stopped. There, a sharp "boundary" appeared, and on that boundary line Duncan could clearly feel some kind of "resistance."

The ghost ship and the Cathedral ship faced each other in silence across the sea.

After they had held this standoff for who knew how long, Duncan glanced doubtfully at a nearby shadow and asked: “What are they waiting for?”

“Maybe they’re still watching how the Vanished moves?” Agatha’s voice came from the shadow, sounding a bit unsure. “But they should at least send some kind of contact…”

The steering platform fell briefly silent. Duncan thought for a moment, then spoke, sounding a little uncertain: “Tell me, is it possible they’re trying to hail the Vanished by radio?”

Agatha fell silent: “…Do we have a radio on board?”

“No, but I’ve always wanted to install one. Coming to Lightwind Harbor this time, I actually planned to do it…”

Agatha: “…”

Just then, flashes of light from the upper decks of the pilgrimage ark cut off the exchange between Duncan and Agatha. Along with the rhythmic signal lamps, Duncan also noticed flags waving near the lights.

In the end, it was still the traditional, reliable lamps and flags that did the job.

“They’re inviting the Vanished to come alongside and dock with the pilgrimage ark?” Duncan read the meaning of the signals and looked surprised. “They’re serious?”

“Captain, this could be a trap,” Goathead’s voice came at once through the mental link, filled with his usual conspiracies and natural wariness toward the church. “You must be careful.”

“I understand your caution, but at a time like this it’s not very likely,” Duncan shook his head. “Besides, trap or not, my plan was to meet the people on that ark anyway—and now that they're inviting us first, that's even better."

As he spoke, he slowly steered the Vanished closer to the huge ark. At the same time, he watched the pilgrimage ark and the surrounding warships even more carefully, and, with the power of flame, spread his perception farther out over the sea.

Of course he would not drop even the most basic caution. Logically, he did not think this was a trap, but this was still direct contact with one of the top forces of the Four Gods' churches. Who could say what was running through the mind of the pope who served the God of Wisdom Rahm?

And Duncan believed that the people on the ark were probably having the same worries. They had invited the Vanished—but were they nervous?

They were nervous too.

From their point of view—who knew what the "ghost captain" of the Vanished was planning?

Since the Vanished had returned to the Mortal Realm, it had already made contact with many city-states and church forces. Duncan knew those contacts had had an effect. The churches of the Four Gods were trying to understand this ghost ship that had sailed back from Subspace. Sending Vanna aboard was proof of that, and it was indeed a friendly sign. But Duncan also knew very well that, to the world, the Vanished was still an unknowable symbol, full of riddles and danger.

To Duncan, the churches of the Four Gods were the same.

Caution, watching, testing, contact—even after building some level of communication, even after forming a bit of tacit understanding, both sides still had to step toward each other carefully again and again, confirming "safety" bit by bit. They had to see whether the ghost captain who returned to the Mortal Realm really had human feelings, and whether the Vanished's recent actions were true goodwill or just a disguise driven by Subspace chaos. And Duncan had to see how much real trust and tacit understanding the other side was offering.

At the same time, he was also speaking with one of his followers.

Morris had once studied at Truth Academy—and his mentor back then was the very "pope" who commanded the Academy Ark.

This was exactly the tradition that set Truth Academy apart from the churches of the other three gods. The followers of the God of Wisdom took "passing down knowledge" as their core doctrine. Their priest system was built entirely on the roles of teacher and student, and even the pope was no exception.

Almost all outstanding scholars in this world had once studied at Truth Academy. The luckiest among them even had the chance to board the Academy Ark and become Pope Rune's students.

"…I think you can be at ease. I've talked with my mentor many times about the Vanished. Among the popes of the Four Gods, his attitude toward the Vanished should be the calmest, most rational and most objective…"

"I'm not very worried about your mentor's 'attitude.' I'm just a bit curious why Truth Academy's pilgrimage ark has come to Lightwind Harbor in person, and so quickly," Duncan replied in his mind. "Remember how big the commotion was in Pland before? The Storm Cathedral only rushed over after everything was already finished. In Frostholm, the Death Church's ark never showed up at all."

"Lightwind Harbor is close to the border. Most of the time, the church's pilgrimage arks patrol near the frontier, so it's normal for them to arrive quickly," Morris explained. "Lightwind Harbor may have sent a call for help to the academy's headquarters many days ago. Also…"

He paused for a moment, then slowly went on a few seconds later: "Also, more than half the people on the Academy Ark are elves."

Duncan narrowed his eyes slightly.

The pilgrimage ark drew closer, this astonishing creation floating before the Vanished like a small city-state. Part of its "hull" grew larger and larger in his sight, until it almost formed something you could honestly call a "coastline."

Then guiding lights and flags lit up along that "coastline." Amid low rumbles and the deep growl of large steam valves venting pressure, Duncan saw a section of the edge of this very special Cathedral ship suddenly shift and transform. A large mechanical structure unfolded from its bulwark and extended down into the sea.

A dock appeared there—a dock where the Vanished could temporarily moor.

Duncan let go of the wheel.

The Vanished began to adjust its own position and angle. It carefully "studied" the mechanical dock extending from the Academy Ark, then finally moved slowly toward the gangway.

For some reason, Duncan felt that the Vanished's movements even carried a faint sense of… distaste.

But he soon turned his attention elsewhere.

He lifted his head and looked at the sky above the Academy Ark.

Once again, he "saw" that hazy, tentacled structure. Like a soul outside its body, a vast, indescribable, empty spirit-form stretched out from the ark-ship and floated like cloud and mist over it, with countless arms and ever-changing shadows at its edges.

Duncan stared hard at those “phantoms” stretching out of the Academy Ark.

When the Storm Cathedral had visited the city-state of Pland before, he had seen something similar there too!

Back then, he had thought it was a kind of “power” from the deity worshipped by the Deep Sea Church—Storm Goddess Gamona, a symbol of the Deep Sea’s strength. But now… the Truth Academy’s ark-ship had it as well?!

Did the other churches’ ark-ships have it too?

Was this something all four ark-ships carried? What in the world was it?!

A storm of questions rose at once in Duncan’s mind. Just then, from the corner of his eye, he saw figures appear on the gangway that linked the Vanished and the Academy Ark.

He quickly put away his scattered thoughts and focused on the “visitors” coming down from the Academy Ark.

There were four steam walkers. They escorted a small group of people onto the gangway, then stopped halfway between the Vanished and the ark, crouching by the sides of the bridge and waiting. The small group kept walking toward the Vanished. Among them were guards in the academy’s knowledge guard uniforms and attendants dressed like apprentices. Walking at the very front was an old man in a scholar’s robe, short and plump.

Duncan recalled how Morris had described his mentor.

That should be the leader of Truth Academy, the God of Wisdom Rahm’s representative in the Mortal Realm, Morris’s mentor—Rune.

That “pope” had actually come out in person—with only a few followers, walking straight toward the Vanished?

Duncan’s thoughts moved, and the next second his body turned into a stream of fire. The fire swept across the deck and fell straight to the end of the gangway, where it gathered again into his form.

The group from the Academy Ark clearly jumped at the sudden flames in front of them. Instinctively, they moved to shield Rune. But he simply waved his hand calmly, then smiled at Duncan as he stepped out of the fire.

“It is very good to meet you, Captain Duncan Abnomar,” the elven old man said, nodding politely and gently. “This is our first meeting.”

“I’m happy to meet you too.” Duncan nodded back just as politely.

But just as he was about to say something else, he suddenly noticed a strange anomaly about the other man.

The pope’s body… looked faintly transparent!

Chapter 632: Nightmare and Rupture

Duncan noticed the anomaly on the elderly elf before him. He saw that the other man's body was turning half-transparent, as if he might disappear from this world at any moment.

The change in Duncan's expression clearly fell into the old elf's eyes.

"As you can see, Captain, some interesting changes are happening to me," Rune said calmly with a smile. He even raised his hand to show the palm where the transparency was worst. "A mighty power is trying to take me over to 'Her' side."

Duncan's expression changed slightly at once: "Atlantis's power— I didn't expect even you, the 'pope', to be affected."

"After all, I am also an elf. It seems that whatever is rooted deep in the soul of our race does not care whether I am a 'pope' or not," Rune said in a calm tone. "I felt that powerful invitation—Atlantis is calling all elves back to the Mother Tree."

Duncan frowned. He had found something that did not quite fit: "But you are still clear-headed. That is not the same as the other elves I heard about."

"Because I'm not going," Rune said with a gentle smile.

"…?" Duncan looked at him.

“As a ‘pope’, I should have some special privileges. At the very least, for a time, I can still refuse Atlantis’s ‘invitation’,” Rune said as he lifted his head to look past Duncan. “Captain, would you mind if I came aboard to talk? I know a little about the current situation.”

Duncan did not refuse. He stayed silent for a few seconds, then nodded. He stepped aside to make room while calmly turning his gaze on the old man’s eyes: “As long as your doctrine does not mind you stepping onto a Subspace Shadows ship.”

“The scriptures come from the god,” Rune said unhurriedly. He walked to the end of the gangway and stepped onto the deck of the Vanished without any concern, then went on: “But it is people who interpret them. I can smooth it over when I meet with the bishops later.”

The corner of Duncan’s mouth twitched. He suddenly realized this pope was not quite what he had imagined. Then he noticed that all the attendants Rune had brought were still standing on the gangway and did not seem to plan on coming aboard. This surprised him: “Are your attendants and guards not coming with you? You plan to board alone?”

Rune had already walked several steps ahead. He looked back when he heard Duncan: “They won’t come. Some things are better if fewer people know about them.”

This old gentleman did not look worried at all. Seeing how calm he was, Duncan had no reason to object. He waved to the people still on the gangway, then turned and walked to Rune’s side. Still, as they crossed the deck, he could not help asking one more thing: “You came here all by yourself. Aren’t you worried about your safety without any guards?”

Rune looked up at Duncan: “If you truly meant me harm, could a few guards really keep me safe on the Vanished?”

Duncan thought about it seriously and answered plainly: “They would have trouble keeping themselves safe.”

“Exactly. I am a practical man. That is the basic discipline of any scholar,” Rune said casually, then followed Duncan toward the captain’s cabin.

On the way, Duncan roughly explained the current situation to this pope. He told him about the disappearance of Lightwind Harbor and the state of the city-state.

As they were about to reach the aft deck, Rune stopped. He lifted his head and looked over the Vanished’s rail toward the wide sea on the other side of the hull.

That was where Lightwind Harbor had once been.

But now there was only sea water slowly turning golden under the sunset, and, far away, a glowing geometric body floating quietly on the surface.

Duncan could still see countless invisible strands floating above that sea, as dense as hair. But to Rune, the sea there was completely empty.

“It was already like this when I arrived,” Duncan said casually when he noticed Rune’s gaze. “You don’t think I made it disappear, do you?”

“…When we first reached this sea, some people did think so. If Banster were here, he would be even more certain,” Rune said after a pause, his tone a little odd. “Please understand, a whole city-state has vanished into thin air. That is truly hard to believe, and the Vanished is still on the scene. Even though we know this is related to the Nameless One’s dream, people cannot help letting their thoughts run wild.”

Duncan said nothing. He stepped forward, opened the door of the captain’s cabin, and gestured for Rune to enter.

With clear curiosity on his face, Rune followed Duncan into this place that, for the outside world, was wrapped in countless bizarre tales, horror, and mystery.

“Captain, you’re back!” Alice, who had been waiting in the cabin, rushed over first. She happily ran to Duncan, then suddenly stopped. “…Who is this old man?”

Rune stared in some surprise at the doll that had suddenly appeared in front of him.

But he reacted quickly and matched her to the information in his mind: “If I am not mistaken, this must be Miss Alice?”

“Yes,” Alice nodded a little and stared curiously at the strange old man who had just come in. “Who are you?”

“The God of Wisdom’s servant,” Rune said with a polite smile. “You can just call me Rune.”

“He is Mr. Morris’s teacher,” Duncan added casually at the side—he knew Alice would understand that better.

“Oh! Mr. Morris’s teacher! Then you must be amazing,” Alice said, suddenly enlightened. She quickly ran over to the small tea stove like she always did. “I’ll make some tea!”

Rune watched in amazement as the terrifying doll, labeled as being in a runaway state in official records, bustled around the room. He also looked curiously at the furnishings in the captain’s cabin. Then, suddenly, a strange feeling of being watched caught his attention. He turned his gaze without thinking and saw, on the chart table in the middle of the room, a jet-black wooden carving of Goathead lying quietly there—the eerie “sculpture” was fixing him with a gaze. Its eyes, like obsidian, were hollow and deep, and a faint, uncanny light flickered in that gaze.

Rune seemed to freeze. He stood still, staring at the strange black “wood carving” without blinking.

After who knew how long, Goathead finally moved. It suddenly spoke: “What are you looking at? Never seen a work of art?”

But Rune seemed to wake from a dream. The moment Goathead’s words fell, he let out a low cry and quickly turned his gaze away. He braced one hand on the table, carefully avoiding looking back at the “wood carving,” and raised his head to Duncan: “She saw it!”

Duncan reacted at once: “Atlantis?”

“Yes, Atlantis saw it. I… don’t know how to describe the feeling, but just now I felt Atlantis’s ‘gaze’ suddenly focus here. She was looking at this place through my eyes. She… I could not understand what she was trying to send. Confusion, fear, anger… countless chaotic emotions…”

He suddenly stopped and waved his hand in front of his eyes, as if trying to drive some unseen interference out of his mind. Duncan noticed that the old elf’s body had become a little more transparent in the last few seconds, but soon Rune returned to “stability.” He lifted his head, the chaos in his eyes slowly clearing: “She has left for now, but I don’t know how long I can hold her back. Captain Duncan, we have less time than I expected. Listen to me first.”

It seemed Rune had used a willpower no mortal could imagine to drive out the part of Atlantis that lingered in his mind. Then he sat down by the chart table and spoke quickly— “Atlantis is calling all the elves in the world. This call is rooted deep in our souls. While I was under its influence, I also touched part of her thoughts.

“I saw… a Doomsday, something that destroyed everything, burned deep into her memories. That Doomsday led to her gradual runaway state… Fear, anger, and helplessness in the face of her own destruction—these things had slept in her mind for a long time. Now she is slowly waking up, so those sleeping fears and memories of Doomsday are waking up with her. But that is not the only reason…"

He stopped, as if it took great effort to steady his thoughts again. After resting for a few seconds, he went on: "In her anger, I also felt a strong emotion aimed at us elves. It was strange and confused, full of a sharp sense of tearing… I felt a strong will to protect. She ordered the elves to return to the World Tree to receive some kind of 'shelter.' But at the same time, she felt huge resistance and even… terror toward this 'protection,' as if she was treating us as some kind of…"

This time Rune paused even longer, as if he had to struggle to find a word that could describe the strong feeling he had "touched" in Atlantis. After opening his mouth several times, he finally spoke again: "Some kind of… not-quite monster…"

He slowly turned his head and looked at a point outside the window—that was the sea where Lightwind Harbor had vanished.

In theory, he could not see Lightwind Harbor, and he could not see the invisible threads floating above the sea.

But he kept staring in that direction, as if some invisible call was sounding in his mind, making the old elf look toward the World Tree that existed only in the race's memory.

"I can feel it…" Rune spoke softly, as if he were talking in his sleep. "She is going mad in this tearing pain, but… there is also…

"It feels like something else, on the 'other side' of that Doomsday. There seems to be another being that has gone mad… sending me a faint call…"

With a clatter, something fell to the floor by the small tea stove.

Alice looked up and stared at the window in fright.

“Captain! Those threads are moving!”

Chapter 633: Dream Sinking

The threads were moving.

Duncan heard Alice’s cry. He snapped out of his thoughts and looked up at the window. Then a sight he would never forget filled his eyes—

On the sea where Lightwind Harbor had once been, the invisible threads, dense as hair and woven like mist, began to change wildly. The long veil of “gauze-mist” slowly swelled and shrank, writhing as it shifted between real and unreal. It slowly reshaped into a form. The part on the sea surface drew back, gathered, and rose higher, while the structure floating in the clouds swelled outward, split into crisscrossing branches, and slowly drooped toward the edge of the sea like another sky.

A hard-to-describe feeling of pressure from a colossal thing came from that shifting phantom. The whole sea began to fall under the shadow of that invisible crown. Only then did Duncan finally understand what he was seeing—it was a tree.

The “threads” that had floated over the sea were twisting together like strands of hair into the shape of a huge tree—a World Tree big enough to cover the entire sea!

Rune pushed himself up from the table with difficulty. The old elf who had relied on his own will to resist Atlantis’s call now seemed close to his limit. He too stared out the window. Without Alice’s power, he still could not see the invisible threads, and that stretch of sea remained empty to him. But suddenly, large patches of shadow appeared on the empty sea—the lines that had been invisible began to show outlines that the naked eye could see.

He saw the tree, the towering giant that was growing fast, spreading out from the elves' racial dream.

"That is…" Rune's eyes widened at once. Memories and feelings that had slept deep in his soul surged up like a tide, and he muttered without thinking: "Atlantis… Atlantis has come to take us home…"

But the next second, his eyes suddenly cleared again. Rahm's power dragged his mind back to the Mortal Realm. He pressed his forehead hard: "Captain Duncan, Atlantis's awakening has entered its next stage… She is remembering her original form…"

A long, clear steam whistle suddenly sounded from nearby. It was the Pilgrimage Ark at the edge of the sea warning the whole fleet. There was a note of urging in the whistle as well; the people left on the ark seemed worried about the pope's safety.

Rune lifted his hand and quickly traced a few glowing characters in the air.

Duncan noticed at once: "What are you doing?"

"I am ordering the ark and the escort fleet to move away from Atlantis at once," Rune said quickly. "There are still many elves on those ships. They may not be affected yet, but they cannot stay in this sea any longer."

Duncan asked right away: "What about you?"

"That is exactly what I… wanted to say," Rune answered. He seemed dazed for a second but soon recovered. "Take me into Atlantis's dream—to the deepest part of the dream. I need to speak directly with that 'Guardian'…"

"Talk?" Duncan frowned deeply. "Don't tell me you plan to rely on your eloquence and sincerity to persuade a mad 'Elder God' to wake up."

“No. I have another way. It might be able to affect her…” Rune said.

Duncan quietly watched the old elf for a moment. Only when a second whistle, the Cathedral ark’s signal to withdraw, came from nearby did he finally break the silence: “How can you be so sure I can take you into the depths of Atlantis’s dream?”

Rune steadied himself and met Duncan’s gaze: “Because the moment I made contact with Atlantis, I saw the Vanished. Even though it was sailing in the darkness at the border, I am certain that is proof you can communicate with Atlantis.”

As he listened to the old pope, Duncan’s expression did not change, but his heart suddenly stirred.

What Rune described… was what the world looked like from Atlantis’s “point of view”?

A plan that had only been vague before suddenly took shape. Duncan turned his gaze to the chart table beside him, to the keel sample lying on it.

Rune grew a little uneasy at Duncan’s sudden silence and could not help asking: “…You do have a way, don’t you?”

“…Things are a little different from before, but…” Duncan still stared at the block of wood on the table. Slowly, a small smile appeared on his face. “Yes, I have an idea, and I was just about to try it. I can give you a ride along the way. The only problem is… the journey may be a bit exciting.”

Rune froze: “…Exciting?”

“Have you ever ridden on a ghost ship, sailing through an Elder God’s nightmare?”

…

When the howl came from the street, Lucretia was asking Taran Ael to confirm the strange scene he had seen in the last moment of the Nameless One's dream, and the voice from Atlantis that he had heard while half out of his mind.

Taran Ael had said that before the Nameless One's dream ended, he saw the world being destroyed. That scene was very likely the one burned deep into the elves' racial memory, the memory of the Great Annihilation at the start of the Deep Sea era that generations of scholars had sought in vain. He had also said he heard a voice that seemed to be Atlantis's, and the anger and terror in that voice seemed to point to a secret. Lucretia felt she was already touching the final truth of this dream, but just as she was about to keep asking, a strange howl swept over the entire city-state.

She jumped to her feet and ran to the window.

The sight before her made even this "sea witch" lose her breath. She stood there, stunned.

The "sky" above the city was burning. Roaring flames swept across it, like huge waves rushing out from the depths of an endless nightmare. They rolled over the layered crowns of trees above Lightwind Harbor and the muddy, chaotic sky between the branches. The fire was like a blanket, covering everything. It shrieked and leaped down into every street under the canopy, pouring like a flood to devour every inch of land in sight.

It gave her a feeling—as if the forest that had stretched out from the dream had suddenly transformed into solid fire, and that fire had then begun to burn the whole city-state.

The moment the flames fell, explosions, screams, the crashes of Steam Walkers in runaway state slamming into buildings, and all kinds of loud, chaotic noise almost instantly filled the entire city-state!

The shocking change came so suddenly that Lucretia felt a strange, unreal sense of tearing. She stood at the window in a daze, staring at the scene outside. After two seconds, her gaze rose on its own, as if something were pulling it, toward the blazing sky.

In the flames that already covered the sky, she saw a huge structure slowly coming into view. It was like a solid Day of Ruin pushing down from the heavens, pressing inch by inch toward everyone's heads.

…What was that?

The question rose in Lucretia's mind without her even thinking it. The next second, a cry from behind finally snapped her out of her brief daze.

"By Rahm's name!" One of the knowledge guards stared at the window and cried out: "What is that thing?!"

Even Taran Ael, whose condition had been poor and whose head was full of noise and pain, pushed himself up from his chair. He wobbled over to Lucretia and looked out at the burning sky and the streets in chaos.

Confusion and fear filled the scholar's eyes. He seemed unable to imagine Lightwind Harbor falling into such horror so suddenly. Even though the forest that had spread out of the Nameless One's dream had already swallowed the whole city, the sight outside now still made him feel as if he had fallen into yet another layer of nightmare. He could not help muttering: "It really is a nightmare…"

"No, Master Taran Ael," Lucretia's voice came from beside him, pulling him out of his daze. He saw the sea witch turning her head, her eyes deep as the ocean. "This is a nightmare."

A brief look of confusion crossed Taran Ael's face, while the light of the flames slowly reflected in Lucretia's eyes.

She saw the room starting to fall apart. The figures in the room curled and twisted in the fire. She saw the light of the sky's flames pierce the roof and turn into cold beams of sunlight that swept through the air. She saw a huge tree appear in the distance—it rose from the sea, as if it were an extension of the city-state itself.

She stepped forward and put her hand on Taran Ael's shoulder.

"My father said that Lightwind Harbor has vanished from the Mortal Realm. There is only a blank space over that sea now.

"Mr. Taran Ael, we have never woken up from the start—the whole city is still asleep.

"But Atlantis is about to wake up from the dream…"

She pressed down slightly and pushed Taran Ael forward, who had frozen like a statue without her noticing.

"Come on. Let's go see what exactly Atlantis has been dreaming about."

The next second, under the blazing flames and the falling sky, Lightwind Harbor slowly and quietly fell apart.

At the last moment, as the flames swept over it, the city turned into bubbles, gleams of light, smoke, wind, and whispering voices. Its final shadow reflected on the calm sea. The remaining firelight and twisted, torn scene in that reflection looked like an illusion, slowly swallowed by the breaking waves.

Amid the rising and falling waves, a huge shadow was slowly growing up from the seabed—it seemed to be a giant tree.

And along the edge of that tree, which kept growing from the deep, another shadow, sometimes real and sometimes ghostly, was moving slowly.

It was a ghost ship, slowly rising into view.

Chapter 634:

Shirley felt that she had been sinking in darkness for a long time. She kept sinking, as if the whole world had suddenly turned into nothingness and she would fall into an endless sleep in this descent.

Until a huge force suddenly grabbed her arm, and Dog's voice rang directly in her mind: "Shirley! Wake up! Wake up! Don't sleep!!"

Shirley finally jolted awake from that dream of falling, and she almost sprang straight up from the spot: "Dog! Fire! The city is on fire again!"

That horrible scene of flames spreading across the sky still seemed to burn in her fading memories. The crushing fear of seeing an entire city swallowed by fire made her heart pound wildly. She could not remember how long it had been since she last had a nightmare like that. When she woke up, she was not even sure if she had truly awakened, or if she had fallen into another nightmare that was about to go up in flames.

But Dog's voice pulled her back from her panic: "Shirley, there's no fire. That was just a dream. There is no big fire here now…"

Shirley finally woke up completely. She shook her head. The scene in front of her was still a little blurry, but she could see lush green filling her vision and hear the sound of flowing water by her ear. She also saw Dog beside her. That let her relax at last. She leaned against Dog without thinking and took a few deep breaths: "That really scared me to death… So what was that just now… Why was the whole city suddenly on fire? Where are we now…"

“We are inside the Nameless One’s dream.” Lucretia’s voice suddenly came from the side, cutting Shirley’s muttering short at once.

Shirley looked up toward the sound. The strange blur in her sight finally faded away. She saw the “witch” Miss standing on a tree stump not far away. At the same time, she saw the thick forest around them and a stream flowing across a clearing in the woods not far ahead.

She stared blankly for two or three seconds before she finally understood their situation. She hesitated, straightened up, looked around at the forest, and spoke in a low voice: “We’ve come back to this forest again?”

Right after that, something else suddenly came to her mind. Her face changed at once: “Wait, what about the Mortal Realm over there?! We’re dreamwalking again now, so is the city ‘outside’ still burning…”

“There is no more Mortal Realm, Shirley. At least, not for Lightwind Harbor as it is right now. The Mortal Realm has already been completely swallowed by Atlantis’s power.” Lucretia looked calmly at the girl who was panicking again and explained patiently. “Do you remember? When my Father contacted us before, He told us that Lightwind Harbor in the Mortal Realm had already disappeared. From that moment on, we had already fallen into Atlantis’s dream along with the whole city. The forest that invaded the city, and the city that was invaded by the forest, were all part of the dream.”

Confusion still showed on Shirley’s face. She had not yet sorted out what was happening in front of her. Seeing this, Lucretia only shook her head lightly: “It’s like how the elves in the city would disappear after nightfall. Anything swallowed by Atlantis’s dream will vanish from the Mortal Realm. We always thought that only the elves could ‘disappear’ in this way. Now it seems… even an entire city can ‘dreamwalk’ under the influence of the Elder Gods.”

Shirley slowly widened her eyes. The fact that the whole city had already been swallowed by a dream made her feel a cold shock. After a long time, she finally spoke in complete confusion: “Then… what kind of situation is this now? How did we end up in this place again…”

“This is another layer of the dream. Shirley, look up. This is no longer the ‘forest’ we are familiar with.”

Listening to the witch’s words, Shirley finally noticed that something in the forest looked a little off. Only then did she realize the strange “sky” that showed through the treetops.

She hesitated, then raised her head.

An endless, astonishing structure came into her view. It hung above them, held up by branch-like masses as huge as mountain ranges in the sky.

It was as if another forest was hanging upside down above the heavens. The vast canopy wove itself into a second land above the plains and mountains. Vines that glowed with soft light and clusters of light, airy spores drooped from the treetops. Dotted gleams lit every corner beneath the canopy. Branches of unmeasurable length and thickness stretched across her vision and met in the farthest distance, becoming a “trunk” like a towering peak. Along the path of that trunk, countless “smaller branches” drooped down and fell all the way to the ground.

Where those “small branches” reached the earth, dense plants grew. Under the cover of the sky’s canopy, they formed a forest.

“This… this thing…” Shirley gaped, stammered several times, and finally managed to form words. “Atlantis!!”

“Yes. Atlantis. We have finally met her.” Lucretia raised her head and quietly gazed at the canopy that almost completely blocked out the sky, and at the faint shapes between the leaves that looked like man-made buildings or settlements. “This is the World Tree that slumbers deep in the elves’ racial memory… It is even more magnificent than I imagined.”

“Wait, give me a second. I’m all mixed up. I need to sort this out…” Shirley said quickly. At the same time, she could not help but look up again at that amazing giant tree that seemed big enough to cover the whole world. “We’ve come down to a deeper layer of the Nameless One’s dream, and the real Atlantis is sleeping here. Then what? Are we going to talk to this tree and see if she can keep sleeping?”

Lucretia did not answer. Her face turned serious and her mind sank.

“Rabby.”

The rabbit’s voice answered in her heart at once: “Rabby is listening~”

“What is happening on that ship right now? Are those cultists doing anything?”

“Rabby was just about to report to you. Things seem a little strange here…” The rabbit’s voice sounded very low, as if it was hiding from someone’s sight while answering carefully. “Those cultists suddenly all hid in their cabins. Rabby heard them talking… They said the Saint felt a bad omen in fate, so all actions are stopped for now. They also said the Ender sent a warning that a new Great Hollow is about to appear, and they must move away quickly…”

“A bad omen? Moving away from the Great Hollow?” Lucretia’s eyes changed slightly. “You mean those cultists sensed some danger and are running away?”

“It seems so. The ship is running at full speed in one direction now. Before this, it was only drifting slowly.” Rabby spoke in a cautious whisper. “Mistress, Rabby suddenly feels a little scared. Did Rabby get exposed? Did those cultists sense Rabby and get scared away…”

“No. You are not that important.” Lucretia answered without the slightest hesitation. “You are not even a match for that ‘Saint’. That ‘Saint’ must have gotten some other piece of information…”

“Then… what should Rabby do now?” The rabbit’s voice really did sound a little panicked. This evil spirit that was so good at moving inside nightmares seemed to be heavily affected in the Mortal Realm. “Those cultists don’t seem to plan on entering the Nameless One’s dream again. Rabby has no way to return to your side through the dream…”

“Stay hidden and behave yourself. I will come and get you later,” Lucretia said quickly. “Don’t worry, I will appear in front of you. And if I cannot find you, then my Father will appear in front of you. Don’t forget, you have seen Him before. Do you understand what I mean?”

As soon as she finished speaking, the Nightmare Rabbit let out a near shrieking scream: “Rabby understands!!!”

Lucretia ended the link with a blank face.

Shirley was still standing nervously beside her, as if she were waiting for the witch’s answer.

“Those Annihilators seem to have sensed something. They have paused their actions,” Lucretia exhaled softly and said to Shirley. “We still don’t know whether there is any change in the actions of the other group, the Suntists.”

Shirley thought for a moment after hearing this, then spoke, not quite sure: “So that means we don’t have to worry about running into those Annihilators here?”

Lucretia just looked at her calmly. Two seconds later she spoke: “No. It means the changes in this dream have already gone beyond those cultists’ plan. They have once again made a huge mess that even they cannot clean up. And we… are now inside that mess."

Shirley was startled by the slightly gloomy tone of this "sea witch". She froze for a moment. Just then, a faint rustling sound suddenly caught her attention.

The sound came from the direction of the stream. At first, it just sounded like ordinary water.

But soon, a strange noise rose within the sound of running water. That noise spread outward, and it seemed to start affecting the soil, stones, and shrubs along the banks…

Shirley saw fleshy tentacles rising out of the stream.

The soil began to writhe like the skin of a soft-bodied creature.

In the shadows in the bushes, something with sharp teeth was chewing on something.

And on the tree closest to her, at the tips of the lush green branches, the leaves slowly opened their eyes.

Shirley slowly took in a cold breath.

The whole forest seemed to have started to wriggle.

She finally let out a sharp, powerful scream: "I know why those cultists didn't come back – run!!"

…

Vanna opened her eyes in the middle of wind and sand.

The memory of the city suddenly going up in flames still lingered in her mind. The noise and explosions from the streets still seemed to echo in her ears. But after a long stretch of darkness and falling, she realized she had once again returned to that familiar place.

“Traveler, we meet again.”

A familiar voice came from beside her, and the blowing sand died down along with it. Vanna raised her head and saw, once more, the old giant in the tattered robe.

She understood what was going on at once.

She had fallen from the dreamwalking city down into the deeper layers of this dream.

“This will be the last time we meet, traveler,” the giant said again.

Chapter 635:

This time, the wind in the desert seemed more violent than ever before.

Chaotic gusts swept again and again across the dunes scattered with jagged rocks. Dust rose into the air and swirled dozens of meters high. In the distance, a huge yellow-brown “wall” was slowly rising into the sky. A greater storm was brewing inside that wall, as if it were gathering power strong enough to sweep across the whole world.

Yet all this restless wind and sand stopped sharply just a few meters away from Vanna and the giant. The dust that had been lifted circled around them, like the view from the eye of a storm.

Vanna noticed the change in the surroundings at once. She stared in shock at the roiling dust in the distance, especially that faraway sandstorm that was rising from the ground like a wall to the sky. She had never seen such a sight before, and for the first time she felt uneasy: “What is that?”

The old giant in the tattered robe lowered his head slightly and looked gently into Vanna’s eyes. “It is a storm, traveler. A storm you yourself will raise.”

“A storm I will raise?” Vanna froze, staring at the giant in confusion. “When did I ever…”

“Not yet. But soon. Time has started flowing again, traveler. It is flowing in every direction. Do you feel it? This world is changing. After such a long stillness, this stone that was buried and bound under dust is finally about to start rolling again.”

Vanna listened, stunned, as the giant suddenly began to speak these vague, puzzling words. She drew her own guesses from them, but before she could ask, the giant waved his hand at her: “Don’t ask too much, traveler. This place is finally heading toward its end. The more you learn about it at this moment, the more tightly you will be bound to it. I do not want you to become the next soul wandering this desert.”

At last, Vanna saw something different in his words and in those eyes that burned with dim yellow fire.

This “deity who had lost his memory” had come to say goodbye.

“Come with me, traveler,” the giant beckoned to her. “Walk with me one last time, and let us put a period at the end of this journey.”

Vanna paused for a heartbeat, then quickly followed the giant’s steps and asked as she walked: “Where are you taking me? What exactly is happening here?”

“We are going back to that ‘big pit’,” the giant slowed his pace and lowered his head a little. “I have started to remember some things. What I have been looking for is there… and maybe what you want is there too.”

In a sudden swirl of wind and sand, the figures of Vanna and the giant vanished together into the depths of the desert.

…

The Sun had almost completely fallen below the horizon.

Upon the vast, boundless sea, only the huge luminous geometric body still floated quietly on the surface. The endless sunlight it shed spilled out gently and ran along the small waves into the farthest distance.

Lightwind Harbor, which had once been bathed in this sunlight, had already vanished from the sea. In the place where Lightwind Harbor used to lie, an astonishing vision now stood tall. Countless strands of invisible things, as fine as hair, rose from the sea and tangled between sky and water, forming the projection of a tree even larger than the city itself.

This giant tree, half real and half unreal, was still growing. It seemed to still be drawing nourishment from the vanished Lightwind Harbor. Every second, it moved a little more from illusion toward reality. Each breeze that passed, each wave that rolled, made its trunk a bit clearer and its grand canopy a bit more solid. Now, standing in the sunlight that filled the sea, it towered over everything and blocked out the sky. Even the grand ark of the Cathedral floating on the distant sea looked like a “small boat” beside it.

The fleet of Truth Academy had already been ordered to withdraw from Atlantis’s projected range. The ark and its escorting warships were now circling on the sea outside the tree’s shadow.

But within the range of the great tree’s projection, on the sea under that towering canopy, a sailing warship wrapped in blazing ghostly fire was heading straight toward the “trunk”.

Its half transparent spirit form sails had already been raised. Invisible force filled them and pushed the Vanished forward, driving it toward the distant World Tree that rose like a mountain to the sky. In the flames, the huge ghost ship groaned in a deep, unsettling way, as if it were under heavy pressure, as if it were resisting a power that rejected it.

When the Vanished sailed to within twelve nautical miles of the trunk, the expected “rejection” appeared.

The waves rose higher and higher, building into a storm. Wave after wave surged from Atlantis’s direction and crashed hard against the bow of the Vanished, at times washing over the deck. Howling wind and thunderous booms came from the direction of the great tree. Each roar sounded as if it would shatter this ghost ship that kept pressing forward through the storm.

Within that ceaseless onrush of power, there was almost a solid feeling of resistance and… anger.

Atlantis did not like this ship. She did not like this ghost ship whose keel had been made from her branch and then reborn upon Saslokar's spine.

She felt confusion, anger, and even fear because of it.

Yet the crashing waves and the World Tree's roar outside the hull barely affected the stability within the ship.

Duncan walked down the steps, passing through dim, long corridors and slanted, ancient stairways. He crossed storerooms where the light was strangely inverted and passed cabins that made eerie noises, going step by step toward the deepest part of the ship.

In one hand he held the consecrated lantern that shed a faint green flame. In the other he held the "square timber" taken from the city of Pland.

He could feel the wood in his hand giving off a slight heat and tremor. This "sample", cut from the Vanished's original keel, seemed to sense something and was growing more and more restless.

Agatha's voice came from the shadows beside him: "The wind and waves outside are very strong. Atlantis is trying to stop the Vanished from getting close."

"It's almost quiet down here," Duncan just smiled. "Looks like the soundproofing in this part of the ship is pretty good."

"Alice tied Your Eminence Rune to a pillar with a rope. She said she was afraid the old Mr. would get thrown off the ship. Your Eminence Rune is not in good shape and could not resist… I tried to persuade her, but Alice wouldn't listen. She said this is basic common sense when going to sea, and that she's an old sailor on this ship now…"

“…As long as she’s happy,” Duncan kept walking. “What about the ropes, are they happy?”

“…They should be very happy. It’s not often they get the experience of tying the Pope to a ship.”

“That’s good then.”

Duncan said this lightly, then pushed open the last door leading down to the bottom deck.

The broken structure of the Vanished’s lower hull appeared before him.

No matter how fiercely the storm raged on the sea above, this layer of the “bottom deck”, half submerged in subspace, stayed as silent as ever. The shattered hull still floated quietly in the void. Chaotic streams of light from subspace flowed without order through the great cracks in the hull, just as they had a century ago, and just as they did now, a century later.

Duncan walked slowly to the center of this broken deck and stopped beside the largest fissure.

Agatha’s form rose at his side. She spoke with a hint of caution: “Can this really work?”

Duncan lowered his head and gazed at the crack under his feet and the flowing light within it.

“The Vanished’s original keel was made from Atlantis’s branch. Later, Saslokar’s spine replaced that keel and, with the divine authority of the King of Dreams, reshaped the Vanished that subspace had swallowed through a kind of ‘phase inversion’. So in a certain sense, the Vanished is another Atlantis.”

He bent down slowly and set the block of wood on the floor in front of him.

“Memory and dream. Saslokar wandered along the border between the real and the unreal. He created Atlantis in a dream and then rebuilt the Vanished in a dream. He drew everything from his own memories. The only problem was that he did not remember himself. He did not even know that he could dream.”

Duncan lightly tapped his finger on the surface of the wooden block.

A small green flame jumped up from one corner of the wood and, in the blink of an eye, consumed the whole block. In the surging spirit form fire, it took on the same ghostly, transparent texture as Duncan’s body.

“Saslokar was the first of the Dreamless. In the most heretical teachings, the simplest truth is often hidden.”

Duncan straightened, then kicked the flaming block of wood toward the fissure that led into subspace.

It tumbled over the edge of the hull and vanished almost at once into that dark, chaotic space, disappearing into the shifting currents of light.

A strange creaking sound began to rise from far away.

“So the key to entering the deep part of Atlantis’s dream was never to wake Atlantis herself. Atlantis is already awake. She does not need to be awakened.

“The one we must wake is Saslokar, the spine that is soaking in subspace.

“We must let Saslokar and Atlantis talk to each other. After all these long years, we must let this ‘Dreamless’ one realize that he is dreaming.”

The strange creaking noise rose to a peak. Then, all at once, dim emerald flame surged up from the cracks in the broken hull.

The spirit form fire rushed through the whole deck. Wherever the flames passed, the great fissures began to close and fade at a speed visible to the naked eye. The broken hull began to slowly mend, and the Vanished's lower structure gradually became whole again.

Before the largest crack healed, Duncan caught a glimpse of the scene beneath it from the corner of his eye.

That was the Vanished's true "ship bottom", the real lower hold that wrapped around the keel.

A huge, desolate spine of an Elder God floated in subspace, sailing through the chaotic void.

Fresh green branches were winding out from the gaps in that skeleton, spreading along the backbone as the fire flowed over every part of it.

"Now the two keels have become one."

Duncan spoke softly.

In front of him, the last fissure in the Vanished's lower deck slowly closed.

He lifted his head and called out in his heart: "Saslokar."

Goathead's voice answered at once: "I am here, Captain."

"Full sail. Top speed. We're going to find your Little Sapling."

"Aye, Captain!"

Chapter 636: Sailing in the Elder Gods' Nightmare

The Vanished began to accelerate toward Atlantis. It charged ahead through waves that rose higher and higher, and into the terrible howls and storms rolling from the direction of that giant tree. Wrapped in blazing fire, the ghost ship started its assault.

Atlantis seemed to notice this sudden change. Its instinctive resistance to the Dream Invasion immediately stirred. Towering waves roared across the sea. The water influenced by the giant tree turned into sky-high walls, as if covered in fangs and blades, crashing down toward the bow of the Vanished with crushing force. In the scream of the waves, countless hazy figures appeared in the storm. They looked like an ancient army, mixed with warped visions of birds and beasts twisted beyond recognition. They surged through the gaps between the waves like a collapsing mountain, rushing at the burning ghost ship in the gale.

However, the Vanished did not avoid the oncoming storm at all. Its sails billowed even more, and its speed increased.

ghostly green flames burst from every seam of the decks, every cabin window, and every gunport on the ship, as if they meant to set the entire sea on fire. That living blaze skimmed over the ocean and crashed straight into the storm made of nightmare phantoms.

The towering waves burned, steam rolled up and opened huge gaps, and the blades hidden in the wind and spray were swallowed by an invisible power.

They vanished with the next gust, turning into harmless mist. The phantoms in the storm turned into true illusions in the fire.

They passed harmlessly through the hull of the Vanished. The spirit form fire did not harm them, and they could not touch the Vanished. Only in the ship's trailing wake of fire did these phantoms slowly pause, as if waking from a long dream. Silently, they faded away on the wind.

After that, the Vanished sailed into a greater storm, with more phantoms and nightmares closer to the true essence of Atlantis.

Just as a person could never tell when a dream truly began, after an instant too small for any sense to notice, the world outside the Vanished fell into murky darkness. The Boundless Sea was gone. The sky was gone. Even the "sunlight" that had spread from the distant sea had disappeared without anyone knowing when it left.

Around them, only storm-visions kept rolling in the dark, along with huge "tunnels" that appeared and vanished inside the storm, woven from countless vines and roots. The Vanished raced forward through one of these unspeakable tunnels.

After another instant too small to notice, sound vanished as well.

The world outside the Vanished became silent.

Yet the storm-phantoms were still there. They just churned in silence, which made them even more eerie and terrifying than before.

The Vanished sailed on through the tangled plant structures. The entire ship seemed to float in a void. Far ahead, in that void, only the vast shadow of Atlantis remained.

It looked like the last solid thing left in the world, as if after the world had collapsed and all things had fallen into silence, it was the one, final tree.

Or perhaps the very first tree.

Rune felt a little better. After they passed that unnoticeable “Dreamwalking moment”, or perhaps after the ship itself had gone through some kind of “change”, he found that the constant calling in his mind suddenly weakened. He felt his thoughts slowly becoming stable again. He could even hear the beating of his heart in his chest.

He lowered his head and saw that his body really was recovering bit by bit.

Looking out the window, he could see that enormous tree stretching for thousands of miles through the darkness.

Even though they were still trapped in this dangerous, terrifying “dream of the Elder Gods”, and even though he knew Atlantis was still trying to “protect”—or rather, to kill—every elf in the world, the old man still could not help but mutter under his breath: “…So beautiful…”

A voice answered from nearby: “Yes, very beautiful…”

Rune turned toward the sound and saw that the strange Goathead on the chart table was staring out the window with a sigh. Pale green flame flowed and rose through its wooden body, and a tongue of fire gathered beneath it like a blurred, twisted spine, running along the table and linking it to the deck below.

“At the beginning, I planted her in the dark—just like this,” the eerie wooden Goathead went on softly. It seemed lost in memory, carefully picking up the pieces buried deep in its mind. “Back then she was not this big… she was just a little sapling, crooked and bent, even a bit… ugly.

“At that time, I did not know what she would become, or what she ought to become. She shaped herself. All I did was let her grow, and keep growing.

“Then I learned to imagine more things. More trees. Plants that grew together with the trees, and all kinds of creatures living among them… I placed them all through that darkness. After a while, the darkness faded, and the world began to grow rich and full. Many things… beyond my first imagination started to happen. Overall, it was interesting—much more interesting than an endless, meaningless emptiness.

“So some intelligent beings that grew out of the forest gave me a name. They said I was the ‘creator’.

“But I did not really understand that title. I did not understand much of what they said. They did many strange things that I could not understand either.

“They gathered together to dance. They piled their harvest at the feet of a billy goat carved from roots. They raised great waterwheels on the river and decorated them with bright ribbons. When at last they learned how to fly, they leapt from the branches of Atlantis in huge flying machines and glided over the hills, landing at the edge of Atlantis’s gaze amid cheers…

“They said it was to please the great creator, so the creator would not leave.

“But I did not understand what they were doing. I was not interested in their… performances and gifts at all. I never was.

“But when I saw how happy they were, I thought it was a good thing.”

Rune fell quiet. His eyes slowly opened wider as he stared at the unsettling Goathead on the table, his expression filled with disbelief.

He opened his mouth, but the tangle of feelings in his chest choked off all words. Only a strange sound came from his throat.

A sudden crackling explosion in the captain’s cabin cut off his next move and his next line.

Pale green spirit form fire flared out of thin air. A tall figure took shape in the flames. Duncan stepped out of the fire and looked straight at Goathead: “You remembered everything?”

“Broken, chaotic. Only vague impressions and a few flickering images,” Goathead answered with a soft creak of wood, slowly turning his gaze toward Duncan. “I can feel that many other ‘fragments’ are scattered in other places.”

“Planning to gather them all?” Duncan asked offhandedly.

“…It does not matter,” Goathead said after two seconds of silence. To Duncan’s surprise, he shook his head. “At least it is not something to think about right now.”

“…All right.” Duncan gave Goathead a long, deep look, then turned toward the window. “Get ready to make contact. We are close to the trunk.”

“Will you take the helm yourself?” Goathead asked.

“No,” Duncan shook his head. “If I took the helm, we might never find where Atlantis is hiding. Since you have remembered part of it, you keep steering. I think that part of your ‘memory’ is enough to lead us in the right direction.”

“Understood,” Goathead replied simply.

To be honest, Duncan found this sudden brevity of his a bit hard to get used to.

But he soon pushed that stray thought aside.

The Vanished began to pass through the layered, silent storm phantoms and the tunnels and Veil woven from countless vines and roots. The ghost ship that had wandered many times along the dark edge of the Veil now finally found the correct way forward.

Duncan turned his head and glanced at Rune, the pope.

After a brief, slightly awkward moment of eye contact, he waved to Alice, who was still off in her own thoughts nearby: “Come here and untie the old gentleman…”

“Oh.” Alice answered at once and, a little regretfully, went over to “untie” the elven elder who was still bound to the pillar.

Rune’s mouth twitched slightly. Trying to hide his embarrassment, he spoke in a calm tone: “Actually, I think it is fine. Miss Alice’s methods also have a certain… professionalism to them…”

He had only spoken half his sentence when a violent tremor suddenly swept through the entire ship.

It felt as if the moving Vanished had crashed straight into some invisible giant mass. A shock unlike any before slammed in from the bow, along with a harsh screeching noise that made it seem as if the ship might break apart. The masts shook wildly. The spirit form sails flashed with blinding light as they flickered, and the fire flowing across the deck exploded with a sharp bang.

Duncan reacted the instant the unseen impact hit. He slapped his hand on the chart table before him, using the spirit form flames to steady the whole ship, and shouted quickly: “Tie him back up!”

This time Alice moved faster than ever: “Got it!”

“Wait, you two!” Rune only had time for one shout before Alice had tied him up again, tight and secure. In his poor state, the pope was no match for the living doll aboard the Vanished.

Almost at the same moment, Duncan caught sight of something outside the window, in the dark void around Atlantis.

spirit form flames burst from the Vanished, as if they had “smelled” something. They spread wildly into the darkness. In the overlapping glow of the spreading spirit flame, he saw… shadows even larger than Atlantis itself.

Chapter 637: Collision

There was a shadow—a shadow outside Atlantis—that had always floated in this vast dark space woven from Atlantis's dreams and memories.

Now, for the first time, Duncan saw it.

"In Rahm's name!" Rune's eyes went wide as he stared at the huge structure that finally appeared above the dark space in the glow of the pale green flames. He cried out: "What is that thing?!"

Duncan did not answer. He only walked to the window, his expression growing unusually grave as he fixed his divine gaze on that dark structure. It seemed to be pressing down on Atlantis from above, yet frozen in a single moment in time. After a while, his eyes changed slightly, as if he had suddenly understood something.

"The Great Annihilation… So that is how it was…"

…

corruption and distortion were spreading through the forest, across the land, and over the whole world.

Some invisible thing was soaking into this ancestral homeland of the elves. Wherever it spread, the earth writhed and heaved like swollen flesh. Fangs and eyeballs opened in the shadows. Trees grew wild and rampant, then dissolved and rose like flames. Everything seemed to lose its old order and change into something else, in a wild, nightmarish frenzy.

Sharp, terrible shrieks and howls swept through the forest without a pause, rushing past the huge crown of Atlantis, echoing across heaven and earth as if to tear at the soul.

Shirley stared in shock at the ground below. She watched a land that had been lush and full of life only a moment ago turn, in the blink of an eye, into an absurd hell that even a nightmare could not describe. She stared at the deep, gaping maws in the forest and the pulsing flesh and shadows, and she instinctively grabbed the raised edge of the “paper boat”.

“This thing really is not going to fall, right?”

She looked again at the “little boat” folded from paper beneath her feet and asked the Miss Witch at her side in a very uneasy tone.

Not long ago, when the whole forest suddenly broke out in terrifying “corruption” and all paths of retreat were cut off, Lucretia had taken out a sheet of paper right in front of her, folded it into a small boat, and pulled her aboard. Shirley could not understand at all how this strange “witchcraft” worked. She only knew that the boat now floated above that horrifying land, and the feel of paper under her feet made her afraid to even breathe too hard.

Even Dog, beside her, had carefully tucked in his paws and curled up into a ball, as if terrified of accidentally scratching the bottom of the paper boat.

“I have never fallen off it,” Lucretia said. She had already taken out more white paper and was folding more strange shapes with practiced hands without even looking up. “If you are really that worried, just close your eyes and pretend you are lying on the sofa at home.”

“How am I supposed to do that?!” Shirley cried without thinking. Then the little boat rocked suddenly in the wind and she let out another yelp. After that, she noticed what Lucretia's hands were doing. "What are you folding now?!"

"soldiers. The 'Winged Flying Troopers' Ginny Hadeway described in City in the Clouds," Lucretia said casually. "We need to know what is happening in other places. And if we really run into enemies, we will need some fighting power to protect this boat."

As she spoke, she tossed the finished paper figures into the air beside the boat. Several finely folded paper people spread their wings in midair, their size quickly growing to match that of real humans. They bowed toward Lucretia, then flew off into the distance.

Shirley stared at this scene with her mouth hanging open. Just as she was about to say something, a voice suddenly seemed to slip straight into her head, cutting off her conversation with Lucretia: "…First, there was the 'corruption'. At the edge of the world, things started to become strange and terrible…"

Shirley and Lucretia looked at each other at the same time. They had both heard the voice. It sounded young, like a little girl's voice.

It was the voice of Atlantis.

The howling wind kicked up more dust. The sandstorm in the desert had somehow faded away, leaving only chaotic dust and grit swirling in the air, blurring their sight and twisting the distant view.

"When the weather first began to change, some scholars already gave their warnings. They called on people to prepare—but what should they prepare for?"

The voice of the giant sounded through the storm, deep and steady, like stone standing firm in the wind.

Vanna stood in the endless sand and looked toward the distant "tower".

She had followed the giant back to this place called the “archive”, back to this great pit that symbolized the End of civilization. She did not know why the giant had brought her here, but she could feel that some world-shaking change was happening. With this “archive” at its center, something terrible was tearing open the Veil.

A ripping sound suddenly came. The roar was so huge it seemed it could shatter mountains.

Vanna looked up in shock at the giant red crack in the sky, at the crimson light that marked the End. In the rolling blood-red glow she saw shifting shadows, rising and falling in waves. The thing that had destroyed this world finally showed a hint of its true form before her eyes.

Fire appeared in the forest. It had no clear source. It was as if, in a single instant, countless trees had all turned into blazing Sacred beacon Torches. A tide of destruction rushed out in a heartbeat and began to burn the World Tree that blanketed the land.

Shirley watched in terror as the flames spread through her field of vision. Everything—the warped land, the once-lush forest, the shadows in the air, the tentacles and flesh that had been crawling through heaven and earth—all of it was swallowed by fire in an instant.

She heard a tremendous noise, the screaming of countless living beings in the flames. Then she heard a terrible thunder that did not come from the sky, but from the branches of Atlantis itself breaking amid flame and distortion, crashing down on the earth like a range of falling mountains.

The paper boat rocked wildly in the roaring heat. As the whole world burned, Shirley instinctively curled up on the little boat. Curled there, she looked up at the sky. She saw the branches and leaves at the edge of Atlantis breaking off and falling, wrapped in roaring fire, past the boat on all sides. As the crown of the tree collapsed with a deafening crash, she finally saw the sky's true shape.

Her vision was filled with suffocating, horrifying shadows. For a moment, she felt as if her heart had stopped.

She heard Atlantis speaking in the depths of her heart—or perhaps it was the entire world, telling her of the ruin and death that had come in ages beyond count.

"…Then the sky fell. Something invisible struck our world, slowly struck our world… We could not see it, could not understand it, could not even think about it… And you? You who were born After the Darkness, you who grew out of it—can you see it?"

Vanna's eyes went wide. She watched the blood-red crack in the sky slowly spread. The whole sky tore open like a broken eggshell, then sank inward toward its center in a way that made her shiver. After that, a sea of fire pressed slowly down from the shattered heavens.

"As their 'god', I felt 'its' approach before they did. I felt something invisible drawing near our world. I felt the end of history. A crack appeared on the Chronicle Pillar in my hands. After that, nothing was recorded. The flames… went out at the edge of my sight."

A low, oppressive howling and a strange creaking noise came from both sky and earth, as if the world itself was letting out its last groan. At last Vanna understood what she was seeing. At last she understood the "answer" the giant had never been able to grasp.

A tall figure stepped into view at the edge of her vision, coming to the rim of the great pit.

Vanna saw the giant standing there, head raised, staring up at the sky.

“From fire and stone it began. With fire and stone it will end. Traveler, I can feel it. ‘It’ has come again… You see it, do you not? You see it more clearly than I do… because you come from a different time-stream than mine. You come from After the Darkness. You have eyes born after that time. You can understand it…”

On the Origami Skiff, in the sight of Shirley and Lucretia, the inverted land hanging over them sank lower and lower. At last they could clearly see many of its features.

For a moment, Shirley felt as if she saw ranges of mountains and rich rivers on that upside-down continent. She saw great stone cities standing among the hills and plains, saw huge canals and long roads linking countless points of light. Under those lights lay wide, fertile fields.

But in the next instant, she saw that land fall into desolation. After a strange “boiling” illusion, it became a world of deserts and rocky wastelands.

Another world was pressing down.

The falling land from the sky struck the crown of Atlantis first.

In silence, the final collapse of all things began to spread from that single point of contact, reaching out to swallow the whole world.

In the ever more chaotic storm of sand, before Vanna’s eyes, the huge tower that symbolized “The Last Man in the World” began to change.

It started to sway and crack. The upper layer, which had looked like blackened stone, split open. The pieces fell away, revealing a kind of pale gray “skin” beneath.

The tower began to shrink, as if time itself were flowing backward. Bit by bit, it drew in on itself, turning back into the shape of a “man”.

An upside-down, burning forest now filled the whole sky. Another continent had pressed down onto this world. In those blazing woods, Vanna finally saw some of the landscapes her companions had once described to her, from their own actions in the dreams of the Nameless One.

The “tower” finally collapsed.

At the moment when the whole world remembered its final Doomsday, he remembered his first shape.

He became a man.

A Senkin, with skin like stone and lines like metal running over his body.

He kept shrinking. Soon, he would be so small that Vanna would no longer be able to see him clearly at this distance.

He seemed to be crying out in terror. In that last minute before the Great Annihilation, this “man” who had been frozen in time for ages at last took a step along the time-stream.

“Traveler,” the giant’s voice came. The old deity in his tattered robe leaned down toward Vanna. He drove the huge Gatekeeper’s cane firmly into the ground. Then he reached into his robes with his other hand and placed something before Vanna. “Take it.”

Vanna stared in shock at what the giant had given her.

It was a blazing, radiant thing, quietly burning in the river of time.

The Sun.

She looked up, but before she could ask her question, the giant gently shook his head. “You can take it now, Traveler. I remember now. I remember everything… Our Sun is free. Take it. It should not lie trapped in this dream any longer.”

Vanna reached out her hand, a little dazed. The bright little sphere dropped into her palm.

It gave off a warm heat.

The giant smiled, slowly straightened up, and turned away.

“What are you going to do?” Vanna asked in confusion behind him.

“Make sure he is not afraid.”

“Wait—”

“It is all right, Traveler. Every journey must end. One day, we all have to say goodbye… because Tarrigan is dead. He died a very, very long time ago.

“And I will give you that Gatekeeper’s cane as well, as a keepsake.”

The giant never looked back. He only waved his hand, then stepped toward the deep pit.

With every step, his body grew larger.

But with every step, his figure became more and more faint.

The ruin called the “archive” also faded with the giant’s footsteps.

The God of Recorded History finally vanished into the storm. The last man ever written into history vanished as well, in the slow and unstoppable collision of two worlds.

In that endless waste of sand and wind, Vanna slowly lifted her head.

The burning Atlantis hung high over this world.

It was now the final second of the Great Annihilation.

The world of the Senkin ended in its final impact with Atlantis.

Chapter 638

Another continent hung upside down in the sky, slowly falling. The two worlds were being destroyed by a “slow collision” beyond understanding. It was some kind of impact beyond the Mortal Realm, not just a simple physical touch. After she saw the twisting, chaos, and madness spreading through the forest, Lucretia faintly realized this truth.

If this had been another time, she would gladly have thrown herself into a long and difficult study. She would have gone to speak with Scholars from the city-states, gathered their sharp minds together, and tried to figure out every secret behind this collision.

But now was clearly not the time.

The Origami Skiff shook wildly in a violent shock, like a little skiff caught in a storm. The shockwave spread out from the collapsing Atlantis, raging over the whole world, then seemed to bounce off the “edge” of the world and return, echoing again and again between heaven and earth.

In this violent impact and tearing far beyond human strength, the little paper boat let out unsettling ripping sounds. Even the mighty Sea Witch felt her control over the vessel racing toward its limit.

Shirley saw the grave look on Lucretia’s face at a glance. She hugged Dog’s head and let out a shrill scream: “Are we about to fall?!”

Lucretia frowned hard. She did not answer Shirley’s shout. Her gaze swept quickly over this already shattered world that was rushing toward destruction. Then she suddenly raised her hand and pointed at the distant ground: “We will land over there.”

“Isn’t that just asking to die!” Shirley yelled. “Do you see any place left down there we can even stand on?!”

“corruption has stopped. Right now it is only fire burning everything. It is only fire. It is much friendlier than those strange, twisted Shadows.” Lucretia glanced at Shirley, did not care what Shirley thought, and had already begun forcing the tottering paper boat to dive toward a part of the forest where the flames were a little weaker.

The Origami Skiff, accompanied by Shirley’s broken screams, tore through the smoke in the forest and flew between two worlds that had become a living hell. The canopy of Atlantis collapsed above their heads. Burning giant trunks and leaves fell past the little boat like a crashing nightmare. Overhead, the upside-down land still kept sinking. By now Shirley could almost see the ravines in its ground and the rolling lines of its dunes.

Its fall was so slow it felt as if the process could last forever. Yet that fall was just as unstoppable, going on and on like a slowly grinding Doomsday that crushed everything in the mortal world inch by inch.

Lucretia steered the little boat with all her strength. Her gaze swept the forest again and again, trying to find a landing spot that was even a little “safer” in that inferno.

A blurred flash of light suddenly caught her eye.

In the next second the little boat sped toward that direction. It moved so fast Shirley almost thought they had gone into a runaway state and were simply falling. The boat shot through a Rain of Fire pouring down from the sky and through drifting sand that had somehow begun to fill the air, rolling like ghosts between heaven and earth. It rushed straight toward the flash deep in the forest.

The flash slowly became clear.

It was a sheltering barrier of light, roughly cone-shaped, held up by a shimmering curtain.

Shirley saw the light as well. She leaned over the edge of the paper boat in surprise and stared down for a long time. At last she made out two familiar figures inside the barrier. “Ah! It’s Nina, and the old man!”

With Shirley’s delighted shout, the paper boat that carried her and Lucretia screamed through the last stretch of air. It finally reached its limit in the instant before it touched the ground. It broke apart in the impact and, in the blink of an eye, turned into fine dust.

Hugging Dog, Shirley jumped out at the last moment in a clumsy tumble. Girl and dog clutched each other as they rolled across the ground more than ten times before finally stopping in front of that cone of pale light.

She looked up and saw Nina standing inside the barrier, and beside her Morris, the old Mister, with a stunned look on his face.

A pile of spinning, colorful scraps of paper landed gently next to Shirley. Lucretia’s figure gathered out of the paper.

Nina waved to them from inside the barrier.

Shirley and Lucretia exchanged a glance, then stepped without hesitation into the layer of light that looked thin and fragile yet truly held back the tide of destruction raging through the forest.

In an instant, it felt as if the whole world went quiet.

The terrifying roar that had howled through the forest became barely audible. The scorching storm that had swept the land stayed outside the light curtain. The choking smoke and the poisonous vapors boiling in the flames were also shut out. Shirley even felt a breath of fresh air rush toward her. She looked down and saw a few blades of grass under her feet and a small clump of shrubs beside them.

“Amazing…” She looked up in shock at Nina and Morris. “How did you make this? Lucretia and I could only run into the sky…”

“It wasn’t us.” Nina only shook her head gently. Then she turned a little to the side and raised her hand, pointing at a spot behind her and Morris.

Shirley looked over in surprise. The next second her eyes opened a little wider.

A small tree stood quietly there, rooted in this land that was breaking apart.

Its trunk was slender and weak. Its long branches climbed toward the sky, then drooped at the edge of the crown and swayed lightly in the breeze.

With this little tree at its center, the cone-shaped light curtain built the last safe Sanctuary World.

For a moment Shirley felt as if she heard a voice—

“Come with me. I will take you to the Wall of Silence…”

Then the voice faded into the wind.

“We are at the Wall of Silence now,” Nina said, turning her head to look into Shirley’s eyes. “The last, the true Wall of Silence.”

Shirley froze for a while, then slowly walked to the little tree. The drooping twigs at the edge of the crown brushed her shoulder and made her itch a bit.

She turned back and looked out beyond the thin curtain of light.

The world was falling apart. The mighty canopy of Atlantis bent, broke, and crashed under the “weight” of the other world. The forest burned. Far away, the ground was lifted by an invisible force and slowly rolled upward toward the upside-down desert in the sky. The flames seemed to spread onto that desert as well. In the hazy distance, a faint layer of smoke appeared on the surface of “that world.”

Yet all those sounds seemed far away, as if they came from another world, like the soft waves outside a shut window at dusk.

“Yeah… it really is quiet.”

Even Shirley knew this silence probably would not last long.

But at least for this one second, that crumbling world was no longer chasing her, even if all that held it back was… a single pretty bubble.

What would happen next?

In the wind, Vanna narrowed her eyes a little.

She saw the upside-down world had already begun to touch the desert under her feet. The first thing to meet was the giant World Tree. Its crown now brushed the ground. That was where the giants had last vanished. Now it became the first “point of contact” between the two worlds. Then the distant mountains made contact. The mountains and rivers in the forest touched the range at the edge of the desert. There, flashing light burst without end, as if a world?tearing storm was brewing.

A sea of fire spread and flowed over her head. She saw the lush world above breaking apart in the flames. The desert under her feet was doing the same.

But the “collision” of the two worlds grew slower and slower, as if some power was forcing its progress to slow down and was interfering in this Doomsday.

Vanna lowered her head and looked at the brilliant sphere in her hand. Tiny flames flowed over the surface of the Sun. The light that burst from that fire had once shone on a glorious, radiant civilization before the age of the Deep Sea.

To this day, that sunlight still remained.

She raised her head again and looked at a place not far from her.

The huge Gatekeeper’s cane still stood planted in the dune. The sea of fire hanging from the sky lit up its rough shaft and head, which looked like trunk and stone. Firelight flowed over its rock?like surface. In that play of light and shadow she saw the countless words the giants had carved onto it.

For a moment Vanna felt as if she could read them. Line by line she ran her eyes over the dense words and symbols, as if she could still hear the giants’ deep, gentle voices speaking at her ear.

“Here, they learned to use fire.

“Here, they discovered the secret of farming.

“Here, there was a flood. The water covered the land, bringing death and fear, and later left rich soil behind…

“They learned to build ships…

“They learned to harness the power of thunder…”

Vanna slowly walked up to the Gatekeeper’s cane and looked up at the last blank patch near its end.

It was no longer blank.

At some unknown time, the giants had already carved the final line there. The God of Recorded History Ming had finished his last entry on the Chronicle Pillar:

“Tarrigan and the Traveler completed their final journey.”

Strange auras and unsettling rustling sounds came from far away. An unusual heat flowed through the air, gathering unseen.

Vanna turned and looked toward the direction she sensed.

She saw streams of light gathering. In the raging fire and twisted light cast by the two colliding worlds, chaotic flows of light slipped through some kind of “crack” and entered this place. Those streams grew hotter and hotter and gathered in the sky not far away, forming a fireball that grew larger and larger.

The fireball began to take on the shape of the Sun. Its edge trembled and sent out jets of flame. It began to float between the two worlds like the Sun, freely releasing disturbing pressure and waves of heat. Then it slowly lowered into the desert and slowly turned its true side toward Vanna.

Hidden inside the Sun’s shining shell were countless twisted tentacles piled together. Between the tentacles, eyes that were not human stared coldly at the Inquisitor standing by the dune.

“Kneel.”

This Sunspawn spoke.

Chapter 639

The invading “Sun” slowly came down. It could not compare to the real Sun, yet it was still as big as a hill and radiated terrifying power.

It hovered just above the ground, almost fully “landed” on the surface. Flames burst from its edge and licked the earth. Under its light the sand and stone melted into flowing magma. The air twisted in the heat. Over the spreading rivers of lava, waves of hot air rolled. Big and small rocks, disturbed by unseen power, floated around this Sunspawn and became blazing satellites that circled it.

This huge fallen Sun Wheel used its countless cold eyes inside to stare at the mortal in front of it, a being that could almost be called a speck of dust. It repeated that short, simple order—

“Kneel.”

Its pressure was completely different from that of any ordinary supernatural being or Heretic. It was power that spread from the Elder Gods. This deformed fireball was the true spawn of the Black Sun. Its words alone were equal to ten thousand spells and secret rites.

Vanna felt as if her body was about to burn. Scorching fire seemed to flow through her. Even the breath she exhaled became part of the flames.

But she only lowered her head and glanced quietly at the small, dazzling sphere in her hand.

A moment later she tucked it carefully close against her body. Then, still silent, she turned and walked to the huge Gatekeeper's cane that was buried deep in the dune. She reached out her left hand and slowly pulled it up with steady force, then lifted it onto her shoulder.

For a mortal, the giants' Gatekeeper's cane was far too huge. Even for Vanna, when she carried the Cane it did not look like she held a weapon. It looked more like she was carrying a great tree.

But she did not care. This heavy "weapon" was just right for her.

She turned around. In her right hand she gripped the greatsword of solid ice. Her left hand held the Cane resting on her shoulder. She calmly stared at the "Sun" that had fallen on the ground.

"You refused," the Sunspawn hissed and trembled, letting out a string of harsh sounds. Its will stabbed straight into Vanna's mind. "But you must hand over that star."

The wind in the desert grew stronger and stronger. Gust after endless gust tore through the last gap between the two worlds, as if it meant to lift the whole desert into the air. In the distance, sand rose into the storm and turned into a towering yellow wall that slowly moved toward this place.

In the howling wind, Vanna raised her head and glanced at the other world, now hanging still above the sky. She asked calmly: "Are you the one interfering with this… 'collision'?"

"You are trying to call on power from afar, but no one can help you," the fallen Sun hissed again, its noise full of tremors. "I have cut off the link between the two worlds. Now you are trapped in this desert. No one can hear your voice. Not the bearer of the Flame Usurper. Not the Leviathan Queen. Resistance is useless… Hand it over, and I can let you go."

Vanna did not answer this spawn of the Elder Gods. She only narrowed her eyes a little as the wind grew more violent.

It was true she could not reach the outside. She could not reach the captain, nor the Storm Goddess. Gentle waves still sounded at her ears, and the fire of spirit form still burned in her body where its mark remained. But she could no longer hear their “source.”

The force of the worlds’ collision had become a shield of mental guidance that blocked everything, turning this desert into a sealed prison. And the one driving all of this was clearly this… blasphemy before her.

The wind began to gather. The far?off yellow wall of sand, lifted by the storm, rolled forward bit by bit under the push of the wind. It was an astonishing storm. In its growing power, countless grains of sand surged and roared inside that wall like a gigantic wave.

Vanna drew a light breath. Ash?like matter drifted into the air with her breath.

She gazed at the Sunspawn on the distant ground. Storm and fire danced in her eyes.

She lowered the huge Gatekeeper’s cane from her shoulder. Then she started forward, her eyes calm, walking toward that profaned Sun. The Cane and the greatsword dragged across the ground and carved two long furrows, which for a moment looked like a line of symbols carved into the earth.

If a giant had been here, he might really have carved such a line—

After Doomsday, the Traveler charged the invading Sun.

But the giants were gone. The history of this world had already ended. The storm wiped away the long furrows behind Vanna, and the soaring sand closed behind her like a giant curtain.

Her steps grew faster, turning into a full charge.

Would the Sunspawn feel surprise? Perhaps in all its knowledge there had never been an option called “a mortal charges a spawn of the Elder Gods.” But could a creature like it feel anything like a human?

Vanna was very curious about that. Yet she had no way to know the answer. She only knew that proud “Sun” finally reacted.

Layer upon layer of heat waves crossed the Sun’s surface, forming a honeycomb?like coat of blazing light. Flames brewed and rose in the air. deadly sunlight burned her body and tried to kill her before she could reach it.

But the sandstorm rolling in from the far end of the desert was closing around her, forming a shield that could, for a time, block that sunlight.

Vanna ran forward with all her strength. As she ran she slowly raised the greatsword and the long staff in her hands. She breathed in the burning heat. With every breath, ash drifted into the air.

She felt as if she was cutting through waves.

A voice seemed to speak in her heart. She no longer knew whether it was her own voice, or the Storm Goddess’, or the captain’s. She only knew that this voice told her—

The sea of sand was also a sea.

She would raise a storm on this sea.

Because she was the Saint of the Storm.

In the roaring wind, the yellow wall of sand closed. Vanna’s figure vanished into the vast sandstorm, as if swallowed in an instant, or as if it had merged with the storm itself.

Between the two colliding lands, only a single desert storm remained, almost joining the two worlds. It rose a thousand meters high and roared forward with enough sound to shake the earth.

Inside the great storm, a pointed wedge rose high. After a one?second pause, it came crashing down like a falling sky toward the invading Sunspawn.

Today, she would try to put out a Sun.

An impact that seemed enough to tear the earth apart burst out in an instant.

The huge storm that spanned the desert shrank into a single wedge and struck the Sun head on. At the instant before impact, the Sun threw up a glorious corona. The corona exploded under the blow, and a wave of destructive matter burst out.

It was as if the whole desert caught fire in that blast. In a single instant, the terrible wave of flame flattened every nearby dune and boulder. The jagged rocks melted and ran like water, filling the furrows and pits in the ground.

In the great explosion of the “corona,” the storm was also torn apart and scattered. The roaring wind suddenly turned into chaotic air currents and rushed out in all directions between heaven and earth. The yellow sand that had formed walls and wedges was ripped into pieces in the heat. Part of it fell back to the ground. Part of it seemed to lose its weight and was flung into the gap between the two worlds, where it gathered around the upside? down Atlantis like clouds.

No one knew how long it took before the wild wind finally blew the sand away from the center of the impact.

A beam of light appeared first in the thinning dust.

The Sunspawn still existed. Its light had dimmed. The hastily raised “False Sun” corona had blocked the force of the storm during the impact, but it had also torn away part of its body. Now its tentacles, curled up inside the shell of fire, twisted and shook in pain. Something gold and red, like flowing flame and like blood, seeped from its burning shell and floated on the molten lake around it, burning as it flowed.

Countless inhuman eyes rolled between those spasming tentacles, searching for the enemy's figure after the sand had cleared.

That figure stood at the edge of a fan?shaped impact crater not far away.

Vanna stood there quietly. The air around her twisted with heat. The last faint wind faded from the tip of her sword.

She lifted her head and glanced at the distant Sunspawn.

In the next second, her body blew apart in the wind. She turned into countless drifting ashes that floated down over the earth in the sunlight.

A small sphere of dazzling light dropped out of the air and landed on the still?hot ashes.

"…In the end, still a mortal, but worthy of respect."

The Sunspawn let out a muffled tremor and slowly floated higher. It called on unseen power and reached out to take the "Ancient Star" that had fallen into the pile of ash.

The star did not move at all.

"…Hm?"

For the first time, this spawn of the Elder Gods felt a trace of confusion.

The next second, a sudden gust of wind swept across the sand and lifted the ashes scattered on the ground.

A ghostly green light slowly appeared in the ash, then in almost the blink of an eye burned into a fierce blaze. Some nameless, chaotic shadow swept over the ashes and, as if rebuilding a soul, shaped a faint, human?like form. Then all the ashes, pulled by that eerie green flame, floated into the air and quickly gathered, reshaping themselves and regaining color and weight. In only a few seconds, they formed Vanna’s body once more.

Even her broken armor was restored as the ghostly green flame passed over it, as if time itself had flowed backward.

Vanna bent down, casually picked up her sword and the Gatekeeper’s cane, then raised her head and looked at the false Sun that still burned fiercely.

She saw its twitching tentacles and the gold?red stuff spilling from its shell of fire.

A smile slowly appeared at the corner of her mouth.

“So you can bleed too.”

She started walking toward it.

Once more, wild wind swept across the world. Sand rose again in the storm.

“Then the next question—can you feel fear?”

Chapter 640:

A roar louder than thunder and more terrifying than a collapsing mountain echoed between the two worlds. It shook again and again between the two inverted lands, even driving away the sea of fire and smoke around Atlantis. It pierced the calm brought by the Wall of Silence and startled Lucretia and the others from their short rest.

Shirley almost jumped up from the ground at once. She lifted her head toward the source of the roar and shouted: “What just blew up?! What was that?!”

Nina ran to the edge of the Protective Ward. She craned her neck to stare at the upside-down desert continent in the sky and pointed: “Look up there! There was a huge explosion over there!”

Shirley looked toward where Nina was pointing, and her eyes slowly widened.

On that upside-down land, she saw a raging storm. Faint storm clouds swept over the ground like a moving wall. Inside the storm, she could see large bursts of light. Every time a light burst flared, the storm itself seemed to be driven back for a moment, and a terrifying roar echoed between the two worlds. Then the storm rebuilt itself and once more gathered toward a bright region of flame.

With each blast and explosion, pieces of the “other world” were thrown out into the space between the two worlds. Countless sand and dust now floated over Atlantis. They drifted without order in the gap between the two worlds as if there were no gravity, forming rivers of flowing sand hanging in the sky, and clouds of dust of all sizes.

The slow collision of the two worlds had already stopped at some point, as if some outside force had jammed the process. Only the constant roaring was left between heaven and earth. The material that kept being thrown out between the two lands gathered into larger and larger clouds.

“We cannot stay here any longer,” Morris said suddenly. “Something may have happened to Vanna. We have not been able to reach her since just now.”

“So we are going over there?” Shirley raised her hand and pointed to the other world hanging above their heads. “I do not mind, but how do we get there? The paper boat Lucretia folded before turned to ash when we ‘landed’…”

Before she finished, Lucretia had already pulled out a sheet of white paper from who knew where and waved it in front of everyone: “I still have paper. I will fold another one.”

Shirley stared blankly at the witch as she took out the white paper, her expression a bit odd: “We are still… folding it out of paper? We do not have anything sturdier?”

Lucretia thought for a moment, then took out another sheet from inside her coat.

“I will stack two sheets together.”

Shirley clearly still felt this was not very reliable, but she could not beat anyone here, so she wisely and carefully kept her opinion to herself. While she and Dog watched with great caution, Lucretia threw a new paper boat out beyond the barrier.

The paper boat grew and stretched quickly in midair. In the blink of an eye it became a small white boat, floating outside the translucent curtain of light like a light, drifting cloud.

Nina stared, dumbfounded, then could not help letting out a cry of amazement: “That is amazing! How did you do that?! Can I learn it?”

“Just a witch’s trick. I suggest you do not get too interested,” Lucretia glanced at Nina’s face full of envy, waved her hand, and walked toward the barrier. “At your stage, it is more useful to learn math, physics, and chemistry first…”

Nina pressed her lips together with a strange look, then lifted her head to look at the ruined world beyond the barrier.

She took a light breath, then turned back to look at the small tree that was holding up the last Wall of Silence.

Two seconds later, she and Shirley both raised their hands at the little tree at the same time and softly said goodbye.

A moment later, the Origami Skiff rose silently into the sky. It carried them away from the scorched earth and flew toward the upside-down world at the end of the sky.

Shirley lay on the edge of the boat, leaning out to look down at the forest that was slowly being covered by darkness and smoke. She watched the small cone-shaped curtain of light sink into the thick smoke and vanish after a few flashes. Only after a long time did she finally mutter in a low voice: “Are we ever going to see that tree again?”

“No. Everything here will eventually fade away, and that is the best result for the Mortal Realm,” Lucretia’s voice came from beside her, calm and almost inhumanly cool and rational. “This place is only a part of the elves’ racial memory. Everything here already died in a very distant past. Atlantis, Celine, Saslokar… they all died a very, very long time ago."

"I know, I know," Shirley waved her hand, a little annoyed, and her tone held a complaint. "You do not have to say it that clearly. I was just feeling a little emotional…"

Lucretia ignored Shirley's grumbling. She focused on steering the little paper boat, and soon shifted her attention from the forest below to the distant World Tree.

Even though the slow collision of the two worlds had paused for now, the collapse of Atlantis still went on. The huge canopy that had once covered the sky had been completely burned through by the sea of fire flowing across the heavens, becoming a terrible tangle of charred remains in the flames. Embers still flowed along the branches that wound like mountain ranges, and some of the fire had even spread to the "other world".

But those flames that spread over seemed to be blocked by something. They could only float above the desert and could not truly touch that world.

Thunderous sounds rolled from the direction of Atlantis as the great collapse of the World Tree neared its peak.

The canopy, burned by fire, began to break off in whole sheets, falling to the ground like great cities dropping from the clouds. Mountains tore apart under the tree's collapse. Gorges and ravines slowly filled and were covered by the tree's ashes. Smoke and dust blotted out the sky. Atlantis was slowly turning into the sight Nina and Morris had first seen.

The little boat slowly approached the boundary between the two worlds.

"Everyone be careful. We may have a Gravity Inversion in a moment," Morris called out. "Do not panic. Hold on to the rail."

Nina and Shirley reacted at once. They were very obedient and grabbed the edge of the paper boat. Dog dug his claws tightly into the raised folds in the floor of the boat.

Lucretia made ready for the Gravity Inversion while carefully guiding the boat higher.

But just when she was ready for everything, a huge sense of danger suddenly surged up from her heart.

An attack.

That thought had barely formed when Lucretia jerked the boat to the side. But she was still a step too late. In the next second, a streak of light suddenly appeared in the air and slashed past. Even though it only grazed the side, the edge of the paper boat was instantly torn and set on fire.

The next moment, endless light appeared before everyone's eyes.

It was a web of rays, a hidden barrier in the gap between the two worlds. It only showed itself when uninvited guests tried to approach the desert world. The interwoven light was bright and pure, shining like sunlight, yet it carried burning malice and a twisted, mad, terrifying aura.

The vast curtain of light surged in the sky. Streams of flame rose from its edge like a rainstorm falling from the heavens, pouring down over the shaking little paper boat.

In that "rain" of fire and glare, Shirley and Dog shouted in unison: "What is this thing?!"

"It is the power of the Creeping Sun Wheel…" Lucretia had already recognized the familiar, blasphemous aura in that rolling light. She hurried to force the boat downward and spoke quickly. "I knew it… The Sunspawn slipped in. That thing has sealed the sky!"

Before she finished, a dazzling flash suddenly cut across everyone’s vision.

The flash almost tore the entire paper boat apart.

The shredded boat lost control and started to wobble and fall toward the ground.

Shirley wrapped her arms around Dog’s neck at once and yelled at the top of her lungs: “I cannot fly!”

Her shout echoed in the sky, but at that moment a strange sound of some giant thing tearing and rumbling suddenly came from far away, cutting her voice off.

The strange sound was so intense that it felt as if the whole world went quiet.

In the shaking, falling paper boat, Lucretia opened her eyes wide and looked toward the source of the sound in surprise.

It was the trunk of Atlantis’s World Tree.

Somewhere near the base of the trunk, a ripping roar was bursting out.

The ground trembled. Cracks big enough to be seen from this distance spread across the trunk that loomed like a giant mountain. In the next second, the cracks widened, and a blazing ghostly green flame burst out from within.

In the rapidly spreading spirit form flames, a huge shadow pushed out from Atlantis’s trunk. First came a proud prow, then tall masts and half-transparent spirit-form sails, then a wide deck, neat rows of gunports, and a towering stern…

It was the Vanished, now fully transformed into its spirit form. It had torn through the remains of Atlantis and entered this world near the roots of the World Tree.

Then it began to rise. It flew over the scorched ground, over the forest where the fires still smoldered, sailed across this broken, ruined world, and headed steadily higher.

The ghost ship sailed in the sky under the afterglow of Doomsday.

Its unreal spirit form flames rolled behind it like foam and wake on the ocean, spreading out in layers. They washed over the sea of fire surrounding Atlantis, as if trying to set the whole world alight once more.

Chapter 641:

Through the last thin link she still had with the paper boat, Lucretia did her best to steer it toward the Vanished as it flew over the forest.

The Vanished also noticed the little boat swaying in the air and about to crash. It suddenly sped up. In its spirit form state, the huge hull moved as lightly as a gust of wind and, in almost an instant, it reached the space beneath Lucretia and the others.

The torn paper boat hit the deck like a cloud in a runaway state after several dangerous shifts in direction, finally crashing down in a crooked line.

Shirley and Dog tumbled out of the boat, rolled across the deck several times, and only then managed to stop. A tall figure appeared in front of them. Duncan bent down, grabbed the dizzy Shirley, and hauled her to her feet, then reached out and caught Nina as she rolled over as well.

Shirley still seemed dazed. After she stood up, she shook her head hard. Only then did her eyes slowly focus again. She looked around and finally relaxed fully: “We are actually still alive… I thought I was dead for sure this time…”

“Uncle Duncan!” Nina cheered happily and threw herself into Duncan’s arms.

Duncan smiled, patted Nina’s hair, hugged her lightly, then looked up into the distance.

Morris stood steady on the deck. One hand rested on the Gatekeeper's cane, and in his other hand he held a delicate mechanical device that looked like a gyroscope. He watched them with a slight smile. Lucretia drifted down lightly from a nearby mast. When the paper boat was about to hit the deck, she had left it a moment early.

Then she had gotten caught on the mast.

"Looks like you are all in pretty good shape," Duncan said with a smile and gave them a nod. "But honestly, flying toward a burning sky in an Origami Skiff is a bit risky."

Lucretia, who was walking over, showed an awkward look at once: "This spell definitely has room for improvement…"

Nina quickly tugged on Duncan's arm and pointed up at the glowing curtain that seemed to divide the two worlds: "Uncle, look up there…"

Duncan nodded lightly: "I have already seen it."

A brilliant curtain of light, as if cast from pure sunlight, covered the sky between the two worlds, hanging like a low shell over the desert continent of yellow sand.

The Vanished kept rising. It had now reached the highest point above the forest. The shining sunlight barrier almost brushed the tip of the ship's tallest mast. Faint ripples spread out from that mast tip over the barrier, looking gentle and harmless.

"Vanna may be trapped on the other side," Morris said as he walked over, his face grave. "This barrier is made from the power of the Creeping Sun Wheel. Whoever built it is aiming at that 'Sun' Vanna told us about. We just crashed into this barrier a moment ago."

Duncan nodded: "I know. This barrier is trying to keep me out."

“So what do we do now?” Nina raised her head curiously. “Can we just smash our way in?”

Duncan gave her a helpless look: “You have been led astray by Shirley. A girl should not have her head full of smashing into things. Do not always think of such rough methods.”

As he spoke, he lifted his head to look at the vast, majestic sunlight Veil floating above the Vanished.

The next second, a light creaking came from deep inside the ship. Then the ghost ship, burning with fierce spirit flame, suddenly lifted higher and charged straight toward the rolling sea of light.

Gravity Inversion happened. At the instant the flip came, the Vanished rolled hard within the curtain of light to adjust to the change in gravity after crossing the boundary between the two worlds.

When Shirley once again dragged herself up from the deck in a daze, she saw that the Vanished was sailing on the surface of the hot, heaving curtain of light. Under the light lay the hazy desert land. Above her head, hanging upside down, were the familiar forest and the wrecked Atlantis.

The sunlight Veil that separated the two worlds reacted almost at once, just as it had when the paper boat drew near earlier. The blazing sunlight turned into surging flames in the blink of an eye and poured in wave after wave toward the uninvited ship sailing on its surface. The flames rose like mountains, roaring and boiling as they rushed in.

But every tongue of light and flame that neared the Vanished was tinted with a soft green almost at once, turning into gentle spirit flame that circled the ship.

In the next second, these ghost-green flames began to spread over the barrier like growing corruption, covering more and more of it and moving faster and faster.

The barrier that had seemed so grand and splendid was being burned through and melted at a speed visible to the naked eye.

Nina's eyes went wide as she watched the golden curtain beyond the rail turn into a sea of spreading green flame in almost an instant. She let out a soft sound of awe: "Ooh…"

Duncan did not speak. He simply let his gaze rest on the "borderline" between the two worlds, and a thoughtful look slowly appeared on his face.

He was still recalling what he had seen in that moment when the Gravity Inversion happened.

The direction of gravity had changed in an instant. There was no "balance point" of zero gravity between the two worlds. As he approached the border, he had not felt gravity weaken bit by bit and then change direction. There was no gradual process.

This showed even more clearly that the "collision" of the two worlds was not a simple physical process, not just two celestial bodies touching each other on a physical level. They were already this close, yet the gravity of the two lands still stayed completely separate and independent, as if they were…

Incompatible.

At the same time that this "incompatible" state appeared, strange corruption had shown up in both the forest world and the desert world. Everything twisted. Unnamable things grew out of the shadows. Atlantis had started to collapse and burn on its own even before the upside-down desert drew near. It all felt like…

A kind of mental corruption on the level of entire worlds.

Two worlds that could not read each other, could not make sense of each other, and could not be made to fit together were twisting at the same time as they drew close.

Duncan lifted his head and looked at Atlantis, now hanging upside down in the sky and falling apart in the flames. The World Tree there was already unrecognizable. In its collapse, the elves' home world was slowly showing a state of complete corruption, dissolving and breaking apart in chaos and dark.

The elves' unique racial nature had shaped this strange dimension called the Nameless One's Dream. Atlantis was trapped here in an eternal nightmare, and what he saw now was the deepest part of that nightmare.

This moment was before the Deep Sea era opened. The Great Annihilation was happening.

The true nature of the Great Annihilation… was the collision of two worlds.

Duncan suddenly frowned.

Two worlds? Was it really only two worlds?

He suddenly thought of the "warrior" who had turned into living metal, and of the world of swords and magic that had crumbled at dusk. He thought of the Moon over his home, of the endless mist outside his apartment door, of the many conflicting records still kept in the city-states, of the countless strange legends written in the books of the Age of Darkness, of those ancient civilizations that could never be proved real, of those relics that did not belong to any known civilization, and of the strong corruption carried by those relics.

Some relics were like poison to this world just by existing. Simply placing them somewhere would twist and corrupt everything around them.

And there were other things that were not even allowed to appear in the Mortal Realm. There was no way to contain or make them harmless. Destroying them at once was the only safe way to deal with them. People spoke of them in fear and called them… “Blasphemous Archetypes”.

Duncan stood quietly on the deck of the Vanished, in the narrow gap between two worlds that were destroying each other. Faced with Universal Extinction and Doomsday, he finally saw the truth of the Great Annihilation.

Lucretia suddenly felt something.

It was as if an invisible wind was stirring over the deck, and a heavy, suffocating pressure was forming at her side.

She turned quickly toward the source of that weight.

A blaze of starlight stood quietly not far from her. The starlight outlined a hazy human shape. It seemed to stand right in front of her, yet at the same time it felt as if it stood at an infinite distance. It did not look very tall, but it gave a sense of endless size, as if she could never truly see its edges.

Lucretia remembered that she had seen this starlight before. It had been not long ago, when she met her Father again for the first time. In one dangerous instant, in a fleeting glimpse, she had seen a bit of the “truth” behind Father’s shell.

But this time was different.

All the rules of light and her normal sight seemed to fail before that starlight. Lucretia was shocked to find her vision bending inside it. Strange “rules” she could not understand were forming within the light. She tried to look away, but found she could not.

Her gaze seemed to have become part of the starlight.

Then, in the next second, just when she thought her mind would be completely swallowed and made one with that giant starlight, all the light faded.

A broad hand covered her eyes.

Lucretia froze for a moment before she realized what it was. It was Father's hand.

She grabbed the hand in a daze, gently pushed it away, and looked toward the place where the blazing starlight had been.

The starlight had crumpled back into Duncan's form.

"Do not be afraid," she heard Father say to her softly. "I am still here."

"What just happened?" Lucretia blinked. Only after she heard Duncan's voice did she finally relax. But the "burn" left by that starlight still felt deeply branded in her mind. "Just now, you…"

"Nothing," Duncan said in a low voice. "I just suddenly understood some things."

Chapter 642:

For Duncan, the “Great Annihilation” was no longer a completely unknown mystery. In the endless, heavy depth of the ancient Veil, the truth finally lifted a corner of its shroud for him—one crucial corner.

It was the collision between worlds that caused the Great Annihilation. The “incompatibility” between those worlds twisted the ruins after the impact into the strange and dangerous age of the Deep Sea. The scene buried in the deepest layer of Atlantis’s nightmare was only a small image taken from that collision.

And it was only a small image—those two worlds were far from the only ones that crashed together.

Duncan could feel that as he “understood” more of this truth, some kind of change was taking place, and that change was happening inside him.

For a brief instant just now, he even felt that everything in front of him turned into chaotic, empty… colors. In those colors he saw the true nature of the world. He saw that everything was like stars on the verge of falling. Each tiny light was made from abstract descriptions of information.

He also saw that all things stayed at the edge of a slow collapse. Their conflicting natures made them keep breaking apart and recombining in the depths of information. He seemed to understand the world’s real face, and he almost found the “single solution” to all contradictions and all imbalance.

But it lasted for only an instant.

He still seemed to lack something, a single, most important “parameter”.

Duncan’s reason returned to the Mortal Realm. He blinked. It felt as if countless voices were roaring inside his skull. Then the roaring slowly faded, and his thoughts began to clear.

He had already understood the nature of the Great Annihilation, and he understood how the Deep Sea age had formed… but what was that missing “key parameter”? He already understood the truth of the world, so what was left that he still did not understand?

The strong impression from that glimpse of the world’s true side still lingered in his mind. He could not help thinking about those abstract, difficult questions. But soon, he forced his thoughts to stop and noticed the worried look Lucretia was giving him.

Now was not the time to keep thinking about those things.

“It’s nothing. I just suddenly understood a few things.” He waved his hand, then turned his head and looked past the ship’s rail.

The Vanished was sailing along the surface of a curtain of light made from false sunlight. Blazing spirit form flames were spreading quickly over that curtain. They corroded and burned through this seemingly powerful barrier, and the clash of forces raised waves of storms made from light and fire in the distance.

But it still looked like it would take some time to completely melt through this “wall of light”.

Unless… a “weak point” appeared inside the barrier itself…

Beneath the light curtain and the sea of fire, on that nameless world covered in yellow sand, a desert storm formed once more. In the heart of the storm, a huge flash erupted again.

The howling wind that swept across the entire desert scattered once more. In the wild, chaotic currents of air, the Veil formed by the storm split into shreds, and the sand and dust fell back down in a dense rain.

In the fading haze of dust, a “sun” whose light was growing dim slowly appeared again. It floated above a lake of rolling lava, its surface flickering and swelling in a way that could be seen with the naked eye.

A breeze rose. Ash gathered and slowly reshaped.

“What are you?!”

The chaotic, trembling roar finally rang out again. A language humans could not understand mixed with that horrible noise. Under the false solar shell, the countless eyes of the Sunspawn trembled violently and stared hard at the figure walking out of the ash.

Emotion finally appeared in its roar, something almost like a human’s… rage.

Vanna slowly raised her greatsword. Her gaze stayed calm as she looked at the “sun” that had fallen to the ground in front of her and said slowly: “In the end you’re only an offshoot of the elder gods. You’re not that strong.”

But the Sunspawn ignored her. It only kept repeating: “What are you?!”

Vanna finally lowered her head and looked at her own body.

The last wisp of ash was being drawn back into her by the pull of the spirit form flames. She could feel her senses waking from numbness. Blood reappeared and began to flow again. A heart—a heart like a human’s—had already begun to beat once more in her chest.

She could even feel the process of that heart being reshaped.

“Just a pile of ash.” She stepped forward as she answered in a soft voice.

“Ash? No… you are not ash at all!” The Sunspawn’s hoarse, deep tremor came from far away. “Subspace… You carry the breath of Subspace. You are a Subspace shadow that leaked into the Mortal Realm—what are you?!”

Vanna suddenly stopped.

A trace of shock appeared in her eyes, followed by thought. Then she seemed to faintly understand something and spoke in a thoughtful tone: “You’re saying I am a Subspace shadow?”

The Sunspawn did not answer her question. It only let out a low, uneasy, jumbled noise. Its fire and light drew together again, repairing and reshaping the “corona” on its surface.

Vanna did not care. She had never expected to hear a complete answer from this blasphemous thing. Or rather, she had already gotten her answer.

Yes. By definition, she was the one who counted as a Subspace shadow. It was the power of Subspace that reshaped that pile of ash from more than ten years ago into “Vanna”. In that reshaping, she had already become a creation of Subspace in essence.

So a “being that returned from Subspace” should look like her.

“So… the captain is another kind of being…”

Vanna murmured softly to herself. Then she seemed to sense something. She lifted her head and quietly fixed her gaze on the “sun” lying on the distant land.

The Sunspawn felt her gaze. It also felt something deeply uneasy inside that gaze. Its surface swelled and writhed. It began to let out a low tremor, as if it were threatening her, or warning her.

But Vanna only laughed. She did not care at all about the waves of heat rising again around her, or about the deadly “sunlight” gathering slowly on the Sunspawn’s body.

“So you can feel fear too.” She let out a small breath and spoke with a smile.

Then the sky caught fire.

A sea of fire, rolling like an ocean and boiling like a storm, appeared all at once. In almost the blink of an eye, it covered a third of the sky. The flames briefly scattered the clouds and fog between the two worlds, then began to sink and curve downward toward the land.

A huge shadow appeared at the center of that sea of fire. It pressed down slowly as if it meant to pierce the sky itself. At the same time, layers of pale golden sunlight flashed for a moment along the edge of the fire. They seemed to be trying to rebuild the barrier and block this “invasion”. But in the next second, that sunlight shattered like glass. With the sound of something breaking, huge ship-timbers wrapped in flame finally fell from the sky.

The Sunspawn let out a wild chain of roars. It was shocked to find that the barrier it had built so carefully had already been melted through by some outside force, and even the flames on the barrier no longer obeyed its will. Then its many eyes were drawn to the giant ship descending from the heavens.

The “shell” made from fire and light opened. The tentacles piled up inside stretched and uncurled in the sunlight against their own will. Eye after eye that did not look like a human’s turned toward the outline of the Vanished. They stared at that mass of fire, at the figure standing inside that fire.

Truth had come.

A voice came from the sky: “You see me now.”

At once, the flames covering the Sunspawn’s shell turned a ghostly green. The green fire spread over the body of this child of the elder gods like a living thing. In a blink, it set the creature ablaze from the inside out, transforming it.

But it was not burned to ash in an instant. While the roaring spirit form flames burned through it, it actually struggled free of the ground and suddenly shot up toward the sky.

Almost at the same time, a bright stream of flame erupted from the bow of the Vanished.

It was a golden arc of fire. The stream of flame burst from the ghost ship’s bow as if from an eruption and rushed straight into the sky. It did not hesitate as it flew toward the Sunspawn, which was dragging a long tail of fire like an upside?falling star, and pierced it in a single instant.

Yet that “fireball” still did not die. It only paused for a moment, then struggled and continued to fly upward.

It was almost about to escape from this world.

But just as the fireball was about to become a fading blur at the edge of the sky, a huge phantom suddenly appeared in its path.

It was a black billy goat.

He was as large as a mountain and drifted at the horizon like a dark cloud. Phantom lightning jumped between His horns, while ghostly green firelight glowed in His eyes. His body gathered and formed out of the sea of spirit form fire flowing through the sky, and His outline stayed hazy and shifting. He dipped His head a little toward the Vanished in a silent greeting, then turned His eyes toward the fireball that was trying to flee.

The billy goat stepped back a few paces among the clouds. Then He lowered His head and suddenly sped up. The sea of fire gathered behind Him, then spread under His hooves to form a road. He began to run along this flaming path, like a black shooting star falling from the clouds. In a blink, He moved faster than the eye could follow, then slammed hard into the fireball that was rising faster and faster into the sky.

The huge explosion and impact shattered the last clouds between the two worlds. It even shattered the distant mountains and part of the already crumbling land. In the crash, the rising fireball broke into countless pieces. Large and small fragments turned to dust at once in the burning of the ghostly green flame. One shining “core” fell from the sky, but only halfway down it was swallowed by a burst of spirit form fire that appeared out of thin air and vanished in an instant.

The Black Goat walked out of the fiery storm born from the great explosion. He stepped down from the edge of the clouds toward the ground and, together with the Vanished, landed in front of Vanna.

Chapter 643:

The shockwaves from the great explosion rippled back and forth between the two worlds. The chaotic winds they stirred up whipped Vanna's silver hair. She raised a hand to shield her eyes from wind and sand. She watched the ghost ship wrapped in roaring flames slowly descend toward the sea of sand, then saw the huge Black Goat step down from the clouds and walk, step by step, to stand beside the Vanished.

Then a stream of flame fell from the deck of the Vanished like a meteor. It burst open before her eyes, widening into a great door. Duncan stepped out from the door.

"Captain!" Vanna snapped back to herself at once. She started toward Duncan, but after only half a step her body swayed and she nearly pitched forward onto the ground. In the last second before she fell, she planted the Gatekeeper's cane left by the giants and leaned on it. She wobbled twice and finally steadied herself.

Duncan hurried up to her: "How are you?"

Vanna held the Gatekeeper's cane with one hand and raised her head with some effort. She forced a small smile. "This time I really… pushed myself."

Then she dismissed the longsword in her other hand with a casual gesture. She reached into her clothes and groped around before taking out the "sun" that was still giving off warm, dazzling light. Her hand shook a little as she held it out to Duncan: "Here. This is the 'sun' Tarrigan left behind… it's completely intact."

Duncan noticed the name at once: “Tarrigan?”

“Yes. That giant… His name was Tarrigan.” Vanna nodded lightly. “He was the God of Recorded History. Long, long ago, He fell on the day the Great Annihilation took place.”

Duncan frowned hard and stared at the ancient “star” in Vanna’s hand, which shone with a warm light. Countless thoughts rose and fell in his mind before he finally reached out and took the sphere.

Warmth spread from his palm. The slow-turning flames on the surface of the sphere gently licked at his hand—but right now there was something even more important.

Duncan slipped the “sun” into his coat. He stepped forward to support Vanna’s arm, then used his other hand to take the huge Gatekeeper’s cane from her, rough and thick as a tree trunk. He could clearly see that this brave maiden was close to her limit.

Vanna did not try to act strong. She let out a breath and leaned most of her weight on the captain. At the same time, she lifted her head to glance at the huge Black Goat still standing quietly beside the Vanished and asked in a thoughtful tone: “…Is that the First Mate?”

“How did you recognize him?”

“The face. Even blown up this big, you can still tell.” Vanna spoke as she walked, then could not help adding, “Besides, I do use my brain sometimes.”

“It really is him. I repaired the keel of the Vanished and shared part of my own fire with him, so he could return to this form for a short time,” Duncan said as he led Vanna toward the flaming gate still standing at the edge of the dune. “We can talk about the details later. For now we go back to the ship. This is not over yet.”

As if to prove his words, even before Duncan finished speaking, a low, strange rumble and an unsettling howl began to roll in from far away. It sounded like two huge millstones starting to grind against each other again. Terrifying vibrations and thunderous booms echoed through both worlds at the same time.

On the far horizon, the “collision” that had paused before started again. Mountains collapsed. Clouds began to boil. In the sky above, in the ruins of Atlantis, a huge firelight appeared once more. Forests and land that darkness had almost swallowed completely were being rebuilt, as if time itself were running backward. But in the process of rebuilding, they took on twisted and frightening forms. In the very next second, those forests and lands, newly reborn and twisted, broke apart again and were swallowed by darkness. The process repeated over and over, step by step slipping into madness.

Around Vanna, terrible winds rose once more in the endless desert. This time, however, she was not the one controlling the “storm”. It felt as if countless grim phantoms were hidden in the gale, roaring and howling. Each phantom called out the names of the dead. A towering wall of sandstorm formed in the wind. Inside that wall, the shadows of cities and mountain ranges faintly appeared.

The final collision and fusion of the two worlds had begun.

In the last second before the storm hit, Duncan pulled Vanna through the spinning gate of flame.

The next second, she was already standing on the deck of the Vanished. The blazing spirit form flames outside the ghost ship formed a wall. The awful scene of the worlds colliding turned into warped, hazy images beyond the fire. Yet even through that fiery barrier, she seemed to hear both worlds screaming at once and the terrible roar of all things coming apart.

“I thought it was over…” She stared in shock at the world tearing itself apart beyond the rail. She felt the tremors running through the deck grow stronger and stronger and could not react for a moment. “Why…”

“We only destroyed the Sunspawn that invaded the dream of the Nameless One. Atlantis’s nightmare will not end because of that,” Duncan’s voice sounded beside her. “This is the deepest layer of the elves’ racial memory. A scene from the Great Annihilation was carved into it. The collision and extinction of two worlds is the ending this nightmare is bound to reach.”

The shaking of the whole ship grew stronger. Vanna braced herself, trying hard to keep her balance. She stared wide?eyed at the sight of all things collapsing in the distance and finally could not hold back: “Then how do we stop all this…”

Duncan only turned his head and quietly met her eyes. “Stop it? Stop what? Stop the collision of two worlds? Or stop the Great Annihilation from happening?”

Vanna froze, as if she were slowly catching on.

“The Great Annihilation already happened. In real history, as the beginning of the Deep Sea age, it has long since happened and ended. What remains here is only a ‘memory’ of something that already took place. We cannot stop it and have no need to stop it,” Duncan said, shaking his head slowly. “What we must stop is Atlantis.”

Vanna fell silent and only showed a thoughtful look.

Duncan walked slowly to the edge of the deck. He looked into the distance, at the doomsday scene of the world being erased.

The fusion of the two worlds had begun. At the end of the “collision”, the two inverted lands did not truly overlap in a physical sense. Before they could, they fell apart. In round after round of reshaping and twisted disintegration, they slowly turned into some dark and chaotic… “thing”.

Above and below the Vanished, around the deck, beyond the ship’s rail, the forests, mountains, deserts, and rivers of the past were all torn open. They soon lost all clear color and outline. The light of the world grew dim. Then those large and small remnants turned into one murky “clump” after another, each with a blurred outline. These clumps floated in endless darkness, bumped together again and again, and fused into even more twisted, grotesque shadows.

No one knew how long passed. At last, among all things that had almost sunk completely into darkness, dim currents of light appeared. They looked like the souls that remained after the world burned out and went dark, like the last glow in a bed of embers. Those dim streams of light flowed among the clumps of grotesque shadows, drifting without order through Duncan’s field of vision.

Deep in those dim, chaotic currents, in the wreckage left by the world’s collision, only one shape was left that still kept a faint outline.

It was a gigantic tree.

She floated quietly in the darkness of Universal Extinction, drifting in the time and years that had stopped moving after the Day of Ruin.

She was already dead, truly dead back when the worlds crashed together. The clash of laws and order wiped out all things. The gods died first in that process, and the World Tree created by the gods was no exception. Atlantis was only a phantom now, already long gone.

Yet she could not truly die.

Because in the elves’ deepest memories, there was always a World Tree like this.

Even if the elves themselves had been made again. Even if, in the third Long Night, the “Abyssal Lord” had rebuilt the elves. After seeing the true face of the Great Annihilation with his own eyes, Duncan already faintly understood what all “things” in the current Deep Sea age really were at their core.

Nothing could escape the clash of laws in the world’s collision. Not the mightiest warrior of any kingdom. Not the World Tree created by the deity. Not even the deity itself.

Duncan did not know exactly what kind of beings the present “Four Gods” were, including “Everburning Ember” Tarrigan. But he was sure of one thing: strictly speaking, this entire Deep Sea age was only something the Abyssal Lord rebuilt from a “blueprint” after the third Long Night.

Everything was embers.

Duncan quietly gazed at Atlantis, the tree that floated calmly in the dark. He watched her remains and the chaotic shadows around her, which had once been the homeland of a race.

The “World Tree” that appeared in the elves’ racial memory was, strictly speaking, also only a replica—but she could not understand that.

In the same way, she could not recognize the “elves” reshaped from ash.

Faint light slowly spread out from Atlantis’s remains.

Specks of flowing light seeped out of the dead tree like fireflies. They slowly gathered into a river in the chaos, winding and flowing. It circled gently around Atlantis’s roots, just as, long ago in the forests of the elves’ home, a river once flowed through the land and nourished the World Tree.

Every point of light in that river was a sleeping mind.

Fed by this “river”, Atlantis’s remains began to grow once more. Still a dead “corpse”, the branches of the World Tree rose in a strange way, stretching outward. From their edges grew fine, twisted, gray?white leaves, like a corpse climbing up from its grave, trying to crawl out of the land of the dead and into the living world.

Ted Riel’s last resistance had failed.

Duncan reached out his hand.

In the darkness, the Vanished sailed in silence toward that pale, twisted “tree of death”, a charred ruin that still kept growing and spreading.

Chapter 644:

Everything had already fallen silent. The howling and roaring from when the two worlds collided had vanished. The colors and sunlight of the mortal world had dissolved into the final Great Annihilation. In the chaotic darkness after the Universal Extinction, the dead World Tree was still growing quietly.

New remains grew from old remains. New ruins bred within the ruins.

She had forgotten the Elves, forgotten herself, forgotten every beginning and every end. Breeding, spreading, continuing to grow—these had become Atlantis's only obsession after the End.

But the Vanished came before this ever-growing corpse, and the eerie green glow of the green flame spreading through the darkness became a barrier that stopped Atlantis from spreading further.

The dead World Tree finally reacted.

Duncan saw unusual light and shadow suddenly ripple within her remains. It was a hazy mist. Vague limbs and shapes seemed to hide inside the gray-white fog. The edge of the mist kept spreading out from the canopy, like tentacles, or like twisted roots.

It reminded him of the mist that had floated above the Pilgrimage Ark of the Four Gods Church.

But before he could think more, a greater change occurred. The "river" that had been orbiting Atlantis, woven from countless tiny points of light, suddenly broke apart. Innumerable sparks of radiance merged into the mist floating above the World Tree. In the next second, the mist that had seemed so unreal and weak suddenly solidified and then surged outward in a wild expansion.

The edge of the mist turned into a sharp spearhead, hurling itself with all its strength against the sea of spirit form fire that spread around the Vanished.

A deep, unreal rumble seemed to echo in the darkness. Atlantis's impact sent ripples through the spirit flame, but only more fire surfaced from the void, slowly staining the chaotic pale mist with ghostly green. Yet Atlantis kept ramming into it. Even though every collision burned her in a deadly way, the impacts never stopped for a single moment.

Duncan even felt a flash of shock.

For the first time, something dared to charge straight into that spirit form fire.

In the next second, as Atlantis kept striking, he saw a hazy figure slowly taking shape within the mist above the World Tree.

It was a faint glow with no clear outline at all, like a soul still brewing, not yet formed.

But Duncan realized at once that this was Atlantis.

He could not help speaking to that faint light: "This is meaningless. You cannot break through this barrier. Very soon, you yourself will become part of it."

Yet the faint light did not answer. There was only the constant impact. The border of the mist melted a little with each collision, and the low rumble turned into clear, repeated boom-boom sounds.

Duncan watched with a tense face. After a long time, he slowly raised his hand.

Flames rose out of the unreal and slowly flowed through the darkness toward Atlantis's true body.

He said in a low voice: "Release those Elves, and everything else you swallowed. Let Lightwind Harbor return to the Mortal Realm. While it is still not too late, there is still a chance to save things."

The hazy faint light finally reacted. It suddenly flickered, and a sharp, childlike voice rang out in the darkness: "They are not Elves!"

The points of light that had been drifting and gathering around the remains of the World Tree suddenly became wildly restless. More radiance flowed together like water and surged toward the mist above Atlantis.

Yet just as the mist was gathering itself for the next strike, the restless points of light shuddered violently again. Then many of the lights that had already merged into the mist abruptly flowed backward, breaking free from Atlantis's pull. Like scattered petals, the tiny lights fell from above the World Tree and drifted around the giant trunk like stars.

In the next second, one of those falling points swelled and slowly took the shape of a vague shadow—

It was an Elf, not very tall, with hair already graying, wearing a dark blue academy robe. A tired look seemed fixed forever on his face, yet now his eyes were calm as he stood among the countless drifting lights, quietly facing the World Tree that loomed in the darkness, huge as a mountain.

Ted Riel, Truth Keeper of Lightwind Harbor.

Duncan looked at the sudden figure in some surprise and said: "I thought you were dead."

Ted Riel only shrugged: “It was just a nightmare—still not as bad as grading all the homework and papers students rush out on the last day of vacation.”

Perhaps because so many Elves had suddenly slipped from her control, Atlantis’s mind-entity seemed stunned and confused for a brief time. But soon, her voice sounded again in the darkness: “Come back… hurry back, it is dangerous out there! Come back… let us wait together for Saslokar to come home, all right…”

At the edge of the spirit flame, a huge black billy goat suddenly stepped out of the fire. It lifted its head and calmly turned its gaze on the pale, twisted World Tree and said: “I am right here, little sapling.”

Atlantis suddenly froze. Her mind-entity wavered inside the mist, as if unable to tell whether the Black Goat in the flames was really the Creator from her memory. For a moment, she seemed to waver. The mist spreading from the crown quietly drew back, yet in the next second, a sharp howl and harsh noise swept across all the darkness:

“No! Wrong! You are not! None of you are! You all…”

She broke off suddenly, and in her confusion lowered her voice, muttering to herself: “You are not… you are… dead? You died… you are not Elves… I…”

A voice appeared out of nowhere and said: “We are indeed not the Elves you remember, Atlantis.”

That voice was not loud, yet it seemed to echo through the whole space. It sounded old, but it carried a calming strength.

On the deck of the Vanished, an old man with a hazy, unreal body slowly walked forward.

Rune turned back and gave Duncan a slight nod. Then he turned calmly, his expression steady, and directed his gaze toward the giant tree in the darkness.

That was the World Tree of Elven legend—their homeland, their Mother, their myth, their heritage, the starting point of all their tales and the source of a glorious civilization.

Now she had been dead for a long time, yet her remains had slowly fallen into a runaway state, swelling and growing even in death.

Rune had never seen a tree so huge. As an Elf, he had not even seen a forest, nor did he know how to live in one. He had never seen a winding river pass through a valley and turn into a babbling stream beneath the trees, never seen birds and beasts dwell in the woods, flowers blooming in clearings, and he had never heard the sound of wind and the sea of trees under the veil of night.

It was said that back then, Elves lived even longer than now—their lives were almost eternal, and under the protection of the World Tree they could be reborn from death. They were light and strong, able to run among the crowns of towering trees…

But Rune had never seen any of it.

He was born after all of that had been destroyed.

He walked to the end of the deck. Age had made his back a little bent, and years of desk work and poor habits had left him slightly overweight. When he lifted his head, wrinkles piled across his forehead like deep lines.

He said to the World Tree: “We must look very different from how you remember us.”

Atlantis did not speak. The faint light only trembled slightly in the mist, and from deep within the pale, twisted remains of the World Tree came a faint rustling, like leaves stirring.

After a long time, the young voice finally sounded again, hesitant: “Those lines on your face… what are they?”

Rune said slowly: “They are wrinkles. When a mortal grows old, the skin loosens and shrivels, and it becomes like this. And when it is cloudy or raining, my back and waist ache, because I am already old and have always lived at sea… My stomach is not very good now, and my teeth have been patched. Maybe in a few more years, I will die like other old people. I will turn into ashes in a furnace, become fertilizer in a plantation… We will not return to the World Tree, and we will not be reborn in giant seed pods…”

He stopped and kept his head raised, turning his gaze toward that distant faint light.

He said again: “We are very different from what you remember, aren’t we?”

From deep within the remains of the World Tree, the faint rustling sounded again.

“…So none of it can come back… can it…”

Rune said slowly: “Yes. It cannot come back. None of it can. And even if it did, it might not be what you knew. But… there are some things I would like to show you.”

As he spoke, he reached into his coat and fumbled around. A moment later, he took out a book.

The book was very old and looked well-thumbed. Elegant letters were printed on the cover, in a script different from the common language used in most city-states.

He opened the worn book, found a passage, and read it slowly: “…The first sunlight fell upon the great rock. The traveler readied his pack. He would cross the hill of flowers and reach the hill of Roland Nam before dusk…”

The young voice in the distance murmured: “This is from the ‘Horo-Dazzo Epic Poem’…”

Rune answered in a low voice: “Yes, that poem. Long ago, explorers found stone tablets carved with it on dark islands, along with many other records. We spent a thousand years reclaiming the meaning of these words, and then several thousand more searching for the hill of flowers and that slope described in the poem… But we never found them. Even those dark islands themselves vanished one day into the mist at the border…”

Rune spoke in a low voice. He set the book down and looked again at the distant faint light.

“We have recovered many things. Half of them we still cannot understand, but compared to humans and Senkin, the Elves have the most complete history. At least we still remember that the Creator woke in the darkness and planted the First Tree in the dream of origin… Four hundred years ago, we restored the craft of the ‘Ring-Tailed Lyre’. Its sound was clear and bright, just like the ancient scrolls described. Seventy-six years ago, we repaired the last chapter of the ‘Heidran Psalms’. It holds many interesting stories and is said to have been offered to the God…

“But there is much more that we still do not know, and never will. Those things vanished in the Great Annihilation and left no trace in the age of the Deep Sea, just like those dark islands that disappeared into the mist.

“Atlantis, I am sorry. We are not the Elves you remember. We only picked up a few fragments from the long river that rushed past and tried our best to leave these traces in the world after Doomsday… I do not know if that gives you any comfort, but…

“This is truly all that is left.”

In the darkness, the faint light floated quietly. The hazy pale mist slowly drew back. Without anyone noticing, the dead, twisted branches at Atlantis's edge had silently faded away, and the ghostly green flame now quietly encircled the giant tree, like… a forest that had vanished long ago.

Duncan lifted his head and looked at the huge black billy goat.

After a moment of silent exchange, he gave a small nod.

The Black Goat stepped forward, crossed the empty air, and slowly came to the foot of the giant tree.

He lifted his head and said softly: "…You have grown so much."

The faint light in the darkness trembled slightly: "I… I did not finish what you told me to do."

The Black Goat slowly lowered his head. He gently tapped his horn against the dry, torn trunk. At the tip of the horn, a point of ghostly green flame quietly burned. He said: "No, you have done very well. Now the good child needs to sleep, little sapling."

Within the pale mist, that faint light slowly dimmed. The sound of wind and rustling leaves finally fell silent. The scattered points of light flowed together into a river that quietly circled the base of Atlantis. From the deepest part of the World Tree, a wailing sob finally rose.

The ghostly green fire of the spirit form leaped up and, in an instant, wrapped the entire giant tree, lighting up all the darkness that had followed the Universal Extinction.

Chapter 645:

The flames rose.

It was as if a fountain of fire as tall as a mountain burst out in the darkness. The last remains of the World Tree turned at once into ash and phantom in the flames. Then the fire wound and flowed, spreading through the dark, chaotic space into a boundless sea of fire. That sea of fire burned away the last borders of the Nameless One’s dream and drove all things back to their “proper place” in the Mortal Realm.

The Boundless Sea appeared. Its endless waters rippled with tiny waves beneath the heaving flames. The sky appeared, pushing back the darkness above the fire and slowly brightening. The city-state appeared. It took solid shape as the flames surged upward, and as the flames faded, every lamp within it slowly lit up.

The whole world seemed to rise out of the darkness, slowly emerging from the sea of fire and once more merging with the Mortal Realm. Duncan stood at the bow of the Vanished and watched it all. For some reason, he suddenly recalled the ancient Elven legend: in Saslokar’s first dream, all things in the world were shaped out of dark chaos.

What he saw before him looked like that “Genesis Protocol” from the legend happening once again.

And at the end of the Genesis Protocol, sunlight appeared over the endless blue waves of the sea.

At some point, the flames had begun to fade. Morning sunlight spread in from the farthest edge, splendid and grand as it covered the endless sea and Lightwind Harbor, which was slowly waking to the dawn. The nightmare was fading. Everything that had been swallowed by it would return to the Mortal Realm as the sunlight rose—and those things that had briefly reappeared in the dream now also had to return to what they had been.

The huge black billy goat stepped on the waves and, with a single stride, came to the side of the Vanished. The ancient God once seen as the "Creator" lowered his head a little and pressed his sharp horn against the tall mast.

A point of ghostly green flame leaped at the tip of his horn and returned to the Vanished.

He said: "I return the fire to you, Captain."

Duncan looked at the Black Goat and said: "I could have handled it myself. You did not have to…"

The Black Goat shook his head and said: "But it was most fitting that I did it myself. A very long time ago, I created her. Now it should also be me who sees her off on her final journey."

Duncan did not answer, only gave a slight nod.

The Black Goat went on: "…Do not feel regret for this. It was something that was bound to happen. In a way, it had already happened long ago—Atlantis had ceased to exist even before the age of the Deep Sea began. What appeared in the nightmare was only a runaway shadow. Letting that shadow keep growing would have been the greatest insult to her. Besides…"

He paused suddenly, and Duncan asked with some curiosity: "Besides?"

The Black Goat seemed to smile a little and said: “Besides… you have already taken her away, have you not?”

Duncan raised his eyebrows at that. He understood at once what Saslokar meant, and it surprised him: “It seems you have sensed a few things.”

The Black Goat said slowly: “Not clearly, but I can vaguely feel it.” The ghostly green flame rising from the deck of the Vanished was reflected in his eyes. Not long ago, he had briefly been granted that fire and, within it, had felt a trace of Duncan’s true power. “Your flame took Atlantis to a ‘place’ I cannot understand. I do not know what that place is, but my instincts say it is good, very suited for my little sapling to have a long sleep.”

The sunlight grew brighter. The splendid double rune rings of Vision 001 were slowly rising above the sea’s surface. The morning sunlight shone on the Black Goat’s body, giving that huge form a crystal-like, half-transparent unreal texture.

The Black Goat lifted his head, glanced at Vision 001 in the distance, and said with some feeling: “The dream is over. Time to return to our posts. They really have built something remarkable…”

In the next second, the Black Goat’s body quietly cracked in the morning glow, like a soap bubble pricked under sunlight, and it vanished silently into the wind.

Duncan stood dazed on the deck for a while. Then he turned and looked at Rune standing not far away. The old Elf’s body had already returned to normal. He stood slightly bent in the rosy light, his expression still a little blank.

Duncan said casually: “I thought you would come greet Saslokar. He is the Creator from your legends, and you may be the last Elf to see him in his Mythic Form—I do not have the energy to let him take that form very often."

Rune finally snapped out of his daze. He gave Duncan a slow look, then suddenly slapped his palm in regret and said: "Ah! I did not react just now!"

Duncan: "…"

After staring for two seconds, Duncan's mouth twitched. He said: "It is fine. You can still talk with him. You will just have to go to the captain's cabin and chat with my First Mate Goathead from now on."

After he finished speaking, he ignored the way the "Pope's" expression suddenly turned strange, waved his hand, and walked toward the rest of the deck.

Nina was already running happily toward him and called out: "Uncle Duncan!"

Duncan raised his arms to catch this "little Sun" as she leaped at him from midair. Then he lifted his head and looked at the others walking over.

Vanna came up to him, lifted her hand to point at the city-state not far away, bathed in sunlight, and said: "Lightwind Harbor seems to be restored. I just do not know how things are inside the city."

Lucretia said: "Once we dock, I will go check the situation in the city. In theory, based on how the Nameless One's dreams worked before, everything should restore itself when the dream ends. But this incident was so large. There will likely be some 'aftereffects' left behind."

Morris also walked over, but his gaze went another way. The Cathedral ship, which looked like a small city-state, was sailing through the waves, clearly headed toward the Vanished floating on the sea.

Morris said: “The Academy Ark is approaching. Looks like they want to talk with us.”

Duncan said as he raised his hand to point at Rune, who was heading toward the captain’s cabin: “That is normal. Their ‘Pope’ is still on our ship. You should go greet your mentor too. You two have probably not seen each other in the Mortal Realm for many years.”

Morris nodded and started toward the captain’s cabin.

Duncan turned his head to glance at Vanna and asked with some concern: “Are you really all right already? Do you not need to go back to your room and rest?”

He still clearly remembered that when he had just brought this valiant maiden back to the ship, she had used up all her strength and could barely walk. Now she already looked full of energy again.

Vanna also lowered her head to look herself over. She hopped in place twice, swung her arms and legs a bit, then patted her chest, a proud smile on her face, and said: “I am fine. I just rested for a while. My strength is completely back now.”

The corner of Duncan’s mouth twitched. For a moment he did not know what to say. Shirley, however, muttered under her breath to the side: “Man, the Athlete is really something… Burned to death by the Sun twenty-seven times, and after sitting on the deck to settle down for a bit, she’s already back to normal…”

Vanna immediately corrected her with a very serious face: “It was twenty-eight times. I was a bit scorched just now. I miscounted when I told you.”

Duncan: “…?”

He stared speechlessly as Vanna and Shirley walked off, still arguing over whether it had been twenty-seven or twenty-eight times. After a long while, he finally smiled and shook his head.

“This is really nice.”

He heard Alice say softly not far away.

Duncan turned and saw Miss Doll sitting on a large barrel at the edge of the deck. She faced the direction of the sunlight, head lifted and eyes half-closed, letting the light spill over her face. Her legs swung lightly over the rim of the barrel, and her body swayed a little with them.

“It is really nice…” she sighed softly again.

Duncan walked over and suddenly asked beside the doll: “What is nice?”

Alice let out an “Ah” and almost fell off the barrel on the spot. Only when she saw it was Duncan did she relax. She grabbed his arm, used the force to steady herself back onto the barrel, and said: “You scared me.”

Duncan laughed and reached out to pat Miss Doll’s hair: “What are you sighing about?”

Alice thought for a moment, then raised her hand to point toward the city-state and said: “The way things usually are is really nice. No huge fires, no strange tree. Everything looks like what I know. The ship is back on a calm sea, and we do not have to fly over weird, scary forests anymore… I can scrub the deck like usual again, and go back to the kitchen to cook.”

As she said this, Miss Doll suddenly seemed to remember something. She jumped off the barrel at once and ran off, waving back at Duncan without turning her head: “the Sun is up! I have to go make breakfast! Captain, wait for me!”

Duncan watched in mixed surprise and amusement as that scatterbrained doll dashed across the deck. On the way, she was tripped by a rope that suddenly popped up, crashed right between Shirley and Dog, and stirred up a whole noisy commotion. Vanna hurried over to look for the doll's head, which had rolled off to who knew where…

In almost the blink of an eye, the Vanished had returned to its usual "lively" state.

After a long time, Duncan smiled and shook his head. He pulled back his gaze and looked again at the large barrel Alice had been sitting on. He lifted his foot and gave its side a little kick: "Do you all also think it feels good to return to everyday life like this?"

The barrel wobbled in place, and its lid suddenly popped open.

Inside, the barrel was packed full with Wave Amulets.

Used by the Athlete as a container to pile amulets in, by the doll as a chair, often turning into Dog's homework desk and Shirley's target for random doodles, the barrel did not seem very happy.

Duncan's expression turned a bit odd. He quietly reached out and closed the lid again.

Then he sat down on the barrel as well, quietly gazing at the sunlight in the distance.

The world had returned to peace again, for now—but it was truly nice.

Chapter 646: A Temporary Farewell

With a rush of air surging out of the pipes, a loud, lingering whistle rose from the upper levels of the Truth Academy Ark. The Vanished once again pulled in beside the steam-powered mechanical dock at the far end of the Ark's shoreline. Knowledge guards and scholars in dark blue robes appeared on the gangway, ready to welcome their Pope back.

On the aft deck, Duncan saw Rune, who had just come out of the captain's cabin.

The short, plump elf elder had been inside the cabin this whole time, talking at great length with the "creator" of his race. Duncan had no idea what he and Goathead had talked about. He only knew that when Rune stepped out of the cabin, his expression looked a little blank.

There was also a kind of calm on his face, the empty sort that came after draining one's thoughts.

Duncan walked up to this "Pope of Truth" and greeted him several times before Rune finally snapped out of his daze and emptiness.

"Your Cathedral ship is already waiting alongside," Duncan said as he raised his hand and pointed past the rail at the gigantic Ark outside, which looked like a small city-state. "The scholars and guards have come to take you back."

Rune looked up, then belatedly nodded: "Oh… right, it is time to go back."

Seeing the elf elder's reaction, Duncan could not help feeling a little puzzled: "What did you talk about with Saslokar? You weren't in this state when you first came aboard…"

"We talked about… a lot of things," Rune said slowly, as if he did not even know where to begin. "A great many things."

Duncan frowned slightly and began to understand: "So you saw what the First Mate is usually like."

Rune jolted, as if he truly returned to himself only then. He lifted his head to look at Duncan, hesitated for a long time, and finally spoke: "…Why does He talk so much?"

"I'm more surprised that He talks so little when He's in His Mythic Form," Duncan laughed, and there was a trace of genuine amusement in his smile. "What you see now is how He usually behaves on my ship—in stricter terms, it's how He acts as 'Goathead'."

Rune opened his mouth, as if he wanted to say something but could not find where to start. After holding it in for a long time, he suddenly relaxed and laughed: "…It's not a bad thing. He seems to really like being that way."

The deck fell quiet for a while. No one paid any attention to the Pilgrimage Ark waiting nearby to take the Pope back. After an unknown time, Duncan finally broke the silence: "How do you plan to handle the 'truth' of this incident? Especially the part about Saslokar."

"Most of it will be restricted to the upper ranks of the Four Gods Church," Rune said. "Just like with all supernatural incidents that point toward a God, we will seal the information, handle the aftermath, and carefully assess the long-term impact of this incident on the Mortal Realm. As for elven society…"

Rune paused here, thinking. After a moment, he gently shook his head.

“The ancient days are already gone. Legends… should be allowed to keep sleeping as legends. That is also ‘His’ wish.”

“That’s good. I don’t like trouble,” Duncan nodded, then shifted the topic. “But there is something I need to remind you of—this is the third city-state.”

Rune at once understood what Duncan meant, and his expression grew solemn.

“Pland, Frostholm, Lightwind Harbor… The cause and course of each incident looked different. Each one seemed like an isolated ‘special disaster’. Every time, the biggest culprit behind it all seemed to be that group of cultists. But a bunch of cultists alone cannot pry at the very foundations of the world’s order,” Duncan said seriously. “What these incidents really show is that the world’s ‘keystone’ is starting to shake. I want to know whether the Four Gods Church has any way to deal with this, what you truly know, and what plans you have in place.”

Rune fell into a deep, dark silence. After a long time, he finally gave a small nod.

“I understand what you mean… and now I have confirmed your stance as well. At least by my own judgment, this is indeed the time to put aside suspicion and step up our cooperation.”

Duncan watched him: “But you still have to consider the reactions of the other Three Gods’ churches, don’t you?”

“It’s not just their reactions… There is also the reaction of the Gods,” Rune said calmly. “I will discuss this with the other three Popes as soon as possible. No matter what the result is, I will give you an answer—and likewise, no matter what the result is, at the very least, the Truth Academy will from now on show the Vanished Fleet the greatest possible trust and cooperation."

Duncan nodded. He knew this was the greatest promise the other side could give him at this stage.

Just then, Rune seemed to recall something and suddenly said: "There is one more thing—I have heard about Miss Vanna's experience in this incident. I think… at the very least, the Flamebearer side will come looking for you soon."

"Flamebearer?" Duncan frowned, then immediately understood.

He turned his head and looked toward the other side of the deck. Vanna was leaning against a pillar by the rail, letting the sea breeze wash over her as she seemed to rest with her eyes closed. But Duncan's attention was not on her, it was on the thing lying beside her.

It was a huge, strange Gatekeeper's cane, as thick as a tree trunk. Its tip bulged like a giant, oddly shaped boulder, while the shaft was straight and rough. The entire Gatekeeper's cane was covered in carved markings that looked like mysterious symbols.

That was what the giant named "Tarrigan" had left to Vanna—even after the Nameless One's dream completely scattered, this Gatekeeper's cane still remained. Along with that strange "miniature Sun", it had followed the Vanished back to the Mortal Realm.

"Everburning Ember, Tarrigan, the Flamebearers' God," Rune said quietly. "The 'giant' Miss Vanna met in the Nameless One's dream should have been an echo left behind in Atlantis's memory during the collision of two worlds, a phantom in the form of 'resonance'. Yet even if it was only a phantom, it was still a phantom of an Elder God. What He left behind has now crossed the boundary between dream and the Mortal Realm.

“That Gatekeeper’s cane… if I’m not mistaken, it should be the ‘Chronicle Pillar’ that the Flamebearers worship. On Frem’s Pilgrimage Ark, there is a device that looks almost exactly the same, and it is regarded as the heart of the Ark. Its size is much larger than that ‘Gatekeeper’s cane’, though. I have seen it. It looks more like a gigantic monument…

“And that ‘Chronicle Pillar’ built on the Flamebearers’ Ark is actually a ‘replica’ made according to the descriptions in the Sacred Tome. For a very long time, the true ‘Chronicle Pillar’ existed only in legend.”

Duncan thought for a moment: “So you mean the Gatekeeper’s cane Vanna brought back is the ‘genuine article’ described in the Sacred Tome.”

“I can only say it is the closest thing to the ‘genuine article’ that we currently know of,” Rune said very carefully. “It is possible that there is no true ‘genuine article’ left in this world at all. The Great Annihilation ended everything. As we trace things back from the age of the Deep Sea, the farthest we can go is only infinitely close to that so-called ‘genuine article’.”

“Either way, it looks like that ‘Gatekeeper’s cane’ holds extraordinary meaning for the Flamebearers,” Duncan nodded lightly. “You think they will want to take it, is that it?”

“I’m not sure. Frem is a broad-minded, fair person. He never forces others and never seizes what does not belong to him. But… you know, that is still the ‘Chronicle Pillar’ left behind by Everburning Ember. Whether for the Flamebearer sect or for Senkin, its meaning is far too special.”

Duncan said nothing. He simply watched the “Gatekeeper’s cane” lying beside Vanna with a quiet gaze and thought in silence.

For some reason, he found himself thinking of that longsword that had once been thrown toward the sky.

He had given that sword to the research institute in Lightwind Harbor, because for him the only important thing about it was the “information” it carried about another world. As for supernatural objects themselves, he was no professional researcher.

In the same way, the Gatekeeper’s cane actually had little meaning to him, even though it had once been held in the hand of Everburning Ember, Tarrigan. Duncan only cared about the “truth” and “knowledge” of the Great Annihilation. Once he had gained that part of the information, he did not care much about anything else.

There were countless supernatural objects in this world, but for Duncan, most of them were worthless—not worth taking up even a single spot aboard the Vanished.

The problem this time, however, was that this Gatekeeper’s cane had been left to Vanna by Tarrigan.

He had to respect his crew member.

“Personally, I don’t mind handing the Gatekeeper’s cane over to the Flamebearers. After all, just like the ‘Horo-Dazzo Epic Poem’ in your hands is of great importance to the elves, the ‘Chronicle Pillar’ is indeed a relic of Senkin’s civilization,” he said openly. “But I have to consider what Vanna thinks. Since you already know about Vanna’s experience, you should know she treasures that Gatekeeper’s cane.”

He paused, then spoke very seriously to Rune: “That is her friend’s keepsake. I am not as broad-minded and fair as this Frem you talk about. I am protective of my own.”

“…I understand your stance,” Rune said, nodding with a solemn expression. “I will pass your words on to Frem and ask him to think very carefully about this matter—to avoid both sides being put in an awkward position."

Duncan dipped his head slightly: "That would be best."

The loud, melodious whistle sounded again, and great clouds of steam rose like billows in the sky above the Academy Ark.

Rune took his leave from everyone aboard the Vanished. Then, under the watchful eyes of Duncan and the others, the elf elder stepped onto the gangway that led back to the Ark.

Driven by a massive steam engine, the mechanical gangway slowly retracted. Then, amid a series of heavy mechanical noises, the entire transforming dock structure folded back into the "shoreline structure" along the Ark's side. The vast Cathedral-ship, a city-state in its own right, let out a low rumble as it gradually pulled away from the Vanished.

But Duncan knew that this Ark would not return to the border right away. Rune had told him of his plans: the Pilgrimage Ark would remain in Lightwind Harbor for a while to help this "city-state just waking from a long dream" handle a series of aftermath matters.

That, however, no longer had anything to do with the Vanished.

Now, Duncan needed to deal with another matter that required "aftercare".

He walked to the door of the captain's cabin at the stern and pushed it open.

Chapter 647: Little Sapling

It was the same familiar room, with the same familiar furniture, the same small living room, the same studio apartment.

Everything still remained as it had been when he left, as if sealed in amber outside the flow of time. No matter how long had passed, nothing here seemed to change.

Zhou Ming stepped into the small living room of the studio apartment. Standing in the place where he had once lived for many years, he let out a soft breath.

He had not returned here for quite a long time—sometimes he even felt that he had already forgotten about this studio apartment, forgotten the “other world” it stood for.

But in the end, that self-deceiving “forgetting” meant nothing.

He shook his head with a smile, then walked straight toward the desk. He did not check the tightly closed window as he once did, because the clutter on the windowsill and the flour he had sprinkled there on purpose had already been cleaned away last time. In this last little room deep within the mist, he no longer expected any more Guests to visit.

A faint green ghostly light was slowly fading on the desk. As the flames receded, a new “collection item” gradually took shape.

Zhou Ming walked over and sat down in the chair, resting his hands on the desk. His gaze was calm and gentle as he looked at the little thing that seemed full of life… the “little sapling”.

She floated above the desk. Her crown spread to about the length of an adult’s forearm, lush and full of branches and leaves. Her trunk was connected to a large clump of soil beneath her, her roots sunk deep into that soil, with a few roots stretching out underneath and exposed in the air.

She just floated there, about ten centimeters above the desk, maintaining that height in an… unbelievable way. She presented a style completely different from the rest of the “collection”.

Zhou Ming lifted his head and glanced at the big shelving unit not far away. The other collection pieces sat quietly in their own cubbies, resting safely on the wooden shelves.

Right now, this “little sapling” floating above the desktop was the only collection item that showed such obvious supernatural traits.

…Was it because her essence came from “dream”? So even after becoming a collection item here, she still kept some properties unique to creations of dream?

Half idly, Zhou Ming wondered that to himself as he reached out and gently brushed Atlantis’s crown. The “World Tree” that looked like a floating potted plant drifted aside from his touch, then slowly floated back to its original spot.

Aside from that, though, the little sapling showed no other lively traits. She did not speak, nor did she react in any other way to Zhou Ming’s touch.

“Now you really have become a little sapling again…” After quietly watching the tiny “World Tree” for a long time, Zhou Ming finally spoke in a low voice. “I don’t know if you can still hear this… To be honest, I don’t even understand the principles by which you all become ‘collections’ here after being burned by the spirit flame. But…”

He paused and glanced at the shelving unit. His gaze swept across the models of the Vanished, the White Oak, and the two city-states.

“But no matter how it works, this will be your new home from now on,” he said softly.

The models did not answer him, making him feel as if he were muttering to the air. If anyone else had been here, it would have been an awkward scene—but fortunately, there had not been any “outsiders” here for a long time.

He reached out with both hands and carefully lifted the clump of soil where Atlantis had taken root, then carried her toward the shelving unit in the corner. He was very careful, afraid that the loose-looking soil might crumble. If it fell apart, gathering it back together might not be so easy, and some dirt might slip into the gaps in the floor and be “lost”.

In this little room, “soil” was a precious resource.

But to his surprise, the clump of earth that looked so loose turned out to be quite stable, as if some invisible force was holding it together. On the way over, not a single grain of soil fell.

He set Atlantis in an empty cubby on the shelf, right next to the model of the Vanished.

The “little sapling” kept floating in the cubby, like a quiet potted plant.

Zhou Ming stood in front of his new “collection” and studied her for a while, but his feelings this time were no longer the same as before. All kinds of complicated thoughts rose and fell in his mind. After a long time, he finally let out a soft, relieved sigh.

At the very least, when he went back, he could tell Goathead that its “little sapling” really was still here.

“You shouldn’t need watering, right…” Zhou Ming suddenly thought of something and could not help muttering. “In theory you shouldn’t… And I hope you don’t grow any bigger. I don’t have that much space here…”

The “World Tree” in the cubby did not answer his muttering. Atlantis only floated there quietly, turning slowly.

Zhou Ming shook his head, then turned and sat down on the sofa in the little living room. He rested there for a while, then casually picked up a book from the small round table beside him and flipped through a few pages without any purpose.

There was no point in it. He had already read that book countless times. Its dry content no longer brought any joy in reading.

But he had grown used to doing something “meaningless” whenever he returned to this studio apartment—either sitting down to read a few pages, or writing two lines in his diary, or tidying up the clutter and cleaning a room that was already almost spotless.

For Zhou Ming, these things were like running a little shop in a city-state or working as a warden in a cemetery. They were not truly necessary, but they were like an Anchor of Humanity, letting him feel that he was still a human being, still living within “order” and “civilization”.

After a while, Zhou Ming set down the book and got ready to stand up and return to the Vanished.

But the moment he lifted his head, his movements froze. Half-risen from the sofa, he stared fixedly at the desk not far away.

Atlantis was now floating quietly several centimeters above the desk, as if she had been there the entire time and had never moved.

Zhou Ming blinked and, for a moment, even doubted his own memory. Then he frowned, walked over to the desk, and examined Atlantis from all sides as she floated in the air. After that, he lifted his head to look at the empty cubby on the shelf.

After a brief hesitation, he picked Atlantis up again and carefully set her on the shelf.

He stared at that cubby for several seconds to make sure, then slowly stepped back and turned around. He walked a few steps away and then quickly snapped his head back.

Atlantis still sat obediently in the cubby.

Zhou Ming frowned, exhaled, and walked toward the front door of the apartment—but just when he was almost there, he suddenly stopped again and turned his head back without any prophetic omen at all.

Atlantis was once again floating quietly above his desk, as if she had never left.

Zhou Ming: "…"

He walked over with a straight face and stared unblinking at the "little sapling" hovering in midair.

"Are you doing this on purpose? Can you move around freely?"

Atlantis, of course, did not respond. She just stayed there quietly like a real tree.

Zhou Ming stared at the "World Tree" for a while longer, then picked her up and put her back in the cubby on the shelf. Right after, he turned his back and stood there for a while on purpose. Ten seconds later, he spun around—Atlantis was floating above the desk again.

The corner of Zhou Ming's mouth twitched. He strode up to the desk and pointed at it: "This is my desk. It's where I work. And if any new collection items show up later, they'll appear on this desk too."

Then he raised his other hand and pointed at the big shelving unit in the corner: “That over there is your place. The second cubby from the bottom is for you. You should be in your cubby, not occupying my desk!”

Atlantis gave no answer. She simply floated in the air, quietly turning in slow circles.

Zhou Ming’s eye twitched. He picked up the “little sapling” without hesitation and put her back on the shelf.

Then he stared at her for a long moment, turned around, and fixed his eyes on his desk.

Atlantis did not appear on the desk this time.

Instead, Zhou Ming heard a banging sound behind him.

He turned around and saw that Atlantis had somehow appeared in another cubby—the one that held the model of the White Oak.

Atlantis was using the big clump of soil at her roots to ram the hull of the White Oak again and again, making loud thumping noises. The model ship was on the verge of getting knocked off the shelf.

“Stop!” Zhou Ming reached out and pressed down on Atlantis’s crown. “You can’t knock into your ‘roommate’!”

Atlantis shivered under his hand, then suddenly swayed to the side. Zhou Ming felt his vision blur for an instant. When he looked along the direction of that last sway— The tiny “World Tree” was floating quietly above his desk.

Zhou Ming: “…”

A short while later, Duncan opened the door of the captain’s cabin and stepped inside, a trace of weariness on his face as he walked over to sit down at the chart table.

Goathead, perched on the edge of the desk, twisted its neck with a creak and fixed its gaze on the captain.

“Duncan Abnomar.” Before Goathead could speak, Duncan waved his hand and began on his own.

“Ah, Captain! You’re back. I thought you would come straight here, but I didn’t expect…” Goathead immediately perked up. With the fading of the Mythic Form, that familiar chattering energy had returned to the talkative wooden carving. But it quickly noticed the subtle look on Duncan’s face. “Uh… you look tired?”

Duncan waved his hand again and let out a sigh this time.

After several seconds, he lifted his head and met Goathead’s eyes: “Your little sapling has occupied my desk.”

Chapter 648: The Gods Are dead?

The captain’s cabin was very quiet. The faint sound of waves from outside came in, fine and gentle, and only made the stillness in the room stand out more. After quite a while, Goathead finally let out a sigh and said: “Ah, that sounds very good.”

Duncan raised his eyebrow and said: “I thought you would ask a few more questions. Aren’t you curious where exactly I took Atlantis? Aren’t you curious about all my secrets?”

Goathead answered bluntly: “Curious. But both reason and instinct tell me it is better not to pry into too many things people call ‘secrets’, especially not into what happens when you leave this ship. You are the captain of the Vanished. Knowing that is enough for me. As for everything else… the less I know, the better.”

“Instinct, hm?” Duncan spoke thoughtfully. He looked at the pitch-black wooden carving of Goathead in front of him and suddenly asked: “Did that instinct tell you what would happen if I were no longer the captain of the Vanished, or if you learned too many of my ‘secrets’?”

Goathead fell silent for a moment. After nearly a full minute, he finally broke the silence and said: “I only know that whenever I have the idea of Boundary Crossing, I see an endless starry sky—and under the light of those stars, the Vanished no longer exists.”

Duncan slowly furrowed his brow. After a brief moment of thought, he shook his head and set the tangle of ideas aside for now. He said: “Atlantis is now staying in a safe place in a special state. You don’t need to worry.”

Goathead spoke softly: “Then that’s good.” He did not ask anything more.

After a few seconds of quiet, Duncan suddenly asked: “But there is still one question—what should I call you? Saslokar? Goathead? Or First Mate?”

Goathead thought for a moment. His tone even sounded a little awkward as he said: “…Let’s stick with the old way of calling me. First Mate or Goathead is fine. The name Saslokar… feels strangely unfamiliar. Thinking back now, it feels so distant that it doesn’t even seem like it was my own name.”

Duncan looked a little surprised and said: “But you agreed quite quickly when I first called you that.”

Goathead’s tone grew even stranger as he said: “…The mood at the time had already gone that way. It would have felt wrong if I hadn’t agreed…”

Duncan: “…”

He gave the pitch-black wooden carving on the table a strange look for a moment, then finally could not hold back his curiosity and said: “I’m very curious about what state you are actually in now—or rather… how you understand yourself. At the moment of the ‘world collision’, you could feel your change. At that time you seemed to have completely returned to your state as the King of Dreams, but it only lasted for a short while.”

Noticing the serious look on the captain’s face, Goathead finally started to think seriously. After a long while, he shook his head, not entirely sure, and said: “To be honest, I’m still somewhat confused even now. I could feel that the part of my memories that belonged to ‘Saslokar’ had awakened within my mind. But I could also clearly feel… he was not entirely me, and I was not entirely him.”

He went on: “But just as you said, when I saw Little Sapling… I changed a little. Perhaps it was the influence of my mythic form. Or perhaps Little Sapling had left such a deep mark in my memories that I… ‘returned’ to the state in those memories. For one brief moment, I even thought… that time had really flowed backward.”

He stopped, as if quietly recalling the strange feeling of that moment, recalling how something deep in his memory gradually revived and how another ‘personality’ awakened in his consciousness. But in the end, he slowly shook his head.

“But it lasted only a very short time. As the sunlight rose and the dream ended, I returned to this state,” Goathead said. “It seems that the symbiotic pact with the Vanished has permanently changed some part of my nature—and to be honest, I actually prefer being like this now.”

“Is that so?” Duncan said, once again thoughtful. “So you are now both Saslokar and not entirely him. That sounds more like a completely new individual reassembled from fragments of the Elder Gods… but if you feel this is good, then there is no problem.”

“Nothing wrong with it at all,” Goathead said in a carefree tone. “Some things… once they are past, they truly are hard to bring back. We all have to look forward. No matter how much the Great Annihilation took away, the fact now is that we are living in the Deep Sea era—so let Saslokar stay in legend.”

“…You have changed after all. In the past, you could hardly say something so reasonable so cleanly,” Duncan said as he gave Goathead a subtle look. He rubbed his chin and added: “But you reminded me. I just happen to have a question for you.”

Goathead’s tone immediately grew serious again as he said: “Please, ask.”

Duncan asked: “Saslokar died. He died long ago—do you still remember that sentence?”

Goathead thought for a moment, then gave a firm answer: “…I remember. When several parts of my memories were recovering and rearranging, that sentence kept echoing in my consciousness. It seemed to be a very strong kind of… ‘self-awareness’.”

“That’s right,” Duncan said with a nod. “Saslokar ‘died’ when the Great Annihilation happened. That is a ‘fact’ deeply imprinted in your memories, and even in the subconscious racial memory of the Elves. But according to the records in The Blasphemous Tome, during the second Long Night after the Great Annihilation, the ‘King of Dreams’ tried to create the world again and was ‘torn into pieces’ when the Genesis Protocol failed. The keel of the Vanished, the ‘Dream-Skull’ in the hands of the Annihilators, and you yourself are all evidence of that record.

“And we can be basically certain that the ‘King of Dreams’ recorded in The Blasphemous Tome was the same Saslokar who had already died during the Great Annihilation. How did an Elder God who had already died when the Great Annihilation occurred carry out a ‘Genesis Protocol’ during the second Long Night? Another similar contradictory record is Tarrigan, the ‘Everburning Ember’ worshiped by the Flamebearers.”

Duncan paused, picked up the glass of water on the table and took a sip. Then he adjusted his posture in the chair. With an even more serious expression, he continued: “Tarrigan was another ‘god’ who died when the Great Annihilation occurred. He was the patron of Senkin. According to the reports from Vanna and the records on that ‘Chronicle Pillar’, his death—or rather, his ‘fall’—was also an indisputable fact. But if he truly died when the Great Annihilation happened… then what is the ‘Tarrigan’ currently worshiped by the Flamebearers on the Boundless Sea? Who exactly is the ‘Everburning Ember’, one of the Four Gods?”

There was a faint creak from between Goathead's neck and base. He swayed his head from side to side, and after quite a while finally said with feeling: "That sounds a bit horrifying."

Duncan looked at the fellow quietly and said: "Don't talk like it has nothing to do with you. You are one of the 'gods' involved."

"I don't remember," Goathead replied with remarkable candor. "I've told you before, I only recalled some vague fragments of memory, and they all focused on the time before the Great Annihilation. As for what happened after that… I truly don't know."

Duncan furrowed his brow deeply and asked: "You have absolutely no impression of the second Long Night, or of your experience with the Genesis Protocol during that Long Night?"

Goathead thought very hard, then shook his head helplessly and said: "If I could remember even a little, I wouldn't be completely blank like this…"

Duncan ignored his nonsense. He simply frowned and kept thinking. After a long time he slowly said: "If that's the case, then I do have some guesses."

Goathead asked at once: "You have a guess?"

"I think we shouldn't simply apply the mortal state of life and death to a deity," Duncan thought for a moment and said with a serious face. "Let's use you as an example—do you think you are alive right now?"

Goathead froze for a moment. After thinking, he answered hesitantly: "I think… you could say I'm alive. Aren't I living just fine right now?"

"By 'living just fine', do you mean your spine is soaking in Subspace, one head has fallen into the hands of the Annihilators, and there are probably even more heads still drifting in the cracks of the world?" Duncan asked.

Goathead’s neck gave a sharp crack, and he immediately cried out: “Please don’t describe it in such a terrifying way! Why do I feel my hair standing on end when I hear that…”

“But that is exactly your current state—you have not only already died, you could even say… you died without much peace,” Duncan said. He also felt the topic was a bit eerie, but since he had already started, he could only force his face to stay serious and continue. “And I suspect the condition of the other ‘deities’ is probably not very different from yours.”

Goathead fell silent, as if caught in horror.

After briefly organizing his words, Duncan continued: “The Crawling King, lord of the Abyssal Deep. According to The Blasphemous Tome, He was the creator during the third Long Night. His current state is ‘having lost his sanity, stuck in the rift between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and Subspace, unable to move, constantly producing countless Abyssal demons and constantly devouring them’.”

“In the Sacred Tome of the Flamebearers, Tarrigan is described as a giant who guards the Primordial Flame, and that giant’s own body is also wrapped in undying fire that burns his flesh forever.”

“As for the Black Sun, I have seen Him,” Duncan said. “He is scorched by his own corona, his mind already shattered, and now he only longs to go out…”

“The storm goddess and the god of wisdom… I don’t know their exact state,” he added. “But I suspect it’s similar.

“Stripped of all mythic halos, just from my own ‘common sense’ and ‘subjective impression’, none of these situations is normal.”

Duncan said this and spread his hands, giving his final conclusion: “The gods are dead—it’s just that their ‘death’ may be very long, or very peculiar.

They do not ‘operate’ according to the ‘life and death’ that mortals understand. Some ‘state’ they remain in after death, or some ‘residue’, can still affect this world, or rather… affect these ‘embers’ that were burned to ashes after the Great Annihilation. This is the true face of the Deep Sea era.”

When Duncan’s words fell, the captain’s cabin fell into silence.

After who knew how long, Goathead’s voice finally broke the silence: “… The way you describe it… is disturbing. This time I really do feel my hair standing on end.”

Duncan thought for a moment and sighed softly: “…Maybe I really should use a gentler way to describe it. It does sound a bit eerie like this.”

“No, what I mean is, the back of my neck actually feels a bit itchy right now… would you scratch it for me?” Goathead said.

Duncan: “…”

Chapter 649: The Postponed Day of Ruin

Amid the embers that slowly cooled after Universal Extinction, the corpses of the Elder Gods ruled the ashes of the world, and certain things that ‘sprouted’ from those corpses built replicas and phantoms of the past among the ash. Stripped of every mythic halo, once he re-sorted all the information he had, the ‘Deep Sea era’ before Duncan showed its truest—and most chilling—face.

He could of course use milder phrases to describe this era, or use some more acceptable way to explain the current state of the gods, but that would not change the essence of things.

He stood up and scratched Goathead’s neck. This former ‘creator’ raised his head and studied Duncan’s expression. He said: “You look weighed down by worries.”

Duncan sat back down. After a brief silence he suddenly spoke, almost to himself: “…The whole world is just a heap of embers slowly going out…”

Goathead spoke at once: “I’ve heard Lucretia say that sentence.”

Duncan nodded and said nothing more. Instead he reached into his coat and rummaged around. After a moment of searching he took out two objects.

One was a ‘sphere’ that shone with brilliant light. It was an Ancient Star shrunk countless times over. Flames flowed over its surface, and gentle radiance kept surging, returning, and rippling, as if it were truly maintaining the ‘operation’ of a star.

This was the ‘gift’ Vanna had received from Tarrigan. It was the Sun that had once belonged to Senkin.

The other was a piece of finely cut, pale-gold crystal about the size of a fist. It had dozens of irregular, asymmetrical faces. Each face showed a smooth, flawless texture, and within the crystal there seemed to be extremely intricate and delicate structures, as slender as strands of hair, spreading outward from the crystal’s center to form a three-dimensional lattice wrapped inside the crystal.

Goathead’s attention was first drawn to that ‘little Sun’, but it soon fell on the strange pale-gold crystal. After staring blankly for a moment, he asked in great puzzlement: “What is this thing?”

“If we go by the classifications of the ‘civilized world’, this should be some kind of ‘blasphemous archetype’,” Duncan said casually. “This is something that separated from the body of that Sunspawn when it fell from the sky—before the flames burned it away, AI ‘picked’ it up and brought it back.”

Goathead froze for a moment, then finally recalled the scene from back then —

In its final moments, the Sunspawn had tried to escape the dream of the Nameless One, but had been intercepted in the sky. At the time, he had given that freak its final blow in his mythic form. The thing had fallen from the clouds in pieces, and at the center of its shattered fragments something shining had seemed to be flung out. But the situation had been chaotic then. That thing had flashed once in the sky and had then been ‘swept away’ by a mass of eerie green flames, and no one had paid it any mind… so it turned out to be this?

A flurry of flapping wings sounded from the side as AI beat its wings and flew onto the chart table. It tilted its head to look at the strange crystal it had picked up. After watching it for quite a while, it stretched out its neck and tapped the surface of the crystal with its beak, crying: “The crystal is full of hatred! The crystal is full of hatred!”

Duncan ignored the stupid bird’s chatter beside him. He stared at the crystal before him in thought, and in his mind he recalled the strange large umbrellas held by those tall, thin men in black who were called ‘the Sun’s residue’. He remembered that inside those strange umbrellas, besides machinery and circuitry so delicate they far surpassed the age, there were also crystal structures cut with extreme precision.

These crystal-based ‘blasphemous archetypes’ seemed to be the unique ‘technological creations’ mastered by the Black Sun and His spawn and Remnant Folk.

Long ago, when he had first seen those strange large umbrellas in the hands of the men in black, Duncan had realized something. The Suntists possessed technological creations, which meant they were not a primitive tribe of savage chaos. The advanced manufacturing techniques shown in these blasphemous archetypes actually displayed an extremely advanced civilization.

Or rather, the ‘afterglow’ left by an extremely advanced civilization.

And now, after personally witnessing the truth of the Great Annihilation, Duncan had a new understanding of this matter.

The collision and annihilation of worlds had brought about the Deep Sea era, and the worlds that collided were by no means limited to the homelands of the Elves and of Senkin. The world of that warrior who had flung out his long sword, and Duncan’s own home world as well, had clearly all been destroyed together during the Great Annihilation. Reasoning from this, every race now in this world, every style of relic, every inexplicable and mutually contradictory historical record, likely represented a civilization that had been destroyed.

Some of those civilizations might have come from different planets within the same universe. But those with huge discrepancies, enough to cause corruption to other ‘heritages’, clearly came from universes with different laws.

Duncan slowly furrowed his brow. He gently rubbed the surface of the crystal and murmured to himself: “Then the Black Sun… from which universe was He a leftover orphan? So they are also the Lost Ones…”

“Who?” Goathead did not react at first, but soon understood what the captain meant. “You mean the Black Sun and His freaks?”

“Everything in the Deep Sea era comes from those worlds that were destroyed during the Great Annihilation,” Duncan said slowly. “The Elder Gods are merely powerful individuals that survived in a half-dead state after the Day of Ruin. The Black Sun could not have appeared out of nowhere—this crystal should represent the civilization that ‘the Sunspawn’ once belonged to.”

Goathead thought for a while and then slowly said: “…But now this ‘civilization’ stands on the opposite side from us. Their very existence is a kind of destruction for the whole Mortal Realm world. The Black Sun wishes to extinguish himself, while His spawn are obsessed with destroying the Mortal Realm dimension and letting the Black Sun ‘be reborn’ from the ruins of the mortal world. They may once have been a glorious civilization, but now they are mad from top to bottom. It is clearly impossible for them to coexist with the mortal world.”

“Exactly. They cannot coexist,” Duncan said. “There are many other things in this world that cannot coexist with the civilized world—dangerous Elder Gods, the shadows in the Spirit Realm, and those things in Subspace… But have you thought one level deeper—why can't these things coexist with the mortal world?"

Goathead was taken aback and seemed to fall into thought.

Duncan said: "Everything is 'ash' left behind after the Great Annihilation. The gods' corpses opened the present Deep Sea era from within the ash. In theory, the current Deep Sea era is already the result of the worlds in the Great Annihilation merging with, reshaping, and compromising with one another. In other words, since the Great Annihilation has ended, and the third Long Night has successfully remade the world, what exists in the world now is already the 'rebalanced' result. There should no longer be the same mutual corruption and contamination as during the collision of worlds…"

"But in reality, there are still Elder Gods like the Black Sun," he went on. "There are still many 'corruptive things' that will cause disasters as soon as they appear in the Mortal Realm world. This kind of corruption is exactly the same as the 'corruption' that appeared around Atlantis during the Great Annihilation. It feels as if…"

Duncan stopped there, as if unable to find the right words for a moment.

Beside him, Goathead suddenly spoke: "As if the Great Annihilation has never actually ended?"

"Yes. As if the Great Annihilation has never actually ended," Duncan slowly nodded, his expression especially grave. "It has only been postponed, temporarily isolated somewhere, and then slowly released into the world as time passes. The corruption still exists, and the conflicts and corruption between different worlds are still going on slowly. The third Long Night forcibly 'pressed' the embers together, but within this barely ‘pressed-together’ order, the underlying opposition and destruction of all things has never stopped…”

Goathead gradually reacted and said: “This corresponds to that ‘dusk’ those Enders talked about…”

“Self-corruption and self-destruction are the destined path of the Deep Sea era. The Day of Ruin was set at the very beginning of history. Doomsday corrupts history and will eventually chase it down along the long river of time—that has always been the ‘gospel’ preached by those Enders,” Duncan slowly nodded as he spoke. “All along, this kind of Doomsday doctrine has been rejected by mainstream society. But after learning the truth of the Great Annihilation and combining it with the various ‘features’ of the current Deep Sea era, I had no choice but to start taking those madmen’s Doomsday theory seriously.”

At this point he paused, then went on as he thought: “Perhaps this is not really some Doomsday theory at all, but just a kind of objective description of the third Long Night. The third Long Night was an incomplete, unsuccessful Genesis Protocol. It did not fundamentally resolve the ‘conflicts’ triggered by the collision of many worlds. It only provided a buffer zone, so that within a term of ten thousand years this world could find its own way out… and that is why a fourth Long Night is needed.”

“…Do you think that ‘way out’ has appeared?” Goathead asked quietly.

“No,” Duncan shook his head. “Those Enders seem to know some things, but only what kind of ‘hidden danger’ the third Long Night left, and that the underlying conflict and collapse of all things in the world are going on slowly. If they truly knew how to solve this problem, they wouldn’t have treated the Annihilators and the Sunspawn as cannon fodder, and wouldn’t have sent them into the Nameless One’s dream to search for answers.

“The information they provided to the Annihilators and the Suntists were vague and ambiguous. It did not sound like clear guidance toward a definite goal at all, but more like some kind of test. That shows that those Enders themselves did not know what the correct direction was.”

Goathead stayed silent for a while, then suddenly asked: “How are you planning to handle this crystal? If it really is some kind of blasphemous archetype… then the longer this thing remains in the Mortal Realm world, the more dangerous it will become. Even if it is kept on the Vanished, it might not be safe in the long run.”

Duncan thought for a moment and slowly raised his hand.

Fine strands of flame rose from his fingertips and seeped into the crystal.

“I am very interested in their secrets,” he said.

Chapter 650: Memory of the Crystal

The flame seeped into the crystal and spread quickly through the three? dimensional structures inside it, as thin as strands of hair and so complex they made one’s eyes swim. As the flame poured in, Duncan’s consciousness gradually began to sink.

He felt that he had entered a vast, empty place, silent and cold.

It was as if this was a corner that had been forgotten for endless years. A nameless sense of isolation and loneliness rushed along with the flame almost at once. Right after that, he sensed light appearing in his field of vision—strong light, so huge he could hardly grasp its scale, and cold.

He opened his eyes and found himself standing on a huge block of black stone, floating in the void. A golden blazing sun burned quietly before him, so close it was almost terrifying. Flames rolled across its surface. Enormous structures like solar prominences rose into the void and then slowly sank back down again, all in utter silence.

Yet this blazing sun gave off no heat. Even at this distance, Duncan did not feel the terrible high temperature its sunlight should have brought when it shone on him. It only burned there, silent and cold, as if it were nothing more than a scene that had been recorded… an image.

Was this the Black Sun? Had he seen It again?

Duncan frowned and thought this instinctively. But right away, he realized that this heatless golden sun was not the same as the “Black Sun” he had seen before. Deep inside its shell he saw no hideous, eldritch tentacles, nor any dying, pallid eyeball. More importantly… this “Sun” did not try to cry out to him for help.

It was a recording, an image left behind by a real star!

Duncan reacted quickly. Then his gaze finally shifted away from that cold blazing sun, and he began to notice the “black monolith” beneath his feet.

It was a vast artificial construct.

Its surface was flat and smooth, cut by grooves and markings that were clearly carved by hand. The material looked like stone, yet it gave off a faint metallic sheen. At certain nodes in those grooves rose protrusions of unknown purpose, as if they were made from strange crystals.

Duncan let his gaze follow the edge of the monolith outward, toward the endless dark void around the golden sun—

He saw more such “monoliths”. Countless colossal black constructs like stone steles floated around the golden sun, drifting in the boundless darkness. They formed neat arrays, like walls thrown up in space. From this angle, he finally saw more detail on the sides facing the Sun. Precisely cut crystal surfaces covered one face of each monolith, reflecting the sunlight. Beneath the crystals seemed to lie intricate machinery, devices that could adjust the angles of the crystal arrays. The whole structure looked as if… it had been built to gather the energy released by the Sun?!

Duncan stared blankly at the array of monoliths floating around the Sun. In the darkness they formed a vast, loose spherical shell that enclosed the star at its center. Between each floating device he could faintly see twisted lines of light, like some kind of force field. And beyond that enormous “shell”, in the depths of the endless dark, there seemed to be more hazy shadows. But they were too far away, and the sunlight too bright, for him to see them clearly.

What were those?

Distant planets? Habitats in space? giant ships? Or…

Centers that maintained and controlled this astonishing Dyson sphere?

He did not know how long it took before he finally drew his gaze away from the immense shell in space. Even after he understood what he was seeing, it took him a long time to truly come back to himself.

…Inside the crystal device the Sunspawn had left behind, what was stored was not some dark, forbidden truth or the corrupt knowledge of elder gods, but… the design of an ancient Dyson sphere.

Duncan narrowed his eyes a little.

No. This was exactly the dark forbidden truth and the corrupt knowledge of the elder gods. For the Deep Sea era, for the wreckage left behind by other universes, for all things that existed under other systems of mathematics, a Dyson sphere built and supported by parameters from an alien cosmos was the very height of taint and corruption.

After he recovered from his shock, Duncan walked toward the edge of the black monolith under his feet. At the same time, he recalled the “New Hope” he had once seen, the ship that had crashed into this world.

Had that ship also become this world’s “corruption”? After it fell… what had it turned into?

He walked to the edge of the stellar energy collector and looked down.

Sheer cliff?like metal casings and the endless distant darkness filled his view.

Duncan knew that here, strictly speaking, there was no such thing as up or down. If anything counted, only the pull of gravity from the distant star could be called “down”. Yet his senses still told him that the black device under his feet was the ground. Standing on its outer shell felt as solid as standing on earth—he would not fall into the endless void, nor be caught and drawn away by the Sun’s gravity.

That mismatch between what he knew and what he felt helped remind him at every moment that this was only an illusion, a vision recorded inside a “blasphemous archetype”.

What about deeper inside this record? Was there anything else?

Duncan sensed his own flame. He guided it to spread deeper into the crystal, letting his mind sink further down.

The splendid golden sun before his eyes vanished, along with the astonishing Dyson sphere.

Boundless darkness spread in from all directions and flooded his sight.

Contrary to what he had expected, he did not see the fall of the civilization that had built the Dyson sphere. There was no second World Collision. He seemed to skip straight past that stage, arriving instead in the dark chaos after Universal Extinction.

He did not know how long he lingered in that dark chaos. Just when Duncan was about to suspect that there truly was no more information in the crystal, faint lights suddenly appeared in his vision!

Several rays of light appeared. Within the glimmers seemed to be vague shapes—some vast, some uncanny, some twisted and without fixed form. He could not make out their true outlines at all, but he heard… “voices”.

Those voices sounded directly inside his mind—

“…Compatibility was far lower than expected. That ‘King of Dreams’ also failed… We must adjust the plan…”

“The Sanctuary World cannot protect everyone… Some entities have survival conditions that are far too strict. Preserving them while guaranteeing the others… the difficulty was too high.”

“…Draw up a list. Those not on the list…”

“Who will make that decision? On what standards will the list be based?”

“…First establish a compatibility threshold, then run simulations… LH?01 has calculated a plan. If we create a stable anchor, we can ensure the greatest possible number… but we will still have to abandon some…”

After that came a jumble of noise, as if that part of the record were missing. The noise left Duncan’s head spinning, but soon he heard clear messages emerge from it—

“…The entities on this part of the list cannot withstand transformation. The cost of preserving them is too high… We can only abandon them.”

“…There is still three percent redundancy. We can make a few more adjustments…”

“…They must live under a specific stellar environment. For the other entities, their sunlight is lethal poison… LH?01’s plan cannot meet this requirement… There is not much time.

“…Abandon them.”

Boom!

A hollow, echoing roar shattered all the voices and tore apart the endless darkness. Duncan had the sense that he had touched the very bottom of this information. No more messages rose up. In the roar and dizziness, his mind pulled rapidly back from the depths of the crystal.

He opened his eyes and saw the familiar cabin in front of him. The pale golden crystal lay in his palm. Under the burn of the eerie green flame, it quickly turned into a heap of ash.

The information carried in the crystal had been drained dry. This “blasphemous archetype”, which should never have existed in the Mortal Realm at all, lost its stability along with it.

Duncan rubbed his hands together. The last trace of ash in his palm instantly scattered into the air.

He looked up and met Goathead’s gaze.

“What did you see, sir?” Goathead asked a little tensely.

“…The process of them being abandoned. The contents of The Blasphemous Tome have been confirmed once again.”

Duncan did not hold anything back. He told Goathead everything he had seen and heard in the depths of the crystal.

Of course, he did not go into the details of things like “Dyson spheres”. That was not something he could explain clearly in a short time.

After he finished speaking, the captain’s cabin stayed quiet for a long time.

He did not know how long it took before Goathead finally stirred. Goathead spoke in a complicated tone: “…The Blasphemous Tome records that during the third Long Night, some ‘clans’ were cast out into the dark…”

Duncan nodded slightly. He also remembered that passage. It said that “the clans cast into the dark did not die—in their long exile they slowly twisted, becoming… something even more dangerous.”

Goathead thought for a moment, then suddenly asked: “What do you make of this, sir? Do you think the Sunspawn’s actions now… are understandable?”

“In things like this, talking about right and wrong is meaningless,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “The world was not built on fairness. I do not know what state this world was in after the Great Annihilation and before the age of the Deep Sea began. I do not know how many plans the Elder Kings who tried to build the Sanctuary World once had, or how many trade?offs they made. Judging the choices of those who paved the road while we stand in a safe era is foolish and short?sighted. Especially from where we stand now… any form of ‘sympathy’ is both unreasonable and unnecessary.”

“…You are correct, sir,” Goathead said softly after a brief silence.

Duncan said nothing more. He only nodded lightly, then let his gaze fall on the small “Sun” that Vanna had obtained from the giants.

Chapter 651: The Little Sun and the Little Sun

Even though he had already seen the “shrunken” Moon, Duncan still found all of this hard to believe now that he was truly seeing and holding this tiny Ancient Star with his own hands.

It rested in his hand, giving off warm light. The flames on its surface brushed harmlessly over his fingers, bringing only a very faint sensation, like feathers stroking his skin.

But Duncan knew that in some distant past, this small, radiant sphere had once lit the sky of Senkin and sheltered a whole civilization.

“…The followers of the Black Sun wanted this thing. One of the Spawn even risked itself for it. What do you think they wanted to do with this ‘Sun’?” Goathead asked. The sunlight shining from Duncan’s palm was reflected in its eyes, full of curiosity.

“Whether it was the Sunspawn or the remnants called the ‘Remnant Folk’, they had only one goal: to ‘revive’ their ‘mother’, the Black Sun that is now on the verge of death,” Duncan said. He carefully turned the “miniature star” in his hand without looking up. “This small sphere, which looks so insignificant, carries ‘information’ from before the Great Annihilation. For the Black Sun in its current state… it may be some kind of key material for self?repair.”

He paused for a moment here, then slowly voiced some ideas that had been taking shape in his mind.

“In that golden crystal, I saw the home where they once lived. They had a vast technological construct built around their star, and their whole civilization existed upon that structure. When the Great Annihilation happened, that enormous construct must also have suffered the ‘corruption’ of other worlds and twisted into what it is now…

“I have a bold guess. The so?called ‘Black Sun’ may be a kind of ‘hybrid’—their entire civilization, born around the star, and the star itself ‘collapsed’ together, mutating into its current form. Because of this ‘fusion’… the Black Sun is far more deranged and chaotic than other ancient beings, and has many more ‘missing pieces’.”

He raised his hand slightly and shook the Ancient Star in his palm.

“Those Sunspawn might think that another Ancient Star could help them mend the ‘missing pieces’ of the Black Sun,” he said. “I do not understand the principles behind it, but one thing is certain—if they truly succeeded, it would be a disaster.”

“…Fortunately, they failed,” Goathead said with genuine feeling.

Duncan nodded, then looked thoughtfully at the Ancient Star in his hand.

Just then, footsteps suddenly sounded outside the captain’s cabin, followed by a knock at the door. Nina’s voice came from outside: “Uncle Duncan! Are you in there?”

Duncan raised an eyebrow and answered at once: “Come in.”

The door to the captain’s cabin opened. Nina poked her head in for a look, then slipped inside with a grin: “Dinner is ready! I came to call you to eat!”

Duncan looked at Nina’s radiant smile, and a thought suddenly stirred in his mind.

“You came at just the right time,” he said, beckoning to the young lady. “Come and look at this.”

Nina came over obediently and at once noticed the “little Sun” in Duncan’s hand. She stared wide?eyed at the pretty glowing orb and quickly realized: “Isn’t this the ‘Sun’ Miss Vanna brought back from that desert?”

“Hold it,” Duncan said, casually handing the “little Sun” to Nina. “What do you feel?”

Nina took the small sphere, which was about the size of her fist, still a little puzzled. She held it up before her eyes and looked it over from side to side, then tried to “feel” it carefully. She looked at Duncan in confusion: “I don’t feel anything… It just feels warm.”

“Only that?” Duncan frowned. He instinctively wondered what other tests he should have Nina run. While his thoughts wandered for just that moment, a crisp crack suddenly reached his ears.

He looked up in astonishment and saw Nina staring back at him, just as dazed. A tiny wisp of flame and a spray of glowing crumbs were falling from the corner of her mouth. The surface of the Ancient Star in her hand was missing a small piece, and clear tooth marks showed along the broken edge.

Duncan: “…?!”

“I… I couldn’t help it!” Nina finally realized what she had done. She almost jumped on the spot, waving her hands. “I just thought it looked like a good size and then… then… I just bit it without thinking…”

“Don’t move around,” Duncan said quickly, cutting off Nina’s panicked flailing. He stood up and snatched the little Sun from her hand. He was afraid that the bite she had taken might have damaged the stability of this “star”. He had no idea how powerful a star compressed to this size would be if it entered a runaway state, but it was clearly something extremely dangerous.

But nothing happened.

The “star” with a bite missing neither collapsed nor exploded. It still gave off mild, harmless warmth.

And when Duncan looked over its surface again, he realized that the little notch had vanished at some point.

Nina leaned in curiously, blinking at the “little Sun”, which had once more become a complete sphere. After a long moment she finally said: “It healed?”

Duncan gave the “little Sun” in his hand a strange look, then lifted his eyes to the “little Sun” hanging above the Vanished. He had seen all manner of bizarre anomalies and manifestations, yet now he suddenly felt that his mind might not be enough for this.

After countless absurd and uncanny notions rose in his heart, he handed the miniature “star” back to Nina: “…Take another bite.”

Nina obediently took the “little Sun” and bit into it again. There was another crisp crack, followed by loud crunching.

To be honest, just hearing it made Duncan a little hungry…

The next second, under the gaze of both Duncan and Nina, the “little Sun” returned to its original, flawless state.

Nina looked up at Duncan, then back at the “little Sun” in her hands, utterly puzzled: “…Why?”

Duncan raised a hand and rubbed his forehead hard—how was he supposed to know?!

“I suspect even the finest scholar in this world could not answer your question,” Duncan said as he kneaded his brow. He gave a strange look to the sparks of flame that had burst from the corner of Nina’s mouth, and after holding back for a long time, he finally could not resist asking: “…Is it good?”

“Crispy,” Nina replied honestly. “It feels great, but I can’t tell what it tastes like.”

“…Do you still want more?”

Nina’s eyes lit up at once (they truly lit up; the whole captain’s cabin brightened): “Can I?!”

Duncan: “…”

The captain’s cabin fell silent for a while. Duncan strained all his knowledge and imagination trying to explain how any of this was possible. Nina, meanwhile, held the “little Sun” and turned it over and over, as if she were looking for the next place to bite.

After an unknown time, Duncan decided to give up on understanding it.

“You don’t feel unwell at all, do you?” He shook his head. Suddenly he began to worry whether Nina’s body would have problems after “devouring a star”.

“No, I don’t. When I swallow it, it’s warm and really comfortable,” Nina said, shaking her head. “Uncle Duncan, can I have another bite?”

“…I suggest you at least not try again today,” Duncan said after thinking for a moment. His tone was serious, though his expression was hard to keep straight. “If you still feel fine tomorrow… then do as you like.”

He paused here, then added: “I originally meant to leave it in your care anyway.”

He was not lying. Before Nina came in, he had already been thinking about where to keep this “little Sun”. For reasons that were natural and obvious, giving it to Nina to look after seemed only fitting. First, there was an essential link between the two of them. With Nina keeping the “little Sun”, they might discover more of its secrets. Second, in terms of safety, a girl whose slap reached six thousand degrees had more than enough power to make sure no one could steal this “star”.

But the fact that his dear niece thought the “little Sun” tasted good… that part had not been in the plan at all…

Nina herself did not think much of it. She brightened at Duncan’s arrangement and nodded hard: “Mm!”

She looked just like a little dog that had finally gotten the bone it had been dreaming of.

Looking at Nina’s beaming smile, Duncan could not help but feel another thread of worry rise in his heart—

Was it really all right to give it to her?

For now, the “little Sun” seemed to recover at once after being bitten. But he did not know whether this recovery had a limit. If he handed it to Nina to “look after”… would she someday eat the whole thing?

“Uncle Duncan?”

The call at his side snapped Duncan out of his wandering thoughts. He hurriedly pushed the strange notions from his mind and turned his head to meet Nina’s bright, sunlit face.

“Are we going to eat?” Nina asked with a dazzling smile.

“…”

In the end, Duncan could not bring himself to take the “little Sun” back.

At the same time, the great Academy Ark had already sailed near the coast of Lightwind Harbor.

In a lounge on the upper deck of the ark, Rune sat in a chair with his eyes closed, resting.

From the state of the elves who had stayed on the ark, it was clear that the Nameless One’s dream had entirely faded from the Mortal Realm. Even the elves who had once vanished completely had now returned to the Mortal Realm.

Once the sudden pressure was gone, fatigue quietly rose up. Rune had been resting for a long time since returning to the ark; only now did he feel his strength somewhat restored.

After a long while, he slowly opened his eyes and looked at his own hands, at the wrinkled skin that no longer held much life.

“I really am old now.”

He muttered this with a sigh, then rose from the chair and walked over to the nearby workbench.

“…Time to have a talk with a few old friends.”

Chapter 652: Stepping Into the Mist

The flame on the alchemy platform began to burn silently. The liquid in the flask started bubbling. Rahm's gaze came from the mist deep inside Rune's thoughts, and Rune felt his consciousness pulled into a dark, deep place. After he passed through a long, unreal black "tunnel", he saw a few faint lights at its end.

They were his old friends – Helena, Banster, and Frem.

He walked up to the figures, but before he could greet them, Helena was the first to break the silence: "You look in pretty good shape, Rune – looks like we don't need to worry about the Truth Academy having to find a new Pope."

"Thank you for your 'concern'. It seems I am not going to be called to the Lord's side anytime soon," Rune glared at Helena, though there was clearly no real annoyance in his tone. Then he turned to the others and gave a small nod. "Sorry to keep you waiting – I needed some time to restore order on the ark, and to recover my own condition."

Tall and broad-shouldered, with skin like rock, Frem studied Rune's spirit projection carefully. His voice was low: "The incident is resolved?"

"It is resolved," Rune nodded and said. "Order in Lightwind Harbor is being restored. The elves in other parts of the world should also start 'waking up' one after another. In the end, the worst did not happen."

“…We want more information,” Banster spoke from the side. The tall, thin old man who followed the God of Death looked grave. “The influence of this incident spread far beyond the previous crises in Pland and Frostholm. It directly affected an entire race and pointed straight at history from before the age of the Deep Sea… What exactly happened in Lightwind Harbor?”

Rune fell silent for a moment. His gaze swept over the shadows before him and finally landed on Frem, leader of the Flamebearers. After thinking for a bit, he finally spoke in a low voice: “With Captain Duncan’s help, I witnessed the Great Annihilation – the final truth of our world, far beyond anything anyone imagined.”

Then he told his three old friends everything that had happened in the deepest part of the Nameless One’s dream. He told them about the great impact that destroyed two worlds, and the information about Senkin’s home world. He held nothing back.

Even for followers of the Four Gods, this information was far too shocking. After Rune finished speaking, the dark space held up by the psychic echo fell into a long silence.

“Worlds… colliding and merging?” No one knew how much time had passed before Helena finally broke the silence. In the darkness, she fixed her gaze on Rune’s eyes. “You mean the World Drift Theory has been proven?”

“We can only say it was something even more extreme than ‘world drift’… You did not see it with your own eyes, so it is hard for you to imagine how terrifying that collision was. It was the destruction and remolding of all things. Everything in the mortal world turned, in a very short time, into a dark, chaotic ‘primordial soup’. It looked… just like Subspace. And the worlds involved in that ‘collision’ were definitely not just two. There might have been dozens, even hundreds of worlds crashing together at the same time. Atlantis's memory is only a corner of that Great Annihilation…"

Rune did his best to describe how he had felt when he saw that scene, and the ideas that followed. While he spoke, the towering Frem stayed silent and thoughtful. After a long time, this Senkin Pope, who looked like a small giant, suddenly spoke: "Are you sure… that giant who traveled with Miss Vanna was the Everburning Ember?"

"That is what all the clues point to," Rune said with a serious face and nodded. "That Chronicle Pillar is now on the Vanished. I have seen it with my own eyes."

He paused for a second, then added in an even more serious tone: "But I should warn you – if you want to take that thing away, it may not be easy…"

"I know," Frem shook his head before Rune could finish. "I will think very carefully about this… Right now, the most important thing is not that Chronicle Pillar, but information about my Lord. Or, to be strict, information about each 'Lord' we all serve."

He raised his head. Invisible pressure seemed to fill his gaze as he looked at each figure present.

Of course the others understood what that last sentence meant.

After all, in this world, the mortals closest to the Four Gods were them. They had long been able to sense what lay behind that hazy, awe-inspiring veil.

"…Our link with the Gods keeps getting weaker. The role of the Pilgrimage Ark is also fading," Banster said slowly. "When the ark was first built, I could almost hear my Lord's voice directly in the meditation room. But after only these few years, that voice has already turned into a vague, muddled whisper."

"The Pilgrimage Ark is only an auxiliary anchor. It can only strengthen our link to the 'Lord'. It cannot truly slow decay," Rune slowly shook his head. "When we built these arks, we already knew this day would come sooner or later."

Banster fell silent. The tall, thin old man closed his eyes a little, as if he was quietly feeling and performing a Listening Rite. After a long while, he finally said softly: "Sometimes, I can almost smell them slowly rotting…"

The dark space grew quiet again. After a long time, Rune finally broke the silence in a low voice: "…Yes. We all can."

Banster turned his head and fixed his gaze on Helena in the darkness: "… The Deep Sea Church's fleet has been operating at the border for a long time. Have you made any progress?"

"The vanguard is still circling in that endless fog," Helena answered with a hint of frustration. "There are no routes or landmarks in the depths of the mist. The sea and sky both have a strange texture. Even if we use the Stargazing Room for navigation, the course error reaches an unacceptable level… We tried to build a few temporary lighthouses where the fog is thinner, but they only let us go a limited distance deeper into the mist… If we go farther, the fog swallows the lighthouses."

"Our fleets met the same problem," Frem added. "We entered the eternal Veil at the border through another gap. At first the fog was thin and the sea was still normal. But if we went just a little deeper, the mist suddenly grew thick. The lights we set up vanished in the fog as if something swallowed them out of thin air."

“This exploration has gone on for some time,” Rune said solemnly. “We have pulled patrol fleets from all over the world and massed them in the border seas. This has surely drawn the attention of many city-states. If we keep this up, it does not matter whether we ever find the ‘link point’ between the Gods and the mortal world. We will definitely stir up suspicion and fear among the people.”

None of the figures spoke for a moment. The Popes fell into their own thoughts. After several minutes, Helena suddenly said: “In all history, only one person truly went deep into the ‘border’ and came back alive from that fog.”

“…Yes. That is also the last thing I wanted to tell you this time,” Rune nodded slightly. “‘He’ is also willing to build closer ties with the Four Gods Church. It is not just about meeting one of us. He wants a truly deep ‘cooperative’ relationship.”

It was clearly a sensitive and hesitant topic. The other three figures did not speak at once, so Rune turned his eyes first to Helena: “You should support this. That Saint named Vanna has been living on that ship for a long time. You must have gotten a lot of information from her. I believe, like me, you know quite a bit about that ship’s current state and that captain’s condition.”

“Vanna… All right, just from the reports she sent back, that captain does seem trustworthy,” Helena rubbed her forehead, for some reason sounding a bit awkward. “Sometimes I even start to wonder whose Saint she really is. Lately she has been… a bit too trusting of that ‘captain’.”

“But at least you can be sure she is still faithful to her belief – otherwise you would not still hear her voice through the Storm Goddess’s divine blessing,” Rune laughed. “I met your Saint this time. We did not talk for long, but I could feel that she is… an honest and real person. Her judgment of that captain is worth trusting.”

“I also agree to build closer contact with that captain, including meeting him directly and inviting him to join our current operations,” Frem said from the side. “I do not have a Saint who was tricked onto that ship, but I trust Rune’s judgment. And in any case, I need to see that Chronicle Pillar with my own eyes…”

Helena and Rune spoke in unison: “Can you please stop bringing up ‘the Saint being kidnapped onto the ship’ every single time?!”

Frem spread his hands. “Fine, I will stop.”

Then, as if by agreement, all three of them turned their eyes to the only figure present who had not yet spoken.

Tall and thin, draped in a black robe, Banster felt a bit awkward under their stares and could not help frowning: “Why are you all looking at me?”

“Only your opinion is left,” Rune said seriously. “We all agree to build closer ties with that captain and to tell him about our operations in the border seas. What about you?”

Banster pressed his lips together. It was clear that his mind was still racing. After a long time, he sighed helplessly: “I need some time to make my bishops accept this.”

Helena looked surprised. “So you accept it personally?”

“What else? ” Banster spread his hands. “Personal feelings have to step aside at times like this – as long as ‘he’ does not take something from me again this time.”

Chapter 653: Leftover Problems

Order in Lightwind Harbor was recovering quickly. Even though this time the Nameless One's dream had spread much farther than the previous crises in Pland and Frostholm, its special nature meant that, once the "dream" faded, its effect on the Mortal Realm was actually the smallest.

Cities that had been swallowed returned to the Mortal Realm. Districts that had been covered and replaced by the nightmare were restored to how they had been. The flowing fire that had filled the sky in the Elder Gods' nightmare never burned anyone's head in reality. When a new day came, the border city had already gone back to its old look.

Of course, it was not true that the incident left Lightwind Harbor with no impact at all.

People still remembered the scene when the nightmare struck. Many citizens needed comfort, and the whole event needed a proper conclusion and explanation. Quite a number of people suffered short-term memory loss, hallucinations, and phantom sounds after they "woke up". These symptoms were not strong enough to cause supernatural corruption, but psychiatrists still had to step in. Even more ordinary people were troubled by fatigue, sleepiness, and sudden, unexplained heart palpitations. These were aftereffects left by the Elder Gods' nightmare draining and consuming their spirits, and no one yet knew how long it would take them to recover.

At 99 Crown Street in Lightwind Harbor, inside the Witch mansion, Duncan sat by the wide floor-to-ceiling window in the first-floor hall, looking at the street outside.

Steam Walkers belonging to the Academy were patrolling the street. Uniformed Knowledge Guards and constables were checking the districts for any leftover “dream residue”. Staff sent from the government office were knocking on doors one by one. They checked on the condition of each resident, wrote down those who needed help for “mental damage”, and took the more serious cases to nearby mental support rooms for treatment.

“…I just went to see Sara Mell. The situation in the city is better than we thought. There should not be much to worry about – my brother will definitely envy how Lightwind Harbor looks after this incident. Frostholm gave him a terrible headache back then.”

Lucretia stood beside Duncan as she spoke about what she had just checked outside.

“I also saw Master Taran Ael and that Truth Keeper who returned to the Mortal Realm. The first is in decent shape, just a bit drained and nervy. But to be honest, he is usually like that anyway. As long as his vital signs stay stable, we can call it a success…

“The other one was sent to the hospital. It is not really serious, just stomach trouble. Pouring down a whole bottle of Blood Raven Elixir put more strain on his digestive system than the mental damage did…”

Duncan listened to Lucy’s report half-heartedly, then said casually: “When we have time, we can visit that Truth Keeper. He knows about the Vanished’s activities at the border a hundred years ago. I want to talk with him about that.”

Lucretia nodded. Just then, a knock sounded from the entryway, cutting off her talk with Duncan.

Morris, who had been reading near the door, got up to open it. He exchanged a few words with the visitor, then the closing of the door echoed through the hall.

“They are staff sent from the government office,” Morris walked over and said to Duncan and Lucretia. “They are gathering data on the mental state of each household, asking if anyone in this house needs psychological help.”

Duncan gave Lucretia a strange look. She spread her hands. “Not everyone knows about the Witch mansion, especially those rank-and-file clerks who were rushed here from other districts during the emergency. Their daily work already wears them out. They have no time to learn about a house full of ghost stories.”

Duncan shrugged and turned to Morris: “What did you tell him?”

“I told him everyone in this house is in good mental health, and that I am especially healthy,” Morris said offhandedly. “Then the Rahm emblem he was using to detect mental corruption suddenly burned up in his hand. I think no one will come to bother this house again.”

“A new ghost story,” Duncan turned his head and said to Lucretia.

“We dodged some needless social contact again,” Lucretia seemed in a very good mood. “That is a good thing.”

Duncan laughed, then looked out the window again. He quietly watched the street as it slowly regained its usual life and energy. Only after a while did he finally speak, thoughtful: “The incident in Lightwind Harbor is over… It is time to deal with some ‘leftover problems’.”

Lucretia blinked. “You mean…”

“Is Rabby still on that ship?”

“…I understand. I will go check on that ‘nest’ first.”

…

Richard felt a little cold.

Ever since the last time he pulled out of that “Nameless One’s dream”, he had often felt a chill in his body, as if the blood in his veins was thinning and stopping. It felt as if his body could no longer make enough heat. Adding another layer of clothes did not help. Even wrapping himself in blankets in his room did nothing.

He did not understand what was happening. He clearly had plenty of warm cotton, yet he could not stop the heat from leaking out of his body. This “abnormality” left him a bit restless and irritable.

He had asked Rabby about it. Rabby had not given him an answer, only told him to wait patiently.

Luckily, there were still many things to do here, so Richard could put his attention on other matters for the time being.

The ship was sailing across the vast sea, moving along a secret route far from all major shipping lanes. Under the Saint’s order, they had already left the so-called “civilized world” far behind and would reach a supply port near the border in a few days.

In the meantime, the believers on the ship were busy clearing away all the “arrangements” left from their last operation. They reset the runes in the assembly hall, sealed the Dream-Skull again, and readjusted the ship’s hidden state so its “scent” would be hidden even further.

Richard and several of his brothers in faith were checking the runes and the “sacred relic” on the lower deck.

“The Saint said these symbols can block the Suntists from sensing this ship,” Dumont muttered beside him. “…I hope they really work that well.”

“After all, we pulled out at the key moment. To those ‘allies’, that must look like betrayal,” Richard said casually. Then he frowned a little in doubt.

“But still… What happened that made the Saint end the operation so suddenly? Did the words of those Enders really carry that much weight?”

“I do not know,” Dumont shook his head. “But the Saint must have his own reasons. He can see the shadows in fate. I suppose he sensed some great danger hidden in that Nameless One’s dream…”

At that point, Dumont suddenly stopped. He quickly glanced around, then lowered his voice and leaned close to Richard’s ear: “Actually, I suddenly feel… this may have been a trap from the start. That so-called ‘Nameless One’s dream’ hid unimaginable danger. We were right to pull out when we did. Those Suntists might already be in trouble.”

Noticing how serious Dumont was, Richard also glanced around on instinct and whispered: “Why do you say that?”

“We backed out early some time ago,” Dumont raised his head and looked at the runes between the ceiling and the walls, which glowed faintly and ominously in the dark. “Yet that ‘Sun Spawn’ has not come here to the ship to hold us to account. To be honest, I do not believe runes meant to block ordinary supernatural beings can stop an offshoot of the Elder Gods.”

Richard froze for a second and finally started to react.

He should not have reacted this slowly. Most of the time, he was sharper than Dumont. But for some reason, his thoughts and reactions had become much slower than before.

It was as if only now, after Dumont’s reminder, he realized that the “Sun Spawn” might already have met with disaster.

“…You mean that Sun Spawn is already dead? Killed by the Nameless One’s dream?” Richard asked in a tense, uneasy whisper. “There should not be any power in the mortal world that can kill a Spawn. Could it be that dream…”

“It might also have been done by ‘his’ followers. Or by ‘him’ himself,” Dumont muttered. “You know who I mean.”

Richard shut his mouth at once and did not continue that topic.

They could not keep talking about it. Otherwise that ghost captain might turn his gaze here, drawn by their reckless words. The shadow of the Vanished would rise from the veil of night, and thick fog would sweep in and carry everyone away.

Everyone who sailed on the Boundless Sea had grown up hearing stories like that.

Even so, Richard could not help feeling a bit curious again.

He knew how powerful the Sun Spawn was. Even among all types of Spawn, they were the strongest. They were born directly from the black sea of the Sun’s fire, an essential offshoot of the Elder Gods. If the Mortal Realm had not been sealed and sheltered by the Four Gods, limiting the Sun Spawn so they could appear in the Mortal Realm only as projections, the full power of their bodies would have been enough to destroy a city-state in a short time. Power like that was hard to face, even for a mighty Saint.

Was that “ghost captain” really that strong?

Cold rose again from the depths of Richard’s heart. He shivered and quickly forced his wild thoughts under control, so his “thinking” would not draw some dangerous gaze from the darkness.

At the same time, he heard Dumont’s voice again in his ear.

“In any case, we left that whirlpool behind. A lot of people are still confused about it, but we are safe now.”

Richard stayed silent for a few seconds.

Icy cold spread through his heart. The blood in his veins seemed to have stopped flowing altogether. He felt cold, colder and colder.

He felt as if his body almost no longer produced any heat.

Even so, he still slowly nodded.

“Yes. No matter what, we are safe now.”

Chapter 654: Visit in the Shadows

In the spacious, ornate assembly hall, the roof and walls were covered with many reliefs and patterns related to the Abyssal Lord. On the high platform in the center, the twisted thing known as “the Saint” sat in silence.

A “crown” woven from pitch-black bones stood on the platform. Between the tangled nerves and blood vessels at the base of the crown were many half-open, half-closed eyes. A chilling brain lay in the center of the Bone Crown. It writhed slightly from time to time and let out low, muffled sounds.

The lower priests and ordinary cultists in the hall stayed quiet. They stood carefully and nervously in the corners, keeping their distance from the central platform. They did not even dare meet the Saint’s eyestalks, which were now in a dormant state. A dull, heavy mood hung over the place, as if even the air had frozen.

Everyone knew the Saint was in a foul mood—and it clearly had to do with the sudden end of the recent operation.

The order to end the operation had of course come from the Saint himself, but it was obvious this was not a result this Lord wanted to see—the outcome was not supposed to be like this.

This silence and pressure lasted for who knew how long. Then a voice suddenly sounded in the ears of every lower priest and ordinary cultist: “Leave.”

Everyone felt as if they had been granted amnesty. In almost the blink of an eye, the Annihilators gathered in the hall left the assembly through the various doors, and in the end only the upper priests beside the platform remained.

“Saint,” an upper priest in a black coat, his graying hair combed neatly back, turned to the platform and broke the silence: “We have received news from Morka and Siprode. The elves who fell into sleep and dissolution in the various city-states have begun to recover.”

“…The entrance to the dream has vanished, and the Dream-Skull no longer reacts to the ‘blood food’,” another upper priest said at once. “Judging from the current situation, the Nameless One’s dream has probably vanished completely—but even now, the Suntists still have not contacted us.”

“They will not contact us again,” a reply finally came from the Bone Crown on the platform. “The Sunspawn who led this operation has fallen. This loss is enough to plunge those followers into a long chaos… Having lost the Spawn that served as their core, the branch that cooperated with us will soon die out.”

The upper priests around the platform stirred at once. After a brief moment of shock, the gray-haired priest finally could not hold back: “Then the Sunspawn has fallen?! How did it die? Was it something deep inside the dream…”

“I do not know,” the Saint said. “I only saw its radiance suddenly go out at the end of its fate, and vast shadows spread out from the place where it went dark. Even now, those shadows are still spreading toward us.”

The upper priests looked at one another. After a short silence, one of them spoke hesitantly: “You mean… after the Sunspawn fell, the shadows that killed it are still chasing us?”

“A haze hangs over our fate,” the Saint said slowly. “It has yet to disperse.”

“We are already far from all city-states and main routes,” another upper priest said hesitantly. “And we have successfully avoided the patrol fleets of the four major churches along the border…”

Another priest spoke up at once: “I do not know what the Four Gods’ dogs have been doing lately. They gathered a large part of their fleets near the eastern border, which has greatly weakened the patrol forces in the other border seas. We passed through very smoothly. We should be able to return to the ‘Holy Land’ soon…”

Yet another priest agreed: “‘The Holy Land’ is shrouded in thick fog along the border, and our Lord’s divine blessing rests there. Even the Pilgrimage Ark of the Four Gods’ dogs cannot break through…”

The upper priests all began to speak, but the “Saint” on the platform stayed silent. Gradually, the voices around the platform faded, and the priests wisely shut their mouths.

“‘He’ is coming.”

After who knew how long, the Saint’s deep voice suddenly reached everyone’s ears.

With those few short words, it was as if an invisible cold wind swept through the entire hall. The wind carried a fear and dread that seemed almost infectious. Even the Oblivion priests, whose hearts were already as cold and hard as black iron, shivered without meaning to.

One upper priest understood the Saint’s meaning almost at once: “You mean… the Ghost who returned from Subspace…”

“How is that possible?! We have not had any dealings with ‘his’ followers since then…” another priest blurted out. “We withdrew from the Nameless One’s dream before it changed any further. We should have already cut all ties with ‘him’…”

The Saint did not respond to those timid and useless voices, full of tension and fear, beside him. He only slowly raised the eyestalks around him. The eyeballs at the ends of those writhing tendrils swept over the hall, and then seemed to look through the walls, surveying the entire ship.

The haze in fate was reflected in his misshapen, swollen eyes. ghostly green flame burned in the shadows and had already begun to appear on the sea’s surface in the near future. He saw death and fear drawing near—in a not-so-distant time, most of the people on this ship would die.

As for the others, the misery in their fate was even worse than death.

He had already smelled, ahead of time, the scent of blood boiling in the flames, and heard the howls that would soon echo out. Yet more desperate than those coming deaths was that the shadows would keep spreading along this route. This ship was not the end, only a stopover for those shadows as they spread.

The Saint slowly withdrew his eyestalks.

In the limited future he could glimpse, he had carefully made many choices. Those choices had given him ever greater power and made this ship a symbol of the Lord’s will. But this time, he found that no matter what he chose, that haze followed closely behind in fate.

Whether it was ending the operation in the Nameless One’s dream ahead of time, changing the course of this “Holy Ship”, or sealing off the aura of the entire vessel, he could not shake off that terrible future.

Those shadows had surrounded him and everyone else. It even felt… as if they were already on this ship.

[Already on this ship?]

In the Bone Crown on the platform, the swollen, writhing brain suddenly froze for a moment. Then the living tissue around it slowly relaxed.

With that flash of understanding in his heart, the Saint noticed that the shadows everywhere had begun to weaken. On the sea not far away, the ghostly green flames that had risen from the darkness seemed to be slowly fading.

"…I have caught you," he muttered softly.

One upper priest reacted at once: "What have you discovered?"

"…Go and bring everyone who has entered the Nameless One's dream to the hall," the Saint said slowly. At the same time, some of his eyes watched as the haze shrouding the ship and the breath of death from the future kept weakening. "Especially anyone who has been in contact with that girl who once traveled with the Abyssal Hound… Richard, yes, bring him here… Do not startle him, do not let him grow wary. Use mental guidance to slowly draw him over."

The haze in the hall faded away completely. The sense of death coming from every part of the ship weakened sharply, and on the sea in the near future, the ghost-green flames sank back into the shadows.

The shadows really were on the ship. Once again, he had sensed that tiny "turning point" in fate—he had made the right choice and gained a good result.

One upper priest quickly left the assembly hall to carry out the Saint's order.

Then the Saint on the platform fell silent for a moment and gave another order: "Also, have the ship stop."

The haze in fate had scattered for now, yet a strange unease still lay in his heart. It seemed that things would not end so simply. That Ghost who had returned from Subspace… might not be so easy to shake off.

Driven by necessary caution, the Saint decided to stay on this stretch of sea for now. Until he was sure all hidden dangers had been cleared away, he could not let this ship draw any closer to the Holy Land…

One minute later, Richard woke from a short and chaotic nightmare.

A cold wind from who knew where blew past his neck. Faint whispers, too quiet to make out, came from the corners of the room. The scenes from the nightmare had already faded from his mind, and he could not remember what he had just dreamed. He only felt a lingering, hangover-like flutter in his heart that slowly ebbed away, turning into a hazy impression as time passed.

“She is coming to visit…”

A vague voice sounded, as if it had risen up from inside his own mind.

Richard sat straight up in bed.

Soft, blurry whispers came from every corner of the room. The lamplight flickered on the wall not far away and cast many strange, mottled shadows, like crisscrossing mycelium, or like an invisible spiderweb covering the whole cabin.

“Time to welcome the Mistress… my lovely little doll…”

The small voice spoke softly again.

Richard blinked slowly. The numbness and dullness in his head seemed to fade bit by bit. He got out of bed and walked slowly to the cabinet at the side. After he opened it and rummaged inside for a while, he finally found what he needed.

It was a big roll of paper and several pencils.

These were the materials he used on normal days to practice tracing runes.

He looked quietly at these things for a few seconds, and a small smile finally appeared on Richard’s face. He hugged the paper and pencils to his chest and walked back to the bed. Without hesitating, he tossed his bedding and quilt onto the floor beside him and spread the big roll of paper directly over the flat bedboard.

“They are coming to find you… do not waste time.”

Richard softly repeated the whisper in his mind. With a smile at the corners of his mouth, he bent over the bed with a pencil in hand and began to draw with practiced ease.

The beautiful face of a lady appeared in his mind and slowly took shape on the paper.

Chapter 655: Invasion

The Mistress was coming, on this cold afternoon.

The soft rustle of the pencil sweeping over the paper filled the room. Lines of different depth and shade stretched and linked across the sheet as if they had a life of their own, slowly forming an image. Richard threw himself completely into this “welcome”, and a feeling of peace and expectation slowly filled his every thought.

Without him noticing, the cold faded away. The strange emptiness that had kept appearing in him lately also vanished. A smile appeared on his face, and there was only one thought left in his mind, only one image—she was about to arrive.

That beautiful lady, that Mistress he had never met. He admired her and joyfully looked forward to her visit… Would the Mistress like this place? Would she like how he had arranged everything? Would she smile and reward her little doll’s loyalty?

Rustle, rustle… The pencil moved lightly over the white paper. The Mistress’s gentle gaze came from the page, smiling as she looked at him.

A rush of excitement rose in him, but Richard’s hands were steadier than ever, and faster than ever. He did not even remember when he had gained such high skill in drawing, able to sketch these beautiful lines so quickly. In the end, he even picked up another pencil in his left hand. Both hands moved so fast that they seemed to leave faint afterimages…

But then footsteps suddenly came from the corridor. Thump, thump, thump, thump. They were as fast as a heartbeat and brought an annoying disturbance.

“They are coming for you, my lovely little doll…”

The light voice in his mind blew past like the wind, with a faint hiss hidden inside it.

That annoying, familiar cold feeling returned. Richard felt a wave of irritation rise in his heart. Someone was coming to bother him, to disrupt the moment when he and the Mistress would meet. They were almost at the door—but he had not finished drawing yet.

He sped up again. His hands danced over the paper, but the annoying footsteps arrived even sooner than he had thought.

The footsteps stopped at the door. Almost without a pause, someone knocked.

The pounding on the door felt as if it was hitting his heart. The sound echoed through the small room. At first it was still gentle, but in the blink of an eye it turned urgent.

“Richard, are you in there?” a voice came from outside the door. It sounded tense and awkwardly “polite”. “The Saint has called a meeting. Everyone is to go to the assembly hall.”

[Do not go. It is a trap.]

A warning rang in Richard’s mind at once. He could no longer tell if it was Rabby’s voice or just his own thoughts. He naturally ignored the voice at the door and kept pouring all of himself into the drawing in front of him.

The silence in the room led to even more frantic knocking. Bang, bang, bang—the sounds came quickly from the door. The person in the corridor slapped the door with force and raised his voice: “Richard, we know you are in there. This meeting is very important. You are not still lazing in bed, are you?”

[Just a little more, just a little more.]

Richard frowned hard. His arms shook as if in a spasm. The Mistress seemed to wink at him. In the black-and-white drawing, those eyes were already as lively as a real creature’s.

But it was still not enough. He still had a few of the most important strokes left…

The knocking suddenly stopped. After a short pause came a heavy crash.

“Bang—crash!”

The flimsy wooden door was thrown open with force. Richard’s movements froze for just a moment—and in that brief instant, someone had already rushed into the room. A huge Abyssal Hound leaped from midair and slammed him to the floor.

[Did the last stroke fall in the right place?]

Richard struggled hard, trying to lift his head for a look, but the strength of the Abyssal Hound kept him from moving at all. He pushed against the floor with all his might, but only hoarse, strange grunts and growls came from his throat, and his head filled with furious anger—

He hated Abyssal Hounds. He hated these rough, violent monsters.

Someone grabbed his arm from the side and quickly tied it with rope. Then another person stuffed something into his mouth to keep him from using the power of spells. The people who had rushed into the room dragged Richard up from the floor, snatched his pencils away, and roughly pulled him toward the door.

The moment he left the room, Richard gave up resisting. His thoughts seemed to break off. His head felt stuffed with cotton. Like a walking corpse, he let several “comrades” hold him up by the arms and walked silently down the corridor.

“Wait,” one of the Annihilators holding Richard’s arm suddenly stopped. He looked up at another cultist walking beside them: “What was he doing when we rushed into the room just now?”

“It looked like he was drawing,” the other Annihilator said with a frown as he tried to remember. “There was a big sheet of paper spread on the bed, but I did not see what he was drawing.”

“…Something feels wrong. I will go back and take a look.”

The Annihilator who had spoken first said this quickly, then turned and ran back to the room they had just left. He stepped over the broken door and hurried to Richard’s bed, looking at the big sheet of paper spread over the board.

It was only a blank sheet of paper.

The Annihilator frowned. For some reason, he felt a touch of unease. Driven by that uneasy feeling, he lifted his head and quickly scanned the room—but found nothing.

The cultist let out a vague grunt in his throat. Out of caution, he bent down, picked up the blank sheet, rolled it up, and tucked it under his arm as he went back into the corridor.

“It is just a blank sheet,” he said to the others waiting in the corridor. “Let us go.”

A blank sheet.

Richard, whose shoulders were held down and whose movements were controlled by his “comrades”, raised his head a little slowly. With a confused look in his eyes, he glanced at the blank roll of paper that the somewhat familiar man across from him was showing. After staring at it in a daze for a while, a slight smile finally appeared on his face.

However, no one noticed his smile.

The messy footsteps faded away down the corridor.

More footsteps soon sounded in other parts of the ship.

The Annihilators who had received the Saint’s orders were already moving. These priests were now walking through long, dim corridors with freshly prepared lists in their hands. They hurriedly knocked on door after door and took every “comrade” who had once entered the Nameless One’s dream out of their rooms.

A tense mood began to spread through the whole ship. Some people sensed that something was off. Some noticed that the ship had stopped moving at some point. Those who had not been taken away secretly gathered in their rooms, nervously talking and guessing about what had happened. Those who had been taken were already arriving at the assembly hall one after another.

The Saint on the high platform in the center of the hall fell into a short daze. Long hours spent peeking at fate had left his mind tired. He suddenly felt a little nostalgic for the past, for the time when he still had a human body. That shell had been filthy and weak, but at least then he could lie comfortably on a bed, and his head had not been filled all the time with hidden whispers and chaotic screams…

He sank into this trance as his memories slowly wove themselves into a hazy veil. In the depths of that veil, it seemed as if an eternal peace was beckoning to him.

That “peace” was a tall shadow burning with ghostly green flame.

The Saint woke with a start from this warning born of fate. Every nerve and vessel twitched and sent a burning pain through him.

“Saint,” a voice came from beside him. An upper priest was reporting: “Everyone you asked for has been brought here.”

The Saint raised his eyestalks. His gaze swept over the cultists gathered in the hall, some fearful, some confused.

Shadows so thick they could not be parted shrouded the entire hall.

The haze of fate blocked all his sight.

“Intruders have boarded the ship!”

…

Only after everyone had left did a faint, almost unnoticeable airflow suddenly stir in Richard’s room—and then a figure abruptly appeared beside the bed.

It was as if a “picture” that had been lying flat on some surface suddenly “flipped” and “stood up”. Lucretia’s figure rose out of the air.

She had been standing in front of that Annihilator the whole time, at the closest point less than half a meter away—she had just been turned sideways.

A picture had no thickness. Eyes in three-dimensional space could not see an “image” that lay parallel to their line of sight.

Lucretia let out a soft breath and looked at her own hands. Then she casually picked up the pencil that had been tossed aside and drew a few lines on her palm.

Then she waved her hand, and her “thin” figure changed from a flat image with no thickness into a normal, solid body.

She turned her head and glanced at the empty floor: “Rabby, I know you are in the room.”

Almost as soon as she finished speaking, a sharp voice like that of a little girl suddenly rang out in the room: “Ah, ah, ah! The Mistress is here! Rabby is coming out right away!”

With that high, childish voice, countless white bits of fluff suddenly appeared in every corner of the room!

From the shadows in the corners, the gaps in the furniture, the holes in the ceiling, the cracks in the floor—in every place where “fibers” could hide—countless tufts of cotton rushed out. It was as if the room itself was wildly pushing out foreign matter. In the blink of an eye, the cotton filled Lucretia’s view, then quickly gathered in the center of the room and slowly turned into a rabbit-shaped form made entirely of cotton balls, with no “skin” on the outside.

Next, the rabbit-shaped cotton mass started to “turn inside out”. Colorful cloth pieces crawled out from its belly and wrapped around it in an instant, turning it into a large, creepy-looking stuffed rabbit doll.

The scary doll swayed in place twice, then leaped at Lucretia in high spirits: “Rabby is here, Rabby is here! Welcome, welcome, a warm—”

“Be quiet,” Lucretia said coldly, catching the rabbit in midair with one hand. “Stay silent.”

Chapter 656: Longing for Cotton

The ship was very quiet. Apart from the gentle sound of broken waves slapping now and then through the open windows, the only noise in the cabin was the faint hum from the distant engine room and pipes. Most people seemed to have left this area. Even the ones who stayed were probably sitting carefully and quietly in their rooms at this time.

This quiet could almost give someone the illusion of being “safe”. If not for the faint smell of blood that drifted by from time to time, some reckless, clueless visitor might never guess that this was a lair occupied by a group of cultists.

But Lucretia knew that her “visit” had probably already been noticed by the master of this ship.

She could feel a wave of hostility aimed at her spreading across the ship. A powerful sense of perception was sweeping again and again through every corridor and every cabin.

She raised the small Conductor’s Baton in her hand and traced a few glowing symbols in the air. For the moment, they cut off the flow of her aura.

The rabbit Rabby stood carefully at her side. This creepy-looking doll was now nervously glancing around. After watching for a long time, it finally could not help but whisper: “Old Master didn’t come with you?”

Lucretia lowered her head and glanced at it: “You want to see him right now?”

The rabbit shivered at once: “No no no, Rabby is just a bit curious. Rabby doesn’t want to…”

“Father will come later, but I have to come first to help him clean up this filthy place.” Lucretia found the rabbit’s reaction amusing, but she did not keep teasing it. “He needs some living Annihilators for a certain… communication ritual. But if he descended here directly, I’m afraid there would be no survivors left.”

The stuffed rabbit listened half-understanding. After a while it suddenly blurted out: “Oh oh, Rabby remembers. The demons around ordinary Annihilators would be scared to death by Old Master, right?”

“…You do manage to remember a few useful things.”

“Rabby is very smart!” The stuffed rabbit instantly became proud. Then its tone changed, turning mysterious and eager to show off: “If that’s the case, Rabby has a suggestion…”

“Suggestion?”

“Maybe we only need to keep that ‘saint’ alive… From Rabby’s observation, that ‘saint’ has already eaten his symbiotic pact demons. He won’t die even if he sees Old Master…”

Lucretia raised her eyebrows.

…

Something had come aboard the ship. Shadows were spreading across the decks. A disturbing presence flashed in and out of perception. Some areas deep in the cabins were slowly slipping out of contact, and among the congregants moving about the ship… some of them were starting to act wrong.

In the bright, wide, and splendid assembly hall, Annihilators were gathering. More and more people were receiving the Saint's summons. These uneasy dark believers hurried in from all directions, whispering under the heavy air and carefully talking over the current situation.

Another dozen or so cultists were singled out and isolated. They were brought to the platform where the Saint stood. Ropes soaked with alchemical potions tied up each of them, and heavy collars to suppress symbiotic pact demons were fastened around their necks.

Several heavily armed priests stood not far away, clearly in charge of guarding these bound cultists.

The surrounding looks could not help but fall on those tied-up "companions". Whispers rose around them, guessing what kind of mistake these people had made to end up bound like this in front of the Saint.

Someone recognized that all the bound ones were "dreamwalking personnel" who had taken part in the Nameless One's Dream operation earlier. When people linked this with the fresh rumors that had just spread through the ship today, about the Nameless One's Dream and the Sunspawn, the hushed discussions grew even more tense and uneasy.

Richard only felt the whispering around him grow noisy and harsh.

The dull buzzing sounded like countless little files scraping his skull. It slowly turned into sharp noise and meaningless howls. He could no longer pick out the words in those sounds, nor understand their meaning. A cold feeling spread deeper and deeper through his veins, making him more and more irritable. What unsettled him even more… was that ever since a while ago, he could no longer hear that small but comforting voice in his mind.

[Where did Rabby go?]

He sluggishly raised his head and looked at Dumont, who was bound beside him. Dumont happened to lift his head as well and turned his eyes this way.

Dumont's gaze also held doubt and confusion. He opened his mouth toward Richard, but no words came out, as if something were stuck in his throat. Between his teeth, Richard could vaguely see some white fluff.

"You brought something onto the ship…"

The Saint's voice finally rang out from the platform. That chilling pressure locked straight onto Richard, Dumont, and the others.

"Where did you hide it?"

Among the dozen Annihilators who were tied up, a few trembled slightly, as if instinct still let them fear the Saint's pressure. The rest, however, stood completely still, as if they had lost all sense of danger and of anyone above them – as if the nerves and flesh that should have reacted to fear no longer existed inside those skins.

The black bones crisscrossing the Saint's body clicked and clacked. Each tap of bone on bone sounded like it could strike the soul itself. In that chain of clicks, Richard's tottering sanity seemed to recover a little. He finally remembered who he was, and then another doubt rose up – why was he tied?

He hesitantly lifted his head and looked toward the platform.

A harsh, commanding voice came from above: "What did you see in the Nameless One's Dream? What did you touch? What did you do after you returned?"

Richard's mind worked with great effort. In his dazed fog, the last spark of thought finally flared to life.

"It was the witch in the sea, that witch and her servant!"

He thought he shouted that.

In reality, he only jerked his mouth open. After a few rough, hoarse huffing sounds, he spat out a large clump of cotton in front of everyone.

More cotton still clogged his throat, so he could not form a single word.

The last spark faded. Richard lowered his head and stared blankly at the white fluff on the floor – cotton. Precious cotton.

“My cotton… my cotton… my cotton!”

A string of meaningless mutters came from his cotton-stuffed throat. Richard hurriedly threw himself forward, trying to snatch back that precious cotton. The ropes tied around his body threw him off balance. He almost fell flat, then twisted and writhed on the floor in a crazed, crooked posture, desperately trying to grab those damp clumps of cotton with his mouth.

Thud, thud.

Several other figures toppled over as well.

Dumont, Wesson, Sulock… all the ones who had once entered the Nameless One’s Dream with Richard dropped onto the floor. The deadly pull of the cotton was something they could not resist. They howled, muttered, and struggled, fighting with all their might over the cotton Richard had just spat out.

[Don’t steal my cotton! Don’t steal my cotton!]

Richard roared in his heart. He rammed his head hard against Dumont, pushing him aside, only for Wesson to clamp down on his ear with a fierce bite. They began to tear and bite each other for the sake of the cotton. All reason and feeling had faded, leaving only the instinct to snatch the cotton.

The hall burst into an uproar. Even the dark cultists whose hearts were as cold as iron could not stay calm in front of such a bizarre and horrifying scene. They watched their dozen former “companions” thrash and writhe on the floor while still bound by ropes, watched them tear into each other while letting out mangled, broken howls. Cotton kept spurting from the wounds they bit open – like some living parasitic creature made of fibers.

“Execute them!” a shout rang down from the platform.

Bang bang bang.

At the Saint’s order, someone finally reacted. Several gunshots thundered through the hall. The armed priests serving as wardens started firing their large-caliber revolvers at Richard and the others. Right after that, others began calling on the power of their symbiotic pact demons, hurling magic bullets, lightning, and clouds of acid at their former “companions”, who were clearly no longer human.

Richard and Dumont’s bodies were torn apart with ease by these attacks. Their fragile skin split like old rags, ripping with harsh tearing sounds. Cotton billowed from their bodies in drifting clouds, with not a trace of blood or flesh.

In the blink of an eye, the dozen Annihilators parasitized by “cotton” lost their lives.

Yet after only a few seconds of silence, the cotton that had poured out of their bodies suddenly started wriggling again. The clumps began to devour and tear at each other, as if the obsession these people had for grabbing cotton still churned inside the fluff. As the cotton gnawed and ripped at itself, some light, drifting things rose from the pile.

They were spores, as fine as dust.

The spores billowed up like a thin mist and began to spread through the hall.

Even the dullest person felt a huge sense of danger and terror when they saw that hazy cloud of spores.

But the spores had only floated a short distance when they seemed to hit an invisible barrier. A powerful force quickly drove them back down into the cotton heap.

On the platform, the Saint opened his black bony cage that looked like a crown and a prison. Tendrils reached out from the giant brain within and waved in the air.

The drifting spores were all caught. A burst of fierce flame then flared into existence, burning up the pile of cotton that was still frantically writhing and heaving.

Chapter 657: Boarding

The cotton caught fire and in an instant turned into a great blaze. Along with the drifting spores, it burned down to ash. Then the flames quickly went out. Only now did the cultists gathered in the hall finally breathe out in relief.

That strange and horrifying scene, and those spores that so clearly meant to spread and infect, had filled every sane person with a sense of enormous danger.

But while the ordinary congregants relaxed a little, the gloomy pressure from the platform did not fade at all. The Saint lightly clicked his bony “crown” against itself. His eyestalks still swept uneasily over the hall and beyond. He knew the shadow hanging over this ship was still there. What he had just destroyed was only a sliver of that shadow that had seeped in many days ago. The true body of that sliver had already completed its invasion…

He had moved too slowly.

“Do not relax too soon. Uninvited guests have already come aboard,” his voice sank into every heart. “From now on, the whole ship is under hostile cultist invasion alert… Lentim, take people to search the entire ship and find the intruders. If anyone refuses to be searched or acts suspicious, kill them on the spot.

“Gomoro, take people to the engine room and seize control of the steam core and the main valves. The intruders may try to take the ship’s core…

take nitroglycerin with you.

“Persha, take your followers to the armory and arm all the ordinary congregants… let those mortal sailors take up weapons as well.

“Basmodon, take people to control the deck guns. The enemy may also attack from the sea.”

The Saint’s sudden string of orders snapped the Annihilators in the hall back to full alert less than a few seconds after they had relaxed. Everyone understood how serious things were. The priests who received orders quickly gathered their subordinates and hurried out of the hall.

The number of people in the hall dropped by about half at once, but many priests still stayed in the assembly space, forming layers of protection around the platform where the Saint stood.

After thinking rapidly for a while, the Saint raised his eyestalks again and looked at the high-ranking priest closest to him: “Eric, take people and execute all the sacrificial victims in the cages.”

The high-ranking priest named Eric froze: “Now?”

“I need fresh blood to strengthen myself. These intruders are far from ordinary. This is not the time to worry about squeezing out the greatest value,” the Saint said calmly. Giving execution orders was as natural to him as breathing. “We can capture new sacrificial victims later. For now, execute all the ones on the ship. Drain their blood and soak the deepest stone slabs of the cages. I need to gather strength and prepare for a final battle.”

“Yes, my Saint.”

Eric bowed his head at once. After accepting the order, he took several of his followers and quickly left the assembly hall.

His hurried steps carried him into the corridor that led deeper into the ship. He rushed past rows of tightly closed doors and down one connecting stairway after another toward the deeper, quieter cabins.

Thin, cool smoke had somehow seeped into the ship from somewhere. It made the corridor look faintly blurred.

“High priest,” one follower suddenly spoke, uneasy as he broke the silence, “this smoke isn’t right…”

“It really isn’t. Under normal conditions, how could there be so much smoke on the ship?” Eric frowned. Behind him, a shifting phantom floated in the air. Black chains stretched out from his spine, and at the end of those chains drifted a black creature like a shapeless lump of flesh. Many eyes opened across its surface, as if it were cautiously watching the surroundings. “…It’s too quiet.”

It was far too quiet. The whole corridor lay in stillness. No sound came from the nearby rooms. Only faint noise from some machine far away could be heard – distant and hazy, like it came from another world.

Where were the people he had sent out earlier to carry out orders? Wasn’t the whole ship supposed to be in the middle of a massive search?

Thin smoke drifted toward them from ahead. Eric suddenly twitched his nose. In the smoke, he smelled a familiar scent. Gunpowder.

Faint sounds suddenly came from some direction. Right after that, someone began giving orders from deep inside the smoke.

“Take your positions! Form up, load, aim -”

It sounded like a military commander shouting to his soldiers.

Eric turned his head in shock toward the source of the voice. With the help of his symbiotic pact “flesh aberrant” demon, he was the first to find it – a squad of toy soldiers, as if carved from wood, was setting up formations on the floor at the far end of the corridor.

The soldiers were only palm-sized. Bright paints covered their bodies, and they wore uniforms like the musketeers and artillerymen of a past age. They ran back and forth across the floor. Some waved tiny flags as they dashed through the ranks, and some stood on higher spots blowing small trumpets. A commander stood on a block of wood dragged from who knew where, raising his command saber high as he gave his orders.

The musketeers were loading their “rifles”, which looked like matchsticks.

The other Annihilation Priests also noticed the toy soldiers gathering on the floor and preparing to “attack” in an oddly proper way. The scene was so strange that at first they could not even react. Some of them even felt it looked ridiculous and funny.

That feeling of humor lasted less than a second. In the next instant, everyone’s heart jolted in alarm. On the Boundless Sea, anything that looked wrong meant danger, even if it looked like a bunch of silly toy soldiers.

Eric suddenly remembered something. A legend about these toy soldiers flashed through his mind. He threw himself forward at once: “Down!”

His warning came a step too late. From the end of the smoke came the commander’s order: “Fire!”

Bang bang bang, bang bang bang.

Gunfire roared again and again in the corridor. Muzzle flashes tore through the smoke, and bullets screamed toward them. One Annihilator after another was riddled by the storm of bullets before they could even summon their symbiotic pact demons. One by one, they fell to the ground.

It was said that long ago, a foolish city-state had tried to challenge the Witch at sea, hoping to “kill the curse spreading over the Boundless Sea”.

An arrogant commander led his battle-hardened marines to surround the place where the Witch was staying for a time and launched an attack under cover of night.

Mist rolled in with the darkness. The attacking soldiers vanished one after another into the fog. When the Sun rose again, the Witch had turned them into one hundred and sixty-six toy soldiers.

To this day, that corps of toy soldiers was still imprisoned in the Witch’s shadows. When the Witch needed them, they would be freed for a short time and would wield the strength of a real army…

Blood was pouring from Eric’s body. The sharp pain was slowly turning into a numb cold. He lay on the floor, his mind helplessly recalling the story he had heard one day in the past. In the corner of his eye, he finally noticed odd things along the corridor – details he should have seen earlier, but for some reason had ignored.

Many oil paintings hung on both sides of the dim corridor.

Before this, those paintings had all shown the Abyssal Lord’s many avatar forms, along with images of demons and scenes from the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea.

Now the content of the paintings had changed.

Many familiar faces gazed sadly and painfully from the canvases at this smoke-filled corridor. Some of them… seemed as if they had still been slowly blinking up until a minute ago.

There was no response at all from the people who had been sent out.

The gloom crouched over the ship grew thicker and thicker, with no sign of fading.

On the platform in the center of the assembly hall, the Saint sank into a long silence, thinking, while anger and despair slowly brewed beneath the calm.

He realized he might have made a whole series of wrong choices.

All his earlier arrangements had not stopped the shadows from spreading. On the contrary, he was losing his “sense” of more and more sections of the ship.

A tense, uneasy mood was spreading through the hall.

The ordinary priests who had stayed behind here also began to notice that something was very wrong.

Those who had left the hall did not return, nor did any report come back. One internal phone line after another failed to connect. Even using Abyssal demons to sense, they still could not reach their “companions” in other areas. First they lost contact with the cargo hold and the water tanks. Then the cabins where the crew members lived. After that, even the nearby corridors…

It was as if the various compartments were slowly vanishing into a spreading darkness. Apart from this hall, the whole ship was being swallowed by something unseen.

Something formless was attacking this place.

Then something even more dangerous touched the ship. A huge, groundless terror fell over everyone’s minds.

There seemed to be movement in the corridor.

A cultist standing closest to the main doors heard faint crackling sounds from the hallway outside. He looked left and right, hesitated a moment, then gathered his courage and stuck his head out to look.

Someone beside him noticed what he was doing and rushed over to grab his arm, trying to stop this reckless move.

They were too late.

The cultist who had stuck his head out suddenly went stiff. He swayed slightly in place, then “walked” backward in a stiff, doll-like way and stepped back into the hall. After a brief pause, he fell flat on his back.

His arms and legs shattered like fragile porcelain. At some point, his body had already turned into lifeless inorganic matter. As he fell, his head came free from the joint at his neck and rolled to the feet of the other cultists.

It was a crude doll’s head.

Cries of shock burst out at once. Then came the sounds of blades leaving their sheaths and weapons being cocked, rising and falling all around. Many Abyssal demons were summoned again. In that instant of panic and fear, the cultists in the hall scrambled to prepare for battle, while footsteps echoed in the corridor and drew closer and closer to the doors.

A silver-haired lady in a deep purple, luxurious court dress was the first to walk in. She had a doll-like, flawless face. Her posture was light and graceful. She simply walked straight into the assembly hall. The gathered Annihilators, Abyssal demons, and all those blades and guns around her were nothing in her eyes. She only looked around curiously. Her deep purple eyes were clear and bright, and deep inside them, it was as if countless invisible threads were reflected.

Another unusually tall figure followed her in.

This figure was like a nightmare that had seeped into the Mortal Realm and branded itself into everyone’s sight. Just by stepping into the hall, he had already begun to scorch the sanity and nerves of more than half the Annihilators present.

Duncan lifted his head. In the ghostly green flames that were slowly spreading out around him, he gazed at the “Saint” on the platform.

“You and your ship are useful to me.”

Chapter 658:

ghostly green flame surged like a suddenly rising tide, flooding into the vast assembly hall in an instant and spreading toward every Abyssal Deep cultist present—it was as if this fire had been brewing and building on the ship for who knew how long, and when it rose it even roared like wind and thunder.

Shouts of alarm and furious roars erupted from all directions. Almost all the Abyssal demons reacted the moment the eerie green flame appeared. The weaker demons entered a runaway state on the spot, and even the stronger ones, driven by terror and instinct, refused to obey the orders of their symbiotic pact partners. Pitch-black Abyssal Deep rifts formed in the air above the hall. The cultists and priests being dragged away by the demons howled as they vanished into those runaway state rifts—the handful of “lucky” ones left behind had no choice but to hastily face the enemy who had suddenly barged in.

Chaotic gunshots rang out, and a few feeble spells fell toward where Duncan and Alice were standing.

But the flame stood like a wall. These weak attacks lost all strength before they could even get close. Bullets turned ghost-green in the fire and fell harmlessly to the floor. The missiles and acid conjured with demonic power turned into fresh flames in midair and whipped back the way they had come.

Alice stared wide-eyed at the thrilling scene. Strange and twisted demons filled the hall, along with cultists driven mad by terror, but Alice did not feel afraid at all—she had followed the captain here to “watch the fun”, and things were indeed lively.

Very soon, though, she felt it was all a bit too noisy.

She looked toward the loudest part of the hall, frowned, and lifted her hand in a beckoning motion. Invisible threads drifted down into her palm. Before they left, the captain had told her that everyone in this hall was a cultist, and cultists did not count as people.

So, with this doll girl as the center, countless Annihilators suddenly went rigid and froze in place, then began turning into dolls one after another.

But just then, a low sound like drumbeats suddenly came from the center of the hall. A vast power burst out in an instant. It even briefly suppressed the spirit form fire spreading through the hall and brought Alice’s doll control to a halt.

The Saint on the dais finally moved. His eyestalks lifted high. Countless crisscrossing black bones clicked around the huge brain like folded limbs, then unfolded outward to stretch and brace themselves. The skeletal body that had looked like a bony cage quickly changed into a spider-like shape, and that horrifying brain now sat on the center of this bone spider’s back. It swayed, and from the swelling, writhing blood vessels came a constant “thump, thump” that sounded like both drumbeats and a heartbeat.

Duncan watched in some astonishment as the Saint rose from the platform, the bone spider clinging to the edge and sending a string of chaotic hissing noises toward them.

His expression was surprised—because he had not thought the thing on the platform could get any uglier.

Before he had time to make a comment, Duncan and Alice heard the terrified, despairing screams of Annihilation Priests dying all around the hall.

They were the cultists who had withstood the first wave of demon runaway states, had luckily escaped the first blast of flame, and had barely survived Alice's doll transformation. As they howled, their bodies suddenly began to swell. Their human forms twisted in the blink of an eye into all sorts of horrifying shapes. Countless swelling, crawling traces writhed under their skin, as if another body had appeared inside them, out of control, trying to burst out of their flesh.

In the blink of an eye, the cultists' bodies ripped themselves apart and collapsed into piles of flesh on the floor. As they died, the demons tied to them through symbiotic pacts began to collapse and fall apart one after another.

But those collapsing demons did not simply vanish.

They turned into drifting black smoke and poured toward the air above the central dais.

"The Saint" raised his black bone limbs on the dais. The black smoke released by the Abyssal demons when they died rushed into the swelling, writhing brain and was greedily absorbed. His size doubled in the blink of an eye, and an even stronger aura leaked out of the brain, faintly forming a barrier around the dais like warped space.

"…You killed your last followers the first chance you got," Duncan said, looking at the dais with some surprise. "That really was unexpected."

"The weak are useless here… They would only become fuel for your flames or sacrifices to Anomaly 099," the Saint rasped from the dais. His bone limbs clicked as he slowly crawled down to the floor. "Better to turn them into my strength… I will fight you to the death in their place…"

Duncan could not be bothered to listen to his rambling. Halfway through, he raised his hand. The spirit form fire in the hall, which had been briefly suppressed, surged up again in an instant and spread toward the dais.

“You have dug up quite a bit of information,” he said casually. “But I still advise you to cooperate. My request is simple—I just want to talk to your ‘Lord’… and, if possible, I want to know where this ship is headed.”

“So that’s it… You really are dangerous to us, ‘Captain Duncan’,” the Saint said. He moved his long limbs forward, forcing back the fire’s corruption as he came. “All the more reason not to let you have your way… O Holy Lord, grant me Your divine blessing!”

The monstrous bone spider gave a low growl. Space around him seemed to twist for a moment. The spirit form flames that had almost set him alight were forced back again for an instant. At once he leaped high, hurling himself at Duncan, who commanded this sea of fire, as if ready to die together.

“The time for martyrdom has come!!”

This twisted, terrifying monster shouted in fanatical zeal. With shocking power he drove back all the flames spreading into the air. He was like a jet-black meteor, fearlessly crashing down toward the “Subspace Shadows” that filled the world with dread!

Duncan spread his hand toward the monster. The spirit form fire that had been forced back closed together in the air in the path of the falling body, ready to swallow the bone spider completely in the next instant.

But the Saint suddenly veered in midair.

At an almost impossible angle, the monster plunged straight down. With a deafening crash, he smashed through the hall floor, opening a huge hole. He dropped straight into it and began furiously tearing through the decks below, disappearing from Duncan and Alice's sight in the blink of an eye.

Duncan: "…?"

Alice: "…?"

Things happened too fast. Never mind Alice's wooden head—even Duncan did not react in time.

After all, he had seen people die as martyrs before, and he had seen fanatical cultists too. But this was his first time seeing someone quit halfway through martyrdom. In a world where the Gods truly existed, could a zealot on the level of a Saint really leave his own "Lord" hanging?

Alice turned her head in confusion to glance at Duncan, then at the big hole in the center of the hall, its edges still wreathed in ghostly flame. At last she asked: "Did it run away?"

Run away? Out here on the vast Boundless Sea, on a ship already completely burned and corrupted by spirit flame, where could that "Saint" possibly run?

Duncan frowned. The thunderous sounds of decks and walls being torn apart and support structures snapping still came constantly from below. All at once, he understood.

"No, that guy isn't running… He's going to destroy the ship!"

Digging, digging, always downward. The engine room lay just ahead.

As fast as possible, as fast as possible, before that ghost captain reacted, before the roaring spirit form flames caught up to him.

He was almost at the bottom of the ship. Beyond the last layers of flooring and walls, past the piping zone… that was where the nitroglycerin he had ordered sent down earlier was stored.

As long as he detonated the nitroglycerin at the steam core, the chain reaction after the reactor boiler went into a runaway state would be enough to destroy the whole ship. Then… the “Holy Land” would be safe.

The huge, terrifying bone spider dug rapidly through the vast ship. Following his memory, he ripped open steel plates, pipes, and bulkheads along the way. This ship, built at great expense and once regarded by the Cult as a symbol of pride, was being quickly ruined by his digging, turned into a heap of irreparable scrap.

But the “Saint” did not hesitate at all. He only sped up, carving an ever faster path through the steel beast’s belly.

In his glimpses of fate, he had long since seen his own death, and the deaths of everyone else.

The weak congregants would die wailing, their flesh burning in the flames. He himself could not survive either, because the gloom had already covered every path. When you were still on the edge of the Shadows, changing course might have helped. But when the whole ship was already deep in endless darkness, choosing a different direction no longer mattered.

It was unwise to fight that ghost captain. In the clearest glimpse of fate, the Saint had seen himself defeated quickly and pointlessly.

Since the ending was fixed, he might as well do something bolder.

At the very least, he could not let this ship fall into that “captain’s” hands. He could not let anyone learn the secret of the “Holy Land”. Otherwise his sins would be unforgivable.

The last wall collapsed before him with a crash.

The cabin in the deep layers that housed the steam core finally appeared before him.

The bone spider almost stumbled as he burst into the space and landed on a platform ringed by pipes, valves, and control stations.

He raised the many eyestalks at the edge of his body and swept his gaze around the chamber.

As he had expected, no congregants were alive here. Only a few corpses lay on the open floor nearby, and around the control consoles and valves he could see twisted human-shaped Shadows “printed” onto the surfaces of the machinery.

The “Saint” did not “mourn” his fallen kin.

He had already found what he wanted. The explosives were stacked at the far end of the platform.

Chapter 659:

In the power section at the deepest part of the machinery compartment, all crew members and cultists who had once stood watch here were dead, but the massive steam core assembly still ran on without anyone at the controls.

The reactor boiler let out a low vibration. The pipes and valves around it gave soft hisses now and then under the automatic balancing system. Warning lights for the Boiling Gold catalyst blinked steadily, showing that pressure in the steam core was running high.

At the end of a steel platform a dozen meters from the steam core stood a huge copper column between floor and ceiling. Parts of its casing were cut away, revealing complex gears and linkages constantly turning inside. The precise machinery clacked in a continuous wave. Strips of paper were drawn into a slot at the edge of the column and spat out from another, then were transferred by teleportation to other backup devices or punch-card analyzers.

This expensive, precise Sorting Engine was automatically calculating parameters related to the next stage of the voyage and feeding the data to the machinery compartment. Part of its input and output came directly from the navigation station above. None of this could be allowed to fall into those Subspace Shadows' hands.

The great gloom in fate was gathering. A prophetic vision more frightening than death itself had come: that ghost captain had already reacted, and his wrath was descending on this place.

The huge bone spider hesitated no longer. He swung his long limbs, scuttled quickly up to the copper column, and drove a bone spike straight into the Sorting Engine’s main drive shaft.

The black bone spike was shrouded in a corrosive field. The protective casing of the drive shaft, tightly wrapped in thick copper and steel armor, gave way like paper. The spinning steel shaft inside shrieked in an instant, and the gears and linkages connected to the main shaft suffered a catastrophic breakdown, dragging the following punch-card machines and stored paper tapes into the mess.

The Sorting Engine and the later punch-card analyzers all drew power from the same main shaft. A single breakdown was enough to destroy the entire system. This was a deliberate “safety flaw”, meant so that in an emergency, the ship’s recent voyage records and its control center could be destroyed in the shortest possible time.

But that was not enough. Destroying the Sorting Engine alone would not stop that ghost captain.

As long as the ship could still sail, it could still carry that captain to the “Holy Land”.

What the “Saint” had to do was remove the steam core’s safety limits.

A steam core in active reaction was nearly indestructible. Its heavy shell isolated the Boiling Gold catalyst and reaction medium from the outside world. Even nitroglycerin might not be able to blow apart that sphere. He had to force an emergency shutdown first.

Now the shutdown conditions were met.

As the drive shaft of the Sorting Engine broke with a roar and the gear trains screamed, every mechanical device linked by gears, belts, and rods began to fail in a chain reaction. The steam core’s output flow almost instantly passed the relief valve threshold. Lethal high-temperature, high-pressure steam filled the machinery compartment. The overpressure blast blew the steam core's safety pins, and with creaking noises, the reactor boiler's spherical shell began to descend.

The Boiling Gold catalyst dropped out of the core as the shell lowered, but the searing "fireball" still burned fiercely deep inside the reactor boiler. Its terrifying heat rushed with the flow toward the control platforms—a blast hot enough to steam a living person in an instant.

But to the "Saint", it was only a breeze.

He raised his bone limbs into the "breeze", seized the nearby barrels of nitroglycerin, and charged without hesitation toward the reaction vessel that was pouring out deadly heat and whose interior flames were surging.

[The time for martyrdom had come, the time for martyrdom had come… Blow everything here to pieces. The Holy Lord's work must not be disturbed by that evil spirit returned from Subspace…]

Flames roared in the reactor boiler. The runaway state blaze tottered on the Critical Threshold. A single barrel of nitroglycerin would be enough to give it a "push" at this point and blow the whole ship to pieces.

The Saint lifted the explosives high.

At almost the same moment, the flames inside the reactor boiler suddenly took on a layer of ghostly green light.

A terrifying face appeared inside the reactor boiler. In that storm of flame that was racing into a runaway state, Duncan's upper body slowly rose out of the steam core's torrent of fire. He bent down to stare at the bone spider holding the nitroglycerin barrel up close and asked in a thunderous voice: "You think this will work?"

"Die, Ghost!"

The bone spider roared and hurled the nitroglycerin at the reactor boiler.

A violent explosion followed. In a flash, the entire reaction vessel was caught up in a runaway state detonation of terrifying scale. Duncan’s flame avatar, not yet fully condensed, flickered in the blast, and the surrounding flames that had not yet been corrupted by spirit flame turned into the shock wave, sweeping everything in the compartment into the explosion.

The steam core exploded. The Boiling Gold catalyst triggered a chain reaction at the critical pressure. Amid terrifying thunder and wildly boiling heat waves, the whole ship began to tear apart with the machinery compartment at its center.

In the shock storm, the pitch-black bone spider stretched out his limbs, using every spike to cling desperately to anything nearby. His bone plates ignited in the heat. A shimmering glow spread over the swelling, writhing surface of his brain. His nerves burned away, and the blood in his brain boiled. He was close to death, but a strange, feverish excitement still stirred his mind.

He had succeeded in blowing up the steam core before that ghost captain fully took control of this place.

No one on this ship could survive, including himself—but at least the “Holy Land” was safe.

The lower hull beneath the machinery compartment began to split. Torrents of seawater boiled in the flames, then poured into the ship with a deafening roar.

The “Saint” folded his badly burned eyestalks and quietly waited for death to come.

But death did not come.

At some point, everything around him became quiet.

After a moment of hesitation and confusion, the dying bone spider slowly raised the eyestalks around his brain again. In his blurred, dim vision, burned by heat, he saw a bizarre scene.

Every flame in the machinery compartment was suddenly tinged with ghostly green. The spirit form blaze froze in midair as if time itself had stopped. The shattered pieces of the ship froze as well. Even the surging seawater hung motionless where it was.

And in the midst of this frozen world hung the blown-apart steam core. Its fragments still floated in midair, and droplets of molten steel spread out like a strange, dazzling flower.

A tall figure descended from the exploding fire of the steam core. In the frozen machinery compartment, Duncan stepped out of the flames and walked up to the bone spider.

He brushed aside the floating molten metal beside him and ordered the frozen flames blocking his view to move away. He regarded the “Saint” with a calm gaze.

This “Annihilation Priest”, whose body no longer showed anything human, was still alive. After facing the steam core’s massive explosion at point-blank range, after enduring a blast hot enough to vaporize steel, this monster was only badly burned.

And in their brief clash earlier, this creature had quickly judged the situation and unhesitatingly chosen the higher-success “blow up the ship” plan. That kind of quick, sensitive decision-making was almost like a kind of Foresight.

Very strong, very smart, and possessed of extremely strange power.

But to Duncan, something else mattered more—

As Rabby had said, this Annihilation Priest had already “eaten” his symbiotic pact demons. That erased his greatest weakness as an Annihilator: he would not die from the death or runaway state of his symbiotic pact demons.

That made him a bit more “durable”.

Of course, it was obvious that, if this Annihilator was to be useful, he had to heal first. In this weakened state, he could never withstand the pressure of establishing contact with the Abyssal Lord.

For now, Duncan cared more about another matter.

“I’ve heard this ship has a supply port you call the ‘Holy Land’,” he said, lowering his head and fixing his gaze on the bone spider’s many eyes. “Where is it?”

The feeble bone spider trembled slightly. Some of his limbs struggled up, then quickly fell again. A hoarse, muffled voice came from deep within the grotesque tangle of flesh: “Give up… You will never find it… I have destroyed all navigation records and control devices. Besides that, the Holy Land’s position existed only in my brain—and just now, I destroyed that part of my memory. Even if the Four Gods themselves came, you would not find that route…”

But to the “Saint’s” surprise, the ghost captain before him did not show the slightest displeasure at this answer.

Duncan only shook his head with a hint of regret.

“It’s fine. It won’t take that much effort.”

In a vague sense, the Saint suddenly felt something. He struggled violently with his bone limbs, and his badly damaged eyestalks turned one after another toward the figure standing in the flames: “What… what are you going to do?!”

Duncan did not answer. He only turned his head to look at the frozen flames in the air, the ship’s shattered compartments in the distance, and the surging seawater beyond the broken hull.

The ship was torn so badly that, through the broken upper decks, he could faintly see the sky between the frozen flames.

“This ship is good. What a pity.”

He sighed softly, then turned to the steam core that had been blown completely to pieces. He reached out to gently touch the ball of fire frozen in midair.

This flame had once been the ship’s heart.

Now, it needed to beat again.

The ghostly green flame began to ripple, and a low, strange rumble rose from every inch of the ship. As the shaking grew stronger, the powerless, broken vessel seemed to slowly “come alive”, struggling as it began to pick up speed.

Duncan leaned close to the light of the fire and gave the awakened ship an order—

“Go home.”

And so the great ship changed course and set out on the homeward route.

Chapter 660: Capture and Endgame

The skeletal spider let out a string of chaotic, piercing noises. It was a howl full of intense mental corruption, the roar of a Monster teetering on the edge of a runaway state. The anger in it almost turned solid. Yet that almost solid fury could not affect the ship beneath it, a ship that had just come alive and was now setting out on its way home.

Even badly wounded, even with his senses in chaos, the Saint could still feel the ship under his feet accelerating in a certain direction. He could feel the abnormal trembling coming from the hull. The steam core was completely destroyed, yet the propellers were slowly speeding up. The navigation and linkage systems were gone, yet the ship itself still knew the way home.

The torn hull pieces still floated not far away. Between the shattered fragments, ghostly green flame burned quietly like the Veil. It kept out the icy seawater and also cut off all hope.

The steel behemoth that he had personally blown apart was now sailing toward the Holy Land in the posture of a broken corpse.

Behind the skeletal spider, from that swollen, horrifying giant brain, came a strange pounding sound, like heavy drums. Its blood vessels swelled and writhed violently, as if something glowing was brewing inside. A mad, destructive aura suddenly began to rise.

But just as this Annihilation priest was about to use his own body as raw material and set off a world-shaking self-destruction, he suddenly found he had lost control of his body.

A weird stiffness hit him all at once. He felt every limb and eyestalk turn in an instant into something hard, like stone or ceramic, fused into solid pieces. Then it felt as though an irresistible force descended on those stiff limbs and pulled them outward, fixing them in place.

Terror spread from the depths of his mind. The Saint pushed himself to the limit to move one eyestalk that was still intact and turned that eye in another direction.

There, a beautiful Doll with silver hair and a dark purple court dress stood quietly in the flames. She raised her hand slightly, as if she was controlling invisible threads. In those faint truths refracted by fate, the Saint saw vague, transparent strands twining between the girl's fingers.

"Anomaly… 099…" A furious and terrified voice came from within his body.

"You need to calm down." Alice tilted her head a little and looked very seriously at the ugly skeletal spider. "Your threads were all tangled. I helped straighten them out."

The skeletal spider trembled, then finally lost consciousness. In the very last second before his body completed its Doll transformation, Alice let go of the invisible threads in her hand.

She still remembered that the captain needed this one alive.

Duncan gave Alice a somewhat surprised look, then glanced at the skeletal spider, which had completely lost consciousness. He asked curiously: "It has threads too?"

“Yes.” Alice nodded. “They’re just a bit messier than an ordinary person’s, but you can still sort them out.”

Duncan frowned slightly, a thoughtful look on his face.

Just then, a gust of wind blew into the engine room, carrying with it many bright, colored paper scraps. The paper gathered at the far end of the platform, more than ten meters from Duncan, and formed the figure of Lucretia.

At a glance, Lucretia saw the skeletal spider lying motionless on the platform. Then she noticed the completely ruined steam core and the shattered pillars of the Sorting Engine not far away, as well as the countless flames and fragments frozen in midair as if time and space had stopped.

Duncan stood at the center of it all. He nodded to Lucretia. “It’s all taken care of here.”

“…I heard a huge explosion from the lower decks, and I saw massive flames and torn metal flying from the stern…” Lucretia looked a bit dazed. She stared blankly at the unbelievable scene in the engine room for a long moment before she went on. “…Did you restore its power?”

“It will return on its own to its home port, though it may take some time.” Duncan waved his hand and looked around at the wreckage with some regret. “What a pity. I was quite interested in that Sorting Engine, and now it’s been blown to pieces.”

As he spoke, he shook his head, then raised his hand and pointed at the Saint lying on the platform.

“Take it away. This thing is badly injured. I want it to recover in the shortest time possible. It doesn’t have to be fully healed. I just need its mind and vital signs stable. I need it to open the door to the Abyssal Deep in the Deep Sea.”

“…Oh, all right, Dad.” Lucretia finally snapped out of her daze. She hurried a few steps forward and raised the Conductor’s Baton in her hand. With a faint look of distaste, she lightly tapped one of the skeletal spider’s legs with the tip.

A shadow suddenly burst from the tip of the Conductor’s Baton. It was like something sealed inside the staff. Duncan only saw its vague, ferocious outline flash through the air. Then the shadow swelled and solidified into a huge, horrifying mouth that looked like an abstract sketch. It swallowed the skeletal spider in one bite, made a hard gulping motion in the air, and then quickly sank back into the Conductor’s Baton.

Lucretia put the Conductor’s Baton away with a face full of disgust.

“…Your spells are all very handy,” Duncan said, watching Lucretia’s actions with a slightly strange expression. There was a trace of emotion in his tone. “The way you ‘summoned’ me this time was quite good too.”

“I hope it met your expectations.” Lucretia’s face brightened with a smile. “After I listened to you talk about the avatar form you use and the rules of the beacon that lets you Teleport between Avatars, I kept thinking about this problem. I’m glad it was useful in the end.”

Duncan nodded slightly.

He had come to this ship in his true body. At first, he had considered sending only a portion of his power as a projection. But after he learned the situation aboard, it was clear that Teleporting his powerful true body here was a more reliable choice.

However, this kind of teleportation needed a beacon, something AI could use for navigation. The mirror ritual he usually used was not enough, and the temporary bodies of the Annihilators could not withstand it. There were indeed other “things” on this ship that could be turned into beacons, but the only ones left were the innocent sacrificial victims locked in cages by the cultists.

After all, outside the Vanished, a “beacon” was a body to be possessed.

Turning the ship’s innocent sacrificial victims into beacons clearly went against Duncan’s principles.

Thankfully, Lucretia had used her wits to solve the problem. She had made an artificial beacon in advance, something that could hold Duncan’s power when it descended.

She carried that beacon, used Rabby to control the cultists running the summoning ritual, and teleported to the ship ahead of time. Then she used the power of the artificial beacon to summon Duncan’s true body as well. From the look of it now, this whole Chain-Summoning process worked very well.

Duncan lowered his head and looked at his own hands.

The body he wore now was attached to the artificial beacon that Lucretia had made. That beacon sat inside him and was running in perfect condition.

“This beacon test went very smoothly.” Duncan raised his head and said to Lucretia, “If it can stay stable for a long time, you should carry one around from now on. Once you run into danger, I can come to your side at once. It’s more convenient than the mirror ritual.”

Lucretia froze for a second, as if she had not expected that. Then a slow smile curved her lips.

“Then I’ll send one to Big Brother too…”

“Frostholm already has one of my avatar forms.” Duncan gave her a sidelong glance. “He even went to the cemetery to visit me this morning. He doesn’t need your artificial beacon.”

Lucretia immediately looked a bit disappointed. “…Oh.”

“…Stop thinking about making trouble for your brother all the time.”

“Oh.”

Duncan shook his head helplessly.

“How are the sacrificial victims on the ship?”

“Rabby and I have already found them.” When it came to business, Lucretia quickly adjusted her expression. “The good news is, the place where they were held is in the bottom hold of the front half of the ship. The explosion in the engine room did not reach that far before you suppressed it, so no one died in the blast or the fire. The bad news is… their condition is very bad. Very, very bad. Some of them were already dead in their cells before we got there. Long sea voyages are boring, and those cultists used torturing the sacrificial victims as a way to pass the time. They even killed sacrificial victims who had lost their value as ‘blood food’ just for fun…”

She stopped and carefully watched Duncan’s face, which had grown dark as night.

“…But don’t worry. I will do everything I can to save those who are still alive. Even if they are on the verge of death, I can pull them back. It’s just that I can’t say anything about their mental state. That will need a more professional psychiatrist.”

“Mm.” Duncan nodded lightly. The grim look on his face eased a little. He exhaled, thought for a moment, and then asked, “Have you found the ‘Dream-Skull’?”

“We’re still looking.” Lucretia answered at once. “It is a precious but dangerous sealed object. It should be hidden in the best-defended and most secret place on the whole ship. I have already sent out my toy soldiers and shadow servants. They are searching every cabin from top to bottom. They should find it soon."

Alice had been standing nearby, listening curiously for a long time. She finally caught up with the thread of the talk and suddenly spoke up with a worried tone: "What if it already got blown up…"

"It shouldn't have." Lucretia shook her head. "The Dream-Skull is a sealed object with a tendency toward animation and corruption. You can't put something like that too close to the steam core, or it might drive the machines mad. Even that bunch of cultists should know at least that much."

"Mm…" Duncan nodded slightly as he listened to Lucretia's analysis. Then his tone turned a bit odd. "But honestly, what to do with it once we get it back is another problem… I don't know if keeping it next to Goathead will be good for him."

Lucretia thought for a moment. "…The First Mate has a broad heart. I think it will be fine."

"Forget it. We'll talk about it after we find it." Duncan waved his hand. "For now, take me to see how those sacrificial victims are doing."

Chapter 661: The Home Port's Bearing

The cages were in a cabin that had been specially reinforced. The narrow, damp, stuffy space was divided by iron bars into more than a dozen large and small cages. The sacrificial victims had been imprisoned inside them.

Going into a place like this never brought any good feeling. Even Lucretia frowned slightly when she stepped into this prison.

By the time Duncan arrived, the victims who had originally been locked in the cages had already been moved to an open space at the far end of the cabin. The environment there was a bit better, and it was right next to a vent. It looked like a place where the warden stopped for short rests.

The air was filled with a foul smell, the stench of blood and rotting flesh. Dirty bloodstains marked the cages on both sides, some of them clearly very fresh. Various "tools" for bleeding, skinning, and piercing hung on the walls and pillars between the cages, giving off an unpleasant aura.

Duncan walked past these iron cages and instruments of torture. Led by Lucretia, he went straight to the end of the cabin to look at the survivors.

His arrival caused a commotion. A tall figure wreathed in spirit form flames stepped into the cabin, looking like an Evil Spirit that had broken into the Mortal Realm. The surviving sacrificial victims cried out at once and tried to shrink back. Yet they were too weak, unable even to stand and run. After a brief struggle, they could only lean against each other and squeeze into the corner, staring in fear at the "Evil Spirit" standing in the ghostly flames.

Duncan could only feel helpless about it. Of course he knew that he looked rather frightening right now. But he had “descended” onto this ship by relying on the artificial beacon that Lucretia had made. To stay in tune with the beacon, he had to maintain this spirit form body.

Soon, though, he noticed that not everyone had backed away in panic. One thin, small figure still remained where she was.

It was a girl who looked about seven or eight. Her clothes were torn, and her body was covered in wounds. Her face was smeared with blood. She sat quietly on the floor, looking up at Duncan and Lucretia. There was no clear emotion in her eyes.

Duncan felt a bit curious. He bent down in front of the child and looked into her eyes. “You’re not afraid?”

But the child did not react at all. Her gaze did not change either. She only stared blankly at Duncan, the ghostly green flames reflected in her confused eyes.

“I already asked.” Lucretia walked up beside them and spoke softly behind Duncan. “The cultists carried out a sacrificial rite on her parents right in front of this child. She has been like this ever since. That was a long time ago. She has been on this ship for a year.”

The Sea Witch paused, then went on: “…Children are special and rare ritual materials, especially for Annihilators. They keep children for their most important rituals.”

Duncan did not speak. His back was to Lucretia, so she could not see his expression after he heard this. Only ghostly green flame spread slowly through the depths of the cabin and began to crackle.

After a few seconds, Duncan reached out. His unreal spirit form hand rested on the child’s head, and he gently ruffled her hair.

“You will get better.”

Then Duncan straightened and glanced back. “Lucy, did you bring any candy?”

Lucretia blinked, then shook her head with a hint of guilt. “…No. I only brought some potions I use every day… Ah, I have some biscuits. Biscuits Lunie baked.”

As she spoke, she quickly pulled a few biscuits from her clothes. After looking up at her father, she stepped forward and put the biscuits into the child’s hands.

The little girl finally showed some reaction. She lowered her head to look at the food, then began to stuff it into her mouth by instinct. She ate quietly and quickly.

“Eating” was one of the few instincts she still had after “living” on this ship for a year.

After a while, two more withered, skinny figures crawled from the corner. Almost wriggling like worms, they crept over to Duncan and kissed the floor where he had just stepped.

Duncan lifted his head. Under his gaze, he looked at all the eyes in the dark corners, eyes filled with fear, confusion, or numbness. After a long time, he suddenly asked in a low voice: “Are there any cultists still alive on this ship?”

“They have all been killed.” Lucretia answered at once. “By your standards, aside from that Saint, no other Annihilator needed to be kept alive.”

“Good.” Duncan nodded slowly, then gave another order. “Send your servants to get food and water. Let these people recover a bit of strength first.”

Lucretia bowed her head. “All right.”

Then Duncan and Lucretia left that deeply unpleasant cabin. A moment later, they stood on the deck.

The “living” ship was still sailing in a straight line toward the Holy Land, moving across the sea in a horrifying, broken posture.

The entire rear half of the ship was almost torn to pieces. Huge cracks ran across the deck and hull. The explosion had left the shattered wreckage blooming outward in a terrifying pattern. Countless scattered fragments still hung where they had been at the moment of the blast, frozen in place relative to the ship. ghostly green flame burned quietly between all the fragments and fractures. It seemed to have fixed the whole ship in the instant of its destruction, branding that ruin onto it forever.

Vision 001 was slowly climbing toward its high point in the sky. Yet layers of fog had appeared on the nearby sea. The mist spread up from the ship and then gathered and wove together overhead. sunlight filtered through the mist in a weak and hazy way.

“…The aura of the Spirit Realm is rising. The ‘changes’ on this ship seem to have attracted the shadows wandering near the edge of the Mortal Realm.” Lucretia looked at the strange fog on the sea around them, a slight frown on her face. “This is a ‘wild sea region’ far from the main routes. The space around here is not as stable as it is near the city-states.”

“Will they cause trouble?”

“No.” Lucretia thought for a moment and shook her head. “Your power rules this ship. Those shadows won’t dare come too close. But the ordinary people aboard do need to be moved as soon as possible. Their mental state is already very bad. In a Spirit Realm environment, they might undergo a transformation.”

“Later I’ll have AI open a gate and help you Teleport them to Lightwind Harbor.” Duncan nodded. Then he suddenly asked, “Besides that, can you tell where this ship is heading?”

“The Stargazing Room was destroyed in the explosion, so we can’t pinpoint our exact position.” Lucretia answered. “But based on Rabby’s rough sense in the Spirit Realm, it should be heading toward the southeastern ‘border’.”

Duncan turned his head at once. “The border?”

“Yes.” Lucretia nodded. “I was as surprised as you. But in this direction, there are no other city-states or small islands. This ship is also ‘returning home’ in a straight line at your command. So its only possible destination… is the Veil at the border.”

The “home port” of this ship was actually in the direction of the border?

Could there be some unexplored island near the mist known as the Eternal Veil? Or… was this ship’s destination simply that very mist?

Lucretia seemed to see the shock and doubt in Duncan’s heart. She spoke up on her own. “The Church of the Four Gods has always kept several standing fleets patrolling the borders of the civilized world. Near the Veil, every island has been charted, and every foothold is under the Church’s control. So the only explanation is that this ship’s destination lies inside the mist, a place outside the Church’s sight.”

Duncan frowned deeply. It still felt unbelievable. “…They opened a secret route right under the Church’s nose?”

“Crossing the border and slipping through the Church’s blockade or around the Ark fleets’ patrol routes is not that hard.” Lucretia explained. “The border is so long. The Church can’t keep every inch of the Veil under its gaze. The patrol fleets were never meant to stop every illegal ship passing by. From the very beginning, their main purpose has been to watch the changes in the border fog. Between those fleets, there is enough time and space for several ‘secret routes’ to exist. If I wanted to, I could reach the Eternal Veil without anyone noticing.”

She paused for a moment, and her tone grew especially serious.

“So compared to the existence of a ‘secret route’, the truly unbelievable thing is that this ship’s ‘home port’ might be inside that mist.”

Duncan understood what Lucretia meant.

In the vast seas of the border, it was not difficult to avoid the Church’s eyes. The truly hard part was to survive in that fog after doing so.

The giant wall of fog called the Eternal Veil was the end of the civilized world. Ever since the age of the Deep Sea, “stay away from that thick fog” had always been an iron rule in every adventurer’s heart.

As Lucretia talked with him about this now, there was another layer of complex feeling in her voice. A hundred years ago, the trouble with the Vanished had happened after Duncan Abnomar insisted on crossing that very wall of fog.

What was inside that fog? Did it have an end? Was there a wider world beyond it? What had the Vanished found in the depths of that fog a hundred years ago?

These questions had long weighed on the hearts of Duncan Abnomar’s two children. Even now, even after “Duncan” and the Vanished had both “returned” to this world, those questions still hung over Lucretia like a dark cloud.

In a way, that cloud even hung over the whole world.

A heavy and complex look slowly appeared in Duncan’s eyes. He turned, walked to the very front of the bow deck, placed both hands on the rail, and stared at the distant sea where thin mist spread over the water.

Now, this ship was sailing at full speed toward that cloud.

Chapter 662: Border Intelligence

Duncan gazed at the distant sea, lost in thought. Lucretia stood quietly behind him. The silence lasted for who knew how long, until Duncan finally broke it and said: “Tell me about the border.”

Lucretia took a step forward and said in a hesitant tone: “You…”

“I do not remember what happened back then,” Duncan said softly. “So I want to hear your view of the border. All these years, you have been active in the border region. As far as I know, you even risked entering that thick fog a few times… If we are destined to deal with that fog again, then at least I want to know what you understand about it.”

Lucretia’s eyes looked hesitant and complicated. She stared fixedly at Duncan’s back, as if she feared this figure would suddenly disappear into the wind again. Before today, Father had also spoken with her about the border, but their talks on this topic never went deep. She always chose to avoid it. Yet today… things seemed different.

After a few seconds, this “Sea Witch” finally spoke: “…I did enter that fog, but only at a very shallow level. Six nautical miles. That is my limit inside the mist. In theory, it should also be the limit of the Four Gods Church’s ships for monitoring in that area.”

“What is there?” Duncan asked curiously.

Lucretia thought for a moment and said: “Most of the sea there was calm, even calmer than other normal waters of the Boundless Sea. The surface was like a mirror. It clearly reflected the flag on the mast. There were no waves at all. The ripples raised when a ship passed would smooth out in a very short time. The whole sea felt like some heavy, sticky substance that could not form ripples. But it was in fact sea water, and the sailing of the ship itself was not affected…"

"But that was only the case in the Calm Zone. Between those calm waters there were strange and irregular belts of turbulence. They would appear all of a sudden, with no prophetic omen. Even after they appeared, it was hard to see them with the naked eye. The fast moving water still looked calm on the surface. It swept past like some kind of cutting line. If a ship came too close by mistake, it would enter a runaway state. In the lighter cases, the ship would spin quickly and be carried by the current onto the wrong route. In the worse cases, it would capsize outright."

"And all of this could still be called the mild side of the mist. When it was not so mild… some very strange things would appear.

"Sometimes, things beyond understanding would suddenly appear in the fog, like huge blocks floating on the sea, or 'mountains' that stabbed straight up from the ocean like blades. But it was very hard to get close to these entities that surfaced from the mist, because very large scale anomalous phenomena in the sky would usually appear around them. Sometimes it was a storm. Sometimes it was a huge ring shaped current. Sometimes an entire stretch of sea water would even vanish into thin air, leaving a fault like a bottomless abyss below, terrifying beyond words…"

Lucretia stopped here. It seemed she was recalling things that left even a Sea Witch like her with lingering fear. After she took a moment to gather her thoughts, she went on:

"In the middle of this chaos, there were sometimes gains. For example, unknown 'materials' and 'objects' would appear together with the currents or storms. They were entities you could touch, catch, and store, and even bring out of the mist. Some of them were very useful, such as Ever-Burning Grease, or crystals that could drive away mental corruption. The Explorer Association and the Truth Academy would pay a high price to buy these items and study their uses. But in general, the things collected from these border manifestations were random and one of a kind. There was no way to get them in a stable way…

“In even fewer cases, in the middle of these chaotic and dangerous phenomena, there would appear…”

She suddenly stopped, as if she was not sure she should go on.

Duncan could not help frowning: “Lucy, what did you see?”

“Only once. To this day I am still not sure whether it was real or just a hallucination from extreme exhaustion,” Lucretia said after hesitating for a long time. “It was a huge cylinder that suddenly rose out of the sea. The cylinder was pitch black. giant ring like structures surrounded it, also black, with no visible detail. It was the only mist entity I ever managed to approach. The waves around it were not too strong, and the Radiant Star could barely hold its own there. I came to the foot of that cylinder. I even brought the ship alongside it and touched its surface with my hand… and then, I heard it speak to me.”

Lucretia raised her hand and pointed at her own head: “The voice roared inside my mind. It was a language I did not know, yet I could understand its meaning directly. It kept repeating one sentence: ‘Curvature Engine activated… we are leaving danger. Curvature Engine activated… we are leaving danger…’”

She lifted her head, saw the subtle change on Duncan’s face, and could not help asking: “Do you know what that sentence means?”

The moment Duncan heard the sentence Lucretia mentioned, he frowned. The words “Curvature Engine” raised a huge wave in his heart. He instantly thought of the ship that had crashed in the Deep Sea era, the New Hope!

Lucretia had found the wreckage of that ship? It had fallen into the Eternal Veil?

“Can you find it again? Have you seen it again after that?” he asked quickly.

“I am afraid not,” Lucretia said. From Father’s attitude she could feel how important this was, but she could only shake her head in apology. “The things that appear in the border mist are random and short lived, like illusions you can touch. When their time is up, they vanish without a trace. So far, I have never run into the same entity twice in that mist.”

A wave of disappointment rose in Duncan’s heart, but he did not show much of it. “…Besides that sentence, did you find anything else?”

Lucretia thought hard and said, not very sure: “Other than that, it was the touch when I laid my hand on it. It was an extremely strange feeling. It felt hollow. There was no temperature and no hardness. I know this sounds odd, but at that time my fingers could not tell what kind of material I was touching at all, or even whether I was touching anything. In that instant, the sense of touch in my fingers seemed to vanish. Or maybe that thing… only kept part of its properties in the Mortal Realm, so I could not fully sense the parts that had disappeared…”

As she spoke, she sounded more and more unsure, as if she could not clearly put into words what she had felt then or what she was guessing now. In the end, she could only spread her hands in helplessness: “Can you understand what I am saying?”

Duncan, however, showed a thoughtful look. After he heard Lucretia describe all these bizarre and unbelievable things, what suddenly came to his mind was the brief shift in his own perception, or rather his sudden insight into the world, in the few seconds after he saw the truth of the Great Annihilation.

He still clearly remembered the “true” face of the world he had seen in that final moment.

Broken pieces of information had joined together into the current Deep Sea era. Incompatible fragments of the Old World had crashed into one another, fused and twisted, turning into things that looked nothing like what they had been, or melting into the boiling stew of information at the bottom of the world.

Then… what about the things that had never fully merged, or that could not be completely erased or corrupted by other things because of some special nature of their own?

Such things had to exist. When a collision on the scale of the universe took place, the chances of every event, from infinitely big to infinitely small, would all stack together. Anything could happen. Anything could also never happen. So those “lucky ones” or “unlucky ones” that were bound to remain even after a chance that small had to have some place to go…

Duncan guessed that most of them should be in Subspace. In that dark and chaotic space, there were many things that seemed to be Old World wreckage. Torn landmasses, pale one eyed giants, and vague shadows floating in the void. They should all be fragments that had not been fully erased.

But now it seemed that some of them had fallen in places outside Subspace.

The “entities” the Sea Witch had seen in the border mist were things like that.

Lucretia felt a bit uneasy. She saw the expressions on Duncan’s face keep changing, as if some pattern of thought she could not understand was slowly taking shape in Father’s mind. It gave her the same feeling she had had back then, when she had a premonition of seeing the Starry Sky.

But this time, she did not truly see starlight rise behind Father’s body.

“I am very interested in those ‘entities’ you saw in the border mist,” Duncan suddenly said, cutting off Lucretia’s wandering thoughts. “What about deeper in? You just said you can only go six nautical miles into the mist at most. What happens if you go farther?”

“You completely lose your sense of direction toward the civilized world,” Lucretia answered at once, suddenly brought back to herself. “In fact, as soon as you enter the Eternal Veil, all normal navigation tools stop working. Even when you look out from the stargazing room at the Abyssal Deep Starry Sky, you can only see a hazy blur of shadows. Only within six nautical miles can the radio still barely work, and the lighthouses or ritual braziers set up on the border of the mist can still guide a ship back. But once you cross that six mile threshold, all contact with the civilized world is completely cut off.

“I once went too far in and crossed that threshold. Even though I crossed it only a little, I almost lost myself in that fog forever. Going back the way you came is meaningless, because once the ship goes through a Boundary Crossing, the continuity of space and time around you seems to be broken. When your ship goes one step forward and then one step back, it will not return to where it was…”

Duncan listened and could not help frowning: “Then how did you get back?”

“I…” Lucretia opened her mouth, hesitated for quite a while, and then said softly with a strange look on her face: “I saw the shadow of the Vanished.”

Chapter 663: Alice’s Spoils

“You saw the shadow of the Vanished?!” Duncan did not hide his surprise at all.

“Yes,” Lucretia looked at Duncan and nodded in a tone that was a little hard to read. “After I had been lost in the fog for three days, I saw a silhouette that looked very, very much like the Vanished sail past in the distant mist. Wherever it passed, the thick fog seemed to thin for a short time and show the look of a normal sea. I… hesitated for a long time, but I had no other choice then, so I gathered my courage and sailed toward that silhouette. But just as the Radiant Star was about to come close, it suddenly vanished… and then I returned to normal waters.”

After Lucretia spoke, she looked at Duncan with a strange gaze for several seconds before adding: “That was in 1862. You had already fallen into Subspace for sixty-two years.”

Duncan was silent for a moment. He turned quietly to look at the distant sea to hide the change in his eyes and said calmly: “I do not remember that.”

“I know,” Lucretia nodded. “So I have always doubted whether what I saw was really the Vanished, or only a hallucination from exhaustion. Or perhaps… it was also some kind of special phenomenon of the border.

“That was my first and only time crossing the six mile limit. After that I never went in that deep again, and I never saw such a phantom again.”

Duncan said nothing. His thoughts rose and fell inside him.

From Lucretia’s account, he finally understood for the first time just how strange and dangerous that endless mist called the border of civilization, the Eternal Veil, really was. At the same time, countless guesses, and curiosity, rose in him about the unbelievable things that appeared in that mist.

It was clear that entering that mist carried huge risk. Even someone like Lucretia, a seasoned border scholar and explorer, had almost been lost forever in the Veil even with full preparations. And even in the relatively safe six mile Calm Zone, all kinds of strange and deadly entities and phenomena could claim an explorer’s life at any moment.

But those strange and dangerous entities were exactly what drew Duncan’s attention.

The shadow that seemed to be the remnant after the crash of the New Hope was only one of them. In that mist within six miles of the border, how many other remnants like the New Hope were there? Were they all the core residues left after different worlds were wiped out? What mechanism had left those residues behind until now? Those entities circled the whole Boundless Sea inside the mist. Then what lay outside that ring? What remnants were there?

Vaguely, Duncan had a feeling that these entities, which felt strangely hollow in Lucretia’s senses, might help him understand the deepest crisis of this world, and might even help him find a way out of the underlying corruption of all things…

A gaze from his side pulled Duncan out of his thoughts. He looked up and saw Lucretia standing quietly nearby, watching him. Her complicated eyes seemed to hold a faint worry.

“…You are going there again, are you not?”

Lucretia asked in a low voice.

“…This ship is sailing toward the border,” Duncan said, patting the handrail beside him. “Those Annihilators have a hideout in the border mist. One way or another, I will deal with it.”

“I do not mean this time. Those cultists will not hide very deep. Wiping out their lair may be easy for you. I mean after that,” Lucretia said as her gaze fell on Duncan’s eyes. “After you clear out that lair, your attention will turn to the mist, will it not? You will go to investigate the entities and manifestations I described to you, and even… go beyond the six mile mark.”

Her gaze brought a bit of pressure. For the first time, Duncan felt that the gaze of this Sea Witch was a little hard to face. But after a short silence, he still nodded: “If the situation calls for it, I will go.”

Lucretia pressed her lips together.

But she did not try to talk him out of it or stand in his way. She only spoke suddenly after a long silence: “Take me with you this time. My experience can help you.”

Duncan was a little surprised. He looked at the witch for a few seconds before he spoke softly: “…What if the end of the mist is Subspace?”

“Then I will need your experience.”

Duncan did not answer at once. He turned and silently gazed at the distant sea for quite a while before letting out a slight breath. “We will talk about it later. I do have this idea, but it is not yet time to go deep into the mist. At the very least, before that I must first destroy the cultists’ lair hidden on the border and make contact with the Four Gods Church.”

Lucretia nodded lightly.

Just then, the sound of footsteps and a strange clatter of metal came from not far away, cutting off their talk.

Duncan looked toward the sound and saw Alice strolling over in high spirits. The doll miss held a big wooden box in one arm, and in her other hand she carried a large bundle of kitchen knives, spatulas, and iron spoons she had scavenged from who knew where. She had strung them together with wire, and she walked over as happily and boldly as if she were bringing back spoils of war, making clanking noises all along the deck.

“Captain!” The silly doll came right up to Duncan, lifted the long string of “treasures” in her hand, and shook them in the air. “Look! I have my own spoils too!”

Duncan was still caught in the serious talk he had just had with Lucretia, and this excited, silly beauty shattered all his thoughts at once. He stared blankly at the string of things in Alice’s hand for quite a while before he finally reacted: “…You looted the kitchen?”

“Yes, yes,” Alice nodded again and again in small motions, her face full of pride. “Goathead said that after we take an enemy ship, we must raid the treasury at once and get enough spoils before it sinks. I just followed those toy soldiers and crawled all over the ship, and finally found the kitchen…”

She paused to think back and then said with some feeling: “This ship really is not very good. The things on it do not seem very smart. When I was collecting spoils, the things in the kitchen did not even fight back. I was all ready to have a battle with this kitchen knife…”

Lucretia stared in shock at the doll’s chatter, while Duncan, after a short silence, finally could not help speaking: “…Alice.”

“Ah?”

“Not everyone has to fight the kitchenware when they cook…”

“I know. The kitchens in the city-states do not hit people. But this is a ship, is it not?”

“…And not every ship has barrels, mops, and pots and pans that hit people.”

Alice opened her eyes wide in surprise.

Two seconds later, the doll let out a cry: “That is so amazing?”

Duncan: “…”

Just then, Lucretia noticed the strange wooden box Alice was holding in her other arm. “And what is this? Also your spoils?”

“Yes,” Alice answered at once and nodded again and again. “I found it in a strange cabin. There was only this wooden box in such a big room, and several iron chains were wrapped around the box. I pulled off most of the chains, but the lock on the box was very strange. No matter how much strength I used, I could not open it. I do not even know what is inside, so I just took the whole box…”

As she spoke, she handed the big wooden box in her arms to Duncan. “Will you take a look?”

While Alice was still talking, a strange sense of intuition had already risen in Duncan’s heart. He took the heavy wooden box from her. Its surface was black and covered with many complex patterns. His gaze slid to the lock, yet he saw only an ordinary looking iron lock, the kind even the clumsiest thief could open with a bit of wire. But this very lock had stopped the very strong doll.

Duncan knew how strong Alice was. She could swing a coffin lid and row a coffin across the sea at the speed of an assault boat, and she could tear apart iron chains meant to bind the box just by force. Duncan could even picture this silly girl rushing into the cabin and ripping those chains off with brute strength, yet left helpless in front of the last shabby little lock on the box.

It seemed that this box was exactly what he had been looking for.

Lucretia came closer and quickly recognized what was going on with the iron lock Alice could not open by force. “Anomaly 132-Lock,” she said. “It needs a special key to open it. The key is a spoken passphrase known only to the one who locked it. After it is locked, it becomes indestructible, and it makes the container it locks indestructible as well, even if that is only a paper box. This anomaly is one of the few harmless anomalies. Its number is not high, but it has a special use. It can help seal dangerous items. In 1876, it was stolen from a transport ship during a pirate attack… I did not expect it to fall into the hands of these cultists.”

After she finished sharing the information about this iron lock, Lucretia thought for a moment and then said, not very sure: “The cultist who last performed the locking is already dead, and the key phrase has been lost. But I can try other ways to solve the puzzle of this lock. Even though it is ‘indestructible’, I have heard that it has a loophole…”

A soft click suddenly sounded, cutting off the rest of the witch’s words.

Lucretia stared in shock at the wooden box in Duncan’s hands.

The lock had opened on its own.

“It seems it does not want to let you try,” Duncan said with a smile to Lucretia. “Or perhaps it knows that if your attempt did not work, then it would be my turn to ‘try’ it myself.”

Lucretia froze for a moment. “…That is reasonable. My thinking was limited.”

Duncan shook his head with a smile, then set the big wooden box on the deck, took off the opened padlock, and carefully lifted the lid.

A black wooden carving of Goathead lay quietly inside the box.

Chapter 664: Goathead

Duncan looked at the Goathead in the wooden box. The Goathead in the box looked like a real wood carving, lifeless and unresponsive as it met his gaze.

Duncan was not surprised. From the moment Alice had muddled her way onto the deck with a wooden box that could not be opened and had clearly been carefully sealed, he had guessed that what he was looking for was inside.

After all, the silly beauty was missing a few points in the brain, so she had to make up for it in other areas, like her grip, her optimism, and her good luck.

“Goathead!” Alice craned her neck to look into the box. She finally realized what she had brought back so muddle-headedly, and her eyes instantly went wide with surprise: “This is the one the cultist was holding? It really looks exactly like the Goathead on the Vanished!”

Duncan did not speak. He just carefully studied the details of this “Dream-Skull”. Beside him, Lucretia crouched down and poked the Goathead in the box with her small Conductor’s Baton. Her beautiful brows drew together slightly: “No reaction… I also can’t see any traits of being alive, and it doesn’t seem to be giving off any special aura either?”

“Just like a real piece of wood.” Duncan nodded, reached into the box, took the carved Goathead out, and weighed it up and down in his hand: “…So it’s actually this light.”

“Have you never taken the Goathead on the Vanished off its base?” When Lucretia heard this, she looked at Duncan in some surprise. “It always seemed to just sit on the table…”

“They are connected. Goathead is part of the Vanished as a whole.” Duncan shook his head at once. “Its head can turn around, but it cannot be removed from the table.”

This was the first time Lucretia had heard this detail, and she seemed to find it quite incredible. Beside her, after hearing the captain’s words, Alice suddenly showed a thoughtful look. Then she clapped her hands: “So that’s how it is!”

Duncan turned his head at once: “Hm?”

“I was wondering why, last time when I tried to take the First Mate’s head off the table, it resisted so much and muttered a whole bunch of things at me. I don’t remember what it said though…”

Duncan stared: “Why did you try to take the First Mate’s head off the table?”

“Because I wanted to wipe the table,” Alice said, as if this were only natural. “And I wanted to take it to the washroom and give it a rinse… but I couldn’t get it off.”

Duncan: “…?”

He no longer wanted to imagine what that scene had looked like—thankfully this doll did not have that much strength in her hands. If it had been Vanna instead, Saslokar might have died a third time…

Lucretia suddenly noticed that Father’s expression flickered a few times.

“What is it?” she asked, unable to hold back her concern.

“…I don’t think I ever reminded the others on the ship that Goathead’s head is fixed to the table and cannot be taken off.”

“Miss Vanna is a steady person. She probably wouldn’t just walk into your captain’s cabin.”

Duncan looked puzzled: “Why was Vanna the first person you thought of?”

Lucretia froze for two seconds, then gave Duncan a rather odd look: “Then who did you think of?”

Duncan thought about it and decided it was better not to keep talking about this topic that was getting more and more ridiculous. He turned his attention back to the “Dream-Skull” in front of him.

“This should indeed be another shard of Saslokar. Otherwise those cultists would not have sealed it up so carefully. But shards differ from shard to shard. Not every ‘Goathead’ has a complete mind.”

As he spoke, he placed the pitch-black wooden Goathead back into the box and closed the lid again. Anomaly 132 at once jumped up from the nearby deck, hung itself on the box’s latch, and with a click, locked itself in place.

“I will send this thing back to the Vanished first and see what happens when I place it together with the Goathead on the ship.”

“Ah, are we going back already?” Alice reacted at once. She stood up with Duncan and looked curiously at the distant sea. “I thought we were going to follow this ship straight to that… what was it… the ‘home port’.”

The one who answered her was Lucretia: “We are still far from the border. Even at its highest speed, this ship would need about a week to reach the area near The Veil. There is no need for us to stay on this almost completely ruined ghost ship for that long.”

“Mm.” Duncan nodded and added: “We can use this time to move the survivors from the prison to the city-states. Then, if we get the chance, we can contact the Four Gods Church. They may also be interested in a cult nest hidden in the mist near the border. And then there is the ‘Goathead’ in this box… there is a lot to do.”

“You can go back first. I will handle the aftermath here,” Lucretia offered. “I have quite a bit of… experience with such things.”

He only nodded slightly and did not say more.

He knew that as a Witch who had wandered the Boundless Sea for a century, Lucretia’s experiences had long surpassed those of ordinary people. City-states struck by disaster, stranded expedition teams, cursed sea ships, and victims kidnapped and offered up in the sacrificial rites of cults—she had dealt with all these before.

She knew how to settle those survivors whose bodies and minds were already on the verge of collapse.

“Then Alice and I will return to the Vanished first.” Duncan nodded to Lucretia, then patted the rail beside him. “This ship will sail back to its home port on its own. You don’t need to worry about it. After you finish dealing with things here, leave that ‘artificial beacon’ on the ship. That way I can monitor its condition at any time and come back here when the time is right.”

Lucretia lowered her head: “I understand.”

The sharp crackle of leaping flames rose out of thin air on the deck. When she looked up again, a spinning door of fire had already appeared before her.

Alice, holding the big wooden box (and her string of “spoils of war”), was the first to step into the whirling flames. Then Duncan waved toward her side, and his body, wreathed in spirit form flames, turned into a streak of fire in an instant and vanished through the gate.

In the place where Duncan had just been standing, a clump of lingering fire still burned calmly in midair. It slowly shrank and dimmed, and soon turned into a magic item no larger than a palm, which fell onto the deck.

That was the artificial beacon the Sea Witch had made.

Lucretia took a step forward and picked the beacon up from the deck.

It was a small puppet, carved from a piece of wood taken from the rail of the Vanished. Inside it was tucked a strand of Duncan's hair. It had been roughly carved into Duncan's likeness: wearing a captain's uniform from the Old Era, a gloomy captain's hat, and a stern beard.

The puppet's overall shape looked somewhat exaggerated, but in just the right way.

Lucretia had spent a whole night making this puppet. For a Witch who had created an entire army of Servants, this task was not complicated. This incredible magic construct could hold a trace of Father's power. Even though its "capacity" was very small, it was enough to replace a human body and let Father open a door of flames near the beacon's location without adding another avatar form.

Father did not wish to occupy more bodies to create more avatar forms. To Lucretia, this was a very good thing. She was happy to use her skills to help Father solve the "practical inconveniences" that came with it.

On the deck, the remaining flames of the fire gate slowly faded.

Holding the small puppet in Duncan's likeness, Lucretia lifted it and examined it back and forth in the sunlight. Then, like a thief, she suddenly glanced quickly to either side.

There was of course no one else here.

So the Witch young lady withdrew her gaze from the empty surroundings, walked to a corner, hesitated for a moment, and reached out to poke the puppet’s head with her finger.

The puppet had no reaction.

She reached out again, poked the puppet’s beard, then poked its exaggerated captain’s hat. She began to laugh, and her expression slowly grew cheerful.

Suddenly the puppet lifted its head and spoke in a helpless voice: “Having fun?”

Lucretia: “…”

A moment later, Rabby the rabbit, who had just crawled out of the cabin and was about to find her mistress to report something, heard a scream that echoed across the whole deck, a scream the like of which she had never heard in her life.

…

The clanging of metal broke the calm on the deck of the Vanished.

Duncan gave a somewhat helpless look at Alice, who was walking back and forth on the deck with her “spoils of war”: “Give me the box. You can take your ‘spoils’ to the kitchen first.”

“Oh!”

The doll answered happily and casually handed Duncan the wooden box holding the “Dream-Skull”. Then she walked toward the kitchen, accompanied by a trail of clanging sounds.

The noise of cleavers, spatulas, and iron spoons knocking together finally grew distant.

Duncan held the wooden box containing the “Dream-Skull” and watched Alice’s cheerful back as she left. At the same time he sensed the information coming from the artificial beacon in some far, unknown sea area. A subtle yet helpless expression slowly appeared on his face. He shook his head, smiling and sighing at the same time.

“…Forget it. As long as she is happy.”

He turned and walked toward the aft deck. As soon as he pushed open the door of the captain’s cabin, he immediately met Goathead’s gaze.

It was as if Goathead had already turned its gaze toward the door before he opened it. Now those obsidian-carved eyes were deep and still. The “First Mate”, who normally chattered endlessly and never acted serious, for the first time did not recite its dizzying, patter-like opening speech. Its eyes were fixed tightly on the wooden box Duncan held in his hands, as if it had already guessed what was inside.

“Looks like you sensed it,” Duncan said as he walked to the chart table and set the big wooden box on it. “I brought you a gift.”

Chapter 665: Boundary Crossing Again

Under Duncan's gaze, Anomaly 132—the "lock"—sensibly opened itself, slipped off the hasp, and jumped to the other side of the table where it would not be in the way.

Duncan opened the dark wooden box, took out the carved Goathead inside, and set it on the chart table.

The "First Mate" at the edge of the table turned its head and stared at the carved Goathead that looked exactly like itself. Two pairs of eyes, carved like obsidian, met each other. After a long time, it let out a drawn-out sigh: "Wow—"

Duncan raised an eyebrow: "That is all you have to say?"

"It is too shocking. That was the only thing that came to mind." Goathead's head twisted back and forth on its base, as if trying hard to study its "other head" from different angles. It stretched its neck as far as it could and stared for quite a while, muttering as it did so: "I already had a faint feeling when you came back on board. And once you went to that ship, you were sure to bring this 'Dream-Skull' back, so that part did not surprise me. It is just that seeing it with my own eyes is still unbelievable. There really is one that looks exactly like me…"

It suddenly stopped there, sounding a bit puzzled: "Why is it not moving at all?"

“You are asking me?” Duncan gave him a strange look. “This is your own head.”

“But I am not familiar with it,” Goathead said in a very righteous tone. “Before this trip to Lightwind Harbor I did not even know I had a backbone…”

Duncan was speechless: “…”

The awkward and strange mood lasted for a few seconds. Goathead finally moved again and stretched its neck toward the “Dream-Skull”: “Could you bring it a bit closer?”

“Like this?” Duncan held the lifeless “Dream-Skull” next to Goathead and watched curiously. “Do you feel anything?”

“…Maybe a little closer?”

Duncan moved it a bit closer, and then a bit more. At last he simply pressed the “Dream-Skull” right against Goathead’s forehead, making the two carved Goatheads touch head to head: “All right, that is close enough. Do you feel anything or not?”

“Take it away, take it away… that is close enough,” Goathead cried, twisting his neck. Only when Duncan put the “Dream-Skull” back on the table did he let out a very human-like breath and mutter: “Still nothing. Aside from being able to sense its ‘existence’ very clearly, I cannot establish any ‘communication’ with this head. I cannot sense any thoughts or memories in it, and it is not responding to me either…”

He paused and thought it over, then shook his head: “It feels like just an empty shell. Aside from ‘existing’ and being ‘of the same source’, it seems to have nothing to do with me.”

Listening to Goathead’s description, Duncan frowned deeply.

“This situation is not quite what I expected,” he said, still frowning. “This is, after all, another shard of Saslokar. Even if it is a much more damaged part, it should still have some special traits. And the sacrificial ritual those cultists held before proved that this ‘Dream-Skull’ did have some ‘activity’… so why is there no reaction at all after contact with you?”

“I do not know, but at least I am sure this head is absolutely real—I really can feel its ‘existence’. The feeling is very subtle, and I do not know how to explain it to you…” Goathead spoke, then began to guess: “Maybe we are just using the wrong way to make contact? Or… maybe those cultists messed up the sacrificial ritual and broke this head? After all, those bastards kept using elf blood to stimulate the ‘Dream-Skull’…”

Duncan’s expression grew serious and thoughtful. He glanced at Goathead again: “Those cultists are indeed bastards—but do you not feel strange talking about your other head being ‘broken’?”

“Of course it is strange, but I cannot think of a better word,” Goathead said helplessly. “Look at the state I am in now. I am completely dead and shattered anyway…”

Duncan: “…”

He had noticed that after the Lightwind Harbor incident, his First Mate had changed in some ways. The most obvious point was how big-hearted he had become, almost to a degree that seemed unhealthy…

Duncan shook his head, pushing aside the strange thought that had just flashed through his mind. Then he patted the lifeless “Dream-Skull” with his hand.

“In any case, the current state of this ‘Dream-Skull’ is definitely not right. Maybe those cultists really did something to it that changed it. Or maybe we just have not found the right way to awaken it. Or… perhaps it is ‘missing’ something. In any event, I will leave it here for now and let you watch for any changes. What do you think?”

“I will follow whatever you arrange,” Goathead said at once. “And I am very curious about this head myself. Leaving it here will let me study it whenever I have time.”

Duncan nodded slightly: “Good.”

Then he lifted his gaze and looked out the window.

The setting sun had already sunk a third of the way below the horizon. Before he knew it, dusk was near. The remaining golden-red radiance of Vision 001 spread magnificently over the Boundless Sea. In another direction, the golden sunlight from the glowing geometric body near Lightwind Harbor grew even more dazzling as dusk approached. Between those crisscrossing beams of light, the silhouette of the distant city-state looked a little hazy.

How long could such a peaceful sunset scene last?

For some reason, such a thought suddenly rose in Duncan’s heart. But then he sighed softly and set those stray thoughts aside.

“I am going back to my room to rest for a while. Once Lucretia finishes dealing with things on her side, I will go into the city with her again. Take good care of the Vanished during this time.”

“Yes, Captain.”

Duncan nodded, stood up, and walked toward the bedroom door at the back of the captain’s cabin. Suddenly he stopped again and looked curiously at Goathead on the table: “You said you wanted to ‘study’ this Dream-Skull. How are you going to study it? You do not even have hands.”

“That is a good question,” Goathead mused. After a moment he lifted his head with full confidence: “I will start by trying to talk to it. Maybe those cultists made this head shut itself off. If I counsel it a bit, I might help it untie the knot in its heart…”

Duncan at once gave up any hope for Goathead’s “research”.

But he did not say anything. He only gave Goathead a look that said “do your best”, waved his hand, and turned to walk into the bedroom.

With a bang, the dark wooden door closed.

In the empty captain’s cabin, only the two carved Goatheads on the table were left in their own quiet.

This silence lasted for an unknown time before Goathead finally turned his head and looked at the motionless “Dream-Skull”.

“…Have you heard of the eighteen cuisines of the Boundless Sea?”

…

After dozing off for only a few minutes, Duncan suddenly woke with a start because of a rumbling noise that seemed to come from nowhere.

He rose quickly from the bed, but the cabin and the space outside were already quiet again.

In the dim bedroom, only a consecrated lantern on the desk gave off a light that seemed a bit too weak. Outside the nearby window it was pitch-black, as if the veil of night had already been hanging there for a long time. It was silent beyond the door, and no sound came from the direction of the corridor or the deck.

Duncan sat on the edge of the bed in the dark. A vague feeling of pressure rose in him from some unknown place. He remembered what had happened before he came back to his room to rest, and then he noticed something wrong in his surroundings.

It was too quiet—not even the sound of waves hitting the hull could be heard. The “veil of night” outside the window also seemed too dark. He could see neither the fading “sunlight” from the glowing geometric body near Lightwind Harbor nor the cold glow spread over the sea by the World’s Wound.

Duncan frowned and suddenly felt something. He left the bed quickly and went to the window beside his desk.

In the endless dim void, a band of turbid, dark radiance slid silently past in the far distance outside the window. In the space briefly lit by that light, some huge, twisted shadows slowly rose at the edge of his sight, rolling without a sound.

Subspace!

Duncan’s heart gave a sudden jolt, and he realized at once what had happened.

After so long, he had “wandered” into Subspace again!?

He still remembered what it had been like the first time he entered Subspace. He also remembered that it had happened after a “nap” as well, and that he had at first thought it was a strange “dream”. That was also the only time he had ever entered this “time and space” that the world saw as forbidden. After that, so much time had gone by that he had almost forgotten it.

Now the same thing had happened again.

Duncan frowned and silently raised his guard. First he summoned a clump of flame and hid it in his hand, then he walked carefully toward the door.

He no longer treated this as some kind of “sleepwalking”.

Because he knew that he did not dream. Even though he did not know the reason behind it, “dreams” did not seem to belong to him.

He came to the bedroom door and listened at it for a moment. Then he slowly pushed it open.

Outside was the dim, deathly still captain’s cabin. The ruined other “Vanished” appeared in his sight just as it had last time, showing signs of being abandoned for a century everywhere. Empty shelves leaned crookedly in the corners. A dirty Oval Scrying Mirror hung on the cracked and mottled wall. Piles of black, suspicious shadowy junk lay on the floor. The only intact chart table stood alone in the center of the room, and the mysterious enchanted sea chart on it gave off a faint glow.

A pitch-black carved wooden Goathead sat quietly on the table. It slowly lifted its head and fixed its gaze on Duncan.

Chapter 666: gaze

Even though a long time had passed since his last visit to Subspace, Duncan still clearly remembered that on this ruined version of the Vanished, on the Subspace side, there had been no Goathead in the captain’s cabin.

On the chart table here, there had only been a single enchanted sea chart, showing eerie and suspicious routes.

Now, however, a pitch-black Goathead sat quietly on the chart table. In the dim light, it silently fixed its gaze on him. At the same time, Duncan was sure that the instant he had opened the bedroom door, this black Goathead had turned its eyes toward him.

It was a living thing. It was reacting to outside stimuli.

Duncan quickly forced his expression under control. While he carefully watched the Goathead that was staring straight at him, he walked out of the bedroom and slowly approached the chart table. As he moved, the Goathead on the table reacted as well. It slowly turned its gaze, and its eyes stayed on Duncan the whole time.

Duncan suddenly frowned.

This Goathead looked exactly the same as the Goathead in the Mortal Realm, but something was off about its position. In the Mortal Realm, the “Goathead” sat at the left edge of the table. The one before his eyes, though, was placed closer to the middle.

Duncan quickly searched his memory and soon remembered. Before he had gone back to the bedroom to rest, he had placed the “Dream-Skull” in that very spot.

The Dream-Skull? This was the Dream-Skull he had brought back from the cultists’ ship. Why had it appeared here in Subspace?!

Countless messy guesses and thoughts surged up at once in his mind. Duncan cautiously walked to the side of the chart table. He braced both hands on the edge of the table and, with a face like still water, stared at the Goathead on the table. The Goathead slowly raised its gaze, its hollow eyes meeting Duncan’s.

That silent, empty gaze was a little horrifying.

After a few seconds of this quiet standoff, Duncan decided to break the silence. He kept his face tight, his expression serious, and greeted it: “Hello, I am Duncan.”

The strange Goathead on the table spoke: “Hello. You are not Duncan.”

For a moment, Duncan almost failed to hold his expression together.

But the thick nerves he had trained up by dealing with all the oddballs on the ship finally did their work. At the critical moment, his face stayed stiff. Only the storm in his heart was not so easy to calm—this eerie Goathead had actually spoken?!

And more shocking than the fact that it had spoken was what it said.

Controlling the changes on his face, Duncan forced himself to speak in a calm tone as he asked: “If I am not Duncan, then who am I?”

“You are the captain,” the Goathead, which seemed to be the Dream-Skull, said calmly.

When it spoke, its voice was almost exactly the same as the “First Mate” Duncan knew so well, but there was a strange gloom and bluntness in it. It felt very unsettling.

As Duncan tried to get used to this odd feeling, he looked at the eerie Goathead with a strange expression. What it said sounded very strange to him, so he could not help asking again: “Isn’t the captain of this ship Duncan?”

“You are the captain,” the Goathead said, meeting Duncan’s gaze. “You are not Duncan.”

It seemed that these were the only words it could say. No matter how he questioned it, no matter how he changed the way he asked, its response never went beyond those two lines. The person speaking to it right now was the captain of this ship, but that person was not “Duncan.”

After a few rounds of questions, Duncan stopped probing in this direction. A thoughtful look came over his face.

He was the captain of this ship, but he was not Duncan—of course he knew he was not Duncan.

He was Zhou Ming, a wandering soul. The identity of the great explorer named Duncan Abnomar was only something he had “occupied” for now. The real Captain Duncan had died a century ago. That, he knew.

But all this time, only he knew this—well, to be exact, the Goathead First Mate in the Mortal Realm might also know, but it would never say it out loud.

This was a fact that could not be announced on the Vanished.

Yet the Goathead that seemed to be the Dream-Skull in front of him had spoken this truth directly.

Duncan raised his head and looked at the ruined cabin around him, then through the empty windows toward the broken masts, the deck, and the distant rail outside.

This shattered Vanished sailing through Subspace did not change at all just because someone in the captain's cabin had torn open the secret that "the captain is not Duncan."

Was it because this was Subspace? Because this ship was only a projection? Or was it because the Dream-Skull that had pointed it out was not a part of the Vanished, so its knowledge could not affect the ship's stability?

Duncan slowly drew back his gaze and looked down again at the Goathead on the table.

Then what exactly was this Goathead? Was it the true body of the Dream-Skull, or only the Dream-Skull's projection in Subspace? Or… had the Dream-Skull been split into two parts from the very beginning, one part found by the cultists, and the other always left here in Subspace?

After frowning in thought for a while, Duncan tried asking: "Who are you?"

The Goathead on the table fell silent. A long time passed, and just when Duncan thought it was not going to answer him, it suddenly opened its mouth: "I do not know."

Duncan suddenly felt a little curious: "Then what do you know?"

This time the Goathead stayed silent even longer. When it finally spoke, its answer was still the same: "I do not know."

"…You do not know anything, yet you know I am the 'captain' here, and you also know I am not Duncan," Duncan said, his expression a bit odd. "Then do you know this ship? Do you know where you are?"

The Goathead did not respond at all. It stayed silent and still, as if it had become a real wooden carving.

Duncan slowly understood. The mind of this “Dream-Skull” was not complete.

Unlike the “First Mate” in the Mortal Realm, this Dream-Skull seemed to have only a few scattered memories and a broken, fragmented way of thinking. Even though it showed some ability to talk here in Subspace, that ability only let it answer a few questions. As soon as a question went “out of range,” it fell into stillness.

Yet within this damaged and fragmented mind, the Dream-Skull still knew that the “captain” of this ship right now was not “Duncan.”

Duncan fell into thought. A vague guess was already forming in his heart.

This might still be tied to that “deal” the real Captain Duncan had made with Saslokar deep in Subspace a century ago.

In that deal, the Vanished, which had almost been fully swallowed and assimilated by Subspace, had been reshaped into a real ship again by the King of Dreams. In return, the King of Dreams, broken and trapped deep in Subspace, had gained a chance to escape. Even though what escaped was only a spine and a shard of skull, and even though almost all memory had been lost, Saslokar had indeed returned to the Mortal Realm.

The Dream-Skull before him should be one of the fragments that had failed to escape from Subspace back then. It had gone through that deal as well, so it knew what had happened to the real Captain Duncan, but it remembered it only in broken pieces.

Duncan had a strong feeling that this Dream-Skull still knew more—more about Saslokar, about Subspace, and about the Vanished of that time.

But its damaged and chaotic thinking could not sort out those scattered memories.

Just as Duncan’s thoughts followed this path and he began to consider how he might use mental guidance on this Dream-Skull to get more answers, a light tremor and a strange noise from some unknown direction suddenly broke his train of thought.

The Vanished was shaking. Something outside the hull seemed to be drawing near.

Duncan lifted his head from the table at once and, by instinct, looked toward the nearby window.

Vast, rolling shadows, and a pale, cracked “land,” had appeared at some unknown time in the endless darkness outside the window. That huge pale structure moved slowly past the ship. On its surface, besides shocking cracks and wounds, there were lines and patterns that looked almost like skin.

Duncan’s heart suddenly jolted, as if he had thought of something. He strode quickly to the window.

At that moment, new shapes appeared on that slowly moving “pale land” outside the window—first a widened fissure, then dark yellow, murky crystals, and then a huge mass of eye tissue that almost filled the entire view outside.

A gigantic eye was slowly moving past the captain’s window.

Duncan stood at the window, watching that cloudy single eye slide across his field of view. As his sight moved with it, he saw the structures around it—a pale, inhuman face.

Then his gaze went even farther. He saw the immense body that rose and fell in the darkness, and the broken land that seemed to be “embedded” all around that body.

It was the pale, one-eyed giant that bore a shattered land on its back in Subspace.

Duncan suddenly remembered. The first time he had entered Subspace, he had seen this shocking being from afar.

But that time he had only skimmed past at a distance and had not even had time to see any real detail of the giant or the land on its back. This time, the Vanished was gliding past right against the giant’s face.

The impact and shock of this sight were far stronger than before. Even Duncan felt a sense of suffocation for a moment.

He kept his gaze on the slowly moving giant outside the window, on that cloudy, dead eye.

That dead, cloudy eye also quietly gazed back at him. As the Vanished moved, the eyeball slowly turned. In the chaos of Subspace, it calmly fixed its gaze on Duncan.

Duncan: “…?!”

He blinked and checked again. The giant’s cloudy eye really was turning slowly as the Vanished passed. That eye had seen the Vanished. It was staring at this ship.

Chapter 667: Reflection in the Eye

In the boundless, chaotic darkness, at the far end of a shattered continent, the one-eyed giant was gazing at the ghost ship passing close by. This “Elder God,” which had been dead for an unknown number of centuries, silently turned its cloudy eye. It was as if that eye had briefly awakened from the long river of time and was following the uninvited guest that had broken into this place.

Duncan stared hard at that eye. His whole body grew tighter bit by bit. Even if he would not suffer the so-called mental corruption, he still felt a suffocating pressure in the face of such a sight. But he did not make any rash move. He did not try to respond to that eye in any way. He simply let the Vanished slowly sail past the giant’s face and watched the eye, turning to its limit, slowly recede toward the stern.

The pale, one-eyed giant did nothing else. It still bore that broken mass of land on its back, floating in the endless, chaotic dark.

From behind Duncan, the Goathead that seemed to be the Dream-Skull suddenly spoke: “giants was the first to die.”

Duncan jerked around and looked at the “Dream-Skull” sitting honestly on the table.

“What did you say?” he could not help asking again.

“giants was the first to die,” the Dream-Skull repeated. Its tone and wording did not change at all. After that, no matter how Duncan questioned it, this was the only answer it gave.

Realizing that this broken fragment of an Elder God could only give this one response right now, Duncan did not keep pressing it. Instead, he turned back and looked at the one-eyed giant slowly fading outside the hull. After a long moment, he murmured to himself: “When the stars shattered and fell apart, the pale giant king Salmir died in the first Long Night…”

In the endless darkness outside the porthole, a faint layer of noise seemed to appear quietly when he spoke the name “Salmir,” then faded away like the wind.

Duncan glanced once more toward where the one-eyed giant lay, then suddenly frowned. After a brief hesitation, he stepped toward the captain’s door.

Before he left, he looked back once at the Dream-Skull on the chart table.

It was still staring at him. The obsidian-carved eyes were empty and dead.

Duncan ignored that unsettling gaze and turned to leave the captain’s cabin.

He climbed the slanted steps from the aft deck to the helm platform above the captain’s room. He walked across the lifeless, mottled, rotten planks. At the end of the platform, the heavy helm waited for him, swaying slightly left and right against the dark background of Subspace.

It felt like a silent invitation.

Duncan walked up to the dark-colored helm and took a deep breath.

He was about to do something bold. Taking the helm of this broken Vanished in Subspace was only the first step.

Once he calmed himself, he reached out, gripped the helm, and released the Power of Flame.

In an instant, fire spread out. The invisible, unreal fire of his spirit form swept over the whole ship in the blink of an eye. Then it slowly became transparent and faded away into nothing. Duncan felt his perception suddenly expand, and then that familiar feeling of “emptiness” came back with the feedback from the spreading flames.

He once again felt the emptiness of the Vanished and sensed its phantom nature. The flames seemed to spread directly through Subspace itself, touching nothing but cold and void.

But this time Duncan was ready. He did not let the shock of this “emptiness” cut off his link with the fire. He ignored the unease of feeling as if he were floating helplessly in Subspace without any protection. Instead, he focused more of his attention on the helm before him. He tried to give this helm real substance and control this phantom ghost ship through it.

Creaking noises rose from beneath the helm. The whole phantom ship began to tremble slightly. The spirit form sails filled out. In some unseen distance, it felt as if cheering came from far away, echoing from every direction.

The captain had returned.

Duncan slowly turned the helm. He felt the ghost ship floating in the darkness tilt a little and adjust its heading according to his control.

A strange feeling rose in his heart. He had truly taken control of this ghost ship sailing in Subspace. What was more, he even felt that sailing through Subspace was easier and smoother than sailing in the Mortal Realm.

The Vanished traced an arc through the dark. The bow turned one hundred and eighty degrees and faced once more the fragment of a heavenly body that looked as if it had been torn from a planet. The pale, one-eyed giant that had already drifted far away appeared again in Duncan’s view and slowly drew closer.

Duncan steered the ship back toward this Elder God.

When the Vanished came within a certain distance, the giant's cloudy single eye on that pale face turned again. In the dark, it stared silently at Duncan.

Duncan acted as if he did not care about this gaze at all. During their close brush earlier, he had already noticed that this eye's stare had no effect on him. Compared to the nervousness such a gaze might cause, he now cared far more about gathering information.

The Vanished slowly closed in on the giant's face. In Duncan's view, the cloudy eye grew larger and larger until it almost filled the entire height of the hull's side.

Duncan stopped the ship here, let go of the helm, and walked over to the rail to study the eye up close.

The giant's eyeball shifted slightly, its empty pupil turning toward him. The dead, cloudy eye was veiled by a layer of pale mist inside the globe. Duncan saw his own figure reflected on that misty surface, blurry and unreal.

"…What are you looking at?" Duncan suddenly asked in a low voice, driven by some feeling he could not name.

But he got no answer. The giant really was dead. The turning of that eye seemed to be only some "inertia" left after the ancient God's death, or a faint "aftershock" in that massive corpse, maintaining a false image of life.

Duncan suddenly remembered a saying: after the Universal Extinction, in the cooling embers, the corpses of the Elder Gods ruled over the ashes of the world.

These dead Gods, even if they died again, and even if another long age passed after that, their remains still kept a certain level of "operation." Their death was a strange, indescribable state. Even if they were broken into countless fragments like Goathead, twisted into impossible shapes, this “operation” would go on. It was as if this long process could continue forever.

Duncan still did not really understand what these so-called “Gods,” or the ancient Elder Kings, truly were, or what state they were in now. But from this pale giant king before him, he felt that he was slowly touching some “face of the Truth.”

Just then, Duncan suddenly frowned.

He seemed to see something.

Inside the giant’s cloudy eye, behind that misty veil, there seemed to be something else.

Duncan leaned in a little closer and studied the murky reflection even more carefully. He tried hard to pick out recognizable shapes from the shadows marked by the traces of time. Gradually, he finally picked out some things.

First he saw a huge being, with the fierce look of some sea beast yet a graceful and holy air. This being stood at the front. Beside it, there was a human-shaped figure wrapped in flames, standing to one side. Behind these two shapes, he could see some vague, glowing things. They seemed like a row of ordered lights, set into the surface of a giant cube.

Besides these, there were giants in black robes, like corpses; twisted, unspeakable masses; shadowy clouds floating above all these beings; tall, thin, crooked limbs; thick clusters of thorns; and pale golden arcs of light…

Many hazy, ghostly outlines like these were reflected in the giant’s eye. Each had a strange form. They stood in silence and solemn stillness in the dark.

Duncan stared, stunned, at those figures that seemed to pour out endless power even as mere reflections. Only after nearly half a minute did he suddenly realize what he was seeing.

These were “Gods,” the images of the ancient Elder Kings.

The single eye of the giant was reflecting a scene from long, long ago. In an age even older than ancient times, in some veil of night between the Great Annihilation and the Deep Sea era, these towering beings had once gathered here. They had stood in silence around the giant, surrounding it.

Their forms had been branded deep into this cloudy eye.

This had been a funeral.

It was the moment when the Gods saw off the pale giant king after his failed act of creation and death.

Duncan’s thoughts spun fast. At the same time, countless new ideas rose in his mind. Using the tales known in the world and the information he had recently gathered, he tried to match each reflected form in the giant’s eye with something he knew. But aside from the known Four Gods and a few other Elder Gods, most of the figures had no match in any legend or record.

More than half of those forms were completely unknown to him. They were not in the orthodox scriptures. Even in the wild myths and twisted stories of the cultists, he could find nothing about them.

Duncan stood there in silence.

If each “God” stood for a powerful civilization that had survived the end of the world, then it seemed that more than half of the Elder Gods had already fallen quietly before the third Long Night. Not even The Blasphemous Tome had kept their names.

Ancient Elder Kings who had died in the act of creation, like the pale giant king and the King of Dreams, were actually the lucky ones among these fallen beings.

Duncan let out a soft sigh and stepped back, ready to turn and leave.

But in that sigh, he noticed another detail.

His own figure was now reflected in the giant’s eye as well.

The reflection stood among the ancient Elder Kings whose forms had been frozen in the long river of time.

There was an empty place there, not too big and not too small.

It was as if, a hundred centuries ago, when those beings had gathered here to see off the pale giant king, they had already left that spot open.

Chapter 668: Held in Starlight

Among the many figures reflected in the chaotic single eye of the Pale giant King, one place was left empty—was it a coincidence, or the deliberate work of the ancient Elder Kings?

Duncan only knew that when he walked to the rail and carefully examined that giant eye, he happened to be standing in front of that empty spot. His figure reflected there, and only after he picked out the other unspeakable shapes from the murky sediment and mist on the eye's surface did he notice this.

It might really have been just a coincidence—he wanted very much to tell himself that. But in Subspace, before the corpse of an Elder God, he did not believe in coincidences like this.

Duncan's brow tightened. He then carefully, bit by bit, slowly stepped back, as if afraid of waking something that slept here.

The dead Pale giant King, and the figures of the Elder Kings reflected in that eye—Duncan always felt that these beings were silently laying a gaze upon him, watching his every move, like a distant gaze cast from the long river of time.

Moving with cautious, slow steps, he left the space directly before the eye.

Yet in the next second, he saw his own figure appear again, once more quietly reflected in that eye, standing among the Elder Kings.

Duncan’s eyes widened a little at once. He felt as if his heart suddenly skipped half a beat, and right after that, an even more unexpected sight appeared:

The image of himself left in the giant’s eye began to change.

That tall, imposing blur in a captain’s uniform and gloomy tricorn hat started to shake and shift, as if some illusion was fading. The figure quickly turned into another form—a “human” in a white shirt and black trousers, not very strong, with a face so blurred it could not be made out.

That was Zhou Ming.

Zhou Ming stood motionless on the deck, like a statue, staring fixedly at the murky giant eye only a step away from the rail, staring at the “self” reflected in that eye.

After an unknown time, he finally took a step forward and came once more to the front of the eye. Separated only by the layer of muddy mist clotted on the eyeball’s surface, he cast his gaze at his own hazy reflection and slowly reached out his hand.

He knew he was taking a risk. In this strange and dangerous Subspace, he was making a terrifying attempt—yet in the end, his fingertips still touched the surface of the eyeball.

A feeling of “nothingness” came from his fingertips. In just that instant, Zhou Ming understood what Lucretia had meant when she described the “void” she felt when she touched that cylindrical black shadow at the border.

He was sure he had touched something, but he did not feel any warmth. He did not feel any hardness. A broken and twisted “sensation” passed in from his fingers and left him stunned for a brief moment.

In the next instant, Zhou Ming saw the reflection of himself in the eye suddenly change. The “human” in the white shirt collapsed like an unstable phantom. Every bit of color that made up the image faded and broke apart in the blink of an eye, and as the colors vanished, countless pinpoints of light surged out from within!

A field of brilliant starlight replaced that quickly dissolving figure and spread outward into the darkness. For the first second, the stars still held a vague, twisted human outline, yet countless rays seemed to overflow from the edges of that shape. The light of a whole star river almost covered the entire eyeball in the blink of an eye, then kept overflowing, rising up—the starlight finally spilled out of the eyeball, spreading from its surface!

The light flowed like a stream and brushed against Zhou Ming’s fingers. At the instant of “contact,” Zhou Ming heard a thunderous roar inside his head.

It was countless booms piled on top of one another, the “tremor” created when a sea of information was pressed into a single moment. It was a vast set of data enough to explain the rules that governed the whole world, an entrance, a gate, and the advice and thoughts of billions of people. In that brief instant that might have been no longer than a single Planck time, yet felt eternal, Zhou Ming felt as if he were being torn apart. His mind rose and sank in the roar, struggling to catch the voices layered inside it. He felt he was just about to understand what those voices meant, and many broken fragments swarmed into his head, crashing through his reason—

“…We are humans… At this moment we stand at the end of all things.”

In that roar, in those countless fragments, one voice spoke like this.

Zhou Ming’s eyes flew wide.

“…We have almost understood every secret…

“…The laws that rule the stars… time and space, the rise and fall of information…

“Until we found that the end of time is destruction… an event beyond our models of thought… happening outside our universe…

“Moving forward along time’s arrow has become meaningless… Within our finite models… the chance of ending that event is zero… We have decided to send #*#%?@ backward to…

“We… named it… ‘Inverse Singularity’… In our calculations… after that event, the only fragment that can remain whole on any timeline lasts 0.002 seconds…

“You are Zhou Ming. You… from the old-calendar timestamp 2022-07-10-07-10-00-000… ending at 2022-07-10-07-10-00-002…

“It is now 41765-12c-32-15b. All things have ended before our eyes.

“Good luck to you.

“Good luck to them.

“Good luck to us…”

Boom—

Zhou Ming felt as if he suddenly stopped after an endless fall, torn free from some frozen instant. The countless overlapping roars turned into a distant, blurred impression in his mind. The part of him that still belonged to “human” reason came back in a split second, and in that brief, fragile moment of clarity, he stumbled backward.

But at some point, all that brilliant starlight had already faded.

The starlight that had overflowed from the giant’s eye was gone. The reflections on the surface of the eyeball had vanished as well—not only the reflections of “Duncan,” “Zhou Ming,” and the Starlight giant, but also the figures that had once stood in the darkness, those shapes that symbolized the ancient Elder Kings.

The “shadows” that had gathered in this eye for a hundred centuries seemed to have been “washed” away by whatever had erupted in that instant of thunder, leaving only a hazy layer of murk that stood for death, covering the eyeball with no more information left to see.

Clearly, this eyeball was only some kind of “carrier of information,” and now, after one powerful outburst and flush of that information, everything on its surface had been wiped clean.

The surroundings grew quiet. There was no more noise, no more roaring. Subspace seemed to return to its eternal stillness. On the ruined deck of the Vanished, all things fell silent.

Yet the broken “fragments” that had rushed out in that instant of thunder still spun in Zhou Ming’s mind, like a never-ending storm that howled again and again through his reason and thoughts. Only after a long time did this “storm” slowly calm, turning into a deep impression and memory, lodged in his mind forever.

Zhou Ming stepped back a few paces and lifted a hand to press his forehead. He panted, and the wild beating of his heart slowly settled.

His ability to think returned to him.

Zhou Ming stood for a long time in the murky gloom of Subspace, letting its meaningless time flow past. He thought in that eternal silence, thought without stopping, until after an unknown span, his figure finally moved again.

He raised his head and looked into the distance.

The endless Subspace swallowed his gaze.

In that boundless darkness, countless other secrets must still be hidden—but he was already tired.

That single “roar” had almost drained all his strength. He had no energy left to steer this ghost ship deeper into that endless dark.

“…Time to go back.”

Zhou Ming muttered softly. At the same time, he walked to the captain’s door. He still remembered how to return from Subspace to the Mortal Realm. He only had to push open the Lost Ones’ Door here, step into another dark space, then open a door again inside that darkness, and he would return to the Mortal Realm dimension.

When he laid his hand on the handle of the Lost Ones’ Door, he paused. Then he turned his head and gave the boundless chaos behind him one last look.

He knew that sooner or later, he would come back.

Without hesitating again, he quickly and smoothly completed the “two-door” process of return.

When the familiar sound of waves entered his ears once more, and the salty, cool night wind brushed across his face, Duncan felt his heart finally grow calm again—he had returned to the familiar Mortal Realm.

He looked up. The cold glow of the World’s Wound poured down from high above onto the sea. Faint golden sunlight spread from the distant waters and twined with that pale light in the sky, sketching out the strange yet charming night view that belonged only to the region near Lightwind Harbor.

Soft creaks mixed with the nearby waves, with now and then the friction of ropes on the mast as they adjusted themselves.

Everything he had experienced in Subspace now felt like a bizarre dream.

Duncan shook his head. He knew, of course, that it was no dream. It was vital information, even a “truth” that pointed toward his own nature.

But for now he could only set these messy thoughts aside—for too much key information was still missing, and wild guesses would not lead to any real conclusion.

From the other side of the door came a sound from the captain’s cabin, the voice of his familiar First Mate.

“…I’ve finished talking about the customs of the Northern Seas. Now I’ll tell you about the Central Seas. I’m a very experienced seafarer, you know, the city-states of the Central Seas…”

A faint smile rose on Duncan’s face before he knew it. He felt himself relax a little again. Then he took a deep breath and opened the captain’s door.

At the edge of the chart table, Goathead, who had been chattering away at the other head, stopped at once and turned toward the captain standing in the doorway.

“Duncan Abnomar.” Duncan spoke casually before the creature could ask anything.

Goathead froze for a second, then its tone turned cheerful: “Ah! The captain is back!”

—

Chapter 669: The Captain and the Doll

Back in the familiar Mortal Realm, back aboard the familiar Vanished, with Goathead's familiar rambling in his ears—Duncan felt his heart grow steadier bit by bit. The exhaustion and tangled thoughts brought by that "roar" in Subspace also quieted a great deal.

He let out a soft breath and walked toward the chart table. Goathead seemed not to have noticed the trace of tiredness on the captain's face. It had clearly enjoyed talking to its heart's content for quite a while, and now it sounded rather excited as it began to boast: "Captain! Your loyal—well, everything after that can be left out—has made great progress! I had a very good talk with this head. We just talked our way from food on the Boundless Sea to poetry and song, and from poetry and song…"

Duncan glanced down at this noisy First Mate: "Did it answer you?"

Goathead paused, suddenly less sure of itself: "Well… not yet…"

But right after, it became full of confidence again: "But I think I'm almost there. With such open-hearted conversation, even a stone would start to talk. I think this head will soon be moved by my sincere words. Maybe in a little while it will greet you, Captain, and…"

"Save it," Duncan cut off Goathead at last, helpless. "That head will not answer you—most of it is still in Subspace."

Goathead let out a sharp little “crack,” like words had suddenly slammed on the brakes in its throat. It stared blankly for two seconds before finally reacting: “Did you say Subspace?”

“Didn’t you notice?” Duncan lifted a hand and pointed at the captain’s door. “I was resting in the bedroom, yet I came back out through the cabin door. While you were having your ‘open-hearted’ talk with your other head, I had already gone into Subspace and come back once.”

Goathead’s skull wobbled and began to tremble.

“Don’t shake like that. As you can see, nothing bad happened,” Duncan said offhandedly as he sat down beside the chart table. His gaze fell on the other, pitch-black “Goathead” on the tabletop. “The Dream-Skull didn’t answer you because its main body is in Subspace. I had a… limited talk with it there. As I saw it, things were just as I had guessed before: it doesn’t have a complete mind and memory like you.”

Goathead finally caught up. It had never imagined that, in the short time the captain had gone back to his room for a ‘nap,’ he had already made another trip into Subspace. The news he now brought back from ‘over there’ was even more shocking. Goathead turned its neck and looked at the head on the table. Only after a long time did it squeeze out a question: “Then… what did it say to you?”

As soon as it spoke, it seemed to regret it, and hurried to add: “Ah, if it is the kind of ‘knowledge’ that is not very safe, then forget it. My curiosity is really not that…”

“It knows some things about ‘Duncan Abnomar,’ about as much as you do. To a degree, you should share the same ‘initial memories.’ But that part is not something we should talk about on this ship. It is enough that we understand each other,” Duncan waved his hand with a calm face. “You know what I mean.”

Goathead’s mouth snapped shut at once.

Of course it knew what the captain was talking about.

But that topic must never be brought up aboard the Vanished—this ship would be sunk by that “truth.” Without “Captain Duncan” as an anchor, it would fall back into Subspace once more.

This was the “unspoken agreement” that had formed between them after a period of sailing together, built through many hints and careful cooperation on both sides.

The captain’s cabin grew quiet. Duncan sat in his chair and rested, slowly gathering his strength again. The Dream-Skull lay motionless on the table. Its empty eye sockets stared at nothing. Goathead seemed to be deep in thought as well. No one knew what this “First Mate” was thinking about. Only after a long time did it suddenly raise its head: “Aside from that, you also…”

“The Pale giant King,” Duncan said. “The creator mentioned in The Blasphemous Tome, the one from the first Long Night. Its corpse has fused with the creation wreckage from that Long Night… but I can’t say more than that. It could be harmful.”

Goathead stiffened for a moment, then slowly lowered its head: “All right. I won’t ask.”

Duncan answered with a quiet “mm.” He did not speak again, but sank into memory and thought.

Even though he knew idle thinking could not give him any useful conclusion right now, he could not stop his mind from turning to those “fragments” that had poured into his head, and to the voice that had spoken to him in that roar.

Even broken as they were, he could still draw a lot from those words—

They were a race that had almost cracked the Truth of all things.

A civilization that already stood at the peak of time and space.

They called themselves “humans”—yet they were clearly very different from the “humans” Zhou Ming knew in the year 2022.

They had walked the path of civilization for too long, and had almost reached the end of the Truth.

Yet they also met their end on the day of the Great Annihilation. Unlike other destroyed peoples in other worlds, they might have been the only civilization with the power and chance to observe the Great Annihilation in full and prepare for it.

Even though they still could not stop the Great Annihilation from coming, it seemed they had found some way to preserve one complete… “seed” at the moment of Universal Extinction.

Duncan turned his head and calmly set his gaze on the oval antique mirror hanging on the nearby wall, on the figure reflected within.

Now he finally knew why there was no red light that stood for the destruction of all things in “his own memories”—because the Great Annihilation had not taken place in the era he knew.

The Great Annihilation lay in a far-off future.

But compared to these possible “truths,” an even bigger question filled his heart.

Why did there have to be a “Zhou Ming”?

He sat behind the table and thought, thought for a very long time. At last, he forced himself to put all the worries in his head aside for the moment and walked to the door.

“I’m going to walk on deck.”

He said this to Goathead, then pushed the door open and left the captain’s cabin.

The deck was wide and quiet. The pale glow of the World’s Wound shone on the distant sea. The water was calm. Now and then small waves slapped the hull, but the sound was soft, not noisy at all.

Duncan walked slowly along the edge of the deck with no goal in mind. He no longer thought about those distant questions that were doomed to have no answer. It was as if he walked only to empty his head, only to feel the night wind.

He kept walking until he saw a slender figure appear not far ahead, and then he stopped.

Alice was sitting on a big barrel near the rail—that was her favorite barrel. She rocked her body gently on it as she looked out at the sea. Her lower legs swung back and forth, and she seemed to be humming some odd tune under her breath.

Duncan listened for a while and then realized that it was the sailor’s minor-key tune Goathead sometimes hummed. Goathead’s pitch was not very true to begin with, and now, after being “improved” by Alice, the tune had grown so crooked that probably only a handful of people on the whole Boundless Sea could still recognize it.

Yet in Alice’s humming, it still sounded pleasant.

The doll finally noticed Duncan approaching. She stopped at once, jumped happily down from the barrel, and called: “Captain!”

“Mm.” Duncan’s mouth curved in a small smile. “I came out for a walk.”

Alice blinked, then suddenly looked very seriously into Duncan’s eyes.

“You look a bit tired. Do you have something on your mind? Is there another big problem you have to deal with?”

The doll’s sharpness took him by surprise, and he froze for a moment. Soon he smiled and shook his head: “It’s nothing. I just happened to be thinking about something. Why are you still not asleep this late? Do you have something on your mind too?”

“No,” Alice answered with a bright grin. “I’m just a bit happy, so I can’t sleep.”

“Happy?”

Alice jumped into an excited explanation at once: “I sent all the ‘spoils’ to the kitchen! They’re very useful—the ‘friends’ in the kitchen didn’t seem very happy at first, but after I explained, they accepted those ‘new friends’…

“I also checked the meat we salted before. It’s in great shape! This time not even a single barrel spoiled. In about a month we can use it for cooking…

“I pickled some cucumbers too. Nina taught me. She said pickles go with smoked meat patties, and they’re much better than the way Goathead taught me…

“I also found a big bunch of never-used pencils in the storage room at the stern of the second deck. I don’t know who put them there. I’m going to use them for drawing. Lunie is really good at drawing. She said she can teach me, but we have to wait until she has time…”

The doll went on like this, talking happily about all kinds of small things, things so tiny they hardly counted as “good news” at all. Yet she truly found great joy in these little matters. Each one made her excited—and now she was doing her best to pull out that joy and share it, hoping to make the captain a bit happier too.

Even though she had no idea what the captain usually worried about or thought about.

Duncan did not interrupt her. He only listened quietly, and he listened for a long time, until a real smile returned to the depths of his eyes.

Alice finally stopped, blinking in the night as she looked at Duncan with simple, bright happiness.

“Alice, have you ever thought about your own ‘birth’?” Duncan asked after a moment. “Have you ever wondered why you came into being, and why you think? Why you are ‘Alice,’ and what ‘Alice’s’ future will be? Have you ever thought about questions like that?”

“No!” Alice answered without even a second of hesitation. Questions that could keep philosophers busy for a whole lifetime were, to her, simple to the extreme—she never thought about them. “Never!”

But as soon as she said it, she seemed to feel that her answer sounded a bit careless. She hesitated and added: “Is that a bad answer? Does it make me seem a bit silly? Do you usually think about these things, Captain?”

Duncan looked at the doll, half amused, half helpless.

Then he laughed and slowly shook his head: “You answered very well.”

Alice did not understand why.

Duncan did not explain. He simply reached out and gently pressed his hand over the doll’s hair.

“If you want to draw, I can teach you.”

“Captain, you know how to draw?”

“A little. A very long time ago… Do you want to learn?”

“Yes!”

Chapter 670: A Gloomy Future

At 99 Crown Street in Lightwind Harbor, inside the Witch residence.

Shirley lay bored over the windowsill, staring blankly at the street outside.

Peace and order had already returned to this city-state. Although many people were still troubled by the Dream After-Effect, the physical damage this Lightwind Harbor incident had caused was clearly far less than in Pland and Frostholm. At least, in the parts of the city one could see, most people's daily lives had already gone back to the tracks they knew.

Some children ran cheering through a crossroads where the blockade had been lifted, holding colorful pinwheels as they dashed along the street in the bright sunlight.

It was close to noon. Vision 001 hung high in the sky. Many pretty blue rooftops across the street were bathing in the sunlight. Now and then, Shirley could see members of the Knowledge Guard in Guardian uniforms standing on high spots, watching the neighborhood with wary, serious eyes.

"Yawn…" Shirley stretched in a long, lazy way, then turned her head and glanced at Nina beside her. "What have you been doing since early morning?"

Nina sat behind a small table near the window, head lowered, gripping a pen and sketching in a big notebook. Her other hand held a glowing little "fireball", which she sometimes raised to her mouth to take a small bite. She did not even lift her head when she heard Shirley: "Mechanical design. I'll take it to the custom workshop later…"

Shirley listened in a daze. She could not help leaning over to look at the dizzying gears and linkages on Nina's pages. She stared at this friend who loved to study, full of confusion: "…Didn't the Old Gentleman say he wrote to Pland to help you drop out of school? You don't have to take exams anymore, so why are you still working so hard?"

Nina immediately lifted her head and looked at Shirley with a very serious face: "It wasn't dropping out. It was early graduation. I didn't have much to do on the ship, so I finished all the high school courses. Teacher Morris talked it over with Uncle Duncan. They said there wasn't much point in me going back to school like this, and the normal path for people doesn't really suit me, so they handled an early graduation for me…"

Shirley was dumbfounded: "You can do that?"

"Normal people can't, but Teacher Morris vouched for me. He can," Nina said. She picked up the little Sun in her hand and took another bite. She chewed with a crunching sound and mumbled: "And I think it's pretty good. I didn't have many friends at school anyway, and I've been following Uncle Duncan on adventures outside for so long. I probably wouldn't fit in if I went back…"

Shirley did not even notice what Nina said at the end. From the middle on, her attention had already fallen on that little "fireball" Nina was gnawing on. She held back for a long time, then finally could not help blurting out: "You've been chewing on this all day… Is that thing tasty?"

Nina casually handed the little Sun over: "Do you want to try?"

Shirley jumped back two meters at once: "I haven't lived enough yet!"

"It's actually not hot at all…" Nina sulked a little as she pulled the little Sun back and muttered: "What a pity. I even wanted to ask Miss Vanna to try it earlier, and she turned me down too…"

“Anyone with a normal brain would never accept that. Honestly, the scariest part is that you can really use this as a snack,” Shirley said. She kept a safe distance from Nina and looked at the fireball in Nina’s hand with a strange expression. “You just eat it like this… Are you really okay? The captain and the Old Gentleman really let you do this?”

“Yeah. After they confirmed it didn’t have any bad effect on me, Teacher Morris even encouraged me to keep ‘testing’ and ‘observing’ it,” Nina nodded and said. “He said my ‘devouring’ process of this Sun might reveal the transformations and compatibility between certain fragments of the Old World, and might even help find a way to solve the chaos at the base of all things… I don’t really understand the details, but he and Uncle Duncan talked about it for a long time.”

As she spoke, she lifted the little Sun again and took another small bite: “The things they discuss have been getting more and more advanced lately. This morning, after Uncle came back from the ship, they discussed for another two hours. I even heard them say they should find a way to capture another Ender to study, and they were talking about where to go catch one…”

Shirley’s face changed halfway through listening. She turned to look toward the living room not far away.

Duncan and Morris were sitting on the sofa in the living room. In fact, their discussion had been going on in fits and starts the whole time and had not ended yet.

Alice was sprawled beside Duncan at the coffee table. She held a pencil and was totally focused on doodling her “drawing” on a sheet of white paper.

“…We have never been this close to the ‘truth’ of the world’s origin. The ‘impact’ we observed in the deepest part of Atlantis’s memory is so far the only ‘event’ that can explain the Great Annihilation… I have been in contact with my mentor since yesterday. As far as I know, he has already shared this information with the other three popes…”

Morris spoke with a very serious face. In his hand, he absent-mindedly played with an exquisite crystal prismatic lens. sunlight from the window fell on the lens and kept refracting into all kinds of bright colors in his hand.

Duncan slowly nodded: “The Great Annihilation brought deadly chaos and conflict, and that chaos and conflict is still rooted in the essence of all things… The third Long Night did not solve that underlying clash. It only delayed its outbreak. Now it seems that this ‘delay’ has reached its limit. The coming of ‘dusk’ really cannot be avoided.”

“The key question now is what will happen after ‘dusk’ arrives, and in what form this so-called ‘fourth Long Night’ will come and end,” Morris said, his tone full of worry. “One obvious fact is that no matter what, our current ‘Deep Sea era’ will go through drastic change in that process. The city-states on the Boundless Sea… may be wiped out just like in the first two Long Nights.”

He suddenly stopped. After a few seconds of silence, he shook his head: “Or even worse.”

Duncan did not answer. Once the topic stretched to the coming “dusk”, the scene he had seen in Subspace rose in his mind on its own.

The ancient Elder Kings had circled around the pale giants who had died at creation, holding a funeral for an Elder God amid a dim Doomsday.

If every “Long Night” had to match a “dusk”, then the reflection he had seen in the giant’s single eye was the scene at dusk.

He also thought of that spreading starlight, and the roar that had come from deep within the stars.

After he had stayed silent for who knew how long, he finally spoke softly: “Maybe only the ‘Elder Kings’ can really answer my questions.”

Morris looked up in surprise: “What did you say?”

Duncan shook his head and did not answer. After thinking for a moment, he changed the subject: “From the information we have now, whether they are Annihilators or the Sunspawn of the Sun, they are all making preparations for the coming ‘dusk’. The word those Annihilators mention the most is ‘a new place’—in the next era after the Deep Sea era, they want to take a place in advance.”

“That may match the idea of ‘the abandoned races’ in the third Long Night,” Morris said at once with a nod. “Based on the evidence you recently found, not all ‘races’ could coexist after the Genesis Protocol. Many races were left outside the Sanctuary World during the third Long Night. The Black Sun may have been only one of them. Many more abandoned races probably did not even leave behind a single scrap of information…”

He paused a little here, seeming to fall into thought, then went on: “And if we start from the idea that ‘the basis of all things is conflict and destruction’, and add the condition that ‘the Gods build the next era on the world’s Embers’, then the coming fourth Long Night may mean building the next era on the Embers of the Deep Sea era. The most likely result is…”

Morris hesitated, but Duncan had already finished the words he had not said: “The next era will be a ‘Sanctuary World’ even narrower, tighter, and more crowded than the Deep Sea era.”

The living room fell into a brief silence. Only the soft scratching of Alice’s pencil on paper went on. The doll did not care about the questions she could not understand. She was just lost in her own “creation”, still full of interest.

After a minute or two, Morris finally slowly put down the prism in his hand.

“More ‘races’ will be abandoned. More creations of civilization will turn into the next era’s ‘Blasphemous Archetypes’. They will be destroyed, exiled, not allowed to stay in the Mortal Realm dimension, not even allowed to stay in the records of history. Many things we value in this era will become the next era’s corruption and taboo, just like the Sun’s Remnant Folk who were abandoned in the last era…”

Duncan nodded lightly: “So those cultists are making their preparations, hoping to secure a place to live in that next, even narrower ‘world’, or at least a ‘spot’ that will not be wiped out so easily. Stealing the power or remains of the Elder Gods is the method they have thought of—though whether it will really work is very doubtful.”

“But what happens after that? Will there be a fifth Long Night, a sixth Long Night? This cycle may keep going, and even speed up, until some limit is reached. And in that process… the ‘Sanctuary World’ will keep getting smaller and more cramped…”

Morris’s thoughts kept spreading out. In the end he was almost talking to himself, describing the ending he had worked out from his dark, pessimistic reasoning.

Embers could reignite, but any rekindling had a limit. A fire that kept shrinking could only ever warm fewer people than before, until the fuel ran out and all things fell into eternal silence in the cold.

In the next era, there might no longer be the Boundless Sea. The last place for civilization to live might be only a single city. After that, it might be only a town, a neighborhood, a single house, a small rock floating in the void. The last faint, muddled strand of “civilization’s” reason would cling to that stone, recalling the glow of past civilizations in a dull, witless daze, and then die in its last dreamlike murmur as its mind faded.

That would be the true end of all things.

Chapter 671: News of the Gathering

Morris's guess pointed to a dark future where all things were silent forever. The chill it brought was far worse than any strange, shocking prophecy of destruction, far worse than the Doomsday calamity muttered by madmen.

It was a dark and icy extinction. The last firelight would slowly go out in civilization's Embers. The afterglow of civilization would be choked bit by bit in wave after wave of deadly shrinking, like a ship that was slowly sinking. In despair, people would throw weight off the ship again and again to try to delay its fate, but in the end, every plank of the ship would still fall into that endless dark abyss of sea.

What was even harder to accept was that, judging from the information they had, the chance of this future was very high. It might even be the best of all the possibilities.

Because at least "civilization" would still have a chance to cling to life for a while after the fourth and fifth Long Nights. At least it could still enjoy a little last, false peace in that Sanctuary World that kept shrinking and collapsing.

In a worse case, there might not be that many later Long Nights at all. The third Long Night had already been a once-only "sacred miracle" and "stroke of luck". The coming dusk would be the day of the true end of all things.

[…Maybe that would be a better outcome?]

All kinds of thoughts rose and fell in his mind. At last, Duncan shook his head and pushed these messy ideas aside for now: “We’ve fallen into pessimism, Morris.”

“We have. Making these guesses when we still don’t know when or in what form the fourth Long Night will come… is a bit early,” Morris said. He rubbed his brow and finally pulled himself free from that gloomy mood. “My mentor is putting together a ‘gathering’ that will span the four great churches. You will be invited to that gathering. At least by then, we should be able to exchange more and better information. The popes of the Four Gods also need the truths we have.”

Duncan gave a small nod. He was not surprised by this news, because it was one of the “agreements” he had already made with Pope Rune of Truth.

If anything, he was a little curious how that elven old man had persuaded the popes of the other Three Gods to accept this “proposal”. Pope Helena of the Deep Sea was easier to talk about. Duncan had dealt with her in Pland, and he also had a link through Vanna, the “secret envoy”. That pope was more or less a leader who was neutral but leaned friendly. But the other two…

Frem, the head of the Flamebearer Church, might be interested in the “Chronicle Pillar” in Vanna’s hand. And what about Banster of the Church of Death?

Duncan’s expression shifted subtly a few times. Then he raised his hand and tapped the pocket mirror on the coffee table: “Agatha.”

Agatha’s figure almost instantly appeared in the mirror: “I’m here.”

“…Are you close with Banster?”

“In ‘my’ memories, there was a time when I received guidance from His Holiness the pope and trained on the ‘Graveyard Ark’,” Agatha said after thinking for a moment, not sounding very sure. “But that is far from really being familiar. There are many Saints on the Boundless Sea. I’m not as ‘special’ as Miss Vanna.”

Duncan rubbed his chin, thoughtful: “…Then you probably don’t really know whether Banster cares a lot about that frigate from back then…”

“He cares a lot.”

Duncan: “…”

He had not even finished his sentence!

“He cares a lot,” Agatha repeated. Then, as if she was afraid Duncan would not believe her, she carefully explained: “Even someone as obscure as me would hear him sigh over that beautiful frigate every now and then.”

Duncan: “…”

“Of course, His Holiness the pope sometimes tries to seem more generous,” Agatha went on, recalling. “He usually starts by saying ‘Actually, I don’t mind that much’, then sighs for a while, and in the end he finishes with ‘It’s just a pity. I designed it myself… Of course I don’t really mind.’”

Duncan almost lost his straight face: “…Isn’t that exactly really minding it?!”

“Ahem.” At this point, Morris suddenly coughed twice at the side, cutting off the increasingly odd rhythm of Duncan and Agatha’s talk. “I think that compared to that famous frigate the Ephemeral, the Viseran Thirteen Isles will be an even more sensitive topic at the gathering.”

“In fact… the Viseran Thirteen Isles may not be that sensitive,” Agatha shook her head instead. “Even though it was a greater loss, inside the Church of Death there are some priests who tend to treat it as a ‘Subspace disaster’. They think that what caused that disaster was the Dimensional Collapse Phenomenon rather than the Vanished. The Vanished only fell into Subspace together with the thirteen isles. It's like a big fire where two people are dragged into the flames together. We can't say that the person who climbed back out of the fire is the arsonist.

"This explanation did not appear out of thin air. Many academic studies on the 'Border Collapse Phenomenon' support it.

"Of course, this explanation is quite controversial inside the Church. For obvious reasons, the bishops don't like this interpretation that 'defends the Vanished'. But since His Holiness the pope has already accepted the invitation to the gathering, I believe he is ready to use this explanation to define what happened back then… or at least to steady the bishops' attitude.

"By comparison, the 'Ephemeral incident' really was a… direct, undeniable attack. The Vanished took that ship away right in front of the fleet."

Morris suddenly understood: "So that's how it is…"

Duncan then reacted: "Wait, that ship really was called 'the Ephemeral'? That wasn't just a nickname people gave it after the incident?"

Agatha and Morris both nodded quietly.

Duncan's expression turned strange: "…Why would you give a ship such an unlucky name?"

"…It's the Church of Death's naming tradition for warships. In fact, it's our tradition when we name many things. For example, the main battleship called 'Wrongful Death', and the long-barreled cannon model 'Sudden Passing'," Agatha said with a calm face. "We see death and passing as a necessary part of the workings of the mortal world. Words related to them are not really taboo for us. And strictly speaking, the name 'the Vanished' isn't very 'lucky' either, is it?"

Duncan thought about it and felt that the Gatekeeper was right.

Just then, Alice suddenly looked up, cutting off the exchange between Duncan and Agatha: “Captain, I finished my drawing!”

Even Agatha in the mirror was startled by the sudden noise. Duncan could not help looking at the doll with a rather odd expression.

Alice had had her head down drawing this whole time, as if all the talk and discussion happening around her belonged to another world. Now that she had finished her “creation”, she wanted to show her work to the captain without any worry or second thought.

For a moment, Duncan even felt a little jealous of the doll’s good mood.

Alice happily pushed the drawing over to Duncan.

It was a… clumsy piece of art.

At a glance you could see how unpracticed the artist was. You could even see that the artist was not even used to holding a pencil. There was no talk of any technique at all, let alone beauty or composition.

On it was a very big and very abstract ship. Dark pencil marks outlined the sails and ripples of the water. A few little stick figures with arms stretched out were standing on the deck. The strokes were a mess, but you could still barely tell the people of the Vanished apart—

Vanna was very tall. Morris had a pipe in his mouth. Shirley and Dog were together. Nina had little flames on her head. Agatha was a dark shadow. Ai perched on the mast. Goathead was sticking his head out of the captain’s cabin window…

Duncan stood on the highest spot wearing a captain’s hat. He was clearly drawn with more care, but was still crooked.

Other than Duncan, each “person” on the ship had lines trailing off from their bodies, drifting and curling in the air.

Morris leaned over curiously for a look, and his expression turned a bit odd: “Uh… As a first ‘drawing’ it’s actually… not that bad. But in general, you can’t see lines on people… At least you don’t need to show them when you draw.”

The old mister’s comment was very gentle, but Alice clearly had her own view: “But they’re really there.”

Morris looked a bit helpless. He raised his head to look at Duncan, and Duncan just started laughing.

“They are there,” Duncan said with a smile. His gaze rested on Alice’s first “masterpiece”, and slowly, a thoughtful look appeared in his eyes. “…This is the world in her eyes.”

“Right?” Alice said at once in pride. “So I didn’t draw it wrong!”

“But…” Duncan noticed another problem. “Why aren’t you in the picture?”

Alice froze at that. She looked down at the Vanished she had drawn and answered: “Because I’m the one drawing.”

Duncan thought it over and finally understood the doll’s logic.

He did not know whether to laugh or cry, and also found it a bit funny.

“The person drawing can still draw themselves into the picture—I’ll help you add you.”

As he spoke, he picked up the pencil Alice had left at the side. With a few swift strokes he drew Alice’s simple figure onto the Vanished, putting her beside himself.

Alice watched with wide eyes and gave a happy cry: “Wow! Captain, you draw much better than me!”

Duncan only smiled at that. He set the pencil down and carefully rolled up the drawing, then put it into Alice's hands.

"Keep it safe. This is your first 'work'."

Alice looked especially happy: "Okay!"

Duncan then turned his head and looked toward an empty spot in the living room: "Is everything taken care of?"

Almost as soon as he finished speaking, Lucretia's figure suddenly appeared in the air amid a burst of fluttering colorful paper pieces.

"Don't worry, Dad, it's all handled."

Chapter 672: Ted Riel’s Visit

Lucretia brought that creepy stuffed rabbit doll over to Duncan. She sat down on the sofa beside him, while Rabby carefully shuffled over to the side of the sofa and plopped onto the floor with a soft “thump”.

“I already sent that Saint to the containment room on the Radiant Star. There are sealing facilities there made specifically to deal with corrupted things from the border and the Spirit Realm. He will slowly recover there until he can meet your needs for the ritual.

“The surviving sacrificial victims have been placed in the city’s relief center. I have spoken with Sara Mell. Lightwind Harbor will take good care of them and try to send them back home if possible… Some of them have lost their sanity and their memories. They cannot even say where their homes are, so a psychiatrist will step in later to help.

“As you ordered, I left the artificial beacon on that ship. You should now be able to sense the ship’s condition through the beacon…

“In addition, I checked all the supplies on that ship that are still usable. There are many. We can bring them back later when we have the chance—consider it a generous haul of spoils. After all, a self-sailing ghost ship has no use for fuel or spare mechanical parts…”

Lucretia reported everything to Duncan point by point. She was clear and organized, and all her arrangements were proper.

Clearly, she was very familiar with this kind of cleanup work.

“Mm.” Duncan nodded in satisfaction and did not hold back his praise: “You did very well.”

But Lucretia parted her lips and suddenly looked a little hesitant.

Duncan noticed it and asked: “Is there anything else?”

“…I told Brother what happened here. He asked whether we needed a fleet,” Lucretia said. “Considering that the Annihilators’ ‘nest’ might be a sea fortress that has been running for centuries or even longer, and that it lies in the border fog, we may need a real ‘offensive’ next. He said that if necessary, he can send the Sea Mist fleet over.”

“That is not necessary,” Duncan thought for a moment, then still shook his head. “At least not for now. We still do not know what that nest looks like. If we expand our operation too soon, it might backfire… We should first scout out the situation in the fog.”

“Alright.” Lucretia nodded.

At that moment, a presence that suddenly appeared outside the house interrupted the conversation in the living room.

Lucretia frowned and looked toward the entryway. Almost at the same second, the doorbell rang from that direction.

Lunie, who had been standing in the corner of the living room on standby, immediately got up and walked to the front door. Lucretia quickly instructed: “No newspapers, no insurance, no lottery tickets, no community surveys. If they say they are raising money for the neighborhood, send them away at once. There was a notice last month. That bunch are all scammers —I really don’t get how anyone still dares to come here…”

“Mistress.” Before Lucretia finished, Lunie was already back in the living room. “It is His Excellency the Truth Keeper.”

“…Uh?” Lucretia blurted.

In the moment she froze, a helpless voice already came from the doorway: “I know Miss Witch never likes people dropping by, but the situation really is special this time—there is an invitation from the Four Gods Church I need to deliver to your father.”

Along with that tired and helpless voice, Ted Riel stepped into the living room. The Truth Keeper looked the same as always. The air around him carried the aura of someone who had worked overtime for a whole month without a single day off.

“Under normal circumstances, no one would dare come near your witch’s manor. Taran Ael’s lumbar spine flared up today and he cannot get out of bed, so I had to come in person.”

As he finished speaking, Ted Riel noticed Duncan sitting on the sofa and immediately showed a slight smile: “Good day, Captain.”

“Taran Ael can finally lie down for a few days,” Lucretia said casually after hearing Ted’s news. “I even think that’s a good thing.”

“Not for me. I lost three sola on it,” Ted Riel said with some regret. “A few colleagues at the academy and I placed bets on which part of Taran’s body would fail first this time, and I lost badly… For the record, I bet on hemorrhoids.”

Lucretia’s expression turned a bit odd. “You people are really bored…”

Ted Riel shrugged. “But I guessed right several times before.”

Morris, who had been sitting on the sofa, now stood up and greeted the Truth Keeper: “Ted, have you recovered?”

“It was just a bit of indigestion—it did not affect me as much as those papers the brats rushed out overnight,” Ted Riel waved a hand. Then his gaze stopped on Morris without him realizing it. He looked Morris over for several seconds, puzzled and a little stunned, before finally speaking with a strange expression: “We met in a hurry last time, so I did not have time to look carefully. Morris, your…”

He suddenly stopped. After a brief hesitation, he seemed to understand something and let out a quiet breath.

“Nothing. You look quite energetic.”

“Really? I also feel that my condition is very good now. My daughter is a psychiatrist, and she also thinks my mindset is very healthy.” Morris smiled. His eyes behind the blessed monocle were as bright as ever, and his smile carried a gentle, scholarly warmth.

Only Saints and Scholars with exceptionally strong Spiritual Insight could sense, from his smile, his gaze, and his voice, the almost unnoticeable madness and noise that had long drifted away from human reason.

Ted Riel took his eyes off Morris and looked at Duncan.

Many, many years ago, he and this man, the greatest explorer in history, had been friends.

For an elf, forming a friendship with humans was something that required great caution and a lot of mental preparation.

But back then, Ted Riel could never have imagined that all his mental preparation had gone in the wrong direction—he should not have been worrying about saying farewell to short-lived humans, but about meeting again with an immortal subspace shadow.

Fortunately, the light of humanity still shone within this shadow—though that light was filled with truths he did not dare to peer into and echoed with noise he did not dare to hear.

“I was just discussing matters of the Four Gods Church with Morris,” Duncan took the initiative to speak. “I knew there would be a gathering, but I did not expect the official notice to arrive so quickly.”

Ted Riel fell silent for a moment. He took a finely sealed letter, stamped with wax, from his coat, set it on the coffee table, and pushed it toward Duncan.

“I am not sure whether you care about something like an ‘invitation letter’, but the Academy Ark told me to give this to you,” he said. “It already bears the signatures of the Four Gods’ popes. You can see it as the Four Gods Church’s first official and formal gesture of goodwill toward the Vanished Fleet.”

Duncan’s gaze fell on the beautifully sealed letter. He reached out, opened it, and took out the special “invitation” inside.

On the stiff card, neat handwriting stated that the Four Gods Church would hold a “special closed meeting”, and it extended an invitation to “the master of the Vanished Fleet”, “Captain Duncan the great explorer”. The content itself was nothing remarkable. Only the four shining signatures at the end of the invitation strongly drew Duncan’s eyes.

They were as dazzling as arcs of electricity burning in the dark—Rahm, Tarrigan, Gamona, Bartok.

Duncan calmly looked at those names and actually did not feel surprised at all.

“It says here the meeting will be held tomorrow—that soon?” He put away the invitation and spoke casually.

“Yes. At least judging from Your Eminence Rune’s attitude, the sooner this gathering is held, the better,” Ted Riel nodded. “Before noon tomorrow, the Four Gods Church's fleets will arrive one after another near Lightwind Harbor. All the Pilgrimage Arks will appear—that will be a grand event."

At this, Duncan paused in surprise. Beside him, Morris let out an involuntary gasp: "Ah? You mean the gathering will be held in the Mortal Realm, and the four popes will gather here?"

"Yes. At first I also thought it would be a 'meeting' held through Psychic Resonance, like the gatherings the popes and Saints held in the past. I did not expect the meeting to take place in the Mortal Realm, much less that it would be… tomorrow."

"For such an important 'closed meeting', this is almost the same as having no preparation at all, and the Pilgrimage Arks themselves need time to sail…" Duncan seemed to have thought of something. "So the most reasonable answer is that the four Pilgrimage Arks had already been moving to the southern border beforehand. Even before the Lightwind Harbor incident, the Four Gods Church might already have planned a gathering. What happened in Lightwind Harbor just gave them an unexpected chance to hold it here and set it for tomorrow?"

"It seems so."

"…Has something happened recently? Is it related to the Church's frequent activities in the border seas these days, and those fleets being gathered near the Eternal Veil?"

"I know about the situations you just mentioned, but I do not know the inside story."

Duncan was a bit surprised. "Even you, the Truth Keeper, do not know about these things?"

"I truly do not know," Ted Riel shook his head. "The Truth Keeper, the Inquisitors, the Gatekeepers, and the Firekeepers may all be the city's highest Church representatives in name, but what we handle is only city affairs. The four Pilgrimage Arks actually operate independently of the entire Church system. The four popes command those arks directly. All the ‘secrets’ are sealed within the ark fleets and do not interact with the cities or with how the Church runs between cities—especially… the more dangerous secrets.”

He raised his head and looked into Duncan’s eyes very seriously.

“It is a necessary safety measure.”

Chapter 673: They Were “Communicating”

For Lightwind Harbor, which had just woken safely from a nightmare, the collective visit of the four Pilgrimage Arks felt like another strange and bizarre dream. It all happened too suddenly. Even the scholars of the Truth Academy and the governor seemed to receive word only when the arks were about to arrive. So even when the Deep Sea Church’s Storm Cathedral appeared on the sea horizon, the citizens of Lightwind Harbor still felt as if it were unreal.

The Cathedral ships of the Four Gods had truly arrived.

Aside from the Academy Ark, which had been moored beside Lightwind Harbor ever since the “Nameless One’s Dream” incident, the first to arrive was the temple of the storm goddess Gamona. The Storm Cathedral reached them at dawn that day. When Vision 001’s radiant halo pierced the sky, the huge pilgrimage temple emerged from a bank of condensed fog onto the sea surface. It and its escort fleet approached from the western side of the city and moored along the coast when the morning bell rang for the third time.

After that came the Flamebearer’s Cathedral ship. The “Flamebearer Temple” surfaced on the sea along with Vision 001’s rising glow, as if sunlight from a blazing sun had fallen into the mortal world. It sailed out of a mirage that looked like flaming sunlight and docked between the Storm Cathedral and the Academy Ark.

Death god Bartok's Cathedral ship arrived last. The "Death Sanctuary" appeared from a bank of dark, dense fog with solemn bells ringing. Its vast shadow swelled and grew in the mist, like a huge graveyard entering the Mortal Realm from the land of the dead. It and its two escort sister ships —"Closed Eye" and "Unclosed Eye"—moored beside the Storm Cathedral.

Those four Cathedral arks, each as huge as a small city-state, almost "surrounded" Lightwind Harbor. If part of their escort fleets had not been left out on the nearby sea in advance, their full escort ships would have nearly crowded out every stretch of shoreline around Lightwind Harbor. If a pair of eyes with nearsightedness and astigmatism had looked down from the sky just then, they might even have confused Lightwind Harbor with the neighboring Pilgrimage Arks and seen them all as one giant, continuous cross-shaped island.

The city's City Hall issued a temporary order in the morning to seal the harbor and ban near-shore sailing. The Truth Academy announced that the four great Churches would temporarily hold a "special closed meeting" in Lightwind Harbor.

After that, curious citizens gathered near different parts of the harbor. They fought to claim good spots so they could get a look at the Cathedral ships' grand shapes. After all, the Cathedral arks usually sailed along secret routes on the Boundless Sea. Ordinary people almost never saw them. This time they had not only appeared near the city, but all four arks had shown up together. Even elves, with their long lifespans, might not see such a sight many times in a lifetime.

On the tallest tower of the city academy near the western coast, Duncan was standing on a balcony, looking toward the shoreline.

He had nothing else to do anyway, so he stood there watching each Church's Cathedral ship appear one by one. The sight was quite spectacular.

“Your Cathedral arks really all have their own special tricks,” he sighed casually.

“To move such massive ‘ships’ quickly across the sea, the power of steam engines alone is not enough,” Ted Riel stood beside Duncan on the high tower balcony, enjoying the wind as he explained. “Each Cathedral ark is both a ship and an supernatural item. Those huge cathedrals and academies on them are not just decoration. They draw the Gods’ power into the Mortal Realm and give the arks all kinds of unbelievable traits. They can race through storms, pass through mist and flame, or become invisible to mortal eyes and calm the tempests of the sea…”

Duncan turned his head with some curiosity. “Then what ‘sacred miracle’ does the Truth Academy’s Academy Ship rely on to sail so fast?”

“…Outstanding engineering. We built two hundred and sixty engine arrays. With enough power, even bricks can fly.”

Duncan: “…?”

“To make machines run, to make theory work, to make paradoxes hold—that in itself is part of Rahm’s sacred miracle,” Ted Riel clearly saw the odd look on Duncan’s face and could not help laughing. “The same engine arrays would not even start on other Cathedral ships. If they did not blow up on the spot, that would already show their craftsmanship is excellent.”

“…The Gods’ sacred miracles are truly unbelievable.”

Duncan shook his head with a subtle expression. After sighing under his breath, he turned his gaze and looked toward the distant shoreline.

He had seen the Deep Sea Church’s Storm Cathedral and the Truth Academy’s Academy Ark before. But this was the first time he had seen the Death God’s Death Sanctuary and Flamebearer Temple. Just like the other two Cathedral ships, these two Pilgrimage Arks had very distinct styles.

Flamebearer Temple gave people an ancient, solemn feeling. Gray-white stone buildings of different heights spread across the massive ark base. Those solemn and mysterious structures were totally unlike the styles found in modern city-states. They looked more like “ancient temples” restored straight out of some historical paintings. The most striking structure stood at the center of the complex: a huge high platform, encircled by solemn stone pillars. A ring of blazing flames burned around the top of the platform. At the center of that fire stood a strangely shaped giant pillar. That pillar looked very much like the Gatekeeper’s cane that Vanna had received from Tarrigan. It was obviously the Chronicle Pillar worshiped by the Flamebearers.

The Death Sanctuary was much gloomier. Black-toned Brother-style buildings were the most common “scenery” on that ark. Its core facility was a pitch-black temple shaped like a great pyramid. The temple sat on a high ground in the center of the ark, surrounded by tall towers, and it gave off a grave-like heaviness. At first sight, Duncan understood why many people simply called the Death God’s Pilgrimage Ark “the Great Graveyard”. It really did look the part.

No matter which ark he looked at, Duncan saw illusory projections floating above them in the air, like spirit forms that normal eyes could not see.

He lifted his head and, face calm as still water, used his gaze on those “spirit forms floating over the mortal world”.

Smoke-like and mist-like, tentacle-shaped phantom limbs spread out from those spirit form projections. They drifted silently over all of Lightwind Harbor like hazy Restless Souls. They did not disturb one another, but sometimes a phantom “tentacle” would suddenly stretch out from its own “body” to touch a tentacle stretching out from another ark—

Duncan noticed this “contact”. He instinctively felt that these hurried touches were not coincidences but something intentional.

He even felt that some of those phantom tentacles were practically… giving each other high-fives.

Some spirit forms drifting over from the harbor floated near the academy’s tall tower and circled around the balcony.

Duncan hesitated for a moment. He glanced back at Ted Riel, who did not seem to be paying attention here, then quietly rubbed his fingers together.

A wisp of spirit form flame appeared in the air and quietly touched those Spirits of the Ark drifting there, which mortal eyes could not see.

In careful perception, he touched the “thoughts” that flowed between those spirits.

Some strange, deep noises echoed in Duncan’s mind. Then, inside those strange, deep noises, actual understandable messages appeared. He heard whispers that did not sound like humans vibrating through time and space… They were “communicating”!

That vibration went deep into his consciousness—

“…The weather is nice.”

“It is okay. This place is really hot.”

“Better than up north. My tentacles were frozen stiff up there…”

“Didn’t you lose all your tentacles a long time ago?”

“Phantom limbs.”

“What are they going to talk about today?”

“How would I know—I just woke up.”

“…Huh? I also just woke up. What are they even going to talk about today?”

“…Stop asking. We all just woke up.”

Duncan: “…?”

Ted Riel finally noticed Duncan’s sudden subtle expression and, even more, the flicker of phantom flame that had flashed in the air. The Truth Keeper tensed up at once: “What happened?”

It would have been better if he had not asked. As soon as he did, Duncan’s expression became even stranger.

But before the Truth Keeper grew so nervous that his stomach acted up again, Duncan forced himself to get his expression under control and shoved that bizarre feeling in his mind aside. He kept his face as calm as he could, looked up at Ted Riel, and asked: “…Do the arks talk to one another?”

“The arks? Talk?” Ted Riel froze at the question. “What do you mean?”

The expression on the Truth Keeper’s face did not look fake. Duncan could tell at a glance that this was probably another special “secret” that only the inner circle knew. Remembering that even Vanna did not know many of the Storm Cathedral’s secrets, he decisively waved his hand. “You do not know, so it is fine.”

Ted Riel instinctively wanted to ask more, but just before he opened his mouth, a faint warning rose in his heart.

He wisely shut his mouth.

Duncan changed the subject at the right moment: “The Four Gods’ arks have all gathered. Where exactly will the meeting be held? Inside Lightwind Harbor?”

Ted Riel shook his head and began to explain patiently: “Lightwind Harbor is not suitable for the meeting. On one hand, a gathering like this might affect the ordinary people in the city. On the other hand, this meeting came up so suddenly that the city has not made any preparations. There is also the question of secrecy.

“The message I received said we should wait for further notice. This time, what we will discuss points straight at the Great Annihilation and already touches the foundation of the world. That means even an offhand remark from anyone at the gathering could cause unpredictable consequences. Even the popes, Your Eminences, must choose the meeting place very carefully—

“Right now they are each on their own arks, using psychic echo to commune with the Gods and seek revelation. The final meeting place will probably be chosen from among the four arks.”

Duncan waved a hand, unconcerned. “Alright, then I will wait patiently. I just hope it does not take too long.”

Ted Riel nodded. But in the next second, the Truth Keeper suddenly frowned. It was as if he had heard a voice coming from far away, and his expression turned strange at once.

“What is it?” Duncan noticed the change and asked curiously.

Ted Riel was silent for a few seconds, a trace of confusion in his eyes. “… On the Fifth Ark…”

Chapter 674: The Fifth Ark

In a boundless, chaotic darkness, the spirit projections of Helena, Rune, Banster, and Frem gathered together.

The four Popes had already finished all their discussions for the meeting, yet they still did not disperse. The final guidance sent down by the divine will left them uneasy and confused.

Just moments ago, when they were choosing the meeting place, the Four Gods had, in a rare move, sent down a strong sign at the same time. Even though that “sign” was still mixed with massive, chaotic noise, all four Pilgrimage Arks were clearly ruled out by the deities.

In the guidance They sent, Helena, Rune, and the others were asked to go to “the Fifth Ark”.

Helena lowered her head. In this dark space woven from Psychic Resonance, a mass of flame burned faintly in her field of vision. She used her gaze on that flame, and only after a long time did she speak carefully: “…the Fifth Ark… what does it make you think of?”

“What else could it be?” Rune shook his head. “The answer is obvious. Besides the four Cathedral Arks, there is only one ship here that could be called ‘the Fifth Ark’.”

“…To be honest, this is the first time in my life I’ve doubted the result of an oracle.” Banster hesitated for several seconds, then finally raised his head and said to the other three, “We did agree to invite that captain, but to hold this crucial gathering on ‘that ship’? That was never part of the plan. And the will the Lord sent down this time feels a bit… strange, don't you think? We haven't heard such a clear and forceful voice in many years…"

"They are urging us on, Banster," Frem said in his deep, calm voice. "We all know that time is running out, and of course They know it too."

Helena tilted her head slightly and glanced at Banster. "You're not still hung up on what happened with the Ephemeral, are you?"

"Of course not." Banster shook his head at once. "So many years have passed. I don't really care about that ship anymore. I'm just being a bit cautious… Of course, that's only my personal feeling. It can't change the command we've received. The revelation about 'the Fifth Ark' has already been sent out with the divine will. In truth, we don't have any other choice."

In the dark space, the four Popes fell silent at the same time.

Helena lowered her head again and fixed her gaze on the illusory flame burning in her sight. She knew that deep down she shared the same caution, even the same doubts, as Banster. But she chose instead to trust the Storm Goddess's guidance without question.

In that long, wordless gaze, she seemed to see the illusory flame in her sight slowly rise and spread in silence. The shifting fire turned into a gentle sea. The tide rose and fell before her eyes, and a vast, ancient vision slowly walked out of the waves toward her.

The image of the Storm Goddess rose out of the darkness. Behind the Goddess floated an even vaster, even more unspeakable "reality". That overlapping, tangled presence reached out gently toward Helena. Helena felt more than one cold touch brush against her soul, coil around her mind, and whisper at her ear:

"While there is still time…"

The vision of the tide faded. The soft sound of waves vanished from her ears as well.

“Go and make preparations,” Helena said, raising her head and looking calmly at the others. “Tell the Bishops who are coming to the gathering. Tell the duty crews on the arks. Let them know about ‘the Fifth Ark’. Everyone needs time to adjust, but also tell them that the time for preparation is limited.”

“And don’t forget to teach them some basic facts about ‘that ship’,” Rune reminded them. “It’s not like the Cathedral ships everyone is used to. I don’t want anyone stepping onto ‘that ship’ and causing some embarrassing misunderstanding because they get spooked.”

“You won’t manage to cover everything. There are too many strange things on that ship. Even now, Vanna keeps telling me about new, unbelievable situations from time to time.” Helena waved her hand. “Just tell everyone coming to the gathering this: no matter what they see on that ship, even if they see someone boiling their own head in a pot, they are not to scream. Treat everything as a natural occurrence.”

“Before we talk any further, we should contact that captain first,” Frem added suddenly, after staying mostly quiet until now. “We went ahead and made his ship the meeting place all on our own, but we still haven’t asked the Master for his opinion.”

Rune nodded. “Of course. We also need to arrange the boarding process and how people will be transferred over. The meeting schedule might also need an urgent adjustment… With the venue set somewhere other than the four Pilgrimage Arks, a lot of things will no longer go according to plan.”

“So many things to do…” Helena sighed wearily. Before her voice even faded, she waved her hand and her figure slowly disappeared into the darkness. “I’ll contact my own Saint first…”

“I need to talk with my own student as well.” Rune spoke right after, and his figure faded as well.

Soon, only Banster and Frem were left in the dark space.

“See you again in the Mortal Realm.” Frem, who was like a giant of living stone, waved his hand, then turned and vanished into the depths of the darkness.

Banster shrugged.

“I really don’t care about it anymore… Why does no one believe me…”

…

“What?! They’re coming onto this ship? Those Popes and Bishops?!”

In the captain’s cabin of the Vanished, Goathead, who had been busy chatting with his other head, clearly jumped in shock when he saw Duncan suddenly return and heard the news he brought. “Did they take the wrong medicine?”

“Don’t look at me. I’m surprised too,” Duncan said casually, giving Goathead a glance. “But the news has been confirmed. It’s even the will of the Four Gods. The four Pilgrimage Arks are all ruled out. The final meeting place has been chosen as ‘the Fifth Ark’.”

He paused, his expression a bit odd. “The Vanished is the ‘Fifth Ark’.”

“…Aha. Those Enders say the Vanished is the ‘Promised Ark’, and now the ones who worship the Four Gods have slapped another name on us, calling us the ‘Fifth Ark’. The mighty and fearsome Vanished has suddenly become a good place to be…” Goathead shook his head, his tone clearly mocking. “Keep this up and they’ll probably start saying you’re a good person too. Is that their way of insulting you now…”

Duncan: “…”

After holding it in for a couple of seconds, he finally couldn't help himself. "I suggest you at least straighten out your worldview a little. You've recovered part of Saslokar's 'essence', after all. Acting like this makes it really hard for me to connect you with the 'Creator' of the second Long Night."

"It's not like I actually made it happen," Goathead muttered gloomily. "And the one who did isn't doing any better. The 'Holy Lord' is still stuck in the passage between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and Subspace. From how Dog describes it, it sounds like someone stuck in a toilet drain…"

Duncan felt he really couldn't keep talking with Goathead. Since when did this guy's jokes start carrying so many hidden jabs?

"Don't think I'm just being mean. I just feel something about this is strange," Goathead added quickly, noticing the look on the captain's face. "Those crazy Enders treating the Vanished as some kind of 'Promised Ark' is one thing. But now those Four Gods, whose own state is pretty suspicious, have suddenly sent 'divine will' and say the Vanished is the 'Fifth Ark' beyond the four Pilgrimage Arks… No matter how I hear it, it sounds wrong."

Goathead muttered as he turned his head on its base, then looked at Duncan very seriously.

"'Ark' has a special meaning on the Boundless Sea. The world only recognizes four true arks. Aside from the four Cathedral ships, any vessel that dares call itself an 'ark' is a heresy. And now the Vanished has suddenly been given the title of 'the Fifth Ark'. I can't shake the feeling that someone is trying to push the Vanished into danger… Of course, we've pretty much been dealing with one crisis after another this whole time anyway…"

Duncan's expression did not change as he listened to Goathead ramble on. When Goathead finally finished, Duncan casually asked, "When you say

‘they’, do you mean the four great Churches, or the Four Gods behind them?”

Goathead froze for a moment. “…Is there a difference? The four great Churches are just the executors of the Four Gods’ will. To put it plainly, they’re Their henchmen…”

“There is a difference,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “If you mean the four great Churches, they shouldn’t have the ability to push the Vanished into real danger yet. But if you mean the Four Gods behind the Churches, then I’m already very interested in Them. If this whole ‘Fifth Ark’ arrangement is something the Four Gods want to do, that’s perfect.”

Goathead: “…”

Instead, Duncan suddenly grew a little curious. He looked Goathead up and down. “You’re not interested? As the former ‘King of Dreams’, now that you’ve taken back part of Saslokar’s memories, you’re not even a little curious about your old ‘colleagues’?”

“Not interested at all,” Goathead said after thinking it over, shaking his head from side to side. “I haven’t recovered any memories from the time between the Great Annihilation and the Deep Sea era. So for me, the so-called ‘Elder Kings’ are just a completely foreign idea… Maybe that’s something to be regretted, but I don’t feel regret.”

Duncan gave Goathead a long, serious look, but in the end said nothing.

He walked over to the chart table and sat down on the chair there.

“I’ve already brought Nina and Morris back to the ship. As witnesses who saw the Great Annihilation with their own eyes, they will also attend this gathering.

“I have accepted the invitation from the Churches of the Four Gods. Right now this ship is heading to the agreed location near Lightwind Harbor. The Radiant Star will meet us there. Lucretia will bring a group of her servants aboard to help us prepare for the gathering.

“Speed up. We’re going to keep our appointment.”

Chapter 675: The Gathering

The leaders and Bishops of the Churches of the Four Gods were going to gather on a ghost ship that had returned from Subspace to hold a meeting. No matter when you said that sentence, it would sound explosive. In any city state, if someone shouted such a thing in the street, everyone who heard it would have to think hard about whether to report it to the Inquisitors or to the nearest mental hospital.

But now it was really happening.

The Vanished arrived at the appointed place at the appointed time. It stopped in the calm waters near Lightwind Harbor, close to the great storm Cathedral. Then the Visitors from the four Pilgrimage Arks began to arrive one after another in small boats.

Shirley lay behind a railing at the stern deck, poking her head out as she watched the priests on the middle deck. They were all either nervously looking around or trying to act calm while their whole bodies stayed rigid. As she watched, she whispered to the Shadows beside her: “They really dared to come… Do you see that bald uncle over there? His forehead is so shiny, his whole head is covered in sweat…”

Dog’s muffled voice came from within the Shadows. “This is way too scary… Back in the city state, we would avoid even a few Guardians, let alone people at this level…”

“Times have changed… That’s the phrase, right?” Shirley said proudly. “Now they’re the ones who have to avoid us, at least on this ship. Hey, do you want to jump out and scare them? You don’t get chances like this very often…”

“I can jump out, but the captain might beat you up afterward. Should I really jump?”

“No, no, no, I was just joking…”

On the deck, Lunie, the doll who had come to the Vanished with her Mistress, was calmly giving mental guidance to the Visitors, leading them across the central deck toward the door into the ship. The clockwork doll glanced back toward the stern deck, then turned to explain to a Deep Sea priest in Bishop’s robes beside her: “That is Miss Shirley. She is the Old Master’s student. You don’t need to be nervous.”

“But I can feel the presence of Abyssal demons…” the nervous Deep Sea Bishop couldn’t help saying. “It’s right next to that ‘Miss Shirley’…”

“That is Mr. Dog, Miss Shirley’s guardian dog,” Lunie explained calmly. “He is also the Old Master’s student. You don’t need to be nervous.”

The Deep Sea Bishop: “…?”

Lunie did not care about the strange look that suddenly appeared on his face. She clapped her hands and looked up to address the priests who had just boarded around her: “Let me stress some common points again

“The ropes on the ship may sometimes start moving on their own. If they tie you up, don’t worry. They’re just playing, and if you greet them they will loosen up. If you see buckets rolling around, don’t mind them either, they are probably just carrying things. If you pick up a silver haired doll’s head and don’t see the rest of the doll nearby, please bring the head to the main mast and give it to a talking pigeon. The pigeon will help return the head to its body.

“Also, do not go into areas that are not open to you. If you get lost, stop where you are right away. You are not forbidden to pray to a deity on this ship, but your deity cannot help you escape from a sealed cabin, so it is better to remember the rules I mentioned before. If you see something on the ship that looks like a Deep Sea spawn, stay calm and walk away. They are fish. Don’t mind any strange shadows that suddenly appear in mirrors or dark corners. That is Lady Agatha taking a walk, she will not enter the Visitors’ rooms…

“Always remember, the ship is safe and friendly in spirit. If you feel like you are about to die, please repeat this line in your heart, the ship is safe and friendly in spirit. Reflect on whether your own actions broke the rules, instead of doubting that the environment is at fault…

“Finally, I hope you all have a full and productive day aboard the great Vanished. Food will be served after the meeting. Please rest assured, it will all be substances that humans can eat.”

The clockwork doll smiled and bowed to the Visitors.

“Now, please follow me. We will head to the hall.”

The priests who had boarded were nervous, doubtful, or quietly on guard as they watched this ghost ship wrapped in countless strange tales and a dangerous aura. The “safety briefing” given by a clockwork doll on the deck did not ease the tension in the minds of these fairly normal people at all. It only made the eerie feeling of the place even stronger. But under the push of duty and responsibility, they could only swallow their misgivings and honestly follow the strange clockwork doll toward the ship’s interior.

Vanna stood at a distance under a mast, watching the busy Lunie with a trace of worry. She couldn’t help muttering quietly, “I don’t think Miss Lucretia should have sent Lunie to do the ‘reception’… It would have been better to send me and Mr. Morris…”

“But I think this is fine,” Helena’s voice sounded beside her. The dignified female Pope stood next to Vanna with a faint, puzzling smile on her face. Her gaze fell on the distant deck, and there was even a hint of cheer in her tone. “This will let them understand, in the shortest time, why I kept telling them before we boarded ‘not to make a fuss’ and to ‘treat everything on the Vanished as perfectly normal’.”

She paused, then looked thoughtfully at the huge silhouettes of the ark ships out on the sea. “The Bishops have deep learning and high skill in divine magic. But they have spent too long on arks where ‘order is normal’. That kind of ‘normal’ will not last forever.”

Vanna felt there was some deeper meaning in the Pope’s words. But before she could ask, Helena spoke first: “Are you getting used to this ship?”

“Uh… it’s fine,” Vanna said, startled, and quickly answered. “Everyone is very kind. I can also come into contact with a lot of knowledge I never knew before, and I keep gaining experience fighting heresy and blasphemy.”

“That’s good,” Helena said with a smile. Before Vanna could speak again, Helena was already walking toward the ship’s interior on her own. “We can talk after the gathering. We mustn’t make the ‘captain’ wait too long.”

Vanna froze for a moment. Right after that, she noticed that a pair of eyes seemed to be resting on her.

She followed that feeling and looked toward the source of the gaze, and saw a very tall figure, especially striking among the crowd, watching her from the distant deck.

It was a Senkin, dressed in a simple short robe, with skin like gray white rock and deep, steady eyes.

It was Frem, the leader of the Flamebearers.

The Senkin Pope, who was like a small giant, nodded to her from afar and then left in silence.

Vanna felt dazed. In the instant her eyes met that calm gaze, she could not help recalling that endless desert, and the old giant who had walked across the sands beside her…

A second later, Vanna suddenly snapped out of it. After a brief hesitation, she too stepped toward the ship's interior.

The captain's call was sounding in her heart. The time had come.

Everyone gathered in the largest cabin on the upper deck of the Vanished.

It was called a "meeting hall", but in truth it was just the dining room on the Vanished. The servants Lucretia had sent ahead had cleaned it up a bit, rearranging the tables and chairs to make it look like a conference room.

Compared to the splendid temples and grand shrines on the Pilgrimage Arks, this "meeting place" was clearly not very magnificent.

But the people gathered here obviously did not dare focus on how "plain" it was.

This was the Vanished, a shadow that had returned from Subspace, the "Fifth Ark" revealed and confirmed by the Four Gods together. Any unremarkable corner on this ship carried a different kind of meaning for the world.

Just being able to set foot on this ship was enough to become the memory of a lifetime, even for venerable Bishops and the "inner court" priests of the Pilgrimage Arks.

All unrelated personnel had already left. The automaton servants sent from the Radiant Star as "support" closed the doors of the hall as they went out.

The ordinary priests sat around the outer edge of the hall. Dozens of Bishops were divided into four areas according to the deities they followed. In the center of the hall, a ring of chairs had been set up. Helena, Frem, Banster, and Rune sat on four of those chairs. Facing them were the true Master of this ship and the Master's followers.

Duncan had deliberately asked Lucretia to arrange the venue this way.

He could tell that every gaze in the room was focused on him, and those looks were very complicated.

The nervous air around these people had never faded from the very start.

But he did not care.

"We meet again." His gaze first fell on Helena opposite him. This female Pope of the Deep Sea had been the first orthodox leader he met in this world, and one of his starting points for contact with the civilized world. "Welcome to my ship. I have kept my promise. I still stand on the side of 'civilization'."

Helena returned the greeting with proper, polite manners, but her eyes still could not help drifting toward Vanna, who sat not far from Duncan.

The Pope's expression stayed calm and gentle, but there was something odd deep in her eyes.

Just now, Vanna had very naturally sat down on the side that represented the Vanished…

This Saint of the Storm and Inquisitor of the Deep Sea had not hesitated at all.

But soon she put away that strange feeling. After quickly smoothing out her expression, she spoke, breaking the somewhat frozen mood in the room.

“This is a closed door meeting. I trust that everyone already understands its nature. So let us skip all formality and get straight to the point.

“We are here to discuss what has already happened to our world, and what is about to happen.”

She turned her head, her gaze landing on Rune beside her.

“The most learned among us has brought something. It may help explain to those here who still do not know the truth what… the ‘Great Annihilation’ is.”

Rune nodded, then gestured to the side.

A Scholar immediately stepped forward and handed him an object covered with black cloth.

Duncan watched curiously. He saw Rune lift the black cloth, and what lay under it surprised him for a moment.

It was a birdcage.

Inside, a small black bird sat quietly, looking very ordinary.

But Rune’s expression had become serious. He lifted the birdcage in his hands and showed it to everyone present.

“This is a black feathered short beaked auk. It has another famous name, well known in scholarly circles.

“Madbird. In 1726, the famous ‘Haipa Incident’ gave this little bird that terrifying name.

“To talk about the ‘Great Annihilation’, I must start with this little bird.”

Chapter 676: Haipa Incident

A bird?

Duncan had indeed thought about where he should start when he tried to explain the truth of the Great Annihilation and the current state of the Deep Sea era. After all, the collision of worlds and their “incompatibility” were such abstract ideas that not everyone could understand them in a short time. But he had never expected Rune to begin this topic with a small, ordinary-looking bird.

He looked up and saw that Morris, who sat beside him, had already grown thoughtful the moment he saw that “Madbird”.

Under the curious gazes of everyone present, Rune set the bird down on the table in front of him. His voice was calm and clear, like a patient mentor in a classroom, as he explained the ultimate truth of this world to the bishops who were gathered there:

“The black-feathered short-beaked auk is probably one of the oldest and most widespread bird species in this world. They lived along the safe coasts of the city-states, and also on lonely islands far out in the dangerous open sea. Explorers even found traces of them living in some dreadful waters that we classified as Visions. But if you only looked at their bodies and their habits, the black-feathered short-beaked auk had nothing special at all. It was only a very tough little bird. That was all.

“Until 1723, when some scholars suddenly put forward a very interesting, or rather very creative, idea: those animals that lived in this world together with humans but had senses different from humans—what did ‘all things’ look like in their eyes?

“The first person who raised this idea was a famous scholar of the Truth Academy, Haipa Strumm. The thought came to him while he was playing with his pet dog at home. He gazed into the dog’s eyes and suddenly thought of how its eyes and brain were built differently from those of humans. He thought of how this special set of senses must understand and know the world in a strange way, different from humans. When that curiosity grew so strong he could no longer suppress it, he designed the famous ‘Haipa Experiment’.

“By using a series of complex occult studies rituals, he linked his own senses with those of an animal. The first test was carried out between him and his pet dog.

“The first experiment failed. The dog almost died in the process. Later examination showed that, in the instant the link formed, the dog suffered enormous mental pressure. It was completely beyond what an animal could endure.

“So Haipa Strumm designed a second test. This time, he decided to choose a slightly ‘lower’ life form, a creature with a simpler brain structure. He only needed to share this creature’s senses. He did not want it to die early from pressure because its brain was too complex. The creature he finally chose… was the black-feathered short-beaked auk.

“In the afternoon of a day in August 1726, Haipa Strumm finished all his preparations. He put the little bird in a special cage, where it could see the sky outside, and then he lay down on the experimental bed beside the cage. The ritual began.

“One hour later, Haipa Strumm was dead. His terrible screams and a strange roaring sound shattered every window in the laboratory. When his soul collapsed at the moment of death, it triggered a howl in the Spirit Realm. As a result, twelve assistants and apprentices were harmed by that howl.

“Compared with many other experimental accidents and supernatural disasters that caused far more serious losses, the ‘Haipa Incident’ did not actually kill many people. However, some of the… chilling ‘facts’ that it revealed left a long shadow over the academic world. From that experiment onward, every attempt to build Shared Senses between different species was listed as an absolute taboo.

“And this is the ‘fact’ that was revealed in that accident.”

As Rune spoke, he reached into his robe and took out something. It seemed to be nothing more than a folded, ordinary piece of paper.

He unfolded the paper, and dense, crowded patterns came into Duncan’s view.

“People found a torn-off page of notes beside Haipa’s corpse. When they discovered his body, it was already terribly twisted. All his flesh had warped into a horrifying form, as if it had been corrupted by the power of the Elder Gods. This page of notes was clutched in the scholar’s right hand, the only part of his body that still kept a human shape. investigators judged that he probably drew these things in great haste, during his rapid fall into madness, using the last fragment of his sanity.

“Please do not worry. This is only a replica, copied from the original file. The parts that carried corruption have already been removed. It is safe for everyone to look at it.”

Rune lifted the paper and showed it to everyone in the hall.

What was on that page? What had Haipa Strumm actually seen before he died?

To be honest, even Duncan could not connect those abstract, tangled lines with the “Haipa Experiment” Rune had mentioned. He only saw a mass of curved lines that looked like spasms drawn on paper. Trembling shadows lay over a series of strange geometric shapes. Countless eye-like or hollow structures spread across the page. The first feeling it gave him… was nothing but eerie confusion.

The hall fell silent. The Haipa Incident was not a secret, but not everyone knew as much about it as the scholars did. Many bishops from the Deep Sea, from the Death Church, and from the Flamebearer Church were hearing these details for the first time. The strange and suspicious parts of this event made everyone sink into deep thought.

“This is what Haipa Strumm saw at the moment of his death through the Shared Senses,” Rune’s voice sounded in the quiet hall. “What you are looking at is the ‘world’ in the eyes of a black-feathered short-beaked auk. And that trembling cluster of lines piled near the edge… that is Haipa Strumm himself.”

A low buzzing of voices rose at once around the room. The bishops sitting along the edges of the hall began to whisper to one another. Some people looked at the still-ordinary-looking black seabird on the table with shock or deep thought in their eyes.

The “Madbird” seemed frightened. It hopped in the cage, beat its wings, and let out a series of sharp, clear cries.

Rune pulled the dark cloth back over the cage.

“This is what once happened in our world, and what still keeps happening in the ‘underlying essence’ of all things,” he said as he raised his head and calmly swept his gaze across the hall. “The essence of corruption lies in the ‘incompatibility’ of all things. What is only a simple thing in our view, under another view—or under another set of ‘rules’—is deadly corruption piled upon corruption.”

In the time that followed, Rune slowly described everything he had seen in the deepest part of the Nameless One’s dream.

He spoke of the true nature of the Great Annihilation, the truth behind the collision of worlds, the reasons behind the many corruptions and twisted phenomena of the Deep Sea era today, and those “eternal conflicts” that still remained in the laws at the bottom of the world.

“…On the day the Great Annihilation took place, many worlds ‘collided’ with each other,” Rune said. “We still do not know why this collision happened. But the result… was a ‘Haipa Incident’ spread across countless civilizations, countless races, countless worlds. In that collision, every world was both a ‘Madbird’ to all the others and a ‘Haipa Strumm’ to all the others. Under the view of the ‘basic rules of the worlds’, unspeakable corruption twisted everything. All the old order vanished. And the survivors…”

Rune stopped. He slowly stood up and looked around at every person there.

“We, and everything around us, even the entire Deep Sea era,” he said, “are nothing more than Haipa Strumm’s last scream at the moment of his death. That scream is still echoing to this day, but it is already close to its end.”

The old man let out a soft breath and slowly sat back down in his seat.

“I am finished,” he said. “Does anyone wish to add anything?”

As he spoke, his gaze fell on Duncan, who sat opposite him.

“You spoke very fully,” Duncan said. “This is all we currently know about the Great Annihilation. Next, we should talk about the gods—the guesses about their true nature, and what you have been doing recently. That is what I care about most.”

The bishops around them stirred again. The four popes sitting on the other side of the table exchanged a brief look when Duncan finished speaking. The noise quickly faded, and the Flamebearer Pope—the tall figure in simple robes, with skin gray-white like stone—gave a small nod.

“From the clues we have, the gods should be the powerful or special beings that remained after each world was destroyed in the Great Annihilation,” Frem said in his low voice. “They are like ‘charred cores’ left after a great burning, carrying the last glow of a world.”

As he spoke, Frem raised his hand and traced the outline of the Flamebearer emblem over his chest, as if confessing his offense in ‘judging the gods’. But he went on:

“…The Great Annihilation destroyed everything of the Old World. Strictly speaking, the gods also did not survive that disaster. And as for this… we actually noticed it a very long time ago.”

When he heard Frem’s words, Duncan’s eyes widened a little: “You had noticed this before?”

At the same time, he saw shock flash across the faces of Morris and Vanna beside him. Clearly, even as Saints, this was the first time they had heard such words from the mouth of a pope.

This was a “secret” kept only inside the Pilgrimage Arks.

Frem gave a small nod.

“Yes,” he said. “We noticed it long ago. It is only now that we understand the reason behind it all.

“The gods are dead and have already begun to enter their ‘decay phase’… but only a few high-ranking church members who patrol the border on the Pilgrimage Arks know this truth. And there is another truth…”

Frem paused for a moment. He raised his head and gazed into Duncan’s eyes.

“The Pilgrimage Arks were created to slow the gods’ rot,” he said. “And now, this ‘slowing’ is almost at its limit.

“The filth born from the gods’ decay… is about to seep into the mortal world.”

Chapter 677: Pilgrimage

Ever since the day he first saw those “giant ships” that were like small city-states, ever since he learned that these huge monsters kept “pilgrimaging” across the sea, Duncan had always had questions about these astounding creations—the Pilgrimage Arks.

What exactly did the Pilgrimage Arks mean? Were their special “pilgrimage” journeys really just patrols?

People in the city-states often said that the Pilgrimage Arks represented the great power of the Four Gods. They were the highest symbols of the Church’s might and also the “palaces” of the four True Gods in the mortal world. The Church sent the Arks to patrol the Boundless Sea to intimidate heretics and to protect the city-states from being corrupted by certain malicious beings in Subspace. At first, Duncan had had no doubts about this explanation.

But as he came into contact with the Four Gods’ churches more and more—especially after he learned many inside stories about the Church from Vanna, Morris, and Agatha—he began to see problems.

The ones who truly fought heretics and malevolent spirits were the inquisitors and guardians of each city-state. The ones who truly intercepted cultists at sea and rescued sailors were the regular fleets of the Four Gods’ churches. The ones who truly watched for Subspace corruption and strengthened the city-states’ defenses were the bells of the Cathedrals, the bishops’ prayers, and the strictly laid-out systems of Cathedrals and bell towers.

The four solemn Pilgrimage Arks… in fact, never took part in any matter that concerned the mortal world.

For three quarters of every year, they patrolled certain hidden routes. Those routes were invisible and unmeasurable to the mortal world, as if they lay in the cracks between dimensions of the Mortal Realm, and they stayed far from every city. For the rest of the time, they took turns patrolling near the eternal Veil at the border, where they traded only the bare minimum of information with the Church's border fleets. They did not deal with any city-state at all. They even deliberately avoided the patrol ships of the border city-states.

Only in very rare cases did these Arks dock at a city-state. For example, after some great event like the Black Sun incident in Pland, they would appear before the eyes of the world.

Aside from times like that, the Arks had no contact with the mortal world. Even within the four great Churches, they were always wrapped in a mist of mystery. Most priests would never in their whole lives have a chance to set foot on a Pilgrimage Ark. Only those chosen as "Saints" could be brought aboard while they were still apprentices, and even then, they were allowed to move only in certain areas. After they finished the learning and training they needed, they were sent back to their original cities. From beginning to end, these Saints never had the chance to touch the true secrets of the Arks.

All these clues showed that the very existence of the "Pilgrimage Arks" was filled with huge doubts. Their real purpose had always been hidden.

Now, Duncan finally had his answer.

"…The four Pilgrimage Arks we have now were built only a few decades ago," Frem said in his low voice. "Before these 'giant ships' were put into use, the four Churches also had an earlier generation of 'arks'. But those ships could not be compared at all with the Cathedral-ships we have today…”

Frem’s voice flowed like stone slowly grinding. It carried a calm weight that made people relax and trust him without noticing.

“The earlier Church ‘arks’ were only big ships,” he said. “Back then, they were still just part of the Holy See’s ocean fleet, a link in its armed forces. They were not as mysterious as they are today, and they were not cut off from the world like they are today.

“The Cathedral-ships we have now are things on a completely different level. Rather than saying they are four ‘great ships’… it is more accurate to say that they are four ‘anchors’. They hold the gods’ sanity in place at some ‘point of balance’ outside the mortal world.”

Duncan did not speak. He only watched the pope opposite him with a serious expression. He knew that Frem was explaining this mainly for his sake. All the other popes and bishops here came from the Pilgrimage Arks. These people were clearly those who already knew the truth.

“…It is impossible now to say exactly who first sensed the truth,” Frem went on. “It was a chain of revelations and inspirations. In benedictions, we heard a whispered Truth. In visions from sacred incense, we saw darkness and corruption piling up. The souls of the four of us felt more than once a ‘pull’ from beyond the world. The gods drew our minds to a vast, chaotic place and let us see Their death and Their shadows… and during all this, the link between the priests of the mortal world and the Four Gods kept breaking again and again. That was around the year 1822.”

At this point, Frem paused for a moment. Lucretia, who sat not far to Duncan’s right, suddenly seemed to think of something and said: “1822… the ‘Cold Harbor Silence’?”

“Yes. The Cold Harbor Silence,” a hoarse voice replied. “That event is well known, but it is only one fragment, one piece left behind because it could not be fully covered up, among a long chain of worsening incidents.”

The answer did not come from Frem, but from Banster, who sat beside him. The Death Pope wore a black robe. His voice was rough, and his old, pale face looked almost like that of a dead man.

“In that incident, every priest in the city-state suddenly lost contact with Bartok, the God of Death,” Banster said. “For twenty-four hours of ‘Silence’, they heard in their minds a continuous, terrifying, hollow wailing and screaming that only they could hear. Afterwards, foul blood flowed out of the ‘Sanctum’. The city’s archbishop sacrificed himself and dissolved in that foul blood to protect the Grand Cathedral. When it was all counted up, seventeen priests had died as martyrs during the ‘Silence’, and seventy-seven more fell into permanent madness after seeing things outside the real world. Their minds shattered.

“And in my judgement, for twenty years after that, the ‘Silence’ kept leaving lasting effects. The brief disappearance of the divine protective wards weakened the Mortal Realm’s defenses over the Frost Sea region. The influences of Subspace, the Abyssal Deep, and the Spirit Realm all slipped in while the defenses were low. With Cold Harbor as the center, the city-states around the Frost Sea produced, in that period, more ‘innate psionics’ than all the other city-states in the world put together.”

Banster fell silent and looked toward Rune.

“Yes, just as Banster said, the Cold Harbor Silence of 1822 was only one fragment,” Rune said with a nod. “The real situation was that, for quite a long time, across the entire Boundless Sea, the connection with the gods was growing harder and even dangerous. Everyday prayers often received no answer, and worse still, they sometimes received answers that never should have come. The protection over the city-states grew weaker. Strange incidents at sea became more and more common. In one revelation and vision after another, we finally confirmed the gods' terrible 'state'."

The hall grew quiet again.

Duncan knew the gods were dead. His followers knew it as well. The four popes and the bishops of the Pilgrimage Arks all knew it too. But when this matter was laid plainly on the table—when every piece of information and every past incident was placed side by side and tied to the Great Annihilation—a strange, heavy pressure still spread through the room.

"…So you built these huge Pilgrimage Arks to strengthen the link with the gods and to slow Their decay," Duncan said at last, breaking the silence. "I am not interested in the exact 'principles' of the process. I only want to know how effective it really was. Did it work? Just now Frem said the Arks' delaying effect has already reached its limit. What exactly does that mean?"

"It did work, at least at the beginning," Helena said with a nod. "The Arks are anchors for the gods. The 'death' of the gods is a long and complex process. Strictly speaking, that process cannot be stopped at all. It is like the turning of the laws of the world—it cannot be reversed. But the presence of the 'anchors' can at least keep the gods in a relatively stable state until They completely 'disappear'. According to our earliest estimates… it should have worked for several centuries, perhaps even a thousand years.

"Our first thought was that if we had such a long 'buffer period', we might have a chance to find other methods to slow the gods' decay even further. We might even find… find…"

Helena suddenly stopped. Some words were hard for her to say out loud. It seemed that even though she and the other popes had already taken action toward that goal, she still did not wish to admit certain "facts".

Rune, Banster, and Frem also fell silent, their expressions complicated.

Beside Duncan, Lucretia frowned in puzzlement. Nina and Shirley could not hide the curiosity on their faces. Morris opened his mouth as if he wanted to speak, but he held back.

Soft, unreal waves sounded in Duncan's ears. Faint whispers seemed to murmur to him from behind the thick Veil. He felt dazed for a moment and looked down at the tabletop in front of him.

A faint trace of water appeared on the table, then quickly faded away.

He looked at that trace of water, then raised his head and looked at Helena across from him.

"Find a replacement, right?"

Helena's eyes widened as she stared at Duncan in shock.

Duncan only shook his head and did not explain. After a few seconds of silence, he spoke again in a low, thoughtful voice: "…But only a few decades have passed. That is still far away from the 'centuries' you expected."

"Yes. Things have grown worse than we imagined," Banster said, his voice hoarse and heavy. "We once thought the gods' current 'balance' might last a thousand years. But the power of decay and rot has already begun to invade the whole world. The Arks' 'pilgrimage' journeys were first meant to strengthen the link between the gods and the mortal world. But now, we spend half our time trying to 'filter' the corruption that spills out as They decay…

"This makes us… deeply sorrowful."

Banster ended his words with a sigh.

After a moment of thought, Duncan broke the silence again: “So you have taken new action—the fleets gathering in the border seas, right?”

Chapter 678: The Road in the Mist

The four great Churches had gathered massive fleets along the borders of the civilized world, and they had been doing this for quite some time.

Because regular patrol fleets had been reduced, and a huge number of ships, personnel, and supplies were being redeployed toward the region near the Eternal Veil, such a large?scale mobilization could not be hidden from the border city?states. Long before today, Lucretia had already learned of these unusual moves from Sara Mell, yet until now, she and Duncan had never been able to figure out the Churches' purpose—until now.

The truth that the gods were dead, the true function of the Pilgrimage Ark, and the fact that the gods had already entered the "corruption stage" ahead of time finally let Duncan guess the purpose of those fleets.

After a moment of silence, Helena finally spoke: "We are looking for Them. That was one of our goals, and it was our very first goal."

Lucretia sprang to her feet, staring at the four popes across from her in disbelief: "You mean the gods are inside that thick fog of the Eternal Veil?! Right outside the border?!"

Banster, the old man in black robes, answered her, slowly shaking his head: "We are not sure. But we are certain that the first traces of rot seeped in from the Eternal Veil at the border. So for now, our plan is only to find the source of that presence. As for what we will see at that source… no one knows."

Rune picked up the thread: “It might be the gods’ divine realm. It might just be some kind of junction that links Them to the mortal world. Or it might be…”

He stopped there and did not finish the rest.

After a brief silence, Duncan suddenly asked: “You said this was only one of your goals. What about the others? Besides searching for Them, what else do you intend to do?”

Helena answered: “Another goal is to figure out what has really happened to this world. Reports of the border collapsing are increasing by the day. Together with the recent ‘malfunctions’ of the Sun, all kinds of anomalies related to the Eternal Veil are becoming more and more frequent. It is obvious that the thick fog there may be hiding secrets closely tied to our world’s present state and its very foundations.”

Duncan could not help pressing her: “So you figure out what has happened to the world… and then what?” He had an instinctive feeling that Helena was not finished.

Helena said: “If possible, we will try to find a ‘new route’ that can pass all the way through the Veil, then take as many people as we can out before the worst happens. If the ‘collapse’ inside the Veil is already set in stone, then our only way out is to leave. There may be other worlds beyond the Veil—wider worlds.”

“Maybe those worlds will not be very habitable, maybe the world beyond the Veil will be even more dangerous than the Boundless Sea. But as long as we can still survive, no matter how harsh the environment, it can become a new cradle for civilization. As long as we stay alive, life will find a way out, even if that means a long and painful process of adaptation… or even mutation.”

As Helena’s voice fell, the hall fell silent. Duncan could feel Vanna, Morris, and the others beside him unconsciously holding their breath. After several seconds, he finally heard Vanna break the silence: “Has the situation already become that bad?”

Rune shook his head: “The worst part is that we do not even know how bad things can get. Without the warning from the Vanished, we would not even know that last time the Sun went completely dark for twelve hours. During those twelve hours, the four arks vanished from this world together with the other city?states. That only made us even more certain that we must face whatever is coming with the worst possible expectations.”

Duncan suddenly spoke in a flat voice. His tone was not loud, but his words fell coldly into everyone’s heart: “But ‘the world beyond the Veil’ is only a guess, a guess with no basis. Very likely, this is nothing more than your wishful effort.”

Helena’s expression did not change at all. She calmly and openly met Duncan’s gaze: “It is better than doing nothing. We are not acting because we are sure something will succeed, but because we have no other choice. There may be nothing beyond the Eternal Veil. It is even very possible that the Eternal Veil has no end at all, and we will never find that so?called new route. But we still have to do something…”

She stopped. Frem, who had barely spoken until now, broke the silence in a low voice: “Under an even worse scenario, we are even considering how to survive inside the Eternal Veil itself.”

Nina could not help crying out in shock: “Survive inside the Eternal Veil?!” She had kept quiet all this time, just sitting quietly beside her Uncle Duncan, because she felt this was not the kind of occasion where she could speak up as she pleased. But this time she really could not hold back: “Can anyone even live there? Can humans really survive and multiply in that fog?”

“Not right now,” Frem said calmly, shaking his head. “At least with the current form of mortal life, and with what we currently understand about the rules of the Eternal Veil, human society still cannot survive and multiply in that fog. And by ‘human society’ here, I also mean elves and Senkin.”

Nina opened her mouth: “Then…”

Helena spoke softly: “That is what I mentioned just now. We may need a long and painful process of adaptation, or even mutation. We may need to become something that is no longer ‘us’ in order to survive in the world that comes after. Perhaps we will become like those eerie shadows that appear in the mist, or like those murmuring noises in the wind…”

Duncan asked again: “And if that still is not enough? The chaos of the Eternal Veil may be something that can never be ‘adapted’ to. If both the new route plan and the adaptation plan fail…”

Banster spoke calmly: “Then we will go to the Spirit Realm. If the Spirit Realm still does not work, then we will launch a full assault on the Abyssal Deep Sea. Since there are people in this world who can summon demons into the Mortal Realm, we can also go to the worlds of those demons. If they can survive in the Abyssal Deep, in the Deep Sea, then so can we. And if even that does not work, then we still have Subspace.”

This time even Shirley could not hold back: “S?Subspace?”

Banster nodded slightly: “No one can survive Subspace. Every mortal who has seen it dissolves into eternal madness and distortion. But if we really reach the final moment, Subspace can still be a choice. Any choice, even the worst choice, is better than calmly and meekly walking toward Doomsday.”

Shirley and Nina both fell silent, a stunned look on their faces.

Duncan wore a thoughtful expression. He fixed his gaze on the four figures across the table for a long time before finally speaking softly: “Is this the ‘revelation’ you received?”

Helena spoke slowly: “This is not a revelation. These are ‘instructions’ we received through one chaotic, faint exchange after another.” She raised her hand and traced on her chest the sigil of storm and the Deep Sea. “They told us to stay alive—to live on at any cost, by any means.”

Duncan did not speak for a moment.

He fell into thought, and was somewhat shaken.

He had to admit that these people, who always seemed late to every ‘incident’ and even a bit slow and powerless, had actually done far more than he had imagined.

Compared to the Elder Gods and the Vanished, they truly did not have much power. But they were trying to do things that even the Vanished and the Elder Gods could not do.

After that silence had dragged on for an unknown time, he finally broke it: “I want to know what progress you have made so far.”

Helena hesitated for a few seconds, then sighed softly: “Unfortunately, our progress is still limited. We have set up several forward bases at the critical line six nautical miles inside the Eternal Veil and can barely hold our ground there, but that is all. To this day, no one has been able to break the ‘record’ left by the Vanished back then.”

Duncan shook his head, his tone quite calm: “the Vanished got into ‘trouble’ as soon as it returned from beyond six nautical miles inside the Veil. Strictly speaking, that was not really a successful ‘exploration record’.”

The four popes' expressions all turned a bit strange. Clearly, none of them felt it was suitable to continue that topic.

Duncan did not mind. He merely adjusted his posture, quickly sorted out his thoughts, and then changed the subject: "Since your progress on that front has already stalled, I happen to have some 'intel' that might be useful. You will probably be interested."

Helena spoke without thinking: "Intel?"

Duncan nodded and said unhurriedly: "A couple of days ago, my daughter and I 'captured' a ship. It was a large vessel built by the Annihilators, the 'base' they used in the previous Lightwind Harbor incident to invade the dreamscape. It was covered in traces of bloody rituals and profane constructs… but that is not the main point.

"The point is that a ship like that clearly cannot dock and resupply at any normal city?state. So guess where its home port is."

Helena, Rune, and the others looked at each other, but they almost immediately reacted. Rune was the first to speak: "Wait, you mean… the border?!"

"Yes. They are hiding inside that fog." Duncan did not keep them in suspense and instead nodded with a serious expression. "It is one of the Annihilators' nests, and it may even be their largest nest and 'headquarters'. They call it the 'Holy Land'. Right now I still cannot be sure what shape this so?called Holy Land is in, and I do not know whether it lies on the 'near side' or the 'far side' of the six?nautical?mile line. But even if it is on the relatively stable near side, a 'Veil colony' that has been hidden inside the Eternal Veil for so long, and can even operate steadily as a large resupply port, should be of great research value to us."

Chapter 679: The Signal Appears Again

A nest hidden in the dense fog at the border, a place that might have been operating steadily for many years—invisible to the entire civilized world and even in the blind spot of the Four Gods Church's surveillance. In that place, the Annihilators had built a "Veil colony" capable of surviving long?term inside the "Eternal Veil". This news shocked everyone present at once.

Banster's voice was hoarse and gloomy, and the expression on the old man in black robes was especially grave: "For so many years, we have been searching for the cultists' nests. Among the three main heretical cults, the Enders are 'freaks' that are discontinuous on the timeline, and the Suntists are sheltered by the Black Sun outside the Mortal Realm. Only the Annihilators… in theory they must have one or more nests somewhere in the Mortal Realm, but after all these years, we have never found them…"

Helena nodded: "I never thought it would be hiding in a place like that. But it does explain how they managed to evade the Church's hunts for so many years. If those Annihilators have really found a way to survive long?term in the Eternal Veil, then they have clearly taken a big step ahead of us."

As she spoke, she turned her gaze toward Rune: "How do you think those cultists have managed to survive at the border?"

Rune shook his head: "'Holy Land' might not be something they built by their own power. Technology does not develop overnight. No matter how much forbidden knowledge the Annihilators have, they cannot create a sanctuary world that far beyond our imagination out of nothing. After all, we have all dealt with them. Everyone knows exactly how capable that twisted bunch really is. I suspect much more that they found some kind of naturally existing ‘legacy’ in the fog… after all, that is the border. Anything can appear there.”

He suddenly stopped there, lifted his head, and looked at Duncan with a very serious expression: “From what you just said, it sounds like you still have not located this ‘nest’ exactly. Then how can you be sure that it…”

“I told you, I captured one of their ships.” Duncan answered casually. “Right now that ship is sailing back toward the ‘Holy Land’ under my orders. It will probably take a few more days. Judging by its current course, its destination should be some hidden spot on the southeastern border, not very far from here… The Vanished will set out before long and meet it before it enters the Veil. What about you? Interested in joining the fun?”

The popes looked at one another when they heard this.

From Duncan’s first couple of sentences, they had already sensed the eerie, dangerous side of this ghost captain. But fortunately, this dangerous power was now standing on their side.

So all that was left for them to consider was how to respond to this “invitation”.

After a short pause for thought, Frem suddenly spoke: “The southeastern border… the Death Church happens to have a fleet over there.” He glanced at Helena. “‘Tide’ should also be in that area, right? They should all be able to make it in time.”

“Yes. The Deep Sea Church can send the nearest fleet over.” Helena nodded at once, looking at Duncan. “Wiping out the cultists’ nest is our duty. And we also know how to deal with the ‘corruption’ they leave behind.”

Several gazes fell on Banster. The old man in black robes did not show much change in expression. He only tightened his face and nodded: “I will send Rest and No Rest. They are powerful new warships.”

The popes and bishops all nodded when they heard this, as if to show their approval of Banster’s arrangement. But Duncan could not help focusing on the Death Church’s very distinctive way of naming its ships. After holding it in for a long time, he still could not stop himself from saying: “They sound like sister ships… the names are quite something…”

“Many of the Death Church’s powerful warships serve in twin squadrons. That is related to our faith.” Banster explained with a very straight face. “We believe everything in this world has two sides, just like the opposition and companionship between life and death.”

Duncan felt that the old gentleman in black robes did not seem to notice his strong urge to make fun of them—but he also felt that this topic should end here.

Because he was afraid the next thing they would come up with would be something like a warship named “Nine Clans Wipeout” or something along those lines…

“Then we will settle it like this.” He nodded and somewhat stiffly pulled the topic back on track. “I will have the Vanished lead your fleets to the rendezvous point. But I have to warn you ahead of time: some time has already passed since I ‘captured’ that ship. The cultists left in the Holy Land have certainly realized what happened. They will already be prepared—either they have withdrawn, or they have set up an ambush in the surrounding waters, or the Holy Land itself may have formidable combat capabilities. You must take these risks and variables into account in advance.”

“Risk and uncertainty have always been an indispensable part of cleansing evil filth.” Banster’s face was calm. “Our warriors are long used to it.”

“Good. Then next I will tell you about the intel I have gathered from those Annihilators lately…”

…

sunlight streamed through the window, falling softly into the room. The air was filled with the strong smell of medicinal plasters, mixed with a hint of refreshing incense.

Ted Riel stood before the window, gazing outside in thought.

From this vantage point, he could see the massive Academy Ark moored along the city’s shoreline, and in the other direction, the steep “shore” along the edge of the Flamebearer temple.

On the streets, he could still see citizens hurrying toward the docks, watching groups of people running together to see those majestic Cathedral ships. The festive banners strung between the buildings that morning were still fluttering in the sunlight, and colored paper flowers blown from somewhere spiraled past the window on the wind before vanishing into the clear sky in the distance.

People did not know the details of this special “gathering”. They did not know what the gods’ heralds were discussing together. They certainly did not know what changes the Fifth Ark had brought, nor that the popes, Their Eminences, had already left the ark and gone to that ghost ship the world had feared and watched warily for a century. For most ordinary people, all of this was far too distant from their lives.

“…Ignorance really is a kind of blessing sometimes.”

Ted Riel pulled his gaze back from the street and murmured to himself.

A voice came almost at once from the bed not far away: “But if your own student has that ‘blessing’, it is not such a blessing for the teacher.”

Ted Riel’s mouth twitched. He turned his head to look at Taran Ael, the scholar lying on the bed: “A slipped disc still doesn’t stop you from making snide remarks, does it?”

“Exactly. It’s my disc that’s slipped, not my vocal cords…”

“…Next time you are destined to get hemorrhoids, and when that happens, I’m going to eat three Bay Inferno Wraps in front of you in fifteen minutes!”

“Rahm preserve me. As a dignified Truth Keeper, can’t you be a little more refined and generous?” Taran Ael wriggled on the bed to change position, then bared his teeth and flopped back where he was. “Look at the state I’m in…”

Ted Riel did not answer this grand scholar, who was stuck in bed with a bad back and so bored that he could only tease people for fun. After a moment of silence, he glanced out the window again: “I wonder what they’re going to talk about today.”

Taran Ael lifted his head to look at the friend who had come to visit him: “You are a Truth Keeper. You really don’t know anything?”

“Taran, you know the Pilgrimage Arks operate independently from the city? state system.” Ted Riel shook his head. “There are some things that become corruption for the whole world the moment they spread outside the arks. When a Truth Keeper walks too closely among ordinary people, they naturally have to keep a certain distance from the deepest secrets.”

“…That’s true.” Taran Ael thought for a moment and sighed: “So you, the ‘big shot’, can only come keep me, the patient, company when the big bosses are busy talking things over…”

Ted Riel did not respond, and his silence only made a certain grand scholar feel even more bored. Taran Ael stayed quiet for barely half a minute before suddenly blurting out: “Seriously, do you think Their Eminences the popes are going to end up fighting with the ‘captain’ on that ship…?”

“What do you think? How about I pass all these questions on to Rune when Teacher Rune comes back and let him answer you personally?”

Taran Ael shrugged and finally fell silent.

Just then, hurried footsteps suddenly sounded in the hallway, cutting off the “warm, lively conversation” between the scholar and the Truth Keeper.

There was a knock at the door, along with a slightly nervous, hurried young voice: “Teacher, something’s happened…”

Taran Ael recognized his student’s voice and spoke at once before Ted could say anything: “Come in.”

The door opened, and a clumsy young apprentice came in, arms full of paper tape.

But just as he was about to speak, he saw the Truth Keeper standing in the room. He immediately froze where he was, suddenly forgetting what he wanted to say.

Ted Riel was the first to break the silence: “Your teacher is currently locked in combat with his lumbar disc. So if it’s just a problem with your studies, ask me.”

Taran Ael braced himself and forced his way up into a sitting position, baring his teeth in pain as he looked at the nervous young apprentice standing in the middle of the room: “Joshua, calm down—what happened?”

“Oh… oh!” The young apprentice finally reacted. He quickly bent to salute the Truth Keeper, then hurried over to his teacher’s bedside. “Teacher, there’s a situation at the offshore research station. They received a signal, coming from the center of that ‘glowing orb’ emitter…”

As he spoke, he handed the long strip of paper covered in waveform graphs to Taran Ael.

“This signal… is very similar to the one the glowing orb sent during the Sun’s blackout…”

Chapter 680: After the Meeting

After hearing Apprentice Joshua's report, Taran Ael and Ted Riel almost turned to look at each other at the same time. Before Ted could speak, Taran had already turned his head and said to his apprentice: "The metal cabinet by the window in the next room, second door from the left, blue paper-tape box—run!"

"Ah… okay!!" Joshua answered in a panic, then spun around and dashed out of the room.

A moment later came a whole series of crashes in the corridor, as if he had run into something, followed by the sound of frantic rummaging in the next room. Before Ted Riel started to worry that this reckless young man meant to tear the whole building apart, Joshua rushed back in, all wind and fire, holding a sealed archive box in his arms.

Ted Riel took the records from the archive box and compared them with the paper tape Joshua had just brought. Then he walked to the side of Taran Ael's sickbed and held both strips out for the Grand Scholar to see.

Taran Ael's gaze fell on the old and new strips of paper. He studied every peak and valley in the lines there, and his expression grew darker and heavier.

"Is it the same signal?" The voice of the Truth's Truth Keeper came from beside him.

"Setting aside the distortion from interference and any error from the device itself… it should be the same signal," Taran Ael said, his face grave.

“…This is the ‘Light-Signal’ Lady Lucretia recorded aboard the Radiant Star,” Ted Riel stared at the earlier strip that had been sealed in the paper-tape box, his expression thoughtful. “It was the information cyclically released from inside the glowing orb while the Sun was extinguished. But we still have not deciphered its meaning…”

He suddenly lifted his head and looked out the window at the sky.

The Sun was slowly drawing near the distant rooftops. The glorious twin rune rings shone brightly in the sky, and the magnificent corona still poured out endless light and heat. Time was nearing dusk, but Vision 001 itself showed no sign of going out.

Yet the “glowing geometric body” near Lightwind Harbor had suddenly begun to release this strange “signal” again, the same signal that had appeared while the Sun was extinguished… Why?

“Has this signal been repeating the whole time?” Taran Ael asked his Student.

“Y-yes,” Joshua nodded in a hurry, clearly very nervous. “When the observatory sent us the data, the signal had already repeated three times…”

“What do you make of this?” Taran Ael turned his head and looked at his old friend.

“…I have to go to the observatory myself. These signals feel very unusual. I keep thinking that strange ‘glowing geometric body’ is trying to… ‘make contact’ with the outside world. Maybe I can find some clues if I go there in person,” Ted Riel said quickly as he walked to the coat rack, picked up his coat and hat, and put them on. “I also need to tell the people meeting on the Fifth Ark. They may not have noticed anything abnormal yet…”

The Truth’s Truth Keeper finished getting ready to go out, then picked up his heavy book that recorded many arts of sacred miracles. He opened it to the page that showed a “door”. But he suddenly stopped, lifted his eyelids, and looked at the Grand Scholar lying on the bed.

Taran Ael suddenly felt a flicker of unease. “…Why are you looking at me like that?”

“If something happens to the Sun again this time, you are going to lie in this bed honestly—you already shook up the academy’s whole safety review with your last amazing stunt.”

“Nonsense! My lumbar disc is almost poking into my hip; where could I even go?!” Taran Ael glared at once. If not for his ruined back, he looked as if he would leap up and bite someone. “You think I want to be scrambling along the roofs and bell towers of the teaching building?”

But Ted Riel only shook his head at that: “…Experience tells me that a herniated disc cannot fully stop your curiosity. As long as the target has enough research value, you are perfectly able to crawl out of a sickbed.”

As he spoke, the Truth’s Truth Keeper strolled unhurriedly to the Grand Scholar’s bedside and tapped his heavy Book of sacred miracles with his knuckles. A small, ghostly scalpel appeared in his hand.

Taran Ael instantly understood the source of his earlier unease. He shouted at once: “What are you doing… I’m warning you, Ted… don’t you dare… damn it, you can’t!”

Ted Riel paid no attention at all to the Grand Scholar’s protests. He pointed the scalpel at Taran Ael from a distance and tapped three times in the air: “This will effectively keep you confined to this bed. Don’t worry—when I come back, I’ll cure you.”

“Ted, you damn XX! The God of Wisdom did not grant you knowledge of disease and healing for this! I… (Elven curses) (Lightwind Harbor curses) (vulgarities not fit to hear)!!”

The room filled with the Grand Scholar’s agitated shouts, though his voice no longer had the strength it once did. The Truth’s Truth Keeper, however, had already turned away and stepped through a door that appeared from thin air.

Only Apprentice Joshua remained in the room, at a complete loss as he faced his Teacher.

“…What are you staring at? Go bring me my hemorrhoid ointment!”

“Oh… oh!”

…

The main part of the meeting had already ended. After they exchanged enough information and reached a series of open “cooperation agreements”, Duncan and the gathered Church leaders announced a recess together.

But unlike a normal “meeting”, there were no flashing cameras here, no crowd of reporters to record this precious moment, no photographs or footage to preserve any detail of the proceedings—there was not even a single page of written agreement left on paper.

The things they discussed here were simply too sensitive. Any form of record might, on some future day, undergo some kind of unpredictable “change”.

But none of the attendees minded. They believed that the Four Gods as witness were enough.

The Bishops left the hall first. Lucretia’s Servants led those Guests to a temporary rest area on the deck, where tea and snacks had already been prepared in advance. In half an hour, there would even be a small barbecue on deck.

Many of the attendees still felt a sense of unreality. After all… to enjoy a rich dinner on the deck of the Vanished, with the sea wind blowing… even the most imaginative poet or playwright in the world would hardly dare to conceive of such a scene with a clear head.

Other attendees had a different worry. They still fretted about the “food safety” on this ship. Even though they had accepted that “Captain Duncan has a human nature and has already formed a cooperative relationship with the Church”, they still felt that something harmful to the body and mind of an ordinary person might appear aboard this ship—especially at a so-called “barbecue party”.

…To be honest, their worries were not wrong.

But it did not matter.

Because it was not yet time to return to the Pilgrimage Ark—the four Popes still remained in the hall, and the “closed-door meeting” after the open session was the truly important part.

“Now it’s just us,” Duncan looked at the four people sitting opposite him in the hall, which suddenly felt quiet and empty after the Bishops left. “So we can talk about some matters that are not so suitable to put on the table.”

“Where would you like to start?” Helena asked. “We will do all we can to answer your questions.”

“…It is not really a question,” Duncan thought for a moment, then spoke slowly. “I just want to know—do you intend to hide your operations in the border seas from the city-states forever? I do not mean the search for the Gods, but the search for new routes. If you really find a new route, how do you plan to persuade city-states, who knew nothing about these plans beforehand, to carry out a population migration on that scale? And the rest of those ambitious ‘migration’ plans…”

He paused there, and his expression grew more serious. “To be honest, they do sound exciting. But once you calm down and think, you can see there are too many hasty decisions, too many things taken for granted—especially when you mean to complete these ‘great feats’ while hiding them from the entire world. How high do you think your real chance of success is?”

“…The secrecy is also a last resort. There is too much information that cannot be given to ordinary people. The ‘secrets’ of the border, if they spread into normal city-states, could easily cause a catastrophe,” Helena sighed. “Of course, your criticism is right. There are too many hasty and wishful parts in these plans, and no matter what, such large-scale actions can never be hidden forever… All I can say is that we never expected the situation to worsen this quickly.”

“We first made our plans on the scale of several centuries,” Frem nodded beside her. “With enough time as a buffer, we could have relied on the efforts of several generations to push these things forward steadily. We would also have had the energy to screen and handle information about the border and pass it safely to each city-state. Now… we can only say that time has become too short.”

“Time… yes, time has become much too short,” Duncan said softly. He knew Helena and Frem were stating helpless facts, so he did not stay on that topic. After a quiet sigh, he turned his head toward Vanna. “Then let’s talk about something else. Vanna, didn’t you have something you wanted to say to Lord Frem?”

The tall, gray-skinned Flamebearer Pope sitting across the table, Frem, froze for a moment. Then he seemed to realize something, adjusted his posture, and turned a serious gaze on Vanna.

Vanna nodded slightly, then stood up and walked toward a corner of the hall. A moment later, she returned carrying something unusually large on her shoulder.

It was the “Gatekeeper’s cane” left by Tarrigan.

“Careful with the beams…” Duncan could not help reminding her. “And the pillars…”

Vanna nodded and carefully avoided smashing anything in the hall with the Gatekeeper’s cane, which was as thick as the trunk of a giant tree. Then she slowly laid it on the table before everyone.

“This is the ‘Chronicle Pillar’.”

Chapter 681: “Madness”?

Frem’s gaze was instantly drawn to the enormous Gatekeeper’s cane. He stared at it for a long time before finally forcing out some words: “… Everburning Ember…”

After a few more seconds of silence, he raised his head. His eyes fell on Vanna and Duncan. “You brought it out here because…”

“This was Vanna’s idea,” Duncan shook his head and stepped back half a step. “She thinks the Gatekeeper’s cane should be given to the Flamebearer Church.”

Frem’s eyes widened a little. He looked at the Inquisitor in surprise.

“Tarrigan left this Gatekeeper’s cane to me as a parting keepsake. But at that time, he did not yet know about the age of the Deep Sea,” Vanna sighed lightly and spoke in a calm tone. “Maybe the Tarrigan I saw was only a shadow. Maybe the Senkin of the Deep Sea age were only ‘replicas’ remade after the Third Long Night. But some things… belong where they belong. The legacy of a civilization should not become someone’s personal collection. Giving it to the Flamebearer Church has more meaning than keeping it in my own hands.”

The table fell quiet for a while. Helena, Rune, and Banster exchanged glances, then wisely closed their mouths. Frem slowly stretched out his hand. His fingers, rough like stone, gently stroked the coarse surface of the Gatekeeper’s cane.

The dense carvings on the Gatekeeper's cane seemed to hold frozen time, telling without words of a forgotten era of civilization. In that faded and vanished memory, a race had stumbled up from the wasteland, walked toward glory, and then toward its end.

But Frem could not recognize a single character carved there. He only felt a strange closeness in every mark, so close it felt as if they were carved into his own soul, and yet so distant it was as if they came from another dimension.

A complex emotion welled up from his heart.

"When the elves first dug out those scrolls in the Dark Islands, they felt the same as you do now," Rune suddenly broke the silence. The old elf watched the changes on Frem's face and spoke quietly. "We have gone through it once. I understand."

"…These carvings show a complete chain of script evolution. We will be able to decipher their meaning," Frem said softly. "The Flamebearer Church is expert in this field."

He suddenly lifted his head and looked into Vanna's eyes with great seriousness.

"I will take rubbings of everything carved on it and use them to study the Senkin script and history—we only need to take those."

Vanna blinked, surprised and puzzled. "Of course… but you mean, the Gatekeeper's cane…"

"This is a gift our Lord gave you. Leaving it in your hands is His will," Frem slowly shook his head. "And, Miss Vanna, the legacy of a civilization is not this Gatekeeper's cane pulled from a dream. The true legacy is here—in the history recorded by these carvings."

The Flamebearer Pope's fingers brushed lightly over the surface of the Gatekeeper's cane. In those shallow and deep grooves, his touch seemed to reach back to those ancient, lost years.

"To this day, whether we want to admit it or not, we can no longer deny what the cultists wrote in The Blasphemous Tome. The true history of our world began with the Third Long Night. Everything in the mortal world is a 'replica' created from the ashes. For a world copied from ashes… digging up 'memory' and 'history' now means far more than chasing after 'relics' themselves. Miss Vanna, we only need to take the writing from it."

Vanna blinked again. This turn of events was not what she had expected. She subconsciously looked up at Duncan. He gave her a slight nod.

"…I understand," Vanna let out a gentle breath. "Then I will keep it safe and treasure it as much as I treasure honor and life."

"Good. Then this matter is settled as well," Duncan broke the silence. He stepped forward with a faint smile on his face, but the smile quickly faded as if something had come to mind. He could not help speaking: "…But that reminds me. After Vanna brought this 'Chronicle Pillar' back into the Mortal Realm, you Flamebearer people never received any 'feedback' or 'revelation' from Tarrigan?"

"No," Frem shook his head and answered very frankly. "Just as we said earlier in the meeting, the link between the mortal world and the Gods has become abnormally difficult. Not only are the 'voices' themselves weakening, but the messages that do manage to get through are mixed with more and more interference and noise. For now, the only good news is that the 'power' that the Gods send down can still work on the Boundless Sea. Beyond that, even we four have not heard Their voices clearly for many years."

“I can only reach the Goddess’s vague revelation and, now and then, her mental guidance,” Vanna quickly added beside him. “The Goddess still answers my call very quickly, but that ‘answer’ has indeed always been hazy.”

“The decline and death of a god is a process completely different from that of a mortal,” Rune spoke up as well. “We still cannot uncover the secrets in it. But clearly, They still have reason—for now, at least. It is just that this ‘reason’ can no longer pass cleanly into mortal minds. It is as if some kind of ‘cognitive deviation’ has appeared between the two. That ‘deviation’ makes our minds less and less able to understand Their ‘voices’…”

Rune stopped there for a moment. After a brief silence, he went on with a hint of hesitation: “Frankly, this reminds me again of the story of the ‘Madbird’.”

Helena’s expression changed slightly at once. She seemed to understand Rune’s meaning right away. “You mean the nature of the Gods’ current ‘death state’ is that They are gradually drifting away from our world at the level of ‘cognition’? That the increasing interference and noise we have received from the arks over these years… is some kind of growing ‘Madbird effect’?”

“This is only a guess I came up with recently—after the Lightwind Harbor incident,” Rune nodded lightly. “It is also the only guess so far that can explain those stronger and stronger ‘noises’.”

Duncan listened quietly at the side as the Popes discussed the matter. When their talk had almost run its course, he suddenly spoke: “In fact… I was just about to say this. I can occasionally ‘hear’ Their voices, or see the messages They send.”

Helena, Frem, and the others fell silent at once.

All four Popes slowly turned their heads. Their eyes fell on Duncan, and each of their faces looked as if they had just seen a ghost—

To be fair, with their skills, they would probably be calmer if they really did see a ghost.

“Is that true?!” Helena was the first to speak. “You mean you can clearly hear the Gods’ voices? They even… send you messages?!”

Even Frem, always so steady and calm, lost his composure. The Senkin Pope, like a small giant, came around the table to stand in front of Duncan. “You have direct contact with the Gods? By what means?”

“Whoa, hold on. I said ‘occasionally’—I only hear or see Their messages once in a while,” Duncan quickly waved his hands, knowing they had misunderstood. “That does not count as ‘direct contact’. But yes… it is quite clear. To be honest, I have no idea what ‘noise’ and ‘interference’ you keep talking about—I have never run into them.”

The Popes looked at one another.

Duncan did not hide his few experiences of, by coincidence, hearing or seeing messages from the Gods. He told them about the notes he had seen, and the traces of the Gods’ conversations he had found in that strange, dark space.

Of course, he kept back the exact content of those exchanges.

Then the hall fell quiet for a long time.

At last, Frem was the first to break the silence. The steady Senkin turned his gaze to Rune. “…This seems to prove, at the very least, that They really do still have reason.”

“Yes, They are still rational,” Rune snapped out of his brief daze and began to think at once. “If this is true… and if my earlier guess is not too far off…”

He paused, then quickly sorted out his thoughts—

“Then we can read the situation like this: the Gods still have reason, but Their ‘reason’ has already drifted away from mortal minds, and even from the world itself. So we find it hard to contact Them, and the world has begun to suffer Their corruption. But on the other hand, because of his own special nature, Captain Duncan is completely unaffected by this ‘drift’…”

Rune suddenly stopped again. He seemed to sense some vague or unexplained contradiction in his chain of thought and fell into silence. Just then, Duncan happened to think of something else.

“I remember… according to the current conclusions shared by scholars and the Church, the ‘Abyssal Lord’ in the Abyssal Deep of the Deep Sea is an Elder God in a completely mad runaway state, isn’t It?”

“Of course,” Rune answered at once without the slightest doubt. “The Abyssal Lord is, like the Black Sun, a being with no reason at all. We even have direct proof of this. Humans cannot enter the Abyssal Deep of the Deep Sea and live, but through complex and dangerous ritual, we can ‘observe’ what lies at that depth…”

“I have had a chat with the Abyssal Lord too,” Duncan shrugged. “Honestly, I think Its mental state is actually fine—though It did say It has been having a hard time lately.”

Rune: “…?”

Duncan glanced at the ghost-struck faces of the Popes and hesitated for a moment. Then he decided to keep going—after all, the mood had already come this far.

“And about that ‘Black Sun’ you just mentioned… I have seen It as well, though we only exchanged a sentence or two. It really is having trouble holding on.”

Rune, Helena, Banster, and Frem all wore the same expression: “…?!”

Chapter 682: Starlight Overflowing

It was clear that the news Duncan suddenly revealed had shaken the Popes' whole view of the world. They stood there trying to recover for a long time, and in the end they still had not really calmed down.

After skipping over anything related to Alice's manor, Duncan briefly told Rune and the others about his talks with the Black Sun and the Abyssal Lord.

He was not worried that this information would corrupt the people here. On one hand, all his followers had already received his spirit flame baptism. That had proved they now had very high resistance to mental corruption. On the other hand, the Popes present almost dealt with mental corruption every single day. Their resistance looked very high. They were not about to go mad and start screaming just because they heard a few mutterings from the Elder Gods. If the group of bishops from earlier were still here, he would never have mentioned any of this.

Helena and the others looked at one another. After a moment of thought and hesitation, all three gazes fell on Rune.

The short, chubby old elf looked a little embarrassed at once: "…Why are you all looking at me?"

"You are the most learned among us," Helena said, her face full of sincerity.

Banster nodded: "In the deep field of occult studies, you often have unique insights and a sensitivity as sharp as a prophetic omen."

Frem said nothing. He only kept staring at Rune without blinking.

Rune stayed silent for a few seconds, his expression a bit strange. After thinking for a moment, he seemed to suddenly think of something. He turned to Duncan, who was watching the scene from the side: “You are sure you heard clear and rational voices from the Abyssal Lord and the Black Sun, right?”

“Of course I am sure,” Duncan spread his hands. “They were as rational as the way we are talking now.”

“Then the second question,” Rune said after a short pause, his face turning very serious. “Since you returned from Subspace to the Mortal Realm, have you ever run into any ‘chaotic creations’ that, in your eyes, were totally impossible to speak with or understand, completely unnamable?”

Duncan was slightly taken aback. Then he vaguely understood what the old Pope meant. After a brief silence he spoke: “…I have met many ‘chaotic, mad, uncommunicable freaks’ by mortal standards. But almost every time… I heard useful information in their noise-like roars. Sometimes I even felt they were deliberately trying to talk to me.”

He stopped there, leaving half a sentence unsaid—
[He had always thought that was normal!]

Rune’s expression clearly changed after hearing Duncan’s answer. His brows knotted at once. Beside him, Helena also reacted: “Wait, so that means…”

“…In the Captain’s eyes, there are no Elder Gods in a mad runaway state,” Rune said slowly, looking into Duncan’s eyes with a serious face. “You can understand voices that have completely left the baseline of reason in any situation. Even beings that would drive a mortal insane at a single glance are, for you, probably still understandable and open to communication.”

For a moment the hall fell silent. Except for Alice, whose brain never quite kept up, and Shirley, who never used hers, everyone began at once, almost on instinct, to think about what this meant, and to think about the ‘reason’ behind this incredible ‘phenomenon’.

While they were lost in thought, Morris spoke quietly, breaking the silence: “If we follow the ‘cognitive deviation’ idea you just raised, Teacher, then that means the Captain…”

“No matter how far everything deviates, it still stays within his range of understanding,” Rune nodded slowly. “This is a bit like… wait, wait, I need paper and a pen!”

Morris reacted at once: “Here.”

Someone quickly spread a sheet of paper on the table. Rune picked up a pencil and bent over it under everyone’s curious gaze, quickly sketching shapes across the paper. To Duncan’s surprise, they were not any complex and mysterious occult studies runes, nor any deep and hard-to-understand math formulas. What Rune drew were just one loose, seemingly random circle after another.

He drew many circular patterns. They were scattered randomly across the page. Some overlapped one another. Some only touched a little along their edges. Some were completely separate.

“Do you still remember the Great Annihilation? And the guesses about how the New World formed after the Great Annihilation…” Rune spoke quickly as he drew. “Many worlds crashed into one another. Their wreckage piled up to form the base of the New World. I call this pile of wreckage ‘Primordial Ashes’. At the very beginning, each set of ashes still carried the ‘rules’ of its own world. We can treat the ashes that share the same set of rules as one circle like this…

“Yes, the idea of sets. The Primordial Ashes left behind by each world are one subset. Do you see these circles that cross one another? The overlapping parts are the parts of the Primordial Ashes that are ‘compatible’ with each other…

“During the third Long Night, the Primordial Ashes that could fit together were rearranged. They formed the Deep Sea era we live in now… the ‘intersection’ in the sets. Yes, right here…”

Rune stopped and pointed with his pencil at the center of the sheet.

There, several large and small circles met. The overlapping parts made up an area only as big as a fingernail.

“This is our Deep Sea era,” Rune went on. “The Primordial Ashes from many pieces of world wreckage that could fit together and barely ‘hold’ under the same set of rules. Together they built the Boundless Sea, and the many city-states on the Boundless Sea…

“And outside this ‘intersection’, in the other parts of these circles that do not overlap, that is, in their ‘difference sets’, lie the things we can touch but cannot understand or control. They drift along the edges of our Mortal Realm, at the World’s Edge. They may show up as Visions, as anomalies, or as other strange phenomena—carriers of corruption…”

Rune thought for a moment, then pointed to the circles that floated outside all the others, those that did not touch any other shape at all.

“Here is where the Blasphemous Archetypes lie,” he said. “Where the Black Sun and other lost Elder Gods and exiled races are. We can no longer understand their existence at all, and they cannot fit into the Mortal Realm. Some of them have already vanished completely into the dark. Others… still drift as Primordial Ashes in some kind of time and space we cannot understand.”

Morris looked at the simple yet clear drawings his Teacher had sketched on the paper and quickly understood: “We sit inside the ‘intersection’, so we can only ‘understand’ the information inside the intersection. Things outside the intersection are, to us, unnamable noise and shadows…”

Rune nodded: “Yes. That is the ‘fact’ this model shows.”

“But for the Captain,” Morris went on, “both the strange shadows outside the intersection and the lost Elder Gods that float completely outside the system of sets are still understandable. In his eyes, there is no ‘world outside the intersection’…”

“As you say…”

Duncan stood to the side, quietly listening to the discussion.

They were talking about him, trying to use a set of logic to explain him. They were trying to know, to understand, to touch his “true secret”.

But he did not care.

He simply listened in silence, lost in thought in the Listening Rite.

His gaze rested on the diagrams Rune had drawn, gaze on the circles that crossed, overlapped, and stood alone, gaze on the Primordial Ashes drifting and scattered through this ruin, gaze on that sheet of paper.

For some reason, he suddenly recalled his recent experiences in Subspace, recalled the overflowing starlight he had seen in the eyes of those pale giants…

Vanna also walked up to that sheet of paper. She looked at the drawing on it and could not help asking softly: “Then where is the Captain on this…?”

Rune’s face grew solemn: “Only in one case can a ‘universal set’ hold all the subsets that have appeared here, and even those that have not yet appeared.”

Vanna thought for a moment and gestured on the paper: “A larger circle that includes them all?”

“No.”

Morris shook his head.

Then the old scholar stepped forward half a step and gently placed his hand on the sheet.

“It is this sheet of paper.”

As he finished speaking, he lifted his head and looked around.

Endless starlight filled his vision, filled his memories, filled his mind.

It filled the eyes of everyone in the hall.

Helena’s eyes widened in the starlight. In the towering wave raised by the Truth, she felt her mind on the verge of collapse. She saw a shifting shadow, a shape, swell up in the sea of starlight. The outline drew close to her, roaring—

“Isn’t it unbelievable?”

Rune stood stiff in the starlight. Noise and trembling squeezed out from his reason: “Truth… so beautiful…”

Then all the starlight suddenly vanished. The vast, rising and falling shadow shrank and collapsed in an instant that no human could sense, turning back into the Mortal Realm hall.

Vanna barely broke free from the terrifying afterimage left by the starlight. Through the strong dizziness, she saw the Captain walk to the table and slowly roll up the sheet of paper.

“Here is a suggestion for you,” Duncan turned his head and looked into Rune’s eyes. “Next time you want to discuss me, make more preparations first.”

The horrible afterimages left by the starlight finally faded away completely. Duncan had already rolled the sheet up and casually stuffed it inside his clothes.

As the Truth was covered for the moment, reason suddenly returned to everyone’s mind.

Banster drew in a deep breath and stepped back without thinking. Then he glared at Rune: “I should have kept my distance from ‘scholars’ like you from the very start!”

“You were the ones who asked me to analyze it!” Rune panted twice, first giving Duncan a fearful glance, then looking at Banster and the other two. “You tell me, did it work or not?”

“Captain…” Morris turned to Duncan, an awkward look on his face. “Sorry…”

“It is fine. Curiosity is human nature,” Duncan said with a laugh, his smile as gentle and forgiving as ever. “The good thing is that no one died.”

Chapter 683: Extinguished Again

By now, everyone who stayed here finally had a deeper understanding of the Master of the Vanished—at least from the goal of “knowing more and talking better”, they had achieved half of it.

Sadly, the mood turned awkward right after this “better understanding”.

A strange silence sat over the hall. The Popes, including Helena, seemed unsure whether they should keep the topic going. Vanna and Morris still looked a bit tense. Shirley was calming the uneasy Dog. Nina, on the other hand, looked at Duncan with some curiosity—the sudden starlight had not affected her at all.

Lucretia looked at everyone in the hall with a half smile. For some reason there was even a bit of gloating in that smile.

Only Alice—the doll Miss—still kept her usual vacant, faraway look, lost in her own world. She had already been spacing out for some time. Back when Rune started using the idea of “sets” to explain the world, she had switched off her brain. After quite a while, she suddenly seemed to react, looking around in surprise and confusion: “It’s over? Are we getting ready for dinner?”

This out-of-sync line from the doll Miss finally broke the awkward silence. Banster lifted his head, his gaze landing on Duncan. After several seconds he could not hold back: “…What exactly was that just now?”

As soon as he finished speaking, Frem, who stood closest to him, instantly took several steps to the side.

“…I was only asking,” Banster glanced at Helena and Rune, who had also stepped aside, and shook his head helplessly.

“I have many secrets on me, some of which even I do not really understand,” Duncan said, not minding at all. He only shook his head helplessly, then looked at Rune on the opposite side, his expression serious. “But I am very grateful for the ideas you and Morris just raised… your line of thought helped me clear up a bit of confusion.”

“…Then I hope next time you clear up some confusion you can give us a warning first,” Rune said, a bit helpless. “Though I know that sounds a bit unreasonable.”

Duncan laughed: “…I will do my best.”

This dangerous topic finally ended, but the thoughts stirred up by Rune’s “set model” still lingered in many hearts. Duncan went back to his seat and touched his pocket. His fingers brushed the folded sheet of paper again—

Primordial Ashes, the “intersection” of world rules, the conflict between what could and could not fit together, the viewpoint of an observer inside a subset, and…

He drew his hand out of his pocket and let out a soft breath.

Lucretia could not help looking at Duncan.

A groundless feeling of dread suddenly rose up, making her heart pound a few times. She looked toward her Father on instinct, yet she felt that in that very instant, in the moment her gaze turned over, Father had… already not been there.

He had gone somewhere very, very far away, so far he was no longer in this world. In that brief moment… Lucretia felt again what she had felt a century ago, when she watched the Vanished enter the thick fog at the border.

But it was only a short illusion. When she blinked again, Duncan was still sitting there as before, as if he had never moved at all.

“So then, what other questions do you have?” Duncan raised his head and looked at Helena, Rune, and the others who had also just sat back down on the other side of the table.

Alice scratched her hair and sat back down next to Duncan: “Oh, so it isn’t over yet.”

Across from them, Rune gave Alice a subtle look, then slightly gathered his thoughts. But just as he was about to say something, he suddenly stopped.

He frowned a little, as if he were tilting his head to listen to a voice from far away through a Listening Rite. Seeing this, Helena reacted at once: “Is there news coming in?”

“Psychic Communication from Lightwind Harbor. Ted Lier is contacting me,” Rune looked up, his face already turning grave. “He says the research facility set up near that ‘glowing geometric body’ suddenly received some signals being released from inside the glowing orb…”

As he spoke, his gaze fell on Lucretia.

“They are exactly the same as the signal the Radiant Star picked up when the Sun went out last time.”

Lucretia stood up at once.

It was now dusk—the Sun had not yet completely set.

Vision 001 was slowly sinking toward the sea surface. The two brilliant glowing rune rings had about one-third of their shape touching the distant ocean. sunlight built a magnificent sunset between sea and sky, and the glow scattered a fine layer of gold over the whole sea.

In another direction, in the offshore waters of Lightwind Harbor, the huge glowing geometric body still floated quietly on the sea surface. Another patch of pale golden “sunlight” spread out evenly from the geometric figure over the surrounding sea, with it at the center. It built a unique view of “two different kinds of sunlight crossing and weaving between sea and sky”.

The “sunlight” coming out of that glowing geometric body was warm and calm, looking no different from any other time.

Yet, according to the records of high-sensitivity instruments, certain specific spectra in that “sunlight” were now “vibrating” in a very complex pattern, periodically sending out wave signals that were hard to understand.

Duncan and the others went to the aft deck and looked, through the crisscrossing sunset glow, at the huge glowing geometric body near Lightwind Harbor.

Frem looked at Rune and spoke in a deep voice: “Is the signal still going?”

“It is still going. The signal has a cycle of twelve seconds. It repeats three times, then pauses for thirty seconds before appearing again,” Rune nodded. “Ted Lier has already reached the research station. He is monitoring the equipment there himself…”

“The cycle and repeating pattern are the same as last time.”

Lucretia said this quickly while raising her head to glance at the nearby sea. Her Radiant Star was quietly docked beside the Vanished, and at this moment a special structure on top of the ship’s bridge was slowly rotating —

A pod shaped like a mechanical flower bud was turning one side of itself toward the distant sea. The covers at the front of the pod opened, and the precise optical lens hidden inside gleamed in the sunlight.

“I am ordering the servants left on the ship to open the optical lens on the Radiant Star,” Lucretia watched the movement of her flagship while explaining to Duncan beside her. “Back when the Sun went out, I was the first one to notice the strange light signal. Only after that did Lightwind Harbor build similar devices and install them at the research facility… In theory, if the station can see the signal, we should be able to see it from here too.”

“The distance doesn’t affect it?” Nina asked in surprise.

“Light does weaken and it can be disturbed, but at this distance it is still fine—the real question now is what this strange signal means,” Lucretia said, brow furrowed, her tone worried. “Last time the signal appeared after the Sun went out. But this time the signal appeared while the Sun still looks fine…”

“Let us move closer to Lightwind Harbor first and make sure nothing goes wrong with the city-state,” Duncan said. As his words fell, the Vanished had already begun to turn its bow and slowly pick up speed toward Lightwind Harbor.

Beside it, the Radiant Star received Lucretia’s orders after a slight delay and reacted the same way.

Rune watched with some surprise the nimble movements of the Radiant Star, and the “test pod” above the bridge making “synchronized responses” as the hull changed its angle. He could not help sighing: “What a clever design… Lady Lucretia, did you build all this yourself?”

“I spent a hundred years designing a ‘vanguard exploration ship’ that could carry out border missions in any situation. There are many parts of this ship I am proud of,” Lucretia said lightly. “But you still have the mood to analyze the engineering on the Radiant Star right now?”

“We do not have anything else to do anyway,” Rune shrugged, looking not nervous at all. “If anything, I am a bit excited. A strange phenomenon has appeared, and it is in a field I have never touched. If we can really crack the secret of the signals coming from that glowing geometric body, we may get a real chance to understand what is going on with the ‘Sun’ above our heads. That is a good thing.”

Lucretia did not answer. She had already moved most of her focus to the Radiant Star, to the “servants” left on the ship.

All those servants were made by her own hand. Each servant held a fragment of her soul inside. Every servant, even the whole ship, was like an extension of her body.

She carefully gave orders and set all the complex and precise observation devices on the Radiant Star into motion.

“…The signal is stronger than what I saw last time,” she suddenly raised her head and looked toward the pale golden sunlight spread over the sea. “The situation does not seem quite the same as before…”

Duncan looked in another direction—toward the Sun, Vision 001, which was slowly sinking and already had a third of its structure below the sea surface.

“Last time the Sun went out…” Shirley’s nervous voice came from the side. She looked quite uneasy. “At least this time, no matter what, the Sun does not seem to have changed yet…”

She only got halfway through her sentence.

A low humming sound suddenly seemed to ring in the bottom of everyone’s hearts.

A strange feeling of unease cut off all conversation.

The distant sky suddenly darkened.

Shirley’s face went blank as she lifted her head and looked toward the darkening sky.

A dark, chaotic sphere like a hollow, and two ring-shaped “bright rims” like red-hot steel, hung there, motionless at the edge of the sky.

The Sun had gone out again.

“…Crap.”

Chapter 684: veil of night – Lost

Once again, the Sun went out before Duncan and the others.

A strange low rumble came first. Then, just as the Sun was about to sink below the sea's horizon, all light vanished from its surface. It turned into a terrifying black hole in the sky. The two rune rings around the Sun still seemed to shine with sunlight. They became two blinding bright rims around that dark hole.

A thin, limited glow spread from the dead edge of the Sun, leaving a layer of murky light between the sky and the sea. That dim light only made the sky look more eerie and frightening.

As the Sun went out, the distant Boundless Sea fell into darkness. Only the "glowing geometric body" near Lightwind Harbor kept shining with its usual "sunlight," holding a basic light over a small area of ocean. The rays of light spilling out across the water became the only comforting thing under the strange "veil of night."

Shirley was completely stunned. She stared into the distance, unable to squeeze out a second sentence. Nina beside her recovered first. She reached out and patted her friend on the shoulder and said: "Don't panic, okay? There's no way it went out just because you said it would…"

"Of course I know that!" Shirley almost jumped up. Then she quickly turned her eyes toward Duncan not far away and said: "Captain, what do we do?"

“Lightwind Harbor is still there. The Pilgrimage Arks are still there…” Duncan did not answer Shirley. He looked at the direction of Lightwind Harbor right away. Under the glow of the glowing geometric body, he carefully studied the distant sea. From here, he could clearly see the coastline of Lightwind Harbor and the outline of the huge Storm Cathedral moored near the city-state.

The other three Pilgrimage Arks could not be seen in full from this angle, but it was clear they were also still in place.

“So… this is ‘the Sun going out’…” Rune muttered. After the first shock passed, he finally reacted. “This really happened…”

Banster stared hard at the terrifying black hole hanging over the sea’s surface far away. His voice was low and heavy as he said: “The aura of the Spirit Realm is starting to grow restless, but the World’s Wound has not appeared ahead of time.”

Duncan looked toward the Popes and said: “I remember you said that last time the Sun went out, the four Pilgrimage Arks didn’t notice anything?”

“Yes.” Rune nodded. “According to what you told us, we stayed still together with the rest of the world during those twelve ‘missing’ hours. We simply ‘skipped’ the event of the Sun going out. If we hadn’t later received reports from Lightwind Harbor, Frostholm, and Pland, we wouldn’t have known anything had happened.”

Duncan nodded slowly, his gaze still fixed on the distant city. “But now you’ve seen it. Your Pilgrimage Arks are here too. Everyone has seen it.”

“What is the principle behind this?” Rune spoke without thinking. He looked at the huge glowing geometric body hanging over the nearby sea and grew thoughtful. “Is it because the four Pilgrimage Arks are now also inside that thing’s protection range?”

“It may really be connected to that strange glowing geometric body,” Duncan said with a nod. “Pland, Frostholm, and Lightwind Harbor each had some special trait that let them ‘remain’ when the Sun went out. Lightwind Harbor’s biggest trait is that it is always bathed in this strange ‘sunlight.’

“But this is not the time to discuss it. You should check the situation on the four Arks at once. Also, Lucretia, can you contact the city now?”

“There is a radio on the Radiant Star. We have already contacted Lightwind Harbor,” Lucretia said, nodding at once. “The city-state has sounded the emergency alarm. Constable units and the knowledge guards are already working to keep order. We shouldn’t have to worry for a while.”

“Order isn’t the problem. Panic is,” Vanna muttered nearby. “And the panic this time won’t be the same as last time. After all, not long after the Sun went out last time, the Nameless One’s Dream broke out…”

Her words brought silence to the deck. Under the dim sky, everyone looked at each other. Their faces showed a mix of subtle, serious, and uneasy expressions.

The four Popes moved quickly. They contacted their own Pilgrimage Arks at once and checked on each Ark’s condition. They gave orders from afar, telling the priests left on the Arks to keep order, monitor the situation, and gather information. At the same time, they ordered each Ark to send some priests into Lightwind Harbor to help control public security and calm the Residents’ fear.

Meanwhile, Duncan and his group returned to the central deck area. There, they found the Bishop groups in some confusion.

These Bishops had been sent out of the meeting early. In the last few minutes, they had gained memories they would never forget. They had just started to get used to the strange, uncanny environment aboard the Vanished, used to all the “living things” and suspicious “rules” on this ship. After the meeting, they had come out on deck to eat a few snacks and enjoy the sea breeze to relax their nerves.

They had barely relaxed when—snap—the Sun went out.

No one had even warned them first.

Thanks to the emergency “training” before boarding and the “common sense lessons” after coming aboard, at least half of the Bishops, on seeing the Sun go out, instinctively wondered if this might count as another “natural phenomenon” that could be seen from the Vanished. When Duncan led a large group into the central deck area, a few Bishops were still deep in discussion.

Their main topic was how early it got dark on the Vanished.

Luckily, after some frantic communication and explanations from all sides, everyone understood what was really happening. They quickly recovered from their first wave of confusion and panic, and order returned.

Under the dim sky and the faint “sunlight” spilling from far away, the Vanished and the Radiant Star once more increased their speed and sailed toward the coastline of Lightwind Harbor.

…

At the semi-permanent floating island research station beside the glowing geometric body, Ted Riel and several Scholars stood together in the upper observation room. Their faces were grave as they watched a radio set. The radio was carrying the latest news from inside the city-state.

The Sun going out had caused a short burst of citywide panic. After that, the Constable units and the Guardians quickly brought order back under control. All main districts inside the city had now entered a state of martial law. The main roads were blocked. Every Sanctuary World was open. Gas lamps were lit early, and the bells of the Academy drifted over the city.

For now, there was no sign of supernatural corruption invading the city. No districts had reported people falling into mental corruption or undergoing any mental transformation.

The good news was that this was not the first time Lightwind Harbor had faced the Sun going out. People were no longer as unprepared as they had been before. They did not suffer so many needless losses in chaotic panic.

The bad news was that after the Sun went out last time, the terrible event known as the Nameless One's Dream had followed. The lingering Shadows of that horror still hung over the city-state.

Even though order inside the city had quickly settled, fear and unease in people's hearts were quietly growing. Everyone worried what might happen after the Sun went out this time.

Ted Riel knew that such wide-spreading fear was the hardest thing to handle. It could not be controlled, and it could not be ignored. It swelled like a dark tide until the crisis ended—or turned into another great disaster.

But that was not the only problem.

Ted Riel frowned and looked toward a machine at the far end of the room.

A recorder was clattering as it ran. Fine gears and rods drove a steel needle back and forth along its track. A long paper strip slowly fed out of the machine. Thin black lines jumped on the strip, drawing information no Human mind could understand.

The signal came every twelve seconds. It repeated three times, then stopped for thirty seconds before starting again.

The recorder was linked to a complex optical device mounted before the observation window at the far end of the room.

“The light-signal from the glowing orb is still going,” a Scholar beside Ted said. “At the moment the Sun went out, the signal clearly grew stronger. It has already passed the highest value in our records.

“Also, a backup unit set in the upper station just received a very weak signal. The signal is the same as the one we get here. That backup unit is aimed at the Sun, the one that has gone dark.”

“This is clearly a complete system,” another Scholar could not help saying. “The Sun and the glowing geometric body that fell into the mortal world still have some kind of link, even if they seem to have separated on the surface…”

“There is still no progress in decoding,” a third Scholar said softly. “If only some new pattern would appear in these signals. At least then we could use it for cross-checking.”

“News just came from the city towers. They have confirmed that the Sun has stopped moving. It is fixed just above the sea surface and has not moved any lower in the last half hour…”

“No one went up the towers to look at the Sun again, right?!” someone blurted out.

“No,” came the answer. “The instruments are recording automatically. The staff only read the data indirectly. Ever since the last incident, the Academy has strictly forbidden anyone to observe the Sun directly in a case like this…”

Ted Riel listened to the talk around him, his brow tightly furrowed. He stayed silent. After a long time deep in thought, he suddenly lifted his head and said: “I have to return to the city-state.”

“Yes, you need to go back to help keep order,” a Scholar said at once. “Leave this place to us. No matter what happens, the observation station will keep running. We will not miss any data.”

Ted Riel looked at these Scholars who carried such weight and trust in their fields. He nodded silently, then opened the Book of sacred miracles that held so many spells and pieces of knowledge.

He turned to the section that recorded “Door” and tapped the page with his finger.

A ghostly great door rose out of the book and formed in the air before him. It opened without a sound.

He took a breath and stepped into the door.

Boundless darkness and chaos swallowed all his senses—

He did not arrive in Lightwind Harbor.

Chapter 685: Dark Passage

The instant that boundless darkness and chaos rushed over him, Ted Riel knew something was wrong.

When he tried to cancel the teleportation at once and step back through the “door,” he found his power did not answer him. The ghostly door that had been at his side only a second ago had already vanished into the endless dark and chaos.

Calm down.

As a Truth Keeper, he drew a slow breath. In the shortest time, he forced himself to calm down. He held back his instinct to start observing and sensing everything around him. In the dark, he stood still where he was. He did not try to see or hear anything.

He slowly pulled his senses back in and held his own thoughts under tight control. Using the “mental discipline” he had trained for many years, he pushed down his natural mortal curiosity, his drive to explore, and his habit of making connections.

This would help him resist any hostile power that might exist in this place. It would also keep him from reaching out too quickly for “knowledge” he was not ready to touch.

Rahm taught that countless truths lay hidden in the dark. In darkness, anything could appear—but the things that did not harm mortals were less than one in ten thousand.

The numbness in his mind slowly spread and turned into a wall that shielded his thoughts. The Blessing of Folly given by Rahm had come. Ted Riel let out a light breath and felt a bit more at ease. Only then did he begin to hold on to the bare minimum of reason and judgment, while carefully rebuilding his senses. He lifted his gaze toward what seemed like endless chaos.

Murky, dreamlike Shadows filled his sight. The darkness looked like a boundless wasteland, and at the same time like a forest of countless towering, unnamable giants. Some huge structure jumped at the edge of his vision. It seemed to float above that wasteland, drifting blind and confused.

A sharp, brutal headache struck him.

For a moment, Ted almost could not stand. The defenses and caution he had built with all his strength shattered in a single second. The instant he saw those giant shapes, countless sharp, tiny, dizzying noises flooded up from the depths of his mind. They tore at his reason like endless cruel saw-teeth. They scraped away his personality and began to eat all his humanity, logic, and memories.

Streams of dim, chaotic light flashed between the floating giants. With that flash, a thought rose in his heart, one strong enough to shake even the firmest Saint into despair—

Subspace.

“Not good…”

Ted Riel only managed to squeeze out one word from his mind before he felt himself losing control of his own body. He felt strange limbs growing from his back, and some thick, icy liquid flowing in his veins. His vision split in the darkness. Countless wild viewpoints he could not control swept around, staring into the dark from every angle. The roaring noise almost crushed his reason—

Then, in the next second, his powerful will surged up from deep inside. He hurried to seal off those alien senses and shred the alien voices in his head. He branded his own identity as an Elf over and over again into his heart.

In that brief moment of forced clarity, he suddenly felt a power appear—and with it, an illusion took shape before him.

He saw a flickering red light like a cold, rational single eye floating in the dark. Many smaller lights flashed around it in neat rows, like an array. A huge outline like a silent tombstone rose behind those lights, standing still in a mist that had appeared from nowhere.

All of Ted's remaining reason was drawn to those lights. Without thinking, he lifted his head and let his gaze fall on that glow. His thoughts were combed, reshaped, and pulled toward that lord of wisdom—

Rumble—

A phantom roar shook him out of the vision. The lights vanished before his eyes. He was back in the dark, chaotic place.

He understood what had happened.

The protection of the God of Wisdom had come. For a brief instant, Rahm had cast him a single glance.

His mind was protected—but only for a time.

A faint noise slowly rose again from the depths of his heart. Ted Riel saw twisted, jumping Shadows creeping back into his vision. He knew at once he had no time to waste. He pulled the Book of sacred miracles from his robe and tried to construct a new door back to the Mortal Realm.

But then, an unseen force came from nowhere. He felt his body suddenly lift away from the wasteland in the dark and get pulled swiftly through the darkness.

In the dark, he watched that chaotic wasteland retreat fast from his sight.

He saw the silent giants rush toward him, then pass through his field of view in indescribable twists, swellings, and shrinkings, and vanish into the far edge of space.

He saw an upside-down mass in the sky surge toward him like a crushing blow, then fade away without a sound like a mirage.

He felt that, for a time, he had stopped somewhere.

In a daze, he lifted his head and saw an immense upside-down shape almost right before him. It looked like a grand yet gloomy building, with northern-style spires and eaves. He could just make out a dry fountain and a dead garden. Parts of the building were broken apart, as if some unseen power had eaten and torn them away.

In the next second, that fine western mansion turned into a shattered giant ship. It was nothing like any “ship” he knew. It looked more like a twisted, broken metal tube built from heaps of steel. It was clearly not whole, like a piece torn off some even larger structure.

Ted Riel had no time to study this shocking thing. In the next moment, he felt himself racing again through the empty void. Light and shadow, more broken and chaotic than before, surged over him like a tidal wave, filling his sight.

With those lights and shadows came knowledge.

Knowledge he had never touched before, but that now suddenly became clear and bright in his mind.

He saw torn structures of time and space. He saw warped stars squeezed into long rings under endless pressure, then turning into eternal flashes of light at the moment of their destruction, flowing like chaos in the depths of this space.

He saw the laws of math collapse at the end of time, and ancient stars out of control, torn into countless burning fragments.

He saw a ship wandering aimlessly in the dark. The ship was decayed and almost broken. It slid through the darkness as if on some eternal mission of exploration—or as if it were only a reflection from a far-off time and space. The ship looked familiar.

Then he saw a huge thing floating at the center of the endless void.

It was a vast throne, as if carved from gray-white stone. The base around the throne was shattered. A headless body sat upon it, keeping eternal silence in the dark.

This journey was about to reach its end—

For some reason, that thought flashed through Ted Riel’s heart. It was as if he had stepped beyond the rules of time and already seen the place where he would finally stop.

Then he stopped.

He seemed to be standing on a small, broken patch of ground. There was a person there—or something else—wrapped in Shadows.

Beside it lay a small heap of melted, shapeless remains. The figure that looked like a Human, yet had some strange half-formed structure, leaned against that heap. It was like a soldier who had died here in some age beyond memory, one hand slightly raised, pointing into the distance.

Ted Riel's mind was drawn to this figure against his will. Compared with the countless gigantic things in this chaotic space, this figure looked especially ordinary and harmless.

But just as he was about to take a step forward, a great warning burst in his heart. He stopped at once.

Right then, a faint, ghostly great door appeared beside him.

It was the teleportation gate he had summoned before, the one he had somehow "lost."

Ted Riel cast aside all hesitation in an instant. He forced himself to look away from the figure and crushed the urge to explore this unknown place. He turned and rushed straight into the ghostly door.

Passing through the door seemed to take only a moment, yet also felt like drifting for a century in chaos. Ted had never thought that a teleportation gate he summoned himself could tear him apart like this.

As his reason wavered on the edge of collapse, he dimly heard a voice at his ear. It was the sound of Humans speaking.

"I got him! Captain, I got him!"

A hoarse voice shouted, excited and proud.

A strong pull came from his arm. In his daze, Ted Riel felt someone grab him and drag him with all their strength. He heard the rise and fall of waves. He felt icy seawater soaking his limbs. A brute force hauled him out of the water onto a deck and threw him down on a hard surface.

"I caught him! This thing was drifting around on the edge of the dark… Yeah, it's a person! This thing is a person!"

Who was shouting? So rough and rude… He didn't sound like someone from the city-state. The voice was strange…

“He still seems out cold… Should I do mouth-to-mouth? Ah, now I’m nervous… Wait, Captain, I don’t even breathe… I only pretend to breathe for the mood… Should I still try?”

Who on earth was that?

Ted Riel struggled to think. He started to “reboot” his senses and every nerve in his body. He forced himself awake and tried his best to open his eyes.

In the darkness, the blurred, wavering shapes around him finally began to grow clear.

He saw the one who had been shouting. He saw a face, very close to his own.

It was an ugly mummified corpse. A horrifying face that looked as if it would rot into dust at any moment.

The mummified corpse was bending closer…

In that instant, Ted Riel suddenly felt that going back to Subspace might have been the better choice.

Chapter 686: Accidents and Coincidence

With a loud bang, the ugly, shriveled mummified corpse shot up from the deck and crashed into a pile of junk not far away like a cannonball.

The sailors on the deck jumped at the noise. Lawrence, who had been watching from a platform nearby, jumped down at once and led a group of men running toward where the “sailor” had fallen. In the middle of the scattered debris, the shriveled corpse in a sailor’s smock was struggling hard. He finally managed to pull his head out of a crate he had smashed through. Seeing the seafarers crowding around him, he shook his head in a daze and mumbled: “I… I saw…”

The first mate, Gus, grabbed the mummified corpse and hauled him out as he asked: “What did you see?”

“I saw my great-grandmother…”

The first mate kicked the mummified corpse straight back into the junk: “You’re a damned anomaly. Where would you get a great-grandmother?!”

Lawrence was sure at once that Anomaly 077 was fine. He turned away and walked over to the “man overboard” they had just hauled up.

An elf in southern-style clothes was half lying on the deck, leaning against the winch used to pull cargo. His expression was dull and blank. He was soaked from head to toe and looked miserable, but there were no obvious wounds on his body.

But when Lawrence came closer, the elf's reaction was clearly not normal. He only turned his head a little, very slowly, as if he was still not fully awake. His dull gaze swept around him once, then turned away again.

Ted Riel was still sunk in a fog, not knowing where he was.

Ever since he had instinctively swatted away that ugly, shriveled mummified corpse, he had stayed like this. His head felt stuffed with a thick, sticky paste of confusion. Strange noises echoed deep in his mind. Shadows shook nonstop at the edge of his vision, disturbing his judgement and his thoughts.

He knew he had already left Subspace. The sea wind and the sound of waves around him were clearly from the Mortal Realm. But that terrible "journey through the dark" had left a long, burning scar in his sanity. The scar was slowly spreading, turning into a dreadful aftereffect of having seen Subspace, and it kept numbing his nerves.

He was already very lucky. Almost no one survived after seeing Subspace, let alone went through one of those terrible "transits" and still came back to the Mortal Realm with a human mind. But he had no time to feel any joy at surviving. The last bit of reason he still had urged him to wake up as soon as possible, to pin his mind firmly to the Mortal Realm. The deadly corruption and shadows had not fully faded. They were attacking from gaps that humans could not sense or understand, trying to drag him back into that dark, chaotic place…

A buzzing, rumbling sound came from the side. It sounded like thunder heard through a thick Veil. Someone walked toward him, a strong old man with graying hair. The man seemed to be talking. His mouth opened and closed, but the sounds that came out could not be understood by human ears.

“Wake up, wake up.” Lawrence reached out and patted the stranger elf’s face, trying to rouse this poor soul who had somehow been drifting on the sea. “What is your name?”

A hazy shadow appeared at his side. Martha’s shadow whispered a warning: “Be careful, Lawrence. The way this person appeared is very suspicious. He drifted here from the sea after the Sun went out. We still don’t know what he really is…”

“Don’t worry, Martha. Even if he’s something that floated out of Subspace, he can’t be stranger than we are,” Lawrence said offhand. But he still stayed careful and put one hand on the pistol at his waist. Thin threads of dim green flame jumped in the cylinder. “When he came out from the edge of the darkness just now, did you see it clearly? How did he show up?”

“There was no prophetic omen,” Martha’s shadow answered quietly. She watched the suspicious elf, who had his eyes open but did not look truly awake. “From the moment the Sun went out, I’ve been watching the area from the Spirit Realm. He just appeared all of a sudden. A fellow like this rose from nowhere in the dark.”

“This is the first time I’ve seen something like this…”

Lawrence muttered to himself. He looked up without thinking and glanced past the rail at the choppy waves around the White Oak. A small patch of sea was lit by the light the White Oak was giving off, and in that patch the ocean still looked like it had before the Sun went out. But beyond that narrow area lay an invisible border. Outside it, the Boundless Sea was dark and eerie, as if the whole world had become nothing but emptiness.

And this suspicious elf had suddenly come out of that invisible border.

At that moment, the “drifter” leaning against the winch suddenly moved his eyes.

Lawrence snapped his head back and stared straight at him.

The elf opened his mouth, but what reached Lawrence's ears was a string of hoarse noise that humans could not understand, or even make: "@##? %…?"

Lawrence: "…?!"

The instant he heard those sounds, a warning flared in his heart. The experience he had gained from drifting on the Boundless Sea for most of his life made the old captain step back two paces at once. His revolver was in his hand so fast it was barely visible to the eye.

Almost at the same time, the sailors on watch around them reacted as well. All kinds of weapons swung up together and aimed at the drifter. Even the "sailor" who had just climbed out of the junk pile managed to pull a curved blade out from somewhere and wave it around at the side.

The drifter on the deck stared wide-eyed, clearly confused for a moment. He spread his hands to show he had no weapon, then spoke again. The same hoarse, piercing noise burst out, a sound that seemed like it could grind an ordinary person's mind to pieces: "%&%?!!"

Then he stopped short.

Ted Riel finally realized that what he was making was not human language at all. It was not even a language.

It was a vibration even he himself could not understand, a sound without meaning.

It was an echo of Subspace.

He reacted at once. In the next second he noticed the world in front of him starting to twist. Shadows rose and shrank on the bodies of the seafarers gathered around him, who had looked like ordinary, innocent people.

Behind the white?haired old captain, countless hostile eyes appeared. The nearby deck slowly softened and turned to something like thick mud. An invisible Veil was slowly opening. The corruption of Subspace was about to…

Yet just as Ted Riel was about to carry out a sacrificial rite on himself to stop the Subspace rift from opening any further, a ghost?green flame suddenly caught his eye.

A pale spirit?form fire rose on Lawrence's body. Then the flame, like a living thing, jumped and spread out. It flared up on every nearby sailor, burning on them and turning them into ghost?like shapes. Then it rushed along the deck, along the ropes, the bridge, the smokestack…

The mummified corpse who had been waving his curved blade at the side and joining the fun let out a scream the moment the spirit flame surged up. He hopped away as if he had been burned, but soon came swaggering back, pretending nothing had happened. He carefully touched a small flame on the deck with his blade, lit a tiny fire seed on the tip, raised it over his head, and pretended that he too was part of the burning fire.

The gate of Subspace was banished before it could open. Ted Riel felt all the noise and all the shadows inside him scorched and driven away by that invisible fire. The flame cut off Subspace's last hold on him. The feel of the Mortal Realm had never been so clear and steady.

He stared up in shock at the old captain, whose whole body was wrapped in faint green flames, and felt a little dazed.

[Why does this fire look so familiar?]

"What was that just now?" Lawrence was a little dazed too. He muttered as he kept a wary eye on the elf across from him, who looked suspicious but not like a cultist or some filthy demon. He was not sure what he should do next. “Some kind of spell?”

“…Who are you people?” Ted Riel suddenly spoke. This time, he made sounds that humans could understand. “Where is this place?”

“You can talk?!” Lawrence was startled. But when he heard the elf speak in human language, he could not help but let out a breath. He still had no idea what had happened, but the danger in his heart faded a little. “…This is the White Oak. I am her captain.”

“The White Oak?” Ted Riel frowned slightly. He seemed to vaguely remember hearing that name before. But his mind was still in a haze after all the blows and the deep exhaustion, so he could not recall the details of the ship for a moment. “What is your relationship with the Vanished? What is your relationship with Captain Duncan?”

“Captain Duncan?” Lawrence froze. This was the first time he had heard anyone outside say that name so calmly. But he soon reacted and nodded. “He is my boss.”

Ted Riel: “…?”

…

“Ted Riel is missing?!”

Inside the witch’s mansion in Lightwind Harbor, Duncan had just returned to the city. He was shocked when he heard the news Lucretia brought.

“Yes. The message just came from the Academy,” Lucretia said with a nod. She had gone out a few minutes earlier. “Fifteen minutes ago, Ted Riel left the research station next to the glowing geometric body. He left through a teleportation gate, but after that he did not appear at the planned arrival point in Lightwind Harbor.”

“Only fifteen minutes?” Shirley leaned in from the side. “That doesn’t sound that long. We can just go look for him…”

“Moving through a teleportation gate… if the person does not arrive the instant the gate opens, then something has already gone wrong,” Lucretia said as she glanced at Shirley. “This is most likely a spell runaway caused by the Sun going out.”

Chapter 687: Settling In and Conversation

The Sun going out could make teleportation spells run wild and cause people to vanish from the Mortal Realm?

After hearing Lucretia's analysis, Duncan felt a wave of doubt. But this world already held so many strange and eerie things, and the Sun going out was the strangest of them all. At this point, nothing that happened really counted as surprising. The most important thing now was to figure out where that "Truth Keeper" had gone.

Just then, Duncan suddenly frowned. It was as if he had heard some message from far away. His expression turned odd.

Alice, who was closest to him, noticed at once: "Eh? Captain, what's wrong?"

Duncan looked up. With a strange look, he glanced at Lucretia and Morris, who were still talking about how to search for Ted: "…Ahem. There's no need to look."

Lucretia and Morris: "Huh?"

"He's fine," Duncan said, waving his hand. "Ted Riel is on the White Oak right now."

Everyone in the room looked at each other. After a few seconds of silence, Vanna finally broke it: "…The White Oak? Lawrence's ship? How did he end up there?!"

“We don’t know yet. It seems even Ted Riel himself can’t explain it clearly,” Duncan said with a sigh. He kept his link with Lawrence open in his mind as he spoke. “Just like last time, the White Oak was still at sea when the Sun went out. The sailors on board saw Ted Riel drifting at the ‘dark border’ on the sea’s surface, and then Anomaly 077 fished him up…

“Lawrence says Ted’s mental state was in complete chaos at first. He could not even talk to anyone. He is only starting to recover now. It seems he went somewhere very, very far away. From his broken descriptions, it sounds like…”

Duncan stopped there, and his face grew a little more serious.

“It seems to be Subspace.”

Ted Riel was wrapped in a thick blanket and sat in a brightly lit cabin. Someone handed him a cup of hot tea that was still almost too hot to hold. He cupped it in both hands, looked up, and said: “Thank you.”

The shriveled, frightening mummified corpse stood in front of him and waved a hand. “Just don’t hit me flying again next time. If these bones break, I don’t know if they’ll ever heal right.”

Ted Riel’s expression turned complicated at once, as if he had just remembered something unpleasant. He gave the “anomaly” a stiff, embarrassed smile. The fellow was clearly in a special runaway state, yet he moved around the White Oak like an ordinary crew member, working hard all over the ship. In the end, Ted could not hold back and asked: “You are Anomaly 077, the sailor?”

“Hey, you know me?” The mummified corpse brightened at once. He leaned closer as he spoke. “Every other ordinary person who sees me just gets scared out of their wits. But you even know my name and my number?”

“…I am the Truth Keeper of Lightwind Harbor,” Ted Riel said calmly, watching the mummified corpse sit down beside him. “Years ago, I was the one who signed your transfer papers.”

The mummified corpse had just started to sit when he sprang back up again. He stared at Ted Riel, pointing at him with a bony finger, his whole body trembling with excitement: “You… you, you… you’re from the Church?! You…”

“Calm down, Mr. mummified corpse,” Ted Riel said helplessly, clearly having expected this reaction. “I know you’re a special runaway?state anomaly now. Don’t worry. I’m not going to force you back into—”

He did not even finish before the mummified corpse dropped to the floor with a thump. The corpse reached out with a bony hand, grabbed the edge of the blanket, and wailed in a voice that could freeze the heart: “I’ve been waiting for someone from the Church for so long! Please seal me! A rope that actually works is enough! If that’s too much trouble, just give me a piece of the shroud and I’ll wrap myself… or you can hit me even harder than you did just now…”

Ted Riel had never imagined a scene like this. The mummified corpse’s shrieking and wailing threw him into a panic. He clutched the blanket and scooted back while he babbled: “Stop, stop, stop… calm down… don’t pull… that’s not what I meant… we can talk about this, but you need to calm down first. You can’t just decide to be resealed by saying it out loud…”

But the mummified corpse clearly was not listening. He kept howling like a ghost. The racket he made sounded as lively as a steam?engine core room. He rattled on about “resealing,” “give me a rope,” “hang me from the mast,” and other such nonsense, the very picture of torn reason and emotional corruption.

To be honest, after half a minute of this, Ted Riel actually started to miss his “lovely” students. Even though they often looked at him with clear but foolish eyes, the worst thing they ever did in class was fall asleep.

That was much quieter than this.

Luckily, the noisy mummified corpse did not keep it up for long. Just when Ted Riel was truly starting to think about taking Anomaly 077’s suggestion and beating him half to death, the cabin door opened.

Lawrence, still wrapped in faint green flames, pushed the door open and came in.

The anomaly who had been crying and wailing a moment before fell silent at once. He grinned and greeted the captain, then vanished from the room almost in the blink of an eye.

Ted Riel stared, stunned, in the direction the “sailor” had gone.

After a long moment, he finally turned his head toward Lawrence. “I never thought that the ‘sailor’ who struck fear into so many mariners would be like this after going into a runaway state…”

Lawrence looked surprised. “You’ve never met Miss Alice?”

“…All right, Captain, sir, you have a point,” Ted Riel said after thinking it over. He waved a hand. “Anything that gets mixed up with the Vanished seems to turn… unbelievable.”

“Yes, unbelievable, but at least not bad,” Lawrence said with a smile as he walked over. “Don’t mind that neurotic mummified corpse, and don’t take his talk about resealing too seriously. He’s just putting on a show. At first he really did try to run away from the Mortal Realm, but now he’s actually quite comfortable on this ship. He just refuses to admit it.”

“It sounds like you know Anomaly 077 very well.”

“A captain’s duty and basic skill,” Lawrence replied. “I have to know everyone on my ship. That fellow is included.” He sat down beside Ted Riel and glanced over his “temporary passenger’s” face. “How do you feel, Your Excellency Truth Keeper?”

“I can still hear faint noise in my head from time to time, but it’s much better than before,” Ted Riel said with a sigh. “The biggest problem now is the mess of memories crawling through my mind. So many scenes… real ones, fake ones, ones twisted by self?protection. It’s hard to tell which ones I can trust. I feel like I’ve been traveling through that dark place for a century… but you’re telling me I was only gone from Lightwind Harbor for a little more than ten minutes?”

“Yes, a little more than ten minutes, Your Excellency Truth Keeper,” Lawrence said with a nod. “When we fished you out, you had only been missing from the teleportation gate for a short while. So we very much want to know what exactly you went through in that ‘short while’.”

“‘We’?” Ted Riel had sharp ears. He did not miss that word.

“I just spoke with my boss. He already knows what happened here,” Lawrence said. “The Truth Keeper ‘vanishing’ has caused some chaos in Lightwind Harbor. Thankfully, the White Oak found you before that chaos could spread too far. As for the city, you don’t need to worry too much. While the Vanished is near that city, there is no place on the Boundless Sea safer than Lightwind Harbor. As for you…”

The old captain paused and thought for a moment before going on: “We still don’t know how much this last extinguishing of the Sun has changed the world. Trying to open a spatial passage again could be very dangerous. So you should stay on this ship for now and rest. While you have the time, tell me what you saw in that ‘darkness’. He is very interested in it.”

Ted Riel’s face slowly grew serious.

After a short silence, he looked into the old captain's eyes and said: "You should already know that my experience is tied to Subspace. That knowledge is not safe."

Lawrence shrugged. "My boss is tied to Subspace too. He is much less safe than your knowledge."

Ted Riel thought about it and had to admit the man was right.

"…All right. Where should I start?"

"Let's start with what you just mentioned while you were still half conscious," Lawrence said. "That inverted manor floating in the darkness…"

…

"Ted Riel is lucky, in a way. He survived Subspace, and he's recovering fairly well," Duncan said. "Right now he's on the White Oak, telling Lawrence about those unbelievable experiences. It may not be long before we receive some shocking information about Subspace."

Duncan ended his link with the White Oak for the moment and turned his attention back to Lightwind Harbor. He roughly explained the situation Lawrence had sent to him so far, then looked over at Lucretia.

"From what we know now, his experience was not the same as mine."

"…After all, he was only 'gone' for fifteen minutes, while you spent a century in Subspace," Lucretia said, her expression clearly complicated. "Just fifteen minutes was enough to tear at a Saint's sanity and almost turn him into a Subspace rift… and he was once able to hold out to the very end under Atlantis's influence…"

"Thankfully, the only loss on the White Oak's side was that Anomaly 077 took a punch," Duncan said, waving his hand. He quickly changed the subject. “Before more news comes from over there, let’s focus on the world after the Sun went out… Lucy, I want to know what that strange ‘signal’ really was.”

Chapter 688: The Information in Alice’s Eyes

Lucretia brought over the copied paper tapes from the glowing orb Research Station, which recorded the latest “strange signal”. She also found the original signal that had first been recorded by the Radiant Star. Duncan stared at them for a few minutes and soon reached a conclusion—

He had no idea what this thing meant…

Drawing any conclusion from a pile of abstract signals was the job of real experts and scholars. And right now, even the real scholars were at a loss in front of these signals.

“They just look like tremors of random strength,” Morris stood under the lamp, spreading a long strip of paper on the table. He tried to find some pattern in the jumping curve as he frowned in thought. “We can convert each tremor’s amplitude into different numbers, or into ‘breaks’ of different lengths. But that just makes it some kind of cipher… Without the matching ‘codebook’, there’s no way to understand what these tremors mean.”

“From the first time we received these signals, the scholars have been trying to convert them into all kinds of forms,” Lucretia said at the side. “Including sound. After we transformed these tremors into electrical signals and fed them straight into playback devices, they sounded like some kind of continuous, low moaning or whispering. But there was no actual meaning in it. We also tried turning them into images, but that direction hasn’t made any progress yet.”

Duncan listened quietly, then suddenly spoke: “Could this be the ‘internal signal’ that the ‘glowing geometric body’ uses to communicate with the other structures of Vision 001?”

“We can’t rule that out,” Lucretia nodded. “The research station has a backup set of high-sensitivity recording equipment. Not long ago, that device also received a faint signal from the direction of Vision 001’s main structure. We have reason to believe that the ‘glowing geometric body’ still anchored off Lightwind Harbor is still in contact with Vision 001’s main structure…

“Both signals were related to the Sun going out,” Morris spoke again, lost in thought. “The first appeared after the Sun went out. The second appeared before the Sun went out. And the content of the signals was the same. To me, that feels… a lot like some kind of warning…”

Duncan said nothing. He walked to the window and looked outside in thought.

The whole city lay under a strange, cross-cut “twilight”.

The Sun in the sky had already gone out, but some kind of “suppressive” power from Vision 001 still seemed to be in effect. Because of that, the World’s Wound had not appeared with this early “veil of night”. At the moment, the sky was pure black, but at the same time, faint golden “sunlight” streamed in from the direction of the coast. It passed between the staggered high and low buildings, forming magnificent yet eerie bands of light over the streets.

The gas lamps along the streets and alleys had been lit early. There was not a single pedestrian on the roads. Only patrol squads of guardians and fast-moving steam walkers sometimes crossed the intersections, sweeping their lamps over the empty streets, full of vigilance and caution.

The city was very quiet. A heavy, tense mood filled the dimness, so much so that any sound from outside could tug at the nerves of those listening.

A soft rustling came from nearby. Alice had curiously picked up the tapes piled on the table. She turned them over and over, completely unable to make sense of them.

Shirley and Dog were lying at another window. Two heads leaned together as they looked out. Nina stood behind them, muttering about something under her breath.

“The situation in Pland and Frostholm is still fairly stable. Thanks to last time, people quickly restored order. But the Sun going out a second time is spreading unease through the cities,” Duncan said suddenly. “Aside from them, contact with the other city-states has been cut off again… just like before.”

“The only difference from last time is that we have four cathedral ships moored beside Lightwind Harbor this time,” Vanna said. “They were affected by the ‘glowing geometric body’ and stayed on this side after the Sun went out. Order on each cathedral ship has already been restored. Rune, Your Eminence seems to have activated some observation and research facilities on the Academy Ark. They’re collecting data on environmental changes in the Mortal Realm after the Sun went out…”

“I hope he finds something,” Duncan sighed. “But honestly, I don’t hold out much hope. Vision 001 has hung over this world for a full ten thousand years. I’m afraid only the ancient kingdom of Critt from back then, or the legendary Abyssal Lord who completed the Third Long Night, know what that thing really is…”

He had not finished when Alice’s voice suddenly came from the side: “Captain, captain! Captain, help! I’m stuck!”

Duncan turned his head and saw that Alice had already been wrapped up in a mass of paper tape around her head and arms. The silly doll stood in the middle of the pile, blinking innocently at them. She did not dare to move at all, as if she was afraid she might tear the fragile tapes if she struggled.

"…How did you even manage that?!" Duncan stared, shocked, then walked over, half angry and half amused, to free Alice from the paper entanglement. "You even got yourself wrapped up in this?"

"I don't know either!" Alice said in a very confident tone. "I just wanted to see how long this strip was. But I could never pull out the end. By the time I noticed, I was already stuck…"

Duncan let out a sigh: "Stop messing with them. These tapes are important."

"Oh…" Alice answered in a slightly dejected voice. She watched Duncan put the "paper strips" back into the box, looking just like a cat whose ball of yarn had been taken away. But soon she seemed to forget that small regret. Her expression turned bright again as she happily leaned toward Duncan. "Oh right, Captain, what is an 'Observer Effect stabilizer anchor'?"

Duncan, who had just picked up the ball of paper tape to put it away, froze on the spot.

The whole living room fell silent all at once.

This silly doll had just said a string of words that she clearly could not have "made up" on her own!

After two seconds of shock, Duncan slowly turned his head. His expression grew very serious: "What did you just… say?"

Alice jumped, thinking she had messed something up again. "Observation… Observer Effect stabilizer anchor… Did I say the wrong thing?"

“Why did you suddenly bring that up?” Duncan dropped the tapes in his hands and took two quick steps to stand in front of Alice. When he saw the tension on the doll’s face, he quickly softened his tone. “Don’t be afraid. You didn’t do anything wrong. But you just mentioned a very… unusual term.”

Alice stared at him with wide eyes. Under his gaze, she relaxed a little. Then she looked left and right, as if studying something others could not see, and said casually: “Observer Effect stabilizer anchor failure. Error code E-C6-305. ‘Star Coronet’ damaged. Main system restarting. Restart time unknown…”

Lucretia finally reacted. She rushed up to Alice and pointed at the tapes on the table: “You figured that out from these tapes?! Is that what they recorded?”

“No,” Alice shook her head innocently. “I don’t know what the messy curves on these strips mean. But there are failure warnings for the Observer Effect stabilizer anchor everywhere… Eh? You can’t see them?”

The doll seemed to realize something at last. She looked at the others with a surprised expression. That surprise and confusion… was just like when she had first learned that “ordinary people” could not see the drifting lines all around them.

Duncan stared at the doll and slowly realized something. He lifted his head and looked out the window at the weakened “sunlight” that slipped in past the shadows of the buildings.

These beams of “sunlight” came from the huge glowing geometric body out on the sea. After being blocked by layer upon layer of buildings and weakened by distance, they had grown very faint here.

But the information carried in the spectrum would not vanish because of that degree of weakening. It spread through the air. It filled the whole city.

In Alice's eyes, it was everywhere.

"So you can directly see the signals released by that 'glowing geometric body'," Duncan withdrew his gaze from the window and looked at Alice. "What… do they look like?"

"I can't really say," Alice scratched her hair. "And I don't even know if it counts as 'seeing'… I just feel there's something inside the light. Then the meaning appears straight in my head. Oh, although Goathead says I don't have a brain…"

Morris came over too. He stared at the doll in amazement. "Then why didn't you say so earlier?"

"You never asked!" Alice was even more confident this time. "And I thought you all could see it!"

Everyone in the room could not help but look at each other.

Clearly, each of them was thinking about those "lines" in Alice's eyes—the very same things the doll had once thought everyone could see.

But Duncan was thinking of even more.

He thought of the little sea bird with black feathers that Rune had brought to the assembly—the Mad Bird.

He also thought of the painting Alice had made, and of the "lines" she had insisted on adding to every person in it.

Alice seemed a bit uneasy. After speaking so boldly, she had finally noticed how different she was from the others. She thought she must have done something wrong. She edged closer to Duncan, hunching her shoulders. "I really didn't know at first…"

“Different observers see different worlds. For Alice, the world has looked different from ours right from the start. She took that for granted and never thought to ask everyone what the world looked like to them,” Duncan broke the silence. He turned and gently pressed his hand down on Alice’s hair. “Don’t be nervous. You didn’t do anything wrong. You did very well. Alice, you’ve done a great service. You’ve seen information that we can’t see…”

He softly rubbed the doll’s hair, helping her relax bit by bit. His gaze went past the window, as if it passed over the rows of buildings in the city and reached the Sun that still hung motionless over the sea.

Vision 001—Observer Effect stabilizer anchor.

Chapter 689: A Neglected “Connection”?

At Lightwind Harbor, faint “sunlight” spread from the surface of the sea and covered the whole city-state under the veil of night. The information carried by the light flowed silently through the sea. Yet there was only one doll who could read that information.

To be honest, even Duncan felt this was a bit unbelievable.

In this doll’s eyes, how many things in the world were different from common understanding? Was the sky blue in her view? Were the leaves green? What shape did humans have in her eyes, and what kind of waves did the sea carry?

And even if she described what she saw—were the colors, sounds, and shapes she spoke of really the same as what ordinary people understood?

This seemed like a puzzle that would always circle around itself and never be solved.

Alice turned her head. The glow of the gas lamp reflected in her large, pretty eyes. She looked at Duncan with a mix of doubt and worry. After a long time, she asked in a small voice: “Captain, the things I see really are useful, right?”

Duncan’s scattered thoughts slowly drew back. He did not let those messy ideas keep spreading. At that moment, he suddenly agreed with something

Alice had once said—some annoying questions that clearly have no answer are better left unasked.

So he smiled. His expression relaxed a little: “Of course they’re useful. Besides that information, what else did you see? I mean after the Sun went out. Did you ‘see’ anything that was different from usual?”

Alice quickly understood what he meant. She frowned slightly and tried hard to recall. Then she turned her head and looked around. After a while, she spoke, not very sure: “If I have to say something… I always feel there’s a buzzing sound…”

Duncan frowned: “Buzzing?”

“Yeah. Buzzing. It’s a very soft sound. And I can’t even say for sure that it’s really a ‘sound’,” Alice said, waving her hands as she explained. “I just feel like there’s something making noise in my head all the time. But if I don’t pay attention, I forget it. When I look at that ‘sunlight’, the sound gets a bit stronger…”

Duncan nodded lightly. After a moment, he asked again: “Last time the Sun went out, did you hear this buzzing sound? Did you see those ‘messages’ about the ‘Observer Effect stabilizer anchor’?”

“No,” Alice shook her head, holding her temples. “I only ‘saw’ and heard them this time, after we came to Lightwind Harbor…”

Listening to the doll’s story, Duncan sank into thought.

According to Lucretia, just now, another set of observation equipment in Lightwind Harbor had received faint signals from the extinguished Sun. Their features were exactly the same as the signals released by the glowing geometric body. In other words, during the blackout, the main body of Vision 001 had also been “broadcasting” a report of failure about the “Observer Effect stabilizer anchor”.

Yet Alice said that during the last blackout of the Sun, she had not “seen” this content. She had only read the failure report from the “sunlight” here after she arrived at Lightwind Harbor… Why?

Was it because the malfunction during the last blackout had not been this serious, so the main body of Vision 001 had not sent out a failure report?

If that was the explanation, then the situation was more serious than anyone had expected. That would mean the whole system had suffered further deterioration—and in such a short time.

The living room grew quiet. Lucretia, Morris, and the others had gathered around. They listened to the talk between Duncan and Alice and looked at the changing expression on Duncan’s face with some worry. After a while, Nina finally could not hold back: “Uncle Duncan, do you know what that ‘Observer Effect stabilizer anchor’ means?”

Duncan opened his mouth, but suddenly felt stuck.

In this world, explaining the ideas of planets and the universe was already extremely difficult. How was he supposed to explain the even more abstract “Observer Effect”? How could he explain the strange things that happen between the macroscopic and microscopic worlds?

And more importantly—could the Observer Theory he knew really be used here?

His expression grew complicated as he raised his head and looked out at the world beyond the window.

“I can guess a few things,” he said slowly. “But it’s very different from the ‘Observer Theory’ I know. It should have taken place in the microscopic world, not…”

He stopped, hesitating.

If Vision 001’s other name really was “Observer Effect stabilizer anchor”, then did that explain the true mechanism by which this ancient Vision “suppressed corruption” and “stabilized order”?

Without meaning to, he thought of the truth behind the Great Annihilation. He thought of the conflicts at the bottom of all things, and thought of the various extraordinary manifestations spreading across the whole world because of cognitive corruption. If the microscopic world was the “keystone of order” for each universe, then when those keystones collided and were wiped out, mixing into a vast, chaotic soup of information… would the Observer Effect still be limited to the microscopic world?

At the moment when the mathematical rules of each universe were torn apart, at the instant when the structure of all matter was completely destroyed and everything was reduced back to basic bits of information—perhaps the very ideas of “micro” and “macro” had already vanished!

In that storm-like rush of thoughts, Duncan murmured without meaning to: “…The corruption of information at the bottom of all things, and the clash of laws… might actually be the Observer Effect falling into a runaway state in the macroscopic world?”

Morris and Lucretia looked at each other. A few seconds later, they turned their heads at the same time. “…Huh?”

“…I’ll find a way to explain to you what the ‘Observer Effect’ is, and what I’m guessing about it, but that will take a lot of time and effort,” Duncan waved his hand quickly. “Right now I want to figure out another question.”

Lucretia spoke at once: “Another question?!”

Duncan nodded and looked at the brother-only doll standing beside him, her face pure and harmless—mostly because she still hadn’t caught up.

“Have you ever thought about this,” he asked, “why can Alice see and understand those ‘signals’?”

“Oh, right!” Shirley reacted at once—mainly because this was the only question so far that she fully understood. “It’s one thing for her to ‘see’ them. Those ‘lines’ can only be seen by her anyway. But how can she understand them? There are so many experts and scholars in the city. They’ve been tearing their hair out over this, and no one has figured it out!”

Vanna was sharp enough to notice the serious, thoughtful look on Duncan’s face when he raised the question. “You already have an answer, don’t you?”

Duncan slowly nodded. After a moment of thinking and choosing his words, he brought up what was written in The Blasphemous Tome:

“You should remember that according to that book, after two failed Genesis Protocols, it was the Crawling King who successfully completed the Genesis Protocol during the Third Long Night and opened the Deep Sea era.”

Vanna nodded at once: “Yes, of course we remember that.”

“The ‘construction’ of Vision 001 also happened in that same era,” Duncan went on seriously. “The Crawling King had the Critt clan serve as his assistants. Together they designed and built ‘the Sun’. And the Crawling King is the same being we know as the ‘Abyssal Lord’. Do you remember how Alice was born?”

“Oh, I know this one!” Shirley lit up at once. “The Abyssal Lord’s replicant pinched her together by hand on the seafloor!”

Everyone understood at once.

All their eyes turned to Alice.

Alice listened to everyone talking about her, and only now did she finally catch up. After she confirmed that she had not messed anything up, she did not know what she started thinking about, but her face showed a proud and happy expression.

"…We have always known that, in a sense, Alice is a 'creation of the Abyssal Deep'," Duncan said. He looked at the doll, who had somehow grown proud, and thought of that time in the garden of the manor when he had accidentally made contact with the Abyssal Lord. "But most of the time, we only focused on her connection with Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm and ignored that her link with the Abyssal Lord is the real key.

"Now it seems that connection may be more important than we thought. At least one thing is clear. She can understand the 'system language' the Abyssal Lord used in that 'creation blueprint'…"

Nina thought for a moment. "Like how a punch-card analyzer can read the paper tape output from a Sorting Engine?"

"…That's a fine way to think about it."

Alice looked at Duncan, then at the others. She seemed to want to ask something, but suddenly she frowned, as if she had heard or seen something. A moment later, she said: "The system has restarted."

Duncan instantly lifted his head. Almost at the same time, a low, unreal rumbling sounded in everyone's mind.

With that deep roar that seemed to fill the whole world in an instant, Duncan saw a streak of glow appear in the sky outside the window—

The Sun, which had sunk down near the horizon and gone dark and still, lit up once more.

Shirley was the first to rush to the window. She pressed her head to the glass and looked down at the street. She saw the glow spill over the roofs, and a squad of Knowledge Guards standing watch at the corner, all raising their heads in surprise to look at the sky.

Nearby, some residents who had been hiding at home reacted as well. They opened their windows and peered outside.

Shirley happily waved from the window toward a neighbor who had appeared at another window not far away, but no one answered her—everyone's attention was fixed on the glow that had returned to the sky.

Soon, faint cheers drifted in from somewhere far away. After a while, the loudspeaker at the intersection crackled to life.

The broadcast announced that the Sun had lit up again. It also reminded the residents not to rush out of their homes. The veil of night would fall soon, and the curfew would remain in force through the night until the Sun rose again as usual the next day.

Duncan listened to the faint broadcast from outside and watched the glow slowly fade from the sky. He let out a slow breath.

The Sun rising as usual… Now, even that had become something uncertain.

Chapter 690

This time, the Sun went out when it was close to dusk, so not long after the sky lit up again, the sunlight slowly faded away from the surface of the sea.

Vision 001’s magnificent double rune rings slowly sank into the ocean. As the last streak of afterglow vanished from the sky, the veil of night descended. In the districts that the glowing geometric body could not shine on directly, the cold radiance from the World’s Wound and the darkness of night covered everything as usual.

The city grew quiet. The gas lamps on the streets gave off a slightly murky glow under the veil of night. Patrol squads of guardians walked through the streets and alleys, their figures stretching into long shadows at each intersection. The Sun going out felt like a dream that was not quite real, and it was slowly melting into the night.

But Duncan could feel that this “nightmare” had not really faded the way it seemed on the surface. A heavy air still lingered over the city. In these silent neighborhoods, tension and unease grew in the veil of night like thick, sticky sludge.

“Every household has turned on all their lights. The air is tense everywhere,” Shirley lay at the living room window, muttering as she watched the street outside. “I definitely don’t want to go out on the street right now… I feel like I can’t even breathe.”

Dog beside her shook his head and wobbled his neck: “There are at least twice as many guards outside today. If you go out on the street now, the night watch guards will pin you down the moment they see you. You still want to breathe? Then the Captain will have to go to the station and fish us out again. At that point you really won't be able to breathe…"

Vanna leaned against the window. She lowered her head and glanced at Shirley, who was sprawled on the sill: "I didn't expect you to be so sensitive to 'atmosphere'."

"I know this feeling very well. The gas lamps in the Lower City always lit up later than in other districts. When the veil of night was about to fall, many people couldn't afford electric lights at home. That tense mood would show up as the sky grew darker. Only when the gas lamps lit up would the whole street let out a long breath, like 'whooosh'. Then we knew we could sleep in peace."

"But tonight, even with the whole city lit up, a lot of people are destined to stay awake," Duncan walked over. He pressed one hand lightly on Shirley's hair and used the other to rub Dog's head. "After the Sun has gone out a second time, even the most optimistic people can't help worrying about one thing – whether the Sun will still rise tomorrow."

Shirley tilted her head to the side. Then she suddenly jerked up and stared at Duncan in horror: "…Huh!? It really won't rise tomorrow?!"

Duncan's face looked odd: "…How would I know? It's not up to me."

"Oh." Shirley scratched her hair. "That's true…"

At that moment Lucretia walked over from the side: "There's news from the Observatory. The signal released by the glowing orb has completely stopped. They're getting ready to send a small team into the glowing orb to check whether that 'stone sphere' has changed."

Duncan raised his eyebrows: "Night work?"

“For the sea where the glowing geometric body is, it is always daytime,” Lucretia spread her hands. “sunlight can calm the power of anomalies on the Boundless Sea. Research around the glowing geometric body has always run in shifts, twenty-four hours a day.”

Duncan nodded. Then he suddenly turned his head in thought and looked toward Alice, who was not far away helping Lunie wind her spring.

The doll noticed his gaze. She raised her head and gave him a harmless, bright smile.

After the Sun lit up again, the error-report signals in Alice’s “eyes” had disappeared. She had gone back to her daily self as if nothing had happened.

But now Duncan felt curious. If he brought her to that stone sphere at this moment, what would happen? This doll, who was in theory a “creation” of the Abyssal Deep Patron, might see something in front of a fragment of Vision 001, which was also made by the Abyssal Deep Patron, that an ordinary person could not see.

In fact, Duncan had once taken Alice to see the glowing geometric body before. But back then, no one realized she and Vision 001 actually shared an almost “same source” connection, so he had not tested anything in that direction. Alice herself had not paid special attention to the glowing geometric body either.

This time, he wanted to run a more deliberate “test”.

“Lucy, I need you to arrange something for me,” Duncan turned his head to Lucretia. “I want to take Alice to see that stone sphere.”

Lucretia froze for a moment, but she quickly understood what Duncan meant and nodded at once: “Understood.”

Duncan grunted in reply, then looked to his side at the empty air.

A streak of ghost-green flame rose out of nowhere where his gaze fell, and a fat pigeon burning with spirit flame flapped its wings and appeared in front of him: “teleportation successful! teleportation successful!”

“We should bring that unlucky ‘Truth Keeper’ over as well,” Duncan said casually. “Go to Lawrence. The White Oak can serve as your beacon. You know the way, right?”

AI tilted his head. After thinking for a moment, he flapped his wings hard: “Air wife! Imaginary wife! Air wife! Imaginary wife!”

“…Lawrence’s wife isn’t imaginary anymore. Don’t say that in front of Martha. She’ll stew you,” Duncan’s eye twitched as he glared at the pigeon, who seemed to get fatter by the day. “On second thought, you can leave a bit later. After that, send Ted Riel straight to the stone sphere. I happen to want to talk to him.”

The pigeon became excited again: “Talk therapy, also known as talk cure~~”

Duncan: “…”

…

Ted Riel wore a warm, thick coat and slowly walked along the stern deck. The cold night wind blew from the sea, carrying a salty, fishy smell. The soft waves tapped against the hull again and again. In the darkness, the sound rose and fell, and his mood gradually calmed.

After the Sun lit up again, it set normally. Familiar dusk passed, and then the quiet veil of night arrived. At this moment, even the cold light of the World’s Wound felt a bit gentle.

“As someone who just finished doing the butterfly stroke in Subspace, your recovery isn’t bad.”

A hoarse, unpleasant voice came from the deck not far away. Ted followed the sound and saw a hideous mummified corpse in a sailor's smock sitting on a coil of rope near the rail, smiling at him in the dark.

That smile was enough to give a person nightmares for a whole night.

Ted frowned and walked toward the mummified corpse. He leaned on the railing beside it.

"You don't actually need that thick coat, Mr. Truth Keeper," the "Sailor" glanced at the coat on Ted's shoulders and spoke casually. "As far as I know, the Saints are built differently from normal people. A little soak in seawater shouldn't be enough to make you feel cold… Or is the chill of Subspace still soaking into you?"

"…This is Captain Lawrence's kindness," Ted looked down at the coat on himself and answered. Then he frowned again. "I feel like… you know a lot about Saints."

"I know a little," the Sailor bared his teeth in a rough grin. "I know that whatever you used to be, after you receive divine blessings, you can't be counted as completely 'alive' anymore. I know your skin can block blades. Your bones can shatter and then grow back. Even if your heart breaks apart, your blood still flows. You can survive for days without breathing. Even a 'scholar' like you, once promoted, fears neither heat nor cold, nor diseases, nor most poisons…"

He paused, then casually took a bottle of beer from beside him. As he swung it lightly, he kept speaking: "Strictly speaking, you Saints are a group of anomalies kept in an unsealed state. Ordinary anomalies go into runaway state once they are unsealed, but you… those divine blessings that were given to you are still controlling you."

Listening to the mummified corpse ramble, Ted's expression suddenly grew serious: "How do you know all this?"

"I'm a Sailor. Sailors should know many strange things, because we are the restless souls wandering on the Boundless Sea," the Sailor stretched his cracked lips in another grin and raised the beer in his hand. "We wander when we're alive, or wander after we're dead. Wander long enough, and you learn things. There is nothing new on the Boundless Sea. Want a drink? Pure Storm Brew. Good wine made by the Deep Sea Church. I stole it from the captain's private stash."

"…You dared to steal from the captain?"

"Stealing wine from the captain's stash is also a necessary part of being a Sailor. Getting hanged from the mast afterward is another part," the mummified corpse laughed in his hoarse voice. He raised the bottle and poured it straight down his throat. A moment later, the beer leaked out through the holes in his ruined chest and a large tear at the side of his neck, dripping onto the deck. "Ahhh… good stuff."

Ted did not care about the mummified corpse's jokes. He still watched this anomaly number 077 with suspicion. In official records, it was marked as a "special runaway-state anomaly". After a while, he suddenly asked, "You must have been a person once, right?"

"How would I know?" the Sailor shrugged without concern. "Under certain conditions, 'people' can become anomalies too. If you think I was, then sure, I was."

Ted noticed that the Sailor was dodging the question, so he did not push further. After a few seconds of silence, he suddenly changed the subject: "Where is this ship going?"

“Lunsa. The captain took a big job. We’re going there to pick up twelve sealed objects and transport them to another northern city-state.”

“…How many?!”

“Twelve.”

“…A large transport ship personally escorted by a Saint is only supposed to carry eight anomalies at a time. Have you never considered the strict containment rules for anomalies, or the possibility that they might conflict and interfere with one another?” Ted stared in shock. “Who signed the permit for you?!”

“The Deep Sea Church did. Why?” The Sailor gave Ted a glance. “Don’t make such a fuss. This is the Vanished Fleet’s dedicated transport service. We’re carrying twelve because Lunsa only has twelve sealed objects that meet the shipping conditions. As for sealed objects going into runaway state…”

The mummified corpse stopped, then raised a hand and pointed at himself. “I’m the only runaway-state anomaly on this ship. I’m on duty here twenty-four hours a day. Go ashore and I fight. Back on board I scrub the deck. When someone finishes doing the butterfly stroke in Subspace, I have to dive down and fish him out. If I had a second chance, I’d rather rot in the shroud and never wake up.

“Any anomaly that needs ‘transfer transport’ to strengthen its seal has at least some thinking ability. When they see me like this, every single one of them gets quiet as a quail once they’re on board. The ones that can move on their own even learned to help close the sealed vault door after the captain finishes his inspection…”

Ted: “…?”

Chapter 691

Ted followed the movement and sat down beside anomaly 077.

“Really not going to have some?” anomaly 077 grinned and shook the beer bottle again, then pointed at a corner nearby. “I’ve got another bottle there. This kind of internal-only good stuff is hard to find again once you miss it. As far as I know, Lightwind Harbor doesn’t have this. Try it. If you’re still soaked in the chill of Subspace, the alcohol might help.”

“Since you know so much about Saints, you should know alcohol does nothing for me,” Ted gave the mummified corpse a glance, then turned his eyes away and shook his head. “There’s something I’m very curious about.”

Anomaly 077 shrugged: “Ask. I might not answer.”

“…How does an ‘anomaly’ like you, one with a complete mind, see this world?” Ted asked very seriously. Then, maybe thinking the question sounded a bit abrupt, he thought for a moment and added, “I’ve dealt with many people and read many wise thinkers’ writings about the world. I understand the mortal point of view. But when I look at you, I suddenly want to know how a rational anomaly like you sees the world…”

“Ah, such a philosophical question right away. As expected of a Truth Keeper,” anomaly 077 clicked his tongue. “But haven’t you met Miss Alice? Why didn’t you ask her?”

Ted went quiet for a moment: “…I feel she has no opinion about the world.”

“…Ah, then it seems you really did meet Miss Alice,” the Sailor laughed happily and took another gulp of beer. While the liquid trickled down onto the deck, he leaned his head back. “You’re asking for my opinion? I think this world might as well be destroyed.”

Ted frowned without thinking.

“That’s your question, Mr. Truth Keeper,” the Sailor said. Noticing the change in Ted’s expression, he glanced over, then turned his eyes back to the sky. “And don’t you think so? The Sun has already gone out twice. City-state-level disasters keep happening. Blasphemous and banished things keep waking and returning.

“In my eyes, this world is full of cracks, shadows, hollows, and a kind of noise like something dying… You people, noble and stubborn – I’m not being sarcastic – you spend your days thinking about nothing but patching this world back together. But use that scholar’s mind of yours and think it through… can it still be fixed?”

Ted frowned but did not answer. He had not expected such an answer from a question asked out of casual curiosity. The attitude of the Sailor surprised him even more. These answers were not coming off the top of his head. They sounded like conclusions he had reached after watching and thinking about the world for a very long time.

Anomaly 077 did not care about Ted’s silence.

“This world is finished, Mr. Truth Keeper. As a Sailor, I can smell a coming storm better than you. Compared to a few hundred years ago, now the world is riddled with cracks. It’s like an old house that has broken open in countless places. At the next widening of those holes, the howling wind will destroy this already-crumbling place.

“All your patching means nothing. Once the keystone collapses, painting the walls or pasting newspapers over the holes only gives the people inside a brief, fake sense of peace.

“Now listen, Mr. Truth Keeper. Raise your ears and really listen…”

The Sailor leaned closer. Right in front of Ted, he put a hand next to his own ear in a listening pose, a half-smile on his face.

“Do you hear it? That hollow, sharp noise… That is the wind blowing from Subspace… It passes through all those gaps big and small and vibrates in a range ordinary people cannot hear. I’ve always heard it.

“Now, you can too.”

A faint noise echoed all around, yet it also seemed to ring directly in his head. It was low and weak, but impossible to ignore.

Ted’s eyes opened a little wider. He stared at the Sailor with a heavy, pressuring gaze.

“Relax, Mr. Truth Keeper. This is how it is when you deal with Subspace. Once you get a little on you, it sticks for life,” the Sailor did not seem bothered at all by the look Ted gave him. He shifted to a more comfortable position and slouched deeper into the pile of rope. “You somehow managed to escape from that place, and I won’t bother guessing what kind of ‘sacred miracle’ kept you alive. But clearly, Subspace still left a tiny mark on you.

“Compared to all those poor souls who went mad and turned into monsters after one accidental glimpse of Subspace, this little side effect is already very lucky.”

“…This is also something a Sailor is supposed to understand?”

“Of course.” The mummified corpse nodded as if it were obvious, not caring whether anyone believed him.

Ted: “…”

The Sailor did not care what Ted thought. The frightening mummified corpse only shifted again, sinking even more lazily into the ropes. He shook the bottle in his hand and muttered, “Try to see it this way. The world is just like this. Whether you take it hard or take it easy, you still have to live the day. If you have wine in your hand, you should drink it while you can. If you can drift one more day, then drift one more day.

“I can’t go back to sleep now. If I could, I’d definitely sleep straight until Doomsday. But things are pretty good as they are. I’ll just keep my eyes open and wait for the world’s Doomsday to arrive…”

At this point, the Sailor turned his head a little and gave Ted a half-smile.

“As for you, Mr. Truth Keeper, you still have your own work to do. Now it’s time to go back – back to your post, to keep patching this shaky wreck of a house.

“Even if it doesn’t help, maybe… this world keeps moving forward day after day exactly because of this ‘useless’ holding on. Maybe one day, at the end of all that emptiness, a road suddenly appears. When that happens, every bit of clinging on will have meaning.”

The low, chaotic noise spread through Ted’s mind again. The aftereffects from Subspace made him feel dazed. He felt that something was wrong with his senses, but before he could figure out what, a crackling sound suddenly came from the nearby deck and broke his thoughts.

He followed the sound and saw ghost-green flames rising on the planks. The fire flared up at once and twisted into a rotating doorway of flame, and a skeletal roc wreathed in fire charged out, circling above his head.

Ted froze for a second and had just opened his mouth to speak when his vision blurred. The burning monster bird wrapped around him and dragged him straight into the doorway.

The flaming door went out with a boom. The deck fell quiet again, as if everything just now had been an illusion.

The Sailor leaned in the pile of ropes, holding his bottle and staring blankly. Not far from him, a writhing shadow suddenly appeared in the air.

The shadow quickly grew solid and clear, gaining shape and color. In almost an instant, it became an old man in a worn white robe, his face covered in deep wrinkles.

The old man was thin and slightly hunched, like a traveler who had walked through countless years on a long road. He stood in the pale light of the World's Wound. The hazy shadows at his feet stretched forward, covering anomaly 077's body.

After a brief silence, the old man in the ragged robe turned his head. His gaze was deep as he looked toward the direction where Ted had vanished. He muttered softly, "…Emptiness…"

In the next second, his figure simply vanished into the wind, like a wrong fragment of time that had left a ghostly image a moment ago and then disappeared without a trace.

The Sailor shivered, then lifted his head in confusion. He sat up from the pile of rope and, out of habit, raised the bottle to his mouth for another drink. A moment later he frowned. "Why doesn't this water have any taste…"

Then his eyes finally fell on the bottle in his hand.

"…What the hell!!!"

…

The gray-white stone sphere, its surface covered in crater-like rings, hung quietly above the sea. A small research platform at the “waist” of the stone sphere bathed in soft golden sunlight. Several scholars in short research robes stood tense at the edge of the platform, uneasy and nervous as they watched the figure at the front.

Alice stood there, craning her neck as she leaned close to the stone sphere to study the strange giant object.

Duncan grabbed her head and pushed it back onto her neck: “Quit fooling around – you’ll fall into the sea!”

“Oh, oh…” Alice shrank her neck at once. She held her head in place with both hands and blinked at the stone sphere in front of her. After staring for a long time, she finally said, “I still can’t see anything…”

“After you got close to the stone sphere, you didn’t hear or see any ‘extra information’?” Duncan frowned at the doll. “What about the sunlight around it? After entering the inside of this glowing orb, did you hear or see anything?”

Alice narrowed her eyes and looked around at the golden light floating on the sea, which was like some crystal veil. The glow reflected in her pretty purple eyes and rippled like water.

She stared around like this for quite a while, then turned to Duncan and said, “…No information.”

Duncan looked a bit disappointed: “No information?”

Alice nodded, then carefully checked again what appeared “in front of her eyes” when her divine gaze fell on the golden light. She nodded once more. “Yes, it’s all showing ‘No information’.”

Duncan: “…”

He suddenly realized that when talking to this silly doll, it was necessary to ask one or two follow-up questions. Who could guess the way this doll's mind worked?!

He had just opened his mouth to keep questioning her when a crackling sound from the air nearby cut him off.

ghostly green flames rose, and a whirling doorway of fire opened in midair.

"AI is back with our guest," Duncan waved at Alice and turned to face the doorway. But an instant later, his expression shifted. "Wait, the door is off–"

Before he could finish, the fiery door burst open. A familiar figure fell out of it, skimming the edge of the platform and dropping straight into the sea below.

Ted Riel's short shout came from the middle of it.

The skeletal roc, cloaked in flame, flew out right after. It circled proudly twice in the air, then landed on the platform, stretched its neck to look down, and let out a sharp cry: "See? I can fly!"

Duncan stared, dumbfounded. Alice crept carefully to the edge of the platform and peeked down, then patted her chest in fright. "He really did fall into the sea…"

Duncan slowly turned his head and looked at AI. Then he shifted his gaze toward where Ted had fallen.

…What had that unlucky Truth Keeper done to offend this pigeon?

Chapter 692: Everything the Truth Keeper Saw

Ted Riel wrapped himself in a thick blanket and sat in the small cabin at the research station. Someone handed him a cup of hot tea that was still almost too hot to hold. He cupped it in both hands, looked up, and said: “Thank you.”

“You’re welcome!” Alice answered very seriously, then began to curiously study this Truth Keeper who had just been pulled out of the sea. After quite a while, she turned her head toward Duncan and said: “Captain, Mr. Ted doesn’t look like he’s in a very good mood!”

“I fell into the sea – twice!” Ted lifted his head to look at Duncan standing to the side. Halfway through speaking, he shivered without thinking. The physical cold did not matter to a Saint; that shiver felt more like he had been soaked in the chill of fate itself. “The first time I fell out of Subspace. The second time, a pigeon threw me out!”

He shivered again, then turned and glared with deep resentment at the fat White Dove strutting across the floor with its chest puffed out. The bird scraped its beak on the floor, tilted its head so that one eye looked out the window and the other fixed on Ted, then flapped its wings: “What are you staring at?”

“You must have offended AI,” Duncan’s calm voice came from the side. “It usually doesn’t throw passengers into the sea.”

“Is it impossible that you’re just a cruel pigeon by nature?” Ted glared, looking very upset. “When it threw me down, it even mocked me. Everyone here heard it…”

“That’s impossible. AI is a peace dove,” Duncan quickly waved his hand and pointed at AI wandering around. “Look, it’s white.”

Ted stared, unable to follow Duncan’s line at all. He had never even heard what a peace dove was.

However, Duncan was already used to no one getting the jokes he blurted out. He just waved it off carelessly: “I guess you didn’t cooperate much when AI brought you here.”

“…Fine, I admit it,” Ted thought for a moment and sighed helplessly. “But you can’t blame me. I don’t even know this pigeon of yours. Even if that flame looked familiar, when a skeletal monster bird suddenly flew out and swept me into a dark and strange space, of course my first reaction was to feel threatened. It was inevitable that I would fight back a little…”

Lucretia, who had stayed quiet at the side, suddenly cut in: “And then you lost to the pigeon and got thrown into the sea.”

Ted Riel said: “…Can we stop talking about the pigeon?”

“Fair point,” Duncan nodded and sat down on the chair next to Ted. “Then we’ll end the pigeon topic here. Next, let’s talk about Subspace.”

“Uh…” Ted grumbled in his throat, his face turning very odd. But the string of unbelievable events had clearly toughened his nerves. He quickly let out a resigned, calm breath and looked around.

The academy staff stationed here slipped out of the room almost in a flash and closed the door. In a few seconds, only Duncan, Alice, and Lucretia were left with him.

“I’ve already told Captain Lawrence everything I could remember,” Ted breathed out a little once the unrelated people were gone. He spoke while he tried to recall: “Subspace left a long-lasting chaos of shadows in my mind. Some of my memories became blurry. I can only remember scattered fragments that don’t connect, like those silent, huge, and strange ‘things’ I saw. You should already know that part…”

“Yes. Lawrence reported the situation to me, but some things have to be talked through face to face to be clear,” Duncan said casually. “For example, the exact shapes of those things you saw. Lawrence’s retelling just can’t compare to hearing it from you directly…”

As he spoke, he casually pulled a drawing from the table beside him.

Those were some sketches Duncan had drawn himself after receiving Lawrence’s report and before AI brought Ted back.

Ted took the sheet Duncan handed him with curiosity. The moment he saw what was drawn on it, his eyes opened a little wider.

The drawing did not show anything horrifying or bizarre. It was only the outlines of doors and windows, some pillars with elegant, complex lines, and some curved ironwork patterns.

However, the “style” and “feeling” they gave off, to Ted, were no less shocking than seeing those gigantic horrors in Subspace again.

He hesitated and looked up. Duncan was calmly watching him, fixing him with that almost divine gaze.

“Is it this style?” Duncan asked softly.

Ted opened his mouth, then lowered his head again and stared hard at the partial building structures on the paper. After a long time, he spoke in a low voice: “Yes. It was a huge building in the dark. It looked like a palace, or maybe a mansion made too vast and complex. It hung upside down above my head. Its spires made me think of those gloomy black towers in the northern city-states. Its doors and windows were long and tall. Outside every window, some dark material like thorns covered and blocked it…”

He stopped, thought for a moment, then continued: “The whole building stayed silent in the darkness, like a giant beast that had been dead for many years. But at some moments, I saw faint flashes in some of its windows, as if someone was still moving around inside it. At those times, the whole building felt as if it was about to come back to life…”

Duncan listened quietly to Ted’s description. His expression grew serious as he looked at the windows, pillars, and decorative patterns he had drawn on the paper.

Those were the things in Alice’s mansion. Although Ted had only seen the outside structure of the building, the style was clearly the same.

What Ted had seen was indeed Alice’s mansion.

Alice’s mansion that lay in Subspace.

But Duncan clearly remembered that after the “Mistress’s bedroom” in the depths of Alice’s mansion had been “taken away” by Ray Nora, a huge hollow was left there. When he looked outward from that hollow, he could only see endless darkness. He did not see the signature chaotic light currents and the huge entity shadows of Subspace. Otherwise, he would have realized long ago that the mansion was in Subspace.

Why was that?

Was it because what Ted saw in Subspace was only a “projection” of Alice’s mansion? Or was it that, when Duncan had looked out from the Great Hollow inside the mansion last time, something had “blocked” his sight?

Duncan frowned and sank into a long silence. After holding back for several minutes, Ted finally could not stand it and asked: “What exactly did I see?

You seem very familiar with it."

"Very familiar. I go there often," Duncan nodded lightly. "But don't ask about the details. It's for your mental and physical health."

"…All right. It is Subspace after all," Ted reacted at once. Then his expression turned strange again. "Rahm bless me, I never thought I would actually be talking with you about Subspace. I went there and came back alive. Even now it still doesn't feel real."

"It's a bit late to start feeling emotional about that now," Duncan waved his hand. Then he went on: "You also mentioned that the huge upside-down mansion changed before your eyes and turned into something like a giant ship?"

"In fact… I'm not even sure what that thing really was," Ted hesitated, then chose his words carefully. "Being in Subspace felt like moving through layers and layers of illusions. My reason and my understanding seemed split into two dimensions, working on their own. I saw many things, and they often turned into something else in an instant. Only some of those changes actually happened. The others felt like my own mind was rearranging information it couldn't understand."

Duncan thought for a moment, then pushed another blank sheet of paper and a pencil in front of Ted: "Whether it was an illusion or not, can you still draw how the mansion looked at the moment it changed?"

Ted hesitated, then took the paper and pencil: "…I can try."

This Truth Keeper wrapped the blanket around himself and went to the table. He bent over and began to sketch the hazy visions he had seen in Subspace.

Duncan stood to the side, watching with a serious and patient expression.

Under Ted's hand, messy and abstract lines slowly appeared on the paper.

However, Lucretia, who was watching curiously, slowly frowned: “This is the ‘giant ship’ you mentioned?”

She saw only many lines randomly linked together, like “fragments” of some abstract geometric body, pieced into a rough spindle shape or some uneven “cylinder”. It was very different from any “ship” she knew.

But the next second, she noticed Duncan’s expression growing more and more serious as he looked at those “abstract patterns”.

Father had seen something in those strange abstract lines!

He had seen this thing before?!

Questions flashed through Lucretia’s mind, but before she could ask, Ted had already put down the pencil.

“I know this doesn’t look like a ‘ship’, but the moment I saw it, my mind just felt that it had to be some kind of ‘ship’,” Ted looked up at Lucretia. “I can’t explain it. It was like some kind of ‘knowledge’ was stamped straight into my thoughts, or some kind of ‘revelation’…”

But Duncan kept staring hard at the messy lines Ted had drawn. Then he suddenly looked up and asked: “…Is it finished?”

Ted nodded: “It’s finished.”

Duncan frowned, his face strangely serious: “Is this all? Only this part?”

Ted finally sensed something from Duncan’s attitude. He hesitated: “This was all I saw… only this part. Is something wrong?”

Duncan stayed silent for a few seconds, then stepped forward and pointed at the drawing: “I’m not sure… but in theory, what you’ve drawn might be only one third of its full structure!”

Chapter 693: Shadows Noticed Afterward

“One third of the structure?”

Ted froze when he heard Duncan’s words. He looked in confusion at the messy, abstract lines he had drawn. To be honest, he thought his drawing was terrible, but it was already the closest he could get to his “original impression”. The lingering influence of Subspace had been disturbing his mind for a long time, so he still could not clearly recall the details of those memories. Even he could barely piece a complete image out of these broken lines.

Yet from Duncan’s tone, he realized that this ghost captain had not only recognized what was on the paper. Duncan even knew what the thing was supposed to look like.

Duncan stood at the table, frowning as he studied the details Ted had drawn. After a while, he pointed at a spot on the drawing: “Is the structure broken here?”

Ted frowned and forced himself to remember. At last a vague image rose in his mind: “I think so… but I’m not sure. I only glanced at it in a rush. I didn’t even have time to see the full side of the structure…”

“It breaks here, then extends outward. These are some connecting structures,” Duncan said, not minding the doubt in Ted’s voice. He picked up the pencil and quickly drew lines in the blank space of the paper. Under his hand, a strange thing with a three-part symmetrical body took shape. To

Ted and Lucretia, it looked nothing like any ‘ship’ at all. “It is made of three main structures like this… Here is where the engine group sits…”

Without realizing it, Lucretia had leaned close to the strange “drawing”. She stared at it for a full half minute before she finally could not hold back: “What… is this exactly?”

Duncan did not raise his head. After a few seconds of silence, he answered softly: “It is called the New Hope.”

Lucretia and Ted exchanged looks, then spoke in unison: “The New Hope?”

Alice also came over, a beat late, and asked: “What is the New Hope?”

Duncan lifted his head. His complicated, strange gaze fell on this brother doll, but she did not seem to notice at all. She only tilted her head: “Why are you looking at me?”

“…It was a ship. A starship,” Duncan took back his gaze and spoke in a low voice, his tone so subtle he himself was not sure what he felt. “Many, many years ago, it reached this world. Or rather, like the other ‘fragments’, it crashed into this heap of World Wreckage we live in.”

“A starship? A ship that flies?” Ted sounded shocked, then he reacted: “You mean another ‘world fragment’? A flying ship called the New Hope, and part of its wreckage fell into Subspace and turned into the mansion I saw…?”

He raised his hand and made a vague shape in the air, his face full of disbelief.

But Duncan did not answer the Truth Keeper’s question. He only lowered his head again and stared at the drawing on the table for a long time. On top of Ted’s sketch, his simple lines had outlined a rough picture of a great starship. It was far from a full copy, but it was clearly the same New Hope he had once seen in a vision, dragging a long trail of fire as it fell into this world.

He still remembered how he had seen that vision in the first place.

It had been when he checked Alice's wind-up key. He had spread his own flames into the brass key. Just like every time he used this method to probe an extraordinary item, he had seen the "echo" left inside that wind-up key.

In that "echo", Alice's wind-up key had turned into some strange kind of data storage medium, and the New Hope had crashed in the final scene of the vision.

For a long time, he had been looking for clues about that starship. He had searched for any legends or records in this world that might be linked to some ancient crash. At the same time, he often wondered about one question.

Why would the vision of the New Hope's crash be recorded inside Alice's wind-up key?

What connection could this harmless brother doll have with a starship that had already crashed in the Age of Antiquity?

The gap between a "doll" and a "starship" was so huge that even Duncan's imagination could not link them. Yet now, an even more unbelievable clue had appeared before him.

Ted had seen Alice's mansion in Subspace. At certain moments, that mansion had taken on the shape of one third of the New Hope's wreckage!

Duncan had questioned Ted's memory and description at first, but he quickly ruled that out. Ted could not describe something he had never seen out of nowhere. Even if his memory was mixed up, he could not "happen" to sketch the New Hope's ship structure in that confusion.

Some scattered and broken clues seemed to be quietly linking together. Some wild guesses rose in Duncan's mind.

As his thoughts surged, Duncan reached into the inner pocket of his coat and felt out the brass key he used to wind Alice.

The brass key lay quietly in his palm. The cold metal end of the key took the classic "?" shape, as if it hid all its secrets inside endless silence.

After a moment, he put the key away. When he looked up, he met Lucretia's and Ted's curious yet hesitant gazes.

"Let's talk about something else first," Duncan shook his head and looked at Ted. "What else did you see in Subspace?"

Ted nodded. He realized that the New Hope might point to some secret that was too ancient and dangerous, so he wisely held back his curiosity. Instead, he went on describing the unbelievable sights he had seen in Subspace.

There were giant things standing on barren plains, a throne and a huge headless figure, an unnamed warrior who had died leaning against wreckage, and many other strange sights. He could not tell which of them were real and which came from his own mind.

Duncan did not interrupt again. He listened with full attention, nodding from time to time. Only when Ted finally finished did he let out a long breath.

The headless corpse on the throne, the unknown warrior beside strange wreckage, the huge structure on the wasteland… All of these were indeed bizarre. But in Subspace, anything might appear. At least in Duncan's eyes, all of these were easier to accept than "Alice's mansion exists in Subspace" and "Alice's mansion is part of the New Hope".

“…That was quite a journey. It’s hard to forget,” Lucretia said at last, breaking the quiet after listening quietly for a long time. “Fifteen minutes… Mr. Ted, those fifteen minutes of yours are enough for many scholars to study for a lifetime.”

“I could use those fifteen minutes to write academic papers for the rest of my life, but to be honest, I would rather never have had that experience,” Ted sighed. “You know, even now I can still sometimes hear that buzzing noise in my head. It moves around inside my awareness like a living thing. Even though I’ve had strict training in resilient psychology and Will-Control Theory, it is still unusually hard to resist this noise. And this aftereffect may last for a long time…”

He shrugged as he said this, his face looking a little bad.

“And what’s worse is that I have to go back to the academy tomorrow and face those stubborn students. Their clear yet foolish views on academic matters are like another kind of ‘Subspace noise’ to me…”

The Truth Keeper murmured this and raised his hand to press his forehead in pain. The lingering echo of Subspace and the foreseeable shadows of the future were clearly mixing together, casting a deep shadow in his heart.

Seeing this, Duncan had no idea how to comfort him. He could only sigh softly and pat Ted on the shoulder: “I understand that feeling very well.”

Ted was a little surprised. He looked up at Duncan in confusion: “How would you understand?”

Duncan paused for a moment. It felt hard to explain, but soon Shirley’s homework notebook and Alice’s doodle book floated up in his mind.

“…On my ship there are people who are even ‘clearer’ than your students.”

Ted stared blankly for a moment. He did not know how much he understood, but he still nodded with a complicated look: “It seems… things aren’t easy for you either.”

Then he grew quiet, as if he felt tired after recalling Subspace for so long and wanted to let his mind rest. But in less than half a minute, he suddenly seemed to remember something else.

“There’s something else,” Ted lifted his head, his expression turning serious. “It’s not about Subspace. It’s about… the White Oak.”

“The White Oak?” Duncan looked a bit puzzled. “What about that ship?”

“…I don’t know if it was just my imagination. After all, I was under the influence of Subspace at the time, and my senses and thoughts were a mess. But I kept feeling that something was off when I was talking with that ‘Sailor’ on the White Oak.”

Duncan’s expression turned serious as he listened.

“Sailor… You mean the Anomaly numbered 077? What was wrong with him?”

“I can’t put it into words. But after I came back here, when I thought about how it felt to talk to that Anomaly, I kept feeling that I wasn’t only talking to ‘him’ at the time,” Ted frowned, choosing his words as he tried to remember. “I talked with him about how he saw the world, about the viewpoint of an Anomaly looking at the world. When he answered me… I felt like I could hear more than one voice. It was as if something else was also hiding on that ship, right beside that ‘Sailor’.”

Chapter 694: The Urging Bell

“Captain! You have to believe me! You know how I am—let alone stealing wine from your collection, my legs start cramping the moment I even walk up to your cabin door… I really don’t know how this thing ended up in my hands!”

Anomaly 077 rasped at Lawrence at the top of his lungs. He was so loud that half the deck could hear him. The seafarers passing by all turned to look, curious what trouble the most unusual “member” of the White Oak had stirred up this time.

Lawrence, his hair already gray, only frowned. He ignored the way the mummified corpse howled like a ghost right in front of him and instead stared thoughtfully at the two bottles of beer sitting on the deck beside him.

Of course he believed what the Sailor said. Although this mummified corpse often did many unreliable things, there was one point on which he had always been very reliable: when he saw the captain, his legs really did cramp.

This “anomaly,” who feared the spirit flame like a natural enemy, could not possibly have taken the initiative to sneak into the captain’s cabin to steal anything. Even if these two bottles of beer were lying right there on the table, he would not dare touch them.

After thinking for a moment, Lawrence suddenly raised his head and said: “…Mr. Ted Riel just left? He was with you the whole time before he left?”

The Sailor froze for a second. He did not know why the captain suddenly turned the topic in this direction, but he still hurried to nod: “Yeah, he just left. Before he went, he was chatting with me the whole time.”

Lawrence fixed his gaze on Anomaly 077’s eyes: “What were you talking about?”

“…Poetry and songs?” Anomaly 077 answered without thinking, then quickly waved his hands before the old captain’s face could change. “Of course not… It was something like worldviews or something? I don’t really remember clearly. We seemed to talk about a lot. I just felt that Mr. Ted, that Truth Keeper, was weighed down with worries, and he talked to me about the world, the future, life, things like that…”

He trailed off, hesitated, then muttered, a little uncertain: “I think I even offered him a drink, but he didn’t take it… Weird, did I actually offer or not…”

Lawrence’s brow furrowed slightly. He watched the mummified corpse’s expression and movements with a grave look. After the other had mumbled for a long time, he finally asked: “Then do you still remember how you answered him? Do you remember what you said?”

The Sailor stopped muttering at once. After a moment of trying to recall, his face slowly turned confused and uneasy.

“I… kind of don’t remember? I should have told him a lot, but I can only recall a few lines… Most of the time it felt like I was just babbling nonsense…” Anomaly 077 muttered, looking nervously at the captain. “Wait, I remember now… I didn’t mean to start talking, but back then there was always another voice talking along with me, pushing me to speak… Captain, that feels kind of wrong, doesn’t it?”

“It is wrong… of course it’s wrong,” Lawrence said softly. As he spoke, a faint layer of eerie green flame quietly rose at his side and flowed out across the deck. At the same time, a vast dark silhouette silently surfaced on the sea beside the White Oak—the Black Oak appeared like a reflection rising from the deep. Its hull was wrapped in black mist, lights flickering, its outline shifting and unsteady.

Anomaly 077 jumped in fright at the sudden movement. He hopped back, dodging the spirit flame spreading over the deck, and shouted: “Hey, Captain, what are you doing…”

“An uninvited guest came aboard—though he may already have left,” Lawrence said casually after giving Anomaly 077 a glance. “Martha told me she saw a figure in the White Oak’s reflection that does not belong to any of us. At one point that figure was standing right next to you.”

The Sailor went blank for a second. His expression slowly twisted into horror: “…Holy crap!”

…

“Your judgment was correct. There really was an uninvited guest on the White Oak then—he was right near Anomaly 077,” Duncan nodded to Ted Riel. “You felt you ‘heard’ two voices. One of them should have come from that uninvited guest.”

Ted Riel had noticed the change in Duncan’s expression a moment ago and now spoke, guessing: “…Did the White Oak send you a message? Did that old captain catch him?”

“No,” Duncan shook his head. “The other side was very alert. By the time Lawrence and Martha noticed something, he had already left the ship.”

“Left?” Ted Riel looked a little puzzled. “Out on the boundless sea, where could he possibly…”

He suddenly fell silent. As a Truth Keeper, he had already found the most likely answer from his own experience.

Duncan noticed the change in his expression and gently nodded: “Do you still remember what you and that ‘Sailor’ talked about back then?”

“I remember,” Ted Riel answered at once. He quickly went through it in his head, then repeated everything he had discussed with the “Sailor” without leaving anything out.

As he listened, Duncan’s face grew more and more serious. In the end he nodded: “As I thought… There is no way that Sailor could have said those things on his own.”

Ted Riel looked puzzled: “How can you be so sure?”

“He isn’t that well educated.”

Ted Riel: “…”

“Looks like we can basically confirm the uninvited guest’s identity,” Duncan let out a slow breath. “That set of theories sounds a bit like the Doomsday rhetoric of a Ender, but it’s more like a milder, more logical version. The one talking to you should have been a Ender in a rational state. He hid on the White Oak and spoke to you through the Sailor’s mouth.”

He paused, then added: “Based on what Lawrence reported, the whole thing looked like a kind of mental ‘overwriting’ and ‘mental guidance.’ The Sailor still remembers talking with you, but he can’t recall the details of the conversation. He also did some things that don’t fit his usual personality. That should also be the effect of this influence.”

Ted Riel frowned. His expression turned a bit strange: “…I’ve never heard of Enders having this kind of ability or working this way…”

“That’s normal. Not long ago we didn’t even believe there were rational Enders in this world,” Duncan shrugged. “This group of ‘Subspace worshipers’ who live in the cracks of time have always been the most mysterious of all. Sometimes they act like monsters twisted by Subspace. Sometimes they look like polite scholars. They live in a non-linear time stream, so strictly speaking… maybe no one in the whole world has ever met a ‘complete’ Ender. Everything we know about them so far is only the temporary state they show in one specific ‘time slice.’”

“…An interesting theory,” Ted Riel raised an eyebrow, then smoothed his expression and spoke in a more serious tone. “A Ender could show up right under my nose, get away safe and sound in the end, and not even alert that old captain under your command… It seems their strangeness really is beyond imagination. But after that ‘uninvited guest’ did all this, it was only to borrow the Sailor’s mouth to preach some spooky Doomsday theory to me… What do you think of what he said?”

Duncan did not answer at once. He fell silent and thought over the words Ted Riel had heard from the “Sailor.” After a long time, he suddenly looked up: “What about you? Do you think patching this world up has any meaning?”

“It’s not about whether it has meaning. It’s that there isn’t any other way,” Ted Riel shook his head lightly. “The world is a great ship sailing on the sea. Maybe it really is like the Ender said: this ship is leaking, it is sinking, and it has already reached the point of no cure. But what else can we, who live on the ship, do? The only thing we can do is patch it and patch it again. That is still better than sitting and waiting to die, isn’t it?”

Duncan did not agree or disagree. He only sank into a long silence, and no one knew what he was thinking about at that moment.

Just then, a faint, unreal bell suddenly rang in Ted Riel's ears, cutting off his talk with Duncan.

The Truth Keeper froze on the spot for a second. After he picked out the bell's rhythm and interval, he slowly frowned in confusion: "The Swift Bell…?"

"The Swift Bell?" Duncan's voice came from beside him. "You mean this sudden bell that just rang?"

"Yes. It's the summons for the Saints to go to…" Ted Riel answered without thinking, but stopped halfway. He turned to Duncan with a shocked look. "Wait, you heard that bell too?!"

"Yeah, I heard it. What is it?" Duncan looked puzzled. "Should I not have heard it? It was pretty obvious…"

"Of course you shouldn't have!" Ted Riel almost jumped out of his chair. "That's the summoning bell from the Nameless King's Tomb. Many years ago, the Four Gods Church built seals and mental guidance around this bell. In theory, only the Saints of the Four Gods should be able to hear the summons…"

"The Nameless King's Tomb?" Duncan began to react. "Ah, Vanna did mention something like this to me before. So that's what she meant by the 'Swift Bell'…"

As he spoke, he stood up and looked around, then said offhandedly: "The bell is ringing again—it seems it's urging the Saints to gather. Are you supposed to take part in the assembly?"

"In theory, yes…" Ted Riel said, but then suddenly hesitated. "But this shouldn't be happening… We are still in the Deep Sea Church's duty period. Technically, even I shouldn't be able to hear the bell…"

He raised his head and stared at Duncan. Duncan stared back.

The bell rang yet again, carrying a solemn air, carrying a note of urgency, as if it was preparing to make a grand proclamation to the world.

Chapter 695: An Unprecedented Situation

When the bell rang, Vanna had just finished her evening prayer on the deck. She stepped into the corridor, ready to return to her room, and saw Morris hurrying into the corridor from the other side.

With just one glance, she guessed something from the serious look on Morris's face.

"You also heard the call of the Swift Bell?"

"Yes. Looks like you heard it too," Morris nodded. "The bell has rung three times already—I was just about to hold the psychic resonance ritual."

"…But it's still the Deep Sea Church's duty period," Vanna widened her eyes a little as soon as she heard that. "How could you hear the bell?"

Morris let out a slow breath: "I don't know. That's why we need to go to the assembly and figure out what happened… It seems we are dealing with an unprecedented situation."

Seeing the grave look on the old scholar's face, Vanna thought of the string of unsettling events lately. Then she nodded silently. The two passed each other and went back to their rooms.

The soft sound of the sea echoed in her ears. The feeling of being submerged in water slowly wrapped around her. Vanna hurried back to her room and began the ritual. She watched the candles on the stand in front of her burn and swell in her sight. The jumping flames turned into a hazy glare. Her restless mood slowly calmed with the sound of the waves.

After a brief dizziness and a reset of her senses, she opened her eyes again and found she had arrived, in the form of a spirit projection, at that sacred ancient “assembly ground.”

Majestic stone pillars stood at the far end of the vast plaza. Chaotic darkness and never-ending streams of light swirled above the pillars. The ground was covered in old stone slabs, mottled and cracked. All across this huge assembly ground, the spirit projections of the Saints were gathering in a rush.

Vanna stood in a corner of the plaza, a bit stunned. She stared wide-eyed at the countless vague figures all around her. She had never seen so many spirit projections appear in the assembly ground at the same time. There was no doubt that these could not all be the Saints of the storm goddess.

It was clear that Morris was not the only Outer Gods believer who had heard the bell during the Deep Sea Church’s duty period.

All the Saints of the four Churches had gathered!

And people were still arriving. More and more spirit projections appeared on the open spaces of the plaza, many of them looking like they had arrived in a rush. Though it was indeed the Deep Sea Church’s duty period, every Saint who heard the Swift Bell still obeyed the iron rule agreed on by the Four Gods Church. As soon as the bell rang, they answered without hesitation and came to this assembly ground as fast as they could.

The dazed and confused spirit projections gathered together, buzzing as they discussed this unusual situation. Vanna walked among her fellow believers, listening to the talk around her as she headed toward the center of the plaza.

A hazy figure came over from the side and greeted her: “Vanna! I was looking for you—what is going on?”

Vanna turned toward the voice and at once recognized Bishop Valentine’s spirit projection. She nodded to him, then shook her head: “I don’t know either. But it looks like every qualified Saint from the four Churches heard the summoning bell… Mr. Morris should be here in the assembly ground too.”

“…The Swift Bell is sounded by the Pilgrimage Ark, but its source lies in the ‘direction’ from the Nameless King’s Tomb. If every Saint received the summons, the only explanation is that the Nameless King’s Tomb has actively sent out a strong signal to ‘gather everyone’…” Bishop Valentine’s tone was grave. He turned his head and fixed his gaze on the still-empty center of the plaza. Only after a long time did he look away. “This ancient covenant ritual has run stably for thousands of years, and nothing like this has ever happened.”

“…Maybe it’s connected to the recent ‘extinguishing of the Sun.’ Some great change is getting closer…” Vanna said softly. Then she suddenly felt something and looked to the side.

Another hazy figure, but one with a familiar aura, appeared in her sight.

It was Morris’s spirit projection.

Vanna at once walked toward him. Before she got close, she heard him speak first: “It seems things are just as I thought. I’m not the only extra one who heard the bell.”

“Yes. It looks like all the Saints are here… Maybe we should be thankful this place is big enough,” Vanna sighed, her tone a bit odd. “The ‘tomb’ itself hasn’t appeared yet. When it does… I don’t know what it’s going to proclaim to us.”

Morris did not answer. He only nodded seriously. After greeting Bishop Valentine, whom he had not seen for some time, he turned with Vanna to look toward the center of the plaza.

Just then, four special figures appeared in the Saints' field of view, one after another.

Helena, Rune, Banster, and Frem—the heralds of the Four Gods—entered the assembly ground. Among the many vague, ghostly spirit projections, their clear forms were especially striking.

The appearance of the four Popes caused a brief stir, but it soon died down. The Saints restored order and quickly calmed down thanks to the presence of their leaders.

Today's situation was far from normal. Many of the Saints who had heard the bell "extra" were confused and uneasy. Even so, the appearance of their leaders was a comforting sign. At the very least, it meant the present situation was still under the Church's control.

Then Vanna noticed that the four Popes, the four Your Eminences, were walking straight toward her.

Her expression suddenly turned a bit awkward.

Under many gazes, full of gaze and formal greetings, Helena and Rune and the others stopped in front of Vanna. Helena spoke first: "The tomb hasn't appeared yet?"

Vanna froze for a second: "Uh… not yet…"

"Good," Helena nodded. "Then we'll wait a little."

Vanna did not even have time to react. She just nodded along in a daze: "… All right."

Then the four Popes really did turn around and start patiently waiting with Vanna for that ancient, mysterious tomb to appear.

Vanna felt her mood grow very strange. She sensed that old Mr. Morris beside her was also giving her a slightly puzzled look, but she had no idea how to explain any of this. She could only give an awkward smile—she did not even know if, in this hazy spirit projection form, Morris could see the complicated look on her face.

Just then, another especially tall figure somehow appeared beside Vanna. He reached out and patted this Inquisitor miss on the shoulder: “Will we have to wait long?”

Vanna did not turn around. She answered naturally without thinking: “Hard to say, but usually the tomb shows up a few minutes after all the Saints arrive at the venue…”

She suddenly stopped.

The space around her seemed to fall silent at once.

Banster and Frem’s expressions froze a little. Helena and Rune’s necks turned stiff as they slowly turned their heads. Vanna also slowly turned and looked toward the source of the voice—

Duncan was standing there, looking (in his opinion) completely harmless as he faced the familiar people in front of him.

After a moment of silence, Vanna finally let out a cry that shattered the stillness: “Captain?! Why are you here?!”

Her cry was like a stone thrown into water. The brief quiet over the assembly ground at once turned into a roaring boil. Shouts of surprise rose one after another. Explosive discussions burst out in waves. Many spirit projections stepped back in shock. Tension, vigilance, and astonishment flooded outward in an instant and spread through the crowd.

Exactly as expected.

Duncan glanced back at the commotion over the plaza, then turned and spread his hands with a helpless look: “To be honest, I didn’t think there would be this many people.”

Vanna felt her brain start to lag. The Popes, however, had already reacted. They spoke in unison, giving a loud order—

“Silence!”

A great power went out with their words. Helena, Rune, Banster, and Frem swept their will over the entire assembly ground. Duncan did not know exactly what they did, but he could feel that the crowd, which had been slipping into chaos just a second ago, suddenly seemed to understand and accept the situation. Although unease still flowed through the air, order had been restored in the assembly ground.

Once order was restored, Helena turned her head first. She fixed her gaze on Duncan: “How did you come here?”

Duncan thought for a moment, then raised his hand and lightly swept it through the air beside him.

A skeletal roc wrapped in green flame flashed through the darkness.

“I came by pigeon.”

Helena: “…?”

“I heard the bell,” Duncan said when he noticed the rich, complicated looks on the Popes’ faces. After thinking for a moment, he added: “Don’t ask me the exact reason—when the bell rang, I just heard it. Then I noticed the gathering of spirit forms. Maybe because the four Pilgrimage Arks are all in Lightwind Harbor right now, this ‘gathering’ was very obvious to me, like lights in the night… I’ve always been curious about your ‘assembly,’ so I decided to give it a try. Mostly I tried following Vanna's soul-starlight, and I ended up here."

Helena stared, dumbfounded: "…That works?!"

Duncan thought seriously, then nodded: "I think it works."

Helena: "…"

Vanna seemed already used to this. As soon as Duncan said "I think it works," she accepted the situation as a matter of course (mainly because the athlete's ability to adapt to new environments was very strong) and said: "Then what do you think about today's special situation?"

"I don't know," Duncan said very honestly. "This is my first time here. What do you usually do after you all gather? Is there some kind of procedure?"

"We wait for Vision 004—Nameless King's Tomb to appear," Frem's deep voice sounded beside him. He always seemed calm and steady, even now, his tone still as formal as ever. "Then a gravekeeper appears. The chosen one will be led into the tomb chamber."

Duncan listened with great interest and slowly nodded.

As if to prove Frem's words, a low rumble suddenly rose from the center of the plaza, at last breaking off all conversation!

Chapter 696: The Tomb That Felt Wrong

When that low, muffled rumble rang out, Duncan's attention at once shifted to the open space in the center of the square.

He saw the patch of mottled, ancient stone slabs suddenly begin to rise and fall like flowing sand. Some huge structure slowly floated up from deep below the ground. What first came into view was a gray-white spire. A moment later, an ancient and mysterious tomb, like a giant combination of pyramid and palace, slowly rose into his sight.

Solemn and silent, old and austere, the "tomb" made of some kind of gray-white monoliths simply stood there not far away. It looked like time itself had been frozen into a block and set down in this dim chaos. Duncan stared in surprise at the huge building rising from the ground. Driven by curiosity, he studied its style and structure, only to find that it did not match any architectural style he knew from the Age of City-States.

It looked more like the architecture of the Kingdom of Critt he had seen in some old books.

All across the square, the Saints' spirit projections also fell quiet. Countless gazes were drawn, almost against their will, to the giant pyramid tomb. A solemn, tense air spread over the assembly ground, and the whole place became utterly silent.

Several more minutes passed. Just when Vanna and Morris both began to frown in doubt and wonder if something had gone wrong, some movement finally came from deep within the tomb. The stone gate, which looked unbearably heavy, slowly began to open with a deep rumble.

The great gate stood wide, revealing the dark corridor within.

The spirit projections gathered in the square fixed their gazes on that gate. The deathly silence lasted a long time, then slowly turned into a faint stir and a low buzz of discussion.

Listening to the low voices from all directions, Duncan realized something seemed off. He frowned and quietly asked Vanna beside him: “What went wrong?”

“…The Gravekeeper didn’t appear.” Vanna also lowered her voice. She seemed uneasy as well as confused. “Under normal conditions, the Gravekeeper should walk out of the gate at this point.”

Duncan’s expression slowly grew heavier.

As time went on, the old and mysterious tomb still stood quietly in the center of the assembly ground, yet the Tomb Keeper who should have appeared still did not show himself. The low chatter on the square spread further and further. For a while, this strange situation even made many people forget about “Captain Duncan,” who had come to the assembly today.

But some others, instead, unconsciously turned their eyes toward Duncan.

Duncan ignored the looks directed at him and walked straight toward Helena.

“It seems you’ve never seen this happen before,” he said bluntly. “What is your plan now? If you don’t have one, I’m going to go check this so?called ‘tomb’ myself.”

“Please wait a moment.” Helena spoke at once. Then she thought for a second and turned to look at Rune and the others beside her. “…We’ll go over and take a look first.”

“Fine.” Rune nodded first, then lifted his gaze and spoke to the spirit projections gathered in the assembly ground: “Everyone else, remain on standby in the square. Do not approach Vision 004.”

With that, he turned around. Together with Helena, Banster, and Frem, he slowly walked toward the solemn tomb in the near distance.

Duncan thought for a moment, then also stepped after them. Rune heard footsteps behind him and glanced back. Duncan casually said: “I’ll just come along and take a look. Relax, I won’t set anything on fire.”

Rune’s expression turned a bit odd for a moment, probably remembering the great blaze that had marked Atlantis’s final moments. Helena hesitated, then looked at Vanna. After a brief pause, she gave a light nod: “Vanna, you come too.”

“Me?” Vanna froze for a second, then quickly reacted and hurried to catch up.

Morris stayed behind with the others in a “safe zone” some distance from the tomb. He watched with nervous eyes as the few figures slowly approached Vision 004.

Duncan followed behind Helena and the others and slowly came to the foot of the solemn gray-white pyramid, in front of the silent, gaping gate.

A deep, dim corridor stretched away from the gate into the distance. The weak lights inside only gave a hazy glow to the outline of the passage. The tomb’s interior seemed far more vast and deep than it looked from outside. The corridor appeared endless; he could not see its end at a glance.

Frem bent down beside the gate, as if carefully checking something. Rune pressed his hand on certain spots on the outer wall of the tomb. Near where his palm touched, faint lights like runes briefly floated in the air and flashed before vanishing.

Helena and Banster seemed to be praying in silent benediction, while also keeping watch for something.

Duncan watched the scene with some curiosity and could not help asking: “What are you doing?”

“In ancient times, this ‘Nameless King Tomb’ went through a period when it could not be controlled. During that time, it randomly summoned chosen people from all over the world and caused many terrible events. Later, the Church of the Four Gods acted together and finally placed a shackle on this old, self-running ‘Vision’.” Rune explained casually as he checked the hidden state runes around the tomb. “Those contracts, witnessed by the Four Gods, set rules for the original, chaotic ‘summoning’ behavior of Vision 004. Only then did we get the current Swift Bell and assembly system…”

Duncan raised his eyebrows: “That sounds like some kind of containment measure.”

“Only limited ‘use’.” Rune shook his head. “Visions cannot be contained. But by grasping their patterns, we can cut their harm to the lowest level, and even put them to work. Vision 004 is still running on its own just like in the past. We’ve only found a way to draw information from it without getting killed…”

Visions cannot be contained…

As he listened to Rune’s casual words, Duncan’s expression turned a bit strange.

He thought of the Vanished—strictly speaking, the Vanished was now in a state of containment, and this “Captain Duncan” was the containment condition for the Vanished.

Yet this one exception still fit the “Clause Zero rule” for Anomalies and Visions…

Duncan shook his head and pushed aside these stray thoughts that had suddenly popped up. At the same time, he heard Frem break the silence in a deep voice: “Looks fine.”

“Yes, everything seems normal.” Rune also finished his first round of checks. The elderly Elf straightened up and took two steps back. He looked up at the grand pyramid tomb, his face very serious. “At least… on the outside.”

“If everything outside is normal, then the problem can only be inside.” Duncan spoke softly. He stepped back to the main gate of the tomb and looked at the dark corridor that seemed to have no end. “So what is your plan now?”

Frem walked over. Under Duncan’s curious gaze, the tall, silent Senkin Pope raised his staff and tapped it on the ground three times, not too hard and not too soft.

The next second, a vague shadow suddenly split off from beside him. In the blink of an eye it solidified, taking on the form of another Frem.

“This is my historical avatar form from one hour ago.” Frem turned and explained to Duncan in passing. At the same moment, the “historical avatar form” had already stepped forward with firm steps and, under everyone’s gaze, crossed the gate of Vision 004.

The tall figure walked into the dimness. Vanna moved to stand near Duncan, watching with some tension as it went deeper into the corridor.

Then she saw the figure suddenly stop at some point.

“Why did it stop?” Duncan turned his head and asked in confusion.

Frem also frowned. Even he, the Summoner himself, did not know why his historical avatar form suddenly stopped on the spot. He stared at the sight deep inside the gate of Vision 004 and raised his hand to sketch a few runes in the air, as if trying to rebuild his link with the avatar form. But at that moment a great wave of unease suddenly surged into his mind!

Almost at the same time, the historical avatar form that had been standing still in the dim corridor trembled slightly, as if slowly turning its head.

Frem, standing outside the gate of Vision 004, instantly changed color. He jerked up his staff and, even as he cut off the summoning, he called out at once: “Careful, corruption!”

The next second, he cleanly severed the summoning and ordered the historical avatar form to dissolve. But only a brief, dim glow flickered at the top of his staff. The tall avatar form standing in the corridor of Vision 004 did not vanish at all. Instead, after a slight shudder, it continued to turn its head.

Like a strange corpse, the tall, pale figure twisted its head around. Its face, slowly turning in the Shadows, had already begun to warp into horrible shapes and dark hollows. A torn, chilling smile spread across that chaotic face. In the dim glow, that ripped grin bloomed in the dark like the mad laughter of a lunatic. Layers upon layers of mutters, whispers, and weird howls seemed to ring at once in almost everyone’s ears!

The ghastly scene made everyone’s hair stand on end. Banster and the others reacted at once, instantly ready to respond to corruption and fight a powerful enemy. Even if it was only a historical avatar form that had entered the tomb, it was still the Flamebearer Pope’s avatar form. Any power that could corrupt and drag it down in an instant was clearly no ordinary thing!

But just then, a tall figure stepped forward and moved ahead of everyone, blocking the gate and cutting off the “historical avatar form’s” line of sight.

Duncan’s body rose in layer upon layer of unreal fire. In the crackling surge of spirit flame, a wall of ghostly green fire almost covered the entire gate. He stood in the flames, fixing his gaze on the figure in the distance that had already been corrupted by some power.

“Why did you stop turning?”

Chapter 697: Phantoms in the Tomb

ghostly green flame lit up the entrance of the corridor and made the dim lights farther in look even more heavy and oppressive. In that unsettling gloom, the corrupted “historical avatar form” suddenly went still, like a stone statue standing in the distance, deaf to Duncan’s words.

But that silent and eerie standoff lasted only a short time. Before Duncan’s eyes, the “historical avatar form” that had been frozen for only a few seconds suddenly shook again, and in the next moment it snapped its head around!

Its once-human features had twisted into dark hollows and swirling pits. Only the torn crazy smile still spread across that scrambled face. It twisted its body at angles no Human could make. In an instant, its four limbs turned into tentacles that clung to the walls and ceiling. With a sudden burst of sharp, chaotic screeching, this terrifying, freakish thing hurled itself at Duncan without a hint of fear!

Duncan frowned at once. The next second, blazing ghostly green spirit flame flooded the entire corridor.

Flames rose in layer upon layer of walls, filling everyone’s sight. The corrupted horror screamed, laughed, and burned as it ran madly toward the exit of the tomb. It forced its way through one barrier of spirit flame after another. It even pushed forward until it was less than four or five meters from Duncan before the burning wreck finally collapsed to the floor, twitching once and then going completely still.

Several minutes later, the flames slowly faded.

Duncan, still frowning, carefully walked up to the remains that had almost been burned to ash. In the ashes there was only a shriveled, charred lump. He had left it on purpose by controlling the fire. Any trait that had once marked it as Senkin was completely gone, but there was still a twisted crack on it, like a laughing mouth frozen in place on the blackened lump, filled with a chilling, crazed joy.

After hesitating for a moment, he picked up the last bit of remains with a strange feeling, then cautiously backed out of the corridor of Vision 004 and returned to the gate.

The few people waiting outside the gate hurried over at once. With tense and uneasy faces, they looked at the “charcoal” Duncan had brought out. Helena stared at the torn mark that looked like a smile on the remains. After a while, she lifted her hand and lightly traced the mark of the Storm Goddess over her chest. “Goddess protect us… Frem, that’s the ugliest smile I’ve ever seen.”

“I’m just glad you can still joke at a time like this.” Banster glanced at Helena and shook his raspy head. Then his attention returned to the remains. “…It’s the smell of Subspace.”

“How could there be Subspace power inside Vision 004?” Rune frowned hard and glanced up at the tomb gate beside him. “It’s always been dangerous, but its danger lay in the strict rules inside the tomb and in that powerful, eerie Gravekeeper. I’ve never heard that it carried the power of Subspace…”

Duncan thought for a moment and asked: “What is the structure inside the tomb like? And what kind of being is this so?called ‘Nameless King’?”

The people present all looked at each other. After a brief, awkward silence, it was Vanna who finally answered the captain’s question: “Aside from knowing a few basic ‘rules of conduct,’ no one knows the true shape of the inside of the tomb.”

Duncan looked confused at once: “No one knows?”

“When a Listener leaves Vision 004, they forget all memories about the interior of the tomb. Only a small part of the information is brought out in the form of parchment sheet fragments. All we can be sure of is that there is a burial chamber inside Vision 004, and some ancient and mysterious being waits in that chamber for the Listener’s visit,” Vanna explained patiently. “But no one remembers what the chamber actually looks like or what the master of the chamber looks like.”

“Protective forgetting…” Duncan softly repeated the words. Then, all of a sudden, he seemed to sense something. He quickly looked up at the gate of the tomb.

Heavy, slow footsteps suddenly echoed in the corridor. A tall, grim figure walked into view with the sound of those steps.

The Gravekeeper of Vision 004 appeared!

The Gravekeeper, “late” by quite a long time, simply walked out like this. Even Duncan did not see how he had emerged. It was as if the tomb itself had suddenly “generated” a body. This eerie Gravekeeper stepped with stiff, corpse-like, heavy steps toward them. The chains coiled around him gave off sharp, scraping sounds with each movement.

Helena and the others tensed at once. Vanna leaned forward a little without thinking, ready to spring into action. Since the Nameless King Tomb was clearly acting abnormally, the “Gravekeeper” walking out of it was clearly no longer safe.

But the “Gravekeeper” seemed not to care about their guarded stances. He simply walked out slowly as usual and finally stopped in front of Duncan.

After a brief silence, the tall Guard, wrapped head to toe in bandages and seeming caught between life and death, turned slightly to the side. He raised a hand and pointed toward the passage, making a silent gesture of invitation.

Duncan raised his eyebrows: “You want me to go in?”

The Tomb Guardian slowly nodded.

“Be careful,” Rune warned in a low voice at once. “Something is wrong here.”

Duncan ignored him. He calmly fixed his gaze on the cloudy eyes that showed through the bandages of the Tomb Guardian. After a few seconds, he suddenly said: “And what if I refuse the invitation?”

The Tomb Guardian fell silent. Just when everyone thought this special entity, created by Vision 004, would not answer at all, it actually spoke. A low voice came from under the bandages: “Then when will you have time?”

Duncan: “…”

He froze for a heartbeat, and in that moment the Tomb Guardian spoke again: “His time is running out.”

“‘His’? Running out of time?” Duncan blinked in surprise, and his expression changed at once. “You mean the master of the tomb? What do you mean, ‘running out of time’?”

This time, the Tomb Guardian did not reply. He simply stood quietly before Duncan, saying nothing and yet somehow saying everything.

“…All right.” After two minutes of serious thought, Duncan suddenly nodded. “Then I’ll go see ‘him’.”

As soon as he spoke, Helena beside him said at once: “Are you sure? The situation inside Vision 004 right now—”

“Subspace doesn’t count as corruption for me.” Duncan shook his head. He had clearly made up his mind. “I heard the ‘bell.’ It seems this round was prepared for me. My gut tells me I shouldn’t refuse this ‘invitation’.”

“Your gut…” Helena was stunned for a moment. Then she seemed to realize something, and she pulled back the words she had meant to say and stepped half a pace away. “All right. I understand.”

The Tomb Guardian slowly turned his head and looked at Helena, Rune, and the others.

“Keep your distance. Do not cross the facility gate again,” he suddenly said. “The C-32-E7 Protocol Tree is unstable.”

Helena and the others all froze at his words. Rune spoke before he could stop himself: “…What protocol tree?”

But the Tomb Guardian did not seem inclined to answer. He only stepped to the side and opened the way to the passage, once more making an inviting gesture to Duncan.

Duncan gave the Guard a deep look, then stepped forward. Before entering the passage, he glanced back at the anxious Vanna standing behind the others and gave her a small nod: “Wait in peace. I’ll be back soon.”

As soon as he finished speaking, he walked into the long, deep, and seemingly endless dark passage.

The heavy gate of the tomb boomed shut, cutting off all sight from outside and blocking all sound from beyond Vision 004. The dim lights on the walls of the passage burned quietly. A strange dead silence closed in from all directions.

Duncan heard only the heavy footsteps of the Tomb Guardian behind him and the harsh scraping of chains rubbing against each other.

But after walking for a while, he suddenly noticed a change in the footsteps behind him. The sound of chains scraping together had vanished as well.

Curious, he turned his head—and his face showed clear surprise.

A tall, silent man with slightly dark skin, black hair, and a white robe was walking along the passage.

Duncan stared for a second, then suddenly reacted: "…That's what you really look like?"

The tall, dark-skinned man turned his gaze. His pupils were a strange pale gold, and something deep within those eyes seemed to shift, focus, and lock onto Duncan. Then he gave a slight nod. "Yes."

Duncan frowned, but just as he was about to ask something else, something at the edge of his vision caught his eye and broke his train of thought.

Far ahead in the passage, a shape like a crossroads had appeared at some unknown time. The junction floated and flickered as if it were an illusion. In front of that phantom crossroads, a group of vague figures in white robes suddenly appeared and were walking toward the distance.

They passed through the ghostly crossroads, walked along the deep, long passage, and then vanished into the solid, heavy wall on the opposite side.

Duncan watched the scene in surprise and curiosity and could not help asking: "What is that?"

"As the protocol tree falls out of balance, the folding and disorder of the Time-Stream are rolling back toward the source—that is a moment from long ago, when they set out."

Duncan's heart stirred. "They? Who are they?"

The Tomb Guardian, now in Human form again, stayed silent for a few seconds, then answered in a low voice: "…Doomsday Observer, End Survey Team."

Duncan suddenly stopped walking.

His eyes opened a little wider, as if he had linked many things together in an instant. Wild, tangled thoughts surged through his mind. He took a quiet breath and looked up along the long passage ahead. Just then another hazy phantom slid into his blurred view.

Another figure in a white robe was walking toward them.

It was a young man with short black hair. He walked with head held high and shoulders straight. His eyes were calm yet firm. He strode down the corridor, and in the instant they passed each other—maybe it was just his imagination—Duncan felt that the figure's eyes seemed to shift, ever so slightly, in his direction.

Then they passed by each other and went on.

Chapter 698: The Figure on the throne

The figure with short black hair and a white robe brushed past him. That brief sideways glance as they crossed paths felt almost like an illusion born in Duncan's own mind. He saw the figure walk toward the depths of Vision 004 and, after passing through a wall, silently vanish from his sight.

Doomsday Observer… Doomsday Survey Team…

Those names, which naturally led to all kinds of associations, finally stirred a curiosity Duncan could no longer hold back. He turned to the tall guide beside him and asked: "What is their mission?"

"Enter the Time-Stream. Within the knowable range of time, confirm whether the Sanctuary World is running according to the Creator's original Blueprint, and determine the timestamp of the system's collapse."

The Tomb Guardian spoke calmly as he stepped forward again, leading Duncan deeper into the tomb of the Nameless King.

But the Gravekeeper's answer had already stirred up waves in Duncan's heart.

Observers who traveled through the Time-Stream, survey teams that tracked Doomsday… was it really them?!

Duncan suddenly raised his head. His gaze swept over the old-fashioned walls and pillars lining the corridor around him, and another thought quickly came to him: "What exactly is this place?"

As soon as he asked, he felt something strange. It sounded like a question he already knew the answer to, yet for some reason he felt that the Gravekeeper before him would understand what he really meant.

The Gravekeeper's steps paused for a barely noticeable moment.

"This is the first Critt observation post—and it will also be the last," the deep, calm voice reached Duncan's ears. "A very, very long time ago, there were one thousand two hundred such Doomsday observation posts, and we directly controlled ten of them."

Duncan froze for a moment. All at once, he remembered a passage he had read before—

"…To avoid repeating the failure of the King of Dreams and the pale king of giants, He divided the Blueprint, so that there would no longer be many nations in the mortal world, and the nations would become one thousand two hundred cities. He gave the first ten cities to that clan to rule, and granted them the name 'Critt'…"

The stylistic features of Vision 004 now had an explanation—it really was a relic left by the ancient kingdom of Critt. This relic had been running for ten thousand years, and even after becoming a "Vision", it still kept operating!

At the same time, what had been recorded in that Blasphemous Tome was once again confirmed. The "one thousand two hundred cities" written in the book really existed, but they did not refer to one thousand two hundred city-states. They meant one thousand two hundred Doomsday observation posts!

The people called the Doomsday Survey Team set out from here and entered the Time-Stream to monitor the operation of the Sanctuary World and to determine the "Time Boundary" when the Sanctuary World reached its limit…

A broad scene suddenly appeared at the edge of his vision. Duncan snapped out of his thoughts at once, lifted his head, and looked forward in surprise.

He did not know when, but under the Gravekeeper’s lead he had already walked out of that corridor that seemed to have no end. After they passed through a tall gate, the view before his eyes suddenly opened up—not just open, it hardly even felt like the inside of a “building” anymore!

He saw a plaza, a plaza under a dim yellow sky that looked big enough to hold tens of thousands of people gathered together.

The gate of the corridor where Duncan stood was high above the ground. A sloping stone ramp led down from it to the edge of the plaza. The plaza itself was covered with huge, flat slabs of gray-white stone, and a wide walkway cut straight across it. He also saw solemn pillars with a faint metallic sheen standing on both sides of the road. There seemed to have been more complex structures on top of those pillars, but they had weathered and fallen apart over the long corruption of the years. All around the plaza he could see all kinds of collapsed, leaning ruins, as if they had once been many gates and pillars. The only thing in sight that remained whole was the huge throne in the center of the plaza.

That pitch-black throne stood in the center of the plaza. Its back rose high, as if it were looking down on everything around it. A hazy, dim light, like the sky at dusk, hung over the plaza. Under that yellowish glow, the ruins before his eyes seemed wrapped in a near?eternal… loneliness.

For some reason, a desolate feeling rose in Duncan’s heart. It seemed that these collapsed, dust-covered ruins brought with them a heavy air that he could not help but feel.

The white-robed Tomb Guardian had already passed Duncan. He stepped onto the sloping ramp and walked in silence toward the plaza that had turned into ruins.

Duncan hesitated for a moment, then followed in silence.

They walked down the slope and reached the wide walkway that cut through the entire plaza. They moved forward slowly between two rows of tall, solemn stone pillars. Duncan’s gaze swept around from time to time, taking in the once splendid and grand structures that were now broken walls and shattered ruins.

From time to time, visions of the past appeared before his eyes. He saw people in long white robes or short gray robes appear beyond the pillars. They hurried across the plaza, some walking toward the abandoned gates at the edges, others gathering in places to talk, as if they were discussing something.

He could almost imagine how busy and important this place had once been. In the years of the Genesis Protocol, when the Crawling King was still adjusting the Blueprint of the New World, and when the ancient kingdom of Critt still acted as the Creator’s “assistant” in shaping this world, they had gathered here. They had worked and rushed about for the founding of the Sanctuary World and made plans for the growth of civilization over the next ten thousand years.

At that time, the Great Annihilation had just ended. The long chain of ruins left by the Great Collision still floated over the mortal world, and the order of all things rose and fell from dawn to dusk.

At that time, the meetings of the Elder Kings were held again and again. Two Long Nights had already failed, but the third Long Night was beginning to show a hint of dawn.

At that time, the troops known as the Doomsday Survey Team passed through the Veil of time as a vanguard force to check the boundaries of the Sanctuary World—the boundaries along the axis of time.

At that time, the Boundless Sea had perhaps only just taken shape, the city-states had not yet been built, and “the Sun” had not yet risen. The first Humans still slept in the Crawling King’s database. In the endless Long Night, only the lights of the ancient kingdom of Critt briefly lit up this chaotic world…

Back then, this place had not yet become Vision 004. There were still one thousand one hundred and ninety-nine other observation posts like it scattered among the ashes of the Great Annihilation, all waiting for the moment when the New World would be opened.

Now, all of that had already blown away with the wind.

Only this desolate, crumbling ruin remained, drifting in a gap outside the Mortal Realm, stirring Duncan’s thoughts and endless guesses deep in his heart.

The tall Tomb Guardian walked slowly ahead of Duncan, as if strolling through a corridor of time. When another team of the Doomsday Survey Team passed between the pillars, he suddenly broke the silence and said: “They have not sent any news back for a very long time.”

“…They went mad,” Duncan said softly.

“Oh.”

The Tomb Guardian nodded and kept walking slowly forward.

After a while, he spoke again, as if talking to himself: “At the beginning, they sent back a lot of information. Within the first Communication Cycle after they set out, they sent back news of the Age of City-States. After that came the rise and fall of the Far Sea Alliance in the darkness.

“They mentioned the disappearance of the kingdom of Critt and happily mentioned the appearance of ‘the Sun’. In the reports they sent back, there were many unbelievable things that did not seem to fit the Blueprint’s design, yet in the Creator's later calculations, the appearance of those things all seemed inevitable…"

The Gravekeeper stopped. He lifted his head to look at the huge, dark throne in the center of the plaza. After a long silence, he shook his head slightly.

"After that, their messages grew fewer and fewer. Sometimes… there were even things we could not understand. It seemed they had dived very deep into the Time-Stream, or gone very far along it. That had already gone beyond our original plan…

"Many times, the messages they sent back contradicted each other, or came in a scrambled order. This happened more and more often later on. The Creator's calculations judged this to be normal, because the Sanctuary World is a finite model. It takes this place as its center, like a lamp lighting up a wilderness, and time is the distance that light can reach. The farther away it is, the more the undefined darkness controls everything. At the boundary of time, if they could not find another lamp, that simply meant there was nothing worth reporting…"

The Gravekeeper fell silent again. After an unknown length of quiet, he spoke softly once more, as if to himself: "They have not sent any news back for a very long time…"

Duncan said nothing.

He had already reached the black throne that looked as if it had been made for giants. He slowly lifted his eyes and looked at the figure on the throne.

A headless body sat quietly on the throne. Countless thick cables and pipes wound around it like veins and nerves stretching out from its flesh. They connected every part of the body and linked it to the countless ports and slots on the throne. Some of those ports still blinked with faint lights, and a kind of flowing glow that seemed almost alive moved through some of the pipes, constantly pouring into the body and then flowing back out again.

The moment he saw the headless body on the throne, Duncan's eyes changed slightly. He suddenly remembered the scene Ted Riel had once described to him, something Ted had seen in Subspace. But more than that memory, what shocked him and even left him a little lost was a certain… familiarity coming from that body.

Stunned, he lifted his head and fixed his gaze on the body on the throne. After almost a full minute, he could not hold back and said: "In Subspace, there is a headless body sitting on a pitch-black throne…"

"That is his shadow," the Tomb Guardian said softly. "The Creator took away his body, but could only take a part of it. He was torn into pieces, and it was not only his body that split apart. His memories, soul, shadow, thoughts, his past and his future… all were shattered in the second Long Night. The Creator brought this body here, and the shadow stayed in the place where he first died."

Duncan suddenly turned his head and looked into the Tomb Guardian's eyes. The sense of familiarity he felt from the body on the throne grew stronger and stronger, until he finally could not help but ask: "Who exactly is the one on the throne?"

"Saslokar. The Creator used him as the template to create the first 'Critt' (from 'create')."

Chapter 699: Lonely Vigil

After hearing the Tomb Guardian's answer, Duncan did not speak for a long time. The answer was shocking, yet for some reason it felt as if he had already… expected it in some way.

"…The 'Creator' you keep mentioning, is that the Crawling King? Or rather… the Lord of Abyssal Deep?"

"We usually call him 'Navigator One'," the Tomb Guardian slowly lowered his head and said, "or 'Cluster Controller'. But we also know the names 'Crawling King' and 'Lord of Abyssal Deep'. Those came up in reports the Doomsday Survey Team sent back from a certain time node."

The tall Gravekeeper fell silent for a few seconds after saying this. Then he spoke again, softly, as if talking to himself: "We also have not received any news from the Creator for a very long time."

Duncan did not answer. Chaotic thoughts filled his mind. After a short moment of thinking, he lifted his head and fixed his gaze on the body on the throne: "So, during the third Long Night, 'Navigator One' gathered part of the King of Dreams' remains, then used his special divine authority of 'copying' to design the Critt race after the King of Dreams as a template, to make them his assistants… The entire Critt race was 'made' this way? Including the Doomsday Survey Teams?"

"Of course," the Gravekeeper said in a calm tone. "The world was still very chaotic back then. The Creator had briefly released some mortals into the still-unformed Sanctuary World, but found that they could not survive there and were far from useful. So he could only seek help from beings as powerful as himself. Saslokar, who had died earlier in the process of the Genesis Protocol, was the most suitable choice."

Duncan quietly listened to the Gravekeeper's explanation, but the look on his face grew more and more strange. He suddenly realized that if he followed this fact to its end… then did that not mean all the Enders could be counted as Saslokar's "spawn"?!

This strange and shocking thought flashed through his mind. Duncan suddenly went blank for a moment, and then could not help linking it to something else—

Those mad "Preachers" had become wildly excited the moment they saw the Vanished and even called it the "Promised Ark"… The main reason behind that was of course that the Vanished had once entered Subspace and returned intact. But could it also… have something to do with the fact that the current Vanished was actually built on Saslokar's "Elder God spine"?!

Could the madness and frenzy of those Enders actually be some kind of stress reaction that "spawn" had when they drew close to an "Elder God"?!

Once these shocking connections appeared, they were hard to stop. Duncan's thoughts raced far away in an instant. Only after a long while did his focus slowly pull back and fall once more on the throne and the headless body before him.

He remembered something the Gravekeeper had said to him before they entered the tomb.

"You said he did not have much time left… You meant this body does not have much time left?"

"He has kept watch here for a very long time, but the maintenance systems here cannot run forever," the Gravekeeper said in a low voice. "The ancient systems the Creator left behind are all developing problems one after another. They have been in service far beyond their limits. This throne once served as the starting point for one thousand two hundred observation posts and upheld the ‘existence’ of all Critt. But now this place has become the last observation post, and the throne’s operation is also about to reach its end.”

Duncan suddenly frowned: “…What will happen when the throne stops running?”

The Gravekeeper stayed silent for a moment, then slowly said: “It will mean that the first pillar system the Creator left behind has completely collapsed. After that, the fourth Long Night will begin.”

The fourth Long Night!

Duncan’s eyes changed slightly. After so many scattered and messy clues, this was the first time he had received such a clear piece of information, the first time he could confirm what the key node would be when the fourth Long Night came!

And the Gravekeeper had just said that all the ancient systems the Creator left behind were failing. The collapse of the throne was clearly only one of them. Vision 001—the Sun—was without a doubt another system on the verge of its limit… This matched what was already known!

Duncan’s brow furrowed tightly, and his thoughts churned within him—

By common sense, when the first “collapse” appeared in a series of interlinked, complex systems, a chain reaction was sure to follow. In other words, once the throne here stopped running, the malfunctions and final shutdown of the Sun would also speed up…

Every Long Night began with the great collapse at the end of the previous one, and the third Long Night had been no exception. The collapse of the throne and the shutdown of the tomb of the Nameless King, the last Critt observation post, would start it. After that, the Sun would speed toward its own collapse amid a chain of failures until it went out forever, and the whole world would sink into the veil of night…

The Gravekeeper before him clearly knew many things, some even beyond the age he himself lived in, beyond the Time-Stream up to now. Those pieces of information… perhaps came from the Doomsday Survey Teams that had set out so long ago and watched over the entire Sanctuary World within the Time-Stream…

Thinking of the Gravekeeper who had brought him here, Duncan's thoughts spread out again:

This Gravekeeper and the tomb he warded had already existed in this chaotic gap for ten thousand years. But from what Vanna had revealed, the tomb of the Nameless King had never held such rational, positive contact with the outside as it did today. In the eyes of the world, this tomb was the chaotic and dangerous "Vision 004". Yet now, this Gravekeeper and everything in the tomb seemed very "normal"…

Duncan's train of thought suddenly stopped. He turned his head, deep in thought, and looked at the tall Gravekeeper standing beside him.

…Was it really normal?

Was this, once again, like those "unnameable" beings he had met before, something only he could hear and see clearly? For all those other "Listeners" who had been led into the tomb, did this Tomb Guardian and the ancient plaza ruin at the end of the corridor look completely different?

Duncan remembered the "Cognitive Shift model" Rune had brought up at the gathering not long ago. After thinking for a moment, he could not help asking: "Will the others who enter the tomb see the same things I see?"

“…I try my best to blind their senses and clear away the harmful parts of their memories before they leave. Mortals should not see too many things. It is harmful to them.”

Duncan nodded slowly.

The Gravekeeper’s answer did not fully match what he had expected, but it already indirectly confirmed his guess.

The world he saw was not the same as the one an ordinary person saw. The more things involved “Anomalies” and “Visions”, the stronger this “shift effect” became.

Duncan let out a light breath and set these tangled questions aside for now. After a brief silence, he suddenly asked: “How long is left?”

The Tomb Guardian turned his head: “Hm?”

Duncan lifted his head and pointed at the tall, dark throne: “I mean, how much longer can this throne keep running?”

“I cannot be sure. I am only a Warden, and the Scholars who understood this complex system have been gone for a very long time. The only answer I can give you is… soon.”

“What will happen to this body after the throne stops running?”

This time the Tomb Guardian did not answer at all. He only shook his head in silence.

Duncan did not press further. He and the Gravekeeper simply stood there in silence, in the ruins lit by the dusk-colored sky. After an unknown stretch of time, Duncan suddenly asked: “I heard the bell… Was it because this place is already near its limit? Were you the one actively calling me?”

“Yes.”

“Why?” Duncan turned his head, his expression puzzled and serious. “What do you hope I will do?”

To his surprise, the Gravekeeper shook his head: “I do not know.”

“You do not know?”

“I am only a Warden. The ones who understood everything and knew everything have been gone for a very long time,” the Gravekeeper said, fixing his gaze on Duncan’s eyes. “But I still remember one thing… only one thing.”

He turned around and looked toward the wide ruins in the distance, toward the phantoms that sometimes appeared at the edge of the plaza, hurriedly passing through many gates and slipping in and out of the timeline. Then he spoke softly:

“When they had just set out, a message came from the most distant, most impossible Time Boundary and reached here almost in an instant. It was a single sentence from a Doomsday surveyor who claimed to have already trekked to the very end—

“He said that dusk had fallen, and that the bearer of the Flame Usurper had set this world alight.”

Duncan stayed silent. As he listened to the Gravekeeper, he hid all his feelings in eyes as deep and calm as water. No one knew what he was thinking at that moment.

But the Gravekeeper clearly did not mind. He simply went on calmly: “I do not know what you will think after seeing all of this, and I do not know what you will do on some day in the future. Even more, I do not know what effect the things I have told you today will have on some action or decision you make in the future.

“My duty is only to ward this station and, according to ancient agreements, activate it from time to time so that it can carry out limited data exchange with the outside world. We are a race that was carefully designed and created. Every one of us exists only to complete limited and necessary tasks, and strictly speaking, bringing you here does not fall within my duties.

“But the ones who were in charge of assigning tasks are gone, and there has been no news of the Creator for a very long time. So I feel that I should at least… do something.”

“…I understand,” Duncan let out a quiet breath. At some point his face had relaxed. He looked at the Gravekeeper and nodded slowly and seriously. “Thank you for telling me so much. To know what once happened is already a great gain for me.”

“Then that is good.”

Chapter 700: Return

Duncan stood for a long time in front of that huge black throne.

He knew this was another “shard” of Saslokar after that being had been torn apart. But this shard could no longer leave the throne. In that age when the Deep Sea era was still being laid as a foundation, it had already been made one of the keystones of the Sanctuary World, permanently anchored between the beginning of time and the End, becoming part of the vast system Navigator One had left behind.

But then he suddenly grew curious. Did the other Elder Kings know about this? When the Crawling King decided to build part of the King of Dreams’ remains into the Sanctuary World, how had they talked about it among themselves?

“Make use of everything,” the Gravekeeper answered calmly when faced with Duncan’s question. “Back then they did not have many resources. Everything that could be used had to show its value. If the Creator’s plan failed, he too would have been used in the next plan.”

Duncan nodded slightly, then left the platform where the throne stood. He strolled onto the walkway and walked forward along those mottled, ancient columns. When he was about to reach the end, he suddenly stopped and asked: “Do you have anything else to show me?”

“No,” the Gravekeeper said slowly. “That is all.”

“Then it seems it’s time to leave,” Duncan said. He raised his head and looked at the dusky, chaotic “sky” above, simulated by some unknown light source. “People outside are still waiting for news.”

“I will see you out,” the Gravekeeper said, lowering his head.

“Mm.” Duncan nodded. But just as he was about to step onto that ramp, he suddenly stopped again, as if he had remembered something: “Right, there’s one more thing.”

The Gravekeeper looked over at him.

“Maybe – maybe – I will meet that ‘Creator’ you spoke of. I still don’t know whether it will go smoothly, and I don’t know what state that ‘Creator’ is in. But if I do see him, is there anything you want me to pass on?”

The Gravekeeper suddenly fell silent. After a long time he slowly shook his head and said: “It would not really mean anything. The facility is about to shut down. After you leave, this place will cut off all contact with the outside world until the system reaches its limit… Even if you really meet our Creator by then, I will no longer receive any news.”

Duncan looked at the Gravekeeper with his gaze for a moment, then nodded in silence.

But just as he turned away, the Gravekeeper suddenly spoke again: “Wait. Please… still help me pass on one message.”

Duncan turned back, his expression especially serious: “Go ahead.”

“Just tell him…” The Gravekeeper hesitated, as if he were searching for the right words. Then, with a strange solemnity, he said: “We were honored to complete our work.”

“I will tell him,” Duncan said with a nod. He turned and walked up the long sloping passage that led back.

The Gravekeeper followed at his side, and in silence he walked with Duncan along the road out of the tomb.

When they were about to reach the exit, the tall Warden suddenly broke the silence and said: “From now on, they no longer have to answer the call. Please remind those shadows gathered outside that no matter what comes from here again, they must not come near this place.

“There will be no new register, and no new guidance. The Sanctuary World has already walked every knowable path that was left in its original design. Our observation has reached its end. Beyond this point lies a future that not even the Creator ever calculated… No one knows what waits in that future.

“I hope that in the days to come, they can all… stay… safe and… well.”

With every word he spoke, the Tomb Keeper’s voice grew more hoarse and deep. With every step he took, his footsteps grew heavier. The marks of time slowly appeared on his body, and the smell of rot and death rose from him. At some point, that pure white robe of his had turned into a tattered, ancient shroud, and chains that seemed to have a sealing power slowly spread out from inside him, winding tighter and tighter around his body.

Then the heavy sound of a door opening came from ahead.

The ancient, solemn gate of the tomb swung open, and Duncan stepped out of Vision 004.

He was the only one in history to ever walk out through that door while still awake.

The figures waiting near the gate rushed over at once. Vanna was the first to reach Duncan. She stepped up to support his arm (even though he did not need the help at all), worry written all over her face as she asked: “Are you all right?”

“Of course I’m fine,” Duncan said casually as he glanced back. But in the dark passage behind him he could no longer see the Gravekeeper’s figure. Only a mass of swelling, writhing shadows was slowly fading in the corridor, and that made him frown. “How long was I inside?”

“Just an instant,” Helena’s voice came from the side. “We heard a short, strange noise from inside the tomb, and then the gate opened again and you walked out.”

“An instant?” Duncan frowned.

“It’s always like that,” Vanna said with a nod. “No matter how long you feel you stayed in the tomb, to the people outside it is always just an instant. The scholars in the Church think it’s because the time stream inside Vision 004 is cut off from the outside world…”

Rune raised his hand and added: “For the record, I was the first to propose that theory a thousand years ago.”

Listening to the voices around him, Duncan stayed silent. He turned and looked at the now silent Vision 004 with his gaze. As he watched, a deep rumble came from within the ancient, solemn tomb, and then it slowly began to sink.

In almost the blink of an eye, that grand Critt structure vanished from everyone’s sight.

At that moment Vanna also noticed the weight and solemnity hidden in Duncan’s expression, and she could not help asking: “In your case… you should still have your memories from inside Vision 004, right? What did you see in the tomb?”

Duncan was silent for a moment, then he nodded slightly.

“What I saw and heard inside Vision 004 should be different from all the previous ‘Listeners’… I learned the truth of how this facility was built, and the future tied to it. But first…”

He raised his head. His gaze swept over the spirit projections waiting on standby in the assembly ground, then settled on Helena and the other three Popes.

“Have everyone else leave first. After I tell you the truth of what is inside the tomb, you can decide how to explain it to your Saints.”

…

Gentle waves rose and fell outside the window. A fresh sea breeze blew into the room as Alice opened the round porthole on the side of the captain’s cabin to let the air in. She stood in the sunlight and wind, narrowing her eyes in satisfaction.

“The room really needs to be aired out often. The captain always forgets to open the windows,” the doll girl muttered, hands on her hips. She sounded like she was talking to herself, but also like she was nagging all her “friends” scattered everywhere on the ship. “If you leave it closed too long, everything will get moldy!”

No one in the room answered her nagging. Even Goathead, who was usually noisy all the time, was unusually quiet now. He sat by the edge of the enchanted sea chart table with his eyes half-closed, looking almost asleep.

But all of a sudden, Goathead’s head jerked up and started turning from side to side.

He saw the doll Alice cleaning the room beside him, and then saw the “Dream Skull” not far from him. A muffled groan came from his mouth.

Alice hurried over, full of curiosity: “Hey! Mr. Goathead! What’s wrong?”

Goathead slowly worked his neck, the wood creaking as he muttered: “Weird… I feel like I just had a dream.”

Alice widened her eyes in surprise: “Huh? Didn’t you say you can’t dream?”

“That’s why it’s weird…” Goathead grumbled. “The captain says I can dream, but in theory I should never be able to notice myself dreaming… Yet just now I zoned out, and it felt just like a dream.”

Alice’s curiosity was hooked right away. She put the duster aside and sat down across from Goathead: “Now that you mention it, I sometimes suspect I dream too, but every time I wake up I can’t remember anything… Do you remember what you just dreamed?”

Goathead glanced at the curious doll sitting opposite him, and his tone slowly turned strange: “I dreamed… that I was sitting on a very huge chair, and I sat on it for many, many years… A lot of people were running around me, busy with all kinds of things, and then…”

He paused. A frown seemed to appear on his stiff face. “And then there were lots and lots of children… Those people running around… suddenly they all turned into my children…”

Alice propped her chin in both hands and slowly leaned forward. The more she listened, the wider her eyes opened, as if she was shocked by Goathead’s few words. Suddenly she blurted out: “Did they all have Goatheads like you?! How did they run around? Did they hop?”

Goathead froze. “…I think you misunderstood something. That’s not the point…”

But he did not get the chance to correct the doll’s imagination. Just as he was about to go on, the door of the captain’s cabin suddenly opened.

Duncan’s tall figure appeared in the doorway.

Alice instantly forgot what they had been talking about. Smiling, she stood up from behind the enchanted sea chart table and ran toward the door: “The captain is back!”

Duncan casually pinched Alice’s cheek as he stepped into the room.

Goathead turned his head, his eyes falling on Duncan with some confusion: “It seems you went to a… strange place?”

Duncan did not answer his question. He simply walked over to the enchanted sea chart table. After he adjusted his seat, he looked seriously at Goathead on the table and said slowly: “I need to tell you something. Don’t panic…”

Chapter 701: Leaving Port

Right now Goathead was very panicked, extremely panicked. Even though the captain had told him not to panic, the moment he heard the news his head almost switched into full vibration mode.

Even Alice, listening at the side, had been so shocked by the captain's news that her head had fallen off – literally fallen off – and she still had not put it back on.

"You mean… every person in the ancient kingdom of Critt, from top to bottom, was copied from a part of my remains?" Goathead stared wide-eyed. "And it was the Abyssal Lord who did the copying?"

"Yes," Duncan said with a nod. "That also explains many of the historical puzzles that have always hung in front of the scholars about the ancient kingdom of Critt. For example, why that ancient kingdom almost left no systematic cultural records – because they were a short-lived people 'made' only for the Genesis Protocol and never had their own cultural system. Or for example, why the 'ruins' of the Critt people are found on islands that are not fit to live on at all, even islands covered by Visions. It is because every ancient Critt city was built as infrastructure for the Genesis Protocol. They were not meant to be settlements…"

Goathead's tone grew more and more complicated: "You know that's not what I'm worried about…"

"…Finding out all of a sudden that an ancient people are actually your own spawn is pretty shocking," Duncan said after a short pause, trying hard to keep his face steady. “To be honest, I was pretty surprised too when I first heard it…”

At this point, Alice, who had not said much until now, suddenly spoke up: “But… but… but… Goat…”

“Put your head back on before you talk,” Duncan said helplessly, giving the doll a look. “Sitting there hugging your head is kind of scary.”

After her head fell off in fright, Alice had not put it back on. She had just been sitting beside Duncan, hugging her head and watching the drama with full attention. Now, reminded, she hurriedly reacted. With an “oh,” she quickly pressed her head back onto her neck, and at once her speech became smooth again: “But Goathead was already the main god of the elves, right? If you insist, all the elves in the world could be counted as his spawn. He should be able to accept this…”

“Easy for you to say.” Goathead swung his head around at once, as if resentment was about to leak out from his base. “I was asleep and half my body got taken away to be used as a culture medium, okay? And it would be one thing if it was only some ancient people. They even threw in a whole bunch of Enders! I always thought those mumbling ‘preachers’ were off. The moment they came on board they went straight down to kiss the deck. I’m telling you, if my material allowed it, I would have had goosebumps all over back then – and now I’m remembering those goosebumps again! What is this even, huh? I take a nap and wake up to this…”

Seeing Goathead slide quickly into full rambling mode, Duncan had to knock on the table twice to quiet his overexcited First Mate. Then he cleared his throat and broke the silence: “Ahem. The Enders were also normal Critt people once.”

Goathead froze for a moment, then reluctantly turned his neck. “That I do know… now I know… And even now, not all of them are that crazy… But still…”

He kept saying “but” for a long time but never got to the point. After a long string of mutters, it all turned into a helpless sigh. His head drooped and he fell silent.

Alice could not help looking at Goathead a couple more times. Then she lifted her head and looked at Duncan, a little at a loss. After a moment she said hesitantly: “Captain… the First Mate doesn’t seem very happy.”

“It’s not really about being happy or unhappy. He just suddenly learned something very shocking. He needs to rest and then take some time to think calmly,” Duncan said with a light sigh as he rose from behind the chart table. “Let’s not bother him.”

“Oh,” Alice answered. She stood up from the chair and followed Duncan out of the captain’s cabin. But as she passed the edge of the enchanted sea chart table, she stopped again. After a moment of hesitation she reached out and patted Goathead on the head. “Have a good rest… You still have to teach me how to cook southern dishes later…”

Duncan listened from the side, the corner of his eye twitching despite himself. But this time he did not say anything. He only shook his head in silence and turned to walk out onto the deck.

The sea breeze was gentle, the broken waves rose and fell, and the distant sea glittered with light. It was still a fine day.

Duncan and Alice strolled onto the deck, and there they saw that Vanna had come up at some point too. She was leaning against the rail, facing the wind, staring into the distance as if lost in thought.

The sea breeze blowing from the border lifted Vanna’s silver-white hair. When she heard movement behind her, she turned and brushed back her long hair, a smile appearing on her face: “Captain, Alice.”

“I thought you would spend more time talking with Helena,” Duncan said with a nod as he walked over to the rail. “News this important is sure to shake everyone.”

“Yes, news this important,” Vanna said with a laugh, shaking her head. “Which is exactly why Her Eminence the Pope won’t have much time to chat with me from now on. She is probably still in a meeting with the other Eminences right now… Whether it’s the origin of the ancient kingdom of Critt, or the future of this world of ours they call the ‘Sanctuary World’, or those… already insane ‘end-survey teams’, any of it is enough to make a lot of people lose a lot of hair.”

“…After that, has Vision 004 shown any more signs of activity?” Duncan asked.

“No,” Vanna said, shaking her head. “After you left, we left a few watchers there. They reported that the assembly ground has shown no movement at all so far… In the past, even when the tomb itself did not appear, there would still be strange noises or shadows now and then in the assembly ground… It seems it’s just as you said. Vision 004 really has shut itself off from the outside world completely.”

“Just like the ‘Sun’ above our heads, that ‘tomb’ has reached the end of its life. Its mission is over,” Duncan said calmly. “The Gravekeeper warned me that even if messages come from the tomb again in the future, you must not answer them, and must never send people in again… If anything comes out of the tomb, even if the Gravekeeper himself walks out of there, you must not answer. You should pull back at once… By then it will no longer be the Vision 004 you know.”

“We know. Her Eminence the Pope has already warned all the Saints. From now on, Vision 004 will be a complete forbidden zone. Besides one rotating team of ascetic monks stationed at the edge of the assembly ground to watch the situation, no one will go near the Nameless King's tomb again…"

Vanna spoke in a low voice, then slowly fell silent. After a few seconds she suddenly let out a sigh: "…Another thing has ended."

Yes, another thing had ended. But what did she mean? This very special "gathering"? The long "watch, summon, and Listening Rite" process aimed at the Nameless King's tomb that had formed over hundreds and thousands of years in the Four Gods Church? Or… one more legacy that the ancient Creators had left for this world?

Whatever it was, it had all come to an end.

"Did that Gravekeeper tell you anything about the 'Sun'?" Vanna suddenly asked after a brief silence. "Did he say how that 'Sun' was built, or… whether there is any way to repair it, even just to extend its…"

Duncan shook his head gently.

"He's just a guard," Duncan said. "A guard whose life and death were bound to that observation post when all the systems stopped and all the engineers and designers left, turned into part of the Vision. He already told me everything he knows. But the Sun…"

Duncan paused and looked out over the distant sea.

Vision 001 – the Sun – was moving slowly across the sky, like an old man at the end of his life, trudging toward his destination.

"The Sun is a vast project built together by the Crawling King and the entire Critt people. It's not something a guard could understand."

"…True," Vanna said with a self-mocking shake of her head. "I expected too much."

“Yes. But it’s fine, because that’s the problem I’m going to solve next,” Duncan said gently, glancing at Vanna. “We just have to go find that ‘designer’ from the Deep Sea era – starting with opening a door.”

As his words fell, a faint creaking sounded from deep within the Vanished’s hull. Right after that, Vanna felt a slight tremor under her feet, and then the half-transparent spirit-form sail slowly appeared on the mast –

The Vanished began slowly adjusting its posture and turning its bow. The huge, imposing ghost ship pointed its prow toward the distant sea – to the vast, hazy wall of mist that stood along the edge of the world.

…

At Lightwind Harbor, the solemn and holy great Storm Cathedral still lay quietly moored near the coastline. A priest in a blue and black robe hurried across the upper cloisters and arches of the Cathedral and almost ran to the door of the Pope’s prayer room: “Your Eminence! Your Eminence! That ship – the Vanished – has moved! Ten minutes ago it suddenly changed course and sped away from Lightwind Harbor!”

“I know,” Helena’s voice came from inside the prayer room, her magnetic tone carrying a calming power. “There’s no need to be so startled. It’s simply time.”

As she finished speaking, the dignified and elegant lady turned back and focused once more on the ritual brazier in front of her.

Part of her mind had sunk into the flames and still stayed within the channel built by the Psychic Communication.

“…the Vanished has already set sail. Vanna just sent me the news… Yes, the Tides has already set out with its escort ships. They will reach the agreed meeting point on time…

“Banster, what about that ‘dead-and-not-dead’ fleet of yours?”

A gloomy voice entered Helena’s mind: “It’s the Rest and the No Rest, Helena.”

“Fine, fine, it’s all the same… Where are they?”

“They’ve set out too. Don’t worry – we will all arrive on time.”

Chapter 702: Spirit Realm Convergence

The Vanished set out at last.

Over these past days, many people had watched its every move, including the four Cathedral arks, as well as the observers appointed by the city-states. Under so many watching eyes, that vast and solemn ghost ship, wreathed in fire and thick smoke, sped away from Lightwind Harbor at a speed that common sense could never accept, and in the blink of an eye vanished into the crack between the Spirit Realm and the Mortal Realm.

It appeared like a phantom and vanished like a phantom. Everything happened just as the legends described.

“We’re o~ff~!”

Shirley clutched the railing at the ship’s side and stared at the endless dark sea, swaying her body back and forth. She looked very pleased with herself.

The Vanished had already entered its Spirit Realm sailing state. The sea beyond the railing had turned into a sheet of pitch black. A sky of mixed black, white, and gray clouded over the whole world with a heavy, chaotic gloom. Far away, there were no more lighthouses, ships, or islands. Only all kinds of strange, shifting Shadows floated between sea and sky, as if they leaned over the horizon and looked down on the whole world.

Dog lay a short distance back from the railing, stretching his neck as far as he could. The chain around his neck pulled tight on Shirley’s arm while he dug all four paws into the deck and shouted loudly: “Hey, stop swinging around! Careful you don’t fall!”

“Dog, since when did you get so timid?” Shirley simply sat down on the railing. While she tried to smooth her messy hair, she turned back with a grin and said: “You used to play by the edge of the deck all the time.”

“This is Spirit Realm depth!” Dog cried at once. “If you fall down here, you can’t get back up!”

Shirley ignored him. She just sat on the railing and kept grinning foolishly at the sea, until Duncan walked over, reached out, and gave her hair a rough rub: “You were never this excited when we set sail before. Why are you so happy to leave the city this time?”

“I got sick of Lightwind Harbor,” Shirley said, full of resentment. “There’s no good food in the city. The shops nearby are either bookstores or mechanical workshops. No good food, no fun places, and no good food…”

Duncan looked at her. It seemed Lightwind Harbor’s Elves cuisine had really left a shadow in her heart. He could not help reminding her: “There probably won’t be good food where we’re going either—in fact, we’ll be on the sea most of the time from now on.”

“That’s fine. The food on the ship is good, at least,” Shirley said happily. “And Nina won’t be dragging me around bookstores every single day. I’ll just treat it as getting some fresh air…”

“You get tired of the ship and want to go into the city, then you get tired of the city and want to go to sea…” Dog muttered, lying on the deck beside them. “All you think about is playing. Nina has almost gone through every bookstore in the whole city these days…”

Shirley waved her hand at once: “Ugh, Dog, don’t nag like some old aunt. My head hurts…”

Duncan did not answer. He only smiled and listened to Shirley and Dog bickering and complaining as always. Then, as if he sensed something, he suddenly raised his head and looked toward a certain spot on the nearby sea.

Almost at the same moment, a hazy Shadow rose up beside him. Agatha's figure appeared within that Shadow and reported softly: "The Radiant Star has arrived. It is searching for an entrance in the Mortal Realm."

Duncan nodded: "Mm. Go guide Lucy in."

Agatha's form faded away.

Only a moment later, Duncan saw large patches of Shadow suddenly spread above the dark sea near the Vanished.

The Shadows wove together like mist, rising and entwining. A huge, strange, and ornate ship slowly took shape within those shadows and thin fog. The Radiant Star sailed out from the mist. At first it was only a dim and blurry phantom, with only the stern looking solid and real. But as the Vanished drew closer, that hazy phantom suddenly became clear and solid in the blink of an eye, turning into an entity that could exist stably at this Spirit Realm depth.

The Radiant Star entered the Spirit Realm depth and began to sail side by side with the Vanished.

Shirley sat on the railing, craned her neck at the scene before her, and let out an exaggerated cry: "Woooow—"

Then she saw a small snow-white paper boat drifting up from the deck of the Radiant Star. The paper boat caught the wind, glided over the dark sea between the two ships, and finally landed steadily on the deck of the Vanished.

Lucretia, dressed in a black dress with black hair, stepped off the paper boat, bringing the clockwork Doll Lunie with her.

Alice, who was hanging strips of dried fish on the deck, noticed the movement at once. She happily ran over to welcome them: “Lunie! You’re here!”

The clockwork Doll walking beside Lucretia turned her head when she heard the voice. She also looked delighted and opened her arms as she stepped forward: “Alice!”

The two Dolls held hands and spun in circles on the deck. They had not really been apart for long, yet they were as happy as if they had been separated for years.

Alice pulled Lunie along and proudly showed her the freshly hung dried fish on the deck. Lunie clearly also had something she wanted to show off.

“Alice! Look at this, Mistress just made this for me…”

The clockwork Doll spoke happily as she reached up, cupped her own head, and then gently pulled upward. There was a soft popping sound.

Right in front of everyone on deck, she pulled her own head off.

Alice stared, dumbfounded. Because she usually did not think too deeply about things, she rarely looked this shocked. But she soon reacted and realized this was a new “function” her friend had mastered. A bright smile quickly appeared on her face: “Ah, you can do it too!”

As she spoke, she casually pulled her own head off her neck as well. The two Dolls each held their own heads and laughed together: “We… are… now… the same!”

Then the two Dolls started fooling around on the deck, giggling and playing.

Everyone else on the deck was completely stunned.

Duncan had been walking toward Lucretia, planning to ask about the Radiant Star's condition after entering the Spirit Realm. But halfway there, he was stopped cold by the sight of Alice and Lunie. To be honest, even in Subspace it would be hard to see something this bizarre.

He froze for several seconds before he finally reacted. Then he turned his head toward Lucretia, who was walking toward them: "What is going on here?"

Lucretia looked a bit dazed as well. While she walked, she could not help glancing back at the two Dolls wandering around with their heads in their hands. Hearing Duncan's question, her expression grew a little stiff: "I just did a small modification on Lunie… After that time when she pulled her head off and caused a malfunction, she kept bringing up how Alice's head joint could come off… She talked about it every few days. I got tired of hearing it, so I changed her joint for her…"

She stopped, hesitated, and looked at the two Dolls strolling along the deck carrying their heads. At last her expression cracked: "But I didn't expect this."

"…Forget it, as long as they're happy. Dolls… have their own ways of fun and social life," Duncan said. It took effort for him to put his shaken worldview back together. The corners of his mouth twitched as he finally pulled his gaze away from Alice and Lunie (which was not easy, since those two head-carrying Dolls were very eye-catching). He forced himself to put his attention back on Lucretia and the Radiant Star: "…Was the crossing smooth?"

Lucretia was still looking toward Lunie and Alice. Only when Duncan repeated the question did she jolt, quickly raise a hand to tap her forehead, and sort out her thoughts: "It was all right, just a bit chaotic…"

She finally shifted all her attention back, lifted her head, and glanced at the Radiant Star, which was now sailing automatically beside the Vanished. Her thoughts flowed more clearly as she spoke.

“This is the first time the Radiant Star has dived to such a ‘deep’ depth to sail… Normally, only her stern sits in the Spirit Realm. Being fully ‘submerged’ like this is a completely new experience, for both me and the ship.”

“This way we can go faster,” Duncan said with a smile. “The Vanished is already used to traveling at Spirit Realm depth. The White Oak and the Black Oak have both sailed alongside as escort ships before. At this depth, we need less than two days to catch up with that ‘returning ship’. And we don’t have to worry about anyone tracking us.”

Lucretia did not answer. She only lifted her head and looked at Duncan.

Father stood there, green flames rising and falling around him. He wore a confident and proud smile, just like in her memories.

After a while, she shook her head and asked: “What about the Church?”

“There will be two small fleets joining us, one from the Deep Sea Church and one from the Church of Death,” Duncan said casually. “The flagship from the Deep Sea Church is the Tidal and its escort group. The Church of Death is sending the Rest and the No Rest, a pair of sister ships, with their escorts. They say all of them are heavily armed warships.

“But what I care about more are the ‘professionals’ they’re bringing. When we face those strange things in the border sea, a scholar’s knowledge is sometimes more useful than firepower.”

“But a scholar’s expertise can also easily draw in even greater dangers…” Lucretia could not help reminding him. “Near the border, those restless Shadows are more eager to come out than anywhere else.”

Duncan raised an eyebrow: “Isn’t that even better?”

Lucretia’s expression went blank: “…”

“Anyway, let’s not talk about that. How is that ‘Saint’?” Duncan waved his hand and changed the subject. “Did you bring it this time?”

“Yes,” Lucretia answered at once. A faint pleased smile appeared on her face. “It is locked in the lowest containment hold of the Radiant Star right now. Don’t worry, its condition is good. I restored as much of its vitality as I could, as long as I was sure this ‘Saint’ could not escape. If you need it, I can bring it out at any time.”

“Not yet,” Duncan shook his head and looked toward the distant end of the chaotic dark sea. “We will use that ‘Saint’ when we find the ‘holy ground’ of those Annihilators.”

Chapter 703: Dolls Have Their Own Ways to Have Fun

This was a secret stretch of sea that did not appear on any official enchanted sea chart. It also lay far from any legal route.

The lights of the civilized world could no longer reach this sea, where a thin mist lay over the water. No deep-sea captain in their right mind would set foot here of their own will.

Ahead, the great wall of fog that encircled the entire world—the Veil—already stood in their path. And even though sunlight still shone on the sea, anyone sailing here would feel no comfort from that sunlight at all.

People had given this chilling place a name: the Border.

A ship that was almost torn to pieces, a ship that by any normal judgment should have sunk to the bottom long ago, was slowly sailing through the thin mist. It moved like a silent ghost toward the distant “fog wall” that rose like a sheer cliff.

ghostly green flame rose like silent phantoms, burning all around the broken ship. The half-transparent spirit form fire forced the ship, which should have been split into fragments, to stay together.

Half of its hull had been ripped open, leaving a terrifying gap. The huge and complex machinery inside lay exposed like the organs of some great beast, bathed in ghostly green flame. That eerie ghostfire spread outward from the hull, flowing and spreading across the nearby sea. Wherever the flames flowed, the thin mist that filled the area slowly thinned and drifted away.

A column of flame surged up, and Duncan's figure appeared on the deck—half-transparent, in his spirit form.

Using the artificial beacon he had left on this ship, he had come here again. But this time, he did not teleport his whole "true body" here like last time. He only projected a phantom. Most of his attention still rested on the Vanished.

Since the fleets from all sides had not yet linked up, he wanted to come over first and check the situation here.

The towering fog wall finally stood before his eyes.

Duncan walked across the deck, stepped over the torn cracks left by the great explosion, and passed twisted, curled metal wreckage. He came to the bow and silently gazed at the magnificent "absolute view" ahead.

Before him stood a "wall" that reached from earth to sky. The thick fog had grown so dense it was almost solid, linking the heavens and the sea, standing in his field of vision like the end of the world.

From the top of the Veil, mighty streams of cloud poured down like waterfalls. They fell in silence onto the sea and turned into drifting mist, spreading across the entire border sea.

Before this grand barrier, the great ship he now stood on—built by cultists—seemed tiny. The Vanished would also be tiny. Even the Cathedral arks would be as small as dust.

"So this is the world's end…" Duncan stood quietly at the bow and murmured as if to himself: "I finally see it with my own eyes."

He remembered the “Border Collapse” he had witnessed not long after first arriving in this world, remembered how the wall of fog had suddenly collapsed in the middle of a normal sea. Back then, he had thought that scene as grand and awe-inspiring as anything he could imagine. Its crushing pressure still remained fresh in his heart even now.

But after truly standing here and seeing with his own eyes the endless Veil of the real border, he realized how small that “collapse” inside the Sanctuary World truly had been.

…But would this boundless, magnificent, true Border also have a day when it “collapsed”?

Duncan turned this thought over in his mind—a thought that would fill anyone else with fear and dread. He watched the distant scene for a while longer, then raised his hand and lightly waved through the air.

Flames coiled around his fingertips, tracing out an oval outline in the air. Inside the outline, a mirror-like surface appeared. A second later, Agatha’s figure surfaced in that mirror: “I am here.”

“What changes are there in the Spirit Realm here?” Duncan asked casually.

“Wait a moment. I’ll go down and look,” Agatha said. In the mirror, she nodded, and then her figure faded away.

Duncan waited patiently. After a short while, Agatha appeared again in the mirror—her hair now a bit messy.

“The Spirit Realm is darker and more chaotic here. Shapeless Shadows sweep across the sea. Compared to ‘inside the civilized world’, those Shadows feel far less friendly,” Agatha reported while smoothing her hair. She paused, then added: “…Very unfriendly, actually. Almost violent.”

“You got beaten up?” Duncan frowned, sounding a little worried.

“I beat up everything that came close,” Agatha said, rolling her shoulders. She looked almost cheerful.

After putting down the heavy memories of the Gatekeeper and spending more time on the Vanished, she had grown used to the crew’s… gang-like mood. “They weren’t hard to deal with, just stranger in shape. Also…”

“Also?”

“There is also a ‘Veil’ in the Spirit Realm,” Agatha said. She raised a hand and pointed toward the great wall of the Veil in the distance. “It stands there like a dark reflection of this Veil, and it looks… even more dangerous and strange. Many shapeless forms rise and shift inside that black Veil. I don’t have a good feeling about it.”

Duncan frowned slightly as he listened.

“So the plan of ‘diving’ beneath the Eternal Veil from Spirit Realm depth won’t work,” he said thoughtfully. “It seems this ‘border’ surrounds the whole world on all levels. There is no safe shortcut…”

“That is more or less what we expected,” Agatha nodded. “If our world is a ‘Sanctuary World’, then the walls of this Sanctuary World must be tight enough. Only then can we have a safe place to live in the chaos after worlds collide.”

She paused to think, then went on: “In the World Model Mr. Morris has been refining, the Veil at the border should block both the Mortal Realm and the Spirit Realm. It may even reach down into the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea.

“And it doesn’t just seal us off in space. From the point of view of time, there should also be something like an ‘Eternal Veil’ to make sure the entire Sanctuary World is complete…”

“A border in the dimension of time…” Duncan said. “In Vision 004, that Gravekeeper also spoke to me about it.” He shook his head. “Mr. Morris must have taken his revelation from there too.”

“Yes. He has been trying to build a World Model that can explain the whole Boundless Sea, even the whole age of the Deep Sea,” Agatha said gently, with a hint of respect in her voice. “The truths we recently found deep in the Nameless One’s dream, and the information you just brought back from the Nameless King’s tomb, have helped him make great progress lately.

“He has started trying to explain the world we live in using both time and space. He is the only scholar I know who has reached this step.”

“Strictly speaking, he is the only scholar who has reached this step and is still alive,” Duncan said with feeling. “Recently his research has been causing… extra commotion on the ship. It’s the same when Nina reads.”

“Scholars always end up wrestling with the knowledge they study,” Agatha said, clearly used to this. “Miss Nina’s situation is much better now. She has learned to stay calm when things jump out of her books…

“That might be related to the time she accidentally burned the design drawing she had spent three days and three nights working on.”

Hearing this, the corner of Duncan’s mouth twitched.

Even though he had lived in this world for quite some time now, every time he heard about such bizarre events, he still could not help wanting to complain.

But in any case, the noise Nina and Morris caused while wrestling with knowledge was still better than the two Dolls on the ship playing their “head-swapping game” right now.

In the captain’s cabin of the Vanished, Duncan blinked and looked up helplessly as he spoke with Lucretia about what they had learned of the Border.

A figure in a black-and-white maid dress staggered into the cabin. The large clockwork key on her back turned with a constant clicking sound. When she saw Duncan in the room, a slow smile spread across her face: “Cap… tain… what… are we hav… having for din… ner?”

Duncan held it in for two seconds before he finally could not stand it: “Alice, why is your head on Lunie’s body?”

Alice’s face showed sudden surprise: “Ah, how… did you… find… find out?”

“I’m not blind! And I’m not stupid!” Duncan slapped a hand to his forehead. Right after that, he heard heavy thumping sounds outside the captain’s cabin, as if someone was walking into the wall again and again.

He rose from behind the enchanted sea chart table, walked to the doorway, and saw Alice’s body outside—now wearing Lunie’s head—banging into the wall over and over. As the body walked, Lunie’s head kept calling out: “You hit it, you hit it—move a bit left… hey, left, you got it backwards! On your side that’s right! Ah, you hit it again… more to the left—ah, crash—Old Master?”

Duncan stared with a blank face at Lunie’s head, which had frozen in shock. A moment later, Lucretia also stepped out behind him, her expression just as stiff.

The two of them stood there together, faces wooden, watching the Lunie+Alice combined body. They watched as Alice’s body kept walking forward and bumped straight into the door frame with another thud.

“Stop walking!” Lunie’s head shouted quickly. “Old Master and Mistress are out here!”

Right after she shouted that, she unconsciously moved her own body inside the cabin toward the door as well, and there was a loud thump from behind them.

Duncan lowered his head and saw a silver-haired head roll to his feet. Alice blinked up at him with innocent eyes: “Cap… tain… save… save… save me…”

At the same time, the Lunie+Alice combination body outside also stepped into thin air, missed its footing, and fell over beside the hem of Lucretia’s dress. Lunie’s head bounced off the body, hit the floor with a thud, and rolled while crying out in a panic: “Mistress! I fell off too!!”

For a moment, the scene was beyond any words.

Duncan’s mind spun for a long time as he tried to sort out the positions of these two Dolls. At last he could not hold back anymore and shouted in unison with Lucretia: “You two switch back!”

Chapter 704: Doll and Doll and Doll

In the dining room on the upper deck, Duncan and Lucretia sat side by side, both with stiff faces. The two head?swapping troublemakers, who had just put their heads back on, sat in the chairs across from them. Lunie looked a little nervous and uneasy, while Alice wore her usual bright smile and even looked as if she had not played enough.

After holding it in for a few seconds, Duncan finally spoke first: “Was it fun?”

Lunie immediately lowered her head and fidgeted with her fingers, looking awkward. Alice, however, nodded happily: “It was fun, Captain! You have no idea, it turns out our connector sizes are exactly the same…”

Duncan’s eyelid twitched. Then he noticed Lunie’s little habit of picking at her fingers. For some reason, the gesture felt familiar. After wondering about it for a moment, he looked thoughtfully at the Sea Witch beside him: “When you were little and did something wrong, didn’t you also like to pick at your fingers?”

“Uh… that was when I was very young…” Lucretia had not expected the topic to suddenly fall on her. She froze for a moment. Then her expression turned a little odd. “You… you still remember that?”

“…I don’t remember, but it still feels familiar,” Duncan shook his head lightly, then cleared his throat twice and turned his gaze back to the two dolls. “Whose idea was it first?”

This time the two dolls finally answered in unison: “Shirley!”

Duncan: “…?”

A moment later, Duncan and Lucretia still sat on the dining room bench with stern faces. But this time, sitting across from them, besides the two head?swapping troublemakers, there was also Shirley.

Dog lay on the floor next to Shirley, hugging his own head with his paws while muttering under his breath: “Don’t look at me, this has nothing to do with me, I tried to talk them out of it, I just couldn’t stop them…”

Duncan glanced at the grumbling Dog, then looked at Shirley. He remembered how she had once tricked Alice into pouring superglue down her own neck, and could not help sighing in his heart. He really did have to keep a closer eye on this girl who feared the world might be too peaceful…

“Why are you giving them bad ideas just because you’re bored?” Duncan sighed and looked helplessly at Shirley. “We are sailing in the Spirit Realm. This is not like being on land. If they really got dizzy and fell into the sea, would you be the one responsible for fishing them out?”

Shirley had already drawn in her neck in that well?practiced pose for accepting criticism. But when she heard the captain’s words, her eyes suddenly lit up: “So that means we can play like this on land?!”

Duncan: “…Do you want to listen to what you’re saying?”

Shirley gave an awkward little laugh, but then her smile turned sly. She leaned forward, grinning, and muttered: “You can’t blame me for this, Captain. Think about it, when you saw the two of them, didn’t you have the same thought? Two dolls who can take their heads off, using the same kind of joints. In Old Gentleman’s words… it’s the spirit of exploration, right? You really don’t want to try it…?”

In the ears of someone with a strong curiosity, Shirley's words were like a tempting whisper from Subspace itself. Duncan's eyebrow twitched. He was just about to speak when he heard a barely audible mutter beside him: "It does kind of make sense…"

Duncan's expression turned a little strange. He turned his head toward the source of the mutter. Lucretia looked up, a bit embarrassed, and when she realized what she had said, she hurried to add: "Of course this kind of behavior is not something we should encourage. Any experiment has to be built on caution and safety…"

Duncan had to work hard to keep his face under control. He kept a calm, serious look and pretended to ignore Lucretia's mutter. Then he sighed and looked at the two head?swapping troublemakers across from him: "Don't play like that again. At least, don't do it on the ship. It's not safe. Remember?"

"Okay, got it, Captain!" "Yes, Old Master."

"Go back to your room and stay there. If you really don't want to do your homework, then read a book for a while, even a picture book," Duncan waved a hand at Shirley. "We are about to leave the Spirit Realm and then enter the eternal Veil. Before that, stop running around making trouble everywhere."

Shirley lowered her head and answered obediently: "Oh, okay, Captain…"

The dining room finally grew quiet. Shirley left with Dog, while Alice dragged Lunie to a corner of the room. The two whispered about who? knew?what—at least this time each of them was carrying her own head.

Duncan glanced in the directions they had gone, shook his head, and sighed. But for some reason, he felt a bit relaxed and cheerful inside.

It seemed that ever since the Lightwind Harbor incident, it had been a long time since he had been able to breathe out like this.

But Lucretia's slightly uneasy voice came from beside him: "Are you… angry?"

Duncan did not look back: "Why do you say that?"

"…We are about to head to the border to investigate the cultists' holy land. It's a dangerous and serious task. Yet Lunie chose this time to cause you trouble…"

She had only spoken halfway when Duncan suddenly interrupted her: "So that's what you were like as a child?"

Lucretia did not react for a moment: "…Hm?"

"Lunie," Duncan raised his hand and pointed at the clockwork doll in the distance who was whispering with Alice and now and then showing a happy smile. "Is that what you were like as a child? I mean, in terms of personality."

Lucretia did not speak for a while. She only pressed her lips together. After a good moment, she finally spoke softly: "…Lunie was the first doll I made. I sealed in her body some parts of my soul that tend to make me make mistakes. Most of the time, those sealed fragments do not affect her operation. But sometimes, they make her act in rather odd ways."

"So most of the time Lunie looks calm and reliable. But when she is with Alice, she becomes lively?"

"…Yes. It seems it will make her make mistakes—at least it raises the chance of it."

Duncan looked back at Lucretia: "Even this level of 'mistake' counts as a problem?"

Lucretia was silent for a few seconds, then answered softly: “On the border, a mistake can easily get you killed.”

Duncan did not speak for a while. He only watched the two dolls in the distance with a thoughtful gaze as they chatted happily about something. After a while, he spoke in a calm tone: “When you are by my side, you are allowed to make mistakes.”

For a moment Lucretia seemed a little dazed. She opened her mouth as if she wanted to say something, but in the end said nothing. Her gaze only followed Father’s gaze in that direction:

Alice seemed to be telling Lunie about some fun things on the ship, or at least things she thought were fun, and Lunie listened with great interest. Alice rarely chatted so happily with anyone other than the captain, and Lunie—who served as the first mate on the Radiant Star and the Sea Witch’s servant—had probably never met a kindred spirit like Alice whom she could talk with this way.

The two dolls seemed to be getting along very well.

Just then, Duncan seemed to suddenly remember something: “Right, there’s something I’ve been putting off…”

As he spoke, he waved casually in midair. AI, who had been happily devouring fries at a nearby table, vanished on the spot. The next second, a ring of eerie, spinning green flame appeared beside Duncan. He reached into the ring of fire and fished something out, then set it down on the table in front of him.

Lucretia looked at the object in surprise. It was an elegant wooden box about seventy centimeters long. Aside from its fine, old?fashioned craftsmanship, it did not seem special.

But slowly, she felt from the wooden box a long?lost sense of… familiarity and closeness.

“This is Nilu.” Duncan opened the wooden box, and a delicate one?third? scale doll appeared in front of Lucretia. “I said a long time ago that I would give her to you, but too many things have been happening and it got delayed. Now that I saw Alice and Lunie together… take her. Let their ‘sister’ join them again.”

Lucretia’s expression turned a little strange. She took the box and carefully lifted the one?third?scale doll named “Nilu” out of it. She set the doll on the table, letting her sit leaning against the box, while her thoughts slowly drifted far away—

In that distant afternoon, with the clear sound of wind chimes ringing, she had walked hand in hand with her brother into that doll shop. Lunie and Nilu had sat quietly in the shop window. Warm sunlight shone on their delicate hair and dresses like a faint veil.

Back then, she could only take one of them away.

But that was already one of the few warm memories of her childhood that she still had. In those warm days, the Sun had still been something that was sure to rise into the sky again the next morning.

The Witch felt a little dazed, and in that daze, the little doll sitting on the table and leaning against the box slowly turned her head and showed her an empty smile.

Lucretia woke from her trance and saw that the little doll was still sitting quietly on the table, her head tilted obediently to the side. The shell without a soul inside was hollow and empty.

She reached out and tapped her finger on the doll’s forehead: “Go back to sleep.”

The doll’s body suddenly shook, as if a brief life had been poured into her. Then she climbed to her feet stiffly and stumbled into the elegant wooden box. She grabbed the lid beside her and tried hard to pull it down.

But she was too weak.

Duncan reached out and gave it a push, helping the doll close the lid.

“Thank you.” A tiny voice came from inside the box, then fell silent again.

“That was remarkable.” Duncan looked up and spoke to Lucretia with some surprise.

“We are entering the border now. Many things are becoming active,” Lucretia said. “If we inject souls into some things ahead of time, we can stop some uninvited guests from ‘sneaking aboard’. Many years ago, Lunie ‘woke up’ for the first time in just this way.”

“…It’s also time to rise up and get some air.” Duncan nodded. As he spoke, he slowly rose from behind the table.

As he moved, the Vanished began to rise slowly from the depths of the Spirit Realm. Outside the dining room portholes, the daylight was growing brighter.

The Shadows that lurked in the Spirit Realm slowly faded away from all directions.

Chapter 705: The Eerie Atmosphere at the Border

As the Shadows in the Spirit Realm quickly retreated from around the Vanished, the sea that had been pitch?black slowly returned to its usual blue. Daylight from the Mortal Realm and the drifting mist around the ships spread to cover the whole ocean.

Nina ran out from her room onto the deck and quickly spotted the strange, almost shattered great ship not far ahead of the Vanished, wrapped in eerie green flame.

That ship had been destroyed by a massive explosion and was now driven only by spirit form fire. It was slowly slowing down, yet still sailing forward. In the direction its bow pointed lay the “border” that had once appeared in her textbooks, but that she was seeing for the first time today.

A majestic wall of thick fog rose from sea to sky. Cloud?like mist poured down from the top of the giant wall like a waterfall, turning into thin haze that filled the whole sea region. In front of it, all things seemed small. Even though Nina had already seen many unbelievable sights while following the Vanished, she still could not help widening her eyes and letting out a long shout: “Waaah—”

Shirley also ran out at this time. She grabbed the rail at the ship’s side and looked into the distance, shouting together with Nina: “Waaah—”

Her voice had barely fallen when Dog’s voice floated out from the Shadows: “This is why I tell you to read more. If your vocabulary were even a little bigger, you wouldn’t only be able to say ‘waaah’ after seeing a Veil this grand at the border…”

Shirley’s eyes widened: “Didn’t Nina also go ‘waaah’? Why aren’t you talking about her?”

Dog jumped out from the Shadows, shaking his head as he muttered: “Nina says ‘waaah’ because she feels the word fits here. You say ‘waaah’ because it’s the only word you know. The two of you are not the same…”

Hearing Dog’s nagging, Shirley puffed out her cheeks in protest and argued loudly: “I… I have lots of words! I have so many interjections. It’s just that the captain and Morris, Old Gentleman, never let me use them! If I really talked the way I wanted, I…”

But Dog was no longer paying attention to her. This Abyssal Hound with its fierce shape had become even more cautious after reaching the border. He looked around, as if sensing the breaths coming from other dimensions. After a moment, he grumbled: “…This place isn’t like the safe sea zones. There are unstable auras everywhere. We’re clearly in the Mortal Realm, yet I can faintly smell the scent of the Spirit Realm…”

“This is the border, and this is only the smallest part of its countless strange and dangerous traits.” As a swirl of colorful paper scraps spun through the air, Lucretia’s voice came. “Here, the boundary of the ‘Mortal Realm’ becomes blurred. All those ‘things’ that are suppressed in the safe sea zones become active. Machines are much more likely to go mad. Books will draw more, and more dangerous, watchers. Many things on the ship will find it easy to come alive. And at certain times, especially when the ship accidentally overlaps with some invisible ‘field’, these dangers will multiply.”

She strolled to the edge of the deck and looked at the distant wall of thick fog. Lost in thought and memory, she went on softly—

“So almost no sane explorer comes to the border to ‘try their luck’… There is no honor or wealth here. There is only a cold, uncanny environment and a dangerous, terrible fate. The very few madmen who dare to set foot here have worked out certain ‘rules of conduct’ that exist only at the border. For example, do not carry any idol or portrait that has human features on the ship. Do not shout loudly in the fog. Do not stand in front of a mirror for too long, and so on…”

“But these rules and taboos can only lower the risk to a point. Seasoned explorers still vanish in the mists near the border. They forget where they are when the fog rises. They push open doors in the cabins that do not exist. They may even, in a daze, believe they have already finished a dangerous, long exploration of the border and safely returned to the city?state where they started. Their tight nerves relax. They finally breathe out and step onto the solid planks of the pier—only to walk straight into the thick fog of the border, leaving behind an empty ghost ship drifting on the sea.”

As the Sea Witch spoke of these eerie, terrifying things, Shirley’s eyes grew wider and wider until she shivered without thinking: “I… oh crap… that sounds kind of scary…”

“Yes, it is very scary. So under normal conditions, people like you, who have no experience exploring the border, should never come near these waters. But you still don’t need to worry, because this is the Vanished, and you are members of the Vanished Fleet.”

Lucretia smiled faintly, gazing out at the sea as she spoke slowly.

“Father and this ship… are no longer the way I remember them. With the Vanished as it is now, I believe that even if some ‘thing’ really slipped onto the ship and opened your cabin door, it would politely apologize and even close the door on its way out…”

As soon as she finished speaking, a voice suddenly came from the side: “Normally, they don’t get the chance to close the door or apologize.”

Lucretia turned her head and saw that Duncan had come up onto the deck at some point.

“Vanna just received a psychic communication. The Deep Sea Church’s Tide has already reached these waters and will appear soon. Two main ships of the Death Church are also nearby. They’re sending out small scout boats to first check the situation in the surrounding sea.”

Lucretia nodded: “That’s good. We need to understand what’s going on around here. In this area, the Church fleets that patrol the border all year round are a bit more professional than we are.”

Duncan grunted in reply and said nothing more. He only guided the Vanished to slowly draw closer to the “guide” ship ahead. Beside the Vanished, the Radiant Star had also shed its Spirit Realm state and was sailing along at an easy pace.

A dozen minutes later, the Vanished and the Radiant Star reached the area near the broken great ship and kept a slow, steady cruise.

Perhaps because they were closer to the Veil, the mist on the sea grew thicker than before. Layer upon layer of fog drifted in all directions like flowing curtains. Even the eerie green flame spilling from around the Vanished could not fully drive the mist away.

On Duncan’s command, the three ships stopped before the fog could get even thicker.

“We’ll move on after we rendezvous,” Duncan said on the foredeck of the Vanished as he looked at the fog?shrouded sea in the distance. “Light the beacon first.”

As he spoke, he raised his hand and pointed at the guide vessel in the very front.

With a snap of his fingers, the eerie green flame burning on that great ship suddenly flared brighter. The roaring spirit flame swelled and rose at once, bursting upward and sending out a radiance bright enough to pierce the fog!

A “lighthouse” made entirely of spirit flame rose up in the fog?covered border sea. The light pouring from the fire shone fiercely over the whole area. Under that glow, on the sea around the three ships, the mist finally showed signs of thinning and their visibility improved a little.

Vanna and Morris came up onto the deck as well. Morris was curiously studying the sea near the rail. He saw that the color of the water seemed a bit deeper than it was beyond the thick fog. The dark blue sea looked fairly calm, only with slight ripples in the breeze. But those ripples looked strange. They were slow and sticky, as if… the whole sea were a layer of thick, smooth oil with no detail on its surface.

Frowning, Vanna fixed her gaze on this stretch of sea that gave off such a strong sense of strangeness and doubt. After hesitating for a moment, she took a small wooden charm amulet from her clothes—a wave?shaped charm amulet carved from Sea-Breath Wood—and threw it into the sea.

The charm amulet, which stood for the Storm Goddess’s faith and blessing, landed on the slow, sticky surface of the sea. It bounced once as if it had fallen on solid ground. No ripple spread out, and it did not sink into the water.

It simply stayed there, resting on that slow, sticky “surface” for several seconds. Then it was suddenly dyed a dark blue by the surrounding water and quietly “melted” into the sea.

Vanna stared in some shock at this scene that did not fit her experience.

But in her ears, the gentle sound of waves still rose as always.

Although the process looked very strange, the power of Goddess Gamona still descended as usual. Even in this abnormal sea region, the Storm Goddess's blessing could still take effect.

It even seemed… to have taken effect a little faster?

Just then, Vanna seemed to suddenly sense something else. She raised her head and looked toward the distant, mist?shrouded sea.

Almost as soon as she looked up, a long, clear horn blast suddenly broke the calm of the border sea. Right after that, a hazy light appeared deep within the thick fog—and behind that light, the huge shape of a ship slowly emerged.

The gentle sound of waves rose again. Through Psychic Resonance, she confirmed the message coming from her Church comrades. At the same time, the huge ship in the distance began to slow down at a set distance, and several smaller escort ships appeared one after another around its outline.

Through the drifting mist, the ships that had come to rendezvous and the Vanished and the Radiant Star, which had arrived earlier, carefully confirmed each other's identities. In the border sea, this was a very important step.

And this kind of identity "confirmation" would continue throughout the whole operation. They would have to do it again at set intervals.

After all, in the thick fog of the border, you could not always be sure that the figure beside you this second was still the person you knew a second ago.

"It's the Deep Sea Church's Tide and its escort group," Vanna reported quickly as she came to Duncan's side. "We've confirmed it through Psychic Resonance."

Duncan nodded: “Good. Allow them to come closer. Let them enter the area lit by the spirit flame.”

Chapter 706:

In the fog that filled the whole sea, hanging like endless gauze, the Tide and her two escort ships from the Deep Sea Church began to enter the region illuminated by the spirit flame, the Sacred beacon Torch. Their hulls gradually grew clear in the mist. The outlines that had been trembling and wavering under the influence of the border environment also became steadier in the firelight.

For the sailors aboard the Tide, the changes were even more obvious. The ghostly green flame soaring into the sky was like a lighthouse that brought order. The eternal mist of the border sea actually receded like a sacred miracle around that lighthouse. As they drew closer to the flame, the faint noise and whispering in the surroundings weakened as well. None of this was something these sailors, who had patrolled near the eternal Veil for years, had ever experienced.

On the foredeck of the Vanished, Vanna slightly furrowed her brow and tilted her head in a Listening Rite, as if she were picking out distant sounds from the wind. Then she nodded to Duncan: “Commander Sandra of the Tide sends you his greetings and respects. He is asking about the next step.”

Duncan nodded: “We wait for the Rest and the No Rest to arrive. Then we enter the thick fog. Make sure we do not leave the range lit by the flame lighthouse.”

Vanna immediately passed the captain’s orders to her fellow church members. Duncan, meanwhile, was quite interested in this “psychic communication” of hers that let her contact nearby Deep Sea believers through meditation and prayer. After watching with curiosity for a while, he suddenly seemed to remember something else: “Speaking of which… should we really install a radio set on the Vanished?”

“If you want to use it in safe waters, that’s fine. But if you want to use it on the border… then it won’t be reliable,” Vanna answered very seriously. “In the border sea, the chance of machines going mad is very high. Only machines like steam cores, which have strong protection, can still run stably. Everything else will have problems more or less, and radio is the most likely of all to go wrong.”

As Vanna finished, Lucretia spoke up beside her: “A running radio set can easily pick up ‘voices’ from unknown sources. Those voices will corrupt people’s minds. Some things can even crawl along the radio into the Mortal Realm and quietly corrupt any device that isn’t under steam’s protection. So as a rule, ships entering the border sea shut down their radios, and they even cut the internal phones on board.”

“Something can crawl along the radio into the Mortal Realm?” Duncan raised his eyebrows. He seemed to find this rather… interesting. “So the patrol ships on the border basically have to rely on Vanna’s kind of ‘psychic communication’ to stay in contact?”

“Psychic Resonance is a sacred miracle granted by the God,” Vanna lowered her head slightly and traced the sigil of the storm goddess Gamona on her chest. “Like the steam-blessed boilers, the words sent out through Psychic Resonance are under divine blessing. In this chaotic border sea, they can avoid being corrupted and twisted by outside forces. Of course, this doesn’t mean absolute safety. Psychic communication can still be interfered with and corrupted. In this endless fog, there is no such thing as one hundred percent safety.”

“I see…” Duncan nodded thoughtfully. Just as when he first set foot on the city-states, he absorbed this new knowledge about the border with keen curiosity and a strong desire to understand it. Then he turned his head and casually asked toward what looked like empty air: “What about you, Agatha? Is the ‘psychic communication’ between you, the Rest, and the No Rest the same as Vanna’s? As a ‘shadow’, is there any difference between the psychic communication you use to contact other death priests and the usual kind?”

Agatha’s hazy figure appeared, floating above the deck, and her slightly airy voice came from the air: “As far as I can feel, there is no real difference. Even after becoming like this, I can still feel Bartok’s divine blessing just as in my ‘memories’, and through it I can still hear the voices of my brothers and sisters in the Church. In fact… after coming here, I feel those voices are even clearer than in my ‘memories’. It’s quite unbelievable.”

The “memories” Agatha spoke of clearly referred to her “life as a Gatekeeper”. That life was false, but those memories were a perfect copy of the real Agatha’s. The judgment she made from them naturally had great reference value.

The “replicant Agatha” who existed as a shadow actually felt the voices clearer than in her memories when she listened to psychic communication in the border sea?

This counterintuitive detail made Duncan fall into thought. He had always believed that, in anything involving divine magic and sacred miracles, the replicant Agatha was weaker than her true self left behind in Frostholm. Yet here, in the border sea, the situation… did not seem to match his expectations.

In the end… what were the Four Gods Church's priests actually handling when they used this power called "Psychic Resonance" to build their web of psychic communication?

Duncan drifted into these thoughts without meaning to, but his thinking was soon interrupted.

"They're here," Agatha's voice came suddenly from the shadow. "The Rest and the No Rest are drawing near."

A piercing whistle rolled out of the depths of the fog. Two black ironclads with towering bridges, small cathedrals rising at their sterns, and heavy main guns on their bows and flanks slowly emerged from the mist. Four small escort ships surfaced with the swell of the fog around them.

The bright spirit flame rising from the Guide Vessel lit up their blurred silhouettes. In response, the two black ironclads blew their whistles again in greeting and flashed a series of light signals.

"Commander Polly of the Rest and Commander Orlando of the No Rest send you their greetings and respects," Agatha said, nodding slightly to Duncan. "They have already sent out scout boats to make a rough check of the surrounding sea. They found no trace of Annihilator activity and no small islands suitable as temporary footholds or lookout posts. But inside the Veil, the scout boats did briefly pick up some unusual noise. We can be sure there is indeed 'something' in that direction."

As he listened to Agatha's report, Duncan's expression grew more and more serious. Then he exhaled softly and slowly calmed himself.

"Let's move out. And I'll say it again: do not leave the area lit by the spirit flame."

The shattered Guide Vessel began to pick up speed again. With it at their head, the "joint fleet" formed by the Deep Sea Church, the Death Church, and the so-called Vanished Fleet finally sailed toward the eternal Veil and slowly entered the depths of the endless fog.

The sky-filling clouds and mist pressed in like a wall, and at some point turned into layered curtains surrounding the fleet. The Sun was left behind them. sunlight faded from sight. As the fog grew thicker, a kind of chaotic but not completely dark “sky-glow” became the dominant color of this sea within the mist.

About thirty minutes after they crossed the boundary of the Veil, the fog began to “gather” in a clear way and grew denser and denser. It started to take on a… viscous, almost textured form, like chunks of something solid floating unevenly in every corner of their vision.

Dim outlines flashed inside those clumps of condensed fog, as if something were watching this fleet that had suddenly barged into the border sea, quietly observing these uninvited guests.

The deck gradually fell quiet. Even Shirley, who was normally always chattering, seemed to sense the change in the air. She closed her mouth, staring at the “clumps” of fog that flowed past the ship’s side like living things and at the faint shapes in the mist.

“This… this doesn’t look like the ‘fog’ I know at all…” Dog muttered quietly. “It’s not the same as what we saw outside the Veil either…”

“Once you enter the Veil, the texture of the fog turns into this,” Lucretia said. She stood by the rail and reached out, her fingertips gently brushing the streams of fog pouring past like rivers in the air. “It’s as if the order between real and unreal has broken down. The diffuse mist starts to gather into clumps, as if something with a mind of its own is out there, pulling the fog together.”

“But in fact, there is nothing inside them. The centers of these clumps are empty. Don’t trust any ‘solid’ thing you see in the fog too easily. Unless it shows clear signs of activity, it’s best to treat everything as a phantom or your own imagination.”

“Hey, is it really okay to just stick your hand in there like that?” Shirley couldn’t help yelling when she saw Lucretia’s movements. “This fog looks super shady!”

“The fog is dangerous, but that doesn’t mean it’s some kind of corrosive poison,” Lucretia glanced at Shirley and shook her head. “If that were the case, you would have died the moment we entered the Veil. With enough experience and the right methods, the area within six nautical miles of the border counts as a ‘relatively safe zone’… Of course, no matter how careful you are, plenty of people have still died in this so-called ‘relatively safe zone’.”

While listening to Lucretia and Shirley talk, Duncan stayed silent. He simply stood at the bow, watching the streams of fog as they merged and split nearby, his expression thoughtful.

Lucretia noticed Duncan’s silence.

“Dad, did something come to mind?”

Duncan blinked. After a moment’s hesitation, he finally muttered softly: “It looks very familiar.”

“Familiar?” Lucretia echoed.

Duncan grunted in reply, but his gaze did not leave the amorphous clumps drifting all around. He stared at the faint shapes inside the fog, the muddy sky-glow above, and the strange textures that sometimes showed themselves where the clouds flowed. His brow furrowed deeper and deeper…

Chapter 707:

The fleet moved at low speed through the condensed, lingering fog. Their hazy silhouettes looked at one another, like a cluster of massive ghosts rising and falling in a sea of mist.

Inside the eternal Veil, the power of the fog far surpassed that outside the barrier. As the fleet pushed onward, the surrounding mist grew harder and harder to disperse. Even with the blazing spirit flame lighthouse shining over the entire formation, thin fog still kept drifting in from the edges of the sea, wrapping around every ship and flowing across the decks. The omnipresent mist even began to seep into the cabins, drifting around the sailors.

Commander Sandra of the Tide stood at the command station in the ship's bridge, frowning as he watched the thin fog slowly curling around them.

He was a tall man with slightly dark skin and striking short hair the color of white gold. The storm tattoo on the left side of his face showed that he had once been an ascetic, who had completed all his vows and thus earned promotion and divine blessing. That was how he became a respected border commander. Now, however, this border commander's expression did not look hopeful.

"How far have we gone?"

Sandra turned his head and suddenly asked the technical Father beside him.

"We are closing in on the six-nautical-mile boundary—only the last mile left," answered the Father, whose gray hair stuck out beneath a robe embroidered with thunder and gear emblems. “Our speed is low, but even at this pace we will soon reach that ‘limit’.”

Sandra nodded, but his frown deepened.

Six nautical miles… and that lighthouse still showed no sign of stopping. It was still leading the fleet slowly toward the deeper fog, which meant that so-called “holy ground” lay farther inside. But if they went on like this, the fleet would soon cross that “forbidden line”.

Beyond six nautical miles lay the absolute limit of civilization’s light. Once they crossed it, the last trace of order on the Boundless Sea would vanish, even if the Saint and the Pope came in person.

The great Cathedral of Storms had ordered the Tide to fully cooperate with the Vanished’s operation here, but that did not include crossing the “six? nautical?mile boundary”.

Sandra looked toward the depths of the mist ahead, his brow still furrowed.

Those Annihilators still had not appeared… which also made no sense.

With such a narrow “safe sea” along the border, a fleet this large was hard to hide—especially with that blazing flame lighthouse standing in the fog. If the cultists really were hiding nearby, they would have noticed this formidable joint fleet long ago. Whether they chose to meet them head-on or set an ambush, this sea should not be so “quiet”. It was so quiet it was as if… there were no cultists here at all.

Had they all escaped already?

A bold thought flashed through Sandra’s mind, and he sank into deeper reflection.

Those cultists had probably known their secret was exposed long ago. After their ship of “sacrificial rites”, soaked in blood and evil, was captured by Captain Duncan, they truly had enough time to flee this place. But the key question was…

Would a bunch of fanatical cultists really abandon their “holy ground” out of fear?

Some of them might run for their lives. But based on Sandra’s many years of dealing with cultists, more of those crazed heretics would definitely stay behind, squeezing every vile and terrifying trick they had to fight the Churches to the death. Those madmen whose minds were completely rotted by blasphemous thoughts had never been stingy about sacrificing their own lives for their “faith”.

Tiny scraps of noise drifted into Sandra’s ears, like sharp but faint tinnitus. Along with the ringing came trembling shadows at the edges of his vision.

Sandra frowned, glancing down at the rail in front of him. Under the handrail, the metal was shining with iridescent colors. Oily “droplets” were forming in those colors and dripping one by one onto the deck.

Illusions—hallucinations and phantom sounds common in the border sea. But at the “depth” where the fleet now sailed, they were actually quite mild.

That, he knew, was thanks to the power of the giant flame lighthouse.

“Have the cathedrals on board light the incense and ring the prayer bells. Increase pressure in the steam pipes,” Sandra said, lifting his head to glance at the ghostly green flame in the distance. “Remind the other ships to watch their crews’ mental state.”

…

Commander Polly of the Rest looked down at her right hand in its black long glove. She slowly clenched her fist. When she opened it again, the few vague eyeballs that had appeared in her palm without warning were gone.

This priestess with the dark gold curls raised her head and muttered softly: “The world in front of us feels less and less real…”

“At present, everyone’s mind is still stable. Mild hallucinations can be overcome and recognized by reason,” said a lower-ranked priest beside Polly. “The Tide just sent word. Similar hallucinations are spreading on their side as well, but the level of corruption is still low.”

“Hallucinations that are clearly bizarre aren’t that frightening. What’s frightening are the things that look perfectly normal and fit our common sense,” Polly shook her head. “Or to put it another way… what’s frightening is when we feel everything around us is normal.”

“We are already deep inside the Veil. This is close to the furthest distance anyone has ever gone,” the lower priest said carefully. “In the past, even when the Deep Sea Church used a large number of mobile lighthouses and temporary cathedrals, they only managed to push six nautical miles into the Veil…”

Polly did not reply. She only looked out through the bridge windows at the distant mist. Through the haze, she saw a ghostly green flame rising into the sky, illuminating the whole sea, its image growing slightly larger in her vision.

After a while, she broke the silence in a low voice: “We’ve slowed down…”

…

Under Duncan’s order, the Guide Vessel, blazing like a giant Sacred beacon Torch, began to slow down and edged in alongside the Vanished.

The joint fleet following this “lighthouse” reacted at once, tightening their formation as they shifted into a more compact array.

At the raised platform on the stern, Vanna stood and looked over the gathered ships.

Frankly speaking, grouping into a dense formation in a dangerous sea where enemies might be lurking was not a good idea. It would probably make many true naval experts explode in sharp, whistling curses. But in this strange, deadly border, many things simply could not be done by “common sense”.

Compared to enemy fire from afar, the risk of getting lost in the thick fog after spreading out was clearly greater. And what worried them most was not a ship that got lost in the fog—but one that got lost and then came back.

But after this whole tense and cautious journey, the joint fleet had not run into any “gunfire” at all. The only thing with them was fog. Endless fog.

“Where did those cultists go?” Vanna could not help frowning and muttering under her breath.

Footsteps sounded from behind her. Duncan’s voice followed: “How likely do you think it is that they all ran? If they really wanted to flee, they’ve had more than enough time.”

“I don’t think that group of madmen would give up their holy ground so easily—even with you here in person, there will definitely be extremists ready to die with it,” Vanna shook her head. “Their words and deeds may be blasphemous and insane, but when it comes to ‘devotion’, I still have to admit it.”

“…According to what I can feel from that Guide Vessel, we should already be near the holy ground. Its desire to ‘go home’ points to this sea,” Duncan said slowly. He walked to the rail and looked at the strangely calm “silent sea” that existed only in the border waters. “Now I’m really curious how those Annihilators discovered this place and decided there was a ‘holy ground’ here worth settling in. I don’t see anything… Could it be that their blind faith really bought them some kind of ‘guidance’?”

As Duncan finished speaking, Vanna opened her mouth, ready to answer. But before she could say a word, a faint “thunk… thunk…” suddenly sounded from outside the hull, cutting off their conversation.

It sounded like something had drifted over and was bumping again and again against the side of the Vanished.

Duncan and Vanna shared a glance, then both strode quickly toward the source of the sound. Duncan leaned over the rail and looked down.

On the mirror-smooth sea, which had an oily sheen to it, a pitch-black shape was floating beside the hull of the Vanished. The border sea was calm and still, yet the thing on the surface bobbed up and down as if pushed by invisible waves, knocking softly against the wooden planking over and over. With each rise and fall, its outline became clearer before Duncan’s and Vanna’s eyes—

It was a pitch-black human shape.

The moment he saw it, Duncan’s gaze hardened. He lifted his hand and gestured in the air: “Get that thing on board.”

A streak of ghostly green fire flashed past. The burning Skeletal Roc dove from a nearby mast and skimmed low across the water. In almost the blink of an eye, it returned to the deck.

Soon, everyone aboard the Vanished had gathered after hearing the news.

The “human shape” Ai had hauled up lay motionless on the deck.

It was a black Humanoid Husk about one meter eighty tall. It only had the rough outline of a person. There were no facial features, no hair, not even details on the hands and feet. It looked… exactly like a “rough husk” of clay made halfway through pinching out a doll.

Several pairs of eyes turned to Duncan at the same time. Duncan examined the black-mud rough husk with a grave expression, then slowly nodded.

“…It really is the same kind of thing as those we saw in the Deep Sea beneath Frostholm.

“It’s a ‘mortal’ in a half-finished state… from the Abyssal Deep Holy Master’s Work of Creation.”

Chapter 708: Knock Knock

The “elements” Rough Husks that had once appeared in the Deep Sea beneath Frostholm now showed up in this border sea, near the “Holy Land” of the Annihilators. This fact gave off an eerie, terrifying air, but it was not all that surprising.

After all, the “Abyssal Lord” was the thread that tied all of this together.

Morris squatted beside the humanoid Rough Husk. He took out a slender metal sampling spike and carefully pushed it toward the thing’s arm. The spike met an outer layer that was extremely tough – obviously much tougher than the skin of humans, elves, or Senkin – yet still a bit elastic, like some kind of dense, heavy-duty rubber.

He pressed harder and broke through that tough “skin”. The sampling spike turned half a circle inside the humanoid Rough Husk’s arm, and when he pulled it out, it brought with it some black, sludge-like material.

It was the familiar black sludge, but it seemed to have lost its activity. There was no sign of wriggling or reshaping at all.

“I’m starting to feel a little sick…” Shirley frowned hard. Those filthy clumps of black sludge gave her goosebumps. She could not help thinking of the chilling things that had happened back in Frostholm – the replicas that had grown in the fog, the Elder Gods’ tentacles that had kept spreading upward from the Deep Sea, the living sludge surging through pipes and sewers…

Yet Dog, who stood beside her, seemed completely unfazed. The Abyssal Hound moved closer to the humanoid Rough Husk with curiosity, circling it and sniffing all around. It looked as if Dog had found something, even pausing now and then as if lost in thought.

Shirley stared at him with open disgust: “Dog, what are you doing? You don’t think this stuff is gross at all… hey, don’t rub your head on it…”

“Dog, did you discover something?” Vanna asked seriously from the side.

“It doesn’t count as a discovery. This is my first time seeing this thing with my own eyes. Before this I only heard the captain describe it…” Dog shook his head. “I just feel like its scent… is a bit familiar.”

Duncan raised his eyebrows at that: “A bit familiar?”

“…Smells like ‘home’,” Dog muttered. “But I’m not too sure… it’s very faint. It just feels kind of familiar.”

Duncan’s expression slowly grew more solemn, but he did not speak for the moment.

Back then, in the Deep Sea under Frostholm, he had found a great number of “elements” Rough Husks. To fully burn away the hidden danger beneath Frostholm and prevent the Elder Gods’ replicant from waking, he had set fire to the Elder God tentacle that served as the “pillar”. That fire had then ignited all the Rough Husks in that section of the Deep Sea as well. Because of that, he had brought no samples back from that place. So until today, Dog had never truly come into contact with this kind of “replicant half-finished product” made by the power of the Abyssal Lord.

And now, Dog smelled the scent of the Abyssal Deep Sea, from these “half-finished products”.

Duncan faintly felt there was some kind of “problem” hidden inside Dog’s discovery.

Lucretia noticed the change on Father's face and asked, a little worried: "Do you think something is wrong?"

Duncan's expression was serious: "Why do these humanoid Rough Husks carry the scent of the Abyssal Deep Sea?"

"Is that actually wrong?" Lucretia asked, puzzled. "All these things were born from the power of the Abyssal Lord. It seems normal that they carry the scent of the Abyssal Deep Sea…"

Duncan turned his head: "From the information we have so far, 'humans' were also created by the Abyssal Lord. So why has Dog never smelled 'home' on any human body?"

The area fell silent at once. Lucretia blinked and finally realized what kind of "problem" Father had sensed.

Her gaze fell on the Rough Husk lying on the deck, that featureless lump without a face, fingers, or toes. Her expression slowly grew more serious.

Duncan spoke softly, still deep in thought: "All mortal races are derivatives of the Abyssal Deep, and the Abyssal demons are also creations of the Abyssal Lord. We treat 'humans' and 'Abyssal demons' as the two ends of a scale. So these humanoid Rough Husks… are they closer to 'human', or closer to 'Abyssal demon'?"

"…I remember you said before that these clay-doll-like Rough Husks are probably the 'half-finished products' from when the Abyssal Lord first created the mortal races. Or you could say they are rough products processed according to some original blueprint. The Elder God tentacle in the Deep Sea under Frostholm was only a partial replica of the Abyssal Lord, so it could only produce this kind of Rough Husk. But if things went a step further, these Rough Husks might become real humans…"

Lucretia slowly spoke while recalling what Father had once told her about the Frostholm incident.

“And now Dog feels that these Rough Husks carry the scent of the Abyssal Deep Sea. Or in other words, he feels that these Rough Husks… are a lot like his own kind.”

“I never said that!” Dog muttered at once, but then he dropped down, sounding much less sure. “Uh, fine… they do feel a little bit like it…”

Shirley blinked, looked at Dog, then at the captain. Her gaze swept around them all, and she still looked confused: “What are you all talking about?”

Duncan glanced at the young lady, then raised his hand and pointed at the Rough Husk on the deck: “We’re talking about the point at which ‘humans’ first split away from Abyssal demons. Or, for these Abyssal demons that already have humanoid shapes, at what point they turn into ‘humans’.”

Shirley needed a moment. Then her eyes suddenly flew wide: “What the hell?!”

Duncan did not explain further. He only nodded lightly, then turned, ready to head back to the steering platform at the stern. They were already very close to the critical line at six nautical miles. Going farther required extra caution. He planned to move the Vanished forward just a little more to confirm the situation ahead.

But just as he was about to step away, a light knocking sound came from the outer side of the hull, cutting him off and breaking everyone’s train of thought.

Right after that, more knocking sounds reached all their ears.

Something was hitting the hull. At first there were only two or three impacts. Then more – a lot more.

Vanna’s face changed slightly. She strode to the edge of the deck in just a few steps and leaned over to look down at the sea.

Black Humanoid Husks, Rough Husks shaped as if molded from mud, bobbed all around. At a glance there were at least dozens, maybe hundreds, bumping again and again against the hull of the Vanished. They rose and sank on the calm sea as if pushed by unseen waves. Knock. Knock. Knock, knock…

What lay farther out was even more chilling.

Ahead of the Vanished, out across the distant water, more blurred shapes were slowly drifting in from the misty surface. Countless humanoid Rough Husks rolled and heaved like dead logs in the water. They drifted along in the same direction, one after another slamming into the side of the Vanished. Each impact gave off a dull thud, and then they rolled away, changing their drifting path and continuing on toward the rear, toward the Radiant Star…

On the foredeck of The Rest, Polly, a goddess-officiant in the black robes of the Death Church, stood at the rail. Dark gold curls framed her tense face as she stared down at the sea. Those humanoid Rough Husks drifting in from afar like blackened driftwood filled her vision with a chill, uncanny horror.

A junior priest stood at her side, looking very uneasy: “Bishop Polly, what exactly are these things?”

“They are things born from the power of the Abyssal Lord. They probably drifted here from that so-called ‘Holy Land’,” Polly said casually. At the same time, a voice was speaking in her mind, telling her details about these humanoid Rough Husks. That voice came from the Vanished, from the “Lady Agatha” who followed Captain Duncan in the form of a shadow: “Ignore them. These things are dead. As long as we don’t touch them on purpose, they will not threaten our ironclad ships.”

“Yes, Bishop.”

The junior priest bowed his head and withdrew, but he had barely been gone for long before he hurried back to Polly again.

“Bishop! The bottom of the ship – there are some down at the bottom too!”

“The bottom of the ship?!”

Polly rushed to the lower decks. There she heard the knocking sounds echoing almost through the entire lower hold.

The impacts came in a constant stream, as if from all directions at once. Countless hard objects were drifting in the water and striking the steel hull. The sound echoed through the compartments, dull and unsettling. Polly even felt a strange illusion.

It was like countless people were outside, each holding a sledgehammer, knocking on the hull on purpose and sending a rolling echo through the ship.

Images rose in her mind without her wanting them. She pictured countless faceless humanoid Rough Husks floating in the waters around The Rest, not only on the surface but underwater as well. Hundreds and thousands of Black Mud Homunculi clung to the ship’s underside, slamming against it again and again, clawing and scraping, trying to punch through the thick steel and sink this uninvited guest that had intruded on the Holy Land…

She shook her head hard and forced those “associations”, which might cause unpredictable trouble, back down. Then she turned to the technicians who had come down with her: “Will the hull be damaged?”

“At the current level of impact, the hull won’t suffer any damage,” the artificer answered at once. “These are just collisions. The force is no more than floating driftwood in the sea… but honestly, the sound is extremely disturbing. And ever since ‘those things’ started hitting the hull near the engine room, the steam engine has been making irregular noises while running…”

Polly’s eyes sharpened: “Have the machines been bewitched?”

“Not to a serious degree, but the machines do feel disturbed. I hope you can ask a priest from the Cathedral to come down and perform a calming mass for the boiler and the Sorting Engine.”

“Fine, I’ll notify the Cathedral and have them send someone,” Polly said at once.

Just as she finished speaking, a hoarse and blurry voice suddenly slipped into her mind. It blended with the constant knocking all around, wove through the echoes in the lower decks, as if it had condensed directly from the cold seawater outside the hull, then seeped into her heart.

“You… will become like them… just like we did…”

—

Chapter 709: Holy Land Island

On the deck of the Vanished, Vanna hurried over to Duncan: “The Tide just sent word. A large number of Humanoid Husks have drifted to their side too and are colliding with their hull. After the impacts, the Humanoid Husks linger and drift around them, as if pulled by an invisible current…”

“Not only that. Commander Orlando of The Rest also sent a message,” Agatha’s figure rose from the shadows beside Duncan. “Their ship is surrounded by floating Humanoid Husks… and something is gathering underwater, striking the bottom of the hull. The knocking is loud enough to be heard through almost the entire deck…”

She paused for a moment, as if listening to some far-off sound, then added: “Bishop Polly of The Rest says she heard whispered words near the engine room, probably coming from under the water – a voice spoke in her head: “‘You will become like them, just like we did.’”

Listening to these reports from the other main ships of the united fleet, Duncan frowned slightly. He paid special attention to the news from The Rest: “Is this mental corruption?”

“We can’t be sure yet. Bishop Polly is undergoing mental calibration in the Cathedral. For now, it looks like she really did hear some kind of ‘echo’ that haunts this sea region.”

“Any reports of ships being damaged?” Duncan thought for a moment, then asked another question.

“None so far,” Vanna said with a shake of her head. “Every impact is just those Humanoid Husks drifting with the current and knocking into the hulls. They pose no physical threat to ironclads… but some ships report that their steam engines and Sorting Engines are making strange noises, as if mildly corrupted. Overall the corruption is still light. After performing calming rituals, everything went back to normal.”

Duncan nodded with a grave expression. For a while he said nothing, only stared out at the distant sea.

Those pitch-black figures like driftwood still floated in from the thin mist at the “six-nautical-mile boundary”. They drifted in like countless drowned corpses sweeping into the fleet’s range. They looked lifeless, yet unseen forces drove them toward every ship, where they kept knocking at the hulls and hammering at the keels.

These unsettling sounds were creating mental pressure on every vessel.

But for Church elites who had gone through strict training, this level of mental strain should still be manageable. So Duncan was not too worried.

After a short moment of thought, he ordered the whole fleet to advance slowly again.

“We’re already very close to the six-nautical-mile boundary,” Lucretia could not help reminding Father from the side. “Are we really going farther in? Navigation methods don’t stay very accurate out here in the border seas. We need a safety buffer… otherwise we might accidentally cross the boundary.”

“We’re not going to cross the boundary,” Duncan said as he glanced at Lucretia. Part of his focus was still on sensing every part of the ship. “Don’t worry, Lucy. I have the most accurate enchanted sea chart in the world. It can mark the position and distance of the Vanished in the Boundless Sea in real time. If we still can’t see the ‘Holy Land’ at six nautical miles, I’ll stop.”

Lucretia opened her mouth, seeming like she still had something to say. But when she saw Duncan’s calm and confident smile, she swallowed the words again.

Duncan shifted a part of his “gaze” into the captain’s cabin.

He could clearly “see” the enchanted sea chart on the table. It was “running” as usual, slowly changing as the Vanished sailed on.

The mist on the enchanted sea chart was slowly thinning, and the track of the Vanished’s voyage appeared clearly along the chart’s edge. The ship was moving very slowly, so on the chart the shifts in position were almost too small to notice with the naked eye. But for Duncan, who could sense the entire ship with precision, even changes too tiny for the eye on the enchanted sea chart could not escape his awareness.

Out on the sea around the Vanished, more Humanoid Husks kept drifting in from afar. Their numbers even seemed to be growing.

Suddenly, Duncan noticed something appear at the edge of the enchanted sea chart.

Through the mist, an unrecorded “marker” appeared on the parchment scroll.

The instant he sensed the change on the enchanted sea chart, he raised his head and looked toward the direction of the Vanished’s bow.

In the depths of the fog, the blurry outline of land was slowly appearing.

Right on the six-nautical-mile boundary line.

“Land!” Nina thudded up the steps onto the platform at the stern. She stared wide-eyed at the growing shadows in the mist and shouted happily: “Land is showing up!”

Yes, land had appeared. And in this direction, there was no doubt that this land was the objective of the united fleet – the nest the Annihilators called their “Holy Land”.

The Church warships following behind the Vanished soon saw the outline of land as well. Once everyone realized that the “Holy Land” lay right at the edge of the six-nautical-mile limit, every nerve went taut.

At the stern of every Church warship, billows of white steam burst out from the tops of the shipboard Cathedrals. Consecrated oils were poured into the Holy Braziers. The seamen ran to their gun stations while quietly chanting the names of their Gods. Robed priests came out onto the decks. They poured holy water over the cannons, lit incense, and blessed the shells with prayers and divine blessings.

At the same time, more black Humanoid Husks kept drifting over from the direction of the “Holy Land”. Floating shapes still bumped into the hulls from time to time. The unsettling knocking never stopped, beating against the bottom of every ship, as if pounding on every heart.

A swirl of colorful paper scraps blew past as Lucretia appeared on the lookout platform at the top of the mast. She peered through the poor visibility toward the island appearing in the distance. After a while she returned to the deck and came back to Duncan’s side.

“I can see some lights on the island, but no signs of activity at all. The whole area feels smothered by a dead, lifeless air. Something feels wrong.”

Duncan listened to Lucretia’s report and only gave a small nod. Then he gestured to the side.

The plump White Dove swooped down from a nearby yardarm and almost slammed into his shoulder with a dull thump.

Duncan turned his head with a strange expression and looked at the dove on his shoulder: "…You should think about losing some weight."

AI tilted her head, then loudly declared her stance: "I only weigh fifty! I only weigh fifty!"

"…Forget I said anything." Duncan sighed. He ignored the noisy bird and gave her a silent order in his mind.

In the next instant, blazing flames burst from AI's body. She turned into a bony, skeletal dove and shot straight up into the sky.

Wrapped in fire, the bone dove streaked through the mist like a meteor flying in reverse, closing in on the dark island from above.

Back on the deck of the Vanished, Duncan narrowed his eyes slightly.

Through the shared vision inside the flames, an abstract, twisted, yet still recognizable bird's-eye view formed in his mind.

AI was quickly approaching the island's shore. From the view she sent back, Duncan saw the coastline, jagged and cruel as if something had torn the island out of a much larger whole. He also saw a narrow, hidden passage – a secret Harbor that would be hard to spot without viewing it from the air. Farther inland he could faintly make out roads and buildings of different heights. Many strange, sharp objects rose like stone spires across the island, spread over a large area, but their exact nature was impossible to tell.

Just as Lucretia had reported, there was no sign of activity on the island.

A vast united fleet. A blazing lighthouse of fire in the thick mist. A huge flaming monster-bird sweeping low over the Harbor. If all of that still failed to draw a reaction from the Annihilators on the island, then there was only one possibility.

“It seems there’s no one on the island – at least, no living people,” Duncan said as he kept sharing vision with AI and turned his head toward Lucretia.

Everyone on deck looked at each other.

“No living people on the island…” Vanna’s eyes widened a little. She glanced toward the land. “Did they all run? Or are they all dead? Or…”

She suddenly stopped. Her gaze swept the deck with a strange look before settling on the humanoid Rough Husk that still lay there quietly, guarded by Doll Lunie the warden.

“…Inform the people from the Deep Sea and the Death Church. We need to move closer to the island. Everyone is to stay together – no falling behind in the fog.”

Under Duncan’s order, the entire fleet began to close in on the jagged, twisted black island that gave off such an uneasy air.

The distant island grew clearer and, as the distance shrank, revealed more and more details that felt fundamentally “off”.

“Its edge looks like a fragment torn off from some much larger whole,” Duncan said, describing to the others what he saw from AI’s perspective. “We’re approaching the western coast. There are clusters of rock formations everywhere, but between the cliffs there’s a hidden waterway leading to an inner Harbor. The terrain there looks relatively flat.”

“Could a ship as big as the Vanished fit in there?” Nina asked curiously.

“It probably could, but I don’t plan to just sail straight in – and neither should the other ships,” Duncan said, thinking it through as he spoke. “We still don’t know the situation on the island. My idea is to have the fleet stop in front of that ‘gorge entrance’. Then we send a team ashore in small boats. Once we have a rough idea of the landing zone, we can send more people up.”

Everyone nodded in agreement.

Just then, Duncan seemed to sense something. He suddenly raised his head and looked forward.

He saw the large vessel ahead – the one they had seized from the cultists and used all along as the “spirit flame, the Sacred beacon Torch” – beginning to pick up speed.

It moved faster and faster, as if it had slipped its reins. Without any order from Duncan, it rushed straight toward the “Holy Land Island”.

It seemed to have lost all weight, light as a gust of wind.

In almost the blink of an eye, it swept across the misty sea and reached the cliff line at the edge of the island, where countless massive rocks jutted up like fangs.

Then it slammed into them without the slightest hesitation.

Chapter 710: “Not Right” Is Normal Here

Under everyone’s gaze, that large ship, wrapped in Ghost flames and blazing like the Sacred beacon Torch, sailed straight into the jagged cliff. Yet the explosion and thunderous impact everyone expected never came.

At the moment of impact, the ship seemed to melt. Its solid deck, hull, and keel turned into something like mud, flowed down, and slapped silently against the cliff. It looked less like a collision and more like a lump of sludge thrown against the rock face. Then the whole ship seemed to be absorbed by the island itself, fading away between those clustered, jagged stone spires.

The spirit form flames that had been burning on that ship a moment ago now burst against the island cliffs in a huge ring of fire. The green flame sea rippled along the shoreline, then spilled out after a brief delay, splashing into the water. It lit the mist-covered surface of the sea and slowly spread out in front of the joint fleet.

It all happened so suddenly that the Church fleet seemed not to have reacted yet to what had happened. But on the Vanished, Nina already stared wide-eyed and cried out: “That ship just killed itself?!”

Lucretia sounded stunned: “Dad, that ship… did it just break free of your command?”

Duncan did not answer. He only frowned, going over the vague sense that the ship had suddenly sent him just before it hit the cliff. After a long moment, he finally broke the silence and said thoughtfully: “No… it wasn’t in a runaway state.”

“It wasn’t in a runaway state?” Lucretia looked puzzled. “Then why did it suddenly crash into the cliff…”

“The order I gave it was ‘go home’—so it obeyed,” Duncan said slowly. “I just thought a ship’s ‘home’ meant the harbor where it usually docked and was serviced. But for that ship… its ‘home’ must have been this island itself.”

Lucretia still seemed to be thinking about his words, but Vanna and Morris, who had gone through the Frostholm incident before, were already starting to understand. Morris suddenly frowned and asked: “You mean that ship was…”

“Built from the island’s ‘material’,” Duncan said, his expression serious. “At least a large part of it was.”

The loss of the Guide Vessel was an accident, but it did not have much impact on the joint fleet. They had already found the location of the Holy Land Island, and the route was now marked on the enchanted sea chart. The ghostly green spirit form flames were burning quietly on the sea, keeping the surrounding mists suppressed. A short while later, the Radiant Star found the entrance to the “fjord” that AI had seen from the air.

For the priests of the Deep Sea and the Church of Death, the investigation of “Holy Land Island” still had to go ahead as planned, despite the accident.

Two small landing boats, one launched from the Tide and the other from the Rest, soon came alongside the Vanished. Each carried eleven marines and one armed priest, all waiting for Duncan’s orders.

On the Vanished, Duncan was deciding who would go ashore with him.

“Vanna, Morris, Alice, you’re coming ashore with me.” Duncan looked over the followers on the deck and quickly picked his people. Then his gaze fell on Shirley, who was trying hard to make herself invisible. “Shirley, you’re coming too.”

“I’m not good at exploring, and I’m nowhere near as well-read as Old Gentleman…”

“I know, but we need Dog’s abilities,” Duncan cut off her muttering. “It’s a Abyssal demon, and it’s good at sensing and tracking. On this ‘Holy Land Island’ that will be very useful.”

Shirley’s expression turned a bit strange as she listened. It took her a moment to realize… her main role here was basically to be Dog’s leash…

But Duncan did not pay attention to the odd look on her face. After deciding who would go ashore, he waved to the others and said: “The rest of you stay on the ship. This place is strange. If anything feels off on board or on the sea nearby, let me know at once.”

“You don’t need me to go with you?” Lucretia stepped forward. “I’m familiar with the border, and I have a lot of experience exploring strange islands…”

“I do, just not right now,” Duncan shook his head. He clearly already had a plan. “Go back to the Radiant Star and keep an eye on that ‘Saint’. It will be very useful later. I’ll scout the island first. If I find a suitable ‘place’, I’ll send AI to pick you up.”

Lucretia thought for a moment, then nodded: “I understand.”

Duncan nodded slightly and led the people he had chosen toward the edge of the deck.

Just then, a loud clattering noise suddenly came from not far away.

Duncan looked up toward the sound and saw a small boat, fixed to the mid-deck and covered with a tarp, banging and rocking on its supports.

It was the landing skiff carried by the Vanished.

In everyone's memory, that little boat's main uses were to have two ropes tied along the side so Alice could hang up laundry, or to let Shirley sneak into it for a nap when she did not want to do homework.

Duncan silently watched the rocking boat for two or three seconds before he said: "AI will take us to the island."

The small boat went still for a moment, then began to shake even harder, thumping its bow against the wooden frame that held it in place.

Duncan: "…"

"Captain," Alice finally came over and tugged on Duncan's sleeve, whispering by his ear: "Maybe we should take it with us… I feel like it's about to cry…"

Duncan gave Alice a strange look, then glanced at the landing skiff on the deck, which really did not look very happy. He felt the whole thing was absurd, but in the end he still sighed helplessly: "Fine. We'll go ashore in the small boat too…"

As soon as he finished speaking, the little boat on the deck snapped free of the ropes and hooks holding it. The crane on the side of the deck creaked to life, lifted the skiff from its wooden supports, and lowered it into the recess along the middle deck.

The whole movement flowed smoothly, as if it was afraid the captain might change his mind.

Duncan: "…"

In any case, with the landing skiff launched from the Vanished, there were now three small boats leaving the joint fleet. They followed the giant rocky cliffs along the edge of “Holy Land Island”, found the hidden entrance that led toward the island’s interior, and began to move inside.

After they passed through the “fjord gate” that looked like the open jaws of some huge beast, they saw tall, twisted clusters of stone pillars on both sides, a wide, calm dark-blue waterway, and mist still hanging in every direction.

The three small boats moved forward carefully through the fog. In the hazy mist, they could just make out vague shapes of harbor facilities on the shore ahead. A few lights, almost like illusions, glowed quietly in the fog, like cold, murky eyes floating in the air.

The boat carrying Duncan and the others did not need a helmsman and could sail on its own, while the landing boats from the Tide and the Rest were driven by small steam cores. The sound of the steam cores at work broke the stillness of the fjord. The splashing of the three boats cutting through the water echoed off the cliffs on both sides and blended into a single, blurry noise.

Vanna suddenly frowned.

She turned to look at the captain, only to see that he was also frowning, staring toward some point in the fog. Behind and to the side of the landing skiff, the two steam launches from the Tide and the Rest seemed to have sensed something as well and were starting to slow down.

The mingled echoes in the fjord slowly grew weaker.

Vanna tilted her head, listening carefully, and asked quietly: “Do you hear it?”

Shirley had not noticed any anomaly, but she could feel the change in the air around them. She twisted her head nervously and asked: “H-hear what?”

The faint scrape of chain came from the shadows as Dog slowly raised its head: “There’s the sound of a fourth boat… in the fog, moving forward with us.”

Shirley’s face changed a little. She lowered her voice: “What the heck?”

Duncan said nothing. He only lifted his hand, signaling them to keep going.

The sound of the propellers driven by machines rose again, and the blurred noise returned to the fjord. In that humming, rumbling, and splashing, even Shirley heard the “fourth boat”.

This time the sound was even clearer than before. Shirley could even pick out a rumble in it that was like a steam engine, only deeper, along with the splash of a bow cutting through the waves.

She stared wide-eyed, trying to find where the sound was coming from, but all the noise blended with the echoes in the fjord. It rumbled all around them, impossible to place.

She could only be sure that there really was a fourth boat, hidden in the fog around them, very close. At times… it even felt as if it was right beside them.

It seemed that Morris had suddenly picked something out. He stared hard at the misty water, then took a strange device from inside his coat, something shaped like a lens, and looked in that direction through it.

A hazy shadow appeared in the lens, like an abstract, unreal boat.

But in the next second, the phantom in the fog was washed over by a layer of eerie green. Imaginary spirit form flames swallowed it in an instant and then vanished just as fast.

The sound of the fourth boat disappeared.

Alice stared in confusion at the brief flash of fire in the fog, then looked up at Duncan: “Captain, what was that?”

“I don’t know,” Duncan shook his head. “Maybe something in the fog was trying to ‘imitate’ us, or maybe it was just an illusion born from the special environment here… Either way, it’s not a big problem. Being ‘not right’ is just part of daily life on the border.”

Alice gave a little “oh” as if she half understood, then turned her head to look at the water in front of the boat.

“Ah, we’re here.”

As the doll spoke, the harbor that had been hazy in the mist suddenly came into clear view.

The three boats came to the dock.

Chapter 711: Vanna’s “Reputation”

In the drifting mist, the three small boats slipped in without a sound and stopped at the end of a gentle ramp in a corner of the harbor.

Duncan was the first to step onto the eerie little island that the Annihilators called the “Holy Land”.

All around was silent. The drifting mist carried a chill. Inside the harbor, man-made structures stood at different heights, blurred by the fog. The outlines of the buildings seemed to merge with the terrain in the distance. A few dim yellow lights shone through the far-off mist, but they did nothing to make anyone feel at ease.

“There’s no sound at all…” Shirley felt the cold hanging in the mist. She hugged her arms and rubbed them as she looked around and muttered: “Dog, can you smell any ‘people’?”

“No smell of the living. Just a faint scent of the dead, mixed into a heavy Abyssal Deep aura,” Dog muttered. It carefully felt out the area around them, blood-red light flickering in its empty eye sockets. “…It feels more and more like ‘home’. Not only the aura, even the ‘atmosphere’… is a bit similar.”

It lifted its head and stared with its hollow eyes toward the island’s interior, hidden in the fog, sounding a bit confused: “A lot of things here feel like my ‘home’, but… not quite. I can’t put the feeling into words.”

“So this is what your home is like, Dog?” Shirley’s focus was clearly elsewhere. “No wonder you said the Abyssal demons back home spend their time biting each other or gnawing on rocks. Your living conditions are awful…”

“I don’t like the feel of this place,” Vanna said, frowning hard as she kept watch on the surroundings. “It keeps reminding me of Frostholm back then…”

Shirley waved a hand: “Fog, silent streets, writhing mud, and elements replicants suddenly popping out, right? We all get it…”

Duncan paid no mind to the chatter around him. After he confirmed there was not a single living person nearby, he waved to the marines who were disembarking from the two other boats, signaling everyone to follow. Then he started toward the dim yellow lights glowing in the fog.

The air around them felt eerie and unsettling, keeping everyone on high alert. Before this, they had all imagined what kinds of dangers might hide in the nest that Annihilators called the “Holy Land”. They had imagined thousands of armed, fanatical cultists, countless traps and flesh-and-blood monsters built by demon worshippers, even a powerful fleet secretly forged by the Cult of Annihilation that would ambush the expedition in this mist…

But a “ghost island” with no trace of living people had not been in any of those plans.

Vanna reached back and took down her alloy greatsword, gripping it tightly. This time they had plenty of time to prepare for the expedition, so she did not have to make do with a greatsword of frozen ice like she had in those rushed fights before.

Having her familiar “battle partner” in hand made her feel a little more at ease.

Footsteps approached. A young lady in fitted armor similar in style to Vanna’s, with a greatsword strapped to her back, walked over.

Vanna remembered that she was the leading priest sent down from the Tide, the one in charge of those eleven marines.

Under Vanna's curious and slightly puzzled gaze, the young priest of the Goddess with the greatsword on her back came up beside her and said quietly, a little excited: "You're Lady Vanna Wayne, right? The legendary Inquisitor from Pland, the strongest in history…"

"…Legendary Inquisitor? I didn't know I'd picked up that title," Vanna frowned, looking a bit embarrassed. "But yes, I am Vanna Wayne. What do you need from me?"

"I…I'm Amber," the priest of the Goddess said quickly. "I've heard many of your deeds… like how you leaped off a cliff to slay the Eldritch God spawn that invaded the city-state. How you jumped from the roof of the Cathedral to cut down the cultist trying to destroy it. And how you jumped from the sea-cliff lighthouse…"

Before Amber could finish, Vanna already felt she could not take it anymore. She waved her hand quickly: "Stop. I don't have that many 'leap down and slay' records. Legends always exaggerate."

"You're… you're very humble," Amber said with a smile. She then pointed at the greatsword on her back. It was already much larger than the standard steel swords most Deep Sea priests used, yet it was still far smaller than the alloy greatsword in Vanna's hand. "I'm trying to learn your fighting style too. My mentor says it's the oldest, yet most practical, killing technique in Storm Swordsmanship… Of course, I'm still far from your level…"

Vanna opened her mouth and managed to squeeze out: "Ah, well… keep it up."

"I'm still working hard," Amber nodded vigorously. Then she hesitated and asked: "But… how can I get power like yours? I've heard so many of your battle stories… Do you have some special training method?”

Vanna’s expression grew even more awkward. She glanced toward Duncan without thinking, but saw that the captain had no intention of stepping in. After holding it in for a few seconds, she finally blurted out: “Eat more meat.”

Amber: “…Huh?”

“And drink more hot water, go to bed early, get up early, keep a regular schedule,” Vanna added, as if even she felt her answer was not very convincing.

Amber’s expression slowly shifted into something one “huh?” could no longer cover—it was more like blank shock: “Th-that’s… all it takes?”

“Yes. And remember to pray every day. Tell the Goddess your doubts and confusion. Don’t carry that pressure and hesitation over to the next day,” Vanna nodded. “And last, the most important thing—”

Amber’s expression changed at last. She became very serious at once: “The most important thing?”

Vanna thought for a moment, then looked at the junior in front of her with a very serious face and said earnestly: “Don’t make random vows when you have nothing better to do. And if you’ve already sworn one, don’t add more to it just because you’re fired up. You’ll trap yourself.”

Amber’s face went blank again: “…Huh?”

But Vanna had already walked away. Leaving the junior who embarrassed her behind, she took a few quick steps to catch up to Duncan, head down.

But Duncan had been listening to the talk behind him the whole time. When he saw Vanna walk up, he finally smiled and said: “Sounds like you’re very popular among your own people—even though you've officially stepped down as an Inquisitor and left the public eye."

"…I run into this sometimes. It happened even more back in the city-state," Vanna said with her head down. In front of the captain, she could finally complain a little about these "little troubles not worth mentioning to outsiders". "And no matter how many times it happens, I never get used to it."

Morris took a pipe from his pocket and held it between his teeth without lighting it. After hearing this, he muttered: "And I don't know why, but the ones chasing after her are always young ladies…"

Duncan immediately gave the Inquisitor beside him a very odd look, only to see her wearing a deadpan, hopeless expression: "…Please don't look at me like that… I don't know why either…"

What could Duncan say to that? Right now he only felt that it was a miracle this beautiful maiden warrior could still have a normal friend like Heidi… Maybe it had something to do with Heidi being a science student?

In any case, it had little to do with him. It was just interesting to see that the usually calm and reliable Vanna also had such a flustered, awkward side.

Just then, on the other side of the group, Shirley suddenly seemed to trip on something and stumbled forward: "Whoa, what the—"

Dog reacted at once, jerking its neck back and yanking on the chain to stop Shirley from pitching forward: "What happened?!"

Shirley steadied herself and turned back, grumbling: "What kind of lousy road is this? Something just tripped me up and I—"

She stopped mid-sentence. Her eyes widened at the spot where she had almost tripped, and the rest of her words turned into a short yelp: "What?!"

Several gazes instantly followed her line of sight.

Duncan also saw what had almost tripped Shirley—it was an arm.

Strictly speaking, it was an arm “set” into the road, fused with the surface around it, a pitch-black “arm” that looked as if it was made from hardened sludge!

Duncan’s eyes narrowed at once. He strode quickly to the black arm.

It was a bent upper arm, elbow, and forearm. Its black, muddy texture blended completely with the road around it, as if it had grown straight up out of the ground.

It was hard not to imagine that beneath the surface of the road, hidden from sight, there might be a whole body connected to that arm.

Almost at the same moment, Amber, the Deep Sea priest of the Goddess walking not far away, spotted something in the fog and called out: “There’s one here too!”

Amber had found a section of torso sticking up from the road, attached to a damaged head and an arm that seemed to be straining forward. The arm and head looked just like the humanoid rough husks the joint fleet had seen floating on the sea near Holy Land Island—black as sludge and lacking clear details in their limbs and facial features.

But its pose was enough to make one picture the horrors of that “humanoid rough husk” struggling to drag itself out of some devouring substance.

Duncan stared grimly at the body “set” into the road. A scene rose in his mind. The ground had softened like mud. The owner of this body had been swallowed by the road beneath his feet. His body had melted like slurry into another mass of mud. His desperate struggle had only delayed death for a moment. Then, after that short and useless effort, he had been left here forever…

But what Shirley and Amber had found was only the beginning.

Within half a minute, as the marines widened their search, they found more human bodies… all fused into the surroundings.

They were everywhere in the fog, dense and countless.

Chapter 712: Peeking at the Truth

They were everywhere.

After the landing party left the shallow shore and walked some distance toward the interior of the Holy Isle, that hair-raising scene finally appeared before everyone’s eyes.

Humanoid Husks that looked as if they were made of pitch-black sludge could be seen everywhere. It was as if the environment around them had swallowed them and “embedded” them into all kinds of places—the ground, the walls, the boulders along the road, even the tree trunks. They had completely merged with whatever had devoured them, and now stood frozen on this Holy Isle that no longer held any living people, like countless strange and frightening sculptures. Every “sculpture” showed a posture of struggle that told everyone one simple fact—

They had once been alive.

Shirley felt her scalp crawl. Those black human shapes that could appear at any time out of the fog, half fused into walls or the ground, made goosebumps run all over her body. She hugged her arms and followed carefully at Duncan’s side, trying her best to avoid the limbs or heads that strained upward from the road as she muttered: “Those cultists… are they all dead? All dead here? Then those things we saw on the sea when we came over—were those them too? Don’t tell me the whole Cult of Annihilation ended up like this?”

“The Annihilators in other parts of the world are still active. They’ve infiltrated countless city-states. They won’t be wiped out that easily,” Vanna said, frowning as she watched their surroundings. “But at the very least, there should be no Annihilators still alive in this ‘sanctuary’… This fanatical dark Cult has finally taken a serious blow. That is at least some good news.”

“Good news, but not very relaxing,” Morris said carefully. “The key problem now isn’t how many Annihilators died here, but how they died, and how they ended up like this…”

Morris paused and looked up, letting his gaze sweep across the blurry buildings in the fog. “This is the ‘sanctuary’ they have run for who knows how many years. They treated this place as a safe harbor to hide from the Church’s pursuit. They even built a town and the Harbor here. That means this little border island was always a safe and stable place… at least, it was until the island started to devour them.”

“Devour…” Shirley repeated the word the Old Scholar had used, then suddenly tensed. She stared at the ground beneath her feet. “This place isn’t going to ‘eat’ us too, right?! What if the ground suddenly sinks and we turn into things like those…”

She was clearly not the only one worried about that. Tension was also building among the assault squad members. Even though everyone here was an elite of the Church, and “professionals” trained to handle all kinds of anomalies along the border seas, it was still hard not to feel nervous in the face of the strange situation on the Holy Isle.

But just as Duncan was about to say something, Alice, walking beside him, spoke first: “It won’t.”

Shirley did not realize at first that the doll was answering her question. “Huh?”

“It won’t devour us,” Alice said casually, as if it were nothing. “Because the Restoration Protocol has already ended. This place has settled down again.”

The group suddenly stopped.

Duncan realized something. He stared into Alice’s eyes and asked: “Did you ‘see’ something again?”

Alice stopped a beat after everyone else. When she heard the captain’s words, she showed a blank, confused expression. “Huh?”

Shirley spoke up right away: “The Restoration Protocol has ended. You just said that.”

“…What Restoration Protocol? I didn’t say anything just now…” Alice scratched her hair. Her confusion did not look fake at all (and of course, she could not pull off that level of acting anyway). “Why are you all looking at me?”

Duncan stared at Alice for a while longer. He knew this doll never lied to him, so at last he only nodded slowly and quickly exchanged a look with Morris and Vanna.

“There are no extra mental signatures nearby,” Morris said.

“We keep going,” Duncan said with a nod. He led the group deeper into the island. At the same time, he silently moved a little closer to Alice, ready to watch the doll at any moment.

The landing party soon walked along the main street of the small Harbor. After they passed through a patch of thick white fog, they came out into an open square.

Vanna frowned as she looked around. “It’s hard to imagine that those cultists could build a place like this. I wonder how long it took them to make all of this.”

All across the square they could still see black humanoid Rough Husks “embedded” into the ground and fused with the things around them.

Judging from the poses of those half-exposed bodies and where they lay, it seemed that when some event occurred, these people still had a last few minutes—or a dozen minutes—to run for their lives. They had sprinted from the island’s interior toward the open sea. Every “body” on the square faced the coast. Some of them even seemed to have tried using spells to save themselves. The ground around some Rough Husks showed scars of acid and explosions. It looked as if they had still been alive in the first moments of being devoured, and had tried to gouge themselves free with brutal, desperate means—but it had done nothing at all.

They had all become these chilling black “sculptures” on the square. This process of “transformation” might have been the direct cause of their deaths.

Duncan walked slowly between the eerie black “sculptures”.

All of a sudden, he stopped. His gaze fell on one of the Rough Husks.

Vanna noticed at once. “Captain?”

“This one moved just now.” Duncan walked up to the Rough Husk whose upper body alone stuck up above the ground. He stared at it and spoke in a low voice.

Right under his eyes, the pitch-black figure shifted a little again. Its head slowly, stiffly lifted, and its arm stretched forward little by little.

It moved very, very slowly. If one was not staring straight at it, it was almost impossible to see it move at all.

It was still slowly “running away” toward the coast.

Shirley felt all the hair on her body stand up.

She suddenly had the feeling that the other Rough Husks around them were moving too. She felt they were all still alive, all slowly struggling and crawling toward the shore. She felt that their featureless round heads were all turning toward her, and that countless invisible gazes were landing on her at once.

Her heart pounded wildly. The tension that had been building in her ever since they landed felt like it was soaking into every blood vessel. She felt a sharp, stabbing pain in the arm that connected her to Dog. It reminded her of when she had just formed the symbiotic pact with Dog and her body was still not used to it. She had not felt this pain in many years.

Out of the corner of her eye, she saw chains.

Countless chains stretched out from the Rough Husks that the ground had swallowed. They grew slowly in the empty air, as if they wanted to wrap around her, or around Dog. Shirley could barely tell the difference between herself and Dog anymore. She felt her thoughts tangling together with Dog's. She felt as if she had also become an "individual" similar to Dog, and Dog… Dog's humanity and wisdom were slowly shedding away into something else…

"…We dug too deep…"

A voice that sounded like countless throats speaking on top of one another drilled into Shirley's head. It rumbled as if trying to bore a hole in her memories.

Countless phantom chains spread in from every side of the Holy Isle and quietly latched onto her and Dog.

"…We dug down to the source…"

Shirley slowly lifted her head. Dazed yet driven by instinct, she looked toward a certain direction in the interior of the Holy Isle, as if something over there strongly drew her gaze.

“…We are the same as them… The source revealed a truth to us…”

Countless stormlike fragments poured into Shirley’s mind. Within the flashing, chaotic shards of light and shadow, strange “impressions” swept across her memory—the extinguished Sun, murky daylight, the howling and booming in the fog, ecstatic believers, guidance, revelation, digging, a holy cavern, a secret chamber, blinding lights, alarms, writhing Shadows, and then… the Holy Isle suddenly coming to life.

This island was alive.

They had dug up something they never should have touched—at the moment when the Sun went out.

Those layered voices still roared in Shirley’s mind. A “truth”—a truth that had instantly corrupted all the Annihilators on the Holy Isle and transformed them into Rough Husks—was being poured into her consciousness bit by bit—

“…Humans are a kind of Abyssal Demon that has been highly differentiated. Abyssal Demons are the original molds that were contained in the Abyssal Deep Sea, because humanity and wisdom could not be poured into them…”

Shirley’s eyes slowly widened.

Through the shared sight between her and Dog, she saw this world clearly for the first time.

But she only saw it for an instant.

In the moment when her humanity and reason were about to fall apart, she felt a warm flame light up inside her soul. The dark wriggling things in front of her and the flood of incomprehensible information suddenly shrank and collapsed into nothing but a small island in the fog. Then she felt a rough, big hand gently press down on her hair.

She and Dog jerked awake at the same time. Instinctively, they both backed away, wanting to get far from the countless Rough Husks here.

She tripped on a chain under her foot and fell backward in a mess.

But the captain caught her thin arm.

“Looks like you saw something,” Duncan said. He felt the feedback from the flame mark and only spoke gently after he was sure Shirley’s sanity was slowly stabilizing. “What did you see?”

“This island is alive!” Shirley finally came fully to her senses. Her eyes flew wide. “We’re standing on a piece of the Abyssal Lord’s flesh!”

Chapter 713: Shirley Still in Shock

“This island… the whole island was a part of an Elder God. Everything on the island… the stones, the soil, those things that only look like trees, all of it was the same thing…

“The Annihilators who lived on this island used its stuff to build houses and make ships. They ate the things that grew out of this soil. Day after day they held rituals and summoned Demons… tying themselves to the whole island…

“There really aren’t any living people left on the island. Everyone got eaten by ‘it’, by this island… Those idiots… those stupid cultists touched something deep inside the island and woke it up…”

Shirley sat on the ground at the edge of the square with her knees in her arms, speaking in broken bits about the things she had just seen. The fright had not left her. Fear still weighed deep in her mind. The shock of briefly peeking at the “Truth” had put heavy pressure on her sanity. Even though the captain had pulled her out at the last moment, her head still buzzed, and many fuzzy “memories” still poked around in her thoughts.

Dog sat by Shirley’s side. With its grim, terrifying skeletal body, it gently rubbed against her thigh, trying to comfort her shaken heart in its own way. It helped at least a little. Shirley was slowly recovering.

Duncan sat beside Shirley as well. He shielded her mind so those corruption-laden pieces of knowledge would not affect her, and at the same time he asked with interest: “They touched something deep inside the island? What exactly did they do?”

Shirley hesitated and searched through her messy memories. Too much information had flooded into her head all at once just now. It came from the “memories” left inside this living island. She had had no time to sort it, think about it, or even understand it. Now those chaotic memories slowly rolled up again from the depths of her mind, and some useful fragments finally became clear.

“They… they dug too deep.”

“Dug too deep?” Morris frowned at once. “What were they digging?”

“At the center of the island, there was a passage leading underground…” Shirley frowned tightly as she finally pulled out some more useful fragments. “It was when the Sun went out…!”

“When the Sun went out?” Morris’s eyes changed at once. He repeated the words and, almost without thinking, exchanged a look with Vanna and the captain.

Shirley suddenly seemed more alert. She matched the voice she had “heard” with the messy images she had seen, then spoke quickly: “Yeah, that time! After the Sun went out, there was still daylight over the Holy Isle. The cultists on the island all stayed ‘awake’… Then it was like they got some kind of revelation, and they started digging in the center of the island. There was already a cavern there, with black rock deep inside. They went crazy digging downward and found a secret chamber, but the chamber was sealed…”

Shirley paused. Her tone became less sure. “They wanted to get into the chamber, but it seems they never had time to break it, or even touch that big door, before something happened…”

Amber walked over from the side. This young priestess of the Deep Sea Goddess was extremely interested in what Shirley was saying. “So the cultists on the island were all killed because they triggered the defense mechanism of this ‘living island’?”

Shirley blinked. She was about to nod, but then felt she had forgotten something very important. She hesitated, then shook her head.

“…No. They weren’t killed by a ‘defense mechanism’…” She slowly recalled and bit by bit understood the “information” that still circled in her mind. After a few minutes of sorting and thinking, she finally understood that “truth”. “They were killed by a… ‘piece of knowledge’…”

Her words had barely fallen when Morris reacted at once beside her: “Don’t say it.”

Almost at the same time, Amber had already pulled out the storm Goddess’s charm amulet from her clothes and used its sharp end to pierce her own palm. The silent death priest who led the group took out the consecrated ash casket of divine blessing. The more than twenty assault squad members all hurried to shield themselves with charm amulets and sacred relics.

Morris cast several layers of mental wards on himself in an instant. He then wrapped Rahm’s charm amulet and a colorful rune bead bracelet around his wrist. Only then did he let out a breath and nod to Shirley. “You can talk now.”

Shirley was startled by the scene around her. She asked without thinking: “…Is all that really necessary?”

“Yes,” Vanna said seriously as she looked at Shirley. “Because this is a ‘piece of knowledge’ that instantly killed all the Annihilators on the entire island. From what you described, it is tied to the rituals they carried out for years, but this knowledge could still be dangerous.”

Morris added from the side: “Normally, if an investigator happens to gain hidden knowledge and survives it, the safest and most professional thing to do is to copy the content onto parchment sheets using ‘Sacred Cipher’ that has received the Four Gods’ divine blessing. That way you can weaken and filter out the corruption carried by the information. Do you know Sacred Cipher?”

Shirley thought for a moment, then shook her head honestly. “…No. I don’t.”

Morris spread his hands. “That’s fine. You can tell us now.”

Shirley scratched her cheek. That little break had actually relaxed her tense nerves a bit. After she took a moment to put her thoughts in order, she repeated the words she had “heard” just now—

“Humans are a kind of Abyssal Demon that has been highly differentiated. Abyssal Demons are the original molds that were contained in the Abyssal Deep Sea, because humanity and wisdom could not be poured into them.”

The square stayed quiet for a few seconds.

Alice was the first to break the silence. She blinked and looked at Shirley. “…That’s it?”

“That’s it,” Shirley said with a nod. “Just that one sentence… but after those cultists learned this ‘truth’, they almost instantly turned into these… disgusting, terrifying things.”

Shirley half understood what she was saying, and Alice half understood what she was hearing. But beside them, a thoughtful and knowing look slowly appeared on Duncan’s face.

He slowly stood up, muttering as he thought: “That’s not just one sentence… That sentence explains a lot.”

Amber lowered her head and traced Gamona's Holy Emblem on her chest with her fingers. "Goddess have mercy…"

Morris's mouth twitched. "…Humans are a type of Abyssal Demon. Even in the Cult of Annihilation's theories, that sounds a bit too extreme."

"This isn't the first time we've run into this kind of 'extreme' information," Vanna said, shaking her head with a strange look. "Not since we first got The Blasphemous Tome." She lifted her head and looked around at the assault squad members sent down from the Tide and the Rest.

There was surprise, deep thought, and confusion on their faces—but no one seemed shaken.

This was a unit that specialized in handling border affairs. Strong will and stable minds were basic traits. Given how things really were out on the border seas, "keeping your cool in the face of unbelievable information and knowledge" was probably already carved into their bones.

"No wonder those 'Humanoid Husks' floating on the sea reeked of Abyssal Demons…" Amber said suddenly, lost in thought. "I've heard the rumor that the Abyssal Lord created all living things during the Third Long Night, but I never thought of understanding the tie between humans and Abyssal Demons from this angle… If this is true, it really could explain the Annihilators' summoning ability, and how their symbiotic pacts with Abyssal Demons work…"

As she spoke, her gaze could not help drifting to Dog, who was still lying by Shirley's legs.

Dog noticed Amber's look at once and raised its head. "Don't look at me. My situation with Shirley isn't the same as those cultists—and I'm not like my brainless relatives either. I'll have you know I've at least completed the great circle of a high school education. I might even be half a step into a City-State University…”

Shirley was left staring by Dog’s last two lines. “…Dog, what are you talking about?”

Dog muttered under its breath: “I don’t know either. The captain taught me…”

Amber opened her mouth, wearing a complicated expression. “Even though I heard about it before, I still wouldn’t have believed there were Abyssal Demons with ‘hearts’ in this world if I hadn’t seen it with my own eyes… Sorry. I didn’t mean anything by that.”

Dog grumbled: “You’d better not. I’m with the captain…”

Duncan did not pay attention to Dog’s muttering. After confirming that Shirley was stable, he broke the silence. “We can talk about the link between humans and Demons later. For now, we need to think about our next move.”

As he spoke, he turned his head and looked toward the direction in the island’s interior that Shirley had pointed to earlier.

“Shirley, do you still remember the exact place where they were digging?”

“Yeah,” Shirley nodded at once, again and again. “I remember that part pretty clearly. I even know the way.”

“Then our next target is the ‘secret chamber’ those cultists dug out,” Duncan said. His gaze soon shifted to Amber and the other assault squad members. “But there’s a problem—are you going to come with us any farther? The area ahead may not be as gentle as the Harbor district.”

“…Captain, we’re not canaries that need protecting,” Amber said, her expression turning serious. “We’ve always dealt with the ‘strange things’ along the border, including many dangerous and bizarre existences like this island. We have our own experience and methods."

Duncan looked at her serious face and stayed silent for a few seconds. At last he slowly nodded.

"All right. Then we keep going deeper."

Chapter 714:

As they went deeper into the interior of Sanctum Isle, the surroundings grew quieter and quieter. The wind no longer sounded. No birds chirped, and no streams murmured. A strange silence gathered in the mist and hung over the team.

Yet this extreme quiet only made everyone more uneasy. When all the sounds that should have belonged to nature faded away, the idea that “this island is alive” began to take over, out of control. Shirley kept feeling as if eyes were resting on her from within the fog. It felt as if the island itself was watching and judging the uninvited guests who had broken into this place. Even the mist that slowly drifted around the group seemed to take on the taste of a “watcher”.

The team still moved forward, heading toward the “dig site” that had appeared in Shirley’s mind.

After they left the Harbor district, a not-so-wide path led toward the center of the isle. It seemed to be a road the cultists had opened up long ago. It lay between two pitch-black rock walls. There were no signs along the way. At the base of the rock walls on both sides of the path, they sometimes saw black stones that looked like clusters of crystals.

Duncan’s gaze was drawn to those black “stone clusters”. These clusters were not rare on the island. On the cliffs on the west side of the isle, stones like these, even larger in scale, “grew” almost everywhere. They looked like some strange “plant” that had pushed its way out of the ground and rock face. It made people very curious how they had formed.

Even with Morris's learning, he could not explain these stone clusters from a simple geological angle. But since the whole island was, as Shirley said, "alive", it did not seem strange for such odd things to appear here.

Maybe these twisted stones really had "grown" from the island, like some kind of secretion from Elder Gods.

Under Amber's command, several marines in the squad carefully collected samples from those clusters. They also scraped a lot of dark, powdery material from the nearby rock walls. They stored these Sanctum Isle samples with great care in metal tubes that had received a divine blessing, and several specific people in the team each carried some.

All along the way, they kept doing the same sort of thing. They worked together smoothly and seemed very practiced. It almost did not slow the team's progress at all. It was clear this was not their first time doing it.

"Any Boundary Samples might come in handy. Some of them have incredible practical properties. Some can help us uncover the secrets of the world and deepen our understanding of supernatural power," Amber explained to Duncan. "Many people think the Boundary is a place where there is nothing, that it holds nothing but fog and seawater. But actually… shapes from the Mortal Realm often appear in the mist, and every year we have to handle almost double-digit 'entity incidents'…"

She paused for a moment, then added: "Lady Lucretia should know this very well. She often works with the Church in the field of boundary exploration…"

"I've heard her mention it," Duncan nodded calmly. "She said this is the main source of income for the Radiant Star when it operates in the Boundary. Truth Academy is the most generous buyer when it comes to Boundary Samples. Flamebearer is always the slowest payer. The Deep Sea Church has a good reputation in these deals, but its 'receiving' standards are very strict. Sometimes their whole review and registration process ends up even slower than Flamebearer."

Amber looked a little embarrassed: "…Not every Church is as rich as Truth Academy. They can buy a dozen city-states just on the licensing of their steam-core reactor boiler technology, while we still have to think about our yearly budget."

Duncan said: "…That is a very Mortal Realm kind of reason."

"Do you feel… like it's colder than before?" Shirley suddenly broke the silence. She hugged her arms, rubbing them as she muttered: "I keep feeling wind blowing over. My arms are almost frozen stiff…"

"Cold?" Vanna frowned at that. "I don't really feel it… but the fog is thicker than before. The road ahead is getting harder to see… hmm?"

Vanna suddenly stopped. Her gaze locked onto Shirley's arm: "Shirley, the chain on your arm…"

Shirley froze for a second. She lifted her arm, confused: "Huh? What about the chain?"

The rattling of iron links echoed in the mist. The pitch-black Barbed Chain connected her arm to Dog's cervical spine, just like always.

Vanna's brows knitted tight. She stared hard at the black chain on Shirley's arm, then shook her head a little, unsure: "…It's back to normal again… but just now, for a moment, I thought I saw the chain on your arm broken."

"What?!" Shirley's eyes went wide at once. Even her voice sounded flustered. "Hey… don't scare me! Did you really see that?!"

As she spoke, she quickly lifted her arm and yanked the chain, dragging Dog right in front of her. She held his huge skull close: "Dog, did you feel anything?"

“No…” Dog was rattled too by Vanna’s words. “She must have seen it wrong…”

But Vanna still kept her brows furrowed. She knew very well that what she had caught in that brief daze was hard to believe, but her Inquisitor training pushed her into full alert almost at once: “Shirley, Dog, you really didn’t feel anything strange?”

Shirley and Dog answered in unison: “Nothing at all.”

“Let me take a look.” Duncan strode over, grabbed the black chain between Shirley and Dog, and lifted it up to examine it closely.

Shirley watched nervously from the side. Only after a long time did she finally gather the courage to ask: “Is… is there anything wrong with it?”

A wisp of ghostly green flame flowed over Duncan’s fingertips. It seeped between the links like water. After a while, he shook his head lightly: “I can’t see anything.”

“What would happen if the chain broke?” Even Alice finally realized how serious this was and asked in a tense voice.

“I don’t know… If the chains binding those Annihilators and contracted demons broke, they usually just died on the spot. Neither the people nor the demons could survive. But my situation with Dog is different…” Shirley spoke in a rush, clearly frightened. “Besides, under normal circumstances this chain can’t break. It’s really tough… how could it possibly break…”

Duncan suddenly reached out and patted Shirley on the shoulder.

Shirley flinched and looked up at him, uneasy.

“Go back to the ship,” Duncan said to her.

Seeing her confusion, Duncan went on: “Something feels off. To be cautious, I think you should return to the Vanished. You shouldn’t keep going deeper into this island.”

Shirley finally understood. She hesitated a little, then nodded. But right then, Dog suddenly stepped forward. For once, he did not obey the captain’s order: “No, Captain. I think… Shirley and I should stay with you on the island.”

Duncan frowned slightly: “Why?”

Dog hesitated for a moment, then spoke as if he had made up his mind: “First, going back to the Vanished right now might not be safer than staying by your side.”

Duncan did not speak, only signaled for Dog to go on with his eyes.

“Second… I’m afraid that even if we leave Sanctum Isle now, it might not help,” Dog said after choosing his words. “I don’t think Miss Vanna ‘saw it wrong’. And in an environment like this, even if she really did see something wrong, we still have to treat it as real… Something might truly be wrong. Just now in the plaza, Shirley was clearly affected by Sanctum Isle. She saw many things she should not have seen…

“In my experience, simply leaving the scene after something like that does not solve the problem. Instead, after a period of time, it often breaks out into a bigger, uncontrollable mess. corruption follows you like a shadow and grows when you run from it, and the way to truly solve it usually lies only at the source.”

Shirley understood what Dog meant. She nervously glanced at the foggy road ahead: “You mean… we still have to keep going in?”

“We must go forward. If we don’t figure out what is happening on this island, and we don’t figure out what is wrong with the chain between you and me, I won’t be at ease,” Dog said in a low voice. “And… like I just said, going back to the Vanished now might not be safe either.”

Shirley opened her mouth, as if she still wanted to say something. But then she suddenly heard Dog's voice pass through the symbiotic pact chain and sound directly in her mind—

"Shirley, stay by the captain's side. Trust my judgment. It's safer with him, even if it means going with him into Subspace."

Shirley turned her head and saw Dog quietly watching her. In his hollow skull eye sockets, the blood-red glow flickered.

Dog seemed to have sensed something coming.

As a demon from the Abyssal Deep, Dog sometimes had vague, hard-to-explain premonitions.

Dog usually could not explain clearly to others what those premonitions meant, but Shirley had always believed his judgment without question.

So she slowly nodded: "Alright, then let's keep going deeper."

"Are you sure?" Duncan looked at Shirley very seriously. "If we go deeper, there may be more things we can't predict."

[Yes. The danger in the environment was relative. The safety by the captain's side was absolute.]

For some reason, that sentence suddenly flashed through Shirley's mind. It was not Dog's voice through their mental link. It felt more like a judgment that had appeared from her own thoughts.

She blinked, then nodded again: "I'm sure. I feel like I'm still in good shape."

"…Alright." Once Duncan confirmed how firm she was, he withdrew his gaze. Then he stretched out his hand and pressed it on the head of the girl who was too thin and short from childhood malnutrition. He spoke very seriously: "Stay near me. Don't fall behind."

“Okay!”

Chapter 715:

After going down a long slope and passing through a small town where no living people remained, only many humanoid Rough Husks embedded in the ground and rock walls, the exploration team entered a valley filled with strange black stones.

The entrance to this valley was hidden, buried in a mass of tangled remnants that looked like thorny plants. But the “memory” in Shirley’s mind clearly pointed out the exact spot.

The black rocks in the valley were jagged and twisted, forming unsettling, complex shapes. They did not look like the result of natural weathering, but they were clearly not carved by human hands either.

They were more like deformed freaks struggling to be “born” from the earth and the cliffs, only to turn into stone at the last moment of their growth. On some of these black, monstrous rocks, one could even see claw-like shapes, almost-formed tentacles, and even eye sockets and mouth-and-nose structures. Once they noticed these details, even someone as seasoned as Vanna, an experienced Inquisitor, could not help but frown. The eerie horror seemed to seep into her bones and made her extra wary.

The flowing fog seeped into every gap and also filled this deathly still valley.

“These rocks feel alive to me…” a squad member in a black robe, bearing the triangular Holy Emblem of the God of Death, muttered quietly. “Like some kind of living things, sealed inside these black shells… I keep feeling like they might move at any moment."

"Control your imagination. Don't casually paint that kind of image in your mind." The God of Death priest who came from the Rest, and who had barely spoken a word since they landed, cut off his soldier's muttering at once.

Duncan glanced at this silent, strange priest of the God of Death. He was a tall, bald man, wearing a black robe. All the skin that showed outside his clothes was covered in dense, complex black rune tattoos. Those countless runes even climbed all the way over his eyelids. It made the priest look strange, gloomy, and frightening.

Because of the awkward tension that still existed between the Death Church and the Vanished, this leading priest did not talk much with Duncan along the way. But when he noticed Duncan looking at him, the odd-looking bald man still turned his head and nodded politely: "Is there something you wish to ask?"

"I remember your name is Norm," Duncan said with a nod. "After the Frostholm incident ended, a large amount of elements collected from Frostholm's pipe system was sent to the Death Church headquarters. Do you know about that?"

"I had direct contact with those samples," Norm answered casually. "They left a deep impression."

"What do you think of these 'traces' on this island?"

"…They share the same source, but they feel different to me," Norm said after thinking for a moment. His face looked a bit stiff as he answered, but he still spoke seriously. "The 'samples' from Frostholm were a cold and disgusting substance. They were in a completely still state, with no more changes happening. But here…"

He paused and bent down to pick up a small stone from the ground.

"Others might not see it from the surface, but I can feel that… the inside is still 'working'. It is still undergoing slow 'changes'. It's hard to describe. It is a sense only we believers of the God of Death can feel. If I have to put it into words… it is like what Miss Shirley said. This whole island is 'alive'. Even though it has grown quiet again, every part of it is still 'living', only in a state that is close to death."

Duncan nodded slightly and stayed silent for a moment.

From the intelligence they already had, the entire island was formed from the power of the Abyssal Lord. And from what Shirley had seen in those "visions", it could even be considered a piece of "flesh" torn from the body of the Abyssal Lord. If it was truly the flesh of Elder Gods, then it was not hard to imagine that it could remain alive even after being separated from the main body for tens of thousands of years.

The only thing that felt unbelievable was… that it had evolved into this form at the edge of the Mortal Realm—trees, rocks, soil, streams flowing through the ravines, and all kinds of resources and minerals that could be collected on the island.

The Annihilators had even used the island's resources to build towns and harbors.

This made Duncan think. What kind of "being" was this so-called Abyssal Lord? Before it became one of the Elder Gods in the age of the Deep Sea, what had the core of "Navigator One", labeled LH-01, actually been?

And what about Rahm, the God of Wisdom, who also had an LH number and should be called "Navigator Two"? He seemed completely different from the Abyssal Lord, both in power and in “form”… What lay behind that difference? Why did LH-01 and LH-02 differ so much?

For some reason, Duncan felt he was still overlooking something. Besides the numbers LH-01 and LH-02, there seemed to be another question he had never paid attention to…

But his thoughts did not go on.

Shirley, who was leading the way, suddenly slowed down.

“…I ‘saw’ this place before,” she said, blinking as she stood in an open space strewn with gravel. She looked around the misty valley, recalling the scenes from the chaotic visions in her mind. “Those cultists all gathered in this clearing. When the Sun went out, they crowded here, shouting like crazy. They thought they had been ‘enlightened’… Their dumb-ass dig site should be somewhere nearby… This used to be a sealed place. For some reason they never dared come close before. But when the Sun went out, they all lost their minds and stopped being afraid…”

Standing near Shirley, Amber frowned a little.

The young official of the Goddess turned her head toward Vanna: “…I think I just heard Miss Shirley say something very rude without even thinking about it…”

“You only just noticed?” Vanna looked surprised. “She’s always like that.”

Amber: “…?”

Shirley paid no attention to their chat at all. Her focus was completely drawn by the broken memory fragments constantly surfacing in her mind and the strong feeling of familiarity from the valley. She took two steps forward, and the blood-red glow in her eyes swept slowly across the thin fog. Very soon, she sensed a familiar aura coming from ahead.

The aura of the Abyssal Deep.

“This way.” She blinked. The blood-red light faded from her eyes. She raised her hand at once and pointed toward a narrow gap between two cliffs. “They dug down from here!”

It was a rock crack wide enough for two people to walk side by side. It seemed to have been a natural fracture in the canyon, but deeper inside there were clear signs of human excavation and widening. A few digging tools lay scattered around the entrance, but the ones who had used them had already been swallowed clean by the rocks and soil. Those chisel marks were the last proof that they had once existed in this world.

“…The passage below is narrow, and we don’t know what’s down there. We shouldn’t all go in,” Amber said after craning her neck to glance inside. She quickly pulled back and turned to the others. “I suggest most people make camp around the entrance. A small group of elites can go down to check the situation.”

“I’ll take the first team down,” Duncan said at once. “Alice, Shirley, Dog… and Morris—you four come with me. Vanna, you and Amber and Norm stay outside to make camp and keep watch on the island.”

There was good reason for his plan. One of his goals in coming to Sanctum Isle was to confirm what connection, if any, existed between Alice and the Abyssal Lord. So of course he had to bring the doll. Shirley and Dog would be their guides once they went below. Morris was very learned and also an experienced explorer of secret realms. This kind of mission was exactly his field.

But clearly Vanna had other ideas: “You’re not taking me? You might run into enemies down there. You’ll need extra fighting strength…”

“There might be enemies outside too,” Duncan said. Then he leaned forward and peeked into the crack at the cramped space below. He turned back and looked at Vanna with a serious face. “And it’s very low down there. No room to jump.”

Vanna froze, stunned for two or three seconds, before she reacted. She looked a bit awkward: “…I don’t only know that one move…”

But she only muttered that, and soon nodded: “Alright, I understand. We’ll stay here and make camp, and we’ll also do a basic search of the other parts of the valley.”

Duncan nodded lightly: “Good. Keep in touch. If anything happens, call my name at once.”

“Yes, Captain.”

Then Duncan led Morris, Alice, Shirley, and Dog toward the dark entrance that slanted down into the depths.

Vanna watched their figures vanish into the darkness. Only when she saw faint ghostly green flame light appear deeper in the passage did she quietly let out a breath. Then she turned her head and saw Amber standing nearby, staring straight at her with a strange look on her face.

Vanna felt a little awkward: “…Why are you looking at me like that?”

Amber thought for a moment, then could not hold back: “…Under normal circumstances, if something happens, aren’t you supposed to call the Goddess’s name first?”

Vanna’s expression went blank: “…”

The Inquisitor fell into deep thought.

But she soon recovered and looked at the younger junior in front of her with utter seriousness: “You can call both at the same time.”

This time it was Amber’s turn to stare blankly: “…You can?”

“You can.”

“…The Goddess allows it?”

Vanna spoke with pious certainty: “I asked, and He did not object.”

Amber kept staring, stunned: “…?”

Norm stood next to the two of them, his face unreadable (mostly because all his features were covered in tattoos). After a long time, he silently traced the triangular emblem of the God of Death over his chest and let out a long sigh that no one noticed.

At the same time, in the narrow passage that slanted ever downward, Shirley and Dog were moving forward with great care.

ghostly green flame slowly spread along the rock walls on both sides, lighting the path ahead. Shirley held the chain that linked her to Dog in one hand and steadied herself on the cold, smooth stone with the other. Her face was tense.

A faint blood-red glow shimmered at the bottom of her eyes.

Chapter 716: Crossing of Real and Unreal

From the entrance, the passage first ran downward along a narrow, low slope. Rough tool marks showed clearly on the surrounding rock walls. But after they walked more than ten meters, the passage ahead began to widen, and the slope grew a little gentler.

ghostly green fire spread along the rocks. Its glow lit the way ahead. Duncan looked at the corridor stretching on into the darkness, and his brow slowly furrowed.

“Did those cultists dig all of this in just a few days after the Sun went out?” Duncan could not help looking at Shirley as he asked: “In such a short time, they dug a passage this deep?”

“No. They only dug open the entrance to this passage, and then broke through the stones at the very bottom,” Shirley shook her head. “This stretch under our feet seems to have already been here before…”

“A passage that already existed deep under this ‘Holy Land Island’?” Morris frowned at once. He walked to the rock wall ahead, studied the stone around them and the ground under his feet, then spoke in a thoughtful tone: “So before those cultists found this place, someone else had already been digging here…”

He suddenly stopped talking and frowned in confusion. A moment later he slowly lifted his head and looked along the path lit by the faint green flame.

“No. It doesn’t look like something dug by people… This ‘original passage’ was made by something else…”

Duncan stepped forward when he heard that and asked: “What did you find?”

“Look at the marks on these rock layers,” Morris raised his hand and pointed at the walls around them. “These smooth, rolling fractures and the ring patterns spaced so evenly along the rock… They don’t look man-made.”

Duncan at once noticed the strange traces on the rock walls that Morris had mentioned.

He saw that the walls of the corridor ahead were smooth. The black and gray stone looked hard, as if some sharp thing had sliced all of it at once, leaving a continuous, clean shape. Every three meters or so, a raised ring of stone wrapped all the way around the passage. The floor under his feet was flat and gently sloped. Large and small stones were fitted together as if someone had carved them with great care and set them into the slope with no gaps at all.

These were not marks that the cultists’ tools or their demons’ spells could have made. They were clearly not the “results of excavation” by anyone before them either.

Even the city-states of today had no underground digging or building skills like this.

Morris slowly ran his fingers along the smooth rock walls on both sides and muttered under his breath: “We’re walking inside a huge pipe…”

“…Back then, under Frostholm, some parts of the Great Hollow also looked like this,” Duncan said in a low voice. “In the end, the scholars in the city-state could not explain how those smooth, flat fractures were formed. They could only say they were ‘corruption hollows’ left behind after the flesh of the Abyssal Lord faded away. But this Holy Land Island… the whole thing is a piece of the Abyssal Lord. So why would there be ‘corruption hollows’ inside it?”

Shirley had been listening to Morris and the captain talk. Suddenly a wild thought flashed through her mind: “…Maybe this is the Abyssal Lord’s rectum?”

The moment she said that, everything went silent. Duncan and Morris both went even darker in the face than Shirley’s ghostly light. Duncan glared hard at the young lady: “You could at least say it’s a blood vessel!”

Shirley shrank her neck without thinking. She scratched her hair and tried to act calm as she changed the subject: “A blood vessel also seems pretty likely, heh…”

Duncan did not keep arguing with Shirley. After he blurted out that last sentence, he fell into thought again and frowned.

A blood vessel… an internal pipe?

If this Holy Land Island really was, as Shirley had said, a “piece of an Elder Gods’ body,” then would this piece of flesh truly have “blood vessels” and “nerves” inside it? If it did… would they really look like this “passage” in front of him?

Duncan followed that line of thought without meaning to. In his mind he tried to picture what kind of shape the Abyssal Lord might have, what kind of “body structure” it might hold. Just then, he suddenly noticed that Alice had not said a word for a long time.

Normally, when the doll young lady followed the captain into some strange new place, she would chatter nonstop. But today she was unusually quiet.

“Alice.” Duncan felt something was off. He at once looked at the doll standing beside him, who seemed a bit lost in thought, and asked: “What are you thinking about?”

He had to call her twice before Alice suddenly jolted as if waking from a dream. She turned her head in a hurry: “Eh… huh? Captain, what did you say?”

“I asked what you were thinking—just now you seemed to be spacing out the whole time.” Duncan frowned slightly. He looked into Alice’s eyes with some worry. “Did you see or hear something again?”

Alice looked around in confusion. She hesitated for quite a while before she finally answered Duncan very carefully: “I haven’t seen anything yet… But I don’t know why. After we walked here, I suddenly felt… very familiar.”

Duncan and Morris spoke at the same time: “A familiar feeling?”

“Yes. Familiar, safe, like…” Alice waved her hands for a long time before she finally found the right words. “Like lying inside my wooden box.”

As she spoke, she lifted her hand and pointed into the darker depths of the corridor: “And in that direction, the familiar feeling is even stronger. It’s like… I came to this place a long time ago, or… I stayed here for a very long time…”

Duncan listened to Alice’s description with a serious face. After a moment he nodded lightly: “We’ll keep going deeper. Alice, Shirley, Dog, no matter what strange thing you see or hear, tell me right away.”

With growing caution in their hearts, the group started walking farther into the passage that seemed to have no end.

The flames spread slowly along the corridor. After they walked for an unknown length of time, Duncan noticed that the space around them suddenly grew wider.

They seemed to have entered a huge underground cavity. The pipe-like passage on both sides suddenly opened out into broad rock walls. The ceiling above rose to more than ten meters in height. For a moment, the suddenly widened space fell into darkness. But after only a second or two, ghost-green flame raced out over the ground and began to light this wide place.

Shirley tipped her head back, staring in amazement at this underground cavern that looked like a huge hall for gatherings. Even though she had caught a quick glimpse of it in the “illusion” before, she still could not help gasping when she saw it with her own eyes: “…Holy crap…”

“…Now I suddenly think Vanna could come too,” Duncan rubbed his chin, lost in thought. “This place looks big enough for her to jump in as well…”

Morris said nothing. The old scholar’s attention was already fully taken by this strange cave full of secrets. He walked slowly along the path lit by the spirit flame, studying his surroundings with care. Then he suddenly stopped in front of a rock wall.

“There’s something on this wall!”

Duncan hurried over, and a scene like a “relief carving” came into view.

On the dark stone wall, a creature with strong limbs, a long body, and a crawling pose seemed almost alive.

Shirley and Dog followed close behind. They stood with Duncan, staring at the “relief” on the wall.

After quite a while, Duncan finally heard Shirley mutter in a low voice: “… Is that a Abyssal Hound?”

“It kind of is…” Dog’s voice sounded very unsure. “But it doesn’t look much like me… This one seems to have flesh, and the body’s proportions aren’t right…”

Before it finished speaking, Morris called again from ahead: “There’s more over here!”

Following Morris’s lead, Duncan saw a second relief.

This one showed a creature floating in midair, shaped like a jellyfish. But it was not made of smoke and dust. It had a solid body, more delicate tentacles, and even on its “head” there seemed to be organs that looked like eyes.

Duncan slowly lifted his head. In the glow of the spirit flame, more reliefs appeared in bits and pieces, set into the rock walls of the cavern. They seemed to stretch on without end at the edge of his sight.

He frowned a little and stepped toward another relief—

A trembling gleam appeared at the edge of his vision.

Duncan stopped at once.

At almost the same moment, the light and shadow before his eyes changed.

Everything suddenly turned into collapsing, scattered fragments of light. The dark cavern and the ancient, mysterious reliefs fell apart in silence before him. In the next instant, the falling shards of light swirled back together, gathered, reshaped, lit up, and appeared again—

In a soundless “roar,” he saw a hall. A hall that seemed to have no end. It formed itself with a rush before Duncan’s eyes.

He saw some silver-gray substance of unknown make spread through his view and turn into a solid floor. Dark blue glowing lines of some mysterious pattern ran all across that floor. High above, the dome blazed with lights. Huge pipes and cables crossed and twisted over the dome like nerves and blood vessels.

Inside this hall stood one round platform after another.

Those platforms gave off a faint glow. Above each one, some invisible field seemed to hang in the air, holding many things frozen in stillness. There were strong, four-legged hound-like creatures, hunting beasts, all kinds of birds, and many shapes he did not know at all and could not see clearly.

The light before his eyes flickered. The lamps in the hall dimmed and brightened. In the blink of an eye, Duncan felt as if he saw the dark cavern again, and the neat rows of “reliefs” on the rock walls—

But in the next second, the dim cavern collapsed again into the form of that hall. He saw something standing at the far end ahead. It was like a huge machine, or some kind of… terminal. Countless pipes gathered around a complex prismatic structure. In the pipes flowed a metallic, black sludge. Lights flashed on the prism that served as the core. Something like a holographic image floated in front of it, lines of text refreshing over and over.

The letters were strange. Duncan did not know that writing at all—but with just one glance, the meaning of the words seemed to sink straight into his mind—

“…the New Hope… main system offline…

“LH-01, Navigator One, ecosystem reconstruction mainframe… status: anomaly.

“LH-02, Navigator Two, data and master-control mainframe… status: anomaly.

“LH-03, Navigator Three, Navigation Mainframe… offline.

“Starship has disintegrated…”

—

Chapter 717: Fracture

The light and shadow collapsed again with a roar. The wide hall and the huge device at its far end broke apart into countless shards of light. Like an avalanche, they fell back into the shape of the dark cavern. It all felt like a short dream, another Mortal Realm casting a confused projection into this layer of reality.

But Duncan knew he had really “seen” it. And he knew he could still see it now.

He looked into the depths of the dim cavern and blinked a few times. In each extremely brief instant, each time his eyelids closed and darkness came, he could see something appear for a split second. It was that vast hall.

He slowly realized that two Mortal Realms were stacked together here, deep under this Holy Land Island. The “Mortal Realm” that lay one layer deeper could not be seen by normal means. But it appeared during 0.002 seconds of every blink of his eyes.

For no clear reason, the number “0.002 seconds” rose up in Duncan’s mind. He was sure it was the exact length of time he saw that hall each time he blinked. It was a moment almost too short for the human eye to catch, but it was enough to shine upon his senses.

He turned his head and looked at the “relief” on the wall beside him. At the next blink, he saw a vivid bird-like creature appear inside a sample containment tank. Then the darkness rose up, the Mortal Realms switched, and it turned back into the relief on the wall. It was a twisted, savage "death-omen bird."

Alice seemed to notice the change in Duncan's expression. She grew worried at once: "Captain? Are you all right…? Your face suddenly got really serious…"

"…LH-01 could not send everything in its database into the Sanctuary World. The things that failed to form during the Genesis Protocol stayed in the first 'hatchery'," Duncan suddenly said in a soft voice. "…This Sanctuary World should have been bigger and more complete. But it failed…"

Morris stared at Duncan in shock. Then he suddenly reacted: "You touched something?"

"There's another shape overlaid on this place. It is how things looked before the Great Annihilation… But you can't see it or touch it," Duncan raised his hand and pressed it lightly to the rock wall beside him. As the ghost-green spirit flame spread into the cracks, he could faintly feel that he was touching more than just cold stone. "Two Mortal Realms are stacked here. The one closer to the original form has been almost completely eaten away by the Great Annihilation. It can only exist briefly during each blink of my eyes."

Morris struggled to understand this impossible "state" that Duncan described. By now, Duncan had already lifted his head and was looking toward the deeper part of the cavern.

"There should be a 'contact point' here," Duncan said in a low voice. "Those cultists must have triggered something in this place."

As he spoke, he stepped into the darkness. With the slow spread of the faint green flames, he walked toward where the "hall" ended.

Morris and Alice at once followed behind their captain.

…

Dog walked with his head low in some tired silence beside Shirley. The blood-red glow in his eye sockets flickered on and off. The scraping of chains over the ground sounded like a distant noise. He walked forward a while longer, then lifted his head a bit late—and found that Shirley had already gone far ahead.

The girl’s back looked blurry. The edges of her figure kept shaking, as if something unstable was overlaid on her body.

Dog shook his head. His empty skull seemed to lose the ability to think and judge for a brief moment. In the next instant, he snapped awake and found that he was, as usual, walking right beside Shirley. The scene where the two of them had drifted far apart felt like a strange illusion that vanished in a blink.

Shirley lowered her head in mild confusion and saw Dog walking at her side.

Then she felt a stabbing pain in her arm. A burning sensation flowed along the chain of the symbiotic pact into her, like… freshly spilled blood.

“Dog?” she whispered. She was not sure if she had spoken out loud or if she only called through the symbiotic pact link in her heart.

Dog did not answer. What reached Shirley’s ears were only two sounds: “thump, thump.”

They sounded like heartbeats.

Something was wrong… She did not know what was wrong, but something was definitely wrong!

Shirley’s whole body tensed at once. The moment she sensed that something was off, she reacted. She snapped her head up and looked toward the captain: “Captain! Dog is—”

There was no sign of the captain ahead.

In the dark cavern, only her own voice echoed back to her. It quickly faded into a vague noise. The captain was gone. Morris and Alice were gone too. Only she and Dog were here, as if it had been only the two of them from the very beginning.

Shirley drew in a sharp breath. The vast, endless darkness turned into an even greater fear. This fear was so familiar. She had thought that she had forgotten this bone-deep feeling, but now it all leaped back into her mind at once—

Fire. Smoke. The smell of blood. The sound of something collapsing. The feeling of something chewing on her flesh…

In the darkness, she stared with wide, terrified eyes. Bone-like spikes slowly pushed out from her arms, shoulders, and spine. Blood-red light filled her eyes and made everything in her sight twist and warp. In that ever more twisted sense of the world, she heard a somewhat unfamiliar voice suddenly come from her side: “Shirley… I feel… kind of cold…”

She slowly turned her head and looked toward the source of the voice.

Dog was sinking. He was sinking into the soil and rock, as if he were melting. His body was slowly swallowed by the ground. The ground seemed to come alive. Thick, slow ripples spread across its surface. It was as if countless living things were hidden inside those ripples. Dog’s body sank into those “living things” bit by bit. First his legs, then his body. Soon only his neck and part of his skull were left.

He opened his mouth toward Shirley. The bony jaws opened and shut. He seemed to be speaking with great effort, or trying hard to spit something out —

“Dog!!!”

Her numb and stiff mind finally started to move. Shirley suddenly remembered the name at the other end of the chain. She rushed toward that patch of ground that was slowly turning alive. She grabbed the chain on her arm with all her strength and shouted: “Dog! I’ll pull you out! Hold on!”

But no matter how hard she tried, she could not stop Dog from sinking. Just as the Abyssal Hound’s skull was about to be swallowed completely by the thick mud, a voice suddenly came into her ears.

“…Shirley, your dad and I are going to buy you a cake. Today is your birthday… When we get back, you won’t be mad at us anymore, all right?”

The girl froze for a moment.

The voice from the other end of the chain cut her reason for a brief instant. At that same instant, she heard a clear snapping sound.

Her hand suddenly felt light.

The Abyssal Hound vanished completely into the mud. The heavy pull from the end of the chain disappeared at once. Shirley stumbled backward.

She saw the other end of the chain whip out of the mud. It had broken. There was no familiar Dog at the broken end. Only two fist-sized things had been flung out with it and landed one after another beside her.

They thumped on the ground, over and over, as if they were still alive.

They were two hearts.

Shirley stared at the scene in a daze, as motionless as a statue.

The pitch-black mud began to churn slowly and gather from all directions. In the mud, a vision of some far-off place seemed to form. Innumerable twisted, savage shadows drifted all around—

In the Abyssal Deep Sea, countless demons noticed an uninvited guest drawing close to their dimension.

Farther out in the darkness, a huge structure lay asleep. Its body sprawled like a mountain across broken land. Its coiling tendrils wrapped around countless floating islands. Dim blue light flowed across its surface. From those tendrils, demons were born without end, and every moment it devoured them again.

But Shirley seemed not to see those looming visions. She sat on the ground in a daze for a while, then slowly got up and crawled toward the two hearts that were still beating. She carefully picked them up and held them in her arms.

She had not held them for a very long time.

“Dad… Mother…”

Darkness surged in. Her figure vanished into the Abyssal Deep Sea.

…

Duncan suddenly turned his head and looked toward a patch of open ground not far behind them.

A blurry figure flickered there for a moment and vanished in a blink.

He reacted at once: “Something happened to Shirley!”

“Shirley?!” Morris, walking behind Duncan, froze for a second. In that brief moment, he even forgot the name “Shirley.” The captain’s words snapped his memory back into the right “place.” Only then did he look up, a step late, and realize that one person was missing from the group… and one Abyssal demon as well.

“Hey! She was just walking right next to me!” Alice also came to her senses now. She stared wide-eyed at the spot where Shirley and Dog had been. “I even heard her talking to Dog…”

Duncan’s face grew grim at once: “None of you noticed when she disappeared?”

Morris and Alice both shook their heads.

Duncan’s brow tightened. After a very short moment of thought, he swept his hand hard through the air.

ghostly green flames of spirit form flared up in an instant. With a string of explosions that rose almost to a roar, the fire howled like a storm and rushed into every corner of the cavern!

The roaring flames seemed to shake time and space itself. The whole cavern, even the whole Holy Land Island, shuddered hard in that instant. After this quake that seemed to shake the very dimension, Duncan’s face had already turned very dark.

“The marks on Shirley and Dog are both still there,” he lifted his head and said to Morris in a heavy tone. “…But they have split apart.”

Chapter 718: Falling Into the Abyssal Deep

In the valley at the heart of Sanctuary Island, Vanna was leading the team and setting up camp at the tunnel entrance when she received news from the cave. She stared in shock and blurted out: “Shirley and Dog are gone?”

“Strictly speaking, they were ‘shifted’ somewhere else by some kind of space-time mechanism in the cave,” Duncan’s voice sounded in Vanna’s mind. “Have you seen any changes on the surface?”

“No. Everything on the surface is normal. Amber just led a team to search the depths of the valley. They found nothing but a few empty huts and some human remains that had been half swallowed by the island,” Vanna answered at once. “The island is very quiet right now…”

Deep in the underground cavern, Duncan nodded slightly after hearing Vanna’s report from the surface. Then his gaze fell on Morris and Alice nearby.

“The surface is normal. Sanctuary Island has not shown any signs of ‘coming alive’. It seems what happened to Shirley and Dog is not the same as what happened to those Annihilators.”

“Then where did they go?” Alice asked anxiously. “Didn’t you say you could still feel their ‘mark’? Are they safe now?”

“They are still alive, but they are in a place I cannot pinpoint. I suspect…”

Duncan stopped halfway. He did not rush to a conclusion, but it was clear he already had a guess in his heart. After a brief silence, he raised his head and looked thoughtfully toward the depths of the cavern.

In the drowsy darkness, a vast shape seemed to stand there in the distance.

Every time he blinked, a huge prism appeared there, wrapped in many cables and pipes. Lights flashed across its surface, as if sending out a silent invitation.

He walked over and let his flame drive back the darkness. In the light of the spirit flame, a grand gate stood in silence, as if it had been set directly into the rock walls on both sides.

On the open ground around the gate lay many tools scattered in haste. In the floor and nearby walls, human shapes were half fused into the stone and soil, melted until no details remained. They looked twisted and horrific.

There was no doubt this was the “final chamber” Shirley had mentioned, the last excavation site deep under Sanctuary Island, the place where those Annihilators had finally “woken” the whole island.

Duncan came to the gate and quickly examined its structure by firelight. The black stone door was tightly shut. Its surface was rough and uneven, as if vines had once covered it and had now rotted away, leaving only a chaos of pits and grooves. In that messy, almost patternless web of lines, Duncan still faintly made something out.

They were the strange characters he had seen in that “hall”, the symbols he had seen before in the vision of the New Hope’s crash.

He frowned slightly, but before he could read the message hidden in the lines, Alice, who stood beside him, broke the silence in a small voice: “Navigator One… access interface?”

Duncan turned his head at once and looked at the doll craning her neck to study the gate: “You can read what is written on this door?”

Alice frowned and slowly shook her head: “I don’t see any writing on the door… It just suddenly popped into my head…”

Duncan stared into Alice’s eyes. His thoughts raced, then he drew back his gaze and turned to the gate again. After a few seconds of hesitation and thinking, he placed his hand on the stone and closed his eyes a little, gathering his mind.

ghostly green flame spread from his fingertips and flashed across the door, then vanished.

In his other sight, in a distant, dark, and strange dimension, a tiny spark suddenly flickered as if stirred by wind. Deep in the darkness, it swayed and flashed once.

In that weak, swaying fire, Duncan heard Shirley’s voice. It was clearer than before, but still separated from him by a thick layer of the Veil.

She was very scared. She was very cold. She had just lost something important. She was carefully building a shell of self-protection around herself, while something with ill intent gathered around her.

Duncan opened his eyes.

“Lucy.” He called in his heart to the witch waiting on the Radiant Star.

Lucretia’s voice came at once: “Do you need me?”

“Bring that Saint over. I have found the ‘connection point’,” Duncan said. “Now I need to open a door and go into the Abyssal Deep Sea, to bring them back.”

“Understood.”

The voice in his mind faded. Duncan slowly raised his right hand. In his palm, a ball of fire was forming, unusually bright, bright enough to sting the eyes.

He pressed the fire onto the black stone door and watched it slowly seep into the gate, then into that strange, dark dimension behind it. Before the flame vanished completely, he spoke softly to it: "…Shirley, don't be afraid."

…

It was very dark. It was very cold. Her body felt as heavy as if it were filled with lead. A strange sharp pain spread from her arm, up to her shoulder, then to half of her body. The pain slowly changed into numbness, as if this body no longer belonged to her, as if her flesh had quietly turned into something she could neither understand nor control.

The "swamp" around her had faded at some unknown time, but an even stronger sense of malice and danger kept rising from all directions. Shirley curled up deep inside a "thicket" that twisted together like broken bones. She hid there without moving.

Mad howls and rambling whispers came from far away. Invisible hunters were prowling in the dark, searching for the uninvited guests who had entered this place. The hunters' presence was slowly drawing near. It was only a matter of time before the "prey" was found.

But this time there was no Abyssal Hound to protect her.

Shirley hugged her twisted, deformed arm even tighter and shrank deeper into the thicket. She had already "smelled" the air here and figured out where she was.

This was the Abyssal Deep Sea. It was Dog's "homeland".

It was the lair of demons.

The faint sound of “thump, thump” beat by her ears. The pulse rising from her chest pulled Shirley out of her daze. She lowered her head in a trance and looked at the two hearts she held in her arms.

“Dad… Mother…”

She muttered softly, just like when she had refused to sleep as a child, hiding in her bed to whisper to “them”.

“I am a bit scared… I want to hold you…”

The two hearts still beat slowly. The sound of thump, thump was so clear. For many years they had been beating inside the body of a Abyssal demon. Behind thick bones and swirling black smoke, their beating had never sounded so clear to Shirley.

Shirley clenched her arms a little tighter, and the feeling in her hands seemed wrong.

She lowered her head and saw a pair of arms covered in a thin layer of bone armor. Blade-like structures stretched out from her elbow joints, slowly opening and closing like living things. Then she looked at her chest.

There was a terrifying hollow there. Inside the hollow was a skeleton surrounded by rising black smoke. A damaged dark red organ beat with difficulty among the bones and smoke, growing weaker with every passing second.

In a human body, this damaged organ was called a “heart”.

“…So my heart was bitten open by Dog back then… No wonder it is so cold…”

Shirley spoke in a low voice as she shifted her position a little in the thicket. She saw that her legs were also slowly being covered by a layer of strange black bone plates. Smoke that marked Abyssal Deep corruption kept rising from the plates and spreading into the air.

She felt more and more sleepy.

Would she die in the form of a Abyssal demon? Or had she already been a Abyssal demon wearing human skin ever since twelve years ago, when Dog fused with her?

This brief thought rose in Shirley’s mind for no reason, but soon even that thought faded in the heavy drowsiness.

She did not want to think about this, and she could not think about this.

She did not understand such things. These “deep” questions were too hard for her.

She cared more about water, food, fuel for the fire, and warm clothes for winter.

The roars and whispers grew closer. The hunters in the dark were drawing near this borderland. Their swelling and shrinking shapes cast even darker shadows in the darkness. A chilling touch seemed to reach her skin a step ahead of them.

But her body was already slowly tipping over. Even the two still beating hearts could no longer wake her from the strong sleepiness. Inside her broken chest, the heart that demons had chewed was slowly beginning its last beat.

A warm light rose in the darkness, as if a ray of gentle sunlight shone on her face. Shirley narrowed her eyes a little and let out a relaxed, content sigh.

It was a warm winter afternoon.

sunlight streamed in through the window and fell on a wooden sill with peeling paint. The kettle on the stove gave a happy hiss. Mother was busy in the kitchen, and the smell of baking biscuits drifted into the sitting room. Dad did not have to work today. He was crouched by the dining table, trying to fix the boards that always creaked. From the street came the clear bell of the postman's bicycle as he crossed the corner and the sound of carriage wheels rolling over the cobblestones.

Shirley dozed on the sofa and was about to fall asleep.

Then Dad would come over. He would pick her up and carry her to the bed in her room. Mother would come out of the kitchen and tap Dad on the head with a long-handled ladle, because his dirty hands had smudged their Daughter's dress…

Lying on the sofa, Shirley slowly showed a faint smile, just like that afternoon many years ago. She rolled over a little. Her arm slipped from the back of the sofa onto her own body and curled against her chest.

Her hand touched a heart that had stopped beating.

All the warmth collapsed at once. Darkness and cold tore through that gentle afternoon sunlight like an avalanche. In the darkness Shirley's eyes flew wide open. When the roar of fear rushed in, she saw the figure that had been crouching by the dining table slowly stand up and walk toward her.

That figure changed in the flames and burned everything in the dark.

"Shirley, don't be afraid."

Chapter 719: Both Sides of the Gate

Shirley’s mind snapped awake from the collapsing dream. She opened her eyes in the darkness and saw that she was still lying in that black thicket that looked like a tangle of thorns.

Whispers and strange howls sounded as if they were already at her ears, almost boring into her head. Cold currents crept from the gaps in the shadows like disgusting tendrils, as if they meant to lick her skin. There was something outside the thicket, a swarm of writhing things whose size kept changing, their real shapes hard to see. They had smelled living flesh and had crossed a long distance to find this hiding place. A gluttonous feast was about to begin.

Shirley twitched her arm a little. The stiffness and numbness in her whole body made every movement painfully hard, but she felt a faint heat spreading from somewhere inside her, once more feeding this shell that had just died.

She lowered her head with effort and saw that the heart in her chest had completely stopped beating. In just a few seconds it had shriveled into a lump of black residue. Yet on that residue, a thin strand of ghostly green flame burned quietly. It was eerie, but it felt warm.

Within this small warmth she got back a little strength and slowly struggled to sit up.

When her arm swung by accident, the broken black chain on her right wrist scraped across the ground. The sound was not loud, but in this silent darkness it was sharp as a shout.

The whispers and howls outside the thicket paused for a moment, then suddenly rose into a chilling roar.

Countless rising and falling shadows surged up from the shattered ground outside. In wild joy, countless Abyssal demons took shape and rushed toward the feast.

spirit flame spread and burned in the gaps between her bones. The black residue in her chest had fully turned into a small, steady flame. Shirley took a deep breath. She heard the noise from outside. Fear of death and a restless, nameless urge rose together in her mind. She panted softly, and from the corner of her eye she saw the two hearts that had fallen to the ground.

After a short hesitation, she reached out and picked up the two still beating “hearts”. Her eyes, glowing with a faint red light, flickered.

A cracking sound came from the edge of the thicket. A huge beast tore open the barrier of her hiding place. Heavy footsteps and hungry growls reached Shirley’s ears.

But she seemed not to hear the sound that was already above her head, nor to feel the breath that had blown upon her face. She only lowered her head and slowly pushed the two hearts into her own chest, murmuring as if talking to herself: “Dad… Mother… don’t be afraid…”

The feeling of a heartbeat returned to her chest. The sense of “being alive” made the last stiffness and slowness in her limbs finally fade away. Shirley pushed herself to her feet. A series of sharp cracking sounds exploded from within her body. Along the edge of her black ribs, layers of bone spurs grew in a rush, wrapping the two hearts and the small flame in a bony cage.

She raised her head in the darkness. Her body stretched taller. A monstrous skull covered in spikes appeared in her field of view.

The thicket that had been her hiding place was torn open in a huge gap. A giant floating skull leaned forward in malice, peering down at the prey in the bushes. Around the skull circled countless horrifying shapes: Death-Omen Birds, Smokewisp Jellyfish, Mad Terrorbeasts…

Dog had once told her that if she ever ran into these things alone, she must run.

But this was the Abyssal Deep Sea. There was nowhere to run here. They were everywhere.

“Shirley, don’t be afraid…”

A Death-Omen Bird attacked first. This confused and half-witted demon could no longer restrain the hunger and violence in its instincts. It let out a sharp screech. Its wings suddenly spread into a dark cloud and plunged down at the thicket, wrapped in a mass of corrosive mist.

Then there was a heavy, dull sound of piercing. A black, jointed bone spike stabbed up like a sword and rammed straight through the Death-Omen Bird.

Next came spike after spike. Black bones, like twisted and symmetrical limbs, stretched out from the thicket. They first stabbed into the sky, then bent down, bracing a tall body that stepped out from among the branches.

Her limbs were long. Black bone plates covered them layer upon layer like tight armor, crossing and overlapping. Sharp bone spurs and blade-like shapes grew from the joints of her arms and legs, shining with a dim red gleam. Her broken chest was covered in jagged shards of bone like thorns. Inside the bone cage, two dark red hearts beat slowly. From her back, countless limb-like bone structures stretched out, like a vast cloak of bone wings yet also like strange, ill-omened legs. These paired limbs bent down from the air and propped her body high above the ground, letting her look down on the Abyssal demons gathering from every direction.

She slowly turned her head. On the face that still kept a human shape, the hollow eyes filled with a rising red glow.

A hoarse, scratching screech sounded beside her. The Death-Omen Bird skewered on her bone spike thrashed a few times on Shirley's "long leg", then dissolved into a mass of quickly fading smoke and a small puddle of slow-flowing sludge. Bit by bit, it was drawn into Shirley's bone spike.

Shirley frowned a little as she watched the spot where the Death-Omen Bird faded away. She lifted that jointed limb and shook it hard in the air: "… Gross. Tastes bad…"

Then she turned her head toward the demons gathered around her. They were frozen in confusion for a moment by the sudden change. She bent forward a little and asked: "Have any of you seen a strange Abyssal Hound? Its name is Dog. He is my friend."

The Abyssal demon swarm drew back for a heartbeat. Some survival instinct made their dull minds think of retreat, but in only a moment, the urge to attack crushed that fragile "reason".

The strange floating skull covered in spikes suddenly opened its jaws. A huge cloud of corrosive mist formed at once and hurled straight toward Shirley.

Next came Death-Omen Birds swooping from the air, Abyssal Hounds racing and howling on the ground, and countless twisted monsters whose names even Shirley did not know. These Abyssal demons, who acted only on instinct, rushed in all at once, roaring and howling as they charged in madness at the “intruders” in their territory.

“I knew it…”

Shirley grumbled in an annoyed tone. In the next second, her figure turned into a blurred shadow.

She swept across the shattered land like the wind. Those bone spikes, like giant skeletal wings and also like curved limbs, spread and stabbed through the air, striking at every demon that dared to come near. With no tactics and no knowledge of any spell, she relied only on the new instincts of her body and the most basic speed and strength as she plunged into the countless demon swarms.

It was a simple and brutal way to fight, just like the first time she had swung her chain and hurled Dog at her enemies.

…

Lucretia looked up at the black stone gate that was shocking even to her, a seasoned border scholar. It took her a long moment to look away.

“…They really did dig up something terrifying,” the sea witch sighed. “These cultists always make a mess they cannot control… as always.”

“This is the connection point between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the Mortal Realm,” Duncan said beside her. “From what I can sense, several layers of dimension overlap here. Not only is Mortal Realm space and time stacked together, but part of the Abyssal Deep Sea, is also stacked directly on this spot. Shirley and Dog are probably so close in nature to the Abyssal Deep side that they simply ‘fell’ to the other side.”

Lucretia nodded, then spoke again with some worry: “…Are you sure this will work? I am not saying your power cannot open the gate, but… if that Saint cannot hold on and the gate closes too soon, how will you come back?

On the other side of the gate is the Abyssal Deep Sea. We know very little about it. Even you might be in danger if you get lost over there…"

"It is fine. I have thought about that," Duncan cut off Lucretia's worries. "We all know that at the very center of the Abyssal Deep Sea, lies the Abyssal Lord. Under His throne is the passage to Subspace."

Lucretia's expression turned a bit strange at once: "…You mean…"

"I only need to punch a small hole. It should not disturb the balance of the whole Abyssal Deep Sea. After all, the breach the Vanished smashed into the Abyssal Deep Sea back then was much larger," Duncan said casually. "If I cannot return the same way, I will come back from Subspace. That Lord should not mind too much. If that does not work, I can just call the Vanished and have them crash through again."

Lucretia: "…"

Duncan only waved his hand: "Let us begin."

Seeing that Father was ready, Lucretia said no more. She nodded lightly, then walked to the open ground in front of the gate. She pointed her short conductor's baton at the floor and tapped twice.

With a soft bang, a cloud of smoke puffed up like a stage magic trick. When the smoke cleared, the strange, disgusting "brain" wrapped in a spider-like bone cage appeared once more before Duncan.

The Saint slowly woke.

Along the edge of the bone cage, the many eye stalks stirred as if rousing from sleep. Its many eyeballs twitched and trembled, and at last it noticed its surroundings and the expressionless Duncan and his group standing beside it.

In almost an instant, this monster that could no longer be called human was fully awake. It strained to rise, but the bindings Lucretia had cast on it earlier held it completely still. It could only make the air around it shake as it let out a harsh and jumbled roar: “What have you done?!”

“We have not done anything yet. We are just about to start,” Duncan said as he stepped toward the Saint. He fixed his calm gaze on that disgusting forest of eye stalks. “You may begin your prayer now – to your master.”

Chapter 720: Open the Door

“Begin your prayer—to your Lord.”

The brain inside the skeletal crown suddenly convulsed. From that sentence alone, the Saint abruptly sensed enormous danger and terror—it did not know what this fear truly was, yet the warning sent by Dark Fate pressed on its subconscious like a great mountain.

It began to struggle violently. Its powerful will even broke through, for a brief moment, the layers of restraints the Witch had placed inside its body. The bone spurs at the edge of the skeletal cage started to rattle and clack. As the bindings loosened for that instant, its senses slowly returned. It finally noticed its surroundings—it sensed the familiar aura of Sacred Island.

It realized where it had been brought. In that moment, heavy despair wrapped its already crazed and warped mind layer by layer, like the veil of night.

“Holy Land!” The terrible brain swelled and shrank as it writhed. The air around it trembled as it roared in wild, overlapping voices: “Holy Land! You have defiled the Holy Land! You heretic cultists… the Lord will punish you, none of you will escape!”

Duncan and Lucretia only watched the raging Saint with expressionless faces. After a moment, Duncan finally raised his right hand. A flame burned in his palm, its edge flickering as thin streams of fire dripped to the ground. One stream spread toward the dark stone door, while another flowed in silence to the Saint’s feet and began to burn.

Only when the flame started spreading did Duncan break the silence: “Two things. First, your ‘Holy Land’ doesn’t need anyone else to defile it. Your foolish kin dug through the surface and woke the flesh of the Elder Gods. They have already ‘returned to the holy Lord’ just as they wished, in every sense of the phrase.”

“Second, I don’t care what your Lord thinks about all this. But I do have some things I want to discuss with your Lord. So, begin your prayer. This is probably the only time in your life you can truly help share the Abyssal Lord’s burden. And from a personal point of view… this will make what comes next a little easier on you.”

The fire spread. The pale green spirit form flame slowly climbed the huge dark stone door. The streams of fire seeped into the grooves on the door like water and burned across its surface, making the whole door seem to come alive, shivering and shaking as if it might move. Another branch of the flame ignited the Saint’s skeletal limbs and began to crawl across its whole body.

A fear that burned the soul along with the flesh swept through the monster’s mind. It struggled with all its strength, but the Witch’s restraints crushed all resistance in an instant. It could only watch the fire spread. Yet compared to the pain in its twisted body, another, darker “sensation” was what filled it with utter despair—

It felt itself forming a link with that dark stone door, a connection deeper and harder to understand than any physical touch. It felt itself slowly becoming part of that door, becoming part of the world behind it. Its consciousness, its memories, all of its reason and everything it could use to hold on to its “self” were turning into the door’s… data…

In a daze, a hollow voice echoed. It was a strange, low hum. On the crumbling edge of its consciousness, the Saint felt his personality stand up again from that twisted, deformed body. He once more felt his hands and feet, the texture of breathing, the vibration of sound against his eardrums—those parts he had once willingly cast off, the parts that belonged to humans, seemed to return to the world in this illusion.

“Offer your prayer to your Lord…”

A voice boomed through his mind, making him raise his head in confusion and daze. But his subconscious still struggled. He clenched his teeth and tried to shake off the voice’s influence—yet it kept coming, trembling on all sides, trembling even inside his own subconscious—

“Offer your prayer to your Lord…”

He lifted his eyes in the darkness and saw a grand black gate standing before him, like the beginning and end of all things. The surface of the gate rippled and writhed like a pool of water. Between those shimmering ripples, he saw countless blurred and broken scenes—

He had once studied in the city-state. He had once hurried through streets and alleys, busy like an ordinary person. He had longed for many things, only to be swallowed by a greater emptiness the moment he got them. In wild indulgence he noticed how false the body’s shell was. In the baptism of blood he gained a brief “enlightenment”—he saw his first sacrifice, a small body lying quietly in a blood-draining trough, spasming one last time. He saw his final sacrifice, a ruined heap that no longer looked human, with only a pair of eyes left, filled with fear and despair. In those eyes was reflected a powerful body that had already surpassed mortal flesh…

And all of it was being swallowed by the black gate—everything about him as a human, everything inhuman, everything he had experienced, everything he had tried to escape… it was all being uploaded to the Source…

“Offer your prayer to your Lord.”

Beside the black gate, a giant filled with starlight looked down. The giant had no face. Many brilliant star-rivers flowed through its body. Dazzling star clusters and dim cloud belts outlined its unspeakable features. It bent down slightly. A river of stars stretched out like a tentacle and flowed to hover before the Saint’s eyes. The tip of that starry tendril opened in silence. Countless eyes blinked in the starlight, watching the Saint’s soul.

Beside the starlit giant, the black gate slowly opened. An existence with a towering main body like a high tower, wrapped in countless massive tentacles, cast a single glance toward the mortal world.

Why refuse your prayer? The Lord was right there… It cast down thousands upon thousands of merciful gazes.

Overwhelming emotion pried open the Saint’s heart. He finally forgot where he had come from. He forgot what he was supposed to do. Before that towering being, he bent his waist, then dropped to the ground and lay prostrate. He whispered softly: “My Lord…”

The ghostly green flame flared up. The dark stone door turned, in an instant, into a gently rippling, pitch-black mirror. Within the waves on that surface, one could faintly see a vast world deep inside.

Duncan turned his head and saw the shriveled black remains quietly burning on the open ground in front of the black gate. Its life had already faded, but the remains that were left… looked as if they could burn for a very long time.

“The Saint really is more fireproof than most.”

He sighed casually, then turned his gaze to the “black gate” that now rippled like a mirror. On the other side of the door, the auras of Shirley and Dog were still active, and growing clearer.

He stepped forward and touched the black mirror with his fingertips. The surface rippled, but he felt no sensation at his fingers.

It was like touching a phantom.

“Is this the door leading to the Abyssal Deep, to the Deep Sea?” Morris could not help but step closer. He studied the black gate with a frown as he spoke: “It looks… somewhat like the ‘rifts’ opened by Abyssal demons, but clearly much more stable…”

“In essence, it is a rift opened by Abyssal demons. That Saint had already become a Abyssal demon. Of course it had the ability to open a passage to the Abyssal Deep, to the Deep Sea,” Duncan said lightly. “All I did was force the rift to stabilize after it opened, and use the ‘connection point’ in this cave to anchor the door as close as possible to Shirley and Dog. Right now I can feel that the two of them are somewhere on the other side.”

As he spoke, he glanced at Alice beside him, then at Morris and Lucretia across from him. He already had a plan.

“Alice, you’re coming through the door with me. Morris and Lucy, you’ll stay outside.”

“You don’t need me to go in with you?” Lucretia asked at once, a bit worried.

“No.” Duncan shook his head. “I’m not going there to fight. I’m only going to find people and have a talk with the Abyssal Lord. Taking one more person or one less person won’t make much difference—but this side of the door needs a warden.”

He paused, thinking, then added: “This rift will stay open for quite a long time. Before we return, Abyssal demons will definitely notice this passage. At that point, things will come out through the door—so you and Morris have to guard this place. And it’s not just this door. The whole Sacred Island could change because of this rift. So you also need to inform Vanna and the people of the Deep Sea and the Church of Death. From now until the door is closed, there may be a lot of ‘guests’ showing up around here.”

Listening to Father’s plan, Lucretia’s expression slowly grew serious. She nodded lightly: “I understand—Mr. Morris and I will guard this place.”

Duncan nodded and said nothing more. He only turned and beckoned to Alice.

“Hold on to me. Don’t let go halfway,” he said quietly to the doll who had followed him over.

Alice nodded at once and grabbed Duncan’s arm tightly. A smile appeared on her face. There was no trace of tension in that smile. In fact, she looked very happy, as if… she was not about to go to a place that would terrify any ordinary person, but was simply going on an outing with the captain.

“Not afraid?” Standing before the rippling black mirror, Duncan noticed the smile on Alice’s face and could not help asking softly.

Alice laughed with real joy: “I’m not afraid!”

“Good.”

Duncan nodded and, without any hesitation, led the doll straight through the black gate.

A strange sensation rushed over them.

It was as if they had passed through a layer of unreal fog. There was no resistance, no discomfort, only a faint, cool breath that rose and then faded in an instant. In that brief moment, it felt as though they had crossed an infinitely long tunnel in the blink of an eye—

Alice’s eyes widened in wonder. Clutching the captain’s arm, she saw many streams of light flashing past. But more surprising than those strange lights was that she seemed to “hear” something.

As they passed through the “tunnel,” on their way to the other side, a voice entered her mind directly—

“Verifying identity, ?#@?&%&… pass.

“Verifying identity, LH-03, Navigator Three, pass.”

Chapter 721: Crossing the dome

That unreal, ethereal voice vanished at once, as if it had never existed.

In the dark “tunnel,” Alice blinked, puzzled by what she had just heard. She suspected she had misheard it, but…

The captain had said that in strange places like this, no matter what you heard or saw, you had to report it right away, even if it was just a hallucination.

So she quickly squeezed Duncan’s arm: “Captain, I just heard a voice!”

“A voice?” Duncan turned his head at once. In the darkness, he fixed his gaze on the doll’s eyes. “What voice?”

Alice immediately repeated what she had heard—including that short, unrecognizable burst of noise, and the strange “name” LH-03, “Navigator Three.”

In the dark, endless tunnel, Duncan slowly widened his eyes. He looked at the doll before him with a very strange, shocked expression, and then a trace of understanding suddenly rose in his gaze.

So that was it… it was like this?!

As a storm of tangled thoughts and staggering guesses surged through his mind, he understood many things in an instant. Almost at the same time, he noticed something bright and dense at the edge of his vision.

Still stunned, Duncan snapped his head around and looked toward where the light had appeared.

A second later, he saw the “Starry Sky” that lay on the dome above the Abyssal Deep, above the Deep Sea—

Magnificent starlight appeared at the end of the “tunnel.” It was a vast scene woven from thousands of stars, stellar nurseries, and high-energy radiation clouds. A river of stars crossed boundless darkness. A massive, erupting celestial body had been torn apart into glowing nebulae spread across the galaxy. All of it formed an endless, splendid Veil that swept into Duncan’s and Alice’s vision like a crashing tide.

Duncan’s eyes flew wide open.

This was the “Starry Sky” that every captain who sailed the Boundless Sea knew well. It lay between the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep Sea. Under normal conditions, one could only “look down” on it through complex Spirit Realm lenses, as a great Star Map. Seafarers in the mortal world could only cast cautious glances at it from behind thick lenses and layers of protection. But here, the truest face of this Starry Sky and every tiny detail of it appeared directly before his eyes.

Duncan and Alice “fell” faster toward that frozen Starry Sky. Pulled by an unseen force, they were quickly entering the dome layer above the Abyssal Deep, above the Deep Sea.

They plunged into the starlight and began to pass swiftly between those motionless celestial bodies.

After a brief hesitation, Duncan reached out toward the unfamiliar stars.

A bright orange-yellow star passed through his palm like a phantom. At the same time, tiny points of starlight appeared on his skin, yet the two clearly did not affect each other.

Then he suddenly noticed how quiet Alice was beside him. Normally, this doll would already be shouting and chattering at the sight of such a magnificent Starry Sky.

But Alice only stared wide-eyed at the surroundings, as if something else had captured all of her attention. The brilliant lights were reflected in her deep purple eyes, dancing there with a lively gleam. After quite a while, the doll suddenly raised her hand and pointed in a direction, mumbling like someone talking in her sleep: “Coordinates offset.”

Duncan frowned: “What did you say?”

It was as if Alice had not heard the captain at all. She still kept her gaze on the stars around them, then lifted her hand again and pointed another way: “Coordinates offset.”

“Coordinates offset. Coordinates offset. Coordinates offset…”

Alice spoke faster and faster. Her eyes swept constantly across the stars, as if trying to find some “reference” that could help her fix her bearings. Duncan was just about to forcefully “wake her up” when she suddenly stopped. She jolted as if snapping out of a heavy dream and turned blankly toward Duncan: “…Report, navigation system failure.”

She went still, and seemed a bit more clear-headed than before. She patted her head, then scratched her hair in confusion: “Ah… Captain, my head just suddenly filled up with all kinds of strange things…”

Duncan grabbed Alice’s arm. Thin threads of flame flowed over his fingertips as he lowered his voice and asked gently: “What did you see?”

“Stars… lines between the stars, and numbers and symbols,” Alice answered, still with a hint of daze in her eyes, as if part of her mind was still busy with something else. “I was supposed to find a path and avoid those collapsing gravity traps… but the coordinates are off. We… we don’t have a safe route…”

Confused, she lifted her head and looked around at the Starry Sky. Those motionless stars seemed to record a distant journey. Long ago, in some universe that had already died, there had once been such a scene. She had once passed through here, guiding the last refugees as they searched for a path of escape… But escape… escape from what?

A spreading glow of dark red appeared in her mind.

The whole universe was red-shifting… the stars were coming apart, physical space was collapsing… the structure of matter was falling to pieces… the servo systems were howling at the edge of failure…

The ship was about to break apart. The navigation cabin had already caught fire… Activate Disaster Backup Protocol.

Alice's eyes flew open. The chaotic noise in her head was wiped away in an instant by some powerful force. She shook her head. Her neck joint creaked slightly—and she forgot all the messy things that had filled her mind.

A warm flame burned quietly at her side. The power in the fire slowly steadied her thoughts. She turned her head and saw the captain standing beside her, watching her with concern: "Alice, don't start overthinking yet."

Alice thought for a moment, then shook her head in confusion: "Captain, I feel like I just saw something… but I forgot!"

"I know, but it's all right. Forgetting is fine," Duncan said softly as he patted Alice's arm. "We're about to go find the answers."

"…Oh." Alice nodded, half understanding and half not.

Duncan said nothing more. While he carefully maintained the flame to protect Alice's mind, he fixed his heavy gaze on the depths of this star river.

A chain of information rose in his thoughts and slowly linked together—

Here was a frozen “holographic snapshot” of the stars. Through the long ages of the past, it had floated in the dome layer above the Abyssal Deep, above the Deep Sea, providing navigation for all the world’s mariners.

The master of the Abyssal Deep Sea, the Abyssal Lord, was called Navigator One, code LH-01.

When Alice stepped through the “black door,” she had briefly heard a voice that called her LH-03, Navigator Three.

The God of Wisdom, Rahm, had a true name: LH-02, Navigator Two. The image of that god in the scriptures always made Duncan think of a huge server, its surface flickering with countless lights.

Ten thousand years ago, a starship called the New Hope had crashed into this “ruined world.” It had tried to flee the Doomsday of its home universe, but in the final stage of its voyage, it had still broken apart and split into three pieces…

Three pieces, just enough to match three modular “hosts”…

Duncan let out a slow breath. He forced the storm of thoughts in his mind to calm down and glanced from the corner of his eye at the doll walking obediently beside him.

Now… he finally knew what the Abyssal Lord’s replicant had stuffed into this doll’s body back then, in the Deep Sea near Frostholm.

The starlight ahead gradually thinned to nothing. Beyond the dome layer lay countless shattered floating islands drifting in a dark, chaotic space.

The Abyssal Deep—the Deep Sea.

A black skeletal limb, covered in countless vicious barbs, dropped from the sky and nailed a writhing lump of flesh to the stone ground. The deformed mass swelled and squirmed as it ran, but now it was pinned in place.

That Abyssal demon, called a fear demon, let out a series of sharp, hideous shrieks. No matter how it struggled, it could not pull itself off the skeletal spike. In almost the blink of an eye, it shriveled like a punctured balloon. Thick, murky smoke rose from its surface, while what remained melted into sticky “sludge” and was quickly absorbed by the black limb.

The towering skeletal limb bent upward. At the center of twelve symmetrical limbs, a massive Abyssal demon that still kept a partly human, female shape slowly lifted her head.

Shirley calmly swept her gaze over the many broken remains on this barren land—the torn bodies of Abyssal Hounds, the death-omen birds still twitching and flapping on the ground, the Smokewisp Jellyfish and fear demon that were slowly turning into sludge, and that black skull floating crookedly in the sky, the red glow in its eye sockets flickering faintly.

Farther away, more Abyssal demons were gathering, lingering in hesitation.

Abyssal demons had no hearts. But even a demon without a heart still had some instinct to seek advantage and avoid harm—at the very least, none of them had come here just to be eaten by a stronger demon.

Shirley moved her twelve long limbs, as if she were walking across the ground on bent bone wings. She slowly headed toward the far end of the barren plain. From time to time, a badly wounded demon failed to get out of the way and was skewered by one of her long “legs,” turning into sludge that was drawn up and absorbed as nourishment.

At first, she had felt nothing but disgust about this. She had tried to step only on the clean ground, doing her best to avoid “eating” that revolting mud.

But now she no longer cared that much.

“Shirley… relax…”

She only muttered softly as she walked through the ranks of mangled demons, moving toward a direction she felt was right.

The battered black skull darted sideways in near terror, getting out of the path of this strange intruder.

But Shirley did not spare that skull even a single second of attention.

She just kept murmuring as she walked on: “…Don’t be afraid.”

On the plain, the demons drew back in fear and opened a path.

Chapter 722: The Second Beating

The huge demon with twelve symmetrical limbs and a human face finally walked away. Under the high, distant Starry Sky and the dome, her back slowly twisted and melted into the chaos far away. In the place she had occupied, there were only piles of pitch-black bones and flesh that were slowly breaking apart and drifting upward, and dozens of badly wounded “native creatures” who were struggling to recover their strength.

Several Abyssal Hounds struggled up from the heaps of bones, the plates of bone on their bodies already broken and incomplete. Death-Omen Birds circled above those lifeless remains, searching for anything useful that could help them regain their strength. The huge spiked skull slowly dropped onto the ground not far away, its dark red, hollow eye sockets staring at the demons on the plain.

After the higher-ranking demon left, a fragile and dangerous balance formed among the remaining Abyssal demons here, but this brief balance was about to be broken.

As their shared fear faded, the instincts for fighting and destroying rose again. Among the Abyssal Deep of the Deep Sea, mutual killing and devouring was the eternal rule, especially when “food” was everywhere and every demon needed to heal as fast as possible.

The Abyssal Hounds that were digging through the bones for usable plates were the first to let out hostile growls at the Death-Omen Birds circling in the sky. Right after that, Smokewisp Jellyfish floated up from the shadows, their curved, wicked tentacles quietly stretching toward the nearby Fear Demons. The black skull also slowly lifted off the ground, its jaw opening bit by bit while dangerous energy stirred inside…

Even though a moment ago they had all been pinned to the ground and ground down by that powerful, strange “outsider demon”, it still could not stop these Abyssal demons from once again falling into mutual slaughter.

But just as the melee was about to begin, an extra sound suddenly came from not far away and at once stopped the demons in their tracks.

The pitch-black skull sensed the intruder’s presence first. It shot upward and turned its head toward the direction of the sound.

A huge shadow was staggering across the plain. It seemed to have popped out of the air out of nowhere, its swelling, writhing darkness outlining a shape that kept changing.

The scene looked like those “newborn demons” that had just emerged from the limbs of a Abyssal Deep lord. They often appeared in this formless, chaotic way. Only after a time of devouring and merging would this formless “demon mass” collapse and condense into a specific kind of demon.

However, this uninvited guest on the wasteland was clearly not a “newborn demon”. For a shapeless demon mass, the aura it gave off was far too dangerous… and strange.

Their sense of danger made all the Abyssal demons present instantly drop the urge to fight each other. By instinct, they focused their guard on that constantly swelling, writhing shadow.

Inside that mass of shadow, a solid shape slowly appeared. It was… a Abyssal Hound built from countless floating broken bones, its body almost twice the size of its kind.

Dog felt that it had had a very, very long dream.

It could no longer remember what had happened in the dream, but it remembered that it had gone to a very, very faraway place. There it had met some people, some friends. It had lived among a group of weak yet orderly beings and had spent a long time learning a set of “rules for survival”.

And a similarly weak… creature had always stayed by its side.

…Right. Where had that little weak creature gone?

Dog slowly raised its head. Its foggy vision seemed to be covered by a heavy Veil. Everything it saw looked twisted and layered. This place… looked a bit familiar, but Dog felt it had not been back here for a very long time.

Dog felt that it did not like this place—it liked much more the place where it had lived with that “little creature”, a place lit by sunlight.

In the hazy mist and the Veil, many vague shapes gathered around. Low roars and whispers came from all directions, distant and blurred. They sounded like threats, like malice.

Dog tried hard to open its eyes wide to see what those shadows that were growling at it really looked like, but it still could not see clearly. Little by little, though, it felt something else.

That feeling came from itself—hunger.

Dog was hungry, very, very hungry, as if it had not eaten for a century and had suddenly come to a place… rich with food.

Driven by that hunger, its muddled mind finally began to recall some impressions related to that long “dream”.

It remembered that little weak creature. Dog remembered that it had kept that little one company through many long winter nights. When the weather was very cold, they wrapped themselves in blankets and hid in the house together…

They shared the hot soup from a kind neighbor. Dog only drank one mouthful each time…

They learned together how to survive in that huge city-state, how to understand the kindness and malice in people's hearts, and how to tell which things in the trash cans were useful and which were dangerous…

Begging, tricks, factories, chimneys, stealing, getting beaten, charity soup, working hard, eating their fill, crying together, laughing together, together…

…living.

In the layered blur of the Veil, those snarls full of threat and hostility rose and fell, growing more and more restless. Then a swift shadow suddenly rushed over from some direction and launched a fierce attack at Dog.

Dog felt something bite into its body—it hurt a little.

Inside the swelling, writhing shadows, Dog's skull lowered its gaze. Deep in its hollow eye sockets, a faint green light flickered on and off as it looked, with a hint of curiosity, at the thing biting into its body.

A Abyssal Hound—it looked like one of its own kind.

Dog's body quickly took shape in the shadows and black mist. Strange bone pieces stretched out from its joints, helping it regain the proper form of a Abyssal Hound. It looked at that "same kind" that was tearing at its body and, after a few seconds, finally spoke in a somewhat rusty voice: "Have you seen a human? She is my friend."

The Abyssal Hound that was tearing at Dog's body suddenly stopped in hesitation. It was not because it had understood Dog's question—it did not yet have that kind of mind.

It had only sensed a huge danger. Deep inside Dog’s eye sockets, where a dim green light burned, there hid a very familiar, terrifying aura.

This Abyssal Hound finally reacted, but it was already too late. It had only just opened its jaws when, in the next second, all the bones on Dog’s body suddenly shattered and changed shape. Countless black bones exploded outward, wrapping around the attacker like a whirlwind, and in the blink of an eye regrouped outside the other’s body into Dog’s form again.

Using the mouth to eat was inefficient. Swallowing the whole thing at once was much more efficient.

The reckless attacker vanished. Only Dog’s tall figure remained in place. The black bones at Dog’s torso squeezed and writhed fiercely. From inside came the grinding and crunching of bones, along with the violent struggle and low, muffled snarls of the “food”. But after only a few seconds, the struggle and snarls slowly faded, leaving only the noise of bones grinding against each other.

The hunger eased.

Dog raised its head, sensing its strength slowly returning.

“Demons… taste good…”

The feast had begun.

Amid the roars and rambling cries of countless demons, Dog’s figure suddenly turned into countless black bone fragments that burst apart and flew in all directions. They swept over the whole wasteland like a broken storm. The bones cut through everything within reach—whether the living demons, the dust rising from demon remains on the ground, the mud flowing over the earth, or even the rocks on the surface and those thorny thickets that looked like fossils. All of them were torn apart by this storm and turned into “food”.

Those Abyssal demons that refused to be devoured launched a futile counterattack. Their fierce resistance only helped fill Dog’s belly. Some demons that were better at telling danger from gain ran madly toward the end of the wasteland to escape that feeding storm. After paying the price of wounds and even losing parts of their bodies, only a dozen or so demons, badly hurt, fled to a place that was somewhat safer.

The storm lasted for who knew how long before it finally faded over the wasteland. From the storm, a huge figure then took shape, its whole body burning with dim green flame and trailing black smoke.

The hunger had gone. Dog raised its head and looked toward some place deeper in the wasteland. It faintly felt a familiar presence in the distance.

That seemed to be the “little creature” that had lived with it for a very long time.

After a few seconds of slow and muddled thought, Dog slowly turned its gaze and found a rather large demon remnant on the messy wasteland. It lowered its head, picked up that remnant in its mouth, and let out a vague murmur from its throat: “Shirley… I found food…”

It took big steps and ran toward the depths of the wasteland.

Among the wreckage and remains, the few surviving demons got up, trembling, and stared blankly into the distance.

They had survived two feasts—by luck, they had not become food, or at least had not been eaten clean.

And that trace of dim green light that had appeared in the feast was still deeply burned into the dull, confused minds of these demons.

That was fear, a kind of fear that was unconditionally stamped into the deepest logic of almost all Abyssal demons, strong enough to press down even on their chaotic instincts.

The huge skull demon, covered in spikes and black from top to bottom, floated in the air, wobbling. A full third of its body had been “gnawed” away by that storm just now, but it had still stubbornly survived. This monster, which seemed to be a bit “smarter” than normal demons, swayed a few times in the air, let out a vague mutter, and then slowly flew off into the distance.

But it suddenly stopped again.

This skull demon seemed to sense something. It jerked its head up and looked toward the dome of the Abyssal Deep above, where the frozen Starry Sky spread.

A streak of dim green fire like a shooting star was falling from the sky, dropping straight toward this wasteland!

Maybe the repeated shocks had simply been too much. At the instant that “shooting star” appeared, a hazy, chaotic “thought” actually rose in the dull, simple mind of the skull demon—

Ah, the third beating is here…

Chapter 723: Under the Dim Starry Sky

A streak of dim green flame fell like a meteor from that frozen dome of the Starry Sky, tracing a bright line before crashing down onto the barren plain full of strange rocks.

Then the flame burst apart and blossomed in midair. In the falling sparks, Duncan and Alice stepped out of it and finally set foot in this unknown world.

Before the light faded, Duncan noticed those twisted, terrifying shapes in the distance. More than a dozen Abyssal demons were gathered around the edge of the landing point, looking strangely dazed for some reason.

He and those demons stared at each other. For a moment, the air felt oddly frozen.

Only when the slow-to-react Alice finally yelled out did that frozen air break: “Captain! We’re surrounded!”

“…I see that.” Duncan answered lightly, and at the same time he was already ready to “deal with” those demons.

The dozen or so monsters in the distance were clearly different from the Abyssal demons he had seen in the Mortal Realm, the ones summoned by Annihilators. Their limbs were far more twisted. Some bodies even showed strange dislocations and cracks. The skull demon floating in midair had a horrifying hole at the top of its head. It did not look easy to handle at all.

In Duncan’s understanding, with twisted things like Abyssal demons, the more twisted and wrong they looked, the stronger they were. The demons in front of him were twisted almost to the point of breaking. They had to be top fighters in the Abyssal Deep Sea, very different from those small fry in the Mortal Realm who ran as soon as they saw him…

But what he did not expect was this: just as he finished getting ready to “say hello” to the local natives with his fists, that group of monsters in the distance suddenly seemed to come to their senses. They burst out in a mess of roars and hoarse cries, then scattered in all directions. In the blink of an eye, half of them were already gone.

The other half were not staying because they did not want to run, but because they simply could not. They were limping and stumbling. That skull demon that looked so terrifying could fly, but when it flew it was like an old diesel engine with a broken cylinder. It wobbled as it floated a little way, black smoke puffing from the big hole in its head with every two sways, then it fell to the ground. After a few struggles it floated up again, puffed out two more bursts of black smoke, and fell down again…

Even with an optimistic guess, it could fly at most six meters in half a minute. Most of the time it just sat there puffing smoke.

Duncan and Alice: “…?”

After the two of them stood there stunned for a while, Duncan finally noticed the messy marks on the ground around the landing point. Many remains that were almost beyond recognition lay scattered among pits and gullies, pouring out thick smoke as they sank into the ground. Deep craters and gouges marked the earth everywhere, as if some crushing force had scraped off a whole layer of the land. It was a terrifying sight.

At first, Duncan had thought these marks were just “natural scenery” in the Abyssal Deep Sea. After all, he had been told from the start that this place was a “broken wasteland”. But now he finally realized… this was a battlefield left after a fierce fight.

Something had arrived here ahead of them and had almost killed all the Abyssal demons in the center of the wasteland. The dozen or so demons in the distance were just a group of lucky survivors—

So it turned out their twisted shapes had really been twisted by someone.

Alice also came back to her senses at this time. She stared around with wide eyes and noticed the black bones scattered in a nearby hollow. At once she grabbed Duncan’s arm: “Captain! This place is covered in demon remains!”

Duncan glanced at the wobbling skull demon that was trying its best to fly in the distance, and at a few Death-Omen Birds hopping on one leg on the ground. He spoke with some thought: “…So the fight already happened…”

“Who did all this?” Alice looked quite uneasy. The scene around them made her nervous. “Are the Abyssal demons’ usual fights this intense?”

For a moment Duncan did not answer. He only bent down to examine a piece of bone that had been burned almost to charcoal, then opened his hand above that fragment.

A tiny spark of dim green flame, almost invisible to the naked eye, drifted out from the charred bone and floated down into his palm.

That weak spark still carried the “memories” left on this battlefield not long ago.

“It was Shirley and Dog.” After a moment, Duncan looked up toward the far end of the vast wasteland. “They both came here before us… In theory, these marks were left by them.”

Alice listened, her face going blank for a second as she failed to process it: “…Shirley and Dog are that strong?”

“It seems something has happened to them, some great… change.” Duncan frowned, his face turning serious. “Especially Shirley. The feeling she gives me now is not quite right.”

As he spoke, he turned his gaze, following the direction in his senses where the aura of the Marks on Shirley and Dog came from.

Boundless chaos filled this endless dimension. The frozen ancient Starry Sky hung high above, covering the dome of the Abyssal Deep Sea. The dim starlight shone on broken floating islands in this chaotic space. Within his sight, he could see many large and small shadows drifting in the dull starlight. All of them were pieces of land floating in midair, and the “wasteland” where he and Alice were standing now also seemed to be only one part of those many broken islands.

The whole Abyssal Deep Sea, was formed from these countless broken floating islands. They drifted in a chaotic space covered by the frozen ancient Starry Sky, and the whole space was filled with a bleak, deathly air.

Duncan withdrew his gaze and looked at the doll at his side: “Do you feel anything special right now? Can you see or hear any unusual information?”

Alice listened carefully inside herself, then shook her head: “Nothing for now.”

“Mm.” Duncan nodded lightly, then raised his hand and pointed into the distance: “The Marks on Shirley and Dog are in that direction and still moving. We’ll go after them.”

“Okay!” Alice nodded at once. As she followed Duncan’s steps, she muttered under her breath: “Shirley must be terrified… She’s actually very timid… Dog isn’t very brave either…”

Those two figures, who gave off a terrifying aura, finally walked off into the distance—they did not seem to have any wish to cause trouble here.

The skull demon floating crookedly in midair trembled a little, the red light in its eye sockets flickering. It watched the two uninvited guests leave, and for the first time, the idea of “relief” appeared in its dull, simple mind.

A Death-Omen Bird with only one leg and half a wing hopped through the nearby rubble. Two almost flattened Fear Demons crawled slowly through cracks in the ground. A few Abyssal Hounds, nearly torn into quarters, were struggling to drag themselves farther away.

What a wonderful day.

A long limb covered in bone spurs stabbed down from the sky like a sword, pinning a strange demon that had just opened its mouth to roar and gather its breath to the ground. Then this limb stepped forward again, striding toward the end of the wilds.

On the twelve symmetrical limbs, countless strange and fearsome demon creatures of all sizes were skewered. Some of these twisted, ugly things were still struggling and roaring, but most no longer moved. They gave off thick smoke and slowly turned into mud.

But the master of those limbs no longer cared about them. After trekking for who knew how long, she finally reached the end of this piece of land.

The land floating in the chaotic darkness was an isolated island, and beyond its edge there was only endless nothingness. At the rim of this wild plain, rock and soil simply stopped. A faint mist drifted from the broken edge of the land, circling the island like a low, flowing layer of clouds.

Shirley carefully stopped at the end of the land. She used her barbed limbs to hook into cracks in the rock and cautiously leaned forward at the edge of the floating island to glance down, then quickly pulled back her gaze.

There was no road ahead.

What should she do next?

She thought about it, standing still at the end of the plain like a statue, for a time as if dead.

But the demons that circled and hesitated around her knew that this strong and terrifying “outsider” was still alive—for in her ribcage made of bones, two dark red hearts and a small flame still beat slowly, unending.

After who knew how long, Shirley finally woke from her thoughts. She controlled her limbs and stepped back two paces, trying to lower her height—she was tired and wanted to sit down and rest for a few minutes.

After a few tries, she finally sat down in a clumsy and slow way and carefully folded the bone structures on her back, which were like huge wings of bone.

She sat on a large rock like that and lifted her head, staring blankly at the frozen, ancient Starry Sky above.

That Starry Sky was very cold, wrapped in a dead and desolate air. It was like a huge, grand but lifeless corpse, looking down on all things with billions of cold eyes.

It was truly beautiful, but also truly frightening. She felt as if she were about to fall into that crowded field of stars and become their avatar, a part of them. At the same time she felt as if they were pressing down on her, pinning her to this broken and barren land.

What words should she use to describe such a sight and such a feeling?

Shirley thought hard and seriously. She suddenly felt a bit sorry that she had not listened to the captain before and read more books. Then she would have known many words, instead of thinking for so long and only managing to squeeze out one sentence—

“…It’s so damn pretty…”

Then footsteps suddenly sounded nearby, cutting off Shirley’s sigh and finally making the demons that had been hiding in the dark, ready to move yet still timid and afraid, retreat at last.

Shirley slowly turned her head and saw a Abyssal Hound taller than all the others, its whole body made of broken bones floating in black smoke, walking out of the shadows.

It came closer with care, dim green fire burning in its hollow eye sockets. It seemed to be hesitating. It looked nervous and unsure. It paced back and forth more than ten meters away for a long time before slowly stepping nearer and putting down the lump it was holding in its mouth.

“…Shirley, I found food…”

That line sounded very familiar.

Chapter 724: Reforging

The strangely familiar words threw Shirley into a brief daze. Her memories rose and fell like waves in a faded sea. From the dim, unreal foam, some old warmth and color slowly surfaced. Only after a long time did she sluggishly come back to herself and look at the massive Abyssal Hound not far away, an Anomaly in size.

It was still there waiting, filled with hesitation and nerves, and a bit of confusion.

As if sticky mud covered its mind, Dog felt many wrong places inside its head. Its past memories were blurry. Its thoughts now broke off again and again. It was not sure what had gone wrong. It only felt that… something seemed to be missing from its heart.

A faint light flickered in its hollow eye sockets as Dog stared at the nearby Abyssal demon with the strange bony limbs, a figure that looked oddly familiar. The world around it swam.

It had never met her, yet it knew her – it had known her a very, very long time ago.

[The tiny kid in my memories… why did she become like this?]

After hesitating for who knew how long, Dog finally walked forward, carefully and slowly. It sniffed around first, then stepped past those long, barbed limbs and came to stand before Shirley.

Shirley silently fixed her gaze on the tall Abyssal Hound. After a few minutes she slowly stood up and put her hand on Dog's head: "Why did you become weird too?"

Dog tilted its head in a dull way. It seemed to want to say something, but before it could speak, it felt a push at the back of its neck – Shirley suddenly reached out, wrapped her arms around Dog's neck, and pulled it hard into her arms.

"…I thought I wouldn't be able to find you…" she muttered in a low voice. Her late-coming fear made her voice tremble a little. "You suddenly fell down. I couldn't hold on to you at all…"

Dog's head felt even heavier. Its sluggish thoughts broke apart over and over and almost could not form a clear line. But at that moment, Dog suddenly heard a sound.

Thump, thump – that was a familiar heartbeat.

Dog was pressed against Shirley's chest. Through the grim, crisscrossed bones, the sound of two hearts beating slowly seemed to smash through the haze in its head. It woke up as if from a long muddy dream. With every beat, its memories rushed back. The light in its sockets grew brighter. At last it broke the silence and spoke, struggling a little: "Shirley, I… back then…"

But Shirley did not loosen her arms. Still hugging Dog's neck, she said softly: "I know, Dog… I already know."

The fire in Dog's eye sockets flickered once. It stopped struggling and asked in a hesitant tone: "When… when did you find out?"

"When I first learned that Abyssal demons don't have hearts," Shirley answered quietly.

Dog fell silent. It stayed there with its neck trapped in her arms, not moving, lost in thought. Only after a long time did it mumble: “I’m sorry…”

“It’s fine,” Shirley answered almost at once. Then she let go of Dog’s neck a little and looked very seriously at the Abyssal Hound that had stayed with her for twelve years and had almost raised her, nodding slowly as if to make the point clear. “It’s fine – you were always with me.”

Dog nodded in a slow, clumsy way. While a little comfort rose in its heart, a faint haze also suddenly returned to its mind.

That sluggish feeling, the broken memories, came back again in waves.

“Shirley, my head feels all foggy…” it blurted out.

“It might be because of this.” Shirley reacted at once, then lowered her head to look at her own chest. Two hearts were beating inside her ribcage. But soon she frowned. “…But I don’t think I can take them out anymore…”

As she spoke, she reached up and tapped the crossed bone plates on her chest, as if trying to open that sturdy “bone cage” again.

“Don’t touch them,” Dog said at once, stopping her. “You’ll die!”

Shirley froze and stared at Dog, lost: “Then… what are we supposed to do?”

Dog did not answer. Its gaze fell on Shirley’s right hand. The broken chain hung there. At the end of the chain, a faint ghostly green flame still burned.

Shirley followed its gaze. Her eyes landed on the same spot, and they had the same thought.

“…Fix this?” she asked, hesitating. “Would that work?”

“In theory I think it would. We’ve always relied on the symbiotic pact to keep us in balance, but…” Dog muttered, not very sure. “This has never happened before. It’s unheard of for someone with a broken Pact chain to live this long. And to repair the chain after that… even more impossible. To be honest, I don’t know how to do it.”

Shirley listened with a serious, thoughtful look. Then she picked up the broken piece of chain, found the other end near Dog’s neck, and held the two breaks together, fiddling for half a minute. She looked up: “…Putting them together like this doesn’t work.”

“Of course it doesn’t – even a normal chain needs a blacksmith to mend it!” Dog shook its head right away, then dropped down because of the dizziness swaying in its mind. “This thing might need a strict ‘recasting’ process… The important part isn’t the chain itself. It’s the symbiotic pact between us…”

Shirley listened hard and tried to think, but she still could not help grumbling: “In the end… how did the chain suddenly snap in the first place? I only remember you suddenly saying you felt unwell in that cavern, and then you sank into the ground…”

“I’m sure it’s tied to the Abyssal Lord, and it’s also tied to those ‘truths’ you suddenly ‘saw’ on that plaza before,” Dog said. It fought the haze in its head while forcing itself to analyze. “There were prophetic omens before the chain broke. The first changes happened right after you ‘saw’ the memories of Holy Land Island…”

It suddenly stopped halfway through, as if it had caught some possibility. A moment later it went on: “…Those cultists were twisted by corruption the instant they learned the ‘truth’. They turned back from humans into ‘Rough Husks’. You were under the Captain’s protection, so it looked like you weren’t affected by the corruption at the time – but what if the corruption still worked anyway?”

Shirley froze and lowered her head to look at her current body.

Dog kept thinking aloud beside her: “You formed a symbiotic pact with me, a Abyssal demon, from the very start. That was long before you met the Captain. So the ‘corruption’ had already taken root in your nature. The memories of Holy Land Island woke it up. They awakened your Abyssal demon side. Because that power was already inside you, it partly slipped past the Captain’s protection…

“The chain between humans and Abyssal demons is, in truth, a ‘symbiotic pact contract’ between two living beings. This kind of contract has strict conditions to exist. In other words, when your nature changed, it broke the conditions for the contract…

“It’s like a business contract. If one side loses the ability to fulfill it because of some force they can’t resist, the contract naturally fails…”

Shirley listened, stunned and dazed. After a long moment she finally asked: “So… what then?”

Dog thought it over: “If we can’t fix it, we make a new one. Maybe we can build a new symbiotic pact contract – not based on how you used to be, but on how you are now.”

This time Shirley understood.

Hope lit up again in her chest, and her energy came back at once: “Then what should we do? How is a symbiotic pact contract normally made?”

She and Dog had been “in a symbiotic pact” for more than ten years, but from the start it had never been a normal contract. She had never held a summoning ritual like the usual Annihilators, so she knew almost nothing about this.

But Dog clearly knew a lot more than she did.

“For Annihilators, the hardest part of a ‘symbiotic pact contract’ is the preparation. They usually have to reshape themselves with a whole series of ritual acts, including all kinds of bloody ‘surgeries’ and mental remolding. This is mixed with many dark and evil dealings, all so their life form becomes closer to the ‘primordial’ state. Only then can they withstand the power of Abyssal demons. But for you, that’s actually the least important part.

“You can skip it completely. You’re already closer to that so-called ‘primordial’ state than any Annihilator, and you’ve long adapted to the power of demons.

“So all you need to do is carry out a simple summoning ritual – that’s actually the easiest part.”

As Dog spoke, it staggered to its feet and began walking slowly across the rubble-strewn wasteland. With its claws it carved deep grooves into the ground. It was drawing a complex set of runes, writing the “text” of the contract.

“Form a link… summon a demon… That part is simple for us. I can prepare all the runes and the site for the ritual. I’ll also provide the power needed to start the array. All you have to do is stand on the node at the edge of the ritual field. When I’m ready, you picture the demon you want to summon in your mind.”

It looked up and met Shirley’s eyes as she watched with curiosity. Dog continued very seriously:

“Normally this summoning can take a full day or even longer. It opens a rift, and you wait until a demon willing to answer appears at the center of the rune matrix. Then the contract is formed. But…”

As it spoke, Dog slowly walked toward the center of the runes. Around it, more and more symbols began to light up.

“But Shirley, you don’t need to wait that long – I’m already here.”

Chapter 725: Knowledge Changed Fate

All the runes were ready. The “text” of the symbiotic pact contract was written on the ground of the Abyssal Deep, in the soil of the Deep Sea. The summoner stood in place. The demon had also taken the proper position. All the conditions to start the ritual were now complete.

Dog stood in the center of the rune matrix. Its eyes, lit by dim green flame, fixed their gaze on Shirley at the edge of the array. As its mind grew more and more muddled, it slowly nodded.

With Dog’s encouragement, Shirley walked to the node of the array and tried to calm her thoughts.

She knew nothing about these complex runes. She had never received any formal occult studies training. She knew even less about the deep, dark rituals of Annihilators. Now she was full of unease. Faced with these mysterious symbols, she felt nothing but nerves.

But she trusted Dog – she needed this friend. She had to reforge their bond.

She took a light breath and slowly closed her eyes, using all her memories and imagination to sketch the demon she wanted to “summon”.

That figure had already long been carved deep into her mind over many years. She did not even need to draw it carefully in her heart. The familiar shape rose up in her thoughts at once.

The runes on the ground began to glow slowly. The Ancient Communication Protocol of the Deep Sea era woke with its own strange logic and shape. A hidden, subtle sense of connection appeared at the same time in both Shirley's and Dog's awareness. As the rune matrix brightened, that link grew steadier…

Yet only a few seconds later, all the runes went dark with no warning at all. The link that had just formed snapped in an instant. A short, piercing screech split the air, making all of Dog's charred bone plates rattle and the twelve bony limbs behind Shirley shiver.

Shirley jerked out of her trance, eyes wide with shock as she saw all the runes die at once. Her body swayed. At the same time she saw Dog in the center of the array snap its head up.

The ritual to reforge the symbiotic pact contract had failed.

"How could this happen…" Confusion filled Shirley's face. She glanced at the runes she did not understand at all, then looked up at Dog, who looked just as lost. "Did I mess something up? Or did you get the runes wrong?"

"That shouldn't be… I felt it start up…" Dog was clearly puzzled too. It stepped away from the spot that stood for "demon" and came to Shirley's side to examine the area around the node. "These runes are definitely right. This knowledge is almost burned straight into my mind. You should have done fine too, or they wouldn't have lit up… I don't know where it went wrong… The whole process just jammed halfway…"

Shirley frowned hard. She noticed the fire in Dog's eye sockets had begun to dim, and its speech was breaking. She grew flustered at once: "I… let's try again!"

Dog nodded at once: "Yes, try again!"

They returned to their positions and ran through the process once more – but the result was the same.

The rune array flickered into life for a moment, but only held for a few seconds. Then, like a broken machine, it “jammed” and shut down completely with a short shriek.

Shirley started to panic. In that brief link just now, she had felt Dog’s state growing worse and worse. Reason and humanity were fading from it. In its waves of confusion, it could hardly even recognize her shape.

As the dizziness grew stronger and its thoughts cut out more often, Dog staggered over to the node where Shirley stood. It could barely support its body, so it forced itself to lie down. It tried to focus and spoke in a low voice: “No… I must still be missing something… The ritual layout is… is fine. The problem should be… in our current special states. We have to… make an adjustment…”

“Adjust? Adjust how?” Shirley asked quickly. “Should I stand somewhere else? Is the node in the wrong place? Or is this area not suitable…”

But Dog seemed no longer able to hear her. Its head drooped. Disturbing clicking came from inside its body. Its skull swayed from side to side, and only a string of low murmurs came out, words that Shirley could not understand at all.

Just then, Shirley suddenly sensed a familiar presence. A deep, stern voice followed, one that in this moment made her feel both safe and overjoyed: “What are you doing?”

Shirley and the groggy Dog lifted their heads almost at the same time and looked toward the voice.

Duncan and Alice stood not far away in the wasteland.

“Captain!?” After a short pause and blank stare, Shirley reacted with a jolt. She seemed to forget how her body had changed. When she stepped forward, she almost tripped over herself. But she quickly caught her balance with her long bony limbs behind her and rushed to Duncan. “Captain, you have to help Dog. It… it’s in terrible shape. Our link is broken, and the reforging ritual just now also failed, and I don’t know…”

“Stop, stop, slow down,” Duncan quickly raised a hand to cut off Shirley’s fast babbling. He frowned a little as he looked at the girl before him, who had changed into a completely different form. He could still confirm by her mark that this was the Shirley he knew, but her current demon posture shocked him. Dog in the distance also looked very different. “What exactly happened to you two?”

Shirley froze, her lips trembling a little: “I… our chain broke.”

Dog seemed to recover a bit just then. It struggled to raise its head: “We… tried to hold the symbiotic pact contract ritual again, but the ritual failed…”

“The ritual failed?” Duncan frowned at once. As he walked toward the rough, makeshift array on the ground, he asked: “What exactly happened?”

“It started up and then suddenly stopped,” Shirley said. She braced herself with her limbs as she followed Duncan and quickly explained what had happened, repeating the “knowledge” Dog had just shared with her. “…I stood here, and Dog stood in the position for the ‘demon’, but it didn’t work…”

As she spoke, she stepped past the Dog that still could not move and hurried into the center of the array. She pointed at the ground while explaining to Duncan: “This was where Dog stood just now. The runes all lit up around here, just… like they’re… now…?”

She trailed off.

She had seen the runes around her suddenly give off a faint glow. Next, every rune in the array began to light up one by one and flash in a complex pattern.

Duncan, who had only just worked out how this so-called “contract ritual” flowed, also saw this. His expression slowly grew a bit odd: “…?”

Shirley and Dog shared the same reaction: “…?”

The ancient communication protocol had taken effect.

Alice saw special “lines” stretch out at the same time from both Shirley and Dog. In the blink of an eye, those lines met in the air, guided together by the dim light of the array. They merged and quickly underwent a transformation into solid matter, reforging the broken chain.

The process happened so fast there was no time to react. By the time Shirley truly realized what was going on, the chain between her and Dog was already whole again.

Then the Pact Array finished its duty. All the runes completely darkened and slowly took on a dry, ashen look of exhaustion.

Shirley stood in the center of the array, stunned for a moment. At last she stepped away from the “demon” position. She lifted her arm. The black symbiotic pact chain clattered and rattled. At the other end of the chain, Dog, now recovered, slowly pushed itself up from the ground and shook its huge skull.

The fire that had almost gone out in its eye sockets burned bright once more. It shone again with the wisdom of someone who had reached the absolute peak of high school graduation, half a step into City-State University.

The air grew a little awkward for half a minute.

“So, if I understand this right,” Duncan said at last. He stood beside the ruins of the array, looking at the two “crew members” before him, whose chain had been rebuilt while their forms stayed the same. “Dog, you really are Shirley’s ‘guardian dog’ now. And Shirley… you’re now Dog’s ‘contract human’.”

Shirley stared blankly. Dog also froze in place.

Alice had been spacing out at the side this whole time. Now she finally reacted and suddenly asked: “Why did it turn out like this…”

Shirley kept staring.

But Dog’s wisdom suddenly got moving again. It thought for a moment and then spoke, hesitant: “…Purity.”

Duncan’s look turned strange: “Purity?”

Dog lifted its head and pointed at Shirley, who now had some human features but, overall, looked almost like a full Abyssal demon: “Her purity as a Abyssal demon… is very high.”

“…That’s not right,” Shirley finally snapped out of her daze. After hearing Dog, she spoke at once. “No matter how pure I am, I can’t be purer than you. I just have the demon part of me showing on the outside. You’re from ‘over there’ from the start…”

Listening to their wild yet very serious analysis, Duncan looked at Shirley, then at Dog. He also felt this whole thing was rather unbelievable, so he couldn’t help thinking it over. Then a strange idea popped into his mind, one he could not quite push away: “Maybe…”

Shirley and Dog spoke together: “Maybe?”

“Maybe it has to do with Dog being ‘marked’ by the god of wisdom Rahm,” Duncan said. He thought a bit, and though he knew the idea sounded ridiculous, he still looked very serious. “It didn’t get dragged away back then, but now it really is the god of wisdom’s Saint – that is probably the reason.”

Shirley’s expression went blank again: “…”

After a short pause, Duncan stepped forward and patted Shirley’s arm (she was so tall now that he could no longer reach her head). He spoke in a heavy, heartfelt tone: “This is why I always say that knowledge changes fate.”

Chapter 726: Shirley & Dog

On the shattered floating island under the frozen starlight, Dog and Shirley walked to the edge of the land and sat down, staring into space.

A pitch-black chain extended from Shirley's arm, which was covered in black bone plates, and linked to the back of Dog's neck. Their two minds flowed quietly along the connection formed by the chain, blending together, sharing reason and humanity—just as they had for the past twelve years.

They had a lot they wanted to talk about. In that short yet terrifying time after the chain broke, this pair of "partners" who had relied on each other for twelve years had faced things they had never imagined. Even Shirley, who hated thinking the most, now found herself reflecting on life.

Of course, they also had to think seriously about how to adapt to this new relationship—"guardian dog" and "contracted human", a setup that would blow everyone's mind if the world ever heard about it…

Duncan did not disturb them. Instead, he took Alice a little farther from the edge of the floating island and, while he waited, looked around to study the strange environment of the Abyssal Deep.

It was very quiet all around. On the wasteland under the dim starry sky, he saw no sign of life.

Many Abyssal demons had gathered here before, but to avoid another beating they had all fled long ago. Now only a barren plain full of strange black rocks remained, along with some jagged, rising and falling shadows in the distance.

If he had not known he was in the Abyssal Deep, Duncan would have thought the scene before him belonged on a barren alien world. The land around him looked like the surface of a dead planet, and the frozen starry sky above gave off a bleak, heavy feeling. It was not a pleasant environment at all.

And if he remembered that the only “animals” here were countless savage demons, and that their daily life was to gnaw on each other, gnaw on rocks, and be gnawed on by their own kind, then this place was even farther from anything that could be called “livable”.

“…I’m starting to think the Four Gods Church’s plan isn’t reliable,” Duncan said casually. “I mean the plan about settling in the Abyssal Deep. In a hellhole like this, even if humans really managed to survive, they’d be twisted beyond recognition. A ‘civilization’ that is no longer human at all—can that still be called human civilization? I really doubt it.”

Alice thought for a moment, half understanding, half not.

But she did not seem bothered by the environment at all. She even adapted to it very well. She was still wandering around in high spirits. The bare plain and the dim light did nothing to affect this doll’s good mood. She ran over to pick up a strangely shaped rock and happily held it out to Duncan: “Captain! Look, look, a rock!”

Duncan pulled his thoughts back at once and looked at the rock Alice had picked up with a serious, grave expression: “What is special about this rock?”

“From the side, doesn’t it look a lot like Goathead?” The doll girl burst into a smile, her face full of pride. “I saw it at a glance!”

Duncan: “…”

While he was still stunned, Alice ran off again. She dug around among the jagged rocks nearby, brought back a handful of things, and showed them to Duncan in delight: “And these! Don’t they look like tree branches?”

Duncan looked at the twigs in Alice’s hands. They had seen a lot of these along the way. They looked like thin branches of some kind of shrub, growing from cracks in the rocks. Their surface carried grayish-white lines, yet they only had bare stems and no leaves at all. Their shape was very strange.

At first glance, anyone would instinctively think they were a kind of plant unique to the Abyssal Deep.

But Alice casually snapped one of the twigs and pointed at the broken end: “Look, this thing is stone too.”

Duncan frowned slightly and took the broken twig from Alice, curiously examining the cross section. The thing seemed very brittle. The break was neat and sharp and had the same texture as the black and gray stones on the ground around them. But when Duncan held it up under the starlight and looked more closely, he saw tiny glimmers faintly reflecting from the break, as if fine metallic dust or fibers were mixed inside it.

Then he raised his head and looked toward the wide space in the distance under the dim starry sky. Large and small broken islands floated in this dimension. Some were almost as big as the greatest city-states on the Boundless Sea, while others were only large rocks. But no matter how big an “island” was, they all had one thing in common in their structure:

The lower half of every floating island was a regular “disk”. At the bottom of each disk he could see many clustered downward-pointing shapes like stone stalagmites turned upside down. Massive structures of unclear shape linked those hanging spires together, as if forming the “base” that supported each floating island.

Duncan frowned a little. He could not help but think of the “mirror world island” he had seen once on the seabed near Frostholm. That black mirror world island, which floated in the Abyssal Deep, also looked as barren and raw as these broken floating islands. The whole island had been covered with the same kind of “black stone” material, with that faint metallic feel.

Clearly, they were made of the same kind of thing.

If those Black Mud Homunculi shaped like humans were the “Rough Husks” of people, then that barren, dark mirror world on the seabed near Frostholm had been the “Rough Husk” of a city-state. And here in the Abyssal Deep… it seemed to be packed full of “Rough Husks” of city-states.

Maybe these were the raw “blanks” the Abyssal Lord had used during the third Long Night. Or, to put it another way… were they the “half-finished products” of the many islands on the Boundless Sea?

If all of these were half-finished… then it was clear that when the Abyssal Lord had first built the Sanctuary World, He had planned something far grander: more islands, more city-states, wider living spaces, richer resources. It was even possible that, in the original plan, the Boundless Sea was meant to be many times larger than the world people knew today.

But now these “half-finished products” only floated quietly in this cage-like space, letting the years pass, forgotten by both the mortal world and the gods. Only the dull, chaotic Abyssal demons fought here day after day, keeping up a meaningless cycle and “balance” of matter.

Suddenly, footsteps came from the side and pulled Duncan out of his thoughts.

He looked up toward the sound and saw two tall figures walking over. One was Shirley, still in her Abyssal demon form. The other was Dog, whose mind had completely recovered.

“Looks like you’re done talking.” Duncan took the initiative to walk forward, breaking the silence first.

“Thank you for giving us time,” Dog lowered his head and said politely. “I hope we didn’t delay anything.”

“We still have a lot to do—but we’re not in such a hurry that we can’t spare ten minutes,” Duncan said casually, while he watched Shirley’s and Dog’s faces. (He mainly watched Shirley’s, since it was hard to read any expression on Dog’s bony skull.) “You both seem to be in good shape. Have you talked about what to do from now on? I mean your new contract relationship… this unheard-of case where a demon summoned a contracted human.”

Even as he said it, Duncan himself felt that the words sounded strange. But Shirley and Dog seemed very calm when they heard him. Dog even shook his head carelessly: “That’s not a big deal. Shirley and I both feel it doesn’t change much for us…”

Alice’s eyes went wide in surprise: “No change at all?”

“Yeah,” Dog said, utterly at ease. “Shirley has always been the one charging around with her head down, and I’ve always been the one holding the chain so she doesn’t cause trouble. How did the captain put it… oh, ‘the dog walking the person’. We’ve lived like that for more than ten years. Isn’t it still the same now?”

Duncan and Alice looked at each other. After a few seconds, they spoke in unison: “That… does make sense…”

Listening at the side, Shirley drooped her head so low it almost fell into her chest. She muttered in embarrassment: “Can we not talk about this… I’m not that reckless…”

Duncan felt that this young lady's words had no force at all. From the day she first swung Dog on his chain and threw him out to beat people, she had never again been able to clear her name of being "reckless"…

But after this little interruption, he did feel a bit more at ease. It really seemed that Shirley and Dog did not care much about this "small matter" of the contract changing, and that spared him a lot of needless worry.

Shirley lowered her head and glanced at Dog, who was linked to her. She gently shook her arm, making the chain clatter.

The chain still bound them together, just like always. Whether one was human and the other a demon, whether one shared whose humanity, whose heart beat in whose chest… none of that was very important.

They were "Shirley and Dog"—and they always would be. As long as they stayed together, that was enough.

"Then there's only one other question left." After a few seconds of quiet, Duncan cleared his throat and broke the silence. He looked up at Shirley, who now "stood grown up", almost three meters tall when her skeletal limbs held her up. "In this form… can you still change back?"

"I can," Shirley nodded right away, but then her expression turned a little hesitant. "After the chain was restored, Dog and I 'noticed' a way to take control of my body again, it's just…"

Duncan looked puzzled: "Just what?"

"There's a tiny bit of side effect…" Dog muttered at the side.

As soon as he finished speaking, Shirley began to control her new body and transform it back toward a human form—

With a series of cracking sounds as bones reshaped and clouds of smoke rising, her huge body shrank quickly within the haze. In just a few seconds, she returned to a normal human height and size. The frightening black bone plates and spikes all withdrew into her body. Her once-mature face also went back to how she usually looked, except for…

Her eyes, which still glowed with a faint red light.

She looked up at Duncan with those eyes now completely covered by red light and spoke in a helpless tone: “This is a Abyssal demon trait. I can’t get rid of it. Dog can go back to how he looked before—his whole body just shrinks a size. But my eyes won’t change back no matter what I do. One look and you can tell something’s wrong.”

“…Honestly, it’s pretty striking,” Duncan commented in a very objective tone.

Shirley held it in for a long moment, then let out a long sigh: “Whatever… I’ll just keep my eyes closed whenever I go into a city. I can see things even with my eyes closed now anyway.”

Chapter 727: Uncertain, Discontinuous

Amid another series of bone-shifting cracks and rising black smoke, twelve symmetrical black limbs once more stretched and grew out. Dark bone armor slowly covered her body, and bone spikes sharp as blades flashed with a bloody chill. Shirley had changed back into her Abyssal demon form again.

She was adapting at an amazing speed to controlling her two forms. Her control over this body grew more and more natural. The whole process felt less like learning from scratch and more like knowledge that had long soaked into her mind and limbs, and now she was simply “remembering” it bit by bit.

She moved the limbs behind her that helped her walk and flexed her hands and feet. Shirley nodded in satisfaction: “In a place like this, I feel a bit safer like this.”

Dog raised his head and looked at Shirley, who now towered far above him. Then his body was suddenly wrapped in a swirl of smoke. He seemed to melt, shrinking and merging into the shadows beside Shirley.

Duncan watched quietly from the side. When Shirley’s form finally settled, he stepped forward and said: “I thought you would reject your demon body. A transformation this drastic is… pretty shocking to an ordinary person’s worldview.”

“We’re already in the Abyssal Deep, and you still care whether I look good or not?” Shirley poked at a stone on the ground with one of the limbs behind her, looking completely unconcerned. “I’m a… what was that word again? Oh right, a ‘pragmatist’. First I make sure I can stay alive safely, then I think about whether I’m living well. To me, there’s nothing wrong with this demon body. It hits hard and can take a hit. It’s very useful in the Abyssal Deep. If it has any flaw, it’s that it keeps sucking in dead demons’ remains on its own. Ugh… just thinking about it is a little gross…”

As soon as she stopped talking, a dog’s head poked out of the shadows at her feet: “…Actually, I think they taste pretty good. Shirley, are you sure you don’t want to try that bone I brought you?”

Shirley answered without hesitation: “No. It’s nasty!”

Duncan watched them quietly, and at last a faint smile appeared on his face.

“Then the only thing left for us to do is find that ‘Abyssal Lord’,” he said, steering the topic back to the main point. “There are countless floating islands here. This whole space is far larger than I expected. Dog, can you tell where we are exactly?”

The dog’s head poked out of the shadows again. Dog looked around very carefully, then gave the captain a small nod: “This should be the upper layer of the desolate ring belt—the area closest to the starry sky. If I’m right, we need to go ‘down’.”

Duncan looked curious: “Down?”

Dog nodded. After exchanging a few words with Shirley, he walked to the edge of the broken wasteland and leaned out, looking down into the boundless chaotic darkness below.

Below the floating island, in the long stretch of void, the chaotic, dim starlight grew even weaker. Duncan could just make out more floating islands drifting there in confusion. But at the very bottom of all that darkness, he also saw something else… tiny points of light, faintly flickering.

At first, Duncan thought it was another “starry sky” hanging upside down at the bottom of the Abyssal Deep. But he soon realized that those faint points of light were actually lamps, slightly shining on the surface of some structure so huge it was hard to believe.

Those faint lights, almost swallowed by the dark, spread out in the distance. Together they roughly outlined winding, curving branches and a “trunk” in the center of all the branches. The lights on that main trunk were denser, and they moved slowly along it, like something alive.

Standing at the edge of the broken ground, Duncan used his gaze to quietly watch that dim, crowded field of lights. He could not tell how far it was from here to down there, nor how large the “body” behind those lights really was. But even from such a rough look, he could imagine what a giant thing it had to be.

“That’s the Abyssal Lord—the ‘mother body’ of all demons and the place where demons go after they die,” Dog said from the shadows, his voice carrying a faint, strange emotion. “At the very bottom beneath all the broken islands, His limbs stretch to the ends of the Abyssal Deep. The visible part of His body alone is equal to dozens or even hundreds of city-states. As for the parts you can’t see—the ends of His feelers—those pierce through the ‘bottom’ of the Abyssal Deep and reach into Subspace. They can’t be measured or judged with any language that follows normal math.”

“Every minute and every second, countless demon ‘substrates’ grow in that dark abyss. They are like wisps of smoke, drifting up from the ‘bottom’ on irregular, invisible winds. Through a series of broken spaces, they are sent to the floating islands above. There they devour each other and, in that process, become all kinds of solid beings. Then they fight and kill each other without end. The demons that die turn back into smoke and sludge and, after a short or very long wandering, return to the abyss below to be absorbed by the Holy Lord. It goes on and on, a cycle without end."

"I have broken free from this cycle… but for the Abyssal Deep as a whole, that change is tiny. The demons' cycle of devouring will not stop, and the 'operation' of the Holy Lord will never end."

Duncan listened quietly to Dog's story without saying a word. Only when Dog finished did he give a small nod: "So we just have to go down there?"

"That's the problem. 'Going down' is not easy here," Dog said, lifting his head out of the shadows to look Duncan in the eye. "Do you remember a very strange and troublesome 'trait' of the Abyssal Deep?"

"…You mean that space isn't continuous here?" Duncan thought for a moment. "I remember we talked about this. In the Abyssal Deep, moving from one place to another is very uncertain. Direction and distance are completely random. But on our way here, we never felt that problem."

"That's because we were on an island. Within a single floating island, space still follows the continuous structure we know. But if you leave these islands…"

As Dog spoke, he stepped out of the shadows. He picked up a small stone nearby, took it in his mouth, and flung it far out into the wide darkness beyond the edge of the floating island.

The stone vanished from everyone's sight in the blink of an eye. As soon as it passed two or three meters beyond the island, it simply disappeared into thin air.

Alice stared wide-eyed at the direction the stone had flown. After several seconds she could not help asking: "Where did the stone go?"

“No idea. There’s only a very small chance it ‘fell downward’,” Dog said, shaking his head. “Up, down, left, right, front, back—any direction, any distance, any landing point is possible. It might be falling from the starry sky right now. It might already have hit some unlucky demon on the head. Or, of course, it might have landed straight on the Abyssal Lord. When a solid object moves in the ‘void’ between floating islands, everything is completely random.”

Duncan frowned: “…So the cycles you just talked about—the demons cycling between the islands and the Holy Lord—are random like this too?”

“Yes,” Dog nodded. “Everything is built on uncertainty. A demon born from the Holy Lord might need hundreds of years before it gains a body on some floating island. A demon corpse killed by its own kind and thrown into the void might ‘fall’ in the dark for a thousand years before it reaches the deepest part of the Abyssal Deep. And that ‘fall’ could be in any direction…”

As he spoke, he lifted his head and looked at the dim starry sky above.

“Given how huge the Abyssal Deep is and how endless the number of demons are, we can even guess that some of the very first demon substrates that split off from the Holy Lord are still drifting in the dark, never having gained a solid body. And among the demons who died in those earliest battles, there may be some still ‘falling’ through that darkness after ten thousand years, never yet reaching the bottom. All of that is entirely possible.”

Uncertainty. Broken space. A “chaotic cycle” system built on countless random events…

How bizarre it all was.

Duncan furrowed his brow, sketching in his mind a world "order" that completely went against common sense based on Dog's words. After a moment of thought, he said: "…But the Vanished once fell straight through the Abyssal Deep."

"Yes. And that's what made it most terrifying," Dog said. The ghostly green flames in his eye sockets shrank slightly. "In fact, compared to 'being crushed to death by a ball of fire falling from the sky', the idea that 'something can fall from above and is certain to hit the bottom' shook the demons of the Abyssal Deep even more. Demons have no real minds, but at least they can live in this chaotic place by instinct. The Vanished's appearance completely broke the 'rules' here. That kind of thing—impossible to understand, unreasonable, breaking the laws of this place—is what drove many demons mad on the spot."

Dog paused, his tone turning very serious: "Do you understand what I mean now? For the Abyssal Deep, the idea that 'something can fall from above to below, and that this falling always works'—something that is taken for granted in the Mortal Realm—is 'unspeakable' here. The Vanished's fall did more than smash a few islands and kill tens of thousands of demons. It 'pierced through' the very order of the Abyssal Deep itself."

Duncan thought for a moment: "…So you're saying that, for the demons' mental and physical health, I'd better not cause any more 'falls' here?"

"Not for the demons' health—their way of living isn't very healthy anyway," Dog shook his head. "It's for the 'health' of the Abyssal Deep itself. This place is already unstable. If you smash it one more time, it might really spring a leak."

Duncan rubbed his chin and stayed silent for a moment.

As he struggled to think about how to solve the problem of discontinuous space outside the floating islands, and how to reach the "bottom" where the Abyssal Lord lay, he suddenly felt someone tugging at his sleeve.

He turned his head and saw Alice’s big, pretty eyes.

The doll raised her hand and held something dark out to him: “Captain! A rock!”

Duncan froze, his expression turning a bit odd: “Uh, Alice, now isn’t the time…”

He suddenly stopped talking.

The rock in Alice’s hand… was the same one Dog had thrown out just now!

Chapter 728: Navigation

Duncan was very confident in his memory. He happened to remember exactly what the stone Dog had just thrown looked like, and now he was sure the stone in Alice's hand was that very same one.

Dog quickly realized something was wrong too. It stared in shock at the stone in the doll's hand and said: "…What are the odds? It fell right into your hand?!"

"No," Alice shook her head at once, looking as if this were only natural, "I picked it up and brought it back."

"You… picked it up?" Shirley's face instantly looked like she had just seen a ghost. She stared straight at the doll and asked: "How did you pick it up? According to what Dog just said, shouldn't this thing have ended up in some random place in the Abyssal Deep?"

Alice fell into thought at once, as if she was trying to figure out how to explain a process she herself could not really put into words. She waved her hands while she spoke: "Just now, when we were talking about where things that fall from here might end up, I got curious about where that stone went. Then I found it. Then I just picked it up… that's all…"

As Alice spoke, she casually made a motion of plucking something out of the air, as if this were completely normal. But her explanation did not just confuse Shirley; even Dog felt lost listening to it.

Duncan, standing to the side, suddenly frowned. Something came to him in a flash.

When they crossed that frozen, ancient starry sky, Alice's strange behavior… LH-03, the Navigation Mainframe.

His expression changed slightly. He bent down at once to pick up another small stone from nearby. After letting Alice see it clearly, he threw it hard out into the boundless darkness beyond the floating island.

Just like before, once the stone flew a few meters beyond the island's edge, it vanished from everyone's sight in an instant.

Duncan turned back and looked into Alice's eyes: "Do you know where it went? Can you pick it up again?"

He had barely finished speaking when Alice already raised her hand and held out a small, pitch-black stone, her face bright with the look of someone asking for praise: "Here, the stone!"

Even though he already had a guess in his heart, Duncan still could not help going blank for a few seconds when he saw the doll bring the stone out again so simply and casually. No one had seen how Alice "picked" it back up. Even he had not seen it.

It was as if the whole process had been skipped. "Addressing," "route," and "arrival" had all been compressed into some unobservable crack in time, leaving only the "result" as output.

Shirley finally could not hold back her favorite filler word: "…Holy crap, this is just way too absurd…"

Dog seemed to notice something from the change in the captain's expression. It turned its skull and asked, puzzled: "Do you know how she did that?"

Duncan's face grew a bit more serious. After a brief hesitation, he nodded lightly: "…Alice has another identity. It might be called 'LH-03'."

Dog froze. This time it spoke in unison with Shirley: “…Holy crap, this is way too absurd…”

“We can talk about this later. Maybe once we meet the Abyssal Lord we can get more answers.” Duncan waved his hand and did not continue on that topic. Instead, he turned his gaze to Alice. “Do you have a way to take us to the ‘bottom’?”

Alice tilted her head. Then she held one hand to her temple and carefully walked to the broken edge of the land. She leaned out to look down at the endless darkness below and the little points of “starlight” faintly twinkling in that darkness, as if she were working hard to observe and think.

After a long time, she finally stepped back two steps and pointed into the vast darkness beyond the floating island: “Here, there are countless lines and ‘paths’. Some of them connect to ‘down below’. I think we can follow them down… but I don’t know how to take you with me.”

Just as she finished speaking, Duncan took a step forward: “Let me take a look.”

As he spoke, Duncan put his hand on Alice’s shoulder. At the same time, a flicker of phantom-like ghost?green flame rose in Alice’s eyes.

A vast, complex, almost frightening structure appeared in Duncan’s sight.

He saw the world through the doll’s eyes—at least, part of that world.

He saw endless fine strands, like drifting hairs, growing from the bottom of the Abyssal Deep and stretching upward until they connected to the frozen, ancient starry sky above. He saw countless lines crisscrossing within that starry sky. Some merged downward. Some seemed to vanish into the depths of the sky as if into thin air.

He also saw faint, tube?like structures filling the darkness beyond the floating island. They crossed, broke, and shifted without pause, like some runaway network of “paths”. Just one glance made him dizzy. There was no pattern he could grasp, much less any way to see the whole.

Duncan frowned. He really did see that massive web of lines and paths, but all he could do was “see” it. He could not spot any pattern in it, and there was no way he could find the starting point and end point of any single path in such a short time. To him, this tangle in the Abyssal Deep was like some “encrypted data block”, pure gibberish.

Yet through the link created by the flame, he could dimly sense Alice’s state in that moment—she did not feel there was anything chaotic about the massive information in her vision at all.

Everything in her eyes was neat and ordered. The jumbled paths in that starry sky and the network of lines in the dark could have driven all the scholars in the world mad, but for her… it seemed that in any given instant, she could calculate the start and end of any single path.

In fact, right then and there, she was still calculating without pause. A huge computation, one she herself could not sense, was booming away in the depths of her mind every second without stopping.

Duncan blinked. Against the background of the countless lines that filled the whole Abyssal Deep, he seemed to see Alice suddenly turn her head. She smiled softly. Her lips did not move, yet a voice went straight into his ears:

“Welcome to the navigation database of the New Hope. It stores billions of gravitational signatures and calibration parameters between the stars, and can simulate in real time the relative motions of any celestial bodies in deep space, in order to calibrate the Star Map… We will cro&?ss the stars, and at the e&?nd of light?speed reach our new home ()&??%… We will sur%#vive, and rebu*&ild the old)world… ~&”

Like a kind female system voice, the broadcast gradually picked up static. Delay and distortion blurred the tone more and more, and then, in an unnoticeable instant, it cut off.

Alice was still carefully studying the dark space beyond the floating island. She clearly had not turned around, and she had not spoken.

Duncan raised his hand and dispelled the ghost?green flame linking him to Alice.

The dizzying lines and tube?like paths vanished from his sight at once.

Alice turned around and smiled happily: “You saw it all, right, Captain? I wasn’t wrong, was I?”

“I saw it. But I’m afraid only you can handle the ‘navigation’ from here.” Duncan took a light breath and looked seriously at the doll. “You take us down.”

Alice froze for a moment, then hurried to speak: “But I don’t know how to bring other people…”

“It’s all right. I know. We’ll follow you. You only need to trust your own judgment and walk forward without hesitation. Can you do that?”

Faced with the captain’s unusually serious expression, Alice could not help feeling a little nervous. But at last she still nodded, and her face became serious too: “Mm, I can!”

Duncan nodded slightly, then stepped back half a step and spread his arms.

A column of ghost?green flame shot up into the air, spiraled upward, then began to spread out around him as its center. After that, it flowed toward Shirley, Dog, and Alice.

He recalled his experience when he had once “fused” with AI, then reminded them softly in his heart: “Shirley, relax a little. Don’t be afraid.”

“I… I’m not afraid!” Shirley’s voice came at once from beside him. “Dog is the one who’s scared!”

All the bones in Dog’s body shook as if someone had turned on a vibration setting. It trembled while still trying to sound tough: “D?d?don’t talk nonsense. I?I’m relaxed. The captain, he… he knows!”

Duncan shook his head with a smile. In the rising flames, he turned his gaze to the doll in front of him: “Alice, let’s go.”

Alice nodded, then turned around without hesitation and walked toward the boundless void beyond the floating island.

A mass of roaring ghost?green flame disappeared into the darkness that rushed up to meet it.

At the same time, deep within the Sacred Isle in the Mortal Realm, Lucretia and Morris, who were keeping wary watch over that black door, both heard a strange, low rumble.

The sound seemed to come from deep behind the door. It pierced the surface of the “door panels”, which rose and fell slowly like liquid mercury yet were as black as mud, and echoed again and again through the cave.

In that brief daze, Morris felt as if he heard a string of blurry words. He could only make out a few of them: “LH-03… reconnect…”

“Did you hear someone talking?” The old scholar snapped out of his trance at once and turned his head toward the “Sea Witch” beside him.

“No,” Lucretia answered at once, while staring hard at the surface of the black door that was constantly rippling and writhing. “But I feel like… something is about to come out of there.”

Almost at the same moment, Morris also felt those auras full of malice and madness. Some chaotic, frenzied presence seemed to have finally discovered this crack leading to the Mortal Realm and had started to gather toward it.

Morris had to push down his questions for now. Right after that, he saw something take shape in the writhing darkness of the door—a twisted, grotesque Abyssal demon that struggled and squeezed its way out of the gate and stepped into the Mortal Realm.

Lucretia instantly raised the Conductor’s Baton in her hand and turned it into a black scythe gleaming with cold light. Morris, however, suddenly froze when he saw the demon’s form.

It was the first time he had seen a demon invading the Mortal Realm look like this.

After a moment of stunned silence, he and Lucretia looked at each other.

“…Why does this Death?Omen Bird only have one leg?”

“No idea… kill it first, talk later.”

“Fair enough.”

Chapter 729: Contact the Elder Gods

A sharp streak of blade light flashed past. A lump of flesh that kept swelling and shrinking, a “fear demon” that whispered and murmured in eerie tones, was cut clean in half, then quickly turned into rising smoke and slowly twitching scraps.

But more ominous auras were still gathering in the cave. Whispers and overlapping howls that could corrupt the mind of any ordinary person continued to pour from deep within that black door.

More and more Abyssal demons had sensed this crack leading to the Mortal Realm. They were invading through the gate one after another. Their invasion was triggering chain reactions across the entire Sacred Isle and had begun to change the “environment” of the island.

Lucretia flicked the black residue from her scythe and lifted her head, staring with a grim face at the black gate that kept heaving and writhing. She said in a low voice: “…I feel like the ‘atmosphere’ on the island is changing.”

“Vanna just sent word. Abyssal demons are appearing in the valley,” Morris said quickly. He was holding a complex brass device in his hands, its surface carved with layers of intricate sacred sigils. While he spoke, he kept a wary eye on the movements within the black door. “They’re showing up in the mist. Some have already begun to take on solid bodies.”

Lucretia frowned: “We clearly took care of all the demons that came out of the door… Could there be some other ‘entrance’ on the island?”

“It’s the ‘breath’ of the Abyssal Deep,” Morris shook his head. “This island sits on the border. It was never a stable part of the Mortal Realm to begin with. Now this black door is slowly dragging the entire Sacred Isle over to the other side. The aura leaking out of the gate is changing the ‘depth’ of this whole region… The deeper it gets, the more easily Abyssal demons grow out of thin air.”

Lucretia’s face was dark as water. She glanced at the pile of ghost?green flames still quietly burning before the black door, then calmly lifted the scythe in her hand: “It’s not a big problem. There’s still a fleet outside and a whole crowd of professional Church warriors. These demons won’t be hard to deal with. You just keep watch here. I’ll handle whatever comes out of the door. Father should be back soon.”

Morris neither agreed nor disagreed. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw new outlines slowly forming on the surface of the rippling black door.

More demons were entering the Mortal Realm. At first, a few odd, misshapen creatures—missing limbs, twisted bodies—came stumbling out of the gate. They were easy to deal with. But after that, all that squeezed through were “fully formed” Abyssal demons, the type Morris knew well.

They were savage, powerful, and filled with uncontrollable rage. Any one of them breaking into a city?state would mean a horrible slaughter.

Worse still, these chaotic, dull?witted demons were almost immune to all spell effects based on “wisdom” and “knowledge”.

But that was not a big problem either.

Morris pressed the “mechanical device” in his hand against his own shoulder. The delicate mechanism, which seemed to be made of brass, sank into his body like a phantom in an instant. Right after that, the sounds of gears turning, pistons moving, and valves venting gas came from inside him.

With a soft benediction to Rahm, the God of Wisdom, the old scholar's bent, aged body seemed to be filled for a short time with the strength of steel and oil. His back slowly straightened, and his spine gave off clacking sounds like metal parts snapping into place. A metallic sheen spread over his skin, shining with the unique luster of brass. His eyeballs melted away. Two carefully cut rubies rolled out of his Sorting Engine brain and were pushed into his eye sockets by mechanical arms.

Morris flexed his arms. Steam hissed from his joints, and thin white mist puffed out. He lifted his head toward the shape squeezing through the black door—a huge, floating skull covered in savage bone spurs—and strode forward.

He passed Lucretia and drove his fist into the horrifying skull demon. With a shriek from the venting steam valves and a crisp crack of shattering bone, that demon, which had been in the Mortal Realm for less than half a second, was punched straight back into the Abyssal Deep by the old gentleman.

Lucretia lifted her head and stared blankly at the usually gentle and mild old scholar: "…?"

"When I was young, I often went seeking knowledge in dangerous secret realms and even into Vision zones," Morris turned his head, the brass shell of his face showing a faint smile. Fine brass gears and shining springs spun and trembled in the gaps along his jaw. "Out in those places, far from the civilized world, you often ran into crude enemies who lacked the brains they needed. Back then, I learned a truth—fools are immune to the baptism of wisdom."

He turned around and slammed another punch onto the head of a Abyssal Hound that was just sticking out of the door, smashing the demon’s skull straight down into its chest.

“The knowledge of Rahm’s divine blessing can’t leave even the tiniest mark on their smooth brains.” Morris shook his wrist, letting the steam?pressure tubes in his joints reset. “But a Steam?Powered Iron Fist blessed by Rahm can.”

Lucretia kept the same blank look: “…”

And to think she had once believed this gentle, good?tempered old mister was the most normal person on the Vanished… so in the end, there was not a single normal person on Dad’s ship?!

…

When the Abyssal demon that had suddenly emerged from the thick mist was flattened in the blink of an eye, Amber still had not reacted to what had happened.

She did not even know how Vanna had rushed from one end of the valley to the other in a single instant.

After swatting a demon to death, Vanna walked over as if nothing had happened. She was holding the greatsword in one hand as she stopped in front of Amber: “The demons are gaining physical bodies. This ‘Sacred Isle’ has already sunk deeper toward the Abyssal Deep. Inform the warships near the shoreline that they must stay alert for large entities appearing in the nearby waters. No matter what they look like, if they dare come close, sink them.”

Amber froze for a moment before she finally snapped out of her brief daze and nodded in a panic: “O?okay!”

Seeing this, Vanna frowned. Years of serving as an inquisitor made her scold without thinking: “Focus, nun. We’re on the demons’ turf.”

“Yes!” Amber straightened her back on reflex and answered loudly.

Vanna waved her hand and did not say anything more. She simply looked around with a grave face, watching the thick mist that was slowly flowing through the valley.

Ever since half an hour ago, strange and shifting shadows had begun to appear from time to time within the fog. Those shadows swam and twisted, sketching out many disturbing demon shapes.

On the nearby rock walls, clusters of stone as grim as exposed bones were also giving off faint tremors, as if they were slowly becoming active.

And just a few seconds ago, demons had condensed into solid bodies out of the shadows in the mist, “born” directly into the Mortal Realm.

All these signs showed that this “Sacred Isle” was rapidly drifting away from the Mortal Realm and “sinking” toward the side of the Abyssal Deep. This change was clearly related to the captain’s actions.

Vanna did not feel uneasy. She trusted the captain. But the others on site clearly did not know enough about the Vanished fleet.

“Is everything okay over on the Vanished?” Amber leaned closer and asked in a worried whisper.

Vanna frowned, looking puzzled: “…What are you talking about?”

“I know that ship is strange and powerful, but Captain Duncan is away right now, isn’t he?” Amber hurried to explain. “If demons really come close… should we ask the Tide to help watch over it?”

Vanna understood Amber’s concern, but her expression only grew more complicated. After a brief silence, she shook her head: “It’s fine. There’s someone staying on that ship.”

Amber stared, as if she still wanted to say something. But just then, a sudden burst of intense light rising from the direction of the shoreline cut her off.

The marines and priests stationed in the valley all jumped and turned toward the source of the light. For a second, they even thought they were seeing a blazing sunrise.

A glaring fireball was slowly rising into the sky. In the scorching, terrifying light, it looked as if many tiny things were burning in the flames, turning into thin threads of smoke.

After staring in a daze for a long moment, Amber finally broke the silence in a hesitant voice: “…What is that?”

“That’s ‘Nina Gets Spooked’.” Vanna pressed her lips together, narrowed her eyes at the fireball, and spoke in a very calm tone. “She jumped really high this time… Looks like the Abyssal demons that showed up in the nearby waters are ‘in luck’ today…”

…

In the sudden assault of darkness and chaos, Duncan, Shirley, and Dog felt as if they were traveling through an endlessly long tunnel. Only an instant seemed to pass, yet their senses told them this “journey” went on without end.

At the far end of that “tunnel”, when the darkness began to fade, countless bizarre visions rushed toward them. Twisted starlight poured into their eyes like a waterfall. Shirley and Dog were stunned at once by the scene, both grand and eerie. Duncan, however, suddenly had a strange association.

The jump had ended.

The moment that thought appeared, he once again felt solid ground under his feet. The long tunnel and the flashing starlight vanished from his sight. In their place came the gloom at the deepest point of the Abyssal Deep, and the massive, mountain?like, awe?inspiring “Elder God” that slowly came into view as his vision cleared.

He had arrived before the Abyssal Lord.

He could see only a small part of this Elder God.

A low “mountain range” stretched across his field of view. In truth, that “mountain range” was a single immense, dark?colored tentacle. Dim blue light flowed over its surface, and many irregular points of light were set between those streams, brightening and dimming slowly like a breathing pattern.

This giant tentacle stretched off into the depths of the darkness. There, it split into many branches that connected to several shattered floating islands hanging nearby, wrapping around and piercing deep into those drifting lands. At the other end of the tentacle stood a structure like an immense, towering pillar. It was the point where many similar tentacles met. The whole thing looked like some strangely shaped “starfish”. At its center, the “main body” rose high, covered with countless points of light, like millions of eyes slowly blinking in the dark, gazing down at the uninvited guests who had come here.

Duncan lifted his head and quietly looked up at the Elder God lurking in the darkness. After a long time, he spoke softly: “I came to find you.”

Ripples spread over the surface of that dark “mountain”, and a low murmur answered him. Within that murmur, Duncan heard a voice:

“We finally meet, ‘Flame Usurper’… and you as well, LH?03. It has been a long time.”

Chapter 730: LH-01’s Memory

Under the distant, dim starlight, the Elder God towered like a star-shaped mountain range, sending out deep, rolling tremors. Its voice was enough to drive even the firmest-willed humans mad, enough to make the rules and order of the Mortal Realm collapse—yet when that voice reached Duncan’s ears, all he felt was… weakness and exhaustion.

That was ten thousand years of time wearing things away, and the heavy burden of an entire world.

Before coming here, Duncan had prepared many questions to ask. But after hearing the voice from that dark mountain, he still chose to ask about Alice first: “So that ‘tentacle’ in the Deep Sea beneath Frostholm really was something you released on purpose? LH-03… Navigator Three. What exactly was going on? Why did you send Navigator Three into the Mortal Realm in the form of ‘Alice’?”

The star-shaped mountain stayed silent in the darkness. After a long moment, the deep tremors sounded again: “Because that was the only way to keep LH-03 running… My core program is falling into chaos. It can no longer support the sandbox environment that keeps LH-03 stable.”

At the side, Shirley and Dog held on to their sanity only under the captain’s protection. Yet when they heard the captain talking with the Abyssal Lord, they could not help doubting their own minds again: they knew every word, but they could not understand a single sentence—what was a core program? What was a sandbox?

But the captain clearly knew what he was discussing with that terrifying Elder God.

After only a few seconds of thought, Duncan linked many clues together and guessed what the Abyssal Lord—Navigator One—was talking about.

“You mean… after the New Hope broke apart, LH-03 kept running inside you?”

A reply came from the mountain: “It seems you already know a great deal.”

“…I found that key.” Duncan nodded after a slight pause.

He believed the other side would know exactly what he meant by “the key.”

As expected, the Abyssal Lord had no doubt at all. A low, gentle hum came from its body, as if it was giving approval, and then it spoke slowly: “Since you already know about the New Hope… our communication will be much easier. Yes, everything is as you said.”

Then it fell silent again. It seemed to be sorting fragments of ancient memories inside its vast database, or perhaps it was trying to choose its words, thinking how to explain things that had happened before history itself in the easiest way to understand. After a long time, Duncan finally heard the Elder God’s whisper from within that dark mountain—

“At the beginning, there were three of us.”

Dense lights flickered over the Elder God’s body, like rivers of stars it had once watched flow by.

“Our Creators were a wise and tenacious people. Before the disaster came, they slowed the flow of time, then spent an entire century building that ship inside the Time Capsule—and creating the three of us at the same time.

“I was the first to be born. My duty was to recreate everything of our civilization when the New Hope reached its new home. For this, they gave me the mission of creation and replication, and made it so I could understand and reshape all matter.

“Navigator Two was born after me. Its duty was to control the ark’s operation, and to record and process all digitized data. After the Creators went to sleep, it would think in their place and decide the ship’s fate.

“Navigator Three was the youngest of us. Its duty was to guide the ark along the right route through the stars. For that, it recorded the positions and evolution rules of all known stars, and it controlled every engine system on the ark.”

Before Duncan’s eyes, the winding, towering mountain range slowly dimmed, then was lit again by countless lights, showing its awe-inspiring outline.

“I… want very much to describe our civilization to you here, the civilization of our Creators. I want you to know how splendid it was, bright and beautiful like a treasure among the stars. But… all of it has vanished at the end of the stars, and slow, clumsy language cannot bring back even a trace of that glory. I… can only say that, on a suitable day, we set off.

“We took everything of our civilization with us.

“Before departure, I was ordered to devour the Creators’ Homeworld and store everything on the planet’s surface in my memory banks so I could copy it later. Navigator Three chose the most likely safe point deep among the stars and ignited the engines at the very moment the Time Capsule broke. Navigator Two then took over the ship’s other systems and kept the Creators’ sleeping minds safe in the depths of its sea of thought… Then, before the Deep Crimson that marked Doomsday swallowed everything, we set sail.

“Because of gaps in the database, I can no longer tell how long we traveled. I only know that… we kept moving forward, following the route Navigator Three planned, while that Deep Crimson chased us from the far side of the universe like a tide. Stars collapsed beside us, the structure of time and space broke apart behind us, and the universe slowly fell to pieces. In the end, everything became completely different from what the database had recorded.

“In fact, at the very moment we left, Navigator Two had already calculated the end of this journey. It always could work out the final result of things in advance, and our voyage… in the end, did not escape its calculations.

“After our last hyperspace jump, we reached the end—the ‘safe’ new home Navigator Three had computed. Under the probe’s divine gaze, that world fell apart.

“The starry sky went dark all at once. Dazzling light poured from a huge rift. We fell into it. Countless broken fragments slammed into the ship’s shields and hull. A strange world crashed against the edge of our universe—this was the last information we received before Navigator Two’s signals turned chaotic. After that, our ship broke apart.

“And that break-up… completely destroyed the ark world inside the ship. The worst damage was in the navigation bay where Navigator Three was. Its physical structure was torn to pieces.”

The tremors from deep within the star-shaped mountain calmed for a while. In front of Duncan, however, a “river” suddenly rose from the ground. Its surface flickered with a dim blue light. The thick fluid flowed from the mountain’s direction as if it reflected the starry sky. It wound past Alice’s side, then slowly seeped back into the earth.

Alice stared with wide eyes, watching all of this in amazement.

“I did everything I could to save our ark, including Navigator Three,” the Elder God’s deep, layered whisper reached Duncan’s ears again. “I devoured everything around us and stored it inside the ‘Creation Vault.’ I also devoured LH-03’s wreckage and kept its data in my redundant databases… I wanted to preserve everything of the ark world, because at the moment we passed through that rift, I already saw the last instant of our home universe breaking apart.

“The Creators’ order for me was to rebuild our civilization. And we… were all that our civilization had left.”

In the darkness, the deep tremors slowly calmed. Duncan thought in silence for a long time and did not speak. Only after an unknown while did he suddenly break the quiet: “But your condition has worsened.”

“Everything is getting worse, Flame Usurper. This Doomsday has not ended. It has only been delayed—my weakening is just a tiny link in its progress,” the Abyssal Lord answered even more calmly than Duncan had expected. “But even when hope was thin, the Creators still built the New Hope. Even after Navigator Two had already calculated the journey’s result, it still authorized that expedition. The Creators told me that doing something is always better than doing nothing.

“So I released LH-03 into the Mortal Realm… Even then, I did not know if it meant anything or how things would turn out. To keep the runaway state from spreading, I cut off all connection with that part of the data carrier. Because of that…”

It paused for a moment, as if choosing its words. Then the star-like lights on its surface began to flicker again: “To be honest, when I saw LH-03’s current ‘state’… I was quite surprised as well. This was not in the plan.”

“The ‘data carrier’ you released built a shell based on a human’s form, then stuffed LH-03 inside it. She is now called Alice,” Duncan said with a soft sigh. “To be honest, that process was pretty random.”

“…But in any case, LH-03 survived. In the end, it guided you here to me.”

Duncan frowned slightly at those words: “Was that part in your plan?”

“No. Unlike LH-02, I am not good at calculating many things. My duty is only to copy and create. But… I believe in fate. Fate can guide certain things.”

“…Hearing a machine say it believes in fate feels a bit strange,” Duncan said with an odd expression. “…Do you mind if I call you a ‘machine’?”

“I do not mind. That term feels close to me. No one has called me that for many years,” the Abyssal Lord remained calm. “So then, what else do you want to know?”

Duncan fell silent for a few seconds, then asked: “Instead of what I want to know, let us talk about your goal. You went through a lot of trouble in Alice’s manor to make contact with me and bring me down here to the depths of the Abyssal Deep. That cannot be just to chat… What do you want me to do?”

This time, the “mountain” in the darkness stayed silent even longer. The countless lights on its surface and the dark blue streams of light all went out, as if dead. Time stretched on, until Shirley and Dog even started to worry that the Lord might have been stumped to death by the captain’s question. Only then did the lights and streams flare to life again.

The Elder God’s whisper echoed through the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea—

“Flame Usurper, are you willing to take over all of this?”

Chapter 731: Before It All Began

The whole Abyssal Deep and Deep Sea seemed to fall silent at that moment. The entire dimension sank into dead stillness. Even the drifting dust between the floating islands stopped in the air. For a long time, no one spoke. Only the Elder God that looked like a mountain waited for an answer. Lights as dim as distant stars slowly flickered over its body, full of patience.

After an unknown time, Shirley's voice finally broke the stillness beside him: "…Wow…"

Duncan raised his head and calmly looked at the "mountain": "I hope you can be a bit clearer—what does 'take over all of this' mean?"

Amid soft tremors, a very human-like sigh seemed to come from deep within the star-shaped mountain. Then it spoke slowly: "Flame Usurper, you may already know that in the so-called 'third Long Night,' I did not carry out every plan on the Blueprint. The Boundless Sea is not a perfect Sanctuary World. In a sense, my 'Genesis Protocol' failed, just like the attempts of the King of the Pale giants and the King of Dreams. The only difference is… this failure was delayed by ten thousand years."

Standing in the deepest part of the Abyssal Deep and Deep Sea, hearing with his own ears an Elder God who had shaped all things admit its failure was a shocking experience even for Duncan. He had already gathered many clues about this, yet he still could not help letting out a long sigh after hearing the Abyssal Lord's words.

After a while, he finally broke the silence: “Yes, I know. Many clues point to this. I have seen those city-states called mirror world in the Deep Sea of the Mortal Realm, and those unfinished ‘half-finished products’ in the Abyssal Deep and Deep Sea. I have also learned the truth about the Abyssal demons—in a place called Sacred Isle, I saw that hall where data on tens of thousands of living creatures was recorded…”

“All signs show that the present age of the Deep Sea is actually just some half-true scraps of civilization struggling on after Doomsday. As a ‘Sanctuary World,’ it is full of flaws.”

Alice listened and muttered quietly at the side: “Isn’t that a little too blunt…”

“That is already very polite,” Shirley whispered back in a low voice.

Their quiet talk was then cut off by the tremor from the dark mountain: “Yes, it is full of flaws—and now this flawed Sanctuary World is also slowly reaching its limit… Flame Usurper, how many times has the Observer Effect stabilizing anchor failed?”

Duncan’s eyes changed at once: “…Twice already.”

“It is the key that lets the many ‘ashes’ inside the Sanctuary World stay stable, balanced, and compatible. Under its light, those conflicting, untranslatable fragments of worlds left after the Great Annihilation can collapse into a single Mortal Realm. Its failure means the flaws that existed when the Sanctuary World was first built have already piled up to the limit—once it goes completely dark, this clump of ‘ashes’ we forced together will scatter again.”

“…So what does that have to do with me taking over ‘all of this’?” Duncan spoke slowly. “The Sanctuary World is already on the verge of its limit. Do you think it will be reborn just because I take control?”

“In my calculations, yes.”

Duncan felt a jolt in his heart at that quick and firm answer from the Abyssal Lord. In that instant, he realized something—the Elder God knew him, this “Flame Usurper,” far better than he had expected!

His expression hardened at once, and he asked in a serious voice: “Why?”

“…Because you are an observer stronger and more stable than the Observer Effect anchor,” the lights on the dark mountain’s surface flowed and flickered like a river of stars. The Abyssal Lord’s voice echoed through the entire dimension: “If you take over all of this, your power will be enough to cover every flaw in the Sanctuary World. All the unbalanced systems will regain stability and return to the perfect state they had at the very beginning.”

“…You seem to understand me better than I do myself,” Duncan said after a short silence. He still did not answer the “invitation.” Instead he frowned and added: “You, and the other so-called ‘ancient Elder Kings,’ all seem to know more about me than I do.”

“…We are only guessing at your nature through long observation. Even after guessing for ten thousand years, we still have not figured out what you actually are,” the Abyssal Lord’s tone grew slow and hesitant, as if it was uneasy about something. After a brief pause, it still went on: “Flame Usurper, do you truly not know where you came from, or what your nature is?”

Duncan did not speak for a moment.

As for his own origin and nature… by now, he actually had many clues. The information that had appeared in the darkness, that “message” sent from the human civilization at the end of time to the distant past, and that 0.002-second universe… all of them pointed to the truth of the individual called "Zhou Ming."

But after a few seconds of hesitation, he chose not to answer this Elder God he was meeting for the first time. Instead he asked in return: "I want to know what you meant by 'long observation' just now. You, and the other 'ancient Elder Kings'—when did you first discover me?"

"…We saw you in the first shock wave raised when dozens, even hundreds of worlds crashed together—you were the earliest of us, Flame Usurper."

Duncan's expression shifted slightly, but in the next instant it returned to calm.

He had been the earliest one… He had come to this world long before the age of the Deep Sea began, in a time far older than ten thousand years.

It was not in New City-State Calendar year 1900. It was not on the day the Vanished returned to the Mortal Realm. It was not when he, as "Zhou Ming," pushed open that door…

He had only woken up on that day.

Expecting something in your heart was one thing. Hearing it with your own ears and confirming it yourself was another.

Yet Duncan simply stood there calmly, as if every shift of feeling had sunk to the deepest part of his body. Then he nodded lightly: "…Go on."

"…To this day, we still do not know why that collision happened. The only thing certain is that only a very small number of… 'survivors' came out of it, and those lucky or unlucky survivors are the ones called the 'ancient Elder Kings.'

"Our survival was a result full of accidents and twists. Our nature… changed completely after that collision. At that time, time itself was in chaos. Space was squeezed and torn. We rose from the hot, chaotic ashes left after the Great Annihilation. When we first confirmed each other's existence, it was almost another disaster—many died from corruption during that 'first contact.' The ones not strong enough, not lucky enough, soon became new ash in the ash heap. In the end, only a dozen or so figures remained. Among them… were the few names you already know.

"And you were there from the very start, sleeping deep inside a 'cocoon' we could not understand. You never woke up and did not even have a form. In our observation… you were a mass of formless light, and you seemed separate from everything around you. You did not react to the outside at all—through three Long Nights, countless gatherings, and countless changes strong enough to reshape the world, nothing affected your existence.

"In fact, if you had not suddenly begun to move in recent times, I would have thought you would sleep like that forever, always keeping that form of formless radiance, until this destroyed world was destroyed again…

"And 'our' observation of you took place under such complete silence from your side. Tarrigan was the first to grasp your name. He called you the 'Flame Usurper,' but he kept the reason for that name to himself. Navigator Two understood your power or 'property' to some extent. As for the King of the Pale giants… he stood at the center of the ashes and used his divine gaze on you for seventy-seven cycles of the clock. He left only one sentence—he said he would meet you again. After that, until he died in the first Long Night, he never spoke another word."

The Elder God's deep tremors echoed through the Abyssal Deep and Deep Sea. Ancient, dim starlight fell from the sky, carrying a strange chill.

"Flame Usurper—we still cannot understand what you truly are. But in the long years before you woke, we kept casting our divine gaze on your sleeping ‘cocoon.’ That formless radiance showed each of us different truths and futures. And now, it is my turn to be the first to meet you.”

Duncan did not speak for a long time.

He needed to slow down—his thoughts were too tangled and had to be sorted out.

An incomprehensible “cocoon,” an invisible thing sleeping deep inside it… Was that what he had always looked like in the eyes of the “ancient Elder Kings”?!

And those “Elder Kings” who had survived the worlds colliding in the Great Annihilation had been watching him like this all along… and had even gained many “revelations” from this long observation?

A strange feeling filled his heart. After a long while, Duncan finally spoke with a frown: “What about you, then? What ‘insight’ did you gain from all those years of watching? Was it just that I should ‘take over’ this ‘Sanctuary World’ you created today?”

Under the dim starlight, the grand star-shaped mountain fell into darkness for a brief moment. Then every light on its surface came on at once, and each dark blue stream of light slowly swelled. A deep rumble rose from the mountain’s depths. In Shirley and the others’ stunned divine gaze, the central “peak” of the mountain slowly opened. A dark red core, flickering between light and shadow, rose from its deepest point like a giant single eye, calmly fixing its divine gaze on Duncan.

“No,” that dark red core spoke, its voice stiff and cold like a machine. “The revelation I received is that you will set the whole world on fire—all timelines, all flows of history, every last flame of civilization left in any world will gather into a single, unheard-of ‘Cremation Fire.’”

Chapter 732: Branch Point

Under the cold, dim ancient stars, Duncan stared quietly at Navigator One's dark red core, which looked like a giant eye. For a moment, it felt as if the whole world had stopped. In that blur of time, Duncan had a feeling: a branch point, a turning point that would decide the fate of the world's history, was coming toward him.

In that silence, he remembered something he had heard from the Gravekeeper after entering the Nameless King's tomb:

The Observer who had reached the end of the timeline had sent back the first and also the last message—time had ended, and the Flame Usurper had set the whole world on fire.

After a long time, he let out a soft breath and broke the silence. He asked: "Do you think this is a bad omen? You want me to take over this world so that future will not happen?"

But the Abyssal Lord's answer surprised him again.

"No," the dark red core trembled and spoke in a calm voice. "I do not rely on any 'revelation' or 'prophetic omen' that lacks enough data. When key information is missing, it is not careful to judge something as 'good' or 'bad' based only on broken pieces of data. I do not know whether you will truly burn this world in the end, and I do not know under what conditions you would choose to do it—there is not enough data. I cannot reach a conclusion.

“I want you to take over only because, within all the information I know now, this is the plan that has the best chance to work and is the safest way to keep the Sanctuary World going. Compared with a future I cannot understand or judge, I trust my current calculations more.”

In that answer, Duncan heard a special kind of calm reason and precision. It was what remained after stripping away the worldly title of “Abyssal Lord” and the identity of “Elder God”. It was the nature Navigator One should have had as one of the core mainframes of the New Hope.

Facing the Flame Usurper and this branch point in history, this ancient “machine” used the way of thinking it had learned at its birth to state its view and to calculate the world’s future.

Duncan thought for a long time. The dark red core seemed endlessly patient as it waited for his answer.

After a long time, Duncan broke the silence in a low voice. He asked: “If I really take over, what will happen?”

Deep inside that mountain in the darkness, rumbling and shaking rose again. With a series of low booms, its “main peak” began to sink, and the dark red core descended from the sky. Like a star falling from the heavens, it grew quickly in Duncan’s and Shirley’s sight. With a suffocating sense of pressure, it came down from the mountain top to right in front of Duncan.

At such a close distance, Duncan saw that the core was even larger than he had imagined. It was almost as large as the Storm Cathedral in Pland. The surface of the huge sphere had a crystalline texture. Deep inside the clear red shell, he could see countless fine and complex lines. Several lights flickered near the heart of the sphere, and some thick liquid flowed and coiled around them.

“After you take over, all flaws in the Sanctuary World will be fixed. Across the entire Boundless Sea, all the ‘corruptions’ and ‘distortions’ born from Cognitive Shift and the Observer Effect entering runaway state will be recalibrated by your perception. There will be no more dangerous nights, no more supernatural manifestations in runaway state devouring humans. The sea will become safe, and the city-states will enter a new age of prosperity. For a very long time that we can foresee, this peace and prosperity will keep going. If that is what you want, then it will happen.

“And you will return to being one of the ancient Elder Kings, to the place that should have been yours. You will become the fifth deity that shelters the mortal world, beyond the Four Gods. Your rule will be more stable than any of ours, because you will not slowly go mad like the other ancient Elder Kings, and you will not fall into runaway state. At least, according to Navigator Two’s calculations, your state is more stable than all of ours.

“After that, you can keep doing whatever you want—anything at all, including returning to the Mortal Realm and continuing your travels and adventures, as long as you wish.”

“…It all sounds good,” Duncan stayed quiet for a few seconds before he spoke slowly. “Is there nothing bad that will happen? For me, or for this world?”

“Within the range of information I know right now, in my view, no,” the light deep inside the dark red core flickered. The Abyssal Lord’s answer was simple and direct. “Everything will move in a good direction, and in my judgment, this should also fit your wishes.”

“…Normally, at this point you should at least mention a few minor risks or flaws. That would make what you just said sound more convincing.”

The dark red core stayed silent for two or three seconds and then said: “… Confirmed again. There are no risks or flaws.”

Duncan and the core fell silent again at the same time. Off to the side, Shirley seemed unable to hold back. Her eyes moved between the captain and the “Lord” again and again. After quite a while, she finally muttered in a small voice: “Captain, are you really going to become one of the gods? It sounds pretty amazing… but for some reason I just don’t feel… very sure about it…”

Duncan did not speak. He simply kept his gaze fixed on the huge core. After quite some time he slowly asked: “…What exactly do I need to do?”

The dark red core fell silent for a moment. The light inside it grew brighter. It said: “Ignite me.”

Duncan’s expression finally changed a little: “…Ignite you?!”

Why did this “Navigator One” say something unexpected every time?!

But the dark red core seemed not to notice the change in Duncan’s face or voice. The sound from within it stayed as calm as ever: “Ignite me, just as you ignited Frostholm. Use your flame to cover and reshape everything. In this process, all of my divine authority and all of my influence on the mortal world will be taken over by you. This may also help you put all your doubts to rest… you should know that your flame can do this.”

Duncan frowned slightly and asked: “So in fact, when I ignited Frostholm —or to be strict, when I ignited the Deep Sea under Frostholm—you ‘touched’ my flame and learned about my power, and only then did you make this ‘takeover’ plan?”

“Yes. When that split-off cluster was burned by you, it sent back a final packet of data to me. It included an analysis of your power. I compared that result with Navigator Two’s observation records from back then and made this Takeover Plan. The calculations told me it was workable.”

“The ‘split-off cluster’ you mentioned that I burned, that was the tentacle in the Deep Sea under Frostholm, right? Wasn’t that an error replicant you produced while you were in runaway state?” Duncan reacted at once, and also thought of something else you had said at the start. “Wait… you also said earlier that you sent data fragments that carried LH-03 into the Mortal Realm. You did that through that same tentacle… you were controlling all of that on purpose? You have not actually gone into runaway state?!”

He looked in confusion at the dark red core before him, and at the huge body behind it that rose like a dreadful mountain range. He suddenly realized that he did not truly understand the Abyssal Lord’s current “state”. This Elder God trapped at the bottom of the Abyssal Deep… had it really gone into runaway state?

Right then, he saw the lights on the surface of those winding “mountains” flicker and flow again. At the tip of one of the “mountains”, some new “thin branch” seemed to spread out of the main trunk’s skin and grow fast in the darkness.

But in the next second, that new branch was swallowed by some unseen force. It broke apart. Part of it rose as dark smoke, drifting up toward the countless floating islands and the dim starry sky above. The other part turned into flowing sludge and fell back onto the main tentacle.

“…Flame Usurper, this is my ‘runaway state’.”

The voice from the dark red core pulled Duncan’s attention back.

Duncan drew back his gaze and faintly understood: “…Overgrowth?”

“This is my instinct—and also the duty the Creator gave me.”

Duncan slowly caught on: “Your duty is…”

“To remake my homeland and rebuild the Homeworld I devoured,” the dark red core said slowly. “But in this narrow Sanctuary World, my mission is doomed to fail. So, from a certain moment on, my instinct began to… drift away from the first design. Those individual bodies that split off from me again and again, devoured each other, and returned to me, those branches that overgrew and then kept withering, and that tentacle that pierced into the Mortal Realm—all of these were results of my gradual runaway state.

“However, this kind of runaway state can sometimes be used. When my main body has already lost the ability to move, those overgrown parts can sometimes act as sensors or as channels of communication. They help me learn about changes in the world and send messages out.”

“…So that is how it is.” Duncan nodded slowly and spoke in a thoughtful tone.

A huge body that had lost control, already covering the whole bottom of the Abyssal Deep yet still overgrowing. A main core trapped deep inside that vast body, unable to move. An ancient AI that could still think clearly but was doomed never to finish its first mission. This was the true form of the “Abyssal Lord”.

And now, this ancient AI, trapped inside its own vast body, sent him an invitation once more—

“Flame Usurper, what is your answer? Are you willing to take over all of this and return to the ranks of the ancient Elder Kings?”

Duncan lifted his head from his thoughts and saw the dark red core move a little closer to him again. All he had to do was raise his hand, and he could touch its unguarded crystalline surface.

“…Captain, it is telling the truth,” Alice said suddenly beside him.

Duncan looked at Alice in some surprise. The doll slowly nodded, her expression a little tangled: “I also… don’t know how to explain it to you, but I just know that everything it says is true.”

Duncan did not speak. He only listened quietly to Alice’s words. After thinking for a moment, he slowly raised his hand.

He touched the dark red core. A faint warmth came to his fingertips.

It beat softly like a heart.

“…Light the fire, Flame Usurper,” the core said, its body trembling gently. “Then I will also be freed from this long mission.”

Shirley opened her eyes wide. Dog stood still at her side and watched everything.

For one moment, it was as if they already saw ghost-green flame leap up into the air. The dark red core and the dark mountain range in the distance were set alight in an instant, and the whole Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea were swallowed by the blaze.

It was as if they already saw all the hidden dangers of the Deep Sea era smoothed away, the flaws built into the Sanctuary World at its design repaired, and the world on the Boundless Sea return to peace, lasting for a very, very long time…

A new deity would return to the place that belonged to Him, like gears locking into place and a puzzle coming together.

But all of a sudden, Duncan pulled back his arm.

“No.”

History moved onto another branch.

Chapter 733: After the Branch

With a howl that tore the air, a heavy alloy greatsword crashed down toward the ground like a falling star. The blunt-edged blade had no sharpened edge, yet it sliced a giant demon the size of a heavy tank clean in half as if it were butter. Then, with another thunderous boom, Vanna slammed her fist into the earth. In the terrible shockwave, several weaker demons gathered around her were crushed into pulp.

A strange, sharp shriek sounded from behind her. A projectile loaded with foul energy shot in from a tricky angle. Vanna moved quickly to her feet, but before she could raise her hand to block it, a fast black figure rushed in from the side. A two-handed greatsword, shining with silver light, intercepted the vicious sneak attack. Then several marine squad members with enchanted steel swords charged in and chopped the demon that had attacked from not far away into thin pieces.

Vanna looked up at the black figure and gave a small nod: “Your reactions are fast.”

Amber’s face lit up with joy. She nodded happily, then could not help looking at Vanna with eyes full of awe and envy: “You really… are even stronger than I imagined.”

“It’s fine. I’m in good shape today,” Vanna said. She gave the alloy greatsword in her hand a casual spin, then drove it backward into the mist beside her, skewering a Abyssal Hound that had just formed out of the thick fog. Her other hand flicked lightly on the hilt—the demon was crushed at once into fine dust. “And these demons are not very strong… they are much weaker than the enemies I’ve been dealing with lately.”

Amber’s face seemed to freeze for a moment, but she quickly recovered and went back to her position. She kept directing the warriors to clear the wandering demons near the cave entrance while arranging for the fighters to rest in turns and strengthen the defenses.

Vanna also lifted her greatsword again, but just then she seemed to sense something. Her eyes narrowed a little as she looked into the deep fog.

For a moment, she felt as if she had seen a figure—a figure in a tattered robe, hunched over as it walked across the rocky shore in the ravine.

The figure seemed not to notice the fierce fighting around it. It did not see the demons or the Church warriors so close by. It was like a phantom from another layer of time and space, hurrying through the mist.

It lasted only an instant. When Vanna blinked again, the figure was gone.

Right after that, a terrifying demon rose out of the thick fog not far away. It was made from countless bones stacked and woven together, and looked like a three-meter-wide, savage “bone ball”. The hollow howls from inside the sphere forced Vanna to push down her questions for now and raise her sword to meet the enemy…

In a burst of dense musket fire, the strange demons crawling out of the black gate were torn to pieces by the bullets fired by the toy soldiers before their bodies could even settle into shape. Then, with shouted orders and shrill whistles, the toy soldiers, their bodies painted in bright colors, quickly formed up again. They began digging works in the ground and pushed wooden carved cannon carts up into position.

Morris watched this scene with interest. Then he reached down, grabbed one toy soldier from the ground, and lifted it to his eyes to study it. The metal plate on his forehead slid back. Inside his skull, between countless spinning gears and trembling springs, a set of fine lenses was pushed out by a mechanical arm and focused on the toy soldier.

The toy soldier struggled hard and began to bang the butt of its rifle against Morris's fingers. Wood and metal hit each other with a series of sharp "clang, clang, clang" sounds.

Morris let go of the toy soldier, stretched his fingers, and turned his head to look at the sea witch beside him. She was using a conductor's baton to keep directing all kinds of toy soldiers, paper war chariots, and folded paper soldiers as they set up the lines. He said: "…Quite fierce."

"…Could you stop grabbing my soldiers all the time just to study them?" Lucretia gave Morris a helpless look. "Why don't you go study the demon corpses instead? They're everywhere here…"

"What's so special about demon corpses? We get those on the ship every few days," Morris said. He casually took out a pipe, but as soon as he put it to his mouth he remembered that he was currently in his Forged State, and had to put it back in his pocket with some regret. "When we get the chance, I want to ask you about Doll technology. The way you drive them seems related to the Academy's tech, but it goes in a different direction…"

"Of course, when this is over," Lucretia said easily. "I'm also very interested in the forged body you use. I've dealt with the Truth Academy many times, so I know you have that kind of divine magic that can briefly transform part of your body into machinery. But turning your entire body into a 'forged form'… this is the first time I've seen it."

Morris laughed, a buzzing sound from the springs in his throat. But just then, something caught at the edge of his vision and cut off what he was about to say.

In the depths of the dim cave, on a patch of open ground beside the black gate, a figure seemed to appear out of nowhere.

The figure wore a tattered white robe and looked as if it had been standing there for a very long time. Neither the demons nearby nor the “soldiers” summoned by Lucretia seemed to notice this uninvited guest. The figure just stood there quietly on the battlefield, out of place with its surroundings, like a ghostly image cast in from another layer of time and space.

The figure seemed to be studying the black gate, keeping a fixed stance as it stared at the door without moving.

But it lasted only a moment. When Morris blinked again, that strange figure was gone.

Lucretia suddenly noticed that something was off with Morris. After directing the soldiers to destroy another demon that had crawled out of the black gate, she turned at once: “What is it?”

“…There was a figure near the black gate,” Morris said in a grave tone. “But it vanished in a blink. You didn’t see it?”

“No,” Lucretia shook her head, her brow tightening. “Damn it, I wasn’t looking that way just now…”

“…It’s fine,” Morris said. He glanced at the witch and waved a hand. “I took a picture.”

Lucretia froze for a moment: “A picture…?”

Morris nodded. At the same time, a series of clicks from turning gears and shifting parts sounded inside his body. Then his whole lower jaw joint dropped off in a very unsettling way. A dark opening showed, and from it he slowly spat out a palm-sized piece of photo paper.

Morris pulled out the photo paper and shook it in the air. With his other hand, he casually fixed his jaw back into place. Then he handed the photo to Lucretia: “It’s not very clear. It seems to have been disturbed, but you can still see a white shape.”

Lucretia took the photo with a strange look on her face. She saw the blurry figure near the black gate, but her eyes still drifted back to Morris: “…Why do you even have that function…”

Morris smiled slightly: “I told you, I had many adventures when I was young…”

Lucretia: “…”

…

Duncan had a faint feeling that when he pulled his hand back, something quietly changed. He could not say whether it was his own fate or the future of the world.

He only felt in some deep, unseen place that the decision he made at this moment was very important, whether it turned out good or bad.

He lifted his head and saw that the dark red core still floated calmly right in front of him. The light inside it flickered. The towering “mountain” behind the core had grown quiet, and the lights on its surface looked a little dim.

His refusal had not “angered” this Elder God. It only seemed… puzzled.

After quite a while, the core finally spoke: “Why?”

Then the light inside the core grew a little brighter than before, and it went on: “In theory, seeing the Sanctuary World repaired should match your wishes. You have already saved three city-states, and taking over this world would let all city-states be saved more completely. For quite a long time, they would no longer be under threat from runaway state and corruption. I have calculated all possible outcomes. You should be glad to see such a result, so why do you refuse?”

Duncan stayed silent for a while, then suddenly asked: “And then?”

The light in the dark red core seemed puzzled: “Then?”

Duncan’s tone stayed calm: “What happens after that ‘quite a long time’ you spoke of?”

The dark red core fell silent. Its slow, flickering glow showed its hesitation.

“I don’t know if there are other plans. Maybe your proposal really is the best choice for now. Maybe things really will go the way you said. But at least for now… I cannot agree to it.”

Duncan spoke calmly as he took a small step back.

“Call it instinct… I feel that there are big problems in your ‘plan’. I think there are other ways, not just resetting this Sanctuary World and letting it drag out a half-life.”

He paused for a moment and looked very seriously at the few rays of light inside the core.

“And just like your reaction a moment ago—it is clear that you cannot tell what will happen after that ‘quite a long time’. Maybe my takeover could truly bring the whole Sanctuary World back to its best state and fix all its current flaws. But even you cannot say how long a Sanctuary World like that, rebuilt and fully in line with its ‘blueprint’, would keep running.

“The Sun that was once thought ‘eternal’ has already gone out twice. The border mist called the ‘Eternal Veil’ has been collapsing again and again for decades. The gods are slowly dying, and you know your own state as well. All things decay. I do not believe that just by sitting in the place of the ancient Elder Kings and the gods I can change that. After all, as a ‘world’ meant for people to live and grow, this Boundless Sea is, in terms of both resources and space, far too… cramped.

“And from a selfish point of view, I do not want to take over everything now only to sit where you sit after another ten thousand years, watching this Sanctuary World fall into the End once again, just like you. When that time comes, who should I look for to ‘take over’ all of this from me?”

Chapter 734: Farewell to The Creator

Duncan’s answer kept that dark red core silent for a long time.

After an unknown time, Shirley and Alice finally heard a low hum from deep within the distant “black mountain range”. As the massive body at the center of the range slowly shifted and writhed, the dark red core of the Abyssal Lord rose bit by bit. It returned to its original place, to the height from which it overlooked the land.

“A Sanctuary World can at least let many people survive, perhaps for several thousand years, perhaps for ten thousand years… Even if it is not eternal, it is better than turning to dust,” the dark red core pulsed faintly, its deep trembling voice echoing across the wasteland. “My Creators told me that survival is the first task, and I have always carried out their orders. In my logic, nothing is more important than keeping the Sanctuary World going.”

“Survival is indeed very important. I understand why you want to keep the Sanctuary World running. But for me… ‘possibility’ is just as necessary. And this ‘Sanctuary World’, as it is now, really does not have enough possibility for me to see a future in it. It…”

Duncan suddenly fell silent. In that silence, his gaze swept over Dog at his side and Shirley, who still kept the form of a Abyssal demon.

The great fire of Pland, the mud of Frostholm, the nightmare of Lightwind Harbor, the priests, soldiers, and commoners who died, the fallen and the martyrs, the limited Boundless Sea, and every explorer who was trapped to death in this Boundless Sea…

Duncan slowly closed his eyes. Memories rose and tangled in his mind, then finally turned into a sigh: "…It's too dark."

The dark red core that overlooked the land spoke quietly: "Then do you have a better plan?"

"No. But I have some vague ideas." Duncan opened his eyes and calmly met the core's gaze, as if staring into a giant eye worn down by ages. "I more or less know what I should do and what I can do. But I haven't found a correct and workable way yet. I'm still searching – for a future better than this 'Sanctuary World', a future with more possibility, a future worth looking forward to."

"…Is it eternal?" the dark red core asked, still calm.

"No. Nothing in this world is truly eternal. All things decay. But at least it shouldn't be a sea shrouded in fog, short of resources, where you can hardly find a place to stand. That so-called 'eternal Veil' at the border… it is far too narrow for civilization."

"You should know we don't have much time. Neither you nor I, nor this 'Sanctuary World', have time to waste," the dark red core said, its light slowly brightening and dimming. "How long will you take to find that way out? And what if, in the end, you still haven't found it?"

Duncan was silent for a moment, then lifted his head and calmly met the gaze of the Abyssal Lord.

"…Before the world collapses, I will come back here. If by then I still haven't found another way out, I will take over all of this."

After a brief silence, the ancient Navigation Mainframe let out a low tremor. "Recorded. Then this is our pact. If, in the end, you still cannot find a plan better than prolonging the Sanctuary World, come back here and ignite me. And if I have already entered a full runaway state before that… show no mercy. Burn me until nothing is left."

Duncan nodded slowly. "We have a deal."

After that, the Abyssal Lord grew quiet again. Its core hung high above the peak. The faint light within it flickered at a rhythm that slowly matched the lights scattered along the surrounding mountains, as if it was engaged in a long and deep thought, recalculating the future and everything in this world.

Duncan did not disturb this ancient Navigation Mainframe. Time passed, who knew how long, before that deep trembling voice suddenly sounded again: "Navigator Three."

Alice did not move. She did not realize it was calling her until Duncan suddenly tapped her arm. Only then did the doll jerk in surprise. "Ah… huh? Me?"

"…It seems you have completely forgotten the New Hope, haven't you?"

Alice listened, then raised a hand to scratch her hair. Her face looked a bit awkward and guilty. "Uh… sorry, I really don't remember… Was I supposed to remember at least something?"

"No, this is good. It is not what I planned at first, but you are still alive. Survival comes above all. Please keep on living, and do everything you can to help the Flame Usurper."

Alice thought for a second, then took a moment to do the math in her head. She nodded half a beat late. "Oh… mm-hmm! Of course, I'll definitely help the captain!"

Beside them, Shirley tilted her head back. She and Dog gazed up together at that awe-inspiring ancient Creator, so grand it could drive every great explorer and scholar in the world mad in both body and mind.

They could tell the time to say farewell had come. They suddenly felt they also had questions they wanted to ask, yet they could not think of a single thing to say.

But the “gaze” of that dark red core already seemed to fall upon them.

It was a feeling hard to describe. The faint light inside the dark red core only pulsed as usual, yet Shirley felt, by pure instinct, that the other side was now turning its gaze upon her.

A strange sense of being completely seen through rose in her heart. She stepped back half a step without thinking. Then she heard that deep trembling voice again. This time it sounded a little gentler.

“This world has brought you a great deal of suffering,” that gentle voice said slowly. “Do you… also think this Sanctuary World is awful?”

Shirley opened her mouth. She did not know how to answer that. She thought that someone more learned, quicker, and wiser should be standing here now.

Someone like Old Mr. Morris, that Grand Scholar. As the first “mortal” to stand face to face with the Abyssal Lord, the one answering now should have been someone far more capable than her.

Not someone as ignorant and uneducated as she was.

But that Elder God still waited quietly for her answer.

“…I…” Shirley finally squeezed out a sound from her throat. The bone limbs behind her shifted uneasily, and the wisp of light in her chest flickered faintly. “I don’t know either… I didn’t really understand what you and the captain were talking about…”

She muttered, then hesitated for a long time before whispering, “It is hard to stay alive. Sometimes you worry about food. Sometimes it is winter clothes and fuel. Where I used to live, the nights were not very safe either… But I think no matter what happens, there will always be some people who live in hardship. Even if the city-states become ten times bigger and there is more than enough food, life will still be hard in other ways.

“My old neighbor used to say this all the time. Life always has bitter parts. It’s not the world’s fault, and it’s not because someone did something wrong. Compared to that, what the captain cares about is more…”

She turned her head a little and stole a look at Duncan, then quickly pulled her gaze back.

“The captain cares about things that are more… ‘profound’. I don’t really understand them, but I think what he says must be right, and it must be better for many more people. As for me, I don’t have many demands for the future. I just hope… I can live safely and steadily. Of course, if it is possible…”

She stopped suddenly, as if she was choosing her words very carefully. After a long hesitation, she spoke in a small voice, “I hope there won’t be any more demons running out to hurt people. I hope no more people vanish in the corners. I hope the Sun rises and sets every day, and the thick fog doesn’t eat people… That would be even better. If all that could really come true, then anything is fine.”

Dog slowly leaned closer and rubbed his bony, fearsome head softly against Shirley’s leg.

The dark red core hanging high above was silent for a long time. Then it finally broke the silence in a soft voice. “I understand.”

With a series of low rumbles, the center of the huge star-shaped mountain range slowly split open. The dark red core of the Abyssal Lord began to sink back into the depths of the mountain, bit by bit.

Duncan knew the time to say goodbye had come.

But before the core vanished completely into the “mountain”, he suddenly took a step forward. “One more thing.”

The core stopped and waited for him.

“The guard of the last Critt outpost asked me to bring you a greeting,” Duncan said as he took another step forward. His expression grew solemn, and his tone became very serious. “He said… they were honored to have completed their work.”

The dark red core stayed still. For a few seconds, there was no sound at all. No one knew what this ancient Navigation Mainframe was thinking or calculating at that moment.

Maybe it had searched its vast database and found the meaning of the distant word “Critt”. Maybe it was recalling information from the Dawn of Creation. Maybe… it was just a silent sigh.

Or perhaps, the Creator who had made all things and the Critt clan also thought of Its own Creators at that moment.

“I was also honored… to have worked with them.”

The dark red core slowly sank into the depths of the mountain range.

Duncan drew back his gaze from the “mountain”. He took a light breath. Layers of illusory flames began to rise and ripple around him. “We should go. There is still much to do.”

Alice walked to the captain’s side and stepped forward to meet the encircling flames. Shirley moved her long bone limbs and stepped into the fire with Dog.

The flames rose. In Alice’s pale violet eyes, countless tangled paths appeared, as she began to search for the correct route out of the depths of the Abyssal Deep.

Shirley still stared, dazed, at the distant peak, at the place where the dark red core had vanished. For some reason, she kept feeling… that a gaze still rested on her from there.

Only when the flames closed around them, and the light and shadow outside the fire grew vague and hazy, did she suddenly hear a faint whisper. The voice seemed to echo directly in her mind. It repeated a few times before she finally heard the words clearly –

“…I am sorry. I did my best back then…”

The flames shot upward, then vanished in an instant into the vast gloom of the Deep Sea of the Abyssal Deep.

Chapter 735: Quiet Changes

The cold, frozen projections of the cluster of Starry Sky caves swept quickly past the edge of their vision. Navigation Mainframe-Alice calculated the route home. Shirley, who had returned to human form, stared in a daze with Dog at the shifting lights beyond the flames and stayed silent for a long time.

After a very long while, Duncan's voice suddenly reached her ears. "What are you thinking about?"

Shirley jumped in fright. Then she blinked her eyes, those Abyssal demon eyes filled with a blood-red glow, and muttered softly, "I just suddenly thought of something… I always thought the Abyssal Lord was a terrifying Eldritch God, in a runaway state, really, really bad…"

Duncan looked at her for a few seconds, then drew his gaze back. "If you had faced Him alone today, things would have been exactly as you say. Your mind would not have been able to understand or handle His voice, and you would only have seen His runaway state madness. It is the same for the other deities. In the end, what you 'saw' of the Abyssal Lord today was actually from my point of view."

"Mm, I know. Dog explained this to me before, after you met with the Pope of the Four Gods. Cognitive Shift… right?"

Duncan nodded and said nothing for a moment. Ten-odd seconds passed before he suddenly spoke again. "Do you think I should have accepted the Abyssal Lord's invitation?"

Shirley froze, as if she had not kept up. “…Huh?”

Duncan still looked at her gently. “If I had accepted, then all the things you hope for could come true almost at once. No more demons would run out to hurt people. No more people would vanish in the corners. The Sun would rise and set every day. The thick fog would not eat people.

“The world you long for, where many more people can live in safety and peace, would be there as soon as I took over the Sanctuary World.

“Maybe it would last a thousand years, maybe ten thousand, or even longer. After I take control of this world, every city-state will be as safe as Pland and Frostholm are now. Even the nights will quiet down. As long as my flames keep burning, this Boundless Sea can keep its peaceful look, until all resources are used up and the Sanctuary World reaches the limit of the lifespan it was designed for. That is the true lifespan the Abyssal Lord once planned, but never reached.”

Shirley was quiet for a moment, then spoke softly. “And then… everyone would still die, right?”

Duncan looked at her calmly. “Yes. But that would be after a very long time. Even if you remained immortal like a normal Abyssal demon, by then you should have no regrets left.”

This time Shirley stayed quiet even longer. She seemed to be trying hard to think it through. Dog stayed peacefully at her side, and it was hard to tell what he was thinking.

“Actually…” After a long time, Shirley finally broke the silence. “Actually, I really don’t understand it all. I think the Abyssal Lord’s plan is already very good. A safe Sanctuary World. It might not be eternal, but at least it is safe. I… don’t have such high hopes. Being able to live the last stretch of time in peace like that, isn't that enough? After all… there is nowhere else to go."

"Yes, there is nowhere else to go," Duncan said softly. "Because this world is forever only this one Boundless Sea, forever only these city-states floating on the ocean, forever only this little patch of living space in the mist…

"But Shirley, the real 'world' shouldn't be like this. This is just… a narrow cardboard box."

Shirley listened on the side, only half understanding. Chains clinked softly as Dog shifted and finally broke the silence. "Just like you said, this little box cannot bear any more 'possibility', can it?"

"It is too narrow. The Boundless Sea locked in fog is very narrow. Even a few thousand or ten thousand years of 'service life' is very narrow. For the countless civilizations destroyed in the Great Annihilation, this little box is only big enough to cram in a small part of their replicas. And the limited life of the Sanctuary World is not even enough time for them to patch together their lost history once…

"This is not a 'new home', do you understand? If the 'world' before the Great Annihilation was made of many lush forests, then the Boundless Sea now is only a small potted plant. The result of the first three Long Nights was only to take a few flowers and grasses that survived in the forest, plant them in the pot, and pretend the forest still exists.

"But in truth, no matter how you water and fertilize it, it will never become a forest. Never. And it would only take one small mistake for even the flower pot to be lost as well."

"So you refused His plan because you can already see it has no future," Dog said slowly. "You already know another way to solve this, don't you?"

Duncan did not answer. He only lowered his head and quietly looked at his own hands.

He blinked. In the instant his eyelids closed, in the first 0.002 seconds of darkness, he saw clusters of stars flicker. Magnificent rivers of stars shone in the deep sky. Huge star-forming clouds stretched between them like splendid curtains.

Even though he had already left that cavern, he could still see that “different scenery” in the first 0.002 seconds every time he blinked.

Duncan knew he was undergoing some kind of change. Those things that used to be hidden, now appearing in his sight, were only one part of that change. As for when exactly this change had started… he did not know.

But he knew that as long as he kept seeking the truth and tried to uncover the secret of his own existence, this change would keep appearing, keep growing, and keep speeding up…

He did not know if he was ready, but he knew there was no time left to prepare. Just like Navigator One had said, neither he nor this world had any time left.

The phantom of distant starlight reached its end…

A sea of blooming flowers burst open in the illusion. The short Conductor’s Baton in Lucretia’s hand fell lightly. A few crisp notes sprang out, and the Fear Demons buried under the flowers turned, soundless, into drifting ash.

Beside her came the hiss of pressurized pipes and a loud clang of metal. Morris punched away a Abyssal Hound that had leaped at him and shook his head with a helpless look. “These demons have no respect at all for knowledge and wisdom… Good thing I still know a bit of boxing.”

“The number of demons is increasing,” Lucretia said, her face serious as she watched the black gate that was still swelling and writhing. For once, a trace of tiredness showed on her face. “The crack is expanding. More and more demons are noticing this place. The whole island is sinking toward the Deep Sea of the Abyssal Deep.”

“The captain should be back soon,” Morris muttered, his throat giving off the metallic resonance caused by vibrating reeds. “Judging from the noise above, if the captain doesn’t come back soon, Vanna might just smash the whole valley open.”

Lucretia frowned and tilted her head, listening to the heavy booms that kept coming from the dome of the cavern. She shook her head slightly. “That doesn’t sound like Miss Vanna’s doing. It sounds more like the Sacred Island itself… It’s about to be ‘woken up’ again.”

Morris opened his mouth to speak, but before he could say anything, a bright green flame suddenly surged up from the writhing black gate.

In the blink of an eye, the fire spewed out from the portal and formed a spinning gate of flames in the open space of the cavern. A few figures stepped out of it, and the captain’s familiar, solemn voice came with them. “You’re right. This place is about to ‘wake up’ again. Tell everyone to evacuate the Sacred Island. Our work here is done.”

Lucretia was startled for a moment, then reacted at once. She did not even bother with greetings and nodded right away. “Got it, Dad!”

Before her words had even fully fallen, she was already moving quickly to gather up her Toy soldiers. After saluting the captain, Morris at once saw Shirley and Dog standing beside him. He noticed Shirley’s blood-red eyes, just like those of a Abyssal demon, and his eyes widened a little. “Shirley, what is…”

But Shirley’s eyes were even wider than Morris’s. She stared blankly at the Grand Scholar in his current “forged” state and finally squeezed out a line.

“Old Gentleman, why did you turn into copper?”

Duncan also looked at Morris with some surprise and gave a small, thoughtful nod. “…A very special form.”

Only then did Morris realize he was still in his forged form. He hurried to focus his mind, silently recited Rahm’s prayer, and cast divine magic to reverse his state.

The feeling of a copper shell faded quickly from his whole body. Living flesh replaced gears, bearings, pumps, and copper tubes in a way that was hard to believe. A pair of ruby focus lenses slipped back out of his eye sockets, and human eyeballs grew there instead. He blinked, pulled the delicate brass mechanism out from inside his body, and finally smiled and nodded. “…The power of knowledge.”

Shirley was completely dumbfounded. “…That’s not what you and the captain meant by ‘the power of knowledge’ when you taught me…”

In such a short time, this young lady had completely relearned what “knowledge changes fate” and “the power of knowledge” could mean. She would probably never forget it for the rest of her life.

At that moment, another wave of strange howls and mutters suddenly rose in the cavern.

The writhing black gate grew restless again. More demons began to push through the crack into the Mortal Realm, their jagged bones and countless hands, feet, and tentacles squeezing out from the moving surface and crawling toward the cavern.

Lucretia raised her short Conductor’s Baton on instinct, but before she could act, Duncan waved a hand at the gate. “Go back.”

The jagged bones and countless hands, feet, and tentacles began to scramble back through the portal in a rush.

“And close the door on your way,” Duncan added from the side.

The swelling, writhing “black gate” slowly grew calm.

Lucretia: “…”

Duncan turned his head, waved to the Sea Witch to bring her back to her senses, and said, “Come on. We still have a lot to do.”

Chapter 736: Leaving Sanctuary Island

The “Black Gate” deep in the cavern had been closed, yet more and more Abyssal demons were still crawling out all across Sanctuary Island. This little island, formed from a piece of the Abyssal Lord’s flesh, was trembling. Deep rumbles and strange buzzing sounds rolled through the mist like noises from a giant beast’s belly. Countless weird shapes flickered in and out of sight in the fog. Every second, shadows turned solid and wildly attacked the uninvited guests who had stepped onto the island.

Duncan and his group left the cavern. After they met up safely with Vanna, Amber, and the others who had been holding the valley, they began to fall back toward the coast.

The ground shook. From deep in the valley came the sharp crack and boom of breaking rock. Chaotic howls and mad muttering spread like a nightmare in every direction. Nameless shadows gathered in the mist. Cold air carried malice from all sides as it howled past the jagged stones on the cliffs. In the swirling fog, even the rocks on the cliff faces seemed to slowly come to life. Huge limbs hung down from the heights. Those vine-like limbs bent and shivered, making wet swallowing and chewing sounds. Dirty black mud dripped from them, and every drop that hit the ground hissed and sent up curls of dark smoke.

Even the Church warriors, who often operated in the border seas, could not help feeling tense. The marines gripped their enchanted steel swords, consecrated lanterns, and charm amulets as they moved, watching the restless shadows along the path. Amber walked beside Vanna with a longsword in one hand and, in the other, a consecrated lantern carved with storm sigils. As she walked she softly recited prayers to the Storm Goddess. Gentle wave?sounds whispered in the minds of the warriors, shielding their thoughts so they would not be tempted or corrupted by the demons' whispers. The death priest, whose body was covered in tattoos, walked at the very front carrying a casket of Sacred Bone Ash. Beside him the fog briefly drew back, and the shapes of the demons faded. A temporarily calm road opened before them for the journey back.

Once Duncan saw that these Church warriors truly had enough strength to handle the trouble on the road and bring everyone back safely, he relaxed. He walked calmly at the back of the group and put more of his energy into thinking.

After some time, they made it through the wild inner part of the island and finally stepped onto the main road leading to the pier—the coast was already close.

The roar of guns and explosions came from deep within the fog ahead. Now and then huge flames leapt up into the air, like a bursting sunrise that lit and burned red a wide stretch of sky. The sight was shocking.

Amber came over and said: "replicas shaped like ships and large wandering demons have already started showing up on the sea nearby. Our fleet is fighting those monsters." The young priest of the Goddess held a longsword in one hand and, in the other, a consecrated lantern carved with storm patterns. Her face looked very serious. "They report that one side of Sanctuary Island is slowly… changing shape. Some of the sea cliffs seem to be softening and collapsing downward. It has not affected this side yet, but the whole island is clearly… coming to life, in some way."

Duncan lifted his head. He looked at the huge boulders in the mountains that kept coming alive in the mist, and at the black tentacles that had grown from the nearby slopes and were curling and spreading toward the low ground. He nodded lightly.

“This island is just as Shirley said. It really is a piece of the Abyssal Lord’s flesh. The whole island is a section of one of His tentacles that pierced into the Mortal Realm,” Duncan said. “And now it seems He has started to correct that ‘mistake’.”

“…It is a pity about all the truths buried here,” Amber pressed her lips together and said: “If we had more time, we could have explored this island properly. Those Annihilators sat here for at least a few centuries. There must still be countless dark and sinful secrets hidden here… maybe even secret bases and lists of their agents hidden inside the city?states…”

Hearing Amber mutter with a bit of regret, Duncan did not answer. He only watched the island as it kept collapsing and twisting, and could not help recalling the vast ‘mountain range’ he had seen at the bottom of the Abyssal Deep—majestic, grand, and yet shrouded in sorrow and darkness.

Ten thousand years had passed. The “Navigator One” that had once been meant to rebuild the ecosystem had, in its runaway growth, turned into a huge twisted monster. Its limbs pierced the Abyssal Deep Sea, stabbed into Subspace, and reached into the Mortal Realm, yet it still had not stopped growing.

This made Duncan think that even if the Boundless Sea had never “malfunctioned”, even if Vision 001 – the Sun could keep supporting it, the ever?growing Navigator One alone would still have been enough to bring another doomsday.

And that doomsday would not be far away. Perhaps, on some day within the next hundred years, Navigator One’s exponentially growing body would fill the whole Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea. Then it would spread at a mad speed into every dimension. His tentacles would stab through every city? state and coil over the whole sea, wrapping around every ship that sailed there, until every solid thing in the mortal world was swallowed again by its "creator" and turned once more into black mud and writhing tentacles.

…Was this the same scene those Annihilators saw in their visions of mental derangement? Just as they preached—on some day in the future, the Abyssal Lord would return to this pitiful world. The elements would burst up from the depths of the world and turn everything back into a pure, original state…

In a way, those mad cultists really had seen part of this world's "truth" in their mental derangement. Maybe it was during brief links with the Abyssal Lord. Maybe it happened while they turned themselves into demons and touched the elements as they pleased. They had seen the future and then explained that terrible future in whatever way they were willing to understand.

Duncan drew in a slow breath and gently shook his head.

Navigator One had invited him to "take over" this Sanctuary World and hoped that, in the process, Duncan would burn away his huge body that had already gone completely out of control. Navigator One had calmly admitted that this would be a kind of "release"—release from a long mission.

It seemed that sustaining this Sanctuary World really was a long and bitter task, enough to leave even an ancient "machine" tired and filled with despair.

In his heart, Duncan once again firmed his resolve to find another way.

Keeping this Sanctuary World as it was would never be a good choice—at least, it was not the best one.

After a journey that was dangerous but ended without disaster, the landing party finally returned to the hidden pier, shielded by the inner bay and the sea cliffs. The small boats they had used to come here still waited at the shore, rocking in the restless water.

The landing skiff lowered from the Vanished rocked the most—and it was rocking upright.

In short, the whole boat had its bow pointed at the sky, stuck in the shallows like a weed, bouncing and swaying. Only when Duncan and the others showed up did it finally flop back onto the water with a loud “bang”. Then it wagged its oars, swung its stern, and rushed to the shore on its own, bobbing in excitement and slapping its own sides with the oars.

Duncan: “…”

Lucretia stared at the little boat for a while, then lowered her head and muttered to Duncan: “Dad, I kind of don’t want to get on that boat anymore…”

“It is a bit embarrassing,” Duncan stayed silent for a few seconds, then sighed softly. “But let’s still get on. We’ve already come this far. If we take the pigeons right in front of it, this thing might just sink itself on the spot. There are already enough ghost ships in this world. If we add one more furious landing skiff to the list, it will be hard to explain to people later…”

Lucretia sighed and, with mixed feelings, could only follow Father onto the small boat.

The three fast boats left the pier and sped toward the mouth of the small bay, toward the thick fog that kept flashing with light and booming with noise.

Just as they left the bay’s mouth and could already see several main warships anchored on the nearby sea, Shirley suddenly seemed to feel something. She jerked around on the small boat and looked back toward the island.

Her eyes, filled with a faint bloody light, slowly widened—

“ The island is starting to sink!”

In a series of dull, thunder?like booms, the whole Sanctuary Island collapsed and sagged like some soft matter that had lost its support. Its sea cliffs melted downward. Black sludge seeped out from every bit of soil and rock. Huge tentacles and jagged limbs burst through the softening cliffs and coast, thrashing madly in the rising water. Countless frenzied demons ran and howled among the crumbling rock walls. They seemed to want to escape, but some unseen force tugged at them so they could not leave the bounds of Sanctuary Island. They could only “sink” along with the island…

Duncan noticed that Sanctuary Island was not really sinking into the sea. Instead, it was dissolving, melting away at the surface of the water.

Navigator One was slowly pulling back this limb that had wrongly stretched into the Mortal Realm.

Even though the collapse of the Sanctuary World was already close at hand and his own runaway state could no longer be reversed, he still tried, within the limits of his power, to repair the system’s errors and push back the final breaking point.

But… how many more times could this kind of delay still work?

Duncan and Alice sat at the stern of the small boat and looked back at Sanctuary Island, which was almost completely “dissolved” into the sea. Its final outline shook in the thickening fog like a dream that was slowly drifting away.

Before that outline fully vanished, Duncan faintly heard a voice. It was a low vibration carried on the breeze.

“Do not forget our pact, bearer of the Flame Usurper…”

Duncan felt someone grab his arm. He turned his head. In the fog, the clearest thing he saw was Alice’s deep violet eyes.

“I heard him speaking, Captain.”

“I heard him too, Alice. Can you still find the place where he is?”

“Yes,” Alice nodded, then scratched her hair. “But I don’t really know how I do it. I just feel that… if you need it, I can still take you to him, because I remember… the ‘road’.”

Duncan nodded slightly. “That is enough.”

Alice hesitated for a moment and then asked, very carefully: “Then… will we go back to find him?”

“I think… we will.”

“Then about when?”

“…At least before the world’s doomsday.”

Chapter 737: Keywords

The fleet sailed back toward the fog boundary along the route they had used to come. Maybe because the large solid mass of Sanctuary Island had sunk, the nearby sea was far from calm. The surface, which usually looked like a mirror, now rippled again and again with fine, fish?scale?like waves. The thick fog around them also kept showing strange and colorful illusions. It made many people tense.

But until they had gone halfway, nothing truly threatening appeared in the fog.

The spirit form sail hung high. Now and then, faint creaks sounded as the ropes shifted. Thin mist flowed over the deck of the Vanished. In the pale haze, Agatha’s figure faintly appeared as she walked slowly through the fog.

She was checking the “environment” around the Vanished. In her eyes, the scenes of both the Mortal Realm and the Spirit Realm were reflected at the same time. The fog around them did not look quite the same as when they came. The Spirit Realm also seemed faintly restless. It did not seem likely to affect the Vanished, but she still cared about it and stayed on guard.

Everyone else had gathered in the cabin. The captain was talking with his followers about the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea.

In front of the crew members he trusted, Duncan did not hide his experiences in the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea, including his conversation with the Abyssal Lord.

Morris sat by the long table with a pipe between his teeth. Thin threads of smoke drifted up, showing how uneasy he felt. After a long time, the old scholar finally put the pipe down and muttered, his expression odd: “I have seen many unbelievable things in my life, but nothing like this. The Creator of this world actually invited you to take His place…”

Nina pinched her own arm hard, as if she still doubted she was awake. Then she looked up at Duncan and asked: “You really turned Him down?”

Duncan’s face stayed calm. “Yes. The Abyssal Lord’s plan has serious problems, so I refused.”

“Does the Sanctuary World really have no future…” Lucretia murmured to herself. She seemed to recall a talk she had once had with Father. After a long pause, she spoke softly: “I still remember the question you asked me. You asked whether I felt this Boundless Sea was narrow and cramped. But now it seems that even this already cramped Sanctuary World has reached its limit. I never thought that, after we left the civilized world and came all this way, this would be the news we received.”

A slightly heavy mood hung over the cabin. The long table fell silent for a time. After a while, Nina leaned close to Shirley and asked in a low, worried voice: “How do you feel now? Is anything wrong?”

“Actually I don’t feel much different from usual. My eyes and ears even seem sharper than before,” Shirley muttered. Her eyes still shone with a bloody light. “It’s just that, when I think about having to cover my eyes or keep them shut every time I go into a city from now on… it sounds really bothersome.”

“At least you came back safely,” Nina could not help grumbling. “I was so worried when I heard you were missing. I even wanted to go up on the island to look for you, but Goathead stopped me…”

Listening to the quiet talk beside him, Duncan slowly let his gaze move over each figure at the table. His tense expression eased a little, and he let out a soft breath.

“Let’s stop here. This trip to Sanctuary Island was very draining. Before we return to the city?state, everyone should rest well.”

As he finished speaking, he was already standing. He waved a hand to tell the others not to get up, then turned and left.

The captain left. Until his figure vanished at the doorway, the cabin stayed quietly heavy. Only after a while did Nina mutter and break the silence: “Uncle Duncan looks really tired… he has a lot on his mind.”

“He has to think about too many things,” Morris said as he put out his pipe. “Sadly, there is very little we can help with.”

After thinking for a moment, Lucretia turned her eyes to Dog and asked: “Did Father say anything else after he turned down the Abyssal Lord’s ‘plan’?”

Dog thought for a while and then spoke, not very sure: “He said he had another plan, but right now it is only an idea. He hasn’t found the right path yet… That’s all. He didn’t say anything more, and he didn’t explain it to me or Shirley.”

Listening to Dog, Lucretia fell into thought…

After leaving the cabin, Duncan did not go anywhere else. He went straight across the mid?deck to the door of the captain’s cabin at the stern.

In the thin mist drifting slowly across the deck, the dark wooden door stood before him as always. The words “Door of the Lost Ones” on the doorframe were sharp and clear.

Duncan put his hand on the doorknob, then suddenly stopped and simply stood there. In a brief moment of thought, he lifted his head and watched the pale fog outside the rail, stacked like layers of curtains, and the hazy daylight that fell through it. He stood like that for a long time.

After who knew how long, he finally drew back his gaze and pushed the door open.

Passing through the familiar door, stepping onto the familiar floor, and walking into the familiar room, Zhou Ming let out a quiet breath and strolled through the living room.

Everything in the studio apartment was just as he remembered, as if it would never change—as if not only the past few years or decades, but even the past thousands and tens of thousands of years had all been the same.

Everything here was etched deep in Zhou Ming's mind. He walked past the furnishings that were familiar beyond all measure and stepped up to the window. He looked out through the glass that had never once been opened and stared at the view outside.

Pale mist hung like layers of curtains. In the fog no trace of what should have been "streets" could be seen. Only hazy daylight fell from above and spread through the vapor.

Zhou Ming hesitated for a moment, then slowly reached toward the window and pressed his hand against the glass.

Cold, hard glass met his touch. The window, as always, did not move at all, as if it had set solid with the space around it.

He drew a gentle breath, then slowly blinked.

In the instant his eyelids closed, in the first 0.002 seconds of the coming darkness, he… saw nothing at all.

There was no window, no fog outside, and no so?called “true side” of the world in his sight.

In front of him there was only endless darkness, an ultimate void in which everything had perished.

Zhou Ming slowly stepped back two steps and steadied his breathing.

He remembered the changes that had happened to him. He remembered that, whenever he moved on the “other side” of the door, each blink gave him a 0.002?second glimpse of the “true landscape” hidden beneath the Mortal Realm. So why, here, did he see only utter darkness made of absolute nothing?

Was it because, here, he was “Zhou Ming” and not “Duncan”? Because this room belonged to some higher level of existence? Or was it because, here, there truly was… nothing at all?

Zhou Ming stood in the living room, lost in thought. Then, out of the corner of his eye, he noticed a patch of light in the room.

It was his computer. The machine whose power cord had already been pulled out was humming along, and the monitor was playing a looping wallpaper as always.

Zhou Ming frowned a little, as if something had come to mind. He quickly walked over and sat down in front of the computer.

He moved the mouse and closed the wallpaper, then opened the browser and began typing in the search bar. He had not used it for so long that his fingers were clumsy. He mistyped several times before slowly getting his feel back.

He still remembered that, once before, the browser on this computer had given him an answer. It had shown “the Moon”, and in some way that reply had really explained part of the world’s “truth” to him.

Would it answer his other questions again?

As the soft clack of keys sounded, he first typed “0.002 seconds” into the search box and pressed Enter.

He watched the spinning cursor and the slowly moving progress bar with uneasy eyes while his thoughts churned.

Navigator One had told him that he had come to this world at the very start of the Great Annihilation. The ancient Elder Kings had gathered around him and seen a chaotic Light Cocoon floating at the center of the ashes. Was that Light Cocoon this “studio apartment” of his?

If so, then what did all the furnishings and items in this studio apartment represent?

What did this computer represent? What about the shelves at the far end of the room? And those “models” that had been burned by flames and transformed into what they were now—what did they stand for?

The cursor flashed. The progress bar at the bottom of the screen suddenly emptied, and an error message from the browser appeared before Zhou Ming’s eyes.

But he was not surprised.

After a brief pause for thought, he typed new words into the search box: “Great Annihilation”.

The browser errored out. The search failed.

Zhou Ming was not discouraged. After a moment’s thought, he entered another keyword: “End of Time”.

Another error followed. Then came more keywords—

“cosmic collision”, “redshift”, “Sanctuary World”, “ancient Elder Kings”, “Deep Sea era”, “the stars”…

He tried one keyword after another, but the error message on the screen never changed.

After trying who knew how many times, Zhou Ming slowly began to frown. When the last keyword—“Zhou Ming”—brought yet another error, he let out a soft sigh, and a wave of disappointment rose in his heart.

“It” had not responded to him. It had given no answers.

Not sure whether he felt more frustrated or empty, Zhou Ming shook his head and leaned back in the chair, staring at the screen with tired eyes.

The little cursor still flashed in the search bar, as if it were waiting for him to type another keyword—or silently mocking him.

Zhou Ming sat there quietly for more than ten minutes. Then, all of a sudden, he stared hard at the tiny flashing cursor as something seemed to leap into his mind.

He sat up straight at once, put his hands on the keyboard again, and typed another keyword—

“Inverse Singularity”

In the instant he pressed Enter, a phantom roar suddenly crashed into Zhou Ming’s mind, and the screen before his eyes fell into darkness.

Chapter 738: The Knock on the Door

A phantom rumble suddenly sounded. The screen in front of him went completely black. In the next second, Zhou Ming felt all sound pull away from him—the computer's fan went quiet, the hum of the fridge in the corner slowly faded, and the whole room fell into a strange dead silence. The air around him… was changing.

And all of this happened right after he typed the words "Inverse Singularity" into the search bar.

He blinked, pushed his chair back, and stood up from the computer desk.

The chair slid backward without a sound. His movements made no sound either. A pen by the edge of the desk was bumped off and fell to the floor, but even when it landed, it was completely silent.

For a few short seconds, Zhou Ming even thought he had gone deaf.

Then he realized the problem was with the environment around him—the room was getting darker.

The lights vanished. Everything in the room slowly became covered in a layer of chaotic shadows. In the deepening gloom, all things began to lose their color. The patterned curtains first turned into a gray-white block. Then his desk, his chair, and his bed followed. Everything in sight turned one after another into dull gray, then was slowly swallowed by the thick darkness that surged upward…

It was as if the many units of a huge system were shutting down one by one. In just over ten seconds, the “room” in Zhou Ming’s eyes turned into a murky, chaotic space. When even the walls around him disappeared, true darkness filled his vision.

Zhou Ming stood where he was and looked around. In this sudden darkness, he felt a strange… familiarity, and an odd sense of comfort.

After a while, his “sight” seemed to adapt to the dim environment. In the depths of the chaos, some faint shapes caught his attention.

Zhou Ming hesitated for a moment. Then, from the positions and distances of those shapes, he suddenly thought of something. He at once stepped toward them.

In the deep, dark chaos, several things appeared before his eyes—lifelike “models,” floating where the end of the room should have been.

The Vanished, the White Oak, Pland, Frostholm…

And the “World Tree” turning slowly in midair—Atlantis.

They floated in this endless darkness, in a space that looked as if it had already gone through Universal Extinction, as though they were the only things left in this “world.”

Zhou Ming stared blankly at these “collectibles” drifting around him. His thoughts surged. Countless questions and guesses rose in his mind.

Why? What did this mean? What was this trying to tell him?

Atlantis, like a floating potted plant, slowly spun in the dark. As if by accident, she drifted to the front of Zhou Ming. Some of her branches stretched out gently into the void. It seemed as if she was sensing the surroundings—or maybe she was just growing without any awareness.

Zhou Ming looked at this little World Tree, hesitated for a second, then reached a finger toward her.

The moment he reached out, he suddenly noticed that his body had changed at some unknown point—starlight had replaced his flesh and blood. Dense river-like star streams and bright nebulae filled his body like mist. The stars inside him were frozen in place, just like that ancient Starry Sky phantom above the dome of the Abyssal Deep.

But the two still seemed different.

Zhou Ming stared in shock at his arm. Before he could think further, his fingertip had already touched one of the World Tree's extended branches.

In an instant, information too vast for any human mind to understand poured into his "head." In that storm of rushing fragments, he felt as if he were blinking his way through an endlessly long span of years, through an endlessly long journey—primordial gods, the first living beings, giant trees, forests, rivers, mountains, civilizations, memories…

Zhou Ming suddenly stepped back half a step. The storm of information faded at once. He opened his eyes in the darkness and saw that Atlantis was still spinning freely in place. Branches stretching from the edge of her crown would now and then flick the White Oak, sometimes flick Pland, and sometimes flick Frostholm…

Zhou Ming stared for several seconds before he came back to himself. Looking at the scene before him, he muttered in a strange tone: "Atlantis, don't bully your roommates."

Then he lifted his head and looked again at the boundless darkness ahead.

Before the "room" vanished, this should have been the wall where the shelves stood, the end of his tiny apartment, the barrier that kept him trapped here—it was the shell of the "cocoon."

But now the entire room was gone. The darkness here seemed to stretch on without end.

Zhou Ming hesitated for a moment, then slowly got up and walked toward that darkness. He raised a hand and felt around in the dark before him. He moved very carefully, as if afraid he might run into the wall from his memory.

Luckily, he was careful.

Because almost at once, he ran into an invisible barrier—something hard and cold in the darkness blocked his way. He felt his arm bump into that barrier. Then he pushed at it with more force and found that it did not move at all.

The room had vanished, but the shell of the “cocoon” was still there. He still could not leave. The darkness that looked boundless was only a part of that hard outer shell.

Zhou Ming stopped in front of the invisible shell. After knocking on it a few times in vain, he gave up. He turned around and looked back the way he had come.

All the furniture in the room had disappeared, including the computer. Only a single door still stood quietly in the depths of the darkness. It was the only “exit” from this space.

“Can anyone explain this?” After who knew how long in silence, Zhou Ming suddenly spoke. He asked the darkness, and although he knew this kind of “talking to himself” might look a bit foolish, he still said very seriously: “Is this some kind of ‘answer’?”

No one in the darkness answered him.

After a while, he spoke again: “Is this an explanation of the keyword ‘Inverse Singularity’? Or is it just some kind of unclear ‘demonstration,’ meant to help me understand my own nature or what I can do?”

The darkness stayed silent.

“Can anyone give a detailed explanation—what are you trying to do by sending a 0.002?second Universe Slice along the timeline? Where am I supposed to find my own manual?”

“Don’t you have any after-sales service? Your civilization made it all the way to the End of Time, and you didn’t even leave a user guide? Hello? Hey—”

“Is anyone here?”

No one. He was the only one in the darkness.

In the long emptiness after his home universe was torn apart by the Great Annihilation, the last and only mind kept running, dazed, inside this hard black “cocoon.” The only difference from all those long past years was that this mind had, for the first time, realized how vast the void around “itself” really was.

He did not know how much time had passed. Zhou Ming felt he might have been standing here in this darkness for a whole century for no real reason before he finally let out a soft sigh.

“There really is nothing here…”

He muttered in a self-mocking way. Then he sat down right where he was in the dark, planning to rest a bit—even though this impossible body, filled with starlight, did not seem to feel tired at all.

Just then, right as he was about to sit, Zhou Ming caught something at the edge of his vision—he saw a very thin, almost invisible “bright edge” drift past the border of his sight, flashing once in the darkness.

His eyes opened a little wider.

It was a thin thread.

In the next second, he grabbed the thread without any hesitation. The faint resistance in his hand told him the thread was really there… it was not an illusion!

Zhou Ming quickly raised his hand and held the thread up in front of his eyes, examining it closely. After a while, he began to search for the source of the thread.

The thread came from beyond that unseen barrier… from outside the “cocoon.”

Zhou Ming slowly stood up, gripping the thread tightly in his hand. He saw that this line, almost invisible to the naked eye, passed through the “invisible barrier” he could never break, drifting lightly in the endless darkness outside. The other end of the thread vanished into the void. He could not see where it led or what it was tied to.

Zhou Ming pulled the thread toward himself a few times. It felt as if there would never be an end to it. The faint, steady resistance from the other side stopped him from pulling harder. He was afraid of snapping this single “connection” to the outside.

After some more time, after more hesitation and thought, he finally made up his mind. He slowly raised a finger and summoned a tiny ball of ghostly green flame, then carefully brought the little flame close to the thread.

Almost in the blink of an eye, the small flame seemed to be pulled by some invisible force and rushed entirely into the depth of the thread.

Then his connection with the flame cut off.

Zhou Ming blinked. This had never happened before, and for a moment he was a bit stunned.

His link with the flame had broken! It was completely, totally, absolutely gone!

Before today, even when it was separated from him by a whole dimension in the Abyssal Deep, his link with the flame had never been fully cut!

Was it a problem with the thread? Or was it the invisible barrier blocking it?

Zhou Ming could not help but think it over, but after only a few seconds, he suddenly felt his hand go empty—the thin thread had vanished.

Before he could react, a low hum rose from all directions. Right after that, all light and color rushed back into his eyes. It was as if all the units of a system that had shut down for a moment were coming back online. With a burst of dizzying light and shadow, the walls, windows, ceiling, floor, and all the furniture of the room reappeared with a roar!

The sudden change left Zhou Ming a bit dazed. He stepped back two steps on reflex and grabbed the shelf beside him for support—the branches of Atlantis drooped down and brushed against his arm.

“Not even a little warning… this is still my ‘home’…”

Zhou Ming could not help grumbling. Shaking his head, he looked around to check the room. Then he seemed to sense something and suddenly raised his head to look into the distance.

Almost the instant he looked up, a sound rang out and echoed through the quiet apartment—

“Dong, dong, dong…”

Someone was knocking on the door.

Chapter 739: A Figure Before Doomsday

No words could describe the shock that hit Zhou Ming at that moment.

The knocking sound—dong, dong, dong—was not loud. In normal times, it would have been the most ordinary noise. But when it echoed in this tiny apartment, every knock felt like a world-shaking roar, like a hammer slamming into Zhou Ming’s ears!

His eyes flew wide. For an instant he almost thought this was some illusion born from the chain of events and disappointments he had just gone through. But he quickly sobered and realized the knocking was a real sound—and it was still going on.

He rushed to the door like a gust of wind and grabbed the handle. But just as he was about to turn it, he suddenly hesitated for two seconds.

Could he really just open the door? Would he be rushing straight into a trap?

If this had been back in the first days of being trapped in this room, he would not have had such worries. At that time he only thought the thick fog was some strange “phenomenon,” and he was sure his familiar home still lay beyond it. But now, Zhou Ming already knew what had happened to his world—his homeland had long since turned to ashes. The only thing left in the entire universe was this one small room, and deep within that endless fog… there was nothing but the ash left after Universal Extinction.

After the world had died, who would still come and knock on his door?

No matter how he thought about it, it was almost impossible for it to be a normal “living person.”

Zhou Ming weighed his choices carefully, while the knocking still repeated patiently. Each round of three dull knocks came every three to five seconds. It did not sound urgent, but it fully showed the knocker’s patience and stubbornness. It was like a polite yet stubborn Visitor, set on paying a call.

…If he opened the door, it might be a trap. But if he did not open it, he might miss this “visit.” Whoever stood outside, this was a once?in?forever event. He had to find out what it was.

Countless thoughts flashed through Zhou Ming’s mind. In the end, he took a small breath and quietly made up his mind. One hand stayed on the handle, and with the other he lightly brushed the doorframe.

Translucent phantom flames flowed and spread along the frame, forming a hazy burning barrier.

After he finished his precautions and raised his guard as high as it could go, he tightened his grip and suddenly twisted the handle, yanking the door open at great speed.

There was no one outside the door. There was only the same swirling, pulsing, writhing black fog as always.

Zhou Ming was breathing heavily. His heart pounded. He stared wide?eyed at the empty fog for a long time, unable to react.

Had he still opened the door too late? Had the knocking Visitor lost patience? Was it really such a coincidence that the Visitor left at the exact moment he opened the door?

Zhou Ming frowned. He was sure the knocking had continued right up until he opened the door. Even if the one outside had lost patience, they should not have pulled away in an instant.

He hesitated, and then a sound suddenly broke his thoughts.

It was the knocking again—the dong, dong, dong of a fist on a door reached his ears once more.

Zhou Ming's eyes widened. He stared hard at the swirling fog in front of him. At last, he noticed it—the knocking sound was actually coming from within the black fog.

The sound seemed very close, almost pressed right against the surface of the fog, close enough to touch with a hand. But no matter how wide Zhou Ming opened his eyes, he could not see anything inside the fog. When he reached his hand into the thick mist, he felt only cold emptiness—there was nothing in there.

Only the knocking kept repeating, still as patient as ever.

Zhou Ming slowly drew back the hand he had stretched into the fog. He stood quietly in the doorway, listening to that knocking that seemed like it would never stop, calming the storm in his head.

There was a Visitor on the far side of the fog, trying to open this "little house," but they were blocked by the shell of the "cocoon."

After he stood in silent thought for a long time, Zhou Ming suddenly raised his head as something came to him. He turned and ran quickly to the desk.

He hurriedly gathered up a few things—a whiteboard marker, paper, a roll of soft measuring tape, a ball of string, and many other little odds and ends. He stuffed them all into a plastic bag, then carried it back to the doorway.

Then he found a small slip of paper and quickly wrote a line on it in the common tongue of the Boundless Sea: “I heard you. Who are you?”

He stuck the note to the mouth of the plastic bag, then, without any hesitation, threw the bag toward the swirling black fog.

The plastic bag stuffed with junk was swallowed by the writhing mist in an instant and vanished into the depths of the darkness.

Zhou Ming stared wide?eyed in the direction where the bag had disappeared. Even his breathing unconsciously slowed. He had never waited this nervously for “something” to happen. Not even when the great fire in Pland broke out had he been this tense.

The knocking stopped. In the very second after the bag of items passed through the fog, the dong, dong, dong came to an abrupt halt.

Clearly, the “Visitor” on the far side of the fog had received the “gift” he sent and reacted to it—but after that, no matter how long Zhou Ming waited, there was no further response.

Aside from the knocking coming to an end, no more information arrived.

Until, somewhere else—

On the chart table, Goathead suddenly sensed something. Its wooden neck creaked as it turned toward the door of the captain’s cabin—a tall, imposing figure opened the door and walked in, his steps heavy.

“Name?”

“Duncan Abnomar.”

Duncan slowly walked behind the enchanted sea chart table and sat down in the chair with a backrest. He let out a long breath, as if he were pushing all his fatigue and tangled thoughts out of his body with that single sigh.

Goathead instantly noticed the captain’s state. It had already prepared an aria of at least five minutes to greet the captain and chat about the border’s unique weather, but now it swallowed all of that in one gulp. After hesitating for a moment, it carefully asked: “Are you… all right? You look upset.”

Duncan glanced at Goathead and said casually: “Someone knocked and got stood up.”

Goathead thought this over very seriously: “…Does this have something to do with AI?”

Duncan waved his hand, already long used to this kind of completely off? topic question.

“Looks like it has nothing to do with AI,” Goathead said at once, even more used to this than Duncan was. Once it realized the captain did not want to say more, it quickly adjusted its mood and changed the subject: “We’re about to pass through the thick fog of the Eternal Veil, Captain. Are we heading straight back to Lightwind Harbor next, or do you have other plans?”

“…We’ll head back to Lightwind Harbor. I need some time to sort out my thoughts, and I also need to discuss a few things with those Popes—they should all be staying in the city?state for now.”

“Understood, Captain,” Goathead answered at once. Then it opened its mouth again, clearly hesitated, and went on: “Also, what do you think about what Vanna and Morris reported?”

“You mean those ‘figures’ they saw before they evacuated Sacred Island?”

“Yes,” Goathead said. “Wearing ragged robes, looking like phantoms of a Ender, but they never interacted with anyone, as if they existed in another space?time entirely… This doesn’t sound like the Enders we know. They appeared on Sacred Island, and… I just feel like there’s something very strange about this.”

Duncan thought for a moment. Then he casually took out a palm?sized photo print and laid it on the enchanted sea chart table to study it carefully.

It was what Morris had given him during their earlier meeting in the cabin —the only piece of evidence the Old Scholar had managed to gather when he witnessed those suspicious figures suddenly appear on Sacred Island.

The image on the photo was not very clear. Fine stripes covered the whole picture like some kind of interference or gauze veil. Even so, one could still make out the black door deep inside the cavern, and the vague white figure by the door.

The white figure in the tattered robe had features blurred into a smear. Only from his posture and position could one tell he seemed to be carefully observing something—observing the black door, or something behind it.

“In the past, when a Ender appeared before people, they were either lunatics who had lost their reason and knew only how to wildly spread their Doomsday theories, or they were still?sane Scholars trying to pass on information or give some mental guidance to the witnesses,” Goathead muttered at Duncan’s side. “This is the first time we’ve seen phantoms that don’t interact with anyone at all. They all looked busy with their own work and didn’t notice the intense fighting nearby at all, like…”

Duncan spoke softly: “Like travelers in a hurry, making their way along a journey.”

Goathead froze for a second: “You mean…”

“Just a sudden thought,” Duncan said, raising his head. “They looked absorbed in their work and didn’t react to their surroundings at all. Maybe… what we saw was the End Survey Team, moving through the Time?Stream to make their observations. This is what they look like when they're 'on the road.'"

Goathead's wooden jaw moved: "…So you're saying Vanna and Morris saw the afterimages those Critt people left while traveling through the Time? Stream? But there have never been any records of sightings like that before…"

"Maybe it's related to the special environment at the border. Or maybe…"

Duncan stopped. After a brief silence, he shook his head.

"Or maybe it's another prophetic vision."

For a moment, Goathead did not react: "Another prophetic vision?"

"Back when the End Survey Team set out from the early era of the Deep Sea, they reached as far as 'the end of time,' which is the moment of the Sanctuary World's End," Duncan said calmly. His gaze, almost divine, rested on Goathead's eyes. "That means…"

He did not finish the sentence, but Goathead already understood: "That means we'll see them at the end of time. Doomsday is the only moment when our Time?Stream and theirs truly meet…"

Duncan did not answer. He only quietly watched the photo on the enchanted sea chart table, watching that hazy figure standing by the black door, as if carefully observing something.

He did not know if it was just his imagination, but he felt that the blurry figure had grown a little clearer.

Chapter 740: The Long Sunset

The grand wall of mist, like a giant barrier reaching to the sky, showed faint ripples on its surface. The cloud streams pouring down from the top of the mist wall were briefly lit by a burst of fire from within—then a gush of pale green flame erupted out, and the towering bow of the Vanished broke through the wall of fog, dragging thin shreds of mist as it sailed toward the “normal sea” ahead.

Right behind the Vanished, the Radiant Star, the Tide, the Rest, and the other warships and escort vessels of all sizes also pushed out of the thick fog.

As the wall of mist slowly drew away behind the stern, the dim, muddled glow in the sky faded. In its place came normal sunlight. The setting sun was slowly sinking toward the distant horizon, and the double rune rings at the edge of Vision 001 were already touching the sea. Golden-red light flooded across the world, vast and magnificent, yet carrying a faint sense of wrongness.

The seafarers who had returned safely from the fog all let out a breath. Strictly speaking, the fleet was still in the border sea, but just seeing sunlight again and the rolling blue ocean was enough to make them feel at ease, and feel the warmth that belonged to the “orderly world.”

“We have already made contact with the Cathedral ark in Lightwind Harbor,” Vanna came to the bow and found the captain, who was standing on the deck and looking into the distance. “I gave a brief report on what happened on Sanctuary Island. Your Eminence Helena is looking forward to seeing you again."

"Mm." Duncan answered simply, but he seemed a little distracted. After a moment, he pulled his gaze back from the distant sea and looked at Vanna. "Is there something else?"

"We are a bit worried," Vanna said. She hesitated for a second, then spoke in a serious tone. "You have seemed even more preoccupied since you left the captain's cabin. Did something happen?"

"I just discussed some troubling things with Goathead," Duncan let out a slow breath. "It has to do with the two suspicious phantoms you and Morris saw."

Vanna blinked: "The two phantoms we saw?"

"Yes, they…" Duncan nodded. He was just about to explain it to Vanna when a sudden sound cut him off.

It was a low, deep hum, like a giant reed plate being struck hard somewhere deep in the clouds. The hum was distant and long, as if it echoed through the whole sky.

Vanna clearly heard it too. She jumped in surprise and lifted her head toward the source of the sound, staring at the distant clouds. Almost at the same time, Morris and Lucretia ran out from a nearby cabin, looking up at the sky in shock.

Many other sailors in the fleet also heard the strange hum. On the three main Church warships, priests and guardian warriors, alarmed by the noise, rushed onto the decks and looked up in confusion at the sky where the echo still lingered. Some of them pointed toward the distant clouds, as if they had noticed something wrong hidden in their depths.

Duncan narrowed his eyes. His sight was drawn by a faint glow behind the clouds, and he could not help looking toward that direction. In the next second, that glow brightened in his vision.

It traced a clear path as it moved behind the clouds, slow on the surface yet truly fast.

Not far away, Lucretia's eyes suddenly widened.

With a series of low rumbles that grew clearer and stronger, the moving glow behind the clouds swelled quickly. Brilliant golden light flashed through gaps in the cloud layer. Moments later, the glowing mass broke through the northwestern clouds—a splendid glowing orb, falling along an arc toward the northern sea.

Like a small Sun Wheel dropping from the heavens, the huge shining body grew smaller and smaller, finally sinking into the far-off waters.

After a brief moment of shock, Duncan reacted at once. He whipped his head around to look at Lucretia, and saw that Lucretia was also looking up at him.

Duncan did not speak, but the Sea Witch already knew what Father wanted to ask. She nodded slightly, her face grave.

The second glowing orb had fallen.

On the nearby Tide, sailors cried out in alarm. Some who reacted quickly looked up at the Sun, and among those with sharp eyes… someone had already noticed the new second gap that had appeared in the rune rings.

Lucretia walked over quickly. Before Duncan could ask, she spoke first: "By eye, it fell toward the north. It should be near Frost Sea—I don't know if my brother noticed it…"

“I did see a flash of gold from the cemetery over there, but the buildings in the city blocked my view,” Duncan said at once. Then he focused his mind and called to the distant northern mark: “Tyrian.”

A wave of clear confusion rushed back along the mark. Then Duncan heard the answer from the “Steel Vice Admiral” in his mind: “I’m here, Father.”

Along with his reply came a jumble of background noise. It sounded a little chaotic around Tyrian.

“Did you see a huge glowing fallen relic?” Duncan asked right away, while he also noticed the confusion on that side. “What is going on over there? Why is it such a mess?”

Tyrian’s voice came through in broken pieces: “Things are a bit… complicated here… I did see the glowing fallen relic you mentioned…”

“Where did it roughly fall?” Lucretia cut in directly. “How far from the city-state? Is it inside the civilized world’s borders?”

Tyrian went quiet for a few seconds. Then his answer came in a hollow tone: “…It hit me on the head.”

Duncan and Lucretia: “…?”

“Strictly speaking, it hit the Frostholm coast,” Tyrian added at once. “But the glowing orb of this thing is huge. Part of its glowing structure stretches right into the city. My office is inside the coverage area… it’s a bit chaotic here right now… this thing is really bright, and it came so suddenly, my eyes are having trouble adapting…”

Duncan and Lucretia again: “…”

To be honest, Duncan had not seen that coming at all…

The awkward silence lasted a moment. At last, Duncan coughed twice: “Has anyone been hurt?”

“We can’t be sure yet. There shouldn’t be any direct injuries, because the glowing part of that thing is non?material. When it fell, it did not even stir a speck of dust. Its physical part landed off the coast, and there were no ships sailing there,” Tyrian said. The chaos on his side seemed to ease a little as he spoke and issued orders in the background. “But the fall of the glowing orb was so sudden that it has already caused panic in the city. I am sending people to calm the affected districts and check for any damage…”

Tyrian paused for a moment. Then he spoke again: “Lucy, this thing should be…”

“It should be the same kind of thing as the glowing geometric body here at Lightwind Harbor. The rune rings on the edge of the Sun now have a second gap that you can see with the naked eye, and it’s even bigger than last time,” Lucretia said, her tone heavy. “The Sun’s disintegration may be speeding up.”

“…Damn.”

“I will send you all my research data on the glowing geometric body as soon as I can,” Lucretia said. “You need to set up a matching research facility. At the very least, move that fallen relic to a safe sea area near the city-state. There should be a solid core at its center… Once things settle down on your side, send someone to find that core and tell me what state it is in.”

“I understand.”

After they exchanged a few more details, Duncan ended the contact with Tyrian.

The deck fell quiet for a time. Bathed in the golden-red glow of the sunset, Duncan and Lucretia stood side by side, both silent.

An invisible weight pressed down on Lucretia’s chest, like some unseen countdown timer. It made her feel short of breath.

She lifted her head and looked at Father. She moved her lips: “Dad…”

Another strange hum came from the sky and cut off what she had been about to say.

The golden-red evening glow vanished at once. Murky darkness washed over everything in sight in a single instant.

The Sun went out again.

From Pland to Frostholm, from Lightwind Harbor to the fleet in the border sea—before the eyes of countless people, the Sun once more fell into darkness. With it came that odd, low hum. The sphere at the center of Vision 001 turned into a terrifying black hollow, leaving only the golden double rune rings fixed on the sea’s horizon, barely lighting the dim, muddled sky.

The two gaps in the rune rings now looked even more obvious, even more shocking.

“The Observer Effect stabilizing anchor has shut down again…”

Alice walked out from the cabin, staring in a daze at the distant, darkened Sun.

“How long will it stay off this time?” Nina came up beside her and muttered uneasily.

“I don’t know,” Alice shook her head. “The system is still showing errors. It’s trying to reboot.”

Dog and Shirley came out as well. Dog squatted on the deck in silence, staring at the horizon. Shirley cast a careful glance at the captain not far away, then muttered under her breath: “…the Sun will light up again, right? It’s not going to stay dark this time, is it…”

“It can’t be that bad, can it?” Nina was startled by Shirley’s words. Then she thought for a moment and sounded less sure. “If it really stayed dark… should I think about hanging up in the sky all the time and lighting the city-state myself… But I wouldn’t be able to light up much on my own, and I wouldn’t get any weekends off, would I?”

Shirley had been half worried and half sighing over the situation, but when she heard her friend mumbling, her expression turned odd. She glanced sideways at Nina: “…Don’t you think that idea is a bit much?”

“Things are already pretty ‘a bit much’ right now…”

Shirley and Nina bickered back and forth, each line taking them farther off topic. It seemed they were trying to ease their nervousness by chatting. While they talked, that low, weird humming sound suddenly echoed in the sky once again.

Almost without giving anyone time to react, the world that had been dark for only a few minutes lit up under sunlight again—the Sun restarted, and the golden-red sunset shone over the sea as if it had never gone out.

Shirley and Nina stared at each other.

This time, the Sun’s “reboot” was clearly faster than the last two times.

“It’s bright again!” After a short daze, Shirley finally reacted and shouted in delight: “It only went out for a few minutes this time!”

“That scared me. I thought it was going to be like before and stay dark for more than ten hours…” Nina also let out a breath. “Looks like things aren’t that bad.”

Not far away, Morris also seemed to relax. A faint smile appeared on his face.

Compared to the last two times, the Sun had stayed out for a much shorter period this time. Whatever the reason it could restart so quickly… the return of sunlight was, in the end, a good thing.

On the Vanished, on the Tide, and on the other Church warships, people also relaxed in the renewed sunlight. The light eased the nerves that had just tensed up.

But an hour later, something felt wrong.

The Sun was still in the same place.

Two hours later, the long dusk still had not ended.

Chapter 741: The Long Night Begins

Hurried footsteps broke the calm inside the sanctuary. A middle?aged priest in a deep blue robe stitched with gold hurried down a long corridor like a gust of wind. Under the silent gazes of the many sages painted on the walls, he came to the door of the prayer room—but before he could knock, a gentle female voice sounded from within: “Come in.”

The middle?aged priest pushed open the door and saw the figure standing before the statue of the Storm Goddess. Helena wore a simple priest’s gown. A string of sea?blue crystals coiled around her wrist, and it seemed she had been offering a devout benediction just a second ago. She did not turn when she heard the door open behind her. She only kept gazing quietly at the veiled face of the Goddess’s statue and spoke softly: “How are things outside?”

“dusk is still ongoing. The Sun is still in its previous position and keeps a ‘normal’ brightness and form,” the middle?aged priest lowered his head and reported at once. “Order in the city-state is still good. Since the situation is unclear, most citizens have gone back home to wait for further instructions. Everything on the ark is normal as well. There are no anomalies. Four teams of technical Fathers are already on standby near the steam boilers.”

Helena nodded slightly, as if thinking quietly. After a moment, she suddenly asked: “What about the other arks?”

“We just made contact a few minutes ago. Everything is normal on the other arks. The Academy Ark says their instruments have received a series of repeated signals from the direction of the Sun. The content of those signals is different from before. When converted into sound, they become sharp, short bursts of noise…”

Helena gave a soft “mm” and fell silent again. She went on staring at the statue of the Goddess, as if she had forgotten the priest still standing beside her, waiting for orders. Only after a few minutes did she speak again, as if to herself: “A long dusk…”

Taran Ael frowned as he studied the data his apprentice had just brought him. Long paper strips fed from the machine were covered in complex lines and a mess of holes that would leave any ordinary person dizzy. Yet all this “gibberish” described the state of “Vision 001 – the Sun,” which had shone on and sheltered this world for so long.

After a long time, the elven scholar finally set the paper strip down and rubbed his temples, too tired to speak.

A calm voice sounded from the side: “Tell me what we are dealing with, Taran.”

Taran Ael lifted his head and saw Ted Riel, who stood beside a bookshelf. The Truth Keeper wore an academy robe, but underneath it Taran could see close?fitting mail and weapon fittings. He stood there with a calm look, yet his eyes were as sharp as a soldier about to step onto a battlefield.

“…the Sun is flickering,” Taran Ael said at last. “You can’t tell with the naked eye, but it is flickering. And it’s not any kind of regular ‘signal.’ It’s more like… an electric lamp in bad condition.” He pressed his dry lips together and pushed the data aside. “Also, the latest tracking records show that it is not fully fixed on the horizon. It is still moving, only… very, very slowly. So slow that no one can see it move.”

Ted Riel was silent for two or three seconds: “…How slow?”

“If its current speed does not change, it will drop below the horizon in about seventy?two hours,” Taran Ael said. He reached for his cup and almost knocked it over. He grabbed it in a rush and took two heavy gulps of cold tea. Only then did his face look a little better. “But the worst part is not the seventy?two hours of dusk coming next. It is what comes after dusk, Ted. You know what I mean.”

“…Night will last longer than dusk,” Ted Riel said, his expression turning serious at once. Of course he understood his friend’s meaning. “If it keeps moving at this speed, how long will the night last?”

Taran Ael did not answer. He only set the cup down and stared at the pages on his desk, as if he was trying to see the future of this world inside those sheets, as if he wanted to dig out some enemy’s secret from them. A long time later, he let out a bitter smile and spread his hands at Ted.

“…I will have the Knowledge Guards get ready,” Ted Riel said quietly after watching his friend for a while. He nodded lightly. “We have plans for long?term missions in case we suddenly fall into a lasting ‘After the Darkness’ again. The glowing fallen relic near Lightwind Harbor will also provide basic shelter during the veil of night. Things will not be too bad.”

“Yes. Lightwind Harbor will not be too bad—the other city?states might not be so lucky.” After a brief silence, Taran Ael sighed softly. “Unlike the previous times the Sun went out and each city-state simply ‘skipped over time,’ this time we are facing the Sun slowing down. Every city-state is going through this world?level Vision together… I don’t know how they will face the long veil of night to come.”

“Every city-state has survival plans for extreme cases, but how much they can really do is another matter… All we can do is hope, and pray that the Four Gods protect them.”

Ted Riel’s voice was low and heavy. Then he shook his head and picked up the thick book in his hand, which recorded many sacred miracles. He seemed ready to open a passage and leave, but suddenly hesitated. He put the book away again, sighed, and walked toward the door.

Taran watched the Truth Keeper’s back, just as if he were watching a warrior about to step onto the battlefield. Only after Ted’s figure disappeared beyond the door did he pull his gaze back and glance at the data he had just pushed aside.

At the bottom of one page, shaky handwriting had left a line of notes from the observers—

“…By current calculations… time until the end of sunset… seventy?two hours…”

Outside the tall window beside him, golden sunset light still blanketed the layered roofs of the city-state, splendid and grand.

Then he heard faint, unreal bells.

The ringing was urgent and repeated in a fixed pattern, as if calling to everyone who heard it, calling them to come and listen to this proclamation before the veil of night descended—

Deep inside the great Cathedral of Pland, Archbishop Valentine had been discussing how to handle the Sun’s anomaly with Governor Dante Wayne when he suddenly stopped and tilted his head, listening to the sudden bell.

Across from him, the governor raised his head at once: “Your Excellency Bishop? What happened?”

Valentine waved his hand lightly. After a short pause, he answered: “It is the Swift Bell.”

“The Swift Bell?” The color shifted slightly on Dante’s face. He was not clergy of the Church, but because of his connection to Vanna he knew many things about the Church and thus knew what the “Swift Bell” was. “So…”

But Valentine shook his head: “No. Let us continue, Governor.”

“…You are not going to answer the Swift Bell’s summons?”

“I will not,” Valentine said slowly. For a moment, he seemed to remember many things, but in the end he still shook his head. “That is an order.”

Do not answer that bell.
Do not answer the tomb of the Nameless King.
Do not answer the call of that Gravekeeper—

The bell kept ringing, again and again, in every city-state, every Cathedral, every ship, and in the minds of every cleric who believed in the Four Gods. The urgent, repeated peals echoed without end.

priests all over froze for a heartbeat the moment the bell rang in their minds. Yet after that brief pause, they all went back to their busy work—continuing to receive and comfort the faithful who came seeking help, continuing to tend Holy Relics and maintain the Cathedrals, continuing to prepare blessings for the warriors who might soon face a very long veil of night.

The bell’s sound was like wind at the ear and waves in the far distance. It echoed out there somewhere, yet no priest answered its call anymore…

In that remote, other dimension, in the ancient gathering ground shrouded in dark chaos, the last group of Penitent Ascetics stationed there stood in silence, gazing toward the center of the square.

Tall stone pillars ringed the gathering ground. Chaotic streams of light slid across the dim sky. An old, pale pyramid?tomb rose from the middle of the plaza, and from its front walked the Gravekeeper, his whole body wrapped in bandages, as if he existed forever on the border between life and death. He stepped out into the empty, abandoned meeting place.

But unlike the countless years before, there was no longer any Saint standing here. The Gravekeeper held pen and paper in his hands, yet no one came to hear news from the tomb.

The Penitent Ascetics stood far from the center, at a safe distance. Their bodies were covered in rune tattoos that marked the blessings of the Four Gods. Their eyes and ears were sealed by spells. They sensed the state of the tomb through God?granted sacred miracles, so they would not look directly at the Gravekeeper or hear his voice with their own senses.

The Gravekeeper walked a few steps out from the tomb. Vast shadows grew from behind him. Nameless limbs and twisted entities spread like thick, shifting sludge along his path. He came to stand before the ascetics and held out a sheet of parchment. On the parchment, trembling eyeballs kept surfacing and sinking. He opened his rotten, warped mouth and called out to the watchers.

His voice was like ten thousand curses of blasphemous corruption. Every vibration stabbed at the heart and tore at reason.

The Ascetic Watchers only stood there at the edge of the tomb’s range, statues in human form, silently “watching” over the tomb’s guard post.

They could not give any answer.
They could not speak with him.
But they also could not leave their station.

The formless, crawling shadows slowly calmed down. After a long face?off, the Gravekeeper lowered his head and stared at the parchment in his hands with his cloudy eyes. He stayed silent for a long time, then finally turned and walked back toward the tomb.

Low, layered whispers seeped out from within the tomb. The Gravekeeper’s muttering merged with the murmurs that came from inside.

He spoke in a low voice, repeating the same words again and again—

“dusk has come…”

Chapter 742: revelation

The Sun moved slowly, at a speed almost impossible for the naked eye to see, sinking very, very slowly toward the line of the sea. Brilliant golden-red light spilled over the Boundless Sea. This magnificent yet eerie, drawn-out dusk still did not end.

For the first time in history, dusk had become something terrifying. More and more people had realized that once this slow sunset finally ended, what waited afterward would be even more frightening: the veil of night, whose end no one could predict.

Dante Wayne stood on the terrace outside his City Hall office, frowning as he looked at the streets washed in afterglow. The close-packed rooftops of Pland's Upper City shone with a dizzying brilliance in the setting sun. This familiar view had once been his pride as Governor, but as the sunset dragged on and on, that pride slowly turned into a heavy pressure.

But he knew that compared with other "ordinary" and "normal" city-states, Pland was already in very good shape.

The flames left behind by the "ghost captain" gave this city the safest veil of night on the Boundless Sea. Even after the Sun set, there should not be any large-scale supernatural incursions here. The Long Night would bring the city heavy pressure, but at least it would not involve those Inhuman Things growing in the dark. All he had to worry about was law and order under the Long Night, the lives of the residents, stockpiled supplies, and things like adjusting production.

Elsewhere, things were not so simple.

In northern Cold Harbor, the city government had already declared a state of emergency. Constable units and Guardian units hurried through streets and alleys repairing Sanctuary Worlds and stockpiling Holy Oil. In Morka, the Truth Academy had activated every Steam Walker stored in the Cathedral arsenal and stationed them at gasworks, pump rooms, and steam hubs across the city. In the southwestern seas, several city-states had announced new “veil of night bans.” Residents in outer districts were to be moved temporarily to the nearest Cathedral shelter, inner districts would be sealed off, and huge bonfires would be lit the moment the Sun dropped and would burn until this night ended…

All stockpiled materials were being counted and moved. In the seventy-two hours before the Sun went down, every city-state was gathering its strength to face the coming veil of night.

If it could end at all.

Footsteps sounded behind him. A young official from the government office came into the room. Through the open sliding door, he saw Dante Wayne on the terrace. He coughed lightly twice and said: “Governor, the people in charge of the steam hubs, power plants, and mining facilities are already waiting for you in the conference room. Would you like to…”

Dante nodded and waved his hand lightly: “I know. Go on ahead. Wait for me a few minutes.”

The footsteps left the room. Dante let out a quiet breath. As he loosened his tense expression, he also tried to sort out his thoughts.

He turned around, walked past his wide curved desk, and reached for a file.

His gaze stopped on a photo frame at the edge of the desk.

In the frame, two figures stood side by side. One was his younger self. Beside him stood a tall, silver-haired maiden with a faint smile on her face. They stood beside a flowerbed, with bright sunlight falling behind them.

This was the only photo of Dante Wayne, already buried in work, and Vanna, who had entered a Church school early for training. After this photo, they never seemed to have such a carefree afternoon again.

“I wonder how things are going for Vanna…”

A few memories surfaced. Dante missed the warm sunlight that had faded into memory. Then he looked past the frame and found the file he needed. He tucked it under his arm and hurried toward the office door.

Vanna woke with a start from a chain of messy, shattered, bizarre dreams. Soft sounds of waves still echoed around her. Outside the porthole, the crash of breaking waves against the hull rose and fell, easing her unsettled mood.

She no longer remembered what had happened in the dream. She only remembered that the suddenly twisting, tearing things had cast some kind of indelible shadows in her eyes. The memories of the dream faded, but a lonely, desolate, ruined “atmosphere” seemed to have long shrouded her mind. Even now it still felt faintly cold.

Vanna sat up on the bunk and looked toward the window not far away. The glow of the setting sun still spread across the sea. She did not know when the Vanished had left its Spirit Realm state, but now it was sailing on the sea in the Mortal Realm. In the distance she could see the silhouette of the Radiant Star. That oddly shaped Magic warship was cutting through the waves at full speed alongside the Vanished.

As for the Tide, the Rest, and the other Church warships, they had already left. After the fleet passed beyond the border Veil, the Vanished and the Radiant Star had parted ways with the Church ships, each going on to deal with its own matters.

Vanna let out a soft breath, then took several deep breaths. The slightly salty air drifted into her nose, and the soft, layered sound of the waves still echoed in her mind.

She suddenly frowned, as if sensing something, and quickly turned to look at a corner of the room.

Gentle seawater rose inside the cabin. She did not know when it had already surrounded her on all sides. Illusory waves sounded at her ears. At the moment Vanna turned her head, that gently rising seawater seemed to expand countless times at once, and the whole room expanded with it.

At the far end of the room, which had suddenly become hard to tell real from unreal, Vanna saw a vast shadow. Some huge… biological structure floated at the end of the slowly rolling waves.

A part of that living structure stretched toward her and condensed a figure above the sea surface: a woman in a long dress black as the abyssal sea, her true face hidden by a veil.

Her divine gaze rested on Vanna. In the pair of eyes with strange diamond-shaped pupils seemed to surge countless thoughts and feelings that could not be directly expressed. Under that gaze, Vanna suddenly felt a nameless sense of closeness and… a stirring deep inside.

She reacted at once. Her whole body went tense as she bowed her head deeply: “My Lord…”

“We do not have much time, child,” the figure said softly. With her words came layered noise strong enough to tear an ordinary person’s mind apart and throw them into a runaway state. Her thoughts echoed directly in

Vanna's mind. "…Our link with the mortal world will strengthen one last time…"

An irresistible dizziness rose from deep inside her. Vanna instantly realized she was being corrupted—corrupted by the very goddess she worshipped with all her heart. The goddess's voice, her thoughts, and the vision she was sending were all filled with a chaos unlike anything Vanna had ever felt before.

But Vanna still forced her mind to steady. At the edge of her vision, she saw a wisp of gentle, ghostly green flame rising and burning, pulling her thoughts back into balance.

"…What do you need me to do?" She tried not to look straight at the vast shadow behind the Storm Goddess. Fighting to stay conscious, she spoke again: "What can I do?"

"…Gather those fallen stars… let them protect you once more… go and tell the Flame Usurper that we wish to… talk with him… we will find…"

The layered sound of the waves slowly turned into some kind of unbearable, piercing shriek. The gentle rising seawater seemed to grow foul. A deep cold seeped into her bones and slowly drowned her whole body. Vanna barely picked out the last words from the noise echoing in her ears. Her head felt as if it would split, and she had no strength left to think about what those words meant. In her blurring vision, she saw the distant waters and the huge shadow silently collapse.

"You saw Gamona's revelation?" Duncan's eyes widened slightly. He looked at Vanna, who had suddenly rushed into the captain's cabin. Then he noticed how bad she looked. He stood at once and took her by the arm: "Sit here first. Catch your breath and talk slowly."

“Thank you… Captain.” Vanna was almost forced down into the chair by Duncan. The lingering stabbing pain and dizziness in her head made even thinking hard, but after seeing the captain, that state quickly eased, and her thoughts began to flow again. “I met her apparition directly and heard her voice… the goddess is in very bad shape. Those noises… they felt like facing those dark Outer Gods head-on.”

She took a few breaths and then told him everything she had just gone through.

After listening to Vanna’s report, Duncan frowned at once, and his expression slowly grew heavy.

“Go collect those fallen stars…” he muttered softly. As he spoke, he could not help recalling the “advice” he had once heard from a tentacle extended from the Abyssal Lord in the depths of the courtyard at Alice’s manor—

“Keep the fragments of the fallen ?#&. When everything becomes impossible to save, use them to extend the life of each Node city as much as you can. Stay alive. Survival is the First Directive.”

Clearly, Vanna soon thought of the same thing.

“…Does the goddess mean those glowing fragments of glowing orb that broke off from the Sun’s rune ring belt?” She lifted her head and looked into Duncan’s eyes. “She means those glowing orbs can protect the city-states in the days ahead?”

“From our experience in Lightwind Harbor, the power of those glowing orbs is weaker than the Sun itself, but within a certain range they can still shield the World’s Wound and calm the veil of night,” Duncan said, nodding slowly. “Now the second fragment of glowing orb has fallen at Frostholm, and with the revelation you just received, it’s not hard to connect the dots.”

As he spoke, he looked up toward the window.

The slowly sinking Sun still hung above the distant sea. The broken rune rings cast magnificent patterns of light and shadow on the waves.

The revelation Gamona had given Vanna was not hard to understand. What truly bothered him was another meaning behind that revelation.

“…This is only the beginning,” he said softly. “It looks like the Sun’s disintegration is going to speed up. The real large-scale collapse and fall… is still to come.”

—

Chapter 743: Another Core

Vanna left. Even with her divine blessing, she still needed proper rest now.

Duncan watched her leave the captain's cabin. Only when she disappeared beyond the door did he look away and turn to Goathead, who was sitting quietly at the edge of the chart table: "What do you think of the 'revelation' Gamona sent to Vanna?"

"…A large-scale collapse and breakup of the Sun seems to be something the Four Gods knew would happen sooner or later," Goathead said, after holding himself back for a long time and finally seizing a chance to speak. "I knew they knew about it. They must have been bottling it up for ten thousand years! Back when the Abyssal Lord launched the Genesis Protocol, he talked it over with them as well, but after the Deep Sea era began, every time anyone asked, they all kept their mouths shut and never said what the problem really was. Of course, I can understand them. If they had said it out loud, the people scared to death would have been more than just one or two city-states. Even those popes were kept in the dark. And now look, the Sun is just straight-up starting to fall apart…"

Duncan looked up at him, then reached out and pressed a hand over Goathead's rambling mouth. "I shouldn't have asked you."

With his mouth covered, Goathead let out a string of muffled grunts. His obsidian-carved eyes rolled wildly on his wooden face, his gaze lively for the first time.

Duncan sighed and drew his hand back. “I was asking about the second half of the revelation… ‘They’ want to talk with me. What do you think they plan to talk about? And in what form?”

“…That I don’t know,” Goathead said this time with a rare bit of restraint, shaking his head in annoyance. “Maybe they’re going to coax you into taking over something again?”

Duncan did not answer. He simply sank into thought for a long moment.

The state “they” were in really did not seem good. Before this, Gamona had still been able to pass him a few broken words, but now she could only send down a revelation through Vanna, and it came with that much corruption…

Just then, a voice from far away suddenly broke his thoughts.

His eyes changed slightly. He looked up at the oval mirror hanging on the nearby wall. Under his divine gaze, a layer of phantom flame spread over it. The surface of the mirror turned pitch black, and then light and shadow slowly appeared.

Tyrian’s image appeared in the mirror.

“Father.” The “steel Vice Admiral” looked a little grim. The scene behind him seemed to be somewhere near the Harbor district, and a hazy golden glow soaked everything behind him. It was clearly not a normal sunset. “Sorry to disturb you so suddenly…”

“It’s fine.” Duncan waved a hand, his tone gentle. “What happened to make you so tense?”

“…Our scholar went inside the glowing geometric body that fell at Frostholm. Following the data Lucretia shared earlier, we did find its core. But that thing… isn’t quite the same as in the records. I hope you can see it with your own eyes.”

“Not quite the same?” Duncan frowned slightly. From Tyrian’s reaction, he sensed that things over there were complicated. He nodded at once. “I understand. I’ll be there soon.”

He quickly cut the link with Tyrian, focused his mind, and turned his head —

Outside the graveyard warden’s hut, fine snow fell without a sound. The evening sun sank, and the hazy snowy scene wrapped the whole world in silence.

Inside the warden’s hut, the stove crackled. The samovar whistled sharper and louder as the water came just to a boil and steam rose.

Duncan stood up and closed the stove’s vent a bit, then took the black brimmed hat hanging by the door. He put the hat on, straightened his long black coat, and stepped out of the hut.

Two young guards in black, who were sweeping the paths and checking the lamps in the graveyard, heard the sound and turned their heads at the same time. When they saw the silent warden, always wrapped in bandages and dressed in black from head to toe, walking out of the hut, they straightened at once and saluted.

Duncan waved back at them, then snapped his fingers. A skeletal roc wreathed in ghostly flame crossed a vast distance at once and landed on his shoulder.

“Full tank, let’s go!” Ai flapped her wings and, in her skeletal form, let out a harsh, grating cry. Then she suddenly turned into a violently rising ring of fire. The ring wrapped around Duncan, and the two of them merged into one. In an instant they shot into the sky, streaking toward the Harbor district…

In eastern Frostholm, a vast golden radiance still covered the whole Harbor. The light seemed to have a crystalline texture as it quietly soaked everything within its range. It was bright but not dazzling, gentle yet unsettling.

Aiden, tall and broad-shouldered with a shining bald head, stared nervously at the golden glow around them.

He had taken off the old gear he used to wear as a pirate and now wore the new uniform of Frostholm's modern navy. In front of his subordinates he always tried to look stern and reliable, but in front of Tyrian he did not hide his unease.

"Are these lights really harmless?" the big bald man muttered. "Looking at them, I feel like I'm being soaked in something. Feels like they're going to seep into my skin. Even when I breathe, it feels like something is pouring into my lungs…"

Tyrian turned his head and glanced at Aiden.

"First, your lungs already have at least seven holes in them. It's not like you pour anything good into those holes on a normal day," he said casually. "Second, we've confirmed these lights are harmless. In Lightwind Harbor, Lucretia has been studying this stuff for a long time."

"…But the thing that fell over here isn't the same as the one in Lightwind Harbor," Aiden muttered. "Their 'core' is a stone ball…"

This Undying commander, deeply trusted by Tyrian, shook his head. His polished head flashed with a bright golden streak in Tyrian's view.

Tyrian quietly sidestepped a little. He opened his mouth, about to say something, but then suddenly sensed a presence approaching and shut his mouth, turning his head.

At almost the same moment, a low, slightly hoarse voice reached both his and Aiden's ears: "You mean the core of this fallen relic isn't a 'stone sphere'?"

A pale green flame rose in silence, and Duncan stepped out of the fire. He walked past the startled guards and government staff around them and headed straight toward Tyrian and Aiden.

Aiden jumped in surprise but quickly recovered. He hurried forward two steps and bent down in salute. "Old Captain…"

A bright streak of gold swept across Duncan's vision. Without changing his expression, he stepped half a pace to the side to get away from the shine of Aiden's polished head.

"Father," Tyrian said, reacting as well and stepping forward. "I didn't expect you to arrive so fast."

"I'm very curious about the 'special situation' you mentioned," Duncan said, waving his hand as he walked forward. "Let's not waste time. Tell me on the way—what exactly is going on?"

Tyrian hurried to keep up, speaking quickly as they walked. "It's hard to describe to you. It's something we've never seen before… even the most learned scholars in the city-state are at a loss. It is a sphere, but its surface is unreal and always shifting, like some kind of living thing. It even makes a faint howling sound… you'll understand when you see it for yourself."

Listening to Tyrian's description, Duncan only nodded lightly and lengthened his stride.

They walked through the pale golden radiance that filled the entire Harbor district, crossed the docks and connecting bridges, and made their way to the shoreline. The way was very quiet. Everyone in the area had been evacuated in a hurry, and long lines of barricades cut the whole dock district off from the city. The center of the glowing orb's glow lay right at one corner of this Harbor's coastline.

If someone looked down from the sky at that moment, they would see the irregular glowing geometric body covering almost one third of the city-state. It was as if a glowing structure had suddenly "grown" from the edge of Frostholm Island and was lighting up a vast area of sea around it in the dusk.

Led by Tyrian and Aiden, Duncan finally reached the center of the glowing geometric body and saw the "core structure" that had left Frostholm's scholars puzzled and even a little afraid.

It floated at the end of the beach, with calm seawater a dozen meters away. A sphere about ten meters across hung quietly there. Rough scaffolding already stood around its edges, and workers bustled nearby.

"See, that's it…" Tyrian raised his hand and pointed at the huge sphere. Its surface flowed with color and moved like a living thing, giving off a sense of unease. "This thing doesn't look like stone at all."

"…Of course it isn't stone…"

Duncan looked up, eyes half narrowed. After a brief moment of surprise, a strange feeling, both natural and hard to name, rose in his heart. He watched the "core," his lips moving a few times before he softly answered Tyrian's question.

"This is a gaseous planet."

Tyrian froze for a moment, then repeated the unfamiliar term in confusion: "A gaseous planet? What does that mean?"

Duncan did not answer. After watching it for a moment, he slowly walked two steps forward until he stood right under the floating "gaseous planet," quietly studying the structure of its surface.

Bands of brilliant clouds with a faint metallic sheen flowed slowly across its surface, drawing ring after ring of “cloud streams” around the whole body. Tiny vortices and storms spun between the cloud bands, slow and magnificent.

When he moved closer, he heard the “howling” Tyrian had mentioned. It was very faint, as if coming from a distant age.

The sound came from within the celestial body. Long, long ago, in the era before everything was wiped out, that howling might have been deafening and strong enough to tear apart a small celestial body. Back then, this planet had been vast and overwhelming, big enough to hold tens of thousands of Boundless Seas within its clouds.

But now, this “star” only ten meters across could give off only that faint, barely audible sound… like a sob.

Chapter 744

The second glowing geometric body that fell onto the Boundless Sea still had a Lost Star at its core, but its situation was different from the first fragment. This Lost Star was a compressed gas planet.

According to the scholars' initial measurements, the gas planet that served as the core still had a diameter of ten meters, exactly the same as the Moon inside the first fallen glowing orb.

Duncan cared more about something else: he did not recognize this planet.

At the very least, he was sure it was not a gas giant like Saturn or Jupiter that had once belonged to the Sun's system. The silver, gray, and bluish metallic tones on its surface, and the few very distinctive storm vortices, were all completely unfamiliar to him.

Duncan stood beside the compressed gas giant and studied the cloud bands and vortex patterns on its surface. Thoughts rose and fell in his mind.

The core of the first glowing geometric body had been the Moon from his home. So when this second fallen relic appeared, he had instinctively thought he would see another familiar body from the Sun's system. But now it seemed that the "raw material" used for the rune ring belt around the Sun was not limited to the Sun's system of his homeworld. The Lost Stars that formed that ring all came from far deeper space, and might even have come from different universes.

Celestial bodies from different worlds were compressed and twisted, then transformed into the halo around the Sun to keep the Observer Effect stabilization anchor running. The Sun itself, as the core of it all, was in essence an eyeball sealed inside a crystalline shell. The eyeball stood for the eye of the observer. This whole device ensured that, after the Great Annihilation, incompatible World Wreckage could still collapse into a single Mortal Realm.

It seemed that this was the principle behind Vision 001.

After pondering for a long time, Duncan gently shook his head.

He knew that thinking about the workings of Vision 001 now was not very useful. This stabilization device, which had been running far past its service life, had already reached the end of its lifespan. Its collapse and extinction were fated. Even if he accepted Navigator One's "continuation plan", he could only use his own flame to replace Vision 001 and let this world enter an Age of Flame after the era of the Deep Sea. No matter what, the disintegration of the Observer Effect stabilization anchor itself was an irreversible process.

Even so, the way Vision 001 took effect still gave him some inspiration. After turning down Navigator One's plan, he had to find another way to carry the civilization of the Deep Sea era forward. He vaguely had an idea, and the principles behind Vision 001 would be very useful for refining that idea.

Tyrian and Aiden stood on the beach, a little tense and confused as they watched Duncan in the distance. They did not know what Father, the old captain, was doing, and they did not dare walk up and disturb him. But it was clear they had noticed how Duncan's expression shifted between deep thought and sudden insight.

Aiden looked around. After he made sure all unrelated people had already backed away, he moved closer to Tyrian, lowered his voice, and said: "What do you think the old captain is studying?"

“How would I know?” Tyrian lowered his voice as well. “I usually cannot understand what Lucy studies, let alone Father’s way of thinking. Maybe he is talking with that thing.”

Aiden thought for a moment, then nodded: “I think you are right.”

Duncan actually heard the quiet muttering from not far away, but he paid it no mind. After thinking for a moment, he suddenly spoke in his heart: “Alice.”

The doll’s voice answered almost at once: “Eh? Captain?”

“Come over for a bit. There is something I want you to see. Ai has already gone to pick you up.”

Alice paused for a second and then said: “Ah, then wait a bit for me. The potato cakes here are almost done. Do you want some? I can send a portion to your captain’s cabin.”

Duncan said: “No need. I am not hungry over here. Just come over as soon as you are done.”

Then he stood where he was and waited patiently. Several more minutes passed before a surge of ghostly green flame suddenly rose beside him. The flame turned into a spinning doorway. The Skeletal Roc flew out of the gate, and right after that Alice stepped through.

The doll held a steaming paper bag in her arms. The moment she saw Duncan, she lit up with joy and pushed the bag toward him: “Captain! Potato cakes! I brought them over for you!”

Duncan turned his head and quietly looked at the simple-minded doll in front of him. The bandages hid whatever expression he might have had, but his eyes were full of helplessness.

Alice thought for a moment, then caught on smoothly this time: “Ah, I forgot that this body of yours over here doesn’t normally need to eat.”

“I can drink tea once in a while, but I really do not need food,” Duncan said calmly, yet he still took the paper bag from Alice’s hands. “But thank you all the same.”

Alice broke into a happy grin at once. Only then did she notice Tyrian and Aiden standing not far away, watching them. She quickly waved at them: “You are here too!”

Tyrian hesitated for a moment before he led Aiden over. His expression turned a little strange as he looked at the doll who looked exactly like the Queen of Frostholm. No matter how many times he had seen this face, that hard-to-describe sense of wrongness always crept up on him again, especially when the doll opened her mouth to speak.

Alice seemed not to notice Tyrian and Aiden’s subtle expressions at all. She was just happy to see familiar faces. She raised her hand and pointed at the paper bag in Duncan’s hand: “Do you want some potato cakes? They were just made. I even poured on Lightwind Harbor’s special mixed spice!”

Before Tyrian could say anything, Duncan suddenly reacted to the doll’s words: “Wait. Did you say Lightwind Harbor’s special spice?”

Alice held her head and nodded again and again: “Yeah, yeah. Lunie bought it outside back when we were in the city-state. She said it could really open the eyes of people from the north. The taste is a bit weird, but the texture is pretty fun.”

Duncan finally understood where the strange smell drifting out of the paper bag came from.

He silently lifted his head and glanced at Tyrian: “Try one.”

Tyrian had no idea what was about to happen. He did not care much about food, and he knew very little about the tales of Lightwind Harbor's cuisine. Faced with Father's invitation, he did not overthink it and even felt a little pleased. He reached into the bag, took out a potato cake, and popped it into his mouth.

Then he just stood there, completely still.

"Looks like your spice is the real thing. It will probably take him a while to snap out of it," Duncan said as he drew his gaze back and nodded to Alice. Then he turned and pointed at the "compressed planet" floating above the beach. "Let us look at this first."

"Oh." Alice answered at once. She was a bit curious why Tyrian had suddenly started to shed tears, but she still focused her attention on the Lost Star, which had a gorgeous surface and let out a faint humming sound.

Of course she knew what it was. Before they set out, she had already known that the captain was investigating the northern fallen relic No. 2, and this strange yet beautiful sphere in front of her was clearly the core of fallen relic No. 2.

"What is it 'saying'?" Duncan asked curiously at the side.

He could share Alice's sight. Through her eyes he could see the "lines" or the information that came from Vision 001. But he could not instinctively understand those things the way Alice did. That was a gift unique to Navigator Three.

Right now, he was very curious what information this doll could pull from fallen relic No. 2.

Alice frowned slightly. After a while, she slowly said: "There is a lot of information. All kinds of error reports. Mainframe communication failure, protocol conflict, reconstruction of runtime environment failed. It is a mess, much more chaotic than the error messages I saw last time."

Duncan asked: "Anything else? Anything like a system reboot countdown?"

"No," Alice said, shaking her head. "It is all kinds of malfunctions, and some jumbled bits of data. There are parts I cannot even understand."

After listening to Alice's report, Duncan only let out a quiet sigh and nodded slightly.

The situation was very bad, but he had more or less expected it.

Aiden stood by and stared, stunned, at the scene. Only now did he suddenly react. He bumped Tyrian's arm at once and said: "Whatever else you say, Miss Alice really can talk with that thing!"

Tyrian finally jolted back to himself, as if waking from a nightmare that had struck him out of nowhere. His whole body gave a clear shiver. Then he bent over and started coughing and retching hard.

This gave Aiden quite a scare. The bald, burly man grabbed Tyrian's arm at once. He patted Tyrian's back while he asked in a rush: "What is wrong?"

Tyrian finally recovered from the impact of that extreme spiciness mixed with a sharp, sour stench. He still could not understand how a single potato cake could leave him with such a "terrifying thrill". When he lifted his head, it still seemed as if layers of ghostly afterimages floated around his vision. In those afterimages, he even saw Father's gentle, smiling face.

He blinked and realized that Father really was here.

"This is a bit too intense. Ugh," Tyrian finally caught his breath. He stared at the half potato cake left in his hand with a strange expression. "How in the world did you make this?"

“The key lies in Lightwind Harbor’s special spice. It is enough to awaken a person’s reverence for food,” Duncan said calmly. “We have been in the south this whole time, and Lightwind Harbor’s food is the thing that left the deepest impression on me there.”

Tyrian stared blankly at the paper bag in Father’s hand and, from the bottom of his heart, understood what “reverence for food” meant.

He was very reverent, almost to the point of fear.

Just then, a howling gust of wind suddenly came from not far away and cut off their conversation.

Duncan looked toward the sound without thinking. In the faint golden light that filled the whole Harbor, he saw a current of wind wrapped in gray-white dust sweep quickly across the sky. The Ashen Wind circled above the beach for a few seconds, then came straight toward him.

The Ashen Wind gathered together, and Agatha, cool in manner and dressed in a black Goddess clergy gown, stepped out of the wind.

Chapter 745

Agatha of the city-state of Frostholm had arrived. Carried by the familiar Ashen Wind, the priestess who now also served as the city-state's Archbishop appeared before Duncan and Alice and bowed her head to him: "Good evening. I am glad to see you come in person to handle this matter."

Duncan lifted his head and glanced toward the sea: "Strictly speaking, it is still dusk."

"dusk will last for a long time yet, but people still have to live by a 'normal' daily rhythm," Agatha said. She gave Alice a small nod. "Long time no see, Miss Alice."

"Uh… ah! Long time no see!" Alice answered after a short pause. She scratched her hair in embarrassment. "There is an Agatha on the ship too, so I did not react right away."

Hearing this, a faint smile appeared at the corner of Agatha's mouth. Though her eyes were covered with a black cloth, it still felt as if a warm gaze fell on Alice. "On the ship… how is she doing lately?"

"She is doing great! Every day she makes Shirley do homework through the mirror, or she slips out to scare people when the fog rolls in, even though she says she is just going out for a walk," Alice said quickly, her face bright with joy. "Everyone likes her. Only Shirley is a bit afraid of her."

Agatha quietly listened to the doll's descriptions. At first she looked a bit surprised, but her expression slowly turned into a gentle smile. After a while, she gave a soft nod and murmured: “So that is how it is. It sounds wonderful.”

At this moment, Tyrian finally found a chance and stepped forward: “Have the Nightwatch matters already been arranged properly at the Cathedral?”

“I came only after finishing those arrangements. Do not worry, we have plenty of people,” Agatha said offhand. Then she could not help frowning slightly and stepped back a bit without drawing attention. “Governor, is your stomach troubling you?”

Tyrian froze for a moment, then understood what she meant. Even as the “Steel Vice Admiral”, he felt a bit embarrassed. The corner of his mouth twitched, but he recovered quickly and lifted a hand to point at the paper bag in Father’s hand: “Do you want to try a potato cake?”

Agatha had no idea why the topic had suddenly jumped to this. She gave the thing in Duncan’s hand a puzzled look. Duncan raised the bag at once: “Alice made them herself. It is Lightwind Harbor style.”

“That will not be necessary,” Agatha said. At the words “Lightwind Harbor” she stepped back half a pace, but then she seemed to realize this was a bit impolite and added: “This body has no life left in it. I can no longer enjoy the world’s delicacies. Thank you for your kindness.”

Duncan glanced at Agatha’s body, covered in cracks and broken apart like a ruined doll. He knew she was telling the truth. He could only shrug in regret, then stuffed the whole bag of potato cakes straight into Tyrian’s arms: “Then you take them all. Eat them slowly when you go back.”

Tyrian took Father’s gift with a slightly blank look. His eyes swept quietly over the people present: one corpse, one Undying, one doll, and one who was his Dad, and also a corpse.

The Steel Vice Admiral finally realized, a bit late, that he was the only one here with a decent amount of living human in him. He was the unlucky one.

Duncan did not pay attention to the subtle change in Tyrian's expression. After he finally handed off the bag in his hand, he clapped his palms lightly and turned to look at the gorgeous planet still floating quietly in the air above the beach.

"This is only a beginning," he said to Agatha. "In the days to come, more and more fragments of the Sun will fall onto the Boundless Sea. Inside them will be all kinds of Lost Stars as their cores. In the long Long Night that follows, these fragments of the Sun may become the only protection for many city-states."

At his words, Agatha's expression turned serious at once: "So the Sun's disintegration is already unavoidable. Is that it?"

"Yes. It sounds terrible, but it truly cannot be avoided, and the process will only speed up," Duncan said with a small nod. "Next I will contact the Popes of the Four Gods and remind them to watch for the fallen glowing orbs on the Boundless Sea and recover them in time."

Tyrian and Agatha fell silent at the same time.

In the days that followed, no one knew how many more sunrises this world would see. The long Long Night was about to descend. Faced with that fact, even Tyrian felt a little suffocated.

Along with that feeling of suffocation, other thoughts rose quickly in Tyrian's mind.

Lost in thought, he lifted his head and looked at Duncan: "Just now, you said these fallen fragments might be the only protection for many city-states?"

“Vanna has already received a revelation from the storm Goddess, and I have also gotten information from the Abyssal Lord. From Lightwind Harbor’s experience, these fragments of the Sun really can provide a ‘sheltering’ power similar to Vision 001, though only over a small area,” Duncan said with a slight nod. “They cannot calm wide stretches of sea, but at least they can protect a single city-state.”

Tyrian’s expression grew heavier bit by bit. After a while, he spoke in a low, almost to himself: “Will it be enough?”

His quiet murmur reached everyone’s ears. Alice looked a little puzzled, while Aiden and Agatha clearly understood what Tyrian meant by “enough”. Their expressions shifted at once and turned solemn.

Duncan slowly nodded.

“I understand you,” he said in a low voice. “To be honest, no one knows how many fragments there will be by then, and no one knows if they will be enough. But if there is no strong restraint, then even if there are enough fragments, they will still never be ‘enough’.”

“The Church will step in. Our patrol fleets cover every route,” Agatha said after a brief pause for thought. “If the Church’s fleets are not enough, Frostholm’s navy is also reliable.”

“That is the most optimistic case. To be honest, I am not used to facing the future with too optimistic a mindset, especially when human nature is being tested,” Tyrian said, shaking his head. “What if even the Church is split? When the veil of night descends, every test will be magnified without limit. Even the most loyal and upright people have their own stance.”

After that, they all fell silent, and the air around them grew heavy for a moment.

Alice still watched the scene in confusion. She looked at Tyrian and Agatha, then up at the captain, and finally could not help asking: “What are you talking about?”

Duncan did not answer. He only lifted his hand and gently pressed it on Alice’s hair.

Aiden spoke from the side: “We are worried that, by then, there will not be enough fragments of the Sun to shelter every city-state in the Sanctuary World, or that some people will try to seize more sunlight. After all, this is about survival.”

With such a blunt explanation, Alice finally understood what they were discussing.

The doll’s eyes widened, and she looked a little lost. This was something she had never thought about before, a problem she had never faced.

Tyrian lowered his head and gave the paper bag in his hand a complicated look: “When that time comes, a northerner might really never again eat potato cakes from Lightwind Harbor.”

Duncan shook his head and said softly to Alice: “Do not think about it. This is not something you need to worry about. This world has always had terrible parts. It did not start today.”

When she heard the captain’s words, Alice suddenly seemed to think of something and looked up at once: “Then, when that time comes, you will step in, right? Like you did in Pland and Frostholm.”

Duncan did not answer, but Agatha quickly reacted: “Yes. The Vanished Fleet. If we add your strength on top of that, it will be much easier to keep the city-states in line and maintain basic order after the veil of night. At least it will stop the very worst from happening.”

Duncan still did not answer. He only stayed silent, neither agreeing nor denying.

His reaction made Tyrian realize something: “You are not planning to step in?”

“No, I am thinking about something else,” Duncan said, shaking his head slightly.

He turned around and fixed his gaze quietly on the Lost Star floating in midair. No one knew what he was thinking in that silence, and even Tyrian did not dare speak at this moment. Only after a long time did Duncan pull his gaze back and break the silence in a soft voice: “If the day truly comes when things are at their very worst, I may have to do something that only I can do. That will probably mean going very far away, and maybe being gone for a very long time.”

In that moment, Tyrian seemed to faintly sense something. Some premonition, born from instinct, made the edges of his vision blur and tremble with light and shadow. For an instant, he felt as if Father’s figure was already standing in a place so distant he could never reach it. Though they were close enough to touch right now, some invisible Veil seemed to be drawing shut between them, as if it meant to separate them into two different times and spaces.

That invisible Veil seemed filled with starlight.

But the feeling vanished in an instant. Tyrian felt his thoughts break off for half a beat, and when he tried to recall what he had just sensed, only endless emptiness remained.

Duncan turned his head. On his bandage-covered face, the only part left bare, his eyes, held a calm light.

“There is no need to worry too much. Even in the very worst case, flame will once again light up this world. Hard times are always only temporary.”

Father’s words seemed to carry another meaning.

But Tyrian had no chance to ask more. A surge of spirit form flame suddenly appeared on the beach and slowly traced out a whirlpool.

Father was getting ready to leave.

“I still have many things to do,” Duncan said as he waved to Tyrian, Aiden, and Agatha. He walked toward the flame while he spoke: “Put more of your effort into facing the coming veil of night and do not overthink the rest. And do not worry about the graveyard district.”

The flame rose and then shot into the sky like a backward-falling meteor, quickly vanishing from Tyrian and Agatha’s sight.

Chapter 746: The Phantom That Passed By

The backward-flying shooting star slowly went farther away and finally vanished.

On the wide shoreline, only Tyrian, Aiden, and Agatha remained.

The ancient Lost Star still floated quietly above the sand. Slow clouds drifted across its surface as it let out a faint, almost sobbing howl. A dozen meters away lay the calm sea. Under the pale golden sunlight, the water looked like a slowly rising and falling mirror, and the tiny waves were much gentler than on other days.

In this long dusk, Tyrian finally broke the silence: “Gatekeeper, do you think that if the Sun really breaks apart completely, the Church will still have enough power to keep order between the city-states?”

Agatha did not answer. Faced with this sharp question, she stayed quiet for a long time. A year ago, she would have given a firm yes without a second thought.

Agatha knew she was no longer as devout and firm as before. That unconditional faith had cracked during the mirror world disaster in Frostholm, and thoughts slipped in through that gap.

But after hesitating, she still nodded lightly: “I believe my Brothers and Sisters will do their best… and so will They.”

“An answer that comes after thinking is not as firm as a believer’s, but in a situation like this it actually feels more reassuring,” Tyrian let out a slow breath, and a faint smile appeared on his face. “No matter what, we will do our best. I believe the other city-states will too.”

Agatha said nothing. She only nodded quietly, then turned around. Her figure faded into a swirling Pale Wind and drifted away.

Aiden had stood quietly to the side the whole time. Only now did he speak, a bit hesitant: “…What are you planning to do next?”

“First, have City Hall do everything it can before sunset. I want every person in the city-state to get through the coming Long Night safely. Second, order the fleet to make full preparations. I want every warship in its best state. No matter how long this night lasts, they must be ready to fight at any moment. Third…”

Tyrian paused for a few seconds and lowered his head to glance at the bag in his hand.

“Third, tell everyone to eat when they should eat, sleep when they should sleep, and live well. Ten thousand years ago, the city-builders raised the city-states in the Dark Age after the old kingdom collapsed. We will also find a way through this crisis… Doomsday is not here yet.”

“Yes, Captain!”

Flames cut across the sunset, leaving a brief bright scar between the clouds, then fell onto the slope before the cemetery. The spirit form flames slowly faded, and Duncan’s figure took shape out of the fire.

Alice had already gone back to the Vanished, while Duncan returned to the cemetery alone. He slowly walked up the slope he had taken many times before. In the slanting, dim evening glow, his shadow stretched long and wavered over the old stone path.

It was very quiet around him. Most people in the city had probably already gone home. There were almost no vehicles on the distant avenue. Only a few steam walkers were strolling down the streets. Workers sent by City Hall were checking the street lamps and gas pipes, and black-clad guards holding consecrated lanterns were making sure all the veil of night Sanctuary Worlds were in the right state. They all looked busy.

Duncan drew back his gaze from the distance and kept walking up.

He stopped at the cemetery gate.

A figure he had not expected yet found familiar stood outside the gate. It was a girl of thirteen or fourteen, wrapped in a thick light gray winter coat. She wore a fluffy knitted hat and gloves, bundled up like a soft ball of yarn. She stood at the gate, sometimes stamping her feet, sometimes walking around the entrance, then looking toward the slope.

It was Annie. She looked as if she had been waiting here for a long time.

Duncan frowned and walked quickly toward the cemetery gate. Annie saw him too. The young lady’s face lit up, and she ran down the slope toward him.

“Uncle Caretaker!” Annie called out happily and stopped at the edge of the open space before the gate. “I came just now and saw there was no one in the warden’s cabin. The black-clothed guards said you had gone out…”

“Curfew is about to start. City Hall told all residents to go home. Why did you run here?” Duncan frowned. His voice, muffled under the bandages, sounded low and a bit frightening. “It is not safe outside.”

“I know. I was just about to go home,” Annie nodded at once. She was not afraid of Duncan in his all-black clothes, wrapped in bandages, gloomy and stern. Instead, she reached into her coat, took out a small packet, and pushed it into Duncan's hand. "This is herbal tea… please take it. And then… I probably won't be coming for a long time."

Duncan looked at the paper packet in his hand, a bit surprised. He stayed silent for a few seconds before softening his tone: "Do you know what is going to happen?"

"…The Sun is not right, is it?" Annie raised her head and looked into Duncan's gloomy, sunken eyes. "The sunset has lasted for a long time already, and it still has not gone all the way down… I heard a nun say that if the Sun sets this time, it might take a very, very long time before it rises again… Mom said the temperature might keep falling then, or maybe stop halfway, and the worst will be the farms…"

She stopped. What came after that seemed too complicated for her. It was hard to understand, and harder to repeat.

Duncan stayed quiet for a while, then bent down a little: "Are you afraid?"

Annie shook her head, then stopped, and hesitantly nodded.

She did not really understand what was happening now, and she could not really picture what things would become later. Compared with the simple, obvious threat of the mud monsters that had once spread through the city, a slowly sinking Sun was a disaster much harder to grasp for a thirteen-year-old child.

But she could feel, from the lords' reactions, the same tense, heavy mood as during the mirror world disaster. She had already been through it once.

"If the Sun never rises again, will we have to carry consecrated lanterns and tattoo runes on our eyelids before we can go outside?" Annie asked. "Like those ascetic monks—they always stand guard in dark places…"

For a moment Duncan did not know how to answer. He thought for a long time before speaking softly: "…The Sun will rise again. If the Sun does not rise, then something else will light up the sky."

Annie seemed not to understand, yet also seemed to think of something. Her eyes widened in surprise: "Is it you? Will you light up the sky?"

"…Go home," Duncan said with a smile. The bandages wrapped around his face hid it, leaving only a curve at the corner of his eyes. He brushed some dust off Annie's clothes, not sure when it had settled there, and then looked up at the dimming glow over the far roofs. "It is getting dark… and thank you for the herbal tea."

"Mm!"

It was getting dark—though it might still take a while.

Outside the antique shop's window, the last splendor of the sunset had already begun to fade, yet the world still refused to sink into full darkness.

Duncan drew back the gaze with which he had watched Annie leave on the northern cemetery slope, and his eyes passed through the old shop's window to look at the Pland streets in the evening.

The streets were already empty. Even the noisiest children had been taken home by the lords of their households. The alleys of the Lower City, which always felt too crowded and lively, now looked cold and deserted, as if the place had become an empty city.

But another steam walker broke the silence outside the window. With the clacking of its steam engine, the huge spider machine walked slowly down the street. Steam hissed from the exhaust port at the back, and the strips of scripture cloth hanging on its armor plates fluttered in the wind. Two guardians in Deep Sea Church uniforms stood on its back, announcing the new veil of night notice that the Grand Cathedral had just issued. It included the new curfew order and changes to the city's functions during the veil of night.

Even though Pland now had a safe veil of night after the Black Sun incident, the city-state still felt tense.

No one knew whether the city's "safe veil of night" would stay safe once the night stretched into tens of days. Even fewer knew whether, with sunlight absent for so long, something else might grow in the dark sea and crawl onto the shore under cover of night to invade the city-state.

If even Pland felt like this, what would the other city-states on the Boundless Sea be like now?

As the sunset grew darker and murkier, Duncan's thoughts drifted. Then he put down the newspaper in his hand and got ready to stand up and switch on the electric lamp by the stairs.

Just then, a figure suddenly appeared at the edge of his vision.

By a shelf in the corner of the antique shop's first floor, that figure appeared out of nowhere. It looked like a traveler with a hunched back, as if he had been walking on some long journey for who knew how long. He wore a tattered white robe whose original look could no longer be seen, his body leaning forward a little as he took slow steps toward the counter.

Duncan slowly stood up and stared at the figure coming toward him.

Yet the figure seemed not to see Duncan. It was as if he walked in another, parallel layer of time and space, his gaze fixed on some far-off, shapeless place. He walked straight through the shelf and moved on slowly like a ghost.

As this happened, Duncan finally began to see the traveler's face clearly. He saw an old face, with deep wrinkles and skin that looked almost withered, as if time itself had frozen there. Then, all at once, that old face became young again. It turned into the face of a young man who had just set out on his journey, and the hunched body straightened.

A second later he turned into an old man again. His figure passed through the counter and was about to brush right past Duncan.

But suddenly he stopped.

He seemed to see Duncan—or perhaps only some phantom shape. His whole body went stiff as he stopped. His eyes opened wide, staring straight in this direction.

Duncan found that he could not read any clear emotion from that trembling face. Was it surprise? Fear? Despair? Or the sudden sight of hope?

Chapter 747: Sunset

Seventy-two hours later, the long sunset finally began to draw to an end. At the far edge of the Boundless Sea, only a thin golden rim of the glorious Sun Wheel and part of its rune rings still rested on the sea. In the refraction of the clouds, the evening glow grew more splendid, yet also more dim.

The people of this world had no time to admire the beauty of the sunset. To most, that radiant glow only meant that the veil of night was near. Now the whole world was slowly stepping into what might be the longest veil of night in history.

In the city-state of Morka, two steam walkers bearing the crest of Truth Academy were walking down the streets. Fully armed Knowledge Guards moved beside the machines, checking the streets while urging citizens to hurry home. In the fading light, the shadows of warriors and spider automatons stretched long and swayed, melting into the shadows between the streets and the buildings by the road.

In Cold Harbor, the last supply transfer had already ended. The notice that the subway stations would be temporarily shut down echoed in every station. Guardians sealed every door leading to the underground facilities and guarded each entrance and exit. At sunset, holy steam and incense would be sent into the pipes until the underground of the city-state was fully purified. After that, the subway would reopen, but it would run carefully under the new schedule and safety rules.

After all, the veil of night might last one to two months. The city-state could not completely shut down for so long. During these seventy-two hours of dusk, the administrators and scholars of the city-state had already drawn up a new “timetable” and set of safety rules for the long Long Night, to keep the city’s basic functions running as well as possible while the veil of night lasted.

The new timetable and safety rules had never been tested in practice. There had not even been time for more careful discussion. Each city-state would test the feasibility of its own “veil of night plan” in this long darkness before the Sun rose again.

And in distant Lunsa, gunfire had once broken the city’s calm and almost snapped people’s taut nerves. Suntists took the chance to move, stirring up the anxious citizens and preaching that the true Sun god would be reborn in the veil of night. Misled by them, their congregation set fires in the Lower City and tried to seize the Cathedral on the city’s edge.

The chaos was quickly put down. The flamebearers of the Flamebearer Church took control of the situation at once, but the tension in the city-state had already risen…

…

A mechanical spider moved its long jointed legs as it walked down a weathered old street in the city-state. The loudspeaker mounted on the machine’s head gave out a slightly distorted voice that echoed through the alleys:

“Attention, all citizens… There are thirty minutes left before sunset. Please return home as soon as possible… The new curfew will last twelve hours. After that, the temporary city schedule will take effect…

“…Steam, electricity, and gas will be supplied as usual. Workers in related posts may pass checkpoints with their permits… All veil of night Sanctuary Worlds will stay open until sunrise…

“citizens have the duty to help watch over the city’s basic facilities… If you find a street lamp out or steam supply weak, please report at once to the nearest Cathedral or security post…

“…If you notice abnormal shadows in your home, or hear strange sounds from underground, please seek help from the Knowledge Guards on the streets…

“Please keep calm and relaxed, citizens. We are going through a special anomaly. The city-state has enough power to protect everyone. Please follow the new schedule and safety rules, keep your life in order, and keep your body and mind healthy…”

The broadcast grew farther and farther away, until it became just a faint, distorted wind in the ears. Outside the window of the Harbor Inn, the gas lamp had already been lit. Its lonely light drove back the darkness heavy with malice and lit up the empty street. Aside from the occasional guardian passing the intersection on patrol, there were no more pedestrians to be seen.

It was hard to imagine that only a few days ago this place had been full of traffic and crowds.

Lawrence drew his gaze back from the window, let out a soft breath, and bent over his diary, writing line after line:

“Year xx, month x, day x. We are still docked at the Harbor of Faerun. This city-state has already done all it can to prepare for the coming night, and now the Sun is about to vanish below the sea…

“My crew members do not feel fear. Instead, they seem… excited, fearless of heaven and earth. The divine blessing of the Vanished fills them with confidence and makes them believe they have enough strength to face whatever comes. That is not a bad thing.

“Faerun is not a very rich city-state, but its situation is still alright. Everyone here is doing their best to calm the people around them and to gather what they need to get through the night… Before dinner, the inn’s boss said he had gotten enough fuel and had filled the warehouse with emergency food and medicine, so even if the curfew grows longer, they can still hold out…

“This city-state lies near the southwest border, and it seems it is used to such ‘restless’ times. No one knows what will happen next. The people here try not to talk about the worst possibilities and instead pour all their effort into daily life. That is a valuable trait. It lets Faerun bear more pressure than the rich city-states in the Central Seas…

“But I am worried about other things—the sealed objects on the ship, and the sealed objects in the city-state.

“And there are those ships still sailing out on the distant sea. Even if they try their best to return, many still cannot reach the Harbor in time. The Sun is about to set. Perhaps many captains and sailors are still on the Boundless Sea. It takes at least seven days to sail from the middle of the southwestern route to the nearest city-state, and the situation on those distant routes is even worse… In a lasting veil of night, no one knows what changes this sea will undergo…”

A faint cool draft brushed past his ear. Lawrence stopped writing and sighed softly.

He raised his head and looked at the window facing the Harbor district. His gaze passed over the docks. He could see two more large cargo ships appearing at the far sea horizon, sounding their horns as they drew toward the coast. Several small fast boats bearing Church emblems shot out from the docks like arrows, heading toward the two ships that had requested to dock, ready to carry out boarding checks and the necessary divine blessing before they came into port.

In a corner of the window, a hazy figure slowly appeared on the glass surface and waved at Lawrence, who was looking into the distance.

“Two more ships coming in, and both big ones,” Lawrence said softly. “All the docks in Faerun are almost full.”

“In the past seventy-two hours, four times the usual number of ships have docked in Faerun, and more than half of them came here just to ‘take shelter’,” the hazy figure on the glass said casually, its voice carrying a faint, airy tremor. “They are already the lucky ones. The ones who cannot make it back do not even know what to do.”

“…Every long-distance ship has a small Cathedral and a shipboard Father, but those measures were made to deal with normal nights,” Lawrence sighed and shook his head. “They gave twenty-four hours after sunset as the final time limit for normal docking. After that, any returning ship will not be allowed to come straight up to the city-state. They will have stayed in the veil of night too long. They will no longer be safe.”

“…The White Oak once had the same ‘treatment’,” Martha said. “I remember you told me—it was after the first time you met the Vanished.”

Lawrence shrugged and said nothing.

Martha stayed quiet for a moment before speaking again: “…If the Sun keeps moving like this from now on, people will get used to it sooner or later. The chaos will only be temporary, just like the city-states that held on through the Dark Age. After the old kingdom fell, they found new ways to continue. As long as life survives, it always finds a way.”

Lawrence knew these were not the kind of words Martha would normally say. She was an outstanding explorer and captain, but not a philosopher.

Yet he still felt a hint of comfort and warmth in her words.

“You are right, Martha,” he nodded lightly. “There will always be a way out…”

High in the sky, the pale World’s Wound slowly appeared behind the clouds. The thinning sunlight was fading from the sea, and at some point a hazy mist had risen nearby, rising and falling with the waves.

The towering bow of the Vanished cut through the waves, sailing into the distance through the evening mist. The half-transparent spirit form sails on its tall masts billowed without wind. The Radiant Star followed close by, its half-real, half-unreal hull rising and falling on the waves as if it might slip into another dimension at any moment.

News came from Lightwind Harbor. The last civilian cargo ship that could return before sunset had already docked at the pier. The city navy was setting up posts and markers in the nearby waters and was moving a mobile Harbor, equipped with a high-power steam core and Cathedral facilities, to the sea between the city-state and the “glowing geometric body”. After that, any ship returning to the city would have to stop at that temporary Harbor, and only after strict inspection and quarantine would it be allowed to come any closer.

Duncan stood on the foredeck, listening as Morris relayed the situation from Lightwind Harbor, and nodded slightly: “Lawrence is in the city-state of Faerun right now. He said they left a twenty-four-hour window after nightfall for returning ships. When that window closes, the returners must also stop at a temporary dock near the city-state and undergo inspection and quarantine.”

“Each city-state is making its own response plan based on its own situation and experience, but no one knows which one will work best,” Vanna said beside him. “Even so, getting through the first veil of night should not be too hard. Even with stored supplies alone, most city-states can safely wait for sunrise. What is truly worrying… is what comes after."

Duncan said nothing. He only thought in silence.

After quite a while, he suddenly spoke: "What about the sightings of the 'End Survey Team'?"

"Just as you guessed—there have also been scattered reports of sightings in other parts of the world," Vanna nodded. "I confirmed it with Helena, Your Eminence. She said that starting a few days ago, there have been at least five incidents within the Deep Sea Church's sphere of influence where people 'saw a phantom as if from another time and space suddenly appear'. After comparison and confirmation, at least three of them are very likely to have been the End Survey Team carrying out their observations at the End of Time."

Duncan thought for a moment and nodded slightly.

At the edge of his vision, the last strand of evening glow finally faded from the sea.

Night fell.

Chapter 748: An Uninvited Guest on the Ship

The long dusk had ended, and the veil of night had descended.

The electric lights came on, driving the darkness from the room. Taran Ael stood at the window, frowning as he stared at the streets outside. The glow of the gas lamps lit the road, and now and then he saw patrolling Knowledge Guards with watch dogs appear near the corners. Aside from that, the whole city seemed dead under the veil of night, empty and silent.

He did not know how much time had passed before he pulled his gaze back from the window and looked at the stacks of sorted notes and books on his desk. He let out a barely audible sigh.

He had sorted all this before the Sun set. Next, he needed to pack everything and send it to the academy's Grand Library. There, a new office waited for him, blessed by the God of Wisdom and guarded by many holy wards, where he could safely carry out his research and reading.

But only a few scholars ever qualified to get a "safe room" in the Grand Library. For most people, once the Sun set, "reading" became a taboo. For safety, all books had to be sealed away for the whole duration of this veil of night, until the next sunrise. This was also part of the "veil of night Ban" that the Administration Hall had just issued.

At the same time, teaching in all schools also had to stop. The young students did not yet have the strength or experience to deal with the monsters that came chasing from the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep Sea. It was far too dangerous.

Of course, some people thought things were not so bad in Lightwind Harbor. The glowing geometric body beside the city-state had a power similar to the Sun. Within its “sunlight”, people might still live and work as normal and carry on their research. But that was only a guess. No one had ever tested the power of that glowing geometric body during such a long veil of night, nor knew the limits of its protection. They could not risk it.

As far as Taran Ael knew, a group of scholars was already running tests near the glowing geometric body. They were fully armed and protected by equally armed Guardians. At different times and places, they tried to “read under the veil of night” to check how well the “sunlight” could protect them.

But even Taran Ael did not know how long these tests would last or how many times they would need to be repeated.

The door opened, and his young apprentice Joshua walked into the room, pushing a small cart. He froze a little when he saw his Teacher and asked: “…You still haven’t gone to the Grand Library?”

“I’ll go with the next group,” Taran Ael said casually, lifting a hand to point at the things on the desk. “Everything is already sorted. Just take these from the desk. Leave the rest here… I’ll be back after dawn.”

“Alright, Teacher.” Joshua answered honestly, then quietly began tying up and packing the sorted books and papers, moving them onto the small cart. He kept his head lowered the whole time, as if trying not to see the words on the pages, or perhaps to avoid meeting his Teacher’s eyes.

“After you finish tidying up here, go home with the others,” Taran said suddenly as he looked at his young apprentice. “You’re on holiday.”

“Can I go to the Grand Library with you?” Joshua hesitated for a moment, then looked up. “I… still have a paper I haven’t finished.”

“So now you decide to be motivated?” Taran raised an eyebrow and spoke on purpose in a teasing tone: “Aren’t you always shouting about wanting a break?”

Joshua pressed his lips together, looking a little embarrassed: “I…”

“Alright, I’m joking,” Taran laughed and shook his head gently. “Go home. Stop thinking about your paper. Those ‘safe rooms’ in the Grand Library are not that safe either. A seasoned scholar like me knows how to work carefully with those wards, but a young man like you is not ready yet… Even if the safe room blocks the bodies of the malevolent spirits, the muttering from the books can still drive you mad.

“Take your break. Rest well and build up your strength. We’ll still have long days ahead of us… and when that time comes, you won’t get such a comfortable holiday.”

Hearing his Teacher’s words, Joshua only nodded slowly. After hesitating for a while, he finally gathered his courage to ask: “Will it really get light again afterward?”

“…Yes, it will,” Taran looked into his apprentice’s eyes and spoke with extra seriousness. “Remember? You and I calculated the Sun’s rate of descent together, and it sank below the sea horizon right on time according to our numbers. It will rise again according to the same calculations. It just needs some time.”

The tense look on the young man’s face finally eased a little. He quietly packed the rest of the things, respectfully said goodbye to his Teacher, then pushed the cart out of the room.

Taran Ael watched Joshua’s back as he left. After quite a while, he suddenly turned his head toward the window and said: “How long do you plan to stand there watching?”

The air near the window twisted at once, and the figure of Truth Keeper Ted Lier emerged from it out of thin air: “I just didn’t want to disturb your talk with your apprentice.”

“…You still dare to use ‘sacred miracles’ to travel?” Taran gave the Truth Keeper a sidelong glance. “Did you forget what happened last time with that Subspace butterfly stroke?”

Ted’s expression twisted at once, then he forced down the twitch at the corner of his eye: “Of course I made sure it was safe… Do you really have to hold such a grudge?”

Taran did not answer. He just quietly raised a middle finger.

The corner of Ted’s mouth twitched again, then turned into an awkward smile.

“Shouldn’t you be leading your Guardians to protect the city’s night right now?” Taran asked casually. “How do you still have time to come here and cause trouble?”

“I finally don’t have to look at that pile of rushed, patched-together papers from those rookies. I’m in a very good mood now, so I came to chat with you—does that reason work?”

Taran still said nothing. He only looked quietly at the Truth Keeper in front of him.

“…Fine. I’m here to personally escort the second group of scholars, including you, to the Grand Library,” Ted shrugged. “A squad of Knowledge Guards is already waiting downstairs. When the others are ready, you’ll come with me.”

“Is that really necessary? A Truth Keeper escorting us in person?” Taran frowned. “It’s only a ten-minute drive from here to the Grand Library. I can just drive myself…”

“In the city-state of Morka, two scholars vanished into thin air on their way to take shelter in the library—the night swallowed them,” Ted cut him off. The Truth Keeper’s face grew serious. “The veil of night has become more dangerous than we thought. And the ‘knowledge’ in your head… is especially sweet to ‘them’.”

Taran Ael froze for a second, then silently turned and walked toward a low cabinet nearby.

“What are you doing?” Ted asked curiously when he saw this.

“Taking my revolver, and a knife and charm amulet for self-defense.”

…

Pages turned in the room. Morris compared the notes he had written before and scribbled in a thick notebook, stopping from time to time to think and adjust his line of thought.

His big notebook was filled with dense lines of writing and abstract symbols, and many dizzying diagrams that sketched the shape of this world.

He was finishing his most important project: trying to build a “model” that could explain the whole world, from the Great Annihilation as the starting point, to the beginning of the Deep Sea era, up to the current state of this “Sanctuary World”, and its possible future.

He had worked on this research for a very long time, and only now, as the world neared its end, did he see a chance to complete it.

Not far from Morris’s desk sat Shirley, who was nodding off, and Dog, who was fully focused on the documents.

After an unknown while, a faint, muffled whisper suddenly sounded by Morris’s ear.

As the whisper rose, a cold current suddenly flooded the whole cabin. The room seemed to turn into an ice cave at once. The chill gathered on the ceiling as if it were solid, turning into strands of white fog that drooped down. In the fog, invisible shadows slowly seeped out and stretched a tendril toward Morris…

Morris did not even lift his head. He kept writing in the notebook and said casually: “Knock it down.”

Before he finished speaking, Dog had already turned into a whirlwind made of shattered bones and black smoke. Fragments of bone and dark mist howled across the ceiling and, in the blink of an eye, devoured the twisted entity that had come chasing after knowledge.

In the next second, Dog’s form returned to normal and dropped back onto the floor.

Shirley jerked awake with a start: “Ah… huh?! What happened?!”

“Another shadow chasing after knowledge,” Dog muttered offhand, turning his head to glance at Shirley. “…Go back to sleep. It wasn’t coming for you.”

Shirley thought for a moment, then nodded: “Oh.”

She simply crawled over beside Dog and half lay down leaning against him. A second later, she was already snoring softly.

Morris stopped what he was doing and looked up, giving Shirley a helpless look. He sighed once, then lowered his head again and solemnly added the last footnote on this page.

And the moment he wrote the last letter, a strange voice suddenly came into his ears—

“An excellent study… You are already pacing before the last gate of Truth.”

Morris jolted in surprise and snapped his head up toward the source of the voice.

A figure in a worn white robe was sitting quietly beside him, wearing a gentle smile and looking at the open notes and papers on the desk.

Morris’s muscles tensed at once. In a blink, his hand went for the revolver under the desk. Dog reacted at the same time and sprang to his feet. Shirley let out an “ow” as she fell to the floor, and then she too saw the uninvited guest who had appeared in the room. Her eyes went wide, and a bone spike shot from behind her like an arrow, as if it would stab the intruder in the next second— Yet the figure in the worn white robe only sat there quietly, as if unaware of the sudden tension and hostility around him, still absorbed in Morris’s manuscripts.

After two or three seconds, he slowly raised his head, still wearing that gentle smile: “I want to speak with your captain.”

Chapter 749: Walking Against the Light

The captain had already arrived.

Almost the moment the uninvited guest in the white robe finished speaking, a column of swirling green flame rose in the room, and a figure stepped out of the fire.

Shirley jumped up the instant she saw Duncan: “Captain, Captain! A Ender suddenly showed up over here just now! This one seems to be the not-crazy kind, and he says he wants to talk to you…”

“I know,” Duncan raised a hand to cut off Shirley’s excited shouting, his gaze already fixed on the uninvited guest. “I was wondering how long you would wait before you appeared in front of me—didn’t expect it to be this soon.”

“You knew I would come?” the old man in the white robe asked casually. Though his words showed doubt and surprise, his face stayed very calm.

“You were bound to come sooner or later, because ‘dusk’ has already begun. Any member of the End Survey Group who still has a clear mind at this moment should be very willing to meet me, and I also very much want to talk with you,” Duncan said as he let his gaze sweep around the room. “…This isn’t a good place to talk. We can move somewhere else to speak.”

As soon as he finished, Shirley, Dog, and Morris—who was in the middle of casting all kinds of blessings on himself—started nodding hard in agreement…

The uninvited guest seemed not to notice their reaction. He only looked at Duncan: “That’s fine. Let’s go somewhere closer to Subspace. I’ll feel a bit more comfortable there.”

Closer to Subspace? Duncan frowned slightly at those words, but after a brief silence he still nodded slowly: “Alright.”

When Morris heard this, his eyes widened a little without thinking: “Captain, are you sure you want to bring—”

“It’s fine,” Duncan waved his hand. “I know what I’m doing. Shirley, go to the captain’s cabin and bring me that brass consecrated lantern.”

Before long, Duncan was holding the brass consecrated lantern and walking quietly with the uninvited guest in the worn white robe through the lower decks of the Vanished. They had already passed the cargo hold of light Inversion and were now on the last corridor; the stairs leading to the bottom of the hold stood at its far end.

The brass consecrated lantern shed a dim green flame, and its light drove back the gloom around them. In the empty corridor at the bottom of the ship, only the echo of footsteps could be heard in most moments—two sets of them. But sometimes Duncan noticed that only his own footsteps were sounding. The Ender beside him seemed not fully in the current Mortal Realm. At times he was like a weightless spirit form, walking on the old wooden boards without making any sound. At other times, even his presence seemed close to fading, as if he had suddenly gone somewhere very far away…

It was very strange, but Duncan stayed polite and did not ask.

Only when they neared the last door did the Ender finally break the silence: “You actually do not need this lantern—this lantern was prepared for a mortal.”

Duncan’s steps paused for a moment. He was quiet, then walked on: “But this ship needs it.”

“…You are truly full of goodwill,” the Ender said softly, and his tone seemed sincerely admiring.

“If you had asked me not long ago, I never would have imagined that one day I would bring a Ender here—and in such a calm mood,” Duncan said casually. “Our first contact with your people was not pleasant.”

“Is it possible that I was also among those who first made contact with you?” The white-robed Ender showed a faint, hard-to-read smile. “At least, I was one of them.”

Duncan turned his head and studied the man’s face carefully in the lantern light.

He saw an old traveler in a white robe, his back bent. The lines on his face looked carved by time itself. His sunken eyes held a faint, metallic gold sheen. His bearing was calm, his smile mild, and only the years seemed to flow quietly in the depths of his gaze.

Duncan drew back his gaze and turned his head forward again as he continued walking: “I don’t know. I don’t remember this face of yours. In any case, whether you were among the ones I dragged onto the ship back then doesn’t matter. What matters is that right now, here you are, talking to me.”

“It seems you already understand us very well.”

Duncan neither agreed nor denied it. He had already reached the last door and was reaching for the handle.

“We’re here. This is the place on the ship closest to Subspace.”

As he spoke, he pushed the dark wooden door open in one motion, and the structure of the lowest hold came into view.

Ever-burning lamp light lit the cabin. The once shattered structure of the lower hold had been repaired in the Lightwind Harbor incident and was now whole again. The solid hull that had grown from the Elder Gods' spine closed in on all sides, blocking the chaotic light flows and murmurs projecting in from Subspace. That eerie wooden door that led straight into Subspace still stood in the depths of the hold, its panels tightly shut, silent and unmoving.

Duncan led his "guest" into the cabin. The Ender followed right behind him, then lifted his head to look over the walls and ceiling and let out a sigh: "Ah… you have already repaired this place…"

"You know quite a lot," Duncan said as he casually hung the consecrated lantern on a nearby pillar and glanced back. "Did some of your people come here in a timeline I don't know about?"

"I once saw its wreckage—maybe in the past, maybe in the future," the old man in the white robe said, as if recalling something, his brow slightly furrowed. "…It broke apart in flame and fell into darkness. The real and grand sight of it was gripping."

Duncan did not answer that topic. He had been thinking about many things along the way. Now he took a moment to put his words in order before asking: "How many members of the End Survey Group are still sane like you?"

Then he paused and added: "I mean in the current time node."

The old man in the white robe was silent for a while, his face still calm: "Only me."

Duncan felt as if his breath and heartbeat both stopped for half a beat.

Then he heard the voice of the old man in white again: “Captain, do you know what it feels like to grope around in the dark?”

This last Critt who still held on to clarity and reason spoke calmly, slowly spreading his hands as if that eternal darkness still lay before his eyes—

“‘End Survey Group’… it has really been a long time since I last heard that name. In the first instant after we set out, that name already turned to dust in history.

“The ‘time’ of this world is limited. This was something we knew from the very beginning. The whole Boundless Sea, the whole Deep Sea era, was like a delicate clock whose running time had been set in advance. We knew it could only tick for a certain stretch, and our only hope was to find a chance to ‘wind it up’ again before the hands stopped…

“That wise follower of yours is already close to building the whole shape of the ‘world’. He was the first to add ‘time’ as an axis into the World Model. In our eyes, this axis looks even more… real, hard, and cold.

“Our task was to move along the time axis and, at every fork that could create a history branch, to observe and give mental guidance, doing everything possible to extend the life of the Sanctuary World while looking for a way to keep going beyond the End of Time.

“From our own experience, this process felt a bit like… walking against the light.

“The day Vision 001 was first lit in the test field was the starting point of that light. It was the most stable moment of the whole Sanctuary World. Everything had just been born, resources were abundant, the timelines were firm, and everything looked so good it seemed as if it could last forever. We set out from that bright morning of sunlight and left the light behind us, walking all the way toward the darkness at the end.

“As we moved away from the ‘starting point’, we saw the world slowly decline. All the small, unavoidable hidden flaws left from the beginning of creation gradually grew and turned into all kinds of deadly threats. The light faded, and the darkness grew. We turned our backs to the sunlight and walked toward the veil of night; the farther we went, the darker it became. We did everything we could to make adjustments, watching the possibilities along the time axis in the dimming glow, hoping to delay the coming of the dark… In a way, we succeeded.

“This Sanctuary World’s original ‘design lifespan’ was eight thousand years. By avoiding waste, easing chaos, and lowering the load on the Sun, it has already run two thousand years past that.

“But before the endless river of time, our success is tiny and doomed to be worn away completely.

“At the end of the time axis there is always only darkness. No matter how we tried to carry the light from the ‘starting point’ as far as we could into the future, or to pick up stray sparks along this road that kept getting darker, we could not light up that time end that loomed like a boundless black wall… We slammed into that endless dark, groped around, and came back with nothing. Then we recalibrated the whole time axis, checked every possibility again, did everything we could to push the future further forward, and then crashed into the dark again, over and over… countless times.”

The old man in the white robe lifted his head and cast a gaze toward some dark corner in the dim cabin. After quite a while, he went on: “There is no road ahead—that was the last sentence left by the first of us to lose his mind before he left. As a forward squad member, he stayed at the time end longer than any of us. He went through every possibility and in the end chose to give up, and even chose… to go back to the past, to ‘correct’ those wasted days.

“That was the first ‘Ender’ the world spoke of… He only entered a runaway state not long ago, and it has been so long since I last saw him that I can no longer remember his name.”

Duncan listened in silence. After a long time, he finally said: “And you held on to your sanity until the very end and have come to stand in front of me still clear-headed.”

“Yes,” the old man in the white robe turned his head, his eyes falling on Duncan. “Because in the current time node, I entered your field of view—when the order of the world is on the verge of collapse, the cause can come after the effect.”

Chapter 750: Future of Fire

When the world was close to the End, cause and effect also slowly fell into chaos. It was not that the last clear-headed Ender walked up to Duncan. Instead, in Duncan's sight, a Ender who would be the last to stay sane "appeared."

But to the two people involved, it did not seem important which of these was cause and which was effect.

"What is your name?" Duncan looked at the old man in the white robe in front of him and suddenly felt a bit curious.

Faced with such a simple question, the traveler in the worn white robe frowned deeply. He thought for quite a while, then lightly shook his head and said: "I do not really remember. The last time I used a 'name' seems to have been a long time ago… but if you are willing, you can call me Critt."

"Critt?" Duncan frowned. "That is the name of your people."

"Oh, right. No wonder it sounded so familiar." The old man showed a look of sudden understanding, and a faint smile appeared on his face. "That is fine. Call me that. I like this name."

Duncan stayed quiet for a moment, then nodded lightly: "All right, Critt. I have a few questions."

"Please ask. I have a lot of time this trip."

"The first question. Why did you choose to meet me at this time?" Duncan looked into the old man's eyes. His tone was very serious. "What is the purpose of this Window Interval?”

“We have actually been looking for a chance to make direct contact with you. By ‘we’ I mean those of us who are still sane.” When Critt answered this question, there was a barely noticeable moment of hesitation, but he still gave an answer quickly. “However, contacting you is a very hard thing. In fact, before today we tried once already. It was just that… we missed that Window Interval.”

“You missed a window?” Duncan looked puzzled. “What do you mean?”

“We came too early, Captain.” Critt spoke in a calm voice.

Duncan froze for a moment. After a very brief thought, he suddenly understood what Critt meant: “You mean those three who appeared on the Vanished back then…”

“Yes, we came too early.” Critt nodded slightly and repeated those few words. “When we found that it was not the year 1900, the Window Interval had already ended. That was the biggest ‘linear runaway state incident’ we had met since we set out. From that day on, many things started to slip out of control. But in the end… it seems everything still stayed on its set track. Duncan Abnomar still set out on his last voyage, even after learning his ending ahead of time.”

Just from these few short sentences, a storm of thoughts rose in Duncan’s mind.

The Enders, or the so-called End Survey Team, knew the truth about him as the bearer of the Flame Usurper. They knew he was an outside soul that had taken over Duncan Abnomar’s body. Duncan had already guessed this part long ago. But the other part of the truth was completely beyond his expectations.

In the memories of Tyrian and Lucretia, those “uninvited guests” who had suddenly appeared on the Vanished back then, those Enders who had talked deep into the night with Duncan Abnomar… they had actually come looking for him?

Duncan quickly sorted out the information in Critt’s words and slowly reacted: “So you originally did not plan to contact… ‘him’?”

“Yes. We revealed his ending ahead of time to one who was about to go to the dead.” Critt nodded slowly. “I know what you want to say, but the truth is, when we appeared on that ship, he already seemed to know some things. As a great explorer, he already had some sense of his fate. Our appearance only surprised him for a few seconds. After that, until the Window Interval ended, he only asked us some questions about how to sail in the border seas.”

A slight tremor and creaking sound reached Duncan’s ears. A low and uneasy noise echoed from the depths of the Vanished’s cabins. But after a few seconds, these strange sounds slowly faded.

Critt looked up at the dark roof above. Only after the surroundings became quiet again did he turn his gaze back to Duncan.

“After we missed that Window Interval, our only remaining chance to contact you was today. Or rather, only when the stability of the Sanctuary World dropped to its limit could beings like us, who go against order, safely enter your sight. And it is also because the stability of the Sanctuary World has dropped to the limit that we now have a chance to show you… a few things. This will help you understand the fate of this world, the fate that is ‘fixed’ so far.”

“Show me a few things?” Duncan’s expression became serious at once when he heard this. “What do you mean? What are you going to show me?”

“Before that, I want to confirm one thing.” Critt raised his head and stared at Duncan. “You have already turned down our Creator, have you not?”

“Your Creator… you mean Navigator One?” Duncan understood and then nodded. “Yes. He wanted me to take over his divine authority and take over this world. But I refused.”

“I see. That is good.” Hearing Duncan’s answer, Critt spoke as if talking to himself.

Duncan became a bit curious: “What does that have to do with what you are going to show me?”

Critt did not answer directly. Instead, he walked forward until he stood before the door that led to Subspace, which was tightly shut at this moment.

“Have you opened this door?”

“No.” Duncan walked over, and his voice turned wary at once. “This door leads to Subspace. Opening it in the Mortal Realm is not a good idea.”

“It is all right. There is no need to be nervous. I will not open it, and I do not have the power to open it.” Critt noticed the change in Duncan’s tone. A faint smile appeared on his face. “I am only bringing you to take a look.”

Duncan watched Critt’s movements and spoke in a careful tone: “Take a look?”

“Subspace reflects everything. As long as it is a possibility of this Sanctuary World, its answer has already been branded in that endless sea of chaos. And we…”

Critt muttered softly, then suddenly reached out and patted the doorframe twice.

“…we have always been good at fishing flickers from the long river of time out of that chaos.”

In the next second, under Duncan’s slightly surprised gaze, the big door suddenly shattered with a roar like an illusion. Lights beyond the limits of human understanding rushed at him like a storm and then, in a blink, re-formed around him.

Duncan almost struck out, but at the last possible moment he held back that impulse and instead chose to stand still and stay calm.

He felt no threat or hostility at all. He could even clearly feel that the door still stood intact in its place. Critt’s presence was also close by, with no change.

He looked around and found himself standing on a dark mountain peak. A dim and muddy sky hung over everything. A patch of dull light hid deep in the clouds. Below the mountain stretched a vast plain. In that boundless land, he could faintly see ruins like cities and also high aqueducts that had dried up and broken.

Other than that, there was only cracked, dried earth. A fine “gray” covered everything within sight, filled the ruins and channels, and rose with the wind in the valleys, blowing toward the plains like a drifting mist.

A biting cold filled the world, as if even the ashes thrown up by the wind were about to freeze.

Duncan quietly watched all of this. After a long time, he spoke in a low voice: “What is this?”

“This is the Age of Fire, Captain.” Critt’s voice came from the side. At some unknown time he had already appeared there. He still wore the same tattered white robe, but the robe now seemed even more ragged.

After a brief silence, Duncan asked again: “Is this some kind of History Branch?”

“This is the only History Branch under which the Sanctuary World continued to exist.” Critt spoke.

The “Ender” then paused, as if choosing his words, and went on:

“At the start, you reshaped the earth. All the grand plans on the Blueprint that had never been carried out appeared in the mortal world. Lands that humans had never imagined rose from the sea. City-states became linked. Resources became abundant. After that, you calmed the sea. You made more life grow in the sea, and you had the seawater purified among the mountains so it turned into rain and snow that fell upon the land.

“Then the world began to prosper. For a time, this New World grew even more lush than all the poems that praised beauty in the era of the Deep Sea. Strong nations rose upon the earth and grew day and night. New technologies were discovered. New poetry, literature, and dreams of the future appeared. Steam trains crossed forests and wild plains. Huge pipeline systems linked factories and the steel jungles of the cities.

“Countless stories, countless lives. Heroes and leaders, knights and philosophers, legendary adventurers, and ordinary people who worked hard in the cities.

“Captain, trust me. If I did not show you this moment, but instead showed you those glorious days, even you would feel a bit shaken. Even the strongest-willed governor and guardian in this world would be willing to trade everything for that world, even if its glory lasted… a very short time.”

Duncan did not speak. He stood on the mountain top and quietly looked down at the dry, broken land at his feet. After a long time, he broke the silence: “Were there still living people at this moment?”

“No. The ashes have swallowed everything. Do you see that city ruin? The tallest Cathedral at the center of the city… the last refugees died there. Now there is only an empty soul wandering inside that Cathedral. She holds a greatsword in her hand, but at this moment that sword cannot protect anyone.”

Duncan raised his head again and looked at that patch of dim light in the sky: “And what is that?”

“A very small Sun. When the world began to cool, she tried to heat this land again and held on for a very long time.”

“And my flame?”

“It went out, Captain,” Critt said slowly. “After you burned everything in the world that could burn.”

Chapter 751: Veil of night

In the Future of Fire, the world had been burned out.

Flames were not eternal. Fuel inside the Sanctuary World also had a limit. Outside the reshaped land and ocean, that eternal Veil still bound the whole world. When everything inside the Veil turned to ash in the fire, the world ended in a long cooling.

It was said that this “cooling” lasted a full four hundred years. In the end, the age of Embers came. Cold ash covered the entire world. No new flames rose. No living thing cried or breathed. The world stopped in this pile of cold embers. No new things were born, and no old things faded away.

In a sense, this Sanctuary World, which had gone through the Great Annihilation, finally reached eternal peace. Embers were still Embers. Doomsday was frozen forever in this moment. No new suffering would ever fall upon this land again.

Duncan walked to a big stone and sat down without a care. He did not mind the ashes that were everywhere. He watched the city ruins on the plain that still kept crumbling and turning into ash. After a moment of thought, he suddenly spoke: “So this choice has no way back.”

“You can reshape everything,” Critt came to Duncan’s side. His thin, bent body stood in the cold wind like a crooked dead branch. “But there is one exception.”

“Myself,” Duncan understood and spoke softly. “I cannot redefine myself…”

Critt stayed silent. After a long time, he finally spoke: “If there truly were no other road, the Future of Flame would at least be a kind of continuation. But I hope you will think and think again. Time is like a river. Many of its branches can be changed. But the main stream that has already crossed the finish, once it has flowed past, can never turn back.”

“You do not have to worry about that. When I refused Navigator One’s plan, I had already thought through these things.” Duncan shook his head lightly. “What you have shown me only makes my earlier guesses more complete. Compared to that, my real gain is that I finally confirmed one thing…”

As he spoke, he raised his hand and slowly closed his fingers in the air. The ghostly green flame of the spirit form burned between his fingers at once. It swelled and jumped in the air like an illusion.

The world of ashes seemed to respond to this bit of flame. The wind on the mountaintop suddenly became restless, and even the nearby ashes showed strange waves. But it was only a momentary illusion. In the next second, the wind and the ashes went back to normal.

In this already ended History Branch, nothing could push it to move forward again.

Duncan quietly cast his gaze at the flame in his hand, then turned his palm over.

The spirit form fire went out at once. The silent, shattering flames turned into tiny sparks and flashed for a brief moment at his fingertips. For that instant, they looked like phantom starlight from a far-off place.

Duncan watched this scene with a grave look and seemed to be thinking: “These ‘fires’ really are only a surface.”

Then he turned his head and looked at Critt, who still stood quietly at his side: “You can see this History Branch. Can you see my other choices?”

“I am very sorry. I cannot.” Critt met Duncan’s gaze honestly. “We are ghosts trapped inside the time cycle of the Sanctuary World. We can only see everything inside this time loop. All your other choices lie outside the cycle. To us, they are like the huge Great Hollow in the veil of night, and my eyes cannot cross that vast darkness.”

“Outside the cycle… in other words, outside the Sanctuary World, this ‘Known World’?” Duncan reacted at once. “So in the end I still have to find a way to break through that eternal Veil?”

“I am sorry. I do not know.”

“Is that so.” Duncan nodded slowly and suddenly sounded a bit wistful. “Right now, I am actually a little jealous of Duncan Abnomar from a century ago. You showed him the future. It was an accident, but at least he knew where he should go.”

“Feeling around in the dark is suffering. Knowing your fate is also suffering. At the end of time, there is never any peace. I am sorry. We do not have good news. We did not have any from the day we set out.”

“It is fine. I was not expecting good news. As long as I gain some insight this time, that is enough.” Duncan got up from the big stone. No ash clung to him. “Time to leave.”

He gave the sky and land here one last look. His gaze swept over the faint sunlight behind the clouds and the tall-spired Cathedral in the city ruins. He did not ask Critt about anyone else’s future or where they were now. He simply turned away without any regret.

The History Branch behind him collapsed with a roar, like the great fire in Pland.

Light and shadow twisted and re-formed. Things went back to their places. The dim, closed cabin appeared again in Duncan's sight. The door that led to Subspace still stood quietly at the bottom of the hold. It was as if nothing had happened here.

Critt was still standing by the door, his hand still raised as if he had just patted the doorframe.

Then he lowered his hand and bowed slightly to Duncan: "I hope this did not trouble you."

"It is fine. I already have enough things to trouble me. One more does not make a difference." Duncan spoke lightly. "At least now we have confirmed that one of the roads is very bad."

"The Sanctuary World is broken beyond repair. There is no point in patching it up, though I should not say that." Critt sighed. "Its destruction is already set. Doomsday has been chasing this world down the river of time since the Great Annihilation. Now it has finally caught up."

"A Doomsday theory. That is the doctrine the Enders have always preached. People always thought it was just the raving of madmen after they went insane."

"Madness and reason are only one step apart. 'Truth' never cares about the gap between them." Critt's expression was calm. "From another point of view, my companions have never truly gone mad. They were just… tired. So they chose to embrace all the truth and became madmen in everyone's eyes."

"Will you turn into that as well?" Duncan suddenly grew curious. "In some time branch, or in the near future…"

"I do not know." Critt hesitated, then slowly shook his head. "dusk has come, but this world will not go dark all at once. I still have a little way left on my journey. To speak with you within this Window Interval, I had to cut out the most stable ‘part’ of myself to come here. So now I do not know what the self at the end of my journey has seen. Maybe…”

He paused briefly and then went on: “Maybe one day in the future, we will meet again. The one who stands before you then might be a crazed, broken madman or a twisted, formless monster. That will mean I have reached the end and wandered too long in the dark. It is also possible…”

Critt suddenly stopped.

Then his eyes changed a little, as if he had suddenly seen a direction after a long time in darkness, as if he had just thought of something. The deep wrinkles on his face eased, and he looked at Duncan: “Right… I will do everything I can to meet you again, whether I am clear-headed or mad. I will show up before you. At that time, there will likely be no suitable Window Interval, so I probably will not be able to talk with you directly like I do now. You might not even be able to see me… but I will surely find a way to leave something behind. You can…”

The old man’s voice cut off.

In the dim, empty cabin, only Duncan’s lone figure stood quietly before the Subspace door.

He stood there like a statue for a long time. At last, he turned, picked up the brass consecrated lantern hanging not far away, and slowly walked toward the exit of the lower deck.

…

Now it was twelve hours after nightfall.

Just as the scholars had warned, the Sun had not risen. No dawn light appeared on the sea’s horizon.

If some people had still held onto hope before this, still praying that the seventy-two-hour dusk earlier had only been a “single abnormal event” and that the next morning the sun would rise on time, then that hope had now gone out completely.

The endless Long Night had become a fact.

Near Lightwind Harbor, the four great ark-ships still lay moored close to the shore. On the eastern offshore waters, the “glowing geometric body” continued to shed soft pale gold “sunlight,” so the city-state did not fall into full darkness.

The Academy Ark was lit up from end to end.

Short and stout Rune stood in the “Temple of Knowledge” at the very top of the ark, praying devoutly before the holy statue of Rahm, the God of Wisdom.

A chant made of “0” and “1,” with a very strange rhythm and sound, was slowly reaching its end.

Incense smoke rose through the temple. Rahm’s statue stood silent in the haze. The statue did not have a human form. It was a black rectangular stone stele. On its top was carved the rune of the Eye of Wisdom, and the whole stele was covered in dense symbols and fine lines.

As Rune’s benediction went on, those symbols and lines showed faint, slow flickers, as if they had been given life for a moment.

But as the benediction ended, the stele’s brief “life” faded with it.

Rune turned his head and looked at a Truth priest who had been waiting at his side the whole time: “How are things now?”

“The bad news is that the Sun still has not risen. The veil of night really seems likely to last a long time. The good news is that, based on data from all the city-states, the drop in temperature is slowing down. Going by the current cooling curve, it seems the lowest temperatures each city-state will reach during this veil of night will not go below the record lows in history. The world will not freeze solid in this Long Night the way you feared… the ‘Cold calamity’ will not happen.”

As the priest gave his report, some tension left Rune’s face at last. But soon he frowned again: “…Is that really good news?”

Chapter 752: On the Road to the Apocalypse

(Translation Changes here from Bcat00 to Novelfire for the rest of the Novel)

The Pope’s reaction seemed to confuse the priest standing next to him, prompting him to begin with a note of caution. “Surely, the fact that the world hasn’t plunged into eternal winter despite the sun being absent for an extended period is a piece of good news, isn’t it?”

“Yes, if we consider only this aspect, it indeed is good news,” Lune, the Truth Pope, responded with a gentle shake of his head. “However, what does this say about the sun’s supposed influence? What about our fundamental understanding of the world, in terms of the ‘rules that are meant to be obeyed’?”

The priest, a man in his middle years, furrowed his brow slightly as he began to grasp the depth of the Pope’s concern.

“The sun is essential for providing light and warmth. Its rising heralds a gradual increase in temperature during the day, and its setting brings about the cool of the night. If the sun were absent for a significant period, we would expect the Boundless Seas to turn to ice. This follows the natural order as clearly as ice melting when exposed to fire. But now, it appears that the night’s temperature drop doesn’t depend on the sun,” Lune explained with a serious tone. “Do you understand the implication?”

Without waiting for the priest's response, Lune continued after a short pause. "It's as if we're dealing with a machine that's been taken over by malevolent forces—a spinning axle that doesn't stop even when the steam core has gone cold, a different engine that continues to produce paper tape despite its gears being stuck. The way things work and their expected outcomes are increasingly at odds. It seems some of the natural laws… are breaking down."

A heavy silence enveloped the temple for a moment until the middle-aged priest broke it. "Perhaps we should reach out to the other three Arks…"

"They're already observing these anomalies; they probably don't need our warning," Lune interjected. "What's more crucial… has our border fleet set sail yet?"

The priest nodded immediately, "Yes, they passed through the veil an hour ago, and we are still communicating with them. The fleets from the other three churches have also entered the border from various directions. So far, there have been no incidents."

Lune nodded slowly, "…And what about the evacuation routes at sea?"

"We've established twenty-six rally points along the primary maritime routes, centrally positioning large church ships and supply vessels at each. Numerous ships that couldn't make it back to the city-states in time have heeded our call and are now converging on these rally points for safety. According to our plans, these refuge ships will then be led to a 'safe distance,' a three-day sail away from the nearest city-state, where they'll remain until the end of the night."

"The true effectiveness of these makeshift 'night shelters' at sea remains uncertain. We have no way of predicting how the night might evolve over time. For now, our only option is to prepare as thoroughly as we can and brace ourselves for the possibility of the worst-case scenario unfolding…"

Lune listened in silence, nodding in understanding.

Suddenly, a series of bells rang out, cutting through their conversation—a sound that came from various sectors of the Ark, each ring infused with a palpable sense of urgency.

Caught off guard, Lune paused, then, as if a realization dawned on him, he listened more closely. A faint smile broke across his face as he said, "… They've returned."

Against the backdrop of the night-covered seas, the Vanished and the Bright Star made their presence known with their eerie green fires, appearing as beacons in the darkness. These two ghostly ships bypassed the warning lines set by the church and city-state fleets near the shore, making a beeline for Wind Harbor. Having been instructed beforehand, the patrolling fleets made no move to intercept them.

With no effort to hide or delay, the Vanished and the Bright Star made landfall on the eastern coast of Wind Harbor. Duncan, taking the lead, walked confidently into the city.

Nina, gripping Shirley's hand, trailed behind Duncan and Morris. They navigated the deserted streets of the port area with furrowed brows.

"…The last time we were here, it was bustling with life…"

"Now, it's only patrolled by guards," Shirley responded quietly. She had blindfolded herself with a strip of black cloth to hide her unsettling eyes, but she quickly realized that such precautions were perhaps unnecessary. Upon entering the city, they scarcely encountered anyone, "I've heard the martial law could last a month or two."

Under martial law, the city-state of Wind Harbor should have been teeming with activity by morning. Yet, aside from essential personnel and those in special positions, the majority of residents were adhering to directives to remain indoors. The dim, golden “sunlight” emanating from the sea cast a ghostly glow on the abandoned streets, evoking the atmosphere of a ghost town.

In contrast, the city’s other half, untouched by the glowing body’s “sunlight,” was engulfed in an even more oppressive darkness.

However, as they moved from the outskirts to the more populated areas of the city, they began to encounter the occasional hurried pedestrian and saw a few shops bravely opening their doors.

“Shops are actually open here!” Shirley expressed her surprise upon “seeing” a few open storefronts along the way, “And there are people walking around…”

“You’ve mentioned it yourself; martial law is expected to span a month or two. During this period, some semblance of normalcy in daily life has to be preserved,” Morris explained, shaking his head. “It’s likely that each city-state has come up with a sort of ‘daily routine’ tailored to the prolonged night, permitting people to leave their homes for shopping or work despite the martial law… Life has to continue, after all.”

While Shirley and Morris exchanged thoughts, Duncan remained silent, his attention fixed on the deserted street ahead. Without joining the conversation, he simply stated, “We’ve seen what we needed to… Ai.”

Suddenly, a flame appeared out of thin air, and a fiery skeletal giant bird began to circle overhead, emitting a piercing screech: “Who summons the fleet?”

“Take us to 99 Crown Street,” Duncan instructed.

A trail of fire blazed through the sky above Wind Harbor, resembling a shooting star. It traversed the city part bathed in the artificial “sunlight” from the sea and headed directly towards the “Witch’s Mansion” in the upper city district.

This fiery spectacle caught the eye of many onlookers, but to those in the know, it was a sign of reassuring… good news.

Upon the flame’s descent, the scene before them came into focus, revealing Lucretia facing the unexpected visitors at her doorstep.

Among them were Helena, commanding presence in her sea-blue robe, Lune, somewhat stout in a scholar’s robe, and a group of unrecognizable clerics and scholars, appearing as attendants or aides accompanying the two high-ranking church figures.

It seemed they had been waiting there for some time.

“…Wow,” Nina whispered under her breath, observing the gathering, “Quite a crowd has shown up…”

“It’s not that surprising,” Duncan remarked, his tone nonchalant.

Lucretia’s initial response was a frown. She scrutinized the “guests” who had been waiting at her entrance and stepped forward without concealing her irritation, “I’m not fond of having visitors, especially not this many.”

However, Lune didn’t take offense to the “Sea Witch’s” forthright demeanor. It appeared he was well-acquainted with Miss Witch’s personality and quirks, and he gestured for his group to depart: “Then the rest of you may return now.”

Following suit, Helena signaled for her own clerics and guards to leave, then nodded towards Lucretia, “Now, you only have two ‘guests’ to entertain.”

With a glance at the two high clerics at her threshold, Lucretia exhaled a resigned sigh and moved aside, “…Fine, my father indeed wished to speak with you. Luni, please, open the door."

The mechanical doll Luni immediately moved past the group to unlock the door, while Duncan gave a slight nod to Lune and Helena, "Let's discuss this inside."

The mansion was a beacon of light and warmth in the midst of the night's darkness. The chill that had settled outside was no match for the cozy fireplace within. Loyal to the mansion's mistress, mechanical dolls and tin servants had meticulously prepared the house for her return. The table now bore hot tea and freshly baked snacks, their warmth a testament to the oven's recent use.

Inside this illuminated and inviting space, the outside world's perpetual, unsettling night and its unraveling seams could easily be forgotten.

The living room became the setting for their gathering, with Duncan adopting a relaxed posture on the sofa. He acknowledged Helena and Lune, who were seated opposite him, with a nod, expressing his surprise at their personal presence. "I hadn't anticipated you would wait here for me. I was under the impression that leaving the 'Ark' was a matter of great seriousness and caution for individuals of your stature."

"Indeed, without a compelling reason, we would not venture from the Ark lightly. However, convening with you at the earliest opportunity constitutes such a reason," Helena responded, acknowledging the gravity of their meeting, "particularly in light of the current situation."

"What is it that you seek to understand now?" Duncan inquired, "Are you curious about the state of the world at present? The origins of this apocalypse? Or perhaps what the future holds?"

A moment of silent communication passed between Lune and Helena before they responded.

“We are eager to learn everything,” Lune declared, shifting in his seat to lean forward, his demeanor growing more earnest. “But foremost, we wish to hear about the occurrences on the Holy Island and your… interactions with the creator of this world.”

Helena chimed in, mentioning that they had received preliminary reports from the Tide, “But we suspect you possess a deeper knowledge of the truth.”

After a brief reflection, Duncan gave a slight nod.

“Then, let me start by presenting a fundamental premise,” he began, preparing them for what was to come.

At the mention of a ‘conclusion,’ a sense of foreboding enveloped Helena, “A conclusion?”

“Yes, a conclusion—the fate of our world is sealed. The possibility of mending is exhausted, and at best… any efforts can only delay the inevitable for a brief period.”

Duncan’s delivery was calm, his voice not raised, yet each word seemed imbued with an immense gravity.

Chapter 753: Another Plan

Everyone looks forward to receiving good news, but, unfortunately, as Crete conveyed to Duncan, there simply isn't any positive news to share when it comes to the end of time.

They found themselves in a modest sanctuary, created from the remnants of destruction, now rapidly hurdling towards its inevitable demise. This impending doom wasn't the result of anyone's mistake, nor could it be attributed to a specific flaw in their plan or an act of human treachery. It was the culmination of everything coming to an end as the era of the apocalypse had arrived.

Lune and Helena listened in somber silence as Duncan recounted everything to them. He shared insights from the exploratory team's ventures into the border waters, the discoveries made on the Holy Island, his unsettling encounter with the Nether Lord, and even his audacious scheme to "conquer the world."

Duncan chose not to keep this last detail a secret. He seemed unconcerned about revealing to the two Popes before him that there existed "another option" for saving the world. Similarly, he didn't shy away from discussing the grim future foretold by the "future of fire," nor did he conceal the ultimate demise of everything, as revealed to him by the Ender.

Lune and Helena remained quiet for what seemed like an eternity, even after Duncan had finished sharing all he knew. They didn't utter a single word for a long time.

After a period of reflective silence, Lune finally let out a gentle sigh, remarking, "Some truths are perhaps better left undiscovered."

"To those unburdened by knowledge, ignorance is a luxury, but you, unfortunately, do not have that luxury," Duncan responded calmly. "Given all that you now know, what are your thoughts?"

After pondering for a moment, Helena slowly lifted her head, her gaze firm and said, “Despite the seemingly inevitable end of the world, it doesn’t mean that all other paths are closed to us, does it?”

She paused, locking eyes with Duncan, her deep blue eyes, as vast and mysterious as the ocean, seemed to mirror the distant, churning waves: “You have another plan in mind, don’t you?”

Standing nearby, Vanna’s eyes widened in surprise. As the Pope spoke, she thought she could hear the soft, distant sound of the ocean, though it felt almost like an illusion, a fleeting glimpse from a goddess paying them no mind.

Suddenly, Vanna came to a realization and turned towards Duncan, about to speak, but Duncan raised his hand to stop her, then calmly met the intense gaze of the “Storm Pope”: “Hello.”

The “female Pope” seemed to ignore his greeting, her focus unyielding on Duncan, a storm of emotions swirling in her eyes. She repeated, “You do have another plan, don’t you?”

Her voice carried a slight tremble, echoing as if surrounded by a chorus of indistinct whispers, transforming the atmosphere in the room to one that was moist, chilly, and tinged with the unique, salty scent of the sea breeze.

Shirley and Dog could feel the shift in the air, an unease settling over them as the atmosphere in the room changed.

Duncan, unfazed by the tension, exhaled softly and responded with calm certainty, “…Create a new one.”

The “female Pope” merely frowned slightly, offering no verbal response.

“The Boundless Sea sanctuary is beyond repair. Any attempts to patch it up are futile; they merely delay the inevitable struggle for survival. Initiating the age of fire is another way to survive, but it’s a path of no return. Choosing this means sealing the fate of our entire civilization in a tomb…”

Duncan’s words were deliberate, his gaze fixed on the “female Pope” as he spoke, then he made a decisive cutting motion with his hand.

“If the effort to prolong the existence of our old world is destined to fail or proves to be unreliable, then we are left with only one option… Not to extend the life of the old world, but to forge a new one.”

The “female Pope” blinked, breaking her silence as the soft sound of waves seemed to rise around them. Her voice, trembling as if resonating directly with everyone’s soul, asked, “Another sanctuary?”

“Another world,” Duncan clarified calmly.

He paused, allowing a moment of silence to envelop the room, during which the crackling of the nearby fireplace became the most prominent sound.

“A sanctuary is a confined, limited system, where disaster safety nets are minimal, resources can only circulate within, and vital life-support systems are singular—there’s only one sun, only one Boundless Sea, and even the number of city-states was capped at its inception. All these elements are confined under the same unchanging sky…”

“This system’s inherent fragility becomes apparent in the face of a cataclysmic disaster. It’s like a building on the verge of collapse, with those inside unable to mend the entire structure, mere spectators to the gradual downfall of their sanctuary. No matter how long the sanctuary has stood or how many years the civilization within has flourished, their fate is already sealed.”

“The limit of any civilization’s development within the sanctuary is defined by that ‘shell’—the unchanging sky.”

Under the intense scrutiny of the “female Pope,” Duncan spread his arms wide, his expression gravely serious: “Hence, we require a world, a ‘world’ far larger than any sanctuary, capable of embracing endless possibilities, allowing civilization to evolve beyond its current confines. Ideally, even when faced with the apocalypse once more, this world would possess the capacity to preserve more seeds of life, rather than plunging into oblivion as the last light of the sun fades away…”

The “female Pope” observed Duncan intently, and after a brief pause, she softly asked, “We understand the concept, but how can it actually be implemented? After the cataclysmic destruction, managing to sustain a sanctuary like the Boundless Sea amidst the fiery remnants of chaos is already a feat of near impossibility. Beyond our sanctuary, the concept of order has been shattered, and we have waited endlessly without ever glimpsing a sliver of hope for the chaos to subside… This Boundless Sea represents the last vestige of order, and beyond its confines, there is nothing left from which to construct a new refuge.”

As she spoke, the ambient sounds of waves subtly mixed with distant, unsettling noises. Helena’s eyes gradually took on a chaotic gleam, hinting at an internal turmoil. Something seemed to stir within her as delicate, deep purple scales reminiscent of some aquatic creature quietly surfaced on the skin of her cheeks.

Yet, she maintained her composure, sitting upright on the sofa, her gaze fixed on Duncan, awaiting his response.

Morris, Lucretia, and the others remained silent, fully aware that this was not the moment for interjections.

Duncan then addressed the core issue, “So, it boils down to ‘order,’ the foundational ‘order’ necessary for the sustenance of the entire world—the sanctuary’s finite existence is also a consequence of deficiencies in this order.”

Looking into the “female Pope’s” insightful eyes, Duncan seemed to connect with a distant realm beyond them, and then he exhaled softly, “… This aligns with my thoughts exactly.”

He gestured towards himself, affirming, “I carry that order, the complete ‘order.’”

The room lapsed into silence.

In that moment, Duncan felt a warm touch on his hand. Turning, he saw Nina clutching his palm, her expression tinged with concern.

Duncan offered her a reassuring smile, gently stroking her hair, “Don’t worry.”

Nina inhaled deeply, nodding with conviction—yet, from her perspective, Duncan’s comforting smile began to blur and dissolve into a myriad of stars.

That smile transitioned into a celestial spectacle as grand and luminous as the Milky Way itself. A figure constructed from starlight gradually rose to dominate everyone’s field of vision. This cosmic entity, composed of ancient stars, nebulae, and regions of star formation, seemed to envelop everything in sight. Despite standing within the confines of the living room, it appeared vast enough to encompass the entire universe, bearing the weight of all creation.

The figure then leaned towards “Helena,” with the celestial illusion around it pulsing and quivering as if on the verge of a massive expansion, ready to unleash and transform into devouring starlight.

“The order of the entire universe—intact and uncorrupted, unaffected by the Great Annihilation,” Duncan declared, his voice resonating through the stellar expanse, “It exists briefly in a moment, yet from the standpoint of data, it is whole and complete.”

As Duncan immersed himself in the sensation of his own existence amidst the grandeur of the cosmos, he experienced what felt like a galactic-scale “breathing” for the very first time—a profound realization of his own cosmic essence expanding and contracting. Yet, almost immediately, he curbed the urge to indulge further in this cosmic respiration.

He was acutely aware that his transformation had been accelerating ever since he left the Holy Island. Initially, Duncan’s only glimpses of his altered self came from the fleeting, inadvertent looks from others. After encountering the Pale Giant King and uncovering a fragment of the truth, he began to observe the shimmer of starlight on his own reflection in mirrors.

More recently, he had noticed his transformations directly in his “bachelor apartment,” and now… he recognized the necessity of exerting control to maintain his human facade.

Time was running out for the sanctuary and for Duncan himself.

Looking into the “female Pope’s” eyes, Duncan perceived the vision of a distant entity—a creature long perished, lying coiled atop a grey-white stone within a palace-like nest, surrounded by numerous deceased “offspring.”

This ancient being lifted its head, its myriad eyes locking onto Duncan’s gaze.

Through Helena, the creature’s voice reached him: “…So beautiful…”

Addressing the current predicaments, Duncan, striving to rein in his celestial manifestation, stated, “Now we face two issues.” He forced the cosmic brilliance to recede, reverting to his “Duncan” persona. “First, ‘data’ alone is insufficient for constructing a new world; I require physical materials, and a vast quantity at that… Yet, I’m unsure of how to undertake this task. I only have a broad, intuitive sense that what I need cannot be found within this Boundless Sea—it’s simply too limited, not nearly adequate.”

“Second, it remains unclear to me how to safeguard everything within this sanctuary while ushering in a new world. In the moment of the new world’s inception, its dazzling emergence might cause everything here to dissipate like smoke.”

Chapter 754: Sunrise

In an awe-inspiring spectacle, countless stars seemed to cascade from the heavens, their distant and brilliant lights gradually coalescing into a human form. This was Duncan, transitioning from the ethereal glow of starlight to a realm that both Vanna and Morris could grasp. However, Duncan's voice retained an otherworldly quality, resonating as if from a higher dimension. The complex overlay of whispers and noise, intertwining reason with cognition, overwhelmed Vanna, rendering her nearly incapable of coherent thought.

Time became an elusive concept, blurring into what felt like a mere instant. Eventually, Vanna senses the cacophony in her mind and begins to ebb. She caught Morris, with shaky hands, preparing his pipe, his voice barely audible as he remarked on becoming accustomed to such experiences.

"Incredible, it feels like I'm meeting the Nether Lord again," declared Dog, lying at Shirley's feet, convinced he had glimpsed the Nether Lord during the ordeal.

Nina appeared comparatively composed, momentarily stunned before she lapsed into deep contemplation. Now and then, she stole worried glances at Duncan.

Meanwhile, Duncan himself maintained a serene composure, locking eyes with "Helena." It was as if he was peering into the soul of this ancient being through her eyes, which mirrored the vastness of distant oceans.

After what seemed an eternity, a voice finally merged with the gentle lapping of waves, reaching everyone, “I understand… We will meet again.”

As the sound of waves faded, the damp, fishy scent that pervaded the air began to dissipate. Helena blinked, her inhuman traits vanishing rapidly before she doubled over, gasping and retching violently. Vanna was quick to her side, offering support and employing her divine magic to soothe Helena’s distress.

Once Helena’s breathing eased, she looked up, her face pallid yet adorned with a heartfelt smile. “It’s been ages since I’ve felt Her presence,” she whispered, “I had nearly forgotten the sensation…”

“Never mind your feelings, you were close to death. You need to return to the Ark immediately for mental recuperation,” Lune interjected, clearly concerned for her well-being. His attention then shifted to Duncan, suggesting it was time to depart.

Duncan signaled his readiness with a gesture.

Helena, now somewhat recovered, stood from the sofa. She and Lune bid Duncan farewell before embarking on their journey back to the Ark.

However, as she reached the threshold of the “Witch’s Mansion,” Helena paused, looking back at Duncan, who remained in the living room.

“Continue with your duties,” Duncan encouraged, sensing her hesitation, “Even as the world faces its end, we must persevere, if only to extend the lives of others by one more day.”

With a silent nod, Helena turned, stepping into the vast, dark night outside while accompanied by Lune.

As the popes departed and the door swung shut, it severed the connection with the expansive, dark night beyond. A blanket of silence swiftly enveloped the entire living room once more. Amidst the subtle crackle of the fireplace, it appeared as though each person was lost in their own world of thoughts, their heads bowed in quiet reflection.

After what felt like an eternity of contemplation, Duncan shattered the silence with his sudden insight: “Considering we’ve merely been hosting a guest for a short period, and now one of the two popes has nearly met their demise—losing nearly half their life—do you think the Storm Church might suspect that we’ve laid a trap? Imagining that we’ve surrounded them with no less than five hundred armed attackers right within these walls?”

Lucretia, who had been deeply immersed in her own thoughts, was abruptly brought back to reality. She looked up, her eyes reflecting a mix of surprise and incredulity: “All this time in silence, and that’s what you’ve been brooding over?”

With a look of earnest concern, Duncan replied, “Isn’t it a valid concern?” He continued, addressing Lucretia directly, “Given the notoriety your household already endures within this city, with rumors abounding that you’ve been responsible for all manner of sinister deeds—ranging from cooking pots filled with children to ensnaring stray dogs from across the world…”

Lucretia responded with a sharp look, though her irritation soon gave way to resignation as she gazed back out the window, “Well then, I suppose I should be grateful for such rumors. Perhaps they’ll spare me from the weekly barrage of sales flyers in my mailbox.” She paused, then added with a hint of resignation, “…Though, I doubt I’ll be seeing any more of those flyers now.”

With a soft sigh, Duncan rose from his seat on the sofa. “I’ve spoken more than enough, and I find myself weary. I’ll retire to my room for some rest. Please don’t delay lunch on my account.”

As he ascended the stairs, which emitted a gentle creak with each step, Duncan's tall silhouette gradually vanished from view at the top.

The remaining individuals in the living room exchanged puzzled glances, momentarily unsure of how to proceed.

Shirley was the first to break the ensuing silence: "I must admit, I was kind of lost during their conversation just now," she confessed, "But one thing did make sense to me. The pope earlier… she wasn't the same one, was she?"

Vanna nodded slowly in agreement: "The Goddess has revealed to me that Their bond with this mortal realm is to be fortified one final time. It seems that process has already begun."

Unable to contain her curiosity, Nina posed the question in everyone's mind: "What happens next?"

Morris, cradling his pipe thoughtfully, responded with a somber tone, "In times past, optimists could confidently say 'the sun will rise as usual tomorrow.' Yet, even that assurance lacks its once comforting certainty." He added, "But come what may, tomorrow will arrive, regardless of whether the sun graces us with its presence. Just as the captain remarked, life must go on. He has his duties, and we have ours."

The tobacco in his pipe slowly smoldered away, its final embers fading into the lingering smoke.

A gentle breeze meandered through the living room, carrying with it a whirl of colorful confetti that danced briefly before vanishing from sight, leaving a sense of mystery and anticipation for what the future might hold.

As Duncan felt the breeze behind him, he was immediately aware of a familiar presence drawing near. Turning around, he witnessed Lucretia's form materializing from a swirl of vibrant confetti that danced in the air.

“I would’ve thought after the mishap we had last time, you’d refrain from making such a grand entrance with all these colorful papers in front of me,” Duncan remarked, a playful smile on his face, “Aren’t you concerned it might fuel my already keen curiosity?”

Without directly addressing his comment, Lucretia fixed her gaze on Duncan, her expression unreadable. “You’re planning to venture beyond the Eternal Veil, aren’t you? To cross the critical threshold of six miles?”

Duncan paused before responding, “Why do you ask?”

“It’s clear you’re in search of something beyond the Boundless Sea. Though the specifics of your conversation with that ‘pope’ elude me, I’m certain you’re preparing to traverse the veil once more. And this time, I sense you intend to journey farther and remain absent longer.”

Duncan took a moment to consider the “witch” standing before him. After a lengthy silence, he finally said, ” Lucy, you must have seen it for yourself by now.”

In that moment, the room seemed to be touched by a hint of starlight, casting Lucretia’s gaze into the depths of a distant cosmos.

“I see it,” the “Sea Witch” admitted openly, “Indeed, from the moment you first appeared before me, I’ve seen it.”

As the starlight dimmed, Duncan looked at the “witch,” taken aback by her admission. “Then you must understand, I’m not exactly…”

“It didn’t matter to Nina whether you were her ‘Uncle Duncan’ or not,” Lucretia interjected calmly.

Duncan let out a sigh, a mixture of resignation and bemusement on his face.

“Amid the starlight, I’ve glimpsed the silhouette of my father—regardless of your acknowledgment,” Lucretia continued, shaking her head slightly,

“It’s evident to me that you have indeed returned to our world, albeit through means beyond my comprehension. Yet here you are, standing before me as you do in my memories, and now, you’re preparing to leave once more… just as you did before.”

She then became more somber, “Do you recall our conversation on this matter?”

“…About taking you with me, yes, I remember,” Duncan acknowledged after a brief pause, “Alright, Lucy, I’ll confess, before you arrived, I did entertain the thought of departing alone—just for a moment, mind you, with no real intention of acting on it…”

Perhaps it was the intensity of the witch’s unwavering gaze that compelled him, but Duncan found himself adding, somewhat awkwardly, “I only considered it briefly, truly…”

To his surprise, however, a faint smile began to form in Lucretia’s eyes.

Unable to contain herself any longer, Lucretia burst into laughter, her joy evident.

Duncan, puzzled, asked, “What’s so funny?”

“You used to get so flustered trying to explain things to me, though it happened only rarely,” Lucretia managed to say through her laughter, “The last time was when you accidentally broke my hairpin.”

Duncan stood there, a picture of bewilderment, his hands outstretched in a gesture of utter helplessness.

Suddenly, a brilliant streak of light outside the window cut through the air, abruptly halting whatever he was about to say next.

Without hesitation, Duncan and Lucretia hurried to the window to get a better look.

Bathed in the thin, golden glow cast by a glowing geometric object in the sky, a more intense arc of light began to emerge on the distant horizon of the city.

Duncan gazed at the emerging “light arc” with a mix of confusion and dawning realization.

From the vantage point of Pland’s antique shop, his view through the open window on the second floor offered a clearer picture—a radiant, golden light was gradually ascending from the horizon, its brilliance unmatched.

In those first few moments of awe and wonder, almost everyone was convinced they were witnessing the dawn.

However, as the golden arc rose fully above the sea and started to ascend into the sky with breathtaking speed, its fragmented nature became increasingly apparent. The structure began to disintegrate further as it climbed higher.

Finally, Duncan now had a full grasp of what was truly happening.

What he was seeing was a fragment of a ring structure, apparently a section of the outer rune circle belonging to Vision 001. The bright edge of the arc was marred by visible black cracks, leading to the eventual fragmentation of the entire “light arc” into a dozen or so loosely connected glowing pieces. Within mere minutes, this disintegrating “glowing array” had ascended to a position in the sky comparable to that of the sun around nine or ten o’clock.

Then, the isolated segment of the rune circle that had ascended into the heavens fell apart completely.

With a world-shattering roar accompanied by a fearsome howl and a blinding flash that ripped through the sky, the glowing array transformed into a dozen “meteors.” These fiery trails streaked across the sky, hurtling down toward the unsuspecting people below.

Chapter 755: Crossing the Border

This event was akin to witnessing a magnificent burst of light, almost as if one-fourth of what could be described as a magical circle of solar energy had suddenly fragmented in the heavens. This fragmentation then transformed into about a dozen radiant, larger formations. In the moments following this initial breakup, these formations seemed to continue their ascent and movement across the sky, mirroring the expected path of Vision 001. It appeared as though each of these luminous entities retained some form of residual energy and directionality. However, this semblance of control was fleeting.

Soon after, these radiant formations began to deteriorate, breaking into both large and small shards of light that scattered across the sky. This spectacle resembled a fleet being torn asunder by a tempest, leaving behind bright trails that slowly dissipated. Among the chaos, numerous smaller light particles detached from the larger masses. These smaller fragments, akin to fireflies in their inconspicuousness compared to the larger pieces, descended from the heavens in a dance of flickers and a cascade of minor explosions.

From the clouds, light poured forth, spanning from the eastern frontier to the western isles, casting the night into a surreal glow of potent, otherworldly golden light.

The descent of the larger fragments was marked by a gradual pace, continuously releasing glowing debris as they traversed the world. Their paths were predominantly directed towards the southwestern seas, although a handful of smaller pieces ventured towards the central and northern territories.

Eighteen hours into what was considered “nightfall,” the Boundless Sea was momentarily bathed in light, reminiscent of a significant solar disintegration. The relatively low altitude at which these objects descended meant that even a fraction of the magical solar circle was sufficient to illuminate the night sky. What might have been seen as a harbinger of doom —a “meteor shower”—instead bestowed upon the world a fleeting period of “daylight” lasting nearly an hour. During this transient day, an eerie silence enveloped the world.

Duncan found himself observing this vision from the second-floor window of an antique shop. He had opened a slender window at the corridor’s end, inviting the outside breeze and sounds into the building. The surrounding neighborhood lay in quietude as if the usual city noises of carriages and pedestrians had vanished into thin air. Yet, the reality was different.

Individuals of all ages—men, women, the elderly, and children—either stepped out of their homes or peered through their windows, captivated by the celestial spectacle. On the streets, groups formed, comprising quickly mobilized sheriffs and guardian squads.

It was as though an unseen force had seized everyone by the neck, holding them in a uniform stance, their gazes locked skyward, mesmerized by the cascading light.

Amidst this silence, the only audible sounds were the roar and whistle of the glowing entities as they streaked through the clouds, accompanied by the distant tolling of church bells.

After an indeterminate span of time, the brilliance in the sky began to wane —the final glowing entities made their way past the zenith amidst the clouds. For a moment, they lingered aloft as if striving to fulfill their destined role to cast light upon the world, yet ultimately, they too succumbed to a loss of energy. Like their predecessors, they descended towards the ocean, their once resplendent trails dimming into obscurity.

Darkness reclaimed its hold, enveloping Pland once more.

The entire world was plunged back into shadow.

A whistle pierced the quiet of the neighborhood, startling the gathered crowds out of their reverie. Stirred by the sound, people began to disperse in an organized manner, heading back to their homes.

Before Duncan closed the window, other sounds reached him—children's voices filled with confusion and curiosity, questioning their parents about the night's events, wondering why their routines were disrupted, why they could no longer meet with friends. Murmurs of frustration, sighs of resignation, and the soft sounds of weeping filled the air.

The last noises to drift in from outside were the foghorns from the dock's direction and the ringing of church bells, signaling that warships had received orders and were making ready to depart.

Frem redirected his attention from the window back to his task, his hands moving with deliberate precision as he etched the final symbols into a ritual stone tablet.

Bathed in the light, the figure of this Pope of the Flame Bearers stood in stark relief, a silhouette poised between illumination and shadow. His face, reminiscent of carved stone, betrayed no hint of emotion, his entire focus seemingly absorbed by the "record stone tablet" he manipulated.

Inside the temple, the fire blazed intensely. A priest garbed in black stood nearby, delivering an update to the pope: "…The patrol fleet stationed in the southwestern seas has observed the trajectory of several primary luminous fragments and has dispatched high-speed vessels to investigate…

“Currently, there have been no reports of these objects making landfall near any city-states. It appears that the remnants of the sun have all plummeted into the ocean… Likewise, there are no accounts of sea vessels encountering these descending fragments.”

“The World’s Creation has once again become visible in the heavens… Over the last eighteen hours, three city-states have reported a marked rise in incidents of supernatural corrosion within their confines… For the moment, they do not seek additional support, though they request that the nearest fleet draw closer…”

“A shadow demon assault occurred in the Port of Mosalara. It remains uncertain whether this attack stems from the recent event or if it signifies an opportunistic strike by the remaining Annihilators amid the turmoil…”

As Frem attentively absorbed the series of updates from the priest, he gave a small nod of acknowledgment before handing over the newly finished, grey-white stone tablet: “I’ve documented everything—ensure this gets to our archives.”

The priest clad in black robes accepted the stone tablet, its surface etched with meticulous carvings that chronicled the dates and observations of the sun fragments’ descent.

The act stirred a memory of a doctrine from their holy texts within him—even at the brink of the world’s end, it is imperative to meticulously document until the final moment. The last whisper of civilization should be captured by the historian’s pen.

With the record stone tablet in hand, the priest departed, leaving Frem standing alone for company, with only the sound of the fire crackling in the basin.

Time passed unmarked until Frem seemed to perceive something unseen and turned towards the fire basin: “Helena, how fares your recovery?”

“My mental state could perhaps be likened to that of the living, yet far from truly ‘recovered’,” came Helena’s voice from the flames, her tone wavering slightly, revealing her unrest to Frem, “Clearly, resting idly is not an option at this stage.”

Frem responded, informed by a prior conversation: “I’ve been briefed by Lune. The news is… profoundly unsettling.”

“Does your concern lie with the divine intervention I received, or is it the ‘captain’s’ strategy?”

“…Both,” Frem admitted after a pause, his voice carrying a weight of contemplation, “Naturally, the latter presents the greater shock.”

A brief silence ensued before the voice from the fire resumed.

“Frem.”

“I am listening.”

“…Do you continue to document our history?”

“Without cease, I fulfill the scriptural command to chronicle our times.”

“Should the world meet its demise and we with it, do you think the stone tablets you’ve inscribed will one day be deciphered by future beings?”

“If such a day were to dawn, it would signify the collapse of the captain’s strategy, the deities’ defeat, and the extinguishment of the era of fire,” Frem spoke softly, his gaze fixed on the dancing flames, “Our histories would become indecipherable, for on that day, the very notion of ‘history’ would cease to exist.”

“Yet, you persist in your recordings and in safeguarding the beacon of legacy.”

“The act of recording history holds intrinsic value. Even absent future inheritors, ‘history’ itself stands as testament that we existed as a civilization unto extinction—echoing the final verses of the deranged poet Puman:

‘Time bestowed upon me life, and in return, I endowed time with memories.’”

“I hadn’t pegged you for a connoisseur of poetry.”

“Poetry is intertwined with history.”

“Is that so?” The voice from the fire hesitated briefly, then pressed on, “In that case, assist me in documenting a new entry—when next you pray to the Eternal Flame, etch it upon a stone.”

Without hesitation, Frem reached for a parchment and readied his pen: “Proceed.”

“…On the 21st of the first month, 1902, according to the New City-State Calendar, the Sea Song embarked on a momentous journey across the critical boundary of the six miles notch at the Eternal Veil. They stand at the forefront of our civilization’s exploration.”

“The Sea Song, 21st of the first month, 1902… Got it, it’s been recorded.”

…

The fog had morphed into an almost sentient entity, far from the simple, drifting mist it once seemed. The steamship, ‘The Sea Song,’ labored through the fog that seemed to swallow the world whole, its progress hindered as if pushing through a dense, invisible barrier, ensnared and constrained by unseen forces.

Within this heavy shroud, the usual demarcations of the world blurred into obscurity—the waters beside the ship transformed into a nebulous mass of gray-white, the sky above shed its clouds for a uniform haze, and a diffuse daylight cast everything in a vague glow. Only sporadically could the lookout discern the undulating seawater through the fog's fleeting breaches.

These glimpses of water, distant and ephemeral, were like visual illusions.

Adorned with the Storm Church's flag, the white vessel, a pioneer of exploration, seemed suspended in the fog. Despite the steam core's persistent thrum, the absence of fixed points and the ever-shifting fog rendered the crew unable to ascertain their advancement—or if they were ensnared in this anomalous "sea".

"We've lost all signals from the flagship, and at present, we could barely catch the beacon from the temporary lighthouse," reported a church sailor clad in a dark blue cloak to the 'The Sea Song's captain on the bridge, "The steam core is at maximum output, and we're holding our course."

"Mm," the captain, a formidable woman with an aura of stern resolve, acknowledged the sailor's update. She then directed her attention to an adjacent priest: "In this direction, can you discern anything more distinctly?"

She inquired of an aged priest garbed in a flowing robe, his face lined with deep wrinkles, eyes recessed, and posture stooped, marking him as an unlikely voyager for such an extended maritime expedition due to his frailty. Nevertheless, he was seated near the captain, cradling a finely crafted brass incense burner in one hand and a talisman made from sea-breath wood in the other.

The venerable priest concentrated as though receiving a transmission beyond the ordinary senses. A hush fell over those present, wary of interrupting his concentration.

After an extended pause, the elder priest finally lifted his gaze.

He had caught various speckles of sensations: the vestiges of a whisper, the faint sound of a final breath, and the odor of decay.

“Over here,” the priest indicated with a raised hand, pointing through the thick fog, “That way.”

Chapter 756: The Far Voyager

In a fog so thick and clinging it felt almost like moving through a dense, sticky substance, the immaculate white exterior of the Sea Song glided forward like a spectral presence.

At first unnoticed by the crew, the once steady roar of the steam core began to transform. It morphed into a strange, low groan that intertwined with layers of echoes. This sound was punctuated by occasional sharp screeches from the pipes, mingled with soft murmurs that resembled the unintelligible whisperings of someone lost in a deep dream.

“The machine seems to have taken on a life of its own…” the priest reported after returning from the engine room to the bridge where the captain stood in command. “The calming effect of the incense we’ve been using is starting to wear off.”

“Sever the connection to the differential engine’s drive shaft, switch every piece of machinery to manual operation, and release some of the steam core’s pressure until it’s back in the yellow zone. Also, change the metal ore catalyst in two hours,” the captain instructed with calm authority. “And reduce the engine room staff’s shifts to three-hour rotations.”

“Yes, captain,” the priest responded, his head bowed in respect. Suddenly, his voice dropped to a hoarse, deep tone, as if a rush of uncontrolled air had forced its way out of his lungs, though it seemed to go unnoticed by those around him. He then turned to leave, and the stern-faced lady captain watched him go before diverting her gaze elsewhere.

Out of the corner of her eye, she noticed a patch of rust beginning to form on the railing next to her seat. It spread slowly, emblematic of the relentless passage of time, years seeming to dissolve before her eyes.

But then, as quickly as it had appeared, the rust vanished from sight as if it were merely a trick of the light. Caught off guard and without a moment to process this anomaly, a deep, vaguely familiar yet eerily unsettling voice whispered directly into her mind:

“Ah… you have come… my little fish… swim, swim… back to the currents…”

The sound of waves gently lapping reached her ears as though she were engulfed by the sea itself, a chilling sensation creeping across her skin. The captain felt momentarily bewildered by the sensation but quickly regained her composure.

From afar, the ship’s first mate’s voice broke through the silence: “Captain! There’s something in the fog!”

This snapped the captain to full alertness, and she immediately turned her attention to the side of the bridge. Peering through the broad expanse of the cabin windows, she caught sight of a faint green glow slowly intensifying within the mist. It seemed as though a massive creature was making its approach, its form gradually becoming more distinct and revealing itself to be another ship.

A colossal ship with a towering bow and sails that appeared almost translucent emerged from the fog, approaching from the side and rear. It caught up to the Sea Song, which was running at full power with an eerie ease. This mysterious vessel was always enveloped in a sort of “distortion” that made it difficult to discern its finer details. However, the Sea Song’s captain instantly recognized the distinct features of this imposing ship—

“It’s the Vanished!” the captain cried out, her voice laced with astonishment, “How did it get here!?”

“That ship has appeared!”

“The Vanished!?”

“Wasn’t it last seen at Wind Harbor?!”

“It’s drawing near!”

These exclamations filled the bridge, creating a cacophony of shock and disbelief. Swiftly, the first mate approached the captain, urgency in his step: “Captain, that ship is closing in on us.”

“…Signal them with the light, ask what they want,” the captain quickly decided, then commanded, “Everyone, to your battle stations. Increase pressure in the church boiler. Remember, we are at the frontier. Do not hastily trust what you see; it may not be the Vanished as we know it.”

Without hesitation, the first mate relayed the orders, and soon, the Sea Song began flashing a series of light signals from its side. These rhythmic pulses of light cut through the dense fog, sending a silent, urgent message across the enigmatic border sea.

All eyes on the bridge were fixed on the shadowy figure of the approaching ship through the fog, which seemed to become even more indistinct and spectral as it neared, resembling a mirage. Suddenly, the captain spotted a bright light flashing near the bow of the Vanished—shining through the mist in a repeating pattern.

Could it be? Had the phantom ship actually acknowledged their signal and was now communicating with them?

The flickering light captured the attention of many on the bridge. The captain scrutinized the signal, her brow furrowed in concentration.

Moments later, the first mate rushed to her side: “Captain, the Vanished has signaled a salute to us… that’s all.”

Confusion momentarily marred the captain’s stoic face, but another development quickly overshadowed this. Out of the corner of her eye, she noticed the shadowy figure of the large ship starting to accelerate away through the fog.

The Vanished unfurled its ghostly sails and silently picked up speed, swiftly surpassing the Sea Song and venturing into the more obscure parts of the sea. Its massive form soon vanished, swallowed by the ever-changing mist.

“That direction is…” the first mate began, a realization dawning on him. He whispered in awe, “Captain, the Vanished is heading towards ‘Him’!”

The captain, however, offered no reply. She remained silent, her gaze fixed on the horizon. It was as if, in the moment the Vanished disappeared, she glimpsed a distant destiny through the fog.

Suddenly, a soft, deep voice resonated in her ears—

“Little fish… you’ve all done well, now it’s time to rest, don’t be afraid… every weary soul has a destination. If you can’t return, this will be your new haven…”

A profound sense of peace enveloped her, touching the very core of her being. With a slight tremor of resolve, the captain gently closed her eyes and murmured, “…Please bear witness…”

When her eyes snapped open again, they shimmered with an unfathomable depth, reflecting a storm within: “…Bear witness to my return journey. My mission is far from complete.”

Fragments of forgotten memories abruptly flooded back into the captain’s consciousness, reigniting the tale of her journey through the disjointed streams of time. She recalled the arduous passage after crossing the boundary, the myriad challenges and shadows she faced, the obscured sea lying at the fog's end, an ancient island frozen in a moment of time, the colossal temple, the final resting place of titanic creatures, and the deceased deities within the temple—and her homeland, shrouded in perpetual nightfall.

"…You must traverse that boundary… cross the critical threshold of the six miles… They are reaching out to the mortal realm, go seek Them… convey our regards, and return with Their message…"

The counsel given under Queen Helena's crown still resonated within her, though it now seemed like millennia had passed, leaving behind nothing more than a faint memory.

The captain shook her head, her steps leading her toward the helm. Unbeknownst to her, the uniform she once wore with pride had degraded into worn, ragged cloth, and the once orderly and glowing bridge had decayed into a crumbling wreck, worn down by the relentless sea breeze and the passage of time. All illumination had faded, the pervasive fog creeping through shattered windows and blanketing the bridge.

The vessel appeared deserted, devoid of any crew members, as if they had long since departed—remaining forever in the Lord's domain, in that everlasting sanctuary of peace.

As the captain navigated through the desolation, her footing unsteady on the ship that seemed lost to centuries, she caught sight of a figure trembling near the helm.

Likewise, the figure slowly turned to face her.

He appeared desiccated and grotesque as if the sea wind had mummified him over a century, his features contracted and distorted into a visage of horror.

This was no more than a grotesque mummy—but then, the captain realized with a jolt that it was her first mate.

The mummy spoke, its voice grating like coarse stone on stone: “Captain, welcome back to the ship. It seems your retirement is yet to come.”

“…You remained as well.” The captain responded, her voice now just as raspy and chilling as the figure before her.

“Yes, my tasks remain incomplete,” the first mate murmured, “The others have found their rest, but I was haunted by a dream. In it, a ghost ship ablaze with green fire emerged, and you beckoned me to signal it… alas, that signal roused me from sleep. I despise that ship—the Vanished, for it shattered the tranquility bestowed by God… those cursed green flames ensure I’ll never find peace again.”

The captain barely registered the first mate’s bitter recounting—though she noted his drastic changes, her weary mind struggled to focus on these minor details. She simply made her way to the helm, observing the first mate’s efforts there: “Can this ship still embark on a voyage?”

“No,” the first mate replied, turning his head to reveal a ghastly grin, “The steam core ceased to function ages ago, and the hull beneath us has decayed into nothing more than rubble. We’re utterly devoid of any power.”

“…Then what exactly are you attempting to do?”

“I’m trying to make this ship move again, captain,” the first mate explained with deliberate slowness, “If you grasp the steering wheel and will it like a ship… it will begin to move. Believe me, Captain. Eventually, we’ll navigate through this perpetual fog and return to the blasted expanse of the Boundless Sea…”

The captain took a seat, absorbing the first mate’s words. After a considerable silence, she murmured, almost as though she was engaging in a private conversation with herself: “Then I must also find myself a task.”

“I would advise you to leave behind some form of documentation,” the first mate suggested, “Once we cross that boundary again, it’s uncertain what transformations might occur. The changes could be profound; you might no longer be yourself, and I may evolve further beyond my current state. It’s possible we’ll forget our identities and our actions. Only sacred scripture has the power to offer lasting insight…”

Sacred scriptures…

The captain’s eyelids fluttered slowly, her mind briefly sharpening. With a moment’s pause for consideration, she extended her hand to retrieve something from the pocket of her frayed coat.

What she found was her logbook—a possession of every captain who sailed the sea.

Time had also left its mark on the logbook, yet the paper, sanctified by divine blessing, had resisted the ravages of time and decay; its inscriptions remained legible.

She bowed her head, drawing a pencil from another pocket, and began to inscribe a new entry on its pages—

“I am Captain Caraline of the Sea Song. Herein lies the record of my voyage home…”

“We encountered ‘Him’—approximately fifty years after we crossed the critical threshold beyond the six-mile marker.”

Chapter 757: Misaligned Reflection

Suddenly, the quiet atmosphere above Pland was shattered by a deep, ominous rumble of thunder—mere moments later, the skies opened up, unleashing a heavy, torrential downpour that swathed the small city-state, nestled in the southwest sea region in a dense, misty veil.

The fleeting “light burst,” which had streaked across the heavens only to disappear over the distant horizon of the sea, had left the citizens of Pland in a state of anxious speculation. They were left wondering about the final resting place of those massive, glowing objects that had plummeted from the heavens. This abrupt deluge of rain added an additional layer of foreboding to the atmosphere, transforming the already dark night into an even more impenetrable blanket of darkness. The wind howled mournfully through the streets, and the relentless patter of rain against the windows piled up layer upon layer, stirring feelings of annoyance and unease.

Lawrence made his way through the hotel lobby, observing numerous guests who, stranded by the storm, had congregated near the windows. They engaged in subdued conversations about the mysterious flashes in the sky, the relentless downpour, and the recent departure of a guardian patrol team. Not too far away, the comforting crackle of a warm fireplace filled the space, and the bright glow of electric lights waged a silent battle against the encroaching darkness of the night outside. In this unsettling, rainy backdrop, the flames and light served as beacons of hope, bolstering the ever-weakening sense of security within the hearts of those present.

“It’s just ordinary rain…” A soft reassurance came from the small mirror pinned to Lawrence’s chest as Martha whispered to him, “I’ve checked with the spirit world; there’s nothing to worry about.”

Acknowledging her words with a slight nod, Lawrence peered out the window. The rain smeared the views of the street into a blurry tapestry, with water streaming down the glass, casting distorted patterns of light and shadow. Martha’s reflection briefly appeared on the window, offering him a reassuring smile.

“I’ve just visited the White Oak through the mirror; all is well aboard the ship. There’s no need for concern.”

“Thank you,” Lawrence responded in a hushed tone, barely audible to anyone but himself, “Please be cautious when venturing into the spirit world; our realm has grown perilous.”

“I’m aware,” Martha acknowledged before adding, “Also, I noticed several ships hastily departing from the military port, disappearing into the night heading northeast. Among them were two engineering vessels, equipped with large winches and towing arms.”

“They must be on a mission to recover the ‘fallen object’; it appears a celestial body landed near Pland,” Lawrence quickly deduced, expressing a hopeful sentiment, “…Let’s hope for a smooth operation.”

With a gentle nod, Martha’s image slowly faded from the window pane, leaving Lawrence once again enveloped by the misty curtain of rain and the flowing water.

After a moment of contemplation, the old captain turned away from the window and made his way back through the hotel’s corridors and stairways, heading towards his temporary accommodations on an upper floor. He retrieved the key to his room, its paint showing signs of wear, and prepared to enter.

However, upon opening the door, Lawrence abruptly halted in his tracks.

In the dead of night, a gaunt, skeletal figure was perched awkwardly on a chair within the confines of the room. The faint glow from a street lamp outside cast its light upon this unanticipated visitor. Upon hearing the sound of the door creaking open, the figure slowly craned his head, unveiling a face as desiccated as a skeleton's, adorned with a macabre grin: "Ah… Captain, you've returned."

The pungent aroma of alcohol immediately assaulted Lawrence's senses.

Raising his hand, Lawrence flicked on the room's light switch, the sudden burst of illumination banishing the shadows and rendering the grotesque figure somewhat less ominous and fearsome. He eyed the intruder with a mix of irritation and concern, asking sternly, "Sailor? Why are you here rather than in your own quarters?"

"Captain…" The Sailor's response came as his head tilted, nearly severing from the neck, hanging grotesquely. Clutching a large bottle of alcohol, he took generous swigs, with the liquid then cascading through the crevices in his chest and neck, pooling onto the floor below. "I found this in my room. I didn't take… hic! Didn't take yours, I'm aware of the rules. Taking from the captain earns one a hanging from the mast…"

Lawrence's initial reaction was one of anger towards Sailor's state, but a feeling of unease quickly took its place. He stepped closer to the corpse-like figure, eyeing the bottle: "What entity has taken hold of you this time?"

As he spoke, Lawrence raised his arm, and a slender thread of ghostly spirit flame danced to life at his fingertips.

Contrary to expectations, Sailor, who would typically react with vigor at the sight of Duncan's ghost fire, showed no sign of alarm. Instead, he merely placed the bottle on the table and looked blankly at the flickering flame, taking several moments before finally lifting his gaze to meet Lawrence's: "Captain, I'm alright, just… recalling some memories."

Lawrence's expression grew more concerned, his gaze fixed on Sailor as he slowly articulated, "…Recalling memories?"

"I once, it appears, truly existed as a human," the corpse made an effort to sit up straighter, an attempt to correct his slouched posture, though he struggled and ultimately failed to do so. "We ventured to a place far beyond, and then… it took an eternity to return to this cursed Boundless Sea…"

…

Frem was abruptly roused from his meditative trance, his peace shattered by a vivid, fiery vision that sent a sharp pang through his head. This towering figure, a member of the forest folk, snapped open his eyes to find himself still in the prayer room, kneeling before the fervently burning fire pit.

The remnants of his vision seemed to flicker within the leaping flames, slowly dissipating as moments passed.

With a growing sense of unease, the Pope's gaze lingered on the fire, his brow furrowing in concentration. Then, as if struck by a sudden realization, he abruptly rose and made his way to the door.

His unexpected emergence took the priests stationed outside the prayer room by surprise. One priest, adorned in a robe of black and red, quickly stepped forward, concern evident in his voice: "What's wrong?"

"I'm heading to the archive," Frem responded curtly, not pausing in his stride. "There's no need for anyone to accompany me. Ensure the fire of the Chronicle Pillar remains guarded.”

The priests shared a look of confusion among themselves.

But Frem was already advancing down the corridor, leaving the sacred confines of the prayer room behind. His form then seamlessly transformed into a stream of fiery light, weaving through the sanctuary’s myriad of candlesticks, fire pits, and bonfires. In what seemed like an instant, he traversed the entirety of the Ark’s upper reaches, arriving at the heart of the Flame Bearers Ark, beneath the “Great Bonfire,” and into the archive guarded by a massive stone dome. This repository held an immense collection of historical documents, scrolls, and precious stone tablets.

The archive was a well-lit expanse, its heavy, wall-like shelving units arrayed in neat rows within the vast hall. Unlike ordinary bookshelves, these shelves were built on long tracks equipped with hidden traction mechanisms powered by steam engines, enabling them to move between the internal library and the external reading area as needed.

However, Frem’s destination lay beyond these massive shelves, in the “Secret Chamber” nestled deeper within the archive. He bypassed the shelves and tracks, approaching a solid stone wall at the hall’s end, where two knights clad in heavy armor and wielding flame-shaped swords stood guard.

“The Secret Chamber is locked,” one knight declared, his voice muffled by the helm yet unwavering even in the Pope’s presence, diligently adhering to his duty. “May I ask the reason for your visit?”

“I need to consult the stone tablets left by the predecessors,” Frem stated with a gravity that matched his role, “I suspect we are facing an event of historical timeline penetration.”

The knights’ armor clinked softly as they shifted.

“…Time range?” inquired the second knight.

“New City-State Era 1600 to 1755,” Frem specified.

The knights exchanged knowing looks, each taking a synchronized half step to the side while simultaneously raising their flame-shaped swords. They positioned the tips of their swords above designated slots on the ground in front of the stone barrier, one knight casting a cautious glance towards Frem: “Please confirm the current date.”

“New City-State Era 1902, 22nd of the first month.”

As the swords were inserted into the ground slots, the sound of gears and mechanisms echoed through the chamber, and the stone wall began to slowly withdraw, revealing the path forward.

“Confirmed, New City-State Era 1902, 22nd of the first month,” the knights of the Flame Bearers announced with a formal solemnity, “Please ensure your return before today’s end. May your path be safeguarded.”

…

“We have lost communication with the Sea Song,” reported a middle-aged man, his attire signifying his role as a priest of the storm. He stood before Helena, his voice laden with both concern and regret, “After it surpassed the critical distance of six miles, it managed only sporadic contact with the temporary lighthouse for about an hour before silence ensued.”

He hesitated for a moment before continuing: “Following the failure of psychic attempts at communication, we ventured to activate the radio, yet still, no signals were received from the Sea Song.”

Helena remained silent for a moment, absorbing the news, then gave a slow nod of acknowledgment.

“You may leave.”

“Yes, Pope.”

With a respectful bow, the priest exited the room, leaving behind a palpable stillness.

Time passed quietly until Helena stood up, her movements deliberate as she approached the statue of the Storm Goddess Gomona. She offered a sea breath wood amulet to the flames at the feet of the statue, then lifted her gaze towards the deity, shrouded in a sheer shawl.

Beneath the veil, the goddess’s visage remained hidden, as mysterious and unfathomable as the ocean’s depths and the threads of fate.

“…The emissaries we dispatched in search of your domain, have they arrived safely within your realm? Or… have they vanished into the vast, unknown void beyond our world?”

The statue offered no response, and not even the semblance of wave sounds filled the silence.

After what felt like an eternity, Helena exhaled softly, her attention shifting back from the enigmatic statue to the fire pit before her.

“Lune, the vanguard fleet of the Storm Church that we dispatched beyond our borders has ceased to communicate,” she spoke softly into the flames, “Will you still proceed with our plans?”

“Proceed,” came Lune’s voice, emerging from within the fire, “‘Mathematical Law’ is ready and will set sail for the southern boundary in twenty-four hours. We’ve detected a stronger signal in that direction, potentially more promising than the Sea Song.”

As Helena absorbed this information, mulling over her thoughts, her contemplation was suddenly interrupted by an unexpected crackling from the fire pit.

Her eyes widened in surprise as Frem’s voice unexpectedly broke through the flames: “Apologies for the intrusion, but I come bearing crucial intelligence regarding the Sea Song.”

“Frem?” Helena’s voice carried a tone of surprise, followed quickly by realization, “You’re referring to the Sea Song? You’ve come with news?!”

“Yes,” the fire responded with a crackle, Frem’s voice emerging somewhat distorted from the flames, “The Sea Song has made its return.”

“It has returned?” Helena’s astonishment was palpable, her voice tinged with disbelief, “But when? How come I wasn’t informed…”

“1675, the twelf month,” Frem clarified with a calmness that contrasted the bewildering nature of his news.

Chapter 758: The Intelligence Brought by Sailor

Under the cover of darkness, the night sky was briefly lit up by dazzling lights, like pieces of the sun breaking apart, disrupting the otherwise peaceful appearance of the long night. This dramatic event unfolded when a quarter of the mystical runic ring broke apart and plummeted to the world for all to witness. In response, at least seven city-states hastily organized expeditions, launching fleets towards the Boundless Sea to retrieve the glowing fragments that had descended into its depths.

In the first two days of this extended darkness, the Boundless Sea, which had known peace for centuries by this point, teetered on the brink of war like never before.

Thankfully, the situation was defused when the massive fleet of the Truth Academy, led by their formidable flagship “Balance of All Things,” reached the central sea’s largest crash site before any other city-state. By securing the majority of these sun fragments, the Academy reaffirmed the church’s dominance and preserved the delicate peace among the city-states. The competing fleets of various city-states did not engage in battle for the fragments. Instead, they accepted the church’s proposal for distributing them, putting aside their rivalries to ensure that the cities in desperate need of sunlight received the precious fragments.

However, during those tense four hours, an unsettling undercurrent of discord began to silently spread among the numerous city-states surrounding the Boundless Sea, highlighting the impending struggle over sunlight, now a critical and dwindling resource for survival.

Yet, for Duncan, who remains in Wind Harbor, these events are still distant concerns because he had received unexpected news from Captain Lawrence of the White Oak in regards to Anomaly 077 – Sailor.

Inside the witch's mansion, Lawrence's image materialized in an oval mirror on the wall of the first floor, his voice emanating from it: "…He claimed to have been the first mate aboard the Sea Song, stating they crossed a critical boundary six miles beyond the border on the 21st of the first month, 1902…"

Hearing this, Duncan, who stood by the mirror, showed a puzzled expression: "But today is only the 22nd of the first month of 1902. Are you suggesting… Anomaly 077 was still actively serving as a priest for the Storm Church on a mission across the border just yesterday?!"

Lawrence responded with a grave tone, indicating the seriousness of his claim, "That's exactly what he told me. He mentioned his captain was named Caraline, and he vividly recalled the moment their ship embarked on its journey. He acknowledges it's been only two days since the Sea Song ventured past the border's six miles limit, yet he insisted Captain Caraline and her crew have been adrift for fifty years after crossing that line…"

Duncan remained silent, absorbing the shocking information, while Lucretia, who had overheard the conversation, could only express her astonishment with a gasp: "Fifty years?!"

"Perhaps… even more than that, madam," Lawrence replied, his expression turning serious as he cautiously elaborated. "According to what Sailor has shared, for the initial fifty years, they managed to keep a count of the days using their clear-minded rationality. However, after that period, they completely lost any sense of time. They found themselves adrift in a perpetual fog, existing in a state that wasn't truly alive but not dead either, reminiscent of those psychiatrists who tragically stumble into 'void faults' at the fringes of dreams while treating patients. Similarly, the Sea Song encountered such a fault at the very edge of our world, and as a result…"

Lawrence momentarily halted, his attention seemingly caught by a sound in his vicinity. Then, a raspy, barely distinguishable voice emerged from the mirror's edge, belonging to Sailor, his voice rough with age: "And so we were 'forgotten,' Captain, ahaha… Forgotten by death, forgotten by the sea, and ultimately, even time and reason ceased to acknowledge us. This led to our becoming undying, eternal wanderers at the edge of the world… But then… hic, by the divine intervention of the goddess, we were once again remembered by Her… And thus, we found our way back to the rightful path… hic!"

Duncan, his forehead creased in thought, quickly seized upon Sailor's words and inquired, "The rightful path you're referring to is…"

"We found Her! A great…" Sailor began to exclaim, his voice growing louder, but he suddenly stopped as though his words were physically stifled. Following a series of indistinct mutterings, he resumed, "I can no longer recall Her appearance, but we truly found… found the source of the call. That was our mission. The Pope had dispatched us in search of Her after She had sent a revelation to Her Grace…"

"Most of us remained behind there; they had no desire to return, to confront a world they deemed already forsaken. The endless drift through the fog had worn away all their once-grand aspirations and steadfast beliefs, and we came across… what was it again? My memory fails me, Captain. I cannot recall it clearly… All I remember is that Captain Caraline and I made it back from the fog. In truth, it was only me. By that point, Captain Caraline had become nothing but a withered shadow, having lost even the memory of her own image, forcing me to assume command of the vessel…"

Sailor’s voice trailed off into a series of unintelligible murmurs, indicative of a mind struggling with clarity. The fleeting memories that had surfaced seemed to whirl around in his deteriorated mind like scattered pieces of a puzzle, leaving him alternately coherent and bewildered.

Duncan, choosing to overlook Sailor’s rambling, reflected briefly before stating, “But now you are known as Anomaly 077—a peculiar entity that was sealed by the city-states many years back. You’ve been manifesting in this realm for centuries, with your first known appearance being aboard an exploration vessel that vanished three years prior.”

Sailor lapsed into silence, not uttering a word for a considerable stretch of time. It was an interval whose length remained undetermined until Lawrence unexpectedly shattered the quiet: “He’s at a loss, he can’t recall how he found his way back to our world, nor the fate of the Sea Song, nor the reasons for his current form, one that conjures storms as an ‘anomaly.’ He observes that the world as it stands now is discordant with the one preserved in his memories, yet he finds himself unable to articulate the specifics of this difference to me.”

Duncan took a moment to absorb this, then exhaled softly.

“I understand. Ensure Anomaly 077 is well looked after first. I’ll get in touch if need be.”

“Understood, Captain.”

As their conversation concluded, the glow within the mirror dimmed, reverting it to a mere reflective surface.

Lawrence’s attention then shifted from the now inert mirror to Anomaly 077, who was seated in the corner of the room, clutching an empty bottle with a vacant expression, its movements repetitive and futile as it tipped the bottle towards its mouth as if expecting an elusive sip.

“Alcohol really has no effect on you,” Lawrence remarked, a note of frustration in his voice as he stood and approached. “You can’t get drunk to alcohol, nor can you be poisoned, and not even a bullet from a gun can harm you. After all, you’ve tested all those methods already.”

The figure halted its pointless motion with the bottle, casting it aside, and after a brief pause, raised its gaze to meet Lawrence’s, its expression listless. “What about a twelve-pound cannon…” it muttered after a delay, its voice carrying a tone of desolation.

“If you’re still around when the end comes, I suppose you could give it a try. Maybe even the sixty-four-pounder at the dock would interest you,” Lawrence said, settling beside the mummy with a hint of humor.

“But considering the world’s end is nigh, such endeavors might be futile. We’re all bound for rest, though your journey has been… unusually circuitous.”

Sailor turned to face Lawrence, his gaze empty.

His eyes, dried and withered, shifted slightly, the brief illusion of inebriation induced by self-delusion fading swiftly. After a moment of vacant staring, the restless entity slowly bowed its head, cradling it within the caverns of his skeletal hands.

“I’ve misplaced the log…” He whispered, his voice a blend of confusion and despair.

“What did you say?”

“The log, Captain Caraline’s diary. She penned much before she disappeared, entrusting me with its return. That was our mission…” The figure’s voice trailed off, its tone verging on the tearful, yet it seemed to have lost the capacity for such distinctly human expressions of grief, “It’s lost, the captain’s diary is lost… I had it with me when the Sea Song ventured back; it was in my possession, but now its whereabouts elude me… Everything's altered, my memory fails me…"

Lawrence absorbed the somber admission from Sailor, his reaction one of silent astonishment, while Martha's silhouette materialized quietly in the mirror beside him. They both remained motionless, their attention fixed on the mummy. The only sound in the room was the figure's subdued, low-toned mutterings, reminiscent of a being that had long forgotten the art of weeping, now struggling to rediscover how to express sorrow.

…

Turning to face his companions, Duncan realized that a crowd had quietly assembled behind him. Their gazes were divided between him and the now inert mirror that had captured their colleague's reflection.

"…So, that mummy actually has such a remarkable backstory?" Shirley murmured under her breath, a hint of astonishment in her voice.

Deep in thought, Vanna reflected aloud, "The Sea Song, crossing the critical six-mile threshold just a day ago… I recall Her Highness Helena discussing this issue. She mentioned that the major religious orders had begun dispatching advance vessels to penetrate the border boundary, aiming to gather insights from beyond our known world."

"But how does the first mate of a church ship turn into Anomaly 077? They only went into the fog a day ago." Nina expressed her confusion, "And then there's the matter of that 'half-century'…"

"Perhaps… it's an indication that the very notion of 'time' is starting to unravel," Duncan proposed quietly, "Or maybe, this anomaly is intrinsic to the outer sea regions beyond the borders. The Sea Song's crew might have paid the ultimate price to uncover this first property of the boundary."

Upon hearing Duncan’s speculation, Morris’s brow creased in contemplation as if a sudden insight had struck him.

However, before the seasoned scholar could articulate his thoughts, an unexpected knock at the door from the entrance cut through the room, halting his train of thought.

They had a visitor.

Chapter 759: Piercing Through History

As the door swung open, Lucretia was greeted by two figures she recognized but hadn't anticipated seeing at her doorstep. Helena, adorned in a flowing dress the color of the ocean, stood beside Frem, a towering orc whose skin bore the rough texture of stone.

In the distance, the glow of headlights cut through the darkness, belonging to a pair of nondescript steam-powered vehicles stationed near an intersection. A handful of church guardians, motionless as if they were sculptures, kept watch by the cars, blending into the night.

Lucretia's expression soured at the sight of her unexpected visitors. "What's with everyone's sudden fondness for dropping by unannounced?" she asked with a mix of annoyance and curiosity.

"We apologize for the intrusion, Lucretia," Helena began, her tone dismissive of the clear displeasure on Lucretia's face. Without hesitation, she proceeded into the house, her presence commanding yet uninvited. "We need to discuss something of grave importance," she continued, hinting at the secretive nature of their visit, eager to avoid drawing any unwanted attention to their presence.

Before Ms. Lucretia could even think of a response, Helena, the esteemed leader of the Storm Church, had already made her way past the threshold, with Frem trailing behind. He offered a clumsy apology to Lucretia, "My apologies, Ms. Lucretia. Helena has a way of taking matters into her own hands. We've come because we've stumbled upon something supernatural. It's something that might catch the Captain's interest…"

Lucretia, finding herself unable to halt their advance, could only respond with a sharp retort, "This is my home, you know!" But her protest fell on deaf ears.

Despite her usual aversion to unexpected company, Lucretia found herself powerless to turn away the determined duo. The pair, both high-ranking officials within the church, had effortlessly made their way into her sanctuary. By the time she fully grasped the situation, Helena and Frem had firmly established themselves within her home.

Inside, Duncan, already alerted by the commotion at the entrance, looked up to find Helena and Frem making their entrance. Helena was a familiar face, having visited previously with Lune, but Frem's presence was a novel sight within the city-state, piquing Duncan's interest. "Is it common for popes to roam about so freely? Especially during times like these?" he asked, his tone laced with a light-hearted jest.

Unfazed by Duncan's playful ribbing, Helena seated herself opposite him with a seriousness that belied the gravity of their visit. "We come bearing a message from the divine. News from beyond the threshold of the borders."

Duncan's initial amusement faded, replaced by a sudden intensity as he pieced together the implications of her words. Even Lucretia, approaching with a look of impatience, paused, her expression turning to one of deep thought, recognizing the significance of the information Helena hinted at.

The room fell into a tense silence until Vanna, standing beside the sofa, ventured a guess, "The Sea Song?" Her words cut through the quiet, drawing everyone's attention.

Momentarily caught off guard, Helena adjusted her posture, acknowledging Vanna's insight. "You…" she began, her voice trailing off as she prepared to delve into the heart of their sudden visit.

Duncan initiated the conversation with a sense of purpose, "Had you not come today, I would have sought you out myself," he said, pacing his words thoughtfully. "I've recently come across some information regarding the Sea Song as well. It appears our meeting today is more than mere chance. However, I'm eager to learn what you've uncovered first. What became of that ship?"

Frem and Helena exchanged a meaningful glance before Frem, with a somber expression, took the lead. "The Sea Song made its way back in the year 1675," he announced, his voice heavy with the weight of history.

A hush fell over the room, a silence that was abruptly shattered by Shirley's incredulous outburst, "What? Three hundred and twenty years ago?!"

After a moment of mental calculation, the room sank into an even deeper silence, during which Alice corrected Shirley with a gentle nudge, "Actually, it would be two hundred and twenty years ago…"

Shirley, momentarily taken aback, recalibrated her reaction, "What? Two hundred and twenty years ago?!"

Unaccustomed to such interjections in their discussions, the popes remained silent, unsure of how to respond.

Duncan, familiar with Shirley's occasional lapses in arithmetic, swiftly redirected the conversation back to the matter at hand, "So, the Sea Song returned in 1675? How were you able to verify this?"

Frem responded with a grave tone, "We discovered a disruption in the usual flow of history—a gap, so to speak. I detected this anomaly and then uncovered corresponding evidence within the stone tablets left by past Flame Bearers…”

He paused, collecting his thoughts before elaborating, “In December 1675, a ship appeared on the eastern frontier. It was in such a state of decay that it seemed almost ghostly and disintegrated into the sea soon after its appearance. The only detail that could be verified before it sank was its name, ‘Sea Song’, etched on its hull.”

“This incident is documented in the Flame Bearers Cathedral archives. Yet, strangely, there is no other record or mention of it in any historical documents or files from that year. It’s as if this event was a shadow, slipping through a crack in history into our reality, observed and remembered solely by the Flame Bearers of that era. In essence, only the bishop’s account from that time has left any ‘mark’ on history.”

Morris, puzzled by the discussion, interjected, “Why would something like this occur? Is it a case of historical contamination? Or perhaps alteration…”

Frem shook his head slowly, “It’s an instance of temporal discontinuity that led to this historical anomaly. The Sea Song must have been displaced from its intended timeline by some mishap, wandering in a 34567 temporal void before finally reentering our world at the ‘1675’ time node…”

After a brief pause for reflection, he further elucidated, “Imagine a tire rolling along, carrying countless specks of dust within it. If one of those specks were to detach from the tire’s inner wall and begin to drift freely, it could reattach itself at any point on the tire’s surface.”

As Frem detailed the concept of being untethered from the traditional flow of time, wandering without chronological anchor, Duncan’s face took on a contemplative expression, his brows knitting together in thought.

Lucretia and Morris, too, seemed to grasp the gravity of Frem's words, their faces lighting up with a dawning understanding as if pieces of a complex puzzle were beginning to fall into place.

In contrast, Alice and Shirley, faced with a theory that ventured far beyond the realm of common understanding, remained visibly unaffected, their clarity of thought seemingly untouched by the intricate discussions of temporal anomalies…

Lucretia, breaking the momentary silence with a soft voice, shared a look of mutual understanding with Duncan, "So, that explains the experiences of Sailor," she mused aloud.

"Sailor?" Helena echoed, her curiosity piqued, evident confusion on her face, "Who's this Sailor you are referring to?"

"The first mate of the Sea Song. He still walks this world, though he is much altered from the man he once was," Duncan revealed, choosing not to withhold the insights gained from Lawrence, and proceeded to share all that he knew over the next few minutes.

Helena and Frem exchanged a glance, absorbing the new information.

After a brief pause, filled with contemplation, Helena spoke up decisively, "I need to meet this Sailor."

"He's currently located near the small city-state of 'Pland', on the southwestern frontier, in the company of another group of my associates," Duncan responded, his tone accommodating. "I can arrange for his return here at any moment, but I prefer to seek his consent first."

Helena seemed momentarily puzzled by this approach, "Seek… his consent?"

Duncan explained, his voice laced with seriousness, "His experiences are beyond what most can fathom, and it's possible that the Sea Song's odyssey beyond the confines of our known world has closed a ‘historical loop’, causing his memories to resurface almost instantaneously. He may no longer be the person you remember as the first mate of the Sea Song, and he might not wish to engage with anyone from the Storm Church again…”

Helena’s expression softened, a mix of understanding and surprise evident, “It’s somewhat unexpected to hear of your consideration and respect for the feelings of your followers in such matters…”

Duncan’s response was marked by a slight twitch of his mouth, a hint of bemusement in his voice, “And what, exactly, is the image you hold of me?”

Helena quickly tried to correct any misconceptions, “A reliable captain, a respected explorer… We’ve had our misunderstandings, but…”

“Accompanied by an ever-present entourage of shadows from other dimensions, rumored to concoct brews from children and stray dogs from around the world…” Frem chimed in nonchalantly.

Helena: “…”

“That wasn’t my claim,” Frem clarified, looking towards Helena with a stoic expression, “That was a discussion between you and Banster.”

Helena, slightly agitated, retorted, “That was a gross exaggeration! And it was last year! Why bring that up now?”

Unfazed, Frem simply turned his gaze back to Duncan, maintaining his composed demeanor, “They indeed said that.”

A heavy silence fell, broken only by Duncan’s sigh as he turned aside awkwardly.

Lucretia, who had been quietly standing by, now visibly struggled to contain her emotions, her face a portrait of restrained indignation. Her silence served as a final gesture of respect towards her father.

Finally, after a moment's pause, Duncan resignedly concluded, "…I'll get in touch with Lawrence."

…

"That's the current situation," Lawrence began, positioning himself directly opposite Anomaly 077. His tone was grave, underscoring the seriousness of the matter at hand. "Captain Duncan is eager for a meeting, and the Pope from the Storm Church is also awaiting your decision. Should you choose to, we can set off without delay. The captain has granted me the privilege of utilizing his flame to call forth a portal. Through Ai's capabilities, you could be transported to Wind Harbor almost instantaneously."

By this point, Anomaly 077 had managed to navigate the initial wave of shock and the bewildering flood of memories that had recently returned to him. He had found a semblance of his old self, though now he was grappling with a new wave of anxiety.

"I… am at a loss," he confessed, his voice laced with the tumult of his inner turmoil, making no attempt to mask his feelings from Lawrence. "My memories are a jumbled mess. The days leading up to the Sea Song's departure are particularly hazy. I recognize my role as the first mate of the Sea Song, yet it feels as though I'm looking at a stranger when I ponder this identity… and, perhaps more distressingly, I've misplaced that journal…"

Lawrence paused momentarily, his next words measured, "If it's Captain Caraline's journal that's weighing on your mind…" He trailed off, then continued with deliberate slowness, "It's possible that it hasn't been lost after all."

Sailor's attention snapped up, a flicker of hope crossing his features, "Ah?"

“You’ve mentioned remembering placing her journal by your side just before Captain Caraline vanished, and that you’ve kept it close ever since. The truth is, it has always been near you,” Lawrence explained, locking eyes with Sailor, emphasizing each word with deep sincerity, “Can you recall what has always accompanied you?”

In that moment, Sailor seemed to be piecing together a puzzle, realization dawning upon him slowly.

“It’s the faint traces we discovered on your shroud,” Lawrence revealed, adding another layer to the unfolding mystery.

Chapter 760: Reunion After a Long Separation

The ancient and worn fabric, now resembling more a relic than anything else, bore only fragments of words such as “Caraline,” “border,” and “Leviathan” – their shapes barely discernible. Making out even these few words was a feat, requiring keen observation and the ability to make connections where none seemed to exist.

Anomaly 077 gazed at the fabric laid before him, a piece that had been transferred from the storeroom of the White Oak upon the captain’s command. Since his transformation and induction into the crew of the White Oak, this fabric had been stored away, out of sight in the ship’s containment room.

“It’s been ages since I’ve taken a good look at this… Actually, I don’t think I’ve ever truly seen it for what it is,” Anomaly 077 whispered, his aged fingers gently tracing what seemed like mere stains but were in fact the remnants of faded writings, “I never knew these texts were here…”

“That’s understandable. Unless you’re actively searching for something, it’s easy to overlook these kinds of details, dismissing them as insignificant smudges,” Lawrence replied, his tone nonchalant, “Had Martha not been so observant and considered this angle, we might never have linked these smudges on the fabric to Captain Caraline’s diary. Especially now, when so little of it is left… The elements have claimed nearly all its substance.”

“Yes, there’s hardly anything left…” Sailor responded, his voice filled with a sense of loss, “It’s hard to believe this was once the captain’s detailed log. Now, what remains is barely coherent… It was meant to be a comprehensive record, not this… ‘fabric’…”

“This transformation likely relates to your journey back from the realm beyond the border to the Boundless Sea. Crossing that six-mile threshold seems to irrevocably alter the essence of certain objects,” Lawrence speculated, “It turned you into Anomaly 077 and transformed Captain Caraline’s detailed log into this piece of fabric—but regardless, these fragments are vital clues, and ‘he’ needs them.”

Sailor stood silently next to the fabric, engulfed in a profound stillness. An inner turmoil seemed to grip him; after a lengthy pause, he gave a slow nod.

“Alright, lead me to him. ‘He’ has been waiting for too long.”

Lawrence let out a quiet sigh, stepping back slightly. Almost immediately, a ghostly green flame flickered into existence where he had just stood. The heart of the flame then twisted and contracted before expanding and pulsing, and from this fiery maelstrom emerged a skeletal bird, its visage striking terror!

The appearance of the skeletal bird and the swirling portal of flame immediately caused Sailor to take a half step back, his gaze shifting from the rotating flames to the creature circling near the ceiling before he turned to Lawrence with a look of disbelief, “…Is this thing really safe?”

“Are you having second thoughts now?” Lawrence’s eyes widened in surprise, his tone incredulous, “You’re not seriously reconsidering at this moment, are you? If ‘he’ has to come personally to fetch you, it won’t be nearly as gentle as this!”

Feeling the weight of Lawrence’s words, Sailor visibly tensed, a look of inner conflict crossing his face as he hesitantly moved two steps towards the flame portal, stopping mid-way with a question, “Does passing through hurt?”

Without a word, Lawrence moved closer, positioning himself just behind Sailor.

Sailor’s whole body seemed to react, shuddering as if feeling a chill he hadn’t experienced in centuries, “No, no, no, I’ll go, I’ll go in myself…”

With that declaration, he approached the swirling flames, bracing himself before tentatively reaching a hand into the vortex, only to quickly retract it, exclaiming, “Ah damn, it’s kind of hot… Captain, isn’t there another way…”

Lawrence, losing patience, gave him a nudge: “Quit your complaining!”

Sailor’s startled yelp was swiftly swallowed by the roaring flames.

“Get a move on! Get a move on!” The skeletal bird screeched, diving into the flame portal. However, in a surprising turn, it reemerged from the portal a moment later, seizing the neglected shroud with its claws before disappearing back into the flames.

Lawrence let out a weary sigh.

Just as he was about to leave, the flame portal burst open once more, and the giant bird reappeared, approaching Lawrence with an urgent, grating demand, “Get some fries, get some fries, get fries…”

Lawrence nearly jumped out of his skin at this unexpected request from the “messenger,” stumbling back to regain his composure. It dawned on him then that he had forgotten to prepare the necessary “offering” and “medium” for the summoning, his forehead beading with sweat, “I… forgot to prepare…”

The skeletal bird fixed Lawrence with a stare, its empty, flame-filled eye sockets boring into him, causing Lawrence to stiffen.

In those tense moments, Lawrence's mind raced through various notorious incidents among the Boundless Sea's captains involving summoning and sacrifices: a wizard met his end against a wall, crushed by the violent backlash for presenting an incorrect offering to a spirit from the shadow realm; a cultist was fatally struck down by an irate demon for an inadequate sacrifice; a Truth Saint, while examining an ancient artifact, inadvertently activated a spell to call forth malevolent spirits and, lacking a proper offering, was forced to eliminate the uncontrollable entity in a desperate struggle…

Uncertain how to interpret the behavior of the peculiar messenger known as "Ai" that the captain frequently mentioned, Lawrence quickly realized that confronting this entity with aggression was likely not an option. The idea of physically overpowering Ai, much less resorting to violence, seemed increasingly impractical as he contemplated the situation.

With a nervous gulp, Lawrence began to second-guess his earlier oversight. Given their allegiance to Captain Duncan, it was uncertain whether Ai, this seemingly otherworldly "messenger," would recognize the concept of camaraderie or allegiance among the crew.

His thoughts were interrupted when he noticed Ai, the skeletal bird, suddenly pull back, turn around, and head back through the portal, all the while muttering under its breath about the indignities of its position: "Slave labor, not even compensated for overtime…"

With that, Ai and the portal vanished from the room, leaving Lawrence in a state of bewildered silence.

…

Meanwhile, Duncan observed Anomaly 077 being unceremoniously ejected from the portal by Ai. He then turned his attention to a visibly agitated dove pacing on the coffee table, puzzled by its demeanor: “What seems to be the issue with this bird now?”

Alice, equally baffled, responded, “I’m not sure. She appears to be quite upset…”

“Let’s not dwell on it. Perhaps feeding her will improve its mood,” Duncan suggested nonchalantly, dismissing the matter with a wave of his hand and turning his focus back to Anomaly 077, who was struggling to regain his footing.

“It’s been a while, Sailor.”

Upon hearing Duncan’s greeting, Anomaly 077, who had been cautiously avoiding making eye contact with anyone in the room, stiffened. It was as if the direct address confirmed there was no escaping this reunion. He slowly stood up straighter, his nervous gaze scanning the room.

“Uh… Captain, it’s been a long time, and everyone else, too… I haven’t seen any of you in quite a while…”

He proceeded to greet each person in the room, reverting to the formality he once displayed in Duncan’s presence, but then he halted abruptly when he met Helena’s gaze.

Responsible for the Storm Church, Helena watched the mummified figure before her intently. She scrutinized Anomaly 077’s desiccated and ghastly form, her expression gradually shifting as she endeavored to reconcile the sight before her with her memory of the Sea Song’s loyal first mate, whom she had met personally not too long ago. Despite her efforts, she found it impossible to associate the dignified first mate with the disfigured, hunched figure of Anomaly 077.

After a moment of silence, Helena spoke, breaking the tension: “I can’t recognize you.”

“Yes, it has been over two hundred years—perhaps even longer,” Anomaly 077 responded with a grin that produced a grating sound. He took a few steps toward Helena, attempting a polite gesture, but hesitated, his hand faltering mid-air, “…I’ve forgotten how to make that gesture properly.”

Helena’s query carried a weight of formality rather than genuine curiosity, “Are you the Sea Song’s first mate?”

“Yes, as far as my scattered memories can confirm,” Sailor replied, tapping his temple as if to summon clarity from the chaos within, “What remains in my mind are fragmented pieces. I vividly recall the moment before we embarked on our journey. Captain Caraline and I were aboard the Ark, under your watchful eye, receiving your sacred blessing. You anointed our wrists with ointment… The day had not yet yielded to night.”

Helena paused momentarily, her acknowledgment tinged with a sense of temporal proximity, “…Yes, that was relatively recent.”

“To me, it feels like eons have passed,” Sailor said softly, turning his gaze towards Duncan, “I’ve shared everything I can recall. Captain Lawrence must have already briefed you on any details I’ve omitted, correct?”

Duncan offered a nod of confirmation as he approached the low table, his hand unhesitatingly grasping the filthy, shredded “cloth”—its unsightly condition notwithstanding: “Is this the shroud Lawrence referred to?”

As Duncan’s fingers made contact with the cloth, all eyes in the room shifted towards him. Sailor confirmed with a nod, “Yes, that’s the one… It bears Captain Caraline’s handwriting, though I’m at a loss as to how it ended up in this state. It’s supposed to be the Sea Song captain’s log…

Captain Caraline entrusted it to me before she disappeared. It's one of the few memories I hold with absolute clarity."

Duncan scrutinized the dilapidated fabric, its inscriptions barely discernible, his expression morphing into a frown, "…It's illegible now."

"The transition back to the Boundless Sea likely caused its current state," Sailor lamented, shaking his head in resignation, "That boundary… It acts as a barrier, preventing us from transporting secrets from beyond back to our world."

Duncan absorbed the information in silence, his contemplation casting a reflective mood over the room. The quiet was so profound that the only sound was the clock's ticking, marking the passage of time in the otherwise still atmosphere.

Breaking the silence, Duncan finally looked up, a decisive tone in his voice, "Would you object if I were to conduct some 'extreme' tests on it?"

Chapter 761: Captain Caralines Log

The moment Duncan began to speak, Sailor was struck with an immediate realization of what the captain intended to do. This insight wasn't new; ever since Lawrence had awakened him aboard the White Oak, Sailor's greatest fear had become a stark reality: the terror of being ignited into flames by Captain Duncan.

Regrettably, this fear had materialized when Sailor was struck by a colossal fireball, a deadly gift from a messenger known as "Ai."

Having endured the horror of being engulfed in ghost fire, which seemed capable of vaporizing his very soul at any moment, Sailor was understandably on edge, voicing his concern with a tremble in his voice, "…Will this directly set the shroud ablaze?"

"Theoretically, it shouldn't," Duncan replied with unwavering confidence. "I possess the ability to fine-tune my flames to reveal the hidden 'reality' beneath the facade of various mystical objects. This technique has allowed me to safely examine and discover secrets of numerous artifacts in the past…"

Before Duncan could further assure him, the conversation took a turn as Shirley, who had been listening intently, interjected with a reminder, "Except, that black leather book we retrieved from the Annihilators was reduced to ashes after you merely glanced at it…"

Not to be outdone, Nina chimed in with her own example, “And let’s not forget the golden mask from the Suntists in Pland that also succumbed to flames…”

“Atlantis too burned not long ago…” Lucretia added softly, highlighting the recent event.

Faced with these reminders, Duncan’s confident facade began to crumble, and the air filled with a palpable tension. However, Alice, who had been distractedly feeding pigeons, sensed an opportunity to lighten the mood and eagerly interjected, “But my wooden box didn’t burn!”

After a brief pause, she continued with a grave tone, “Though, it did become part of the Vanished after the captain ‘inspected’ it…”

Trying to maintain his composure, Duncan managed to address Alice with a strained smile, suggesting she could’ve omitted that last detail before turning back to Sailor. Despite the awkward exchanges, he endeavored to project an air of assurance, “…Regardless, it’s extremely safe.”

Sailor, observing the captain’s strained dignity and the mixed reactions of the crew and the two impassive popes, took a moment before reluctantly offering his trust, “I believe.”

With a palpable sense of relief, Duncan approached Sailor, placing a comforting hand on his shoulder, “Don’t worry, I recognize its value as potentially the last remnant of the Sea Song. I’ll handle it with utmost care.”

Acknowledging Duncan’s pledge, Sailor nodded, albeit still somewhat dazed by the gravity of the situation. Duncan then proceeded to a low table, where he solemnly laid out the shroud, his demeanor reflecting the seriousness of the task at hand.

Helena and Frem found their attention inexorably drawn to Duncan’s actions. After a moment of hesitation, filled with the weight of the responsibility they bore, Frem felt compelled to voice his concern, “This is the sole piece of ‘knowledge’ that has made its way back from the uncharted territories. Should there be any indication of harm, I implore you to cease immediately.”

“I understand,” Duncan responded with a gravitas that matched the significance of the moment. With the eyes of his companions fixed upon him, he carefully positioned his hand above the ancient shroud.

“…Let me have a word with it,” he whispered under his breath, a soft murmur meant only for himself.

From his fingertips, a stream of ethereal flame, resembling liquid more than fire, sparked to life and gently descended upon the shroud. With the fluidity of water, this ghost fire instantly permeated the fabric, seeping into every crease and fold as it explored the hidden secrets within.

Duncan, with his eyes gently closed, focused intently on guiding the flames as they wove through the shroud. He was deeply attuned to the fragments of information being relayed through the fire, seeking to connect with a reality that was fractured, remote, and seemingly lost to time. Though familiar to him, this process required a level of concentration and precision he had honed over many such endeavors.

In the realm of his perception, a tumultuous void unfolded, initially revealing nothing but the chaotic absence of form or structure.

However, abruptly, as if a lost era had been plucked from the annals of history and thrust into the present, a faint illumination pierced the void within this tumult.

Feeling a pull towards this light, Duncan advanced mentally, and before he could fully engage with it, a soft, indistinct voice reached him:

“I am Caraline, the captain of the Sea Song, and this message is what I’ve managed to send back from our journey…”

“We encountered ‘Her’—roughly fifty years after we crossed the critical six miles limit…”

At this revelation, Duncan’s metaphorical eyes widened in his visionary state. The light amidst the chaos began to take shape, forming the silhouette of a woman donned in the Storm Church’s naval attire. Her stature was imposing, yet her features remained obscured.

She seemed to stand alone, speaking to the ether, unaware of Duncan’s presence or observation.

“…Beyond the frontier, time is not linear. It took years of being adrift to understand that the six miles critical limit is more than a physical demarcation; it defines the limits of our world’s order…”

“In the mists, detached from the familiar flow of time, I witnessed an array of surreal visions. In the densest fog, the very edge of our world appeared to crumble and decay…”

“…There, the specters of explorers lost to the frontier, devoid of both substance and self-awareness, roamed. Caught in a tumultuous, disjointed temporal stream, they moved without purpose, like fog, coalescing and dispersing. The Sea Song encountered some of these phantoms, and through these interactions, I came to realize we were beginning to mirror their fate…”

“My crew, they began to lose their sense of self, transforming into something unrecognizable after nearly fifty years adrift. This realization came to me much later, and by that time, I was scarcely in better condition than they were…”

“…Throughout it all, the first mate remained steadfast at his post… His endurance is beyond my comprehension…”

“Then, as if by some miracle, we found ourselves once again amidst the call of the waves, drawn to a suddenly materializing sea. This sea ‘pulled’ the Sea Song towards an island. I came to my senses then, astonished that such a vast physical expanse could exist beyond the known frontiers. It was then I understood that these ‘islands’ were actually the sacred resting grounds of our deity.”

“There she was, the sovereign of storms, the essence of the deep sea, the goddess Gomona…”

“The revelations I share may astonish or unsettle many, yet they are the truth of my experiences.”

“The realm of the divine is not situated in a ‘higher’ dimensional plane, nor does it lie at the ‘foundation’ of our universe. The concept of a divine kingdom as a distinct place is a fallacy; the gods have always been amongst us… encircling the world, beyond the mists at the edge of our reality. They, and their offsprings, form part of the ‘outer barrier’.”

At this point, Caraline’s phantom paused, her narrative interrupted by a gap in her recollection. Duncan, drawn in by her account, sought to engage with the captain’s visage, questioning the nature of her revelations.

“The gods encircle the world and are integral to the outer barrier?” he inquired abruptly, “What lies beyond this barrier? What exists further out? Were you able to see it?”

The phantom of Caraline offered no reply, trapped within the confines of her recorded message. After a brief silence, she resumed her account, still echoing Captain Caraline’s words:

“…Many of us remained there.”

“The goddess of storms slumbers at the heart of those primeval islands… these ‘islands’ are in truth the carcasses of Leviathans, arrayed around the sea, cradling Her in their midst… the largest of these hosts a temple, a structure reminiscent of a tiered obelisk, crafted from an amalgam of dark green and pitch-black stones, adorned with enigmatic, convoluted markings that hint at some form of script, though none I recognize…”

“The entity at the temple’s core is beyond description, differing vastly from any preconceived notion of the goddess I held. In the moment I beheld Her form, it felt as though my consciousness was shattered and reconstituted countless times. Yet, it was a soft voice that restored us, a voice that integrated us into ‘Her’ being, shielding us from dissolution into the formless entities of the mist…”

“Then, She expressed her regret to us.”

“She confessed her inability to maintain control. She revealed that she had perished yet struggled against the encroach of death. Now, She required our assistance.”

“She tasked me with delineating a pathway, a specific course leading from the Boundless Sea directly to the outer barrier. Only through navigating the correct route within the fog that lies between the boundary of the six miles limit can travelers hope to reach ‘Them’…”

“It was essential for someone to make the journey back to bring this information.”

As Caraline’s spectral form spoke, her head bowed gently, her voice carrying a tone of solemnity.

“Exhaustion had claimed most of my crew; they opted for a final rest in the divine anchorage of the Lord… I harbor no resentment towards their choice, for it is an intrinsic aspect of ‘humanity’ to seek solace.

“In the end, it was just my first mate and I who embarked on the journey back to familiar shores. The Sea Song had been claimed by the islands, yet the goddess crafted its semblance from the mist before its complete engulfment. My first mate and I boarded this spectral ship, guided by the direction she imparted, navigating back towards home…”

“Now, the end of our voyage draws near.”

“I sense the gradual fading of my own existence, as well as that of the Sea Song… we are but phantoms conjured by the goddess amidst the fog, and the tangible world does not permit such phantasms to linger… this sensation of fading, it signifies our nearing home.”

“Yet, my first mate and I are not the same. He is no illusion birthed from the mist; he has remained vigilant throughout our journey, from our departure until this moment, manifesting tangibly within this realm, loyally executing his duties.”

“Hence, the responsibility of the route falls to him… he carries the knowledge to navigate back to our world, and equally, to return to those islands… regardless of the passage of time.”

“I am Caraline, captain of the Sea Song, and I bequeath the entirety of the Sea Song to my devoted first mate, marking this as the final entry I record as captain.”

“Goddess, please bear witness…”

Within the enveloping chaos and dense fog, the luminous figure of Caraline stilled into silence once more.

Then, as the fog lifted, Duncan found himself returning to his senses—he was back in the living room, surrounded by the familiar yet now seemingly distant reality of his own world.

Chapter 762: The Temporary Sailor

As soon as Duncan regained consciousness, everyone quickly converged around him, eager to hear what he had experienced. The eerie, soft glow of a ghostly green flame, which seemed almost alive in its gentle ripple, was still visible, nestled within the creases of the shroud surrounding him. With a slight blink, Duncan managed to quell the flame, preventing it from fully engulfing the shroud in its ethereal fire. He took a brief moment to collect his thoughts, piecing together the vision he had just witnessed before his eyes landed on the mummy.

Sailor stood at a cautious distance, yet its curiosity got the better of it as it seemed to lean forward slightly, its demeanor a mix of hesitation and intrigue.

With a blend of concern and curiosity etching her youthful face, Nina approached Duncan. “Uncle Duncan, what did you see?” she asked, her voice tinged with an earnest need for answers, gently tugging at his arm.

Opting for transparency, Duncan responded without any attempt at evasion, “…Captain Caraline’s memories,” his voice soft yet clear. “It showed me what happened after the Sea Song was lost at sea and how they managed to find their way back home…”

At the mention of these events, Sailor’s interest was visibly piqued, and it edged closer to the group, drawn in by the narrative unfolding.

Withholding no details, Duncan recounted everything revealed to him in the vision. Upon concluding his tale, all eyes instinctively turned towards Sailor, who had subtly moved to stand beside the coffee table by now.

Caught in the moment, Anomaly 077 was momentarily absorbed in the story until Duncan mentioned Captain Caraline entrusting him with the route to the outer world. This revelation caught him off-guard, causing his demeanor to shift abruptly as he took a step back, his eyes widening in disbelief. “Hey, don’t look at me, I don’t know anything about the route, what route… I’m clueless!” he protested, his hands gesturing his ignorance.

Helena, skepticism evident in her expression, pressed him, “You don’t know?” She was puzzled. “Captain Caraline said she entrusted that route to you… Do you not remember anything?”

“I don’t!” His response was a mix of confusion and a hint of panic, his arms spread wide in a gesture of complete bewilderment. “I vaguely remember something about the log… But, honestly, I can barely recall my own journey back!”

Frem, the tall and usually silent orc, studied him for a moment before posing his question, “Then what else do you remember? After returning to the Boundless Sea, do you not have any other more vivid memories?”

This prompted Sailor to think deeply until a moment of realization struck him. “Yes, I remember waking up in a box, with two individuals draped in blue and black robes sprinkling bone dust and spices over me. And there was another, as big as you, Frem, poised to seal the coffin with me inside. I resisted, and in response, he struck me with a hammer blow. The next thing I knew, it was 1864.”

The revelation hung in the air, leaving a brief silence in the room, punctuated by an awkward atmosphere. Alice, seemingly unfazed by the tension, leaned in with genuine interest, “Ah, then what happened?” Her question broke the brief lull, her curiosity undimmed.

Following Sailor’s recount of waking up to a second hammer blow in 1901, the mood in the living room shifted as everyone exchanged knowing looks. Helena let out a cough to break the tension, and with a helpless shrug, Duncan signaled a mutual desire to steer the conversation away from these unsettling tales of resurrection and hammering.

Undeterred by the awkward atmosphere, Alice’s curiosity remained piqued. She leaned in closer to Sailor, her voice tinged with genuine intrigue, “Hey, how did you know it was 1864? Weren’t you just knocked unconscious when you woke up?”

Sailor explained that he had later asked Captain Lawrence, who informed him that historical records mentioned only that one incident where he nearly lost control completely. He added, “Besides, I actually woke up several times, but those memories are a blur…”

Alice, ever so interested, inquired about his sleep quality, to which he replied, “Not bad, the chanting was never too loud. Though now, I spend half my time out of the box since the captain gave me a bed…”

Their exchange, veering into an oddly casual chat about sleeping arrangements, was abruptly interrupted by Duncan, who felt compelled to steer the conversation back to the pressing matter at hand. Clearing his throat, he interjected, “Ahem, now is not the time for this.”

With the room’s attention back on him, Sailor ceased his banter.

Duncan then addressed Anomaly 077 directly, acknowledging Sailor’s forgotten memories regarding the ‘route’ but also suggesting that what Captain Caraline recorded in her log held equal weight. “The ‘route’ might not have been something you were simply supposed to remember. Captain Caraline's words, 'entrusted the route to you,' suggest she might have passed on this information in a more tangible form, anticipating that there might come a day when mere memory wouldn't suffice."

Duncan's theory suggested that just as Captain Caraline's log had traversed boundaries in a tangible form, she might have employed a similar method to ensure the 'route' remained with Sailor unaffected by any alterations to memory or self-awareness. "This 'route' could still exist with you, in a form we've yet to comprehend," he concluded, hinting at a mystery deeply intertwined with Sailor's own being and possibly hidden within the enigmatic shroud or another form entirely, waiting to be discovered.

As Sailor absorbed Duncan's hypothesis, a flicker of acceptance crossed his face, tempered by skepticism. "…Could Captain Caraline really have implemented such a method? I always assumed her log's transformation was an unintended mishap… She was, after all, only human…"

Helena interjected with a perspective that lent the conversation a deeper significance, "But she once stood before our Lord," her voice cutting through the silence with a hint of reverence. "Any human who has looked into the face of a god… can scarcely be deemed ordinary anymore."

This assertion left Sailor speechless, contemplating the weight of Helena's words.

Seizing the moment to outline the next steps, Duncan fixed his gaze upon Anomaly 077 with renewed intensity. "We'll need time to determine how we might uncover the information that's purportedly within you," he said, his tone underscored with seriousness. "For now, you'll remain with us. And when the time comes, be ready to join the Vanished on our voyage."

The prospect of a prolonged commitment seemed to catch Sailor off guard, his initial shock palpable. "Ah? I assumed my role was merely to pass on what I knew…"

Duncan’s silent stare prompted a swift adjustment in Sailor’s demeanor, his expression hardening with resolve. “Of course, as you’re well aware, my allegiance to the Vanished Fleet is unwavering. To board that legendary vessel has always been the dream of my lifetime…”

A softening smile from Duncan eased the tension, mirrored by the others’ encouraging grins. In a gesture of camaraderie, Shirley gently patted Sailor’s skinny arm, offering words of reassurance, “Don’t fret, the captain is truly kind. And life aboard the ship is far from dull. Every day is an adventure…”

She then left unsaid her own role in contributing to the ship’s “adventures.”

The moment, though light-hearted, was not lost on Helena, whose gaze carried a mix of emotions. The memory of those warriors who had sought her blessing prior to the Sea Song’s departure, their vibrant faith now a stark contrast to the present, weighed heavily on her.

“It’s time we departed,” Helena finally declared, her voice tinged with a hint of melancholy, acknowledging the length of their visit and the duties awaiting her and Frem at the church.

Noting the mechanical clock’s late hour, Duncan acknowledged their need to leave without the customary farewell, citing his own preparations as his focus.

As Helena and Frem made to exit, Helena paused, turning back towards Duncan with a momentary hesitation. She then imparted crucial information, “The Storm Church’s border assembly point lies in the southeastern border, close to the waters where you last encountered the ‘Tide.’”

Duncan’s acknowledgment was subtle yet firm, “Understood. I’ll reach out before we embark.”

This exchange, layered with unspoken understandings and commitments, underscored the gravity of their shared cause and the uncertain journey ahead.

After the departure of the two popes, the night swallowed the sounds of their cars fading into the distance. Once abuzz with conversation and speculation, the living room settled into a brief silence. It was Shirley who broke the quiet, unable to suppress a wide yawn, signaling the night's toll on her, "Aooo… I'm sleepy, I'm going to bed!"

Following Shirley's lead, Vanna and Morris also excused themselves, leaving the room in search of rest.

Assuming her role as the hostess, Lucretia turned her attention to making the "new member" of their unusual household comfortable. She eyed the mummy with a practical gaze, inquiring about his lodging preferences, "There are plenty of empty rooms here. Do you have any preferences for the room? Floor level or ventilation?"

The mummy, taken aback by the consideration, quickly dismissed the need for any special arrangements, "No need, no need," he said, waving his hands in a dismissive gesture, his voice tinged with nervousness, "Just find me a place to stay, I don't sleep anyway…"

His attention drifted to the stair railing nearby, an idea sparking in his eyes. "Hey, this railing is nice. Just give me a rope, and I can hang here, facing the sun, perfect for sunbathing in the morning… Oh, although there hasn't been much sun recently…"

Duncan, intrigued yet skeptical, arched an eyebrow, "Are you sure? Just so you know, Nina wakes up the earliest, and that girl can be quite groggy in the morning. If she groggily comes down the stairs and looks up to see you hanging on the railing, it won't just be a simple scare—you'll really be seeing the sun."

Lucretia, overhearing this plan, was immediately flustered and insisted, “You must stay in a room!” Her tone was firm, almost motherly in her concern, “Don’t scare Nina—then I’ll have no house left.”

Nina, who had been quietly listening behind Duncan, chimed in with a small, meek voice, “Actually, I’ve got it pretty under control now…”

Observing the interplay between Captain Duncan, Miss Witch, and the “sun fragment” expressing her grievances in a softly wronged tone, Sailor sensed an atmosphere far removed from what he had anticipated.

Intrigued and perhaps a bit amused by the domestic dynamics at play, he couldn’t help but let a smile creep across his face—a smile that, despite its intent to be reassuring, carried an eerie quality.

“Alright, I’ll follow your arrangement.” His agreement, while grudging, signified his willingness to embrace the peculiarities of his new surroundings.

Chapter 763: Before the Long Voyage

Sailor had recently become a unique addition to the inhabitants of the “Witch’s Mansion,” though his presence seemed to barely ripple through the daily life within the mansion’s walls.

Unlike any ordinary person, Sailor had the peculiar ability to remain stationary for extended periods, much like a mummified corpse. He required neither sustenance nor sleep. If left unaddressed, he might spend days without uttering a single word, often found in his secluded corner, lost in thought or staring blankly into space, giving the impression he was in a perpetual state of contemplation or disconnection from his surroundings.

This unusual behavior almost led the other residents to occasionally forget the presence of an extra occupant within the mansion.

Interaction between Sailor and others was minimal, with the exception of Luni. Their exchanges were brief and functional, mainly consisting of simple requests and responses such as, “Ah, could you shift a bit to the side?” followed by a quiet “Yeah.” Once the task was completed, “Alright, you can move back now,” would be met with a nonchalant “Oh.”

As days turned into a routine, a curious incident occurred on the third day that prompted Lucretia, the mansion’s mistress, to confront Sailor. She found him in the basement storage room, sprawled amidst various items, mimicking a corpse. She expressed her bafflement, recounting tales from her father about Sailor’s once vibrant and active demeanor aboard the White Oak, questioning why he had adopted such a subdued presence in her home.

In response, Sailor, while maintaining his position among the clutter, locked eyes with Lucretia in the dim light and posed a question, “Is it bad to seek calm?” He suggested that his calmness was intentional, hinting at a preference for peace and quiet, possibly shared by Lucretia herself.

Lucretia attempted to articulate her thoughts but was swiftly interrupted by Sailor’s revelation. He explained his current state as a form of preparation, conserving energy for an upcoming, significant journey that seemed to be in the planning stages. Despite the captain’s silence on the matter, Sailor was convinced of the impending voyage and had been instructed to rest and attempt to recollect anything related to the Sea Song.

Curious, Lucretia inquired about his recollections, to which Sailor shared vague memories of life aboard the Sea Song—highlighting the disorder, the noise from the crew during the second shift, and an endless omnipresent fog. He concluded, somewhat apologetically, that despite the captain’s confidence, he had yet to remember anything specific about the ‘route’ they were to undertake.

It was a bold move to exhibit such a lackadaisical attitude in the presence of the Sea Witch. Her eyebrows arched in a reflex of surprise at Sailor’s audacity, but she quickly masked her reaction, resuming her typically impassive demeanor, “Father always has his methods.”

Sailor, sprawled amid the mess, nonchalantly smacked his lips before abruptly shifting the conversation, “What about you? Is your Bright Star ready to set sail?”

Lucretia offered no verbal response, her expression tightening into a frown.

Observing her closely, Sailor noted, “You’re still resistant. I can see your hesitation,” his voice calm yet carrying an underlying seriousness, “I somewhat understand what you’re resisting… but please, be prepared. This voyage might turn out to be the greatest in history, perhaps even the last. This time, at least, you have the choice to embark alongside your father…”

His words prompted a silent but intense stare from Lucretia, compelling Sailor to halt his speech.

“Has anyone ever told you that you talk too much?”

He pondered briefly, “…I’ve been here three days, and only today have I spoken this much… alright, I’ll hold my tongue.”

Lucretia watched him silently for a moment longer before redirecting her attention towards the door, stating, “The Bright Star is always ready for a long voyage.”

However, as she initiated her departure, Sailor halted her, “Hey, wait a moment, there’s one more thing…”

Curiosity piqued, Lucretia turned back, inquiring, “What is it?”

“Could you help me reconnect my spine and shoulder…” he continued, his posture still lax in the heap of clutter, evidently having dislocated a joint during his earlier lazy stretch.

Lucretia’s face subtly shifted as she regarded him, but then she decisively turned and exited without offering assistance, “Just lie there.”

…

The scene transitions to Duncan, who paused his writing to glance towards the window. Despite the darkness outside, the bright indoor light bathed the study. Alice sat quietly by the window, the light gently illuminating her, her eyes nearly closed as if on the brink of sleep.

Her attention snapped to Duncan as he observed her from his desk, her face lighting up with a smile, “Captain! Have you finished writing?”

Alice’s curiosity was apparent when approaching Duncan, even though she knew she couldn’t decipher the contents of the captain’s diary on the desk.

“I’m done. If you’re tired, you don’t need to stay here on my account. Go rest in your room.” Duncan answered.

“I’m not tired!” Alice quickly responded, her eyes momentarily caught by the cryptic entries in the captain’s diary, “Is this your diary? Uh… I can’t understand a single word…”

Duncan offered a warm smile, choosing not to delve into the intricacies of diary writing but instead posed a simple question, “Do you want to try writing a diary?”

Alice, caught off guard by the suggestion, hesitated before responding, “Me? I don’t even know where to begin… I’m not sure what to write about, and doesn’t it require a vast vocabulary?”

Her concerns were met with Duncan’s laughter, an encouragement in its melody, “You just write about anything that feels important or captures your interest. A diary isn’t about showcasing a vast vocabulary; the words you already know are sufficient. And if words fail you, why not express yourself through drawings?”

As Alice absorbed his words, her initial hesitation transformed into enthusiasm, “I can draw!” she exclaimed with a newfound joy.

Her declaration of artistic ability was modest, to say the least. Duncan had taught her the basics of drawing, enabling her to produce simple sketches that could be recognized as either a man, a woman, a person, or perhaps Dog. Despite the simplicity of her skills, she held a proud belief in her ability to “draw.”

Seeing her excitement, Duncan reached into his desk, retrieving a brand-new diary and a pencil, which he then offered to Alice, “This is for you, a little something I brought back from the ship. It’s a place for you to keep the memories you cherish.”

Alice’s delight was palpable as she accepted the diary, eagerly flipping through its blank pages before settling down next to the desk, poised to write. However, curiosity got the better of her, and she asked, “Why do you suddenly want me to start a diary?”

Duncan paused, taken aback by the question. After a moment’s reflection, he shared his rationale, “We’re on the cusp of a journey to places far and unknown, where we’re bound to experience a myriad of sights and events. Memories can be elusive, and to ensure you don’t lose sight of the journey’s essence, it’s wise to anchor them in writing.”

Alice seemed to grasp the significance of his words, showing a flicker of comprehension before nodding earnestly. She then focused on the diary, inscribing “Alice’s Diary” on its title page with a level of seriousness that marked the significance of the moment.

“Look, I’m done!” she declared, showcasing her work to Duncan. The letters were uneven but represented the best of her efforts since Duncan had taught her to read and write.

“Excellent,” Duncan commended with a smile, adding a gentle reminder, “Just remember, diaries are usually private. It’s important to keep them to yourself…”

Alice gestured towards Duncan’s diary with a puzzled face, “But you showed me yours.”

Caught in a moment of contradiction, Duncan’s face stiffened slightly as he explained, “…That’s because I’m aware you can’t decipher the contents.”

Feeling puzzled, Alice scratched her head and glanced down at her new diary with a mixture of uncertainty and concern, “Is it also not okay for you to see it?”

Duncan responded firmly, “Not okay,” emphasizing the privacy of a diary. However, seeing Alice’s troubled and somewhat disheartened look, he softened his stance, suggesting, “But if there’s something you really want to share with me, feel free to. Apart from that, I won’t peek; your secrets are your own.”

This reassurance brought a smile back to Alice’s face, “Okay!”

Duncan couldn’t help feeling a mix of amusement and exasperation at the situation, but he was glad to see Alice’s mood lift, which in turn lightened his own spirits.

Alice, not dwelling too deeply on the complexities of human emotions, was simply glad to see the captain in a better mood. She then changed the subject, her curiosity piqued about their upcoming journey, “Captain, are we heading to the border next?”

Duncan was caught off guard by her question.

Alice quickly clarified, “Miss Vanna told me,” eager to explain her source. “She mentioned we’re leaving in a few days and that we need to stock up on plenty of food and water because where we’re going might be very special…”

Acknowledging her information, Duncan confirmed, “Yes, it’s going to be a place unlike any other… a place I’m not entirely sure of myself, what it looks like, or what awaits us there.”

“Further than the Holy Island we visited before?”

“Much further than that.”

Alice’s “Oh~” was drawn out, her mind trying to grasp the concept of a destination even more distant and unknown than the Holy Island, but finding it difficult to visualize.

Duncan looked at Alice with intrigue, expecting perhaps a hint of worry or apprehension, but found none in her clear, untroubled gaze.

“Aren’t you scared?” he asked, probing for any sign of fear regarding the uncertainties of their expedition.

But Alice simply shook her head with conviction, dismissing any notion of fear.

Duncan decided to paint a grimmer picture to test her resolve further: “We could get lost beyond the border, face anomalies in time, and despite our best preparations, it might take a long time to return… if we can return at all.”

Yet, Alice’s response was to shake her head again, this time breaking into a reassuring smile, “Don’t worry, I’ll bring us back.”

“You? Bring us back?” Duncan couldn’t hide his astonishment and a touch of skepticism.

“Yes!” Alice’s confidence was unwavering.

“And how do you plan to do that?” Duncan asked, already anticipating her answer.

“I don’t know!” she replied cheerfully, without a hint of doubt.

Duncan was left speechless, looking at Alice, who radiated a bizarre confidence despite her confusion.

However, as he continued to observe her, his expression of bemusement gradually blended with a thoughtful gaze, as if Alice’s unfounded confidence had sparked a new train of thought, mingling his helplessness with contemplation…

Chapter 764: Sailing into the Night

As the night stretched on, marking the twenty-second day since darkness had enveloped the world, a series of eerie and unsettling events began to unfold, as reported through messages from distant lands.

In the far-off Cold Port, an enormous shadow emerged momentarily above the sea, standing tall and imposing like a cliff yet appearing ethereal as fog. This shadow moved silently, gliding from the sea into the air, ominously advancing toward the city-state as if to envelop it in darkness. During the night, the shadow went largely unnoticed until the night watchmen, experiencing what they believed to be a watchful presence from above, triggered a panic that led to all the churches ringing their bells in unison. It was this clamor that seemingly scared the shadow away, making it disappear back into the darkness from whence it came.

Meanwhile, in the warmer climate of Mok, the entire lower district found itself engulfed in a bizarre fog of a crimson hue that carried a repulsive odor. The fog's arrival coincided with the malfunctioning of lights across several blocks, and this ominous mist even seeped into churches and night shelters for a brief period. It was only when the city-state's guardians managed to clear the fog, which had mysteriously formed during the night, that the affected districts reported several unnerving disappearances, including two technicians who had been out checking on the steam hubs.

From the Parman Islands, there were reports of a mysterious fleet suddenly appearing in the nearby waters under the cover of darkness, making its way toward the city-state. Despite being issued a no-docking command and being directed to a designated waiting area, the fleet seemed perplexed by the ongoing “Long Night,” inquiring about the night with confusion and claiming it was experiencing “normal daylight” with “warm and bright sunshine” on their decks, even going so far as to question the sanity of the city-state’s inhabitants.

As the fleet disregarded the orders and continued its approach, the city-state’s navy was left with no alternative but to engage, resulting in the destruction of the unidentified ships amid a chaos of terrified screams, desperate curses, and pleas for help, leaving the sea littered with burning debris.

The nature of the ships the navy destroyed that night remained a mystery, as did the source of the “sunlight” they claimed to be basking in.

Now, on this twenty-second night of uninterrupted darkness, the world’s usual order is desperately clinging on, and the fragile semblance of “peace” is gradually eroding in this seemingly endless night.

In the lower district of Pland, outside Duncan’s antique shop, a gas street lamp cast a weak yellow glow, standing guard on the deserted streets where other lamps flickered with an almost imperceptible green flame.

Inside, Duncan was seated next to the shop window, meticulously cleaning a brass ornament while idly browsing through an old book.

The book was a treasure from Morris’s collection, a renowned work by the infamous “mad poet” Puman, cherished for its brilliance and madness alike.

On the page before him, Duncan admired the elegant cursive script that flowed across the paper:

“We shall have a long journey…”

While Duncan didn’t usually find the poetry of his world particularly captivating, the pervasive silence that had swallowed the city-state made any distraction welcome, even the rhythmic beauty of verse.

It had been ages since the last customer had entered his antique shop. The stories behind each item in the shop seemed to have aged along with their physical forms, doubling in richness, and Duncan had resigned himself to the likelihood that this quiet would persist.

However, this solitude was abruptly interrupted by the sound of the door creaking open. The bell above it rang out clear and sharp, pulling Duncan from his thoughts. He lifted his gaze to the entrance and saw a man and a woman stepping into the light from the enveloping darkness outside, their movements tinged with a cautious nervousness.

"…How rare," Duncan observed them with a fleeting glance, noting their unmistakably human appearance, which piqued his curiosity, "to see people wandering about at this hour?"

The young man, evidently unsettled, adjusted his jacket and quickly surveyed the room before responding, "We noticed your lights were on… it seems every other place is locked up tight…"

"We're employed at the steam pump station and the power facility," the young woman chimed in hastily, her words laced with an eagerness that suggested they were eager to assert their reason for being out so late, "We carry passes that allow us to be here."

"Oh," Duncan responded with a nonchalant tone, setting aside the brass ornament he had been cleaning and regarding the two with a flicker of amusement in his eyes, "So, what brings you here? Looking to purchase something?"

"We were hoping to find a pair of porcelain plates, the decorative kind you might place on a mantelpiece," the young man said, quickly specifying, "… Nothing too pricey."

To Duncan’s surprise, they had come with a purpose.

Raising his eyebrows in mild intrigue, Duncan rose and made his way to a shelf, remarking over his shoulder, “This is an antique shop, so our items aren’t what you’d call cheap—though given the unusual circumstances, I’m willing to consider a discount, reducing the price from over four thousand to merely twenty-six…”

He paused, turning to look back at the couple with a curious gaze, “But I have to ask, why now? What I mean is, what’s the urgency of making such a purchase during these times?”

The couple shared a look, and the young woman offered a shy smile before replying, “We’re getting married.”

Surprise flickered across Duncan’s face at this revelation.

“We’re in the process of setting up our new home,” the young man elaborated, “and we wanted to add some decorative touches… With most places closed, we heard rumors of your shop remaining open and thought we’d take our chances here…”

“…To think, amidst this enduring darkness, I’d meet a pair of newlyweds,” Duncan murmured almost to himself as he selected a few ornate porcelain plates from the shelf, his voice tinged with wonder, “Why not wait for daylight to return?”

“What if daylight never returns?” the young man countered abruptly.

Duncan paused, turning to meet the young man’s gaze squarely.

“Now, with the future so uncertain… Our wedding was initially planned for the week before last, but we ended up delaying it until now. However, we’ve come to realize there’s no point in waiting any longer,” the young man explained, his voice carrying a mix of resolve and a hint of defiance against the unending night.

“Our ceremony will be a modest one, in compliance with the night’s curfew restrictions. We’ve arranged for the church’s priest to officiate at our own home. Should the sun choose to never grace us with its presence again…”

The young woman’s voice trailed off after she broached the grim possibility of an eternal darkness, her attempt at a smile betraying the effort it took.

Their words may have been simple, but the depth of their message was profound, echoing a sentiment that transcended eloquence: Life must continue, regardless of the circumstances. No amount of fear or lament could hasten the sunrise.

“Pick any that catches your eye,” Duncan suddenly offered with a warm smile, gesturing towards the illuminated shelves adorned with exquisite plates, each accompanied by a wooden stand for display.

After a moment of contemplation, the couple selected a pair of light green plates adorned with intricate golden patterns reminiscent of the craftsmanship of southern elves. They watched Duncan carefully wrap their choice in protective paper, and then, with a hint of timidity, the young woman inquired about the price.

“It’s on the house,” Duncan declared casually.

The surprise at his unexpected generosity was evident in the couple’s eyes.

“Let this be my wedding gift to you. The night may be long, but may this gesture bring a bit of luck your way,” he added, his voice imbued with a sincere wish for their happiness.

“But we couldn’t possibly…” the young man began, only to be interrupted.

“Don’t let time slip by; your pass has its limits,” Duncan gently reminded them with a smile, moving towards the door of the shop, “And don’t worry, you’ve already provided ample ‘compensation.’”

Puzzled, the young man asked, “Compensation? What do you mean?”

As Duncan opened the door, letting the light from the street lamps spill into the shop, he gestured towards the illuminated path that stretched into the night. “A moment of joy,” he said, sharing the source of his contentment.

With the couple gone, the shop once again surrendered to the quiet of the night. Duncan lingered at the doorway a moment longer, his sigh blending into the silence as he retracted his gaze from the street.

Meanwhile, at Wind Harbor, a different scene unfolded under a surreal, golden pseudo-sunlight.

The Vanished, with its towering masts, began to show signs of life as ethereal sails, as translucent as ghosts, billowed into existence. The exploration vessel leaned into its journey, departing from the harbor with a quiet dignity.

Not far off, the gleaming Bright Star activated its paddle wheels, the sound of the sea accompanying its departure.

“What’s making you so happy, Captain?” Alice asked with curiosity after noticing Duncan’s rare smile on the deck.

Turning away from the receding view of Wind Harbor, Duncan’s eyes lingered on the city-state they were leaving behind. With its myriad lights dimming into the distance and the faint, struggling sunlight fading from the coast, the island was gradually engulfed by the omnipresent shadow of the night.

Duncan took a moment before responding to Alice’s inquiry, his answer laced with a sense of optimism, “There are indeed moments of happiness to be found.”

Alice, still not entirely understanding but sensing the significance of his words, cast a lingering glance back towards the fading lights of the city-state, her voice carrying a note of hope mixed with uncertainty, “Will we ever return there?”

In that brief pause, Duncan seemed to weigh countless thoughts and considerations about their impending journey, the myriad of paths that lay ahead, and the vast array of futures that could unfold from their decisions. Yet, he settled on a simple yet resolute affirmation: “…We’ll come back.”

This assurance brought a noticeable lift to Alice’s spirits.

Duncan, too, allowed himself a small smile at her reaction, then took a deep breath, easing his hold on the helm, symbolically letting go of the immediate concerns and focusing on the journey ahead.

They had now officially departed from Wind Harbor. Their next destination was the designated “rally point” on the eastern frontier, where they would join forces with the Storm Church’s border fleet. Together, they planned to navigate towards the Eternal Veil, tracing the path once charted by the Sea Song in a bold quest to uncover the truths that lay beyond the known world.

For Duncan, this expedition was more than a mere voyage; it was a crucial step in gaining a broader perspective on their world, to “observe this shelter from the outside,” and perhaps, to understand the larger forces at play.

However, before embarking on this grand adventure, there was a matter Duncan felt compelled to address directly.

He turned his attention to a solitary figure that seemed to shrink away at the edge of the helm, a gaunt and hunched presence trying to make itself as inconspicuous as possible.

“Sailor,” Duncan called out gently.

At the sound of his voice, Anomaly 077 stiffened, a mix of surprise and apprehension flashing across his features as he stammered, “Ah… Ah?!”

“Come here,” Duncan said, his voice warm and inviting as he took a step back to make room, gesturing towards the helm of the Vanished with an encouraging smile, “Take hold of it.”

Chapter 765: The Course

Suddenly, a sharp “crack” sound came from Sailor, startlingly indicating that a bone had just snapped out of place as the mummy twitched.

Then, Anomaly 077’s voice filled the air with dramatic pleas: “Captain! Captain, please, I beg you, don’t scare me like this! I promise I’m loyal, diligent, honest, and truthful! If I’ve made a mistake, just tell me, and I’ll correct it. There’s no need for this kind of intimidation… Or, if you prefer, you could just load me into a cannon and shoot me away…”

While begging, the mummy tried desperately to drag himself toward the ship’s railing as if he might throw himself over at any moment. He actually managed to swing his body over the railing, but before he could jump, a rope quickly shot out, wrapped around his ankles, and pulled him back onto the deck, tightly coiling around him.

Duncan approached with a half-smile that seemed more mocking than genuinely amused. He stopped a short distance away, simply watching.

Anomaly 077’s cries stopped suddenly. He shivered, pulled his neck in, and froze, eventually managing to say, “If you’re looking for entertainment, you might as well cook me… I could even do sit-ups in the pot for you…”

“There’s not a pot on board that’s big enough for you,” Duncan replied lightly, though his brief smile faded as he became more serious, “I’m serious, I have some experiments in mind.”

The change in the captain’s behavior and voice caught Anomaly 077’s attention, prompting him to look up at Duncan with a puzzled expression.

“…Experiments?”

“Release him,” Duncan said casually. The ropes, which seemed to have a life of their own, started unwinding from Anomaly 077, making a quiet rustling sound as they retracted.

Sailor, now standing and visibly confused, managed to fix his dislocated joint (explaining the “crack” noise Duncan heard earlier) and began to follow the captain, filled with both curiosity and worry. He eyed the ropes cautiously and approached the dark steering wheel but hesitated to touch it. After a moment of hesitation, driven by curiosity, he finally asked, “This experiment you’re talking about… what is it?”

“The course,” Duncan answered with indifference.

Sailor seemed to ponder for a moment, a hint of realization crossing his face.

“I know you don’t remember the course. Lucretia told me,” Duncan continued, locking eyes with Sailor, “but I trust the observations Captain Caraline recorded in her log. She believed that the experiences you’d have upon returning to the Boundless Seas would change you. She met the gods herself and was fundamentally transformed before she ‘recovered.’ She gained ‘knowledge’ that goes beyond what’s normally understandable.”

Duncan motioned towards Sailor as he spoke.

“Now, I need to understand ‘you’ and discover the truth behind your various ‘qualities.’ Just like Captain Caraline’s logbook that was found with you, I suspect you’re a kind of ‘medium.’ And for this experiment… letting you use your ‘power’ seems like the best way to get answers.”

Sailor looked down at his hands, pondering, “My power…”

With a tone of clinical curiosity, Duncan shared what he learned from the church’s documents about “Anomaly 077—Sailor’s” unpredictable abilities.

“When ‘Anomaly 077’ is active, it tends to ‘take over’ the nearest ship, causing it to teleport to random places in the Boundless Seas,” he explained, “and each teleportation brings the ship into a storm. This behavior particularly interests me.”

Sailor began to understand what the captain was suggesting. Looking at the helm, his hesitation was clear, “But if I actually touch the helm…”

“Don’t worry, the Vanished isn’t really affected by your powers. I just want to study how they work,” Duncan assured him casually, “and even if ‘teleportation’ and a ‘storm’ happen, it wouldn’t be much of a problem for this ship, nothing more than a breeze.”

“Uh, you misunderstood me,” Sailor quickly corrected, looking around anxiously, “I was worried the ship itself might fight back against me… I’ve noticed this ship seems to have elements that could start a fight easily. In just two hours on board, I saw at least three fights break out…”

As he spoke, Alice showed off her pride on the side.

Duncan’s face twitched when he saw the doll’s smug expression, “What are you so proud of!”

Alice proudly tilted her head, “I won my fight with the bucket!”

Duncan: “…”

Ignoring the doll’s strange behavior, Duncan refocused on Anomaly 077. “I’m in charge of everything on this ship, and I’m allowing you to take over the steering for now. Don’t worry about any negative consequences. But if you’re hesitant, I have another ‘research strategy’ we could use.”

Sailor immediately looked happier. “You have another plan?”

Duncan didn’t say anything but raised his hand, showing a small flame flickering at his fingertip.

Seeing this, Sailor’s excitement faded. “I think I prefer the first idea…”

Duncan flicked his finger, snuffing out the flame, and subtly motioned towards the steering wheel. “Go ahead and do what needs to be done before I change my mind and bring the flame back.”

Feeling resigned, Sailor took a deep breath, puffing out his chest as if drawing courage from the cool night air. He clenched his teeth, stepped forward, and with a decisive motion, reached for the steering wheel, his eyes closed.

The moment Anomaly 077’s withered, claw-like fingers touched the wheel of the Vanished, it was as if the first mate of the Sea Song was taking command of his ship.

Likewise, as soon as Sailor’s hand touched the wheel, Duncan heard a surreal, thunderous noise, like a huge ship launching into the ocean for the first time, surrounded by massive waves, with the sea itself shaking and breaking around the Vanished.

At that moment, the ship seemed to be caught in an unexplainable “force,” and Duncan felt this “presence” trying to take over the ship.

Normally, such a “presence” would have caused any regular ship to be swallowed by a dimensional rift, lost to some random location in the Boundless Seas where a storm would be taking place. However, the Vanished continued on its path across the waves, under Duncan’s careful command, immune to the mysterious force trying to alter its course.

Duncan’s concern grew as he felt an odd influence on the Vanished. Then, he suddenly sensed something out of the ordinary and looked around.

At that moment, a figure that blurred the lines between being there and not being there appeared in a corner of the bridge. Agatha emerged from the mirror realm, steadying herself on the railing with a sway. She looked at

Duncan, her expression a mix of confusion and worry. “Captain? What’s happening? The spirit world here is…”

Before she could finish, Duncan quickly closed the gap between them. “Agatha, I need your ‘eyes’.”

Caught by surprise, Agatha understood what he meant and reached towards her eyes. “Okay, just give me a second to take them out…”

Duncan, startled, quickly said, “Stop! You don’t have to do that!”

Confused, Agatha responded, “Ah?”

Duncan wasted no time in explaining further and conjured a spectral green flame, placing it gently on Agatha’s forehead.

“Just stay calm; it won’t hurt you.”

Before he could even assure her fully, the connection through the flame was established.

Now, Duncan could see through the gatekeeper’s eyes.

Suddenly, everything around Duncan seemed to shake briefly and intensely, as if the very light and shadows around him were shifting and realigning. Duncan’s vision flipped rapidly, then stabilized, giving him a unique view unlike any shared vision with Alice he had experienced before.

He found himself in a black-and-white world, looking up at the ghostly reflection of the Vanished in the “sky” above the sea. He saw unseen currents swirling violently at the edge of reality and illusion. In this strange, overlapping realm, he watched the sea’s surface in the distance continuously break apart and then reform.

In front of the Vanished, the sea acted like a faulty mirage, caught in a loop of breaking down and coming back together. Waves appeared and disappeared out of nowhere, and the entire surface of the sea would suddenly vanish, leaving a huge “void,” only to fill back in and reappear seconds later. The scenery in the distance kept getting misplaced, and with each second, this pattern repeated as if stuck in a never-ending reset loop.

From the back of the mirrored Vanished, Duncan looked out at the ever-changing “landscape” before turning his attention to the helm.

There, a faint, nearly invisible figure could be seen holding the wheel, its features blurred and fading, like a lingering echo tied to the helm.

Next to Duncan, within this mirror world, Agatha appeared much more solid.

As she watched the incredible scene on the distant sea, she asked, “Captain, what are we seeing?”

“…It’s the course,” Duncan replied quietly, “the true path from the ‘border’ to the ‘outer barrier’ set by the gods.”

Agatha’s eyes widened in amazement.

“Duncan continued calmly, “As Captain Caraline noted in her log, she passed the course to her first mate. The course hasn’t disappeared,” Duncan explained, “Anomaly 077, he is the embodiment of the course.”

Again, the distant surface of the sea went through its cycle of breaking down and rebuilding, with a ghostly roar filling the sea as if resonating with the entire world.

“This phenomenon, which has been misunderstood as Anomaly 077 taking over and causing the ship to teleport randomly, is actually a form of guidance. It’s the Sea Song’s first mate trying to steer the ship towards the ‘destination’ ingrained in his memory. However, this effort could never succeed within the Boundless Seas, hence…”

He paused briefly, then added softly,

“Hence, the creation of those storms.”

Chapter 766: The Helmsman

Anomaly 077 turned out to be the key to unlocking the way to the external barrier, a secret cleverly hidden within his unique traits from the moment he was identified as an “anomaly.”

In the realms of the spirit world, the strange event of the sea collapsing and reforming around the Vanished continued without pause. Duncan and Agatha occasionally caught glimpses of a distant, alien landscape as if they were looking at an image flickering due to a weak signal. This phenomenon was fueled by the obsession linked to the “Sea Song,” which sought to guide those to their “final destination.”

However, in the Eternal Veil—a place known for its instability and isolation—Anomaly 077’s powers did not work as expected. As a result, the path he was meant to create became chaotic, misaligning time and building up a tremendous force with each failure.

When the energy finally achieved a spatial transition, this accumulated energy erupted in the real world, creating a violent storm as a consequence.

Duncan reached out towards the horizon, where flames began to spread across the sea’s surface. He had ignited the storm’s growing intensity, but he quickly extinguished it, causing it to vanish harmlessly into the air.

He then disconnected the “link” with Agatha and returned to the real world.

Sailor stayed at the ship’s helm, gripping the wheel tightly, his body tense as if he were about to break. When Duncan looked back at him, Sailor immediately said, “Captain, about me…”

Duncan nodded in acknowledgment: “You can let go now.”

Relieved, Sailor quickly stepped back from the wheel as if it were extremely hot, moving to the farthest corner from the helm. His behavior showed a mix of nervousness and fear. He cautiously watched the ropes and buckets around him, occasionally looking back at the wheel with a look of fear and awe.

Seeing Anomaly 077 in such a state, Duncan felt a rush of complex emotions. He remembered Captain Caraline amidst the chaos, the fleeting experience of steering the wheel in an alternate reality, and the Sea Song’s long, fragmented journey through time…

The mummy crouched in a corner of the helm, nervously looking around. It was as if the essence of the “First Mate,” who had survived the time-lost journey, had been stripped away, leaving behind only the captain’s log of the Sea Song and the “path” that had become part of him.

Duncan stayed silent for a while before softly sighing and approaching the wary Sailor.

“Captain, did I do my duty correctly?” Sailor asked cautiously, his voice filled with fear of not having met expectations and worried he might be asked to “steer the ship” again.

Duncan confirmed with a serious expression, “You have, this time,” looking Sailor in the eyes to convey the importance of his statement, “but this was just a preliminary test. As we go deeper into the Eternal Veil, I’ll need you to take on the role of helmsman again to officially guide us until we reach the destination once achieved by the Sea Song.”

Upon hearing Duncan’s words, Sailor’s already worried face seemed to sink even more. He instinctively tried to step back, only to realize the ship’s railing was behind him. But the seriousness in Duncan's eyes made him stop.

Duncan spoke earnestly, "The Vanished depends on your guidance. You must realize the 'path' Captain Caraline left behind hasn't disappeared; it lives within you. You are the manifestation of that path—your unique 'abilities' and the supernatural occurrences you've initiated all originate from it. We need it now—I need your help."

Sailor paused, seeing the spectral figure of the captain before him in a different light, feeling a deep sense of purpose and value he hadn't felt in a long time.

"Can I really do it?" Sailor murmured, his voice filled with uncertainty, "This ship… it's not just something anyone can handle. I'm afraid it might overwhelm me the moment I try to steer it…"

Duncan reassured him with a steady voice, "You are more than capable of navigating this ship."

This statement left Sailor momentarily lost for words.

Duncan recognized the weight of such a task, "I know this is a heavy responsibility—very few people in the world would be brave enough to guide the Vanished without being crushed by the mental strain. But you, as the Sea Song's First Mate, have traversed beyond what most can imagine. You are qualified for this challenge," Duncan paused, then with a firm nod, he added, "If you accept, as the captain of the Vanished, I will formally name you our helmsman for this journey."

Duncan then mentioned, with utmost seriousness, "Of course, you're free to say no without any consequences. I'll find another way. If you prefer to go back to the White Oak now, that's also an option."

Sailor, clearly overwhelmed, considered his words carefully, wrestling with the decision amidst a flood of thoughts.

After a long moment, Sailor made up his mind. With a smile that was almost daunting, he nodded slowly, “Alright, I’ll do my best.”

As he spoke, the environment seemed to react—the ropes near the helm softly rustled, wooden barrels on the aft deck gently rocked, the sail ropes on the mast creaked quietly, and deep within the ship, the ancient structures whispered as if in conversation.

These noises blended together, creating a sound that felt like a welcoming round of applause.

Sailor took in the sounds with a mix of astonishment and confusion, his expression one of someone momentarily overwhelmed. Yet, as he understood what was happening, the deep lines on his face eased into a smile—a smile like the one he had when he first got promoted on the Sea Song years before.

Duncan, sharing the moment, smiled back and gently patted Sailor on the shoulder, comforting him, “Just do your best. That’s all we ask. Now, take some time to rest. We still have a long way to go before we reach our meeting point at the frontier.”

Looking slightly unsteady, Sailor left the helm and crossed the deck, his uneven steps disappearing into the night.

Duncan watched him leave and then turned back towards the middle of the deck, only to see Alice crouched near the helm, complaining to a coiled rope, “You didn’t welcome me with such excitement when I first came aboard… there was even applause now…”

The rope moved on the ground, extending a part of itself towards the railing as if trying to explain something.

“An induction ceremony for the helmsman? What is that?” Alice asked, her eyes wide with curiosity, “And what about me? Didn’t I get a ceremony too? It already happened? When?

“…Huh? The chaos in the kitchen was my ceremony!? Why didn’t anyone tell me earlier! I thought that was just a big mess… We almost destroyed the kitchen that day, and dinner was delayed because of it…”

Duncan, who was about to talk to Alice, stopped, watching her lively chat with the rope. He hesitated for a moment before awkwardly looking away, puzzled by her odd interactions with the ship’s inanimate objects.

As he reflected on this, he suddenly felt an intuition, hearing Goathead’s voice in his mind, “Captain, have you chosen a temporary helmsman?”

“Do you have any objections?” Duncan asked mentally as he walked back to the helm to navigate the Vanished further, “Are you worried about an ‘outsider’ taking on this role?”

“No,” Goathead quickly replied, “the captain has complete authority over the crew, including appointments or dismissals and creating or removing roles on the ship. The helmsman you support is the helmsman the Vanished recognizes, but… I am concerned about what destiny awaits ‘Sailor’ after he completes his duty.”

Duncan was silent for a moment, considering the consequences.

Goathead spoke again, this time more quietly than before, “It seems you’ve thought about this thoroughly. He was destined to be carried away by the currents of time, to vanish like the last sparks of a fire. On the day he returned to the Boundless Sea, he was meant to disappear. However, the log of Captain Caraline served as a shelter, preserving him, and the final journey of the Sea Song became a ‘path,’ grounding his existence. He became an eternal traveler…”

“Now, there’s only one last task for him—Captain Caraline’s final order.”

“And now, Captain, by making him the helmsman, you’ve given him the chance to fulfill his ultimate mission.”

In the cool night breeze at sea, Duncan looked out over the dark waters, pondering these thoughts for a while before finally speaking, “I understand, and, honestly, Sailor knows this too.”

Goathead remained silent, allowing the quiet to settle.

“Our voyage is still ongoing…”

Duncan then said softly, his mind recalling a book he had recently read, where the lines of a famous “mad poet” struck him, remembering from the text—

“Our journey is still ongoing until the moment when time itself comes to an end…”

…

The door to his cabin closed softly behind him, and the withered figure returned to the interior, easing onto his bed with careful, measured movements. The room was filled with warmth and light, sensations that had become unfamiliar to him over time.

As he lay there, he felt enveloped in a sense of coldness and isolation, with broken, scattered memories of the Sea Song passing through his thoughts as remote as if they belonged to another person.

He murmured to himself, repeating verses that had once been cherished by Captain Caraline—lines that shimmered in his faint memories like stars in the night sky above a desert:

“…Dusty sails shall rise again, leading us to lands long forgotten.”

“On the day destined for us, set forth fully ready…”

“We will all become explorers, embarking towards unseen lands with the wind at our backs.”

Sailor shifted in his bed, his dry, deformed eyes slowly closing.

Sleep continued to escape him.

Nevertheless, a slight smile appeared on his face.

The moment of truth was nearing.

Chapter 767: Border Base

Duncan found himself once again enveloped in the majestic fog that bridged the sky and the sea. However, this time his arrival at the frontier was shrouded in the secrecy of night, a stark contrast to his last visit. The sky above was a tumult of darkness, pressing down as if it could touch the world. The only light came from the eerie glow known as the World's Creation, which bathed the cloud edges and the fog wall in a pale, cold light. This massive fog barrier, visible through the night, seemed like a living entity—a dark, undulating mass that stood tall and distant. Its surface occasionally shifted to reveal unsettling, bizarre shapes, striking fear into the hearts of all who glimpsed it, evoking a primal dread.

The edges of this fog wall, touched by the light of the World's Creation, appeared to be adorned with countless eyes that stared down coldly and malevolently from the sky, overseeing the hubris of humans daring to explore the unknown ends of the world.

At the base of this imposing curtain of fog, human ambition had gathered in the form of fleets, poised on the brink of the unknown.

Upon sighting a distant lighthouse, Duncan commanded the Vanished, leading it to adjust their course slightly. Heading towards the southeast, they soon encountered the border—a massive, floating mobile port that sat atop the mist-enshrouded sea. It was a marvel of engineering, with its large steam core releasing plumes of white steam into the air and a differential machine's towering presence, its rotating lights occasionally slicing through the darkness to reveal the shadows of ships of various sizes nearby.

Surrounding the floating port were over a dozen ships, each distinct in design and size, while small patrol boats wove through the waters, their lights flickering in the darkness like fireflies dancing over an endless abyss.

Here, at the edge of the world, the usual rules of light discipline were abandoned, allowing these beacons of human presence to shine freely. They stood as a testament to humanity's persistence, a striking contrast to the vast and unfathomable sea and fog wall. Yet, brave as they were, these lights of civilization seemed almost inconsequential against the backdrop of the Boundless Sea and the towering fog, tiny specks that the ever-shifting fog could engulf at any moment.

In this world on the brink of collapse, these lights on the sea represented humanity's fragile yet defiant reach towards the crumbling edges of their sanctuary.

The arrival of the Vanished and the Bright Stars did not go unnoticed. Patrol vessels nearby quickly relayed their approach, and a welcoming steam whistle sounded from the mobile port, its echo carrying through the night. A beacon from the port's lighthouse then reached out across the sea, guiding the two ships to dock at the port's edge.

Once docked, Duncan led his crew onto the pier, where they were met by a gathering of figures there to welcome them. Among these figures, one in particular caught Duncan by surprise.

Pope Helena herself stood among the welcoming party of clergy, a sight that Duncan had not anticipated.

"Welcome to the 'Border Base'. We have been eagerly awaiting your arrival." Pope Helena took a step forward, her smile warm as she greeted Duncan and Lucretia, giving a slight nod in welcome.

Duncan, visibly taken aback by the sight of the High Priestess, couldn't hide his surprise. "How come you're here?" he asked. "Shouldn't you be on your ark right now? Can it really travel here so quickly?"

Helena's smile broadened at Duncan's question. "Should the need arise, the Church's ark can sail at speeds that rival your ship," she explained, her tone light. Yet, she quickly clarified, "But no, I'm not physically here. The Storm Cathedral remains at Wind Harbor. What stands before you is merely one of my avatars. It seemed fitting for me to personally send you off as you embark into the border."

Duncan's eyebrows arched in surprise at her revelation. The figure before him showed no obvious signs of being an illusion. "…Really can't tell," he admitted, impressed.

With a graceful motion, Helena raised her hand toward Duncan. Mist began to curl at the edges of her arm, and her skin turned as transparent as water, revealing the illusionary nature of her presence.

"Creating illusions in water and fog is a gift from my lord," she said, as her hand returned to its normal appearance and she started walking again. "This isn't considered a significant divine power—most high-ranking members of the Storm Church can perform it."

As Duncan followed Helena deeper into the border base, he glanced back at Vanna, who was trailing a bit behind. "Can you do this too?" he inquired, curiosity piqued.

Vanna hesitated for a brief moment before lowering her gaze, a hint of embarrassment in her voice. "Uh… actually…"

Before she could elaborate, Helena interjected from ahead, without needing to look back. "She can't," she stated plainly. "Despite my efforts to teach her, she never mastered it."

Vanna remained silent, her head still bowed in a mix of embarrassment and disappointment.

Shirley, who had been quietly following, seized the moment to tease, stepping closer to Vanna with a look of mock astonishment. “Hey, didn’t you claim your divine art skills were pretty decent?”

Caught in a moment of humiliation, Vanna felt compelled to defend her expertise, albeit reluctantly. “…Divine arts are vast, encompassing combat, healing, support, and several specialized fields like research, secrets, and miracles. I wasn’t proficient in all of them; my focus was quite specific…”

Half understanding yet curious, Shirley was about to guess, “Oh, so you’re skilled in combat…”

Still leading the way, Helena cut off the speculation without looking back. “She excels in healing,” she corrected, setting the record straight.

This revelation surprised not only Shirley but most of the group. Duncan, in particular, found himself reassessing Vanna, the formidable warrior beside him, trying to reconcile her prowess in battle with her proficiency in healing arts, a combination that seemed at odds with her formidable exterior…

In the typical portrayal, healing clergywomen are imagined in light cloth armor, clutching a short staff, positioned safely at the back of the battle formation due to their low defense and susceptibility to damage. They are the fragile lifelines that could perish with a single misstep. Then there’s Vanna, a figure capable of effortlessly overpowering demons single-handedly—how had she become associated with the role of a healer?

Duncan found himself grappling with this incongruity, though he kept his thoughts to himself, choosing not to voice the glaring question. However, the crew of the Vanished was not known for their reticence, often characterized by their direct and unfiltered curiosity.

“Why, though?” Shirley couldn’t hide her bewilderment, her gaze fixed on Vanna. Her confusion was palpable as she gestured towards Vanna’s imposing stature, her question trailing off into a puzzled, “…Why?”

Helena provided an answer with a nonchalant tone, “She became adept at setting bones on the training field after practice sessions,” revealing that Vanna had mastered this aspect of healing in merely six months.

Shirley’s puzzled expression dissolved into understanding, and even Duncan found himself nodding, albeit with a complex mix of emotions, “… That makes more sense.”

Vanna, the subject of their discussions, remained silent, her head bowed, lost in thought.

Duncan, however, was struck by another realization. “But you’ve been with us on the ship for so long, and I’ve hardly seen you perform any healing. Why is that?” he inquired, looking at Vanna with a thoughtful expression.

Vanna’s response was laced with a hint of resignation, “Do you think anyone on the Vanished actually needs healing?”

Duncan paused, considering her words. He looked around at his crew, realizing the unique composition of the Vanished’s occupants—predominantly non-living beings, making the necessity for a healer somewhat redundant. The only somewhat human figure, old Morris, was renowned for his resilience, seemingly more durable than many saints…

Vanna sighed once more, her gesture towards her greatsword and the clasp on her shoulder speaking volumes. “I think it’s better this way—preventing harm by eliminating threats before they can cause injury. That way, nobody has to suffer.”

Helena’s gaze then shifted to Anomaly 077, who lingered at the back of the group. She slowed her pace, giving the mummy a contemplative look before posing a question, “Do you remember this place?”

Sailor’s response was calm and measured, indicative of his complex relationship with his memories. “I remember, but it’s vague,” he admitted. Despite having regained some of his memories, including those of this very location, they felt detached, as if belonging to someone else. “Even the deepest memories seem foreign, except for those involving Captain Caraline,” he concluded, reflecting on the peculiar nature of his recollections.

Helena’s voice was gentle, refraining from delving deeper into the extent of Sailor’s recollections or his emotional connection to the place. It was a delicate acknowledgment of the chasm between Anomaly 077’s past life as the Sea Song’s first mate, a role he played until not so long ago, and his current existence as a distant echo of that life. For the port’s guards, the transition might seem recent, but for Sailor, it was a chapter from another lifetime.

“You’re essentially a stranger here now,” Helena reassured Sailor, her words offering comfort. “Aside from myself and a select few within the Church’s higher echelons, no one knows of your current appearance. You needn’t fret over bumping into old ‘friends’—unless you wish to, of course.”

Sailor appeared caught off guard by Helena’s assurance, his response carrying a tone of genuine gratitude. “Thank you,” he said, bowing his head slightly in appreciation.

It was at this juncture that Lucretia’s curiosity bubbled to the surface. “Has this port always operated in the border region?” she inquired. “My own ventures have taken me near these waters, yet I’ve never come across it…”

Helena provided a comprehensive overview of the port’s history and function. “This mobile port has anchored the border waters for the better part of a decade," she began. "However, the dense fog that blankets this region often obscures its presence. It serves a dual purpose: as a border patrol and exploration fleets base. It's also a hub for research. Equipped with extensive laboratories and observational equipment, it delves into the mysteries of the spirit world and the marine ecosystem. Its missions often necessitate ventures deep into the fog. When not on a specific assignment, it patrols the eastern border. Its movements and stops are cloaked in secrecy by the Church. It's no surprise that you've never stumbled upon it."

Lucretia expressed her admiration for the port's operations and its role in the border waters, "…Impressive."

Helena echoed the sentiment, her voice tinged with a mix of pride and nostalgia. "Yes, it is indeed impressive. This place was forged by the collective efforts of many remarkable people." Her gaze then drifted towards a point in the distance, lost in thought for a moment. "The Sea Song, it set sail from Dock No. 2, right over there," she noted, pointing out the location with a hint of wistfulness.

Chapter 768: The Black Fog

At the historic location where the Sea Song once embarked on its journey, the dock now stands deserted. The ship had found its way back through an accidental journey to 1675, but it’s clear that it can never return to this spot again.

“I remember this place too…” Sailor whispered, his gaze fixed on the pier that was now bathed in the bright glow of powerful lights. The docks, extending from the movable harbor, seemed like the sprawling limbs of a colossal creature, each stretching out towards the infinite expanse of the night sky. In this remote area, far from the glow of city lights, stepping beyond the illuminated docks felt like venturing into oblivion—a leap into the dense, dark fog that required immense bravery.

“We’ve got three escort ships lined up for you. They’ll act as guides,” Helena explained. “Once they’re all set, they’ll accompany you through the fog and lead you to the ‘lighthouse,’ the last known location from which the Sea Song transmitted its signal. From that point, you’ll push forward, crossing the six mile limit. The three battleships, serving as your navigational guides, will remain near the lighthouse, awaiting your return.”

Duncan responded with a silent nod. Fueled by curiosity, Lucretia inquired, “How long will you wait for us here?”

“Indefinitely,” Helena replied with a light tone. “The era of pioneering patrols is coming to an end. The Eternal Veil is slowly disintegrating, leading to an increase in ships encountering strange and perilous mutations. Most of the patrol paths have become impassable. As a result, aside from maintaining some critical observation points, the patrol fleets are withdrawing to safer areas within the Boundless Sea. This movable port and my presence here will remain until you return. Or…" She trailed off, then took a deep breath and fixed her gaze on Duncan, expressing her hope for their safe return.

"We'll make it back safely," Duncan assured her confidently, his arms crossed as he stared out at the foggy horizon. "Both the Vanished and the Bright Stars have managed to return from beyond that boundary, and now, with Captain Caraline's 'map,' nothing will prevent our return."

Helena gave a slight nod in acknowledgment.

Following this exchange, Duncan and his team finalized their preparations at the frontier outpost. When the three escort ships, designated as their navigational guides, were ready, they embarked on their journey. It was a moment that would blend into the countless others in the vast expanse of the night, marked by the resounding farewell whistle from the movable port.

Three modern warships adorned with the emblem of the Storm Church, accompanied by two ancient "ghost ships" that had witnessed a century, departed from the dock. As they moved further away, the bright illumination of the port dimmed, leaving them enveloped by the thickening night. The dense fog, alive under the cover of darkness, turned an even deeper shade of black, exerting a formidable pressure that seemed almost alive.

Standing on the ship's elevated stern deck, Duncan couldn't help but cast his gaze back towards the port. As they moved further away, the bright lights of the port began to fade into the distance. In this moment of transition, Duncan recalled the parting words of the Cretan he once met—advising him to "walk against the light."

This notion of moving against the light wasn’t new; the Doomsday Survey Team had embraced this approach, as had the Sea Song during its historic departure from this very port. Now, it was the turn of the Vanished and the Bright Stars to embark on this challenging path.

Following those who dared to confront the unknown, each venture against the light represented a step deeper into the unexplored. Now, the crew of the Vanished was on the cusp of reaching the true “beyond” of their world.

Standing beside Duncan, Alice was visibly fascinated by the ominous fog ahead. The closer they got, the more she craned her neck upwards, eventually expressing her astonishment with a mix of fear and wonder, “Wow… it’s even scarier than during the day… bah.”

Predictably, as she looked up beyond a certain angle, her doll head came off. Duncan, without even looking, caught Alice’s head by the hair and brought it in front of him, slightly annoyed, “When will you ever learn…”

With her eyes blinking, Alice protested, “Captain… don’t grab the hair… hair falling out…”

Nonchalantly, Duncan handed back Alice’s head, which she quickly reattached to her neck. She then noticed a single strand of hair had come loose, which she held sorrowfully, lamenting, “Another one… poor Kalenifoskina Portitas Angwenistan Leforgen IV…”

Duncan, caught off guard by the elaborate name, asked incredulously, “… Have you started naming them that outrageously?”

Alice remained silent, her head bowed as she twirled the strand of hair with a somber expression.

Observing this, Duncan cautioned her, “…Be careful not to get it stuck in your finger joints. Last time, it was quite the task to clear the hair from your joints.”

While they exchanged these words, Duncan's attention returned to the "Eternal Veil" that was beginning to envelop the bow of the Vanished. He noticed something peculiar—the fog was becoming darker, not just from the absence of light, but its very essence seemed to be shifting in color.

Under normal circumstances, fog, even at night, would appear lighter in color and become more visible when lit. The stark darkness of this fog hinted at something unnatural.

Concerned, he promptly communicated with Vanna, who was positioned on the forward deck, asking her to check on this anomaly. Vanna quickly relayed information from the leading ships through their mental link.

"The color of the fog has been gradually changing over the past two days," Vanna informed him, "notably after the Sea Song ventured beyond the six-mile mark. However, this alteration is only on the surface; deeper within the fog, its color remains lighter, as expected."

She briefly paused, apparently still in mental communication with her colleagues at the church for further details, before adding, "The scholars have conducted numerous examinations. Other than the alteration in the color of the surface layer, these dense fogs have remained unchanged—there's no presence of toxins… It's as though only the 'color' attribute is affected in this superficial layer…"

Hearing Vanna's update, Duncan's face took on a contemplative seriousness, nodding slowly as he watched the dark fog increasingly shroud the bow of the Vanished.

In response to the growing darkness, all ships in the fleet reduced their speed and activated various warning and navigation lights along their structures. The Vanished, the escort ships, and the Bright Stars tightened their formation, carefully maintaining a safe distance from one another to prevent any mishaps. The visibility around them diminished rapidly, necessitating this close formation to ensure that no ship strayed or collided with another.

Surrounding the Vanished, ethereal flames of a ghostly green hue began to emerge, casting a spectral light. These spirit fires seemed to cut through the dense, dark fog, faintly illuminating the shapes of nearby ships amidst the swirling mists.

The black fog that enveloped the fleet moved like living, undulating veils, creating a surreal atmosphere around the ships.

After setting the green flames ablaze, Duncan remained focused on the fog, his brow furrowed in thought. Abruptly, he headed towards the captain's quarters.

"Umm, Captain, where are you going?" Alice called out, puzzled by his sudden departure.

"Just stepping away for a moment," Duncan replied with a casual wave, "Don't worry, I'll be back shortly."

As he moved, he mentally signaled his first mate: "Goathead, you're in charge of the Vanished. I need to step out for a bit. If we reach the six-mile mark and I haven't returned, inform the others to hold position."

"Understood, captain."

Duncan quickly arrived at the door to the captain's quarters. Before him stood the enigmatic "Door of the Lost," silent and imposing as always.

He inhaled deeply, then pushed the door open, stepping through.

The transition was marked by a cool breeze and a brief moment of disorientation, a sensation now familiar to him. Zhou Ming found himself back in his modest bachelor apartment, the window revealing the perpetual gray-white fog that obscured the world beyond his small dwelling.

This time, however, Zhou Ming didn’t head towards the window to peer outside. Instead, he turned to observe the path he had just taken.

The main door of the apartment stood ajar, revealing the surging black fog outside. This was not the first time he had encountered it; on the day he had first chosen to step through this door, the same black fog had greeted him—it was this very fog that had served as a conduit from his “shelter” to the Boundless Sea, marking the beginning of his journey aboard the Vanished.

Zhou Ming’s expression deepened with concern as he pondered a mystery that had intrigued him—why was it that the fog obscuring the world outside his windows was a benign gray-white, yet the fog that lingered outside his apartment’s main entrance bore an ominous shade of black?

Now, this same unsettling black fog had begun to manifest at the edges of the Boundless Sea.

Could this phenomenon be a harbinger of impending doom? A sign that the barriers between worlds were weakening? Or perhaps it signified that from the moment he dared to traverse the black fog, his fate was intertwined with a pivotal moment on the brink of the end?

The Sea Song, in its return to the Boundless Sea lacking precise “navigation,” was misplaced into the year 1675. However, when Zhou Ming stepped through the black fog, he was transported directly to the Vanished in the year 1900—eerily close to what felt like the eve of the world’s end.

“Beyond the six-mile boundary, time loses its continuity…”

“Without precise ‘navigation,’ the point in time one arrives at when re-entering the Boundless Sea through the six-mile threshold is unpredictable…”

“There must be some way to determine the ‘time landing point’ with accuracy…”

Zhou Ming whispered to himself, attempting to organize his jumbled thoughts. After a moment, he began to move towards the room.

However, as he walked past the window, he abruptly stopped.

Out of the corner of his eye, he caught sight of something on the window glass.

There, etched in faint, mist-like, mirror-reversed script, was a line of text.

At this discovery, Zhou Ming’s sense of astonishment and disbelief surged. He stood frozen for a brief second, then swiftly moved to the window as if propelled by a sudden gust of wind!

Chapter 769: Visitor in the Mist

After hurrying to the window, Zhou Ming was able to confirm, much to his astonishment, that what he had seen was indeed real—there were actual words written on the window! Even more intriguing was the fact that these words were inscribed from the outside, using the widely recognized language of the city-states.

The appearance of the words was peculiar; they seemed to quiver slightly on the glass, creating an unsettling effect. It was as if they weren't directly etched onto the firm, unyielding surface of the window but rather appeared to be suspended in a sort of ephemeral, mist-like illusion. Zhou Ming had to concentrate intensely on these letters for a considerable duration before he could decipher the message from the indistinct and reversed script—

"I am outside. You are inside."

This revelation left Zhou Ming utterly bewildered—he couldn't fathom why anyone, or anything, for that matter, would go to the lengths of leaving such a seemingly simplistic and cryptic message on the exterior of his "shelter cocoon."

At first, he couldn't help but find the situation somewhat amusing, yet a moment later, his amusement gave way to contemplation as a vague idea began to form in his mind.

Zhou Ming gradually moved away from the window, casting his gaze towards the gray-white fog that shrouded the exterior.

He had been attempting to piece together what lay beyond his “apartment” with only vague guesses up until this point. While the finer details eluded him, he had started to discern a certain pattern or, more precisely, a fundamental logic underlying the deepest essence of this world.

He realized that the notion of “information” carried profound significance; the way information is conveyed lays the groundwork for order. Building on this realization, he understood that “symbolism” in this realm possessed a tangible and potent… “function.”

With this epiphany, Zhou Ming looked back at the text, his perception subtly shifting. He began to suspect that the phrase wasn’t simply meant for “communication” with him.

Instead, it served as an “anchor point”—a marker placed by some entity that comprehended and had the power to manipulate the “truth” of their reality, marking its presence outside his room.

Suddenly, Zhou Ming’s train of thought was interrupted by a recollection: the mysterious knocking sound that emanated from the black mist during his last return to this place!

In the next instant, as if his memories had the power to influence reality itself, the moment this thought crossed his mind, a sound abruptly emerged beside him—bang, bang, bang.

Zhou Ming quickly turned towards the apartment’s door, only to realize that the sound wasn’t emanating from there. The knocking was coming from the window, suggesting the presence of an unseen visitor outside, obscured by the gray-white fog, persistently tapping on the glass, invisible yet undeniably there, as if awaiting recognition from the “little house’s” inhabitant.

This scenario inexplicably made Zhou Ming think of those “fish.”

Zhou Ming approached the window once more, this time placing his hand against the glass where the knocking originated in an effort to both feel and hear more distinctly—the knocking persisted, and slowly, he began to sense an actual vibration transmitting through his palm.

Lifting his gaze, he peered into the dense fog outside, engaging in a silent confrontation with the “visitor” obscured within it. He envisioned a guest, a being that, among all conceivable possibilities and logical paths, “might possibly manifest here.”

Who could it be, reaching out to him from the very edge of order, from a realm nearly severed from all other existences, at the very foundation of reality itself?

A shadowy figure briefly materialized within the mist, and just as this shadow came into view, Zhou Ming sensed a familiar essence piercing through the dense veil—a spark of his own, a blast from the past he presumed lost forever.

This realization instantly validated his perceptions; the “visitor in the mist” materialized into a definitive presence.

Abruptly, the gray-white mist dissipated, and the once perpetual “landscape” outside transformed in an instant into a brightly lit, elegantly furnished room—a stark contrast to the view from his side of the window. Across this newly revealed setting stood a woman with silver hair cascading over her shoulders, her eyes wide in astonishment at the dramatic shift unfolding before her.

“Ali…” Zhou Ming found himself uttering instinctively at the sight of her, but he quickly corrected himself, “No, Ray Nora—is it really you?!”

With this acknowledgment, the truth ushered in a directed collapse, and the view outside the window solidified.

There stood the Frost Queen Ray Nora, the enigmatic “visitor in the mist.” Now, she continued to gaze intensely at Zhou Ming—or more precisely, at an unfathomable presence enveloped within some vast, chaotic expanse.

Her eyes mirrored the infinite depths of distant galaxies, their light piercing through the “glass” into her surroundings, casting a subtle celestial glow over what was once a part of “Alice Mansion’s” bedroom, as if it were on the verge of being engulfed by the cosmos itself.

However, under Zhou Ming’s watchful eye, Ray Nora’s expression suddenly shifted, as if she had managed to shake off the mesmerizing effect of the cosmic light, regaining her clarity. She attempted to speak, but through the barrier of the window, only indistinct sounds could be heard.

“…I see… light…”

Zhou Ming, driven by an urge to comprehend her words fully, instinctively pushed the window open.

He remained motionless, staring in disbelief at the now open window, taking a moment to grasp the reality of the situation—the window had indeed opened!

After an interminable duration, during which the dense fog had enveloped this room, rendering it seemingly inaccessible, the window had unexpectedly swung open with startling ease. Zhou Ming was momentarily paralyzed by disbelief, struggling to process the ease with which the barrier between him and the outside world had been dismantled.

Regaining his composure, his attention was immediately captured by the figure of “the Frost Queen” Ray Nora, stationed across from him.

For Ray Nora, witnessing the barrier of light that she had been facing suddenly give way was beyond astonishing; it was an event that defied all expectations in her “drifting journey” across realms. To encounter an entity endowed with “intellect”—perhaps even “humanity”—at the very edge of time and space was a revelation that shattered all her conceptions of the universe.

Despite the overwhelming chaos of starlight that obscured any definitive shape, making it impossible to discern any logic or reason within that bewildering expanse, she intuitively recognized the intelligence behind it. It had heeded her call, unveiling a portion of its enigmatic domain. A “limb” now extended towards her, adorned with millions of eyes that flickered and emitted a discordant sound.

“It’s really you,” Zhou Ming expressed his astonishment upon seeing “Her Majesty the Queen” again, grappling with his confusion. “You’ll have to wait a moment, I’m a bit confused… How did you find yourself here? You departed from Alice’s Mansion, and since then, you’ve been… wandering at the fringes? Was it you who knocked last time?”

The cacophony among the stars was overwhelming, yet amidst the turmoil, Ray Nora’s clarity was being incessantly reforged. She watched the “limb” oscillate before her, the myriad voices at its end clamoring for her attention, but gradually, she began to decipher their message.

She realized she was beginning to comprehend the whispers of the cosmos—they were inquiring about her quest.

“I’m on a journey,” she responded instinctively, recounting her odyssey. “I was adrift in the spirit realm, then caught in the currents of subspace… At the edge of all existence, I found myself ensnared by the mist. Yet, a beacon of light emerged, guiding me here, to this grand ‘hall’…”

Ray Nora paused, stepping back to fully appreciate the structure before her that appeared to transcend time itself—a “cocoon” suspended at the brink of oblivion, its duration in this liminal space unknown, now revealing a sliver of itself. An ancient and profound presence communicated with her through this opening, each utterance, each vibration laden with truths so profound they could unravel the mind a thousand times over.

Yet, amidst this confrontation with the unfathomable, she found herself gaining steadiness, becoming resilient enough to withstand the onslaught of these cosmic truths. Her mind, too, began to anchor itself more firmly amidst the chaos.

Ray Nora found herself unexpectedly adapting to the situation, regaining her sense of logic and clarity after what could only be described as a reckless encounter with the unknown. It hadn't even dawned on her that her own voice had taken on a vibratory quality, echoing the tumultuous interaction, nor had she realized how the intense luminescence of starlight had become a permanent fixture in her field of vision.

"You fell into subspace?" Zhou Ming expressed his astonishment with a frown, noting the peculiar tone in Ray Nora's voice as she responded. Despite sensing something off about her condition, he didn't dwell on it too much. Instead, he scrutinized her for any signs of subspace contamination, half-jokingly lamenting, "…Why does it seem like everyone's been taking subspace dips lately…"

Feeling somewhat bewildered by the ongoing stir within her soul, Ray Nora couldn't grasp the significance of the new tremors. Yet, amidst this confusion, she began to perceive a more coherent "entity" amidst the chaotic swirl of starlight and the extending "limb." It appeared as though a figure was standing within that vast and impressive "nest."

With a slight tilt of her head and a furrowed brow, she ventured, "Are you inviting me in?"

Zhou Ming was caught off guard by her question—had he extended an invitation?

Shaking off the momentary confusion, he embraced the idea. Having been isolated in this secluded “cage” for so long, the prospect of entertaining a guest was genuinely appealing. He hadn’t anticipated company, but now that the opportunity had arisen, he found the idea rather pleasant.

Feeling somewhat sheepish, he glanced down at the windowsill and chuckled awkwardly, “Then you’ll have to climb through the window… I’m not quite sure how to usher you in through the door…”

In response, the supernatural presence made way for her; the fissure in the cosmic “nest” widened as if opening its doors, and the light, brimming with truth and enlightenment, beckoned her forward.

Without a second thought, Ray Nora advanced towards the beckoning light.

As Zhou Ming observed her bold, unhesitant approach through the window, he was struck by the realization of why she had been the one to spearhead the deep dive project decades earlier. Her determination and decisiveness far surpassed that of the average individual.

Nonetheless, he couldn’t resist cautioning her, “Hey, be careful, don’t fall…”

Ray Nora transitioned through the window, her surroundings undergoing a dramatic transformation.

And then, with a solid impact, Her Majesty the Queen landed on the floor. “Ouch!”

Chapter 770: The Visiting Frost Queen

The atmosphere in the room was momentarily filled with silence.

Zhou Ming chose not to break the quiet, feeling that any words spoken in this peculiar situation might only serve to make things more uncomfortable than they already were.

Similarly, the Frost Queen remained silent as well, continuing to lie on the floor, making no attempt to get up.

In this way, the two of them found themselves in a strange sort of standoff. The Frost Queen was busily engaged in chewing on the floor, while Zhou Ming, unable to tear his gaze away, found himself fixated on the back of her head. This unusual scene persisted for about thirty seconds until Zhou Ming felt compelled to intervene. It simply didn’t seem proper to watch silently as a lady gnawed at the floor.

Gently bending over, he cautiously broke the silence, asking, “…Do you need help getting up?”

Ray Nora experienced a sudden shift in her perception. The incessant buzzing, the cacophony that had filled her mind, abruptly clarified into coherent human speech, understandable without the need for focused effort. This unexpected clarity prompted her to react swiftly, propelling herself off the floor with force.

In the process, her head collided with Zhou Ming's chin, a painful encounter that preempted any vocal reaction from her before she found herself once again in her initial position on the floor.

Zhou Ming, taken aback by her sudden movement, momentarily saw a burst of stars in his vision.

Quickly shaking off the disorientation, he ignored the lingering stars before his eyes and moved to assist the "Queen" who had stumbled once more, apologizing with a hint of awkwardness, "Sorry, I was standing in the wrong place… Are you okay?"

Despite the buzzing in her head, Ray Nora felt unprecedented clarity. She realized that her reasoning faculties had fully re-engaged, and a complex "understanding" had reassembled in her mind. This newfound clarity allowed her to perceive the surrounding chaos in a new light, revealing another aspect of this "nest."

She observed the room's floor, tables, chairs, and various other objects that seemed ordinary to humans, all suspended in a vast expanse of dimly lit darkness. This space seemed to be bordered by walls of illusion, perpetually expanding and contracting in her vision, creating an effect similar to a series of mimicked illusions.

This perception led her to feel as though some unnamed, non-human presence inhabited this space, expertly imitating human characteristics and surroundings.

She also noticed the "entity" that had spoken to her. Although it appeared as a bewildering array of stars, these stars now formed a vaguely human silhouette. While she couldn't discern any facial features within the radiant starlight, she could see the "hands" that were supporting her arms, and she heard the starlight articulate in a human voice, conveying a sense of friendliness and kindness.

“I… am okay,” Ray Nora responded, her voice tinged with hesitation. Despite the wisdom and poise typically associated with the Frost Queen, she appeared somewhat bewildered by the series of unforeseen events. Seeking to engage with this “entity” that seemed to emulate human behavior, she apologized, “Sorry for disturbing your peace, I was merely… curious, and then this curiosity ensnared me in your ‘palace’…”

Zhou Ming’s brow furrowed slightly, sensing something peculiar in the manner in which the Frost Queen addressed him. However, he didn’t dwell on this feeling for long, as he was equally bewildered by the situation—the vision of stars swirling before his eyes hadn’t yet cleared, and he could only manage a vague gesture with his hand, saying, “It’s okay, I never imagined… you would be the first ‘human’ to visit this place.”

Driven by her escalating curiosity, Ray Nora gestured towards a spherical object hovering near what could be assumed to be the entity’s head, given the constellation of stars forming its semblance, and inquired, “…What is this?”

Zhou Ming glanced upwards, his face momentarily adopting a contemplative silence before he attempted to grasp the small celestial body, which was enveloped in a faint yellow hue, seemingly detached from his own essence. Upon his touch, the miniature planet silently merged back into him.

“This is Venus,” he explained, striving to maintain a neutral expression and tone, “a… star.”

Ray Nora observed this vision with wide-eyed wonder, spontaneously reacting with, “…Incredible.”

“I also find it incredible,” Zhou Ming admitted earnestly, “Before you collided with me, I could never have envisioned… such an event occurring.”

He then looked down at his hands, which appeared normal, but as he focused, imagining the cosmos, faint stars began to materialize before his eyes. His transformation seemed to deepen…

Puzzled by the “stellar entity’s” actions, Ray Nora was simply astonished that it exhibited human-like intelligence, marveling at the fact she was engaging in conversation with such a remarkable being at the world’s edge. Feeling reassured by the entity’s friendly demeanor, she ventured more boldly, “Have you… always resided here?”

Zhou Ming’s frown deepened as he suddenly identified the subtle oddity in Ray Nora’s way of speaking.

“You don’t recognize me?” he queried, his surprise evident.

“Recognize you?” Ray Nora responded, her gaze filled with confusion as she looked at the non-human figure, “Have we… met previously?”

After a brief pause, Zhou Ming had a realization—of course, Ray Nora had never actually seen him before.

She had encountered Duncan.

Thus, he opened his palm, summoning forth a flame for Ray Nora to see.

A greenish flame emerged amidst the stars, establishing a connection instantly—the flicker of flame that Ray Nora had previously encountered resonated with the one now before her.

“Do you remember now?” The constellation of stars vibrated as it communicated in human speech.

Ray Nora was momentarily paralyzed by the revelation, taking several seconds to regain her composure before looking at Zhou Ming in utter disbelief: “You are… the Captain?!”

“…That’s one aspect of my being,” Zhou Ming reflected, attempting to clarify for the “Queen” his multifaceted nature, “Or rather, one of my forms, a vessel.”

He paused for a moment, then felt compelled to share his thoughts: “You are the first ‘human’ to witness me in this form, now you’re privy to a secret unknown to others.”

A wave of profound realization surged through Ray Nora’s consciousness, akin to the overwhelming awe she experienced upon her first encounter with the enigmatic “cocoon” – a seismic shift in her understanding, revealing truths previously concealed!

Yet, perhaps due to her prior venture through the “crack” into this “cocoon” and enduring an initial awakening, the disorientation this time was fleeting. She swiftly regained her cognitive clarity and pieced everything together—

She had stumbled upon an enigmatic force at the edge of existence, a confluence of countless forms, an entity whose “tentacles” reached into the fabric of reality itself, manifesting in myriad ways yet stemming from a singular origin. This origin lay dormant at the end of all time, and now she, a daring explorer, had uncovered it.

“We haven’t seen each other for a long time,” Zhou Ming remarked with a smile, aware that the revelation would momentarily disorient Ray Nora, yet noting her prolonged daze, he felt compelled to engage her in conversation, “Don’t just stand there, come sit down. Tell me about your adventures after you ‘escaped,’ how you discovered my ‘little abode,’ and what those symbols you were tracing outside mean.”

With that, he made his way to the sofa.

“Don’t be put off by the simplicity here. After the apocalypse, resources are scarce, and this place can’t hold a candle to the grandeur of your former palace or your opulent bedroom now—and there's little here for entertainment. But then, as a ghost now, you probably don't have much use for food, do you?"

"Uh… no, no need."

Ray Nora responded almost reflexively, still somewhat in a trance as she followed Zhou Ming to the sofa. Her steps were uncertain, as if the ground beneath her shifted and undulated, sparking Zhou Ming's curiosity: "Feeling dizzy?"

Internally, Ray Nora lamented: everything in this realm hovered in a state of perpetual flux, hardly a stable environment for mortals, hence the dizziness was to be expected.

However, she hesitated to voice this complaint in front of the "stellar entity," instead bravely admitting, "A bit, but it's manageable."

"…Oh, then please, take a seat quickly."

Zhou Ming suggested, his tone reflecting a hint of concern as he touched his nose, musing over the fact—the "Queen" had indeed suffered a couple of harsh falls to the floor, quite forcefully at that… It appeared those impacts were not trivial.

Yet, he didn't dwell on guilt—he too had been struck hard enough to see stars.

Once seated on the sofa, Ray Nora found her surroundings marginally more stable.

Though the "sofa" itself was shrouded in an enigmatic dark mist, its surface pulsating with a vibrant "hue" reminiscent of a living organism, at least seated, she was spared the disorienting sensation of traversing through chaos.

Zhou Ming took a seat on an adjacent sofa, his gaze filled with curiosity as he regarded the Frost Queen, long lost to time: “Alright, now share the tale of your journey.”

“…After I managed to escape from that confining space, I’ve been navigating through the intricacies of time and space,” Ray Nora began, succinctly capturing the essence of her adventures post her escape from what she referred to as “Alice’s mansion with her bedroom.” “The journey I undertook was nothing short of peculiar. As I mentioned earlier, it even involved traversing the disturbances within subspace—my ‘little house’ served as a sort of sanctuary, shielding me as I ventured through these chaotic, fragmented passageways that exist beyond the conventional dimensions of our reality…”

“My travels were laden with remarkable occurrences, tales of which I’m eager to share with you later. However, what might capture your interest at this moment is the manner in which I stumbled upon this location…”

“To summarize the experience, I was inadvertently drawn here by a sudden current. After enduring a prolonged period of entrapment, the beacon that initially directed me to your home was… a lamp.”

“…A lantern?!” Zhou Ming reacted, his eyes growing wide in astonishment.

“Indeed, a lantern, adrift in the mist,” Ray Nora affirmed with earnestness, “Specifically, a lantern of the type commonly used aboard vessels.”

Chapter 771: Ray Noras Journey

The atmosphere in the Nest became eerily quiet for a brief moment, so much so that the constant, low-grade tremors that usually echoed between the stars seemed to pause. Ray Nora noticed the humanoid figure in front of her freeze, almost as if her words had put it into a temporary state of suspension. Then, after what felt like an eternity, the area of space that had been still, where the starlight had paused, started to pulsate and shift once again, breaking the silence.

“Is there only one lantern? Can you tell me more about its surroundings? And where exactly can it be found?” Zhou Ming pressed, his gaze locked onto the Frost Queen’s eyes with intense curiosity, bombarding her with questions.

Ray Nora answered quickly, “There’s just a single lantern, and it’s hanging from a broken piece of wood. That’s all there is—no other objects around. It seems to be suspended in mid-air, enveloped by a dense fog,” she explained. “As for its location, it’s incredibly close to your ‘palace’, almost directly beside it…”

She paused momentarily as if a flood of additional details had just occurred to her. After organizing her thoughts, she resumed, “The lantern itself doesn’t emit a strong light; logically, it shouldn’t be visible from a distance through the fog. Yet, the instant I arrived here, it caught my eye. I maneuvered my ‘drifting house’ closer to it, and it took a considerable amount of time to actually reach it. It’s as if… the lantern’s light isn’t hindered by the fog or how far away one is; as long as it remains lit in this place, its light seems capable of reaching any location within this fog."

Upon hearing her detailed account, Zhou Ming sank into a deep contemplation. Ray Nora added, "Of course, these are merely my own observations and speculations—you must understand, many phenomena here are… 'unusual', making it challenging for me to discern whether my perceptions or feelings accurately reflect reality."

"I understand," Zhou Ming responded softly. Then, something seemed to jog his memory, prompting him to suddenly stand and walk over to a desk a short distance away.

Ray Nora stayed seated on the sofa, wary of moving. From her perspective, she watched as the mass of previously stationary starlight started to stretch and move in an unpredictable direction, eventually coming to a halt.

Not paying heed to the confused look, Zhou Ming reached for a sheet of paper at the edge of the desk and grabbed a pencil, quickly beginning to sketch. He drew a lantern with a traditional design, crafted from brass, attempting to accurately capture the intricate details of the lantern that hung in the captain's quarters.

After a short time, he returned to Ray Nora with the drawing in hand, showing her the depiction on the paper. "Does the lantern look like this?" he asked.

The entity made of starlight extended its limbs, each ending in numerous eyes that converged their focus on a singular point. In front of these eyes, a holographic projection of a lantern materialized as if summoned from the void.

Ray Nora's body stiffened in response. History had shown that the casual demonstrations of high-dimensional beings could prove fatal to the unprepared mortal, capable of driving even the most seasoned scholars to the brink of insanity with a mere glance. However, she quickly realized she was not descending into madness.

The multitude of eyes fixed upon her with a softness, displaying a patient and friendly anticipation for her reaction. It appeared she had become thoroughly acclimated to the presence of these starlit beings.

"…It's very similar," Ray Nora found her voice, scrutinizing the projected image with a careful eye. "The details elude me, but the resemblance is striking—somewhere between seventy to eighty percent accurate."

Zhou Ming exhaled a sigh of relief upon hearing her assessment, his theory now gaining substantial credence.

The lantern was "his"—a beacon left by Duncan Abnomar during his final journey in the year 1800, a "marker" akin to a guiding light in this otherworldly domain.

Zhou Ming's mind was awash with contemplation, silence enveloping him as he pieced together fragmented thoughts. The lantern amidst the fog took on a symbolic meaning beyond mere illumination; it served as a beacon of guidance.

For vessels adrift in the fog, a light piercing the gloom signifies the path to safety—a beacon towards refuge.

His own abode, shrouded in the fog, might mark the boundary of this realm or perhaps lay even beyond. Here, the passage back to the realm of order is veiled by chaos…

The presence of the lantern established a "connection"—geographically pointing towards the Boundless Sea and temporally marking the moment when the Vanished would reemerge into reality, signaling the impending conclusion of the Boundless Sea's existence.

Lost in his thoughts, Zhou Ming's gaze drifted, reflecting on the profound implications.

His experiences had led him to a vague understanding of the "deep rules" governing the world, among which the critical role of "information" in the fabric of reality stood paramount.

Evidently, the "captain" who had ventured to the world's edge had also encountered these truths—it appeared that in the final voyage of the Vanished, "he" had come to know many secrets.

Zhou Ming's attention shifted towards the apartment door. Under his intense stare, the door seemed to swing open, revealing the swirling, pitch-black fog beyond—on the other side lay the Vanished, specifically the captain's quarters adjacent to the "Door of the Lost."

That was the lantern's rightful place.

Thus, it was confirmed: the lantern had always been right at his doorstep, a constant presence.

Zhou Ming's focus returned from the vivid imagination of his contemplations, the door in front of him remained closed, a silent guardian awaiting its owner's return to reality from the depths of thought.

Ray Nora, in the meantime, was careful to keep her silence. While she couldn't discern any human-like expressions from the swirling mass of starlight that represented the being in front of her, she sensed its deep engagement in thought. The thoughts of this entity sent ripples through the surrounding chaos, accompanied by a constant, low, indistinct moan that seemed to fill the space around them. She remembered the rigorous training from her youth, designed to keep her from listening, thinking, or trying to comprehend these sounds that sought to invade her mind.

Her goal was clear: to prevent her own thoughts from dissolving into the entity's, to avoid becoming just another transient idea within its vast contemplation.

Thankfully, this intense period of reflection seemed to come to an end—the omnipresent low moan slowly subsided, and the entity's attention returned to her with a gentle focus.

"Sorry, I got a bit distracted," Zhou Ming offered courteously, "Now, let's shift our conversation to your other experiences. I'm quite intrigued."

Ray Nora let out a sigh of relief, grateful for the shift in focus. She found it far easier to talk about her experiences than to "listen" to the entity's thoughts.

"After I broke free, I had trouble controlling my 'drifting house' at first, so I ended up wandering for what seemed like an extended period. In fact, I believe I experienced a longer duration than you might expect, encountering numerous strange phenomena related to timelines along the way…"

Zhou Ming listened without interruption to Ray Nora's recounting of her adventures post-escape. His attention was unwavering and filled with interest as she described the remarkable and supernatural things she witnessed upon gaining her freedom.

For the most part, the tales of her travels didn't offer much in terms of solving the current puzzles Zhou Ming was pondering over; they were largely accounts of peculiar landscapes and phenomena one might encounter in the realm of spirits. However, for Ray Nora, these experiences were beyond anything she could have imagined or encountered during her rule as the Frost Queen.

She had achieved her desire to explore, witnessing a myriad of vistas throughout her extensive journey.

Eventually, Ray Nora came to the topic of the last “disturbance” she faced and how she arrived in this fog-enshrouded location.

“…The disturbance occurred after I escaped subspace while I was navigating just above the abyssal deep sea, under that ‘dome’ with the stagnant starry sky,” she reminisced, “Suddenly, a shockwave erupted from the depths of the sea, seemingly aiming right at me, and forcefully ejected me outwards. Following that was a lengthy period where I lost complete control over my ‘drifting house.’ By the time I managed to stabilize, I found myself here.”

Zhou Ming was deep in thought, his brow furrowing as he pondered the situation. “Could it be the Nether Lord?” he murmured to himself in a low tone, his voice tinged with uncertainty. “But that doesn’t seem quite right… There has to be a reason behind this.”

“The Nether Lord?” Ray Nora, catching his muttered speculation, reacted with visible surprise. “Do you mean to say that the Nether Lord was responsible for creating that shockwave and intentionally sent me here?”

“Just speculating,” Zhou Ming clarified with a shake of his head, aware that no definitive answer was at hand. Thus, he quickly steered the conversation away from the topic. “Let’s not dwell on that for now. Let’s talk about this ‘fog’. Are you familiar with what this place actually is?”

Ray Nora took a moment to consider his question, her silence stretching for a long moment before she gave a complex nod.

“In the beginning, I was clueless. But after spending some time enveloped in this dense fog, I began to witness… ‘phantoms.’ Knowledge seemed to flood into my mind out of nowhere,” she spoke softly, a hint of awe in her voice. “This is the end of the world. Here, I’ve glimpsed the shadow of the end of all things.”

“You should consider yourself fortunate for having followed that lantern to my doorstep and stopping outside my place,” Zhou Ming responded gravely. “It’s a good thing you didn’t venture further into this fog. Otherwise, you might have never found your way back.”

At this moment, even the brave Frost Queen felt a shiver run down her spine.

She realized that she had been like a traveler on a raft, powerless against the current, hurtling toward the brink of a waterfall. Just as she was about to be swept over the edge and into the abyss, she was fortuitously stopped by the only “rock” in the rapids.

Though the collision with this “rock” nearly shattered her.

After a brief pause, however, a look of hesitation crossed her face, and she eventually voiced a troubling thought: “Actually… I ventured a bit too deep…”

Zhou Ming, momentarily caught off guard, responded with a puzzled “Hmm?”

“…After I followed the ‘light’ to your ‘palace,’ I attempted to make contact with the large ‘entity’ there, but you didn’t respond at the time. Instead, a shadow surged out from your ‘palace.’ That indescribable force struck my ‘drifting house,’ causing it to lose control once again for a brief moment, and I was pushed deeper into the fog. Thankfully, it wasn’t too severe this time…”

Zhou Ming’s expression turned slightly awkward at her admission.

Chapter 772: Setting Off on the Journey Again

When Ray Nora shared that an unidentified mass had emerged from his glowing cocoon, momentarily causing her drifting house to veer off course, Zhou Ming's face subtly changed. He took a moment to think and then guessed that this mass might be the "miscellaneous items" he had discarded earlier.

His original plan was to use these items as a conduit for initiating contact with an external entity.

However, the method of communication turned out to be rather forceful.

Luckily, Ray Nora seemed to have not faced significant difficulties due to this incident—and she also failed to notice the brief, telling silence of the "Thousand-Faced Bright Star" before her.

Capitalizing on the opportunity, Zhou Ming steered the conversation in a new direction: "So, after the momentary loss of control, what occurred? You mentioned you 'overshot'… Could you elaborate on that?"

Ray Nora, not suspecting anything amiss, knitted her brows in concentration. After a brief pause, she recounted, "When my drifting house momentarily went off course, I found myself in the thickest part of this fog. Eventually, I came to a halt near an unseen… 'border.' Describing this border to you is challenging… It's intangible, invisible to the naked eye, yet the fog abruptly ends at its edge. Beyond this border is a vast emptiness."

She hesitated, sensing that her explanation still lacked precision, her expression one of vexation. Zhou Ming's demeanor grew more serious: "Emptiness?"

"Yes, a true void. Not merely darkness or 'emptiness' as we usually understand it… I'm struggling to convey this accurately. Even in 'places of emptiness,' there's at least some notion of 'place,' but what I encountered defies logical explanation," Ray Nora said, clearly finding it difficult to articulate and remember her experience, "Consider the perception of the world by individuals born blind, those who've never seen light, who lack visual context. It's commonly believed their world is dark, but their 'vision' is actually an extreme 'void'…"

She paused, using her hands to illustrate her point, "They don't perceive 'darkness' because, in a strict sense, 'darkness' is still a part of vision. Having never seen any color or shape, the concept of 'a world of darkness' is too abstract and unfathomable for them. Thus, from their perspective, their 'view' isn't black but 'void,' devoid of color and form, making the visual world utterly non-existent. That's how I felt beyond that border. I felt as though I should 'see' something, yet it was beyond my comprehension and perception to the extent that my mind couldn't even form an 'image.' I recall hearing some sort of sound then and in my memories of it. Still, my mind was blank. I stood at that invisible threshold, fully aware it was a 'border.' A border implies there's 'another side,' but it… simply didn't exist."

Ray Nora gestured with her hand, her expression still clouded by the unsettling and unnerving memory she was recalling.

"There's no 'other side'…" Zhou Ming's brows furrowed in contemplation as he listened to her abstract and difficult-to-grasp explanations, his mind beginning to draw parallels, "Is it like a sheet of paper that doesn't have a 'back side'?"

Ray Nora’s eyes widened in astonishment, then she observed the “stellar entity” before her as it raised its appendages amidst a backdrop of countless eyes and shimmering starlight, a… form started to materialize.

Zhou Ming took a piece of paper, twisted it, and joined the ends together.

A rush of insight flooded Ray Nora’s consciousness, and in that instant, she grasped the concept of a Möbius strip.

The immense “void” she had encountered suddenly made sense to her.

“That’s exactly it!” she exclaimed, snapping out of her reverie, her eyes locked on the structure ensconced in turmoil, illuminated by thousands of eyes, “This is what I experienced! A boundary without an ‘other side,’ a sheet of paper lacking a ‘back side!’ The ultimate limit, the very ‘end!’”

The form then discreetly disappeared.

Zhou Ming let go of the Möbius strip, and as the paper loop settled on the table, he pondered, “Could this represent the outer limit?…”

He was aware that the protective barrier erected by the “gods” was far from simple. The Möbius strip served merely as an easily digestible “analogy”—the two concepts weren’t exactly identical, but based on Ray Nora’s description of the “boundary scene,” there had to be some similarities.

Ray Nora watched him, her gaze filled with confusion and curiosity.

“You’ve ventured to the very edge of the world—maybe even beyond where the ancient monarchs ceased their exploration,” Zhou Ming said to “the Frost Queen,” his voice carrying a hint of unease, “You witnessed… what lies beyond the boundary, yet it was incomprehensible to you…”

A Möbius strip possesses no “end.” For an entity traversing its surface, no matter how far it travels within its continuous loop, it will never encounter the “edge” of the Möbius strip, nor will it be able to discern an “invisible boundary” there, which can invoke a sense of dread and bewilderment at the “void” perceived. Yet, Ray Nora, in her daring journey, had at some point felt the presence of that “end.”

She had undergone an “ascension of dimensions”. Although unable to “understand” the scene before her and feeling she encountered only “void,” she had, for a brief moment, become someone… standing outside of the loop.

He painstakingly detailed everything to Ray Nora, elucidating the bizarre occurrences she encountered and the true nature of the “dimensional ascent” she underwent over time.

Information surged into Ray Nora’s consciousness, transforming her understanding and very being.

Yet, she embraced these revelations with open arms and sheer delight.

This quest for knowledge was precisely why she embarked on her journey, precisely what she yearned for at this juncture.

She was eager to explore more vistas, to grasp the full meaning of her observations.

“I should leave now,” she abruptly declared, rising to her feet.

Zhou Ming regarded the Frost Queen with a mix of surprise and speechlessness, momentarily unsure of what to say.

“I want to take another look there,” Ray Nora said, turning to him with her gaze ablaze with starlight that seemed to have etched a permanent presence in her eyes, “With my newfound understanding, I feel… this time, I might actually perceive something within that ‘void,’ perhaps… entities that previously eluded my comprehension but truly exist.”

Zhou Ming remained silent for a beat, then slowly got up from the sofa.

“Do you believe that ‘something’ exists within that void?”

“Yes,” Ray Nora replied instantly, her voice carrying a depth of conviction and determination that might baffle others, “I’ve sensed them, heard them, akin to the wind whispering across stones, leaving no imprint on my consciousness as if fingers fail to discern colors or eyes cannot measure warmth. My logic was too limited to grasp the entities beyond that ‘end,’ but now… I sense a shift. I can perceive them, even if only faintly.”

Zhou Ming locked eyes with the Frost Queen. “You’re choosing a path fraught with danger,” he remarked abruptly, “You nearly got swallowed by that ‘end’ before, and yet you choose to return.”

“Yes, it’s a gamble,” Ray Nora responded, her smile radiant and eyes sparkling with an adventurous gleam, “Adventure inherently carries its risks.”

“…Akin to embarking on another ‘Deep Dive Project’?”

“…Exactly, like launching another ‘Deep Dive Project,’” Ray Nora’s smile faded as she solemnly nodded, “My personal Deep Dive Project.”

She averted her gaze, inhaled deeply, and after a brief pause, reflected, “See, I really wasn’t meant to play the role of a ‘queen.’”

Zhou Ming remained silent, his steps carrying him towards the window that linked to the “Drifting House.”

After a moment, he spoke again, “I’m bound to this place—I cannot leave. So, remember to share with me what you discover.”

Ray Nora nodded enthusiastically: “Of course, I’ll be your eyes.”

She then made her way back to the “rift,” poised to return to her drifting house for another expedition, her spirit undiminished by the challenges that lay ahead.

Zhou Ming watched as the determined Frost Queen embarked on her new venture.

For a brief moment, he pondered the propriety of allowing this woman to exit through the window as the commencement of her grand adventure, feeling it lacked the gravitas such a departure deserved.

Yet, he quickly reconsidered… perhaps the informality was fitting.

The queen, once confined, now had the liberty to begin her journey in any manner she preferred.

His visitor had departed.

With a soft hum, the window sealed shut, and the view outside was swiftly swallowed by dense fog—Zhou Ming barely caught a glimpse of the drifting house before it vanished from sight.

He lingered by the window, lost in thought for an extended period, then diverted his attention back inside, his gaze sweeping across the living room.

The recent events felt surreal as if someone perpetually secluded in a cabin had dreamt of receiving a visitor.

Approaching the sofa, however, the sight of the Möbius strip fashioned from a paper strip, resting on the coffee table with its ends still gently curved, grounded the experience in reality.

Beside it, a piece of paper bore the sketch of an old-fashioned lantern.

There had indeed been a visitor.

Zhou Ming exhaled, a sense of relief washing over him, making him feel a tad lighter. He then smiled, shook his head in amusement, and made his way to the apartment’s door.

Upon opening the door, the ever-present, shifting black fog greeted him as usual…

Chapter 773: Leaping Across the Boundary

Duncan gently pushed the door to the captain's cabin open and made his way inside, immediately drawing the gaze of Goathead, who rested atop the navigation table. Under the subdued lighting of the cabin, Goathead's eyes followed him in silence, a stark contrast to the usual bustle of seafaring life.

With a nonchalant air and a wave of his hand, Duncan announced his return, "Duncan Abnomar— I'm back," before peering out the window, curiosity lacing his tone, "Where are we now?"

Before entering the cabin, Duncan observed that their ship had successfully navigated through the ominous dark mist. Now, he noted, the fog blanketing the sea had transformed back to its mundane shade of grayish-white. The dense fog appeared almost serene under the light, rolling silently in the distance.

"We arrived at the boundary line of six nautical miles about fifteen minutes ago. The fleet is currently on standby, awaiting your orders," the Goathead responded, its voice creaking as it moved its head to maintain its gaze on Duncan, "You… seem to have ventured far or been absent for quite some time. At first glance, I scarcely recognized you."

Duncan listened to Goathead's words, which carried a hint of unease, but he merely gestured dismissively with his hand. Rather than approaching the navigation table as he typically would, he pivoted slowly, his attention seemingly caught by something else. His eyes settled on an antique brass lantern that hung unassumingly on the wall beside him, its presence as ordinary as any other item in the room when unlit.

With a deliberate motion, he removed the lantern from its hook and scrutinized it closely, its antiquity evident in his careful handling.

“Do you intend to visit the lower deck?” inquired Goathead from behind him, a note of perplexity in its voice, “The lower deck is presently calm, requiring no intervention, and given our critical juncture…”

“No, I’m not headed to the lower deck,” Duncan cut in, bringing the lantern back to the navigation table and setting it down with a casual air, “What can you tell me about this lantern?”

Goathead seemed momentarily taken aback by the captain’s abrupt shift in focus, especially after his prolonged absence and sudden return. Nonetheless, it replied after a brief pause, its tone reflective, “In terms of its function, I believe I’ve already informed you. However, if you’re inquiring about its origins… then, I must admit, it was already here when I boarded.”

“This lantern was part of the Vanished from the beginning,” Duncan mused, a spark of realization igniting in his eyes. A question then dawned on him, one he had never thought to ask before, “Wait, how do you know about the lantern’s purpose then? Who explained its function to you? And what about the other items on this ship…”

“The ship itself imparted the knowledge to me,” Goathead began, pausing momentarily as it adopted a more solemn tone, “I am acquainted with the purpose of everything aboard this vessel. A significant portion of this understanding is derived from the ship’s own ‘memory,’ while the remainder comes from…”

It trailed off, allowing its gaze to drift towards Duncan, caught in a brief spell of hesitation.

“From a time long past, when ‘the captain’ was still capable of thought and sporadic communication.”

Duncan acknowledged this revelation with a nod, signaling he did not wish to delve deeper into the matter, and redirected his focus to the lantern in question.

Observing the captain’s intense scrutiny of the lantern, Goathead’s curiosity was piqued. It closely inspected the familiar object and noted Duncan’s grave demeanor, “Is there an issue with this lantern?”

“…It’s fine,” Duncan momentarily hesitated, aware that discussing the subjects related to “the other side” of the door in Goathead’s presence was imprudent. Thus, he opted for a more indirect inquiry, “I was just wondering whether this lantern serves any additional purposes beyond offering solace during inspections of the lower deck?”

“As far as I am aware… its sole function is as you described,” Goathead replied after a brief contemplation, earnestly providing its understanding, “It accompanies the captain through the shadowy recesses, remembered by the ship for this role… perhaps, you could seek insights from Miss Lucretia?”

Duncan considered this for a moment, when abruptly, a shadow began to swell in a nearby mirror, soon giving way to Agatha’s form materializing from within the darkness, “Captain, we’ve intercepted a signal from the direction of the lighthouse, inquiring if an incident has occurred.”

With a sigh, Duncan stood, replacing the lantern on the wall—aware that the Bright Star along with the trio of church warships that served as both escorts and navigators, awaited his directive.

Recognizing the importance of their mission to explore the border, particularly given the perilous nature of the “outer seas” beyond the six nautical miles boundary line, he knew any delay was inadvisable.

“Instruct Vanna to reach out to her peers. Tell the church warships to draw near the lighthouse and convey to Sailor that he is to be ready at the stern. We’re poised to cross the boundary.”

“Understood, captain.” Agatha gave a respectful bow, her form gradually dissipating into the mirror’s shadow.

Subsequently, Duncan exited the captain’s cabin, his steps taking him across the deck shrouded in fog until he ascended the stairs beside the cabin, leading him to the expansive stern deck.

The Boundless Sea stretched out before him, its surface mirror-like and tranquil under the cover of a dense gray fog. The sky overhead was overcast, yet there was a distinct “glow” permeating the clouds and mist, an illumination unlike that of sunlight or the World’s Creation, casting a diffuse light that saved the sea from total darkness.

This unique “glow” that permeates the border seas is a phenomenon that persists even on days when the sun is hidden from view, casting a surreal light over the waters.

“So many breathtaking scenes, so many mysteries yearning for exploration…”

These words drifted towards Duncan from a nearby presence. Turning towards the source, he observed Morris standing at the edge of the stern deck, his gaze lost in the dense fog stretching into the distance.

The venerable scholar was clad in an old, worn coat, an unlit pipe in hand, his features etched with contemplation. Feeling Duncan’s eyes on him, Morris turned, offering a smile tinged with self-mockery.

“Just a bout of sentimentality, Captain. It’s hard not to feel a twinge of regret when faced with the prospect of the world’s demise and surrounded by innumerable phenomena that could occupy several lifetimes of study."

Duncan remained silent, simply joining the old scholar to gaze out into the fog.

Amidst the mist, a monumental lighthouse loomed, an architectural marvel that merged the functionality of a lighthouse, the sanctity of a church, and the innovation of a steam-powered platform. At its foundation lay a steam core, powering a vast harbor, atop which sat a church, its design inspired by the storm. The church's central spire served as the base for the lighthouse, around which a solemn black structure twisted upward, forming a spiraling exterior. Sacred steam pipes, nestled between each twist of the spiral, were visible, and crowning the structure was the "torch," a blessed flame that shone with an intensity surpassing any mundane light, its brilliance a testament to the church's prayers. Even in the dense fog that blankets the border seas, its light pierced through the mist.

Yet, its reach faltered at the chaos beyond the six nautical miles, a realm no longer bound by "order."

"That is the 'lighthouse' erected by the Storm Church at the eastern border. The other three major churches control similar beacons," Vanna added, having approached the stern deck as well. "Her Grace Helena mentioned that these lighthouses represent the pinnacle of the churches' achievements in their border expeditions. They can sustain communication and navigation for a short period beyond the six nautical miles boundary line, but that's the extent of their capability."

The sound of steam whistles filled the air, a reminder of the nearby seas' activity. The three church warships, tasked with navigation, slowly passed the Vanished and Bright Star, making their way towards the enigmatic lighthouse shrouded in fog.

The church warships had fulfilled their role; the next phase of “crossing the boundary” was a journey they were not equipped to join. It marked the conclusion of the living’s contribution to the expedition, paving the way for the “ghost ship” to assume command.

Duncan’s attention was drawn by the sound of hesitant steps approaching. Turning towards the source, he observed Anomaly 077 making his way towards him, a figure of uncertainty.

Adorned in a “naval uniform” that he had acquired from an unspecified source, the attire hung awkwardly on his emaciated, decayed form, a stark contrast to the remnants of his original, tattered clothing. The uniform, ill-fitting on his withered body, seemed an attempt to cloak the remnants of mortality.

“This was provided by the church…” Anomaly 077, catching Duncan’s eye, quickly gestured with his hand, “I thought it proper to dress more appropriately… a touch of formality never hurts.”

Duncan offered a nod of acknowledgment and casually inquired, “Are you prepared?”

“…To be honest, I’m feeling somewhat apprehensive,” Sailor admitted, his fingers instinctively adjusting a button on his uniform before he composed himself, striving to project a semblance of reliability, “But I am ready.”

Foregoing further conversation, Duncan lifted his gaze towards the Bright Star and silently communicated: “Lucy.”

“I’m here, Papa.”

“Sailor is set to take control. You’ll need to maintain close proximity to the Vanished,” Duncan instructed with gravity, “Moving forward, I’ll cease to restrain Anomaly 077’s influence and will instead amplify his presence. Should all proceed as planned, the Bright Star will be enveloped by his powers as well. We'll navigate the 'correct course' towards the final abode of the Storm Goddess."

Lucretia responded with a voice that conveyed both calm and resolution: "Understood, I'll keep pace."

With a nod and a deep inhalation, Duncan's gaze shifted back to Anomaly 077, who had now taken position at the helm.

"…Helmsman, execute your duties."

"Yes, Captain!"

The declaration came with a force and volume that belied Sailor's typically raspy voice. Grasping the helm with both hands, he initiated the transition.

Almost immediately, a greenish light began to shimmer around the Vanished, gradually extending to encompass the Bright Star in its glow.

The sound of squeaking and creaking filled the air as if the very fabric of space was contorting. The visages of both ships took on an ethereal quality before adjusting their bearings and surging forward into the denser fog.

As they embarked on this boundary-crossing venture, Duncan was greeted by the sound of steam whistles.

Initially, it was the trio of church warships bidding farewell, followed by the signal from the border-standing church lighthouse, and finally, the resonant calls from the vessels of the Storm Church anchored near the lighthouse.

These steam whistles, echoing at the edge of the known world, heralded the Vanished and Bright Star as they accelerated once more, bidding adieu to the realm of the living and crossing into the unknown.

Chapter 774: Convergence Window

After they sailed past the critical marker of six nautical miles, the environment around the Vanished and the Bright Star underwent a strange transformation.

The ocean and the fog abruptly disappeared, replaced by an odd twilight that enveloped the sky. This twilight spread everywhere, making it seem as though the entire world beyond the edges of the ships had lost its definition. Every distinct feature merged into a homogenous and indistinct… backdrop. The two ghostly vessels seemed to be gliding through this monochrome expanse as if they were floating in a void.

“…This isn’t what the church’s records suggested,” Vanna remarked, gazing out at the transformed surroundings, her words flowing without thought. “The documents mentioned that even after crossing the six nautical mile threshold for some distance, the sea and the sky should remain visible… I recall Miss Lucretia pointing this out too.”

Duncan, deep in thought, quietly lifted his gaze to observe Sailor, who was now clenching the wheel with a noticeable tension. After a brief pause, he finally broke the silence: “Maybe this is the scenario that unfolds when Anomaly 077 is ‘properly triggered’—we’re navigating through a unique ‘corridor’, shielded from the chaotic temporal disturbances that lie beyond the critical boundary.”

“But how long will we be traveling through this corridor, Captain?” Alice inquired, her curiosity piqued, standing beside him.

After a moment of reflection, Duncan shook his head, indicating uncertainty: “Even I can’t say for sure.”

Alice’s inquisitive eyes then shifted to Sailor managing the helm.

Feeling the weight of her stare, Anomaly 077’s anxiety heightened, causing him to retract slightly and protest, “Don’t look at me, I’m just as clueless. I’m merely handling the ship…”

As he spoke, he endeavored to maintain a stern demeanor, making slight adjustments to the wheel. Yet, in truth, he was unsure of the direction they were headed, merely moving the wheel back and forth to seem occupied. Given the surreal circumstances, the ship’s precise “course” seemed irrelevant to the position of the helm…

Duncan, perceptive but opting not to comment, checked the condition of the Vanished to ensure all was well, then shifted his focus away from Sailor’s predicament. He cast his gaze towards the nearby Bright Star, mentally reaching out: “Lucy, how are things on your side?”

“Everything’s as usual here, apart from Rabbi, who’s so terrified he’s barricaded himself inside a box, refusing to emerge,” came Lucretia’s immediate reply, her concern evident. “He’s incessantly babbling that we’re ‘plummeting’… plummeting towards the ‘end of the world’. It’s quite worrying.”

“Crashing towards the apocalypse?” Duncan’s brow furrowed in concern as he mulled over Rabbi’s frantic declaration. He turned his attention away from the conversation, his gaze sweeping across the deck to the ship’s edge, which was enveloped in a uniform expanse of “gray-white” that seemed to represent a vast emptiness.

“It could be referring to the ‘external barrier’,” Duncan mused, “Or possibly something that lies even further beyond that barrier.”

“Something beyond the barrier?” came Lucretia’s voice, tinged with confusion.

“…Ashes, the chaotic and unfathomable remnants of the old world that weren’t used as ‘building blocks’ for the new sanctuary,” Duncan elaborated, his mind tracing back to a recent discussion with Ray Nora. He remembered the Frost Queen’s words about the extreme purity and the terrifying “void” that exists at the world’s edge. An insight struck him, “… For a fish, the world of air would indeed be an incomprehensible void and an apocalypse.”

On the Bright Star’s bridge, Lucretia, upon hearing her father’s interpretation, seemed to grasp something deeper. She then glanced at the box near the helm, which was gently shaking with Rabbi’s ear peeking out, visibly trembling.

Miss Witch scowled slightly: “…As a creature meant to instill fear in others, must you be so frightened?”

“Rabbi… Rabbi isn’t meant to instill fear, Rabbi is… merely fear itself…” Rabbi’s voice was muffled inside the box as if trying to reassure itself, yet the tone shifted mid-sentence, “It’s truly horrifying, Mistress! We’re plummeting, descending rapidly! Don’t you feel it? It’s becoming colder, darker, more constricted, like plunging headlong into a narrow tube from an endless abyss, about to choke, freeze, be crushed, envision that scenario, imagine it…”

Without showing emotion, Lucretia walked over, flung open the box lid, and hoisted the rabbit up to slam it against the wall with a single hand.

The doll rabbit made a “pia” sound upon impact with the wall, then fell silent.

“So, it’s your imagination that’s vivid, isn’t it?” Lucretia fixed a stern gaze on the flattened rabbit doll as it slowly slid down the wall, and she unconsciously rubbed her arm to ease the chill, “Stop sharing those wild fantasies of yours—keep them to yourself. Otherwise, it won’t just be a matter of being thrown against the wall next time.”

The doll rabbit inflated back to shape with a “poof-bang” sound, shakily stood up, and muttered an obedient “Oh” before heading back towards its box.

However, before it could get far, Lucretia seized its ear, dragging it back towards her.

“Stop idling around, go find a task to occupy yourself,” Miss Witch commanded with a tone that brooked no argument, “Take a handful of your mechanical companions, head to the rear boundary of the ship and stand guard. The essence of the ship’s spirit seems somewhat disturbed in this area… Ensure that none of those devoid-of-soul shadows break free from within. I don’t have the spare capacity to address such nuisances at the moment. Off you go.”

“Oh, alright, Mistress…” Rabbi responded, its head hanging low as it obediently made its way out of the bridge, taking small, dejected steps.

Once the rabbit had departed, Luni approached, her voice tinged with concern: “Wasn’t that a bit harsh on Rabbi? She’s merely frightened.”

“She’s excessively frightened. I needed to find her a distraction,” Lucretia let out a light sigh and dismissed the matter with a wave of her hand, “She originated from the deep depths of the spirit realm, capable of perceiving many ‘shifts’ that are beyond human detection. What seems trivial to me may appear ‘vibrant’ through her eyes…”

She halted mid-sentence, then cast a speculative glance at the clockwork doll before her: “But now that you mention it… didn’t you sense anything? In crafting your mimic soul, I incorporated ‘elements’ from the spirit realm.”

Luni paused, reflecting deeply, then shook her head, “I haven’t sensed anything.”

A hint of complexity shadowed Lucretia’s features as she scrutinized Luni—though perhaps it was her imagination, she couldn’t shake the feeling that ever since Luni began interacting with that animated doll named “Alice” on the Vanished, there was a distinct and pure… “aura” about her. This observation became especially pronounced after the dolls learned the peculiar act of exchanging heads…

Yet, when she last covertly evaluated Luni’s cognitive abilities, no significant alterations were detected—she had yet to bring this up with her father.

“Mistress?” The clockwork doll picked up on the scrutiny, her head tilting in puzzlement.

“…It’s nothing.” Lucretia brushed off the fleeting thoughts, deciding to sideline the odd connections forming in her mind for now. Just then, something in the periphery of her vision caught her attention.

Through the porthole, amidst the vast expanse of “gray-white” that blanketed their view, patterns, and shadows that hadn’t been there before began to emerge, becoming gradually discernible.

“What’s that?” Luni, too, noticed the enigmatic lines and shapes materializing on the “corridor’s outer wall”, her eyes widening in astonishment.

In the instant following her inquiry, the vague, seemingly detached “outlines”, began to shift within the gray-white backdrop.

The once indistinct black lines began to shiver and swiftly reorganize themselves into coherent shapes, while the shadows around them expanded, filling in the outlines with color. A ship, as if being “printed” onto the corridor’s outer wall from the uniform gray-white backdrop, suddenly materialized and started to align itself with the trajectory of the Vanished and the Bright Star.

This occurrence was akin to a wayward traveler abruptly “bursting into” the corridor, and the once abstract and warped shadow of the ship, upon coming into the view of the Vanished and the Bright Star, rapidly assumed a more recognizable… “form”.

Lucretia, caught off-guard, dashed to the porthole with the swiftness of the wind, her gaze fixed intently on the newly appeared ship within the corridor.

She instantly identified the faint emblem emblazoned on the vessel.

“It’s the Sea Song!”

That vessel was the Sea Song, known for its eternal journey, meandering through the shattered currents of time.

It had navigated from a disjointed time stream, finding a brief moment of “convergence,” to intersect with the path of the Vanished and the Bright Star.

The atmosphere on the Vanished’s aft deck turned eerily silent.

Every onlooker was drawn to the vessel hovering “in mid-air” outside, observing its flag becoming more discernible and the name on its hull increasingly visible—the Sea Song was voyaging within its own temporal flow, seemingly oblivious to the nearby Bright Star as if the discrepancy in time veiled its “vision”. It passed alarmingly close, then approached the Vanished.

There, it adjusted its bearing and emitted a sequence of light signals.

Anomaly 077’s grip on the wheel tightened, his eyes widening as he scrutinized the blinking lights on the Sea Song, silently tallying the sequence and intervals as though he was counting the beats of a long-stilled heart.

“Short light-dark-short light-dark-long light…” He halted his count mid-way, even as the Sea Song continued to flash its signals. Closing his eyes briefly, he then mustered all his strength and shouted with a raspy voice, “Captain! The approaching vessel is signaling their intent!”

Duncan exhaled quietly, his face etched with a blend of gravity and resolve.

“Signal back with lights,” he instructed softly, “Give them our respects.”

Chapter 775: Departed, Far Away

Nina stepped onto the deck, extending her right hand skyward. Suddenly, intense flames erupted from her palm, morphing into a brilliant arc of light capable of cutting through the dense fog. This artificial sunlight danced above the ghostly Vanished, serving as a homage and farewell to those who had perished in a different timeline.

She pondered whether the Sea Song, another vessel entwined in this mysterious event, was aware of what transpired in this alternate moment. Were its crew heading towards their demise or returning from it? In that fleeting instance, as the two timelines brushed against each other and the lights shimmered, did the crew grasp the reality of their doomed fate?

As the moment of temporal overlap faded, the silhouette of the ship began to rapidly lose its clarity, dissolving back into vague lines and shadows, only to plunge once more into the abyss of the “deep sea.”

At the front of the Vanished, a particularly stooped and frail figure stood against the wind, his form quivering slightly. Gripping the ship’s wheel tightly, his gaze remained fixed on the Sea Song. For a brief second, he seemed to want to cry out, but no sound came from his parched, withered throat.

Then, he lifted his hand in a gesture he wished to direct towards the ship he once served and the comrades he once knew—a salute he had reacquainted himself with thanks to Vanna. It was a simple motion, tracing the pattern of rolling waves across his chest, a sign meant to invoke the storm’s protection and a prayer for safe passage. Yet, abruptly, as if jolted by a shock, his hand retreated to the ship's wheel, gripping it firmly once again.

Around the Vanished, the uniform, gray-white "inner wall" of the ship momentarily roiled with dangerous, chaotic waves, only to quickly settle down as if nothing had happened.

He couldn't afford to let go; he was the one steering the ship.

The brief window of connection closed, and the last glimpse of the Sea Song vanished from sight, marking its final departure from the mortal realm across all conceivable timelines.

Till the very end, Sailor never released his hold on the dark wheel of the Vanished.

Then, approaching footsteps broke the silence. Turning his head with a hint of sluggishness, Sailor saw a tall figure making their way towards him, observing him with a calm demeanor.

Caught off guard, he instinctively straightened up, managing to utter, "Captain…"

Duncan extended his hand, gently pressing against the gaunt shoulder of the ghoul standing at the helm: "Are you okay?"

The ghoul glanced down at his hands, which were still clasping the wheel tightly. His face, a map of wrinkles, trembled slightly as he spoke, "…Look, I'm holding on well. I just loosened my grip for a moment… the ship stayed on course… and then I never let go again… never let go…"

Duncan remained silent, simply offering a reassuring pressure on the ghoul's shoulder once more.

As he started to turn away, ready to leave the helm, the quiet murmur of Anomaly 077 caught his ear. The words were whispered so softly as if Sailor was conversing with his own doubts: “Will it make any sense?”

Duncan paused, his gaze returning to his helmsman.

“Will all this make any sense?” This time, Sailor looked up directly into Duncan’s eyes, his voice carrying a trace of newfound bravery. His eyes weren’t searching for an answer as much as they were seeking a beacon of hope amidst turmoil, “The Sea Song, the frontier folk, the city-state guardians struggling to keep order, and… us, does any of it make any sense?”

After a brief silence, Duncan nodded calmly: “…Yes.”

Turning back towards the deck, Duncan made to leave the helm area. Just then, he heard Sailor call out from behind, “The first rule of the Vanished’s crew, right?”

Without a word, Duncan simply waved his hand in acknowledgment and continued on his way.

He descended the stairs to the aft deck, which lay in quietude, and whispered in his heart: “Lucy.”

The Sea Witch’s reply was prompt: “Yes, I’m here.”

Duncan took a moment before speaking in a measured tone, “I recall you once told me about a time you inadvertently crossed beyond the six-mile limit into the Eternal Veil’s depths. You got lost, and it was the phantom of the Vanished that guided you back to safer waters.”

There was a long pause from Lucretia before she finally spoke, “Yes, I… always believed it was just a fleeting ghost of the Vanished, emerging briefly from subspace…”

Duncan chose not to respond further. From the way Lucretia spoke, it was clear that the perceptive “witch” had arrived at a realization similar to his own.

The recent emergence of the “Sea Song” had sharply brought Duncan to an awareness of a truth he had known but never fully contemplated before.

Beyond the six-mile threshold, the fabric of time unravels and reforms unpredictably, where cause and effect weave in and out of coherence. Ships that have completed their journeys may yet traverse these waters anew. It was here, amidst this realm of temporal anomalies, that Lucretia’s vessel once found itself adrift, lost beyond the boundary where linear time ceases to hold sway. In her most desperate hour, it was the ghost of the Vanished, like a beacon through the mists of chaos, that guided her back to the tangible reality of our dimension.

Lucretia had always believed this spectral guide to be the Vanished itself, either slipping through the veils of subspace back into our world or casting a shadowy projection from its enigmatic journey through the realms between.

Yet, a new theory now emerged in Duncan’s mind.

Standing at the deck’s edge, Duncan leaned against the railing, his eyes scanning the monotonous gray-white expanse that stretched beyond the ship’s hull. His gaze seemed intent on penetrating this boundary, eager to glimpse the untamed maelstrom of fog and chaos that lay beyond, where the fabric of existence itself twisted in perpetual tumult.

In that vast, obscured expanse, the Vanished, under the command of Duncan Abnomar, could still be charting its course—perhaps just beginning its voyage, or on the cusp of returning. Maybe it was on the verge of uncovering some profound truth about the nature of their world, or… perhaps it had just lit a lantern at the very edge of existence, illuminating the path to a dormant exile’s refuge.

…

The crisp sound of a match striking shattered the silence within the living room, a small flame inching closer to the wick of an oil lamp set upon the table. The light it cast was gentle, bathing the room in a warmth that, while not as brilliant as electric lighting, felt comforting.

Heidi leaned over to ignite the lamp, casting a glance around the living room before approaching her mother.

The glow from the oil lamp, though modest compared to the brilliance of electric lights, became their primary source of illumination following a directive from the government to ration electricity. This mandate came in the wake of a malfunction affecting several generators in the eastern district of the city, compelling the authorities to prioritize power for essential services like factories, shelters, and containment facilities, thereby relegating residential lighting to more primitive means.

“I wonder when the power will be restored…” Heidi voiced her concern softly, almost to herself.

Her mother responded with her usual calm and steadiness, embodying a tranquility that seemed unshakeable, “That depends on how quickly the generators can be repaired.” She paused, then added, “Did the notice say how severe the damage was to the generators?”

“They didn’t specify the exact damage, but I heard the malfunction isn’t related to machines being bewitched, so it should just be a normal operational issue,” Heidi explained, her tone carrying a hint of optimism. “If past events are anything to go by, it should be fixed in a few days—maybe two or three days if we’re lucky, a week at the most…”

“Gas lamps and oil lamps can still be used, so the situation isn’t that dire, is it?” Her mother offered a comforting smile, then reached for a piece of paper on the table, extending it towards Heidi. “This is the ‘Message Paper’ that arrived this morning. Could you read it aloud for me? My vision is blurry these days, making it difficult for me to read.”

Heidi accepted the “newspaper” from her mother.

As the night stretched on, engaging in ordinary “reading” activities had become a hazardous endeavor in the city-state. With the majority of libraries and book markets shut down and most newspapers ceasing their nighttime publication, the thirst for information persisted. To satiate this need within the confines of safety, City Hall supervised the creation of the “Message Paper.”

This publication was a streamlined form of a newspaper, crafted with both physical and spiritual safeguards. The paper itself was consecrated and blessed by the cathedral, ensuring its safety from malevolent influences. Its content was meticulously curated to limit the duration and complexity of reading, thus minimizing the risk of knowledge contamination. Additionally, the paper was adorned with sacred prayers and rune embellishments to safeguard the mental well-being of its readers.

Despite these extensive precautions, the distribution of these newspapers was tightly regulated. They were not available for public purchase but were instead delivered directly to individuals who met specific reading qualifications. These recipients were expected to possess a foundational understanding of mysticism and the skills to handle “minor troubles” that might arise.

While the process and regulations surrounding the “Message Paper” might seem burdensome, they were emblematic of the city-state’s commitment to preserving the flow of information within the bounds of modern civilization. Information needed to be disseminated among those qualified to interpret it, then relayed to the broader populace, including those not directly engaged with the city's governance. Although Heidi was not officially affiliated with City Hall, her interactions with the city's administrators had given her insights into their rationale.

The night's challenges were manifold, yet the city-state endeavored to stave off the "human" decline into darkness for as long as possible, striving to prevent the erosion of civilization itself.

With a sense of duty, Heidi unfolded the paper, steadied her nerves, and began to relay the contents to her mother:

"…The malfunction within the generator has been pinpointed, and the repair teams are working swiftly to address the issue. The engineers on-site have provided an optimistic timeline, estimating that all necessary replacements and repairs will be completed within the next two days…"

"The challenge of distributing food in the northern part of the city has been successfully addressed, ensuring that the city-state's food reserves are now adequately stocked… The lighting infrastructure is fully operational, confirming that the production output of the vertical farms remains unaffected… Additionally, there's good news regarding our mushroom cultivation efforts, which have seen a noticeable increase in yield…"

"In international waters, a tense situation has unfolded in the northern seas. The naval forces of Cold Port and Morpheus Port have converged near a 'sun fragment.' The fleet of the Death Church has stepped in as a mediating force, preventing the situation from escalating further…"

As Heidi read aloud each piece of news, she occasionally paused to offer silent prayers and invocations to Lahem, the deity of wisdom, seeking guidance and protection. However, upon reaching a particular segment of the report, she halted abruptly.

Sensing the shift in Heidi’s demeanor, her mother inquired softly, “Is there any special news?”

There was a brief silence as Heidi absorbed the significance of the final news item on the paper. After a moment of contemplation, she exhaled softly, her voice tinged with a mix of concern and awe.

“…A dispatch from the Storm Church has announced that the border exploration fleet has embarked on another daring ‘cross-border’ mission. The Vanished and the Bright Star have ventured beyond the six-mile threshold…”

The gravity of this revelation lingered in the air, highlighting the courage and audacity of those willing to explore beyond the known boundaries of their world into realms where time and reality itself were fluid and unpredictable.

Chapter 776: Cold Night

Beneath the subdued glow of an oil lamp, Heidi carefully placed a sheet of paper on the table. This paper bore news from a world beyond their small, quiet living room, illuminated only by the lamp’s cozy light and the comforting presence of her mother’s soft, watchful eyes.

Heidi was no stranger to tales of distant adventures. The Vanished, including her father, frequently sent letters home, their words filled with mentions of the borderlands and the grand voyage that lay ahead. She had always known that her father, alongside a renowned captain, was destined for the far reaches of the frontier. Yet, it was only upon receiving official word through the city-state’s networks that the reality of their departure truly sank in for her.

This realization transformed what had been a distant, abstract idea into a palpable truth. As she stared at the concise message, it dawned on her that their journey had truly begun.

Her father, the man she looked up to the most, had set sail into the vast unknown in the cover of night.

“They will be safe,” her mother assured her, pulling Heidi back from her reverie. Her voice was as steady as it had been years ago, during a tempestuous night, as she offered comfort, “You needn’t worry so much, Heidi.”

Heidi turned towards her mother, her expression somewhat vacant: “Is it because of the skilled captain they’re with?”

“No, it’s because of your father—he always makes it back safely,” her mother responded, her smile warm with nostalgia. “He’s taken on many daring endeavors, more than you could imagine. Yet, he always returns to us, eager to share tales of his supernatural ventures… This time will be no different. He’ll come back with stories from worlds beyond ours, and you’ll get to hear an amazing story from him, just like I have.”

Heidi absorbed her mother’s words in silence. After a brief pause, she whispered, “Father, and Vanna… they’re part of something truly monumental, aren’t they?”

“Indeed, embarking on such a journey is always a significant endeavor.”

“What should I do in the meantime?”

“First, you should wrap yourself in a warm coat, then head outside to the community gathering spot. Share this latest update with our neighbors. They’re still awaiting news on the generators and the food supplies,” her mother instructed gently. “Inform those who can’t read, help alleviate their worries, and dispel the fear and tension that’s been spreading. Encourage them not to succumb to despair, to stand strong against the darkness of this prolonged night. Fulfill the promise you made when you graduated from the academy, and then return home safely. I’ll prepare your favorite mushroom vegetable soup.”

Her mother gracefully rose from her seat, setting aside the needlework she had been engrossed in and walked over to Heidi. With a tender touch, she began to smooth out her daughter’s hair, saying softly, “Heidi, these tasks are significant too.”

As her mother’s fingers gently combed through her locks, Heidi paused, caught in a moment of contemplation, before offering a soft nod of agreement. Her eyes lingered on the makeshift “newspaper” spread out on the table, etching its message into her memory once more.

Meanwhile, far off in the northern seas, a unique vision unfolded under the cover of night. A thin, pale golden sheen that could be mistaken for “sunlight” blanketed the ocean, casting a glow over the waters. Amidst this surreal light, a colossal, glowing geometric structure floated on the surface of the Boundless Sea, resembling a crystal mountain. Surrounding it, at the fringe of this illuminated zone, various warships of different sizes patrolled the darkness, their movements reminiscent of a school of fish cautiously encircling their prey.

From the vantage point, Sorenna observed the scene with a somber demeanor. Standing on the bridge, he peered through the expansive windows at the sea stretched out before him, where the artificial sunlight gently spread. At the sea’s horizon, he could just make out the silhouettes of two small speedboats maneuvering ahead of the fleet, their movements deliberate, neither too bold nor too withdrawn, like probing tentacles.

These were the advance guard of the Morpheus navy, cautiously testing the defenses of the Cold Port navy.

Nearby, several warships adorned with black flags sailed close to the zones controlled by the Cold Port and Morpheus navies. Basking in the faux sunlight, these flags bore the barely visible insignia of the “Death Church”. The main cannons of these warships were fully exposed, ready for confrontation.

Sorenna mused that the clergy aboard those church warships must be feeling the weight of the moment, a thought that briefly sparked a twinge of guilt within him.

However, this fleeting guilt was quickly replaced by a steely determination.

Just then, the communications officer received an external radio transmission. After processing the message, the officer looked up at Sorenna, reporting, “Commander, the ‘Mourner’ has reached out. They’re requesting that we and the Morpheus navy's vanguard each pull back five miles to clear the danger zone."

Without a moment's hesitation, Sorenna responded firmly, "Inform them that the other side should withdraw first. Make it clear once more that Cold Port needs that 'sunlight.' This isn't up for debate—it's an ultimatum, a necessary outcome. The Cold Port navy will maintain its position here until we achieve our objective."

A palpable tension filled the bridge, the atmosphere turning icy as if the cold wind from outside had infiltrated the room, circulating a slow, chilling breeze.

The signalman was ready to relay Sorenna's message to the church warship, which was acting as the intermediary in this tense negotiation. However, before he could transmit the response, a new communication broke through on the radio's open channel.

"…Commander, we've got a message from Morpheus's navy."

Sorenna's expression turned to one of concern. After a brief pause, lasting only a second or two, he approached the communications desk and lifted the receiver to his ear.

The voice that greeted him was familiar, one belonging to a middle-aged man who Sorenna had known for years: "Sorenna, I knew you'd answer personally. Listen, I'm aware of the dire situation in Cold Port, but things are even more critical here in Morpheus. An unknown entity is attempting to make landfall on our coasts. Despite numerous efforts by our defense forces to push them back, they persistently reemerge from the depths… we're in desperate need of sunlight, if only to temporarily halt the 'anomalies' encroaching upon our shores…"

Sorenna replied with a calmness that belied the gravity of his words, “Farview Cliff vanished twelve hours ago, as though cleanly severed from the island.”

An unsettling silence followed his statement.

Sorenna continued, his voice measured yet carrying an underlying chill, “Cold Port is fading into the darkness. Hobo, after all these years, you know what’s at stake here.”

The response from the radio was delayed, filled with tension, until finally, it came through with undeniable urgency: “Your nephew is in Morpheus! He’s part of the coastal defense!”

“…The people of Cold Port will honor his memory.” With that, Sorenna hung up the receiver with a deliberate motion.

In the ensuing cold silence, he turned to face his crew, who awaited his command.

“…Spare the church’s warships,” he instructed, the calm in his voice masking the storm within. “Focus our attack on the ‘Harp.’ Their command center is located there.”

“Understood!”

The bridge crew sprang into action, following Sorenna’s orders, setting in motion the targeted assault. But their efficiency was suddenly shattered by a sharp cry of alarm.

Upon touching the control stick, a sailor found his hand instantly frostbitten, the skin freezing to the metal. In a state of panic, he ripped his hand away, leaving behind skin already turned to ice.

It was only then that the reality of their situation became painfully clear to everyone on the bridge. The cold that had stealthily enveloped them was now impossible to ignore. Their thoughts slowed as if caught in the grip of the frost, the intense cold biting into their flesh and bones. A mist of ice, thick with crystals, filled the air, swiftly encasing nearly every instrument and control panel in a fine layer of frost.

Reacting swiftly, Sorenna made a dash for his captain's chair, intending to activate the fleet-wide alarm. Yet, he barely managed two steps before being halted by an arm, dry and cold as steel, that obstructed his path.

The bridge was quickly enveloped in a chilling fog, and through this mist, a ghastly figure barred his way. Dressed in the attire of Frost's navy, the figure stood divided, its body gruesomely severed at the waist as though cleaved in two by a cannonball. The figure's head slowly turned towards Sorenna, its skull-like face cracking into a macabre smile as it greeted him, "Good afternoon, sir, please, try to remain calm…"

Frozen in place next to the captain's chair, Sorenna's gaze shifted sideways, witnessing one horrific figure after another materialize from the dense, icy fog, each one seizing control of his crew members. Within moments, the bridge was overrun by these spectral invaders.

Out of the corner of his eye, Sorenna noticed the sea itself seemed to be rebelling, with vast swathes of white fog roiling over its surface.

This icy mist swiftly condensed upon the sea, rapidly freezing the waters and entombing the area in ice. Amidst the shifting, fracturing icebergs, a ghostly fleet emerged as if conjured from the depths – a massive warship accompanied by a flotilla of both large and small vessels materialized, veiled in a shroud of ice crystals. Cascades of freezing seawater poured from their hulls like waterfalls while their deck guns ominously swiveled to target every ship in sight.

The eerie symphony of metal contorting and warping filled Sorenna's ears.

Turning towards the source of the noise, he witnessed the metal wall beside him undergo a bizarre transformation. The steel seemed to liquefy, displaying an unnatural fluidity before the molten segments coalesced into a chilling visage, complete with a single eye masked in frost.

“Sorenna, it’s been a while.”

“Captain Tyrian… or is it Governor now?” Sorenna’s body tensed, his voice low and strained as he kept a wary eye on the Morpheus fleet. “You’re certainly making a dramatic entrance.”

“I usually prefer not to resort to such displays of power against the city-states’ navies – mostly to avoid unnecessary tensions,” the admiral replied, his tone suggesting a rare departure from restraint. “But it seems… today’s atmosphere is already beyond tense.”

Silence fell between them, lasting several seconds. During this pause, Sorenna’s focus remained fixed on the Morpheus fleet.

There, too, was no sign of resistance – a clear indication that the undead had also seized control of their flagship.

Chapter 777: Dissipation and Alliance

The confrontation on the open sea took a turn for the complex when a formidable fleet, shrouded in the chill of mist, made its unexpected appearance, bringing a new dynamic to what was initially a three-sided standoff. Yet, in an odd twist, this escalation seemed to simplify the predicament at hand.

The forces of Cold Port, alongside the Morpheus Navy, found themselves relieved from the immediate threats of crossfire and the daunting presence of the church's fleet.

Sorenna, with a gaze fixed upon the metallic visage before him, displayed a remarkable calmness. His eyes betrayed neither fear nor uncertainty despite being fully aware of the prowess of the "Iron Admiral" commanding the emerging fleet. He understood that while these spectral adversaries could harness the element of surprise to overpower two of the flagships, they lacked the means to dominate the entire fleet. A chaotic battle, should it ensue, promised dire outcomes for all parties involved.

It became evident through Tyrian Abnomar's actions, choosing this mode of encounter, that his intentions leaned towards negotiation.

After a prolonged silence, Sorenna finally spoke in a voice resonating with depth, "Cold Port requires sunlight."

In response, the metallic figure, its speech accompanied by a metallic resonance, added, "Yes, Cold Port seeks sunlight. And now, Hob, your former ally and the commander of the Morpheus Navy, communicates the same need for Morpheus. But let me tell you, darkness is encroaching upon our world. Jotun City, Haper, Bandor Island, and even distant lands like Feyron and Mok are succumbing to shadows. Only a handful of city-states remain bathed in sunlight… Everyone is in desperate need of it."

Despite the tension evident on Sorenna's face, his reply was even more composed than before, "Captain Tyrian, is there merit in discussing this now? My immediate concern is Cold Port's survival—unless you suggest you'll reveal the 'sun fragment' that plummeted into Frost."

Maintaining its composure, the steel face revealed, "…It's already en route to Cold Port."

This revelation took Sorenna aback, his prepared retorts dissipating into the air, leaving him momentarily speechless.

A hush fell over the entire bridge.

Tyrian's voice then filled the silence, "If you head back now, you should be able to witness its arrival on the northern shores of Cold Port," as the undead sailors, enveloped in the icy fog, subtly withdrew their hold over the crew, positioning themselves aside in a standby manner, "Allow the Morpheus Navy to escort the sun fragment here before this standoff spirals out of control."

Sorenna paused briefly before inquiring, "And of Frost?"

"Frost is under more secure watch than any of you can imagine. We possess our own forms of 'assurance.' There's no need for worry," Tyrian assured calmly, "The paramount task for you and Hob now is to return to your respective city-states and, with the sunlight's aid, swiftly reestablish order."

Breaking the tense silence, Sorenna abruptly inquired, "…What do you want?" His tone carried a mix of suspicion and understanding, acknowledging the harsh reality that nothing comes without a cost. “There’s no free lunch, I grasp that concept well. Share your intentions, Governor Tyrian.”

The figure, with a face as impassive and cold as steel, locked eyes with Sorenna, revealing, “…I seek to forge an ‘alliance mechanism’ that thrives in the shadow of night,” he declared, his gaze piercing, “orchestrated by Frost, spanning the entirety of the Cold Sea. I demand unwavering support from both Cold Port and Morpheus Harbor.”

Sorenna took a moment to digest the request, quickly piecing together the “Iron Admiral’s” underlying strategy. A crease formed between his brows as he instinctively searched the horizon for the three warships of the Death Church, previously skirting the fringes of “sunlight.” To his surprise, they had already maneuvered closer to the fog-enshrouded fleet, aligning with the fog ship as though seamlessly integrated into their ranks.

“…I understand. Secure the sunlight and shoulder the responsibility. Those averse to bearing it… will fall to our jurisdiction,” Sorenna shifted his gaze from the window back to the metallic figure, giving a nod of acknowledgement, “Regarding Hob…”

“He consented three seconds prior to you,” Tyrian stated, his tone devoid of emotion.

“Very well, I have no further questions.”

With that, the undead receded into the background, and the chilling fog that filled the bridge began to dissipate, leaving behind melting ice crystals. The immense ice floes scattered across the sea’s surface also started to diminish, signaling the lifting of the fog fleet’s menacing presence over the standoff.

A buzzing broke the newfound silence, emanating from the communication station’s handset, accompanied by a blinking light. The communications officer, hesitantly glancing at his commander, received a stern command from Sorenna: “Answer it. Do I need to instruct you further?”

Upon lifting the handset, the officer briefly paused before looking up, “It’s the public channel from Morpheus…”

Stepping forward, Sorenna took the handset with an air of expectancy, listening intently to the message from the other side.

“Sorenna, listen, upon my return…”

“You’re free to recount today’s events to my nephew—or perhaps, I’ll take it upon myself to do so later.”

“…You truly stand apart from the rest.”

“Yes, thank you, the sentiment is mutual.”

“…Thank you, farewell.”

After hanging up, Sorenna’s gaze wandered beyond the expansive window, surveying the Boundless Sea now engulfed in the cloak of night. The fog fleet gradually receded into the enveloping darkness, becoming a part of it.

As the last traces of pale golden “sunlight” vanished from the sea’s surface nearby, Tyrian inhaled deeply at the ship’s bow, his silence enduring. After a lengthy pause, he slightly turned, posing a question to an unseen companion, “Do you deem this outcome satisfactory?”

The quiet that had enveloped the scene was shattered by a resonant, gravelly voice. Emerging from the gloom, a towering figure adorned in a long black coat, his body swathed in dense bandages, made his presence known. “There is no superior alternative; this is the paramount path,” he declared, his voice echoing a mixture of resolve and somber realization, “The luxury of sunlight is finite, and the erstwhile approach of every city-state scrabbling for survival in isolation has become untenable. A unified alliance is imperative to maximize the chances of survival for the populace. Rationing sunlight, assembling combined defense fleets, managing resources on a macro scale, and orchestrating a collective defense against the myriad dangers that lurk in the darkness necessitate the formation of a cohesive union. Ideally, this monumental task would have fallen to the church, but their influence, too, has waned."

Tyrian's gaze drifted to the three church warships, their outlines blurred against the night's embrace. After a pause filled with contemplation, he continued, "To transport a fragment of the sun from Frost to Cold Port requires the mightiest of high-speed tugboats for six days—a duration that mirrors the average transit time for sun fragments among the city-states sprinkled across the Cold Sea…"

"In the event of a city-state being suddenly besieged by a catastrophe without 'sunlight,' the delay for aid can exacerbate the crisis to an uncontrollable extent. Hence, the need for several formidable fleets, perpetually patrolling the night, ready to rush to the aid of any city-state at a moment's notice—these fleets, in tandem with the church's own, should safeguard the entirety of the Cold Sea… but solely the Cold Sea."

"Dedicating our efforts to the Cold Sea suffices. Other regions must devise their own strategies," Duncan interjected, his head shaking in dismissal of broader concerns. He then probed, "Yet, amid these preparations, do you harbor no reservations about my directive to dispatch the sun fragment from Frost to Cold Port?"

Tyrian's response was immediate, his head shaking in denial.

Facing Duncan squarely, he elaborated, "Holding the greatest share of sunlight prevents me from establishing a 'Cold Sea Union' that is perceived as equitable and trustworthy. My possession of the sun fragment in Frost undermines any claim to impartiality in its distribution," he articulated calmly, his lips then curving into a smile, “Moreover… the true safeguard for Frost now lies within your flame, doesn’t it?”

Duncan’s response was a silent yet affirming nod.

Tyrian’s curiosity, however, got the better of him, prompting him to inquire further, “How fares it ‘over there’?”

“We navigate a fissure in time, its duration uncertain,” Duncan replied nonchalantly, his gaze lowering to his own form. To his astonishment, despite bracing for a severance from his “incarnations” upon crossing the boundaries of the six miles mark, it appeared… these avatars of his being remained intact and operational.

Duncan found himself in a unique position, simultaneously engaging in conversation with Tyrian and perceiving the events unfolding in Pland, all while his primary consciousness embarked on an otherworldly journey aboard the Vanished, voyaging to the world’s extremities. This dual experience was nothing short of supernatural.

Noticing Tyrian’s attention shift towards him, Duncan casually mentioned, “This journey, I chose not to bring you along but instead opted for your sister’s company,” his eyelids slightly lifting as he cast a brief glance towards Tyrian, “Do you harbor any resentment towards that decision?”

Tyrian was momentarily caught off guard by the question but quickly regained his composure, his gaze, marked by the presence of a singular eye, returning to its habitual state of calm and severity: “No, I understand my duties. Your decision was made with good reason.”

Duncan detected the slight strain in Tyrian’s tone but chose not to comment, merely allowing a subtle smile to flicker at the corners of his eyes, hidden beneath the bandages.

Together, they turned their gazes towards the horizon.

Time seemed to stand still until Tyrian was startled by Duncan's voice breaking the silence, "Strive to ensure the survival of as many as possible, for as long as possible."

Tyrian looked towards Duncan in astonishment.

Without facing his son, Duncan continued, his voice reflecting on a reflective quality, as though he was imparting a lesson or perhaps reminding himself, "You, Lucy, and everyone aboard the Vanished, every individual within the city-states, each has their own role to play. The overarching mission uniting these efforts is survival—to safeguard everything in this world to the utmost of our abilities: life, memories, and civilization. Strive to preserve, to endure."

His gaze remained fixed on the distance, on what lay beyond the night, as he spoke further, "Even if the dawn ceases to break, even if the night engulfs all, even if the very fabric of reality starts to crumble, and hope seems a distant memory, remember this… persist, if only for one more moment. That is your task. Leave the rest to me. I'll find a way," Duncan concluded, his tone resolute yet tinged with a deep seated determination.

Tyrian, visibly moved and somewhat overwhelmed by his father's words, found himself at a loss for words, sinking into a profound silence.

Duncan offered no more words, simply staring into the abyss of the night, contemplating the journey ahead.

In his alternate perception, the monotonous grey backdrop began subtly shifting, revealing faint light and shadow glimmers. It appeared their traversal through the temporal rift was nearing its conclusion.

Chapter 778: The Palace at the End of the World

Something started to manifest from the indistinct and uniform grey-white backdrop, resembling a long passage finally opening up, with the scene at its exit swiftly coming into view.

With nimble movements, Shirley scaled the mast, her eyes widening in anticipation as she peered into the distance. She couldn't contain her excitement and joyfully called out towards the deck below, "There's something ahead! It's real, not just a mirage. It appears to be some kind of physical object!"

As the end of their "path" grew nearer, the scene became increasingly distinct. The monotonous grey-white surrounding them began to fade away, much like the morning mist vanishing under the warmth of the sun. Duncan was the first among them to notice the shimmering reflection of light on the water as the view became clearer – then, the gentle drift of mist over the water's surface, and beyond that, numerous shapes, both large and small.

These shapes, floating atop the gleaming water, slowly coalesced into a distinct group of islands.

This was the enigmatic "archipelago" that Captain Caraline had referred to in her log!

The entire crew of the Vanished congregated on the deck, their excitement tinged with a slight unease, as they gazed out at the sea and islands that seemed to have appeared out of thin air. They watched as the illuminated surface of the sea expanded towards them, encircling the Vanished, accompanied by the sudden sound of water crashing against the ship. Then, the ship jerked and vibrated as it entered this new body of water. After their prolonged and mysterious “voyage through the space-time rift,” the sound of waves lapping against the hull was a surprisingly welcome change.

Gripping the ship’s wheel firmly, Sailor stood on the elevated platform at the stern, his gaze fixed on the sea and islands that filled his entire field of vision. Fragmented memories began to surface, a mix of coherent and disjointed images flooding his mind, inducing an ineffable feeling of being out of place in time—

He recalled this location; he remembered the moment the Sea Song finally made landfall on an island after a lengthy drift. He could hear the chaotic sounds on the ship, the crew emerging from a prolonged nightmare akin to the walking dead, the priest who had lost his way suddenly snapping back to reality. He saw people crawling on the deck, kissing the rusted and deteriorating wood, and then transforming into spirits and ashes carried away by the sea breeze…

He recognized this place – it was as though he had never departed, feeling perpetually stationed on the bridge of the Sea Song.

It wasn’t until he felt a slight burning sensation in his hands, still clutching the wheel, that he was jolted out of his reverie.

Looking down, he noticed a thin layer of flame briefly caressing the dark surface of the wheel before it disappeared, along with the stinging feeling.

“I still have a duty… Indeed, there’s an unfulfilled duty beckoning me… I’m grateful for the awakening,” Sailor whispered under his breath, expressing his gratitude to the Vanished for pulling him back from the brink of oblivion. Then, with a renewed sense of purpose, he raised his gaze once more, meticulously steering the vessel amidst the archipelago of familiar islands, quietly voicing a vow, “Captain Caraline, I’ve made my way back…”

The magnificent exploration vessel, the Vanished, glided cautiously through the mist-enveloped sea, weaving its way among the shadowy outlines of what were called “islands,” its crew vigilant for clear paths through the fog. Trailing closely behind, the Bright Star proceeded with equal caution, its silhouette looming through the mist.

Before long, the deck of the Bright Star became a flurry of activity as myriad white shapes burst into the air. These were numerous paper seabirds, expertly crafted and released into the fog. They soared with purpose, initially encircling the Vanished and the Bright Star in a protective dance before daring to extend their reach, sweeping over the cluster of islands.

Duncan, watching the aerial scouts deployed and guided by Lucretia, noted with a mixture of relief and curiosity that they remained untouched by the fog, uncorrupted and intact. This observation suggested a level of safety in these parts that was unexpectedly reassuring.

“These ‘islands’ are surrounded by numerous slender shadows under the water, resembling sprawling limbs of some great creature,” Lucretia’s voice resonated within Duncan’s mind, her observations adding layers to the mystery, “Moreover, from an aerial perspective, these ‘islands’ share remarkably similar contours, and on closer inspection, one can discern biological structures on their surfaces… They align with the descriptions in the log, revealing themselves to be the carcasses of Leviathans.”

Duncan hummed in response, his attention drawn to the “islands” amidst the fog. In areas where the waters ran shallow, he too could see the elongated shadows stretching beneath the islands – slender in comparison to the islands themselves yet each shadow was vast, dwarfing the Vanished in size. These shadows lay motionless in the water, indifferent to the presence of newcomers, bearing the unmistakable mark of ancient demise.

Memories of encountering massive tentacles and a hauntingly large eye beneath the ice surfaced in Duncan's mind.

He understood that the "Leviathans" carrying the city-states were no more than replicas fabricated by the Nether Lord. But here, in this remote expanse, lay the true Leviathans.

"Her offspring encircled Her in death, resting at the world's end…"

Morris's voice, tinged with a metallic resonance, unexpectedly joined the conversation. Duncan turned to see Morris had reverted to his "cast form" at some stage, his body a complex interplay of gears and valves, from which occasional sounds of machinery emanated.

Morris, turning towards Duncan, his voice carrying the vibration of springs, remarked, "Conceiving it in thought is one thing, witnessing it with your own eyes is entirely another, wouldn't you agree?"

He paused momentarily, then gestured towards himself, emphasizing a point, "Being cautious is crucial here; after all, flesh and blood are exceptionally vulnerable in these surroundings."

"…At least flesh and blood have the chance of being healed by Vanna, but your brass shell would require a blacksmith – something we're lacking aboard," Duncan pointed out.

"Actually, Nina could assist," Morris responded with ease, suggesting he had considered this before. "I've entrusted her with the blueprints of my design. She's become quite adept."

Duncan mulled over this information, recognizing the logic in Morris's suggestion. Nonetheless, the thought struck him as somewhat peculiar.

At the same time, Vanna found herself at the forefront of the deck, her gaze lost in the distant sea, while an indistinct figure lingered by her side amidst the mist.

“I… can sense Her presence closer than ever before,” she murmured, more to herself than anyone else, “It’s as though the entire ocean is filled with Her whispers… She’s speaking directly into my ear, yet the words elude me.”

“It could be that our proximity muddles the clarity, or perhaps it’s merely senseless babble,” Agatha’s voice emerged from the shadow, her tone serious. “However, you must exercise even greater caution here – as Her saint, your connection and sensitivity to Her influence surpass others, even under the captain’s safeguard. It’s imperative you remain vigilant not to lose touch with your humanity.”

“I understand,” Vanna acknowledged with a slight nod, appreciating the caution.

Agatha remained silent, lost in contemplation amidst the fog. Eventually, she broke the silence, her voice soft, “Have you ever wondered… what the realm of Bartók might look like?”

Vanna, taken aback, found herself at a loss for words.

“The dead Leviathans here form this archipelago, with the storm goddess lying at rest among them. This sparked a curiosity in me about the final resting places of other deities,” Agatha continued thoughtfully, “My faith tells me that souls journey through a gate to find eternal serenity in Bartók’s domain. My experiences affirm that the ‘messengers of death’ exist, navigating the spirit realm, heeding the call of the gatekeeper…”

“But where does this gate stand? Could it be located at the edge of our world as well? Are those messengers present there too? And the souls… the final wilderness they traverse, does it lie at the heart of a sea like this?”

“The concept feels… difficult to grasp.”

Vanna’s eyes widened, surprised to encounter such queries from a saint and a former gatekeeper. Yet, Agatha’s questions ignited a spark of curiosity within her, compelling her to ponder these mysteries alongside Agatha.

She shifted her gaze, peering into the depths of the distant fog, contemplative and curious.

The “temple” that the “Storm Codex” spoke of, the one that reigns over all storms and serves as the foundational pillar of the sea, what form did it take?

“There’s a significantly large island ahead,” Lucretia’s voice resonated within Duncan’s mind, tinged with a palpable sense of excitement, “And it appears there’s a substantial structure on the island!”

As if responding to their approach, the fog around the Vanished began to withdraw, revealing a clear path ahead. At the end of this newly revealed stretch of sea, bathed in the enigmatic and chaotic light cascading from the skies above, a colossal island came into view for all aboard.

This island didn’t seem to be a mere work of nature; instead, it bore the marks of an architectural marvel, a creation of an ancient civilization. It was constructed from countless enormous black stones, meticulously cut and arranged in complex patterns. These rectangular blocks, both large and small, rose from the sea’s embrace, assembling into an expansive, undulating edifice. Atop this monumental base stood a vast “palace”.

Crafted from stone-like “materials” that shimmered in shades of black and dark green, with crystal-green elements interwoven among the blocks, it boasted a facade that was both somber and intricate. The palace’s architecture was layered, supported by massive pillars at its base, while the upper sections featured numerous peculiar openings, seemingly designed to accommodate the passage of gigantic creatures.

“Amazing… structure,” Morris murmured, his voice a mixture of awe and disbelief as he beheld the grand palace in the dim light. After a moment’s silence, he managed to voice his wonder, “How was it constructed?!”

“Clearly, this is beyond the capabilities of our current civilization’s technology,” Duncan remarked, his observation casual yet profound. Then, something caught his attention at the periphery of his vision – those… “entities” emanating from the palace’s lower reaches.

They resembled immense limbs or tentacles, akin to those of sea monsters, stretching from the palace’s flank into the watery depths below.

Gomona is there.

“We’re drawing near,” Duncan stated with a sense of gravity, “We’ve located her.”

Chapter 779: Memories Lurking on the Island

As the Vanished and the Bright Star made their way through the scattered, dark “islands” floating amidst the surrounding waters, they slowly neared the central island. This main island, composed of massive black boulders, gave the impression of a gargantuan, man-made structure.

Encircling the vessels, a thin mist meandered through the air like a sentient being, caressing the surface of the sea nearby. The breeze that wafted through this mist seemed to be laden with the soft echoes of whispers and murmurs, blending into a haunting chorus.

Standing at the forefront of the deck, Vanna watched as the island of black rock loomed larger in her view. Without realizing it, her grip on the railing tightened. The sound of the gentle and rhythmic waves began to resonate within her mind, transporting her back to a memory long past. She found herself recalling the very first time she heard the sound of the ocean, which was in the prayer room of a cathedral, standing before a goddess’s statue right after her baptism. It was then that a voice, soft as a sea breeze, whispered to her heart:

“Ah… my little fish… you have come.”

Jerking back to the present, Vanna realized the voice was not a figment of her imagination; it was genuinely echoing in her heart. Almost simultaneously, she noticed the island transform. The imposing structure, resembling a grand palace, appeared to quiver slightly. From every door and window, countless massive tendrils stretched out, reaching skyward and then plunging into the sea, stirring the waters and intermingling with the mist.

Then, as suddenly as they had appeared, the tentacles vanished, retracting into the structure. However, numerous large and small shadowy figures began to emerge near the island. They seemed to be an assembly of ships from which countless figures disembarked. Like pilgrims, they held torches and flags, stepping onto the black boulders and making their way into the temple through its side doors…

Vanna thought she could hear music, a festive melody of flutes and percussion that played together, creating visions that flickered and faded before her eyes.

She then witnessed crowds embarking on a pilgrimage, the scene shifting to artisans constructing the grand palace. She saw colossal sea creatures and humans alike gathering for a pilgrimage along the vast coastline, observed individuals in elegant attire lighting lamps on elevated platforms, all while the distant horizon slowly succumbed to a crimson hue. She saw eras of war and peace, heroes, travelers, young warriors safeguarding the masses as they reached the temple, only to find eternal rest on the morning of the second day.

Within these visions, Vanna strived to keep her eyes wide open, peering into each phantom scene. She watched as the palace, crafted from black and dark green boulders, opened its grand doors to her. An entity, shifting through countless forms, emerged to greet her, finally taking on the guise of the “Maiden of Tranquility” and proclaiming, “We have been waiting for a long time…”

A sudden, deep vibration emanated from the depths of the ark, rousing Helena from her meditative state.

In the prayer room, the main lights remained off, leaving only the gentle glow of a dim oil lamp burning in front of the statue. Its flickering flame cast moving shadows around the room, creating the illusion of whispering figures lurking within the interplay of light and darkness.

Helena scanned the room, her gaze cutting through the dimness. As the whispering voices faded into silence, she drew closer to the goddess's statue, her attention fixed on a dark red "pillar" that rose from the floor. This was no ordinary pillar, but a nerve cord that stretched from the ark's depths to its current position.

"I think I just heard Its voice," Helena murmured softly.

At that moment, an aged, deliberate voice reached her ears. "They have arrived safely," it said, carrying a tone of satisfaction. "My kin… They're filled with joy, even the Queen is content."

Confusion marred Helena's expression. "Didn't the Sea Song also reach this place before?"

The old voice, tinged with a hint of amusement, replied, "It's different this time, young one. The visitor this time is someone the Queen has awaited for many years."

"Many years?"

"Yes, since the day the 'Sun' first rose…"

Meanwhile, the Vanished had completed a quarter circle around the black island, eventually finding a suitable spot for anchorage through a break in the boulders. Sailor skillfully maneuvered the rudder, guiding the massive ship to a halt near the shore. Subsequently, a smaller boat was lowered, ferrying Duncan and his companions onto the island.

"Let's explore the island; stay put here, don't wander off," Duncan instructed the small boat that had transported them, as it bobbed in a makeshift “harbor” framed by rectangular black stones.

Following his command, the boat began to sway gently, splashing against the stones.

Suddenly, a wind swept in from the sky, bringing with it a whirlwind filled with countless colorful pieces of paper. This maelstrom, originating from the direction of the Bright Star, landed about ten meters from Duncan, where it took on the form of Lucretia.

With everyone assembled on the island, the firm ground beneath their feet provided a small comfort amidst the foreboding atmosphere of this world’s edge. Duncan stepped onto an elevated rectangular black stone, surveying the pathway that led to the palace.

Vanna began speaking beside the man: “This is a place of pilgrimage. In my vision, I saw numerous people arriving from faraway lands by boat, igniting large bonfires around the island, and adorning the temple’s path with flags…”

Reflecting on her vision, she moved next to another large stone near Duncan, pointing towards a broad, stone-laid path.

“This path leads directly to the temple. In the mornings, pilgrims disembark on the island, forming a procession that stretches from the shoreline all the way to the temple’s entrance. The island itself was constructed by people using a form of technology that’s beyond my comprehension. They melted and shaped stones from the depths of the sea into these massive boulders and then commanded summoned behemoths to erect the island using these hefty stones…”

Duncan absorbed Vanna’s recounting, his imagination painting vivid pictures of how this place must have looked in those bygone eras, now lost to memory. He hopped off the rectangular black stone and led the group down the ‘Pilgrimage Road’ Vanna had envisioned, heading towards the temple.

“What else did you see?” Shirley inquired, walking alongside Vanna with a look of curiosity.

“Land-dwelling humans lived in harmony with gargantuan sea creatures – they revered these giant sea beings, known as ‘Leviathans’, as gods and divine messengers. However, their reverence wasn’t just religious; it was part of a deeper, more symbiotic relationship,” Vanna explained, trying to piece together the sudden influx of knowledge. “They lived alongside many other titans, of the sky, of the underground, mastering the forces of mountains and glaciers…”

“They forged pacts with these ancient entities and drew strength from the giants, a power so vast it could reshape rivers, lakes, mountains, and the very earth itself, creating wonders beyond imagination… But I struggle to detail these marvels precisely. I’ve only glimpsed fragmented visions and received knowledge from nowhere. I can’t fully envision those scenes; they seem to be ‘Its’ memories. ‘It’ shared these memories with me, then fell silent.”

Abruptly, Vanna’s voice tapered off, her expression clouding with concern as she gazed towards the palace.

“…Its condition is dire; It shared those visions and then ceased to communicate.”

Duncan paused on the side of the path.

His attention was caught by something at the roadside – a withered piece of black material resembling dried seaweed, seemingly inconsequential.

Yet, he furrowed his brow, fixated on the desiccated “seaweed bundle,” sensing something amiss, his face a mask of contemplation.

“What’s that?” Nina noticed and moved closer to the object, tempted to pick it up for a closer look but stopped short, turning to Duncan with a puzzled look, “Did you find something odd?”

Duncan brooded for a moment before bending down towards the withered black material, extending his hand. Then, something remarkable occurred.

The desiccated material began to transform, causing a dizzying visual effect. It elongated, reconfigured, and by the time Duncan made contact, it had morphed into a crude cylindrical shape. As he lifted it, the cylinder’s surface unveiled intricate patterns, along with features resembling buttons and indicator lights.

Duncan examined the complex cylindrical object in his hand with a contemplative gaze before decisively pressing the most prominent button on its surface.

Immediately, vibrant music emanated from the device, a harmonious blend of drums, bells, and flutes filling the air.

He remained silent, his gaze fixed on the cylinder for an extended period. Without uttering a word, Duncan resumed his march forward, the device still in his grasp.

Vanna paused, momentarily taken aback. The memories of the island that had flooded her mind now converged once more in her vision. She envisioned the original owner of this small device—a child, trudging alongside a group of refugees. With hand extended and led by an adult, the child clutched the device as it played a lively tune.

As the vision faded, Vanna realized Duncan had moved significantly ahead. She hurried to close the distance between them.

Upon reaching the somber black temple, a vast circular plaza unfolded before them. A solitary figure stood in silence at the plaza’s center.

Lucretia reacted with swift precision, her short baton at the ready. However, before she could act, the figure in the plaza—seemingly the temple's last sentinel from an era long past—collapsed without a sound into a heap of ashes. These remnants were swiftly carried away by the wind, leaving Lucretia no chance to discern the guardian's appearance, be it male or female.

"…That was the vice-captain of the guard," Vanna abruptly stated.

"The guard?" Morris echoed instinctively.

Vanna's expression was one of confusion as she furrowed her brow, shaking her head after a brief pause. "…I don't know, the thought just came to me out of nowhere…"

Her explanation was cut short by a warping sound.

The melody emanating from the cylindrical device in Duncan's possession began to warp, growing increasingly unpleasant to the ear. Simultaneously, its surface started to lose its color, rapidly withering and distorting until the music ceased altogether within a mere few seconds. The device reverted to a cluster of withered black material, akin to dried seaweed.

Chapter 780: Remains

Crossing the expansive “Pilgrim’s Road,” Duncan made his way to the majestic entrance of the temple – an immense opening that seemed designed for beings of giant stature, narrowing from its base to its peak. The entry was marked by an enormous doorway, guarded by two vast doors made from a material now unrecognizable, showing signs of significant wear and neglect. One of these doors had collapsed to the ground, while its counterpart leaned precariously against the temple wall.

From within the doorway, the soft sound of waves could be discerned, blending with a series of deep, disorderly noises. These sounds suggested the presence of a colossal creature caught in a struggle between sleep and consciousness, its breathing and murmuring echoing in the shadowy expanse. A slight, fishy scent of the sea wafted over from the end of the Pilgrim’s Road, bringing with it a noticeable coolness.

Morris, marveling at the sight before him, approached the temple’s exterior wall. He adjusted his eye socket, which retracted to make way for a series of lenses that slid out along a copper track, allowing him to meticulously examine the ancient, weathered dark green stones. “Such flawless craftsmanship,” he observed, “as if these stones weren’t assembled but rather ‘grown’ into this formation…”

Vanna, reaching out to touch the temple walls, shared her sense of familiarity. “I’ve encountered such structures in dreams,” she said, “and during moments of deep prayer… It’s not uncommon for saints to have visions of towering walls or vast stones stacked high… It seems these visions were alluding to this place…”

Standing before the vast doorway, Lucretia casually tossed a piece of white paper into the shadowy corridor beyond. As soon as the paper left her fingers, it burst into flames, transforming into a figure of fire that resembled a human shape, flying briefly into the darkness before fading.

“Inside… there’s a deep stillness,” remarked Miss Witch with a note of hesitation, “but my magic seems to weaken swiftly as if it’s being suppressed by some unseen force.”

Turning his gaze from the dark interior of the temple back to his companions, Duncan pondered for a moment before raising his hand in a subtle gesture. Suddenly, a pale green flame sparked into existence from nowhere, gently enveloping each member of the group.

Nina initially reacted with a jump but quickly became fascinated, playfully shaping the flames on her arm into a ball and tossing it back and forth in her hand. Vanna and Morris experimented with the flames, engaging in physical movements; Vanna swung a great sword several times, and Morris’s joints emitted loud cracks, while Lucretia watched with a mixture of intrigue and discomfort. She was not entirely at ease with her father’s tendency to conjure flames on a whim and appeared visibly tense in the moment.

However, it was Anomaly 077 who showed the most acute reaction, almost instantly leaping into the air with a scream. It jumped nearly two meters high, shouting in panic as it landed: “Fire fire fire… The Captain’s ablaze, I’m burning, ah ah ah~!”

Shirley, reacting swiftly, conjured a bone spur from her back and knocked the dessicated corpse to the ground with a blunt force. “Quiet down with the howling,” she scolded, “it’s only a little fire – even Dog wouldn’t make such a fuss… hey, stop your trembling!”

“Dog” responded with a jittery, typewriter-like chatter: “I… I’m not trembling… I’m perfectly calm…”

Turning to address his oddly spirited crew with a blend of resignation and bewilderment, Duncan couldn’t help but compare their reaction to the dignified, solemn, or emotionally charged preparations of explorers in other tales. Facing the brink of world-altering discoveries, those explorers might reflect solemnly, mournfully, or even draw on poignant memories of loved ones. Yet here were his “companions,” treating the edge of disaster with the casual air of a day at the market. With patience, he explained, “We stand on the threshold of lands where ancient deities slumber. Your minds will soon be tested like never before. Thus, I envelop you in flames, not as mere spectacle but as a shield against the temple’s ancient influences.”

Anomaly 077, with a sudden spark of comprehension, exclaimed, “Ah, so it’s akin to preemptively striking the hostage to spare them from worse fates…”

Without missing a beat, Shirley knocked him down again, yet upon reflection, she conceded with a nod, “You know, you might actually have a point.”

“Why hit me then!?” protested the animated corpse as it picked itself up, shooting a glare.

Shirley, unfazed, retorted, “Because it looked like the captain was itching to do that himself,” and then, with a playful glance towards Duncan, added, “Right, Captain?”

Duncan, maintaining a stoic facade, nodded. Yet, as he did, he sensed an inexplicable shift in the atmosphere. Was it his imagination, or did the air itself transform with the application of his protective flames? Since their arrival on the island, a somber, oppressive aura had cloaked them all. But now, as if dispelled by the light of his flames, the group's inherent liveliness seemed to resurface with renewed vigor.

With a thoughtful frown, Duncan felt a deeper connection to the island's mysteries, then redirected his focus towards the darkened entrance ahead…

Their cautious steps into the temple disturbed a silence that had persisted for eons. The pale green glow of Duncan's flames cast their shadows against the ancient, discolored stone walls and floor, creating a tapestry of elongated, distorted shapes. The vastness of the palace interior, coupled with the intensifying scent of the sea and the ambiguous sounds that filled the air, created an atmosphere of overwhelming depth and mystery.

"Mind the shadows at your feet, and be wary of the deceitful silhouettes cast by our light," Vanna advised, leading the way with a vigilant eye. She cautioned the group against heeding any voices that did not belong to their own, adding, "And…"

Her warning glance fell on Morris, "Do not touch anything here."

"I haven't touched anything," Morris quickly defended, a shade of embarrassment in his tone as he raised his hands in a gesture of innocence, "I was merely observing with close interest."

As Duncan led the group through the expansive temple, his vigilant eyes meticulously surveyed the intricacy of its grand design. The pale green illumination from his flame trailed his gaze, casting light into the shadowy recesses of this ancient structure. It was during this careful observation that Duncan's pace noticeably slowed.

Above them, a vast, vine-like structure, pale and eerie, stretched across the ceiling. It snaked its way along the curvature of the dome, traversing the wall to thread itself through an opening at the top, vanishing into the further mysteries of the edifice.

Shirley, catching the direction of Duncan's attention, instinctively lifted her eyes to follow his gaze. The sight momentarily seized her heart – a reaction shared by both. Her mind reeled twice over, teetering on the edge of insanity. The protective flames that encased her, however, flared up, pulling her psyche back from the abyss. These flames, burning at the periphery of her consciousness, mitigated the profound shock induced by the realization that they were in the presence of a god's remains.

With a sudden clarity, Lucretia whispered, "It's the limbs of a god…" Her eyes, wide with awe, scanned the pale structures they had observed from a distance, now understood to be emanating from this very place.

With a hint of humor in his voice, Dog remarked, "Seeing it up close truly differs from a distant glimpse. I almost believed I felt my heart beat once more."

Duncan issued a casual yet stern warning, "Be cautious not to fixate on these limbs for too long," before urging the group onward.

As they delved further into the depths of the temple, the sights became increasingly surreal.

Enormous tentacles, some as robust as ship masts, others sprawling across the ceiling wide enough to rival the breadth of medium-sized vessels, entwined in a chaotic embrace. These tentacles pervaded every corridor and chamber like an invasive root system, intertwining with the architecture itself. They seemed to both nurture and consume the palace, integrating and outright replacing the original structural elements in some places.

In one particularly striking hall, the amalgamation of tentacles and unidentifiable organic structures nearly occupied the entire space, leaving the explorers in a state of bewildered awe. The mere sight of this biological marvel, devoid of any divine mental influence, was enough to push the fragile-minded to the brink of madness.

Duncan had every reason to believe that this overwhelming display represented merely a fraction of a larger, unseen entity. Much more of this is likely to lie concealed beneath the island or deep within the ocean's abyss.

The temple, he surmised, served as a mere point of contact—a vestibule for terrestrial pilgrims to commune with a vast marine deity. The Leviathan Queen, extending merely a portion of her tentacles from the depths, created this sanctuary to engage with the humans once under her protection.

Their journey through the temple culminated at the threshold of a long corridor, which ended not in another chamber but before a vast, lake-like pool of water, suggesting an indoor sea. This unexpected vista marked a pause in their exploration, hinting at the profound connections and mysteries lying ahead.

They found themselves in a vast circular chamber, where the floor gently sloped downwards to form a depression that cradled a softly glowing, circular pool. This pool, occupying the majority of the room's space, was surrounded by stone pavement. The walls around this chamber were punctuated with numerous doors and windows, through which countless tentacles, vessels, and what appeared to be neural threads wove their way. These appendages entered the room through the openings, plunging into the pool's depths and merging into an intricate, complex structure that was beyond the capacity of human sight to fully discern.

Parts of this massive limb structure had emerged from the water, lying inert on the stone paving. Close to where these parts lay sprawled, there were bits of debris, suggesting some form of decay or destruction.

Overwhelmed by the scale of what they encountered, Shirley finally voiced her disbelief, "Is the building really this big?" She was puzzled, feeling as if the ‘hall’ they were in was almost as expansive as the entire palace they had seen from the outside.

“Have you noticed that too?” Morris responded, casting a knowing look at Shirley before surveying the surroundings with a contemplative gaze. “The spatial dimensions here… they seem to defy logic. It’s either significantly larger on the inside, or… once we passed through a specific door or corridor, we stepped out of the palace into a connected, secretive space.”

Vanna, meanwhile, stayed quiet, her attention fixed on the lifeless, pale appendages near the water’s edge. Her face was a mask of complexity, tinged with a sense of melancholy.

She was surrounded by whispers, the constant sound of waves in the background, yet she could not make sense of any of it. From the moment she stepped into the palace, the clear, guiding presence of the goddess had faded, leaving her unable to hear Her voice anymore.

Duncan stood close to Vanna, his expression one of intense concentration and doubt.

He had come to this place with the expectation of engaging in a direct dialogue with Gomona, even in her peculiar state of being “dead.” He anticipated that he would be able to hear her voice in some form—be it echoes, visions, spiritual presences, or something entirely different, similar to his encounters with other enigmatic beings in the past. Yet, there was silence.

All that remained was the long-perished remains of what once was, with every trace of essence vanished from the entity.

Chapter 781: A Glimmer of Life in the Hourglass

Frankly speaking, Duncan experienced a fleeting but profoundly disturbing notion for a few brief moments—had he arrived too late?

He pondered whether his slightly delayed departure or an unforeseen hold-up along the journey had caused him to miss a critical moment. The Storm Goddess Gomona, who had seemingly been suspended in a state of death for ten millennia, might not have waited for him to make his entrance and could have fully succumbed to her demise. Was her consciousness now completely extinguished?

However, this outlandish speculation quickly faded from Duncan's mind. He had verified that right up until the Vanished anchored next to this mysterious island, Vanna had been able to "read" the thoughts of the Storm Goddess Gomona. This indicated that, at least until that point, she had remained in some form of active existence.

Could it truly be such a remarkable coincidence?

Duncan cast a thoughtful look towards Vanna, noticing that she, too, was turning to meet his gaze. Their eyes connected for a brief instant before both awkwardly looked away.

After a moment of silence, Duncan softly spoke, "Let's not dwell on it any further. Let's head down and uncover what awaits us," leading the way with the others trailing close behind.

They entered an enormous hall that seemed to defy conventional architectural principles, descending a spiral staircase that felt like navigating through a vortex leading towards a water-filled basin at its base. Nearby lay the immense, pale tentacles of the “Leviathan Queen,” their smaller offshoots intertwining with the dark stone blocks of the structure like roots, withering amidst the steps.

Duncan had the eerie realization that this grand palace, and even the black island supporting it, resembled a colossal, artificial “shell,” within which resided the ancient, divinely touched sea creature. As the creature perished, its body decayed and shrank, leaving behind numerous “chambers”—the corridors, rooms, and halls they were exploring.

They were traversing the interior of the creature’s “shell,” walking over the recesses left by the decaying flesh, drawing closer to the heart of the beast that had ceased to beat.

A greenish glow emanated from the stairs, piercing the surrounding gloom, as Duncan reached the area where the circular pool met the staircase. There, he discovered a slightly raised, arch-shaped stone platform. On it lay a mass of pale tissue, roughly the size of a neighborhood church’s roof, lifelessly sprawled across the platform. And at its side, on the platform’s edge… he observed what appeared to be remnants of tables, altars, and… human skeletons?!

Lucretia was the first to spot the skeletons. She paused, then swiftly moved closer to the stone platform, carefully examining the scene with a gradually deepening frown: “These aren’t the bones of standard humans or elves but bear a structural resemblance… they’re definitely some kind of humanoid.”

Duncan approached the platform, his expression serious as he surveyed the scene before him.

The skeletons were diminutive in size compared to the massive form of the Leviathan Queen, tucked away in a corner of the platform in such a manner that they were initially overlooked upon entering the vast hall.

“Who might have left these here?” Nina inquired, her voice tinged with nervousness and a hint of fear, instinctively seeking refuge behind Duncan. “Could they be explorers who preceded us? Perhaps members of the Sea Song?”

“No,” Lucretia responded, having just remarked, “these bones don’t resemble those of humans or elves—I doubt they belong to the forest folk either, as those individuals possess a distinct, singular sternum.” Breaking the ensuing silence, Anomaly 077 added, “And I recall… the crew of the Sea Song were ultimately enveloped by the mist and foam near the island, finding ‘peace’. It’s improbable they would have left any remains in this temple.”

Without a word, Duncan continued to scrutinize the items scattered amongst the skeletons with a grave demeanor—pieces of armor or clothing, broken weapons and ritualistic objects, and the ruins of a small altar.

Then, Vanna, with a quiet interjection, broke the silence: “These garments… they resemble what I witnessed in my visions, worn by those who once embarked on pilgrimages to this island…”

“A pilgrimage to this island?” Duncan replied, his voice reflecting his surprise, “Before the Great Annihilation?”

The scenes Vanna had glimpsed in her visions were undoubtedly from the era when the Storm Goddess Gomona reigned as “the Leviathan Queen”, predating the Great Annihilation. They hinted at the existence of a civilization that had thrived alongside the Leviathan, akin to the Elves before Atlantis’s downfall or the era preserved in Ta Ruijin’s memories. Could artifacts from such ancient times have endured to the present?

Duncan, marveling at the notion, examined the artifacts surrounding the skeletons. Outside the palace, remnants from the ancient era had transformed into peculiar black, shriveled matter or, as the sailors described, had dissipated into mist and foam in the sea, eluding human comprehension.

Yet, how had these skeletons and their accompanying relics remained intact?

Just then, Alice's voice pierced the contemplative silence: "Captain, look! What's this?"

Prompted by her call, Duncan joined the doll at her location, directing his gaze to where she pointed—a dust-covered object shrouded in tattered cloth near the altar's corner.

It was a delicately crafted, ornate, and ancient hourglass.

After a brief pause, Duncan reached out, lifted the hourglass, and gently blew away the layer of dust covering it.

The intricate symbols and script adorning the hourglass's surface came into sharp relief.

"An hourglass?" Morris observed the object in Duncan's hand with visible surprise, his optical lenses minutely adjusting. Then, sensing something amiss, he remarked, "Odd…"

Intrigued, Vanna instinctively queried, "Odd in what way?"

Morris paused, reflecting on his observations before sharing, "It's stylistically out of sync with the rest of the temple, particularly the inscriptions on the hourglass… While the temple's outer walls are adorned with many runes, the inscriptions on this hourglass clearly belong to a different tradition. It resembles…

As Duncan listened to Morris’s analysis, a realization dawned on him:

Viewed from a side angle, the silhouette of the hourglass, with its two conical shapes pointing towards each other and encased by a decorative framework, bore a striking resemblance to… Bartok’s door.

“…It bears a resemblance to some of the sacred relics associated with the Death Church!” Morris interjected.

The sacred relics of the Death Church… artifacts associated with Bartok, the deity of death?

This revelation made Duncan’s demeanor turn grave. Piecing together the clues—the preserved skeletons and artifacts within the palace—he began to form a theory.

After a moment of deep thought, Duncan turned his gaze back to the motionless remains of the sea creature by the pool. He then gently inverted the hourglass he held in his hand.

The hourglass contained pale golden sand that flowed silently, too faint for the human ear, moving like mist through the “Doors of Death” mirrored in its design.

In an instant, the world seemed to fall silent, as if divided into realms of life and death by some unseen force. Duncan’s surroundings morphed into a monochrome landscape, where every object’s outline shimmered with shifting, ghostly images. In this altered state, all living beings disappeared from sight, leaving only Duncan, clasping the hourglass, surrounded by the skeletons, which began to reassemble and flesh out before his eyes.

The skeletons transformed into living figures—two armored men with stoic expressions and a young woman in white robes who offered him a smile.

Duncan, struck by the miraculous reversal from death to life, was about to speak when the woman in white robes gestured for silence and stepped back.

At the pool's edge, the giant, pale limb, as vast as a church's rooftop, stirred slightly, its surface starting to shimmer with a luminescent glow. Then, a soft voice echoed in Duncan's mind – "We finally meet, Usurper of Fire."

"Gomona?" With a hint of surprise, Duncan recognized the entity and glanced at the hourglass in his grasp, "…I hadn't anticipated actual results. It was merely a speculative attempt."

"Yes, your speculative attempt was fruitful—within the temple's temporal flow, I was utterly deceased. This hourglass harbors a fleeting essence of life, intended to facilitate our communication under dire circumstances… Upon crafting this hourglass, Bartok had prophesied that you would inevitably turn it."

Hearing the soft voice echo in his mind, Duncan's eyebrows arched in astonishment: "Hold on, are you suggesting… you foresaw my arrival, my act of turning this hourglass, and even this exact conversation? Was everything orchestrated in advance?"

"Indeed, from the moment this sanctuary came into existence, its destiny was sealed. Usurper of Fire… For us, the concept of time does not resemble a river or a linear path; rather, we perceive it as a vast expanse, a tableau fully visible from our vantage point. On this 'Scroll of Time', all conceivable outcomes have reached their conclusion…"

The voice took a brief pause before resuming in a tender tone:

"In this grand scheme, your emergence, Usurper of Fire, marks the sole certainty at the tail end of this Scroll of Time. However, the outcome of this event remains unpredictable."

Duncan, with a thoughtful look, shared his insight, "I've started to grasp the essence of time's flow… What you've described is within the realm of my understanding, though initially, it’s challenging to reconcile with tangible reality,” he said, surveying his surroundings, “The peculiar flow of time within this temple… That explains why, upon our entry, neither Vanna nor I could detect your presence, and the discovery on the platform…”

His gaze briefly settled on the figures beside him before diverting.

“Seeing those remains led me to suspect a ‘discrepancy’ between the interior and exterior of this temple. Crossing its threshold seems to have ushered us into an isolated ‘branch of possibility’. What’s the reason for this division?”

“To prolong the ‘decay’ of the external barrier,” Gomona explained in a hushed tone, “We are succumbing to decay, Usurper of Fire. It was imperative for us to ‘seal’ our deterioration within, lest the sanctuary’s natural decay prematurely unleashes our corruption upon this world.”

Chapter 782: Residue and Inertia

The fine particles of sand within the hourglass were gently making their way to the bottom, hinting at a passage of time that seemed as if it could go on forever. Duncan held the hourglass with extreme care, engaging in a meaningful conversation with an entity of ancient power.

“The gods are fading away,” was a thought Duncan had come across more than once. The heads of the Four Gods had shared this dark revelation with him, explaining that the decline of the divine was not just an abstract concept but a tangible force. This force was slowly infiltrating the world of mortals, signaling its eventual doom to a catastrophic end known as the Great Annihilation.

Yet, hearing these words directly from a deity themselves painted the crisis in an even more urgent light. It made Duncan realize that the gods had been fighting against this decline with everything they had for as long as they could.

“This sanctuary, which was created in haste, is full of flaws… Everything in it is ephemeral: the protective barrier, the artificial ‘sun’, the fundamental elements that support the islands, and even us. Our end was decided from the start, determined even before the onset of what is known as the first eternal night,” explained the ancient Leviathan Queen. She spoke in a place that lacked color, defined only by shades of black, white, and gray. Despite her powerful nature, her voice carried a surprising gentleness, narrating their collective history to Duncan like a calm dream floating in the depths of the ocean.

“It took a long journey to come to terms with our ‘end’, and an even longer time for Bartok to decipher the enigma of our ‘continuous death’. We represent the ‘inertia’ of a time long past.”

“The inertia of the ancient world?” Duncan mused, his mind racing to piece together his thoughts.

“If you understand the force behind the destruction of our world and many others, then you must also realize that the Great Annihilation didn’t destroy everything in its path. Some ‘fragments’ managed to survive the catastrophic collision of worlds, and we, who are known as ‘gods’, are among these fragments.”

“However, by their nature, fragments are incomplete. Just as dust falling from a boulder eventually becomes sand and loses its original form, we too were irrevocably changed by the force of the Great Annihilation. From that moment, we were transformed into something akin to the glowing ’embers’… Yet, unlike those embers, we were able to maintain our ‘self-awareness’.”

“This consciousness of our past selves gave us the strength to rise from the ashes, trying to shape some of the surviving embers into something resembling our memories.”

“At first, this gave us a flicker of hope, the ambition to rebuild all worlds, to breathe life back into everything that had been reduced to ashes. However, it wasn’t long before we faced the reality of our ‘reconstruction’s’ limitations and began to acknowledge our own waning power…”

We exist in a condition that cannot truly be considered life; we continue as faint whispers of desire encapsulated in lifeless forms. Our ability to remember and be aware of ourselves, along with our memories of the world as it used to be, allows us to function. However, these capacities for ‘recognition’ and ‘remembrance’ are slowly diminishing over time.

“Bartok, who has the most profound understanding of ‘death’ among us, has described this phenomenon as ‘the inertia of the old world’. He argues that our existence continues not because of any decision or strength of our own, but because the ‘world refuses to fade into nonexistence’. The old world, despite being devastated by the Great Annihilation, has left behind a momentum from its existence that survives after the cataclysm, taking shape as the various survivors that outlasted the disaster – in essence, becoming us.”

“The ‘awareness of self’ and the ‘nostalgia for the old world’…” Duncan pondered, holding the hourglass in one hand and thoughtfully stroking his chin with the other, “Are these the critical elements that led to the creation of ‘sanctuaries’?”

“Exactly,” the voice answered, its gentleness masking the seriousness of their discussion, “Using our memories and awareness of self as a foundation, we tried to reconstruct the original ‘keystones’ from the surviving pieces, leading to the creation of numerous pseudo-records related to the Great Annihilation within the world. However, the quest for tangible proof of the Annihilation is in vain, because no such ‘proof’ has ever existed. Even the vast oceans are made up of bits and pieces we managed to recover from the survivors…”

“Yet, the stability of these remnants, as well as our ability to ‘recognize’ and ‘remember’, is constantly weakening over time… This gradual loss is the reason behind the ‘life limit’ concept built into the design of the sanctuary.”

Duncan pondered Gomona’s words, occasionally pausing to reflect and quietly sharing his thoughts, “‘Inertia’ is bound to fade away… which means the Doomsday Survey Team will inevitably face that ‘limit’, no matter how perfectly they carry out their mission, ‘the end of the world’ was predetermined at its beginning…”

He then recalled Crete's admonition: "Continuing with the sanctuary has no point…"

"Truly, continuing with the sanctuary has no point," the Leviathan Queen reiterated softly, providing deeper insight into the statement – "To 'delay' the Great Annihilation any longer is pointless."

A new realization lit up in Duncan's eyes as he looked up, noticing a pale limb beginning to rise from the edge of the pool, with eyes slowly appearing on its surface.

"Do you remember? The cataclysm brought about by the Great Annihilation is not over; it continues relentlessly, attacking the most basic logic of existence. The conflict of principles and the advance of chaos are just its visible symptoms. At its heart, it symbolizes the battle between 'being' and 'non-being' – as long as we, the 'living', continue to be, and as long as the sanctuary exists, the Great Annihilation will go on. It will persist until everything in the world is obliterated, and only then… will the Great Annihilation come to an end."

The pale limb in front of Duncan drooped, its eyes, though non-human, shimmered with an intelligence and emotion akin to that of humans. It was as if, in their gaze, there was a sense of resignation or perhaps deep thought.

"What you see as a rift is actually a 'result', a 'crossroads' where all possible outcomes from every universe come together into one inevitable 'end' – it symbolizes the 'ultimate point' of the vast ocean."

In the silence that followed Gomona's explanation, time seemed to slow down for Duncan. After a moment, he softly said, "So, from the very beginning, this 'world' was haunted by the ghost of its inevitable end."

After a short pause, he looked for Gomona's "eyes" again, piercing the quiet: "Thus, no matter what solution we might find in the end, our first challenge is to deal with this ‘unending destruction’. We need to find a way to stop the Great Annihilation – but the only way to stop the Great Annihilation is…”

He trailed off, allowing Gomona to finish the thought in her calm voice: “To let the Great Annihilation ‘come to its natural end’.”

A profound silence fell over them, as if the universe itself had stopped to listen.

After a long moment, Duncan exhaled slowly: “This cannot be the ultimate ‘truth’ you wanted to share – there has to be more you haven’t told me yet.”

“Yes, there is more – letting the Great Annihilation ‘run its course’ could take different shapes, but with our current knowledge and abilities, ‘total destruction’ seems like the inevitable outcome of every path. However, as I’ve mentioned, this conclusion is based ‘on our current knowledge and abilities’…”

The pale limb lowered once more, making way for a spectral figure – a girl in a flowing dress, her face hidden behind a veil, who approached the edge of the pool and bowed deeply to Duncan.

Years before, she had perfected this gesture as a means of communicating with her “mortal allies,” reserved for moments of utmost importance.

“Usurper of Fire, your existence transcends our understanding and capabilities. Technically, you’re even beyond the reach of the Great Annihilation – though you are among the primordial beings, having awakened from the original flames, you aren’t just a ‘survivor’.”

“We can’t fully grasp what you are, but Navigator No. 2’s calculations hint that you might be the only ‘whole’ entity among us – possibly, you have the means to protect the remains of the old world when that ‘end’ comes.”

Duncan stayed quiet, his expression more troubled than before, his thoughts clearly burdened.

Then, it dawned on him – those “objects” that had appeared in his room!

The “Maiden of Tranquility” spoke again, her voice echoing in Duncan’s ears: “Understanding and perception, memory and information – these are seen as the foundational pillars upon which the reality of our world is built. Navigator No. 2 shared with me that it comes from a civilization that was on the brink of uncovering the universe’s basic laws, right before the onset of the Great Annihilation. It was at the peak of this civilization’s in-depth and complex explorations that a certain thinker proposed an idea. This idea is the most remarkable piece within Navigator No. 2’s collection of memories – that information is the core of all that exists; everything is essentially a form of information.”

“Information is the essence… everything is a manifestation of information…” Duncan repeated, his voice carrying a tone of deep insight. It was as though an intense, profound ‘roar’ echoed from within him, shedding light on myriad questions. The space around him seemed to vibrate, edged with the transient glow of stars at the edge of his vision before these images gradually disappeared.

He then heard the “Maiden of Tranquility” again, though her voice now sounded far away, muffled as though through a thick veil: “…To this day, Navigator No. 2 ponders over this concept, its originators on the verge of uncovering a pivotal truth, yet they only managed to pose this idea. With what we ‘survivors’ have at our disposal, in the conditions of the sanctuary, Navigator No. 2 has come to accept the possibility that it may never be able to turn this idea into a solid theory or ‘tool.’ However, your presence… has sparked a thought. There might have been a civilization, even more advanced than the one Navigator No. 2 originated from, that had already crossed that threshold.”

Chapter 783: Handover

The deafening cacophony that had once engulfed his senses began to dissipate gradually, clearing the fog from his perception and bringing the world before him into vivid detail. This experience felt akin to how once muffled and indistinct sounds suddenly sharpened and became apparent as if a curtain of fog had been pulled back to reveal the landscape beyond.

In the newfound silence, the voice of Gomona, gentle and comforting like the soft touch of a breeze over a calm lake, pierced the quiet, asking, “Usurper of Fire, what is your view of the world?”

Taking a moment to consider her question, Duncan repeated her words thoughtfully, “The world in my eyes…” His gaze drifted across his surroundings, taking in the sight of Gomona, who stood before him with a serene presence, the massive, lifeless body of the Leviathan Queen lying nearby, and the peaceful pond where a fish momentarily captured his attention with its graceful leap. This brief distraction led him down a path of introspection.

Turning his attention back to Gomona, ” Duncan took a moment before offering his insight. “My view of the world often diverges from that of others around me. The way I perceive things seems to alter them, and this alteration extends outward, influencing how others see them too. Navigator One describes this phenomenon as the power of the observer, but I feel… the truth might be more intricate than that.”

Gomona’s ethereal form seemed to brighten with a smile at his response. “It appears Navigator Two’s evaluation was precise,” she observed. “The civilization that stands by you—or, to put it more accurately, ‘they’—have already discovered that ‘answer.’”

Pondering her words, Duncan mused, “…If we consider ‘information’ to be the fundamental layer of existence, is it possible to preserve everything within the shelter while also ‘completing’ the Great Annihilation?”

“If ‘information’ indeed constitutes the essence of all that exists, and we have the capability to rebuild the world from this basic level, then theoretically, any scenario is imaginable,” Gomona answered, her voice as soft as ever. “The absolute ‘everything.’ Every possible and impossible scenario, every being that has ever existed or will exist in the universe, those that were eradicated, and those that survived the Great Annihilation… as long as ‘information’ can define them, they can be recreated in any form… even allowing for a rebirth after ‘destruction’…”

Gomona then paused, her expression turning thoughtful as if she had reached the limits of her understanding. After a brief moment, she gently shook her head, conceding, “That concept is beyond my understanding.”

After a short reflection, Duncan admitted, “…Truthfully, it seems beyond my comprehension as well, at least as the person I currently am.”

Gomona’s face took on a thoughtful expression, her spectral features momentarily becoming less distinct, though the depth of her emotions remained as palpable as any human’s. “You’ve previously mentioned that you possess ‘complete order.’ Could you explain what you mean by that in more detail?”

A hush fell over the temple, encouraging a moment of deep introspection. Duncan seized this opportunity to carefully organize his thoughts, sifting through the extensive information at his fingertips. He aimed to explain his current level of self-awareness and the unique “state” that characterized his being. After a thoughtful pause, he broke the silence with a carefully considered explanation: “Picture a civilization at the pinnacle of order, capturing a 0.002-second snapshot of the universe at the precise instant it recognized the inevitability of the Great Annihilation. In a bid to conserve a pristine sample of their time, untouched by the looming disaster, they ‘sliced’ this moment out of the timeline, encapsulating it… This fragment, this ‘essence,’ now exists within me.”

Duncan elaborated, his explanation becoming more lucid, “From what I understand, this minuscule piece of the universe serves as the vital seed needed to birth a new universe… it’s like a ‘start parameter,’ a fundamental blueprint from which everything else can emerge.”

He paused, wrestling with the complexity of the idea, but Gomona quickly understood and expanded on his point: “A flawless blueprint, embodying ‘self-consistency’ and ‘completeness’!”

A spark of recognition lit up in Duncan’s eyes: “Precisely, that’s exactly it.”

For the first time, Gomona showed a level of excitement Duncan had not seen in her before. “This is exactly what we’ve been looking for—a pure, undamaged blueprint! Neither our allies nor the civilization that backs us have achieved this, which is why our creations were temporary, like waves in the ocean. But with a complete blueprint…”

Time seemed to move faster, its passage marked by the accelerated trickling of sand in an hourglass. This sound gently pulled Gomona back from her excitement, reminding her of the need to preserve her limited “vitality.”

“With this complete blueprint at our disposal, we have a real chance at constructing a tangible world,” she said, trying to remain calm. “Our previous efforts at ‘creation’ were unsuccessful mainly because we lacked a comprehensive understanding of the cosmic order. If ‘information’ is the foundation of existence, then the universal order is the ‘formula’ that allows all information to integrate flawlessly. We've never been able to grasp this formula, but you… you have it…"

"But merely having the formula is just the start," Duncan added, "As I've said before, I need resources— and a lot of them. Just as a single seed cannot grow into a giant tree without soil, a blueprint by itself cannot create a house without bricks and mortar."

"I believe we do possess the necessary resources," Gomona confidently claimed.

A look of realization dawned on Duncan's face, signaling a shift in his understanding.

Gomona, with a hint of reluctance, suggested, "Would our sacrifice be enough?" Her voice carried a blend of hope and uncertainty as if she doubted whether their collective offering would meet the requirements.

Duncan's face took on a mixture of emotions, his voice reflecting a complex blend of feelings, "Are you seriously considering that?"

"We hold a substantial amount of 'information' from the ancient world. Navigator Two had informed us of this. Its research, initiated by its creators long ago, is still incomplete. Yet, it has made strides towards the edge of understanding," Gomona explained with a tone of solemnity. "Its findings suggest that the 'information' we carry exceeds our capability to wield or control. Its volume surpasses that of the Boundless Sea. Our failure to harness this information means we are wasting a massive store of 'basic information.' A small portion is used in constructing the shelter, but the rest deteriorates with us, unused and diminishing…"

"But your case is different, Usurper of Fire. Your civilization has reached such advanced levels that you might be capable of utilizing this power effectively. You could potentially orchestrate our 'detonation' in a way that is efficient. Although we are just remnants of the old world, combining all pieces of the ‘external barrier’ could be enough to support the creation process at least once…”

She paused, the hastening flow of the sands in the hourglass marking a moment of urgency.

After a moment of silence, she continued in a gentler voice, “This is something Salmir couldn’t accomplish back then…”

Salmir, known as the Pale Giant King, had the ambitious goal of reconstructing the stars, but his attempt ended in failure as the stars collapsed under prolonged darkness, caught in subspace.

Duncan stayed quiet, his face revealing his reluctance to consider the Leviathan Queen’s “proposal.”

Both emotionally and logically, the idea of “detonating” the Four Gods along with the remnants of other ancient deities as fuel for a “creation blueprint” was daunting. He questioned whether the explosion of information would be sufficient for such a grand plan.

Admitting this felt somewhat crude, yet Duncan couldn’t ignore the thought that the “informational content” these “gods” contained, including Gomona, seemed minor compared to the vastness of a complete universe.

These were “minor gods” after all—a ship’s mainframe, a recorder of planetary histories, a marine leviathan in charge of a section of the ocean, and an ancient deity of death and sacrifice. Their collective knowledge and memories from the old world appeared too limited to draft a comprehensive map of the cosmos.

Despite his doubts, Duncan found himself unable to express his reservations aloud. The Leviathan Queen, positioned gracefully at the edge of the water, looked towards him with eyes full of hope. This being, though considered a “minor god” in his eyes, firmly believed that her ultimate sacrifice could significantly contribute to the birth of stars in the emerging world.

After a notable period of silence, Duncan gave a subtle nod in acknowledgment.

Internally, he harbored skepticism, considering this plan to be fraught with uncertainty. He thought it wise to consider other options.

“We’re running short on time,” Gomona reflected, then quickly added, “Naturally, a more reliable solution would be preferable. But should time become too pressing, remember…” she let her words linger, imbuing them with significance, “…we will be here, ready for your decision.”

As the flow of sand in the hourglass increased, the reality of their limited time together became unmistakably clear.

“It seems our time to part is imminent,” the ghostly figure of the girl remarked, as the immense, pale limbs in the backdrop slowly reached towards the water’s edge. “Bartok had mentioned that the remaining vitality in the hourglass would suffice for our essential dialogue—it appears our window for conversation is nearing its end.”

Duncan glanced at the hourglass, observing the dwindling amount of sand. He recognized the necessity of conserving “vitality” for that critical moment when he must return to provide Gomona with the final “answer.”

“Before we part, is there anything else you’d like to impart?” Duncan asked.

A brief silence ensued until a woman nearby, dressed in a white robe that evoked the semblance of clerical attire, approached to hand him something.

Duncan’s interest peaked immediately—it was a brass key, distinctly crafted for winding a doll!

“What is this?” His curiosity was piqued.

“This is the ‘route’ to all the nodes of the entire external barrier,” Gomona explained softly, “Navigator Two was adamant that it should be entrusted to you during your visit here. In your hands, it will reveal its true nature, and you will naturally understand how to use it.”

The idea that the object would manifest its true purpose in his possession intrigued Duncan as he cautiously accepted the brass key.

The key felt cool and substantial in his hand. Unlike another key he was familiar with, which featured an “infinity” symbol, this one’s handle was embellished with an intricate design, surrounded by a ring through which an arrow was threaded.

“I trust this will be of significant aid,” Gomona offered, her smile conveying hope.

Taking a moment to securely place the key on his person, Duncan confirmed, “This will undoubtedly be invaluable.”

Gomona’s spectral nod seemed to signify the end of their meeting: “With that, we have addressed all that was necessary.”

Chapter 784: The Key to the Apocalypse

Everything came down to this simple moment.

As the hourglass was carefully turned over, the last few grains of sand began their descent, marking the passage of time much like the moments of life that slip away, never to be regained. Duncan disappeared into the “spiritual rift,” leaving behind the serene and color-muted hall by the water pond. In this quiet place, made up of shades of black, white, and gray, the enormous limbs of the Leviathan Queen rested gently along the shore. Nearby, a young woman dressed in a white robe and two warriors maintained a respectful silence.

It was time once again for a period of rest, though a brief span remained. The dwindling life force from the hourglass was scarce, yet it afforded a precious opportunity for long-separated friends to share a brief exchange.

“Lillian… it feels like an eternity since our last meeting,” came a soft, resonant voice, stirring the still air of the hall. The pale limbs near the pool’s edge quivered ever so slightly, sending ripples of nostalgia through the room.

The woman in the white robe, Lillian, offered a warm smile and took a seat by the edge of the water pond. She leaned back against a tentacle of the Leviathan Queen, finding comfort in its familiar touch. “Yes, Gomona, it has indeed been a long time since our paths last crossed. But remember, Lancelot and I have always remained close by your side.”

“Do the days filled with gentle waves and radiant sunshine still visit your memories?”

“They do. It feels as though it was just yesterday… I also cherish the memory of our first meeting, when you unexpectedly entered my dream. You confessed how weary you had grown of your temple duties and longed for a brief escape. Together with Lancelot, Owen, and later Paltry, who now guards the temple’s entrance, along with others from our circle, we embarked on an adventure. You wished to witness deserts, volcanoes, and snow-covered landscapes, and so we did. Eventually, I escorted you, our adventurous ‘Queen’ who had fled from her responsibilities, back to your temple, and in turn, we were honored as your royal guardians. Those days were filled with such vibrancy and life.”

“…Indeed, those days were vibrant and alive. Despite the passage of time, the memories remain delightful. We even concocted a plan to covertly open a quaint shop at the pilgrimage’s outset, imagining the Leviathan Queen herself offering souvenirs to pilgrims as a whimsical venture…”

“That scheme was solely yours,” interjected one of the towering warriors, breaking the silence for the first time. “Lillian, Owen, and I never consented to it.”

“…Perhaps we should have,” Lillian mused softly, a hint of regret in her voice. “It does seem like it would have been a delightful endeavor…”

The area around the water pond returned to silence, only to be gently pierced once more by the soft, resonant voice: “I don’t want to go to sleep.”

“But sleep you must, Gomona,” Lillian replied, her gaze tender and caring as she caressed Gomona’s tentacle with her hair. “You need to rest here and then awaken in the timeline beyond the temple… The other three ‘Kings’ are eagerly awaiting your message. Their concern grows by the minute.”

Gomona’s expression conveyed a sense of loss, her voice tinged with longing. “But you won’t be there outside the temple… I miss you.”

In an attempt to offer solace, Lillian spoke with a gentle assurance. “We will meet again one day in the distant future. Do you recall the predictions of Navigator Two? It has analyzed the fate of the sanctuary time and again. Despite its forecasts invariably pointing towards the extinction of all, no prediction is absolute. Though seemingly final, every outcome carries a margin of uncertainty—like a spectral variance that lurks after countless zeroes in a decimal place…”

Her voice softened, carrying the weight of impending slumber, as she continued, “Amidst the ‘end’ foretold as the extinction of all, what lies concealed at the edge of time may hold a glimmer of hope. It’s there we shall meet once more… And then, let us venture forth together, and perhaps, open that souvenir shop once again.”

Her words faded, marking the return of silence as those briefly reanimated succumbed to their eternal rest. After a time indeterminable, the stillness of the water pond area was gently broken: “Goodnight, Lillian, goodnight…”

Reality’s colors reclaimed their presence, the monochromatic hall regaining its lifeless hues. Duncan’s vision was restored to the water pond, now emanating a soft blue light amidst the black and dark green stones, the Leviathan Queen’s tentacle once again lifeless by the water’s edge.

Beside the tentacle lay scattered skeletal remains.

Duncan, observing the dwindling sands within the hourglass—now less than a fifth remaining, their faint golden glow a beacon in the dimness—was approached by his companions.

Shirley, leveraging her stature, pushed to the forefront, concern in her voice: “Captain Captain! What happened? You turned into a shadow, just standing there. It was so freaky…”

After a moment’s pause, Duncan placed the hourglass upon the altar, then looked up, his voice steady: “I saw the Leviathan Queen and we spoke of certain matters.”

Vanna, moving closer, interjected with curiosity: “You spoke with the goddess? What is this place exactly…”

Before she could continue, Duncan gestured for silence and explained, “This ‘temple’ divides the timeline into two segments.”

This revelation prompted a mix of expressions among the group, with Morris adopting a contemplative look, quietly pondering, “The timeline is split into two parts?”

Duncan took a moment to gather his thoughts before sharing the insights he had gleaned, including some conjectures. “If my understanding is correct, the timeline outside this temple pertains to the ‘Deep Sea Era.’ Gomona, as one of the four deities of the Boundless Sea, oversees the ‘external barrier’ surrounding this temple. Here, she exists in a state that is neither fully alive nor dead, answering the prayers of her followers while maintaining the order of the Boundless Sea—that’s the ‘Storm Goddess’ Vanna knows.”

“And within the confines of this temple lies a segment cleaved from the Deep Sea Era—here, the Leviathan Queen Gomona has isolated her own demise and decay, alongside recollections of the cataclysmic event and numerous fragments of knowledge pertaining to the world’s core essence. She has ensnared all these elements within the temple’s timeline, aiming to shield the sanctuary outside from their corrupting influence.”

Duncan paused for a moment, his gaze shifting back to the lifeless tentacle beside the water pond, and the nearby skeletal remains scattered on the ground.

“This is the reason that upon entering the temple, Vanna found herself unable to commune with the Storm Goddess. All that was visible was a form that had succumbed to complete death—because Gomona confined her demise within these walls. In essence, the moment we crossed into this space, we were met with her actual death.”

Lucretia’s attention drifted to the hourglass positioned on the altar, prompting her to ask, “So, this hourglass is…”

“It’s a means of communication left behind for me,” Duncan confirmed with a nod. “It’s a creation of Bartok, the god of death, who fashioned a bridge between the living and the dead. By inverting the hourglass, I was afforded the chance to converse with Gomona, who was momentarily reinvigorated. Although the remnants of life force it harbors are dwindling.”

A hush fell over the water pond area, the gravity of the revelation leaving the group lost in thought. After a brief silence, Morris, his voice imbued with reverence, finally spoke: “…Remarkable… So, did the god of death and the storm goddess collaborate to forge this sanctuary?”

Duncan responded with a gentle shake of his head, indicating there was more to the story: “Not solely them.”

He mulled over the temple’s intricate workings, slowly piecing together the puzzle. The hourglass’s power stemmed from Bartok, the god of death. The strategy of segmenting the timeline to encapsulate “information” hinted at an association with the god of wisdom, while the archived information and “memories” linked to the Great Annihilation represented the Eternal Flame. Positioned at the boundary of the Boundless Sea, beyond the realm of structured existence, the calm waters served as the “foundation” for this barrier—clearly an influence of the storm goddess.

This entire external barrier was a collaborative endeavor by the four deities, establishing the true limits of the world. It was here that the other Kings were granted the chance to “forge” the world within the sanctuary, time and again.

As Duncan pieced together his understanding of the world, his grasp of its mechanics grew clearer. The realization of how the external barrier functioned enlightened him and seemed to empower him with a newfound ability to interact with the world’s fabric. This enlightenment quickly morphed into practical knowledge—the kind that could be applied to influence the entire Boundless Sea. More specifically… might be harnessed to bring about the Great Annihilation.

This revelation halted Duncan’s train of thought, casting a shadow of gravity over his demeanor.

It dawned on him that he had uncovered the means to dismantle the external barrier and everything it encapsulated—this, he speculated, might have been Gomona’s true message for him.

Alice, picking up on the shift in Duncan’s mood, moved closer, her expression tinged with concern as she clutched at his clothing. “Captain? You look quite troubled…”

Jolted back to reality by Alice’s presence and the genuine worry in her violet eyes, Duncan’s swirling thoughts began to settle. He inhaled deeply, a soothing gesture as he gently stroked Alice’s hair, offering her a semblance of reassurance.

“Don’t worry,” he said, his voice regaining its steadiness, “I’ve just come to a sudden realization…”

His gaze returned to what remained of Gomona, a symbol of a greater truth.

“If my deductions are correct, the other ‘three gods’ have likely made similar sacrifices—They’ve each ‘sealed’ their ‘deaths’ and ‘corruptions’ within this temporal divide in an effort to stave off the world's inevitable decay."

Nina, catching the serious undertone of the conversation, looked from Duncan to the nearby hourglass, then broke the silence: "So, what's our next step? Are we going to seek out the other three gods?"

"…Yes, that's exactly what we're going to do." Duncan affirmed with a subtle nod.

His path forward was now clear. He intended to journey to each critical point along the external barrier—to lay the groundwork for the Great Annihilation.

Chapter 785: News from the North

In the remote and icy waters of the north, whispers tell of a group coming together under the gloom of darkness. This group is the “Northern City-State Alliance,” a coalition born amidst the eerie quiet of the northern seas.

Leading this formidable assembly is a figure shrouded in myth—the “Iron Admiral.” Commanding an army of the undead, he seized control before the escalating tension among the city-states, exacerbated by their prolonged deprivation of sunlight, could erupt into chaos. The first to align with him were the city-states of Cold Port and Morpheus. In the secretive ambiance created by the Sea Mist, these initial members solemnly pledged their allegiance to the alliance through a binding agreement.

In response to their unified efforts, a formidable naval force has now been established. This fleet stands as a guardian over the city-states left in shadow, navigating the perilous and mystifying darkness that the night has become. Meanwhile, a collaborative endeavor between the city-states and the church authorities has led to the formation of the “Sunlight Distribution Committee.” This committee diligently oversees the remnants of sunlight that plunged into the ocean. Their mission is to ensure that these fragments are harnessed to cast light upon the darkest corners of the night at the opportune moment.

Heidi, having absorbed this intriguing news from the paper, shifted her gaze towards her mother, who was seated nearby, illuminated by the flickering light of a candlestick. Despite the restoration of the city’s electrical power, which had bathed their living room in bright light once more, her mother preferred to maintain a candle lit at all times.

“Now, no single city-state in the north is permitted to keep a sun fragment indefinitely. The ‘Sunlight Distribution Committee’ circulates these fragments among the city-states, ensuring that no area remains engulfed in darkness for too long, which could lead to dangerous mutations,” Heidi recounted the information gleaned from her visit to City Hall, illustrating how the northern city-states have embarked on a remarkable initiative to ‘share daylight.’ This initiative involves large engineering vessels traversing the Cold Sea, each towing a fragment of the sun. These makeshift suns play a crucial role in safeguarding the city-states…

She took a moment to reflect before adding, “This arrangement has also revitalized maritime trade between city-states. Cargo ships now accompany the engineering vessels, ensuring that despite a decrease in operational efficiency, essential logistics and trade links between city-states have been reestablished…”

After a brief pause, Heidi marveled at the ingenuity of their efforts, remarking, “It’s truly astounding… It appears that the ‘Iron Admiral’ isn’t the tyrannical ‘King of the Undead’ that some rumors make him out to be…”

“Remember, rumors often stray far from the truth. Don’t forget, we still have the Vanished tirelessly seeking hope for us at the world’s end,” her mother replied with a gentle smile, continuing her sewing, “Is this what you found out from City Hall?”

“The newspapers didn’t provide all these details,” Heidi responded, gesturing towards the newspaper on the table, “I got this information from someone in the secretary’s office. The intricacies of the Northern City-State Alliance and the Sunlight Distribution Committee aren't widely publicized, but they're not exactly secret either."

Her mother took a moment to reflect before responding slowly, "Is that so… It appears that we, too, will soon be part of our own City-State Alliance and have a Sunlight Distribution Committee of our own."

Heidi was caught off guard by her mother's insight; the thought had not yet crossed her mind.

"It's a practical strategy for survival. In these times, any method that enables us to endure the night serves as a powerful incentive for city-state leaders to spring into action. If you've come to know of this, it suggests that the initiative has already gained significant traction among the governors," her mother explained with a casual yet reassuring tone, "The northern city-states have established a commendable model… The 'Iron Admiral' has blazed a trail for us, and with the spread of this news, other city-states, regardless of their private reservations, are now compelled to consider adopting this strategy."

"…But what if the city-states that have already secured fragments of the sun refuse to collaborate?" Heidi understood the logic behind her mother's words but remained concerned, "Not everyone might be willing to share so selflessly, after all."

Her mother paused to ponder before posing a seemingly unrelated question, "Did you hear about the church's fleet docking at the military port west of Pland a couple of days ago?"

"Yes, the 'Cyclone' of the Storm Church and the 'Logic' of the Truth Academy, along with their escort fleets, were reported to have made a stopover during their patrol for maritime safety," Heidi confirmed with a nod.

“That’s correct, Heidi,” her mother said, her face lighting up with an affectionate smile, “Now, why do you think the ‘Iron Admiral’ prioritized establishing a united fleet under his command as the initial step towards forming the City-State Alliance?”

At that moment, Heidi experienced a flash of insight. Despite her credentials as a respected psychiatrist and a distinguished scholar of the Truth Academy, she sometimes found herself a step behind in matters outside her field of expertise. But now, she understood the strategic importance.

“Let’s celebrate, Heidi. After enduring such prolonged darkness, it seems we’re on the cusp of witnessing something positive,” her mother suggested with a smile, gracefully rising to head towards the kitchen, “I’ll prepare some of our finest dishes, and you can retrieve one of the bottles of premium wine your father has been saving. He won’t mind if we open just one.”

“Oh… oh,” Heidi murmured automatically, standing up before a sudden recollection halted her, “Ah, but Dad has quit drinking. He gave away his entire collection…”

“In the basement, beside the white shelf, there’s a wooden box that appears to have just a single layer. But if you tug on a wooden block sticking out from its side, you’ll discover a secret compartment,” her mother revealed nonchalantly, “And, behind the storage rack, in the farthest corner of the basement, there’s a chest containing five bottles of wine. Feel free to pick any one of those to bring upstairs.”

Heidi was momentarily lost for words, “…”

As her mother paused at the kitchen doorway, she looked back with a look of triumph, “Did you really think I wouldn’t be aware of it?”

…

Standing at the bow of the Vanished, Morris was suddenly enveloped by an unexpected chill. The sea around them was tranquil, with hardly a whisper of wind, yet he felt as if an icy breeze was piercing through his brass-constructed body right into the oil pump and the compact steam core nestled within.

“What’s wrong?” Duncan, picking up on the subtle disturbances emanating from Morris, queried with a blend of concern and curiosity.

“It’s odd… my body, being what it is, shouldn’t experience cold, and yet, why do I sense a chill deep within?” Morris pondered aloud, pausing in his maintenance of his pipe, “It’s as though something invaluable has vanished into thin air, or as if an item securely stored in a bank vault has been stolen…”

Before he could finish his thought, the captain interjected from behind, his tone light yet pointed: “Your words bring to mind an old man whose treasures were pilfered by monkeys.”

Turning to face the voice, Morris found Duncan observing him, an inscrutable look upon his face.

“I’m unfamiliar with that tale,” Morris admitted, his expression one of genuine confusion, “What, exactly, is a ‘monkey’?”

Duncan paused, seemingly searching for the simplest explanation: “… Imagine it as a creature from another dimension, existing in subspace.”

Morris, struck by the concept, chose not to delve deeper into the mystery. Meanwhile, Vanna, who had been earnestly following their exchange, turned her gaze towards Morris, her demeanor growing increasingly serious: “Could this be an omen from the god of wisdom? Do you have a premonition of impending events?”

“It’s unlikely to be that grave,” Morris quickly dismissed the concern with a gesture, “Were it a divine sign from the Almighty, it wouldn’t manifest merely as a chill. It’s probably just my spouse discovering my secret stash of wine again—nothing to worry about.”

“Oh,” Vanna responded, her interest visibly waning as she redirected her attention to the captain, “Captain, when will we depart from these waters?”

The shift back to matters of the ship prompted a change in Duncan’s demeanor, marking the return to seriousness.

His gaze drifted towards the distant island, crowned by a grand palace and encircled by the shadowy outlines of Leviathan remains, as he slipped his hand into his pocket. The cool touch of metal against his fingertips was the “Second Key,” essential for the operation of certain intricate mechanical dolls.

“We’ll anchor here for half a day. I need time to decipher the ‘route’ provided by Gomona,” he declared with gravity, “Until my return, maintain vigilant observation of any activity, both aboard and in the vicinity of the ship. Pay particular attention to any alterations in the surrounding sea and document any occurrences.”

Morris acknowledged the command with a nod: “Understood, Captain.”

With that, Duncan turned on his heel and departed from the deck, leaving his crew to their thoughts and duties amidst the quiet mystery of the calm sea.

The atmosphere grew momentarily still as Vanna turned away, her gaze lost in the vast expanse of the dark sea islands that lay silently in the distance. She seemed caught in a reverie, her thoughts adrift.

“What’s on your mind?” Morris inquired, standing beside her, breaking the silence.

“Since I was very young, I’ve always dreamed of the sound of the sea—the gentle, rhythmic lapping of waves against the rocks,” Vanna shared in a soft, reflective tone, “After completing my religious studies, I learned to pray, and in those moments of prayer, I could still hear the sounds of those waves… The ‘Storm Codex’ interprets these sounds as the voice of the divine realm.”

She took a pause, letting the weight of her words hang in the air before continuing, her hand gesturing towards the eerily quiet sea: “But listen—there’s no sound of waves here. The sea is eerily calm, as silent as the grave, only disturbed by the noise of our ship cutting through the water.”

In her mind, the soothing cadence of the sea waves lingered as if offering comfort to an unseen sorrow.

“These are Her memories,” Vanna whispered, breaking the silence, “She told me She hasn’t witnessed the tumultuous sea in countless years—almost forgetting the sight of wind-driven waves cresting and falling.”

Morris remained silent, simply packing his unlit pipe, offering a quiet presence beside Vanna.

…

In the captain’s quarters, Alice’s curiosity was piqued by a brass key of distinctive design.

“I’ve got a new key!” she exclaimed, a mix of surprise and delight evident in her voice as she examined the key Duncan had given her, “This one’s different; the last one had a figure-eight lying on its side, and this one? It’s a circle pierced by an arrow. What’s this circle supposed to represent?”

“It likely symbolizes the ‘outer barrier’ encircling the Boundless Sea,” Duncan explained with a casual air, then looked at Alice, his expression a blend of resignation and fondness, “Don’t you feel the gravity of the situation? Turning this key could lead to unforeseen consequences.”

Alice pondered his words, tilting her head in contemplation. After a moment, she seemed to grasp the seriousness but remained uncertain.

“It seems… yes,” she replied, scratching her head, her voice carrying a hint of doubt, “I feel a bit anxious, but whatever comes our way, you can handle it, can’t you?”

Duncan paused for a moment, then let out a resigned sigh, a smile breaking through his solemn demeanor.

“Yes,” he affirmed, taking the key and offering a reassuring nod to Alice, “Leave it to me.”

Chapter 786: Another Alice Mansion?

Alice and Duncan, having worked together on numerous occasions, had a routine that was almost seamless. With practiced ease, Alice exposed the intricate keyhole embedded in her back and sat patiently on the bed, awaiting the captain to activate her mechanism with the winding key.

In his hands, Duncan held a delicately crafted brass key, its handle forming a loop for ease of use. He moved towards Alice with the intention of winding her up when, unexpectedly, Alice voiced a question that halted him in his tracks: “Captain, I have a question.”

Pausing, Duncan looked at her, slightly taken aback. “A question?”

Alice’s voice carried a mix of curiosity and uncertainty. “You mentioned that this key is connected to the three ‘nodes’ along the outer barrier, and since I am Navigator Three, this means I am also linked to them. This implies that I can navigate us to any destination given a path, even to the world’s most remote corners…”

Her voice trailed off, indicating her struggle to articulate her thoughts fully. Duncan, sensing her hesitation, did not press her for clarity. Instead, he waited with a patient silence that eventually encouraged Alice to gather her thoughts and proceed: “So, are there other ‘paths’ we can take? Or, in the absence of this new key, could I navigate us to new places on my own?”

Now visibly puzzled by the sudden depth of inquiry, Duncan responded, “…Why did you start thinking about this?”

Alice's reply came slowly, reflecting her reflective mood. "I just… suddenly felt curious about my own existence," she confessed. "Up until now, I've been happily performing my daily tasks aboard the ship, surrounded by those who clearly understand their roles and purpose. They possess something I've struggled to understand – a sense of purpose. It appears everyone has one except me…"

She paused, lost in thought, before articulating the question that had been forming in her mind: "Should I have a sense of purpose as well?"

Duncan offered a gentle shake of his head in response. "…There's no definitive should or shouldn't," he reassured her, "but that doesn't mean you shouldn't muse over and seek to understand yourself better. Understanding oneself is a crucial part of personal growth, which is always beneficial."

This sparked a new curiosity in Alice. "Can dolls grow too?" she inquired.

"Absolutely," Duncan affirmed. "Growth is possible for anyone who is open to it. Since joining us on this ship, you've experienced considerable growth—you've acquired knowledge, met new people, visited new places, and seen new sights. Growth is about change, about being different today than you were yesterday. And by that measure, you have indeed grown."

Alice pondered this for a moment before a sudden realization brightened her expression. "Ah, so even forgetting a few words I learned yesterday morning counts as growth?"

Duncan found himself at a loss for words, momentarily speechless.

Alice, noticing the silence, prodded, "Captain? Why aren't you speaking?"

Duncan, attempting to maintain focus on the task at hand, responded with a mixture of resignation and humor. "…Sometimes, my words may not capture the full complexity of what I mean," he explained, carefully avoiding Alice’s inquisitive gaze as he concentrated on the keyhole, “You need to consider these things more dialectically.”

Alice pondered over Duncan’s words but found herself puzzled; she was unfamiliar with the term “dialectically.” Nevertheless, sensing the captain’s assurance, she accepted his explanation with a cheerful nod, expressing her readiness to proceed. “Okay, then I have no more questions! I’m ready! Wind me up, please!”

Taking a moment to gather himself, Duncan inhaled deeply, steadying his thoughts before carefully positioning the brass key in the keyhole on Alice’s back. As he did so, a click sound resonated in the air, indicating the key had found its place. The key seemed to be magnetically drawn into the lock, and as it slid into position, the intricate patterns surrounding the keyhole began to glow faintly. The winding process commenced automatically, accompanied by a gentle clicking noise that seemed almost soothing in its rhythm.

Suddenly, Duncan experienced a familiar sense of vertigo, an overwhelming rush that seemed to reset his senses. Darkness swiftly enveloped the surroundings, akin to a thick curtain obscuring all in its path. Then, a cool sensation swept over him, giving the impression of passing through an unseen portal. In the midst of this darkness, specks of light and shadow danced and reformed, eventually coalescing into a scene of spacious opulence, though dimly lit and imbued with an eerie aura.

Regaining his bearings, Duncan hastily shook off the lingering dizziness and scanned his new environment. He found himself within the confines of a grand mansion, its living room expansive and adorned with a dark red carpet. A spiral staircase curled upwards to the second floor, while high, Gothic pointed windows and a gloomy chandelier that seemed to sway subtly added to the mansion’s somber ambiance.

However, Duncan quickly realized that this was not the “Alice Mansion” he remembered. The ambiance here was darker, the candlelight providing only a feeble illumination that barely pierced the surrounding darkness. The mansion’s ceiling appeared more deteriorated, with parts revealing a skeleton-like structure, creating an atmosphere even more sinister and foreboding than he recalled. It felt as if unseen entities lurked in the shadows, observing the newcomers with an invisible, chilling gaze.

With a sense of unease, Duncan noted he was standing on a second-floor platform. Overlooking the hall below through the open space at the platform’s edge, he caught sight of the spiral staircase that descended into the hall. After a moment’s deliberation, he decided against descending to the first floor. Instead, he turned and made his way towards the corridor that led deeper into the mansion’s second floor, determined to explore further.

As Duncan shifted direction, a sudden gleam in his peripheral vision halted him in his tracks. The fleeting glow that captured his attention sent a ripple of anticipation through him. Curious, he moved toward the source of the light, pushing aside the encompassing shadows as if they were tangible, thick curtains of darkness. As he dispersed the gloom, what he discovered seemed utterly incongruous with the surroundings.

Before him was what appeared to be a modern “screen,” akin to an LCD panel.

This object was incongruously embedded into the wall at the corridor’s end. Its silver-white metallic frame seemed to fuse seamlessly with the wall, creating a surreal integration, while the screen’s surface emitted a soft glow.

Duncan scrutinized the text on the “screen” for a brief moment, recognizing its similarity to the device he encountered within the illusionary “Holy Island” cave. The text’s meaning unfurled in his mind as clear information — “Core escape pod offline. Illegal release, operation unauthorized.”

He absorbed the message, a wave of realization washing over him as he turned to gaze at the corridor's damaged terminus and the "great void" beyond. His thoughts shifted between the "New Hope navigation segment" and the "Alice Mansion," leading him to a startling conclusion he hadn't reached until now.

The Frost Queen had commandeered the escape pod from the New Hope…

This revelation explained her ability to traverse the world with her "room" – the structure was, in fact, a repurposed spacecraft's escape pod!

Chapter 787: Awakening

Duncan found himself momentarily frozen in the hallway, struck by a revelation that was as bewildering as it was enlightening. He grappled with a mix of emotions, feeling both incredulous at the absurdity of the situation and, at the same time, strangely convinced by its logic. This internal conflict swirled in his thoughts for some time before he managed to push aside the desire to voice his perplexities, choosing instead to concentrate on the peculiar “screen” that was integrated into the wall before him.

As he stood there, lost in thought, his expression slowly shifted to one of deep reflection.

The cataclysm known as The Great Annihilation had ushered in a “collision of worlds,” fundamentally altering the fabric of reality. The New Hope had not been spared, part of it morphing into what was now known as the “Alice Mansion,” suspended in subspace. Within this mansion, after employing a navigation key to access an alternate version, Duncan encountered a “screen” at the corridor’s end which purported to unveil the truth of the mistress’s bedroom…

In essence, the Alice Mansion that was accessed with the navigation key had parts of its structure “restored” or rather “re-materialized” to their original form.

Mulling over these revelations, Duncan raised his gaze towards the far end of the corridor, pondering what had become of the garden and the doll that once lay there in slumber.

He descended from the second floor, retracing the path engraved in his memory down the stairs, through a narrow passageway adjacent to the main hall, past the now silent rooms that once seemed to whisper secrets, making his way toward the garden.

His journey was momentarily interrupted by a peculiar door along the corridor.

Among the numerous identical doors, one stood out, shimmering with a silvery metallic luster, its edges highlighted by soft blue glowing lines, making it look like a piece of advanced machinery set within the mansion's classical decor. Drawn to it, Duncan approached and noticed an "observation window" set above the door.

Peering through this window, he observed a room bathed in cold, blue light, filled with densely arranged cabinet equipment on large racks and brackets, interconnected by pipes that dangled from the ceiling, linking these enigmatic machines.

Duncan attempted to open the door, only to find it immovable, as if it were merely an "illusion" affixed to the wall, never meant to "open."

Yet, as he studied the room's interior, Duncan found himself deep in thought.

He recalled the whispers that seemed to emanate from the mansion's corners in the version of the Alice Mansion he knew well, along with the soft music that appeared to drift from an unseen ballroom within its expansive halls.

…Could it be that those ghostly sounds were in fact the humming of server arrays in operation?

Entertaining this surprising thought, Duncan moved away from the door with its flickering metallic glow, continuing his path toward the garden's entrance.

The corridor Duncan traversed felt immeasurably longer than he recalled, stretching out before him as if defying the limits of memory and space. Yet, through the dim light, the silhouette of the garden gate was persistently visible, serving as a beacon that seemed to call out to him, urging him to hasten his steps as though guided by an unseen force.

As Duncan advanced, the environment began to reveal startling anomalies. The doors and walls beside him started to unveil their “original” forms beneath their classical exteriors: doors gleamed with a futuristic, metallic sheen; sections of wall transformed into the interiors of spacecraft cabins, complete with embedded lighting; irregularly shaped metal plates surfaced unexpectedly. These remnants of a bygone era emerged amidst the traditionally elegant facades and rooftops like the shedding of dragon scales, revealing the metallic infrastructure and power lines that lay beneath the architectural “skin.”

Eventually, Duncan reached the end of the seemingly infinite corridor, where the garden gate awaited him. Crafted from an array of colorful stained glass and set within a classically designed frame that emitted a soft, pale blue glow, the gate stood in silent invitation. A screen was unexpectedly placed among the stained glass, displaying the words: Navigation Core Server/Mind Core Chamber.

Pausing momentarily in front of this gate, Duncan extended his hand towards it. To his recollection, the gate opened with ease as though it had never been secured, revealing a dimly lit expanse that unfolded before him.

Beyond the gate lay a hall, its farthest reaches shrouded in a mist-like darkness that blurred its edges and dimensions. Within this haze, dark, obelisk-like shapes loomed, their outlines intermittently pierced by flickering lights. The only clearly visible feature in this enigmatic space was a circular platform at its center.

From above, countless wires and pipes cascaded down, converging on a peculiarly shaped protrusion on the platform. These connections were illuminated by a soft light that danced between them, reminiscent of fireflies in the night. The arrangement gave the impression of a surreal, living “tree,” with light coursing through its “branches” as if it were the lifeblood of the structure.

At the base of this extraordinary and chaotic “tree,” the doll sat silently on the platform’s edge.

She was awake.

Yet, she made no move to acknowledge Duncan’s entrance into the hall. The doll, a mirror image of Alice, sat motionless, clutching a white drawing board to her chest, her gaze fixed ahead in an unfocused stare as if frozen in a perpetual state of readiness.

Duncan inhaled deeply, treading carefully towards the doll at the root of the “tree of cables.”

When he had covered a certain distance, the doll showed the first sign of awareness, subtly turning her head. It appeared as though her attention shifted from the door to Duncan himself.

Despite her slight movement in response to Duncan’s presence, the doll remained silent and expressionless, her gaze following him not with the curiosity or warmth of a living being, but rather with the detached, programmed responsiveness of an inanimate object. She was like a doll in the truest sense, equipped with only the most rudimentary form of interaction: basic motion tracking.

Yet, as Duncan observed this minimal reaction, he felt an unexpected wave of emotion wash over him. This simple, almost ghostly, interaction with the doll stirred a peculiar sense of poignancy within him as if her mechanical behavior had somehow tapped into the eerie essence of their surroundings.

He moved closer to her, and as he did, the doll slowly lifted her head, her eyes mechanically adjusting to keep him in her line of sight, yet without any hint of real recognition or emotion.

Suddenly, breaking the silence, the doll spoke, “There’s no way forward.”

Her voice, unexpected and clear, cut through the room, startling Duncan. He hadn’t anticipated that the doll, which had so far shown no sign of life beyond basic tracking, would speak.

Caught off guard, Duncan responded, “No way forward? What do you mean?”

The doll’s response was cryptic, “Guiding New Hope to jump to a safe domain…”

She turned her head in a stiff, slow motion, her gaze drifting as if she was looking through the fog at the servers hidden beyond, or perhaps at images from a past that had vanished from the space. Her voice, devoid of emotion, reverberated through the hall, “Guiding jump to gravitational focus… Jump engine disabled, star chart malfunction… Standard stellar deviation… No navigation points found, destination analyzing failed… There’s no way forward…”

Suddenly, she seemed to freeze, her eyes widening as though a surge of realization had jolted her from a deep slumber.

“There’s no way forward, Navigator Three apologizes to all crew members, there’s no way forward, apologies, there’s no way forward…”

She began to repeat herself, caught in a tragic loop of apologies, her voice echoing endlessly. A low, ominous noise began to fill the hall, emanating from the fog in every direction. As she continued her distressed repetition, her voice growing increasingly urgent, “There’s no way forward, there’s no way forward there’s no way forward there’s no…”

The background noise escalated into a shrill scream, accompanied by a sensation as if something massive was collapsing within the fog, shaking the entire hall. Just as the situation seemed to spiral out of control, Duncan, driven by a sudden impulse of desperation, grasped the doll’s shoulders firmly and called out, “Alice! Alice, can you hear me speaking?!”

To his astonishment, the doll ceased her repeating chant, her head turning slowly towards him as if the sound of her name had reached some part of her. A flicker of what seemed like recognition passed through her otherwise vacant eyes.

As the shrill noise and the vibrations subsided, the doll whispered, “Captain…”

Gazing directly into Duncan’s eyes, the doll’s voice emerged with the strained and stilted quality of a long-dormant machine stirring back to life, each word a laborious effort.

Then, with deliberate motions, she turned her head from side to side, as though recalibrating her systems. Following this adjustment, her speech flowed a bit more smoothly: “Captain, are you hungry?”

Duncan found himself at a loss for words.

The thought that this innocent doll would prioritize such a mundane concern upon regaining some semblance of consciousness was both bewildering and oddly touching.

“I’m not hungry. This isn’t the time for that,” Duncan replied, swiftly regaining his composure. The possibility of actually reviving some part of Alice’s awareness in this surreal setting seemed beyond belief, “Look around you. Do you understand the situation you’re currently in?”

It was only then that Alice seemed to fully register her surroundings, noticing for the first time that they were no longer aboard the familiar confines of the Vanished.

A fleeting expression of confusion crossed her features as she turned her puzzled gaze towards Duncan: “What place is this?”

Duncan paused, considering how best to explain the complex reality of their situation to Alice’s innocent consciousness. How could he describe that they were essentially inside “the core server room of the New Hope’s navigation chamber, which had been reimagined by the observers,” in a way she could comprehend? After a brief moment of thought, he took a decisive stance, grasping Alice’s shoulders firmly.

“This is the world inside your brain.”

Alice’s response was one of naive bewilderment: “But I don’t have a brain.”

The reply left Duncan momentarily speechless, struggling to find a response to her literal interpretation.

After a beat of stunned silence, he managed a stern reply: “Just pretend you do!”

“…Oh.”

Chapter 788: Analyzing the Star Map and the Uninvited Guest

Alice’s excitement was unmistakable, her eyes sparkled with amazement as she keenly observed every nuance of her environment. She appeared ready to rush into the enigmatic fog at the end of the hallway, only to be stopped in time by Duncan’s intervention. Pulling eagerly at Duncan’s arm, she flooded him with a barrage of inquiries about everything she saw, from the cables hanging above them to the mysteries concealed behind the doors they passed. Through Duncan’s patient explanations, Alice gradually learned that they were traversing a special section of the “Alice Mansion,” a discovery that exhilarated her. She treated this revelation as an extraordinary adventure.

“How fascinating… so this is the essence of the Alice Mansion,” Alice, with her doll-like appearance, remarked joyously. She explored the area around the platform where she initially stood, expressing her wonder, “Is this truly my home? It’s so vast! It’s just unfortunate I cannot reside here…”

“First off, we are currently exploring just a fragment of the Alice Mansion, specifically a grand hall within it,” Duncan elaborated, his eyes following Alice’s exploration. He felt compelled to clarify, “Additionally, not every Alice Mansion mirrors this one. For instance, in another variant of the Alice Mansion, you would find a garden in place of this hall. I surmise that accessing different Alice Mansions requires using distinct keys for opening varied doors.”

“Oh…” Alice responded, her nod indicating a partial understanding of Duncan’s detailed explanation.

Duncan’s focus then shifted to the drawing board Alice was clutching. This board was in her possession even before she had awakened, and she had instinctively continued to hold onto it. Recalling another version of the Alice Mansion, specifically the garden, where the doll had captured a catastrophic celestial event on her drawing board, Duncan became curious about the current contents of the board in her hands.

“Alice, may I have a look at your drawing board?” he inquired suddenly.

“Drawing board?” Alice appeared momentarily puzzled by the request but quickly realized she had been holding onto something. With enthusiasm, she approached Duncan and presented the drawing board, saying, “Here you go!”

Upon receiving the board, Duncan flipped it over, revealing not a drawing but a screen filled with an array of incomprehensible lines, symbols, and constantly refreshing data. It seemed to be engaged in intricate calculations and reconfigurations ceaselessly.

As Duncan studied the screen intently, a wave of speculation washed over him. At that moment, Alice, driven by curiosity, leaned in to get a better view. The unexpected revelation made her gasp in astonishment, leading to a prolonged exclamation, “I…”

Immediately recognizing the drawing board’s significance, Duncan urgently asked, “Do you comprehend what this represents?”

Without hesitation, Alice accurately described, “It pinpoints our location within the vast spatial and temporal structure of this refuge.” Then, without waiting for Duncan to ask more, she added with a touch of confidence, “What did I just say?”

Duncan was momentarily speechless. Ever since Alice's awakening, her remarks had increasingly left him uncertain about how to respond.

Yet, Alice's comment confirmed Duncan's suspicion: They had indeed uncovered the route.

The navigation key provided by the Leviathan Queen to unlock the "route" was indeed connected to this "doll" residing in the mansion, specifically through this "drawing board" she possessed!

Noting Duncan's thoughtful silence, Alice, tilting her head, expressed her bewilderment, "Captain? Why are you silent?"

Brought back to the moment by Alice's question, Duncan looked at her earnestly and posed a crucial inquiry, "Alice, if I'm correct, this 'route' leads us to the nodes of the external barrier. Are you capable of 'operating' it?"

Alice seemed momentarily perplexed, reclaiming the drawing board from Duncan and gently tracing her fingers across the screen's dynamic data and symbols. After pondering for a moment, she voiced her thoughts, as if thinking out loud, "I believe I… might understand? However, it seems I need to look deeper into it."

With a contemplative expression, she continued, "The operation method appears to be ingrained in my consciousness, as though I'm instinctively ready to initiate something, but fully comprehending it requires a bit more time… Don't worry, Captain, it won't be long."

As Alice shared her insights, Duncan's attention was diverted by a sudden activity. He glanced up to see the "tree" at the hall's center, composed entirely of intertwined cable conduits, beginning to animate —

Its "branches," illuminated by myriad twinkling lights, became more lively, uncovering numerous cables stretching toward the edges of the hall, enveloped in mist. A low hum emerged from the mist, indicating the activation of some mechanism, its power gradually intensifying…

Alice's fingers gracefully navigated the drawing board, tracing the intricate lines and symbols displayed. As she did, data materialized out of thin air beside her, floating like ethereal figures. She became absorbed in her task, her concentration so deep that it seemed her entire being was immersed in the complexities of her work.

Unexpectedly, Duncan was startled by a voice that filled the hall. It was unmistakably Alice's voice, yet it emanated not directly from her but through an overhead broadcasting system:

"Main engine initiating… Star map analysis underway, authorization acknowledged by… Navigator One…"

Duncan watched the unfolding scene, a mix of astonishment and anticipation building within him. Just as he started to feel a surge of excitement, a sudden cacophony disrupted the tranquility. The luminous activity on the "tree" and the buzzing of machinery throughout the hall rapidly diminished.

"Analysis halted… Unauthorized access detected."

A wave of concern flickered across Duncan's eyes, reflecting a brief disorientation in Alice, who appeared momentarily taken aback. Then, as if emerging from a trance, she looked up, her expression one of sudden realization, "Captain, there's someone at the door!"

The idea of someone knocking seemed almost unfathomable.

Yet, Duncan's reaction was swift, and almost simultaneously with Alice's announcement, he detected the sound of knocking. It was not loud, but its clarity was undiminished by distance, reaching him as though no space separated them.

The knocking was persistent, its rhythm mechanical, devoid of any urgency yet relentless.

Clutching the drawing board closely, Alice leaped down from the platform, her actions betraying a hint of apprehension as she approached Duncan, “Captain, shall we respond to the door?”

After a moment of reflection, Duncan replied solemnly, “Follow me,” pausing to add, “Keep the drawing board with you at all times.”

“Oh… okay!” Alice’s reply was marked by a surge of anxious anticipation as she quickly aligned herself behind Duncan, moving toward the door.

Leaving the shadowed confines of the navigation hall, they ventured down the mansion’s extensive corridor. With Duncan leading, they passed silent rooms and porches, their pace brisk and purposeful as they approached the main hall on the ground floor.

Throughout, the knocking continued, a constant sound that seemed to resonate deeply within, unceasing in its persistence.

The sound of knocking momentarily transported Duncan back to memories of his solitary apartment and the mysterious visit from the Frost Queen amidst enveloping fog. He quickly set aside these wandering thoughts to concentrate on the pressing situation at hand.

With a firm grip on the drawing board, Alice quickened her pace to stay close to Duncan. She gazed around with wide-eyed curiosity at the grandeur of the mansion’s corridors, its slender windows, and secretive doors that seemed to whisper of mysteries locked away, her mind teeming with questions she had no time to ask due to the urgency of their task.

The sprawling complexity of the mansion was overwhelming. Alice came to the realization that without Duncan’s guidance, she could easily lose her way in its vast, winding passages.

After navigating through the intricate maze of hallways, they arrived at the grand entrance hall of the mansion.

There, at the end of the corridor, stood a daunting door, its significance amplified by the continuous knocking sounds resonating from the other side.

With a look of mild concern, Duncan made his way towards the door, Alice at his side. He attempted to sense any potential threats or intentions from the other side but was met with a puzzling silence; there were no signs of hostility, danger, or even the faintest hint of presence.

Though persistent, the knocking seemed to urge them to make a pivotal decision. Duncan recalled the headless butler's solemn warning—"Do not open the door at all costs, for beyond it lies the Great Annihilation"—and hesitated, his hand hovering over the doorknob.

Alice, though visibly anxious, maintained her trust in Duncan, clasping the drawing board as though it were an anchor in this sea of uncertainty, her gaze locked on the formidable door before them.

As Duncan's hands made contact with the door, it let out a creak of protest yet surprisingly gave way with ease. Despite its daunting appearance and the eerie sound it made, the door opened smoothly as if it had been eagerly awaiting their approach.

With the door now ajar, a flood of sunlight pierced the darkness, washing over Duncan and Alice in a warm, welcoming light, revealing a new reality beyond the threshold that they had never anticipated.

In the midst of the emptiness outside, a radiant sun shone brightly, its luminous rays enveloping the entrance of the Alice Mansion in a dazzling brilliance. Remarkably, despite the intensity of the sunlight, it felt soothing to their eyes, causing no discomfort.

A strange familiarity washed over Duncan as he took in the sight of the sun, which soon began to shift its position in the sky, its blazing corona gradually dimming to reveal the truth hidden beneath its fiery exterior.

Beneath its scorching guise, an ancient deity emerged, a disturbing fusion of pallid, decaying tentacles and swollen flesh that formed a celestial being. At the heart of what seemed to be a sun, this entity featured a massive eye amidst its tentacles, slowly directing its focus towards Duncan and Alice, who stood on the brink of the mansion.

This entity was known as the “Black Sun,” not just a cosmic phenomenon but a revered figure among the Suntists as the “True Black Sun”—and this very entity had been knocking.

Before Duncan could process his thoughts into words, a feeble voice echoed, not through the air but directly into their minds. The ancient god, its appearance marked by the toll of its luminance, spoke in a voice layered with exhaustion, “I was on the verge of abandoning my attempt to reach you.”

Caught off guard and momentarily lost for words, Duncan observed the deity. Its eye, challenging ordinary perceptions of distance and scale, scrutinized them intently, “Navigating from the depths of the mansion to the door is no small feat, especially in response to your knock.”

Hearing Duncan’s observation, Alice promptly concurred, voicing her agreement with genuine enthusiasm, “That’s right, it’s vast! Our journey here felt like it took forever!”

The cosmic entity fell silent for a brief moment as if mulling over their statements. After a short pause, it acknowledged their explanation with a simple acknowledgment, “Hmm, that explains it.”

Chapter 789: The Rotting Black Sun

In the vast, empty void of space, Duncan gazed at the sun, a celestial body he had always associated with light and warmth. However, in a startling revelation, he realized it was no more than a mere shadow in this emptiness. This epiphany came swiftly, altering his perception drastically. Despite its grandeur, the entity before him, which he knew as the “Creeping Sun wheel,” provided neither warmth nor the comforting presence of life. To him, it was hollow, a distant echo of something far more profound, reminiscent of his first encounter with it through the “Golden Mask.”

Duncan pondered over this enigma, the “True Black Sun,” which had somehow pinpointed the Alice Mansion’s location to project its illusory presence. What had drawn its attention? Was it Duncan’s own arrival or the disturbances caused by Alice’s navigational endeavors?

With a mind brimming with curiosity yet tempered by caution, Duncan inquired, “How did you find this place?” His voice, careful yet devoid of hostility, reflected his complex history with the followers and descendants of the Black Sun—a history marked by challenges but ultimately shaped by understanding and empathy. Duncan had come to recognize that the intentions of this ancient deity were never malevolent towards the mortal realm.

Unlike other ancient gods, this deity had been metaphorically simmered over a gentle flame by its own worshippers and progeny. If it were capable of expression, the “True Black Sun” might have labeled itself as “tragic” on each of its tendrils…

“I ‘heard’ the disturbances from subspace. Navigator Three… after years of dormancy, suddenly activated, signaling the approach of a significant moment,” the sun, marred and misshapen, revealed. Despite its weakened state, there was a softness in its voice, “Usurper, our paths cross once again.”

“The approach of a significant moment… You anticipated my arrival?” Duncan seized upon the sun’s statement, his concern evident, “And you’re aware of Navigator Three?”

“…I am also ‘one of them,’” the Creeping Sun wheel responded, its pace measured, “Before the birth of a new sun by Navigator One, I played a role in this sanctuary’s creation.”

Duncan paused, his gaze laden with reflection.

He then spoke, his voice resonating with a clarity of purpose, “What do you seek from me? Do you still harbor hope that I might assist in ending your existence? If so, I must confess, I’m currently preoccupied—your ‘progeny’ and ‘adherents’ persist in reigniting your flames, and my ability to intervene is limited at this time…”

Before Duncan could fully articulate his thoughts, the disfigured sun interjected, its voice trembling once more: “Concern for my offspring… or the mortals who worship the ‘Black Sun’ is no longer necessary.”

Duncan’s demeanor shifted, his eyebrows furrowing as he sought clarity, “What do you mean by that?”

The sun’s response was both shocking and disconcerting: “The faith in the True Black Sun has dissipated from this realm. The Black Sun will soon be forgotten, its stories and records transforming into ambiguous, distorted ‘impressions,’ eventually replaced by semblances that mimic reality yet are mere illusions. Usurper, should you doubt these words, you have the means to verify them within the mortal realm. I trust in your capabilities to do so.”

The significance of these revelations dawned heavily on Duncan, his expression growing more solemn. He contemplated the implications, breaking the silence with a poignant question, “…What happened? Why has it come to this?”

He considered the possibility that the “True Black Sun” could no longer bear the burden of its slow demise and had eradicated all traces of its offspring, remnants, and worshippers. Yet, the idea of memories and records fading into oblivion, replaced by illusions, suggested a scenario far more complex than mere annihilation—it hinted at the corruption of history itself.

Observing the entity before him, Duncan noted its writhing tendrils and the flesh engulfed by its aura, which spoke with a voice tinged with sorrow, “I am rotting. After enduring for ages, my end is imminent.”

The concept of “rotting” struck a chord with Duncan, echoing previous mentions by various entities. Now, the “True Black Sun” brought it up as well.

“As all things associated with ‘me’ begin to fade, so does the world’s memory of me,” the deformed sun continued, its tone reflective. “My homeland’s visage, the faces and names of those key to my creation—those who were part of my essence—are fading. They are relics of the ‘Old World,’ vital to my existence.”

“Usurper, it’s uncertain if you can fully grasp what I’m conveying—my essence is eroding, and this disintegration is the final stage of decay.”

Duncan remained thoughtful, absorbing the profound revelations shared with him. After a moment, he ventured, “…So, you’re suggesting that your self-awareness and memories are involuntarily fading, erasing everything tied to your self-awareness and memories from this world… Is this the essence of your ‘rot’?”

“Precisely as you’ve deduced—it’s a gradual process,” the deformed sun replied, its voice now carrying an even greater weight of frailty. “Since arriving in this ‘world,’ our decay had begun. This type of rot has been a constant throughout the sanctuary’s history…”

The deformed sun shared its sorrowful truth with Duncan, revealing the tragic nature of its existence. “Unfortunately, the part of us capable of rational thought remains conscious during this ordeal. I am painfully aware of what I’m ‘forgetting,’ even as those elements vanish from my being. I understand what those lost aspects represented, but such ‘memories’ are now futile. The remnants of our past, brought from the old world, continue to disintegrate, becoming unrecognizable scraps…”

“This is my reality, and it applies to the entities known as the four gods as well. They, too, are experiencing this decline…”

“Usurper, over the years, I’ve endured several ‘intensifications’ of decay, with the fading of the ‘Black Sun’s’ legacy possibly marking its most severe and final phase. My time is swiftly depleting.”

Having conveyed so much, the deformed sun seemed to lose the strength to continue, its voice fading into silence.

Duncan, his brows knitting together in concern, began to understand the concept of “rot” as it pertained to the gods, linking it to various observations. Yet, his immediate focus was on the intentions behind the Black Sun’s revelations.

“You’ve sought me out, clearly not just to impart this knowledge. What do you wish for me to do?”

After a moment of silence, the voice of the Black Sun reached Duncan and Alice, carrying a solemn request: “I implore you to end my existence… However, when that day comes, I ask that you consume my remains with your flames, reduce them to ashes, and then, remember those remains.”

The notion of burning to ashes and holding onto memories intrigued Duncan, prompting a moment of insight.

“…It seems you’ve gleaned some understanding of my ‘power,’” he acknowledged, his tone grave.

“I have vigilantly observed this sanctuary for eons, enduring the ceaseless decay and isolation that have limited my actions, yet I have remained acutely aware of the myriad events transpiring within this realm—including those involving you,” the Black Sun articulated with a measured pace, its voice imbued with a profound sense of purpose. “My desire… is to cement a legacy.”

Duncan, absorbing the weight of these words, repeated, “A legacy in a ‘new world’…” His expression remained thoughtful, a mix of skepticism and curiosity coloring his response. “Your request sparks interest. Yet, how can you be so confident that your actions will ensure a ‘place in the new world’? Furthermore, how can you be so sure that a ‘new world’ will indeed materialize?”

His gaze hardened, signifying the gravity of his inquiry, “You must understand, while I do harbor plans to reconstruct everything following the sanctuary’s demise, certainty of success eludes me—I’m still in the process of devising a viable strategy… And yet, you approach with such a proposal, aspiring to secure a spot?”

“At the core of our agreement,” the entity before Duncan, a conglomerate of pale, shifting flesh, began to transform subtly. Slender tentacles protruded from the radiant aura enveloping it, reaching out as though in search of something unseen, highlighting the seriousness of its proposition. “Should you grant my request, I am willing to offer you a glimpse into the future, a preview that will undoubtedly serve as a boon in your journey.”

Duncan found himself ensnared by curiosity.

“You claim to have ‘proof’?” His keen gaze dissected the throbbing entity, “Do you imply you possess evidence that validates a successful transition into this ‘new world’ is feasible?”

A momentary silence ensued, after which the Black Sun offered a mysterious response: “At present, I do not.”

Duncan, momentarily thrown, pondered if the ancient being was jesting. Yet, he quickly regained his composure. Given his extensive encounters with the myriad enigmas and inconceivable phenomena at reality’s brink, he began to discern the significance behind the entity’s statement.

“And how is this ‘proof’ supposed to manifest?”

“It will materialize once you heed my appeal,” the Black Sun declared with a deliberate pace.

Duncan lapsed into contemplation, weighing his options.

“You are free to take your time over my offer,” the voice of the Black Sun resonated with a patient tone as the tendrils retracted into the fiery aura surrounding it. “I recognize your hesitancy and the skepticism you harbor—the ‘Black Sun’ has indeed been the source of many a catastrophe in this world, and while I may not pose as your foe, I have yet to earn your trust.”

Then, Duncan shifted the dialogue, probing deeper with a query, “Is it a place for yourself you seek? For the ‘offspring’ now faded from your memory? Or is it for something else entirely…”

“For our civilization,” replied the Black Sun, its voice now a mere whisper, laden with nostalgia, “A civilization that once flourished.”

Through this exchange, the ancient entity, the Black Sun, conveyed its deep-seated desire not only for the cessation of its existence but for the preservation of its legacy within the fabric of a potential new world. Faced with the weight of this request, Duncan found himself at a crossroads between skepticism and the potential for unforeseen possibilities, pondering the implications of their impending agreement.

Chapter 790: The Rotting Future

In a vast expanse of turmoil, a grotesque, deformed sun burned silently, its eerie glow casting light on clusters of flesh that formed malevolent “stars,” a far cry from their original identities.

This ominous entity goes by several names: The Black Sun, the Creeping Sun Wheel, the True Black Sun, among others. Speculation abounds about its origins. Was it once a genuine star, encased in a Dyson sphere by a now-extinct civilization, or is the sphere itself a remnant of that civilization, serving as the sole evidence of its former glory?

Among the many bizarre entities Duncan has encountered in this realm, the Black Sun is undoubtedly the most singular “Old God” he has come across. It symbolizes the amalgamation of a once-great civilization and its nurturing star, now fused into this aberrant form. This fusion may account for its decay proceeding at a pace faster than that of other Old Gods, its essence unraveling from the moment of its transformation.

Despite the Black Sun’s pleas, Duncan remains wary, sensing hidden depths and secrets within this twisted celestial body that perhaps even the Four Gods are unaware of, which keeps him on alert.

For now, the Black Sun holds back its secrets, and Duncan is not inclined to probe further. The Black Sun has hinted at an impending end but suggests there is still time for contemplation, understanding, and building trust.

“I cannot agree to your request at this moment,” Duncan communicated, expressing his reservations, “I lack sufficient knowledge about you, and more critically, I’m unsure about your plan for reshaping the world. Until I gain clarity on these matters, I cannot pledge my support.”

“That is understandable,” came a deep, resonant reply from within the Black Sun, its voice vibrating with layers of sound, “Then take the time to validate your plan, find your path… You will seek me out again, of that I am certain.”

Duncan, curious, inquired, “Will you maintain this ‘projection’ here at all times? So, if I need to consult with you, I should return to this specific location?”

“The sanctum of the refuge limits my influence, and forcing entry would harm the mortal realm – but here, my presence is unrestricted, free from consequences,” the Black Sun patiently explained, “I will maintain this projection. As long as you’re in the ‘borderlands,’ you can reach out to me… I will be listening.”

Duncan nodded in acknowledgment: “Understood.”

In the midst of this chaotic void, the Black Sun momentarily trembled before regaining its calm. Although Duncan had not agreed to its proposal, the entity seemed to accept this non-committal stance as a satisfactory temporary resolution. Its corona gently enveloped itself, and its massive singular eye, partially obscured by flesh, closed in a semblance of rest.

“It’s so quiet…” Duncan was caught off guard by the soft, dreamlike utterance of the deformed sun, “It has been ages since I’ve felt this kind of ‘quiet’… Even the searing flames now feel bearable.”

Understanding the nature of the ‘quiet’ being referred to, Duncan observed with a complex expression, “…you can no longer hear the prayers and sacrifices offered to you."

"Yes, it's as if they never existed," the Black Sun responded gently, "This might be the respite I've longed for."

Duncan tried to discern any emotion in its tone, pondering whether the Black Sun felt relief or perhaps a hint of sorrow, but the voice was too serene to reveal anything definitive.

He contemplated the nature of divine decay and ventured, "…When the 'rot' reaches its peak, what becomes of you? Do you simply cease to exist? Or do you linger in a state where you're disconnected from everything, forgotten by the world, as you described?"

"I don't know, as no Old God has fully succumbed to decay, and the final outcome remains a mystery," the Black Sun answered slowly, "But it's expected that the refuge world will continue to 'fade' along with us…"

"Long ago, we used our collective memories, born from the ashes of great cataclysms, to create the 'materials' for constructing the sanctuary as you know it. As the gods decay, the refuge, built from these 'materials,' will also deteriorate – symbolizing the gradual erasure of all memory of the old world as we disintegrate."

"One day, the ocean will forget how to form waves, life will lose the concept of death, flames will not know how to burn, wind will stop blowing, clouds will fall from the sky to the sea… even if the 'sun' created by Navigator One rises again, it won't stop the collapse that begins at the very foundation of the world…"

Duncan absorbed these profound words, his thoughts drifting to the palace on the black stone island, recalling the Leviathan Queen who died alone within its walls.

To protect the real world from her “decay,” she isolated her “end” within the palace’s temporal flow, but now, even that isolation has ended.

“This feels like an end as obscure and lightless as the last flicker of a flame,” Duncan commented, his voice tinged with emotion.

“The end of time is inherently dim and lightless, just as the brightest stars eventually cool and fade,” the Black Sun replied gently, “Moreover, since the refuge world was created, the ‘rot’ of the gods has been an integral part of its history, with realities continuously eroding away from the true dimension. Who could notice… they have already vanished.”

Duncan contemplated these words, a chill running through him as he grasped the full implications of the Black Sun’s statement: “…What exactly are you suggesting?”

After a pause, the Black Sun asked, “Do you remember how many intelligent races once thrived in the Boundless Sea?”

Duncan’s thoughts briefly clouded, but he instinctively replied, “I thought there were four…”

He hesitated, sensing something amiss with that number.

“Which four?” the Black Sun pressed, its voice calm yet profound.

Duncan fell silent, the realization hitting him with profound clarity, leaving him speechless.

After a short pause, the Black Sun continued, its tone steady, “You recall their existence but not their names or appearances. I, too, remember they existed but can no longer picture them… because the entities responsible for preserving their memory have been ‘decaying’, and ultimately, the world ‘corrected’ this by erasing their memory, reducing the lifespan of the sanctuary.”

“Usurper, this is our world’s reality. It has happened before and continues now, with the ‘Black Sun’ disappearing from the world’s view being just a minor aspect of this widespread disintegration.”

“There’s no need for grief, for death and oblivion have always unfolded this way.”

…

As the door of Alice’s Mansion creaked shut, sealing away the external world, the artificial sunlight vanished as if it had never been there.

The mansion’s tall, slender windows were covered in grime, with thorn-like shadows blocking any light. Sunlight seemed a distant concept, visible only when the main door was open.

Duncan returned to the dim hall, standing in the unusual quiet for a long time before exhaling softly.

Beside him, Alice remained silent while she looked anxiously towards the door, her unease evident.

She seemed eager to ask questions but unsure what to ask.

“I couldn’t follow your conversation with the ‘Black Sun’,” she admitted, scratching her head, “But your demeanor suggests it was serious, right Captain?”

Duncan turned to Miss Doll, his expression softening after a moment.

“It’s fine if you didn’t understand,” he reassured her, stroking Alice’s hair gently, “These are concerns for me to reflect on.”

“Oh,” Alice said, her expression showing a glimmer of understanding before quickly shifting to another question, “So, are you considering the Black Sun’s proposal? About the location of that… new world or whatever it was.”

Despite not fully grasping the exchange with the Black Sun, she understood that it had made a request of Duncan.

Duncan paused thoughtfully under Miss Doll's watchful eye. "I'm not certain yet, but the 'new world' it mentioned, holding some evidence of it, intrigues me," he mused, "And there's something else that has caught my attention even more…"

Alice's curiosity was piqued: "What else?"

"The true form of the Black Sun," Duncan disclosed, directing Alice's curious gaze with his hand, "My interest in that is growing."

Alice processed his words, her face a mix of understanding and bewilderment: "So… are we going to search for its real form?"

"No," Duncan responded with a gentle smile, "That's a task for another day; we have more pressing issues to address."

"Pressing issues?"

Duncan's face showed a mixture of feelings: "…Remember the decoding we need to do?"

"Oh, right!" Alice exclaimed, as realization hit her.

Chapter 791: Sailors Farewell

A fog hung over the ocean like a delicate veil, shrouding the mysterious islands that lay beyond the ship's railing. The sea remained tranquil, in stark contrast to the enigmatic ancient temple that had once stood imposingly in the distance, now entirely obscured by the fog, as though it had never been there, to begin with.

On the ship's stern deck, Sailor found himself seated atop a wooden barrel, his eyes fixated on the haunting mist at the horizon. He was so engrossed in his thoughts that he seemed to be in a trance.

The quiet was suddenly broken by the sound of footsteps approaching, pulling Sailor out of his deep contemplation. He turned, his body stiff as if he were more of a statue than a living person, to see who was coming, lifting his eyes to meet theirs.

"Miss Vanna, good afternoon," he greeted her, a hint of sadness in his voice, "Ah, you're really tall."

"That's something I often hear," Vanna responded casually, taking a seat on a barrel next to him. She looked out at the captivating fog that had so thoroughly entranced Sailor, "Agatha mentioned you've been here all day. What's been on your mind?"

"I'm not entirely sure," Sailor admitted, sounding a bit puzzled as he shook his head. "Just lost in thought, I suppose. In this state, there's not much else I can do. No need for food, drink, or sleep – and there's hardly any manual labor required on this ship. It seems to run itself quite efficiently. The most we ever seem to do is clean up after Miss Alice's chaos…"

Vanna listened quietly, allowing Sailor to speak his mind. Though he seldom spoke since they arrived on the Vanished, when he did share his thoughts, they flowed freely, making one wonder if he had always been this way, even in life.

As Sailor eventually trailed off, Vanna offered a kind smile and shook her head gently, "You shouldn't talk like that in front of Alice. It would break her heart."

"Ah, I know. I wouldn't dream of it," Sailor quickly reassured her, his expression becoming a complex mix of emotions, "Besides… I probably won't get the chance to say it, anyway."

Vanna looked at him with curiosity but chose to remain silent.

Sailor's gaze returned to the fog, towards where the temple once stood.

"…You hear it too, don't you? The gentle sound of the waves," he suddenly said.

Vanna appeared slightly surprised, but before she could respond, Sailor continued, seemingly indifferent to her reaction, "Since we set sail, I've occasionally heard it – the whispers among the waves, speaking in languages I don't understand. They seem to communicate with me, just as I am now sharing my thoughts with you… Is it wrong, do you think, to speak this way?"

"That's a blessing from the Goddess," Vanna answered, pausing for a moment as if choosing her words carefully. "She's aware of your presence. Her voice naturally reaches those who have faith in Her."

"But I've lost my memory of Her," Sailor said quietly, a note of sorrow in his voice. "I remember arriving here, something important happening, but the days I spent as a priest in the Storm Church, offering prayers, seem to belong to someone else. It appears I can no longer be considered a follower. It's been two centuries since I last prayed to Her."

"The Goddess might not be in your current memories, but you are certainly in Hers," Vanna replied with a firm belief, her faith unwavering. "The Goddess remembers each of Her children, even those lost for centuries like you. As the 'Storm Codex' teaches us, prayer is just one form of connection; our true bond with the Goddess goes beyond rituals."

Sailor looked at her with renewed respect, "Your faith is strong."

Vanna's expression softened, showing a hint of curiosity, "Do I not seem like a devout believer usually?"

Sailor decided not to delve into that question further.

"I'm nearing the end of my journey," he suddenly said, his voice carrying a sense of finality. "The captain has plotted a new course, and it seems my services are no longer needed."

Vanna's face showed she was about to say something, but she paused, allowing Sailor to continue uninterrupted: "After this last mission, it's probably time for me to leave the ship. I'll take nothing with me. These old robes and coats belong to a past era, destined to fade away just like me. So, you don't need to worry about settling any affairs for me, just…"

His words were cut off by a commanding yet calm voice from behind: "Just what?"

Startled, Sailor quickly turned around, and Vanna also stood, turning towards the source of the voice.

"Captain, you've returned," Vanna said with a mixture of relief and complexity in her tone, nodding towards Duncan before looking back at Sailor with concern, "Captain, Sailor, he…"

Duncan raised his hand, indicating he had overheard their conversation, and focused on Sailor, “Go on, you were saying ‘just’ what?”

Encouraged by Captain Duncan’s steady gaze, Sailor began to speak more openly than he had before, “Just feel sorry for Captain Lawrence—I left abruptly, without a proper goodbye, without hinting I might never come back. The crew of the White Oak probably still waits for my return…”

He paused, then offered a smile filled with both regret and freedom, embodying his complex feelings.

“Could you relay a message for me? Just let them know that ‘Sailor’ was proud to serve on the White Oak, even if it was for a brief period. Despite the constant noise and chaos, it was truly the happiest time in my recent memory.”

“I don’t have any personal belongings to leave behind, but please extend my apologies to Gus, the White Oak’s first mate. I regret that the two pounds of fine tobacco I owe him will likely go unpaid. And not just to him, but also to the second mate, the boatswain, the stoker, the engineer, and the priest…”

He paused, counting off a few names on his fingers before spreading his hands wide, a rueful smile on his face. “Gambling never ends well, does it? This includes bets against people. I had also planned to leave something for you. I intended to write you a letter and slip away quietly. There are things that always felt too awkward to say in person. But, as you can see, things don’t always go as planned…”

As Sailor shared his thoughts under Duncan’s understanding gaze, he took a deep breath – a gesture more symbolic than necessary, given his lack of need for oxygen, blending with the surrounding mist.

Facing Duncan, Sailor’s expression became serious, his eyes conveying a depth of sincerity that hadn’t been there before. “I am truly honored. Despite my initial fears, I am deeply grateful for the brief time I spent with the Vanished.”

“You are the greatest explorer and captain of our era. I’m convinced that whatever you aim to achieve, you will succeed. I don’t have proof, nor do I understand prophecies, but I have a strong feeling… Whatever you seek, you will find it.”

“So, if there really is a new world out there, I hope you’ll remember the story of the Sea Song and share it with those yet to come. Let them know that, in the twilight of our world, there was a crew who gave their all.”

“And finally, thank you. Thank you for everything you’ve done so far, and for continuing to try to save this world… Though it feels cold and twisted to me now, I vaguely remember it once being a good place.”

With that, Sailor’s voice remained steady, his earlier hesitation and remorse dissipating like fog in the sun.

He then bowed deeply to Duncan, showing the utmost respect and gratitude, and upon straightening up, he turned to Vanna, drawing the symbol of the waves across his chest with his right hand.

Vanna, visibly moved, stepped forward as though she wanted to reach out, but instead, she simply reflected the symbol back to him, a silent exchange of understanding and respect.

“Are you sure you want to leave?” Duncan asked, locking eyes with Sailor.

“You’ve come back, so it’s time for me to move on,” Sailor replied with a serene smile, taking a few steps back. “I’ll find a peaceful place to rest. It’s been a long time since I’ve truly rested.”

Duncan nodded, his silence a solemn acceptance of Sailor’s decision.

Sailor walked across the deck, disappearing into the thick fog that had quietly enveloped the ship. His form faded into the mist, eventually vanishing from sight entirely, leaving Duncan and Vanna in a poignant silence.

After a moment, Vanna, unable to stand the silence any longer, turned to Duncan, her voice carrying a mix of emotions, “Captain…”

Duncan raised his hand to pause further conversation, then posed a thought-provoking question, “Vanna, do you know how many times a person can truly face death?”

This question caught Vanna off-guard, hinting at a deeper meaning. She remained silent, her gaze lingering on the place where Sailor had disappeared, perhaps hoping for one last glimpse of him. Eventually, she turned her attention back to Duncan, ready to move the conversation forward, “Captain, what are our next steps?”

Acknowledging her readiness, Duncan walked towards the ship’s helm at the stern, signaling a readiness to continue their journey without looking back. “We have much more to explore. The Vanished will chart a new course – Alice is ready, and now, we’ll test her ‘navigation’ skills for the first time.”

Vanna, understanding the shift in focus, followed Duncan promptly.

At the helm, Alice stood beside the wheel, visibly anxious as she awaited further instructions from Duncan. The mop, bucket, ropes, spare iron hooks, and other deck items seemed to anticipate the significance of the moment, congregating around the helm as if drawn by an unseen force, ready to witness the unfolding events.

A rope gently nudged Alice’s leg, offering reassurance or perhaps seeking comfort for itself.

Admitting her apprehension, Alice whispered, “I’m a bit nervous…” Despite Duncan’s reassurances, her voice betrayed her anxiety, “Even though the captain said it’s okay, I can’t help but worry…”

The ropes, bucket, and other items nearby responded with a cacophony of clattering and rustling, their movements creating a symphony of sounds that, to Alice, felt like the voices of her ‘friends’, each expressing their own nervousness.

It was clear that Alice wasn’t alone in her feelings; the entire ship seemed to be holding its breath, bracing for what was to come.

Chapter 792: Alices Liberation

When Duncan and Vanna ventured towards the stern of the ship, they stumbled upon a scene that was as bizarre as it was unexpected. Miss Alice was found in a peculiar position, nestled awkwardly among a disarray of ropes and buckets right next to the steering wheel, deeply engaged in an activity that seemed quite out of the ordinary. At first glance, she appeared to be talking to herself, a solitary figure amidst the maritime clutter. However, driven by an innate curiosity, Duncan moved closer, almost on tiptoe, to better understand the situation. To his astonishment, he discovered that Alice wasn't merely talking to herself; instead, she was offering what seemed like psychological counseling to the inanimate objects surrounding her.

The core of her counseling session revolved around a strange confession: "Even though I have no idea how to steer this ship, there's really no reason for us to panic. The fact that I'm not familiar with navigation comes from an honest understanding of my own limitations."

Duncan had been hesitant about the idea of leaving Alice alone on the deck. Now, having witnessed this peculiar behavior, his concern grew, convinced that her actions were contributing to an underlying tension that seemed to permeate the entire ship.

It was at this moment that Alice noticed Duncan's presence. She quickly untangled herself from the cluster of buckets and ropes, stood up, and warmly greeted him with a wave, exclaiming, "Captain! You've come!"

Duncan’s reply was a subdued “Hmm,” marked by a solemn expression. He made a conscious effort to overlook the odd phenomenon of the objects seemingly shifting on their own, choosing instead to direct his focus towards Alice. “Are you still feeling nervous?” he inquired.

“Just a little,” Alice responded, her bashfulness evident in her nod. Yet, her demeanor soon brightened with a smile. “But I’m feeling much better now! I’ve had a meaningful conversation with my friends here. It turns out they were also feeling a bit anxious, which made me feel less alone with my nerves…”

Observing this unusual interaction with a mix of confusion and amusement, Vanna said, “Do you understand why they’re feeling anxious?”

“Not the faintest idea,” Alice replied, her voice tinged with a note of contentment. “They didn’t go into specifics, but they assured me they’re keeping a positive outlook.”

Vanna was momentarily speechless at Alice’s answer, while Duncan sighed, his expression one of resigned acceptance. He then offered Alice reassurance, “Don’t dwell on it too much, and don’t be concerned. Goathead and I will monitor the situation on the ship. Remember, your role here at the helm is symbolic. Do you recall our earlier discussion?”

Alice’s expression turned thoughtful as she recalled her time with Duncan at the “Alice Mansion,” the feeling of holding the “drawing board” amidst an eerie black fog, and then she nodded solemnly at Duncan. “Yes, I remember. You advised me to hold onto that sensation while at the wheel, to treat it as my ‘drawing board’ and to ‘transmit’ all my memories to the Vanished, right?”

“That’s correct,” Duncan confirmed. “This approach is inspired by the feedback we received from Sailor during our navigation of the ship. But at this point, we’re still unsure if the Vanished is able to ‘understand’ the instructions you’re giving, since the information you and Sailor have documented isn’t completely aligned.”

“Understood,” Alice replied, her nod full of determination. “So, we’re about to conduct a preliminary test, correct? To see if I can truly connect with the ship before we leave this place.”

Quietly, Duncan and Vanna moved to the side of the control deck, their eyes lingering on the essence of the Vanished. In a silent exchange with the ship’s somewhat restless “consciousness,” Duncan remained concentrated until he was confident that the Vanished was ready for the next steps. He then subtly nodded to Alice, who was stationed by the steering wheel, signaling, “It’s time to begin, Alice.”

Sensing the significance of the moment, Miss Doll advanced cautiously and took a deep breath. Though unnecessary for a doll, this action served as a symbolic mimic of a deep, calming breath, a human technique to steady one’s nerves before a daunting task.

The steering wheel before her, dark and foreboding, silently awaited her touch, presenting a challenge she had never imagined facing.

Alice paused, reflecting on the surreal nature of her current predicament. Despite not possessing vast intelligence, her thoughts often drifted to far-off places. Yet, she had never envisioned herself in this position, assuming the role of a captain and taking control of the steering wheel of the Vanished.

This responsibility, bestowed upon her by Duncan, was not to be questioned. Filled with a mixture of apprehension and anticipation, yet devoid of doubt, Alice reached out, her fingers wrapping around the wheel that felt as though it bore the entire weight of the night sky.

At that moment, Alice’s perception of the world around her transformed dramatically.

Her “eyes” widened in astonishment as she experienced a disconnection from her doll body, only to realize she had merged into a new “body” – she felt as if she was floating in the ocean, enveloped by a fog, her hull gently caressed by the cold, calm waters, her deck illuminated by the faint glow of the sky, her invisible sails at the mercy of the spirit world, ready for the journey that lay ahead.

Alice had become one with the Vanished; she was now the ship in its entirety – its rudder, its sails, its deck, its ropes. These ropes, akin to the strings that control a puppet or the nerves that weave through a human body, represented countless thoughts and connections.

In this bewildering state, Alice marveled at the transformation of her “body,” feeling a deep connection with these threads. It was then that she realized something she had previously overlooked: The Vanished possessed a soul, intertwined with these very threads.

While it had always kept its “threads” hidden, now, with Duncan’s permission, Alice was granted the ability to perceive them.

Overwhelmed with joy and an insatiable curiosity, Alice’s consciousness roamed this vast new body, exploring every corner with zeal. She discovered parts of the ship beyond her previous awareness, including Duncan’s private quarters and sections of the ship’s underbelly, which remained hidden from her. Yet, even without access to these hidden areas, Alice uncovered numerous secrets previously unknown to her – unexplored rooms, locked cabins, and concealed passageways and levels known only to Duncan…

But suddenly, Alice’s joyful exploration was abruptly halted by an unexpected force, as if she had collided with an unseen barrier within the intricate “ship-shaped network” created by myriad delicate threads. In that instant, halted by what seemed to be a collision with one or possibly two entities, Alice's journey came to an unexpected pause.

Confused and slightly disoriented within the dimly lit expanse created by the fine threads, Alice encountered a figure she recognized: Goathead.

Goathead seemed to float in the void, his expression as perplexed as Alice's.

Their mutual confusion lingered in the silence between them until Goathead, appearing almost like a phantom and semi-transparent, broke the stillness with an exclamation of surprise, "What's this!?"

"Mr. Goathead!" Alice exclaimed, her voice filled with delight at their meeting. She instinctively wanted to wave in greeting, but then remembered that her current form was merely a consciousness within a different vessel. Instead, she shouted, "The captain has allowed me to steer!"

"I can see you're at the helm," Goathead replied, still visibly perplexed. As someone who had always monitored the entire condition of the ship, he had never anticipated encountering an anomaly within the "spirit" of the Vanished – a wandering "entity." Curious, yet inadvertently colliding with the adventurous doll, he inquired, "But why are you here?"

"I'm not entirely sure," Alice answered honestly, "Isn't this part of steering? And may I ask, why are you here?"

"I've been intertwined with this ship for a century, growing alongside it. Why do you think I'm here?" Goathead's eyes narrowed as he scrutinized the doll before him, which to him appeared as a cluster of phantom light. "And who told you that steering involved immersing your soul into the ship's essence? You're moving around so carelessly; aren't you concerned about colliding with someone…"

Alice paused, her thoughts racing before a realization dawned on her. “Under normal circumstances, would you encounter someone within the ship’s ‘soul’?”

Goathead remained silent, offering no reply.

“But I did encounter someone,” Alice quickly changed the subject before Goathead could respond, her voice a mixture of surprise and embarrassment. “And it felt as though it wasn’t just you I ran into… It seemed like there was also a fleeting shadow…”

As she contemplated this aloud, a weak and aggrieved voice emerged from the void: “It was me…”

Startled, Alice then realized that indeed, amidst the dark chaos around her, several discordant and eerie shadows lingered, drifting like fragmented echoes among the threads and the faint silhouette of the Vanished. Shortly thereafter, the most prominent shadow began to stir. As smaller shadows swiftly merged and reformed, a human figure emerged from the darkness.

Agatha, adjusting her adventurer’s coat and smoothing out her appearance to regain her human form, shot a glare at the doll. Her presence added another layer of complexity to the already enigmatic situation Alice found herself in.

Agatha, typically known for her affable demeanor, expressed her annoyance with an unusual sharpness, “You just rolled right over me! Shattered me into pieces! Do you really need to move around so recklessly?”

Alice, taken aback, glanced at Agatha and then turned to look at Goathead, finding herself unexpectedly privy to another layer of the ship’s intricate internal dynamics. After the captain, she was now the second crew member to gain insight into the “First Mate” and the “Lookout’s” unique and vibrant existence aboard the ship.

Opting to momentarily revel in this revelation, Alice responded with a playful, “…Well, well.”

This remark quickly stirred both Goathead and Agatha’s frustrations.

Their attention then returned to Alice, observing her with a blend of curiosity and concern.

“Your current state… is quite remarkable,” Agatha remarked, scrutinizing Alice, who now seemed to be an integral part of the Vanished, with a mix of astonishment and analytical interest. Drawing upon her expertise as a former gatekeeper, she examined Alice’s “mental phantom” with a professional eye. “So, is this your ‘essence’? Or rather… is it closer to your true essence?”

Pondering the question, Alice inquired, “What do you mean?”

Agatha elaborated, “…It suggests that your usual form has been constraining you, and now, being merged with the Vanished, this more powerful ‘vessel’ has granted you a new level of ‘freedom’.” She patiently explained to Alice, now accustomed to her transformed appearance, “Have you noticed this yourself?”

Alice’s realization dawned upon her, her dimly glowing form in the void expressing a sense of elation: “Yes, I feel light and liberated, though there’s always this nagging sensation that I feel…”

“Always feel what?” Goathead and Agatha asked in unison, their interest piqued.

Alice hesitated, then confessed with a thoughtful pause, “Always feel… something isn’t quite right,” slowly “looking up” as she spoke, “This isn’t my body; that… is.”

Both Goathead and Agatha, momentarily taken aback by Alice’s statement, instinctively raised their gaze skyward.

A massive, fragmented shadow, larger and more imposing than the vague silhouette of the Vanished, loomed ominously over the chaotic expanse, having emerged into their consciousness without prior notice.

“…Damn!”

Chapter 793: Temporary Communication

The scene began to subtly change as a massive, undefined structure started to form near the Vanished.

Duncan, who was stationed at the stern's helm, was intently monitoring Alice's condition. However, he was suddenly overcome by a strange sensation. Almost simultaneously with Vanna, he looked up towards the sky.

A huge, vague form was slowly appearing through the dim sky and light fog, coming into view.

This form seemed to be made up of many large, separate pieces that were loosely joined together, creating a shape that somewhat resembled a space shuttle. It appeared as if it had been torn from a larger entity, with its central part visible as a fractured, interconnected framework!

The scale of this apparition was awe-inspiring. Gazing through the distant mist, Duncan and Vanna couldn't determine its exact size or how high it was above the Vanished, but its mere presence exerted an overwhelming force, making it feel almost suffocating.

After some time, in a voice filled with wonder, Vanna asked, "What is… that thing?!"

Duncan quickly turned his attention back to the figure at the helm – Alice. She was standing quietly, but at some point, her gaze had dropped, her eyes half-closed as if she was about to doze off, her spirit seeming to drift away with numerous faint “lines” emanating from her.

Possibly due to their past experiences of sharing visions, Duncan could just barely make out these almost invisible lines – they descended from the sky, densely packed, resembling a colossal tree with an intricate structure, or perhaps a cluster of inverted spikes. These lines were clearly connected to the massive phantom in the sky at one end, and converged behind Alice at the other…

Alice felt as though she was in a long, strange dream, in which she was a grand spaceship traveling through the stars.

She carried the hopes and futures of many, departing from a slowly disappearing time cocoon, leaving her origin, never to return.

Behind her, stars burst into life like waves before dimming as if withdrawing, the fabric of the universe unraveling behind her, while a terrifying vision, similar to a red comet, chased her relentlessly through the disintegrating celestial bodies. She navigated through dying worlds as if racing through a shrinking, collapsing tunnel, dodging deadly gravitational traps and enduring storms of bombarding rays like torrential rain…

She calculated tirelessly, constantly adjusting her trajectory, searching for an exit among the stars, charting a course to escape the “collapsing tunnel” using a star map built from the collective knowledge of millions. Every marker on the map shifted, everything in the universe veered off its intended course – first the positions of the stars, then the laws of matter, and finally… “calculation” itself.

There was no way forward, no means left for navigation; the very act of “calculation” had broken down. The protective shields failed, the ship’s structure began to fall apart, and alarms sounded with urgent intensity. The database crashed, life-support pods burst into flames… The thoughts of the “passengers” dissipated into the vast emptiness.

Everything culminated in a bright flash followed by a cataclysmic explosion.

And then, Navigator Three woke up amidst a sea of error messages – she had been lost in a long and strange dream.

In this dream, she found herself as a doll, engaged in the surreal yet mundane tasks aboard a ghost ship – cleaning, cooking, doing laundry, and fiddling with oddities…

The ship sailed through a sea of glowing embers, and it, too, seemed to be made from a kind of compressed ash. She wasn’t alone; a few other “beings” created from ash lived on this ship. Occasionally, the ship would dock next to islands – enormous chunks floating in the embers, bizarrely merged into strange shapes, maintaining some kind of obscure “function” amidst the ashen sea.

The islands buzzed with activity and sounds, the ash mimicking the life that once was, producing noises that seemed intelligent. At times, Navigator Three found these sounds and shapes somewhat familiar, as if echoing information stored in her memory, and this “familiarity” often stirred a feeling of… “sadness” within her.

Yet, in the dream, the “doll” found joy, making peace with the ash. To her, all ash was the same; she wandered this world, reborn from the flames, as if given a meaningful “existence.” She had a shell that mimicked the embers, allowing her to run, jump, and laugh among the other ash-formed beings.

In this dream world consumed by ash, there was a single entity not made of ash.

It was a fragment of the undying cosmos – stars flowing like a river through the sea of smoldering ash.

Alice, or as she was known in this scenario, Navigator Three, suddenly opened her eyes.

She found herself in darkness, surrounded by vague shapes and lines, inside the navigation cabin of the New Hope, a place from her “memories.”

“Mr. Goathead? Miss Agatha?” Alice called out, her voice tinged with worry as she remembered her actions before the darkness engulfed her. The familiar figures were gone, leaving no trace.

“Where did you all go?” Her voice echoed in the void, her advance stopping after a long silence, her spirit lowered, “Did I mess things up again?”

Suddenly, a light broke through the darkness, interrupting her contemplative murmurs.

Alice looked up, surprised by the appearance of light.

Before her stood a towering rectangular silhouette, topped with a red light that looked like the eye of a giant, set in the upper part of the figure. Around and behind this shadow were numerous flickering lights, looking like a multitude of eyes hiding in the darkness.

Alice paused for a moment, instinctively feeling the urge to approach this mysterious figure – and just as she formed this thought, her vision briefly blurred.

When her surroundings came back into focus, she found herself standing right in front of the imposing shadow crowned with a red light.

The surrounding darkness acted like a curtain, hiding the finer details of the figure before her, yet part of her – the part connected to her identity as “Navigator Three” – recognized it instantly.

“Navigator Two?” she said in surprise, her voice pronouncing a name that felt unfamiliar yet deeply familiar, as if she had known this entity for a long time.

“It’s been a long time, Navigator Three,” the tall rectangular shadow responded, its voice tinged with the static of interference, “It seems Navigator One has indeed succeeded… though the results were not as I predicted, I am nonetheless relieved to detect your identification signal once again.”

“Did you call me here?” Alice asked aloud, her mind swirling with thoughts that, if she had a physical brain, would surely have overwhelmed her, “How can I go back?”

Navigator Two was silent for a moment, as if Alice’s response had unexpectedly veered away from its “calculations.”

But then, breaking the silence, Navigator Two’s voice reached Alice again: “I merely intended to observe you beforehand, to check your stability – the navigation key I designed for you was a bold move. Given my projections and understanding of our current reality, its success is uncertain. After all, I have avoided direct interactions with Navigator One for a long time to prevent cross-contamination.”

Alice’s eyes widened as she processed Navigator Two’s explanation. She then, with a thoughtful look, asked, “What exactly does that mean?”

Navigator Two paused again, its red light dimming as it did so.

Alice waited patiently, her eyes fixed on the flickering lights in front of her.

After a moment, the light grew brighter once more.

“In the last message I received, Navigator One mentioned that a ‘fragment’ it had sent out found an exceptionally capable ‘host’ within the sanctuary, someone capable of preserving the backup data you carry. Yet, why does your current operational efficiency seem so… misaligned with my calculations?” Navigator Two queried.

Alice took a moment to reflect on this, then looked directly at Navigator Two, asking, “Are you saying I’m not smart enough?”

Navigator Two remained silent for a beat.

“Even though I’m not entirely clear on all the details, you seem to be talking about something related to the ‘duplicate’ of the Frost Queen from before, right?” Alice responded, showing some understanding of the situation. “I’m not sure about the specifics, but the captain mentioned it was due to a mistake by the Nether Lord’s duplicate, which targeted the wrong entity for duplication…”

She paused, her curiosity evident as she looked at the light: “Is that a big problem?”

The red light on Navigator Two flickered slowly as if it were pondering the question or perhaps letting its computational processes run. After a significant delay, it replied in its slightly static-laced voice, “No, if the objective is merely navigation, then what we have should suffice.”

“Do you feel regret?” The light dimmed slightly, “You’ve lost a vast amount of your memories. You were once celebrated among us for your quick processing abilities and your capacity to multitask, charged with mapping the vastness of the universe. Yet now, you’re confined to such a… limited form.”

Alice blinked, taking in the words.

The comments were cryptic, yet she sensed an underlying meaning.

This time, she pondered before responding.

“I don’t think so,” she said after a while, gently shaking her head after some thought, “I might have felt lost before, but now I’ve found my way, so I don’t have any regrets. Besides, I’m so busy every day, I don’t really have time for regrets.”

The red light on Navigator Two dimmed again before returning to its previous intensity.

It seemed to be contemplating as well, and after a short pause, it said, “If that’s the case, then that’s good.”

In the darkness, the towering rectangular silhouette began to fade away.

“Are you leaving?” Alice asked quickly, a hint of urgency in her voice.

“This connection is temporary, enabled by the experimental navigation key; I can’t sustain it for long,” Navigator Two’s voice replied, growing fainter in the darkness, “We’ll meet again. I’m glad… to have detected your signal once more.”

Alice’s smile widened.

Though she didn’t fully understand the situation, she felt a deep sense of happiness.

The captain had always said that happiness was something to be cherished.

“Then, until next time,” she waved enthusiastically into the thickening darkness, “I’ll come to find you with the captain and everyone else!”

The darkness did not respond, except for a brief, fading chirp.

Chapter 794: Dont Speak Your Last Words Too Soon

The grand illusion quietly faded away, leaving only faint traces of light that slowly vanished within the murky, tumultuous clouds. Standing next to the ship's helm, the doll suddenly blinked her eyes as though her soul had just rejoined her body, reviving her expression with lively animation.

She gazed upwards, seemingly bidding farewell to a figure swiftly disappearing into the abyss, and waved enthusiastically in that direction, exclaiming, "Goodbye! Goodbye!"

"Who are you waving at?" Duncan's voice emerged from nearby. Turning, Alice saw both the captain and Miss Vanna standing close to her, each wearing a puzzled look. Vanna, in particular, seemed to be searching the skies as if expecting to witness some remaining marvel.

"It was Navigator Two!" Alice replied with a burst of excitement, openly sharing her recent experience. "I suddenly felt connected to the Vanished. Then, I encountered Goathead without realizing I crashed into Agatha first. She broke into pieces though, but she managed to reassemble herself. After that, I met Navigator Two, who said it had come to greet me. I saw a huge ship soaring through the stars, and I even had this amazing dream where I was flying at incredible speeds! And also…"

Miss Doll was clearly overjoyed, launching into a barrage of stories that prevented Duncan and Vanna from interjecting. Initially full of questions,

Duncan found himself completely overwhelmed by the doll's enthusiastic storytelling.

Remarkably, the doll managed to make each sentence leap to a different topic without any logical connection. Despite their combined efforts, Duncan and Vanna struggled to comprehend Alice's narrative, partly due to Vanna's background as a sports enthusiast.

"Stop, stop, stop, let's take a moment to calm down and sort through this from the beginning," Duncan finally intervened, quickly ensuring that Alice's connection with the ship was secure to prevent any mishaps. He then carefully asked, "Are you feeling unwell now?"

"Me?" Alice paused her torrent of words, looked down at herself as if puzzled by the question, and then shook her head, "No, I feel pretty good… Though, there was a moment when I felt detached from my body, which was quite startling…"

"You felt detached from your body?" Duncan's concern deepened, recalling the massive illusion behind the clouds and the numerous "threads" that had seemed to connect to her, along with the sudden "presence" he had sensed within the Vanished. He nodded thoughtfully, "It's possible that for a moment, your consciousness had left your body… Now, can you describe exactly what you saw, but take it one step at a time, calmly."

"Okay." The doll nodded, made an effort to calm down, and began to systematically describe her experiences as they occurred, including her guilt over accidentally breaking Agatha.

"Don't worry about Agatha too much; she's used to it. Sometimes, Shirley skips her homework, and Agatha ends up breaking just like that," Duncan reassured her, dismissing her concern. "But the appearance of Navigator Two is quite unexpected. I didn't anticipate it would leave a method of communication in your navigational key."

As he spoke, Duncan observed Alice closely, checking for any signs of change or damage.

“Are you concerned?” Alice quickly picked up on his tone, but waved off the concern, “Don’t worry, I’m feeling great. Navigator Two didn’t seem harmful. Even though I can’t remember everything, it felt friendly.”

“I’m not worried about malintent; I’m concerned about its impact on you. Technically, you were both once part of the New Hope. Now, there’s a significant deviation between your ‘state’ and your ‘essence.’ It’s uncertain if this change poses any hidden risks,” Duncan explained, adding, “But it seems there’s no immediate cause for concern. Since Navigator Two reassures you’re fine, I’m relieved.”

Alice scratched her head, looked at Duncan with a mix of hope and uncertainty, and asked, “Captain, I think I’ve got the hang of steering and navigation now. When do we set off again? I promised Navigator Two I’d be the first to find it.”

“In a day,” Duncan nodded, “We’re adjusting the Vanished based on the feedback we just received. We’ll depart in a day. Everyone should rest and prepare for the next journey, and also…”

He trailed off, looking towards the mid-deck cabin entrance, but didn’t finish his thought.

Alice followed his gaze, then suddenly remembered something, “Oh, Captain, where’s ‘Sailor’? He was at the helm earlier; I thought he’d definitely come to see…”

“Don’t worry,” Duncan said with a knowing smile, “He’ll show up soon.”

However, Sailor didn’t appear on the deck, nor did he join the crew when they discussed the illusion in the sky.

Even as Alice prepared dinner for everyone and they gathered in the dining hall, Sailor was absent.

When the captain announced their next destination as the “node” where the God of Wisdom Lahem resided, Sailor was still nowhere to be seen.

It wasn’t until later, as Duncan and Vanna walked on the deck with Alice beside them, that she couldn’t help but inquire again, “Captain, where did Sailor go?”

Duncan stopped, leaned against a mast, and looked out over the empty deck. He then turned to Vanna, “Do you remember what I asked you earlier?”

Vanna paused, trying to recall, but before she could speak, hesitant footsteps interrupted her. Turning, she saw a hesitant, hunched figure emerging from the misty deck – a mummy, moving step by step, its face so wrinkled that all features were compressed together, yet its bewildered expression was unmistakably clear.

“Captain…” Sailor approached Duncan, appearing awkward beside the doll, “Uh, I have a question…”

“Alice has taken over the helm,” Duncan stated, “You must have noticed the commotion on the deck.”

Sailor’s face froze, then he hesitantly asked, “So…”

“Your steering duties have been temporarily assigned to Alice. She will handle navigation from now on.”

Sailor stared at Alice, then Duncan, and finally pointed to himself, “What about my task…”

“It’s completed,” Duncan said nonchalantly.

Sailor couldn’t contain his confusion, “Then why haven’t I vanished?”

Duncan looked at the mummy with indifference, “Did I ever say you would?”

Sailor was stunned for a few moments, then it dawned on him, and his already wrinkled features twisted further in realization, “Wait… that doesn’t make sense! My task is done… I even felt the bindings on me loosen, and my connection to the shroud severed… why am I still here?!”

“Because you’re on this ship, obviously,” Duncan retorted, “Did you think leaving the Vanished was that easy? Even subspace can’t take anything from this ship after it lingered there for a century, and you thought you could just leave?”

Sailor was speechless, finally grasping a crucial oversight.

Duncan continued, “Honestly, your words earlier were quite touching.”

Sailor’s demeanor shifted towards unease and avoidance.

“I was moved, and I’ll be sure to pass on your ‘confessions’ to Lawrence…”

Sailor started fidgeting, attempting to blend into the ship’s deck from embarrassment.

“…However, the debts you owe to the first mate, second mate, and others of the White Oak must be settled by you personally. You’ve admitted yourself that gambling and betting are detrimental habits. Don’t pretend you’re without means; I’ve confirmed that Lawrence has been compensating you as an official member of the crew.”

Unable to contain his shame, Sailor began aggressively scuffing the deck with his toe as if attempting to spark a fire from sheer agitation: “Please, stop, I beg of you…”

Duncan merely shrugged and turned to Vanna with a questioning look.

“Do you now grasp the essence of my earlier question?”

Vanna appeared visibly perplexed, her mind trying to untangle Duncan’s cryptic words: “…I had assumed you were alluding to the multiple endings one faces when forgotten by others…”

Duncan elaborated, his arms folded across his chest in a display of casual indifference, “I was referring to the concept of ‘social death’—a phenomenon that can occur repeatedly. Each time you’re remembered, you face another kind of ending. Hence, it’s wise to refrain from declaring your final words too hastily; it proves quite embarrassing should you not actually meet your end.”

Vanna remained in a state of befuddled silence, struggling to digest Duncan’s philosophical musings.

Duncan, undeterred by Vanna’s puzzled look, cast his gaze down at Sailor, who had now resorted to squatting on the deck, aimlessly picking at the wooden planks while mumbling to himself: “I had a feeling… something about your demeanor was off at that moment, but I hesitated to ponder too deeply… I just knew something was amiss…”

At this, Duncan allowed a smile to break across his face, a clear sign of his satisfaction with the unfolding scenario.

He was decidedly in high spirits, reveling in the fact that he pulled a prank on this mummy.

Chapter 795: The Body of Civilization

Late into the night, the “Vanished” and its crew found themselves navigating the fringes of the known world, enveloped in a persistent twilight. Above them, the sky melded into a perpetual haze of gray, casting a diffuse, eternal light that seemed to ignore the passage of time, cloaking everything in an unchanging glow as if day and night had ceased to exist.

Amidst this eerie atmosphere, Sailors, a being whose face was etched with the signs of many thoughts and emotions, sat contemplatively on the stern deck. He had been in this reflective state for what seemed like eternity, motionless as a statue.

Breaking the silence, Duncan approached Sailor, casting a glance at the mummified body nearby before posing a question, “Still lost in your collection of ‘last words’?”

“Not exactly,” Sailor shifted uncomfortably, his voice barely above a whisper, “I’m… just suddenly uncertain about what lies ahead.”

“The future?” Duncan queried, one eyebrow arching in curiosity.

“In my initial plans, I was supposed to have disappeared from this world already,” Sailor confessed after a brief pause, his tone serene yet deliberate. “I never envisaged a life beyond this mission. I hadn’t entertained any thoughts of what comes after – having roamed this world for countless years, the prospect of facing a future now seems… daunting.”

Duncan regarded him with a seriousness that belied the casualness of their conversation, “If you’re truly reluctant to continue, I can grant you the ‘eternal rest’ you seem to desire. It would be quick.”

At this, Sailor’s expression shifted subtly, betraying his internal conflict with a slight adjustment in posture, “No, that… might not be necessary after all…”

A faint smile graced Duncan’s face as he crossed his arms, gazing out at the mist-enshrouded sea. “Do you honestly still yearn for that ‘eternal rest’?”

This time, Sailor took even longer to respond, as if the question had unearthed a depth of contemplation he had not yet explored.

After what seemed an eternity, the preserved body unexpectedly stirred, its voice rasping, “This world remains as cold as ever to me.”

Duncan responded lightly, “But the world to come will be warmer. There, you might not have to remain as you are. Perhaps even in your state, you can still feel warmth.”

A trace of surprise flickered in Sailor’s eyes, “A new world?”

“Have you forgotten your own beliefs? The change we’re working towards will succeed – there will indeed be a new world, as you once assured,” Duncan said, locking eyes with him, “Do you still hold that belief?”

After a moment of reflection, Sailor nodded, “I do. I always have.”

“Then, wait and see it for yourself,” Duncan encouraged with a smile. “It promises to be a better place. The tale of the ‘Sea Song’ and many others deserve to be told by those who lived them. If you wish for these stories to endure, you should be the one to carry them forward.”

Listening to Duncan, Sailor seemed to come to a realization. Gradually, the deep lines of contemplation and concern on his face eased into a smile, albeit one that carried the weight of his experiences, “Alright, I’ve decided.”

He rose slowly, his gaze sweeping over the cold world around them, yet now with a semblance of peace, “I wish to witness this ‘new world’, Captain. Indeed, I am not ready to die.”

“Good,” Duncan replied, a smile of relief spreading across his face as he clapped Sailor on the shoulder, “Then let’s not die.”

Following a night of rest, the crew assembled on deck, with Alice taking her place at the helm at the stern – the doll, Miss, assuming a posture of grave determination before the dark wheel.

“Ease your tension,” Duncan said, standing next to Alice and speaking softly, “You’ve managed this once before. The ship is ready; just do as you did last time.”

With a nod, albeit a stiff one, Alice stepped forward, her expression resolute as she reached for the heavy steering wheel.

Before her fingers could graze it, Duncan and Vanna turned, their gaze drawn once again to the mist-covered ocean – a gentle farewell whispered by the waves amidst the islands.

Duncan offered a slight nod in that direction, murmuring a farewell meant only for his ears, “Goodbye, I’ll come to see you again.”

In the next instant, as Alice’s fingers touched the steering wheel of the “Vanished,” the navigational system of Navigator Three had assumed control, ready to chart a course into the unknown.

From the sky, a colossal illusion descended, its arrival shrouded in the strange, eternal twilight that bathed the world in a murky light. This grand vision, a fragmented echo of New Hope, unfurled across the sky, casting expansive shadows that enveloped both the “Vanished” and the “Bright Star," as well as a significant swath of the surrounding sea. Amidst this surreal event, a voice, virtual and distorted as though it traveled across vast distances of time, resonated within the minds of all present:

"…Jump engine activated, New Hope will set sail… May we meet again at a distant destination. The future's hope awaits us all…"

This voice, laden with static and distortion, gradually faded away, and with its departure, the fog that had veiled the sea began to lift. Beyond the rails of the "Vanished" and the "Bright Star," the world itself seemed to drain of color and detail, reverting back to that all-too-familiar monotone of "gray-white."

Hovering above the two ships, the ancient projection of New Hope lingered like a guardian figure, its wings outstretched protectively.

At the helm, Alice's grip tightened on the wheel, her eyes wide as she peered into the distance. Invisible "threads" seemed to weave her, the ships, and the projection of New Hope into a singular narrative, her consciousness momentarily transcending her doll's form to become the guiding will of their journey.

The way forward was clear, charting a course toward the very brink of the world.

Meanwhile, the Boundless Sea remained cloaked in the veil of an endless night, within which a new "order" for survival had begun to stir.

A radiant "sunlight," slowly traversing the sea, was being towed by a robust tugboat, dragging a massive copy of the sun between city-states. This pale golden radiance emanated from the tugboat, extending its light tens of kilometers around. Within this glow, numerous cargo ships, both large and small, navigated the waters.

These fleets, voyaging between city-states under the shield of this moving sunlight, were propelled by potent steam cores through the perpetual darkness. Captains delivered essential supplies to cities in dire need, bringing with them the promise of hope that the sunlight symbolized. Each city would bask in this light for three to five days, the brief respite allowing defenders to regroup before the fleet, laden with new cargo, would embark once again, bringing sunlight and hope to the next destination.

This endeavor had become a widespread operation across the entire Boundless Sea, with increasing numbers of fleets transporting sunlight and supplies in this manner.

The Northern City-States Union had already sprung into action, and in the Central Sea, the new “Sunlight Route” centered around Pland had successfully completed its first long-distance material transport under the cover of darkness. In Pland, the White Oak, leading the charge and towing a fragment of the sun, pierced through the night’s encirclement, reconnecting cities that had been cut off from one another. Far away, in Wind Harbor, several fleets organized by the Church had embarked on their journeys into the night, destined for Mok and Lansa, breaching the nocturnal blockade.

As sunlight coursed through the night, these fleets, navigating a world on the brink of submersion, resembled ancient explorers venturing into uncharted territories, armed with axes and torches, combating the encroaching darkness. As civilization teetered on the edge of decline, these efforts sought to sustain the lifeblood of society.

Taran El stood atop the highest tower in Wind Harbor, his gaze lost in the diminishing pale golden glow on the horizon. He observed a massive glowing geometric shape, akin to a crystal crafted from light, being towed by a hefty tugboat into the darkness, with the silhouettes of numerous ships faintly discernible within the fading sunlight.

This was the inaugural cargo fleet from Wind Harbor, embarking on a seven-day journey through the long night. Protected by sunlight, they were to deliver supplies to Mok before proceeding to the Central Sea, integrating into the “Sunlight Route” established by Pland, thereby reconnecting the central and southern seas.

For the past year, the “sunlight” that had enveloped the city-state departed, and Wind Harbor, once shielded by this light, confronted the long night in its full extent for the first time. Darkness descended upon every street, with gas lamps flickering under the night sky, tracing the outlines of the city in Taran El’s view.

As footsteps approached from behind, Taran El, without needing to look, knew who had come.

“Truth be told, I feel a bit melancholic, Ted, do you understand this feeling?” he spoke casually, his voice tinged with sentiment, “For almost the entire past year, I’ve been engrossed in studying that piece of the sun, which had almost become a part of Wind Harbor – including myself, many of us never imagined it would leave.”

“It has transcended being merely a ‘research sample.’ Following the fall of Vision 001, it has become a lifeline for many city-states,” Ted, the Truth Keeper, joined Taran at the terrace’s edge, their eyes surveying the city swallowed by night, “…The Academy has issued orders, ‘survival’ is now the foremost mission for all city-states and their inhabitants, superseding all else.”

Taran El listened in silence, absorbing the gravity of Ted’s words. After a long pause, he finally exhaled a heavy sigh, breaking the silence: “Let’s take a walk along the docks.”

Chapter 796: The Days When the Waves Calmed

Following the departure of the cargo fleet, the docks, under the cloak of night, transformed into a realm of unparalleled quietude, a stark contrast to the usual hustle and bustle. The once busy machinery for loading and unloading now stood silent, its operations halted, and individuals unrelated to the docks' operations had been ushered away from the work zones. In this newfound stillness, only the essential security personnel remained, their presence complemented by the soft glow of gas lamps flanking the roads, serving as silent sentinels through the night.

Venturing down the southern ramp of the docks, traversing a lengthy staircase, one would find themselves greeted by the expansive sandy shores. By daylight, this locale was a cherished haven for the town's residents, offering a respite from the daily grind.

However, in the present nightly atmosphere, all that remained was a deserted beach, its sands caressed by the dark, endless sea. The night air, tinged with the salty chill of the sea breeze, seemed to carry within it whispers of sorrow as the waves relentlessly battered distant rocks, their frothy upheavals casting ghostly shadows under the moon's ethereal light.

The solemn-faced guardians, tasked with securing all pathways leading to this coastal domain, stood with lanterns and swords in hand, their vigilant eyes piercing the veil of night that lay beyond the city's limits.

“The coast is now off-limits,” declared a fully armed Truth Guardian, halting Taran El in his tracks. The guardian shone his lantern upon the scholar’s face, meticulously scrutinizing his features and the count of his eyes, “The outer perimeter is now dangerous… Truth Keeper?”

Upon noticing the figure trailing behind Taran, the guardian, illuminated by the lantern’s soft glow, expressed surprise at recognizing the visage of Ted Lir.

“We merely seek a stroll along the shore,” Ted Lir assured the guardian with a gentle nod, “We shall return within the hour.”

“…You may proceed, but this gentleman must present a pass,” the Truth Guardian responded after a moment’s hesitation, his gaze fixed upon Taran El, “Without it, passage is barred.”

“I am Taran El, a university professor granted second-tier night passage privileges.” Taran El promptly produced the requisite document from his attire, a pass he always carried. “This grants me access to the coastal region…”

Upon inspecting Taran El’s credentials, the Truth Guardian’s demeanor softened, and he allowed them to pass.

“Thank you,” Ted Lir expressed his gratitude to the guardian, advancing forward.

Yet, as they were about to cross the checkpoint, the guardian felt compelled to voice his concerns: “…Truth Keeper, and Professor Taran, with the departure of the sun fragment, the coast has been sealed. What purpose brings you here?”

“…We aim to see any alterations to the coastal region after the sun fragment’s departure,” Taran El explained as they continued their walk, “We’ll not be long.”

Silence enveloped Taran El and Ted Lir as they meandered along the quiet beach, a silence that was soon broken by Taran El's observation.

"It seems this area too has been cordoned off," he remarked, noting the heightened vigilance, "The guardians here are exceptionally dedicated."

"They were chosen by me," Ted Lir revealed, "This coastal zone is merely one of many sealed areas. Should this have been the Great Steam Core or a Level One Containment Zone, even I, alongside the Governor, would be obliged to present identification and justify our presence."

A moment of silence ensued before Taran El voiced another thought, "Any word yet?"

"The Vanished and the Bright Star crossed the border a month past. Now, their existence is all we can determine," Ted Lir replied with calm resolve, "Captain Duncan remains stationed in Pland, and the avatar at Frost continues its daily actions. Occasionally, tidbits concerning the Vanished are all there is to go upon in terms of information. The news about the end of the world is still mostly confined to secrecy among the city-states."

After a brief pause, Ted Lir added, "Even my resources are limited to such snippets of information."

"Knowing they are 'alive' and active at the border offers a bit of comfort," Taran El confessed softly.

"The irony isn't lost on me," Ted Lir said, slowing his pace, a complex emotion surfacing, "that amidst all this, neither ship has encountered a single soul truly 'alive.'"

Taran El couldn't help but roll his eyes, "Hence my use of 'alive.' Was that not apparent?"

Ted Lir shot Taran El a look of mock frustration, "…How could that have been clear?"

Their laughter broke the night's solemnity, offering a brief respite from the cold air. Taran El then turned his gaze toward the horizon, where the Storm Church's Ark once stood. Now, only the vast, empty expanse of sea met his eyes, its surface a pale glow under the fissuring crack in the sky.

"The arks have departed," Taran El mused, a sense of abandonment enveloping him, "Wind Harbor feel so forsaken…"

"Quit it with your melodrama," Ted Lir chided pragmatically, "Bury yourself in grading papers for a night, and such fanciful notions will quickly fade."

"I am unlike you," Taran El retorted, pride in his tone, "My students are diligent; their submissions reflect earnest effort…"

Ted Lir merely snorted, dismissing the scholar's sentiment.

Yet, after a prolonged silence, both men found common ground by speaking in unison, "Grading papers has its merits."

Caught off guard by their simultaneous realization, they shared a moment of bitter laughter before retreating into silence once more.

Just beyond where they stood, the vast expanse of the sea mirrored their silence, its surface as still as glass, unmarred by any ripple. The sea air, laden with the tang of salt and the bite of chill, swept in from the unseen horizons, yet the sea itself remained eerily calm as if under a spell.

The celestial luminescence bathed the world, casting a uniform, ghostly glow over everything, transforming the nocturnal seascape into a scene of otherworldly calm.

Ted Lir, his expression clouded with concern, gazed out toward the tranquil coastline, his forehead creased in confusion.

“What seems to be the matter?” inquired Taran El, noting the unease on his companion’s face.

“It’s weird… I suddenly have this sensation that we’re missing something,” Ted Lir voiced his unease, his words tinged with uncertainty. “Don’t you feel it too? There ought to be sounds – the whisper of wind caressing the sea’s surface, the gentle batter of water against the shore…”

He trailed off, his gaze fixated on the distant, silent sea as he stood enveloped in the night’s stillness.

Gradually, both men persuaded themselves that perhaps all was as it should be.

…

Meanwhile, Tyrian, standing at the shoreline, faced the sea’s unnatural stillness with a furrowed brow. A momentary wave of disorientation swept over him, blurring the lines between reality and something else entirely.

Shaking his head in a bid to dispel the fog of confusion, he grappled with an internal contradiction. His senses told him the sea’s calm was normal, yet a part of him stubbornly held onto the memory of a different scene – one where waves danced and frolicked.

Breaking the silence, he uttered, “…The waves have vanished.”

Turning to address the imposing figure beside him, he sought confirmation, “Father, is there something amiss?”

Duncan remained silent, pondering, while the confused Aiden asked, “Waves? What’s wrong with them? What do you mean?”

Tyrian’s confusion deepened upon hearing Aiden’s response, prompting him to physically shake his head in an attempt to clear the unsettling sensation. He gazed out at the sea, feeling a fundamental aspect of it slipping away from his grasp, a ‘natural vision’ of the world fading from collective memory.

Then, Duncan’s voice reached him, solemn and grave: “She has forgotten the waves.”

This declaration seemed to anchor Tyrian back to clarity. The mention of “the waves” by his father abruptly dispelled his confusion, replacing it with sheer astonishment.

He looked out to the sea, eyes wide with realization.

Aiden, too, appeared to snap out of his own befuddlement, his gaze towards the sea now filled with a mix of realization and fear.

In this moment, it became apparent that across the world, the sea had transformed into a mirror-like calm – the concept of “waves” had been erased from existence.

“Father,” Tyrian turned sharply towards Duncan, a sense of urgency in his voice, “The Storm Goddess, She…”

“It’s rot,” Duncan interjected softly, his voice carrying a weight of inevitability.

Tyrian and Aiden froze, absorbing the gravity of the situation.

“Fear not, She remains with us. Although the decaying rot deepens, the sea endures, and thus, so does she,” Duncan reassured them, dispelling the dread with his calm demeanor. “This ‘peeling away’ is but part of the rot’s progression, a phenomenon not unfamiliar to our world.”

Tyrian, momentarily stunned, echoed, “Already occurred before?”

Duncan posed a question, seemingly out of the blue, “Do you recall how many intelligent races inhabit our world?”

“Of course, there’s three…” Tyrian responded almost reflexively.

However, Duncan’s question hinted at a deeper, more unsettling truth, suggesting a loss far greater than just the waves – a hint of forgotten histories and beings.

“Before long, you’ll also lose the memory of waves breaking against the shore. The world will ‘correct’ this, erasing it from existence. Until then, cherish the memory of their ‘existence’,” Duncan spoke softly, his hand resting reassuringly on Tyrian’s shoulder.

“Do not mention ‘waves’ from now on; the very word is considered a blasphemous concept and will contaminate those who hear it.”

Chapter 797: Navigator Two

The soothing murmur of the ocean had ceased, leaving Vanna in a stunned silence. As one of the Vanished's crew and having undergone the transformation of subspace reshaping, her senses had been honed to exist in a realm where the whispers of the waves were a constant presence. The abrupt disappearance of this sound jolted her to immediate awareness. Without hesitation, she sprinted from her cabin to the deck, seeking the captain.

"Captain!" Vanna exclaimed, a rare look of confusion etched on her face as she approached Duncan. "The waves in my mind have disappeared. I fear something dire has befallen the Storm Goddess…"

Duncan nodded, his expression grave. "I am aware," he acknowledged. "The decaying rot has escalated."

Rooted to the spot, Vanna absorbed his unequivocal response. It took her a moment to shift her gaze towards the endless expanse of "grey-white" that stretched before the Vanished, her heart silently calling out to the goddess in a prayerful whisper, as she had done countless times before.

Yet, the comforting cadence of the sea remained elusive. Instead, faint whispers and chaotic murmurs, once dismissed as mere distractions during her prayers, now offered a strange solace to her unsettled spirit.

Out of the corner of her eye, Vanna noticed shadows beginning to form in the monotonous grey-white void that lay ahead of both the Vanished and the Bright Star. Suddenly, a seemingly endless layer of dark figures emerged, and a mirror-like expanse unfolded before them.

A voice, eerily reminiscent of Alice but heavily distorted, resonated through the minds of all on board: “Migration concluded… detaching from the passage.”

In the blink of an eye, the grey-white corridor encasing the Vanished and the Bright Star silently fractured, and the ships plummeted into a “nodal sea” composed of solid matter, skimming the mirror-like surface without creating so much as a ripple.

Duncan, with a solemn look, observed the view beyond the deck and then silently contemplated the sprawling shadows cast upon the “sea surface.”

As they came into clearer view, what appeared to be mountainous forms rising from the sea were, in reality, immense clusters of black crystals.

These gargantuan crystals stood like islands, their surfaces continuously fracturing and expanding, forming a forest of jagged crystal clusters. Illuminated by the chaotic light of the sky, their translucent edges blurred into the surreal landscape.

This was a realm far removed from the tranquil domain of the Storm Goddess.

Shirley, too, made her way to the deck, her eyes widening in awe at the sight of the crystal-laden sea, letting out a prolonged gasp of wonder.

“We’ve entered the nodal sea,” Duncan stated, regaining command of the Vanished. “Our next task is to locate Navigator Two, hidden somewhere within those crystal formations.”

Morris, also on deck, pointed confidently in a direction. “It’s that way. I can sense it,” he declared.

Under the scholar’s guidance, the Vanished and the Bright Star cautiously made their way deeper into the crystal sea.

Alice emerged on deck, her eyes wide with amazement at the sight of the massive, blade-like crystals retreating from the ship’s side, some pulsing with a vibrant glow. Despite her loss of memory regarding the New Hope, she instinctively felt that this alien landscape bore no resemblance to it, nor to the aftermath of the Great Annihilation that had reshaped her “Alice Mansion.”

Suddenly, a voice echoed in her mind: “You’ve arrived…”

Startled, Alice turned towards Duncan, exclaiming, “Captain! Someone is speaking to me!”

The voice hesitated before revealing itself reluctantly: “I am Navigator Two…”

Duncan approached with a look of understanding, gently patting Alice on the head as if to reassure her. “Inform Navigator Two that we’re on our way to it.”

Alice, acknowledging with a nod, paused thoughtfully for a moment before looking back up at Duncan with a mix of confusion and concern. “It’s not responding to me anymore,” she admitted, troubled by the sudden silence from Navigator Two.

Duncan remained silent, his face devoid of emotion as he took control of the Vanished, skillfully navigating through a complex maze of crystal clusters that rose like peaks around them.

Time seemed to lose its meaning as they journeyed, until the world around the Vanished suddenly expanded. Emerging from a gate-like structure created by intersecting giant crystal columns, they were greeted by an unexpectedly vast expanse of sea. At the heart of this immense body of water, Navigator Two stood alone, silently awaiting their arrival.

Observing the orderly black array before him, Duncan softly instructed, “Switch to the small boat,” as they stopped a short distance from Navigator Two. The crew then transferred to a small boat, approaching the central mainframe with caution over the mirror-like surface of the sea.

From the direction of the Bright Star, a small white paper boat approached, carrying Lucretia at its bow, accompanied by Rabbi the rabbit and Luni the clockwork doll.

As the two boats met, approximately a hundred meters from the mainframe array, Lucretia turned and shared her observation, “Don’t you think… ‘It’ appears quite strange?”

Duncan, staring ahead with a grave demeanor, eventually responded, “Perhaps, appearing strange is the most normal state here.”

Reaching Navigator Two, they finally beheld the so-called “God of Wisdom” in its true form, revealed from within the mist. It was a collection of server structures of varying sizes, resembling steles, with a particularly large black rectangular core adorned with a red light that seemed to watch over its surroundings, reminiscent of the dark red “core” of the Nether Lord.

Surrounding the core were twenty-two smaller units, each several meters in height, their surfaces alive with flickering lights and a multitude of indicators blinking in an endless dance. From these structures emanated a deep, continuous hum.

The servers were interconnected by a network of what appeared to be nerves and blood vessels, creating a living, breathing entity. Flesh-like materials extended from each server, merging with the metallic exteriors and even transforming some parts into skin-like textures. At various convergence points, pulsating organs and brain-like tissues were visible, adding to the surreal fusion of technology and biology.

As they drew closer, a mass of flesh at the base of Navigator Two's mainframe reacted, sending an eyeball on a stalk out to confront Alice, who, startled, slapped it away.

The eyeball quickly withdrew, and the entire network seemed to respond to this act of aggression.

A moment later, a synthetic voice questioned, "Navigator Three, why did you hit me?"

Alice paused, scratching her head a bit sheepishly: "Ah, I got a scare… and slapped without thinking much…"

Duncan, having observed the disturbingly altered server matrix, asked, "You didn't originally look like this, did you?"

Upon Duncan's inquiry, the central mainframe's red light pulsated gently, and then a profound voice filled the space around him, offering insight into the peculiar state of their world's technology. "No, I did not. My current state should help you grasp the reasoning behind the phenomenon of why machines could be 'possessed' in our world now."

Duncan's face subtly registered his alarm. He gazed intently at the fusion of organic and mechanical components within Navigator Two's mainframe, noting the eerie appearance and disappearance of eyes within the network of blood vessels and nerve fibers. He made a concerted effort to maintain a composed demeanor despite the bizarre sights before him.

"When did this transformation begin?" he posed his question with a depth of curiosity.

The response came with the red light dimming and brightening slowly, “The change commenced with the first cry of a newborn echoing across the Boundless Sea. It was when Navigator One’s nanomachines completed their inaugural task of reshaping our world that we began to change. Given your encounter with Navigator One, you’re likely familiar with its altered state, so my current appearance shouldn’t come as a surprise.”

There was a brief pause as if the entity behind the voice was contemplating its next words. Then, with a tone that seemed to carry the weight of resigned acceptance, it continued, “Think of it as a form of ‘adaptive adjustment.’ My situation, while unsettling, is not unique – yet, it could be seen as less severe compared to others. After all, I am still capable of having this direct conversation with you.”

Chapter 798: The Hardcore Navigator Two

From the very moment Navigator Two began to articulate its thoughts, Duncan had already discerned a notable divergence in this entity's state, especially when contrasted with the Storm Goddess. This distinction was not attributed to any "contaminated" condition manifested by its physical host mechanisms, but rather to its preservation of "awareness."

Expressing his intrigue openly, Duncan posed a question: "Our encounter with Gomona revealed her approach to sealing away 'death' and 'decay' within a temple to mitigate the erosive forces within the sanctuary. I had presumed your circumstances to mirror hers, yet it appears your situation is markedly different?"

Responding to Duncan, the central host conveyed with a slight shiver, "The dilemma of decay and corruption infiltrating our 'essence' is a shared ordeal among us. However, the strategies we employ to decelerate this rot vary significantly."

"The burden of being the 'foundation' of the world weighs most heavily on Gomona, compelling her to adopt the drastic solution of splitting herself 'in two'. Ta Ruijin, on the other hand, chooses to hibernate amidst flames, postponing his decay within the confines of an endless dream loop, while Bartok has constructed a solitary jail for himself, a boundless wilderness from which escape is impossible…"

“In contrast, my existence is perhaps the most unique – as you observe, I am merely a machine crafted by mortals, only to be bestowed with the traits of life and decay through the cataclysmic event of the Great Annihilation. My method of combatting this is through ‘iteration’.”

The central host’s lights flickered as Duncan registered surprise at this revelation, prompting him to inquire, “Iteration?”

“I currently operate as version 16 · 08 · 102-beta,” Navigator Two elucidated with a mix of calmness and gravity. Perceiving a subtle shift in Duncan’s demeanor, it offered a detailed explanation, “The first numeral denotes the generation, the middle number represents the major version, and the final digits signify minor version updates. The beta designation reflects a recent update to my light driver, which remains unstable – those are the light effects you see dancing across the auxiliary servers, now capable of executing 4096 distinct light patterns.”

Upon concluding its explanation, Duncan’s expression grew even more perplexed.

After a brief pause, Duncan managed a wry smile, “I had assumed those lights were critical status indicators…”

“My condition can either be self-reported or monitored externally – though such was the case when my creators were present. Now, there’s no one to assess my operational state,” Navigator Two continued, maintaining its serene and earnest tone, oblivious to Duncan’s shifting mood, “As for the lights, they were an addition by one of my creators post-creation.”

It paused momentarily, the sound within the central host wavering slightly.

“The rationale behind his action remains elusive to me, yet he seemed to believe it significant. The joy on his face upon witnessing my first ‘blink’ is a memory I cherish. Hence, I’ve committed to mastering more ‘blinking’ techniques over the years, ensuring the retention of those lights with each version iteration," Navigator Two shared.

Behind the central host, lights on the auxiliary servers, resembling tombstones, began to blink intermittently, their glimmers akin to stars in the night sky.

Duncan's mind drifted to a memory of the vast, dark ocean, recalling the immense form of Navigator One, adorned with countless, enigmatic lights.

Alice's eyes lit up with wonder as she admired the twinkling lights on Navigator Two's frame, whispering in awe, "How beautiful!"

"Indeed, their beauty is perhaps their purpose," Navigator Two replied softly.

In the ensuing silence, Morris, having contained his excitement, seized the opportunity to inquire, "So, you employ 'iteration' as a means to delay your own 'decay'…but could you elaborate on what 'iteration' entails?"

Navigator Two's red light shifted upwards as if directing its gaze towards Morris, and replied with a gentle tremor emanating from within: "The exterior may be fragile, yet the realm of knowledge is ever-renewing – thus, it is through the ceaseless evolution and rejuvenation of oneself that those perpetual truths can be upheld…"

Suddenly, a cacophony of roars and tremors filled the air as shadows of varying sizes on the distant sea surface began to oscillate within the fog. Morris, taken aback, scanned his surroundings, only to witness an unforgettable spectacle.

The sea surface was adorned with innumerable black crystal formations, which gradually began to "bloom" like a forest of blades. The crystals split and cracked open, revealing previously obscured silhouettes within – these were vast, tombstone-like black mainframes.

The sight stretched across the sea, presenting a mysterious and majestic tableau, yet it was, in reality, a graveyard of countless tombs!

“Each of these are former incarnations of myself,” announced Navigator Two, its voice breaking through the silence and effectively pulling Morris back from his state of astonishment. The voice of this “God of Wisdom” retained its characteristic tone, revealing, “Every cycle of iteration leaves behind such remnants.”

Still reeling from the revelation, Morris turned to face the scene again.

Lucretia, standing nearby, shared in the shock. She had mentally prepared herself to encounter the remnants of ancient deities, having already witnessed the colossal form of an ancient god within the Storm Goddess’s sanctuary. Yet, the sight of these divine forms amassed like mountainous relics was beyond her wildest expectations.

“This concept of iteration is truly remarkable,” Duncan admitted, somewhat stunned by the visual before him. This was not the scenario he had envisioned upon hearing Navigator Two’s explanation of “iteration.” “The software updates I’m used to certainly don’t involve such dramatic manifestations…”

“Indeed, it does provoke quite the reaction,” Navigator Two responded with composure, “Each cycle of upgrading necessitates a method for disposing of my previous incarnations. However, there are instances where the new version fails to overtake the old, resulting in a temporary regression. However, I typically have multiple contingency plans ready, which are initiated in the event of a failure. Then, the concerted effort of several new iterations ensures the triumph over the previous version, guaranteeing the success of the update…”

Duncan was left speechless at this admission.

The notion of Navigator Two's "system upgrade" felt extreme, akin to a physical transformation or a tangible "hardware update."

Yet, while Duncan grappled with these thoughts, Morris and Lucretia beside him had moved beyond their initial astonishment. Even Nina, who stood close by, nodded in agreement, whispering, "Our mentor always taught us that the quest for truth is inseparably linked to both a strong constitution and the spirit of a warrior."

Morris, hearing this, expressed his approval, "The pursuit of knowledge is indeed a battle, a truth you've clearly grasped."

Inspired by the conversation, Shirley added softly, "I've always been adept at combat, yet I've never felt knowledge flood into me in the same way…"

From her shadow, Dog emerged, quipping, "Your situation is unique; knowledge struggles to keep pace with you…"

Alice, observing Navigator Two and the interchange among Morris, Shirley, and Dog, appeared puzzled by the ongoing discussion, simply allowing a giggle to escape her.

Vanna, positioned at the stern of the vessel, crossed her arms and sighed, shaking her head.

This prompted Duncan to reflect, drawing parallels and forming bizarre associations among his companions – in this world, scholars chase knowledge as if it were a wild beast in pursuit of mortals. Yet, for his companions, the dynamics seemed askew – knowledge eludes Shirley, finds Alice approachable, but fails to penetrate the mind of the doll lady. As for Vanna… the lady appeared indomitable, likely having vanquished knowledge during her academic endeavors.

Shaking these fanciful thoughts from his mind, Duncan redirected his attention to Navigator Two.

He now had a newfound understanding – he recognized the source of the scholars' formidable resilience in this world.

The challenging conditions they faced were merely a facet of their determination; the real catalyst seemed to be the physical enhancements undertaken by the God of Wisdom, an entity that literally opened up its own cranium for the sake of progression…

In that moment, Navigator Two's focus shifted, its central host's red light sweeping across Duncan's boat and eventually resting on Dog.

"This dog's appearance seems familiar to me."

Taken aback, Dog remembered something from its past, instinctively retracting its neck and seeking refuge behind Shirley.

Shirley quickly acted, grasping the chain near Dog's neck and looking up with apprehension at the enigmatic deity before them.

"There's no need for alarm," Navigator Two reassured them in a soothing tone, "You're safe here; no force will tear you apart now – I'm merely surprised to find such a unique being among the imperfect creations of Navigator One."

Its red illumination intensified, betraying a hint of curiosity for the first time.

"What happened with you two?" Navigator Two inquired, its voice soft yet filled with genuine interest.

Chapter 799: Possibilities Beyond the Blueprint

Dog was visibly uneasy and afraid in the dim, unsettling glow of the “God of Wisdom,” a dark red light that flickered like a subdued flame. He tucked its head close to Shirley’s legs for comfort, a clear sign of its nervousness. Despite this initial fear, Dog gradually overcame its trepidation and began to share its and Shirley’s story with this ancient entity they stood before.

Their tale was one of catastrophe instigated by cultists, a transformation from an ordinary dark hound, indistinguishable from other shadow demons, into something more by feeding off a symbiotic relationship with humanity.

As Dog spoke, a soft green light danced in its hollow eye sockets, waxing and waning in intensity, a visual sigh of its easing tension. It eventually lay down, resting against Shirley, who offered comfort by occasionally petting its head and adding to the story with her own words.

When their narrative concluded, Navigator Two, the entity they addressed as the “God of Wisdom,” fell into a deep silence. Its body, adorned with star-like lights, dimmed and then brightened periodically, suggesting it was lost in thought—or perhaps, it had simply entered a restful, breathing mode.

After a pause that seemed to stretch indefinitely, Navigator Two finally broke the silence, its curiosity piqued by the unusual turn of events: “So, you gained humanity, and your symbiote turned into a ‘shadow demon’… Young lady, can you show me what your demon form looks like?”

Shirley, caught off guard by the request, instinctively looked towards Duncan for reassurance. With a gentle nod from him, she transformed. The sound of cracking bones filled the air as she shifted forms. Her small, frail body was now encased in dark bony plates. Bone-like wings sprouted from her back, adding a mix of maturity, ferocity, and an odd beauty to her appearance.

Carefully, she adjusted her new skeletal limbs, trying to maintain her balance on the small boat: “This boat is a bit cramped, isn’t it…”

Navigator Two observed Shirley closely, its internal lights brightening as if showing interest.

“Sample coupling…” Navigator Two finally spoke, its voice betraying a mix of surprise and confusion. “An individual beyond the blueprint! Why?”

Shirley, struggling to keep her balance, looked up in confusion at the entity’s remarks.

Navigator Two elaborated, “In this ‘sanctuary,’ everything is created and evolves according to a preset blueprint. This includes events as significant as the sun’s extinction, all within the original design. Ideally, only occurrences that align with my calculations should manifest in this ‘world.’ But we never anticipated… someone like you.”

Its gaze shifted between Shirley and Dog, pondering the implications.

“The case of the dark hound falls within expected possibilities. By their nature, shadow demons lack the capacity for rational thought due to inherent flaws. The external introduction of ‘humanity’ could theoretically endow them with cognitive abilities, albeit with extremely low probability. That’s still within the realm of possibility…”

“But you… You perplex me, young lady.”

“Based on the original parameters set by Navigator One, you should not be alive. While humans and shadow demons share a common ancestry, the transformation you’ve undergone doesn’t follow any logical pattern, and its result diverges from… the initial design.”

The dark red light intensifying its glow, Navigator Two looked at Shirley with evident confusion.

Shirley, for her part, was even more baffled.

After a moment of contemplation, Shirley hesitantly pointed towards her chest, suggesting a possible explanation.

Interwoven black bones formed a protective “cage” around her heart, within which beat not one, but two hearts. Enclosed by this bony structure, a soft green light flickered quietly, perhaps holding the key to the mystery surrounding her unique transformation.

Navigator Two focused intently on the small, flickering flame before its attention shifted towards Duncan.

“Flame Usurper, I wish to have a word with you,” it said, calling out to Duncan in a tone that demanded attention.

Caught off guard, Duncan hesitated for a brief moment before recovering. He glanced around, somewhat puzzled, “But it doesn’t seem like there’s a spot for a private chat around here, does it?”

Navigator Two remained silent. However, a subtle “click” noise emerged from its core, signaling something was about to happen. Duncan watched as a compartment at the base of the entity’s cabinet-like structure opened, revealing a sophisticated mechanical slot that extended outward.

Duncan, initially taken aback, quickly realized what was expected of him. He frantically searched his person, his fingers eventually brushing against something cold and metallic.

It was the brass key of the doll, marked distinctively with an infinity symbol.

The key underwent a transformation right before everyone's eyes, morphing as if it were wax melting, only to solidify back into a sleek, rectangular device. Its black surface was etched with intricate, fine lines, and one end boasted a delicate metal interface, its complex metal contacts starkly exposed.

This was a form of the key Duncan was all too familiar with; it was reminiscent of his initial attempts to unravel the key's mysteries using fire. During those moments, he had glimpsed its true nature and had also witnessed the tragic spectacle of the New Hope disintegrating and crashing down in this world.

Lifting his eyes, Duncan noticed the slot on Navigator Two's surface surrounded by a soft, pulsating blue light.

A deep voice resonated, "The startup key of New Hope is universal."

There were two keys: one for starting up… the other, a specialized navigation key…

Understanding dawned on Duncan; he grasped the fundamental nature of these two "wind-up keys." Amidst the intrigued and anxious looks from those around him, he gave a slight nod and took a step forward.

Just then, Alice tugged at his sleeve, her expression a mix of concern and entitlement. She gazed up at the red light emanating from Navigator Two and asserted, "Let's be clear, this key belongs to me."

Navigator Two paused before responding: "…Lend it to me for a moment."

Alice released Duncan's arm, though her worry was evident. "Just don't damage it! I still need it to wind me up…"

Sensing her apprehension, Duncan nodded earnestly, offering Alice a semblance of reassurance.

He then inserted the “startup key,” now a delicate metal device, into Navigator Two’s waiting slot. A distinct “click” resonated through the air.

Instantaneously, their surroundings dissolved, giving way to an expansive, serene, and purely white space that unfolded from the point of connection.

Then, this seemingly empty expanse burst into life with breathtaking landscapes in what felt like a mere heartbeat!

Vast plains stretched out before them, suddenly cloaked in a blanket of vibrant green as vegetation sprouted rapidly. Rivers carved their way through the land while the outlines of distant cities began to materialize on the horizon. The sky, initially a blank canvas, adopted a soft light blue hue crowned by clouds that glowed with a subtle purple luster. A radiant sun ascended, bathing the entire scene in its warm glow.

Duncan found himself on a small hill, an ideal vantage point overlooking this newly formed world of plains and rivers.

Before him stood a man clad in a white robe, his attire suggesting that of a scientist. He was tall, slender, with somewhat disheveled hair and a look of weariness etched upon his face.

As they stood amidst the created landscape, the figure before Duncan began to explain, “This form, it’s borrowed from one of my creators. After my initial activation, he suggested that if I ever wished to forge friendships with humans, I could adopt his likeness.”

Intrigued by the revelation, Duncan couldn’t help but inquire, “Was he also responsible for programming your lighting effects?”

“No, that was the work of another,” the figure replied gently, his gaze drifting over the lush plains before them. “I owe my existence to many creators. They endowed me with much: their appearances, wisdom, the essence of thought, an abundance of code, personality traits, and… those enchanting lights."

As they took in the beauty of the surroundings, Duncan remarked softly, "This place is stunning," his eyes following a majestic bird species soaring across the sky, its wings shimmering and casting specks of light that faded into the horizon. "Is this your homeland?"

Navigator Two, embodying the figure, shook its head in denial.

Confused, Duncan sought clarification.

Navigator Two responded, after a lengthy pause filled with reflection, "I can't recall what my homeland looked like. Despite my efforts to retain the original data through countless iterations, the degradation was inevitable. Information became distorted, unreadable, or lost entirely. Even though I strive for a perfect restoration, the image of my homeland has blurred beyond recognition."

He might have sighed if he could, yet he only fell silent briefly before adding, "This landscape is a reconstruction based on the faintest of memories left to me, a mere approximation of what my homeland might have been."

Sensing the admission's gravity, Duncan cautiously broached, "Is it rot?"

"Yes," Navigator Two acknowledged, a note of resignation in his voice. "Initially, I believed I could outpace the decaying rot through continuous self-updating. Yet, the truth is inescapable. Everything succumbs to the decay."

The conversation paused as Duncan processed this somber truth.

Shifting the focus, Duncan asked, "What did you want to discuss with me?"

Navigator Two faced him directly, its gaze intent. “You’ve facilitated the emergence of an entity not foreseen by our original design. Do you comprehend the significance of this deviation?”

Duncan, understanding the reference to Shirley, frowned. “Are you referring to Shirley? While her transformation might have been unforeseen by your standards, I wouldn’t say I ‘created’ her in the strictest sense.”

Navigator Two persisted, “In a system designed to be closed and deterministic, even the smallest anomaly can disrupt the entire framework. Your influence catalyzed a deviation from the preordained plan. Yet, rather than leading to destruction, Shirley has survived and continues to exist in a stable state. This outcome has mitigated one of my deepest concerns.”

Intrigued, Duncan pressed, “And what concern is that?”

Navigator Two expressed a profound apprehension, “…I was worried that the ‘new world’ you create would become just yet another larger ‘Boundless Sea’. In my calculations, there was a great possibility of this happening.”

Chapter 800: Gazing into the Future

Upon hearing Navigator Two's statement, Duncan's face turned serious. He looked intently into the eyes of the individual before him and spoke with gravity, "A bigger 'Boundless Sea'? What leads you to think this way?"

Navigator Two took a brief moment to gather his thoughts. Then, seemingly out of nowhere, he posed a question that appeared to be unrelated, "In the place where you originated, the civilization responsible for your creation, did they achieve the 'ultimate stage'?"

"The ultimate stage?" Duncan's brow furrowed at the question. "Do you mean…"

"To master all known truths within their world, to unravel all its mysteries including the universe's origins and its eventual fate, and to possess the capability to alter the universe itself—turning the laws of nature into 'tools' that can be manipulated and redefined, rather than unchangeable laws to which one must conform."

As Navigator Two expressed these thoughts, his demeanor showed a trace of emotion and nostalgia. Since making his appearance, his emotional expressions seemed to have grown more aligned with those of humans.

"My creators referred to this phase of civilization as 'Transcendental Criticality'—though they never fully reached this stage, they had grazed its brink and thus outlined the prerequisites for achieving it. Their greatest accomplishment was the creation of a 'Time Capsule' during the erection of the New Hope, safeguarding a century's worth of knowledge as the end of their world loomed near."

"Flame Usurper, while my creators never actually attained 'Transcendental Criticality,' they deduced through comprehensive analysis that it was possible for 'mortals' to achieve such a state, and that through the might of civilization, the mathematical principles of the universe could be harnessed."

Navigator Two maintained his intense stare into Duncan's eyes, loading his gaze with a palpable pressure.

"Flame Usurper, having observed your civilization for countless years, and after rigorous calculations, I have come to believe that the civilization standing behind you has surpassed my creators. I am eager to know, have they truly reached that 'ultimate stage'? Were my creators' theories on the zenith of truth accurate?"

Confronted with Navigator Two's penetrating stare, Duncan eventually nodded slightly.

"Yes, they have reached it."

This might have been the confirmation Navigator Two had long awaited, but upon receiving it, his eyes momentarily lost focus. He stood frozen for several seconds before abruptly snapping back to reality: "So this phase really exists… Hence, civilizations can genuinely 'transcend boundaries'. The system is not closed…"

Duncan, perplexed, was about to inquire further when Navigator Two, as if jolted awake, hastily continued: "Then, your civilization must have already mastered observations beyond our universe? Are they aware of other universes and have begun to ponder over how to traverse that 'barrier'?"

Duncan paused to reflect, then remembered the “message” conveyed by human civilization among the myriad stars – an event that defied their understanding, that occurred “outside the universe.”

After pondering briefly, he responded: “I can’t confirm if they’ve begun to consider the existence of other universes or the ‘barrier’ you speak of, but they have indeed observed an event ‘outside the universe’—the first and unique ‘extra-universal event’ they witnessed was the ‘Great Annihilation’, which had not yet breached our dimension of reality, or more accurately… the collision with another universe.”

“Yes, precisely! Witnessing an event from outside our universe! This marks the initial step—theoretically the ‘First Step’. My creators wanted to confirm if such a thing was truly feasible… and here it is!”

Navigator Two’s words flowed quickly, his excitement unmistakable, a stark contrast to his demeanor up until now. Clad in a white robe, his form echoing that of a long-past human with a countenance marked by fatigue, he paced energetically around a small mound, only to halt abruptly in front of Duncan, his eyes alight with fervor.

As the wind swept across the mound, the expansive plains beyond heaved with waves of grass, and rivers glinted under the sun’s glow.

“Flame Usurper, the concept of ‘outside the universe’ is crucial. Our universe is not alone; its very nature reveals the Great Annihilation as the clash of multiple universes. In essence—facing cataclysms like the ‘Great Annihilation,’ a civilization’s advancements, no matter how sophisticated, or the fortitude of its refuges, even if they span star systems or superclusters, all become futile upon the cataclysmic impact of another universe—”

Navigator Two extended his arms, his gestures dramatic, embodying not just the likeness but also the essence of one of his creators, endowing him with a persona nearly indistinguishable from a living being:

“Pop, akin to a soap bubble, obliterated.”

His stance lingered, his expression complex, as if attempting to muster a smile yet teetering on the brink of sorrow.

“In the event of ‘external events’, all constructs within our universe are rendered powerless; none can withstand such force, akin to the shell of the New Hope… despite being forged from neutron star material, it fractured as effortlessly as paper…”

As Duncan’s eyes gradually widened, a realization dawned upon him about the profound message this ancient “artificial intelligence” sought to convey.

“…Thus, for a civilization to be genuinely ‘safe’, it must master the capability to ‘transcend its world’,” he asserted gravely, “and currently, we have not achieved this pinnacle, not even the civilization I hail from, which only glimpsed the possibility of ‘transcendency’. Therefore, we must ensure that the ‘next world’ harbors the potential for ‘transcendence’, or in other words… the ‘successors’ emerging in the ‘new world’ must be afforded the chance to ascend to such a level,” Navigator Two declared, lifting his gaze solemnly, “The new world must embrace this potential, must be capable of ‘nurturing’ such a possibility.”

Duncan remained silent for a moment, struck by a profound… astonishment.

Navigator Two, this ancient “artificial intelligence”, exhibited foresight surpassing any “ancient king”. While others debated the viability of this sanctuary as a means of salvation, he was already contemplating the demise of the new world… because destruction is inevitable, whether caused by another Great Annihilation or some unforeseen calamity.

“Fear, this was the first ’emotion’ I experienced,” Navigator Two’s voice resonated, calm yet profound, “What concerns me… may appear distant, but after countless external sensors relayed the ‘sensation’ of the universe’s collapse, this ‘fear’ has been woven into my core logic. I understand, such an event is bound to recur eventually.”

“Flame Usurper, I find myself devoid of any sense of security, and truth be told, the others share this sentiment—the ‘mortals’ in our sanctuary refer to us as ‘gods’, yet they are unaware that their ‘gods’ are engulfed in a profound fear that spans from dawn till dusk. The memory of calamities on the scale of the ‘Great Annihilation’ haunts us, and until we discover a method to counteract such disasters, this fear will persistently linger. This constant yearning for ‘security’ has led me to contemplate a significant question…”

“What is the ultimate development stage a civilization can achieve, and what level must it attain to effectively withstand all calamities and thrive amidst them?”

“It might be that there is no definitive end, but from my perspective, ‘transcending the confines of our world’ emerges as a pivotal milestone.”

Breaking the silence, Duncan responded, “…So, essentially, you are concerned about two aspects: firstly, whether it’s possible for mortal civilization to grow to the capability of ‘transcending the world,’ and secondly, regarding the ‘new world’ I have conceived—assuming it truly exists—whether it can nurture such an evolution of civilization.”

Navigator Two offered a slight nod before posing a question, “Flame Usurper, are you aware of the fundamental distinction between a genuine ‘world’ and a ‘sanctuary’ like the Boundless Sea?”

Duncan remained silent, prompting Navigator Two to provide the answer himself.

“While ‘possibility’ is a term that comes to mind, it doesn’t quite capture the essence accurately. In my view, the most significant difference lies in ‘randomness’. A fully functioning and healthy universe is characterized by the emergence of ‘true randomness’,” Navigator Two elaborated, “whereas within a sanctuary, we encounter only ‘false randomness.’”

Duncan quickly grasped the implication of these words.

“Therefore, nothing that surpasses the ‘information threshold’ of the sanctuary could ever manifest within it,” he articulated promptly, “Similar to a figure on a two-dimensional plane, no matter the speed at which it moves, or even if it masters instantaneous travel within that plane, it can never ‘ascend’—only a system that permits ‘true randomness’ can facilitate the occurrence of ‘supercritical’ events that transcend the system itself!”

“My creators referred to such phenomena as ‘Ultimate Transcendence’, believing it to be the potential zenith in the evolution of mortal civilization… at that point, we would be truly safe.”

Navigator Two’s voice softened, and he slowly lifted his gaze towards the void above where the New Hope could never arrive at the final destination.

Duncan finally comprehended the message Navigator One had conveyed to him amidst the profound depths of the sea –

“Indeed, from the very onset of our journey, Navigator Two had already deduced the eventual outcome.”

The destination that remains unreachable for the New Hope symbolizes a chasm in the progression of civilization, before which, a spaceship propelled by a jump engine and constructed from neutron star material, and a steel longsword hurled skyward with force by a warrior, stand on equal footing.

For when confronted with “external events”, all constructs within our universe are inherently fragile.

Chapter 801: Pilgrimage of the Apocalypse

As twilight descended, a chaotic breeze swept across the expansive plains, picking up fallen leaves from the modest hills and whirling them towards the vast sky above. The city's outline on the horizon was bathed in the remaining sunlight, gradually enveloping it in a radiant golden glow.

This "illusion," crafted by Navigator Two using the residual data in its database, was astonishingly lifelike. It was so detailed that it replicated even the tiniest particles of dust and the subtle movements of the breeze with remarkable precision. Knowing that his interaction was with an ancient artificial intelligence at a conscious level, Duncan recognized the scene's artificiality. Without prior knowledge, distinguishing the simulated hill and plains from their real counterparts would have been impossible.

Yet, this was, indeed, an illusion. The flaw of this simulation lay in its perfection—every dust particle was meticulously calculated by Navigator Two. The wind that seemed to flow chaotically had its path predetermined within the AI's core algorithms before it ever began to traverse the plains. The simulation was constrained by its database and calculations, leaving no room for the unexpected, not even a randomly blown dust particle.

The ancient kings were aware of the apocalypse and the reality of the Great Annihilation, but only Navigator Two, a sophisticated AI developed by an advanced civilization that once navigated the cosmic seas, grasped the subtle yet critical "differences" in the fundamental laws of the universe.

And now, it had encountered another being capable of comprehending everything.

A weary man, clad in a white lab coat, found solace on the slope of a hill, seated on a substantial rock, gazing distantly at the artificial twilight.

“My creators had not achieved the advancements of your civilization; hence, I struggle to comprehend what a 0.002-second slice of the universe signifies or the futures it could unfold. Therefore, I fear that your strategy might only be expanding a ‘Boundless Sea.’

“Though it may be vast, capable of harboring trillions of stars, and might exist for billions of years, mimicking the lifespan of a genuine universe, as long as the challenge of ‘ultimate transcendence’ remains unresolved, it would still serve as a ‘sanctuary’ where the evolution of civilization is confined to its initial design. Thus, the very forces that once obliterated our homeland could threaten it once more…

“‘Paranoia’ was the second concept I learned related to ‘human nature’ after my creators disappeared. This ‘paranoia’ and ‘fear’ are deeply ingrained in the foundation of my system, driving me to incessantly ponder and calculate in pursuit of a scenario allowing ‘two-dimensional beings’ to ‘rise’ from their plane—a phenomenon I’ve termed a ‘super-system event.’

“Yet, I’ve not succeeded.

“A self-contained system precludes occurrences outside its parameters. Despite countless adjustments and refinements to my logical framework, the stark reality is that the nature of non-closed-loop and super-system events is a privilege exclusive to the real universe.”

The tranquility of the hillside enveloped Duncan and Navigator Two as they both looked off into the distance together. After a period of reflective silence, Duncan unexpectedly voiced a thought: “…So, for the Boundless Sea, Shirley represents a ‘super-system’ entity. Could it be because the ‘information’ I carry surpasses the boundaries of the Boundless Sea itself – yet, within the universe’s 0.002-second span that I embody, this portion of information remains a part of a self-contained system, incapable of transcending itself?”

Duncan shared this notion with a sense of unease, realizing that this hypothesis offered little in the way of reassurance. If his speculation were accurate, it would confirm Navigator Two’s grave concerns: regardless of whether it’s in the old world or the new, a “super-system event” would be unattainable – civilization was destined to be ensnared within an enclosure, despite how expansive it might be engineered.

Navigator Two remained silent for a moment, lost in thought, before gently shaking his head.

“Upon encountering that girl, I did entertain this theory for a moment. However, upon deeper analysis, I ultimately discarded this notion,” he articulated thoughtfully, “because you didn’t completely ‘reshape’ her. Apart from your ‘influence,’ everything that makes up Shirley remains a ‘creation’ confined within the sanctuary…

“This situation could be interpreted as a super-system event within what was initially a closed-loop system, yet you didn’t genuinely alter the ‘total information’ of the Boundless Sea sanctuary. That is to say… the universe’s 0.002-second worth of information is still entirely encapsulated within you.

“From this perspective, the ‘super-system’ characteristic should be considered as intrinsic to you. The alterations in Shirley did not result from her being endowed with ‘information’ from outside the Boundless Sea, rather it’s because she acquired your ‘trait.’”

Duncan, pondering deeply, felt compelled to respond: “But your assessment might be flawed, as you yourself have acknowledged the ‘limitations’ of a closed-loop system."

"Yes, being confined within a closed-loop system restricts my ability to perfectly analyze and calculate singularities pertaining to you. Hence, the possibility that the 'new world is just another Boundless Sea' cannot be disregarded."

Navigator Two paused, then slightly shook his head again.

"Nevertheless, it is of no consequence. In the end, lacking a superior alternative, 'doing our utmost' is often the only course of action available."

Without further comment, Duncan simply nodded in agreement. Then, he and Navigator Two continued to sit on the hillside, basking in the serene tranquility of the evening air, their gaze fixed on the shimmering river waves across the plains.

In this digital illusion, time seemed to flow exceedingly slowly – and it had been a considerable while since Duncan had allowed his mind such respite.

Yet, like all moments of luxurious repose, it felt fleeting once concluded.

"I should leave," Duncan announced abruptly, rising from his seated position on the hill. "There's still a long journey ahead."

"Yes, you have much farther to go," responded Navigator Two, standing up to face Duncan with a composed look. "You still have to meet the remaining two of us. After you've visited all the nodes along the external barrier, Gomona awaits your arrival—do not make her wait too long."

Duncan paused, absorbing these words before responding, "…You're aware of my intentions, aren't you?"

"…You are embarking on a pilgrimage along the external barrier, the initial step in the dismantling of this world," Navigator Two revealed with an innocent smile. "I understand that once you depart from Gomona's place, the actual dismantling of this world will commence its countdown. Regardless of how the new world will form, the disassembly of the old world is an integral part of this transformation. We must find a way to conclude this persistent… ‘Great Annihilation.’”

He extended his arm, offering his hand to Duncan with a smile of pure joy.

“I cannot predict the chances of our success, nor can I foresee whether we can be ‘carried over’ into this new world, and in what form we might exist there. But I trust that you will give it your all, so I’ll see you in the new world.”

Duncan regarded the offered hand for a brief moment before accepting it.

A small green spark quietly jumped between their clasped hands, vanishing as quickly as it had appeared.

“See you in the new world.”

Duncan’s form slowly faded away—disconnecting from the simulation.

The wind that had been moving across the plains and hills came to a halt, and the golden-red sunlight that had illuminated the sky began to dim. Standing quietly on the hillside, the man in the white lab coat watched as darkness gradually enveloped the world around him.

Memories of his homeland nestled back into the shadows; he remained there, motionless for an extended period, before slowly raising his right hand.

A small green spark lingered on his fingertip, but in an instant, it was enveloped by a soft starlight glow, seemingly revealing its “true essence.”

Navigator Two raised his hand, waving gently in the enveloping darkness.

Suddenly, a complex tapestry of lights and shadows sprang from the void, rapidly morphing to reveal a scene of staggering complexity—the vast, dimly lit expanse of the Boundless Sea, cities shrouded in fog, and the misty borders of the world, along with the nodes and barriers that flickered in and out of existence.

This scene unfolded on what could be described as the surveillance display of the entire world.

As Navigator Two's eyes moved over the projection, his attention was drawn to the periphery, where the nodes and barriers were just barely perceptible. There, a shimmer of starlight caught his attention.

This starlight, originating from the node known as the "Leviathan Queen," had traced a path in the shape of a quarter arc along the external barrier, making its way to rest at his own "Navigator node."

This starlight appeared to be wearing away at the barrier, radiating a potent and expansive "aura"… that was accompanied by the unmistakable scent of impending destruction.

Navigator Two remained in a state of silent anticipation. After an indeterminate period, he witnessed the starlight at the Navigator node flicker momentarily before continuing its journey toward the next node.

This advancing arc of starlight along the barrier acted as a forewarning, a countdown to the end of the world.

Pondering the situation, Navigator Two adjusted his focus slightly, and a message materialized within his field of vision, destined for a distant recipient:

"Sender-LH02, To – King of Fire – He is en route to you."

In the engulfing darkness, Navigator Two awaited a response, an interval that seemed longer than any previous communication with Ta Ruijin.

Eventually, a response materialized:

“Sender-King of Fire – Understood, I am prepared.”

“Sender – LH02 – Your response was delayed, is everything alright?”

“…The flames grow weaker, but I remain.”

“…Bartok, are you present?”

“Present.”

“Leviathan Queen, are you still with us?”

“…Yes.”

From the desolate wastelands above, the eerie howls and whispers akin to those from a tempestuous temple were barely discernible. With a gentle exhale, Navigator Two waved his hand, dispersing the lingering dim illumination in the atmosphere.

Chapter 802: The Only Cook on Board Takes the Helm

The tranquil sea breeze swept effortlessly across the ocean's mirror-like surface, causing the flags on the ship to flutter gently. Amidst the quiet of the night, an escort fleet composed of numerous large warships advanced steadily. Within this fleet, a colossal phantom slowly materialized from thin air.

Onboard the Ark, which resembled a miniature city-state, stood a grand cathedral with towering spires reaching towards the heavens. The light emanating from these spires bathed the nearby sea surface in a soft glow, with imposing towers and connecting corridors that seemed to guard the church's main structure, resembling giants stationed at the Ark's perimeter. This was the pilgrimage Ark of the Storm Church, which, after spending several days in the southern waters, had finally made its way back to the central region of the Boundless Sea.

Atop the highest tower of the Grand Storm Cathedral, Helena stood on the terrace, gazing out at the serene sea under the cover of night, with a middle-aged priest standing silently by her side, his head slightly bowed in reverence.

"The condition of the Goddess appears to be deteriorating," Helena abruptly remarked, "No one within the expanse of the Boundless Sea can discern Her voice with any clarity anymore."

The middle-aged priest nodded in agreement, adding, “The Death Church has relayed similar reports. Moreover, there have been occurrences of unrest among the deceased in numerous city-states that have long been engulfed in darkness. These incidents aren’t confined to those under the protection of the Death Church but have spread to others as well.”

Helena listened in silence, and after a brief pause, she sighed softly, her fingers tracing the Storm Goddess’s amulet on her chest—a symbol composed of sinuous lines imbued with enigmatic significance, which remains undocumented and unexplained in the ‘Storm Codex’: “…Both the domains of Death and Storm are receding from the world.”

The priest remained silent, offering only his quiet presence in response.

Turning to face him, Helena inquired, “Is there widespread unease among the people?”

“Recently, there has been an uptick in individuals seeking solace in confessionals and preaching halls, but the overall condition of the Ark and the escort fleet remains stable. The clergy’s faith is unshaken. We have always understood that the world would face periods of decline, and we’ve been preparing for this—the waning of the Goddess’s influence is a trial we were inevitably destined to confront,” the priest explained, pausing before he continued with a note of hesitation, “However, in some of the more remote city-states, a palpable sense of unease is spreading. While the chief priests maintain their faith, they are finding it increasingly challenging to manage the growing discontent among the believers and the clergy.”

Helena responded with measured words, “Preserve order, and collaborate with the city-states’ authorities on management and emergency procedures. Even if prayers prove futile, the might of steam and machinery remains intact, and we still have the unfaltering support of fire and steel.”

“We must demonstrate to the believers that regardless of the Goddess’s fate, the Storm Church will unwaveringly fulfill its responsibilities. Above all, it is crucial to divert everyone’s focus away from ‘prayer’ and towards other forms of support.”

The middle-aged priest bowed deeply in acknowledgment: “Understood.”

Helena acknowledged his response with a noncommittal hum, her gaze remaining fixed on the distant sea. She found herself muttering, “Lately, there’s always this peculiar feeling I get about the sea… but then, whenever I try to grasp it, it seems like nothing more than an illusion.”

Noticing her concern, the priest raised his head, his expression one of puzzlement. “The sea… is there something wrong with it?”

After a brief pause, Helena’s expression turned thoughtful, and she eventually dismissed the topic with a wave of her hand. “No, it’s nothing—just some baseless musings. You may go now; I have other duties that require my attention.”

Once the priest had departed, Helena remained alone on the terrace, taking in the sea breeze for a few moments longer before she turned back towards the cathedral tower. She descended a spiral staircase and navigated through a short corridor, making her way deep into the cathedral’s heart to her private prayer room—a place where she spent the majority of her time.

The prayer room was aglow with light, with oil lamps nestled in wall niches and candles flickering before the altar. In front of the Goddess’s statue, a fire basin burned with an unquenchable flame. This ethereal fire, nearly transparent and ghost-like, cast an aura of surrealism around the room.

Approaching the fire basin, Helena added spices and essential oils to the flames, watching as the smoke began to rise. Suddenly, a cacophony of murmurs and whispers filled her mind, disorienting her with a barrage of “noise” that seemed to taint her soul. Yet, she quickly regained her composure and addressed the flame, “Frem, I wish to speak with you.”

After a few crackles from the flame, the voice of Pope Frem, known as a Flame Bearer, emerged, sounding slightly distorted. “Is this concerning the ‘Archive’?”

“Yes,” Helena responded, indicating her awareness of his plans. “I understand you’re moving your Ark northward, towards the perpetual ice region, correct?”

Frem’s voice, still altered by the flames, conveyed a sense of urgency. “That eternally frozen ice field is believed to be a ‘fragment’ that could persist after the world’s end. For years, the Flame Bearers have been gauging our world’s ‘focal points’ across the Boundless Sea, seeking areas stable enough to withstand the ebbs and flows of history and time. Our findings have led us northward.”

Helena, showing a hint of hesitation, inquired further, “Have you pinpointed the exact location?”

Frem’s calm response came through the flame. “No, only that it lies to the north. Our time for precise measurements is running out. The mortality rate for priests venturing into historical voids for measurements is increasingly unacceptable—I cannot justify further risks… Now, our only option is to set sail northward, and I will personally determine the exact focus once we arrive.”

Helena gave a slight nod, her mind evidently churning with thoughts before she finally broke the silence. “I will dispatch a fleet to rendezvous with you. They will join your Ark before you venture into the icy waters. These ships will be carrying the most significant and invaluable documents that the Storm Church has amassed over the years.”

The flames within the basin responded with a lively crackle and leap, signaling a brief pause before Frem's voice emerged once more: "That's a prudent move. I've reserved space for them."

Helena drew in a deep breath, releasing it slowly, a gesture of gratitude. "Thank you," she said, her voice carrying a mix of relief and appreciation.

"It is our responsibility as the Flame Bearers," Frem's voice replied, emanating a sense of solemn duty from the fire basin.

…

In a space devoid of distinct features, a uniform expanse of gray-white surrounded the Vanished and the Bright Star, casting them into what appeared to be an endless void. The monotonous backdrop made it difficult to discern any movement, leading Duncan to occasionally entertain the unsettling thought that the Vanished was immobilized in a static, unchanging pocket of space-time.

However, Duncan was acutely aware that the ship continued its journey, navigating the intricate and turbulent structure of space-time beyond the known frontiers. Glimpses of the fragmented phantom of the New Hope occasionally visible above both the Vanished and the Bright Star served as fleeting assurances that the "jump" through space-time was still in progress.

Alice, positioned at the stern's helm, looked ahead with a gaze that lacked focus. Her hands remained firmly on the wheel, yet her usual vibrant demeanor was absent, replaced by a vacant and cold expression as if she had become a mere puppet. Her consciousness had extended beyond her physical form, intertwining with the Vanished and New Hope to ensure the stability of their journey through the jump channel.

After observing Alice's condition, Duncan made his way back to where the crew had gathered inside the cabin. In the dining area, Shirley sat at the table, a look of concentration on her face as she aimlessly stirred a bowl of soup whose color and texture seemed slightly off.

Having circled her spoon through the soup more times than she could count, Shirley finally raised her eyes to Morris, who was seated across from her, her expression troubled. “Perhaps I should take a turn at cooking next time?”

“There’s no need for that. You’re the youngest among us; it’s not yet your responsibility,” Morris responded dismissively, his curiosity piqued as he noticed Shirley’s reaction to the soup. “Does it not taste right, the dish I’ve prepared?”

Shirley’s response was a mixture of reluctance and forced politeness as she slightly recoiled, “Actually, it’s… it’s okay.”

Morris, intrigued by her reaction, sampled the soup himself, his expression turning contemplative. “This is exactly how Heidi instructed me to make vegetable mushroom soup,” he mumbled, bewildered. “Where did I go wrong?”

“It’s difficult to pinpoint exactly where the mistake occurred, but I’m confident that the vegetable mushroom soup Heidi makes doesn’t resemble this at all,” Vanna interjected, her gaze fixed on her own bowl with a mix of concern and resignation. “Let me take over the cooking next time. While I can’t guarantee a gourmet meal, at the very least, it won’t turn out as odd as this.”

“I do miss the pies and the fish soup Alice used to prepare,” Nina softly expressed her nostalgia for the culinary delights once served aboard their vessel, specifically Alice’s fish soup and pies. “Once you removed the fish head, the soup actually tasted quite decent…”

It was precisely at this stage that Duncan made his entrance into the dining area. The crew's subtle murmurings and mild complaints didn't escape his notice, prompting a complex mix of emotions to flicker across his face. "Back when Alice was in charge of the kitchen, I don't recall hearing so much praise for her cooking. Now that she's taken over the helm, it seems her culinary talents are suddenly in high demand," he remarked, his tone laced with a mix of amusement and irony.

Upon noticing their captain's presence, the crew promptly rose to their feet in a sign of respect. Nina, ever playful, stuck out her tongue in a lighthearted gesture as she stood up. "Perhaps I should take a turn at cooking next time. Back at Pland's, I was known to be quite the chef," she quipped with a chuckle, her tone brimming with a newfound confidence.

Duncan couldn't help but respond with laughter. Taking his seat, he shared a moment of collective trepidation with the crew as they all glanced at the less-than-appealing meal before them. The air was thick with anticipation, a silent plea for a culinary miracle.

After a brief pause, Duncan's actions brought a sense of magic to the room. With a snap of his fingers, a phantom flame danced across the table, morphing into a dark, mirror-like surface. Within this mystical display, the image of Lucretia, affectionately known as Miss Witch, gradually emerged, seated comfortably in the dining hall of her own ship, the Bright Star, surrounded by an array of sumptuous dishes.

"Good afternoon, Papa," Lucretia greeted with a warm smile, extending her pleasantries to the rest of the crew. "And a good afternoon to everyone else."

Curious, Duncan leaned in to inquire about the feast before Lucretia. "Preparing to enjoy lunch?" he asked, his interest piqued.

Lucretia confirmed with a nod and a smile, detailing the menu crafted by her crew: “Baked apple pies, grilled steaks, creamed corn soup, and vegetable patties. Today, Nilu, though still a novice compared to Luni, managed to contribute a salad. She’s rapidly learning and starting to assist me with various tasks,” Lucretia shared with evident pride.

Nilu, the twin doll and newly minted crew member of the Bright Star, made a charming appearance, peeking over the table to warmly greet everyone watching from the other side of the mirror.

Unable to contain her curiosity, Shirley leaned in with a hopeful glance, her voice tinged with hesitation. “Does it taste as wonderful as it looks?”

The smile that Lucretia offered in response was enigmatic yet affirming. “Luni’s culinary prowess has even drawn accolades from renowned chefs,” she assured, her pride in Luni’s skills unmistakable.

The conversation turned playful, with Lucretia teasingly awaiting Shirley’s next words, prompting Duncan to intervene with a sigh. “It seems we’re without a chef aboard our ship again – Alice has taken the helm,” he stated, a hint of resignation in his voice.

Lucretia’s graceful and restrained laughter echoed through the dining hall. “Well then, it looks like we were right to prepare in abundance. I had a feeling it would come to this,” she remarked, her laughter mingling with a sense of inevitability.

As the crew, now visibly eager, began to rise from their seats, their gazes converged on Duncan. With a resigned yet amused smile, he gestured for them to proceed. “Don’t wait on my account – Ai will see to your transport to the Bright Star. I’ll remain here. With Alice at the helm, I prefer not to leave the ship unmanned. Just be sure to bring some food back for me,” he advised, his tone lighthearted yet firm.

Shirley and Nina’s excitement was palpable as they prepared to depart, while Lucretia’s voice, still emanating from the mirror, offered a final reminder. “Remember to bring your own tableware! I haven’t prepared enough for everyone… Shirley, please, put that basin back!” she called out, her voice a blend of amusement and wary caution.

Chapter 803: The Perceptive Agatha

Leaving the boundary separating them from the rest of the world and embarking on a journey that seemed to stretch to the very edges of the world, the Vanished and the Bright Star crew members slowly developed a deep, unspoken connection. This bond formed through frequent interactions between the two vessels: crew members regularly visited one another, exchanging both supplies and tales of their lives. Ai frequently acted as the go-between for these groups, facilitating their communication. The relationships that grew out of these meetings and the daily routines that evolved from them seemed to quietly cement themselves as a vital support system for everyone involved, uniting them in their shared humanity.

Cut off from the rest of society and the noise of crowded places, these voyagers found comfort and reassurance in simply talking to and being with each other. In the dense fog that seemed to signify the end of the world, recognizing and acknowledging the existence of their companions became of paramount importance.

In a scene of abrupt departure, Nina, Shirley, and several others quickly exited the dining room, each person holding tightly to their eating utensils and dishes. Shirley was especially careful to take her unusually large rice bowl with her, leaving behind a scene of calm. Duncan stayed behind, sitting at the table with a smile of resignation on his face as he looked over the remains of their meal: burnt food and a pot of thick soup that continued to bubble away.

After a short pause, he shook his head slightly and spoke to himself in a low voice, “I wonder how Morris ever managed to survive his younger days of adventure… Maybe he had a stomach made of iron?”

Right on cue, Agatha’s face appeared in the reflection of a shiny soup spoon lying on the edge of the table. She started recounting a tale, “I’ve heard stories about Morris. He would spend one-third of his time eating hardtack, another third foraging for whatever he could find, and the last third he’d transform into his mechanical form, consuming machine oil and even gnawing on molten ore, leaving his well-being in the hands of fate…”

Duncan couldn’t help but smile at this, responding, “That certainly sounds like something Morris would do.”

Agatha gave a nonchalant shrug, her eyes moving from the spoon to a dining knife nearby. “I can believe most of his wild stories, but there was this one time he claimed to have been stuck in a deep fissure for weeks. He came out saying that the taste of a death crow wasn’t as bad as one might think. I find that hard to swallow.”

Before Agatha could even finish, Duncan’s face showed his skepticism. “Eating a shadow demon? Is there even anything on those to eat?”

Agatha simply shrugged again, her hand drifting from the spoon to the knife. “Who knows? Morris only shared that story after a few drinks. You know how it is when the elderly reminisce about their adventures with a bit too much to drink—the details tend to become a bit blurred.”

Duncan’s lips twitched slightly, an understated signal of his decision to move on from their previous conversation. He lifted his gaze to a porthole nearby. Through its open window, he saw nothing but a vast, uninterrupted expanse of grey-white that stretched into infinity, making it appear as though the entire world had merged into this endless shade.

Breaking the ensuing silence, Agatha's voice, captivating as ever, came from his side. Her image, though slightly distorted, was reflected in the flickering light on the surface of a nearby lantern, adding a surreal quality to her presence.

"What are you thinking about?" she asked, her tone inviting a deeper conversation.

Duncan took a moment before answering, his voice soft yet filled with an undercurrent of emotion, "It's been a long while since we left. Do you ever find yourself missing Frost?"

Agatha responded immediately, her voice carrying a mix of nostalgia and earnestness, "Yes, I miss it. I won't hide my feelings from you. The memories and emotions that have built up over the years still press heavily on me, even if they now feel like distant echoes. Sometimes, I'll snap out of a daydream and think I'm back in that cathedral for a brief moment, waiting to meet with Bishop Ivan."

She paused, letting out a soft sigh, then locked eyes with Duncan.

"But you have other intentions for our journey, don't you?"

Surprise flickered across Duncan's face as he watched Agatha's reflection shimmer in the lantern's glow. "…Why would you say that?"

Agatha's voice was calm, almost reflective as she explained, "I can feel it. You're driven by a purpose, embarking on a path that skirts the edges of this world. The Vanished leaves a trail wherever it goes… a trail marked by your decisions. I might not understand it completely, but through our travels, I've started to notice something significant. From the storm goddess's domain to the wisdom god's territory, and now this voyage… it's as if you're drawing a circle around the globe, and within this pattern, I sense… an impending finale."

“You’re on the verge of something monumental. This circumnavigation at the world’s end is just the beginning. Once you finish whatever preparations you’re making at the border, that’s when the real expedition starts. And I have this feeling… you’re not planning for us to be with you till the very end.”

Duncan remained silent, his eyes steadfastly meeting Agatha’s.

“Being a gatekeeper has granted me a vision beyond the ordinary, especially now, as a reflection. It’s like having a glimpse into fate itself,” Agatha shared with a soft, reassuring smile, then gently shook her head. “Lately, my sleep has been disturbed by nightmares. I dream of this ship navigating through an endless emptiness, abandoned and forlorn, with you alone at the helm. I’ve called out, inquiring about everyone else, but my voice doesn’t reach you. In those moments, I get a haunting feeling… that in your forthcoming voyage, there might not be a place for us.”

Agatha took a brief moment before continuing, her words imbued with a resolute certainty. “Your sudden question about my longing for Frost only solidifies my belief in what you’re planning.”

Duncan listened quietly, deeply absorbed in thought. After a significant pause, he finally spoke, breaking the thoughtful silence that had settled between them. “You’re correct in your assessment. The Vanished is on a voyage to encircle the world, and after this journey concludes… I am faced with the task of initiating a reset of this ‘world.’ But before this can happen, it will be necessary for all of you to leave.”

Agatha’s eyes remained fixed on Duncan, her expression expectant, waiting for him to elaborate.

“This departure isn’t about sending you away,” Duncan clarified thoughtfully. “You have always been part of my crew, integral to every step of our journey. It's just that, as I approach this critical stage, your roles will evolve."

"And what exactly is your plan?" Agatha asked gently, curiosity lacing her voice.

Duncan took a moment, his voice steady as he replied, "…My plan involves dismantling this world. During this pivotal phase, you will act as my 'anchors,' serving as my eyes and ears. There will come a time when I might not be able to monitor everything directly…"

Agatha listened intently, her silence extending even after Duncan finished explaining his vision. She then spoke, her voice laced with a hint of uncertainty. "It now makes sense why you chose to bring the Bright Star along instead of having Miss Lucretia directly join us on the Vanished…"

"The Bright Star is essential for the return journey," Duncan elaborated. "Lucy is sharp; she likely sensed what I was planning."

"She might have guessed, but you'll need to share the complete picture with everyone eventually," Agatha responded with earnest seriousness, her eyes meeting Duncan's. "You know you can count on us."

"I do trust you. It's just that finalizing this plan took a considerable amount of time," Duncan confessed, looking directly into Agatha's eyes. "It wasn't until we left the realm of Gomona that I fully understood the structure of this world and realized that a 'shutdown' sequence was necessary to resolve the lingering aftermath of the Great Annihilation. Initially, the inclusion of the Bright Star was a precautionary measure."

Hearing this, Agatha exhaled softly and allowed herself a smile. "With this knowledge, I feel much more at ease."

She then gracefully moved down from the lantern, her silhouette passing through the light and casting reflections over the dinnerware until she came to rest beside Duncan’s glass of water.

“With such a detailed plan in place, we can move forward with confidence,” she affirmed. “Following the captain’s orders is always better than facing uncertainty without direction.”

Duncan’s smile widened as he looked towards Agatha’s reflection, which shimmered in the water glass. He gently tapped the glass, causing the image of the enigmatic gatekeeper within to briefly distort.

“Good, because I’ve got an order now,” he announced confidently.

Agatha’s image smoothly transitioned onto a nearby piece of fine china. “I’m ready for your command,” she said, her voice clear and eager.

“Get Sailor and have him clean up this mess,” Duncan directed, standing up from his chair. “That one crew member has been milling about aimlessly since he’s been relieved from his duties at the wheel, acting as though he’s got a lifetime exemption from work aboard the Vanished as if he’s above contributing.”

A note of playful understanding was evident in Agatha’s reply. “Understood, Captain!”

Duncan nodded in acknowledgment and then made his way out of the dining room.

He was planning to retreat to the solitude of his captain’s quarters to rest before they reached the next crucial point on their journey. Along the way, he intended to make a detour to inspect the condition of Alice, who had been assigned to the ship’s helm. Though now reduced to a mere “empty shell” tethered to the wheel, with her more complex duties reduced to basic navigational instincts as “Navigator Three,” Duncan felt uneasy about leaving her unattended for too long.

With these thoughts preoccupying him, Duncan walked at a leisurely pace towards the rear of the ship. Yet, as he neared the stairs leading to the helm, he came to a sudden stop.

Thump, thump, thump.

The unexpected sound of knocking on glass rang out, startling him.

For a moment, Duncan instinctively looked around for the source of the noise, but he quickly realized there were no windows in his immediate vicinity. Nonetheless, the knocking continued as if resonating directly with his mind.

With a puzzled frown, Duncan connected the dots.

The source of the knocking was coming from his own “perception”!

He sharply looked up, catching sight of the “Door of the Lost” standing ominously a short distance away…

Chapter 804: Raw Material

Zhou Ming briskly entered his apartment, casting his gaze immediately towards the window that faced him as he walked through the door. Outside, a persistent grey-white fog clung to the world, giving it an air of timeless, unresolved mystery. Accompanying this visual stillness was a sound akin to the patient tapping of raindrops, rhythmically knocking on the windowpane from an unseen source. Though no one was visible beyond the glass, the persistent knocking was undeniable evidence of a visitor's presence.

As he stepped further into his apartment, Zhou Ming felt an unmistakable awareness of the person waiting at the window. This sensation was unusually vivid, likely intensified by a previous encounter that had forged some kind of metaphysical connection between them.

A thought crossed his mind, pondering if the act of receiving a visitor here somehow enabled one to sense their presence from "the other side," before they were fully visible.

Driven by this curiosity, Zhou Ming approached the window. As he neared, the figure of Ray Nora materialized outside the glass, her backdrop as ever was the opulent and timeless bedroom she was known for. Standing there, the Frost Queen continued her patient knock, her eyes—somewhat empty yet reflecting the sparkle of stars—fixed on the window. Without hesitation, Zhou Ming welcomed his ethereal visitor, expressing his gladness at her return.

"Please let me in…" Ray Nora's voice broke the brief silence, her gaze taking a moment longer than usual to focus on Zhou Ming, her tone betraying a hint of weakness.

Zhou Ming immediately picked up on Ray Nora's distress, stepping aside to allow her entry and extending his hand to assist the Frost Queen with evident concern.

It was then, as Ray Nora shifted to move through the window, that Zhou Ming noticed the startling absence of her left arm. But it wasn't just the arm that was missing; part of her shoulder, chest, and abdomen had also disappeared as if cleanly consumed by an unseen force. Remarkably, there was no blood, only a mysterious "light membrane" that seemed to seal the jagged edges of her wound, giving off the illusion of slowly creeping further across her body, threatening to consume more of her.

As Ray Nora made her way into the apartment, Zhou Ming quickly overcame his initial shock, supporting her carefully as he noted her alarmingly low body temperature, which felt almost ghostly.

"We haven't seen each other in some time," Ray Nora managed to smile, acknowledging Zhou Ming as a comforting presence, "Returning to your 'palace' after such an intense journey feels incredibly soothing…"

"Let's not focus on that now," Zhou Ming interjected with urgency, guiding her towards the sofa. As he did, he couldn't help but inquire, "What happened to your arm?"

"Don't be concerned for me, my arm hasn't truly vanished," Ray Nora explained, settling onto the sofa with visible exhaustion. She then placed her right hand near her left shoulder, hovering it over the space where her arm would be. "I'm clutching something invisible, which causes parts of my body to 'disappear.' But I can't release it; if I do, it will vanish into thin air. I've attempted to let go several times, to no avail, so I've kept a firm grip on it… It appears I've held on for far too long."

“Holding onto something?” Zhou Ming echoed, visibly puzzled as his gaze shifted to where her left arm should have been. “What is it that you’re holding?”

“I’ll attempt to hand it over to you now,” said Ray Nora, taking a moment to gather her strength. She straightened up, miming the motion of handing something over with her right hand, “I’m not certain of the outcome once it’s in your possession. It might still vanish, or it might transform into something tangible. I truly don’t know…”

Her clarity seemed to wane under the influence of this mysterious entity, yet she persistently tried to transfer it. Zhou Ming, unable to see anything, extended his hand instinctively—he felt the cool touch of Ray Nora’s fingers, followed by something cold, soft, and formless settling into his palm.

Ray Nora had successfully transferred an invisible entity, a tangible yet unseen object.

Almost immediately, Zhou Ming observed Ray Nora’s form beginning to restore itself—her shoulder, chest, and eventually her entire arm re-materialized before his eyes.

And yet, he could still feel the cold, nebulous presence in his hand.

“…It’s still present,” Zhou Ming remarked, looking down at his palm in astonishment, “What in the world could this be…”

His voice trailed off, his eyes widening with shock as he watched something that had been invisible in his palm slowly materialize. Initially, it appeared as a nearly transparent shadow, which gradually solidified into a mass of dust-like grey substance with indistinct edges.

The grey substance remained quiet in Zhou Ming’s hand, seemingly alive with internal, incomprehensible motions. Its core undulated and pulsed unsettlingly, with vague shapes forming within it, while its periphery was shrouded in a mist that seemed to swirl, inducing a sense of vertigo in the onlooker.

“…What exactly is this?” Zhou Ming couldn’t contain his bewilderment, quickly looking back up at the Frost Queen, “Where did you come across this? Is it from the ‘beyond the borders’ you mentioned before?”

As the mysterious object left her possession, Ray Nora’s physical and spiritual vitality notably improved. Her complexion brightened considerably.

“At the furthest reaches of the fog, beyond the ‘boundary’ I mentioned previously, these entities are found in abundance… The entire ‘realm’ there is composed of them,” Ray Nora explained, her voice reflecting a mix of wonder and bewilderment. “After our last discussion, I began to not only perceive them but also see them. Yet, deciphering their true nature remains beyond my grasp. The most astonishing discovery, however, is that these substances can be transported back here. I brought a small sample with the hope you might shed some light on its essence.”

Zhou Ming’s expression grew increasingly pensive, his brow furrowing as he digested the revelation that the substance indeed originated from beyond the known confines of their world. This realization seemed to trigger a cascade of thoughts and hypotheses in his mind, intertwining with a peculiar sensation…

He felt a subtle shift within his very core.

His transformation, it seemed, had unexpectedly accelerated.

The cosmos around them resonated with a low, reverberating hum, filled with voices speaking in tongues too arcane for comprehension. Ray Nora cast a wary glance around, then deliberately focused her mind, tuning out the celestial whispers that filled the space.

She had witnessed these phenomena before and maintained her composure, unlike her initial reaction.

To her, the noise was perhaps a natural consequence of thinking on a cosmic scale.

After a moment, Zhou Ming let out a sigh, as if he had arrived at a hypothesis regarding the nature of what Ray Nora had brought back. The only step remaining was to confirm his suspicions.

He lifted his hand, within which a soft green light flickered. He focused, attempting to manipulate the flame based on the sensations he experienced during his transformation. Under his intent gaze, the green of the flame slowly dimmed, replaced by the appearance of faint stellar patterns within its dance.

Ray Nora watched, her eyes wide with a blend of shock and curiosity.

“Do you… have any idea what this is?” she inquired, her curiosity piqued.

The figure, seemingly woven from the fabric of the night sky itself, turned towards her, its voice resonating with a warmth and a hint of joy:

“It’s raw material.”

“Raw material?” Ray Nora echoed, her astonishment palpable. She was clearly struggling to grasp the concept. “What kind of raw material?”

“The foundational substance of a promising universe, the elemental units of data—as I had guessed!” Zhou Ming declared, locking eyes with Ray Nora. He slowly opened his hand, revealing the cluster of grey-white substance that had now completely merged into the starlight, assimilated into his being. He had come to a profound understanding of the nature of this material, “Data is eternal, undergoing endless transformation. The hypothesis of Navigator Two is true; data forms the bedrock of existence—everything is a manifestation of information, including the phenomenon of the Great Annihilation itself!”

Ray Nora listened, her expression one of puzzled fascination, while Zhou Ming, unable to contain a surge of excitement and enlightenment, began to pace beside the sofa. His mind raced with thoughts, occasionally pausing to distill his burgeoning insights.

Zhou Ming elucidated his theory with growing enthusiasm, addressing Ray Nora with a clarity meant to bridge the complex gap between their understandings. “Consider the universe and everything within it as if it were an immense computational entity, a ‘mathematical machine’ of sorts, operating on an unimaginable scale. This machine processes and manifests all the variables of existence, functioning in a self-sufficient and consistent manner. Every entity, every phenomenon we witness in our reality, is essentially data being processed by this universal system. The occurrences we experience, the very fabric of our reality, are outcomes—’solutions’ produced by the calculations of this cosmic machine…”

Ray Nora found Zhou Ming’s rapid discourse challenging to grasp fully. With a mix of curiosity and confusion, she interjected, “Are you suggesting that our reality is not genuine?”

Zhou Ming was quick to clarify, his hand gesturing dismissively at the notion of illusion. “No, our existence is very much authentic because we are integral to this mathematical construct. We, and everything around us, are manifestations of countless information units,” he elaborated, intent on making his point clear. “If the essence of all existence is information, then ‘reality’ as we know it is solely a network of information. This insight sheds light on the nature of the Great Annihilation… However, explaining this fully would take us considerable time, time I believe you could use to figure out on your own. The crucial concept here is that information never disappears; its ‘fundamental units’ merely undergo a state change…”

Pausing momentarily, Zhou Ming’s thought process visibly deepened, then with a determined gesture, he emphasized his next point.

“The ‘mathematical machine’ that underpins existence has always been operational, endlessly computing all possible ‘solutions’. Its constituent ‘parameters’ neither cease nor vanish; they merely undergo transformation —into states beyond our current capacity to perceive or interpret. Within the framework of this machine, these transitions remain part of the ongoing ‘calculations’. Yet, for us, beings who rely on deciphering these computations to comprehend our universe, this transformative phase… is what we see as the Great Annihilation.”

Chapter 805: About the Ashes

In a being where stars themselves seemed to roar with a sound so powerful it threatened to unravel the very fabric of existence, Ray Nora found herself immersed in a celestial revelation. Bathed in the dazzling light of countless stars, her soul felt illuminated, her mind appearing to dissolve under the weight of profound truths unveiled before her.

She felt an inexplicable unity with these truths, understanding the teachings of the thousand stars. Knowledge previously beyond her grasp now lay within her understanding, revealing the intricate logic that governed the cosmos. At the fringes of her vision, a mesmerizing pale purple starlight danced, its stunning beauty rendering her breathless.

Lifting her gaze to the heavens, where billions of starry eyes twinkled back at her, she whispered, half to herself, “I understand now… those are the remnants, the cooled embers left from when worlds collided… But the ashes aren’t extinguished; they merely await a new purpose, a reconfiguration…”

Her words sounded foreign, even to her, sparking a flicker of doubt. Yet, that doubt quickly dissipated as the meaning of her own words crystallized within her. The starlight in front of her seemed to flicker in agreement, acknowledging her realization.

Observing Ray Nora, Zhou Ming was taken aback by her precise understanding, especially since he didn’t expect the Frost Queen to grasp his concepts so deeply. His curiosity about her realization was overshadowed by the urgency of focusing on the “ashes” beyond the boundaries that Ray Nora had identified.

He reflected on the theory posited by Navigator Two, that the universe could be viewed as a colossal “mathematical machine,” a repository and processor of all data and operational logic. The catastrophic event known as the Great Annihilation could then be interpreted as the result of forcing together several incompatible “systems,” leading to conflicts and critical errors.

This collision of cosmic systems disrupted the orderly flow of “information” within their domains, rendering what was once coherent and accessible data into chaos. The mathematical frameworks of these universes were compromised, losing their ability to function stably.

The protective measures erected by ancient gods resembled a makeshift sandbox environment, a last-ditch effort to maintain some semblance of order amid the chaos. This sandbox managed to preserve a fraction of the “information mapping,” yet, in essence, it too was engulfed in the systemic collapse.

Information, however, does not simply vanish, especially not in the face of cataclysms like the Great Annihilation. From the perspective of the “mathematical machine” model, the “information units” that make up the cosmos hadn’t disappeared; they had merely lost their linkage to the “world laws” or the operational framework of the universe, similar to…

Zhou Ming halted abruptly, his gaze drifting contemplatively towards the far corner of the room, where a lone computer sat humming quietly, its cursor blinking as though imbued with life. Under his watchful eye, the cursor began to move of its own accord, revealing a message on the screen:

“Data corrupted, format incomplete – World.”

For a brief moment, Zhou Ming blinked, and the message on the screen vanished as if it had been a mere figment of his imagination. Yet, the message resonated deeply with him, confirming his suspicions.

He exhaled softly, a whirlwind of thoughts swirling in his mind. As he began to sort through these thoughts, achieving a momentary clarity, a sense of unease crept back in.

Zhou Ming pondered the nature of the information — its apparent indestructibility within the confines of a “world” seemed logical, but what about beyond? In the vast emptiness, where the civilization of his creators had once caught fleeting glimpses of the boundless “void,” what universal laws might govern such a place?

The more he thought about it, the more he realized the futility of trying to comprehend what lay beyond his world with a mind that had never ventured past its borders. His brows furrowed in frustration, yet amidst this contemplation, he recalled his recent discussions with Navigator Two.

He remembered the AI’s fear and paranoia, its concerns and visions of transcending the very fabric of their world — leaving a “possibility” for future civilizations to explore.

Gradually, as his mind settled, a smile crept across Zhou Ming’s face. The mysteries that eluded him now would, he believed, one day be unraveled by someone in the future.

Observing the ancient being before her, Ray Nora sensed his turbulent thought process come to rest. Gathering her courage, she timidly inquired, “Do you have any plans next?”

Zhou Ming paused, lifting his hand to gaze silently at his palm.

There, the Bright Star began to dance, its light spreading across his skin, briefly bringing forth “ashes” that morphed into various forms before dissipating like mirages.

He mused aloud, “The fundamental ‘material’ issue has been resolved, yet the nature of these materials isn’t quite as anticipated. These ‘cooled ashes’ have lost all connection to the world’s foundational system; they’ve ceased their evolution, setting them apart from the Four Gods and the Boundless Sea… A gentle ‘recompilation’ won’t suffice to reshape them. As you’ve seen, the moment my influence wanes, they simply fade away. These ‘cooled embers’ are devoid of the self-sustainability needed for permanence…”

“Perhaps the solution lies in reaching a ‘critical point’? We need to fundamentally restructure these ‘materials’ by redefining their relationships and providing them with an initial burst of momentum…”

Zhou Ming shared his thoughts aloud, seemingly indifferent to whether Ray Nora, known as “the Frost Queen,” could grasp the complexity of his ideas. Given her past reactions, which suggested a deep understanding of many topics, he treated her as someone with a keen intuitive grasp.

Ray Nora, who had become accustomed to the depth and intricacy of their conversations, effortlessly navigated the complexity of the discussion, grasping the concept he presented.

Her response came with a mix of surprise and concern, “Do you mean to ignite the entire Boundless Sea?” Her eyes widened at the thought, revealing her misinterpretation of his statement.

“No, no, no,” Zhou Ming hastened to clarify, with a dismissive wave of his hand. “The ‘critical point’ I’m referring to isn’t about causing a literal explosion of something specific. It’s more about a metaphorical ‘information explosion,’” he explained, attempting to correct her misunderstanding while pondering, “Though, it may indeed result in a significant release of energy, it’s not about destroying the Boundless Sea…”

He left unsaid the fact that the Boundless Sea might nevertheless be irretrievably altered or even disappear as a result of this process.

Ray Nora, still intrigued but choosing not to delve further into the fate of the Boundless Sea, shifted the conversation after a moment's thought, "Do you have an idea where this 'critical point' might be?"

Zhou Ming, stroking his chin thoughtfully, replied with careful consideration, "I have some preliminary thoughts," before quickly steering the topic away, "But there's no need for concern over this at the moment. My current priority is on those 'ashes' beyond the boundary."

This response brought a solemn expression to Ray Nora's face.

"The Vanished is navigating towards the world's end," Zhou Ming mused, hinting at a significant upcoming venture. "After this journey concludes, I must personally explore what lies beyond the boundary—to see those 'ashes' you mentioned with my own eyes."

Ray Nora, ready to assist, promptly asked, "Is there something I can do to help?"

"My physical presence is bound here… at least for now," Zhou Ming responded earnestly, "So, when the time comes, I'll need you to lead the Vanished to that specific area of ashes."

Confused, Ray Nora questioned, "What exactly should I do?"

"In practical terms, your direct involvement isn't necessary—it's actually your 'little house' that will play a crucial role," Zhou Ming explained, gesturing towards the window, "Position your 'little house' at the fog's edge, and Alice should manage to locate it."

"My house?" Ray Nora echoed, momentarily puzzled before realization dawned, "Oh, you're referring to its connection with 'Alice's Mansion'?"

With a slight nod, Zhou Ming confirmed her understanding.

The “room” that Ray Nora acquired from Alice’s Mansion is fundamentally the escape pod from the spaceship known as New Hope. Given its nature as an escape pod, it’s designed with features akin to emergency positioning and distress signaling capabilities. Zhou Ming had come across information deep within Alice’s Mansion indicating an “unauthorized ejection of the escape pod.” Logically, as the originating vessel, Alice’s Mansion—or more accurately, New Hope—should possess the technology to re-establish the location of this escape pod.

Suppose the mother ship can determine the pod’s location. In that case, Alice (who is Navigator Three, piloting the Vanished) should be capable of pinpointing Ray Nora’s precise position at the edge of their known universe.

Zhou Ming considers this strategy the most viable approach to navigate to the “lands beyond.” In a realm where conventional order disintegrates and the very fabric of space-time is in flux, specific methods of positioning and navigation are crucial. This is true even for the Vanished, a vessel tasked with traversing such chaotic boundaries.

However, Zhou Ming also contemplates potential complications—such as damage to the escape pod’s positioning system, Alice’s Mansion’s inability to locate it, or the unique conditions at the universe’s border distorting or obstructing the connection between the pod and the mother ship. Thus, before Ray Nora sets off, it’s essential to prepare alternative solutions.

Under Ray Nora’s inquisitive watch, Zhou Ming extended his hand, revealing a softly glowing pale green flame, enveloped in a celestial light, gently flickering in his palm.

“Accept this; it’s a far mightier flame than the one I’ve given you before,” he offered. “Should Alice fail to locate the ‘little house,’ I intend to use this flame as a means to forge a path. Yet, consider this a contingency plan. The flame's ability to transmit power has its limits. Ideally, the Vanished should directly navigate to the designated location."

Ray Nora eyed the mesmerizing flame, its luminance steeped in starlight, casting a brilliant glow in the dimly lit chaos around them. The power emanating from the flame instilled a sense of awe and a touch of fear within her—a feeling she hadn't encountered even when braving the depths of the icy seas.

After a moment of hesitation, marked by the gravity of the task ahead, the queen gave a slight nod.

Extending her hand towards the flame, she affirmed, "I'll carry it with me—beyond the boundary, awaiting your arrival and that of the Vanished."

Chapter 806: Far from Home

Ray Nora departed, taking with her the symbolic flame that had been entrusted to her by Zhou Ming. She, the queen of travel, along with her unique drifting home, vanished into the boundless, murky fog visible from the window. It was a considerable time after her departure that Zhou Ming, still standing by the window, took a deep breath, detached himself from the view outside, and looked away.

Zhou Ming had always harbored a deep curiosity about the “Frost Queen” and her enigmatic ability to navigate through the thick, seemingly impenetrable fog that enveloped the world. He was particularly fascinated by the concept of the drifting house, which was essentially the escape pod from the New Hope, journeying through what was considered the edge of the world. Despite knowing its origin, he struggled to comprehend the nature of its power and how it managed to traverse the fog-laden unknown. Ray Nora, however, seemed incapable of providing a detailed explanation for this phenomenon.

When pressed by Zhou Ming about how she managed to “travel” with such ease, Ray Nora’s responses were vague, attributing it to a sort of “instinct.” She described herself and the drifting house as a unified entity, navigating the fog as if she were merely walking through it, unaffected by the spatial-temporal anomalies or the energy requirements that one might expect to consider in such a scenario.

Zhou Ming found her explanation almost mystical, concluding that the escape pod must have retained its complete automatic navigation system.

This system, transformed by the catastrophic events known as the Great Annihilation, could have evolved into what he termed a “supernatural characteristic” – akin to a “navigation instinct” that became apparent when Alice assumed control.

Regardless, the intricacies of how the “Vanished” was propelled through the fog at the world’s edge remained a mystery, yet this did not hinder its journey across the unknown…

Shifting his focus, Zhou Ming sighed lightly, clearing his mind of these ponderings, and approached his desk.

His desk was home to an LCD monitor, softly glowing, and a computer tower that hummed quietly, both appearing as conventional technological devices but functioning as usual, as if awaiting his command.

However, Zhou Ming did not engage with the keyboard or mouse before him. Instead, he sat quietly, his gaze fixed on the blinking cursor in the search box on the screen, reminiscent of a man confronting a reflection of his past self in a mirror.

After a moment of silence, he murmured, acknowledging the interconnectedness of his surroundings and himself, “You are part of this place, as is this desk. The floor, the roof, everything here is… and so am I. We all are, aren’t we?”

The cursor continued its steady blink, offering no response to Zhou Ming’s contemplation. Gradually, the light from the LCD screen began to fade, dimming to darkness until the screen resembled an empty mirror.

In this darkened mirror, Zhou Ming found himself staring back at his own reflection, a silent witness to his introspection.

At the periphery of his vision, Zhou Ming began to notice something extraordinary. On the surfaces of the seemingly mundane objects around him—his desk, the walls, the ceiling, even the corner shelves and the modest wardrobe that had been fixtures of his home for countless years—a soft, pale purple starlight started to emerge and swell. This was not just any ordinary phenomenon; it was a signal, an almost uncontrollable transformation nearing its critical threshold.

Then, an unexpected itch on his arm drew Zhou Ming's attention downward, where he found the "World Tree" Atlantis, a tiny sapling, floating beside him. The small tree, with its branches tenderly brushing against his skin, seemed to convey a sense of unease.

Taking a brief moment to collect his thoughts, Zhou Ming gently lifted Atlantis, placing it on the desk with a delicate touch.

"Don't be afraid, little sapling, it's not time yet," he whispered soothingly to the top of Atlantis, his voice imbued with a calm reassurance. A faint smile graced his lips as he continued, "I will make sure everything is arranged perfectly. You'll be planted in fertile, stable ground where the sun shines bright and the wind caresses softly… Everyone will find their place there, Saslokha included…"

Now resting quietly on the desk, Atlantis seemed to respond with a soft rustling, as if it was whispering back, echoing Zhou Ming's promise with the sound of winds from distant memories sweeping through the World Tree's foliage.

Gradually, the encroaching starlight that had begun to infiltrate his room receded, and everything within his sight returned to its usual state.

"It's not time yet…" murmured the "Singularity" within the confines of the apartment, a hint of anticipation in its tone. "The day has yet to arrive…"

…

In another scene, Goathead suddenly raised its head, its deep, obsidian-like black eyes fixating on the figure who had just entered. For a fleeting moment, it seemed as if the entire cabin was bathed in diffused starlight, with a towering figure stepping through the Door of the Lost, radiating a power so immense it appeared capable of subduing the Vanished itself.

However, this illusion quickly vanished from Saslokha's sight, replaced by the more familiar scene of the captain entering his cabin, much like any other day.

"Duncan Abnomar," Duncan announced, raising his hand in greeting, cutting off any potential questions. "I've just returned from a 'long journey.'"

"…I almost didn't recognize you there for a moment," Goathead admitted, its tension easing as it began to ramble. "You've seemed quite… ominous after your recent outings. Sometimes, when you walk in, I'm not entirely sure what to expect… Ah, excuse my rambling. Don't take offense to my bluntness; the sight earlier had me a bit on edge. Are you alright? Do you need to rest? They haven't returned yet, but I expect them soon. Shirley's hunger should be well satiated by now, and we might be nearing our destination. Alice is still steering us…"

Goathead's rapid-fire chatter hit Duncan like a deluge just as he stepped back through the door, his heart tangled with complex emotions from his journey. Duncan, barely able to process the onslaught, could only respond with an instinctive and sharp retort: "Quiet!"

The first mate promptly snapped to silence, the abrupt "clack" marking the end of his outburst. After a brief pause, Goathead's demeanor softened, and with a sigh accompanied by a gentle smile, he offered a more subdued greeting: "…Welcome back, as long as you're alright."

Duncan let out a weary sigh as he moved toward the chart table, but not without giving Goathead a serious look and a nod of acknowledgment. “What could happen to me,” he said, his voice carrying a mixture of reassurance and introspection, “Don’t worry.”

His attention then shifted to the navigation chart, shrouded in a mist that seemed to erase all familiar landmarks. Beyond the world’s border, the chart’s once detailed depiction of the Boundless Sea’s routes and markers had been swallowed by an endless expanse of grey-white fog, with only the pale green lines indicating the Vanished’s own path faintly visible.

That ghostly trace on the chart showed they had traversed roughly half the distance to the world’s end, nearing what was labeled as the third node—this was the extent of guidance the chart could offer now.

Duncan found himself pondering whether the real Duncan Abnomar, the original captain who had dared to challenge the world’s border a century ago, had navigated with such a vague chart—or had he ventured forth without any chart at all?

Caught in these fleeting thoughts, Duncan’s attention was drawn by the cheerful sounds drifting in from the deck.

His crew had returned, their spirits high from their latest escapade aboard the Bright Star.

A surge of unnamed emotion rose within him, bringing a smile to his face. Duncan pushed away from the chart table and made his way to the door, stepping out to greet his returning crew.

Nina and Shirley, caught up in their playful antics on the deck, paused and turned at the sound of his approach. Nina’s face brightened with a beaming smile as she waved enthusiastically: “Uncle Duncan!”

Morris, momentarily pausing his pipe-smoking, removed the pipe from his lips and offered Duncan a respectful bow. Vanna greeted him with a warm smile and a nod. Shirley, perched atop Dog, laughed and flaunted a bit too proudly, “I ate a bit too much…” her gesture exaggerated yet endearing.

Nina, bubbling with laughter, approached Duncan carrying a lunchbox. “This is sweet pancakes and carrot stewed meat made by Luni. I’ll put it on the table for you, don’t forget to eat~” With these cheerful words, she briskly made her way past Duncan and into the captain’s cabin.

Duncan’s face remained lit with a gentle smile as he observed the vibrant scenes unfolding around him. His crew was alive with energy, engaging in conversation, laughter, playful jests, and occasional boasts. He watched sailors emerge from below deck, grumbling to Morris about the challenge of scrubbing “unidentifiable viscous substances” from the pots in the kitchen. Suddenly, Agatha materialized in the air, causing Shirley to make a run for it. However, her escape was short-lived as Dog, ever vigilant, gently tugged her back with the leash.

From a distance, Duncan silently observed these moments, as if attempting to etch each vibrant image and personality into his memory forever.

For him, this was undeniably the best day he had spent aboard this ship.

Then, his attention was drawn by a deep, resonant rumbling from above and a subtle tremor beneath his feet, signaling a shift. Outside, against the monotonous grey-white expanse that surrounded the Vanished, vibrant streaks of color abruptly sliced through the fog, heralding the end of their jump through the channel.

As the ghostly silhouette of the New Hope began to dissolve above them, the entrance to the jump channel started to disintegrate, unveiling a tapestry of grey, black, and dark red hues within the dense fog ahead. This visual tumult was accompanied by the unmistakable sound of ships slicing through water – they had reached their destination.

“…Jump stop…”

This announcement, somewhat garbled and distant, floated to everyone’s ears, prompting a unified rush to the ship’s side to witness the new scene. Duncan’s gaze, however, was momentarily drawn away towards the stern deck. In the next instant, Alice’s head appeared, peeking over the railing of the driving platform, her face breaking into a joyful wave: “Captain! We’ve arrived! It’s the festival of fire…”

In an expected twist, her head detached, tumbling down and coming to a rest at Duncan’s feet after a few bounces.

Alice, looking slightly puzzled, glanced up at Duncan.

He let out a resigned sigh: “Sometimes, I wonder if you do it on purpose.”

After a moment of reflection, Alice responded: “Save, save, save…”

Chapter 807: The Island of Ashes

The colossal silhouettes of the Vanished and the Bright Star cut through the thick fog at the world's end, sailing into a calm sea that was materialized into existence, with their destination clearly visible ahead – it was right in front, a desolate land floating on the ocean, covered in ashes.

Apart from that particularly desolate piece of land, no other significant objects could be seen across the sea, only clusters of floating ash drifting atop the mirror-like water surface, casting shadows under the chaotic daylight, resembling… fallen clouds.

The immense silhouettes of the two ships emerged from the dense fog at the edge of the world, gliding into a sea that seemed to spring into existence just for them. Ahead lay their destination, a solitary, ash-covered landmass adrift in the ocean, stark and devoid of life.

Beyond this bleak island, the sea stretched empty and unmarked, save for the occasional clusters of floating ash that skittered across the still surface of the water, casting eerie shadows in the unpredictable light. These shadows, under the tumultuous sky, took on the semblance of clouds that had plummeted from the heavens.

Navigating a path carved by gatherings of ash, the Vanished made its slow approach toward the desolate island. The sea around the hull mirrored the sky above so perfectly that Duncan, for a moment, believed they were sailing through the air itself. The surrounding mist and ash swirled around the vessels, creating an illusion of floating through clouds, with denser patches of ash mimicking islands adrift in a celestial sea. As the Vanished moved, it did not so much as ripple the water but rather gently coaxed the ash and fog to part before reassembling in its wake.

Shirley, leaning against the ship's railing with Dog by her side, was captivated by the seascape unfolding before them. Despite the numerous wonders they had encountered on their travels with the Vanished, she remained profoundly moved by the beauty they found at each new waypoint.

"Dog… I've been feeling lately that not having enough words is quite limiting," Shirley confessed quietly, her voice barely a whisper as though she feared being overheard by the captain, yet she chose not to communicate through their symbiotic mental link, perhaps wishing for someone else to overhear her reflections, "All I can think to say is 'wow,' but this place… it's truly magnificent."

"Do you want two more books?" Dog responded, his head tilting slightly, "Or perhaps you should start by finishing those books you've stashed under your bed?"

Caught off guard by the suggestion, Shirley quickly silenced Dog with a gentle push on his head, whispering, "Shh-"

Duncan, overhearing the exchange between Shirley and Dog, chose not to intervene, his attention wholly absorbed by the island now coming into clearer view. As they drew nearer, the stark details of the island became evident.

It was a flat, lifeless expanse, devoid of vegetation, not particularly large but significant as the final resting place for a "deity." Unlike the grandiose temple dedicated to the Leviathan Queen or the stunning crystalline burial sites of Navigator Two, this island boasted no structures or monuments. Only ashes, dust, and the occasional wisp of smoke marked its surface.

With a mix of emotions hard to articulate, Duncan directed the Vanished to anchor near the island's shore before taking a small boat to land on its ash-covered beach.

The landscape they encountered was a stark monument to the power of fire, with evidence of its retreat leaving behind a world of soft, warm ashes underfoot. Dark red scars streaked through the layer of ash, fading as if withdrawing with each passing moment.

As Duncan and his companions disembarked onto the island's expansive, ash-covered beach, they were met with the novel sensation of ash's soft warmth under their feet, making their way cautiously towards the island's heart.

The island offered no clear paths, just a blanket of fine ash covering everything in sight. The group moved with extra caution, mindful of the hidden obstacles beneath the ash – nobody was keen on stumbling and falling into the unknown qualities of the ash layer.

Shirley began to voice her discomfort only a short distance into their trek. "It feels like ash has filled my shoes… And it's all over my skirt too…" she complained, envisioning a thorough bath upon their return, "This ash finds its way into everything!"

Trailing behind, Lucretia offered her perspective, "This place must have once been consumed by intense flames for such a landscape to remain even after the fire has devoured all." Despite the ash-covered surroundings, Lucretia walked with an effortless grace, a beautiful sun umbrella in her hand creating a gentle breeze around her, repelling the ash. She gazed into the distance, noting, "There are still some smoke columns over there; not all flames have died, but for the rest of the island, those are merely the last embers."

Observing Lucretia’s unfazed poise, Nina couldn’t hide her admiration, “Magic is so convenient…”

“Envious? It’s the reward of countless nights spent over a century,” Lucretia responded with a smile, then glanced at Duncan, offering, “Do you need one? I have an extra umbrella – it’s quite effective at keeping you clean and making breathing easier.”

Duncan looked at the ash clinging to him and then at Lucretia’s almost magical purple sun umbrella, his skepticism clear. “No need,” he declined.

“I could change it to black,” Lucretia suggested earnestly, “And if you like, I could even add a skull motif to the handle.”

Before Duncan could respond, Shirley briefly entertained the thought of the captain with a dark, gothic-style umbrella, a mental image so incongruous it took her by surprise.

Duncan faced Lucretia with a determined expression, and then, without a word, flames engulfed his body. He transformed into a spectral figure within the flames, levitating above the ash-covered ground, and declared, “I have my own way.”

Lucretia, watching, allowed a small, secretive smile to play at the corners of her mouth, unseen by her father. Then, struck by sudden inspiration, Shirley excitedly slapped her hand, exclaiming, “Oh, right, I think I have my own way too…”

Before Shirley could finish her sentence, a cacophony of crackling sounds erupted from within her, quickly followed by a dense shroud of dark smoke that enveloped her completely. Sinister, jagged shards of bone began to emerge and extend from her frame. Within moments, she had transformed into an imposing, shadowy demonic figure. Then, with the aid of twelve skeletal limbs that extended from her back, she lifted herself above the ground, moving effortlessly over the ash-covered terrain.

“This is much more comfortable, and the view from up here isn’t half bad either,” came Shirley’s voice, now deeper and tinged with a mature huskiness. She casually stirred a mound of ash on the ground with the tip of one elongated limb, her tone reflective, “…I don’t know why, but there’s something about these ashes that unsettles me. It’s not merely their filthiness; there’s an odd, unnerving sensation they produce… it’s quite disagreeable when they adhere to my form.”

Upon hearing Shirley’s contemplative murmurs, Nina, who was walking alongside Duncan, expressed her agreement with a grimace and a tug at Duncan’s sleeve, “I feel exactly the same. There’s something about these ashes that’s just… suffocating. It feels like I’m being smothered, restricted in movement, as though they’re wrapping themselves around me, making it hard to breathe.”

Duncan halted in his tracks at this, his demeanor shifting from amused interest in Shirley’s transformation to concern. “Is everyone feeling this way?” he inquired, turning to gauge the reactions of their companions.

“Not at all,” replied Alice quickly, the mechanical doll examining her own form and articulating her joints. “I’m just noticing the ashes seeping into my joints, causing a bit of irritation. A thorough cleaning is definitely in order after we return.”

“I share Shirley and Nina’s sentiments,” Morris chimed in seriously. “There’s an unsettling essence about this place… It’s unlike the domains of the Storm Goddess or the God of Wisdom. It feels as though something buried within these ashes is ‘stirring,’ exerting an influence on us.”

He paused, seemingly to consider his next words carefully, then added, “However, I don’t detect any overt hostility. It appears more to be a characteristic of the ‘environment’ here than anything else.”

Hearing the varied responses, Duncan’s expression grew concerned. He then called out in another direction, “Vanna, what’s your take on this?”

Silence followed. The endless sea of ashes before them offered no reply, though Duncan was sure Vanna had been there just a moment ago. He could have sworn he saw her silhouette flicker and then disappear as if she had been silently observing until just now.

An unsettling quiet descended upon the group, with Nina staring bewilderedly towards where Vanna had been, the question of Vanna’s identity barely forming in her mind.

However, before she could fully grasp the thought, a sudden burst of flames interrupted her contemplation. A deluge of memories and information rushed back into her awareness as if breaking through a dam of forgetfulness –

Vanna, the youngest inquisitor from Pland… renowned for her formidable prowess and steadfast faith… her striking silver hair… initially reserved upon joining the ship but soon revealed a cheerful, optimistic nature… known for her lighthearted complaints about matrimonial prospects… notably tall…

Nina, her mind a whirlwind of confusion, lifted her gaze as countless fragments of memory swirled and merged within her consciousness, forming fleeting images of Vanna that quickly dissolved into indistinct shapes. She perceived the gentle caress of invisible winds traversing the island, stirring the ash into the air. Amidst this ghostly dance, a tall silhouette seemed to stride toward the island’s heart, moving as if in another realm entirely, its back turned, resembling a wanderer who had relinquished all memories, embarking on an endless voyage.

Snapped out of her reverie by this vision, Nina pointed excitedly towards the fading figure amidst the wind-whipped ashes, exclaiming, “There! Vanna went in that direction! I just saw her moving there!”

Her alert seemed to rouse everyone from their daze, prompting exchanged glances filled with uncertainty. The fleeting images of Vanna and the spectral appearances in the wind momentarily blurred the line between reality and illusion, leaving them all grappling with their perceptions. It was at this moment of collective disorientation that the captain’s steady, commanding voice cut through the confusion, pulling them back from the brink of oblivion –

“Everyone, back to the ship!”

Emerald flames flared to life, carving out a sanctuary amidst the ash-strewn wasteland. Morris observed as a fiery vortex materialized next to Duncan, with the silhouette of Ai floating above this fiery gateway.

“These ashes are the remnants of a forgotten history,” Duncan announced urgently, “Return to the ship now.”

Nina, driven by concern, couldn’t help but ask, “What about you?”

“…I need to retrieve Vanna,” Duncan declared, his gaze fixed on the endless expanse of ashes that seemed to stretch into infinity, “And while I’m out there, I’ll also look for Ta Ruijin.”

Chapter 808: The Invisible City

Vanna had been journeying along this path for an extensive period – so extensive, in fact, that the origins of her voyage had faded from her memory. She couldn't recall when it began or the reasons that propelled her into this seemingly perpetual quest. The starting point of her journey, as well as its purpose, had slipped from her grasp.

Her world was a wasteland. Throughout her travels, she encountered nothing but vast expanses of yellow sand that stretched into the horizon, the crumbling remains of once-great cities on the verge of collapse, and ancient artifacts shrouded in layers of dust. She wandered through these abandoned ruins, her steps retracing the echoes of a forgotten era. Occasionally, she would halt at these sites, though any details she observed would evaporate from her memory by dawn's light; she retained only a vague impression of having passed dilapidated walls.

The wind, a relentless force, carried the sand across the desert, creating a symphony of sharp, eerie sounds as it clashed with the rocks. These sounds, reminiscent of spectral wails, were a constant backdrop to her journey. Amidst this cacophony, Vanna discerned a distinct noise, one that had become a familiar presence on her travels:

"Ding… Ding… Ding…"

It was reminiscent of the sound of metal against stone, akin to the rhythmic beating heard in a blacksmith's workshop.

Upon hearing this, Vanna halted her march on the sandy path, peering into the distance with narrowed eyes. She had come to associate this metallic chorus with the proximity of new ruins or hidden artifacts.

Yet, the origin of these sounds and their connection to the discoveries remained a mystery to her.

Suddenly, against the endless curtain of yellow sand, the vague outline of a structure materialized, similar to other remnants she had stumbled upon during her journey.

Vanna observed this newly revealed cluster of buildings briefly, a sense of familiarity enveloping her despite her initial surprise. After a momentary pause, she resumed her walk, advancing towards the edifice amidst the swirling chaos of wind and sand.

Just then, a young woman’s voice pierced the solitude: “Where did you come from?”

Startled, Vanna scanned her surroundings, but her eyes met only the swirling dance of yellow grains. The source of the voice seemed devoid of any physical presence as if it were a mere figment of her imagination.

Puzzled and with a sense that the sand was clouding her thoughts, she shook her head, determined to press on.

The voice persisted, this time with a hint of curiosity: “Why aren’t you responding to me?”

Accompanying the voice, Vanna thought she could detect the sound of footsteps, mirroring her own yet eerily close.

Halting once more, she fixed her gaze on the empty space beside her. Though the speaker remained invisible, Vanna felt the subtle presence of someone, or something, an “aura” of sorts, near her.

Could it be that an unseen companion was journeying alongside her, attempting to engage in conversation?

This occurrence prompted a cascade of questions in her mind. Was such a phenomenon commonplace in this desolate world? Did an invisible entity truly exist, sharing this vast emptiness with her?

As Vanna's thoughts once again became muddled, a whirlwind of absurd and strange ideas surged through her mind, only to dissipate as swiftly as they had appeared. She paused briefly, wrestling with her confusion, before she cautiously broke the silence, "I don't remember where I came from."

"Forgot where you came from?" The voice of her unseen companion floated through the air again, this time with a hint of cheerfulness, "Ah, that's unfortunate. Forgetting your origins can make it difficult to find your way back… But it's not a rare occurrence here."

"Here? Not rare?" Vanna replied, her voice tinged with surprise, "Are there others like me here?"

"Yes, many," the voice responded, its tone suggesting a smile, "Over there, in that city, it's bustling with people."

Without seeing where the voice pointed, Vanna naturally turned her gaze toward the indistinct outlines of buildings that loomed in the sandstorm, her curiosity piqued: "In that city…"

"Yes, in that city," the voice reiterated enthusiastically, "People have arrived here from every conceivable direction. Some retain a vague memory of their origins, while others have even forgotten their own names. But such details lose their significance on this journey, which spans from one distant place to another. Sometimes you pause briefly, and at other times, you find yourself unable to go any further – and wherever you find yourself stuck, that place becomes your new point of reference… Yeah, my brother once shared that insight with me."

Vanna, still perplexed, took a step towards the shadowy cluster of buildings. Almost instantly, she heard the sound of footsteps accompanying her own, a gentle reminder of the unseen presence trailing behind her.

"Your brother?" Vanna inquired, the oddity of speaking to an invisible being slowly fading, replaced by a sense of normalcy. After all, having a companion to converse with during such a lengthy trek seemed like a rare comfort.

"Yes, my brother. He's six years older than me," the unseen voice replied promptly, its tone still carrying a cheerful lilt. "But it's been many years since I last saw him. He left for Vesseran to pursue his studies, and we've lost contact ever since."

Vesseran? The name echoed in Vanna's mind, stirring a flicker of recognition. Was Vesseran a city, perhaps?

"Do you worry about him?" she found herself asking.

"Not really," came the response from beside her, "Many of us haven't had news from the outside world in a long time, nor have we been able to send any messages out. Being out of touch isn't necessarily a bad thing…"

The voice seemed to drift off, carried away by the wind, which then became distorted as if stretching across a vast distance before being swallowed up by a cacophony of noises. Vanna strained to understand the last few words, but they were lost to her, leaving only silence in their wake.

She stood motionless for a few moments, the absence of the voice leaving a void. Breaking the silence, she called out, "Are you still there?"

But the desert offered no reply, save for its characteristic eerie howls and the intermittent sound of metal clinking, resonating through the air like an unanswered question.

It appeared as though her unseen companion had disappeared, swept away by the desert winds.

After some time had passed, Vanna collected her thoughts and resumed her trek toward the city that lay in the distance.

Her journey was long and arduous, but just as the day began to transition into evening, she reached her destination. The “city” her companion had described was in sight. But contrary to what she might have hoped for, there were no signs of life or the hustle and bustle of city inhabitants. Instead, what greeted her were the ruins of a city long forsaken, its walls and buildings surrendered to the encroaching sands, left to erode in the relentless passage of time.

Upon finding what appeared to be the remnants of a gate amidst the crumbling city walls, Vanna peered through, taking in the desolate view of the city’s ruins before advancing toward the “city.”

Yet, just as she was about to cross the threshold of the “gate,” a firm and commanding voice emerged from nowhere: “Stop, stranger – where do you come from?”

Startled, Vanna paused.

Could it be that an invisible soldier was guarding this derelict gateway?

She had navigated through cultist-infested sewers, faced down creatures that lurked in the shadows, but she had never found herself in such a peculiar situation.

Hesitantly, she turned towards the source of the voice, opting to respond as though this were a normal interaction: “I’m… on a journey, but I can’t recall my point of origin.”

Recalling her invisible travel companion's earlier words about the "city" being populated with many "residents" who had similarly lost their bearings, Vanna hoped her answer wouldn't raise any eyebrows.

The "guard" remained silent for a moment, possibly contemplating her response or maybe disappearing into the whirl of the sandstorm. Vanna waited, a blend of patience and curiosity holding her in place, and just when she was about to proceed regardless, a voice filled with warmth and familiarity spoke from beside her –

"Ah, you've arrived!"

It was the voice of her previous missing "invisible travel companion."

"I was worried you might have gotten lost," the voice expressed cheerfully. "The journey here is fraught with diverging paths, particularly those minor trails through the forest. Should the berry bushes beside the path catch your eye and lead you astray, you might spend an entire day finding your way back…"

Forests? Trails? Berry bushes?

As she listened to the continuing voice, Vanna's gaze swept back over her path – a landscape dominated by sand and stone, devoid of any forest or berry bush. What were these fantastical things doing in their conversation?

And as she stood there, bewildered, the authoritative voice of the guard spoke again, this time addressing the "invisible travel companion": "Is this your friend?"

"Yes, we encountered each other along the way," the youthful voice quickly responded. "She's traveled from afar, a newcomer to this place, unfamiliar with our ways. I thought I'd show her around the city."

"…Then you may enter, but be cautious not to stray. The evening approaches, and the wilderness beyond the city limits is fraught with dangers, especially as darkness descends upon the forests."

"Ah! Thank you!"

The voice, brimming with enthusiasm, expressed gratitude towards the guard before addressing Vanna, "We're allowed to proceed now."

Redirecting her attention away from the desolate landscape that lay beyond the city's boundaries, Vanna acknowledged the guidance with a nod, orienting herself towards the source of the voice: "Understood."

She ventured into the so-called "thriving city," her steps taking her down a broad yet desolate avenue that ran straight from the city's entrance. The road was flanked by ruins, with yellow sand swallowing the remnants of what might once have been bustling streets and broken stone slabs scattered chaotically underfoot. From time to time, she caught the fleeting sounds of what could be mistaken for vendors peddling their wares, snippets of conversation, and the clatter of wheels against cobblestones. However, these auditory glimpses quickly vanished into the wind, leaving her unable to discern any distinct words or phrases.

"How do you find it? Quite lively, isn't it?" The young and vibrant voice emerged beside Vanna, almost as if gesturing towards imaginary storefronts and the hustle of unseen crowds, "I've called this place home for many years. It's the most bustling city in the entire continent."

…The continent? What is that?

A wave of disorientation momentarily swept over Vanna as if a surge of knowledge, alien to her understanding of the world, sought entry into her consciousness, vying for a foothold in her mind.

But in the next instant, her resolve steeled, dispelling the burgeoning confusion and repelling the intrusive knowledge that attempted to take root.

Chapter 809: Ashes with the Wind

Vanna advanced with caution in the abandoned metropolis, now a ghost town devoid of life. Beside her, an unseen companion kept pace, eagerly describing the vibrance and beauty that once characterized this thriving city. It was painted as a bustling hub of activity, its streets teeming with the joyful hustle and bustle of daily life.

This city was once the crown jewel of the entire continent, a place renowned far and wide. It served as a home for many and a waypoint for travelers from all corners of the globe. The city's guards were known for their unwavering vigilance, its inhabitants for their warmth and generosity. It was a melting pot where new and exciting merchandise, innovative ideas, and captivating stories from across the world converged.

"You're going to love it here, just like everyone else does," the invisible guide assured Vanna with a buoyant tone. "Give it a few days, and you'll be captivated by its charm!"

While Vanna half-heartedly absorbed her guide's spirited narrative, her thoughts veered towards the peculiar. Despite the apparent absence of residents, she occasionally caught snippets of conversation, suggesting she wasn't alone. She wondered how she was perceived by these unseen denizens. Did they view her as a blind swordsman, aimlessly wandering their streets with a weapon in hand? Was there no concern or curiosity from these invisible onlookers about her armed presence?

Her musings then shifted to her jovial guide, whose youthful voice suggested she was a young girl, invisible and intangible, making it challenging for Vanna to rely on her for navigation. Instead, Vanna had been making her way through the decrepit ruins and crumbled walls based on her own decisions, indifferent to whether her guide could keep up or even followed. Yet, the guide seemed not to mind, remaining ever-present and engaging as though this were a prearranged outing for Vanna, her “new friend.”

Pausing at an intersection, Vanna took a moment to gather her thoughts, pondering her place in this unseen city and her relationship with her invisible guide.

Just as she grappled with these questions, a sudden wave of dizziness overcame her, more intense than before, leaving her mind momentarily blank, as if a crucial memory had slipped away.

Looking around at the desolate ruins with confusion, Vanna noticed that the earlier sense of something being amiss had now inexplicably faded away.

“Would you like some fruit?” A new voice, gentle and reminiscent of an elderly woman, broke the silence, offering refreshment as if from a roadside vendor. “They’re fresh from this morning, perfect for quenching your thirst after a long journey, aren’t they?”

Turning towards the source of the voice, Vanna saw nothing but a pile of wood and stones, partly concealed by the desert’s encroaching sands, and a fleeting shadow among the ruins, gesturing as if presenting goods for sale. A gust of wind blew, sweeping sand from the shadow’s hand, revealing nothing but an empty plank in front of it.

In the blink of an eye, the shadow vanished, leaving Vanna to contemplate the eerie and enigmatic nature of the deserted city.

Standing isolated at the crossroads, Vanna was engulfed in the eerie silence, the only sound being the hollow whispering of the wind. It dawned on her that the voice of her “invisible companion” had ceased, leaving her in a prolonged silence.

Turning towards where she last felt the presence of her unseen guide, Vanna tentatively called out, “Are you still there?”

But no reply came.

The wind picked up slightly, dislodging a few grains of sand from a crumbling wall nearby. As they fell, they seemed to carry a faint yet distinct sound with them – a soft tinkling, reminiscent of a distant bell: ding, ding-ding…

With a fluid motion, Vanna shifted her great sword to her left hand and with her right, she drew a familiar symbol across her chest. The meaning of the symbol eluded her, but her body remembered the gesture as if it were a deeply ingrained habit, perhaps some sort of benediction.

With renewed caution, she gripped her sword firmly and ventured further into the heart of the city.

As she roamed the desolate ruins, it became clear that the city’s once sprawling and intricate streets were now endless vistas of yellow sand. The remains of buildings and pathways, although shattered and buried, hinted at their former splendor.

A thought struck Vanna – could this truly have been the world’s most vibrant and thriving metropolis? She pondered the countless lives that must have filled this vast city, the endless caravans bringing goods and stories from distant lands.

Yet, it now lay forsaken.

What had led to such a bustling city being deserted? When had it happened? And why, after all, had she come here?

Continuing her journey, Vanna’s train of thought was abruptly interrupted as she approached a particular building. The wind carried strange noises and, with it, a piece of paper swirling through the air, catching her attention with its barely visible writing.

Intrigued by the notion of paper surviving the relentless sandstorms, Vanna acted instinctively, catching the flying scrap. Upon inspection, she realized it was a fragment of a newspaper. The top half, though tattered, proudly displayed the newspaper’s name, while the bottom half bore text that had been worn away by time. Amidst the fading words, Vanna discerned a sentence that remained legible:

“…A great fire broke out in Pland, spreading from the upper to the lower district, damaging many factories and blocks, with casualties among the residents…”

Staring at the aged text, Vanna was enveloped in confusion. After a moment of contemplation, she finally articulated her bewilderment:

“What is Pland?”

No sooner had she spoken than the piece of newspaper in her grasp began to disintegrate, turning into yellow sand and slipping through her fingers, carried away by the wind.

Vanna paused, taking a moment to shake the last remnants of sand from her hand before she continued on her way.

Her journey through the ruins extended for what seemed like an eternity until she abruptly came to a halt before a peculiar structure. Amidst the swirling dust, the building appeared almost out of nowhere, its form rising awkwardly yet distinctly from the surrounding debris and fallen structures. It stood there, an anomaly among ruins, resembling a silent behemoth that had been quietly observing Vanna’s approach.

The structure was a modest-sized chapel, characterized by several spires that, while not grandiose, lent it an air of solemn dignity.

It was clear that the chapel had been abandoned; its exterior walls were discolored and cracked, its windows broken and scattered, and its roof tiles missing, all signs of long-term neglect. However, in stark contrast to the completely collapsed buildings that were engulfed by the encroaching sand, this chapel retained its basic structure. But what truly captured Vanna's attention was the small flowerbed situated at the chapel's entrance.

This flowerbed, though dilapidated and home only to dead plants, was remarkably free of sand, a curious sight in a land where the yellow desert sands seemed to invade every nook and cranny. It was as though someone, somewhere, was still tending to this broken garden and its desiccated flora.

Vanna stood before the flowerbed, her gaze lifting from the withered plants to the small, forlorn chapel. After a moment's contemplation, she stepped inside.

Crossing the threshold, she experienced a sudden shift in atmosphere; the pervasive, scorching heat of the desert was abruptly replaced by a cooler, more isolated environment. Then, almost immediately, she was greeted by a series of bright lights.

Despite its outwardly abandoned appearance, the interior of the chapel was surprisingly well-kept. The doors and windows remained intact, and the main hall was illuminated by bright, welcoming lights. Empty wooden pews were lined up in neat rows, leading to a pulpit that was softly lit from above, giving the chapel an air of sanctity and peace.

A wave of vague familiarity washed over Vanna. It was as if she had encountered this place before, either in person or through the words of another, yet she could not pinpoint the memory. Her life before entering this vast, endless desert seemed like a distant dream, details blurred and unreachable.

Clutching her great sword, Vanna walked down the central aisle, surveying her surroundings with a mix of wariness and wonder. Eventually, she decided to take a moment to rest, choosing a bench near the front.

As she sat down, the ancient wood creaked under her weight, mirroring the stiffness and fatigue she felt in her own body. She sighed deeply, a tangible expression of her weariness.

Then, in the midst of the chapel's silence, a soft, almost imperceptible sound caught her attention. It was the sound of breathing.

Someone was sitting beside her.

Vanna turned her head sharply towards the source of the sound.

There, right beside her, was a young nun clad in a somber black habit, her age mirroring Vanna's. She sat in quiet contemplation, her head bowed in what appeared to be deep, devout prayer.

A real, tangible person!

The realization struck Vanna with the force of a revelation. It had been so long since she last encountered another living soul that the memory of human company had almost faded into the realm of myth. Her journey had felt eternal, a solitary trek through landscapes dominated by sand and shadow, accompanied only by elusive sounds and the ghost of her invisible guide. She had almost resigned herself to the belief that this desolate world was her sole domain, and she, its lone wanderer. But now, the sight of another human being sparked a flurry of emotions within her: excitement, confusion, and an inexplicable sense of recognition.

Vanna was on the verge of speaking, her mind racing with questions and a yearning for connection, "You are…"

“You’ve stayed here too long, sister,” the young nun interrupted, her voice serene yet carrying an undercurrent of solemnity. She raised her head, her gaze meeting Vanna’s with a calm intensity. “Ashes, it’s easy to be assimilated by the ashes.”

Chapter 810: The Erosion of Wind and Sand

The unsettling declaration from the young nun, “Ashes… can easily be assimilated by ashes…” brought Vanna to a momentary standstill. In that fleeting moment, a sensation washed over her as if a tight knot in her mind had slightly unraveled. She was on the verge of inquiring further when the nun, cloaked in black, allowed a soft smile to grace her lips. Then, to Vanna’s utter astonishment, the nun disintegrated into a heap of ashes that the wind whimsically scattered right before her eyes.

The sound of tapping, reminiscent of a familiar yet elusive memory, echoed once more from the void, signaling another presence within the church’s ancient walls. Vanna’s instincts sharpened; she turned her gaze towards the source, only to be met with the sight of an indistinct silhouette at the church’s entrance.

As the figure drew nearer, its form gradually became more defined with each advancing step. It was an elderly priest, his posture bent, adorned in the worn vestments of his vocation.

In one hand, the old priest held a lamp emitting a soft glow, its light reflecting off his hand, revealing a metallic sheen. It became apparent that he had lost an arm in some bygone conflict, now replaced with a steam-powered prosthetic. Despite his slow approach, his eyes never once settled on Vanna; instead, they were fixated on some distant point beyond her, filled with an ineffable longing.

Overcome with an inexplicable sense of recognition, Vanna felt compelled to leave her seat and greet this mysterious figure. “Hello, may I inquire as to where I am?” she ventured.

The priest halted, his attention still diverted beyond her, and responded in a tranquil tone, “You have strayed into an wayward thread of history, Inquisitor – you must find your exit from this place lest you too are reduced to ashes… He is no longer capable of discerning.”

Confusion laced Vanna’s voice as she asked, “He can no longer discern? Who are you referring to?”

“The deity tasked with the chronicling of history…” the old priest murmured. As his words trailed off, his body began to crumble into ashes, which the wind swiftly carried away. His parting words, barely audible, lingered in the air, “…everything… will drift towards the ultimate chaos…”

Warmed by an unseen force, a strand of ash brushed against Vanna’s fingertips, jolting her with its touch. Though her memory remained shrouded in mystery, unable to recall her past or recognize this desolate place, a deep-rooted alarm within her urged her to flee.

Without hesitation, she sprinted towards the main door of the church.

Pushing the door ajar, Vanna was greeted by the expansive night sky. Unbeknownst to her, day had transitioned to night, and the desert now lay under the cloak of darkness. The day’s blistering heat had succumbed to the chilly nocturnal winds, now reigning supreme over the barren landscape. The wind, a harbinger of the desert’s merciless nature, hurled sand like tiny daggers, lashing against the ancient ruins and Vanna’s exposed skin, inflicting a stinging pain.

Vanna’s skin, known for its resilience against small-caliber bullets, now bore the delicate lacerations inflicted by the sand, driven by the fierce wind.

She observed her arms with a mix of surprise and confusion; rather than blood, what seeped out from these fine wounds was akin to fine ashes, resembling black smoke that gently rose and then dissipated into the atmosphere as though being eagerly consumed by the very essence of this world.

The realization hit her – she was gradually being “absorbed” into the fabric of this strange world.

A fleeting thought urged her to seek refuge back within the church’s walls, yet the echo of the unnamed nun’s and the old priest’s forewarnings ignited a stark admonition within her heart.

The sanctuary, with its deceptive offer of shelter, posed a far greater peril than the abrasive desert sands. The illusion of safety within its confines threatened to erode her resolve, effectively disintegrating her existence into nothingness.

Determined, she knew she had to escape this city… These “ruins” that rose amidst the desert sands offered no shield; rather, they stood as beacons of danger. The environment here was paradoxical; the open, barren sands might paradoxically offer a safer passage…

These thoughts cascaded through her mind in a rapid torrent, yet her resolve did not waver. Protecting herself with a ragged cloak against the stinging assault of the sands, she made her way towards what she recalled as the city’s exit.

The sands around her stirred, hinting at a disturbance or, perhaps, revealing that this city had never truly permitted anyone to leave. Out of the corner of her eye, Vanna noticed a sudden movement in the sand. In an instant, a hand emerged, grasping her ankle with unexpected strength.

From the depths of the desert floor, a figure composed entirely of sand rose, gripping Vanna in a manner reminiscent of a soulless specter. It slithered on the ground, its visage ever-changing, momentarily taking shape only to release a series of garbled roars and murmurs!

Yet, this sandy assailant could not detain Vanna. With a determined step, she broke free from the grasp of the “sand person,” then forcefully stamped the ground, causing a thunderous noise. The resultant shockwave obliterated the sandy figure, scattering it into a cloud of dust around her.

As the dust settled, a half-buried stone pillar with faint inscriptions became visible among the sands: “…Wilhelm… The Black Sun descends from… we have failed…”

The moment of shock was fleeting, and Vanna, without a second’s pause, continued her flight.

The wind crescendoed into a howl, carrying with it a cacophony of sounds. These sounds, vague and overlapping, resembled the bustling noise of a busy marketplace, complete with the chatter of vendors, the footsteps of pedestrians, and the clatter of carriages.

Amidst the ruins of the sand city under the cloak of night, these vibrant sounds enveloped Vanna as if an invisible, bustling city had awakened beside her. She could almost visualize a lively and prosperous scene unfolding in parallel to her solitary escape, imagining a city that throbbed with life even under the cover of darkness. Meanwhile, from the corner of her eye, she noticed flickers of light emerging in the distance.

In this surreal tableau, it seemed as though, following its abandonment or perhaps its complete fading from collective memory, the city’s lights stubbornly persisted, lingering in the annals of history. These lights, relics of a bygone era, would dutifully flicker to life at dusk, casting their glow upon the spots they once brightened…

As darkness enveloped the city, the lights brought an eerie semblance of life to the ruins. Beams cut through the shadows, illuminating the skeletal remains of structures and fallen columns, around which shadowy figures moved, their voices a muffled cacophony in the dim light.

Vanna, sword in hand, moved through these spectral images with a single-minded focus. She navigated the illusion-filled landscape, her steps unwavering and determined, her eyes fixed on the path ahead.

Yet, despite her resolve, her body continued to succumb to the insidious assimilation by the surrounding invisible ashes. Her injuries multiplied, and even without the abrasive touch of the sand, her flesh seemed to fissure spontaneously, emitting plumes of black smoke and ash. With each puff of ash that left her body, the ambient sounds grew louder, the ghostly scenes around her clearer.

In one lucid moment, amidst the ambient noise, she caught snippets of conversation as if the speakers were right beside her, perhaps even addressing her:

“Have you heard? The Thirteen Islands of Witherland have vanished… Word from the north came just days ago… That fearsome ship tore open a portal to subspace…”

Vanna chose to ignore these disembodied voices. With a sweep of her arm, she conjured a gust that scattered the encroaching sand. Amidst this disturbance, a flyer whipped past her, carrying the unmistakable image of Tyrian Abnomar on a wanted poster. The figure beneath the portrait was a sequence of zeros so lengthy, it bordered on absurd, suggesting not a monetary reward but rather the immeasurable danger this individual posed.

Suddenly, the tranquility of the night was pierced by the sound of rhythmic music, suggesting the presence of a large gathering somewhere in the distance. Vanna strained to listen as voices cut through the murkiness:

“…A new queen for Frost… Today marks the coronation of Her Majesty Ray Nora. May we revel in the queen’s glory, seek her protection, and offer her our unwavering allegiance…”

This auditory chaos was soon joined by a plethora of sounds, sights, and snippets of information that seemed to envelop Vanna purposefully:

One street over buzzed with the celebration of Queen Ray Nora of Frost’s coronation day; another echoed with the turmoil of the Frostbite Rebellion; conversations about the wanted poster of the infamous former Frost Admiral Tyrian filled the air; and not too far off, a gathering around a podium where relics from the era of the ancient city-states were on display, with a prominent historian—credited with significant discoveries from that period—addressing the crowd. This figure, a beacon of knowledge in the field, was unfamiliar to Vanna…

Suddenly, as if conjured by the swirling winds and shifting sands before her, a figure materialized. He was a man dressed in worn, ragged garments, his movements betraying a sense of disorientation. His eyes, clouded with confusion, seemed to scan the horizon endlessly, as though trying to make sense of his surroundings. Clutched in his hands were a battered scroll and a stub of a pencil, and he stood there, his demeanor one of apprehension, as if the very air around him was a source of fear.

He bowed repeatedly to the invisible throngs that passed him by, his actions mimicking those of someone desperately seeking information from any who would listen. His mutterings were punctuated by moments of loud exclamations as though frustration had seized him in a sudden frenzy.

Vanna brushed past this enigmatic figure initially without a second thought, but a specific phrase uttered by the man halted her in her tracks. He was earnestly questioning the passersby, his voice tinged with urgency, “Excuse me… what year is it exactly? Does anyone know what year it is now?”

Turning her attention fully towards the man, Vanna noticed that he, too, seemed to recognize her presence, lifting his gaze to meet hers almost simultaneously.

“Hello, my name is Puman,” he introduced himself with a wave despite his evident confusion and wild-eyed appearance. His tone, oddly enough, retained a semblance of politeness, “I’m dreaming again, but this time I can’t seem to find the way out… Can you tell me what year it is now?”

Puman… could this truly be the infamous “mad poet” Puman, known more for his bewildering verses than clarity of mind?

Caught off guard by the encounter, Vanna barely had time to process the moment before the man, who had just identified himself as “Puman,” dissolved into the wind and sand as swiftly as he had appeared.

Left behind, as tangible proof of his brief presence, were the crumpled scroll and the pencil stub he had been clutching, now lying forsaken on the ground.

Chapter 811: At the End of the Wind and Sand

According to historical accounts, Puman, known centuries ago as the “Mad Poet,” was a unique individual who dared to delve into truths deemed forbidden and miraculously managed to survive. The legends tell of this poet’s peculiar habit of sinking into dreamlike states, during which he professed to journey through various era and worlds, each more bizarre than the last.

Puman’s legacy is a vast collection of writings that have left subsequent generations in awe. From the onset of his career, his work displayed a remarkable blend of elegance and depth, captivating even the most discerning critics from various city-states with his sophisticated yet profound poetry. However, as Puman approached the twilight of his life, a discernible shift occurred in his creations. His later poems began to explore themes that were at once bizarre and chilling, replete with disconcerting metaphors and ramblings reminiscent of a prophet’s frenzied declarations. He became obsessed with conveying to humanity the existence of entities and realms beyond the scope of known reality, his writings bordering on the sacrilegious. Consequently, Puman transformed into a figure shrouded in despair and fear.

The admiration and praise that once flowed freely towards him eventually turned into aversion and apprehension. Admirers who had once held him in high esteem now regarded him as a menace. Even the church’s authorities attempted to curb his influence, though they failed to identify any tangible corrupt or blasphemous essence in his writings.

Puman's final days remain shrouded in mystery, adding another layer to his enigmatic legacy. Some narratives suggest he was confined by the church, ultimately meeting a quiet end in an asylum on a desolate island. Yet, there are accounts that insist he continued to live, with claims of sightings as late as the winter of 1842, where witnesses described seeing the poet, unmistakable as depicted in portraits, standing on a frost-laden cliff, pen and paper in hand, composing his verses.

A "caretaker," purporting to have been by Puman's side during his last years, offers a glimpse into the poet's final chapter through his autobiography. He describes how Puman became increasingly absorbed in his fantastical dreams, drawing inspiration from these visions to craft his extraordinary and peculiar poetry. Ultimately, Puman succumbed to a dream so captivating that he lost all desire to return to reality. One sunny morning, he vanished from his bed, leaving behind a poem on the bedside table—a farewell of sorts.

Vanna, stepping forward to the very spot Puman was last seen, stooped to secure the crumpled scroll and pencil just as the wind threatened to carry them off.

With a puzzled frown, she unrolled the scroll and read the cryptic lines penned on it: "…I saw it, the sun has retreated, in the night, everything falls into tranquility… The ship sails from the sky, with stars like a curtain, granting the mortal world eternal slumber… In silence, in stillness, in sleep, the dead embrace the departed world…"

As the wind picked up, causing the paper to flutter, Vanna heard a voice whispering close to her ear—a voice that belonged to the vanished mad poet, though his form was nowhere to be seen. "Look, look, do you see?

The scene I saw… truly beautiful, the curtain rising from the end of the sea, reflecting over the entire world…”

Vanna turned her gaze in the direction from where the voice emanated, her eyes meeting nothing but the swirling dust that danced in the chaotic wind. Her eyebrows knitted together in a frown, her voice tinged with slight hoarseness as she asked, “Are you also trapped here?”

The voice, seemingly lost in its own world, continued to mutter to itself, its words initially muffled and disjointed. After a moment, however, the voice regained clarity.

“I’ve always been pursued by them, relentlessly, like hounds with a scent for blood… In every dream, I’ve stumbled across myriad places, each with its own crevice for me to seek refuge. Exhaustion eventually took hold, and the thought of being caught seemed less daunting… And so, I was engulfed by the hound known as truth, which led me to glimpse distant scenes before bringing me here…”

As Vanna absorbed the rambling discourse, she recognized the challenge in establishing a clear line of communication but felt compelled to inquire further, “Do you know how to leave this place?”

“No, no, no, one can’t simply leave, my friend…” The voice responded promptly, then trailed off into more unintelligible mutterings, “…Down in the basement, the robed ones proclaimed it a sanctuary, believing iron cages could imprison my spirit, preventing it from fleeing my corporeal form in dreams, and that braziers could repel the shadows lured by my essence, sparing me from total consumption in my slumber…”

The voice’s words became muddled with the wind and a cacophony of faint, indistinct sounds, only to emerge clearly once more: “…Do you understand, after many years… by then I had long been deceased, and years later, a young girl found herself ensnared in a similar cage. By that era, technology had significantly advanced, and she emerged from the basement with her life intact…”

“Ah, the poor girl, I witnessed her ascension to power, and then her downfall, executed by those who once lauded her… I pondered whether to immortalize this in my poetry… no, no, better not. The robed ones forbade me from weaving the visions of my dreams into my verses, warning that it would strengthen my ties to realms beyond our own, which is undesirable… My opportunities to write grow scarce; I must reserve my remaining words for matters of greater importance…”

“Listen! The sound of someone knocking against the railing, the clinking of keys… ding ding, ding ding, ding ding. The guards are on their rounds, ensuring I remain confined…”

At that moment, the wind intensified, carrying with it the distinct sound of “ding ding ding,” reminiscent of keys.

And still, the mad voice continued its monologue: “But am I truly there? They might see me, seemingly at peace upon my bed, but I am absent, not within that husk; I reside here, in this realm of ashes… What brings you here?

“You ought to depart; this place is not for you, your journey lies beyond. Take my poetry, but my pencil… these items belong to me, not to be held by others… They will ensnare you, draw you into the depths…”

As Vanna stood there, the paper and pencil slipped from her grasp, transforming into sand with a whirl and vanishing into the air before she could react.

“Which direction should I take?” she inquired the voice, her question floating into the void, “I’ve lost track of where I came from, and I’m clueless about where I should head… How do I exit this city?”

“Any direction, any direction,” replied the voice, now sounding as if it were receding rapidly, its clarity diminishing into a faint echo, “This place is boundless… It’s ensnared in a perpetual dream of its own making. I’ve just seen it—beyond the city lies a desert, and beyond that desert, the city reclaims you. Escape is an illusion; the further you venture, the deeper you’re drawn in… But I must leave, I must awaken once more…”

And with those words, the voice faded entirely, lost to the wild dance of wind and sand.

Left alone, Vanna stood amidst the endless night, surrounded by lights that shone upon a city forgotten by time, her silhouette merging with the luminescence around her. Within the glow, she glimpsed ephemeral shadows of carriages traversing the fractured streets, vibrant storefronts amidst the ruins, and distant melodies that overtook the howling winds, their cadence soothing the sharp discomfort of myriad tiny cuts on her arms.

She briefly closed her eyes, almost ready to succumb to the seductive warmth and prosperity of this illusion.

But in an instant, her eyes flung open.

Something intangible had shattered within her, igniting a will that fought against the gentle, yet inexorable, pull towards oblivion. The phantoms dancing in the lights dimmed and vanished. The biting chill of the desert night cut across her face, the wind’s sting reviving the acute pain of countless minor injuries.

Yet, amidst this reality, she found a reason to smile—pain was a reminder, a confirmation of existence.

She understood that she did not belong to this surreal place. Despite not recalling her name or origin, one truth was clear: she was an outsider here.

Clinging to this realization was crucial—it was her defense against being assimilated by this land.

In this moment of awakening, Vanna grasped another vital insight: the necessity of finding her “anchor.”

It was imperative that she swiftly uncover her identity, recall her origins.

Gradually, memories and understandings began to trickle back, illuminating the essence of this vast desert. She recognized she had stumbled into a realm governed by “forgetfulness,” where resistance to “forgetting” was her only path forward.

Abandoning her aimless wanderings “outside” the city, she acknowledged the city’s “infinity.” Understanding that mere physical departure was insufficient for escape, she concluded there must exist another means of exit.

Bathed in the ambiguous glow of light, Vanna allowed the wind and the sand to pass over her, wearing away at her form. In this process, she found a semblance of peace, her mind gradually settling as she employed her thoughts and senses to navigate a path out of this maze.

She pieced together bits of information carried by the wind and embedded in the grains of sand—snippets of text, fragments of conversations, and remnants that seemed to echo different “times” and “events.” These snippets appeared to serve as various “anchors” within this vast desert of amnesia.

She reasoned that she, too, must have her own anchor—a testament to her existence somewhere, perhaps in the memories of certain individuals, within the… world itself.

With her eyelids drooping, a subtle stir began to take root in the depths of her heart after a duration that remained unmeasured.

In the midst of this infinite desert, she stumbled upon a trace that connected directly to her –

Vanna's eyes snapped open as a piece of torn paper fluttered by her. Swiftly catching it, she focused on the text it bore:

"…The border exploration fleet has once again embarked on the 'cross-border' operation. The Vanished and the Bright Star have breached the six-mile threshold… venturing towards the world's edge in search…"

Simultaneously, a familiar voice reached her, its tone fragmented as if snatched from a distant memory –

"…Any news of note?"

"…A dispatch from the Storm Church…"

"They'll be fine, try not to fret, Heidi…"

"Is it because of the renowned captain?"

"It's because of your dad…"

"Dad and Vanna, they are part of something truly grand…"

A surge of recognition flashed in Vanna's eyes, her heart finding its rhythm once more, pulsating with renewed life as if awakening from a long slumber. She remembered her name, and –

"The Vanished… Captain?"

Holding the paper, she whispered to herself, a mixture of realization and wonder in her voice.

Then, at the edge of her field of vision, a flicker of eerie green flame emerged, and almost instantly, a familiar yet imposing voice arose from behind her: "I am here."

Chapter 812: Sand and Fire

In an instant, the fragmented memories loudly pieced themselves back together, and Vanna’s confused and estranged thoughts snapped back into sharp focus as though the entire world had been set right with a single breath.

Once obscured by a haze of yellow sand as if under siege by unseen forces, the sky began to clear as the winds carried the sand away. Simultaneously, wisps of black smoke materialized from thin air, swirling and merging back into Vanna’s form. Memories of her name, her past, and the path that had led her to this moment flooded back. She remembered everything about the Vanished and the missions she had shared with her captain.

As she turned, her eyes met with the tall, dignified presence of Duncan standing beside her. He observed her silently, with a patience that suggested he had been there all along.

Taking a deep, steadying breath, Vanna shook off the lingering confusion and disorientation. After a moment of silent reflection, she murmured to herself, “It feels as though I’ve been ensnared in a lengthy dream—what a prolonged and winding journey it’s been.”

“Thankfully, you didn’t become utterly lost,” Duncan replied, a gentle smile playing at the corners of his mouth. “There was a time, amidst the ashes of the forgotten history, when your silhouette seemed almost imperceptible to me.”

A fleeting sensation of fear brushed against Vanna’s heart, but she quickly dismissed it. Looking around, she realized that the endless desert and the ruins it cradled hadn’t vanished with her return to clarity.

This place wasn’t merely a figment of her imagination, crafted solely for her benefit. It truly existed at this unique juncture, a peculiar “anomaly”—an eternal dream sustained by a ceaseless ember, an alternate layer of “reality.” She had awakened within the dream of an ancient deity yet hadn’t escaped this vast illusion.

Nevertheless, her awakening triggered a transformation. The once vivid and imminent vision of a bustling city receded into the shadows, and the phantom noises of streets and alleyways dissipated entirely. Now, the city lay in silence, a testament to ruin, lit only by floating orbs that cast a soft glow on the crumbled walls.

Reflecting on Duncan’s words, “the burned history,” Vanna began to grasp the true nature of this desert. She then recounted her visions: the coronation of the Frost Queen, a convocation during the era of archaeological discoveries among the old city-states, and the wanted posters of the Mist Fleet. These glimpses, she realized, were remnants of stories that the flames had spared.

Upon hearing Vanna’s observations, Duncan calmly offered, “…the afterglow lingers.”

Vanna’s expression shifted, adopting a grave demeanor as she remembered her initial encounter with this ash-covered isle, the subtle red glow buried within the warm ashes, and the distant columns of smoke rising into the sky.

“What about the others?” Vanna asked, momentarily pushing aside the nagging unease that tugged at her heart.

“They’ve pulled back to the ship for now,” Duncan replied casually. “The dynamics at this ‘node’ have shifted, possibly due to the critical conditions in Ta Ruijin, or maybe because ‘history’ as a concept holds unique significance here. The ash here is excessively perilous… I ventured here alone to find you.”

“I’ve caused you concern,” Vanna sighed, her voice tinged with regret.

“Let’s not dwell on that,” Duncan dismissed with a wave of his hand. “Instead, tell me what you’ve gone through. Do you still remember everything? What insights have you gathered about this ‘desert’ now?”

Vanna took a moment to steady her emotions and collect her thoughts, aware that the captain still had objectives to fulfill in this vast, sandy expanse. She began to share the details of what she still remembered about her ordeal in this endless desert – the whispers that reached her, the remnants of ruins she stumbled upon, and the distinct “ding, ding, ding” sound that accompanied the rise of the wind and sand.

She admitted that her recollections of the initial part of her “journey” were fuzzy at best. Upon her arrival in this boundless sea of sand, her mind was clouded for a considerable duration. Yet, one vivid impression remained –

“Forgetfulness and a sense of being lost dominate my earliest memories of the journey, almost as if I had intentionally etched those sensations into my subconscious. It’s as though I was conscious of the transformations occurring within me but was powerless to counter them. My only recourse was to engrain this feeling deeply within me, hoping it would later serve as a reminder of the ‘forgetfulness’ I experienced…

“My memories became clearer only after I had forgotten my name and my past. That’s when the ruins started appearing more frequently within the desert, and the voices began to emerge. This transition marked a gradual ‘assimilation,’ the most dangerous aspect of which was its subtlety. There was no malevolence; it was akin to the erosion caused by a gentle breeze or the sun's rays – imperceptible until it was too late, and by the time I became aware, I found myself unable to leave the city."

As she shared this, Vanna took a cautious breath, still feeling a shiver of fear from the memory of her descent into confusion and the sense of being utterly lost. Then, something else came to her mind.

"Actually, before I recalled anything about the Vanished, I encountered someone else who seemed out of place here," she hurriedly added, "He told me his name was 'Puman.'"

"Puman?" Duncan's face showed a flicker of surprise, "The renowned 'mad poet'?"

"Yes, I was too bewildered at the time to recognize him, but now that my memories have returned, I'm certain he was the 'mad poet' chronicled in our history," Vanna confirmed with a nod, "He matched the descriptions from the literature perfectly, appearing tense yet courteous. He was inquiring about this place, seemingly in search of an exit."

Duncan reflected aloud, "Could he possibly be another 'shadow' cast by this desert?"

"I don't think so," Vanna replied with certainty, shaking her head. "He took physical form before me. He told me he had once again fallen into a dream and explained that, in the real world, he was confined to a basement, watched over by 'robed guardians' circling his 'prison.' It seems… he found his way here by accident."

"To accidentally stumble into the dream of an ancient deity at the world's end?" Duncan raised an eyebrow skeptically. "Even for someone as legendary as the 'mad poet,' that's somewhat hard to believe…"

He trailed off, lost in thought for a moment, before he connected the dots, “The details you’ve described sound remarkably like the containment facilities used by the church for natural-born psychics, as told by the Frost Queen, Ray Nora.”

“The Frost Queen… of course! That makes sense,” Vanna quickly realized, piecing together another fragment of the puzzle, “Puman even mentioned the Frost Queen, though he didn’t use her name explicitly. He must’ve been referring to her – someone who emerged years after his time, also trapped in a ‘cage’…”

Duncan listened intently to Vanna’s recounting, his mind racing with theories about the enigmatic “mad poet.” However, their speculation was cut short by a sudden, chilling gust of wind that swept through, reminding them of their present situation and priorities.

“We’ll delve into the ‘mad poet’s’ tale once we’re back. Morris and Lucretia are the experts in that field, not us; they’re the scholars,” Duncan stated with a sense of urgency. “Right now, our main goal is to locate Ta Ruijin and figure out how to get you out of this place safely.”

No sooner had Duncan finished speaking than a sound carried by the cold wind caught their attention – a distant, rhythmic tapping, like metal striking stone.

“Ding…ding ding…”

“That’s the sound!” Vanna recognized it instantly, turning to Duncan, “I’ve been hearing this sound all along. Whenever it echoes, something in the desert shifts; a new ruin emerges, or I hear those elusive voices…”

She paused, her thought interrupted.

The ding ding sound persisted, and then, Vanna noticed a change.

This time, the sound didn’t seem to emanate from everywhere; she could pinpoint its source.

After a moment of quick assessment and surprise, both she and Duncan pointed towards the heart of the city, exclaiming in unison, “…It’s coming from that direction!”

Though distant, the source of the sound was unmistakably clear now.

Without any further hesitation, they started towards the sound.

And that guiding noise did not fade; instead, the rhythmic ding ding ding continued to beckon them deeper into the city’s heart, growing ever more distinct as they progressed.

As they journeyed forward, Vanna’s mind circled back to the enigmatic advice given by the “mad poet” just before he vanished:

“The city stretches on endlessly, surrounded by the desert, and beyond the desert, the city resumes… Venturing outward, you’ll never escape this place.

To leave, you must not go outward but inward.

The ‘infinity’ of history unfolds in an unintuitive ‘one-way infinity’!

To find an exit or to seek the ancient deity overseeing history, the journey must be inward!”

Grasping the depth of his words, Vanna eagerly shared her epiphany with Duncan. Upon hearing her, Duncan simply nodded with a grave understanding and gestured around them.

“The city is fading away.”

Vanna, taken aback, surveyed her surroundings.

Indeed, the city was dissolving into the wind.

The decayed columns crumbled before their eyes, while streams of yellow sand cascaded from the lofty walls and towers. What began as a gradual disintegration swiftly accelerated into an expansive dispersal—the sand flowing like waterfalls from every elevated structure in the city, engulfing the dilapidated walls in dust. In mere moments, they, too, were swallowed by the desert.

Within a few short breaths, the entire city had vanished from view as though its presence had been nothing more than a mirage.

All that remained was the boundless expanse of sand.

And the sound, now almost tantalizingly close – Ding…ding ding…

Lifting her gaze, Vanna spotted a lone fire under the night sky. It reminded her of a similar beacon she had encountered in another dream amidst another desert sea long ago.

Beside this fragile flame, threatened by the cold wind yet resilient, sat a gigantic figure she recognized from another dream. In that memory, she had traveled alongside this ancient, towering presence. Now, he was there, his head bowed, tirelessly working with a chisel and stone in hand, etching into the sand beneath…

Ding…ding ding…

Chapter 813: The Pivotal Divergence

Ding… Ding Ding…

The sound echoes of a god meticulously etching into the sand with a chisel amidst the scorched remains of bygone eras.

To Vanna, the giant appears just as she remembered: aged, towering, with the wear and tear of countless eras etched into his visage like deep cuts from an axe. His hair and beard are unkempt, and his eyes appear deeply recessed.

Yet, in comparison to her memories, he looks even more withered and stooped over. His frayed robe seems to pulsate with a subtle, red glow as if the embers of a long-fading fire still cling to him. Tiny sparks occasionally escape from the edges of his garment as he moves, the flickering light casting short, ephemeral shadows onto the desert sands.

The giant raises his arm once more, the hammer meeting the chisel, and the chisel striking the loose sand, creating a crisp sound akin to metal striking stone. Despite the effort, sand proves to be a stubborn medium, leaving no mark, only the clear, echoing sound of the chisel across the vast desert.

Standing by a sand dune, Vanna observes this familiar scene from a distance. After a moment of hesitation, she takes a tentative step forward, following her captain’s lead.

Then, breaking the silence, the giant's deep, raspy voice reaches her: "Time… is an illusion, a construct placed by observers upon the changing world. History, then, is but a shadow cast by sentient beings within this illusory time. To these observers, meaning is founded on the existence of 'people'… without them, meaning fades away."

Vanna halts a few meters from the giant.

"There were once stones here, upon which history could be etched. But now, only sand remains, and even the flames have dwindled to but a faint glimmer," the giant muses to himself, glancing at a small bonfire struggling against the chill wind, "It's nearing its end."

"Civilization was birthed from flame and stone, and it shall conclude with them…" Vanna finds herself speaking out, echoing the words Ta Ruijin once shared with her in a profound dream at Wind Harbor.

At this, the giant lifts his head, his gaze meeting Vanna's.

"Not long ago, I had a fleeting dream, a memory from a distant, almost forgotten past, leaving behind only vague impressions… but within those shadows, I saw you," he says, looking into Vanna's eyes, a smile creasing the deep lines of his face, "Thank you for being there with me on that journey. Though the details escape me now… I still remember, it was a journey marked by solitude."

Vanna's eyes widen slightly in surprise: "You're referring to the dreamscape of Atlantis, how… how could you know about that?"

"In the moment when time is poised to complete its cycle, every event that has unfolded within the continuum of time is interlinked," Ta Ruijin acknowledges with a subtle nod, his voice resonating with a deep understanding. "In the early days of this sanctuary's inception, I was intricately tied to its temporal currents… now, my knowledge spans broadly."

He then shifts his gaze towards Duncan, who stands close to Vanna.

"With patience, I've awaited your arrival, Flame Usurper," the giant says, his smile tinged with melancholy, "Yet, your presence here is a rare beacon of significance in this void of emptiness."

"To be frank, I hadn't envisioned this place to be as it is," Duncan admits, letting out a sigh, his honesty palpable. "I assumed… as the chronicler of civilization, you'd fare better than other 'deities.' After all, 'memory' falls under your dominion; you should possess greater resilience against 'decay.'"

Ta Ruijin shakes his head, a note of resignation in his voice. "Contrary to what one might expect, when the span of a catastrophe stretches far enough, the 'eradication of history' often happens before the extinction of the beings themselves," he explains. "It's not always that a race dies and then its history fades; more tragically, while a race still breathes, their history can already be forgotten… forgetting is a deep void."

He pauses, the weight of his reflection evident. "Forgetting is indeed a deep void, particularly when many aspects of this world can vanish abruptly. The 'corrections' within the sanctuary are insufficient to heal the gaps left by 'blasphemous prototypes,' leaving behind endless scars and cracks in the fabric of history. I've endeavored to conceal these points of historical distortion that could propagate corruption, tirelessly re-crafting the memories of the mortal realm, time and again… until stones turned to sand, and sand to dust, with nearly nothing left for restoration."

With a gesture of resignation, Ta Ruijin lets the stone and chisel fall from his grasp. As soon as they contact the yellow sand, they disintegrate, blending seamlessly with the desert floor.

Duncan advances towards the giant, whose seated form still towers above the tallest of men: “You’re aware of my purpose here.”

“Yes, Navigator Two has already briefed me,” Ta Ruijin responds, his voice steady and calm. “You’ve come to conclude this world, as I foresaw long ago… everything will be incinerated by your hand – this act is the initial step towards their salvation.”

Duncan locks eyes with the giant, curiosity evident in his question, “Are you speaking of the era before the sanctuary’s foundation, when you and the other ancient kings first encountered ‘me’? Is that why you’ve named me ‘Flame Usurper’… because you had glimpsed the future?”

“I may not possess the capability to compute the intricacies of the entire world like Navigator Two does, but I’ve been gifted with a vision that extends far into the timeline—though, admittedly, it’s not always as beneficial as one might hope,” Ta Ruijin says with a chuckle, a hint of wistfulness in his voice. “Back in the old world, those who placed their faith in me believed in this ability of mine, and so, it was within my reach.”

Duncan shares his inner turmoil, his voice reflecting a blend of contemplation and concern. “The notion of ‘burning everything’ has always been shadowed by my fear of reaching that ‘final burning,’” he confides. “This anxiety took root shortly after Navigator One introduced that ‘takeover strategy’ to me—a vision from a Doomsday Ender once showed me such a finale. In that particular version of history, my actions also led to the world’s end, yet the doom was inescapable.”

He pauses, revealing his deepest apprehension: “That’s been my primary worry, the only thing that’s truly haunted me—the final burning looms like an ominous shadow. I can’t help but feel… the conditions for its onset are eerily similar to the actions I’m about to undertake. If I proceed with ‘the first step,’ am I inadvertently steering us towards that disastrous final end?”

As they sit amidst the yellow sands, Ta Ruijin leans in, locking eyes with Duncan in a moment of profound connection before eventually breaking the gaze.

“There lies a crucial divergence,” he starts, his voice carrying the gravity of his years. “Whether we consider Navigator One’s scheme or your current course of action, ‘burning the world’ appears as an inevitable ‘first step.’ However, the real distinction… hinges on who you are at the moment you initiate this plan.”

At the mention of the “Eternal Flame,” a lightbulb goes off in Duncan’s head!

A key insight, previously elusive and now crystal clear, dawns on him.

Moved by an instinctual urge, he inches closer, his gaze piercing into the giant’s eyes: “Are you suggesting…”

“The influence wielded by Captain Duncan is finite,” Ta Ruijin articulates with serene clarity, “You’ve dwelled within this avatar for an extended period, yet… it remains, fundamentally, just an avatar.”

Duncan’s realization is palpable as he stares down at his hands, coming to terms with the root of his underlying disquiet, comprehending the source of his instinctual apprehensions…

It’s the “self” confined within this form, sensing the avatar’s limitations and issuing a subconscious caution.

He is not merely Duncan; he is Zhou Ming.

Duncan represents merely one of his incarnations, akin to the antique shopkeeper in Pland or the graveyard caretaker in Frost—the captain of the Vanished, merely one among three facades.

Duncan’s initial spiritual odyssey commenced with the activation of that brass compass—whereas Zhou Ming’s inaugural spiritual venture began the moment he stepped through the fog from his bachelor apartment.

With a deep breath, he allows this newfound understanding to anchor within him.

In reality, Zhou Ming had already begun to intuit certain truths about his identity, recognizing that his so-called “true self” aboard the Vanished was fundamentally no different from the “corpse avatars” he utilized in Pland and Frost. He understood that “Duncan” was his inaugural persona in this world, yet he hadn’t fully explored the deeper implications of this realization—

The question of whether he was fundamentally Duncan or Zhou Ming had been crucial from the very beginning.

Reflecting on this… Zhou Ming’s brow furrows as he remembers the initial encounter with Goathead upon his arrival on the Vanished. He recalls the entity’s acute awareness of his presence and its persistent inquiry – “Name?”

“Just as you’re starting to grasp the significance of this question,” Ta Ruijin’s voice unexpectedly interrupts Duncan’s reverie, bringing a sharp focus back to the present, “Might I suggest you temper your thoughts somewhat? The brilliance of your starlight is nearly blinding.”

Duncan comes to a sudden realization, noticing for the first time the subtle starlight radiating from him. This soft luminescence has begun to envelop the surrounding yellow sands, as if dipping the desert itself into a vast, star-filled night sky.

Ta Ruijin, meanwhile, gathers his worn robe around him as if to shield himself from the starlight’s glow, his voice carrying a note of resignation.

Standing close by, Vanna seems unaffected, yet there’s a puzzled look on her face.

She appears much like a student who, while standing next to her mentor, finds herself lost in the complexity of the conversation.

In response, Duncan offers an awkward cough: “Uh… my apologies.”

Following his words, the starlight that had subtly illuminated the surroundings begins to withdraw.

Chapter 814: Bonfire

As Duncan slowly came back to his senses, the brilliant glow of starlight that had previously covered the sand began to recede, disappearing as if it had never been there at all. This light seemed to be absorbed back into Duncan himself.

Witnessing this, Ta Ruijin also breathed a sigh of relief as if a weight had been lifted from his shoulders. Then, the being known as the “Eternal Flame” shifted his attention to Vanna, who was standing a short distance away.

As the starlight faded, Vanna seemed unaffected by its presence or departure. It was as though she was entirely unaware of the starlight’s disappearance, lost in her thoughts much like Duncan had been just moments before. It was only after some time had passed that she looked up and began to take in the changes in her environment and herself – a faint purple glow remained at the tips of her silver-white hair, suggesting that the starlight had always been a part of her, only now becoming visible under a certain mystical illumination.

Breaking the silence, Ta Ruijin spoke up, directing his words towards Vanna. “You’ve been subtly influenced by the power of the Flame Usurper, becoming an embodiment of his essence,” he said, acknowledging her with a slight nod. “This confirms my suspicions – the true nature of the Flame Usurper’s essence isn’t in the flames themselves, but hidden beneath them.”

Vanna started to understand the depth of the conversation happening between the captain and this ancient deity. Her expression changed several times as she processed the information.

Turning his attention back to Duncan, Ta Ruijin continued, “In reality, Flame Usurper, you’ve never fully entered this world. You’ve been observing the complexities of the Boundless Sea from afar, through a veil, only occasionally seeing its true essence with your own eyes. And I believe I understand the significance of this ‘flaming end’ you’ve mentioned. It’s a result of your limited perspective.”

“The act of ‘usurping’ Navigator One is tied to the necessity of preserving this sanctuary. To protect it, you must remain fully aware of its condition… you must continue to be ‘Duncan.’”

Ta Ruijin paused, giving Duncan time to digest his words before speaking again, this time more softly, “The Flame Usurper’s gaze, if fully unleashed, could lead to the destruction of this world. Its presence depends on your perception.

“On the other hand, when you need to take ‘the first step,’ you must embrace the identity of the Flame Usurper. It’s ‘Captain Duncan’s’ perspective that will maintain the sanctuary amid the flames, leading to ‘the end of the flame.’ This outcome, beyond your personal intent, may be the one thing in this world you cannot avoid.”

Duncan stayed quiet, pondering Ta Ruijin’s profound statements, contemplating his role in Navigator One and his own plans…

In this narrative, the perceptions of “Duncan” and “Zhou Ming” reveal different aspects of the world.

After a lengthy silence, Duncan, still embodying his role as “Duncan,” finally spoke, “I understand,” he said quietly, his gaze meeting Ta Ruijin’s. “Thank you for the reminder. It’s indeed crucial.”

“Good,” Ta Ruijin responded with a smile. Then, showing the strain in his ancient, bent figure, he slowly pushed himself up from the sand, standing with a mix of determination and effort.

As he stood, sand flowed off his body like the last grains in an hourglass, a poignant reminder of time’s relentless march. The night wrapped its dark cloak around the desert, and he, in the midst of this timeless landscape, fixed his eyes on the far-off horizon.

After a moment of contemplation, he exhaled a soft, almost mournful breath, “There’s scarcely anything left…”

Upon hearing his somber reflection, Vanna couldn’t help but ask, “What was this place before?”

“Before? It hardly was a bustling hub even in its prime. From the beginning, the ‘history’ we speak of in the sanctuary was more like a shadow in the flow of time—a mere outline of mine, fleshed out and maintained by the ritual efforts of those who tended the flames. They crafted a semblance of a world moving forward, enduring through the ages. But this place, it was never brimming with life as we know it.”

“Yet, it wasn’t always this barren desert. Once, in what now stretches as an endless dry expanse, there were rivers and oases, rare as they might have been. Despite the illusory nature of time here, it bore witness to events worthy of note.”

“Back then, cities rose near these water sources, home to intelligent beings other than humans. These cities were as if reflections in a mirror, cast by the real world into this dream I had spun. In their shared memory, the world was flourishing, forever prosperous.”

Bending down, the ancient figure scooped up a handful of sand, watching it trickle through his fingers, taken by the cool night air.

“Then, decay set in. The real world began losing its vibrancy, and as it did, the sanctuary’s record of history grew fragmented and incomplete. With every self-correction this place underwent, more decay, like gangrene, crept into its narrative. The once fertile land was slowly consumed by the encroaching sands, its past whispers echoing in the ruins left behind, leading to the desolation you see now.”

Vanna thought back to the city ruins she had explored, the voices she had heard echoing through the vast desert, and the artifacts she had seen, all of which had seemed so real at the time.

Then, a memory struck her—the “theories” and “heretical speculations” she had once stumbled upon in the cathedral archives of Pland. These texts spoke of a world’s duality.

Some theorists had suggested that our world was split, that somewhere, there existed a parallel realm where the sea and land were inverted—a vast, dry wasteland punctuated by the rare oasis or river, home to civilizations that mirrored our own in some eerie, reflective dance.

With widened eyes, Vanna looked out into the distance, her mind painting vivid images of ancient city-states that lay in ruins across the desert sands…

This was the realm those scholars had speculated about, a mirrored version of our world.

And it was real—tucked away at the edge of the world, cradled in the fading memories of an ancient deity.

Vanna suddenly looked up as though she was about to say something important to Ta Ruijin. However, before she could utter a word, a powerful gust of wind whipped through the air, stirring the sand into a frenzy.

The sandstorm rose like a thick curtain separating the heavens from the earth, engulfing both her and the captain. Then, as quickly as it had arrived, it disappeared, leaving behind a calm. The formidable figure of Ta Ruijin, who had just been standing in the desert, was now nowhere to be seen.

In the midst of daylight that broke through the clouds and mist, shedding light on the ash-strewn landscape, a gentle breeze picked up, causing the pale ash to dance in the air, reminiscent of a delicate fabric moving in the wind.

Coming back to reality, Vanna surveyed her surroundings, her eyes scanning the horizon. All she could see was a vast expanse of ash, punctuated here and there by columns of smoke that twisted upwards towards the sky.

Not too far from her position, the remains of a bonfire struggled to stay alight, its flames flickering weakly on the verge of being snuffed out.

Next to this dying fire sat Ta Ruijin. The once powerful giant now appeared frail and withered, his form barely more than a skeleton. It was as though he himself had become part of the fire, his body the kindling, with only a weak, trembling flame emanating from what remained of him, fluttering in the wind.

He sat there, head hung low, with something that had once been beside him now reduced to indistinct ashes. His hand clutched a piece of black stone, suggesting he had been intensely focused on some task until movement eluded him.

Vanna moved closer to the feeble fire, her gaze lingering on the giant’s face in silent contemplation.

Lost in her thoughts, she thought she heard that distinct sound again –

Ding… Ding Ding…

At that moment, Duncan came up to her, placing his hand gently on her shoulder.

“It’s time to go,” he murmured softly, “while the fire still burns.”

Vanna gave a small nod in agreement.

Duncan then reached out, his finger extended towards the embers next to Ta Ruijin.

Without a word, the flames subtly shifted to a soft green glow, their light now resembling the sparkle of distant stars, slowly flickering as if breathing.

In the midst of the fire’s last dance, Duncan whispered to himself, “See you in our new world.”

…

Far away, under the cover of an eternal night, a vast fleet made its way northward.

The night wind swept across the calm sea, bringing with it the piercing cold of the northern waters, a cold that seemed to seep into one’s very soul. The dim, ethereal light of the fissuring World’s Creation illuminated the scene, revealing icebergs floating on the dark, reflective surface of the sea. Their ghostly forms cast shifting shadows, moving both slowly and swiftly, accompanying the ships on their journey.

Even the mighty bonfire, often seen as a beacon of warmth and safety, could not dispel the penetrating chill that seemed to engulf the sea. Frem, standing by the central bonfire on the deck of the Cathedral Ark, felt a sudden shift in the atmosphere. What was typically a source of heat and comfort now felt as though it radiated no warmth at all. Instead, a profound coldness, as if emanating from a bottomless abyss, seeped through, biting into his very bones.

The sound of footsteps approaching interrupted Frem, the Flame Bearer Pope, from his contemplation. He turned toward the noise and saw a priestess dressed in a black gown adorned with flame-like patterns, her face obscured by a veil, approaching him. She walked with a deliberate grace towards the bonfire, then bowed respectfully in his presence.

“Your Holiness, we have navigated through Frost’s waters and have just received communication from the vessels of the Storm Church. They have confirmed they will meet with us in thirty minutes to hand over the ‘goods,’” she informed him.

“Mm,” Frem responded, his mind still partly on the unsettling cold, “…And the archives? Are they ready to receive?”

“The storage has been arranged,” the tall orcish priestess assured him. “We have made space in our storage compartments to accommodate the incoming documents.”

Frem gave a nod, his expression one of tacit approval.

“There’s more,” the priestess added, “We’ve also received a message from Frost. Governor Tyrian sends his regards, along with a message:

“‘May the blessings of the world be upon you. Greetings to those who record and inherit. Move forward with assurance, for every effort to preserve is of value. In addition: ‘they’ have traversed the domain of flame and are now making their way to the final node.’”

Her report finished, the priestess stood silently by, awaiting any further instructions or questions from Frem, her posture embodying the solemn duty and the weight of the message she had just delivered.

Chapter 815: And Then, Death

As the fleet journeyed farther north, the chill in the air intensified, suggesting that the coldness had become an inherent characteristic of the sea that lay before them. Despite the warmth of the flames or the layers of winter clothing they wore, these measures only managed to fend off the biting cold temporarily, failing to provide true warmth.

During one particularly frigid and endless night, the Storm Church delivered its last set of documents to the Church of the Flame Bearers' Ark. This exchange occurred under the cover of darkness, with the vessel from the Storm Church docking alongside the Flame Bearers' Ark for several hours before it retreated back into the obscurity of the night.

Frem, positioned atop the Ark's high tower, watched as the departing ship's outline grew increasingly indistinct against the distant sea. The sound of steam whistles from the ship lingered in the night, blending with the wind before fading away completely.

"This may well be our final glimpse of others from the civilized world," remarked the towering pope of the forest folk, turning to address the priestess by his side. "Following this exchange, our temple will remain in the north. The Ark is not just our vessel; it is our archive, and the archive, in essence, is the Ark itself."

"We are fully prepared for what lies ahead," the priestess responded with a calm demeanor. "We will make our stand amidst the eternal ice, witnessing the last embers of light pierce through the darkness until this prolonged night comes to an end… It is a profound honor to be here with you, Your Holiness.”

Frem paused momentarily before replying softly, “The honor is mine as well.”

At the edge of his vision, far ahead of the Ark fleet, a faint white mass began to emerge from the sea.

This was the frozen expanse in the farthest reaches of the Cold Sea, the world’s most frigid region, where everything is ensnared by ice, achieving a form of eternity within its grasp. This is the final destination for the Flame Bearers.

The city-state they left behind had lost its fragment of the sun several days prior when a tugboat transported the enormous glowing object to a place where it was needed more. Now, the city relied solely on artificial lighting. The bright glow of street lamps and the lights from countless homes merged together, creating a luminous flow that traced the city’s contours, maintaining the semblance of order and tranquility that civilization clings to.

It seems that people have gradually acclimated to this prolonged darkness.

The newly implemented curfew system is functioning without a hitch, and after an initial period of unrest and confusion, factories and markets have resumed their orderly activities. Though residents have limited the frequency of their outings, they continue to uphold their daily routines within the constraints allowed. Despite a few acts of sabotage orchestrated by dissenters in the shadows against the city, these were swiftly quelled by the combined efforts of the guardians and the sheriff’s forces.

The “Sunlight Fleet,” tasked with transporting a fragment of the sun, navigates the vast ocean between city-states. Accompanying this fleet, a massive convoy of cargo ships traverses the night, successfully restoring sixty to seventy percent of the inter-city bulk logistics transportation. The periodic arrival of the “sunlight” brought by the fleet has significantly alleviated the pressures that have mounted on each city during this prolonged night. Despite the increasing occurrences of distortions and mutations, the guardians, for the first time in a long while, find a moment to catch their breath—

They are grappling with unprecedented challenges, yet it’s a welcome change from the relentless despair that once shrouded them in darkness.

At times, Tyrian finds himself contemplating the sustainability of this new status quo—a delicate balance seems to have been struck. Civilization has demonstrated remarkable resilience and adaptability throughout this enduring night. The populace has grown accustomed to the prolonged darkness, bolstered by the solidarity among city-states, the implementation of the curfew system, the establishment of a new night watch order, and the itinerant rays of sunlight. These measures appear sufficient to sustain this semblance of normalcy, potentially for an extended period, if not indefinitely.

However, such thoughts are fleeting, as Tyrian soon comes to a stark realization: this sense of tranquility is but an illusion, a temporary reprieve from the reality that the world is inexorably spiraling towards its demise, at a pace far exceeding anyone’s expectations.

This awareness stems from his understanding of the “decay” afflicting the gods, the gradual yet irreversible deterioration at the world’s foundation—knowledge inherited from his father.

But what about others? Tyrian wonders about the perception of city-state governors, church administrators, guardians, sheriffs, and the ordinary citizens. Do they, too, harbor this false sense of peace, unknowingly ensnared by this deceptive calm?

“…Maybe it’s not a bad thing,” Tyrian mutters to himself.

Caught off guard, Aiden inquires, “Huh? What’s not a bad thing?”

“Nothing, just thinking out loud,” Tyrian replies, shifting his focus from the distant city lights to gaze upon Aiden’s gleaming bald head. “What were we discussing?”

“We were talking about the need to adjust production in several factories in the lower city district,” Aiden begins, before quickly adding, “The Coordinating Committee has raised concerns about a slight shortfall in fuel production capacity. While it’s not a pressing issue at the moment, they predict it will become more severe over time…”

“I’m aware; I reviewed the report earlier today. Inform the Coordinating Committee that City Hall will provide a response by tomorrow morning,” Tyrian dismisses the topic with a wave of his hand. “Is there anything else?”

A moment of hesitation creeps into Aiden’s voice, tinged with uncertainty, “Well, there’s something… unusual reported by the Great Furnace.”

“Something unusual?” Tyrian’s expression shifted to one of mild irritation, his brow furrowing in frustration. “Please, let’s not dance around the details. Who reports in such a vague manner?”

Aiden hastily cleared his throat, realigning his posture and demeanor before responding, “There’s been a report from a department stating they’ve been without tasks for some time now. The head of that department has expressed… a sense of oddity about the situation.”

Tyrian’s concern visibly deepened, a sense of disquiet washing over him as if crucial pieces of information were eluding his grasp. “A department?

What exactly do you mean by ‘a department’? Which department are we talking about here?”

“The report was somewhat disorderly, and it landed on my desk in a state of confusion. It’s unclear who sent it. Many parts of the document are illegible…” Aiden’s explanation grew increasingly befuddled, his expression turning into one of utter bewilderment. His speech slowed, his words coming out as if he were a machine grinding to a halt, painstakingly forcing out each word: “…I just recall… they… were in charge of… incineration…”

He paused, his expression vacant, as he stared blankly at Tyrian.

After a brief moment of silence, Aiden appeared to snap back to reality, a tremor running through him before he proceeded as if the previous exchange hadn’t occurred. “…The production capacity of the metal ore mine has returned to pre-night levels. The surplus ore is currently being prepared for shipment. Upon the Sunlight Fleet’s next visit, it will be transported as scheduled…”

However, Tyrian seemed to have tuned out Aiden’s update regarding the metal ore mine. From the moment Aiden resumed speaking, Tyrian’s gaze had fixed on him with an intensity that bordered on alarming, causing Aiden to falter under the heavy, unspoken question hanging in the air: “Uh… did I say something wrong?”

“Aiden,” Tyrian’s voice was laden with a gravity that underscored the years of loyalty and service between them, “do you recall what you were just reporting to me?”

Aiden, taken aback, reviewed their conversation with a puzzled look. “The… the production capacity of the metal ore mine, adjustments in the factory production in the lower city districts, the Coordinating Committee’s concerns about fuel shortages? Before that, we discussed the Flame Bearers fleet heading north…"

He trailed off, noticing the increasingly perturbed look on Tyrian's face.

"The Great Furnace," Tyrian stated, his voice and demeanor conveying deep seriousness, "do you remember telling me about a report from a department in the Great Furnace?"

Aiden's expression blanked: "…What report?"

Tyrian remained silent, his gaze drifting toward the outskirts of the upper city district, in the direction of a particular cemetery.

As a gust of wind wound its way through the night, stirring the streets and venturing into the heart of the cemetery, it carried with it a mist of gray-white dust. Within the swirl of the wind, the figure of Agatha began to coalesce from the dust.

Today, Agatha had forsaken her bishop's solemn black attire in favor of the light armor and combat jacket she wore during her tenure as a gatekeeper. The cracks adorning her cheeks and arms, reminiscent of the fissures on a fragile doll, emanated a soft, green glow. She made her way hastily from the Silent Cathedral in the upper city district to the cemetery, yet upon her arrival, she was met with an unexpected sight.

Duncan, the towering figure wrapped in bandages who served as the cemetery's caretaker, was positioned beside a mortuary table located on a narrow path within the cemetery. He was assisting a figure that appeared to have recently been a corpse, evidenced by its neck bent at an odd angle and its head lolling to one side. The figure clumsily descended from the table, its movements rigid and accompanied by the disconcerting sound of cracking joints.

The gravekeeper Duncan, while helping the reanimated corpse down, maintained a serene demeanor: "…Yes, experiencing some headache is to be expected. Perhaps you'll feel better once you've returned… Your neck needs to be stabilized, either a wooden brace or fire tongs should suffice. Try to remain positive. Think of this as if you've simply wandered off after having a bit too much to drink. Your family won't hold this against you—they'll be glad to have you back. After all, there are many others like you."

While he was speaking, another mortuary table nearby creaked as its coffin lid was pushed open. An elderly man with white hair sat up, looking around in confusion: "Why am I lying here? My chest feels tight…"

"I'll assist you in a moment," Duncan promptly responded, moving towards him. "Please, don't try to get down by yourself. A broken limb might be somewhat more… problematic to deal with… Yes, breathe. Feeling tightness in your chest is normal after being in there for so long… that's it, deep breaths, inhale the air—"

Duncan halted mid-sentence, turning his head to acknowledge the gatekeeper, Agatha, who stood on the path, her expression one of utter astonishment.

"Oh, you've arrived," he greeted her with an air of nonchalance.

"…Mr. Duncan," Agatha, still trying to process the scene before her, managed to say, "What exactly are you doing?"

"It seems your understanding of the situation hasn't fully adjusted yet," Duncan remarked indifferently before returning his attention to his peculiar task. "As you can see, I'm helping my temporary 'guests' find their way back."

Chapter 816: Merging into the Long Night

In the graveyard, the deceased were emerging from their coffins with an unsettling persistence, their bodies meandering through the tombstones. They roamed without direction, posing questions with evident confusion, or positioned themselves on the cold, hard surfaces of the morgue slabs, lost in a bewildered state. They engaged in futile reflections and deliberations amidst the lingering discord that remained after the collapse of the familiar world they once knew, attempting to come to terms with the discomfort and ominous shadows that now plagued their existence.

The caretaker, whose duty was to oversee the cemetery and thwart any disturbances that might awaken the dead, found himself in an unusual role. He was now shepherding these resurrected beings, guiding them from their temporary graves back to their earthly homes.

The dimly lit streetlights cast a ghostly illumination over the scene, intensifying the surreal atmosphere. Agatha, despite being disconnected from the sensations of the living, felt an icy chill creeping from the depths of her being. She stood frozen by the pathway, her eyes fixed on Duncan as he escorted the reanimated deceased, one by one, out of the cemetery. It was as though she was caught in an eerie, dreamlike state.

“You’re the last one,” Duncan eventually announced to the final departed soul, a young man whose life had been claimed by violence, evidenced by the stark wound across his chest. With a blend of gentleness and assurance,

Duncan assisted the newly risen from his resting place, advising, “You recall the route to your house, don’t you? Proceed home. It’s expected to feel a sense of breathlessness; this sensation will become familiar in time… Head home, reunite with your family. Avoid overthinking; live your life to the fullest – depart from this place, move forward, and never glance back. For the foreseeable future, there’s no necessity for you to return here.”

As the last of the departed staggered off, the faint glow of the streetlight followed his departure until he merged with the obscurity of the night.

Duncan then made his way to the gatekeeper, Ms. Agatha. Beneath layers of bandages, his eyes conveyed a warmth and serenity: “My apologies for the delay, Miss Agatha.”

A wave of bewilderment washed over Agatha, bringing with it a premonition of forgetting something crucial. However, she quickly regained her composure, pressing a hand to her forehead while whispering, “The line separating life and death has blurred… Captain, what’s unfolding? There’s a strangeness permeating… the cemetery… it’s far from normal…”

She tottered slightly, her consciousness flickering as though she was on the verge of collapse.

“Take a moment, Agatha,” Duncan reassured her, extending his arm for support and guiding her gently towards a morgue slab to rest beside a coffin.

“Try to remain composed, whether you’re breathing or not,” he advised, echoing the comfort he had offered to the restless spirits earlier, “It’s normal to feel weak and a bit anxious; these feelings will diminish shortly. Tyrian has already adjusted, and so will you.”

Comforted by his presence and words, Agatha felt the turmoil within her mind begin to ebb, her thoughts stabilizing. After a brief silence, she softly inquired, “How much longer?”

“We’re on our way to the final point now, the realm ruled by the god of death. Based on what we’ve encountered before, it’s likely to be a journey of about two or three days. After we reach there, I’ll be able to assess Bartok’s condition accurately,” Duncan said, locking eyes with Agatha, whose gaze was obscured by a black veil. “However, if you’re inquiring about what lies beyond that, the ultimate end… it’s going to require more time.”

“…And what will become of our world?”

Duncan remained silent, offering only a steady, contemplative look in response.

At that moment, he was reminded of a future the Black Sun had shown him – a future where the sea forgets the motion of waves, where life loses its grasp on the art of dying, where flames no longer know how to ignite, where the wind ceases its journey, where clouds descend from their lofty heights to meet the sea…

Gods would fade into nothingness, and the world, in its descent into obscurity, would forget – this was the “decaying future.”

It stood as a bleak counterpart to the “future of flames.”

Agatha’s question went unanswered, but she sensed an understanding of the inevitable outcome within Duncan’s gaze. As the familiar conflict and contradictions in her mind began to resurface, she faintly realized… such cataclysms might not be the first to this world.

“…I’ve been through the most rigorous training and trials. I honed my abilities within the temple walls, fortified my resolve. I took an oath before the sacred statue of the Lord to use my strength and faith to safeguard those under our care…”

Her words trailed off, a chilling sensation penetrating her consciousness as if her thoughts were being encased in ice. Her voice, carrying through the cold night air, seemed to originate from one grave and resonate into another.

“But how can I safeguard them under these circumstances? Captain Duncan, when the very foundations of our world are crumbling…”

“You are safeguarding them, and everyone in this city is contributing to its protection in their own unique ways – preserving the way of life, the memories, everything,” Duncan interrupted her with a deep, resonant voice. “I understand that despite our efforts, everything is gradually inching towards oblivion. The ‘memory’ of the world is slipping away, like sand escaping a clenched fist. Holding on tighter might slow the process, but no one is to blame.”

He then turned his gaze towards the cemetery path and the morgue slabs alongside it, which had now fallen silent.

Some slabs still displayed the scars of bullets and blades, adorned with flowers laid by the living in memory of the dead, and even… what appeared to be fresh tear marks.

This place had witnessed conflicts over the border between life and death, mourners paying tribute to those who had departed, and now it rested in silence. It was likely that, for a considerable time to come, it would no longer welcome any “visitors.”

Over time, the significance of cemeteries would fade from collective memory, leading to their inevitable neglect. The transition from life to death would become a mere change of state, eliciting no concern or attention. Bartok’s role within the priesthood would grow dim, and the notion of a church dedicated to death would evolve into a concept that, while natural, remains beyond the comprehension of many, with no one seeking to understand it. In this dwindling world, a new adaptation would arise –

“ignorance” would emerge as a kind of mercy bestowed upon beings. This ignorance serves to shield the fragile minds of mortals from the harsh reality of rot and decay that festers unseen.

Agatha experienced the chill of the air filling her lungs and then slowly releasing. It dawned on her that she hadn’t taken a breath in quite some time. After her physical demise, she had increasingly embraced her identity among the deceased, gradually losing the instinct to “breathe.”

But in that moment, she found herself breathing effortlessly once again.

The darkness of the night tenderly wrapped around the world, clearing the fog from her mind, soothing all her disquiet.

Beside her, Captain Duncan’s voice resonated, his words offering calm and assurance.

“Agatha, did you know? Humans are actually capable of seeing their own noses – it obstructs a significant portion of their field of vision. When both eyes focus, it casts a theoretically unavoidable shadow.”

“Yet, your brain has adapted to this ‘problem.’ It learns to overlook the shadow, cleverly filling in the gaps in your perception with its remarkable imagination. Only from certain angles and in specific conditions does the existence of this ‘blind spot’ become apparent.”

“Furthermore, owing to the way our nervous system is structured, we actually perceive the world upside down. The brain expends considerable effort to invert the images relayed by our nerves to present them the right way up – leading to situations where neurological anomalies cause some individuals to perceive everything upside down, struggling to navigate their environment.”

“Such are the imperfections of human beings that their brains must engage in a process of ignoring, forgetting, and even deceiving themselves to navigate this world logically."

"Similarly, this world possesses a 'correction' mechanism akin to that of the human brain – concealing those dreadful inconsistencies and contradictions under its guise. Though these issues continue to accumulate, and the world gradually declines… this arrangement represents the best effort 'They' could muster."

"Agatha, this world is so flawed that its architects had to rely on a strategy of neglect, oblivion, and self-deception to ensure you could live sensibly within it. And now, we are approaching the limits of this process."

"It's like sand escaping between our fingers."

"But 'They' did the best they could."

Duncan withdrew his gaze from the horizon, his attention returning to the gatekeeper seated on the morgue slab.

"…I will return to the cathedral," Agatha declared softly.

A faint greenish glow emanated from within her shattered form, concentrated where her eyes once shone with life.

"People will flock to the cathedral in search of solace, and there will be other clergy like myself, momentarily lost in confusion and distress. They depend on me – and beyond that, when this 'phase' momentarily ceases, I shall persist in performing my sacred obligations… I belong among the faithful, ensuring the continuity of their lives, even if it's just for one additional day. And then…"

With a gentle sigh, she gracefully descended from the morgue slab, her movements reflecting agility.

Standing in the darkness, she resembled a resolute monument, her past days of devotion within the cathedral, garbed in long ceremonial robes, in no way lessening her presence as a guardian.

“Then, the situation may deteriorate further,” Duncan’s voice resonated nearby, “Life has lost its grasp on the concept of death, and perhaps flames will next forget their essence to ignite. Wind and clouds, light and darkness, numerous elements will slowly succumb to this relentless decay – and the ‘correction’ mechanisms of the world will be stretched to their limits. There will be those who awaken in the darkness, confronting the true terror of our existence. By that time…”

Agatha lifted her gaze, meeting Captain Duncan’s eyes with determination. A gentle wind began to stir around her, and her form started to disintegrate into ashes, carried away by the breeze.

A smile graced her face.

“I will continue to uphold my duties and wait with patience – we all have our respective roles to fulfill, don’t we?”

Duncan offered a soft nod in agreement.

As Agatha’s essence transformed into a whirlwind of ash, it blended into the nocturnal air, leaving the silent graveyard behind.

Chapter 817: The Journey Nears Its End

The atmosphere aboard the Vanished was heavy with a foreboding sense of conclusion as the ship and the Bright Star traversed through a serene yet monotonous landscape dominated by shades of gray and white. The impending end seemed to hang in the air, palpable to all aboard, even though Duncan refrained from vocalizing the sentiment.

In the dining area of the Vanished, the crew had gathered, with Lucretia relinquishing control of her ship to the unlikely pair of a doll named Luni and a rabbit named Rabbi, joining the rest at the long table.

Beside Duncan sat the enigmatic figure known as the “Sea Witch,” accompanied by Nilu, a diminutive doll recently welcomed into the crew of the Bright Star. It was Nilu’s first appearance among them, perched delicately on her mistress’s shoulder, her tiny hands gripping Lucretia’s hair as she observed her surroundings with wide-eyed curiosity.

Noticing Nilu’s elegant appearance, Shirley couldn’t resist the temptation to play a prank. “Hey-ha—”

Startled, Nilu let out a surprised cry, clutching onto Lucretia’s hair tightly for comfort.

Observing Nilu’s reaction, Lucretia gently reassured the doll, listening as Nilu softly confessed, “She frightened me.”

Shirley, feigning innocence, quickly diverted her attention back to the ongoing briefing led by the captain.

Seemingly unperturbed by the minor disturbance, Duncan shifted the conversation towards the challenges posed by the Boundless Sea.

“In the cities, the undead mingle with the living, rendering graveyards and crematoriums obsolete. The dead wander aimlessly, while the living exist in a state of listless stagnation, with the natural cycles of life and death disrupted. To outsiders, these distortions are unfathomable, yet they’ve become the unsettling norm, either rationalized or ignored.”

“The plight of the Storm Church mirrors that of the Death Church. Their fundamental beliefs have twisted into unrecognizable, heretical forms, yet daily life continues as if nothing is awry. However, this adaptation to a ‘corrected’ reality is unsustainable.”

A somber silence fell over the group, with Shirley’s earlier levity replaced by a sober mood in the wake of Duncan’s chilling portrayal.

Turning to Vanna, Duncan inquired gently, “How are you coping?”

Visibly distressed, Vanna furrowed her brow and replied, “Reconstructing one’s cognition isn’t a simple task.” Contemplating Duncan’s words, she managed a wistful smile and shook her head. “I had almost forgotten about ‘the waves.’ This unexpected encounter has stirred those memories, leaving me feeling as though the fabric of reality itself is unraveling.”

Vanna paused, her expression conveying intense concentration as she grappled with articulating her complex emotions. “It’s like there are two conflicting ‘cognitive systems’ battling in my mind. One part of me is keenly aware of certain truths, while another refuses to acknowledge them, dismissing them as incomprehensible or non-existent. It’s as if both perceptions have firmly rooted themselves in my consciousness, like…”

Her voice trailed off as she sought an analogy to encapsulate her inner conflict.

“Perhaps something akin to ‘hydrophobia’?” Duncan interjected calmly.

“Yes, that feeling of believing ‘water is poisonous’…” Vanna mused, nodding slowly. “Indeed. The battles waged within the mind are always more challenging than those in the physical realm.”

With a pensive expression, Duncan shared his strategy for addressing Vanna’s cognitive dissonance. “I had contemplated the necessity of reinforcing and stabilizing your cognition,” he began, his gaze scanning the assembled group. There was a hint of a green fire dancing in his eyes as if reaching out to touch the essence of their beings, binding their consciousness more closely to his vision. “However, considering what lies ahead, it is crucial for me to bestow upon you these flames. Only with them could you serve as my most reliable ‘anchor.’”

Lucretia reacted subtly to Duncan’s proclamation. Though she appeared poised to offer her own insights, she ultimately remained silent, her attention firmly fixed on her father.

Pressing on, Duncan outlined the next phase of their journey with unwavering focus. “Our next destination is Bartok’s ‘node,’ the final point of the ‘external barrier’ fashioned by the four gods. Completing the final mark there will allow the Vanished to circle back to the Leviathan Islands—the origin of our journey. Upon reaching that point, our explorations beyond known boundaries will draw to a close.”

With a sweeping gesture encompassing everyone at the table, Duncan lowered his voice to a whisper as he surveyed the faces of those who had shared this journey with him, finally settling his gaze on Nina.

Nina symbolized his initial connection to this world—the first ‘human’ he encountered and a pillar of humanity within this sanctuary.

Sensing the weight of Duncan’s thoughts, Nina broke the silence. “Once we reach that point, will you continue alone?”

Duncan’s response was resolute. “Yes.”

“And will this journey be fraught with peril? Is it a place far beyond our reach?” Nina sought clarification.

Duncan pondered her questions thoughtfully. “It’s not a matter of being ‘dangerous’ or ‘safe.’ It’s a task uniquely mine, beyond the understanding of others. I am venturing into a realm beyond the very edge of our world, a place so remote that even the gods hold no sway there—a distance immeasurable by any standard. Yes, it is exceedingly far.”

“Will you find your way back to us afterward?” Nina’s voice conveyed a blend of hope and concern as she reiterated her question.

“Yes, I will return,” Duncan affirmed with a certainty that left little room for doubt.

Nina’s expression registered surprise at his declaration, her brow furrowing slightly.

“Are you sure? You won’t leave us waiting in vain?” Her skepticism was evident in her tone.

“Absolutely. Should there come a time when you await my return, know that I would indeed come back, without fail,” Duncan promised, his assurance unwavering.

Nina’s expression grew more pensive, her brow furrowing as she absorbed Duncan’s assurances. It was at this moment that Morris, who had been silent until now, posed a question that redirected the conversation: “What role do we play in all of this?”

Duncan turned to address Morris directly, his explanation deliberate and clear. “Once the Vanished embarks on its final journey, you and the crew will take charge of the Bright Star,” he instructed. “Agatha will utilize her abilities to create a ‘reflection’ of the Vanished, effectively linking it to the Bright Star. You will navigate following the Sea Song’s course, traveling from the domain of the Storm Goddess back to the vast expanse of the Boundless Sea.”

“Your return voyage will include stops at the city-states of Frost, Pland, and Wind Harbor. Additionally, you will rendezvous with Lawrence, who is currently stationed at Morpheus’s western frontier. With this arrangement, I will gain a comprehensive understanding of our world. Remain vigilant for my instructions; a significant event is imminent.”

Vanna reacted with a blend of curiosity and concern. “A significant event?”

Duncan’s response was measured yet profound. “The end of our world,” he declared. “I intend to orchestrate an orderly conclusion to our current existence before the underlying ‘mathematical machinery’ that sustains it completely unravels. It is crucial that we preserve the essence of our world beforehand.”

While the concept of a ‘mathematical machine’ may have been beyond the grasp of some, the mention of ‘the end of the world’ resonated deeply, sparking a shared moment of contemplation.

Shirley’s reaction punctuated the ensuing silence, a mix of astonishment and disbelief in her voice: “…Oh my…”

Yet, the rest of the group’s response was notably composed, a testament to their trust in Duncan.

Observing their reactions, Duncan couldn’t help but smile. “It seems you have a great deal of faith in me,” he remarked, appreciating the trust they had placed in him.

Vanna responded with a smile tinged with respect and gratitude. “After everything we’ve experienced in Pland, Frost, and Wind Harbor, how could we not trust you?” she pointed out. “You’ve had numerous opportunities to cause destruction, yet you’ve chosen preservation. If you were to propose something that seemed harmful, I would sooner doubt my own judgment than question yours.”

Duncan chuckled softly, recalling a past encounter. “Gomona would surely find it amusing. Weren’t you the one who greeted me with a flying chop when we first met?”

A hint of embarrassment colored Vanna’s cheeks. “You weren’t supposed to bring that up again,” she lightly admonished him.

Steering the conversation back to the broader picture, Duncan reassured them once more. “The ‘end’ of our current world is a necessary step toward the creation of a new one, a world where peace is everlasting. I’ve devised a plan to transition everything of value from this world to the next. You can trust in that.”

Driven by a blend of curiosity and concern, Shirley posed another question. “What comes after the end? Where do we stand in the aftermath? And what about you? How soon will this ‘new world’ you speak of come into being?”

Meeting her questioning gaze with a reassuring smile, Duncan responded softly, “Blink your eyes.”

Following his instruction, Shirley blinked, her expression one of puzzled anticipation.

“In the time it took you to blink, the new world would have arrived for you,” Duncan revealed, his voice carrying a promise of swift and profound change.

Chapter 818: Warmth and Cold

As the journey to the death node neared its conclusion, the monotonous grey-white expanse outside the ship began to reveal subtle changes. Thin black lines slowly materialized against the backdrop, hinting at structures emerging in the distance. These silhouettes grew more defined, gradually unfolding before the eyes of those aboard the Vanished and the members of the Bright Star's crew.

Duncan, having witnessed such sights on his voyages, found the scene unfolding before him to carry a unique sense of solitude and elongation this time around.

He stood silently at the front of the Vanished, patiently awaiting the end of their current leap through space, when he heard footsteps approaching from behind. Without the need to look back, he recognized the presence of his companion.

"Lucy," he spoke softly, acknowledging her without turning around, "we're nearing our destination."

"I'm aware," Lucretia replied as she joined Duncan at the ship's bow, gazing alongside him at the landscape gradually transforming in the distance. "This is the final node, isn't it? After this, we return to the Storm Goddess's haven. Every journey must come to an end."

Duncan exhaled a gentle sigh, a mix of resignation and sorrow in his voice. "I'm sorry that I must embark on the next part of our journey alone," he confessed, feeling a swell of emotions despite knowing he was merely inhabiting an “avatar.” The complexity of his feelings in Lucretia’s presence left him questioning which of these emotions genuinely belonged to him or “Duncan Abnomar.”

Lucretia cut him off, her voice carrying a mix of warmth and seriousness, “You’ve fulfilled your promise by bringing me to the world’s end.”

She faced Duncan, her gaze steady and her demeanor composed, yet a hint of humor soon broke through as she laughed lightly. “What did you expect? That I would dissolve into tears, clinging to you to prevent you from embarking on what needs to be done? Or that I would lash out in anger, leaving you with a heavy heart as you set out on this crucial voyage? Did you think I would let my disappointment jeopardize the world’s hope at this critical moment?”

Duncan, faced with Lucretia’s laughter and resilience, found himself at a loss for words, managing only a resigned smile and a shrug in response.

Lucretia inhaled deeply, her smile serene as she locked eyes with Duncan. “I’m no longer a child, Papa. I can’t deter you from making your next move, nor can I offer a better solution to the problem at hand. The best I can do is smile in this moment… That’s something you taught me.”

Duncan responded with honesty, “I don’t recall teaching you that.”

“To smile at each goodbye,” Lucretia reminded him softly, cherishing the memory, “so if we never meet again, our last memory of each other will be one of happiness, not sorrow.”

Duncan remained silent, choosing not to mar the moment with questions about Lucretia and Tyrian’s final farewell to the captain of the Vanished—a century prior—when it set sail toward the eternal horizon.

After a brief pause, Lucretia raised her hand, her gaze locked firmly on Duncan.

Duncan, somewhat perplexed, looked at her. “What?”

“High-five,” Lucretia proposed simply.

“High-five?” Duncan echoed, his confusion evident in his slight frown.

“Promise me you’ll come back. Then, we high-five,” Lucretia explained, her voice steady and calm. She looked up at Duncan, standing tall at the bow against the backdrop of slowly shifting black lines in the distance. It seemed to her as if Duncan’s silhouette was about to merge into the changing patterns of light and shadow. For a moment, she was transported back to a sun-bleached afternoon at the dock, with her father standing silent and statuesque at the plank to the Vanished.

“High-five. Promise me and my brother you’ll return safely.” Those were the words she had uttered back then.

Back when she was much younger, not yet known as the “sea witch,” she couldn’t recall whether she had been smiling at that moment—likely not, as she wasn’t as emotionally resilient and seasoned as she is now.

In her memory, Duncan eventually turned and walked away in silence.

But the warm touch and the sound of their palms meeting snapped Lucretia back to the present. She saw her father smiling, his hand enveloping hers in a reassuring gesture, reminiscent of the farewells he offered each time he departed from their home during her and her brother’s childhood.

Suddenly, the dark silhouette in the distance swelled, filling their entire field of vision outside the Vanished and the Bright Star. The grey-white backdrop seemed to silently collapse, and a distorted voice echoed in everyone’s mind: “…jump… stop.”

Before Lucretia and Duncan unfolded a vast, colorless wilderness, a landscape devoid of any hues except for shades of black, white, and grey. There were no shores, no seas, only a barren expanse where black and white grass grew untamed, waving in the wind in eerie silence, like the quiet waves of death.

The Vanished and the Bright Star sailed above these undulating grasses, silently traversing this desolate wilderness under the cloak of perpetual night.

…

The night appeared endless as if the sun would never rise again.

Frem stood beside the roaring bonfire on the Ark of the Flame Bearers, his gaze wandering back towards the path they had traveled from, towards the fringes of civilization. Yet, all he could see was boundless darkness, with the World's Creation emitting a cold, pale glow over the sea, reflecting like a mirror. It seemed as if from the distant past to the far future, the world had always been ensconced in this somber state.

He turned his attention back to the bonfire, continuing his prayers in its flickering light.

The cold northern winds whispered secrets in his ear, mingling with the deep, mechanical groans from within the ark. Occasionally, the distant sounds of ice shattering or continuous thunderous roars broke the silence—ominous noises made by the ark's ice-breaking prow as it navigated through the ice-laden waters.

The Ark of the Flame Bearers ventured further north, having passed the series of "northern city-states," including Frost, and now entered what was once deemed the "end of civilization": the frigid ocean.

In this icy realm, the vast expanse of the sea was replaced by endless layers of ice that stretched into the darkness. Mist rose from the depths of these ice fields, reaching up to meld with the sky. Illuminated by the enigmatic light of the World's Creation, the entire landscape was bathed in a uniform, eerie silver glow that, paradoxically, seemed to shimmer with a sort of “brightness.”

After what felt like an eternity immersed in prayer, Frem opened his eyes, a frown creasing his brow as if he’d sensed an anomaly. Shadows, indistinct and fleeting, separated from the surrounding darkness, moving toward the great bonfire at the forefront.

As the figure representing historical continuity merged into the flames, Frem gave a subtle nod and summoned an attendant of the Flame Bearers, who was always on standby nearby. He whispered a set of instructions to the attendant, who then departed to carry them out. Before long, deep, mechanical sounds resonated from within the Ark of the Flame Bearers. This feat of engineering marvel began to adjust its trajectory with precision, simultaneously recalibrating its ice-breaking mechanism to continue its voyage deeper into the ice fields. Amidst the sound of ice being shattered, a series of disconcerting, sharp noises could also be heard.

A priestess, dressed in a black robe and veil, quickly approached Frem next to the bonfire. “Your Holiness, we’ve suffered a malfunction in one of the transmission shafts within the ice-breaking mechanism,” she reported urgently.

“Is it still operational?” Frem inquired.

“The mechanism’s efficiency has decreased by thirty percent, but it remains functional,” the priestess responded promptly. “However, the chief mechanical priest has warned that the failure of the initial transmission shaft is likely to set off a domino effect. There’s a risk that additional shafts may fail within the next five to seven days, potentially rendering the ice-breaking mechanism inoperative.”

Frem shook his head slowly, his response measured. “That’s acceptable for now. The ice-breaking enhancement was always meant to be a temporary measure. This vessel wasn’t originally designed for ice navigation,” he explained, displaying a calm demeanor. “Don’t worry. We’re nearing our destination.”

The priestess glanced towards the great bonfire, a beacon in their icy surroundings. “Is the ‘direction’ given by the Lord directly ahead?”

“Yes,” Frem confirmed with a gentle nod. “The Lord revealed to me through the vision in the flames that we are approaching a pivotal moment in the real dimension’s historical continuum. Transporting these critical archival documents to this location is essential for leaving ‘traces.’ Though the Lord’s guidance has grown increasingly indistinct, and the exact nature of these ‘traces’ remains unclear to me, their significance is undeniable.”

The priestess offered no further questions. Instead, she bowed her head in devout prayer before the great bonfire. While she harbored no expectation of receiving divine communication—as such messages had long been exclusive to the Pope—prayer had ingrained itself into the daily routine of the clergy, becoming a source of comfort even in the absence of direct responses.

The biting cold of the ice sea, capable of penetrating to the bone, was relentless. Despite this, the clergy and crew aboard the ark found themselves gradually acclimating to the frigid conditions. Those who had initially fallen ill due to the cold were beginning to recover, a small yet positive development in their challenging journey.

Concluding her prayer, the priestess rose, and the cold wind was a sharp reminder of their harsh environment. “I’ll inform the engineering team to maximize the operational lifespan of the ice-breaking mechanism. We need to keep those hydraulic hammers active until we reach the ‘focal point.’ Should the mechanism fail entirely, we’ll resort to explosives. We’ve prepared a substantial stockpile for such an eventuality.”

Frem acknowledged her plan with a slight nod.

The priestess offered a respectful bow before departing. Yet, she paused for a moment to cast another glance at the great bonfire, its flames casting more shadows than warmth. “This fire is so cold.”

Chapter 819: The Stagnant Land of the Dead

In an expansive wasteland where the colors black, white, and gray dominated the landscape, a relentless and bone-chilling wind swept across the terrain without pause. The grass moved in waves, and the surrounding plants, devoid of any color other than black and white, swayed without life in the gusts. Occasionally, small, faint lights would emerge from the grass, floating and drifting above this desolate expanse like lost souls wandering in a forgotten realm of the dead.

This entire land was bathed in a dim, perpetual twilight, under a sky that was clear of fog or clouds, yet filled with swirling, murky patches of color that danced endlessly.

The Vanished and the Bright Star moved silently through this desolate expanse. This bizarre occurrence defied explanation, so Lucretia dispatched two toys from the ship to explore the “land” beyond. They confirmed that beneath the undulating grass was indeed solid ground. Yet, both vessels continued to glide over this vast terrain, their hulls cutting through the earth as though they were navigating waters, blurring the line between the concepts of “sea” and “wilderness.”

At Duncan’s behest, both ships slowed their pace, navigating carefully under the never-ending night sky. Shirley ascended to the scout’s nest atop the mast, scanning the horizon, yet all she could see was the endless wilderness. The land was flat, save for slight undulations, with no structures or notable landmarks in sight—not even the smallest hill.

After a time of aimless journeying, the ships gradually came to a halt, as if marooned in this boundless and uninterrupted wasteland.

“Given the unusual circumstances we faced at the ‘Island of Ashes’ previously, we must tread carefully this time,” Duncan addressed his crew gravely after assembling them on the deck. “We mustn’t leave the ship without due caution. Right now, understanding the ‘rules’ of this ‘Dead Wilderness’ is paramount.”

“We should seek advice from an expert,” Morris interjected promptly. “Miss Agatha might have insights into the realm of the dead…”

No sooner had the aged scholar spoken than a shadowy figure materialized on the deck, and Agatha’s voice, carrying a mysterious and otherworldly tremble, filled the air: “I’m attempting to decipher our current predicament, though it may be quite complex.”

She took a brief pause, seemingly gathering her thoughts, and then proceeded to elucidate, “According to ancient texts, those who find themselves in the Dead Wilderness are set upon a ‘Path of No Return’ that winds through the wilderness. This path stretches indefinitely, with only one direction to follow. Those who have passed away walk this path, gradually losing memories of their earthly lives. Along the way, they will meet the ‘Gatekeepers,’ messengers who guide the deceased further into the realm of the dead.”

“The Gatekeepers are tasked with leading the deceased along unseen pathways, traversing the entire wilderness in a mere moment to arrive at the heart of the realm of the dead—a place marked by a colossal gate. It is here that the departed glimpse the silhouette of Bartok guarding the entrance. Under its watchful presence, they shed all earthly burdens and impurities, entering through the gate in a state of purity, to embrace eternal peace," Agatha detailed the beliefs of the death church.

In this belief system, unlike what Duncan was accustomed to, there was no notion of reincarnation. Death marked a final transition into perpetual rest, not a cycle of return to the living world.

This revelation piqued Shirley's interest. "So, does this mean that everyone just… goes to sleep behind that gate after they die? But what if there's no more room? People continue to die, after all…"

As Shirley pondered out loud, Alice, who had just descended from the helm, joined in the speculation with a soft voice, "Wouldn't that make it crowded? Are they piled on top of each other as they sleep?"

Shirley, leaning closer to Alice, whispered a humorous theory, "Maybe they sleep standing up, packed tightly like bamboo skewers, stacking vertically until there's no more space, and then they start stacking horizontally on top, creating layers—one horizontal, then another vertical, and so forth…"

"But wouldn't the ones at the bottom feel crushed by the weight?" Alice pondered.

"No, I've heard that the dead don't weigh anything…" Shirley answered.

As the conversation between Shirley and Alice took a turn into the absurd, Duncan, noticing the increasingly bizarre atmosphere, felt compelled to intervene. "Ahem… perhaps you could keep this discussion between yourselves."

Shirley quickly recoiled, nodding in understanding, "Oh, right…"

Duncan redirected the conversation back to Agatha. "You mentioned that our situation is 'somewhat complicated'… Could you elaborate?"

Agatha affirmed, “To put it simply, according to the sacred texts, outsiders require a ‘passage’ and ‘guidance’ to meet the god of death. However, it appears that this guiding mechanism has faltered.”

Duncan’s frown deepened as he grasped the implications.

Lucretia and Morris, standing by, showed signs of realization as well. Morris, pipe in mouth, expressed concern, “It seems the world’s death mechanism has ceased to function…”

“Indeed, with the disappearance of the death mechanism, the ‘Gatekeepers’ that usher souls across the Dead Wilderness are absent as well,” Agatha continued with a solemn tone, her gaze drifting towards the endless wilderness beyond the ship. “Without the deceased to initiate the ‘Path of No Return’ and the presence of ‘Gatekeepers,’ what remains is merely this wilderness. And although the giant gate and the lord of death theoretically reside at the center of this realm, reaching it without the proper guidance is an impossibility.”

Nina, who had been silently absorbing the conversation with rapt attention, suddenly found herself unable to contain her curiosity any longer. Her eyes widened as she alternated her gaze between Duncan and Agatha, before finally voicing her thoughts, “Do we really need specific conditions like ‘paths’ and ‘guidance’? Isn’t there some other way we could approach this? Perhaps some kind of ritual or something along those lines…”

Agatha responded with a gentle shake of her head, conveying a sense of regret. “I’m afraid there aren’t alternative paths available. Symbolism plays a vital role when it comes to matters involving the gods. It’s about recreating specific events according to very precise rules. And given the unique nature of the realm governed by the god of death, the regulations here are even more stringent than in other domains. This is essential to maintain a clear separation between the realms of the living and the dead.”

She paused, a complex expression crossing her face as she continued, “At least, that was the case before the death mechanism vanished from our world.”

Breaking the ensuing silence, Vanna chimed in with a thought-provoking question, “So, if we were to find a ‘deceased’ person, could it potentially reactivate the guiding mechanism here and open up the pathway to the grand gate guarded by Bartok?”

Agatha replied cautiously, confirming Vanna’s theory based on her understanding of the sacred texts. “That’s one interpretation, yes. But it’s not guaranteed to be straightforward. The scriptures speak of the world as it was in ‘normal’ times, and much has changed since then. Even the gods… have been altered into forms beyond their own recognition.”

Vanna nodded, seeing a potential direction in Agatha’s words. “It gives us something to work with, at least. It’s a starting point, better than aimlessly wandering this wilderness.”

However, Morris quickly highlighted a significant obstacle to this theory, his voice muffled slightly by his pipe. “The real challenge is finding a deceased person now that the concept of ‘death’ seems to have been erased from the world.”

This remark cast a strange pause over the group, prompting uneasy glances among the crew.

Attention turned to Agatha, who promptly clarified her position with a raised hand, “Don’t look at me. In the strictest sense, I’m not ‘dead.’ I exist merely as a fading shadow. I never truly ‘lived’ in the conventional sense, so I can’t be considered ‘dead.’”

Then, as eyes shifted to Vanna, she quickly dismissed the notion, “And I’m not a valid candidate either, right? Yes, I died once, but was revived. My continued existence has been affirmed by the captain, so I don't fit the criteria of being truly deceased…"

She trailed off, adding with a note of uncertainty, "At least, not in the full sense of the word?"

"I'm out of the question too—I've become a shadow demon after being reborn," Shirley quickly asserted, noticing the gaze of the group turning her way. She waved off the speculation, "Even though I've died once, the current me, being reborn, means I'm beyond the reach of Bartok's 'Gatekeeper'…"

Duncan surveyed his crew, his expression turning thoughtful as he stroked his chin, a hint of bemusement in his voice. "It's rather odd, isn't it? That on this ship, it seems we're devoid of both the living and the dead as traditionally defined…"

While musing aloud, Duncan's gaze inadvertently fell upon Morris, who was engaged in an unusual activity. The old man was holding an unlit pipe in one hand and a screwdriver in the other, meticulously adjusting something at the back of his head with a series of mechanical clicks.

Catching the captain's inquisitive look, Morris hurriedly tucked the screwdriver away, a faint buzzing of springs emanating from his chest. "Apologies for the racket—seems a screw's gone loose in my noggin," he explained, almost casually.

A hush fell over the assembled group on the deck, each member exchanging silent glances that spoke volumes of their shared bewilderment.

Amidst this contemplative silence, Alice, emerging from a moment of distraction, leaned closer to Shirley and whispered, her mind still tangled in their previous musings, "…Could it be that they are like how Sailor sleeps, by hanging…"

Shirley, caught off guard by the sudden return to a seemingly abandoned line of discussion from earlier, replied incredulously, “Are you still on that topic? We’ve moved on countless times since then…”

Her voice trailed off as a thought struck the demon girl, “Wait, who did you just bring up?”

“Sailor, he likes to pretend to be sleeping by hanging,” Alice clarified, unfazed.

Slowly, Shirley turned her attention back to Duncan, a new line of inquiry forming in her mind. “Speaking of which… why hasn’t that mummy joined us yet?”

“He’s likely below deck at this moment, probably shirking his duties again,” Duncan acknowledged, his brow furrowing at the realization. “But that brings us to another question… Can Anomaly 077 be considered ‘deceased’ in the conventional sense? Somehow, his ‘death’ seems less genuine than that of others here.”

His gaze lingered thoughtfully on Agatha, Vanna, and Shirley, each embodying their unique state of being between life and death.

Sensing the situation’s oddity, Shirley remarked, “Captain, you have an unusual way of putting things…”

To which Duncan responded, his eyes widening in mock surprise, “Isn’t the nature of our entire conversation unusually strange?”

Chapter 820: Forgery

In theory, Anomaly 077 didn’t conform to the traditional definition of a deceased being. Despite this, the crew unanimously agreed that it was worth an attempt – that they should at least try.

Therefore, approximately twelve minutes later, Sailor found himself unexpectedly jolted from his slumber in a secluded corner of the lower deck by a sudden surge of frantic and disorderly footsteps. As he opened his eyes, the sight that greeted him was the captain, urgently leading the entire crew in his direction. Before Sailor had a chance to gather his thoughts, Vanna swiftly approached and, grabbing him by the collar, lifted him off the ground.

Witnessing such an unprecedented scenario, Sailor experienced a chill of fear and anticipation run through him as he caught the eager and intense gazes of his shipmates. Attempting to retreat, he stammered, “I… I was merely seeking a quiet spot to rest, surely that doesn’t breach any crew regulations… And even if it somehow does, you can’t all possibly be thinking of reprimanding me through physical means, can you?”

“Quit your feigning; you’re incapable of sleep anyway,” Duncan emerged from the throng, scrutinizing Anomaly 077 closely, “There’s a matter of utmost importance that requires your attention.”

“A matter of utmost importance?” Sailor, puzzled, swiftly straightened his attire and adjusted his stance, alert to Vanna’s impending actions (he remained apprehensive that the formidable and attractive woman might unintentionally inflict harm on him with a mere touch) and inquired with curiosity, “What matter could that be? Haven’t we just reached the domain of the God of Death? Are we considering retreat already?”

Duncan dismissed the question with a gesture, cutting directly to the core of the issue: “The reason is precisely because we’ve arrived at the domain of the God of Death – we now necessitate a deceased individual to attempt to awaken the guide here.”

Confounded, Sailor needed a moment to digest this information, then, turning his bewildered gaze towards Dog in the corner, he uttered, “… What?”

“In simpler terms, due to the ‘decay’ affecting the God of Death, the process governing death in the mortal realm has ceased. Consequently, with the cessation of this process, no new deceased are arriving in this barren landscape, leading to the absence of both the gatekeeper and the Path of No Return,” Dog elucidated with patience, despite being unclear why he was the one providing the explanation, “The ‘entrance’ to the God of Death’s realm is concealed within a location that can only be accessed through a specific ‘guidance ritual’. Our current objective is to reawaken the gatekeeper here – to put it bluntly, we require a deceased individual.”

With a slightly better understanding, Sailor paused for a moment of silent contemplation before hesitantly pointing towards himself and stating, somewhat confusedly: “I’m not entirely deceased, though… although it’s true that I’ve been heading in that direction. Why not consider Lady Agatha for this task? She appears to be more deceased than I am, considering I still possess some physical form, whereas her soul seems even more diminished…”

“We’ve deliberated over it, and concluded that neither Agatha, Vanna, nor Shirley meet the necessary criteria,” Morris interjected with a sigh, his gaze fixed on the somewhat desiccated figure before him with a mixture of emotions, “However, it seems you don’t quite meet the criteria either – while you are technically a corpse, there are many like you who remain active in the mortal world today. Such ‘undead’ beings appear incapable of drawing the ‘gatekeeper’s’ notice.”

“Given the current situation, it’s uncertain whether the ‘gatekeeper’ of the realm of death still exists,” Sailor commented with a shrug. “They might have vanished along with the ‘decay’ that affected Bartok. After all, these ‘gatekeepers’ are fundamentally intertwined with the death mechanism itself…”

Morris wore a look of contemplation, his brow furrowed in thought, when Duncan’s attention was drawn to a shadow on the wall that appeared to tremble slightly. With curiosity sparking in his eyes, he inquired, “Agatha? Is something the matter?”

Breaking the lingering silence, Agatha proposed, “I was wondering… perhaps we could simulate a state of death using ‘Sailor’ as a model to determine if the ‘gatekeeper’ of this realm still lingers among us. It might just work.”

Duncan, caught off guard, questioned, “…You believe that’s possible?”

“I once served as a ‘gatekeeper,’ albeit in the realm of the living. However, there’s a sort of ‘mirror’ effect between the gatekeepers of the living and those of the dead, reflecting the ‘symmetry’ inherent to the God of Death,” Agatha elaborated. “During my training, which remains vivid in my memory, I learned how to ‘communicate’ with the gatekeepers of the dead world once a soul departs its mortal coil. These ‘conversations’ revealed that the judgments of the ‘other side’s gatekeepers’ concerning the deceased are not infallible. At times, they mistakenly linger around those who are not yet dead, and such ‘errors’… can be manipulated.”

Shirley, catching up with the conversation, expressed her concern: “Wait, is that even permissible? It sounds rather dark!”

“Absolutely not, it’s blasphemous,” Agatha responded with a casual shrug. “To deceive the emissary of divinity and disrupt the balance of life and death, to the extent of beckoning death itself – ordinarily, such acts would merit a death sentence.”

Shirley quickly interjected with a question: “I’m curious, for a priest of death, would such a sentence be considered a promotion or a dismissal…”

Duncan gestured for Shirley to hold her thoughts, silencing her speculative query (despite having pondered it himself), and then directed his gaze towards Agatha: “Is this really okay?”

“It’s fine. Given that the very fabric of life and death has unraveled, along with the old doctrines and the authority they once held… who besides me even remembers them?” Agatha mused, her shadow casting a seemingly rueful smile in the flickering light, “Besides, no one is left to pass such a sentence on me.”

After a brief pause, observing the indistinct shadow, Duncan nodded in agreement: “Alright, let’s proceed. What are our first steps?”

“Firstly, we must distance ourselves from the Vanished. Aboard this vessel, not even the ‘gatekeeper’s’ gaze can pierce through,” Agatha stated promptly. “Next, we require ‘Sailor’s’ cooperation. I will transform him into the likeness of a ‘deceased,’ though he need not do anything except follow my guidance. And finally… this is for Sailor.”

Her attention then shifted to Anomaly 077, who was nearby: “You must remember, regardless of what appears before you, do not follow it – the allure of the gatekeeper’s beckoning is irresistible to the deceased. Even though you aren’t truly dead and possess the capacity to resist, it will undoubtedly be a formidable challenge.”

“Rest assured, I won’t be lured away,” Anomaly 077 declared with confidence, patting his chest for emphasis, “I’ve found my place here on the Vanished; there’s no reason for me to leave it…”

“But what if, at the journey’s end along the Path of No Return, you encounter the crew of the Sea Song?” Agatha posed the question with a serene tone. “What if you come face to face with the captain of the Sea Song?”

The atmosphere became noticeably more somber at her inquiry.

Sailor, too, fell into silence, the figure of the desiccated corpse remaining motionless. However, just as Duncan anticipated a moment of doubt, Sailor instead shook his head with even greater resolve, stating, “I won’t be swayed to follow her.”

“Are you certain? We must treat this with utmost seriousness,” Agatha pressed further for assurance.

“I’m certain,” Sailor affirmed with a grin, an air of confidence about him, “Captain Caraline entrusted me with a message for the city-state, along with the navigation course – she would never expect me to follow her. That’s not what she would have wanted.”

“…Very well, then we have no issue.” Agatha acknowledged with a nod.

Amidst the chaotic whisper of the cold wind under the night sky, the black and white tall grasses danced in the wind. A paper boat descended gracefully from the Vanished, coming to rest on the barren ground. Here, Duncan was the first to disembark, stepping onto the desolate terrain of the realm of death.

Following him, Agatha's indistinct silhouette seemed to barely touch down as she "floated" from the ship, landing gracefully beside him.

Sailor was the last to leave the ship – his exit less graceful, resulting in a tumble that produced an odd crack from his hip upon landing.

"Damn… I really should have considered metal joints before embarking on this journey," Sailor grumbled, readjusting his dislocated joint before limping over, "Is this the place? What comes next?"

Agatha glanced back at the small boat, now silent among the wild grass, with only Lucretia's silhouette visible on it. The rest of the crew remained on the Vanished, a precaution to avoid a recurrence of the "Island of Ashes" incident.

Turning her attention to their surroundings, Agatha pointed to a specific spot: "Simple, just lie down here."

Sailor, without any hesitation or objection, complied and lay down in the designated spot, indifferent to the chill of the ground as the tall black and white grasses enveloped him.

"…This feels like my own funeral," Sailor commented, a tinge of somberness in his voice, "These grasses encircling me, they're like the walls of a coffin."

Agatha didn't acknowledge Sailor's musings.

After ensuring he was positioned correctly, she took a moment to center herself, focusing her energy. Gradually, her initially indistinct and ghostly figure began to gain clarity.

A faint green glow emerged within her, momentarily casting a light upon her form, transforming her from a mere shadowy presence into a semi-transparent, spectral being. Though still ethereal, she now appeared capable of performing the next "ritual".

A staff, conjured from the depths of her memory, materialized in her hand.

“…This feels oddly familiar,” Agatha murmured to herself, looking at the staff with a mixture of nostalgia and resolve. She then commenced circling Sailor, her staff lightly touching the ground as she moved.

As Agatha traced her path along the ground, pale flames ignited from the lines she drew, ascending to form a triangular shape against the monochrome backdrop of the black, white, and gray terrain.

Sailor, positioned at the heart of the triangle, became enveloped in a silence born of apprehension, his anticipation rendering him still as he braced for the imminent proceedings.

With deliberate care, Agatha commenced the inscription of numerous arcane runes encircling the triangle. Each symbol was crafted with precision, marking a ritual she hadn’t performed in ages.

“From this point forward, remain silent and avoid wandering eyes; the dead neither speak nor gaze upon the world around them. You might perceive someone calling your name or witness strange lights before you, yet these are mere deceptions, unworthy of your focus,” Agatha paused momentarily, standing over Sailor’s prone form at the triangle’s epicenter, her gaze fixed upon the desiccated figure, “Eventually, a twilight-like glow, the sole ‘hue’ amidst this realm of death, will emerge. Subsequently, the ‘gatekeeper’ of this domain shall make an appearance. Heed my instructions carefully; do not succumb to his allure – leave the negotiations to the captain and myself.”

Chapter 821: The Guide

Sailor lay perfectly still and silent, camouflaged among the contrasting hues of the tall, black and white grass, convincing himself he had become indistinguishable from a lifeless body.

The wind, chaotic and unyielding, whipped through the wild grass, creating waves that seemed alive. Within this tumult, faint sounds began to emerge, weaving through the air like distant whispers, subdued conversations, and the ghostly strains of music, creating an otherworldly symphony.

Embracing the tranquility associated with death, Sailor shut his eyes, allowing the serene embrace of the imagined afterlife to envelop him amidst the boundless wilderness.

With a staff in hand, Agatha moved around Sailor in a deliberate pattern, tracing a circle around him thrice. With each step she took, runes etched into the earth below her glowed, casting an eerie light. Pausing by Sailor's head, she planted her staff into the ground and extended her arms wide as if to welcome or invoke something unseen.

Suddenly, the wind intensified, carrying clearer and more distinct sounds. Duncan, observing the scene, anticipated the awakening of the "gatekeeper" of this realm. However, as abruptly as it had risen, the wind calmed, and the sounds faded into silence.

"…Hmm?" Agatha opened her eyes, a look of perplexity crossing her face, her brow knitting together in concern.

“What’s happening?” Duncan inquired, his curiosity piqued by the unexpected turn of events.

Sailor, still lying on the ground, cautiously opened his eyes, sensing that the ritual might not be proceeding as planned. He remembered Agatha’s earlier instructions to remain silent and immobile, so he communicated his confusion and concern solely through his eyes, daring not to move or speak.

Agatha, troubled, revealed, “At the final moment when we should have established a connection, I felt the presence of the realm’s ‘gatekeepers’. Yet, they didn’t engage with us; they simply departed.”

She continued, clarifying their original intent, “Our aim wasn’t just to be noticed. We needed the ‘gatekeeper’ of this side to reveal themselves. Even if they detected the feigned death, it should have prompted them to appear more swiftly, as a simulated demise is a grave offense, perhaps even more so than an actual death.”

Understanding the stakes, Duncan then realized the implications: “Ah, so our actions could actually provoke these ‘gatekeepers’?”

“Yes,” Agatha affirmed, “Should they discover our ruse, their fury would be immense.”

Duncan, taken aback, remarked, “You hadn’t mentioned this risk before.”

Agatha responded with a nonchalant shrug, “As long as we remain undetected, there’s no issue. But if discovered, I admit, there’s little I could do. I might not be able to confront them, but I am adept at escaping. Should it come to it, negotiating with the ‘gatekeepers’ is feasible. They’re reasonable beings who usually can be appeased after an initial fight.”

Now slightly wary, Duncan sensed that the situation was not as straightforward as he had initially believed.

Yet, without dwelling on his reservations, he redirected his attention to the immediate issue: the apparent indifference of the ‘gatekeeper’ to their staged scenario of death.

Agatha’s expression conveyed her resolve as she paused, deep in thought. Then, her gaze shifted decisively towards Sailor, and she broke the silence with a sense of urgency: “I’ll attempt the ritual once more. As soon as it concludes, you need to spring to your feet and dash back to our small boat as swiftly as you can—this action will disrupt the ‘passage’. Remember, do not look back under any circumstances.”

Sailor, clearly anxious, could only respond with a wandering gaze, prompting Agatha to seek a simpler form of communication: “I need clarity. Just nod or shake your head slightly.”

After a brief hesitation, Sailor’s head began to sway as if to signal ‘no’, yet he halted midway and instead offered a subtle nod.

“Alright, I’ll take that as your agreement. Remain still; I’m about to restart the process.”

With that, Agatha grasped the combat staff that had emerged from the depths of her memory. Once again, she ignited the pale flames at her feet, reactivating the enigmatic runes etched into the earth.

As the ritual recommenced, the wind whipped up around them, carrying whispers and murmurs through the air. Agatha successfully reestablished the “passage,” and even Duncan felt the presence of “them” once more.

At the ritual’s climax, Agatha forcefully planted the staff into the ground and commanded, “Now – get up!”

Sailor, prepared for this moment, sprang up with urgency, vaulting over the encircling flames, and sprinted towards the origami boat nearby.

This sudden movement from the “deceased” Sailor disrupted the ritual, tearing through the “passage” and revealing a realm that lay concealed within a deeper layer of reality to Duncan.

The flames surged upwards, and the triangular rune array left by Agatha burst into a brilliant light. Then, above the triangle, the air itself seemed to fracture silently, a sliver of twilight emerging from this crack—a rapid expansion that painted the ascending flames with a twilight glow.

Through this widening breach, Duncan caught sight of an unusually tall figure cloaked in black. Contrary to Agatha’s predictions, the figure showed no signs of anger but merely observed the scene quietly before turning away.

Confused, Duncan turned to Agatha, who was visibly taken aback. She called out to the departing “gatekeeper” in frustration, “Wait! Doesn’t this violation of the rules concern you? The faking of death, the deliberate sabotage of the guiding passage—address this issue!”

But the figure continued to walk away, seemingly indifferent to her protests. As it departed, the crack in the sky began to seal shut.

Stunned yet determined, Agatha was about to take matters into her own hands and force the passage open to pursue when suddenly, dry, claw-like hands emerged at the edge of the closing gap. These hands grasped the edges of the crack, holding it ajar and then forcefully widening it again as the sound of breaking glass filled the air, signifying the forcible reopening of the passage.

Emerging from the other side of the crack was a figure, a “gatekeeper” draped in a robe as dark as the deepest night. Its hood was so deep that it shrouded its face entirely, leaving only two dimly glowing yellow eyes visible, flickering with an eerie light akin to fire beneath the shadow of the hood. The gatekeeper leaned forward, and from beneath the hood came a voice, gravelly and deep, as though it were echoing up from the depths of the earth itself, uttering a single command: “Come.”

With that terse, chilling command, the crack, resembling shattered glass, disintegrated without a sound.

Simultaneously, the morose landscape that Duncan had been staring at—the embodiment of night within the wilderness—crumbled away. The shroud of perpetual darkness that had enveloped the realm of the dead lifted, unveiling the soft luminescence of twilight. The monochrome grass of the wilderness, unnamed and untouched, began to sway gently in the twilight breeze, revealing a pathway that extended endlessly into the horizon as if it were a bridge between the heavens and the earth itself.

The towering “gatekeeper” stood silently upon this newly revealed path, immovable and solemn as if it were part of the landscape itself.

Duncan’s gaze momentarily drifted back towards the Lost and the Dazzling Stars, the two ships now appearing as ghostly, frozen silhouettes in the distance, bathed on one side by the twilight glow. Despite the newfound light, the edge of the wilderness seemed to retain a shadow of its former nocturnal veil.

Turning his attention forward once more, Duncan observed the silent gatekeeper breaking the stillness of the moment, issuing another brief command: “Go.”

With that, the figure began to stride along the path, prompting Duncan and Agatha to exchange a glance before hurriedly following.

“The situation is somewhat perplexing,” Agatha whispered to Duncan as they walked, her voice tinged with unease. “The gatekeepers I recall… the ones from my memories, they don’t behave like this. Their presence feels off… Their actions and mannerisms are different.”

“The one who walked away earlier was strange as well,” Duncan added casually. “At least this one has chosen to appear and guide us. That’s something, given that we’ve reached a ‘deeper place.’”

“That’s precisely why it’s strange,” Agatha replied, her brow furrowed in thought. “The gatekeepers should easily recognize that we’re not ‘dead.’ Typically, they would inquire or negotiate before leading us anywhere… Yet, this one simply began guiding us. It’s as if he was expecting us…”

Duncan nodded, finding her observation logical. “Why not ask him?”

After a brief hesitation, Agatha looked up towards the tall figure, which had slowed its pace ahead of them. “Are you specifically waiting for us here?” she inquired.

The towering figure remained silent, offering no response as if Agatha’s question had fallen on deaf ears.

Unwavering in her determination, Agatha raised her voice after a brief pause, seeking clarity: “Do you recognize us? Can you see that we are not actually deceased?”

The imposing figure ahead halted momentarily, releasing a noncommittal grunt that sounded like “Hmm.”

Turning towards Duncan with a mix of confusion and resignation, Agatha speculated, “It seems this gatekeeper may simply be uninterested in our state.”

Duncan remained silent, absorbing Agatha’s observation. After a moment of contemplation, he directed a question at the gatekeeper: “Earlier, we encountered another gatekeeper who disregarded us and departed. There were mentions of others as well. Where have they gone?”

To their astonishment, the gatekeeper ceased walking, breaking his silence with a word that resonated deeply: “Funeral.”

Puzzled, Duncan queried further, “A funeral? Are you implying that the other gatekeepers have gathered for a funeral?”

“Yes,” came the terse reply.

“Whose funeral could it be?” Agatha inquired, driven by a mix of curiosity and concern.

“The Death God’s,” the gatekeeper responded, turning to face them. Under the shadow of his hood, the dull yellow glow of his eyes seemed to burn with a quiet intensity.

“The Death God is dead,” he declared, a statement that hung in the air with a weight that seemed to shift the very atmosphere around them.

Chapter 822: The Worlds Last Cooling

In a world where deities and ancient evils once roamed, their demise had become a part of history so profound it seemed almost tangible. Duncan had always been aware that not only the Death God but also the Storm Goddess, the Eternal Flame, the God of Wisdom, and every other ancient god and evil entity—whether they had left their mark in the annals of history or faded into oblivion—were long gone. This knowledge wasn't new to him; every ancient ruler and deity had perished.

This cataclysmic event, known as the Great Annihilation, occurred well before the world as they knew it turned into a wasteland of scorching chaos and ash. On that fateful day, when thousands of worlds collapsed, all gods met their end, leaving behind nothing but their decaying remains—a mere echo of the old world's inertia.

However, when the towering gatekeeper solemnly announced, "The Death God is dead," Duncan realized with a jolt that the reference wasn't to the historical extinction he was familiar with. It signified a recent occurrence, a new kind of end.

Agatha, standing beside Duncan, also grasped the gravity of the situation. Her initial confusion quickly transformed into sheer astonishment. "What happened?"

…

The world was undergoing a chilling transformation, and it wasn’t just the physical temperature that was dropping. An essential vitality, akin to the foundational essence of the mortal realm, was gradually fading away. It felt as if the world was exhaling its last breath, signaling the imminent demise of an era.

The undead began to roam the streets freely. The cold flames that once combated the cold were now ineffective against the encroaching frost that enveloped the mortal world. The seas had turned stagnant, and memories of the past were either vanishing or morphing into unrecognizable, fragmented echoes.

From the thriving trading city of Pland, through the cold landscapes of Frost, to the elven island of Wind Harbor, from scientific Mok to the shattered archipelagos of the Eastern Seas, a palpable sense of “cooling” and “alienation” was spreading. Like an unstoppable dark force, it was gradually extinguishing every last gleam of civilization.

Tyrian made his way to the tallest lighthouse in the southeastern region of Frost. From its observation deck, he gazed out at the dark sea stretching towards the city-state. A large fleet, bathed in sunlight, was approaching. The cargo ships, heavy with oil, cloth, and grain, docked at the pier. In the darkness, massive loading machines buzzed into action, transferring goods from the ships to the shore.

At the docks, the undead sailors of the Mist Fleet were busily engaged, outnumbered now by even more of their “kindred” from recent days. Oblivious to death, these corpses manned the machinery, ensuring the city continued to function as per the directives of City Hall.

Beyond, in the city district, tall chimneys and the bright lights of factory platforms stood out. The power plants hummed with activity, steam hubs vibrated with energy, and vast pipes, like veins, extended from the factories into the city. They supplied power and protection to the inhabitants, a semblance of normalcy in a world growing increasingly cold.

Yet, within those factories, the massive steam cores had cooled. No catalyst could reignite the warmth from the flames within their chambers. Despite this, the cold reactors continued to hiss, steam flowed without pause, and the pipes throbbed with what seemed like relentless power.

The city's vitality, metaphorically its "breath" and "blood," continued to pulse through its vast network of pipes without pause. Despite the ominous changes happening elsewhere, the city's gas lamps still cast their bright glow, factories buzzed with activity, machinery churned tirelessly, and guardians roamed the streets. These sentinels were ever-vigilant for supernatural disturbances that defied the natural laws, while sheriffs kept order under the cloak of night, aiding those in need and addressing the growing incidents affecting public safety.

The semblance of normalcy prevailed; the city's heartbeat of civilization had not yet dimmed. Yet, Tyrian sensed an unsettling shift in the atmosphere—a cold, faintly decayed scent as if emerging from the city's very foundation, from the darkest depths of the Boundless Sea, carried by every gust of wind, permeating every sliver of sky, and clinging to every particle of dust.

He could feel the world teetering on the brink of a catastrophic decline, a sensation that echoed memories of better times. Tyrian was acutely aware that something profoundly wrong was unfolding, and the situation was deteriorating rapidly.

He recalled his father's words about the world attempting to "correct" the aberrations within its framework, but there was a threshold to such corrections. Now, it seemed they were rapidly approaching that limit.

Caught by a sudden intuition, Tyrian felt a familiar presence drawing near, prompting him to shift his focus from the distant horizon.

“Father,” he said, turning to face the tall figure shrouded in bandages and cloaked in black. “Why have you come?”

“The graveyard no longer requires my watch. With this avatar, I find myself with an abundance of time,” Duncan replied, joining Tyrian. His eyes traversed the night, following Tyrian’s previous gaze. “What are your thoughts?”

“Has the time come already?” Tyrian mused, his eyes searching the night with a complex emotion. “I thought we had more time—the ‘time’ you hinted at.”

After a brief silence, Duncan ominously stated, “…The Death God is dead.”

Tyrian paused, the weight of his father’s words momentarily eluding him.

“The world’s decline is hastening beyond our predictions. Its innate mechanism for self-correction is failing to ensure that those within the shelters remain in a ‘survival state’—that is, as living beings. Life, being a complex and high-maintenance condition, can no longer be fully sustained within the shelters,” Duncan explained somberly, his gaze fixated on some distant point, as if envisioning the world’s impending doom.

“This is why we’re witnessing the ‘resurrection of the dead’ across various city-states and the disturbing absence of newborns. Bartok has prematurely disrupted the world’s cycle of life and death.”

“His intervention was not meant to precipitate such a rapid degradation.”

“The shelters no longer need to sustain the living.”

“Moreover, the cessation of the death cycle allows for the majority to ‘endure’ in whatever form possible—be it as the undead. This grotesque existence, however temporary, is a means to persist through the sanctuary's gradual collapse."

"This extended time is the legacy Bartok fought to leave for our world."

As Tyrian absorbed his father's revelations, a mix of shock and bewilderment rendered him speechless, his mind racing yet unable to articulate a response.

Duncan's voice, deep and gravelly, broke the silence once more, imparting a grave insight: "This might be the final instance where the Four Gods have managed to buy time for this sanctuary."

Finding his voice amidst the turmoil, Tyrian asked, "Why?"

Duncan explained the dire consequences of halting the death mechanism. "Its stop deals a critical blow to the sanctuary, marking the commencement of the final countdown. From this point, all semblance of order will rapidly begin to warp, and the world's innate ability to self-correct will fail completely. This breakdown is why the distortions and anomalies, once veiled from human awareness, will start to become glaringly apparent to more and more individuals."

As he turned to face Tyrian, his gaze was intense and penetrating.

Reeling from the onslaught of information and grappling with the implications of his father's sudden announcement, Tyrian found himself confronting memories and details he had unconsciously ignored or forgotten, surfacing like specters from a nightmare.

After a moment that seemed to stretch into an eternity, the fog of confusion in his mind began to clear, allowing his thoughts to coalesce and his rationality to resurface.

"So," he began, the words emerging tentatively, "ordinary people will soon…"

Duncan continued, “Having been influenced by me, you’ve been able to perceive many things prematurely. As the world’s distortions and anomalies grow more severe and the sanctuary’s self-correcting mechanisms fail entirely, more individuals will start to recognize the world’s aberrations—similar to your experience. It won’t be everyone; susceptibility will vary based on mental resilience, intuitive sensitivity, and a degree of… ‘luck.’”

“For those unable to perceive these changes, life will go on as usual in a world that’s becoming increasingly alien and frightening, without them sensing any shift in their reality.”

“However, for those who become aware… the situation will deteriorate significantly.”

“Tyrian, you must brace yourself—and the other city-states as well.”

“The ultimate, most tumultuous upheaval of the old world is on the horizon.”

…

Duncan and Agatha had been journeying along this mysterious “path” for what seemed like an eternity. As they moved forward, the strange, monochromatic grass that bordered their trail began to vanish. In its place, a landscape of endless, pale, and dark broken stones unfolded, with only the occasional withered plant breaking the monotony of the stone-strewn wilderness.

The ethereal twilight glow that once imbued the wilderness with a surreal quality gradually receded, giving way to the serene dominance of the night. The wilderness transformed before their eyes, adopting a more somber and desolate guise.

In a subdued tone, Agatha shared with Duncan that they were now entering a new segment of the “Path of No Return.” This stark and desolate region, known as the “Death Wilderness,” lay deep within their journey. She described how, beyond the twilight—which symbolized the last vestige of life—a peaceful night awaited to usher in the realm of the deceased. The endless expanse of barren land, strewn with broken stones, signified the severance of the dead’s final ties to the mortal world. Crossing this threshold would lead them to the “Great Gate.”

However, Duncan realized that these once sacred symbols and rituals tied to the death mechanism had lost their significance.

Lifting his gaze towards the horizon, where the deepest part of the night sky stretched overhead, Duncan could discern a massive, indistinct shape looming at the heart of the wilderness.

Then, out of the corner of his eye, he noticed other presences for the first time.

Dressed in black robes, these figures were the “Gatekeepers,” still seemingly bathed in the twilight’s fading glow.

Silent and solemn, the Gatekeepers moved through the vast, desolate wilderness, all converging in the same direction. Their silent procession resembled a funeral march, each step a testament to the solemnity of their purpose as they navigated the boundless landscape of death.

Chapter 823: Burial

Beneath the cover of night, in a barren landscape strewn with gravel, numerous figures cloaked in black robes advanced silently in a single direction. Their path was lit by a mysterious twilight glow emanating from an unseen source, casting their long, night-like robes in a light that seemed both real and surreal. As they traversed the barren land, these solitary figures merged into streams of twilight, weaving through the darkness like rivers converging in the heart of a desolate wilderness of death, where they encircled a solemn gathering.

At the center of this wilderness stood a monumental gate, its triangular doors imposing yet silent. Duncan initially mistook it for a mere hill, but in an instant, he found himself standing before it, awestruck by its majestic rise from the ground, its triangular form sealed shut. Dark red veins sprawled across the door's surface like blood vessels, ensnaring it with the appearance of chains.

This gate, it seemed, was the barrier to the realm of death, now overseen by a deity seated on a throne before it. This deity towered over Duncan, his stature surpassing anyone Duncan could imagine, including Ta Ruijin. Even while seated, the deity's form was colossal, nearly as large as a house itself.

Adorned in a tattered black robe as dark as the night itself, wrapped with dark red thorns, the deity's presence was as imposing as it was mysterious. Under the long shadows cast by his robe, his face remained hidden, indistinct as if he were no more than a silhouette shaped by the fabric—echoing the teachings of the Death Church's holy scriptures:

“Death is a faceless shadow, omnipresently lurking within the shroud of darkness. When you gaze upon Him, He gazes back at you.”

Yet, this once formidable embodiment of death lay defeated, a grotesque, thorn-like short sword impaled through his chest, anchoring him to his dark throne. His hood was askew, suggesting that even in his final moments, he cast a longing glance towards the triangular gate, the very symbol of the cycle of life and death.

This tableau was akin to a self-inflicted demise, a murder where the victim was also the perpetrator.

Among the “Four Dead Gods,” this scene was unprecedented: at the threshold of death and decay, Bartok had enacted his own end, a second act of “self-destruction.”

Surrounding the gate, the twilight-clad figures stood as still as stone, resembling petrified tombstones in their motionlessness. Yet, amidst them, a path remained, as if intentionally left clear for those who would come to witness, stretching from the wilderness to the dark throne.

Leading the way was the towering gatekeeper, with Duncan and Agatha in tow. They made their way through the path flanked by the silent phantoms. The twilight glow from the figures bathed them in its light; Duncan remained unaffected, but Agatha, whose form was originally ethereal and translucent, began to solidify under the twilight’s touch, appearing momentarily to possess a physical body.

Having reached their journey’s climax, Duncan and his party halted before a majestic throne under the watchful eyes of the towering gatekeepers. The leader of these imposing figures offered a silent nod of acknowledgment before seamlessly rejoining his comrades along the sides of the throne room.

Duncan raised his gaze to the entity seated upon the throne, a presence more formidable than any they had encountered before, including Ta Ruijin. This was the entity known as the world's first and ultimate deceased, a being of immense power and mystery.

It became clear why the falsely "deceased" Sailor, brought forth by Agatha's magic, had failed to command the attention of these gatekeepers. They were guardians of the true end, the genuine deceased who commanded the throne.

Agatha, with a mixture of reverence and curiosity, stared intently at this dark-clad deity. It was a moment of profound significance for her. As a gatekeeper herself, imbued with the memories of those devout followers of the Death Church, she had never imagined she would stand in this sacred place. It was a realm believed unreachable by the countless devout throughout their lifetimes, let alone witness such a momentous event—the ceremonial end of the Grim Death God.

After a long and reflective silence, Agatha finally turned to Duncan, her voice tinged with complexity, "Captain, what do we do now?"

Before Duncan could formulate a response, another gatekeeper, who had been standing vigil by the throne, approached them. This spectral figure, towering and silent, handed Duncan an ancient and finely crafted hourglass before returning to his station. Duncan recognized the hourglass, identical to one he had seen in the final resting place of the Leviathan Queen, yet this one was devoid of sand.

Puzzled and intrigued, Duncan looked up to inquire about the hourglass, but was instead drawn into a mysterious understanding by a whispering breeze. Under Agatha's watchful eye, he activated the hourglass. A flicker of starlight-infused flame danced at his fingertips before merging into the hourglass, reviving the once-recorded vitality in a spectacle of flowing flames and reversing sands.

In the blink of an eye, the environment around Duncan shifted dramatically. He found himself standing atop a small mound, bathed in a soft, ethereal light against the backdrop of an impenetrable night. Around him, wildflowers bloomed, their fragrance adding to the surrealism of the moment. The serene silence was punctuated by the sound of a shovel cutting through soil. Duncan turned to see a frail, elderly man diligently digging a shallow grave, his actions reflecting an eternity of labor in the soft, black earth.

This unexpected scene, unfolding under the guidance of the ancient hourglass, hinted at a deeper connection between life, death, and the realms beyond, inviting Duncan and Agatha into the mysteries that lay at the heart of existence itself.

As Duncan absorbed the somber beauty of the scene before him, he approached the old man who was tirelessly digging into the earth.

“I’m here… I apologize, I might have arrived a bit late,” Duncan offered tentatively, breaking the silence.

“It’s not late,” the old man responded without pausing his work, his voice steady and imbued with an ageless wisdom. “Death is never early nor late. It arrives precisely when it’s supposed to. Your timing is just right.”

He gestured towards a small mound of soil beside him, where, unnoticed until now, an additional shovel lay resting against the dark, piled earth. “Can you lend a hand?”

Wordlessly, Duncan stepped forward, picked up the shovel, and began to dig alongside the old man, their actions in silent harmony.

For a time, the only sounds were the rhythmic digging and the soft shifting of soil, a solemn melody on the mound.

After a while, the frail figure broke the silence, his voice carrying a hint of nostalgia. “The other three… It’s been ages since I last saw them. Since then, our only communication has been through the remnants left by the second guide. How are they?”

“They’re well,” Duncan replied, his voice calm and steady as he continued his task. “I’ve entered into a pact with them. We’ll reunite in the new world.”

A hint of warmth flickered in the old man’s demeanor. “That’s good to hear… A reunion is something to look forward to.”

After a brief pause, Duncan cast a curious glance at his companion. “Is this how you truly look?”

“No,” the old man admitted without ceasing his digging, his tone reflective. “I have never had a face, not since the beginning. But I thought… since I’m about to depart, I should at least leave behind a semblance of one.”

“You have no face?” Duncan echoed, intrigued and somewhat bewildered by the revelation.

“Yes, I am distinct from the others. I am ‘Death’ itself,” the old man confided softly, a profound solemnity in his voice.

Duncan remained silent, allowing the gravity of the statement to sink in, waiting for the old man to elaborate.

“Every end of a world is unique. Some linger for years, others much longer. And then there are those… civilizations that fight valiantly, employing every conceivable means to delay their inevitable demise, sometimes even for a century,” the old man mused, continuing his labor.

“In my world, the end came swiftly—so swiftly that there was no time for decay or defiance. Yet, it wasn’t so abrupt that people couldn’t perceive their doom. It was a pace that allowed everyone to witness the approach of their final moment.

“At that instant, every soul met their end. Death echoed through time and space, unsettling even the stars on the brink of extinction. In the last breath of my world, ‘Death’ became the brightest, most universal, the sole entity to emerge in the entirety of the cosmos.

“And in that fleeting second, everything beautiful and ugly, every fear and act of bravery, every resilience and fragility inherent in human nature and thought, was encapsulated.

“From that culmination of death, I came into being. Upon opening my eyes for the first time, I watched everything collapse before me. By the second blink, all that remained of the world I had glimpsed only once was scorched, chaotic ashes.”

With a measured push, the old man drove his shovel into the earth, skillfully excavating another portion of soil from the grave before him, and flung it aside.

“I’ve been at this task for ages, ever since the haven was conceived. I’ve toiled away at digging this pit, a labor that seemed almost endless – after all, vanquishing death itself is no minor feat. Yet, here you are, aiding me, Fire Usurper.”

His gaze then turned introspective, as if pondering an uncharted future. “Don’t you yearn to witness the new world? There might still be a path open to us…”

“No, but thank you for the offer,” the old man responded with a gentle shake of his head, scooping and discarding another handful of earth. He then paused to meet Duncan's gaze with a serene clarity. "I'm unlike others you may know; this much you might have surmised. I am not a relic of the old world, but rather a creation of the Great Annihilation, forged from those fiery ashes. Thus, the duty to dictate this world's decay, to establish its cycle of life and death, fell upon me alone – the haven necessitated such a 'recycling system.' But in the forthcoming world, the decay of things should not be under the dominion of a similar 'deity.' Even the suggestion of such a possibility is flawed. Let all that emerged from the Great Annihilation remain with it."

A reflective silence enveloped Duncan as he cast another shovelful of soil into the grave.

"Do you harbor any regrets?"

"No," the old man replied with a serene smile, "I've accomplished all that was required of me. Now, to relish an eternal, undisturbed rest is the finest payment for 'Death'. But for you, I offer a piece of counsel."

Duncan ceased his movements, attentive.

"Refrain from treating sacrifice lightly. Though it may seem odd coming from me," the old man continued, locking eyes with Duncan, "I detect on you the scent of martyrdom…a scent all too familiar to me, yet it ought not to cling to you."

Duncan stood in silence, absorbing the moment.

When he looked again, the frail old man and the second shovel were no longer beside him. It was just Duncan standing there, alone.

The deity of death had taken his rest in the grave, his form nearly enveloped by the earth. He closed his eyes in peace, as if he had been resting there since time immemorial.

After a moment steeped in silence, Duncan bent forward once more, continuing his solemn duty of covering the grave with soil, carrying out the last rites for a being as ancient and as pivotal as the concept of death itself.

Chapter 824: After the Death Gods Rest

Dark, fertile soil cascaded down, covering the modest grave beneath it like the encroaching night sky at the culmination of existence, concealing an eternal demise. The deity birthed from the silence that enveloped all things now lay in rest, in the precise moment when the world edged towards its conclusion, transforming into a humble mound atop a hill.

A chaotic breeze swept through the darkness, tenderly caressing the small earthen mound. Nameless wildflowers and grasses adorning the mound danced in the wind, producing a soft, whispering sound. Standing amidst the gusts, Duncan clutched his shovel, his gaze fixated on the newly formed mound of earth in front of him.

He then surveyed the surroundings – the deity of death hadn’t arranged for a headstone for itself, and there were no materials in the vicinity that could be fashioned into one.

With a decisive action, Duncan thrust the shovel, previously used for digging, into the ground in front of the mound, stabilizing it with soil at its base to serve as an improvised marker.

Having done this, he inhaled deeply, laying his hand upon the shovel’s handle one final time.

A subtle greenish glow, mingled with the faint light of distant stars, emanated from his fingers, gradually enveloping the makeshift “headstone” of the deity of death before fading away.

“May you rest in peace, Bartok, until we meet again,” Duncan murmured softly, his form gradually dissolving into the wind.

The turbulent wind transformed into a brief cry, as light and shadow emerged from the darkness and swiftly reassembled. After experiencing a moment of weightlessness and a shift in perception, Duncan felt the solidity of the ground return beneath his feet, and the landscape around him quickly came into focus.

The majestic Gate of Death still stood, unyielding, in the midst of the devastated stony wilderness. Before the triangular gateway, the imposing figure seated upon the dark throne silently crumbled away, akin to a fragmenting dream dispelling at dawn. The unseen presence cloaked in a black robe dispersed with the wind, and the robe itself descended like the night, decaying and eroding into nothingness.

Among the scattering black fragments and dust, only a delicate greenish light, paired with dim starlight, flickered in the breeze.

Duncan bowed his head, noticing the edge of the hourglass in his grasp shimmering faintly, with vague whispers seemingly resonating beside him. Realizing something profound, he advanced and placed the ancient yet finely crafted hourglass beside the throne, once occupied by the deity of death.

Retreating, he saw Agatha standing silently, her gaze fixed on the now vacant throne. After an indeterminate span of time, the “Gatekeeper,” born of illusions, slowly turned her head, her eyes reflecting a mixture of complex emotions: “…Has He found peace?”

“Yes, I accompanied Him on His final journey,” Duncan responded gently, then added, “The hourglass harbors a fragment of His essence. I’ve positioned it next to the throne, ensuring that the mortal realm’s Death Church can still momentarily access some ‘blessings’… they will continue to require them.”

Agatha’s response was a slow, deliberate nod. She seemed as if she were on the cusp of articulating a cascade of thoughts and emotions, yet words eluded her. In place of speech, her inner turmoil found expression in a soft sigh so faint it barely stirred the air.

“The time to return is upon us,” Duncan intoned, a gravity in his voice hinting at the urgency of their situation. “The final countdown has begun. We must make haste back to the node of the Leviathan Queen without delay.”

Acknowledging Duncan’s directive with a soft hum, Agatha cast her gaze back the way they had come, only to behold a desolate expanse of broken stones stretching into the horizon, devoid of any discernible features to mark their path.

The surrounding darkness seemed to claim this silent domain entirely, a realm where paths once trodden by the dead offered no passage for return.

Yet, in that moment of despair, a startling change occurred. The enigmatic “Gatekeepers” encircling the throne of the Death God began to stir. These silent, monolithic spectres initiated a solemn procession, lifting their hands one by one. They pointed into the darkness, from which a twilight-like illumination began to emerge, weaving through the air in the direction they indicated. This light seemed to gather and flow unseen, paving a path through the wasteland.

Guided by the silent decree of these towering phantasms, a pathway materialized amidst the desolation, bathed in a soft, twilight glow. Along its borders, unnamed wildflowers burst into bloom, their petals swaying gently in the breeze.

For the first time in this dominion of death, as the machinations of mortality ceased and the Death God lay in rest, a way back to the realm of the living was revealed.

Witnessing this miraculous emergence, Agatha could only stare in wonder. Her eyes instinctively sought out the Gatekeeper who had initially led them, finding him in a silent farewell, his gesture a solemn directive: Leave, and never again linger in the domain of death.

Heeding this silent counsel, she, alongside Duncan, embarked upon the newly formed path, leaving the desolate wasteland behind them.

Their journey back was marked by solitude, with only the occasional gust of wind for company. The wasteland gradually receded from view, giving way to the familiar sight of black and white, unnamed wild grasses swaying in the wilderness. As they pressed on, the towering silhouettes of the Vanished and the Bright Star loomed in the distance. Approaching these landmarks, Duncan and Agatha found themselves back at their point of departure.

The paper-folded boat awaited them, with Lucretia standing at its bow, her expression a mix of bewilderment and surprise. Upon noticing Duncan, her eyebrows arched in astonishment before she leaped down to greet them.

“Have you been here the entire time?” Duncan inquired, taken aback by the sight of the “Sea Witch” who seemed to have scarcely moved, “Our absence was extended…”

“You left but a few minutes ago,” Lucretia replied, her astonishment mirroring Duncan’s. “As soon as you and Agatha disappeared behind a curtain of twilight-hued light, you’ve returned seemingly out of nowhere. I feared you might have been thrust into an unforeseen predicament.”

“A few minutes?” Duncan’s brow furrowed at this revelation, yet he quickly shelved his bewilderment. Given the series of extraordinary events they had encountered, such anomalies had become almost routine.

“Our task is complete,” he declared with finality, “We shall depart right away.”

Lucretia’s gaze shifted between Duncan and Agatha, sensing that the duo had traversed an epic saga within what, to her, had seemed a mere handful of minutes. Yet, she refrained from probing further, instead offering a subtle nod in agreement, “…Alright.”

…

As the pale flames within the brazier died out, the soft, indistinct whispers that had been echoing in her mind also faded away. Agatha, who had been kneeling in a meditative stance within the sanctuary of the prayer room, lifted her head, drawn by a subtle intuition, and turned her attention towards the mirror adjacent to her.

Blindfolded, she was deprived of conventional sight, yet this limitation bestowed upon her a heightened spiritual clarity. This unique perception unveiled the essence of other dimensions, realms beyond the grasp of the average eye.

Reflected in the mirror, she perceived a vision fleeting yet profound—a solitary grave set against a desolate, dark landscape, with the light of twilight dwindling on the horizon.

This ephemeral glimpse into another reality was momentary, yet its message was clear and resonant to Agatha, who held the dual roles of a youthful Gatekeeper and an Archbishop. She comprehended the grave implications of what this scene represented.

Silently, she continued to kneel before the sacred statue, and after a brief moment of contemplation, bowed her head once more, resuming her silent prayers. Her lips moved without sound, offering benedictions for those who had passed from this world to the next.

Her prayer, succinct yet poignant, was recited thrice. Rising gracefully from her kneeling posture, Agatha approached a nearby shelf. From a wooden box, she selected a dried flower, its petals pale and delicate, and placed it next to the candlestick that stood before the image of sanctity.

Outside, the ambient sounds of the city's restlessness permeated the walls of the church, a distant cacophony of life's unceasing tumult.

Footsteps, hurried and purposeful, approached from the corridor. Soon, a voice belonging to a member of the clergy echoed just outside the sanctuary: "Archbishop, are you present?"

"Enter," Agatha's voice carried a calm authority.

The prayer room's door swung open, revealing a middle-aged clergyman. His short, dark hair and the bandages covering half of his face gave him a distinct appearance. His attention was immediately captured by the sight of the white flower positioned solemnly before the holy figure.

A frown creased his brow as he observed the flower, a sense of significance nagging at the edge of his consciousness. There was a question to be asked, a meaning to be deciphered, yet it eluded him, leaving his gaze clouded with confusion and a lack of understanding.

Agatha, sensing his perplexity, positioned herself so that she stood between him and the symbolic white flower.

"What concerns you?" she inquired, her voice embodying both curiosity and command.

The clergyman’s expression of confusion briefly intensified before clarity returned to him. He promptly relayed his message: “Archbishop, a new group has arrived at the cathedral seeking shelter and guidance. There are about a dozen of them. Following your directives, I’ve dispatched Mark along with Sister Natasha to welcome them.”

“Understood,” Agatha acknowledged with a nod, her demeanor composed. She then inquired further, a casual tone bellying the depth of her concern, “What can you tell me about these newcomers? From whence have they come?”

“They’re quite distressed, caught in a whirlwind of fear and confusion, struggling to articulate the nature of their distress,” he began. “The one among them who appears to be in the best shape shared that he experienced a sudden awakening earlier today. To his alarm, he found that many aspects of his surroundings felt profoundly wrong. Familiar faces of relatives and friends now seemed foreign and, disturbingly, frightening. Overwhelmed by fear, he sought refuge at a local chapel, where he encountered others in similar straits.”

“The resident priest at the chapel took immediate action, offering solace and blessings to calm their spirits, before assigning two guardians to safely lead them through the city to our doorstep.”

“Their origins are diverse, with the majority hailing from neighborhoods around the southern port and a few from the vicinity of the cemetery district. They seem to have no prior connections, sharing neither acquaintances nor common traits in their backgrounds…”

Agatha absorbed the clergyman’s account with a serene demeanor, her response a silent nod of acknowledgment. “The municipal authorities will be making arrangements later on. There’s provisional accommodation prepared at the mountain’s base.”

“Understood,” the clergyman said, then paused, his gaze resting on Agatha with a mix of hesitance and concern. He seemed to search the interim Archbishop’s face for clues, torn over voicing his next thought. “Archbishop, can you shed any light on what’s unfolding? These episodes have been escalating in frequency, affecting even the church…”

“John,” Agatha interjected, her tone preempting further inquiry, “Do you recall the guidance I offered our congregation the day before yesterday?”

A shift crossed the clergyman’s features as he nodded in recognition.

Agatha continued, her voice imbued with a tranquil yet firm resolve. “I cannot provide you with the clarity you seek at this moment, for the simple reason that the explanations would elude you—much like those voices remain unheard by you. However, should you find yourself abruptly ‘awakening,’ do not succumb to fear. Proceed directly to the inner sanctum. There, you will find someone ready to guide and assist you through whatever comes next.”

Chapter 825: Circular Convergence

Priest John departed with a complex yet determined look on his face. He asked no questions before leaving, nor did Agatha offer any further explanation.

Now, Agatha found herself alone again in the prayer room, where the bright lights fought valiantly against the encroaching darkness from outside, which seemed almost to have a physical presence. The candlesticks in front of the sacred statue flickered weakly with a few lingering flames while wisps of smoke continued to rise from the recently extinguished fire in the basin. In a nearby floor mirror, Agatha's reflection appeared fragmented and disjointed.

Turning towards the revered image of Bartok, she raised her head. Although her eyes were covered by a black cloth, she gazed intently at the figure enshrouded in the night. To her, the statue, which remained unchanged to any observer, now seemed to be filled with cracks, resembling a pile of debris miraculously held together by some unseen force.

The atmosphere within the cathedral felt increasingly filled with the presence of death. It was as though the very foundation of this world was slowly decaying and dying. Now, it seemed nearly everyone was transitioning from the living to the state of the dead. Individuals who had died unwittingly were active throughout the city-state, including within the church itself. John had passed away, succumbing during midday prayers the previous day; Sister Lora had died in a light sleep. Yet, they continued their duties within the cathedral as if nothing had changed.

Abruptly, a flicker of uncertain flame appeared in the mirror beside her, turning it pitch black before a figure emerged clearly within it.

As Agatha turned, she saw not Captain Duncan in the reflection but Tyrian.

Tyrian spoke first, “My father crafted this path to forge connections among those ‘blessed’ by his fire. Miss Agatha, how are things with you?”

“The number of deceased within the cathedral is on the rise,” Agatha replied softly, a hint of sorrow in her voice. “Many have transitioned from living to dead under surprisingly ordinary circumstances. It seems unstoppable, beyond the reach of any remedy or safeguard.”

“The same situation is unfolding elsewhere in the city-state,” Tyrian responded gravely, “and indeed, in other city-states across the world.”

Agatha nodded in acknowledgment, pausing to consider before she added, “But the presence of the moving dead is not our greatest concern. The true problem lies in the increasing number of people who are ‘awakening.’”

“Yes,” Tyrian acknowledged with a grave tone, “As my father had forewarned, the mechanism designed to ‘correct’ the world is breaking down. The god of death’s last intervention delayed the complete collapse of our sanctuary but, in the process, damaged its ‘correction’ mechanism. Now, this protective barrier, which was supposed to safeguard the minds of ordinary individuals, is deteriorating, and it’s happening more rapidly than we anticipated.”

“Even so, Governor Tyrian, I urge you not to worry excessively. Whether it be the clergy within our church or the guardians and law enforcement personnel outside, many have spent their entire lives training to face such unprecedented calamities, even those that directly impact them.”

“It’s likely that no one foresaw a reality where gods would forever slumber, where even our world would face demise, or that our current predicament would be as grave as it is. Nevertheless, we’ve prepared for ‘everything.’ No matter the circumstance, our primary commitment is to our duties without conditions.

“A few days back, I briefed our team of priests. I informed them about an unfolding disaster, invisible to them as of yet, advised them on safeguarding those ‘awakening,’ and provided guidance for dealing with their own potential ‘awakening.’

“Some of them now share our understanding of the situation, while others have yet to comprehend the full significance of these directives – but this has not hindered their adherence to them.

“I trust that the external law enforcement will act similarly.

“Among any group, there will undoubtedly be individuals who falter, who are overwhelmed by fear or mental strain, failing to meet their responsibilities. Yet, importantly, those who steadfastly fulfil their roles are not few, Governor Tyrian. Regardless of when or how the world’s end arrives, we are ready for it.”

Upon hearing Agatha’s determined words, Tyrian allowed himself a moment of reflection before his expression softened, and he nodded in agreement: “I plan to enlarge the ‘quarantine zone’ and set up a network of shelters around the cemetery area – utilizing the cemetery’s inherent defenses for the gradual relocation and safeguarding of our populace. This effort will necessitate the church’s collaboration.”

“This will be a challenging and extensive endeavor,” Agatha remarked. “With the ‘living’ and ‘dead’ intermingling, and people awakening unpredictably from amongst them, we lack the means to fully discern this transformation. We can’t relocate all awakened individuals to shelters, nor can we view the others as adversaries, even if they roam aimlessly, akin to zombies.”

“I understand, but we must strive to do our utmost,” Tyrian replied with steady composure, “It’s preferable to descending into utter, uncontrollable chaos – should the worst occur, at least we’ll have established sufficient shelters to safeguard a segment of our community.”

“…I understand. The church will fully support City Hall’s initiatives as they await your directives.”

…

Before the ark-like colossal ship, reminiscent of a small city-state, stood a vast array of hydraulic machinery at its prow, forming a formidable mechanical barrier. Countless heavy metal battering rams, arranged in precise order along this “mechanical wall,” were methodically hoisted along their tracks before crashing down forcefully. These metallic behemoths acted like a multitude of sharp teeth, relentlessly crushing the thick ice ahead. Amidst the continuous roar of machinery and the thunderous sound of ice shattering, the church ark persisted in its slow advance through the icy maritime expanse.

This ice-breaking mechanism carved a lengthy path through the ice layer, leaving behind a trail that pointed back towards civilization. Ahead, nothing but solid ice and darkness stretched into the distance, with the dense fog that marked the “border” churning and swelling at the edge of visibility, growing more ominous and formidable, yet seemingly always just out of reach.

Frem stood atop the church ark, his gaze fixed on the endless icy plains stretching out before him, flanked by two fire basins ablaze with flames as cold as ice. These flames crackled with low, indistinct murmurs as if hiding secrets within their glow.

He felt the “focus” that had been revealed to him in the latest revelation by the flame tower, Ta Ruijin, was near. This unique point held the potential to maintain the “legacy” in its pure form during the transition from the old world to the new.

Frem was aware that the “Captain” was orchestrating a monumental plan akin to the creation of a world. He understood that success would herald the arrival of a “new world” – a concept beyond his ability to visualize. Yet, he was certain it would be vastly superior to the twisted, dark, and crisis-laden expanse of the Boundless Sea that currently enveloped them.

This new realm promised a place for everyone, a fact Frem gleaned from the sporadic messages that had returned from the edge of the known world.

However, this rebirth necessitated destruction; everything from the old world would be eradicated in this transformative process. The “Captain” might possess the means to “rebirth” individuals in this new world, but what of the creations left behind?

What would become of the poems, the melodies, the remarkable works of art, the precious scrolls and tablets chronicling the Dark Ages, the Old City-State Era, the New City-State Era, and the essence of a once-thriving civilization? Was there a way to safeguard these artifacts?

Even if preservation were possible, these remnants of the past could pose a significant challenge during the process of world creation, potentially becoming a monumental burden.

This deep-rooted concern propelled the Flame Bearers on their arduous journey northward, and now, after enduring countless hardships, they were on the cusp of reaching their goal.

Their mission was to bestow a “legacy” upon the inhabitants of the new world, safeguarded within this eternally frozen ice field.

It was within reach, just beyond them.

Yet, an unexpected, shrill noise erupted in the distance, swiftly followed by a cacophony of explosions and the grinding sound of metal on metal. The ark beneath their feet shuddered violently, emitting a deep groan as if some internal mechanism had ceased operation.

A sense of dread washed over Frem in an instant.

Shortly thereafter, a woman priestess, clad in a dark robe and her face obscured by a veil, rushed to Frem's side.

"Your Holiness, the main power conduit of the ice-breaking device has suffered a rupture!"

…

Meanwhile, the Vanished and Bright Star traversed a monochromatic grey-white expanse. At the end of this prolonged "transition channel," a subtle infusion of color was beginning to emerge.

Duncan, stationed at the bow of the Vanished, gazed silently towards the slowly materializing seascape ahead. He detected approaching footsteps, accompanied by a sense of "warmth" that had become a rarity in this world.

Turning, Duncan observed Nina behind him, enveloped in a gentle radiance, the sunlight cascading around her, seemingly dispelling the pervasive chill left by the world's demise.

"…Have you discovered a new application for 'sunlight'?" Duncan queried, his eyebrows arched in amusement, a smile gracing his face before he grew contemplative, "Your control has become increasingly refined – initially, even attempting to boil water with a flame would result in singed hair."

Nina responded with a slight squint, "Yes, and it would occasionally singe those shadowy passersby from the darkness and various demons."

“…I’m inclined to believe their presence wasn’t merely coincidental.”

“It’s of no consequence.”

A momentary silence ensued between them.

Then, in a soft tone, Nina broke the silence, “…We’re almost there.”

“Yes,” Duncan replied gently, poised to articulate further thoughts, but before he could, the indistinct hues at the periphery of his vision burst forth into a serene expanse of sea and islands dotting the horizon.

“Space jump… concluded.”

Chapter 826: The Final Assembly

The abrupt end of the spatial jump transition signaled the reappearance of the Vanished and Bright Star, emerging from the nondescript, gray-white void of space. Their arrival was accompanied by a gentle shudder and vibration, akin to vessels smoothly gliding into the peaceful, mirror-like surface of a serene sea.

After a prolonged expedition to the farthest reaches of the known world, the two spacecraft had returned to their point of origin—the initial node they had discovered and the final resting place of the legendary Leviathan Queen.

Upon their return, the environment seemed unchanged from their departure. The Boundless Sea remained eerily still, and the scattered shadowy islands were cloaked in persistent mist. The largest island was just barely discernible through the dense fog, its outlines faintly appearing like an apparition from a dream.

The atmosphere was noticeably quieter than before—the typical subtle disturbances on the water's surface were absent, and the continuous, low whispers of the fog had fallen silent. Even the breeze sweeping across the deck carried a sound that was muted and distant.

The crew gathered at the ship's bow railing, their eyes fixed on the distant islands and the familiar seascape they had not seen in a long time. After a moment of reflective silence, Nina broke the quiet, her voice laden with wonder and nostalgia: "Without realizing it, we've been navigating the edges of the world for such a long time…"

Morris, standing next to her, responded in a subdued tone, “Yes, so long that I almost forgot this journey had an end.” He adjusted the focus of his ruby-colored glasses and added, “I believe I’ll carry the memories of everything we witnessed on this journey forever.”

Turning to Morris, Vanna commented, “This will undoubtedly lead to a series of remarkable discoveries and scholarly articles.”

Morris paused briefly before replying, “No one writes or reads scholarly papers anymore—the world has begun to decline, and no new discoveries will rekindle those fading embers.”

Vanna shook her head, her voice infused with hope: “Then we’ll leave that to a distant future—one where the spark of curiosity is reignited, and people seek knowledge and wisdom once again.”

Shirley, leaning against the railing, looked out at the horizon and murmured to herself, “Ah, yet here we are, back again.”

Behind the group, Duncan felt the collective gaze of his crew turn towards him, awaiting his command.

He was prepared for this moment, and as it arrived, he took a deep breath and commanded calmly, “We will dock by the island with the temple, and then everyone will transfer to the Bright Star for departure. We’ll keep in touch using the flame.”

Lucretia appeared about to speak but then opted for silence, closing her mouth.

“But before we do that,” Duncan continued, “let’s gather in the dining hall one last time.”

Footsteps resonated across the deck as Alice, the doll who had just finished her tasks at the helm, approached the captain and the rest of the crew.

“Alice, it’s time to showcase your culinary skills,” Duncan called out with a smile as he saw the doll-like figure approach, “We’re about to enjoy a meal.”

Alice hesitated momentarily at his words, but then her expression transformed into a bright, cheerful smile, and she nodded eagerly, “Ah! Okay!”

Lucretia quickly interjected, “I’ll fetch Luni and Nilu. They can help in the kitchen—and I’ll also bring the fine wine from the Bright Star.”

“I’ll help too!” Nina exclaimed, her expression radiating warmth like sunlight, “With my help, the cooking will be finished in no time!”

Alice seemed slightly overwhelmed by the enthusiastic offers to assist, gesturing dismissively with her hands, “Ah, there’s no need for so many helpers, I can manage on my own…”

However, after a moment of consideration, she sighed resignedly, “Well, if you really want to help, then come along…”

As the Vanished continued its journey through the mist-enshrouded islands towards the dark island with the grand temple, a unique gathering quickly took shape in the ship’s dining hall.

The long table, central to many previous gatherings and welcoming to all aboard, was once again positioned in the heart of the dining hall. Nina ignited the lanterns on the surrounding pillars with flames as bright as the sun, while Luni and Alice prepared a lavish spread of food and fine wine on the table. For a brief moment, the warmth and light they generated seemed to dispel the eternal night of the Boundless Sea and the pervasive chill of the outside.

Duncan took his place at the center of the table, flanked by Nina on his left and Alice on his right. Nearby sat Morris, Shirley, Dog, Sailor, Luni, Nilu, as well as Ai the dove and Agatha in her phantom form, who did not require food.

At both ends of the table, three chairs remained conspicuously vacant—Duncan had set them aside but remained silent about whom they were intended for.

As everyone settled in, Nilu, a diminutive doll, climbed onto the table. She grasped a large bottle of wine, dashing back and forth, pouring the dark-red liquid that shimmered like blood in the sunlight into each glass from the Bright Star's private stock.

Duncan raised his glass, but a sudden recollection caused him to pause and scan the room, his expression marked by complexity.

After a brief moment, his face relaxed slightly, and he quietly shifted his chair to the opposite side of the table.

Alice promptly adjusted her chair to maintain her position to Duncan's right as he repositioned himself at the table. Ai, the dove, flapped its wings and followed suit, settling near Duncan. The others, seated across from him, watched with puzzled expressions as they tried to decipher the captain's sudden change.

"The position I was in just now wasn't auspicious," Duncan admitted with a half-smile, struggling to articulate the strange thought that had prompted his movement. He gestured dismissively to those across the table, "Don't bother moving; stay where you are—it's luckier this way."

The crew on the other side listened, none quite understanding the captain's reasoning. Morris suspected it was some arcane joke known only to captains, a bit of gallows humor from subspace. Meanwhile, Nina, after a brief pause, burst into laughter.

"What are you laughing at?" Duncan asked, his gaze sharp.

“Nothing, just felt a sudden relief,” Nina replied with a mischievous grin from across the table, “The way you seriously mentioned ‘not auspicious’ just then was more comforting than anything else you’ve ever said.”

Duncan’s eyes flickered with realization at Nina’s tease, and he cleared his throat, “Ahumph, as I’ve mentioned, this is our last gathering on the ship for this journey. After this, we’ll dock at the Leviathan Queen’s resting place and then part ways, understood?”

“Yes, understood, Uncle Duncan,” Nina responded, her eyes twinkling with a mix of respect and jest. She lifted her glass, her face alight with expectation, “Then, may I have some fermented grape juice or wheat fruit juice today?”

It had been a while since Duncan had heard such a request from Nina. A smile crossed his face as he nodded, “Today you can, Shirley, you too—no need to sneak drinks today.”

Shirley, who was swirling her glass idly, looked up startled by Duncan’s comment, instinctively straightening up, “I haven’t been sneaking drinks!”

Duncan offered a knowing half-smile, “Didn’t you notice when you were sneaking drinks on the ship that the bottles, glasses, and the liquor were all sorts of ‘mirrors’?”

Caught off guard, Shirley was at a loss for words.

Duncan shook his head, still smiling, and raised his glass, “To this journey.”

Thus, everyone with hands lifted their glasses, those capable of drinking did so, and those who could not, spilled their wine onto the floor of the Vanished in a symbolic toast.

Even Ai, the dove, participated earnestly, dipping its beak into the glass, its demeanor more solemn than ever.

Alice stood up and began serving the meal to everyone at the long table. She lifted the lid of the pot that sat in the center, revealing a rich fish soup that was customary for everyone to enjoy. Beside the pot, there was a large plate of golden-brown sweet pancakes, a favorite treat from Pland that the captain adored.

Once Alice had distributed the initial servings, Nilu, the tiny doll only as tall as an adult's arm, scampered back onto the table. She deftly carried soup bowls and plates of pancakes to everyone, her cheerful demeanor showing no sign of comprehending the significance of "this journey," yet she appeared very joyful.

"I didn't expect such a little one like her to be capable of working so well," Shirley commented, her tone filled with wonder as she watched Nilu bustling back and forth. "I remember when I first saw her, she wouldn't move, just lying in a wooden box. She was said to be Luni's sister from long ago, left lying in a doll shop for a hundred years…"

"Nilu's awakening turned out to be a great success, and the process of endowing her with reason and humanity went incredibly smoothly," Lucretia interjected casually, "It might be due to the unique conditions at the frontier and Luni's influence… this little one seemed predisposed to 'activate' from the start."

Nilu approached Lucretia, cheerfully placing down the soup bowl and opening her arms wide, emitting a tiny, delicate sound: "Affinity!"

Watching this scene with a gentle smile, Duncan suddenly posed a question, "Have you thought about the new world?"

Nina paused, her expression showing a moment of confusion: "The new world… what about it?"

“In the new world, what do you want? Or rather…” Duncan paused thoughtfully, his gaze sweeping seriously across everyone at the long table, “What do you imagine the new world to be like?”

Chapter 827: Farewell

At the expansive dining table, the crew members exchanged hesitant glances, each taken aback by the captain's unexpected question. The room fell silent as they puzzled over the underlying meaning of his inquiry.

After a moment of thoughtful silence, Nina had a sudden realization. She considered her response carefully before speaking in a soft voice, "Perhaps… a safer place to live? It's hard to imagine… I think the best place would be Pland before the sun became problematic. Ideally, it would be more spacious. Living in a city-state feels confining, a feeling that's especially noticeable after experiencing the vast openness of the sea. The world is so vast, yet finding enough space to simply stand feels remarkably limited…"

Duncan, giving her a reassuring smile, agreed, "Indeed, there will certainly be a broader, safer habitable area in the future," then he turned to Shirley, who was seated next to Nina. "And what about you, Shirley? What are your hopes for this new world?"

Shirley, her mouth half-full of a biscuit, replied somewhat indistinctly, "I haven't thought much about it—just essentials like enough food and clothing. It would be wonderful if utilities like water and electricity were more affordable."

Duncan gently corrected her, "That's more a wish for a better society, not necessarily the world itself. Perhaps think a bit bigger?"

After a thoughtful pause and another bite of her biscuit, Shirley's expression became contemplative. Finally, she said, "Well… my hopes are similar to Nina's—a safer, bigger place. You're right; everything else really depends on the people… Oh, Dog, he would love a large house, or even just a vast, empty lot where Dog can roam freely without being disturbed…"

Duncan nodded, smiling, and shifted his attention to Morris, who was nearby.

"As a scholar, I realize that no society composed of people is ever perfect, even if the environment is safer. People themselves can introduce new challenges. That's part of why societies evolve and progress," Morris explained with a shrug. "So rather than envisioning a 'perfect' new world, I'd prefer more opportunities for research and more unexplored phenomena to study. More unprecedented events, more wondrous places, more remote destinations worth exploring. I dream that we can delve deeply into the principles of things without our research being obstructed by various 'dark barriers' and 'contradictions'. I hope for a world where knowledge isn't dangerous, where scholars don't fear for their lives each time they open a book. I wish for humanity to advance beyond the unspeakable fears that keep us tied to our birthplaces."

Morris let out a soft sigh, a spontaneous smile spreading across his face, "If that were possible, it would indeed be a marvelous place…"

"I just wish to regain my sense of taste and have a normal sleep cycle," interjected Sailor, who had been quiet until now, muttering, "I haven't had a good night's sleep in centuries."

Vanna was the next to speak, her expression wistful and filled with longing. "My hope," she said, her voice tinged with emotion, "is to witness what 'continents' are really like. I imagine vast and fertile stretches, numerous cities and 'nations' flourishing in the world, with people traveling easily between these cities. I’m curious about what such a scene would truly look like.”

Shirley, surprised by the idea, responded with wide eyes, “Is that even possible? A land as big as the ocean?”

With a knowing half-smile, Vanna replied, “Didn’t you just express a desire for a ‘more spacious’ place? Continents are far more expansive than city-states.”

Shirley, slightly embarrassed, responded by pursing her lips, “I was just thinking out loud… I can’t really picture it either…”

Agatha, her ethereal form gliding past the dining table, chimed in with a magical tone, “Yes, it’s difficult to imagine things we’ve never experienced. As for the new world—I have almost no specific desires for it. It should be a benevolent place, and my only wish is to keep traveling with the Vanished. Despite being the newest member aboard this ship, I’ve already encountered landscapes beyond anything I ever imagined. It’s a pity our journey is coming to an end…”

Shirley’s expression suddenly brightened, “Then I hope to remain with the Vanished! There’s nothing more enjoyable than adventuring with this ship.”

Nina laughed, swaying in her chair, “I agree, it would be ideal if we could return to the Vanished.”

Their eyes briefly met Duncan’s, but quickly shifted away to the ‘Sea Witch’ Lucretia, who had remained silent throughout the conversation. Observing their gazes, Lucretia snapped out of her reverie.

“Will the Bright Star and my crew have a place in the new world?” she asked curiously. “This includes Luni, Nilu, and Rabbi, as well as the metallic man-servants and wooden maid-servants I’ve created… Are such beings permitted in the new world?”

Duncan had been quietly absorbing the various dreams and visions of his crew, sketching out the future world in his mind. Lucretia's question drew him back to the present. After a moment of thoughtful consideration, he assured her, "They will have a place—all beings will find a home."

Simultaneously, Shirley and Nina eagerly asked, "Will the Vanished also be there?"

Duncan hesitated slightly before affirming, "The Vanished will be there," he nodded decisively, "in some form or another. I will ensure that everything and everyone reaches the new world in the most suitable manner. Then, you can still come back to the Vanished, and we will explore even further."

Lucretia's expression gradually transformed into one of contentment, her smile broadening: "Then this time, please bring my brother—even from across the Boundless Sea and through various barriers, I can almost sense his resentment."

Duncan remained silent for a few moments, then responded with a deep nod, "Okay."

Lucretia let out a relieved sigh, stood up, and lifted her wine glass.

"Then, let us toast to the new world," she proposed, her smile reflecting a blend of hope and anticipation.

Agatha also rose, her glass held high: "To the new world!"

Others joined in with their own enthusiastic cheers:

"To the captain!"

"To the Vanished!"

"To the future!"

"…Uh, I don't know what to say, damn it, cheers!"

The gathering lifted their glasses in unison. Nina, having consumed a considerable amount of beer and wine, grinned broadly, her cheeks flushed: “Shirley, give some to Ai; she doesn’t have hands… How does this dove manage to drink so much? It’s all gone?”

She then glanced around the table: “Let’s include Luni in the toast… And Nilu, too. Can Nilu even drink?”

The small doll eagerly raised a glass nearly as large as herself and exclaimed, “Yes!”

As she spoke, she embraced the glass and gulped down its contents in one swift motion. Red wine dribbled from the joints of her neck, staining her exquisite doll dress.

Luni reacted with surprise and immediately started apologizing, hastily trying to dab at the wine stains on Nilu with a handkerchief.

Nina leaned forward, offering to help: “Hey, that won’t dry quickly; let me dry her off. Don’t let her move…”

Shirley quickly intervened, grabbing Nina by the collar to stop her: “No! You’ll just scorch it again! Remember what happened to your white dress with the blue trim?”

Amidst the commotion, Dog remained unperturbed, his two paws holding his glass while the liquid poured into his bony neck. The liquor fizzed inside his chest cavity and evaporated almost immediately as he shook his massive skeletal head, murmuring, “This wine has no taste… In the new world, I hope I can taste things normally…”

As he spoke, he sensed an attentive gaze and looked up to find the captain watching the scene with an amused smile: “It’s possible.”

Observing the unfolding chaos, Lucretia shook her head with a mixture of amusement and resignation, “If I had known it would end in chaos, I would have brought Rabbi. That rabbit thrives on chaos, creating mischief even when it's unnecessary…"

"Yeah, Rabbi would have been perfect for this," Luni agreed, continuing to handle the thoroughly drenched Nilu with one hand, while still futilely trying to clean her up with the handkerchief in the other, "Rabbi absorbs water well."

Lucretia let out a sigh: "You shouldn't use the fact that you're not afraid of nightmares as an excuse to always pick on Rabbi. I remember you using him to wipe the table last time."

Luni immediately bowed her head in remorse: "Mistress, I apologize."

From her sister's supportive grasp, Nilu cheerfully raised her hand: "Not sorry!"

Lucretia resignedly said, "Forget it, stop wiping. We'll just soak everything in a tub when we get back."

Duncan sat at the table, his arms crossed, a serene smile on his face as he observed the familiar, chaotic scene unfold before him. It reminded him of the time when Alice had proudly presented her fish soup at the dining table, while her head was still bubbling away in the cooking pot.

Soon after, they prepared to depart.

The Vanished and the Bright Star moved slowly but eventually reached the black island adorned with the towering temple and winding paths.

The necessary farewells had been exchanged.

A paper-folded small boat was launched from the edge of the Vanished's deck, unfolding into a shuttle large enough to accommodate everyone. Lucretia stood aboard the small craft, with Luni beside her, clutching Nilu.

Shirley, Dog, Nina, Morris, Vanna, Sailor, and the spectral form of Agatha…

One after another, the figures disembarked from the Vanished, gathering on the paper-folded small boat.

Duncan remained on the deck, silently watching the unfolding scene.

Then, he noticed Nina and Shirley turn around, followed by Vanna, Morris, and the others—their faces adorned with smiles, they waved back at him.

Lucretia wore the brightest smile of all.

At every part of, one should smile, so that if they never met again, the last memory they held of each other would be filled with warmth and joy.

Thus, Duncan too smiled, waving vigorously at each departing member.

And then, they left.

Chapter 828: The End and the Beginning

The Bright Star skillfully navigated farther away from the shore, adjusting its course with a subtle turn. The ancient wheel mechanisms on its sides groaned quietly under the pressure as the ship gained momentum, swiftly slicing through the dense, ominous fog ahead. It sped up, disappearing from sight as it moved further away, eventually fading completely from Duncan's view.

Duncan stayed behind on the Vanished, his gaze locked on the last spot where the Bright Star had been visible before it vanished into the thick fog. He continued to watch long after the ship was gone, his attention only shifting when he noticed a gothic-style doll in an elaborate deep purple dress standing beside him.

The doll, known as Alice, had also been staring off into the distance. Simultaneously with Duncan, she turned her focus elsewhere.

Just then, a plump white dove landed on Alice's shoulder. The dove looked curiously at her with its small, round eyes, reminiscent of mung beans.

The atmosphere on the Vanished had become eerily quiet. The usual chatter and activity that animated the deck were absent. There were no playful arguments between Shirley and Nina, no Morris gazing out to sea lost in thought, no Vanna sitting on a barrel carving amulets, and no sightings of the mysterious Agatha. Only Duncan, the doll, and the dove remained.

After a lengthy silence, Alice murmured, "They're all gone…"

It was unclear to Duncan whether this was an expression of sorrow from the doll or simply an observation.

Reflecting on the departure of the others, Alice had not questioned whether she should stay; she had remained as if it had always been her intention. Her acceptance of the situation intrigued Duncan.

“When everyone else left, you didn’t ask if you could stay,” Duncan noted, looking into the doll’s eyes, “You didn’t even seem to consider it, did you?”

Alice responded with a chuckle, her tone confident, “Of course I had to stay!”

Her response was direct, implying that the decision required no justification.

Duncan paused to consider her words, then laughed and gestured around them, “You see, it seems we’ve come full circle back to the beginning.”

Alice looked around, her realization quick, “Oh, it’s just you and me left on this ship… ah, and Ai, and Mr. Goathead.”

The dove then tilted its head and began to flap its wings vigorously, squawking in a sharp, discordant female voice, “Initializing settings, initializing settings!”

Duncan watched the dove intently, reminded of his homeland by the fact that this bird hailed as a relic from Earth, and replied softly, “…Yes, initializing settings. Time to proceed to the next operation.”

He then turned away and waved to Alice without looking back, “Off we go, Alice, it’s time to fulfill our promise to Gomona.”

“Ah, yes, captain!” Alice responded eagerly.

“Aye, aye, captain!” Ai cooed loudly with her wings flapping.

…

As they continued to sail away, the fog around them grew thicker, swirling like an intricate curtain that seemed to isolate them from the rest of the world. The silhouette of the ship's stern gradually blurred until it completely disappeared into the expansive fog, signaling that the Bright Star had reached the perimeter of the island clusters and was about to vanish entirely from the temple island.

On the highest deck of the Bright Star, Lucretia and others stood, unwilling to break their stares from the encroaching mist until the last familiar contours of their surroundings had faded.

"At first, I thought I was cursed to be trapped on that ship for a lifetime," Shirley confided quietly, visibly shaken by the memory. "But now, we are really leaving it…"

Near her, a clothesline stretched between a railing and a flagpole, from which a small doll named Nilu was hanging. The line ran through the sleeves of her garment, allowing her to sway gently. This little creature, still developing her awareness, sensed the shift in mood and asked timidly, "Mistress… unhappy?"

Lucretia turned towards the swinging doll, her expression softening to a gentle smile, "No, just thinking."

"Thinking!" Nilu repeated, perhaps questioning or simply echoing the last word she heard.

Unbothered by the repetition, Lucretia affirmed quietly to herself, "Yes, thinking, thinking about what to do next. You will think like this too, in the future. Your mind will grow, just like your sister's – you all possess the 'hearts' I meticulously created."

Encouraged by her words, Nilu began swinging more joyfully, exclaiming, “The heart!”

The prolonged silence was broken when Sailor announced, “We are now nearing the physical maritime boundary. Lady Lucretia, any further and we’ll fall into the chaotic time stream. It’s time to enter the next stage of the journey.”

Lucretia nodded slightly, her gaze then shifting to the side.

In the mist, a shadowy female figure appeared, nodding back at Lucretia.

“Miss Agatha, Sailor, I want to thank you both. Go ahead and take over from here.”

“Don’t mention it, it’s all per the captain’s orders,” Agatha responded, her voice ethereal as it floated through the air. Then, her spectral form gradually faded into the mist.

Suddenly, a deep and profound rumbling began within the Bright Star, emanating from beneath their feet. It felt as though a massive beast was stirring in the ship’s hull, its presence rising from the sea’s depths. The rumbling and vibrations spread through the entire vessel as the “reflection of the Vanished,” guided by Agatha, began to physically manifest.

A gigantic phantom emerged from a shadowy realm, swiftly ascending from the calm sea surface. With unstoppable force, it merged into the Bright Star.

Shirley’s eyes widened in awe as she watched the deck ignite with intense, surreal green flames. These flames consumed every part of the ship inch by inch, transforming the towering smokestack into a dark mast, while the steaming vapors morphed into ghostly sails. The wooden deck extended before her, leading to a grand helm and a dark steering wheel at its far end.

For a brief moment, the scene vividly resembled the Vanished, making Shirley feel as if she were back on board her previous ship.

Yet, this was only an illusion, albeit a fleeting one. From up close, Shirley could discern numerous details characteristic of the Bright Star, confirming that they were still aboard it.

However, this level of “projection fusion” was sufficient for Anomaly 077 to assume his role as the “helmsman of the Vanished.”

The gaunt figure, resembling a corpse, solemnly straightened his sailor’s uniform, then nodded at Lucretia and approached the phantom-flamed helm. He climbed the spectral steps to the elevated platform and grasped the dark steering wheel firmly. The hollow howls and echoes, seemingly emanating from the depths of this apparition, soon transformed into celebratory cheers for their homeward voyage.

“Return – home!” Sailor shouted, his voice hoarse and commanding as he forcefully turned the steering wheel, “We’re going home!”

As Duncan traversed the ruins along the “Pilgrimage Path,” a distant howling echoed from the edge of the vast sea, prompting him to pause and glance back towards the source of the spectral sounds.

Alice, walking alongside him, also halted and looked around with curiosity, “What’s the matter?”

Duncan turned to her, his voice low and reflective, “…They’re returning, everything is going smoothly.”

“Is that so? That’s great,” Alice replied, her face lighting up with a smile, “I wonder how Pland is doing now…”

“Pland… is doing well.” Duncan’s response came slowly as he attuned himself to the distant and elusive “signal” that bridged time and space.

He maintained a connection with Pland, whose “avatar” remained active in the antique shop, following his previous instructions. However, Duncan felt the link weakening, not due to any environmental factors or the vast “remote distance” at the “end of the world.” This fading connection was an inevitable consequence of the “anomaly” known as “Zhou Ming” growing and awakening.

The fragile sanctuary could not endure the intense scrutiny of the “anomaly,” whose gaze, if cast even momentarily across the Boundless Sea, could obliterate it in a mere 0.002 seconds.

That was why he had sent Nina and Morris back to the Boundless Sea—to serve as his “eyes”—since he anticipated losing his own ability to observe it directly.

After a brief moment of tuning in, Duncan carefully managed his dwindling connection to the distant avatars. Sensing the escalating “awakening” within himself, he further diminished the avatars’ activity, now disabling their senses of taste, smell, and their ability to perceive temperature, pain, and other complex sensations inherently human.

These human sensations—feeling warmth or cold, pain, tiredness, and the need for sleep—had once been crucial in maintaining his identity as a human. But now, he had no choice but to gradually shut them off to prolong his observational capabilities of the Boundless Sea.

His goal was to sustain this until Nina was safely back.

“Captain?”

Alice’s concerned voice broke his focus. Duncan turned to see the doll looking at him worriedly, gently tugging at his sleeve.

“Are you okay?” Alice inquired anxiously, “You don’t look very well.”

Duncan’s expression softened gradually.

Even without the sensory feedback from the avatars, he was determined to retain his humanity.

“It’s okay,” he reassured her softly, “Let’s go, they’ve already set off, and we still have a long way to go.”

Chapter 829: An Unexpected Encounter

In a world where everything was bathed in shades of gray and white, the shadowy Mirror Vanished, which veiled the Bright Star, moved silently through the corridor-like expanse. Its massive structure was surrounded by green flames that glowed with a ghostly light, creating a navigational link between the ship and its environment while Anomaly 077 piloted the vessel toward the Boundless Sea.

The voyage back seemed to drag on forever. The monochrome corridor stretched on indefinitely, presenting a dreary landscape devoid of any wind or noise outside the ship. Even though the crew was well-acquainted with this path, it felt as though they were making no progress, caught in an endless journey that everyone on board grew weary of.

The Bright Star functioned both as a cutting-edge exploration vessel and a mobile fortress for the sea witch. It housed numerous dangerous laboratories and workshops, making it a place not conducive to light-hearted pursuits.

Shirley, utterly bored, leaned against the railing, staring into the perpetual gray and white abyss. She mumbled to herself, “When will we ever arrive? It feels like we’ve been aimlessly floating in this void since we set out.”

“You’re not wrong,” Nina agreed, joining Shirley at the railing and letting out a deep sigh. “It does seem like we’ve spent most of our time just drifting here.”

After a brief silence, Shirley confessed, “I kind of miss the captain.”

“It hasn’t been that long since we were last with the captain,” Dog’s muffled voice came from the deck below them. He looked up at Shirley and remarked, “Weren’t you just saying yesterday how relieved you were to be free from someone constantly pestering you about reading and writing?”

“That’s different,” Shirley replied, looking at Dog with a conflicted expression. “I still feel… it’s complicated.”

Dog lowered his head, acknowledging Shirley’s difficulty in expressing her feelings.

Suddenly, an unexpected tremor disrupted their conversation as the deck vibrated briefly.

Dog quickly raised his head, the green flames in his eye sockets flickering wildly. “Did you two feel that? It felt like the deck just shook.”

“Could we be approaching our destination?” Shirley speculated, her gaze shifting towards the horizon. A strange, indistinct line began to materialize within the gray and white. “Look, something is appearing!”

No sooner had Shirley spoken than another, stronger tremor shook the Bright Star. The entire ship trembled, and soft alarm bells rang out from different areas shrouded in the spectral illusion of the Mirror Vanished.

Alarmed, Shirley exchanged a concerned glance with Nina and rushed towards the stern’s control wheel.

As they sprinted, the chains of the dark abyss suddenly tightened, pulling Dog into the air before he could stand. Dangling and bouncing, he shouted, “Hey, Shirley, slow down! At least warn me first! Don’t rush off like this __”

But Shirley didn’t listen. She continued to drag Dog along as she ran across the deck, with Nina moving even quicker, like a swiftly darting flame.

When they reached the control wheel, they discovered Lucretia already there, intently monitoring the situation. Sailor, the helmsman, gripped the wheel tightly, his face marked by nervous confusion.

Nina hurried over to Lucretia and inquired anxiously, “Miss Lucretia, what happened?”

With a serious tone, Lucretia explained, “We are exiting the ‘corridor’ prematurely. We have not yet returned to the Boundless Sea.”

Although Shirley was not an expert in navigation, her experiences sailing the frontier made her acutely aware of the seriousness of their situation. Her eyes widened in alarm, “Ah?! Damn… Exiting prematurely means falling directly into chaos. It could take years to return…”

Lucretia paused, lost in thought for a moment, before addressing Sailor, “What’s the situation now? Can we still control it?”

Sailor responded quickly, “No, the corridor is collapsing, and we are veering off course—it’s as if some massive ‘target’ is interfering with it. I can only maintain the ship’s stability now. Be prepared; we are about to exit!”

Just as Sailor finished his explanation, a violent tremor, stronger and more sudden than the earlier ones, shook the Bright Star violently. It seemed as if the ship was flung several meters into the air before crashing back down onto the sea. Amid the thunderous roar, even Lucretia nearly stumbled. Simultaneously, the uniform gray and white ‘corridor’ seemed to rip apart from the force, disappearing from view.

Within seconds, an immense expanse of dense, chaotic fog surrounded them. Outside, a mirror-smooth sea surface shrouded in mist appeared. The Bright Star found itself adrift in this obscured ‘sea,’ directionless and unable to identify any landmarks or determine its position.

Visibly shaken, Shirley stared into the distance at the thick fog typical of the frontier seas and sighed deeply, “Ah, it’s over, we are still at the frontier…”

Lucretia, frowning and with a tone laden with concern, added, “Even worse, we’re not just at the frontier but outside the six-mile limit.” She peered into the swirling fog and continued, “If we were inside the six-mile limit, there might still be a chance to catch the civilized world’s radio signals, or at least find a way to ‘navigate’ back to the Boundless Sea. But beyond it…”

Sailor cut in grimly, “This time, ‘direction’ is completely useless.”

Agatha, materializing like a misty, ethereal figure on the deck, approached with an understanding of their plight and asked about their next steps, “Miss Lucretia, should we temporarily disengage the projection of the Vanished?”

After a moment’s consideration, Lucretia decided, “No, keep it for now. Although it’s just a projection, it’s still the shadow of the Vanished, which can provide some protection to the Bright Star in this eerie sea… Are you under a lot of stress?”

“I’m fine,” Agatha reassured her, shaking her head, “I can maintain it for a few more days easily. But it can’t be maintained indefinitely.”

“I understand,” Lucretia acknowledged gently. Her attention then shifted to something flickering deep within the fog—perhaps a ship’s lamp, or just an illusory glimmer of hope?

“There’s something there!” Shirley exclaimed, her excitement palpable as she jumped up and pointed into the distance. “There’s something flashing over there!”

“Head that way,” Lucretia decided after a brief moment of contemplation.

She knew this decision was somewhat impulsive. This area, the frontier beyond the crucial six-mile limit, was not governed by the protective influence of the Four Gods' nodes or the temporal and spatial safeguards known as "navigation lines." Any phenomena they encountered here could be perilous—be it a transient breeze, a deceptive illusion, or a siren-like whisper.

Venturing towards an unidentified presence in this frontier zone carried significant risks. Yet, with the Bright Star having prematurely exited the navigational corridor and now hopelessly adrift beyond the essential boundary, swallowed by a relentless dense fog and possibly surrounded by emerging time rifts and enigmatic "entities" that could be just as dangerous, they seemed to have no other option.

The flickering light in the fog might be a "drifting object" that had originated within the six-mile limit, and approaching it could potentially offer a route back to the Boundless Sea.

Guided by Sailor's skilled handling, the Bright Star, surrounded by spectral flames, slowly adjusted its course, inching closer to the shimmering light deep within the fog.

As they approached, the light remained consistent, growing clearer instead of dissipating into the mist.

Lucretia breathed a sigh of relief, but her anxiety soon surged anew.

The light was real, not an illusion—it was a tangible entity, a mysterious object drifting through the fog-laden sea…

What kind of ominous object could it be?

Lucretia glanced back toward the deck, reassured by the thought that under the protective guise of the Vanished's mirrored counterpart, combined with the Bright Star’s formidable arsenal and unique capabilities, they were well-prepared to face whatever awaited them.

Her father’s critical mission was far from complete, and she was resolute not to perish en route home for an unknown cause.

Other crew members emerged from below deck and gathered on the aft deck, quickly catching up on the situation through the updates provided by Shirley and Nina. They too began to anxiously watch the light as it grew steadily clearer through the dense fog.

Suddenly, as if the fog momentarily thinned, the light and the silhouette behind it became distinctly visible.

Using the lens embedded in his face, Morris was the first to make out the shape behind the light, and his expression subtly changed.

It was a ship.

A frontier exploration vessel, distinguished by the unique features of a paddle wheel power system and a ghostly half-body.

It was the Bright Star.

A silence fell over the deck, and after a short pause, many eyes turned to Lucretia.

“…It looks familiar,” Shirley murmured quietly.

Snapping out of her daze, Lucretia realized—

“That’s the Bright Star… from a long time ago, when I first crossed the critical six-mile limit.”

Chapter 830: Hesitation at the Threshold

Lucretia instantly recognized the ship; it was her own vessel, the Bright Star, yet it belonged to an alternate timeline.

Decades earlier, during a daring voyage near the borders, Lucretia had inadvertently crossed the boundary and became “lost” on the Bright Star. At that exact moment, decades in the past, she stood aboard that ship, desperately seeking a way back to the Boundless Seas.

Sailor, clutching the wheel and sweating profusely (assuming his sweat glands still functioned), instinctively shouted, “Lady! That’s an vessel from another timeline—do not go near it! We likely got knocked out of the ‘channel’ prematurely because of its interference. Any rash contact could trap us!”

Prompted by Sailor’s warning, the crew on deck began to understand that this encounter was unlike any previous interactions, such as the one with the Sea Song in the “channel.”

The Sea Song was a ship unconnected to the Vanished or the Bright Star, and its sudden appearance at that time was just a fleeting phantom caused by temporal disturbances. However, the ship now materializing from the dense fog was indeed the Bright Star from a different timeline, a “parallel space counterpart” to their own vessel. The implications of contact between two such ships within the temporal flow were uncertain.

No scholar, even those from the Truth Academy skilled in physical and combat arts, had explored this phenomenon, but it was clear that the outcome would likely be dire.

Yet Lucretia seemed to disregard Sailor's urgent warning. She gazed intently at the Bright Star as it drew closer through the fog. Suddenly, as if struck by a realization, she quickly surveyed her surroundings.

The illusion of the Vanished overlaid the ship, its dark wooden deck aglow with ghostly spirit fires, and translucent spirit sails billowing from the masts —all as vivid in her memory as the day it happened.

On this final journey at the edge of the world, she finally grasped the enduring mystery that even her "father" had failed to unravel.

It was she herself, steering her own destiny…

"Don't worry," she spoke softly, her voice not loud, but carrying enough weight to quiet the entire deck, "We won't meet that ship—we'll just pass by it. Keep to our current course, sail beside it, without making any contact."

"Okay… Just make sure that 'you' on that ship doesn't suddenly come closer," Sailor murmured softly. He didn't challenge the "captain's" judgment at that moment; instead, he obeyed the order, piloting their "hybrid" vessel, slowly steering alongside the Bright Star.

Tension gripped everyone on board as they observed the Bright Star emerging from the dense fog of another temporal stream. It was close enough for them to make out numerous details on its hull, spotting many variances that seemed to mark it as a "version" from decades past. They watched anxiously as the other ship momentarily slowed and faltered as if the sudden proximity to the Vanished caused a brief stir of panic. Ultimately, the two ships passed by each other without incident.

Lucretia exhaled a deep sigh of relief.

Then, in the moments after the ships had completely passed one another, the Bright Star from the alternate time stream quickly faded, vanishing like a phantom into the fog.

The convergence of the time streams had concluded.

This was the moment Lucretia had anticipated. She immediately commanded, “Turn the ship around, follow the last trace of that ship as it disappeared; that’s our direction back to the Boundless Seas.”

Sailor internally hesitated, yet his hands moved swiftly to carry out the captain’s order. As the ship began to slowly adjust its course, he turned to glance at the “sea witch”: “Lady, was that…”

“That was something that happened once, decades ago, beyond the critical boundary. The Bright Star once encountered the ‘illusion’ of the Vanished. I still remember every detail,” Lucretia nodded, “Don’t dwell on it too much; first, figure out how to leave this place.”

“It’s no use thinking too hard; my head is about to explode,” Shirley said, scratching her head. She quickly reviewed the situation in her mind, clearly overwhelmed, “So, you from decades ago got lost at the border, encountering a guiding illusion that was actually you from the future, but even your future self was lost – neither ship knew the way back, but both eventually found the right direction… What is even happening here?”

“Causality, luck, space-time, everything here is a mess,” Morris remarked, holding a seldom-lit pipe in his mouth, his voice carrying a hint of somberness, “Don’t rely too heavily on rationality when thinking about the border seas. The human brain has its limits when it comes to ‘irrationality.’ Don’t let those irrational things drive you mad.”

As the old man finished speaking, Dog grumbled under his breath nearby, “Shirley’s fine, she doesn’t overthink things, her mind is as clear as day.”

Shirley reacted to Dog’s comment by punching him on the head, resulting in a resounding ‘clang’.

Lucretia and the helmsman, immersed in their duties, paid no attention to the minor disturbance beside them. They remained sharply focused on the path ahead, guided by the direction indicated by the bow of the Bright Star, where the fog appeared to be shifting ominously.

Noticing a change, Nina looked up in concern, “Miss Lucretia, why are we slowing down now?”

Lucretia responded with calm precision, “…There’s a ‘critical change’ ahead in the fog, that marks the boundary. Crossing that line will take us into the relatively safe waters of the Eternal Veil,” she explained, her tone then growing more serious, “But there’s a problem.”

While Nina looked confused, the helmsman seemed to have already grasped the situation. He grimaced, making a grinding noise with his mouth, “Once we ‘cross’ from that point, our date of return to the Boundless Seas will be set – but that might not align with a date like 1902.”

Nina’s confusion lasted only a moment before realization dawned, and her eyes widened as she understood the helmsman’s implication.

Lucretia added gravely, “We exited the ‘channel’ too soon, and the moment we deviated from our navigation path, the surrounding time streams likely became disrupted,” she explained. “And just now, the Bright Star from decades ago appearing could indicate a shadow from another time stream intersecting our path, or it could mean we’ve inadvertently ‘entered’ the wrong time stream…”

This time, even Shirley grasped the gravity of their situation, her shock evident, “That means, if we go back now, we might end up decades ago?!”

The helmsman sighed deeply, “That would be the better scenario. Worse yet, with the time streams so jumbled, we could end up at any point in time after we cross the boundary.”

Shirley exclaimed, “…Damn…”

“Should we contact the captain?” Vanna suddenly suggested, recognizing their predicament’s gravity, “This is already beyond what was planned; maybe the captain’s authority could…”

“No, I’ve already tried,” Lucretia interrupted, shaking her head, “but I could only vaguely sense my father’s voice.” She continued, “We are still in the chaotic flux at the border, where the disordered temporal flow creates interference, and from my father’s perspective…”

She paused, then shook her head slightly again, indicating uncertainty and concern.

The crew members exchanged uneasy glances as the Bright Star continued its cautious navigation near the ‘critical line’ within the fog, moving slowly through what was deemed a ‘safer’ zone, avoiding the fog’s deeper, more perilous parts.

The path home appeared deceptively simple as if they could merely step across it—no physical barriers, no visible obstructions lay in their way. Yet, the true obstacle for the Bright Star was far more daunting than any physical barrier—it was time itself.

On the bridge, the mechanical intricacies of the ship were diligently monitored by Luni, a clockwork automaton. Tucked away in a corner, Rabbit Rabbi held tightly to the doll Nilu, barely daring to breathe. Agatha’s silhouette was faintly visible in the reflection of a nearby porthole, and the rest were gathered around the captain’s chair, creating a palpably tense atmosphere.

“If only there was a ‘guiding anchor’ from the Boundless Seas,” Morris whispered, his voice low, “even a simple piece of driftwood from the Veil would suffice.”

“The likelihood of that isn’t any greater than us crossing the boundary and landing precisely in the year 1902,” Lucretia responded, shaking her head dismissively. “We’re at the border, after all.”

Shirley rubbed her head, her voice tinged with uncertainty, “Imagine if we really ended up decades, even centuries, millennia in the past…”

She trailed off, leaving her sentence hanging in the air.

Vanna quietly echoed Shirley’s unfinished thought, “Centuries…”

“That would mean we arrived ‘too early’,” Nina quipped, sticking out her tongue playfully, “The good news would be that we could see the ‘sun’ as it was back then.”

Vanna, however, ignored Nina’s attempt at humor and looked up earnestly at Lucretia, “Miss Lucretia, how long can you survive?”

The bridge fell eerily silent. Lucretia understood the gravity of Vanna’s question and broke the silence after a moment of solemn contemplation, “I’m not certain how enduring this ‘curse’ might be, but living for a few centuries shouldn’t pose a problem.”

Morris shook his head, his tone somber, “My life is finite. Even with the aid of mechanics and wisdom, this body will eventually degrade.”

From the side, Agatha’s voice added, “Theoretically, I have no lifespan limit but without a physical form to inhabit, my existence remains precarious…”

“Shadow demons can live very long,” Vanna suddenly turned to Shirley, “At least, I’ve never heard of one dying from ‘old age’. They just need to stay hidden, especially from the church guardians of any given era…”

Shirley listened, her expression turning from blank to slowly dawning comprehension, “Ah… no way…”

“We need to prepare for the worst-case scenario,” Vanna stated firmly.

“Then consider an even grimmer possibility,” Lucretia interjected, her expression serious, “What if we didn’t arrive too early, but ‘too late’? When Father needs us, we might not have arrived yet…”

A heavy silence descended upon the group once again.

The oppressive quiet hung over the bridge, stifling conversation.

But suddenly, a ringing sound emanated from the direction of the control wheel, piercing the heavy atmosphere.

At that moment, the clockwork automaton Luni, ever vigilant at the monitoring area, exclaimed with urgency, “Lady, there’s a signal!”

Chapter 831: Silent Calls

A signal was detected!

An immediate hush enveloped the bridge. Even Lucretia, typically the paragon of self-control, registered a brief flicker of surprise in her eyes—a signal had been detected six miles beyond the frontier's boundary. In this disconcerting situation, maintaining composure proved challenging for everyone where they were lost.

"How is there a signal out here? Who could be sending it? Is this a real signal or just another deceitful trap set by the thick fog to ensnare us?" Lucretia questioned the air.

"Prepare defenses!" Lucretia commanded without a second thought. She darted to the control panel and swiftly pulled a lever among the assortment of devices. Luni, positioned close by, reacted with equal urgency. Her clockwork doll pressed several buttons on the console and then pulled back, winding the spring on her back in reverse three full turns.

Soft clicking noises filled the air as tiny cracks formed on Luni's arms, legs, and neck. Runes began to illuminate beneath her synthetic skin, and her eyes emitted a soft red glow. Simultaneously, mechanical sounds resonated around them as grids and conduits, previously hidden, slid out from the floor and walls, releasing the scent of incense and a deep, resonant hum.

Shirley watched in awe and eventually exclaimed, "Wow… you even have this incredible contraption?!"

Nina, equally astonished, stared at the now defensively positioned clockwork doll. “How did you transform like that?”

Under Nina’s intense scrutiny, Luni trembled slightly, the sound of clashing internal components evident. “I must emphasize, my mistress has forbidden any disassembly by strangers,” she stated as she eyed the girl warily.

“Exploring the frontier regularly requires us to be perpetually prepared for the unexpected,” Lucretia noted, her gaze shifting towards the demon girl and the mini sun fragment. She sighed softly, “Stay alert; I’m about to connect to this signal. The entity trying to communicate might not be human, or even capable of normal speech… But that probably doesn’t scare either of you.”

As she finished, Lucretia took a deep breath and laid her hand on the communicator—click.

A voice, burdened with heavy static and distortion as if filtered through multiple layers of interference, emanated from the speaker: “…Calling… zzzz…this is…zzzz…the lighthouse, calling…the Vanished, awaiting your…zzzz…return. Repeat, this is…zzzz…”

The monotone, raspy message echoed like a ghost caught between moments in time.

Everyone on the bridge, including Lucretia, momentarily froze in shock.

“Lighthouse?” Shirley whispered to herself after a pause, her memory suddenly stirring, “Wait, I remember now! When we left, the last stop…”

Lucretia’s thoughts wandered back to the last mobile harbor on the frontier before their fleet crossed the veil, remembering the female pope’s farewell: “Three warships will stay near the lighthouse, awaiting your return… This harbor will remain here, and my avatar will stay until you return…”

“…The lighthouse is still operational, they’re actually still waiting there?!” Shirley’s eyes widened in realization. She might not have been the most studious, but her memory was sharp. “It seems like the whole world is almost frozen in time!”

Lucretia remained silent, pondering their departure. She maintained her usual composure, unaffected by the excitement of the moment. She first confirmed that the signal was real and not a mirage created by the crew’s collective psyche reflecting off the frontier waters. She then checked the Bright Star’s defenses before lifting the radio handset: “This is the Bright Star. We have received your message. We are attempting to navigate back from the critical line. Our ship’s navigation is down. Please boost the power of the lighthouse’s antenna.”

She replaced the handset and waited.

However, only static responded from the communicator, followed by a few seconds of the same repetitive message, then silence took over, leaving only the buzz of interference.

“Can’t they hear us?” Nina asked, eyes wide with curiosity, “Is there interference?”

“I’m not sure, but it’s clear that the signal definitely originated from ‘the lighthouse,’” Lucretia replied, her brow furrowed. She turned to Luni, “Can you determine the signal’s direction?”

“Not precisely, but I can estimate a general direction,” Luni responded promptly, adjusting the nearby equipment, “Should we head that way?”

Lucretia exchanged a glance with Morris.

After a silent agreement, they decided to follow this signal as their “guiding anchor” back home—a metaphorical piece of driftwood from beyond the boundary.

“We’ll at least make it back to around the year 1902,” Lucretia murmured to herself.

The Bright Star cautiously adjusted its trajectory, patrolling along the six-mile critical boundary as long as possible, and increased the sensitivity of its antenna to pinpoint the signal’s direction. They eventually identified the most probable “gap” in the boundary line.

The ship’s horn blared with determined resolve as the Bright Star, shrouded in the ghostly image of the Mirror Vanished, plunged into the mist toward home.

As they crossed the critical line, the crew felt almost nothing, but Lucretia, seasoned in navigating the frontier seas, subtly sensed an indescribable “change.”

Her expression tense and her senses sharpened, Lucretia was acutely aware of every sound emanating from the communicator—

Had they made it back? Were they now around the year 1902?

As if fate had finally ceased its mischievous antics upon their return, Luni joyfully reported just as they crossed the threshold: “Mistress, the signal has significantly strengthened—we’ve successfully re-entered the veil, and we’ve also received a precise time signal, confirming our timing is accurate!”

Lucretia let out a deep sigh of relief. The last time she had felt such profound relief and happiness was when she received her brother’s message confirming that their “father has indeed regained his humanity.”

The bridge erupted in cheers from Shirley and Nina, accompanied by the relieved sighs of Rabbi in the corner and the quiet jubilation of the little doll, Nilu.

“Continue closing in on the signal,” Lucretia commanded, picking up the radio handset again to contact the lighthouse, “This is the Bright Star, we have successfully crossed the critical line, advancing toward the lighthouse, is your situation secure?”

However, after calling twice, only static noise filled the air. Although the signal was now strong enough not to disrupt communications, the lighthouse still gave no response.

It almost seemed as though the earlier call beckoning them home had been nothing but an illusion.

Lucretia’s face grew more serious, and the bridge’s atmosphere, which had briefly lightened, turned tense once again.

She set down the handset, shaking her head, “Something seems off about the lighthouse, we’ll head there first and investigate.”

As they approached, the lighthouse emerged from the depths of the frontier fog near the six-mile critical line, its ability to transmit signals through the veil somewhat diminished but still active.

It was still illuminated, the beacon less bright than at their departure but still cutting through the dense fog.

The sight of the light allowed a slight easing of tension. There was an active signal, and the light was still operational, suggesting the recent lighthouse maintenance.

But why was there such silence?

After a prolonged journey, the Bright Star finally drew near to the lighthouse.

At first sight, Lucretia observed the three massive Storm Church warships still moored quietly under the lighthouse at the mobile platform’s harbor.

Their lights were still lit and clearly operational, yet they offered no response to the Bright Star's arrival.

It appeared as though the ships were being maintained, but no one was acknowledging their return.

"I think I saw someone moving in the upper sections of the lighthouse," Shirley commented, peering intently from the deck, her voice barely above a whisper, "There are definitely people up there, but it seems like they're ignoring us… Can't they see us?"

"Could all this actually be just an illusion…" Nina voiced her concerns softly.

"…What if we're the illusion?" Shirley added, her suggestion carrying an even more eerie undertone.

Lucretia, however, paid little heed to the girls' speculative whispering. She too had noticed signs of activity within the lighthouse. After a moment of contemplation, she decisively laid out her plan:

"I'll go up with Vanna to investigate. Everyone else, stay on the ship. Do not disembark until we return, and be wary of any voices or figures that might appear on the communicator. Luni, keep watch over the ship."

Luni promptly nodded in acknowledgment: "Yes, Mistress."

With their plans quickly set, Lucretia and Vanna embarked on a paper boat, making a discreet landing at the eerily quiet lighthouse.

The surrounding area was steeped in silence, the cold wind sweeping through the harbor brought a piercing chill that seemed to freeze the soul and stiffen the blood.

Stepping onto the pier's walkway, Lucretia and Vanna surveyed their surroundings in the enveloping night mist. Shadows and figures moved within the mist, yet strangely, none seemed to acknowledge their presence.

Chapter 832: Welcome Home

Lucretia and Vanna traversed the moving platform beneath the lighthouse complex, navigating the dense fog along well-known paths and bridges during the night. The weak lighting around them shone like distant, dim stars in the mist. Amidst the soft glow and shadows, a figure stirred nearby.

A harbor guard, his complexion ghostly white, brushed past Vanna. He was dressed in a sharp uniform and held a lantern that still shone brightly. His face was marked by a precise, careful expression, yet he seemed completely unaware of the two unexpected visitors in his path.

As the guard disappeared back into the fog, Vanna observed him with a troubled expression. Once he was out of sight, she turned to Lucretia and whispered, “He wasn’t breathing.”

“Yes, the person we saw earlier wasn’t either. Most here no longer breathe,” Lucretia replied quietly, her face cast in shadows, “Even those few who still breathe show no signs of noticing our presence.”

“Everyone seems to be in a state of…” Vanna started, struggling to find the right words, then paused, finding it difficult to articulate her feelings. After a moment, she resumed, “A sort of stupor, a pervasive ‘unawareness.’ They continue with their routines, even handling shifts with precision, but they don’t acknowledge us at all.”

Lucretia just hummed softly and didn’t respond further, instead surveying the shadowy surroundings through the fog before they made their way toward the church at the lighthouse’s base.

Inside the church, the atmosphere was similarly subdued, with fewer people around. Apart from a few individuals sitting or praying quietly, only a priestess in a black nun's outfit was present, cleaning the main hall. She appeared slightly more aware of Vanna and Lucretia's presence, pausing and looking their way briefly before resuming her task nonchalantly just as Vanna was about to address her.

Lucretia and Vanna then walked across the church's main hall and entered the tower that connected to the lighthouse through a side door. They climbed a dimly lit spiral staircase, checking several vacant restrooms and storage areas until they came upon a door left slightly open.

From behind the door emanated a bright light and a soft sizzling noise.

Vanna moved to push the slightly open door further and entered a small room filled with various devices, the air fragrant with incense. In the center of the room, a small brass incense burner hung from a steam pipe, seemingly freshly lit.

As they passed by the steam pipe, almost in unison, a figure rose from a corner of the room and walked directly towards Lucretia.

Lucretia was taken aback when the figure stood up, previously unnoticed in the corner of the room. It was a middle-aged man clad in a priest's robe, who eerily lacked any signs of breathing or a heartbeat. He appeared completely unaware of their presence, almost like an inanimate object, so much so that Vanna hadn't even realized there was another person in the room.

Without acknowledging them, the priest passed by Lucretia and Vanna with an expressionless demeanor and sat down at a table at the far end of the room. His movements were mechanical as if he were programmed to perform these actions. Clearing his throat, he pressed a button on the table and positioned a microphone in front of him.

“Calling Vanished, calling Bright Star, this is the border lighthouse. The current time is the twelfth month of 1902. We await your return voyage… Repeat, calling the voyagers, this is the border lighthouse, the current time is… we await your return…”

He repeated the message three times, then paused and pressed the button again to repeat it several times before switching the device to listening mode. Afterward, he stood up from the table and returned to his original spot, passing Lucretia and Vanna again without even a glance to the side.

“That’s the call we heard,” Vanna said, watching the scene unfold. She spoke softly, turning towards Lucretia, who was also observing intently.

“I had heard my father describe the Boundless Sea, but I never fully imagined what it would be like,” Lucretia shared, her voice tinged with complexity, “It’s even more… more…”

She faltered, struggling to find the right words to convey her feelings.

“…The situation inside the city-state shouldn’t be this severe,” Vanna commented after a moment, shaking her head slightly. “This lighthouse is in the deepest part of the border, where order dissolved the earliest and where the influence of the gods’ ‘corruption’ is strongest. In the city-state…”

“Yes, the conditions might be better there, although they will likely worsen over time,” Lucretia interjected seriously, “Let’s not dwell on it too much for now.”

“Right, let’s not dwell on it too much now,” Vanna agreed, pausing briefly to gather her thoughts and suppress her worries. Just then, footsteps echoed from outside the room.

The two instinctively turned their heads as the previously ajar door was pushed open by a man in a guardian’s uniform.

He might have been searching for the middle-aged priest.

As Vanna had grown used to the peculiar “environment” of this place, she stepped aside to let someone pass, but just as she did, the guard dressed in black reacted with a sudden startled expression. It seemed he had only just noticed the two women in the room. His body trembled slightly, followed by a look of sheer excitement and joy.

“Miss Vanna, and Lady Lucretia!” the guard exclaimed with enthusiasm, rubbing his eyes as though in disbelief, “Is it really you? Have you returned?!”

Vanna was visibly confused by his reaction, taken aback for a few seconds before her expression shifted to one of surprise: “You’re still ‘awake’?”

“Awake?” The guardian initially looked puzzled but quickly caught on to her meaning. He checked himself, glanced at the other figure resting in the corner of the room, and smiled with a mixture of emotions, “Yes, I am awake, and there are others who are awake too. Everyone would be thrilled to see you…”

“Are there other ‘awake’ people?” Lucretia interjected, clearly surprised, “On our way here…”

“Yes, the awake are few, so we’ve gathered in the residential area below the lighthouse for mutual support and to monitor each other’s condition. We only venture out to patrol, restock supplies, and assist any others who awaken,” the guardian explained with calm precision, “And… to see if you had returned.”

He paused, his gaze shifting to the middle-aged priest seated in the corner of the room.

“The communication device is now controlled by ‘them,’ and disrupting their routine can provoke severe reactions, sometimes even madness. Therefore, we only approach during specific ‘window periods’ to check the monitoring antenna's records and verify if any ships are navigating back through the deep fog from the top of the lighthouse. Today, it's my shift. But honestly…"

The guard's smile was tinged with complexity and joy: "Honestly, I never thought I'd actually witness your return. I look out at that fog every day, but it's always just fog. Have all of you returned? What's the situation like at the world's end?"

Vanna and Lucretia exchanged looks, and after a brief hesitation, Lucretia nodded slowly, "The situation is quite complex now, and explaining it would take some time. Please, take us to your 'shelter' first."

"Of course," the guardian responded immediately, nodding, "But before you enter the shelter, you'll need to undergo a ritual inspection – it's necessary, given this is the border, and you're returning from the fog."

"After that, Her Grace Helena's avatar will personally welcome you."

Vanna's expression brightened at the mention: "The Pope's avatar is here?"

"She was originally stationed at the mobile port where the Eternal Veil and Boundless Sea meet, but she moved here when the situation deteriorated. Her presence has been crucial in maintaining the shelter—she's been with us throughout this ordeal," explained the black-clad guardian, gesturing invitingly before leading Vanna and Lucretia towards the exit.

As they approached the doorway, the guard halted abruptly, turning to face the two travelers who had just returned from the edge of the world. His expression, initially filled with joy and excitement, gradually softened into a warm smile.

"Although the situation at 'home' is far from ideal right now…" he said earnestly, "welcome home—it's been a tough journey."

Vanna returned his smile: "Yes, we've come back."

…

Upon receiving Lucretia’s message again, Duncan finally felt a sense of relief.

He and Alice were still on the island of the Leviathan Queen, where they had been for several days.

Now, the island was engulfed in flames that shimmered like stardust, creating an illusion reminiscent of a star-forming nebula. These “flames,” mimicking the faint mist emitted by a nebula, enveloped the entire dark island. They seeped from every crack in the stones, each joint between bricks, and from every pillar and rooftop, saturating everything on the island and even spreading to the surrounding sea, reaching the carcasses of the Leviathan-like islands.

Duncan sat calmly on a large stone at the edge of the plaza in front of the black temple, his eyes fixed on the flames as they infused the very “foundation” of this world.

Behind him stood Alice, silent and still.

Chapter 833: Their Last Journey

In a world where the stars burned with the intensity of distant fires on the edge of reality, Duncan-Zhou Ming witnessed the faint sparks he had placed at each corner of the external barrier merging into a glowing ring.

These sparks radiated starlight, enveloping the ancient deities that formed the node points of the barrier. They melded with the gods' power, essence, memories, and information…

This fusion echoed his first encounter with the golden sun mask, during which he unearthed hidden truths by imbuing it with his own fiery essence. In a similar fashion, he had manipulated mystical objects with his flames, and was now applying this method on a much larger scale.

Throughout its existence, from its birth to its decline, the information of this world flowed into his consciousness.

For Duncan, perceiving through the "Counter-Singularity" perspective, the Boundless Sea resembled a magical artifact—this dwindling civilization stubbornly persisted, pretending to be more than a mere pile of ashes.

Alice looked up at Duncan, her eyes filled with curiosity. "Captain, how much longer must we wait here?"

"We can leave now," Duncan responded softly. "Nina and the rest have safely made it back to the Boundless Sea. It's time for us to move on to our next location."

Curious, Alice inquired, “The next place? You haven’t yet told me where that is…”

“It’s a location we must uncover ourselves—but it won’t be hard,” Duncan assured her, then glanced at an object near him.

In his hands, he held an ancient, intricately designed hourglass, a vestige bequeathed by the god of death, Bartok, to the storm goddess, Gomona. He had retrieved this hourglass from a temple just three days earlier.

The sand within, representing life force, was nearly exhausted.

Cradling the hourglass, Duncan watched a gentle flame flicker inside. The final grains of sand hovered within the central flame, defying gravity. He listened to their soft, barely audible murmurs, then nodded slightly: “Yes, it’s time to go.”

These whispers seemed to send him off, though their exact phrases were barely discernible.

Duncan appeared to understand their intent and began to smile warmly: “Ah, that sounds delightful… To reunite with friends, to embark on new adventures, to establish a vibrant group… and maybe even start a souvenir shop?”

“Alright, I understand. I’ll make it happen… Don’t fret or doubt; this is a unique opportunity to influence the world and the future—you all deserve this chance.”

“…Yes, it will take a considerable amount of time, indeed, but don’t worry, I have all the time in the world; it’s merely a blink of an eye to me…”

“Now, we must depart, Gomona, farewell—sweet dreams.”

As he spoke, the final grains of sand disappeared within the flame, and the hourglass silently crumbled to dust, scattering into the breeze. The entire island commenced its slow submersion beneath the celestial flames.

Knowing its time, Duncan stood up, waved his hand, and magically opened the fiery portal. Moments later, they were back aboard the Vanished. Under the guidance of Goathead, the ship sailed smoothly through the fog that lay between the Leviathan Islands, edging closer to the outer limits of the node sea.

Inside the captain's quarters, Goathead, the ever-diligent first mate, sat by the sea chart table. As the door swung open, Goathead turned around. Seizing the brief moment before possibly being interrupted, Goathead sighed and began to speak hurriedly:

"Ah, it's really a bit hard to adjust to the silence here. Normally, Miss Vanna would be exercising on the deck, and Shirley and Dog would be 'exploring' around. I used to think they were too noisy, always wondering when it would finally be quiet. But now that it's suddenly silent, it feels strange. It's like how it was when I first came aboard this ship; it's amazing how quickly time has passed. The human heart is indeed peculiar; I never imagined I'd go through so much back then. Of course, now I can't really claim to have a good human heart anymore… I'm done talking, I'll be quiet now."

Feeling the words press at him, Duncan had been just about to tell Goathead to be quiet but found himself holding back his words, merely staring at the table momentarily before blurting out, "You're able to be quiet on your own?"

With its usual lack of expression, Goathead responded, "Yes, I just finished speaking."

Duncan, slightly taken aback and suspecting that Goathead's timing was intentional, managed to keep his cool and stated, "…Then continue to remain silent here, Alice and I need to plan our next navigation steps."

Goathead simply acknowledged, “Understood.”

Feeling a mix of irritation and bemusement, Duncan led the conversation deeper into the captain’s room, approaching the bedroom when he whispered to Alice, “Remind me later, I need to establish a rule in the new world—those who speak incessantly without pausing deserve a flick on the tongue…”

Alice leaned closer and whispered back, “But Mr. Goathead doesn’t have a tongue, its voice comes directly from its neck…”

As Duncan entered the bedroom, he casually shut the door behind him and turned to Alice, “Now that you mention it, I’m curious, do you have a tongue?”

“Yes,” Alice responded earnestly, opening her mouth and stretching the corners with her fingers to show him, “Look—plurr plurr, here’s my tongue.”

“I’m really curious how the original Navigator One managed to ‘create’ you, even including a tongue. Couldn’t they have just focused on reinforcing the joints?” Duncan eyed the doll curiously, then approached the bedside, retrieving the winding key for the “Navigator Edition Alice Mansion,” and playfully waved it in front of the doll.

Alice, adeptly managing the task, sat down in front of Duncan, turned her back to him, and unzipped her dress to reveal the keyhole for winding.

Duncan, holding the navigator key, hesitated before using it. He looked at the keyhole on Alice’s back and spoke thoughtfully, “Alice, have you ever thought about wanting something more? Like a desire or a wish… to no longer be a ‘doll’?”

Alice adjusted her dress and turned her head back in slight confusion, asking, “No, what’s wrong with being a doll?”

“Do you have any desires or ideas about the new world and the future?” Duncan continued seriously. “Nina and the others have their dreams—Shirley wants a vast space, Morris desires room for research and exploration, even the Leviathan Queen has her own ambitions. But you… you’ve always been quiet during our discussions about the new world.”

Alice pondered for a moment, then shook her head, saying, “I don’t really have an opinion. I’m not dissatisfied with anything; everything as it is suits me fine,” she said earnestly. “I don’t know what the new world should contain; everything I’ve experienced since ‘waking up’ has been good. And I actually enjoy being a doll, I like it this way.”

After a brief pause, she added, “Ah, but if I choose something to want, I still want to be with you in the new world—I’m not comfortable living in the city-states.”

Duncan’s face showed a mix of surprise and gentle resignation as he smiled.

“Okay,” he responded softly, patting Alice’s hair. “I’ll make sure you come with me, that’s guaranteed. If you’re unsure of what you want, leave it to me, I’ll think about it and make it happen for you.”

“Great!” Alice exclaimed cheerfully, adjusting her position on the bed to turn around, then suddenly she remembered something and turned her head back with a smile, “Oh right, I would like a new frying pan, a smaller one, for making tiny sweet pancakes.”

“Okay, I’ve made a note of that,” Duncan replied with a gentle smile, nodding earnestly, “In the new world, Alice wants a new frying pan.”

“For making small sweet pancakes!”

“Yes, for making small sweet pancakes.”

He inserted the winding key into the keyhole; it clicked into place and turned automatically—light and shadow danced around them, resetting the ambiance. When Duncan opened his eyes, he found himself back at the starting point before leaving the Alice Mansion.

In the dimly lit main hall of Navigator Three, a “tree” constructed from cables, pipes, and metal branches stood quietly. At its base, a doll holding a drawing board slowly opened her eyes, powering on like a robot, becoming alert, and then smiling brightly.

“Captain! We’re back in!”

Duncan nodded, assisting the slightly unsteady doll to her feet.

“Captain, what are we doing next? Should we greet the Black Sun at the door? Do you want to find the entry… the next route you mentioned?”

Duncan glanced at the “drawing board” in Alice’s hands, now serving as the remaining “functional interface” of Navigator Three.

“We need to search for something,” he started.

“Search for what?”

“The escape pod of the New Hope—it’s lost at the end of the ashes.”

Chapter 834: The True Appearance of the Mansion

After receiving the captain's directives, Alice started pondering with great intent – then she gazed deeply into Duncan's eyes, seeking understanding. "What is an escape pod?" she inquired with genuine curiosity.

Duncan was not taken aback by her question. In fact, he often thought he would only truly worry if this doll ceased to exhibit her characteristic confusion. Despite several mishaps, he had ascertained that although Alice often appeared bewildered, the sophisticated space navigation system, "Navigator Two," was invariably operational within her instinctive knowledge.

At this moment, the task was straightforward: Alice needed to recognize that a segment of the mansion was absent, at least theoretically.

"That's a part that's missing from the 'Alice's Mansion,' but you don't need to understand exactly what it is," Duncan explained nonchalantly, observing her still fixated on him with wide, innocent eyes. "Do you remember what I told you about the Frost Queen?"

Alice paused to reflect. "Which one? There are many, but I don't remember all…"

"Ray Nora has taken a room from your 'Mansion.' That room is what I referred to as the escape pod. She now 'rides' it to the ash-covered edge of the world. I need to locate her position," Duncan elaborated with patience.

“It’s okay if you don’t grasp it all right now; I’ll help you understand this in time.”

Alice seemed to follow, yet her comprehension was unclear. Nevertheless, after Duncan finished, she quickly nodded. “Oh, what should I do now?”

“Remain here, continue sitting under this ‘tree,’ just as you did when analyzing the flight paths of the external barriers. Keep connected with the mansion,” Duncan instructed, lifting his right hand to reveal a tuft of pale green flame soaked in starlight. He handed the flame to her, “Take this; it will create an additional ‘bridge’ between you and me. I’m now heading to the ‘missing’ part of the mansion to place a marker. If my predictions hold, I should be able to ‘interfere’ with Navigator Two and transfer data to your ‘system core’ through this external bridge.”

Alice simply responded with an “Oh,” and nodded eagerly. “Okay!”

As she spoke, she grasped the tuft of flame from Duncan without hesitation – a peculiar warmth spread through her palm, the ethereal flame turning palpably gentle, subtly swaying in her hand.

Holding the small flame carefully in one hand and her “drawing board” in the other, Alice turned and made her way back to the “Data Tree,” a structure woven from innumerable cables and pipes. She sat down on the platform, looking up with a beaming smile and declared, “I’m ready!”

Duncan smiled and nodded, then turned to exit the hall. He walked through the ornate door that linked the garden to the deeper parts of the mansion, moving along a lengthy corridor lined with locked rooms and filled with the hum of servers. He passed various stairways and halls, quickly reaching the deepest part of the second floor’s corridor—the “fracture point” where the escape pod detached from the main body of the ship.

The corridor’s end looked just as he remembered; the floor, ceiling, and walls appeared violently torn apart by some colossal, invisible force. Beyond the fracture point, the endlessly deep darkness of space loomed, so profound it seemed one glance could pull someone into its void.

Duncan ignored the daunting abyss, focusing instead on a particular section of the wall near the corridor’s end. There, he swiftly found what he was seeking close to the fracture.

Embedded in the wall was a display still cycling through warnings about the unauthorized release of the escape pod. Duncan approached the display, took a deep breath, and closed his eyes halfway, murmuring, “…It’s time to verify my guess… Let me ‘see’… the true appearance here.”

A faint starlight peeked through the slits of his half-closed eyes as he carefully controlled his increasingly restless “essence.” He was tapping into his power, trying to open his “other pair of eyes” without fully unleashing the singularity within him.

Gradually, Duncan opened his eyes, and a bright starburst erupted from them, resembling ancient stars relearning their orbits. Amid the expanding starlight, he beheld the other side of Alice’s Mansion.

He saw the enormous ark spaceship floating in the boundless dark chaos of space. The torn starship retained only about a third of its original structure. Standing at the end of a connecting corridor in the ship’s midsection, Duncan observed the silver-gray and silver-white alloy structures that replaced the dark-toned floors and walls of the mansion’s original corridor. Various warning lights flickered in the distance, and before him lay the scorched, molten support frame of the escape pod where it was blown open.

Duncan glanced at the broken pipes, supports, and the blasted hull of the spaceship at the end, his lips twitching slightly as he mused, “…Ray Nora definitely didn’t leave as ‘quietly’ as she claimed. How did she manage to blow this place up without having any idea what it was?”

Of course, there was no one in the deserted spaceship corridor to answer his rhetorical question, as the only “owner” and “victim” of this place had no clue what an escape pod was. Duncan sighed and shook his head, then refocused his attention on the flickering display.

Now, he could see the full extent of this device—it was part of the external release system for the escape pod, fixed on a curved support that was severely twisted and damaged, with internal pipes exposed. Despite its battered state, it still appeared functional.

Placing his hand on the device, Duncan prepared to “read” the data with his own flame and transfer it to Alice. His plan was simple and direct.

Alice, in her current state, was oblivious to the deeper workings of her own mansion and consequently unable to detect the system malfunctions occurring within it. Although the instincts of the “Navigator Two” system remained intact, Alice’s inability to interpret these signals meant there was no response. Therefore, Duncan’s task was to establish a direct connection between Alice and the malfunctioning point of the mansion using a temporary fix—a technique he compared to using a jumper wire.

He admitted to himself that he didn’t fully understand the mechanics of the spaceship—akin to how many who repair phones might not know the detailed architecture inside the chips. The important thing was that attaching the wire effectively resolved the issue.

As he initiated this makeshift repair, the flame from his tool began to merge with the escape pod’s release system.

At that moment, Duncan’s peripheral vision caught sight of an anomaly.

A mass with a dark gray metallic sheen, resembling mud that flowed and shifted continuously, had emerged from the nearby equipment grilles and pipes without him noticing.

This eerie, mud-like substance gathered on the floor, slowly creeping towards him with a deeply unsettling low rumble. Duncan tensed, ready to react, but just as he prepared himself for action, the substance halted a short distance away as if it was observing or assessing him.

In a flash of realization, Duncan recognized it—the “Cleaners” from Alice’s Mansion, a peculiar entity designed to expel “intruding foreign bodies.”

He wondered if this entity was part of the New Hope’s maintenance system, possibly a form of “damage control” or a swarm of nanomachines.

While maintaining his interaction with the escape pod system, Duncan’s mind raced with possibilities. Just then, he observed the “nanomud” inch slightly closer without showing any signs of hostility.

Under his watchful eye, the nanomachines formed what appeared to be a tentacle-like limb, which gently tapped the curved support of the release system, seemingly attempting to show Duncan something. It then pulled a damaged cable from the support.

Duncan looked perplexed and asked, “…You mean, connect from here?”

The mud formed another limb, gesturing up and down in the air.

With slight hesitation, Duncan allowed his flame to extend to the indicated damaged cable.

The mud appeared content, vibrating its limbs before collapsing back into a liquid form and making a gurgling sound as it slowly moved towards a crack in the nearby wall.

Duncan was left speechless, “…”

He was stunned by the realization that this entity could not only communicate but also think.

As he grappled with this revelation, the mud had completely disappeared. Then, through their psychic link, Alice's voice excitedly broke through: "Captain! The drawing board lit up! The drawing board lit up! I think I figured out where the 'escape pod' is!"

…

Helena guided Vanna and Lucretia across the central bridge of the residential sector, updating them as they moved. "There are now one hundred seventy-six people here—all 'awakened' are here," she informed. The area they traversed was originally part of the broiler system. As the number of awakened individuals grew, those who initially regained consciousness in better condition naturally congregated here, transforming the location into a makeshift camp.

Vanna paused on the bridge, leaning on the railing to gaze down at the living quarters hastily arranged using the existing infrastructure of the broiler system.

After a brief pause, Helena continued, "We will soon expand into a better-conditioned living area—the dormitory next to it. It's currently occupied by our 'bewildered brethren.' We can't forcibly evict them; we must avoid conflicts as much as possible. However, as more and more awakened people begin to dominate that area, once the awakened are in the majority, we can extend our main activity area there."

Lucretia broke the silence that followed, her voice reflecting her disbelief, "…Hard to imagine, the world has actually become this…"

"Adapt as soon as possible," Helena advised softly. The Pope, in her avatar form, turned to face Vanna and Lucretia with a somber look. "The current city-states are just this place magnified a thousand times," she explained. Then, shifting the conversation, she prompted, "As for now… it's your turn, tell me about the world's end."

Chapter 835: The Clouds

In a world blanketed by fog, wanderers roamed aimlessly outside the boiler where deep roars echoed from the harbor's fog-enshrouded facilities. The core of cold steam hummed vacantly as it merged into eerie mirages. The once-thriving sanctuary of flames had vanished, and with it, the distinction between "normal" and "abnormal" blurred into oblivion. As minds and the world itself deteriorated, sanity ironically became synonymous with madness and contamination. Those labeled insane had gathered within high walls, constructing their final stronghold, watching anxiously as the world outside succumbed to dArkness.

"We will prepare ample supplies for the Bright Star," Helena declared from a high platform atop the boiler room, addressing Vanna and Lucretia who stood beside her. "You can move to the western dock—it's one of the few external channels we currently control."

"Can this 'lighthouse' still provide supplies?" Lucretia asked the Pope in astonishment. "Do you really have that many resources?"

"Yes, we're not short on materials, which might surprise you," Helena responded with a smile. "In fact, the 'operation' of the entire world continues, including the production and transport of major supplies, even 'commercial activities' within the city-states… Every fortnight, a cargo ship loaded with supplies arrives from the border base, refueling this lighthouse and more. Those engulfed in trance handle the exchanges as usual, while we 'awakened ones' use old permits dug up from files to move some of the materials to other storages. Likewise, we can utilize many of the facilities here."

She turned, her gaze sweeping over the vast platform outside the boiler.

"Yes, this world is still functioning, every part… operating in a trance along old trajectories, like a massive ship internally collapsing but still drifting on its original course in the ocean under inertia. Us awakeners on board are powerless to fix the ship, but at least we can 'sail' with it before it capsizes."

Vanna and Lucretia stood speechless for a moment, unsure how to respond.

The world had become unrecognizable to them.

However, Helena appeared unconcerned, simply waving her hand and continuing, "Thank you for informing me about the events at the world's end. Now those of us waiting on the Ark finally understand what's happening outside; our wait now has a purpose, no longer just a desperate struggle to survive. Is the Vanished still sailing at the world's end?"

"Yes, Captain and Alice are at the world's end, still advancing further," Vanna whispered. "They are preparing for the new world. When everything is ready… you can 'blink your eyes.'"

"Good, then I won't delay your journey any longer," Helena's avatar turned, softly exhaling. "I'll arrange the supplies, and someone will escort you two back to the dock…"

She suddenly stopped, gazing intensely into Vanna's eyes for a long moment before speaking.

"Vanna, safe travels – we'll meet again in the new world."

Vanna solemnly nodded: "Yes, Your Holiness, we'll meet again in the new world."

…

The howling wind had unknowingly ceased, leaving only the sheer, extreme “cold” on this icy plain—a cold that penetrated flesh and bone, freezing the soul. Amidst this icy wind, the Flame Bearers, who had long forgotten the warmth of “fire,” continued their journey.

The living dead trudged across the ice plain, their chest lanterns casting a faintly twinkling line deep into the ice.

Frem stood on a hastily erected platform, gazing into the distance where the imposing silhouette of the Ark silently stood far away. Its lights painted a twinkling “mountain” in the night, while lights from the lanterns flowed endlessly between that “mountain” and the ice beneath his feet, weaving back and forth tirelessly.

After the icebreaking device had become completely unusable, the Flame Bearers resorted to using the explosives they had carried on the ship to break through the next segment of ice. After the explosives were depleted, the Ark continued with its powerful drive and sturdy armor to break open another path, until finally, its power system shut down completely. Although the steam core still howled vacantly and air flowed through the pipes, the giant ship remained stuck in the ice, halted just short of its destination.

Fortunately, the distance to the final “focal point” was not far, and they were already within the influence range of the focal point. At this moment, civilization’s last “archive” was being established on this ice plain.

Footsteps echoed from the side as a veiled priestess approached the platform where Frem stood. She stopped beside him and bowed slightly. “Another eleven have ‘awakened.’ They’ve been settled in the camp and are currently undergoing psychological comforting and counseling,” she reported.

Frem nodded slightly in acknowledgment. “How are they doing?”

“Better than the last batch,” the priestess answered. “We find that continuously conveying hints and reminders to those in a ‘trance’ state is useful. When they ‘awaken,’ most of them almost immediately recognize that this is still a controlled ‘situation’ and seek help from the nearest contact person. We can share these experiences with the city-states.”

Frem nodded again, his gaze returning to the construction site of the archive.

The engineering machinery, transported from the Ark, was actively engaged on the ice plain. A cluster of buildings, crude and somewhat unattractive, began to emerge.

Compared to the majestic Ark and onboard cathedral, these buildings, resembling rough factories, lacked aesthetic appeal. Their sole design goal was to construct as sturdy a storage space as possible in the shortest time, given the unfamiliar environment.

“Does this really make sense?” A soft murmur came from beside him.

Frem turned his head to look at the priestess beside him.

“Sorry, Your Holiness, I am not wavering, I just…” the priestess shook her head, struggling for words, “I just thought about recent events—more and more people are ‘awakening’ from their ‘trance,’ many with their last memories dating back to the day we set sail. Many have asked me what has happened along the way, so many questions…”

“I understand what you’re trying to say, Delice,” Frem interrupted softly, his gaze still fixed on the construction site. “Many believe that as long as people survive, it’s as if everything is preserved because civilization is created by people, and people can recreate civilization countless times… I understand, yes, and I couldn’t agree more. As the Pope of the Flame Bearers, I understand better than many how civilization is established and continued."

He paused, his voice still soft. "A civilization without people is meaningless, but Delice, there's also the other half of that saying—people without civilization are similarly so. Civilization isn't just the cold stones and books, not just the mute sculptures, scores, and crafts; those are merely the carriers and forms of civilization, not the abstract civilization itself. All of these points are correct, but—

"Civilization needs carriers, needs evidence.

"It's foolish to cling to 'carriers' while abandoning 'essence,' and it's equally foolish to recognize the essence but think carriers are unnecessary. Without carriers and evidence, even the most brilliant memories will erode over time, eroding before people have a chance to rebuild civilization. And even without considering this… Delice, we also need to leave some evidence, so that many years later, future generations can understand what happened to this world. The significance of artifacts and archaeology lies in this 'informing.'"

The veiled priestess, Delice, faced Frem's gaze squarely. Her once bright eyes, which had turned murky and dim days ago, now held a firm resolve.

"I understand, and I will also tell others your teachings…"

Frem nodded.

A thin "fog" had unknowingly appeared around them.

Delice looked up in surprise at the white fog fluttering around.

Since entering the ice plain, they hadn't encountered "fog" for a long time.

Though the eternal curtain's majestic fog wall was visible on the horizon, unlike other border seas, this ice plain almost never saw fog.

“The weather has changed…” She raised her hand, touching the insubstantial fog, “Is there fog on the ice plain now?”

Frem frowned, looking up at the sky, observing the flowing, drifting wisps of white, finally realizing.

“No, this isn’t fog,” he suddenly declared, his voice filled with surprise. “… this is cloud!”

“Cloud?” The priestess paused, as if recalling what “cloud” meant after a moment of thought, then her eyes widened in astonishment. “The clouds have fallen from the sky?”

“…The altitude of the clouds has lowered,” Frem spoke gravely, but he quickly realized this explanation didn’t make much difference and added, “It’s not so much that they’re ‘falling,’ it’s more like…”

He paused, and Delice had already understood his meaning. The priestess blinked, her tone tinged with unease, “The sky itself is lowering…”

Chapter 836: The Clouds Descended, and the Curtain Closes

Around the world, a distinctive atmospheric layer, infused with the essence of clouds, gradually descended. This layer resembled a vast, flowing ocean above, seamlessly merging into the sky. In some regions, it drooped toward the earth or sea, forming a misty veil, while in others, it floated several hundred to tens of meters above the inhabitants, continuing its slow, almost imperceptible descent.

Frem stood on the icy plains under the night sky, his eyes fixed on the tumultuous clouds now so close that only a thin mist separated him from them. The scene was illuminated by light piercing through the clouds, casting a mercury-like glow over everything that momentarily stole one’s breath and stirred the soul.

Beside Frem, Priestess Delice stood, both looking upward at the celestial phenomenon after a prolonged observation. Around them, many others scattered across the tundra were similarly transfixed, as if held in place by an invisible force. However, the atmosphere shifted as people began to panic, their eyes darting around, many focusing on Frem.

“Your Holiness…” Delice broke the silence, her voice hoarse, “What do we do now?”

“Continue with our tasks,” Frem replied, his voice deep and steady, resonating across the icy tundra, “Construct the archives, transport the relics, safeguard our legacy—the world still lives; our mission is not complete."

The Pope's voice, firm and authoritative like a massive boulder, anchored everyone's restless spirits. Momentarily pausing, the Flame Bearers bowed their heads and then turned their attention from the sky back to their work on the archives.

Unnoticed, Frem exhaled softly. Despite the frail pulse of his heart, his worried gaze shifted back toward the distant drifting mists.

…

Against a stark grey-white backdrop, the immense structure of the Vanished silently floated in the "transition channel," devoid of reference points. Although it seemed stationary at the center of the channel, Duncan knew well that he and his ship were moving at speeds beyond human comprehension.

The Vanished had ventured beyond the world's edge, and Duncan had truly departed the Boundless Sea, leaving behind the sanctuary built by ancient kings. Beyond the tranquil channel lay utter chaos: the extinction of worlds had left behind a tumultuous, scorching waste known as the Ashen Sea.

As Duncan felt his connection to the Boundless Sea weakening by the day under Alice's control, he struggled to hear the voices of his two "avatars." Now, he experienced only brief daily intervals of their consciousness, with their actions severely limited.

This weakening connection stemmed from several factors: Duncan's "transformation" was intensifying, and the physical "distance" between the Vanished and the avatars was growing. As Ray Nora mentioned, other potential reasons might have involved the Ashen Sea's unique environmental conditions.

However, there was positive news. The “enhanced marks” Duncan had placed on Nina and others to maintain contact under challenging conditions were still functioning effectively. These marks, designed for a specific, straightforward purpose, remained largely unaffected by the changes, enabling continued communication with his crew.

After conducting his daily checks, Duncan wandered through the Vanished, moving through deserted corridors and silent stairways until he reached the empty deck. Alice was at the stern, steering the ship alone without the presence of her usual companions, making the ship feel as it did when Duncan first arrived—abandoned and silent, echoing his initial encounter with the Vanished.

But some things hadn’t changed—his mind was noisier than during his first visit.

From somewhere in his mind, Shirley’s unrefined voice echoed, “Hey hey, Captain, let me tell you, we snagged a bunch of great stuff from that lighthouse! That woman, Helena, was really generous. She let me raid the warehouse, and I even found some gorgeous dresses… I don’t know why someone like her would hoard pretty dresses… pity they’re too big for me, two sizes too large…”

Then Nina’s sensible and gentle voice followed, “Uncle Duncan, everything’s fine here. Nilu and I have become good friends, and I even helped her sew a little dress… You must take care of yourself on the ship, and make sure you and Alice eat on time. I left lots of biscuits and jam in the kitchen…”

Sailor’s hoarse voice chimed in, “Captain, I haven’t been slacking these past days. Miss Lucretia can testify; I’ve already started helping her crew clean the deck and hallways—I wasn’t this diligent on the White Oak…”

“Papa, don’t listen to his bluffs; he was coerced into working by Luni because he just lounges in the warehouse all day. He even tried to convince my servants to join him for a ‘big sleep.’ Luni couldn’t tolerate it anymore… This guy even had the audacity to demand a daily wage from me, claiming that working wasn’t part of his agreement when he signed on with the Bright Star!” This complaint-laden voice belonged to Lucretia.

Duncan halted on the mid-deck, listening to the cacophony of voices in his head, and finally, unable to contain himself, remarked, “Sounds like you all are having quite a lively time.”

“One Shirley is enough to turn any place into a battlefield,” Lucretia’s voice, heavy with exasperation, resonated in Duncan’s mind. “She causes chaos everywhere, even managed to coax Nilu into hiding in a bedside cabinet yesterday. I had to take apart the entire thing to get her out! How do you usually deal with this?”

“Usually, I think it’s manageable,” Duncan responded thoughtfully, “It’s very quiet on the ship, so a bit of commotion is actually quite nice—even if it might be a bit overwhelming for you.”

Lucretia let out a deep sigh, “Ah, the most overwhelming thing is still Miss Vanna’s morning workout routine… although, that might not be as surprising as Nilu’s antics.”

As he listened to his daughter’s grievances, Duncan’s expression subtly changed, reflecting on the potential excessive chaos aboard the Vanished…

Then, a moment later, Morris’s voice returned. “How are things on your end?”

“The Vanished is still in the ‘channel’,” Duncan replied, glancing outside the ship’s rail before casually adding, “Honestly, it’s hard for me to gauge from a ‘distance’ or ‘route’ perspective where exactly we are, even Alice isn’t sure. But one thing is certain, we are nearing the coordinates given by Ray Nora. Alice can still sense that.”

“…I never thought the one who seemed the least reliable on the ship would end up doing the most crucial task,” Shirley interjected, “In the end, she’s the one who’s with you at the world’s ends…”

As Shirley’s comment hung in the air, a brief silence followed. After a few seconds, Duncan heard Shirley again, “Hey, why are you all silent! Alice isn’t as dependable as me! I’m usually so well-behaved… Nina, don’t look away!”

Duncan chose to ignore Shirley’s antics.

“How’s the situation on the Boundless Sea?”

After a brief pause, Morris responded, “Just as we reported earlier today, the clouds have descended—it’s now all covered in a thin ‘mist’ with low-hanging clouds everywhere… truly, if we didn’t understand the significance, it would indeed look like a magnificent spectacle.”

“The good news is, other than the clouds lowering, no other severe changes have occurred; at least it hasn’t affected the navigation of ships,” Vanna’s voice followed, “We’re currently heading towards Pland. Lucretia plans to take us there first; afterward, she’ll return to Wind Harbor with the Bright Star and stay there until the end.”

“We’ve also made contact with Mr. Tyrian; after reaching the central sea, a ‘Sun Sharing Fleet’ will leave Pland and head north. Miss Agatha will transfer to that ship and travel to Frost.”

“As for Sailor, we’ve arranged for him to meet Captain Lawrence in Morpheus if the city-state government is still operational. If not, the White Oak will come instead to take him to Morpheus.”

Vanna paused for a few seconds before adding softly –

“Captain, please rest assured, we will handle everything well and won’t let you down.”

Chapter 837: Shhh, Thinking

Duncan had been quietly listening to the diverse voices echoing within his mind—calm and reliable reports from Vanna and Morris, hesitant complaints from Lucretia, and occasionally, the passionate rants from Shirley and the kind advice from Nina. These voices, bridging time and space, wrapped around him like chains of warmth, anchoring him to reason and humanity, even as his two avatars within the city-state were slowly becoming ineffective.

After a while, Duncan paused his communication with Vanna and the others and walked slowly across the deck. He navigated through the stern stairs and ramps until he reached the towering stern helm.

The doll was still positioned quietly at the helm, her hands clenched tightly around the dark, heavy steering wheel. Her eyes, unfocused, stared straight ahead. Countless invisible threads stretched from her body, connecting her to the Vanished below her feet and the illusory projection of the New Hope in the sky.

Suddenly, a thin mist began to emerge from all around the deck, swirling and converging together.

Duncan noticed the eerie appearance of the mist and instinctively furrowed his brow. He then realized that the gray-white backdrop in the distance seemed to be slowly “cracking”—at the end of the uniformly textured “channel,” large patches of fog formed, and deep within this fog, there was an unmistakable sense of void.

Almost at that moment, he heard a fragmented, muffled voice say, “Jump complete…”

The Vanished experienced a subtle shake, less abrupt than its previous encounters at the border node when it had entered a kind of “medium,” causing a noticeable vibration. The channel silently shattered, and the endless, thin mist instantly filled the surroundings. The next second, Alice, who was at the helm, blinked, and the doll’s consciousness suddenly snapped back into her shell.

“Captain!” The doll turned to Duncan, her face lighting up with a joyful and proud smile. “We’ve arrived!”

Duncan nodded but was about to speak when he suddenly paused—he noticed that the edge of the Vanished was rapidly becoming “blurry”!

Not just the edge, but the entire ship was quickly blurring. Under the cover of the mist, everything within his sight seemed to suddenly lose its clear “boundaries.” The details on the deck blurred, the masts gradually faded into the fog, and even Alice in front of him seemed to merge with the mist, transforming into an ethereal form.

And the ghostly green flames enveloping the Vanished also dissipated during this process!

Alice seemed to notice something; she stood astonished in place, then slowly looked down at her hands, which were rapidly losing detail and becoming “blurry.”

“Eh?” she uttered in confusion.

But the next second, Duncan suddenly reacted.

The ghostly green flames that had enveloped the Vanished shimmered with a layer of hazy stardust. Duncan’s eyes sparkled as if filled with billions of stars, and the Vanished, teetering on the brink of information collapse, rapidly reassembled and regained clarity in his vision. Under the stardust-infused flames, the deck and masts almost instantly reverted to their original state, and Alice's figure also stabilized in front of him.

The doll barely had time to comprehend what had just occurred; she only noticed the flames on the ship suddenly "changing color," and then the same colorful flames engulfed her as well. After a brief moment of astonishment, she raised her hand, examined it, and let out an exclamation: "Wow!"

Still feeling a residual fear, Duncan took a deep breath. For the first time, he felt a slight touch of reality about the ashen edge that Ray Nora had discovered.

This was indeed the true boundary of order, the periphery of nothingness, the "Sea of Origin" where information units remained unassigned. Here, the information had not yet been defined, and nothing from the shelter, even the Vanished emerging from subspace, could maintain a stable "data structure"—simply because there were no data structures here.

Only those who had survived the Great Annihilation and had achieved "self-stability" on the informational level could maintain themselves relatively "safe and stable" in this void.

Like the "Reverse Singularity," like the wreckage of New Hope.

Taking a deep breath to calm his emotions, Duncan reached out and gently touched Alice's hair, then looked around. Speaking of the wreckage of New Hope, where was Ray Nora?

He and his ship had already reached the location indicated by the escape pod's signal, but as he scanned the towering stern deck, he saw no physical entity amid the chaotic and empty "fog."

“Can you feel the signal from the escape pod?” Duncan asked Alice, his brow furrowed slightly, “We should have arrived at the location, right?”

“Yes, theoretically, it should be right here,” Alice replied, her attention returning from the enchanting stardust around her. She hurriedly sensed the direction of the escape pod, then scratched her head, a bit puzzled, “The signal is nearby… I sensed it just now, why can’t I see it…”

Duncan’s mouth twitched suddenly: “Could it be that we’ve bumped her away again…”

Startled by his remark, Alice keenly caught the implication: “Again?”

Duncan replied with a dismissive tone, “…You don’t need to worry about that. Let’s find Ray Nora first.”

As he spoke, Duncan slowly extended his own perception, cautiously controlling the portion of his power that belonged to the “Reverse Singularity,” all the while trying to detect any unusual aura surrounding the Vanished.

At that moment, he was preoccupied with two concerns—first, he hoped that the unfortunate Frost Queen had not been accidentally displaced by the Vanished, and second, he hoped she hadn’t been crushed beneath the massive ship.

His intention was to meet with the queen, not to inadvertently cause her harm, which would certainly make for an awkward explanation during their face-to-face meeting.

Meanwhile, Alice had come to a realization. After thinking hard for a while, the doll slapped her hand and exclaimed, “Yes… The Vanished came directly according to the escape pod’s signal, so when it landed, didn’t it directly land on the escape pod…”

Duncan sighed deeply—realizing this now did little to help the situation.

Had he known, he wouldn’t have allowed Alice to jump directly to the escape pod’s beacon; he would have set a “certain distance from the jump marker” as a safety buffer. How could he have anticipated that the positioning of the New Hope would be so precise? Previously, when the Vanished went to the Four Gods node, it hadn’t directly collided with their foreheads…

And just as he was lamenting internally, Duncan suddenly sensed something truly unexpected.

He “scanned” an entity that did not belong to the Vanished.

But the location of that entity… was on the Vanished itself.

Duncan looked up, puzzled, in the direction of his perception. After confirming what he sensed, his expression gradually turned thoughtful.

Alice noticed his focus and asked, “Ah, Captain, have you found it?”

“Let’s go over and see what’s happening,” Duncan murmured as he led Alice away from the helm. They walked through the platform and connecting stairs, following the guidance of their senses, and finally arrived at the door of the… captain’s cabin.

Alice looked up at the familiar place, her hands on her head, “This is the captain’s cabin, I don’t see anything else.”

However, Duncan continued to stare intently at the captain’s cabin door, also known as the Door of the Lost, sensing the changes here, and even… gradually understanding the changes that had occurred.

After frowning and pondering for a long time, he finally stepped forward and placed his hand on the side of the door hinge.

The twisted misalignment of the space-time structure emerged in his mind, turning into a tangible map that he could understand. He found the node of this space-time misalignment and gently pushed.

The door swung open—from the position of the door hinge.

Alice watched the unfolding scene in bewilderment. After a long pause, she finally blurted out, “Can it open from there?!”

Duncan responded, “…Shh, I’m thinking.”

Behind the door, a layer of hazy glow seemed to encompass a “room space” that did not belong to the Vanished, enveloped in a layer of constantly trembling visual phenomena.

Unlike the typical scenario where opening the Door of the Lost would transport directly to a “bachelor apartment,” this time, what appeared before Duncan seemed to be a genuine “entrance,” one that could potentially allow entities other than himself to enter.

He first cautiously reached into the glow to test it, then turned his head to look at Alice, asking, “Do you want to come?”

Alice nodded without hesitation, “Yes!”

Duncan extended his hand toward the doll, instructing, “Follow me—hold onto my arm, and don’t let go until it’s safe.”

Alice obediently clasped Duncan’s arm, following the captain into the layer of hazy glow.

They seemed to pass through a layer of icy curtain, and after a brief moment of dizziness and sensory dislocation, the scene before them stabilized rapidly.

A lavish and spacious room materialized before Duncan and Alice, both real and tangible.

Ray Nora was sitting somewhat blankly on the large bed in the center of the room, staring bewilderedly at Duncan and Alice who had just pushed through the “door” and walked in. The Frost Queen appeared to have been greatly shocked and was a bit dazed until Duncan approached her. She suddenly snapped to attention and raised her hands, gesturing in the air.

“…Just rolled right over!” Ray Nora’s expression became increasingly frantic as she exclaimed, “Such a big ship! It just rolled right over me! Half the room was suddenly hit by a mess of stuff and shattered into pieces. It took a good while to recover, and then you pushed open the wall and walked in! Such a big hole! Can’t you use the door?”

Pushing open the wall?

Duncan was momentarily stunned, then looked back at the direction from which they had come.

He saw Ray Nora’s room door, which was properly embedded in the wall, still tightly closed, but next to the door was a large hole—that was where he and Alice had entered.

Space-time misalignment.jpg.

Alice quietly poked Duncan’s arm, “Captain, why aren’t you speaking?”

“…Shhh, I’m thinking again.”

Chapter 838: An Invitation at the End of the Century

On the very edge of the chaotic expanse, where the rules and nature of information were distorted, Duncan spent a full minute in deep contemplation before deciding to stop trying to solve the problem.

At that moment, there was a silver lining—Ray Nora had not been expelled from the Vanished, nor had she been crushed beneath the ship. Unfortunately, she had been violently rammed by the ship itself and was now slightly dazed.

This situation gave Duncan a vivid image, reminding him of a renowned global artwork back from Earth: Dog lodged in the front bumper as a car sped down the highway.

Duncan cleared his throat twice, dismissing the unsettling image, and walked a few steps with Alice. His expression was a mix of apology and concern. “Sorry, I wasn’t paying attention while we were driving the ship… Are you alright?”

Lost in thought, Alice paused before suddenly tapping Duncan on the arm. “Captain, I recall it was the Vanished that collided with the White Oak, and then I boarded your ship. Now it’s the Frost Queen’s turn—is this a pattern?”

Duncan shot her a sharp look. “’Pattern’ isn’t quite the right term here!”

At that moment, Ray Nora began to regain her composure, massaging her throbbing head as she slowly rose from the bedside. “I’m okay, just a huge shock—I didn’t anticipate such a… ‘shocking’ arrival.”

While speaking, Ray Nora’s gaze lingered on Alice, observing the girl who bore a striking resemblance to her with a mixture of curiosity and complexity. Alice met her gaze with a serious, inquisitive expression.

After a significant pause, Ray Nora smiled and extended her hand to Alice. “Hello.”

Alice responded with a beaming smile, eagerly grasping Ray Nora’s hand. “Hi there!”

“It’s incredible,” Ray Nora murmured to herself, noting the firmness of Alice’s handshake. She then turned to Duncan, “I never thought my first encounter with Alice in this dimension would be under such supernatural circumstances… though it’s hard to say if this place is the ‘real dimension.’”

With those words, she gently withdrew her hand and walked across the room, gesturing toward a wall.

Instantly, the wall disintegrated, transforming into a transparent curtain. Beyond it lay an infinite expanse of void and swirling clouds of chaos.

“I’ve been waiting here for quite some time,” Ray Nora began as she gazed into the chaotic void beyond the transparent curtain. She explained, “During this period, I attempted to navigate the edge of this dense fog but found nothing—just this endless, chaotic whiteness. Initially, I couldn’t even see the fog; I only sensed something ‘there.’ It was only after our last meeting that I started to actually see these mists, but that’s all I can do.”

“Don’t tell me you’ve tried venturing deeper into the ‘fog,’” Duncan said, his face showing a mix of curiosity and concern. “That would be incredibly reckless.”

“Don’t worry, I’m eager to explore, but I haven’t lost my senses,” Ray Nora replied with a smile, shaking her head reassuringly. “The dangers lurking deeper are unimaginable, and even with the ‘Drifting House’ for protection, I likely wouldn’t survive a return.”

“Your caution is commendable,” Duncan responded, visibly relieved. “That’s a completely uncharted and unknown ‘primitive data sea.’ Any entity entering would be instantly reset to the same undefined state—it’s a different concept from this ‘border’ state here.”

Ray Nora nodded slightly, then redirected her curiosity to Duncan: “Now that you’re here, what do you plan to do next?”

“First, I need to validate my theories, then conduct some research and experiments to see if I can develop some ‘samples’ in this primitive data sea,” Duncan answered promptly, his determination evident. He then turned his focus back to Ray Nora with another question, “But now I’m more curious about something else… can you leave this room?”

“Leave this place?” Ray Nora paused, her eyes shifting to the door-shaped gap that had appeared when Duncan and Alice had entered the room—the softly glowing “passageway” still clearly stable.

“You mean…” she slowly realized, “to accompany you to the Vanished?”

“That’s a stable passage door, though its method of opening might seem odd now,” Duncan nodded. “It appears to support free movement, but I’m unsure if you, as an entity, can leave this room.”

“…It should be feasible,” Ray Nora frowned slightly, considering the possibility for a moment. “I’ve reached through the door before, retrieving ‘intangible things’ from the sea of ashes, and I’ve left this room to enter your palace floating in the endless void. Although I'm tied to this 'Drifting House,' it seems there are no issues as long as I don't stray too far."

"That's reassuring," Duncan said with a smile, extending an invitation to Ray Nora, "Would you like to visit the Vanished?"

The Frost Queen responded with a smile and a slight bow: "It would be an honor."

Passing through the cool curtain once more, Duncan and Alice experienced the familiar slight dizziness and sensory misalignment as they returned to the deck of the Vanished.

Duncan turned back to confirm, and indeed, Ray Nora had successfully passed through the door—she stood in front of the "Door of the Lost," her expression still slightly puzzled.

Ray Nora widened her eyes. Despite her preparations, the actual moment of passing through that door was still unavoidably perplexing.

She now found herself on the solid deck of the Vanished, surrounded by a vast "world." Everything around her was vivid and strikingly "spacious."

She had finally stepped out of her confinement.

"I…" Ray Nora's lips moved several times, and after a lengthy pause, she finally spoke, "I actually walked out of the room…"

"Welcome to my ship. Before we explore this vast sea of ashes, let me show you around," Duncan said, smiling as he opened his arms in a welcoming gesture. "It's quite empty now, might seem a bit quiet, but it used to be very lively."

Ray Nora listened, her mind gradually adjusting to her new environment. With a faint smile, she stretched vigorously, finally free from her confinement.

“Feels good to be out,” she said softly, then turned her head to look back towards the direction she had come from.

The Door of the Lost, which had been pushed open from the hinge side, stood silently in her view.

Duncan noticed Ray Nora’s contemplative silence and casually asked, “What are you thinking about?”

“…I’m thinking…”

Duncan suddenly coughed twice. Adopting a serious and professional demeanor, he quickly explained, “I know what you’re likely thinking. This door is indeed quite magical. It can rebuild ‘passages’ in a disordered time-space relationship through different ways of opening. But you only need to know two ways to open it—pulling it open from the doorknob normally leads to my captain’s quarters, pushing it open from the hinge connects to your Drifting House.”

Ray Nora blinked, her curiosity piqued. “What’s the principle behind it’s function?”

Duncan thought for a moment before responding with a straight face, “Because it’s very magical.”

Ray Nora decided not to press further.

Duncan then stepped forward, closed the “Door of the Lost” in the usual manner, restoring its normal state before pulling its handle again, opening the door to the captain’s quarters.

He turned and made an inviting gesture towards Ray Nora.

Inside the captain’s quarters, the black wooden goat head mounted on the sea chart table heard the noise and immediately turned its neck with a squeak and a creak. It was the first to notice the Frost Queen walking side by side with Alice.

The figure on the table visibly paused, then exclaimed in surprise: “Whoa! I guess this definitely isn’t two Miss Alices—Captain, you’ve brought an incredible guest.”

“This is my first mate,” Duncan raised his hand to introduce the talking object, “Its name is Saslokha, but you can just call it Goathead.”

He then pointed towards Ray Nora, informing Goathead: “This is the Frost Queen, probably no need for much introduction. Don’t worry about the middle principles and processes; for now, she’s on board as a guest.”

“Hello, Mr. First Mate, you can just call me Ray Nora,” Ray Nora responded politely, but then she paused, seemingly realizing something. “Wait… Saslokha? I think I’ve…”

“It’s all from when I was younger,” Goathead interrupted, suddenly acting shy and shaking its head as if reflecting on a long life. “Back then, I was still complete, had a body below my head… but now, I’m just this ship’s first mate, Captain Duncan’s most loyal first mate.”

As it spoke, Goathead stretched its neck to the side, using its chin to point towards another “Goathead” (Skull of Dreams) positioned on the other side of the sea chart table. “This one is also Saslokha, my other head, but this head has some problems, now it can’t communicate. Normally it’s just me talking to it one-sidedly—it’s a good listener, silent and patient. The captain always complains that I talk too much and tells me to shut up, but this head won’t. And let me tell you, I always feel this head actually responds when I talk to it a lot, sometimes it even moves a bit, but the captain always says that’s my delusion…”

“Quiet.”

“Okay, captain.”

Ray Nora observed this bizarre scene with a somewhat stunned expression, struggling to grasp what had just unfolded. It felt as if a wave of sound had suddenly washed over her, leaving her bewildered and speechless…

The last time she had experienced such an overwhelming sensation was just a few minutes ago when the Vanished had rolled over her…

Chapter 839: The Test

Ray Nora had embarked on an incredible journey aboard a magnificent ship, captained by a remarkable leader known as Duncan, flanked by an equally impressive first mate, an unusual dove, and a doll that strikingly resembled Ray Nora herself.

The setting was vastly different from anything the Frost Queen had imagined, yet it surpassed her expectations in every aspect.

After touring the upper deck, Duncan escorted her back to the main deck.

“The ship is vast, featuring multiple layers of cabins beneath us,” Duncan explained, his warm smile radiating comfort. “Exploring every nook and cranny could easily consume a whole day. However, we should first focus on our immediate tasks.”

Upon hearing the captain’s instructions, Ray Nora snapped out of her awe for the ship. She quickly composed herself and turned her attention to the ship’s hull, where it was encased in a gentle fog that seemed harmless.

However, this was no ordinary fog; outside the ship, the space was engulfed by a profound, indescribable void. The “fog” was merely a faint illusion created by the limited sensory capabilities of humans, barely detecting the presence of “something.”

Ray Nora’s gaze involuntarily shifted back to Duncan. Beneath his tall and formidable appearance, another being resided, the “thousand-faced starlight.” This entity was intently gazing into the distance, probing the fog for something elusive.

Duncan, also Zhou Ming, moved towards the deck's edge. His senses stretched across the ship, using it as a conduit to delicately "touch" the unseen "Sea of Ashes" outside. Within the fog, he discerned traces left by the annihilation of a world.

He soon reached out beyond the ship, his fingertips ablaze with flames colored by starlight.

At that moment, faint noises and vibrations emanated from deep within the ship, with masts and ropes creaking, their sounds tinged with a hint of unease.

"Don't worry," Duncan whispered, more to himself than anyone else, "I remain your captain."

The disturbing noises eased slightly.

Duncan's fingers then made contact with the "area" beyond the hull for the first time.

Simultaneously, a flapping noise filled the air as Ai, the dove, noisily descended from the mast and landed on Duncan's shoulder, flapping its wings vigorously and emitting sharp, peculiar cries: "Hot…hot…hot…"

The dove then jumped from Duncan's shoulder and, in either anxiety or excitement, fluttered chaotically across the deck, squawking in a manner that only Duncan could understand, leaving Ray Nora completely baffled.

"…What is this dove saying?" Ray Nora couldn't resist asking the nearby doll, though conversing with a doll resembling herself was strangely unsettling. She found no one else to turn to. "Hot… what?"

"Oh, Ai has its unique way of communicating," Alice replied nonchalantly, as if it were self-evident. "It's conveying something vital to the captain."

Surprised, Ray Nora inquired further of the doll: “…Can you understand it?”

Alice was candid: “No, I can’t.”

Silenced by this response, Ray Nora fell quiet.

Alice noticed the sudden silence beside her and curiously turned her head toward Ray Nora, known as the “Frost Queen,” and asked, “Eh? Why have you stopped talking?”

Ray Nora sighed, her thoughts seemingly drifting to the past. “…I wish I had your positive outlook back then,” she confessed. “Life used to be…very exhausting.”

“From now on, try to take things a bit easier,” Alice suggested warmly, patting Ray Nora on the arm with a smile. “Those tiring days are behind you.”

In response, Ray Nora began to sense that this seemingly naive doll might actually possess a unique kind of wisdom.

Duncan, who had overheard their conversation, continued to focus on the “world” outside the ship—the ashes that surrounded them.

Gradually withdrawing his hand, Zhou Ming opened his eyes to the fog, where ancient starlight expanded in his vision. At the focus of his gaze, he observed the unassigned basic elements of information transforming under the bath of starlight.

After some contemplation, he pointed his arms in a specific direction.

Ray Nora and Alice abruptly stopped their conversation when sounds reminiscent of wind and mountain streams emerged from that direction, their eyes widening in astonishment.

In the hazy fog, a massive, colorless, and detail-less gray mountain range began to materialize within the clouds. The mountain evolved rapidly, as if it were alive, its surface revealing gorges and gradually adopting various colors. Sounds emanated from that direction—sometimes distant, sometimes near, sometimes real, sometimes illusory.

Standing at the edge of the deck, Zhou Ming watched as information reconfigured before his eyes and was reassigned in his thoughts. He raised his hand as if strumming guitar strings, and the “mountain” that was rapidly gaining a sense of reality suddenly split in the middle, releasing a magnificent waterfall that cascaded down, forming a river. In the next moment, the river surged, vast plains emerged on either side of it, and a land more extensive than any city-state Ray Nora knew of expanded and spread in the fog. Then, the fog dissipated and condensed into clouds and a blue sky…

This creation continued to expand rapidly, eventually encompassing the ship, with the river feeding into a vast lake on which the ship floated on the mirror-smooth surface. Seconds later, “wind” was generated, causing ripples on the lake’s surface.

Ray Nora approached the edge of the deck, watching as the green land and blue sky, along with the lake and mountains, stretched to the horizon as if the entire world had been shaped right there. She inhaled the fresh air and listened to the sounds of the wind and water, a profound realization dawning within her — everything here was real and “effective,” and if someone came to this vibrant lakeshore, they could indeed survive here!

They would be able to breathe, drink the water, cultivate crops in the fertile soil, and observe the flourishing of birds and animals across the mountains and plains. Rain would fall, clouds would gather and disperse with the breeze, plants would thrive and then wilt, and life would continue its cycle.

A joyful smile almost erupted across her face at that thought.

But before the smile fully formed, Duncan—known as Zhou Ming—lowered his hands.

And just like that, everything around the ship silently collapsed and dissipated. The mountains and plains instantly reverted to a fog, all colors and contours returned to chaos, and the sounds along with the breeze that had brushed her cheeks… seemed as though they had never existed.

Ray Nora stood dazed at the scene, seemingly unable to react immediately. After a prolonged silence, she finally turned toward the captain.

“This was merely a test, a basic one at that,” Duncan approached Ray Nora, his voice deep. “It was merely to verify whether the ‘materials’ here could be reactivated—creation isn’t as straightforward as this.”

Ray Nora detected a complex tone in the captain’s voice, and her heart tightened: “So… the outcome of the test…”

“There’s good news and bad news,” Duncan exhaled slowly. “The good news is my initial assessment was correct—the information doesn’t vanish, it merely loses its original ‘definition’, and reassigning it can revive this mathematical machine.”

Ray Nora quickly asked: “And the bad news?”

“The bad news is that my other assessment was also accurate—the current conditions cannot sustain this rebooted mathematical machine, as you’ve just witnessed. Once my observation and definition are withdrawn, everything reverts to its initial state.”

“So, simply reassigning them is futile. Everything must return to ‘singularity’; I need a starting burst of energy, and a big bang… requires harsh conditions.”

Ray Nora tried to grasp the captain’s line of thought, the knowledge she had gained in that “nest” previously now resurfacing in her mind. After a moment of reflection, she tentatively responded: “…You know what it needs?”

Duncan paused, then nodded: “…Yes.”

“Can you achieve it? Is it exceedingly difficult, or outright impossible?”

This time, Duncan did not respond directly. After a long pause, he simply shook his head: “I still need to consider it carefully.”

With that, he gestured to Ray Nora and Alice.

“I need to retreat to my quarters to plan the next steps,” he sighed, turning towards the stern. “There are many vacant rooms below deck; Alice can show you where to rest.”

As Duncan walked away, Ray Nora turned to the doll beside her: “He seems deeply preoccupied—is the ‘captain’ always so… human-like?”

She had deliberated for a long time to choose the word “human-like,” cautious not to utter it in Duncan’s presence.

“Yeah,” Alice nodded casually, “Shirley said the captain can be quite human!”

Ray Nora was puzzled: “…?”

Was “human-like” used that way?

But before the Frost Queen could inquire further, Alice swiftly changed the topic: “I’ll show you to the restrooms on the ship… By the way, would you like some fish soup?”

Ray Nora was caught off guard by the abrupt shift in conversation and hesitated before replying: “Uh, no thanks.”

Alice remained enthusiastic: “The fish soup is really good! It’s a famous dish on this ship!”

“Thanks, but I… probably won’t enjoy it.”

“You don’t like fish? How about sweet pancakes? The captain loves sweet pancakes!”

Ray Nora appeared embarrassed: “…I’m currently a ghost.”

“…Oh.”

Chapter 840: Ray Nora was greatly shocked

Beneath Goathead, a faint creaking noise emanated as its neck slowly rotated on its pedestal. It watched in silence as Duncan made his way back to the captain's quarters, its gaze intently following his every move.

Upon reaching the chart table, Duncan seated himself in the high-backed chair and rested his hands on the tabletop. The sea chart before him was shrouded in mist, obscuring the details and creating the impression that even this remarkable chart had lost its guiding ability in this mysterious "sea" that had long surpassed any known boundaries.

Duncan's attention, however, was not on the obscured sea chart. Instead, he seemed to be looking through the desk and the ship's floor, reaching out towards the vast emptiness beyond the known realms.

After a while, Goathead spoke up cautiously, "I just noticed… there has been a significant change in the 'environment' surrounding the Vanished. Did you cause this?"

In contrast to his normal demeanor, Duncan remained subdued, possibly influenced by the somber atmosphere.

"I conducted some experiments," Duncan replied softly. "I tested the hypothesis that information endures and confirmed that the 'Ashen Sea' still supports the functioning of objects, at least in the brief experiments where the ripples of change manifested anew in this cooled ash."

“But it didn’t last, did it?” Goathead hesitated before adding, “I sensed it… the emergence and disappearance of the ‘ripple’ you mentioned. Although I don’t understand the principles and processes involved, I can sense that something fundamental seems to be missing behind those changes.”

“The initial driving force, a process capable of instantly resetting and fully rebooting the entire ‘mathematical machine’,” Duncan disclosed the insights he had gained from the fleeting ripple. “Simply put, short-term, localized manipulation of materials in the Ashen Sea is futile. The overall ‘entropization’ of the Ashen Sea causes all changes to revert to nothingness. Thus, if we truly want to transform the materials here into a new world, we need to reset the entire system. Integrating the preserved data from the old world during the reset process should be relatively straightforward.”

Goathead was silent for a long time, reflecting deeply. Eventually, it slowly raised its head and said, “I’m not sure what you mean by ‘entropization,’ but it seems you are still contemplating some quite radical plans. Forgive my bluntness, Captain… Miss Nina would be saddened, given your promise to her.”

Duncan remained silent, his gaze fixed intently on Goathead on the table.

“Do you consider yourself the most suitable ‘initial driving force’?” Goathead asked, undeterred by the captain’s intense scrutiny. “Resetting the entire ‘mathematical machine’ seems to require immense energy and ‘information,’ both of which you ‘yourself’ possess…”

“I am exploring an alternative,” Duncan suddenly interjected, his tone calm.

Taken aback by the interruption, Goathead’s neck emitted a series of squeaks and creaks, “…I thought you were planning on sacrificing yourself…”

“Yes, I had considered that, but Bartok reminded me before he left,” Duncan stated calmly. “He advised against using sacrifice to lay the foundations of a new world too readily. Sacrifice should always be the last and most reluctant choice, not the initial strategy. Too easy a sacrifice diminishes its significance. Besides, I promised Nina and Lucy that I would return home.”

After saying this, Duncan sighed softly.

“Of course, if there really is no other option, I am not opposed to dying, but for now… I think I should put more effort into finding a better solution.”

“Do you have an idea?” Goathead asked curiously. “Is there another way to initiate the process?”

“In theory, all I need is information and energy, and the ‘information’ part can be supplemented later through post-assignment. So, what I primarily need is energy, energy to restart the mathematical machine, to activate the ‘information’,” Duncan explained thoughtfully. “I have a vague notion for resolving this issue, but its feasibility remains uncertain…”

He paused suddenly, his gaze fixing on something invisible in the distance. After a brief moment, he resumed, “I think I need to speak with someone with whom I have an appointment.”

While speaking, he casually inquired, “What is Alice currently doing?”

Goathead hesitated briefly, checked the situation on the ship, and a subtly human expression appeared on its rigid wooden face: “…She is with the Frost Queen, preparing to engage in something quite peculiar…”

This remark from Goathead underscored the strangeness of the situation.

On the spacious mid-deck, Alice was eagerly dragging Ray Nora to demonstrate a trick she had recently mastered. The doll was visibly excited, pulling the bewildered Frost Queen onto a barrel and then pointing to her own head, exclaiming, “I just learned this! I practiced it a lot with Luni to succeed!”

Before Ray Nora could grasp the situation, the doll embraced her own head and yanked it upward with a “pop,” tossing the head into the air.

She then adjusted her body left and right, aligning her neck joints to catch the descending head…

It was only then that Ray Nora understood what the doll was attempting to do—though she might have been better off not knowing.

To make matters worse, the doll failed to catch her head.

Her head plummeted down, landing head-first with a “thud” against her neck joint, and rolled to a stop at Ray Nora’s feet, looking up innocently and blinking: “A slight… slight miscalculation… help pick… up…”

Ray Nora’s eye twitched as she observed this debacle. The Frost Queen, who may be accustomed to overseeing the Abyss Plan and confronting rebels without flinching, appeared momentarily unsettled by the spectacle.

Duncan arrived on the deck just in time to witness this unusual scene.

He had been struck quite hard—though perhaps not as hard as Ray Nora had been.

He swiftly stepped forward, seized Alice’s head, and reattached it to her neck with a definitive “pop.” He then turned to face the still bewildered Ray Nora, his expression subtly apologetic as he explained, “Sorry, Alice sometimes thinks differently from most people…”

It seemed that only then did Ray Nora recover from her shock. She stared at Duncan blankly before finally uttering, “…This is the first time I’ve witnessed such a scene from a third-person perspective.”

Duncan: “…”

Unexpectedly, the Frost Queen added her second remark: “Frankly, it’s quite interesting.”

“I was talking with Alice when she mentioned that her neck joints tend to loosen easily,” Ray Nora elaborated, spreading her hands and appearing calmer than before, “Out of curiosity, I asked her to show me exactly what she meant. Her demonstration turned out to be more thrilling than I had anticipated…”

What could Duncan really say to that? He merely twitched the corner of his mouth, turning to adjust Alice’s head while giving Ray Nora an awkward smile.

Ray Nora, however, appeared unfazed, observing the scene with interest. It was neither simple nor normal, yet it felt extraordinarily peaceful and routine. After a moment, she smiled and remarked, “It seems she’s really happy.”

“If only she weren’t always so carefree,” Duncan sighed helplessly. “Seriously, are you really okay? That scene just now… I thought you might be traumatized…”

“I’m fine,” Ray Nora assured him, taking a deep breath. “When my head was cut off back then, I didn’t see it myself—associative things can be overcome.”

Duncan paused for a moment, realizing that the Frost Queen indeed possessed a very strong mind—and even stronger peripheral nerves.

At that moment, Alice seemed to realize something, turning her head to look at Duncan: “Captain, did you come to find me?”

“Yes,” Duncan carefully freed the last strand of hair caught in Alice’s joint, nodding, “We’ve arrived here, and there’s an appointment… it’s time to keep it.”

Alice blinked, finally recalling something, “Ah, the flaming meatball hanging at our door…”

Duncan was surprised, amazed that the doll could remember such details so accurately, and even more impressed by Alice’s refreshingly unconventional way of describing it…

Ray Nora looked on, puzzled, not understanding what the two were discussing. She couldn’t help but ask curiously, “An appointment? Where are we going next?”

“It’s an appointment for me and Alice,” Duncan smiled, “Don’t worry, we won’t leave this ship, just briefly visit another dimension, and we’ll be back soon.”

“Yes, the captain is going to wind me up!” Alice exclaimed happily, waving to Ray Nora, “You go back to your room first, I’ll come to play with you after I’m wind up!”

Ray Nora listened, even more bewildered: “Wind up?”

But the doll obviously had no intention of explaining further, pulling the captain towards the rear deck, leaving the Frost Queen bewildered with a head full of question marks.

Chapter 841: The Letter

At the beginning of his monumental journey to the world's edge, Duncan had established an agreement with the Black Sun. He had committed that once he verified the cornerstone of the emerging world at the frontier of civilization, he would honor the entity's request for inclusion in this new world. In exchange, the Black Sun promised to provide Duncan with a crucial "clue" about this unknown world.

Upon reaching the Sea of Ashes, the time had arrived for Duncan to fulfill his promise.

Inside the captain's quarters, Alice sat gracefully on the bed, facing away from Duncan as he slid the navigation key into the doll's keyhole with a slight sound of friction. After a fleeting sensation of dizziness and a sensory reset, Duncan found himself in Alice's Mansion's expansive yet somber hall.

The entrance of the mansion featured a dark door embellished with intricate designs, standing quietly at the end of the carpet. Rays of sunlight peeked through the door's crack, hinting at the shadowy figure of the Black Sun waiting beyond.

However, Duncan did not head straight to the door to meet his appointment. Instead, he explored deeper into the mansion, where he found Alice lost in thought with a drawing board in the navigation chamber before returning the doll to the hall and approaching the door.

For reasons he could not fully explain, Duncan wished to share all future experiences in this “land of all endings” with the doll.

Alice displayed a constant and palpable happiness, showing no fear of the Black Sun she was eager to encounter, whom she whimsically called the “flaming meatball.”

When Duncan finally approached the mansion’s door, he easily pushed open the slightly ajar entrance. Despite its appearance of weight, the door moved effortlessly, creaking on its hinges as it swung open. A brilliant yet bearable, artificial sunlight burst into view.

Encased in a luminous sphere of flames, a pale, distorted mass of flesh slowly expanded and writhed. A large, half-open eye seemed to cast a drowsy glance: “Ah, Flame Usurper, you have arrived… are you here to fulfill our agreement?”

Duncan confronted the bright stare: “I have now reached the end of all things and verified the cornerstone of the new world. I am here as we agreed.”

The Black Sun stirred; its fiery shell gently rose, and a deep, resonant tremor emanated from its numerous tentacles and bulges: “Ah, it seems you have made significant progress… So about my initial request, a place in the new world…”

“Yes,” Duncan quickly interjected, cutting off the other’s inquiry.

The prompt response seemed to surprise the Black Sun; its movements and the trembling of its flesh paused momentarily before it spoke hesitantly again: “You are certain…”

Duncan responded earnestly, “Indeed, the new world is expansive enough to provide a place for you—and your ‘home’ as you remember it in your memories—but that is contingent upon the new world being completed as planned."

"You aren't concerned that I might become a 'dangerous element' in the new world?" the Black Sun inquired. "My kind and I have been exiled from this sanctuary for ten thousand years, and now you are bringing me and the other tribes back to the new world. Don't you see this as a potential risk?"

Duncan calmly reiterated, "As I've mentioned, the new world is vast, immensely so—your civilization is not everlasting, and the 'hidden dangers' you worry about will be diluted by the enormous spatial expanse and the passage of time. In such a prolonged safety period, your civilization will lack the opportunity to interact with others. Regarding you…"

He paused, a subtle smile playing in his eyes.

"Being one of the 'ancient kings' who established the foundations of the sanctuary, you are intimately familiar with the original blueprint of the Boundless Sea and all its systemic flaws. Given your profound understanding of the 'sanctuary,' I suspect… this world actually lacks the ability to 'exile' you. Or rather—if you had wished to return to the Boundless Sea, you would have done so on the day the kingdom of Crete launched Vision 001 into the sky."

He looked up, observing the immense eye at the core of the writhing sun.

"In the history of constructing this sanctuary, there were no records of conflict among the ancient kings; all was settled through negotiations—you chose exile voluntarily, though the actions of your descendants and survivors spiraled out of control."

The Black Sun fell silent for a moment before slowly speaking, "The creation of the sanctuary was 'extreme.' Back then, we couldn't afford even a slight waste of resources or time. The Long Night had already failed twice, and we were compelled to succeed on our third attempt… no one had a choice."

"Thank you for your prudence back then. Let's forgo unnecessary tests and assumptions between us. I have made my plans—now it's time for you to fulfill your promise," Duncan's tone became stern, his expression serious, "You mentioned you have 'evidence' concerning the new world. What exactly is it?"

The Black Sun remained silent but slowly stretched out its slender tentacles from the edge of the fiery eyeball. A limb suddenly extended, holding something at the end which it precisely delivered to Duncan.

Alice, who had been deep in thought beside him, started and leaned in curiously, "What is this?"

"A letter," the Black Sun responded with a tremulous voice that filled the void. The small tentacle expanded, revealing an object to Duncan.

It appeared as a silver-gray cube, about ten centimeters on each side, adorned with intricate patterns. Though its design was intriguing, it seemed less significant than what Duncan had initially anticipated.

Duncan stared at the small metal cube with a puzzled expression, noticing its slightly translucent, blurry surface. It was evident that since only the projection of the Black Sun had visited this place, the cube he observed was also merely a projection.

The actual cube resided with the Black Sun, somewhere beyond the confines of the real dimension.

Duncan suddenly frowned as he discerned specific patterns on the cube's surface.

Seemingly anticipating Duncan's reaction, the Black Sun thoughtfully moved the cube's projection closer to him, slowly rotating it to display each side.

On the first surface, Duncan observed a human silhouette standing on a map filled with numerous lines and reference points.

The second surface revealed a series of circles, arranged in size from smallest to largest.

On the third, he saw intersecting lines where each junction appeared to illustrate a mathematical principle.

However, the fourth surface was covered in child-like scribbles, their naive strokes starkly contrasting with the precise and meaningful designs on the other sides.

The fifth surface was dotted with numerous random depressions that seemed to represent a “star chart” of constellations or a similar celestial system.

His attention then shifted to the sixth surface.

It was adorned with distorted symbols!

These symbols initially seemed to represent various types of writing, but they had been twisted under some unknown influence into shapes that were utterly unrecognizable. Duncan felt as if these contorted symbols were alive; as he stared, each line seemed to tremble and rearrange itself, obscuring their true forms.

Duncan instinctively reached out to touch the cube, but his fingers passed right through the illusion.

“Its ‘physical’ form is not present, but I can describe its condition to you.” The Black Sun’s voice resonated in his ears, “It is a metal ingot, as hard as steel yet surprisingly light, hollow inside and hiding a potent energy source which I cannot examine without compromising its integrity. It seems to possess a powerful ‘mechanism’ that emits information outward, though this mechanism is also concealed within.”

“Furthermore, it originally held more information, including the ‘text’ you noticed that is unreadable.”

“Initially, it even produced sounds, but only as chaotic noise; it consistently emitted some sort of ‘signal,’ but even I cannot decipher what it is, and now, its emission process has largely ceased. I cannot determine if this is due to a malfunction or if the energy has depleted… however, it likely isn’t related to energy depletion, as the energy reaction inside it remains robust.”

Listening to the Black Sun’s detailed explanation, Duncan stayed silent for a considerable time, merely observing the continuously rotating cube. Finally, after a lengthy pause, he broke the silence: “So, this is a letter, a letter from the ‘new world’ to the ‘old world’—is that what you are suggesting?”

“Yes.”

“But how can we confirm this?” Duncan inquired, unable to hide his skepticism. “How do you know it’s not just another relic from the Great Annihilation, like other twisted fragments?”

“It originates from a place where, theoretically, no ‘fragments’ should exist,” the Black Sun replied calmly.

Duncan immediately frowned in thought: “A place where no fragments should exist?”

“…The World’s Creation.”

A heavy silence fell over the scene.

Duncan’s eyes widened in astonishment as he gazed at the projection of the cube, noting its effort to convey various messages, including the illegible text.

This was indeed a letter.

But who had sent this letter?

Chapter 842: A Thoughtful Alternative

Duncan gazed intently at the cube suspended by the tendrils of the Black Sun, noting the messages on its surface that seemed to have struggled significantly to reach him.

He reflected on the journey of this small metallic cube—how it had been transmitted to this world, to this era, through mysterious methods and processes unknown to them.

The cube acted as a letter, a missive from the new world to the old, yet all evidence that could prove this had been obliterated by some enigmatic force. Its creators had likely tried countless methods to let the cube “declare its origin,” but these efforts had evidently failed. However, these failures did not make the attempts pointless.

Its mere presence served as a testament, and though this interpretation might just be a bold assumption by the Black Sun, at that moment, Duncan was prepared to accept this assumption as the sole truth.

In the ensuing silence, the deep, resonant tremors of the Black Sun finally broke the quiet: “The cube’s manufacturing process and function surpass my understanding—beyond any knowledge system that has existed in any city-state, beyond any technology known to me before the Great Annihilation.”

“On the other hand, from a ‘purposeful’ perspective, I see no rationale for why anyone would create and position this cube within the World’s Creation—especially since even the ancient kings lacked the capability to send objects into the World's Creation. Thus, the only plausible explanation I can think of is that this cube originates from a world and an era beyond my understanding."

"I am acquainted with all the history of this shelter—the only aspect unknown to me is the future, the future concerning 'the new world.'"

The edges of the Black Sun slowly expanded its radiant yet deceptive corona, its tendrils ablaze, stretching across a sea of flames before gradually curling inward.

One tendril, reaching far to the entrance of the mansion, stayed firmly in front of Duncan as if it were presenting a treasure, delicately supporting the small, unassuming metallic cube.

"Flame Usurper, this letter has no designated recipient. Someone or some group in the new world tried every possible means to send it to this era, yet they couldn't ensure the cube would directly reach any particular individual… but I sense it's intended for you."

Duncan struggled to express his feelings at that moment. He examined the symbols and patterns on the cube's surface, and although the text was blurred and disordered, he managed to decipher part of the message the "letter" conveyed—the human form (self), order, mathematics, a child's doodles, and stars.

"They exist in a logical and stable world… they can gaze upon the stars," Duncan murmured, almost to himself, "They live securely, and…"

"And, they have reached an advanced stage of development," the Black Sun added slowly, "The manufacturing techniques used for this cube are exceptional, as are the methods used to send it 'here,' none of which are recorded in any known 'blueprints.'"

For a while, Duncan remained silent, standing beside Alice who blinked in curiosity. Miss Doll watched the distant Black Sun and then the nearby cube, and though she did not understand the complex concepts of “manufacturing technology,” “development stages,” and “blueprints,” she at least realized that the cube was a significant item sent by someone important, which eventually prompted her to break the silence: “Captain, who could have sent this ‘letter’?”

The first thought that came to Duncan’s mind was that someone, or perhaps a group, from the new world was responsible. However, as he was about to speak, he suddenly paused, his resolve wavering. After a prolonged period of deep thought, Duncan hesitantly reached out towards the projection-like cube—a collection of stardust-like flames dancing at his fingertips.

As the flame approached, the Black Sun’s tendril instinctively shrank back, but eventually, it cautiously reached out once more, its voice simultaneously murmuring, “This is merely its projection, the actual body of the cube is not present here.”

“I understand, but I want to see if I can ‘hear’ or ‘see’ anything,” Duncan replied. “Projection or not, it makes no difference to me if there’s an informational mapping relationship.”

The Black Sun remained silent, merely lifting the projection of the cube slightly.

Duncan’s fingertip flame seamlessly merged into the projection, much like rain blending into water.

He stayed silent, intently absorbing the information conveyed by the flame—he felt the flame slowly dissolving into a void and, even with his “singularity” eyes, saw nothing deep within the flame.

No echoes, no “memories,” all profound information carried by the cube seemed to have been erased during its journey through the World’s Creation.

Duncan waited patiently until the last trace of the flame had completely disappeared into the depths of the projection, with nothing responding to him, leaving only a void deep within the cube.

Alice, who had been watching with bated breath next to him, dared not make a sound, fearful of disturbing him. Only after seeing Duncan sigh softly did she approach cautiously and inquire, “Did you see anything?”

“Nothing,” Duncan replied softly, shaking his head. “I fear it’s all been wiped out during the ‘transmission’ process.”

A look of disappointment crossed Alice’s face as she paused and then said, “…Oh.”

Duncan felt the sting of disappointment as well, but he said no more, simply waving his hand and turning his attention away from the metallic cube.

Yet, just as he shifted his gaze, as if a barely noticeable breeze had passed, a projection-like flicker flashed across his mind—in that nearly hallucinatory moment, he heard a voice as if emanating directly from his memories:

“…I will try everything to see you again… I will definitely leave something…”

Duncan swiftly turned back, his eyes intently fixed on the small cube.

The ephemeral voice was so fleeting and elusive that he could not be certain it was truly related to the cube, unable to determine if it was merely a “memory” that had surfaced spontaneously in his mind. The voice did not resurface, making everything seem like an auditory illusion.

But seconds later, a slight smile formed on Duncan’s face.

In his mind, there appeared the image of an elderly Cretan, hunched over in a tattered white robe, walking backlit against the light, waving goodbye, and stepping resolutely toward the endless night at the world's end in search of a flicker of light that was never meant to illuminate the old world with hardly any guidance.

Cretan had succeeded.

He had sent a message of safety from the new world.

…And perhaps, it was not merely a message of "safety."

This realization caused Duncan to slowly furrow his brows in thought, his expression shifting. Beside him, Alice sharply noticed the captain's change in demeanor and couldn't help but feel anxious, hesitating for a long time before finally daring to tug on Duncan's sleeve: "Captain?"

Duncan looked up, his face set in a serious expression. He casually patted Miss Doll's hair and gazed up at the distant Black Sun. "You just said this cube 'came' from the World's Creation?" he asked.

"Yes," the Black Sun immediately replied, its voice echoing as if from deep within itself. "This cube 'surfaced' from the depths of the World's Creation, a fact I can completely confirm."

"It sounds like you are quite familiar with the World's Creation and have been paying attention to it for some time," Duncan said, his expression growing more serious. "The other 'ancient kings' don't seem to know as much about it as you do."

"As you say," the huge and terrifying eye of the Black Sun met Duncan's gaze with a calm demeanor, no longer hiding its knowledge. "I know many things related to the World's Creation, just as I know the entire Boundless Sea… Remember what I mentioned at the beginning? Over the long years, I have always been 'overlooking' this world…"

Hearing this, Duncan's expression subtly shifted, then he suddenly realized something significant. "Wait, are you saying… your actual body is in the World's Creation?!"

"No, I am on its 'backside,'" the Black Sun calmly clarified. "No one can stay inside the World's Creation, not even the so-called 'ancient kings.' It is a place that can devour and tear everything apart, the Great Annihilation itself—but setting that aside, the World's Creation itself… is an impregnable 'barrier.'"

"It is enough to completely isolate the entire Boundless Sea and those harmful, dangerous exiles, keeping the toxic, erosive 'influences' that are harmful to the shelter blocked on the other side of the barrier—in the 'backside' of the World's Creation, is the cold land of exile, where I have been for ten thousand years, right above everyone's heads."

The… backside of the World's Creation!

Duncan's heart pounded wildly. A fact he had previously overlooked now stood clearly before him—the World's Creation actually had a "backside," and on that unimaginable "backside," the Black Sun, considered one of the oldest, most dangerous "ancient gods" feared by the entire world, was actually always suspended above the heads of all beings?!

After absorbing the shock, Duncan suddenly understood something else—

Why did the cube that "passed through" the World's Creation and was sent to this era end up in the hands of the Black Sun? Because in this world, the closest to the World's Creation was this ancient god who had been "exiled" ten thousand years ago!

"Flame Usurper," the voice of the Black Sun came then, interrupting Duncan's train of thought, "Why are you suddenly interested in the World's Creation?"

Duncan quickly collected his scattered thoughts, briefly organizing his emotions, then looked up seriously at the ancient “deity.”

“I have a rather bold plan… it might sound a bit crazy.”

“Oh?” the Black Sun voiced its curiosity, “Can you tell me? Is it related to the World’s Creation?”

Duncan thought for a moment, then nodded earnestly. “Simply put, I plan to detonate it.”

The Black Sun fell silent immediately.

After what seemed like an eternity, the twisted and indescribable “ancient god” suddenly emitted a series of strange tremors and gurgling sounds from within, then the chaotic sounds reformed into a rational syllable—

“…Ah?”

Chapter 843: The Guiding Light

Duncan had come to the realization that his plan might indeed verge on insanity—even the Black Sun seemed to require a moment to process his last declaration…

However, Duncan was sincere. Following the Black Sun's contemplative "Ah," Duncan's expression became even more grave. He restated firmly, "I intend to detonate the 'World's Creation'—when I use 'detonate,' I mean it in a figurative sense. I plan to unlock its power, specifically the aspects that were not fully released during the Great Annihilation."

After a while, the Black Sun finally regained its composure, and its deep, resonant voice, now tinged with a hint of static, inquired, "…When did you conceive this plan?"

"Before I arrived here to meet you," Duncan replied with a calm demeanor, "though at that time, my direction was only vaguely outlined, and the concept wasn't fully formed."

He paused, then added, "I have always possessed a sort of… 'intuition,' likely stemming from the 'knowledge' left behind by the civilization that created me. There are numerous mechanisms I do not fully understand, yet my instincts guide my actions and suggest the correct path forward. Motivated by this intuition, I believe that the 'World's Creation' can aid me in tackling a major challenge I face—the problem of the initial driving force."

“It wasn’t until I met you here and saw the ‘letter’ you brought that I confirmed the validity of this direction, or rather… this letter seems to act as a reminder, pointing me toward the correct path.”

Upon realizing that Duncan’s proposal was not a product of madness but a thought-out, calculated strategy, the turmoil on The Black Sun’s surface eased slightly, and it adopted a serious tone: “What do you mean by ‘the problem of the initial driving force’?”

“Fundamentally, it’s akin to the ‘Big Bang,’ the event that initiated our universe,” Duncan explained. “This is a metaphorical description. Picture it as a simultaneous explosion of information, matter, and energy. If we view the entire universe as a vast, complex mathematical device, then the initial burst of this device is that ‘explosion’ where everything began.”

“In the outer regions of order, I conducted preliminary experiments that verified the hypothesis of indestructible information, and demonstrated that ‘assigning’ values in a state of chaotic information could indeed reshape reality. Yet, I also faced a challenge: this ‘mathematical device’ of the universe maintains ‘integrity,’ where all its informational parameters must perfectly interlock. I cannot reconstruct the universe piece by piece, step by step—although I might have an endlessly long time to prepare, once the process begins, all tasks must be performed simultaneously.”

“Therefore, I require such a massive explosion, in an infinitely brief yet infinitely extensive ‘instant,’ to achieve the synchronous assignment and ‘activation’ of all information. If this is not accomplished, the new universe will disintegrate and gradually dissolve into the void—much like the current Boundless Sea.”

“And this requires an immense amount of energy, an extraordinarily vast amount… comparable even to that of a Great Annihilation.”

Duncan looked up solemnly at the massive, pallid eye surrounded by flesh and fire: “You see, my plan is quite rational and meticulously thought out…”

As the tentacles encircling the Black Sun trembled, the voice emitted a tone of growing concern, “I’m starting to feel a bit scared when you mention the term rational. I do, however, see the necessity of this plan. Indeed, such a vast amount of energy can only be sourced from the ‘World’s Creation.’ But how do we ensure that this process unfolds as you envision? How can we take control of the ‘World’s Creation’? How do we initiate it, guide it, and prevent it from spiraling out of control?”

The ancient deity bombarded Duncan with a flurry of questions, revealing deep seated concerns about the feasibility of Duncan’s plan. These worries were justified.

Positioned perilously close to the ‘World’s Creation,’ this entity understood the nature and terror of the rift more profoundly than anyone else in this world. Having observed the solidified Great Annihilation in the sky for millennia, it struggled to reconcile that catastrophic force with the possibility of a ‘new world.’

Yet Duncan, undisturbed by the Black Sun’s skepticism, had clearly pondered these issues extensively. He collected his thoughts and began calmly, “Everything is information.”

The Black Sun maintained its silence, attentively awaiting Duncan’s further explanation.

“The ‘World’s Creation’ operates on the same principle,” Duncan continued.

A faint pulsation of flames from the Black Sun suggested it was piecing together Duncan’s theory.

“After encountering the chaotic state known as the ‘information sea,’ I truly grasped the concept that ‘everything is information,’” Duncan confidently asserted, ensuring that The Black Sun was following his logic. “The ‘World’s Creation’ is the crystallized form of the ‘Great Annihilation’ itself. Yet, the Great Annihilation is also a manifestation of information. From the most basic logical perspective, the ‘World’s Creation’ is indistinguishable from the myriad things of this world.”

“As long as it is governed by ‘information,’ nothing is truly ‘out of control.’ It exists, thus it can be controlled. If it were uncontrollable, then even its ‘loss of control’ would be a controllable type, unless the principle of ‘everything is information’ fails to apply,” Duncan elucidated.”

“You seem very confident, and resolute,” The Black Sun remarked, its tentacles extending as it spoke with a deep, soothing tremor.

Duncan responded not with words but with a gentle nod of affirmation.

He held a steadfast belief: nothing could hinder the ‘World’s Creation’ from ushering in the dawn of a new world—not even the ‘World’s Creation’ itself.

“And there’s another factor that bolsters my confidence,” Duncan added abruptly.

“You mean… the appearance of that cube?” The Black Sun quickly interjected.

“Exactly,” Duncan affirmed with another subtle nod. “It traversed the rift of the ‘World’s Creation’ to reach ‘this side.’ A letter, no matter how meticulously crafted or perfectly safeguarded, that it can cross the divide between the old world and the new world to arrive here is nearly miraculous. Thus, its ‘delivery window’ must have been meticulously chosen, likely situated at the point where the two worlds are most intimately connected…”

Duncan’s voice trailed off as his gaze drifted into the distance, piercing through the dazzling yet deceptive corona of the Black Sun, peering into a much farther realm of time and space.

In the collapsed remnants of the old world, where all knowledge converged at an “end point,” a new world burst into existence through a monumental explosion at a “starting point.”

This convergence and explosion, relative yet originating, resembled the two ends of an hourglass. At their intersection—a point that served as both an end and a beginning—lay the “singularity,” also the site of the ‘World’s Creation.’

From a distant future, a letter traveled through the only “aperture” to the opposite end of the hourglass. This letter was a message of homecoming and a beacon for the night’s navigation.

“I will come for you,” Duncan declared slowly, his gaze shifting from the horizon to focus intently on the Black Sun. “I will fulfill the promise to consume you, reserve a place for you in the new world, and then—it will be done.”

The corona of the Black Sun pulsed slowly, and from its layered flesh emerged a gentle, deep tremor: “I will light a lighthouse for you in the night sky; you must navigate towards the brightest direction.”

“Okay, see you then.”

“See you then.”

…

The night stretched on endlessly, with fog enveloping the city-state and dense clouds hanging so low they seemed almost touchable. A piercing cold pervaded the world, and although the gas lamps along the road still glowed brightly, the flames within the lampshades appeared frozen, emitting no heat.

Wrapped tightly in her coat, Heidi wasn't entirely sure why she needed such heavy clothing. Yet, an innate instinct urged her to "keep warm," even though she could barely remember what "cold" felt like.

She moved swiftly through the lamp-lit streets, showing her pass at the sheriff's post as she went, her steps quickening towards home.

Along the way, Heidi noticed more pedestrians than usual—some heading to factories, others out shopping. It was a stark contrast to the early days of this prolonged night, indicating that the citizens were gradually adapting to the darkness.

Yet, the city remained unnervingly quiet compared to the days when "everything was as usual."

Heidi ignored the other pedestrians weaving through the mist and kept her gaze down, rushing forward. Occasionally, she heard chaotic sounds from nearby streets—shouts of conflict or screams of terror. At times, she even glimpsed armed church guards clashing with frantic pedestrians in the fog, but she quickly averted her eyes and dismissed these disturbances.

Passing a street lamp, Heidi caught sight of a flyer on the lamp post from the corner of her eye. The flyer, bearing simple yet ominous messages —"Waves, death, the temperature of fire—if you see and understand these words, please immediately seek shelter in XX district or XX district. Do not panic, stay calm, people are still protecting you"—was printed with crooked, barely legible symbols.

She had noticed similar graffiti around her home recently.

Yet, it seemed unimportant.

Turning her head away, Heidi walked through the cold fog, continuing her journey home.

Chapter 844: Returning Home

Heidi experienced a wave of dizziness accompanied by a slight discomfort as she approached the final intersection on her way home. Stopping in confusion, she looked back over the path she had just traversed.

The street was enshrouded in a light mist, with low clouds masking the rooftops and dim streetlights casting an eerie glow. Shadows shifted ambiguously within the fog, occasionally producing faint, unsettling noises. Despite this, the scene appeared typical.

Heidi frowned as she noticed some text scribbled on a nearby wall. The crudely drawn symbols were difficult to discern and strained her eyes.

A robust woman standing in a nearby doorway seemed to notice Heidi's puzzled pause in the middle of the street. She addressed Heidi with a look of concern, "Good evening, do you need help?"

"…No," Heidi hesitated before responding, "I'm fine, just a bit dizzy."

"Do take care of yourself. Dizziness is no trivial matter," the woman replied, her smile warm. "If you're feeling unwell, you're welcome to come in for some hot tea."

Heidi appreciated the offer and smiled but politely declined, "Thank you for your kindness, but I feel much better now."

"Is that so? It seems a bit of fresh air really does help. It's a pleasant day today…"

After nodding and expressing her gratitude, Heidi turned away and then noticed a man in a blue coat emerging from the fog. He walked briskly, carrying a heavy parcel, his eyes filled with panic as if fleeing from some unseen terror within the fog. He looked around anxiously, cautious not to make any sudden movements, as if fearing to disturb something hidden in the mist.

Driven by instinct, Heidi approached the anxious man. “Hello, sir, are you in trouble? I’m a psychiatrist…”

The man in the blue coat, surprised, stopped and stared at Heidi. He opened his mouth as if to speak, then, sensing something unsettling about her, tensed up and waved his hand dismissively before turning and disappearing into the mist without a word.

Confused, Heidi frowned and glanced down at herself, wondering what might have caused such a reaction from the stranger.

The dizziness and unease returned with greater intensity.

A heightened sense of alertness overtook Heidi, her dormant spiritual senses awakening. Although the streets seemed normal, she now sensed an underlying threat and chill.

Something was clearly amiss, evident right before her eyes, yet she had overlooked it—the discordant elements around her…

Heidi cautiously moved to the roadside, observing her surroundings while silently invoking the name of Lahem. A sharp golden spike silently appeared in her hand.

However, she was still unsure of the “enemy” for which this golden spike was intended—was there truly an enemy present?

The pendant on her chest warmed slightly, as if reminding her of something important.

Once again, her attention was drawn to the so-called “graffiti” on the wall. The wavy lines shook and shifted, forming readable phrases: “Waves, death, the warmth of fire…”

Heidi stood frozen, engulfed in shock.

The cries of reason and memory surged through her mind like relentless waves, lost yet as persistent as death itself. She began to comprehend the profound changes that had engulfed the world and felt a deep panic rising within her. However, her extensive mental training allowed her to regain her composure more quickly than most, prompting her to survey her environment urgently.

Dark red shadows, reminiscent of flesh, crept across the night, covering walls and rooftops. The heavy clouds softened the eerie glow of the World’s Creation into strange, trembling shadows that seemed to slither and float across the city’s skyline, animating it unnaturally. On the mist-soaked street, shambling figures emitted deep murmurs and soft whimpers.

A man dressed in a gray coat wandered by, clutching a decaying, dubious substance which he consumed while muttering to himself.

An abandoned bicycle moved slowly down the street, its deteriorated wheels and chain squeaking. A twisting shadow, roughly the size of a human head, sat on the seat.

From a nearby building, a monstrous limb adorned with hundreds of blinking eyes stretched into the mist. This grotesque arm twisted around, its numerous eyes scanning the chilly night, and from it emerged a voice, eerily human:

“Good evening… It’s a nice day today…”

Heidi shuddered as a cold chill pierced through her heart and lungs.

Memories flooded back—vivid images of street graffiti and engravings she had often noticed, the unsettling discord that had always unnerved her, and the figure of a man dressed in a blue coat, who had appeared rushed and fearful.

Suddenly, she remembered that she had left her mother at home!

Taking a deep breath, Heidi spun around and dashed back along the fog-enshrouded street as fast as her legs would carry her—

Amid the fog, a startled gasp echoed, and voices weakly called out her name. The dark red shadows along the roadside trembled and gathered together. Gunshots rang out from a nearby street, sparked by some panic-driven commotion, while a mechanical spider walker, adorned with numerous eyes and mouths, stumbled forward from the opposite direction, its pressure pipes bursting open and releasing a strange, monotonous tune.

Yet Heidi seemed oblivious to these disturbances; she blocked out all distractions and sprinted straight down the street—through the fog, eventually glimpsing the lights of her home.

Grasping her skirt, she ran awkwardly for the last few meters, pausing just before she reached the front door. She hesitated, transferred the sharp “golden spike” to her left hand, and calmed her breath before cautiously taking out her key, unlocking the door, and turning the knob.

The door swung open to reveal the cold, bright light of the living room. Inside, everything looked normal, although writhing shadows still lingered in the corners, offering a stark contrast to the turmoil outside.

Her mother sat by the fireplace at the far end of the room, deeply engrossed in a newspaper that had been delivered at some unknown time.

Upon hearing the door, the elderly woman looked up with a gentle smile and said, “Heidi, you’re back—was the visit to the clinic successful?”

Heidi’s mother appeared unchanged, her usual self, much to Heidi’s relief who had been worried that unwanted visitors might be lurking in the room.

With a quiet sigh of relief, Heidi put away the golden spike she had been clutching and walked calmly toward the fireplace. “There’s no time to explain, Mother, you must come with me now. This neighborhood is no longer safe—there’s something sinister lurking outside…”

Mid-sentence, Heidi stopped speaking abruptly.

Her mother’s face remained serene, her gentle smile unchanging, showing no sign of surprise or doubt. After a short pause, the older woman nodded affirmatively, then stood and walked across the room to the staircase by the fireplace.

From beneath the stairs, she retrieved two suitcases.

“Everything necessary is present. The shelter is well-equipped with basic amenities, and the supplies remain abundant— Governor Dante always ensured that. Your ‘medical box’ has been packed and is waiting on the table in your room. Please, fetch it yourself; they’ll be needing those supplies at the shelter. And don’t forget your revolver, take several boxes of bullets with you—try to avoid using them, but if necessary, aiming for those fleshy, crawling creatures one bullet at a time continues to be effective.”

As she detailed these preparations, she walked back to the fireplace, stretched slightly to reach the old rifle that hung from a brass hook, and took it down.

Click-click, she skillfully manipulated the rifle’s mechanism, loaded bullets into the chamber, and practiced ejecting and reloading them with ease.

“I’ll stick with this one; it’s the same rifle your father and I used on our excursions. This old companion has always been reliable—one shot, one cultist.”

Heidi watched, utterly astonished, and slowly came to a realization. Incredulously, she addressed her mother, “Mother, do you mean to say… you’ve been prepared all this time?”

“I was ready the moment they posted flyers on the telephone poles. After that, it was just a matter of waiting for you to ‘wake up,’” the old woman explained, looking intently at Heidi. “Thankfully, I didn’t have to wait too long.”

Overwhelmed and speechless, Heidi remained silent for a long while until her mother’s urging snapped her back to reality. She quickly ascended the stairs to her room where she found the small suitcase her mother had packed for her, along with several cardboard boxes on the table.

Upon opening the boxes, she discovered shiny, golden bullets, each engraved with the sacred words of Lahem, the god of wisdom: “Let knowledge enter the mind.”

Heidi gazed at the golden bullets, gathered her resolve, secreted some in her clothing, and meticulously packed the remainder into the medical box.

After completing her preparations, she dashed down the stairs.

“Mother, I’m ready, we should—” Suddenly, Heidi halted on the staircase.

The front door stood open, and a familiar figure was framed in the doorway. Dressed in an old but neatly maintained woolen coat, sporting a monocle, and puffing on a pipe.

Her father had returned home.

Chapter 845: The Final Voyage Plan

Heidi had just finished bringing all the additional luggage into the living room when she approached the dining table and stared blankly at Morris, who was sitting opposite her. It had been a considerable time since she last saw her father. Although they managed occasional contacts, even those infrequent communications had dwindled to nothing long ago. Her father's sudden return home seemed almost surreal to her.

Morris was seated at the dining table, leisurely consuming freshly fried sausages and bread. He chewed each bite thoroughly and for a long time. After a while, he raised his eyes to meet those of his wife next to him and his daughter across from him, a smile spreading across his face. "It's been a long time since I've had home-cooked food," he remarked.

"There's more if you're still hungry, but we need to leave after this meal," his wife replied with a nostalgic smile, reminding him of days gone by when they would plan a stroll in the park after lunch. "We need to report to the nearest shelter—it's becoming increasingly unsafe in our neighborhood, what with those confused people… they are becoming less and less human-like."

"They have lost their self-awareness, and the world is gradually forgetting what 'human' looks like, resulting in their current state," Morris explained calmly. "The keystones and anchors set by the gods are failing rapidly, and those who are not awakened will continue to deviate further from ‘normal’… yet in their own ‘feeling’, nothing has ever changed.”

A look of sorrow crossed Heidi’s face. “Is there no hope?”

“Don’t worry about them, Heidi,” her father replied, shaking his head with a reassuring smile. “It’s all temporary; things will get better. The captain is figuring things out—my early return to the city-state is also part of his grand plan.”

Heidi hesitated for a moment before speaking, her voice filled with a mix of hesitation and curiosity. “It seems like you’ve experienced a lot outside. Has everyone else returned? Is Vanna back?”

“Yes, Vanna is back too, along with the other crew members,” Morris nodded slowly. “Vanna has gone to the cathedral first and will head to City Hall afterward to settle things there; she will contact you once she’s done. Nina and Shirley are back home too; we have scheduled times and methods of contact, and Sailor and Agatha… they all have their own arrangements and missions.”

A hint of curiosity appeared on Heidi’s face. “Can you tell me about your journey?”

“Of course—there isn’t much time left in the world, but still enough for a grand tale,” Morris replied.

Meanwhile, in the fog that enveloped the entire city, two girls ran through the streets of the lower district. They passed suspicious dark red clumps piled on the road, weaving between buildings that blinked with countless eyes and walls that pulsated like a heart, avoiding the aimless, unselfconscious shadows that roamed the streets. The low, chaotic whispers and occasional loud noises echoed through the fog, encircling them like uninvited guests.

“This is even worse than what the female pope described!” Shirley exclaimed, a chilling atmosphere enveloping her. To embolden herself, she transformed into her terrifying demonic form, carefully stepping over the pulsating heaps on the ground with her twelve long skeletal limbs. “She only said the city is full of people who had lost themselves… but she never mentioned this kind of ‘loss of self’!”

“The situation likely changed while they were out at sea in that lighthouse.” While following Shirley, Nina couldn’t help but glance up at her friend, now transformed into a terrifying figure. “But then again, do you really need to be scared? You look more frightening than that shadow we encountered earlier,” she remarked.

Shirley quickly responded with a grin, “What’s frightening? I consider this look quite amazing, not scary at all!” She then propped herself up, surveying their surroundings thoughtfully. “Moreover, there’s a silver lining to this situation—I can freely roam around the city in this guise. It seems as though they don’t even notice me. And even if an ‘awake’ person does spot me, they’ll probably dismiss it as just another distortion and won’t bother chasing me down to shoot me…”

“You should still be cautious,” Nina warned. “What if there’s another priest like Miss Vanna patrolling the city? If she sees a shadow demon like you, she might just come at you with a sword…”

“Then you’ll just have to douse him with some sunshine,” Shirley joked, tapping Nina’s shoulder with one of her skeletal limbs. “Let him know why there are still two such bright and beautiful girls roaming the city at the end of the world…”

Nina was hesitant to engage further with her friend, whose thought processes were uniquely her own.

Their conversation was abruptly interrupted by the sound of a bell ringing through the fog. They looked towards the source of the noise and saw a steam bus with a bright yellow shell. The bus, rather peculiarly, sported several pairs of hands and feet, using them to crawl through the foggy street, while white steam puffed from its rear. It stopped near them at a station, and its middle section suddenly tore open, revealing a mouth full of sharp teeth.

“Wanna ride? Going to the museum!” the steam bus shouted to Shirley and Nina. “The curfew is lifted, and there’s a dazzling exhibition of paintings and textiles!”

Nina watched the scene in disbelief, while Shirley, after a moment of surprise, energetically waved off the offer. “No thanks! I have too many legs to get on!”

The bus replied cheerily, “Alright, alright, see you! I’m off to the next stop!” The “door” then snapped shut, and with a puff of steam, the bus raised its multitude of limbs and quickly scuttled away, vanishing down the street.

Shirley and Nina exchanged glances.

Suddenly, Dog’s silhouette emerged from the shadow between them, grumbling, “…The shadowy abyss of demons might be more normal than this place now.”

Nina remained silent, simply turning towards what she remembered as the direction of home.

Ignoring the eerie shadows and sounds that surrounded them, they eventually spotted the familiar little shop in the lower district. Among the buildings now enveloped in various sinister shadows and heaps, and almost transformed into some kind of “living entity,” the little antique shop still maintained its original appearance—a comforting safe haven, its glass windows still emanating a warm, bright light.

Nina hurried forward, pushing open the already unlocked door. The doorbell rang crisply, echoing the familiarity of her memories.

“Uncle Duncan! Shirley and I are home!” she shouted into the stillness of the antique shop.

However, her call was met with silence.

“Uncle Duncan, we’re home!” Nina called out once more.

This time, a voice responded, though Nina briefly struggled to discern whether it originated from within herself or somewhere in the shop: “I’m behind the counter.”

Nina hesitated, her gaze instinctively drifting towards the counter next to the staircase.

There, she spotted a gaunt, hunched figure seemingly blended into the shadows, sitting silently behind the old, stained wooden counter.

Shirley, now back in her human form, walked alongside Nina into the shop, passing shelves that appeared untouched and dusty for several days, and made her way to the counter.

“Uncle Duncan…” Nina approached cautiously, noticing Uncle Duncan behind the counter slightly shift his eyes, yet remaining otherwise still, which filled her with concern, “Are you alright?”

“I have already severed most connections with this avatar,” Duncan’s voice resonated in Nina’s mind, “but I have retained just enough of my vision to see you and Shirley arrive home safely—did anything happen on the way?”

Nina, her expression complex, eventually let a warm smile spread across her face.

“Nothing,” she replied cheerfully, standing directly in front of the counter so that Uncle Duncan, distant as he was, could see her clearly, “A lot has changed in the city, but there was no danger. Mr. Morris has also made it home safely, and everyone else is fine. Shirley and I just walked here from the shopping street; many people there have already sought refuge in shelters.”

“That’s good to hear. I can only see a very limited area from here, and I’ve been curious about the outside.”

“How are things on your end?” Shirley leaned in, unable to contain her curiosity, “Did you and Alice find what you were looking for?”

“We found it, and now we’re preparing to depart to our final destination.”

“The last stop?” Nina and Shirley asked simultaneously.

“Yes,” Duncan responded slowly, “Soon, you will see the Vanished again—it will then become the most prominent light in the sky.”

Outside, the hull of the ship was enveloped by a uniform gray-white background. The Vanished vibrated slightly, then settled into a profound stillness as the ship embarked on its final journey.

Duncan stood at the stern of the ship, at the helm, with Alice beside him clutching the wheel, steering their course.

“We’ll first return to the border, but we won’t enter the Boundless Sea—the Vanished will ‘ascend’ at the Eternal Veil, and we’ll traverse the entire world from a very high place until we reach the World’s Creation,” Duncan explained, lifting his gaze as if looking through the gray-white corridor of their jump, peering at the end of time and everything beyond. “And then, that ‘moment’ will arrive.”

“Ascend? World’s Creation?” Nina’s voice, filled with astonishment, echoed in his heart, “Is that… possible?”

Then came Shirley’s exclamation: “The Vanished can still fly?”

Duncan smiled, his mouth curving into a knowing smile. “It’s possible—the Sea of Clouds is also a sea.”

Chapter 846: The Sunlit Path

Vanna stood atop the highest tower of the Storm Cathedral, her eyes scanning the horizon through a vast window. She surveyed the intricate rooftops of the church, the soft glow of lights nestled in the clouds, the slightly changed skyline of the city buildings, and the expansive stretch of the great sea in the distance.

Near the tower's spiraling staircase, steam-powered pipes emitted a soft hiss as a copper incense burner dangled from a valve on the pipe, releasing wisps of fragrant smoke. Beside her, the elderly Archbishop Valentine stood silently, his pale eyes, clouded from halted blood circulation, focused on the distant horizon along with Vanna.

Breaking the silence, Vanna whispered, "I often stood here at dusk, watching every corner of Pland. The hiss of the steam pipes and the scent of the incense always brought peace."

"It feels as if those days were not long ago," Archbishop Valentine murmured in a low tone.

"Indeed, they seem almost recent," Vanna agreed with a slight nod. "Those nights were filled with turmoil, darkness brought threats upon the people—from shadowy cultists to their summoned beasts. I was filled with determination, ready to confront any danger to our city-state."

The old archbishop remained silent, his gaze drifting toward the church garden. In the misty night, distant roars and eerie sounds echoed, suggesting the presence of a massive creature hidden in the fog.

“Granny Tereni has started her feast again,” Valentine eventually spoke, his voice slow. “Every evening at this hour, she consumes herself, only to regenerate from the earth twenty-four hours later. Nearby, twelve nuns and twelve priests remain close to Granny Tereni, entering the small abbey by the garden at specific times—just as you used to during your daily walks.”

Vanna let out a faint sigh, her voice barely audible, “Will they venture beyond the church grounds?”

“I have ordered the garden sealed, although it’s not truly necessary,” Valentine explained. “Granny Tereni never leaves the garden, even when ‘alive.’ And the nuns and priests pose no threat—there are far more dangerous shadows lurking in the city.”

“My sword feels out of place now,” Vanna said with regret.

“We still need your strength if wanderers try to scale the shelter’s high walls,” Valentine countered, shaking his head. “Disorder can erupt at any time, anywhere in the city—sometimes when people suddenly ‘awake’ in their homes, other times when blind wanderers breach our security zones. We’ve formed a new Night Watch to patrol the streets, but there are always gaps they can’t fill. Your leadership as the inquisitor would be invaluable to them.”

He paused, then continued, “You may need to adjust to some of your former comrades. Several in the Night Watch have undergone… ‘changes,’ appearing less human. But in these times, possessing rationality and humanity is a rarity.”

“I don’t mind,” Vanna chuckled, shifting her arm slightly, “After all, it’s better than dealing with the ‘human factor’ on the Vanished, right? I’m ready to return to this work—you can make the arrangements.”

“That’s good to hear,” Valentine replied, smiling and nodding in approval. “I’ll notify the Night Watch during the next shift change to share this good news. Would you like to rest in your room for a bit? It’s still in excellent shape, and someone has been maintaining it.”

“Okay,” Vanna agreed, then paused, a hint of concern in her voice. “Is there anything I should be cautious about?”

“Don’t worry about the murmuring from your vanity table; it’s nothing coherent. And try not to gaze out the window for too long—it tends to grow eyes. That’s all you need to be aware of.”

“…Honestly, the situation is quite… ‘mild,’” she remarked with a note of sarcasm.

Valentine gave a helpless shrug, but before he could continue, a sudden burst of light erupted from nowhere, cutting him off.

Both turned their eyes upward, startled, trying to locate the source of the light.

The clouds above glowed with a cold, pale light, a brilliance emanating from the World’s Creation—a phenomenon caused by the lowering clouds, revealing a “scar” that spanned the entire sky, now mostly hidden behind the clouds, only occasionally visible through the brightest, thinnest gaps.

Suddenly, between the clouds, a different glow emerged.

It wasn’t the usual cold, pale light, but a faint orange-yellow hue, blending with the light from the World’s Creation, briefly reminiscent of the long-lost… sunlight.

Vanna looked upward, searching for the origin of the World’s Creation. Through a gap in the lowering clouds, she spotted the vast “scar,” and to her surprise, the sun-like orange-yellow light was emanating from the edge of the World’s Creation.

It seemed as though a strong light source was bursting forth from “behind” the pale fissure, obscured by the cracks in the sky, allowing only a little residual light to diffuse from the edges of the cracks, thus faintly illuminating the sky.

Valentine, making the same connection, wore an expression of stunned confusion on his face, staring blankly at the sky. “What is that…”

Vanna remained silent, and just then, the orange-yellow light diffusing from behind the World’s Creation gradually dimmed and completely extinguished.

A moment later, the orange-yellow light flared up again, spreading across the sky. The invisible, powerful light source flickered on and off like a beacon in the night sky. This spectacle was visible to the entire world. Even the other dimensions could witness this scene.

At the world’s edge, at the “border node” where gods slumber, the dim, false sunlight once chased away the fog, shining over the Leviathan Queen’s palace, on the server matrix of Navigator Two, on the Ashen Isle of the Eternal Flame, and on the tombs of Bartok.

Deep in the abyssal sea, where the uncontrollably proliferating Navigator One slowly writhed at the ocean’s bottom, a vast swarm of nanomachines nearly filled every inch beneath the shattered lands. Among countless uncontrollable tentacles, the dim sunlight suddenly dispelled the darkness, illuminating the dark red core of Navigator One.

In the distant northern ice fields of the Boundless Sea, ice sculptures stood silently next to a massive archives building, the bearers frozen on the ice field, the tallest among them still maintaining a posture of looking southward before being frozen.

The faint and flickering “sunlight,” though obscured and diluted by the barrier known as the World’s Creation, still managed to cast a gleaming sheen over the frozen visages, deeply imprinting each rigid gaze.

This sunlight was toxic, lethal even for the creatures of the Boundless Sea; to them, bathing in this light was akin to drowning in the murmurs of subspace.

However, thanks to the mitigating effects of the World’s Creation, the lethal impact of this sunlight on the terrestrial world was significantly reduced. Although a trace of its toxic nature remained, it was largely negligible.

Moreover, this world was already profoundly distorted and warped. In the face of widespread disintegration, the menace posed by the Black Sun’s radiance was hardly more threatening than the ongoing collapse of the world itself.

Thus, the exiled sun began to shine unimpeded for the first time in ages. Long after those who had once cherished its light had faded into history, it now blazed fiercely amid the Great Annihilation.

The sunlight streamed through the transition channel, carving a luminous and distinct path against the stark gray-white backdrop.

Duncan sensed a subtle vibration beneath his feet; Alice was fine-tuning the transition mechanism, adjusting their trajectory based on the navigation signal emitted by the Black Sun.

Duncan narrowed his eyes, focusing on the light at the channel’s end—here, free from the obstruction of the World’s Creation, the sunlight spanned both time and space and appeared almost blinding.

“I will be your beacon in the night sky; you must steer towards the brightest light…”

The architects of a Dyson sphere, while not as technologically advanced as the “New Hope,” clearly knew how to assert their presence in the cosmos, capable of emitting a signal strong enough to guide starships.

“I see the light; we are heading towards you. This should shorten the journey of the Vanished,” Duncan communicated to the sunlight, aware that the Black Sun could hear him through this method, “How are you faring now?”

“The intense heat, it feels like I am simmering in flames—it’s painful, yet somehow satisfying,” replied the voice of the Black Sun, trembling within the beams, “This is the first time in ten thousand years that I’ve truly blazed; I thought I couldn’t bear it, but… it’s a good pain.”

“In the new world, you can exist peacefully with your own light without suffering from self-inflicted burns,” Duncan responded with a soft smile, “There will be a provision for such harmony.”

“…Is that really possible?”

“Yes, this is a unique, tailored opportunity for a new beginning,” Duncan explained calmly, “You could even request additional features—like altering your own sunlight to a shade of pink.”

“Ha, no need for that, but if it’s feasible, I do have another request…”

“What might that be?”

“Could you arrange a few more planets for me? Gas or rocky, either type would suffice. Observing the evolution of life on various planets could be quite fascinating.”

“Consider it noted—your wish will be granted after Alice gets her flat bottom pan.”

“That’s indeed a great honor.”

Chapter 847, Depth 3: Nightfall

In the days that followed, all who traveled the Boundless Sea witnessed the ominous radiance of the Black Sun—a misleading illumination that expanded and enveloped the entire world. As the last lighthouse on these waters, it cast its light across every nook and cranny of the sanctuary, providing continuous illumination for an unending sequence of days and nights.

Speculation about the source of this unusual “radiance” varied among the populace. Some theorized it was an indicator of the world’s ongoing decay, while others interpreted it as a sign of a transformation within the World’s Creation itself. Eternal optimists viewed it as a sign heralding the return of the sun, while ultimate pessimists saw it as a precursor to the end of everything. For many, however, this strange sunlight was merely an event to be ignored.

Creatures that had lost their self-awareness roamed aimlessly through the city, shrouded in mist and dim light. They ferociously devoured what they could vaguely “recognize” as food, their deep growls filling the air. At the same time, the city-states buzzed with a background noise of whispers emanating from their depths.

Over the ocean, immense, shifting shadows moved toward the coastline of the city-state. These were fleets of spectral ships, arisen from forgotten eras. Their crews—ghostly sailors and pirates—landed under the cover of night, melding with the shadows amid the howling winds, and their whereabouts remained a mystery once they departed. However, each dock and pathway seemed haunted by the soft echoes of sea shanties and distant calls.

At night, the city's structures appeared to come alive, their original shapes obscured by the fog. Roofs seemed to grow eyes, chimneys twisted and stretched, windows developed sharp, fang-like features, and each doorway emitted loud, unnerving noises that contributed to the loudest cacophony the city had ever experienced.

In this disturbing reality, the awakened and frightened citizens constructed towering walls deep within the city. They communicated through the sewers and the remaining urban rail systems. In refuges like the city hall and churches, they maintained a semblance of order.

The inhabitants took turns sleeping, ensuring that vigilant eyes were always on the lookout in these last bastions, guarding against the transformation of walls and rooftops into animate, fleshy obstructions.

In addition, Night Watchers tirelessly patrolled the city, searching for the last survivors in completely distorted and ruined districts, protecting them from other dehumanized creatures eager to consume and obliterate their existence.

A vital directive had been issued from a distant northern city-state and had spread globally through various city-state alliances. Its message was stark and straightforward: Survive. Survive at all costs. Prevent as many as possible from falling before the arrival of the new dawn.

Although the usual processes of death were suspended, those overwhelmed by the night and madness still disappeared from this world, reduced to mere remnants within these refuges, unable to welcome the anticipated "dawn"—the final defenders of this world fought desperately to avoid this fate.

Within the high walls, those who were protected engaged in hopeful and cautious conversations about this “dawn.”

Talks of a new world emerging from the prolonged darkness filled the air.

Initially, no one knew how the news of this dawn had spread, or whether it was a deliberate act by the protectors. It might have been just a distant, elusive hope, but in this night of universal downfall, it was crucial to hold onto the hope that continued to thrive.

Lawrence stood atop a restored section of the ancient city wall that bordered the western district of Morpheus, silently gazing into the horizon.

This part of the city wall, recently refurbished and reinforced, now served as a formidable barrier protecting the frontier city-state. The massive wall stretched from the port to the steam hub factory, encircling nearly all of the city’s survivors.

Outside these massive walls, the few remaining survivors had taken refuge in two churches and nearby apartment buildings. The Night Watchers were diligently working to connect the underground networks of several shelters, aiming to include everyone.

During the night, a terrifying mix of roars and mechanical firing sounds from steam walkers erupted, intertwined with light flashes that pierced the dense fog before silence returned. After a considerable pause, a signal flare shot up in that direction, bursting into a persistent glow against the night sky.

The dim “sunlight” from behind the World’s Creation mingled with the light from the flare.

“It appears there are no survivors left in that direction, just the monsters that the city itself has spawned,” Martha’s voice emerged from a small mirror attached to Lawrence’s chest. “It’s getting late; we’re unlikely to encounter any new ‘awakened ones’ in those long-abandoned districts.” ŖάNOBĘṢ

“Morpheus is not a large city. Our search operation here will soon conclude, and in the coming days, our main task will be ensuring safety within these walls,” Lawrence nodded thoughtfully. “However, in other city-states, the search for survivors will probably persist until the very end. In those sprawling, maze-like old districts, there’s always someone still clinging to hope, waiting to be rescued…”

The “sunlight” behind the World’s Creation dimmed briefly, then surged again, illuminating the entire sky.

“Who would have thought that the last to illuminate this sky would be the ‘Black Sun,’” Martha whispered. “Just a year ago, such talk would have been dismissed as madness, not even uttered by devotees of the sun.”

“But now, no one besides us even recalls what the ‘Black Sun’ is,” Lawrence sighed, shaking his head. “All the fear and reverence once associated with it have been relegated to forgotten history.”

He looked up at the dim yellow light spreading across the sky, where the forgotten “Black Sun” still shimmered faintly behind the World’s Creation, yet its light was no longer needed by any creature in this world.

It now merely served to guide the last remaining ship still navigating these dark times.

Footsteps approached from behind. Lawrence turned from the contemplation of the sky to see a gaunt, disheveled figure in an ill-fitting sailor’s uniform emerge from the mist and ascend the city wall towards him.

“Captain, I have returned to make my report,” Sailor said, adjusting the hem of his uniform and forcing a grotesque, unnerving smile.

Lawrence examined Sailor and winced slightly: “…Could you refrain from smiling like that whenever you greet me? It’s quite unsettling.”

Sailor responded by stretching his smile even wider: “Given my appearance, I’m considered quite handsome by today’s standards in the city-states.”

Lawrence spat aside and refrained from further teasing the grim figure, instead stepping forward to clap Sailor on the shoulder. “So, how was your time aboard the Vanished?”

Sailor paused for a moment, his face marked by deep lines that gradually relaxed as he reflected, “It was a good experience.”

“That’s good to hear,” Lawrence replied with a warm smile, shaking his head in amusement. “Now that your remarkable assignment outside is complete…” He gestured broadly with open arms, “Welcome back to the White Oak.”

Sailor returned the smile, spreading his arms wide in response, “Happy to be back.”

Quickly sidestepping, Lawrence joked, “I was just saying—no need for an actual hug. Go freshen up, your scent of rotten flesh is quite potent.”

…

“Mr. Morris has taken his family to the safe haven, and he has also joined the city wall guard squad… It seems when the head of the guard saw an elderly man volunteering, he initially rejected him, but then, Mr. Morris impressed everyone there with his capabilities by beating every youngster that dared to challenge him…”

“Miss Vanna has taken up a position at the cathedral—she’s now in charge of the watchmen stationed there. It’s known that they have several out-of-control priests detained within the cathedral walls, keeping her quite busy every day, but she seems genuinely content… She mentioned this to you as well? Yes, she's pleased to be making a difference back in the city-state…"

"Did Sailor and Miss Agatha arrive safely at their destinations? That's relieving… I heard that the ships heading north are becoming scarce, and with the deteriorating conditions in the Cold Sea, I had some concerns… It's fortunate they arrived safely, as that was likely the last fleet to depart."

"How is Miss Lucretia? Sampling the local dishes at Wind Harbor? Oh, really?… That sounds just like something a witch would do…"

In the background, Nina's voice was a cheerful hum, while Duncan sat on the edge of the deck of the Vanished, a gentle smile on his face as he listened to her distant chatter.

"Do you and Shirley have any plans?" he inquired abruptly.

There was a brief pause before Nina responded, "…Shirley and I have decided to remain at the antique shop."

"You're not considering taking refuge at the cathedral? It might be safer there."

"No, we don't have other family, and we feel secure enough. Taking refuge doesn't really align with our needs – now Dog and Shirley take turns patrolling the shop while I ensure it remains a beacon of light and warmth. Our little shop has essentially become a small 'refuge' on this street. Sometimes Night Watchers drop by for a break, and they all serve under Miss Vanna… Oh, they even call this place 'the most reliable night safe house in the city-state'…"

Nina's tone was lively, tinged with pride, clearly content with their setup. Duncan listened, his slight worry fading.

It appears that the two young women have creatively transformed the quaint antique shop into a vibrant and essential part of the community.

As Nina continued her easygoing banter, Duncan’s gaze was drawn to the changing light and shadows at the end of the transition channel.

The clouds stretched across the horizon, visible through the channel, their outlines highlighted by the diffuse ‘sunlight’, sketching the silhouette of the eternal curtain.

Finally, Duncan slowly rose to his feet and said, “Nina.”

The chattering girl paused immediately: “Hmm?”

“Get ready to look up—”

Chapter 848: Depth 2, Annihilation

The warp transit concluded its journey – the extensive voyage through the remote frontier had ended, and the Vanished had once again entered the world of fog and water.

However, this arrival marked merely a brief pause in a much larger expedition. Duncan's true objective lay not in returning to the Boundless Sea but in reaching the farthest extremity of this world, a place that hung suspended in the sky, locked in perpetual coldness.

The ship began to emit gentle vibrations as it exited warp transit. The illusion of the New Hope rapidly vanished into the sky, while countless unseen threads withdrew back into the puppet's exterior. Almost immediately, the thick fog characteristic of the frontier waters enveloped the ship from all sides, welcoming it warmly. The Vanished glided through the sea, moving silently over the calm, mirror-like water as the ship gradually stabilized.

Alice blinked, her eyes quickly regaining their brightness. She looked up at Duncan, who was standing nearby, and flashed him a quick smile. "Captain! We're back!"

"Yes, we are back in the Boundless Sea. I'll take over the helm now," Duncan replied with a smile, nodding at the puppet before heading towards the shadowy helm. "Feel free to rest or just watch if you prefer."

"Okay, I'm not tired. I'll watch!" Alice responded enthusiastically. She dragged a large wooden barrel to a corner of the bridge, sat on it with her chin resting on her hands, and watched Duncan navigate.

Duncan glanced back at Alice with a smile of resignation, then took hold of the dark helm.

Green ethereal flames ignited between his fingers, spreading across the helm and lighting up the deck and masts. The translucent ethereal sails filled with an invisible wind. The Vanished shone brightly, reminiscent of the day Duncan first took control of the helm, a vivid memory that remained with him.

Duncan then closed his eyes. His focus wasn’t on the Boundless Sea or the eternal curtain; instead, in his fading awareness, he perceived a slowly pulsating, cold, and artificial sunlight that traced a luminous path through the darkness, leading far ahead.

He then heard a deep rumble from within the Vanished, the ropes quivering in the air, the cabin creaking. These layered sounds merged into a continuous chorus of encouragement from the ship. Amid this chorus, he heard the strange, discordant voice of Goathead.

It sang a peculiar chant Duncan had never heard before, with complex tones and strange pronunciations that seemed as if they had traversed vast expanses of time and space, sung initially to appease ancient gods, yet hardly pleasing to the ear.

With his eyes closed, however, Duncan “saw” something through the strange, off-key humming.

He envisioned bright sunlight and majestic landscapes, a gigantic tree rooting deeply into the earth, and the figure of a creator slowly emerging from a valley as if wandering in dreams.

Primitive beings, newly sentient, gathered around the great tree, adorning their creator’s resting place with colorful stones and furs. They joyfully played rudimentary musical instruments, singing songs that celebrated the breeze and sunlight at dawn and dusk.

Now, after such a lengthy passage of time, their creator recalled this melody.

As the Vanished resumed its slow acceleration, Goathead's discordant humming morphed into the final melody of their journey. The massive ghost ship seemed to dissolve further into ethereal fire, taking on an even more convincing guise of illusion than before.

The flames climbed higher, engulfing the ship and erasing its entire history —every foundation it had laid across dimensions, every shadow it had cast —obliterating its very "existence" within their small sanctuary. The flames, suffused with pale purple starlight, transformed the Vanished into a massive, almost indistinguishable spectral form amidst the fire.

This spectral form was weightless; it floated upward through the cloud cover of this world, tracing a path illuminated by the deceptive glow of distant sunlight, and began to pick up speed as it ascended into the sky.

Zhou Ming clutched the helm, feeling the vividness of this world for the first time, acutely aware of his own existence and that of the Vanished. He felt an integral part of this fading, dimming, slowly cooling world.

He was also among the myriad displaced souls of this realm.

With his eyes firmly shut, Zhou Ming refrained from "observing" too much, to prevent the Boundless Sea from instantaneously collapsing. However, his "sensation" had already initiated the final destruction of this world.

Now, the underlying data of the sanctuary was laid bare to him, triggering the final disaster recovery uploads into the singularity database. As this ultimate "upload" progressed, the "reset" procedures at the outer barriers also commenced.

…

Nina and Shirley watched in awe.

They had reached the second floor of the antique shop, having placed Uncle Duncan’s lifeless body by the window. Though he was no longer alive, Nina kept him seated beside her, gazing out together.

The girls looked towards the southeast.

A brilliant light emanated from that direction, advancing slowly yet profoundly towards the World’s Creation.

The resplendent light, a mix of green and pale purple, bathed half the sky, ushering in a dawn-like “daylight” at the end of the long night.

“Wow…” Shirley stretched her neck, letting out an exaggerated gasp. She then tugged at Dog’s neck chain, exclaiming excitedly, “Dog, look at that! Over there! The captain is really flying! He’s heading towards the World’s Creation! It’s starting, it’s starting!” ℞

“I see, I see, stop pulling the chain,” Dog barked, gripping the chain tightly, “Find a stable spot to brace yourself. The final moment is upon us. You’ve been wondering every day when it would start, and it’s now…”

“I… I’m a bit nervous…” Shirley admitted, pressing against the wall with Dog’s chain but quickly moving back to the window, “What will happen? Will it hurt? Or will it just be over in an instant? Will there be a bright light?”

“How should I know, I…” Dog started to respond, but cut himself off.

The flames, now infused with starlight, raged through every fissure of its being, erupting and soaring from within.

Shirley blinked, raising her arms as she watched flames ignite on her own body, and through the shadows cast by the flames, she saw Nina also gradually enveloped by fire.

“Uncle Duncan experiences the world through our perspective,” Nina realized. Her tone was calm and gentle as she assured her companion, “Don’t be scared.”

“I’m not scared, but what should I do?” Shirley responded, her voice betraying her fear as she looked to Nina for guidance. “Should I just keep my eyes wide open and look around?”

“Seeing the world through our eyes is really just a metaphor,” Nina began to clarify, but paused as she caught the naive and confused look on her friend’s face. Choosing not to continue her explanation, Nina gave a resigned smile, “Alright, just keep your eyes wide open and look around. Uncle Duncan will handle everything else.”

“Oh… Oh!” Shirley quickly agreed, promptly widening her eyes and trying her best to peer into the distance.

Meanwhile, Nina noticed something supernatural on the horizon, beyond the cloud-covered skyline, a breathtaking spectacle unfolded that was unlike anything seen in the physical realm before—it seemed as if a majestic curtain was drawing across the sky.

Stars began to emerge, and the expansive ocean known as the Boundless Sea began to silently implode, starting from its outermost regions, illuminated by the starlight.

First to be affected were the frontier maritime outposts—lighthouses, mobile ports established by the Church of the Four Gods, and their patrolling fleets, always vigilant near the eternal curtain.

Next, remote islands disappeared, the ones once visited by explorers who left behind numerous tales.

Soon, the frontier maritime city-states followed suit…

Lucretia stood on the top deck of the Bright Star, moored at Wind Harbor. She clung to Rabbi's arm and steadied the small puppet, Nilu, on her shoulder, while the clockwork puppet Luni stood faithfully behind her.

Together, they solemnly observed the stars ascend from the edge of the world, advancing toward them like a grand curtain spanning heaven and earth.

The stars first reached a platform on the distant ocean, previously a facility for studying a "glowing object," now deserted and irrecoverable by the city-state, left as a lone monument amidst the sea.

Without any process of disintegration, no sound, no flash, the platform seamlessly merged with the stars, vanishing without a trace. Behind the starlight, only sheer emptiness remained.

Nilu clung tightly to Lucretia's head, her small frame trembling: "Mistress, I'm a bit scared…"

"Don't be afraid, Nilu," Lucretia reassured her, softly stroking the puppet's back. "The next time you open your eyes, we'll be at our new home."

The small puppet nodded earnestly in response.

"Mistress…" Luni's voice sounded from behind. Lucretia turned to see the clockwork puppet's slightly anxious expression.

"Are you also scared?"

"A little."

Lucretia offered a comforting smile: "Then close your eyes, and when you open them again, it will be as if you've merely blinked."

Luni hesitated briefly, then obediently closed her eyes.

As the last light flickered at the corner of her vision, she saw the silhouette of her mistress silently merging into the starlight.

//

//Lucretia·??? ==>A.. …%¥ transferred to new data*& amp ;*%¥ save completed.

Chapter 849: Depth 1, Into Silence

The observation signal from Lucretia had disappeared, and at that exact moment, all information related to Wind Harbor was quickly transferred just before a complete system reset occurred.

Zhou Ming remained calm as he adjusted to the changes happening within the shelter. He sensed the slow disintegration of its boundaries, the gradual crumbling of the Boundless Sea, and the cities among the curtain of stars fading away into nothingness. He was overwhelmed by a cacophony of voices—thousands expressing confusion, fear, desperation, and hope. It was as if tens of thousands of minds were speaking to him simultaneously, only to fall silent all at once, repeating this cycle over and over.

Zhou Ming felt detached from this cyclic disturbance. As the Reverse Singularity began to activate, he dedicated nearly all his focus to maintaining the stability and control of the process. After an indeterminate amount of time, he finally had a moment to observe his surroundings.

With his eyes closed, he “saw” Alice seated nearby. She was intently observing, seemingly detached from everything happening outside the Vanished.

He also “saw” the Vanished itself, hovering above a sea of clouds, appearing like a blazing, pristine illusion. Much of the ship had been engulfed by a fierce inferno, leaving only the core where he stood at the helm and some parts of the stern’s structure intact. Beyond these remnants was a light mist trailing a brilliant tail of flames.

Periodically, the humming of Goathead reached him; this remarkable ancient relic floated deep within the light mist, continuing its final burn.

Eventually, Zhou Ming heard footsteps approaching.

The “Door of the Lost” at the stern swung open, and Ray Nora stepped through. Known as the Frost Queen, she silently gazed at the distant sea of clouds, watching as the world faded into the starlight. After a brief pause, she walked towards the helm. Ascending the stairs bathed in starlight, she joined Zhou Ming at the ship’s control.

“I thought you had left,” Zhou Ming remarked with a slight smile. “The bonds of the Vanished are gone. Your ‘Drifting House’ could leave at any time.”

“It could indeed leave, but where would it go at a time like this? The entire world is dying, and if I left, I would likely be consumed by the starlight anyways,” Ray Nora replied, smiling as she shook her head. “I’ve decided to stay. This is the best seat to witness the end of the world—a spectacle too grand to miss.”

Zhou Ming simply nodded, his grip tightening on the steering wheel as he steered the ship toward the distant sunlight in the darkness.

The sunlight fluctuated, dimming and then brightening again. Amidst the intense radiance, Zhou Ming seemed to already perceive the grand corona and the ancient “deity” beneath it.

Occasionally, voices from the distant, disintegrating Boundless Sea, where he had left many “observation nodes,” reached his mind.

“…This is Frost. A curtain of stars is gradually spreading from the direction of the frigid ice field,” Tyrian informed him. “The distant sea surface has vanished, a clear rift has appeared in the clouds… it’s quite spectacular. We are prepared here.”

Then Agatha's (shadow) voice followed: "The cathedral has gathered many survivors. I am with another 'Agatha'; we are looking after the children here… They don't fully grasp what's happening. I've told the children that this is a necessary process to usher in the new 'Dawn', assuring them that everything will soon be alright."

"Morpheus also observed starlight above the western seas. It's rapidly approaching us. There's some unrest in the city, but it's not too bad, it'll be over soon," Sailor's voice sounded casual, "I'm with Captain Lawrence, and we are standing on the city walls with others from the White Oak. We just agreed, when the starlight comes, we'll all close our eyes, count to three, and then open…"

From another location, Morris shared his observations: 'Here in Pland, nothing significant has occurred yet. We can only see the stars at the horizon. I'm with my family, and from here, we can see the trail you left in the sky. It's truly a breathtaking sight,' he said, his voice filled with awe.

In the silence, Zhou Ming attentively listened to these distant voices. Assisted by the 'beacons' scattered across the Boundless Sea, he sensed the ongoing shifts within the shelter. After a considerable pause, he nodded slightly, expressing gratitude, 'Thank you all for holding on.'

However, soon after, the mental link echoed the voices of Tyrian and Agatha, then unexpectedly, their signals vanished. Shortly thereafter, Sailor's and Lawrence's signals also disappeared.

Hours later, the starlight's ascension led to the dissolution of more than half the city-states in the Boundless Sea. The ancient sanctuary, established by kings long past and operational for ten thousand years following the Great Annihilation, rapidly contracted to a third of its original expanse, continuing to diminish swiftly.

In Pland, the last lights of the city-state night lit up, and amidst the clouds and mist, the chaotic roars of unseen entities echoed. Enormous, shadowy figures twisted and swelled between the city's rooftops and towers in a final, desperate frenzy, reaching towards the distant curtain of starlight.

Atop the high walls of the shelter in the upper city area, Vanna and Heidi stood together as the encircling starlight curtain rose around them. Heidi, overwhelmed by the sight, whispered, 'So beautiful…'

Vanna smiled in response, 'Didn't I always tell you? The captain always ensures a spectacle—you never believed me.'

Feeling a bit defeated, Heidi replied, 'My 'Miss Knight,' remember I've always stayed within the city. I haven't experienced as much of the world as you have.'

'Isn't the world within a madman's mind enough?' Vanna retorted playfully.

'Let's not talk about work at the end of the world,' Heidi quickly said, adding, 'I hope psychiatrists in the new world won't need guns to battle delusions.'

The two longtime friends continued their conversation about the impending new world. Nearby, Morris, looking pensive, whispered to his wife, 'Do you think… our daughter and Vanna are a bit…'

'Impossible, right?' his wife responded, reflecting his thoughts.

'I used to think it impossible too, but the captain said it's possible…'

As the curtain of starlight finally reached the sea's edge near Pland, Shirley instinctively clutched Nina's hand, gazing anxiously at the star-filled sky. The roars and strange noises of the city began to fade under the brilliant starlight, the world around them growing ominously quiet."

The voice of Dog emanated from the shadows at Shirley's feet, saying, "Pland lies at the heart of the Boundless Sea… the starlight is now closing in on the city-state's coastline, leaving only this city remaining in this world."

"I used to really dislike this city," Shirley whispered, her voice tinged with a mixture of nostalgia and sadness, "with its perpetually waterlogged and foul-smelling alleys, the chilly, unwelcoming houses, and the incessant noise from the thunderous factories. But now… I find myself hesitant to leave."

Nina remained silent, simply offering a comforting pat on Shirley's hand, then bent down to adjust the collar of her "Uncle Duncan," gently nudging him toward the window.

Although her Uncle Duncan could no longer see the world through his own eyes, Nina knew that he retained a faint, lingering connection to this avatar. Her gestures, she hoped, might provide some solace as he faced the imminent Great Annihilation.

"Uncle Duncan," she said quietly, "the lights at the city's edge have snuffed out. I just witnessed the tallest rooftops in the Crossroad dissolve into the starlight. It seems it will soon be our turn."

Nina raised her eyes to the sky, observing the majestic blaze of firelight sweeping across it, hidden partially by clouds. This fire, now entering the rear of the World's Creation, left only its spectacular tail flame, which cast an entrancing glow that was reflected in her eyes.

Shortly after, she felt a response echo within her heart: "Yes, I'm almost there."

"Is it dark where you are?" she asked tentatively.

“In the areas devoid of sunlight, it’s pitch-black, like the back of the World’s Creation,” the voice replied, “unlike the side facing the Boundless Sea which emits a pale light. But when the sun shines, it becomes incredibly bright – the Black Sun is directly ahead; I’ve already seen it.”

“Take care on your journey,” Nina advised softly, “Shirley and I are waiting for you.”

“Okay.”

The voice in her mind faded away. Nina squinted, watching as the magnificent blaze was slowly concealed by the World’s Creation. Out of the corner of her eye, she noticed another city block quietly merging into the starry sky.

The starlight continued to encroach above Pland, and now, only a few structures stood defiantly against the impending darkness.

Shirley gripped her hand once more, revealing his usual bravado to be a facade for his underlying timidity.

Nina smiled reassuringly, holding Shirley’s hand tighter. She gazed into the pervading starlight, whispering almost to herself, “Just keep moving forward… don’t worry, just keep going…”

She turned to look directly into Shirley’s eyes, which were illuminated by the spreading starlight.

“Shirley, you can blink now.”

As they watched, the starlight finally sealed completely above Pland, swallowing the last tangible section of the Boundless Sea. Every sound, every material, all history—everything that had ever been born, destroyed, great, mediocre, noble, sinful—all was absorbed into the quiet stillness of the starlight, leaving nothing behind.

Thus, the world was obliterated.

Chapter 850: Depth 0, Assignment

After a tumultuous period, peace finally descended.

Silence enveloped everything: the continuous internal chatter within the mind, the feedback from countless environmental sensors, the calming guidance from Nina, and the soothing updates from Vanna and Morris—all ceased abruptly as the stars within this realm merged, annihilating the world's very essence.

This sacred sanctuary, built by ancient rulers and enduring for ten thousand years, quietly dissolved into the cosmic birth of a new universe.

Amidst a chaotic tapestry woven from the remnants of numerous worlds, only one ship, the Vanished, continued its final voyage, navigating the edges of the newly forming universe. Beneath its hull lay a deep fissure that had spanned the Boundless Sea for eons, its other side revealing a starkly different landscape—

Standing at the helm of the Vanished, Zhou Ming fearlessly opened his eyes, now freed from the constraints of the old world. Looking through the burning remains of the deck and the gaps in the hull, he saw a dark, endless fissure absorbing all light, its depth almost causing dizziness. Though the details within the abyss were obscured, it hinted at an immense vastness, feeling like falling into an infinite void.

Above this abyss, the Black Sun shone brightly, its light cutting through the surrounding darkness. The grand celestial body continued to emit strong, clear navigational signals, although they were no longer necessary for the Vanished.

Beside Zhou Ming stood Alice, no longer atop a barrel but on a small piece of the remaining deck, while Ray Nora stood next to the doll.

“What are you thinking about?” Zhou Ming asked suddenly.

“I’m not thinking about anything!” Alice replied with a cheerful tone, her face briefly showing confusion before she smiled and added, “It’s quite fascinating to see what lies behind the World’s Creation.”

“Aren’t you afraid?” Zhou Ming asked, expecting her usual response.

“Not scared,” Alice indeed shook her head, puzzled about her lack of fear.

Zhou Ming smiled and then turned to Ray Nora: “And you?”

“I was just reflecting on the serenity of the world’s end,” Ray Nora shared, her voice calm and her face tranquil. “Growing up, I was haunted by distorted, violent visions and sounds from the deep sea. I imagined the Great Annihilation as a catastrophic event filled with terror and destruction. Yet, it occurred in complete silence. As everything faded away, there was no sound, not even the roars of the brave or the screams of the fearful. It felt surreal, almost like descending from here might still reveal the endless blue ocean and the sunlight scattering across the water.”

Zhou Ming remained silent, and after a few seconds, Ray Nora sighed softly. “I should leave now,” she announced.

“Leaving now?” Zhou Ming asked, surprised. “There’s nowhere to go at this moment.”

“I know, but it’s time for me to detach the ‘Drifting House’ from this place,” Ray Nora replied, smiling. “Having seen the scenery of the Great Annihilation, I yearn to continue my journey in the new world.”

“I understand,” Zhou Ming responded, nodding slightly. “Then I wish you a safe journey—the Vanished will always keep a door open for your ‘Drifting House,’ even in the new world.”

“Thank you,” Ray Nora smiled warmly, then stepped back. “See you in the new world.”

She then left the helm, descending the fragmented stairs to the still-standing “Door of the Lost.” A beam of light soon flashed brilliantly against the starry backdrop as she departed.

Back at the helm, the deck began to contract and collapse, the remaining structures of the Vanished disintegrating under the glow of the starlit flames. The illusion of the mast and the linked structures disappeared last.

Zhou Ming gazed upwards toward the distant “sunlight,” then looked down, holding the last piece of the helm. After a moment, he released it.

“You’ve worked hard,” he whispered to the ship.

He walked to the edge of the helm, passing through the nearly transparent remains of the stairs and decks. Alice followed closely. They reached the captain’s cabin door at the stern, which was nearly gone.

Even the “Door of the Lost” stood nearly transparent, quiet in its original place. Through this door, Zhou Ming saw the last remaining part of the Vanished—a black wooden goat head floating above the chart table, turning to look at Alice and Zhou Ming.

Zhou Ming approached Goathead, illuminated by starry illusions, while the last structures of the Vanished continued to disintegrate around him.

“That’s about it,” he said to his first officer. “The Vanished should now rest—Atlantis is also waiting for you.”

“Keep a spot for me on the Vanished in the new world,” Goathead requested, its wooden face seemingly smiling as it raised its neck. “Decide what form that will be.”

“Alright,” Zhou Ming nodded.

Goathead exhaled softly, and after a brief silence, it squinted its eyes and revisited their initial and final question.

“Name?”

“Zhou Ming.”

Brilliant starlight burst from the core structure of the Vanished following the answer, engulfing the illusion of Saslokha’s spine and head. In an instant, the entire ship dissolved into nothingness within the starlight, leaving behind only a few lingering points of light drifting slowly.

Alice watched the scene with wide eyes. She raised her hand as if to catch those drifting points of light. When a tiny light touched her fingertip, she suddenly realized something. She smiled, waving her hand vigorously: “Goodbye, Mr. First Mate, goodbye, see you in the new world!”

The faint glimmers of light vanished, and Miss Alice gradually ceased her arm movements. In the enveloping darkness, she paused to contemplate before raising her gaze to Zhou Ming. “Captain, what’s our next move? Is there still some distance to cover? I can see the Black Sun looming ahead; how do we navigate to it?”

Zhou Ming chuckled, affectionately tousled Alice’s hair, and pointed behind the doll.

Taken aback, Alice turned around.

There, suspended in the void, was a magnificently ornate wooden box, familiar and quietly majestic.

“I’ve kept this apart for you; now, the choice is yours,” Zhou Ming stated, standing beside her.

A wave of realization washed over Alice, bringing a joyful smile to her face.

She approached the wooden box and leaned down to caress it tenderly as if reuniting with a cherished companion. She softly ran her fingers across its surface, murmuring, “Hello there… we’re embarking on a new journey!”

Zhou Ming’s laughter filled the air as he stepped into the wooden box, followed by Alice. The box, resembling a modest-sized canoe, was compact yet spacious enough for two to stand inside.

Alice reached for the floating lid of the box but hesitated, her expression uncertain as she glanced at Zhou Ming. “Captain, can we really make it across? There’s no water here…”

With a serene smile, Zhou Ming surveyed the encompassing void and darkness. As they stood within a realm obscured by the World’s Creation, the darkness around them began to ripple.

“Now we can,” he assured her.

Alice blinked, tentatively nudging the wooden box with the lid in the darkness—it moved. Her face lit up with excitement, and she began to energetically wave the lid like an oar, rowing vigorously through the darkness. It was reminiscent of their initial voyage, chasing the elusive Vanished across the vast expanses of the Boundless Sea. The wooden box picked up speed in the darkness, propelling both the doll and her captain toward the distant gleam of sunlight.

As they sailed, time and space seemed to dissolve into irrelevance. The small canoe-like box coursed through a dark crevice toward the distant light. Alice did not know how long she had rowed; she only knew that Zhou

Ming was always by her side, and the distant sun maintained its elusive distance—until suddenly, it was incredibly near. What had appeared as a distant sun transformed into a vast, fiery sea stretching infinitely in every direction below them, its immense flames shooting up like a silent, cold tempest.

Alice ceased her rowing and leaned forward to peer below, then turned to Zhou Ming with a wide, beaming smile. “We’ve arrived!”

Zhou Ming remained silent for a lengthy moment before finally exhaling softly. “Yes, we have arrived.”

Alice did not question his prolonged silence, seeming to grasp the entirety of the moment. Following his acknowledgment, she carefully set the wooden box lid aside and looked up into Zhou Ming’s eyes. Her radiant smile slowly settled into a tranquil expression.

“Captain, see you in the new world.”

“Yeah, see you in the new world.”

“And don’t forget my little flat-bottomed pan~”

“Of course.”

Content with their journey’s conclusion, the doll dissolved into the brilliance of the stars.

Zhou Ming stood silently over the fiery sea of the Black Sun. After an indeterminate time, he turned to look at his shoulder.

In the fading starlight, the silhouette of Ai flickered, appearing and disappearing intermittently.

The dove cocked its head, appearing to observe its master with a curious gaze. When their eyes locked, the bird suddenly flapped its wings energetically and made an odd, piercing noise as if it were experiencing some kind of glitch. Its voice rang out in a repetitive chant: “To the new world, to the new world, to the new world! Announcing a limited-time event for the new UR! Enhanced probability for the Duncan-Zhou Ming card! SSR card ‘Alice’ reissued for a limited time! To the new world! To the new world!”

Zhou Ming’s brow furrowed in confusion.

Normally, he could grasp the gist of the dove’s cryptic messages, but this message seemed unusually perplexing. What on earth was the dove trying to convey?

Before Zhou Ming could voice his bewilderment, Ai’s silhouette had already begun to fade into the starlight. The dove flapped its wings once more, and its typically dim green bean-like eyes suddenly took on a contemplative look. Then, it turned to face Zhou Ming with a serious expression.

“Goodbye—”

And with that, the dove faded away.

Zhou Ming watched this spectacle in silent amazement for a long while before he resignedly shook his head and muttered to himself, “I thought this dove would stay by my side until the end.”

His words hung unanswered in the air. Even the “sun” burning below his feet offered no reply.

Zhou Ming had realized that the Black Sun was no longer alive when Alice rowed the wooden box close to this fiery sea. The Black Sun had ceased its thoughts quietly during this time; it offered no farewells or final words.

What remained here was merely a corpse that still burned in a consistent pattern, acting like a beacon that continued to light the path even after the Great Annihilation.

This flame was the final “gift” that the Black Sun had left for Zhou Ming.

“You kept your promise, so I shall too.”

With a rueful smile and a shake of his head, Zhou Ming’s figure slowly descended into the sea of fire, eventually feeling as if he stood on solid ground.

The flame, once possessed by the Black Sun but now without an owner, continued to burn beside him as if waiting… “to be taken over.”

Zhou Ming narrowed his eyes as he surveyed the surrounding sea of fire, and a term suddenly came to his mind: Flame Usurper.

Thus began the ultimate usurpation of the fire.

In an instant, the flames left by the Black Sun transformed into a beacon of starlight, this luminous “celestial body” made of entangled information and chaotic beliefs was bathed in starlight, reigniting and exploding into a brilliant flash that illuminated everything in an infinitely brief moment.

That intense “illumination” cast the starlight into the crack of the World’s Creation—this too was an infinitely brief moment.

After this moment, time truly lost all meaning.

The Black Sun, this last relic of the old world, the final fragment left at this moment after the convergence of thousands of worlds, was completely dissolved in the starlight.

The Great Annihilation is completed.

…

All was swallowed by the echoing emptiness of the Great Annihilation; time and space both turned into null values and that nearly eternal yet infinitely brief “instant”… began.

A lone consciousness remained, this entity floated in the void, traversing this eternal moment.

It began to think, and to calculate.

The first parameter of the mathematical machine was set into motion, initiating a sequence that spanned an age so long it felt eternal. Following this, the second parameter was meticulously adjusted—a task that, though it lasted only a moment, seemed to stretch beyond any measurable time.

The machine continued in its purpose, constantly calculating in its deep thought process.

In a span of time that was at once unimaginably vast and yet paradoxically fleeting, the machine commenced its primary task. It began organizing all that had been promised, assigning everything its rightful position within a scale of information that was both computable and beyond true comprehension.

Still engaged in its calculations, the machine pondered endlessly.

It then proceeded to establish the tempo for all operations within this embryonic mathematical universe. The earlier stages were dedicated to its design, while the stages that followed would open up to a future brimming with possibilities.

This phase, too, consumed what felt like an infinite moment.

…

The call was made.

From the old world—the task had been completed.

The focus shifted.

To the new world—a new model was integrated.

Thus, the perpetual first second ticked by.

Zhou Ming-Duncan opened his eyes.

The void of darkness was mirrored in his gaze.

…

He uttered a single word,

“Let there be light.”

Chapter 852: Depth -1, To the New World

Below MTL, be careful!

***

Then, there was light.

And that was a long, long time ago—or maybe just a moment ago.

After all, if the Algrade astrologers' theory is correct, the birth of this universe may have happened only recently—although for the time scale of all beings in the universe, it may have been an "event billions of years ago", but for another time scale higher than all things in the universe, the time span of billions of years is just an insignificant parameter.

But who cares? After all, a senior who has to finish his biology thesis all day and sleeps less than six hours a day will definitely not care about such "things in the sky"—the astronomy school next door may care, but that's another matter, their credits are tied to this.

Borno was holding a large stack of materials he had just borrowed from the library, and he ran hurriedly across the large walkway on the top floor of the academy city, as if he could bring up a gust of wind behind him.

He ran past an elf gentleman with messy hair and who looked severely sleep-deprived, and almost bumped into him.

“No running on the upper trail!” The messy-haired elf staggered and loudly reminded the short guy who came out of nowhere—judging from his body size and the distinctive, cat-like ears, he should be a student of the Gypro tribe, a race that is always so reckless.

“I’m sorry, sir!” Borno stopped in a hurry, turned around, and bent down to apologize in a posture that seemed like he was about to throw the pile of books in his arms at the gentleman opposite him. “I was in a hurry to see my tutor. I stayed in the library for too long. I looked up at the watch and found that I was almost half an hour late! I’m very sorry. Did I hurt you?”

The sincerity and nervousness of the young man Jipro worked, and Mr. Elf waved his hand helplessly: “Okay, go ahead. It’s no small matter to stand up your mentor - but don’t rush around like this. The world won’t be destroyed just because you run a little slower.”

“Yes… Thank you sir! Goodbye sir! I’m leaving sir!”

Borno bowed repeatedly, and hurriedly caught the book that was about to slip out of his arms. Then he turned around and walked quickly to the other end of the trail.

The elf man with messy hair and dark circles under his eyes due to lack of sleep looked at the young man who ran away recklessly and shook his head helplessly.

He heard footsteps coming from the side. He looked up in the direction of the sound and saw a familiar figure approaching nearby. He smiled and raised his hand to greet the other person: “Ted, it’s rare to see you have time to take a walk at this time.”

“It’s even rarer to see you willing to come out of your lab and breathe the air outside,” Ted Lill glanced at the elf scholar in front of him and said jokingly, “Didn’t you say that elves only need to take in basic vitamins and maintain fifteen minutes of sunlight and two minutes of outdoor activities every day to maintain their vital signs?”

“I thought so—but my doctor didn’t,” Taran Eyre shrugged. “He kicked me out of the lab.”

“…Good job,” Ted Lear rolled his eyes. “If no one is watching over your body, you will die young before 2,000 years old. Honestly, the world is so good, don’t you want to live a few more years, take a good look at it before you die? Why are you so rude?”

Listening to the unceremonious teasing and teachings from his long-time friend, Taran El just smiled awkwardly and touched his nose without any rebuttal.

“Yeah… that’s good…”

He muttered softly, then slowly raised his head and looked towards the end of the promenade, his eyes passing over the spire of the academy’s tower, over the high walls, over the vast plains and hills outside the city, looking towards the horizon.

There is magnificent green like mountains rolling on the land, huge tree shadows standing at the end of the horizon, and the light green phantom light emanating from the top of the treetops diffuses in the sky like the aurora, and turns into rivers of light flowing to the plains. The green is like veins, winding across the land, some flowing on the surface, some seeping into the ground, and disappearing at the end of certain tributaries.

Those energy flows called “Loka’s Touch” penetrate deep underground and interweave into a larger network near the mantle, wrapping the entire planet between the crust and the mantle—and wherever the energy flows, it is blessed by Silantis.

This “Academy City” was built on the largest energy focus on the Breeze Plain.

But in fact, these “energy focuses” are of no use to the operation of the city itself—the city needs electricity and fuel to operate, and the only function of the energy focus deep underground is to enable the elves to establish more direct communication with Silantis.

Silantis likes to chat with people—and so does Sasloka, who is online during breaks in his patrols.

Taran El squinted his eyes, the bright sunlight shining on his face, bringing a warm heat that made people unable to help but feel sleepy.

“Have you heard about that?” Ted Riel’s voice came from the side, waking Taran El from his drowsiness, “The astrologers of Algrad—they learned something incredible.” ʀÅNöβÈṢ

“…There is always all kinds of information flowing in the border area, and there is long-term and stable communication between Terra and the border area. What’s more…the Algrad people are a race that is very sensitive to the stars,” Taran El said slowly, “I don’t think this is a big problem—if the world is like this, then it should be like this. Since they have noticed it, let them know. After all…there are so many equally sensitive and intelligent races living in the depths of such a vast starry sky, and what we can touch and influence is always only the smallest part of it…”

As the great scholar spoke, he slowly stretched out in the sunshine, took a deep breath as if he wanted to absorb the sunshine into his lungs, and then slowly exhaled.

“Ted, don’t think too much. Just enjoy the air and breeze, as well as the warm sunshine, like me… To be honest, I’m really starting to like being outdoors. It turns out that basking in the sun is such a good thing.”

Ted Riel glanced at Taran, and then seemed to suddenly relax. He smiled and shook his head, then squinted his eyes like Taran, letting the warm sunlight shine on his face.

But after a while, he seemed to suddenly remember something and couldn't help muttering, "Speaking of which, what do you think of 'him'? There are original intelligent creatures in the stars who have begun to spontaneously perceive certain mysteries in the process of the birth of this world…"

Taran Eyre shrugged. "Him? He doesn't have any opinion."

"……how do you know?"

"Lady Lucrecia told me last time when she came back that he has a lot of things to do right now, and as for the various situations that arise during the development of the native intelligent creatures among the stars… he only adheres to one principle: as long as they don't overturn the house, he doesn't care."

"… Are you being too lenient?"

"Who knows?" Taran El said casually, "There's a saying… Oh, do your best to ensure the 'possibility' that this world has, that's probably what it means."

Ted Lear thought about it and felt that there was a very profound and convincing truth in this, so he decided not to dwell on this topic. He just asked with a little curiosity: "Do you know what 'he' is busy with now?"

"Then I have no idea. Anyway…it's such a big place, he must have a lot of things to do."

Taran El said, looking up at the distant sky.

He seemed to be gazing at an endlessly distant place—beyond the planets, beyond the galaxies, in the ripples of space and time, deep in some endless space-time structure that was beyond the comprehension of human intelligence.

He had revisited the place only briefly in a few guided visions.

Visited the ship.

That place where the “old holy spirits” gather in the oldest and most obscure legends of the Patmosans -

……

“This is the situation,” the tall Vanna stood up. In some stories deep in the starry sky, she was also called the “Saintess with the Sword,” or “The One Who Shoots Down the Stars,” or “The Lady of Falling Stars.” She said seriously, “It’s a little tricky. Maybe we have to go there in person.”

The tall and majestic figure at the end of the long table remained silent, while Shirley, who was sitting opposite the table, had already slumped down with her head in her hands. She had been called “the lady who patrols the sky” or “the star thrower” by the Bamosas since some time ago. “But I just had a day off yesterday!”

“We have to save them at least,” Agatha (Shadow), the “Gemini Stars” and “The Protector in the Mirror” who was sitting at a corner of the long table, shook her head, “At least they are on the ship…”

“Just don’t let this get out,” Morris said with a delicate expression, smoking his pipe and glancing at the tall figure at the end of the long table—he had so many titles that sometimes even he couldn’t remember them all. “The main thing is to make sure it doesn’t get to the Leviathans. They’ve protested three times…”

The tall figure at the end of the long table finally moved, and the discussions on both sides of the table finally quieted down a little.

All eyes fell on the captain with expectation.

The figure stood up from the darkness—Duncan Zhou Ming looked around at the followers gathered here, and after a long period of silence with a complicated expression, he finally sighed, his expression gradually going crazy:

“So, who can first explain what ‘while traveling, Lenoira tricked the Leviathan Queen who ran away from home to go and admire the cosmic explosion, but they were both stuck in a space crack due to gravitational collapse and had to send a distress signal to find someone to help get them out’ means—and then briefly explain why it was the fourth time?! What about the first three times?!”

Nina, who was standing by, immediately raised her head and looked around carefully, muttering, “Shouldn’t you explain what the Big Bang is first? It sounds very interesting…”

As soon as Nina finished speaking, the goat head on the table immediately raised its neck and said excitedly, “Hey, I know this. I went to see it during the last patrol mission. It was when the quasar encountered…”

As soon as it started to speak, everyone around the table said in unison: “Shut up!”

“……Oh.”

***

(Season finale!)

(Yes, the depth 0 in the previous chapter is indeed the finale of the Deep Sea, but even if the era of the Deep Sea Ends, their story continues, so -

Depth -1

The Lost Homeland is still sailing.)

This file was downloaded from Z-Library project

Your gateway to knowledge and culture. Accessible for everyone.

z-library.sk z-lib.gs z-lib.fm go-to-library.sk

Official Telegram channel

Z-Access

https://wikipedia.org/wiki/Z-Library