远瞳 著

起点中文网 阅文集团旗下网站
阅文集团 CHINA LITERATURE

深海余烬
远瞳 著
起点中文网
阅文集团
CHINA LITERATURE

Deep Sea Embers

Yuan Tong

Translated by bcat00

Mystery | Cosmic Horror | Psychological | Xianxia

SYNOPSIS

On that day, the fog blocked everything.

On that day, he became the captain of a ghost ship.

On that day, he stepped through the thick fog and confronted a completely subverted and fragmented world.

The old order had vanished, strange phenomena dominated the endless seas beyond civilized society, and isolated island city-states and fleets of ships challenged the sea that had become the last ember of lights for the civilized world. All of this while the shadows of the old days were still stirring in the deep sea, waiting to devour this world that was about to die.

But for the new captain of the ghost ship, there was only one question he had to consider first — Who knows how to steer this ship?!

Chapter 1: That Day, the Fog Was Thick

Endless thick fog rolled outside the window. It was so dense that it felt as if the whole world had vanished beyond it. Only a dim, muddled daylight pushed through the fog into the room, leaving this quiet place in a half-dark, half-bright gloom.

Inside the slightly messy studio apartment, Zhou Ming sat hunched over his desk. The clutter on the table had been roughly pushed aside, and his haggard face hovered over a notebook as he wrote quickly:

“Seventh day. Nothing has changed. The thick fog still covers everything outside the window. The window is sealed by some unknown force… The whole room feels as if something has ‘cast’ it into some kind of anomalous space…

“There is no way to contact the outside world. There is no water or power. But the lamp stays on, and the computer can still start up—even though I have already pulled out its power cord…”

A faint sound of wind seemed to blow from the direction of the window. Zhou Ming, who was bent over his diary, suddenly lifted his head. A small light came into his tired eyes. But a second later he saw it was only his imagination. Outside that window there was still only the pale, clinging fog. A dead, silent world lay there, coldly covering his tiny home.

His gaze swept across the windowsill. He saw the wrench and hammer tossed there at random. They were the traces of how he had tried to leave the room in the past few days. Now those hard, clumsy tools just lay there in silence, as if mocking his helpless state.

After a few seconds, Zhou Ming's face became calm again. With this calm that felt like an anomaly, he lowered his head once more and went back to his writing:

"I am trapped, with no idea how to get out. In the past few days, I even tried to tear up the roof, the walls, and the floor. But even when I used all my strength, I could not leave the slightest mark on the walls. This room has become like… like a box that has been 'cast' together with space itself, with no way out at all…

"Except for that door.

"But what is beyond that door… is even more wrong."

Zhou Ming stopped again. He slowly read over the words he had just written. Then he flipped through the diary a bit carelessly, looking at what he had recorded in the last few days—heavy, gloomy lines, meaningless wild thoughts, impatient doodles, and bad jokes he wrote when he forced himself to relax.

He did not know what use any of this writing had, or who might ever read this nonsense in the future. In fact, he was not even someone who usually kept a diary. As a middle-school teacher whose free time was very limited, he had never had much energy to spend on something like this.

But now, whether he liked it or not, he had plenty of spare time.

After one sleep, he had found himself trapped in his own room.

Outside the window was thick fog that would not fade. The fog was so dense that he could not see anything but fog itself. It was as if the whole world had lost the cycle of day and night. The same dull and sleepy light filled the room all twenty-four hours. The window was locked. Water and power were cut off. His phone had no signal. No matter how much noise he made in the room, he could not draw any help from the outside.

It was like an absurd nightmare, a dream where everything moved against the laws of nature. But Zhou Ming had already used every method he could think of to make sure of one thing: there were no illusions here, and no dream. There was only a world that was no longer normal, and a self that still seemed more or less normal for now.

He took a deep breath. His gaze finally rested on the only door at the far end of the room.

It was just an ordinary, cheap white wooden door. The calendar he had forgotten to take down last year was still pinned to it. The handle had been worn bright from use. The doormat in front of it sat a little crooked.

That door could open.

If this sealed, twisted room was a cage, then the cruelest thing about the cage was that it kept a door that could be pushed open at any time. It tempted the prisoner inside, again and again, to push it and leave. But beyond that door was not the “outside” Zhou Ming wanted.

Out there were no old yet familiar stairwell halls, no bright sunlit streets filled with lively people, none of the things he knew.

There was only a strange, unsettling foreign place. And “over there” was also a trap he could not escape.

But Zhou Ming knew he did not have much time left to hesitate. The so-called “choice” had never really existed from the very beginning.

His food stores were limited. Only the last quarter remained of his few large containers of mineral water. He had already tried every method of escape and every way of calling for help inside this sealed room. Now there was only one road left to him: he had to get ready and go to the other side of the door to seek a single slim chance to live.

Maybe he would even get a chance to find out what had caused this bizarre and desperate supernatural situation.

Zhou Ming took a light breath, lowered his head, and wrote the last few paragraphs in the diary:

"…But no matter what, the only choice left now is to go to the other side of the door. At least on that strange ship I can still find some food. And the exploration and preparations I did over there in the past few days should be enough to let me survive on that ship… even though the preparations I could make there were actually very limited.

"Last of all, to those who come after. If I do not come back, and one day in the future some kind of rescue worker opens this room and sees this diary, please do not treat what I have written as an absurd story—it really happened. As chilling as it is, there really was a person named Zhou Ming, trapped inside this mad and eerie space-time phenomenon.

"I have done everything I can in this diary to describe all the Anomaly phenomena I saw, and to record every effort I made to escape. If there really are any 'later ones', please at least remember my name. At least remember that all this once happened."

Zhou Ming closed the diary, tossed the pen into the holder beside him, and slowly stood up from behind the desk.

It was time to leave, before he sank completely into helplessness and a dead end.

But after a short moment of thought, he did not walk straight to the only door that might lead to the "outside". Instead, he went directly to his bed.

He had to face the “foreign land” beyond the door in the best state he could manage. Right now, he was not ready, especially in his mind.

Zhou Ming did not know if he would be able to fall asleep. But even forcing himself to lie on the bed and empty his mind was better than going “over there” while he was too mentally tired.

Eight hours later, Zhou Ming opened his eyes.

Outside the window there was still a chaos of fog. The light that knew neither day nor night carried a heavy gloom that pressed on him.

Zhou Ming ignored what lay beyond the window. He took some food from his dwindling stores and ate until he was almost full. Then he walked to the full-length mirror in the corner of the room.

The man in the mirror still had messy hair and looked quite worn out. There was nothing special about his looks or presence. But Zhou Ming kept staring stubbornly at himself in the mirror, as if trying to burn this image into his mind forever.

He stared like that for several minutes. Then he spoke in a low voice to himself, as if talking to the man inside the glass: “Your name is Zhou Ming. At least ‘on this side’, your name is Zhou Ming. You must remember that at all times.”

Only after that did he turn and walk away.

When he came to the all-too-familiar door, Zhou Ming took a deep breath and set his hand on the handle.

Besides the clothes on his body, he carried nothing extra. He took no food and no weapon for self-defense. This was the lesson left by his earlier “explorations”—he could not bring anything through this door except himself.

In fact, he even felt that he had to put a question mark behind this “self” as well, because…

Zhou Ming turned the handle and pushed the door open. A mass of gray-black fog that swelled and shrank like some kind of The Veil appeared before his eyes. In that shifting fog, he already seemed to hear the sound of waves in his ears.

As he stepped through that layer of fog, a slightly fishy, salty sea wind blew against his face. The vague, unreal sound of the waves became clear. A gentle rocking rose under his feet. After a brief spell of dizziness, Zhou Ming opened his eyes. Before him was a wide, empty wooden deck, tall masts standing under dark clouds, and a gently heaving sea beyond the rail, its edge nowhere in sight.

Zhou Ming lowered his head. What he saw was a body stronger than the one in his memories, a captain’s uniform whose fine workmanship and high cost were clear at a glance but whose style was completely unfamiliar, a pair of big, knobby hands, and, held in those hands, a black flintlock pistol with a classical, elegant look.

Yes, even his own “self” needed a question mark.

Chapter 2: the Vanished’s Captain

This was not the first time Zhou Ming crossed this door to the “other side”.

Ever since a few days ago, when Zhou Ming woke up and found that some kind of “phenomena” had trapped him in his room and a strange, heavy fog had covered the whole world, he had discovered the bizarre place on the other side of the door.

After all, that door was now the only exit from his “room”.

He still remembered the confusion and helplessness the first time he opened the door and saw a deck outside. He remembered even more clearly the shock and panic the first time he looked down and saw that his body had changed. But after that, in order to find a chance to break out of his situation, he had forced himself to boldly explore “this side” several times. Now, although he still had no idea what had really happened to him, and still did not understand what was going on with this strange, huge ship that had appeared outside his apartment door, he had at least gained some experience and a rough understanding of the ship.

As in the past few times, Zhou Ming forced himself, in as short a time as possible, to shake off the dizziness brought on by passing through the door. Then he immediately checked the condition of this body. He examined the short pistol in his hand, comparing every detail with his memory. In the end he confirmed that the things he carried were the same as when he last left the deck.

“…Looks like every time I pass through this door, the body ‘switches’ seamlessly… If only I could put a camera out here on the deck. Then I could check whether this body changes when I open the captain’s cabin door and go back to the apartment…

“Too bad objects from the two ‘worlds’ can’t pass through the door, so there’s no way to bring a camera over…

“But the phone in my apartment did record what happened when I passed through the door from that side. I really did walk through that black fog… so it really is that the body ‘changes’ into this form when it goes through the fog?”

Zhou Ming muttered to himself. He knew that standing on the deck and talking like this would look a bit ridiculous to anyone watching, but he had to make some noise. On this vast, empty, eerie ghost ship… he needed something to prove that he was still “alive”.

A fishy, salty sea wind blew across the deck and fluttered the dark blue captain’s coat of unknown material on his body. Zhou Ming let out a soft sigh, but he did not walk deeper across the deck. Instead, he turned around and looked at the door behind him.

He put his hand on the doorknob.

If he turned the knob and pushed the door inward, he would see a thick gray-black fog. If he walked through that fog, he would return to the single apartment where he had lived for many years.

He tightened his grip and yanked the door outward instead.

The slightly heavy oak door creaked. Behind it was a dim cabin. In the unclear light he could see fine tapestries hanging on the walls and shelves full of ornaments. There was a wide chart table in the center of the room. At the far end of the room there was another small door, with a wine-red carpet laid in front of it.

If he pushed the door inward, he would return to his apartment. If he pulled it open, it led to the captain's cabin—and the latter was clearly the "normal facility" on this ship.

Zhou Ming stepped into the captain's cabin. As he passed the doorway, he habitually glanced to the left. A full-height mirror was fixed to the wall there, and in it he clearly saw what "Zhou Ming" looked like now.

It was a tall man with thick black hair and a stern short beard. His eye sockets were deep, and his face alone carried an air of authority that did not need anger to be frightening. He looked to be over forty, but his bold features and heavy gaze blurred any sense of age. The well-made captain's uniform he wore made the man in the mirror look even more special.

Zhou Ming rolled his neck and then made a face at the mirror. He thought of himself as an easygoing, friendly person, and the image in the mirror really did not match his temperament. But he quickly gave up, because he felt that the man in the mirror did not look any friendlier. Instead, he looked less like a stern captain and more like a psychopathic serial killer…

As Zhou Ming was doing all this, a faint clicking sound came from the direction of the chart table. He looked over without surprise and saw a wooden Goathead statue on the table slowly turning its face toward him. The dead wood seemed to come alive for a moment, and the obsidian eyes set in its wooden face stared gloomily this way.

The memory of his panic the first time he saw this eerie scene flashed through his mind, but Zhou Ming only curled the corner of his mouth. He walked toward the chart table, and the wooden Goathead on the table turned its neck bit by bit with him. A hoarse, gloomy voice came from its wooden body: "Name?"

“Duncan,” Zhou Ming said calmly. “Duncan Abnomar.”

The wooden Goathead’s voice instantly changed from hoarse and gloomy to warm and friendly: “Good morning, Captain. I’m very glad to see you still remember your own name. How is your mood today? How is your body today? Did you sleep well last night? I hope you had a good dream. Also, today is a fine day to set sail. The sea is calm, the wind is just right, cool and comfortable, and there are no annoying navy ships or noisy crew members. Captain, do you know what a noisy crew member…”

“You are noisy enough already,” Zhou Ming said. Even though this was not his first time dealing with the eerie Goathead, he still felt his brain throb. He glared at the thing almost viciously and squeezed the word out between his teeth: “Quiet.”

“Oh, oh, oh, of course, Captain. You like quiet. Your loyal first mate, second mate, chief sailor, sailor, and lookout all in one knows this very well. There are many benefits to keeping quiet. There was once a man in the field of medicine… or maybe philosophy, or architecture…”

Now Zhou Ming felt not only his brain but even his bronchi starting to tremble. “I mean, I order you to be quiet!”

The moment the word “order” left his mouth, the Goathead finally fell silent.

Zhou Ming let out a small breath of relief and stepped over to sit in front of the chart table. For now, he was the “captain” of this empty ghost ship.

Duncan Abnomar. A strange name, a tongue-twisting surname.

The first time he stepped through that layer of gray-black fog and onto this ship, these facts had appeared in his mind. He knew that this body he had on “this side” was named Duncan. He knew he was the ship’s master. He knew the ship was on a long voyage far beyond imagination. He knew these things, and only these things.

The memories left in his mind were so vague and thin that only those key fragments remained. All other details were blank. It was as if he knew the ship had some astonishing voyage planned, but had no idea where it was going. The ship's original master—the real "Duncan Abnomar"—seemed to have died a very, very long time ago.

And the things left in Zhou Ming's mind felt more like the last, deepest impressions a ghost captain had left in the world after completely dying.

Instinct told Zhou Ming that there was something very wrong behind this "Captain Duncan" identity. Especially since there were supernatural phenomena's on the ship—like a talking wooden Goathead—the mystery around Captain Duncan might mean some danger he had never even imagined. Yet he had to keep using this name in order to move safely around the ship.

Because, just like the wooden Goathead just now, certain things on the ship were constantly trying to verify the captain's identity.

Even the ship itself seemed to be checking the captain's identity at all times.

It felt like some kind of safety measure, as if the ship's captain might forget his own name at any moment, and once he forgot it, something extremely terrible and dangerous would happen. So the ship had "checks" set up everywhere.

Zhou Ming did not know what would happen if "Captain Duncan" forgot his name, but he was sure that nothing good would come of giving the wrong name.

After all, even the wooden Goathead on the chart table alone did not look like a kind soul.

But as long as he wore the name Duncan Abnomar, everything on the ship seemed fairly mild and friendly.

Anyway, none of them looked very smart.

Zhou Ming—or maybe he should call himself Duncan now—ended his short moment of thought and memory, then looked at the enchanted sea chart spread out on the table.

However, there were no recognizable routes, markings, or land on the enchanted sea chart at all. There was not even an island. On the rough, thick sheet of parchment he could only see large patches of gray-white clumps constantly surging and rolling. Those gray-white, fog-like things seemed to cover whatever routes should have been on the paper. The only thing visible in the center of the enchanted sea chart was the faint silhouette of a ship looming in the thick mist.

In the several decades of his life, Duncan (Zhou Ming) had never had any experience sailing out to sea, but even someone who knew nothing about sea charts would know that a “normal” enchanted sea chart should not look like this.

Clearly, like the wooden Goathead on the table, this enchanted sea chart was also some kind of supernatural item. Duncan just had not yet figured out how to use it.

It seemed that once the captain’s attention finally stayed on the enchanted sea chart, the Goathead that had been quiet on the table for a long time started moving again. It began to make clicking sounds as the wood rubbed, and its neck twisted back and forth in small movements. At first it turned rather carefully, but soon the clicking grew impossible to ignore. In the end, its whole head started shaking on the base as if someone had turned on a vibration mode.

Afraid that if it kept twitching it would start drilling sparks into his chart table, Duncan finally could not help glancing at it. “Speak.”

“Yes, Captain. I must repeat: today really is a fine day to set sail. The Vanished, as always, is waiting for your orders! Shall we raise the sails?”

Chapter 3: Lost at the Border

The wooden Goathead's hard, dark face stared at Duncan sitting behind the chart table, and the obsidian eyes seemed to shine with an eerie light. In fact, the thing had no ability to show expressions at all, but Duncan clearly read a kind of expectation on that wooden face.

In fact, this was not the first time the Goathead had urged him to "set sail". Every time he came here, the Goathead would urge him like this.

He even felt that the whole ship kept urging him, pushing him to end this blind drifting at sea as soon as possible and set sail back onto the right course.

But Duncan fell silent. Shadows passed over his naturally imposing face. As he pondered in silence, he clearly saw two problems:

First, he was the only person on the entire ship, and the ship was insanely huge. As a sailing ship, the vessel called "the Vanished" was at least one hundred and fifty to two hundred meters long, by Duncan's rough estimate. To handle such a giant, you would need dozens, even hundreds of experienced sailors. How was he supposed to sail it alone?

Second, even putting those professional issues aside, there was still one key problem blocking his voyage—he did not know how to sail a ship at all.

Duncan grew a little anxious. He tried to imagine what would happen if he asked this eerie and noisy Goathead in front of him to teach him how to steer a ship. After imagining it, he felt even more anxious.

But the Goathead did not know what its captain was thinking. It just asked: “Captain, do you have any concerns? If you are worried about the Vanished’s condition, you can rest easy. The Vanished is always ready to sail with you to the world’s end. Or are you worried that today is an unlucky day to depart? I know a little of divination. Which kind of divination do you trust more? The stars, incense, crystals, all are fine. Speaking of crystals, do you remember…”

Duncan forced the muscles in his face to stay tight, holding back the urge to fight the Goathead to the death. He spoke in a low voice: “I’ll go to the deck and check the situation first—you stay here and be quiet.”

“As you wish—but I must remind you, the Vanished has been drifting blindly for far too long. You must take command of her as soon as possible and bring this voyage back on course…”

The Goathead finished speaking, and with more sounds of wood scraping, it finally returned to its original posture.

At once, Duncan felt as if the whole world had quieted down.

He let out a soft breath, and the throbbing in his head slowly calmed. Then he picked up the flintlock pistol on the table and rose to leave the captain’s cabin.

He had found this old-looking flintlock pistol while exploring the ship. Along with it, he had also found a single-handed sword, which now hung at his waist. These two items were his only sense of security when he moved around the ship.

During his explorations over the past few days, he had spent a long time roughly learning how to use them—even though, up to now, he had not seen any living creature on the ship besides himself.

Talking “objects” did not count.

The fishy, salty sea wind blew into his face, and his slightly irritated mood calmed with it. He stepped onto the deck outside the captain's cabin and instinctively looked up at the sky.

Thick dark clouds still covered all the sky he could see. There were no sun, moon, or stars in the clouds, only a muddy daylight covering the endless sea.

This scene had lasted a long time. In fact, ever since the day Duncan came to the ship, this was the only sky he had seen. It even made him wonder if this world had no normal weather at all, and whether these packed clouds were the eternal sky over this sea.

Duncan turned around and saw the door of the captain's cabin standing quietly there. On the beam above the door, a line of words was carved in letters he did not recognize. When he focused his gaze on them, however, their meaning appeared clearly in his mind:

"The Lost Ones' Door."

"The Lost Ones' Door… the Vanished, hm," Duncan muttered to himself, then added with a hint of self-mockery, "This ship really does have a good name."

Then he walked around the captain's cabin and climbed the stairs along the edge of the deck to the upper deck at the stern. There was a wooden platform here, the place with the best view on the ship aside from the lookout.

A heavy black ship's wheel waited quietly on the platform for someone to take the helm.

Duncan frowned. For some reason, he suddenly felt a sense of urgency and restlessness, and it seemed to appear out of nowhere the moment he saw the wheel.

He had never felt this way in any of his previous visits here!

As if answering the anxiety in his heart, a sudden, chaotic wind swept across the deck, and the calm sea around them instantly broke into waves. The wind and waves were still not enough to truly affect the huge Vanished, but alarms rang in Duncan’s mind. The next second, driven by his instincts, he looked toward the bow.

On the sea directly ahead of the Vanished, between the hazy sky and water, a boundless high wall of white fog rose up as if from nowhere, like a barrier reaching the heavens, making his eyes widen at once!

It was white fog that looked as if it wrapped around and cut off the entire world, a sheer wall linking sky and sea and rolling toward them. More than its frightening size, what made Duncan (Zhou Ming) even more alert was that it instantly reminded him of the endless mist outside the windows of his apartment.

The Vanished was sailing straight toward that fog wall!

Duncan did not know what that dense fog was, or what lay inside it, but instinct told him it was extremely dangerous. His survival sense told him that being swallowed by that fog would be anything but good!

He rushed instinctively toward the platform with the helm—but a huge sense of helplessness fell over him at the same time. Even if he held the wheel, how could he alone steer this giant ship away from that fog wall?

But he still moved by instinct to stand before the wheel. Almost at the same moment, he heard a hoarse, gloomy voice come from a copper tube next to the wheel that was connected to the captain’s cabin. It was the Goathead’s voice—and this time, the eerie thing actually sounded a bit panicked:

“Captain, a Border Collapse has appeared ahead. We are approaching the limits of the Mortal Realm! Please adjust our course at once!”

Hearing the Goathead’s panicked voice, Duncan nearly burst into a curse—adjusting the course was easy to say. Why didn’t it conjure a hundred or so good brothers who could sail a ship and have them run this thing?

Then he looked up toward the masts and saw only a few bare poles standing on the deck. A wave of sorrow rose in his heart. Forget raising sails; the truth was that the ship did not even have sails. Those poles were completely empty!

In his agitation, he did not even have time to think carefully about the strange words the Goathead had just used. His instincts alone made him reach out and grab the wheel in front of him, which for some reason seemed to be trembling slightly.

For the first time in days, he had actively placed his hand on the Vanished’s wheel. Before this, the ship’s eerie condition and the Goathead’s constant urging had always left him full of doubts and resistance toward “taking the helm”. Now, he finally had no time left to hesitate.

He gripped the wheel tightly. His mind was blank, and he had no time to even think about how he could, alone, command an empty ghost ship.

The change came in the next instant.

A sound like mountains roaring and seas crashing exploded in Duncan’s mind. It was as if ten thousand cheering people stood on the shore sending off a ship, as if hundreds of shouting sailors on the deck were calling the captain’s name, with desolate sea songs and invisible stormy waves mixed in between.

A mass of green flame rose at the edge of his vision. Duncan instinctively looked at his hand and saw emerald fire burst from the Vanished’s wheel and sweep toward him with terrifying speed, spreading over his whole body in the blink of an eye.

In the blazing fire, his flesh-and-blood body suddenly became hollow and ghostly. The captain’s uniform turned tattered and ragged, as if it had been soaked in seawater for dozens or hundreds of years. Under the flesh that had suddenly become as unreal as a spirit form, Duncan could vaguely see his own bones. Flames danced on those crystal, jade-like bones, and the undying fire flowed through his body like water.

Yet he felt no pain or burning at all. In the roaring flames, he only felt his senses spreading out in all directions.

The fire swept down from the helm platform, flowed over the deck, over the rails, and over the masts. The flames wove together like a net, then rose from the deck as if breathing, climbing along the lonely masts and finally weaving between sea and fog into huge sails like misty gauze.

The Vanished had raised her sails at the collapsing border of the Mortal Realm.

Chapter 4: Spirit Realm Drag Racing

ghostly green flame burned fiercely across his body. Flesh and bone turned into a translucent spirit form in the blaze. In this flowing fire, Duncan gripped the helm of the Vanished, and his senses seemed to spread along the flames, reaching out until they covered the entire ship.

So it turned out the ship did not need a crew at all.

The Vanished could raise her sails by herself. As long as the captain held the helm, she could set off at any time.

When the eerie green flames had first flared up, Duncan had panicked for a moment. But in the past few days of exploration he had already seen more than one supernatural phenomenon on this ship. Those experiences forced him to calm down, and in those most critical seconds he did not let go of the wheel in his hands.

Now he finally felt sure that this flame was some kind of power that did not harm him. Whether his body could return to normal later or not, at least for now, this power of the flame was helping him control the ghost ship under his feet.

The cheering roar that had been surging through his mind faded like a receding tide. Duncan felt clearer-headed than ever. The Vanished sent him all kinds of indescribable sensations, like an extension of his own limbs. He still did not have the knowledge and experience a proper captain should have, but at least now he had the ability to control this ship alone.

The gauzy, mist-like spirit-form sails swelled on the masts. Numerous auxiliary jibs and side sails began to adjust their angles on their own. The airflow above the sea was in complete chaos, yet those spirit-form sails seemed to draw a unified driving force out of the formless, confused wind. The massive Vanished ended her aimless drifting and began to steady under the push of her sails.

Duncan tried turning the wheel in his hands. The solid feedback of force flowed into his mind. He felt the huge hull under his feet finally begin to turn, trying to move away from the endless bank of mist ahead.

But the turn still did not seem fast enough. That boundless wall of dense fog kept creeping closer. From the brass speaking tube beside the wheel came Goathead's sharp cry: "Attention, we are approaching the limit of the Mortal Realm… We are about to fall into the Spirit Realm! Captain, we need—"

"I'm working on it!" Duncan shouted, cutting Goathead off. "Instead of squawking down there, why don't you think of something useful to do!"

Goathead fell silent at once. Just when Duncan thought it had finally quieted down, the tube suddenly carried its hoarse, shrill, downright creepy scream again: "Come on! Come on! Come on!"

Duncan: "…?"

In that moment, everything around him suddenly felt unreal. He had accepted the strange things that had happened to him, accepted the supernatural power on this ship, even accepted that he was being slow-cooked over a low green flame. But he had never imagined that Goathead, which had seemed so eerily dangerous from the very start, would suddenly act like this… That cursed thing had always been unsettling, but right now it was just too bizarre.

But the rolling fog that kept closing in gave Duncan no time to think or complain. The Vanished had already begun to swing around at high speed—judging by her massive hull, this turning speed was practically a drift. Yet the distant fog bank seemed to be consciously chasing its prey. Thin shrouds of mist spread from its edges, and the haze expanded so fast that in almost an instant it covered all the space around the Vanished.

The moment thin mist rose from the sea's surface, Duncan clearly felt something strange change in the surroundings. The daylight suddenly dimmed. The once-blue seawater somehow filled with countless thin black threads. Those black threads floated up from beneath the surface like tangled strands of hair and, at a speed visible to the naked eye, stained the entire sea pitch black.

Shapes seemed to loom everywhere in the thin fog.

"We've fallen into the Spirit Realm!" Goathead's noisy, eerie cheer finally stopped. Its shout now sounded as if it came from an extremely distant place, laced with countless low, fine whispers, as if many malicious voices were circling around Duncan. "But the Vanished has not completely dropped yet—Captain, hold the helm. Before we sink into the abyssal Deep Sea, the Vanished still has power to hold her course. We can still get out!"

"That depends on me knowing where to steer!" Duncan growled under his breath. His voice mixed with the crackle of burning green flame, as if it came from hell itself. "I've lost my sense of direction!"

"Instinct, Captain, instinct!" Goathead shouted through the tube. "Your instinct is more accurate than the marks on the enchanted sea chart!"

Duncan: "…"

A wave of helplessness surged up in him, but Duncan no longer had the strength to argue with a cursed Goathead. Since the thing said to trust his instinct, he would just charge ahead with it—

Following the faint feeling that lingered from before the mist rose, he gripped the wheel hard and turned it with all his strength toward the direction he believed in.

The Vanished howled from top to bottom in a series of eerie wails. Her massive hull traced a startling arc across the now completely black sea. Gale winds roared, mist swirled, and in the dim light and fog, something at the edge of Duncan's vision seemed to slowly emerge.

A second later he realized it was a ship—a white vessel a size smaller than the Vanished, with a black smokestack rising from the middle of her hull.

At the end of the Vanished's beautiful arc, that ship which had suddenly appeared from the fog was heading straight toward them—or rather, the Vanished was heading straight toward her.

Only one howl echoed in Duncan's heart: "Damn it, drag racing in the Spirit Realm just went wrong!"

He had explored this bizarre world for so long without seeing another living person. Why did a ship have to pop up now, of all times? What were the odds of this kind of two-way collision course?

…

Gales howled. Huge waves towered. The Boundless Sea was unleashing its terrifying might to the fullest. Before this natural power that could tear even an supernatural apart, the White Oak was squeezing the last bit of strength from her steam turbines to fight against death.

The gray-haired captain, Lawrence Creed, stood in the wheelhouse. The sturdy walls and glass windows of the bridge gave him no sense of safety at all. He gripped the helm with both hands, and the White Oak's dying groans and convulsions seemed to surge straight into his mind through the gears and linkages behind the wheel.

Through the wide windows he clearly saw incredible waves rising outside the hull. But more terrifying than those waves was the strange dense fog rising and spreading over the distant sea, and the faint black lightning flickering inside it.

The White Oak was the most advanced steamship in the world, but no matter how advanced a machine was, it could only ensure surging power in “normal” seas. Now, however, the ship and her captain were facing the collapsing border of the Mortal Realm and the bone-deep chill spreading up from the bottom of the world, from the foul palaces of those evil Gods.

“Captain! The priest can’t hold on much longer!”

The first mate’s shrill shout came from the side. Lawrence heard a murky, hoarse echo in the man’s voice. He then looked toward the front of the bridge. On the prayer stand, the censer was sending up an ominous purple-black flame. The respectable and loyal clergyman in the deep-blue robe sat before the censer, his whole body shaking. Blood covered his mouth and nose, and madness and clarity alternated constantly in his eyes.

Lawrence’s heart sank.

He knew that respectable priest was still standing on the side of humankind, using his last bit of devout faith and his pure, holy soul to resist the call from the depths of the world. But this endurance was already at its limit. The purple-black smoke rising from the censer was proof that the corruption had already broken through the prayers.

Once the priest collapsed, every sober mind on this ship might turn into a door leading to the Abyssal Deep Sea, or even to Subspace.

“Captain!”

The first mate's voice came again from the side, but Lawrence cut him off. The middle-aged captain's face was filled with resolve: "Temporarily shut down the Holy beacon. We sink into the Spirit Realm!"

The first mate froze, dumbfounded. This man, who had spent half his life making a living at sea, seemed unable to believe his ears: "Captain?!"

"We sink into the Spirit Realm—this way we can at least avoid the fiercest wave of the Border Collapse for ten minutes, and the priest will have a chance to recover," Lawrence repeated the order in a tone that allowed no doubt, adding only a brief explanation. "Carry out my command."

The first mate opened his mouth, as if wanting to say more, but then he gritted his teeth: "You're the captain!"

The crew began to carry out the captain's orders at once. Lawrence, still steering personally, took a deep breath. Deep in the hold, the Holy beacon was slowly going dark. He could feel the invisible protective field around the White Oak rapidly weakening. Without the sacred relic's protection, the ship was sinking bit by bit into the layer between the Mortal Realm and the Abyssal Deep Sea—the "Spirit Realm" in between.

Thin mist appeared on the surrounding sea, and the water slowly turned black.

It was very dangerous, but in history there had been ships that returned from a Spirit Realm state to the Mortal Realm. As a member of the Explorer Association, he had read countless books on this subject and all kinds of "survival guides" written by survivors.

How much worse could it get? All he needed to do was let the White Oak hide from one wave of the storm at the edge of the Spirit Realm, then use the surging power of her advanced steam turbines to pull off a risky "Spirit Realm drift". If luck still favored him, he could lead his crew back to the Mortal Realm.

Then he would hurry to hand that damned "Anomaly 099" in the cargo hold over to the Governor of the city-state of Pland, and for the rest of his life he would never again wade into the authority's muddy waters.

It could not get any worse.

Lawrence comforted himself like this.

Then he saw, on the suddenly darkened sea in the distance, a three-masted sailing ship a full size larger than the White Oak abruptly appear. With a certain unstoppable momentum, it carved a breathtaking arc and came crashing straight toward them…

Captain Lawrence stared blankly ahead.

"…Fuck."

Chapter 5: Crossed Paths

The enormous shadow rolled in to crush them, and everyone on the White Oak saw this moment that would stay with them for the rest of their lives.

It was an ancient, awe-inspiring three-masted warship. In this age when steamships were no longer anything special, that sailing warship emerging from the dense fog looked so old it might have stepped out of an oil painting from a century ago. Her masts rose high, her sides were steep, and ghostly green fire burned across her black wooden hull like restless souls. Enormous sails billowed in the void, filled with howling phantoms and layers of flame. A scene like this appeared only in the most terrifying shipwreck legends, even on the dreadful Boundless Sea.

“We’re going to crash!!!”

Some of the crew cried out. These men, who made their living at sea and were known for their bravery and roughness, still lost their composure before such a giant. They shouted and ran. Some tried to find shelter on the deck, some clung to anything that could hold them in place, and some even dropped to their knees amid the pitching waves to pray with unprecedented devotion, chanting the names of the storm goddess Gamona or Bartok, the Lord of Death.

On the Boundless Sea, the Gods’ divine blessing had already faded, but only these two True Gods still had the power to watch over all their children alike.

But not all the crew lost their calm. The ship's first mate immediately looked to the captain he trusted most. He knew that sailing the Boundless Sea was full of danger, and an experienced captain was always the key to deciding a ship's fate. Lawrence had set foot on the ocean for more than thirty years. The old captain, now over fifty, might not be as strong as in his youth, but the experience that had kept him alive on this vast ocean might still win everyone a slim chance to live.

The ship emerging from the dense fog clearly was not a normal vessel sailing the world of the Mortal Realm. It looked more like something that had risen from the Spirit Realm, or from somewhere "deeper". If it was some kind of supernatural manifestation, then maybe they could use some supernatural power to fight it.

Old captains who sailed the Boundless Sea all had at least some experience dealing with supernatural manifestations.

Yet the first mate saw only fear and shock on the captain's face.

The old captain held the wheel without moving, as if he had not even noticed that the entire ship was already swallowed by the shadow. He stared fixedly at the oncoming hull, the muscles of his face so tight they looked carved from stone. At last he forced out a few words through his teeth, colder than the wind on the Frost Sea: "…It's the Vanished…"

"C-Captain?!" The first mate was startled by the name drifting into his ears. Like everyone who made a living on the Boundless Sea, he had heard that name from many older, more experienced, and more superstitious crewmen. "What did you say?! That—"

"The Vanished!!!"

Captain Lawrence seemed not to hear the first mate at all. He only clutched the White Oak's wheel with all his strength and let out a hoarse roar, as if he wanted to scream at something. Almost as soon as his shout fell, the towering hull of the Vanished finally touched the White Oak's bow.

Almost all the sailors screamed.

Yet the earth-shaking impact they were braced for never came. The gigantic ship wreathed in green flames passed through like a vast phantom, its roaring blaze sweeping across the White Oak's deck. Thick hull, gloomy cabins, dim corridors, a keel and beams all burning with fire… The sailors stared in terror as they watched themselves crash into the phantom of that ghost ship, while the green flames burning on the ghost ship swept past them like a net of fire.

Lawrence also watched that blaze howl toward him, but before it reached him, he first saw it sweep over the first mate in front of him. The first mate's body suddenly turned into an illusory spirit form within the unreal flame, and the bones inside that spirit form burned like firewood. He also saw the priest by the prayer stand ahead. The flames on the priest flickered weakly, as if the God behind him was still using a thin trace of divine blessing to shield him from being devoured by the Vanished.

Then the flames reached Lawrence as well. He saw his own body undergo the same change. A powerful sense of weariness, obedience, and fear flooded his whole being. The ocean amulet he wore next to his body began to work, a feeling of heat and coolness alternating to barely keep his reason intact. With what little clarity he had left, he "passed through" the Vanished's cabins and corridors.

Gloomy, oppressive cabins rushed toward him and then swept past. Ropes mottled with rot and barnacles coiled around ancient wooden pillars that burned with green flame. He saw a vast cargo hold, where all kinds of uncanny objects that should have been buried in the Deep Sea lay quietly.

He saw a luxurious cabin with a wooden Goathead set on the table in its center.

That Goathead turned, gazing coldly into Lawrence’s eyes.

At last Lawrence used all his strength to lift his head. He saw the figure holding the helm. Beside the classic ship’s wheel stood a tall figure in a black mariner’s uniform, as imposing and terrifying as the master of a nightmare. That figure ruled all the ghostly flames, and even the sea already sunk into the depths of the Spirit Realm seemed cowed by his presence, torn open behind him.

Lawrence closed his eyes in resignation. He knew he was already part of the Vanished now. That nightmare captain needed sacrificial victims to feed his endless emptiness and loneliness.

But the next second, he forced himself to open his eyes again. It felt as if all the courage and madness of his life had gathered into these few moments. Recalling what he had learned from books and legends, he looked at the terrifying captain standing on the Vanished with an attitude as frank and calm as he could manage.

“You don’t need to take everyone—take me and let my crew go.”

But the tall figure did not answer. He only turned his gaze over coldly. There seemed to be a hint of curiosity in his eyes, as if he were wondering why a tiny mortal captain dared to bargain with him.

Lawrence finally could not hold back and let out a roar: “They all have wives and children!!”

The figure standing on the Vanished finally reacted. He stared in Lawrence’s direction and seemed to say something, but just then a loud roaring rose from the side. In the howl of wind, Lawrence only heard a vague noise and could not make out a single word.

The answer from the Vanished was blown away by the roar of the waves—

“What did you say?! The wind’s too loud, I can’t hear you!!”

The next second, a huge clamor crashed into Lawrence’s ears, full of wind, waves, and the shouts of sailors outside the door. Out of the corner of his eye he saw emerald flames fading quickly, and the Vanished’s last lingering phantom dissipated from the air like fog.

Lawrence sucked in a deep breath, then noticed that his hands, which the green flames had burned away before, had returned to normal. Everyone else in the bridge had also turned back into flesh and blood. The devout priest was lying by the prayer stand, gasping for breath and constantly chanting the holy name of the storm goddess Gamona. The ominous purple-black smoke in the censer slowly dispersed, and pure white smoke rose from the brass lid.

It took Lawrence a long time to steady his breathing. Then he looked around in doubt, as if he could not believe that nightmare was really over, until the first mate’s voice came from the side: “Captain! That ship—the Vanished has left!”

Lawrence looked dazed. After a few seconds he finally muttered to himself: “…He actually spared us?”

The first mate did not catch it for a moment: “Captain? What did you say?”

“Captain Duncan…” Lawrence murmured without thinking, then slapped himself as if he had accidentally spoken some forbidden word. He suddenly raised his head to look at the first mate. “Roll call, now! See who’s missing on the ship!”

The first mate nodded at once and moved to leave, but Lawrence immediately called him back: “And see if there’s anyone extra on board!”

The first mate froze, then understood. A trace of fearful suspicion appeared in his eyes. He took a deep breath, quietly whispered the name of the storm goddess, and then rushed out onto the deck.

On the White Oak, still sailing in a Spirit Realm state, the assembly bell rang like a death knell.

Chapter 6: The Missing “Cargo”

The assembly bell rang. After the sharp peal of the bell came the messy, panicked footsteps of the sailors, while Lawrence stayed in the bridge with the second mate and the priest, Mr. Ron, who still had not caught his breath.

The old captain looked out at the sea through the window. The White Oak was still at Spirit Realm depth. Fog coiled over the sea outside the rail, and the water was still black as ink. But the storm had stopped, and the terrifying Vanished had disappeared. It gave a person the illusion that the storm, and even the collapse of the Mortal Realm border, had all been brought by that ghost ship, and now all the disasters had gone away from the White Oak along with that ship.

Lawrence thought of the terrible legends about the Vanished and Captain Duncan Abnomar. He thought of the fleet swallowed by the Mortal Realm border more than a century ago, and of the ships that had sunk into the Abyssal Deep Sea, after encounters with the Vanished. Suddenly he felt that this was not impossible at all.

But no matter what, the Vanished had left, and the surrounding waters had briefly returned to calm. Although they were still at dangerous Spirit Realm depth, at least he and his crew had a chance to catch their breath.

Next, Lawrence had to find out exactly what the Vanished had taken from the White Oak, or what it had left on board.

And he had to find out as soon as possible.

As long as there were hidden dangers, he did not dare to let the ship surface into the Mortal Realm. Certain things brought out from the Spirit Realm could cause terrible corruption in the Mortal Realm. But if they stayed too long at Spirit Realm depth, he and his crew would still suffer irreversible effects.

Listening to the noise coming from the deck, Lawrence suddenly lifted his head from his thoughts. He looked at the priest, who was sitting before the censer and whose face looked a little better, and asked with a very serious expression: “Mr. Ron, how stable are we now?”

The priest coughed twice, then took a small, finely made spirit compass from his robe. Its surface was engraved with many symbols of the sea and holy signs. With a snap, he pressed open the metal lid. The pointer on the spirit compass began to spin wildly, then finally stopped and settled in one place.

“We are staying on the surface layer of the Spirit Realm, a bit closer to the Mortal Realm. The influence from the depth of the Abyssal Deep is very weak…” The priest watched the pointer on the spirit compass and suddenly looked a little puzzled. “Strange… we are completely stable here. With the sacred relic shut down, there is almost no tendency to sink any further… cough, cough…”

“Maybe that one ‘hit’ from the Vanished knocked us onto a safe route instead,” Lawrence said with a wry smile, shaking his head as he tried to use a cold joke to lighten the mood. “I heard there are subtle balance points in the Spirit Realm that let things from the Mortal Realm avoid the pull of the deep layers…”

“Captain, that joke was far too cold,” the priest said, coughing twice again. Although he had caught his breath, his condition was still far from good. “Cough… in any case, what happened today must be reported to the Church. The appearance of the Vanished is never a small matter. For the past decades there have always been reports of encounters with the Vanished, but afterward they were all proved to be just the crew's nonsense, or group hallucinations caused by Visions going into a runaway state. But today we truly saw it with our own eyes… Goddess above, once you return to Pland, you had better be ready for a long time without sailing again."

"I understand. Neither the Church nor the city-state authority will allow a ship that has just suffered a Visions disaster to go back to sea. It is for everyone's safety. And I have more than the Church to report to: the city-state, the Explorer Association… sigh, and my terrible wife…" Captain Lawrence pressed a hand to his forehead, let out a long sigh, then waved his hand. "Enough about that. You need to rest now. Until we return to port, this ship will need the Goddess's blessing."

The priest nodded lightly, and very soon, the first mate, who had only just left, returned to the bridge.

"There is no one missing and no one extra on board," the first mate reported at once before the captain could even ask. "I personally checked the sailors assembled on deck and went to the boiler room to check the artificers who stayed there. They could all accurately recite the name of the God they worship. They are alive, no doubt about it."

"Not a single person missing?" Lawrence widened his eyes. This should have been good news, but he could not believe the report. "What about the Holy beacons?"

"The sacred relic is normal too," the first mate answered at once. "The navigator is preparing incense and oils, waiting for your order to restart the sacred relic."

Lawrence listened, torn between shock and doubt, and could not help muttering softly again: "Did he really spare this ship?"

“Good luck smiled on us, Captain,” the first mate said, spreading his hands. “We did not lose anything. Maybe that terrifying ghost captain was just passing by. He might have only crashed into us by accident.”

“Do you believe that yourself?” Lawrence glared at his first mate. “If good luck really smiled on us, we would never have run into…”

He had only spoken halfway when hurried footsteps suddenly sounded outside the door. A moment later, someone pushed the bridge door open. The boatswain appeared before Lawrence, dripping with sweat. The tall man’s face was full of fear.

“Captain! Anomaly 099 is gone!”

The bridge fell silent at once. Everyone stared at one another. But for some reason, after a brief moment of shock, Lawrence suddenly felt as if a weight had lifted from his heart.

Good. After an encounter with the Vanished, the ship had finally shown that something was wrong. That, at least, felt right.

But he quickly controlled his expression. As he walked toward the door, he hurriedly told the first mate to take the wheel, and ordered the boatswain to lead the way.

Hurried footsteps echoed through the corridors of the White Oak. Soon, guided by the boatswain, Lawrence reached the deepest part of the steamship.

A special compartment appeared before his eyes.

The door of this compartment was covered in dense occult studies symbols. The heavy, pitch-black door looked as if it had been cast from a single block of black iron. The mysterious symbols stretched from the edge of the doorframe all the way out into the corridor, faintly forming some kind of closed cage meant to bind whatever was stored in the room.

Lawrence glanced at the door and confirmed that neither it nor the surrounding symbols showed any sign of damage. Then he looked up. The “sacred relic room” that held the Holy beacon was directly above the sealed vault. That beacon was the key to keeping the ship from the influence of the deep layers, and it also served as the second safeguard that maintained the sealed vault. Even while shut down, it should still have kept the vault’s barrier intact.

Yet with both layers of protection intact, the contents of the sealed vault, the most critical cargo the White Oak was escorting on this voyage, Anomaly 099 – the Doll, the “spirit coffin” – had disappeared.

Lawrence took a deep breath, stepped forward, opened the sealed vault’s door, and pushed the heavy slab wide.

Inside the sealed vault, the lights were bright. The gas lamps hanging from the four pillars lit the center of the room with almost no shadows. But the “cargo” that should have been placed there had vanished without a trace. Only a few crisscrossing chains were left, along with some gray-white ash scattered on the floor around them.

The boatswain’s voice came from behind Lawrence: “According to the containment rules for Anomaly 099, the lights in this room must stay on, and every two hours a crew member comes in to tighten the chains around the spirit coffin and scatter bone ash on the floor. But when that… ghost ship appeared, everything turned chaotic. The sailor on duty did not come in on time. He was about seven minutes late, and when he arrived, he found that Anomaly 099 was gone…”

“Being only seven minutes late would not push that thing into a runaway state,” Lawrence said, frowning and shaking his head. “At most the containment would weaken and act up. In the worst case, the coffin would be running around inside this room. The layers of seals here and the restraint from the Holy beacon are not for show. Right now, the problem is that it has disappeared. The cargo has left this ship. That has nothing to do with that sailor."

The boatswain looked a little nervous. "Then you mean…"

"It must have been the Vanished," Lawrence said in a deep voice. "That 'captain' took Anomaly 099 away…"

He paused for a moment and let out a soft sigh. "Maybe we should feel lucky. The Vanished only ever takes what it wants. That captain came for Anomaly 099, not for our lives."

The boatswain looked at his captain's face, then at the empty sealed vault. After a long time, he finally asked hesitantly: "Then… we have lost such an important piece of cargo. How are we going to explain it to the city-state authority…"

Lawrence glanced at the boatswain and slapped his shoulder hard.

"The Vanished counts as a calamity. We have maritime insurance."

"…Will the insurance company pay for that?"

"If they do not pay, we will have the Explorer Association put out a new bounty on the Vanished…"

"Captain, are you not being a bit anxi…"

"Shut up."

Chapter 7: Doll

The blazing green flames were slowly fading, and the sea around them was beginning to calm.

After confirming with Goathead that the Vanished had left the dangerous waters and that they could now sail on their own, Duncan took his hand off the dark helm. He lowered his head. What came into view was his body, restored to flesh and blood, and the deck of the Vanished, returned to normal after the green flame went out.

Yet in some unseen way, he felt that many things had changed.

He could feel that the moment he had grasped the Vanished's wheel, something had shifted. The emerald flame had bound him to this ship, and even to this sea. Even though the flame had now retreated, he could still feel that invisible link and sense every detail of the great vessel beneath his feet.

Duncan slowly closed his eyes. He heard faint whispers coming from the deep, dim corridors inside the Vanished, whispers that carried a strange sense of closeness. He saw that the consecrated lantern in the captain's cabin had lit itself at some point, a ghastly white light flickering inside its glass shade. He heard the sound of waves beating against the hull, and under those waves there seemed to be deep eyes watching. But whenever he tried to find the source of that gaze, it hid itself, as if it had a will of its own…

Duncan opened his eyes and let out a light breath. The spirit form sails on the Vanished's masts, thin as gauze and mist, billowed in answer. He walked toward the stairs leading up to the deck, and the ropes beside the stairs writhed to either side, opening a path for him.

He understood now. Only after he chose to take the wheel had he truly become the captain of this ship.

"Captain, we are rising from the edge of the Spirit Realm and will soon return to the Mortal Realm," Goathead's voice came from beside him, but this time it was not through the brass pipes used for communication on the ship. It appeared directly in Duncan's mind. When it spoke of serious matters it sounded much more solemn, and far less noisy. "We were lucky. At our deepest we only brushed the bottom layer of the Spirit Realm. We were almost untouched by the influence of the Abyssal Deep."

Mortal Realm, Spirit Realm, Abyssal Deep Sea, and, deeper still, Subspace… These strange words, which had appeared before him again and again, floated through Duncan's mind. He knew they pointed toward the true nature of this eerie world, but he still did not know what they really meant.

However, when he listened to Goathead call him "Captain", Duncan always felt a subtle change in its tone. He even suspected that now, even if he revealed the identity of "Zhou Ming", Goathead would still obey his orders. This was the change brought by taking the wheel and successfully returning from the green flame.

But after a brief hesitation, he still did not rashly try it. Nor did he ask Goathead about the Spirit Realm, the Abyssal Deep Sea, or Subspace.

If it had been a few days earlier, he really would have sunk into anxiety and unease, and would have been desperate to figure out his situation. Now, he did not seem to be in such a hurry.

In this world there were other “people”, other ships, a society with order, and other civilizations. That alone was enough for him to grow many hopes for the future, and even to form some plans, though they were still quite vague.

As his thoughts wandered, Duncan recalled the details of the encounter with the ship that had suddenly emerged from the thick fog. He remembered the ship’s striking smokestack, and the mechanical structures that had appeared directly in his mind when it crossed paths with the Vanished.

“That was a mechanically powered ship… while the Vanished looks like a sailing warship from an earlier age…” Duncan muttered to himself. “But it was not completely a mechanical ship either…”

There were compartments on that ship whose purpose he did not understand, laid out like sites for some sort of ritual. On the keel he had seen many strange patterns and symbols. They looked like decorations, but went far beyond what decoration should need.

“Goathead,” Duncan called suddenly. He did not know Goathead’s real name, so he instinctively used the name in his mind. “When we ‘crossed’ that ship just now, the man who looked like the captain was shouting at me. What did he say?”

Goathead seemed not to care at all how the captain addressed it. It accepted the name happily and answered at once: “The wind and waves were too strong. I did not hear clearly.”

“You did not hear either?” Duncan frowned. “…I kept feeling that his expression was so tragic, like he was ready to die together with me. Whatever he was shouting should have been very important.”

“Wanting to die with you is a normal reaction for humans, especially for sailors at sea. It is nothing to make a fuss about. And their shouts before they, like ants, try to shake a giant tree are even less worth your attention…”

Goathead’s answer sounded perfectly natural to it. Duncan, who was walking up the stairs to the deck, almost missed a step. His mouth twitched in shock. “Wanting to die with me is humans’ normal reaction?”

As soon as he said it, he felt that something was wrong. It sounded like he was exposing flaws in his identity as “captain”, revealing how little he knew about “himself”. Maybe the green flame had drained him too much, or maybe the feeling of merging with the Vanished had dulled his caution. Whatever the reason, it made Duncan tense at once. Yet Goathead seemed not to notice at all.

“They fear you. That is normal,” Goathead said, his tone even sounding a bit proud. “Anyone who sails the Boundless Sea should fear you, just as they fear those old Gods and the Shadows in Subspace. Speaking of Shadows, do you know that a great engineer – or maybe an agronomist, or a gourmet – once said…”

Duncan wisely did not take up the topic. He was worried that if the conversation went on, he would not be able to keep up the act. [Of course, the main reason was that he really did not want to talk to Goathead. Once someone responded, its chatter grew at a geometric rate.] And in the next second, something else on the deck drew his attention.

“…What is that?” Duncan stood at the edge of the deck, staring in astonishment at the thing by the door of the captain’s cabin.

It was a wooden box a bit longer than a person, built with very fine craftsmanship. Unknown dark wood had been joined together so tightly that no seam showed and then reinforced with metal that looked like gold. Along the edges of the box he could see complex carved patterns, like writing, or like pictographs that had been deliberately twisted. This box was definitely not something from the Vanished. Duncan had not seen it when he left the captain's cabin earlier.

After a brief silence, Goathead's voice sounded: "…I do not recognize it, but it should be spoils of war…"

"Spoils?" Duncan did not react at first. He walked around the box twice. "Why does this thing look like a coffin, only much fancier than a normal coffin… Wait, spoils? You mean this thing was 'taken' from that ship just now?!"

"A successful hunt, Captain," Goathead said in a very serious tone, with something that sounded like flattery mixed in. "You always return fully loaded from every voyage. This is just your usual performance."

Duncan opened his mouth without thinking. He felt that he had never planned to take anything from that ship. How did this count as a hunt or as "returning fully loaded"?

But then he thought again. Saying that out loud might not fit his image as "captain". More importantly, that mechanical ship had already disappeared into the thick sea fog. Thinking of that white-bearded captain's eyes, almost bursting with rage as he glared at him like a man ready to die together, Duncan felt there was no way to send this thing back. He could only swallow all his words.

He stood before the ornate wooden box that looked like a coffin and noticed that the lid seemed loose. It looked as if it would open with a single pull.

After hesitating for a moment, he placed his hand on the lid of the box. At the very least, he had to figure out what his little "Spirit Realm joyride" had brought onto the ship.

His body was stronger than he had imagined, and the lid was lighter than he had thought. With just a little force, the dark lid lifted, opening a crack, then swung fully open under his hand.

Duncan stared into the box, dumbfounded.

“A person?”

Inside the box lay a beautiful young woman. Her silver-white hair spread inside like liquid mercury. Her features were flawless, and she carried a faint air of noble detachment. She wore a gorgeous purple-black court dress, and her hands were folded on her chest, as if she were in a long sleep.

Perfect, like a Doll.

“No, wait. This really is a Doll!”

As he looked closely, Duncan suddenly noticed the inhuman structure of her joints.

Chapter 8: the Sun

A doll. A doll so delicate and lifelike that Duncan almost failed to tell it was not a real person at first glance. She lay quietly inside the ornate wooden chest, like a lady sleeping in a spirit coffin, waiting for someone to wake her.

Duncan really felt she would open her eyes in the next second.

But it was only an illusion. The doll just lay there in the chest, not reacting to anything around her.

Duncan watched this strange… “thing” with wary care. A doll by itself was nothing unusual, but her face looked too close to a real human, and that coffin-like wooden box gave him a gut feeling of danger. When he thought about how this chest had appeared on the Vanished for no reason at all, it was no wonder he became so alert.

After watching for a long time, Duncan finally felt sure that the gorgeous Brother doll in the chest was not going to suddenly jump up and give him a fright. Only then did he relax a little. He frowned and asked Goathead: “What do you think is going on here?”

“This should be the important cargo that ship was escorting earlier,” Goathead answered at once. Before, it had said it did not recognize the strange wooden chest that had suddenly appeared on deck, but its experience with matters at sea was clearly richer than that of Duncan, this fake captain. “There are symbols on the outside of the chest that point to a God, and there are bolts around it for fastening chains. That may mean it used to be under some kind of seal. Carrying a sealed object across the Boundless Sea is extremely risky. That ship must have had some backing."

"A seal?" Duncan's eyelids twitched. He looked at the chest lid, which he had already pushed fully open. When it arrived on the Vanished, the lid had already been broken, which was why he had been able to move it so easily. He did not understand much about seals and that sort of thing, but he was sure whatever seal this thing once had was now gone. "So this thing is dangerous?"

"It is very dangerous to those fragile ordinary people, but I do not think it can threaten you," Goathead said. "An Anomaly that can be sealed by human skill is not something that could resist Captain Duncan's power."

Duncan stayed silent, his face serious, but his thoughts churned.

Goathead's flattery sounded nice enough. If he really had been this "Captain Duncan", he might even have believed it. But he was not, so inside he was panicking.

Because Goathead's words had made it clear that the doll lying in that coffin was a "dangerous item"! It was only harmless to the real captain!

Even though he now carried Captain Duncan's name, and even seemed to be using the man's body and some of his power, Zhou Ming had a clear idea of his own limits. He did not believe this alone made him the same as the "real Captain Duncan".

He still knew far too little about this world, this ship, and even the body he now used.

On top of that, he had sharply noticed a new strange word in Goathead's speech just now—"Anomaly".

Anything out of the ordinary could be called an anomaly. It sounded like an ordinary word, but the way Goathead had stressed it made him faintly sense that, here, this word had some special meaning.

Maybe in this world, the word “Anomaly” did not just mean something “unusual”. It also pointed to a certain category of things. For example… a doll lying in a coffin.

Sadly, he had no good excuse to ask about something that probably counted as “common knowledge” here.

He sighed inwardly, feeling again how he needed to collect information and build up knowledge very carefully. Then Duncan frowned and gave the doll one last look, as if making up his mind at last: “I should throw it back into the sea.”

He felt a trace of hesitation as he spoke. When he looked at the doll, that hesitation grew stronger.

It was not just because “the doll was pretty”, something that simple. It was because “she” really did look too much like a living person sleeping in a spirit coffin. When he thought of throwing her back into the sea, Duncan even felt as if he was tossing a living human off the ship.

But in the end, that very hesitation only hardened his resolve.

He already knew this world held many strange and eerie things. So far, all he had seen of it was this one ship, the Vanished, but even here he had already met the talking Goathead, a mast that could raise its own sails, lamps that never went out, that weird and dangerous sea, the chilling Spirit Realm, and endless sea fog…

Just now, he had even run into a mechanical ship sailing this eerie sea while carrying a sealed object. The thing that ship had been “guarding” had then somehow appeared on the deck of the Vanished.

As a rational and cautious person, he could not keep something so likely to hold strange, dangerous power just because the doll looked pretty.

Regret was regret, but Duncan still firmly closed the “coffin’s” lid again. Because he still did not feel at ease, he went into the cabin to find nails and a hammer, and carefully hammered a ring of iron nails all around the lid.

At last, he pushed the “spirit coffin” holding the doll to the edge of the deck.

Goathead’s voice sounded in his ears: “You may deal with your spoils as you wish, but I still humbly offer a suggestion. There is no need to be so careful. The Vanished has not added to its spoils in a long time…”

“Shut up.” Duncan cut off Goathead’s rambling with that simple reply.

Goathead fell silent. Duncan then kicked hard at the “spirit coffin” and sent it straight into the sea.

The heavy chest dropped straight down from the rail and plunged into the sea, which had already gone back to its normal color. After a dull splash, it floated back up and slowly drifted toward the stern of the Vanished.

Duncan watched the chest with his gaze as it drifted away on the waves. Only after it was completely hidden behind the stern did he finally let out a slow breath. Then he lifted his head and looked into the distance. The mist over the sea had completely cleared, and the blue ocean rose and fell gently around the Vanished.

The ship had fully left the Spirit Realm and returned to the Mortal Realm.

There was no sign at all on the nearby sea of the mechanical ship that had briefly crossed paths with the Vanished.

Duncan frowned slightly and did a quick estimate of how much time had passed since the ships met and how fast each one should be sailing.

From the way the sea now looked, that ship should not have vanished from sight so quickly.

“…Was this also because of this strange sea? Or was it tied to that so-called ‘Spirit Realm sailing’?” he wondered.

Duncan muttered to himself in his heart, but soon his attention was caught by something else—

He saw a line of golden light suddenly appear deep within the heavy clouds that had always hung over the sea.

Bright golden sunlight slowly spread out. The thick clouds, like heavy curtains, seemed to be brushed aside by an invisible hand and began to thin and melt away. The sea, which had been gloomy for who knew how long, was slowly lit by sunlight. Duncan stood at the bow of the Vanished, eyes wide, using his gaze to take in the sight of the clouds breaking up. In that moment, he suddenly felt a strange, hard-to-name emotion.

Ever since he had learned, days ago, that “this side” existed, ever since he had first explored this strange ship, those unbroken clouds had always covered the whole sea. He had almost come to believe this world simply had no sunlight at all, that it was meant to be forever overcast.

He had been parted from sunlight for too long. Even on the other side of the “door”, in Zhou Ming’s small studio apartment, the thick fog outside the window had long since hidden the Sun.

But now, the Boundless Sea had cleared.

After being away from sunlight for so long, he finally had the feeling of seeing the sky again in this world “on this side”.

Duncan took a deep breath without thinking and spread his arms toward the direction of the sunlight. The heavy clouds seemed to answer him, quickly thinning and fading away. At the brightest instant of the sky, a huge sphere covered in countless twisted streams of golden light came into Duncan’s view.

Duncan’s expression froze in that very moment, arms still spread to welcome the sunlight.

He stared at the sky, eyes wide. The sunlight was bright, but not as blinding as what he was used to. He could clearly see the thing hanging above. He saw the shell of the sphere, covered in countless tight, tangled lines. He saw the brilliant streams of light spilling out around it. And against the crossing glow, he saw two ring-shaped structures around the central sphere, laid out like concentric circles and slowly turning.

Duncan narrowed his eyes. He could just make out that the two rings seemed to be made up of countless fine and complex runes linked together, as if some supreme power had carved an eternal shackle into the sky, chaining “the Sun” in place.

Duncan did not get to embrace the sunlight he had longed for.

This world did not have sunlight at all.

“What is that?” he asked softly, his voice low and cold.

“That is, of course, the Sun, Captain,” Goathead said, as calm as always.

Chapter 9: Away and Back, Then Back Again

The sunlight was very bright.

If the glowing thing hanging in the sky really was the Sun, then its “sunlight”… was indeed very bright.

Duncan did not know how long he stared at the sky. Only when his eyes grew sore and aching did he finally drag his gaze down from the clouds. But the image of that “Sun” stayed burned into his retinas and deep in his mind. Even with his eyes closed, he could clearly recall it: the sphere glowing with pale gold light, the twisted streams of light curling around it, and the ring structures moving quietly around the sphere like concentric circles.

The Sun was not like this. It was not supposed to be like this. In the world he knew, even under the sky of another planet, the star hanging overhead would never look like that.

But now he had to accept the facts.

He was in a foreign land, far more distant than he had ever imagined.

Even the Sun had taken on a form he could not understand.

Duncan turned his head without thinking and looked at the door in front of the captain’s cabin.

If he pushed the door inward, he could return to the room where he had lived for many years, return to his small apartment.

But outside that apartment, the heavy fog had long since covered the whole world. The “home” he knew, in a way, had already shrunk down to that last thirty-square-meter room.

The “home” that seemed only a door-push away was, in truth, just another lonely boat drifting on the sea.

After a long silence, Goathead’s voice suddenly echoed in Duncan’s ears: “Captain, where are we going next? Do you have any plan for our voyage?”

A sailing plan? How could Duncan have something like that? He did want to draw up a proper plan to explore this world and fix the next legs of his journey, but he did not even have a normal enchanted sea chart. He did not know what lands existed in this world, what powers ruled them, or whether this endless ocean even had an edge.

Only a few hours ago he had just learned how to steer the Vanished at all.

Still, he fell into thought. A few minutes later, he spoke in his mind: “That ship that rammed into the Vanished earlier—where did it come from?”

“You wish to head for those city-states?” Goathead sounded a bit surprised, then quickly began to advise against it. “I suggest you do not go near the routes controlled by those city-states… at least not yet. You may be the great Captain Duncan, but the Vanished is not what it once was. Their city-states’ Garrison Navy and the Holy See’s Guard Corps would certainly do everything they could to resist your… attack.”

For a moment Duncan had nothing to say. He suddenly really wanted to know what kind of heaven-shaking crimes the “Captain Duncan” he had replaced had committed in the past, that just showing his face in the mortal world now seemed enough to trigger a full twenty-five-man raid on the spot…

And from Goathead's roundabout wording, Duncan also realized that the current state of the Vanished and this "captain" of his was not as glorious as the spirit's usual praise made it sound. Was the reason the ghost captain and his ship lurked out on the high seas simply that they did not dare return to the civilized world's harbors?

So exile was just another way of saying "a trip to the end of the world", huh.

Duncan felt a bit troubled. He urgently needed a way to learn about this world. He had to find some means to make contact with its "civilized society". Whether it was to survive here in the long term or to solve the mysteries and return to the "home" he knew, he could not just keep drifting aimlessly on this endless sea. But the problem was—

The "civilized society" of this world did not seem to feel the same way.

In the locals' eyes, "Captain Duncan" was a world boss wandering around outside the main cities. The moment he appeared within sight, they had to pull together a twenty-five-man raid…

Duncan sighed. If there had been even a single book to read on the Vanished, he would not be this passive. His only source of information here was that muttering Goathead, and right now he did not dare reveal too much about himself in front of it.

Come to think of it… how could a ship this big not have a single book on board?

For people living at sea, a lonely, long voyage was an extreme kind of pressure. People needed some way to ease that stress. Ordinary sailors might not have much time to read for fun, but the great “Captain Duncan”… surely wasn’t illiterate, right?

After all, being a captain was a skilled job that demanded a high level of knowledge. Even the roughest, most savage pirates needed a captain who could read an enchanted sea chart, understand the stars, and calculate the route.

With that doubt in mind, Duncan asked a casual question. He was careful, trying to make it sound like an offhand remark. Goathead, however, answered without any hesitation:

“Books? Reading at sea is a dangerous thing. The beings in the Abyssal Deep and in Subspace are always waiting for a gap to appear in a mortal mind. The only safe reading is those ‘classics’ published by the Holy See. Those are safe, but so dull it’s better to go scrub the deck instead… and you have never been interested in anything from the Holy See, have you, Captain?”

Duncan raised his eyebrows at once.

Since when did reading a book at sea become a life-or-death risk? And only the Holy See’s “classics” could be read safely? What kind of sickness did this endless ocean have?

He felt he had learned a bit more about this world, but with that came new questions. Duncan could only force those fresh doubts down inside. He walked to the rail and looked out over the endless stretch of sea and sky.

The golden “Sun” poured down rays of light, and what shone on the sea looked like rippling sheets of fine gold leaf. If he ignored how strange the Sun itself looked, it really was a beautiful scene.

“I want to hear your advice,” Duncan finally said to Goathead after much thought. His tone was still careful. “I’m getting tired of this aimless sailing.

Maybe…”

He had only gotten halfway through the sentence when a strange feeling suddenly rose from deep inside. It came from the link between him and the Vanished, as if some “foreign object” had suddenly touched the ship. Right after that, he heard a “thump” from the stern, like something heavy had hit the deck.

Duncan frowned. At once he drew the loaded flintlock pistol at his belt with one hand and his single-handed longsword with the other, then ran quickly toward the source of the sound.

Moments later, he reached the aft deck. The thing lying there quietly left him stunned.

It was that ornate wooden chest that looked like a spirit coffin.

It was that eerie doll.

A chill crawled over Duncan’s heart. He stared hard at the still-wet chest, half expecting it to pop open by itself at any second. Then he noticed that all the nails around the lid were gone.

Those were the nails he had hammered in before throwing the chest into the sea. They should have been very solid.

He stood there, facing the chest with tense caution for several minutes. At last he made up his mind. Keeping a tight grip on the flintlock in one hand, he slipped the longsword into the crack of the lid with the other, then pried it open with force.

The ornate lid creaked open. The lifeless Brother doll still lay quietly inside, surrounded by red velvet lining, like a princess in her sleep.

Duncan stared at the doll for several seconds and spoke in a deep, serious tone: “If you are alive, then get up and speak with me.” [He believed he was showing enough authority in that moment.]

He repeated the words twice, but the doll did not move at all.

Duncan kept his serious expression as he looked at her, then finally said in a flat voice: “Very well. Then I can only send you back again.”

Once he finished speaking, he closed the lid again without hesitation. Then he fetched tools and hammered in another crisscrossing ring of coffin nails. When he was done, he even found an iron chain and used the hooks already on the chest to fasten the lid down tight.

After he finished all this, Duncan straightened up and clapped his hands in satisfaction. He looked at the “spirit coffin” he had bound up and nailed all over and nodded slightly. “This time you shouldn’t be able to climb out of your coffin.”

Then he kicked the chest into the sea again without a hint of hesitation.

He watched the chest hit the water, then watched it rise and fall with the current as it slowly drifted away. Duncan let out a small breath, then turned and left the stern.

But halfway across the deck, he suddenly turned back and looked again toward where the chest was drifting.

The wooden chest was still bobbing on the waves.

Duncan nodded, turned away, and kept walking. Then he suddenly looked back again.

The chest was still floating on the sea, and it had already drifted very, very far.

“Maybe I should put a cannonball or something in there. Then it would sink…”

Duncan muttered this under his breath, then finally turned for real and slowly walked toward the captain's cabin.

"You are a bit harsh toward that lady," Goathead's voice sounded in his mind.

"Shut up—are you really calling a cursed doll a 'lady'?"

"It does indeed look like a cursed doll… but what curse on the Boundless Sea could compare to the Vanished and the great Captain Duncan? Captain, that lady is actually quite gentle and harmless…"

Duncan: "…"

Why did Goathead sound so proud every time it mentioned the curse and ill fame of the Vanished and Captain Duncan?

Perhaps sensing Duncan's foul mood behind the silence, Goathead quickly changed the subject: "Captain, you said earlier that you wanted to hear my advice. Specifically…"

"We'll talk about it later. I need to rest for a while. Steering the Vanished through the Spirit Realm earlier drained my energy. Stay quiet for now."

"Yes, Captain."

Goathead fell silent, and Duncan returned to the captain's cabin. He walked to the chart table and let his gaze casually sweep over the enchanted sea chart.

The next second, his eyes suddenly froze.

The enchanted sea chart seemed to have changed in a subtle way. The gray-white patches that had covered the whole sheet and writhed like living things had faded a little. The sea area around the Vanished was becoming clear!

Was this thing… updating information on the surrounding waters in real time as the Vanished sailed?

Duncan stepped up to the chart table at once and focused all his attention on the subtle shifts on the enchanted sea chart.

But his concentrated state did not last long.

From deep within his mind, the Vanished once again sent the signal of “contact with a foreign object”. Right after that, Duncan heard another “thump” from the deck just behind and to the side of the captain’s cabin.

Chapter 10: Elegance Wasn’t Exactly Elegant

That “coffin” had come back again.

On the stern deck of the Vanished, Duncan stared without expression at the ornate wooden chest lying quietly in front of him. Beads of water slid from its edges and dripped at his feet, proving that his memory of throwing the chest into the sea was not false, proving that this thing had, until not long ago, really been drifting out on the ocean.

Such a strange sight was enough to chill anyone’s heart, yet for some reason Duncan felt calmer than he had expected.

Maybe it was because he stood on this already bizarre ghost ship. Maybe it was because he had just gone through a thrilling “Spirit Realm drift” and a collision. Or maybe it was because he had been dealing for days with the equally strange Goathead. Whatever the reason, Duncan seemed to have built up some immunity to the weird supernatural phenomena of this world.

In fact, when he threw this “cursed doll” into the sea last time, he had already faintly guessed that things would not end so simply.

He lowered his head and, as expected, saw that the iron nails and chain he had hammered around the “coffin” were gone without a trace. He bent down and once again used the pirate sword in his hand to pry open the lid.

The ornate gothic doll still lay quietly in the center of the red velvet lining, hands folded, calm and elegant.

But this time Duncan clearly noticed that the hem of her dress seemed damp from seawater. A faint fishy smell came from the inside of the lid.

So far, this strange doll had done nothing out of line or dangerous besides vanishing and then returning over and over. But the fact that it kept “going away and coming back” was already a standard trait of a cursed item.

Duncan watched the doll for a while, face blank, then broke the silence with a half-smile: “I suddenly feel like satisfying my curiosity…”

As soon as he spoke, he turned and walked toward the nearby hatch, quite at ease leaving the doll on the deck.

Although he was personally very wary of the doll and did not want her near him, his understanding of the Vanished and of Goathead told him that leaving her on the deck for a while would not cause any real trouble. Even if she suddenly lashed out, the many “living things” on this ship would be enough to handle it.

He was going to use this time to do some “prep work”.

Duncan crossed the stern deck, opened the wooden door leading below, and stepped onto the age-worn wooden stairs. Familiar with the path, he went down into the space beneath the deck. This counted as the “upper gun deck”, the place where the cannons were set.

Old-fashioned muzzle-loading cannons lay quietly along both sides. Moldy, darkened planks covered the gunports. Black powder barrels and solid iron-ball cannonballs were piled between the guns, as if they had been resting there for a century.

As Duncan’s gaze swept over these timeworn things, a thought suddenly struck him.

On this ship, he had never seen a second “human” figure besides himself. So… who operated these cannons?

Did they, like the Vanished itself, load and fire on their own when needed?

And what about the freshwater tanks on board? Did they refill themselves? What about damage to the hull? Did it repair itself? Or… did this ship even have a real concept of “damage”?

Questions bubbled up one after another in his mind, and he had no idea where to start answering them.

He knew very well that he still understood far too little about this ship. In the past few days, he had explored it to a certain extent, but only enough to get a rough idea of its upper structure. The deeper areas were far stranger and more intimidating than the upper levels.

On top of that, he had always pinned his hopes on leaving his “bachelor apartment” and returning to the normal world on Earth. He hadn’t focused his main effort on the Vanished at all, which left him with very little motivation to act “on this side”.

But now, he suddenly felt more curious about the ship—or rather… more of a sense that he should take control of it.

This was his ship. He ought to understand the Vanished.

Maybe this change had started the moment he took hold of the wheel.

Duncan shook his head, set his later exploration plans aside for now, and walked over to the pile of cannonballs.

A short while later, Duncan returned to the stern deck with several cast-iron cannonballs in his arms. Just as he had expected, the cursed doll in the “coffin” still lay honestly inside the chest.

“Did she move at all just now?”

“Not at all,” Goathead’s voice answered at once. It sounded like it had been holding itself back for far too long, and once it started talking the words poured out. “This lady was as quiet as she looks. You should trust my judgment—she is mild and harmless to you. Since she has come back to the ship again and again, that may mean she and her spirit coffin have some kind of connection with the Vanished. A great gardener once said…”

“Shut up.”

“Oh.”

Duncan stared expressionlessly, his gaze fixed on the doll in the chest.

He didn’t know if she truly couldn’t move or if she was still pretending to sleep even now—but either way, he didn’t care.

He was going to satisfy his curiosity.

The solid cast-iron cannonballs were very heavy. When traitors were executed at sea, tying just one of these balls to a man was enough to send even the most seasoned sailor to the bottom.

Duncan put four cannonballs into the “coffin”—then went back to the gun deck and hauled up four more.

Eight cannonballs almost filled every bit of remaining space inside the chest. The elegant gothic doll was now surrounded by a ring of iron balls. She looked… very well-armed.

Elegant she was not; creepy she definitely was.

Duncan closed the lid of the “coffin” again, then, with quite a bit of effort, pushed the chest to the edge of the deck. Even with his current strength, it was not an easy job.

In the end, he lifted his leg and kicked the “coffin” into the sea.

A heavy splash rang out. The ornate wooden chest went straight into the water and sank.

Duncan stayed at the rail of the deck, silently using his gaze to stare at the spot where the chest had gone under. He did not move for a long time.

Goathead's voice sounded in his mind: "Captain, have you changed your mind? If you regret throwing away this piece of loot, the Vanished can try to fish the chest back up with the anchor. It's not the proper use for an anchor, but the anchor says it can try…"

"Shut up."

"But you've been standing at the rail for quite a while…"

"Shut up."

"Oh."

Duncan let out a quiet breath.

He absolutely could not admit that his toes hurt in front of his flunky Goathead.

So he stood there on the deck for several minutes with his toes throbbing, forcing himself to keep the stern look a dignified captain should have. By the end, he even started to wonder if he looked like one of those rocks on the shore that just stand there, waiting forever for a spouse to come back. Only when the pain finally faded did he turn, unhurried, and go back to the upper gun deck below.

He waited quietly for a few more minutes. When he felt that enough time had passed, Duncan suddenly walked toward the stern end of the gun deck. He opened the viewing window between the two stern guns and focused on the sea outside.

Goathead hadn't stayed quiet for long. It couldn't help itself now: "Captain, what are you…"

Still staring at the waves, Duncan answered without looking up: “I’m very curious how that cursed doll makes it back here.”

“Uh… because she’s a cursed doll?”

“…I really appreciate your habit of not overthinking things. But I believe that even for a cursed doll, there must be some kind of process when she returns to this ship. She wants to pretend she’s ‘dead’, yet she keeps coming back. I think there must be a reason behind that, and she must have the ability to communicate. But right now she refuses to talk. So I’ll have to figure out how she moves and force that thing into a conversation.”

Goathead was silent for two seconds, then asked cautiously: “Captain, you seem… suddenly in a better mood? Ah, that’s a wonderful sign! Ever since you woke up last time, you’ve been in low spirits and lost interest in many things. Your loyal First Mate and Second Mate and…”

“Shut up.”

“Oh.”

Once Goathead quieted down, Duncan kept watching the sea with full attention. In his line of sight, the water behind the stern remained calm.

The “coffin” really seemed to have sunk into the Deep Sea with no sign of coming back.

But with the experience of the last two times, Duncan was especially patient now. He silently counted the minutes, waited, and watched, letting the Time-Stream flow.

He did not even notice that he was actively hoping for the doll to appear again.

Then a tiny black shape entered his vision.

As the waves rose and fell, that shape suddenly rushed into view. It was the ornate wooden chest, bursting out of the sea like a lone boat in the storm. The beautiful gothic doll stood in the box, arms wrapped around the coffin lid, paddling for dear life in the waves with big, sweeping strokes.

A gothic doll standing inside her coffin, brandishing her own coffin lid as she rode the waves.

Elegant she was not; she was honestly creepier than eight cannonballs.

Duncan was deeply shaken.

Chapter 11: Alice

Duncan felt he would probably never forget this scene for the rest of his life.

On the eerie, dangerous Boundless Sea, an ornate spirit coffin rose and fell with the swells, while a gothic doll driven by some mysterious force stood inside it, clutching a huge coffin lid in both hands, riding the waves straight toward him…

And she didn’t look very happy about it.

No matter how he looked at it, the whole thing was far too creepy. For a moment, Duncan didn’t even know whether he should be more shocked that the cursed doll was actually moving, or more stunned by the way she swung that coffin lid around with such crushing momentum. All he knew was that this scene was nothing like what he had imagined.

He had pictured several ways she might return to the ship, but he had never once imagined… this.

While Duncan was still staring in a daze, the doll had already reached the stern of the Vanished.

Even though her “oar” was a coffin lid, her paddling speed was shockingly fast. She had a strange lightness and strength about her. Duncan carefully leaned his head out of the viewing window and saw the doll toss the coffin lid back into the spirit coffin. Then she reached out, grabbed a protruding timber at the stern, and began to climb up at incredible speed—agile and swift, as if invisible ropes were pulling her upward.

At the same time, the heavy wooden chest rose from the sea in a bizarre way, floating at her side as if it had lost all its weight.

Duncan quickly ducked his head back in before the doll noticed him.

The doll clearly had no idea that the captain of this ghost ship had been watching her in secret. In almost the blink of an eye, she climbed up the tall stern of the Vanished and flipped herself onto the deck.

She waved a finger in the air, and the spirit coffin that had been floating beside her drifted down and landed neatly at her feet. Then she turned her head this way and that, as if checking the deck to make sure no one was around. Once she was sure she was alone, she quickly smoothed out her slightly wet dress and started scrambling into the coffin, using both hands and feet.

Halfway in, a pirate sword suddenly thrust out from the side and blocked her. Right after that came the sharp click of a flintlock hammer being pulled back.

The doll froze at once. She tried to turn her head and saw a ghostly captain wreathed in green flames standing beside her, staring coldly at her with his gaze. His voice sounded like it rose from the depths of the Spirit Realm, cold as the Abyssal Deep: “Oh. I caught you, doll.”

In front of Duncan, the doll clearly trembled. She seemed terrified and tried to dodge to the side, but her panicked movement went wrong. Her upper body jerked, Duncan heard a clear “click” from the base of her neck—

And then her head fell off.

Right before Duncan’s eyes, a beautiful head dropped from the doll’s shoulders. Her long silver hair spread out in the sea breeze as the head rolled to his feet.

The doll's body stayed in its half-crouched pose beside the spirit coffin, ready to run. One hand groped blindly in the air, while the fallen head stared helplessly up at Duncan, mouth opening and closing: "Hel… help… help…"

It was no exaggeration to say that Duncan's heart almost stopped right then —though he wasn't even sure if he still had a heart after being burned by ghostly flames. Still, watching that head come off with his own eyes really shook him.

The roaring ghost flames around him hid the horror on his face, and his moment of stunned delay looked to the doll like cold indifference. Miss Doll never even noticed that this terrifying Captain Duncan was actually more nervous than she was. She just kept repeating: "Help… help… my head… fell off…"

Duncan finally snapped out of it. He patted the small heart that now only existed in his imagination and tried his best to control his movements and his voice. He calmly watched the doll for a while and confirmed that, for all her strange and uncanny traits, she seemed… more afraid of him, this "ghost captain", than he was of her.

Once this fact became clear in his mind, Duncan realized he had to keep up this calm front.

He still didn't understand this world, and he understood this cursed doll even less. Until he could fully control the situation, the identity of "terrifying Captain Duncan" was his biggest shield.

At the same time, he couldn't just leave the doll in front of him alone. The way things had turned out was not what he had expected, but the result was clear enough: this doll could communicate with him.

He holstered the flintlock and kept his other hand on his sword. At close range, a flintlock with only one shot was obviously less reliable than a blade, and his rushed practice with firearms was far from enough to make him a skilled gunman.

Then, with his free hand, he picked up the doll's head from the deck.

The feeling was very strange. Even though he knew she was only a cursed doll, the act of reaching down and grabbing a "head" still made Duncan uneasy.

The faint warmth coming from the head almost made him want to fling it away on reflex.

This was just too creepy and uncanny.

But in the end he held back that strange urge. He looked the head in the eyes and asked calmly: "Do you want me to put this back for you?"

"My… my… my…"

"Fine, you do it yourself," Duncan said, nodding as he passed the head to the doll's hand, which was still groping blindly in the air.

He watched as those hands caught their own head with practiced ease, fingers nimble. She casually smoothed her messy silver hair, adjusted the angle a little, and set the head back on her neck. A crisp click sounded as the ball joint locked perfectly into place.

The whole process flowed smooth as water. It was clear this was not her first time doing it.

Right after that, the doll's stiff face turned lively again. She blinked and let out a long breath: "Whew… I'm alive again."

Duncan: "…"

From any angle, he felt like he should say something about that. But then he remembered the persona of “Captain Duncan” and the fact that he still knew nothing about this doll’s background. So in the end he only nodded to her with a blank face and said: “Good. Now you’re coming with me—we need to talk. You’ve come onto my ship again and again.”

As he spoke, he let the ghostly flames around him fade away and returned to his original appearance.

Transforming into his spirit form was a power he had gained after taking the wheel of the Vanished. But he had only just come into contact with it and was far from skilled. He had no idea how to really “use” this power yet. Other than steering the ship, he didn’t even know what else it could do.

Just now, he had released it only to create a strong image in front of the weird cursed doll—and to build up his own courage.

Now that his image was set and the doll was very cooperative, there was no point in wasting more energy keeping the flames burning.

The cursed doll obediently stood up beside the coffin. Then she stared in shock as she watched Duncan return to human form. Her eyes went wide: “You… you’re not a ghost?”

Duncan gave her a calm glance: “When it’s necessary, I can be.”

The doll raised a hand to steady her head, and there seemed to be a hint of awe in her eyes.

Duncan had no idea what she was so in awe of, but it was obvious that her head still wasn’t very secure. She had probably almost scared it off again.

He turned and walked toward the captain’s cabin. Through his live link with the Vanished, he could feel the doll hesitate for one or two seconds, then follow after him honestly.

Just as he expected, the ornate and strange spirit coffin also floated close behind her. It seemed she had to take it wherever she went.

A short time later, Duncan led the cursed doll into the captain’s cabin.

Under the carved Goathead’s gloomy gaze, the ghost captain and the cursed doll sat facing each other across the chart table. Duncan sat in his heavy dark-backed chair, while the doll used the coffin-like chest as a seat, sitting on it with graceful poise.

She really was elegant and composed. When she sat quietly, silver hair hanging down, gothic dress spread around her as she perched on the chest, she looked like a work of art that should be displayed in a palace and guarded by soldiers.

Unfortunately, every time Duncan looked at her, he couldn’t help thinking of how this young lady had just been riding the waves on a coffin and then running around with her head falling off…

He sighed, then put his cold, stern expression back on and fixed his gaze on the doll’s eyes: “Name?”

“Alice.”

“Race?”

“Doll.”

“Occupation?”

“Doll… Why are you asking all this?”

Duncan thought for a moment and said: “To get some basic information.”

Chapter 12: The ghost captain and the cursed Doll

On the two sides of the wide chart table, Captain Duncan of the Vanished sat facing Alice, the doll who was under the curse.

The air between the two of them – though maybe neither of them was actually human – was not what you would call friendly.

The doll who called herself “Alice” still looked a little nervous. Even though the ghost captain in front of her had promised her temporary safety, in front of Duncan’s face that seemed to come with a natural +10 intimidation bonus, even a cursed doll like her clearly could not calm down.

She kept a dignified posture as she sat on her own coffin lid, but the fingers quietly pinching the hem of her skirt gave away her unease.

Duncan stayed silent for the moment, studying the “lady” in front of him while he thought.

A doll driven by some unknown power, clearly not made of flesh and blood, yet able to speak, walk, and even feel a bit warm to the touch – a “supernatural subject” like this, back in his hometown, would have made it onto Approaching Science, and it would have run for at least three and a half episodes.

Duncan did not know what kind of being a doll like Alice counted as in this world, but in the past few days of dealing with Goathead he had picked up some information in a roundabout way. He knew that even though this world had “supernatural Visions”, such extraordinary things were not something you could see everywhere. And the doll in front of him…

Duncan guessed that even in this strange world full of Anomalies, she had to be some kind of special existence.

He had reasons for this guess. The mechanical ship that had collided head-on with the Vanished was very new and had a well-trained seafarer crew. He had seen with his own eyes that even when they fell into great terror, many sailors on that ship still held their posts. Inside that ship were many compartments and items whose use he could not make sense of. Many of them were covered in complex rune markings, and the style of those marks was very similar to the symbols carved on the surface of Alice’s spirit coffin.

In other words, the purpose of that advanced ship’s voyage was very likely to escort – or rather “guard and transport” – this cursed doll, Alice.

Duncan shifted his posture in the chair and fixed a calm yet serious gaze on Alice. There was no doubt that his ship now had a very remarkable “guest” on board.

But on the other hand, this doll did not really seem like a frightening figure. She actually seemed quite timid.

After all, right when they met, before he had even said much, she had gotten so scared that her own head had fallen off.

“Excuse me…”

Probably because Duncan’s long silence and gaze put too much pressure on her, Alice finally could not help speaking. “And…”

“Where did you come from?” Duncan finally withdrew that oppressive gaze and asked in a calmer tone.

Alice clearly froze for a moment, as if processing what he meant. After a few seconds, she lightly tapped the ornate wooden box under her. “From here.”

Duncan’s expression turned a bit stiff. “…”

“Of course I know you used to lie in that box,” he coughed twice and said. “But I’m asking where you came from – as in place, understand? Do you have a hometown? Or some kind of point of origin?”

Alice thought carefully again, then calmly shook her head. “I can’t remember.”

“You can’t remember?”

“How could a doll have a hometown?” Alice folded her hands on her lap and answered with dignified seriousness. “Most of my memories are of lying in the box. I lay in here, being carried from one place to another. Sometimes I could vaguely feel people walking outside the box or standing guard… Ah, and I remember some low whispers. The people watching outside my wooden box talked about things in voices full of fear and tension…”

Duncan raised his eyebrows. “Talked about things? What did they talk about around you?”

“Just some boring trivial stuff.”

“But I’m curious now,” Duncan said very seriously. He believed they might really have been trivial matters, but right now he needed to learn about this world in any way he could – even from the noisy idle talk of its ordinary people.

“…Fine. What I heard most often was a designation, Anomaly 099. They seemed to use it to refer to me and my box, but I don’t like it. I have a name,” Alice said as she thought. “Besides that, I sometimes heard them talk about seals and the curse or something, but most of those memories are blurry. When I'm in the box I sleep. I don't listen very carefully to what's going on outside."

The doll spoke slowly, then suddenly seemed to remember something and added: "But I still remember what I heard most recently. That should have been right before I came to your ship. The voices talking outside the box kept mentioning a place, the city-state of Pland. That seemed to be their destination… and should have been mine too?"

"The city-state of Pland?" Duncan's eyes grew thoughtful as he silently noted that name in his heart.

He had finally learned something useful again, though he did not know when this bit of useful information would come in handy.

Then he looked up and fixed his gaze on the doll again. "Aside from that?"

"Aside from that, I mostly just slept, Captain," the doll said solemnly. "When people seal you inside a big box like a spirit coffin and there are endless drowsy whispers drilling into your ears around you, what else can you do but sleep? Do sit-ups in your coffin?"

Duncan's mouth twitched.

She looked dignified, and when her head was not falling off she was an elegant beauty. But in reality she not only paddled across the waves on her coffin lid, she also suddenly came out with snarky lines that could choke a person.

In his heart he quickly built a new picture of Miss Alice.

But on the surface he still kept up the image of the calm and stern Captain Duncan. He only made a noncommittal sound and then went on: "So, aside from being groggy in the wooden box, you know nothing about the world outside. You can’t tell me how this world has changed now, and you can’t tell me where any harbor or city-state is located.”

“I’m afraid so, Captain,” the doll said seriously, then suddenly seemed to realize something. Her eyes widened a little and she stared nervously at Duncan. “So… are you planning to throw me off the ship again? Because I’m not worth anything?”

Before Duncan could answer, Alice went on: “Fine, I understand. It is your ship, after all. But this time, can you not stuff cannonballs into the box? Honestly… eight cannonballs was a bit much…”

It was clear that this doll was not in a good mood, but she did not quite dare to throw a fit.

Duncan also felt very awkward. The main reason was that, back when he had stuffed the cannonballs into the box, he had not considered that he would later have to calmly discuss the matter with the person involved. At that time he had treated the Alice lying inside the box as a standard cursed doll from a horror movie. All the scenes in his head had followed that style. He had never thought that this cursed doll had not crawled out of The Grudge at all, but was more like something that had walked out of a courtyard comedy instead.

So all the early preparations he had made to fight a terrifying curse now turned into sheer embarrassment.

Fortunately, Duncan had a thick skin, and that stern, gloomy face of his looked as if it had been carved there with an axe and a knife. As long as his nerves did not short out, he could keep a straight face. So he forced himself to ignore the embarrassment caused by those eight cannonballs and just shook his head lightly. “I haven’t decided yet whether to throw you off the ship. After all, you always seem to find a way back on board. I’m just curious – why do you keep coming back to the Vanished? I can see that you’re actually wary of me, and of this ship. Since that’s the case, why not stay far away from this danger?”

“This ship is called the Vanished? Fine, I really am a little… afraid of you and your ship, but compared to that, isn’t the deep sea even more dangerous?”

The doll stared quietly at the ghost captain in front of her. In her sight, behind this tall man stretched endless dim nothingness. That darkness overlapped with the real scene in the cabin, as if two worlds had been forced together. Yet compared to those vast, suffocating shadowy voids, the things that came from the deeper parts of the Boundless Sea made someone like Anomaly 099 feel even more danger.

“In this world, is there anything more frightening than the Deep Sea?”

Chapter 13: Long-Term Bed Rest Is Bad for Your Neck

The Deep Sea was something worth fearing.

Alice was a doll, but her bright eyes could still show feelings, and her expressions changed in ways that could not be explained by common sense. So Duncan could clearly see in her face that fear and rejection toward the Deep Sea – or rather, toward certain “things” in the Deep Sea. When he linked this to the Spirit Realm and the so-called border manifestations he had seen earlier out at sea, it was easy to realize that the vast ocean he sailed on definitely hid a Great Terror.

Yet the Vanished sailed on this endless sea, and so did that mechanical ship he had collided with in the Spirit Realm before.

This could not help but make him curious about more distant things. What was the land of this world like? Or rather, did normal land even exist in this world?

However, the doll in front of him could not answer his questions. Most of the time in Alice’s memories she had been in a dazed state. In Duncan’s judgment, that had to be the effect of some kind of seal, or some kind of “suppression.”

He also remembered what he had seen of the inside of that mechanical ship when they passed each other, through the vast senses of the Vanished. Those esoteric runes, the arrangements full of religious symbols, and the signs carved on the outside of Alice’s spirit coffin all pointed to one thing:

This “cursed doll” was definitely deeply feared in “civilized society.”

Duncan gave the doll in front of him a meaningful look, and she met his gaze with calm, gentle eyes.

“Let me confirm again. You truly don’t remember where you came from, and you can’t recall what you’ve been through in the past, right?”

“I don’t remember,” Alice answered very earnestly. “Ever since I first had memories, I’ve been lying in this big box. I don’t know why, but it seems there was always a group of nervous people around me. They were afraid I would come out, so they sealed the box in all kinds of ways. To be honest, thinking back now, I suddenly feel that the ring of nails you hammered into my lid was actually pretty friendly… Even though you later added eight cannonballs, at least you didn’t pour lead into it, right?”

This time Duncan did not pay attention to Alice’s trash talk, but continued to ask: “Then where did your name come from? Who gave you this name? If you really never left the box and never had contact with anyone, why would you have a name? Did you give it to yourself?”

Alice suddenly froze.

She really did seem lost. She stayed in that blank state for more than ten seconds. Just when Duncan was starting to worry that this doll also came with a “crash” setting, the doll finally moved again. “I… don’t remember. I’ve known from the start that I’m called Alice, but I didn’t give myself this name, I…”

She muttered in confusion and unconsciously held her head with both hands. The sight made Duncan’s eye twitch, and he hurried to stop her. “All right, if you don’t remember, then forget it. You don’t have to yank your head off…”

Alice: “…”

After that, Duncan asked the doll many more questions, but sadly most of them led nowhere.

Just as the doll herself had said, for most of the time since she became aware, she had drifted in a daze in that spirit coffin, staying in a state that switched between sleep and half-awake. She knew very little about the outside world. The only knowledge she had came from snatches of talk she heard outside the spirit coffin while half dreaming. Those bits of trivia could hardly help Duncan piece together the outline of this world.

But even so, Duncan did not walk away empty-handed. In talking with Alice, he at least confirmed a few things.

There was a kind of power structure in this world called “city-states”. That word came up again and again in the doll’s story and made up almost all of her journey. The end of this particular journey had been a city-state called “Pland”.

It seemed to be a prosperous place. The sailors said in their talks that “it holds an important position on many routes”.

Second, Alice also had the designation “Anomaly 099”, and that seemed to be some sort of “official” label in the civilized world. As for the name “Alice” that she used for herself, so far it seemed that no third person knew it besides her and Duncan.

Finally, Alice had been transported from one city-state to another again and again. And she did not seem to be the only Anomaly moved in this way. On some trips she had heard the escorts mention “other sealed vaults” in their conversations.

From this, Duncan boldly guessed that this constant relocation of Anomalies might itself be a necessary method of sealing them and keeping them from “getting loose.”

And it was obvious that this time the team responsible for transporting Anomaly 099 had run into terrible luck. Because of the sudden appearance of the Vanished, the “doll” they were guarding had already escaped.

It was just not clear what was so terrifying about this strange cursed doll, or what kind of damage she would cause now that she was free.

After all… she looked quite harmless while staying on the Vanished.

To be honest, Duncan was rather disappointed.

He had thought he had finally found a channel that could help him understand this world, but he had not expected the one lying in the coffin to be as confused as he was.

But when his gaze swept again over Alice, still sitting quietly on the wooden box, this disappointment faded a little.

At least he now had another person to talk to on the Vanished – even if she seemed to be a doll, even if her head falling off was terrifying, even if she surely had more secrets, even if she sometimes blurted out trash talk.

But she was still a lot more normal in style than that noisy Goathead.

And speaking of weird dangers… of this Boundless Sea, this Vanished, and all the strange things on this ship, which one looked safe?

From an outsider’s view, it even seemed that this “Captain Duncan” was the most dangerous thing on the Boundless Sea.

Duncan let out a breath. Without noticing, his expression relaxed a little, and he asked in a casual, chatty tone: “I want to know – if I throw you off the ship again, what will you do?”

Alice blinked. “Will you stuff in cannonballs this time?”

“No.”

“Then will you nail it shut?”

“Uh… no.”

“Pour in lead?”

“No… Ahem. I mean, if I refuse to let you stay on the ship…”

“Then I’ll just paddle back again,” Alice said, sitting there with perfect poise and a calm face. “I don’t want to be swallowed by this sea. At least your ship gives me a place to stay.”

Duncan was shocked by how frank this doll was, to the point that for a moment he did not know whether to call her honest or thick-skinned. After thinking for a while, he finally managed: “You could be a bit more tactful…”

“You already know the answer anyway, don’t you?” Alice said with a smile. “But if I come back again, I might find some place in the cabin to hide so you won’t notice me. I won’t rush onto the deck in such a loud way again. I haven’t been awake for long. I didn’t think things through when I came back those last times, but now I have experience…”

Duncan cut her off. “My senses cover the whole ship. I can even tell where every wave hits the hull.”

The rest of Alice’s words were instantly stuck in her throat. “Ah…”

Duncan went on, still looking calm: “And I could also choose to destroy you outright, using a more thorough way to keep you from clinging to me and my Vanished.”

The doll seemed to have truly never considered that possibility. Her eyes widened on reflex, and then there was a click at her neck…

The now headless doll fumbled to catch her own head and started hastily pressing it back onto her neck. The mood Duncan had been trying to build collapsed at once. He could only sigh with a helpless smile. Only after Alice put her head back on did he continue: “But I’ve suddenly decided that having one more crew member on this ship isn’t a bad thing. If you can behave yourself on this ship, I can give you a position.”

“You should have said that earlier! My head almost got scared off!”

In the end Duncan could not stop the corner of his eye from twitching. “So what is wrong with your neck anyway?”

Alice looked innocent. “I don’t know! I don’t usually get that many chances to ‘come out and move around’. How would I know why my body has this kind of problem…”

Duncan quietly looked at Alice for a few seconds, then said with a straight face: “Looks like long-term bed rest is bad for your neck.”

Alice: “…”

Looking at the speechless doll, Duncan suddenly felt a bit better.

“All right. In short, the Vanished has a new crew member now – come with me, I’ll arrange a place for you to rest.”

Chapter 14: The Harmless New Crew Member

The Vanished was large, startlingly large. As a ship driven by sails, its size in Duncan's eyes had almost gone beyond what was necessary.

Such a size meant larger holds, more cannons, a sturdier structure, and a more stable posture when facing wind and waves. All of this meant it was more than enough to face the harshest challenges of long voyages.

But at the moment, Duncan had no plans for any so-called long voyage. This oversized ghost ship only brought him a sense of loneliness. So if there could be one more "crew member" on board that he could talk to, it would be no bad thing at all.

In any case, this big ship had plenty of vacant "guest rooms".

Footsteps broke the silence in the corridor. Duncan led that gothic doll down the wooden stairs and came to the cabins on the lower level beneath the aft deck. This place lay directly under the captain's cabin. From the layout, it should count as the "upper-class quarters" on this big ship. Compared with the darker, gloomier areas farther below, where a faint eerie air lingered, this place at least seemed bright and tidy.

Duncan stopped in front of a crew cabin, then casually pushed open the half-closed wooden door.

Inside was a small single room with simple furnishings.

There were several such single cabins on the ship, but they had all been vacant for a long time. There was no trace that anyone had ever used them.

When he first explored the upper levels of the Vanished, Duncan had already noticed these empty rooms. He had not thought much of them at the time. But now that he personally held command of this ghost ship and knew the secret of its ability to sail on its own, a question had surfaced in his mind.

Since this ship did not need any crew members at all… then who were these crew cabins prepared for?

The single cabins in the upper deck were clearly prepared for officers such as the first mate, second mate, and boatswain. In the lower levels there were also crowded bunk rooms prepared for ordinary crew members. Besides that, the ship even had a dining hall and a game room meant for many people to use. Unlike the sails and ropes that needed no human hands to control them, the presence of these facilities themselves meant they had been prepared for “people”.

Yet this ship did not need any crew members.

Duncan frowned slightly. He had already realized that, at some point in its history, this ghost ship that now sailed alone on the sea… must have had a crew.

At least when this ship was first built, it had been designed with proper living quarters for seafarers.

So what had actually happened to make the ship end up like this? Where had the original crew gone? Had the real “Captain Duncan” always been the master of this vessel? And how much inside knowledge did that strange Goathead know?

“Captain?” a puzzled voice suddenly came from behind him.

Duncan’s thoughts were cut off at once, and he jumped. The next moment he realized that it was the voice of that doll girl—he had actually forgotten about Alice’s presence for a moment.

Over these past days, Duncan had grown used to being the only living person on this ship. He had also grown used to the chatter of that noisy Goathead. Now that an extra person, Alice, had suddenly appeared, he actually felt a little unaccustomed.

“My name is Duncan. You can call me Captain Duncan—of course, just calling me Captain is also up to you,” Duncan quickly adjusted his expression, then turned to look at the doll girl following behind him. “From now on this empty room is yours. Go in and take a look.”

“Ah, all right!” Alice nodded. She first craned her neck to peek over Duncan’s shoulder at the room, then turned around to grab the wooden box that had been floating behind her the whole time. She hoisted it up onto her shoulder and carefully carried it into the room.

The sight of the “coffin” that never left Alice’s side made the corner of Duncan’s mouth twitch. He watched the doll girl set the “coffin” carefully beside the bunk, then check the velvet lining inside with extra care before she finally began to look around at the furnishings. At last he could not help but speak: “Are you going to carry that box with you all the time?”

“Yes,” Alice answered as if it were only natural. “Otherwise where would I put it?”

“This box used to be your seal. I thought you would mind that,” Duncan frowned. “But it seems you can’t leave it now.”

“It was those people who sealed me, not the box’s fault,” Alice sat down on the box as she spoke and patted the lid. “Would you like to come in and sit for a while?”

Duncan shook his head. “No need. How do you feel about this room?”

“Ah, it’s very nice.” Alice looked quite happy. She looked around at the simple furnishings as if she were standing in a splendid palace. “Is that a wardrobe? I don’t have any clothes to change into, so I probably won’t use it… but having a cabinet is nice. Oh, and a table. I can put things on it in the future, though I don’t think I have anything to put on it… maybe I can use it for my head? It would be more convenient when I comb my hair…”

“So long as you are satisfied.” Watching a gothic doll sit on a coffin and plan out her life was a very strange sight, especially when that plan already included some very suspicious details. Even so, a faint smile slowly appeared on Duncan’s face. He stepped back half a pace, his expression returning to normal. “You can rest here for a while and get used to the environment.

“Other than the stairs going down, you can move freely on this level and on the deck above. The layout here is not complicated. You should be able to learn where everything is soon.

“I will be in the captain’s cabin. If you need anything, you can come find me there. If I am not inside, there is a talking Goathead on the chart table. He is my first mate.”

Alice had been listening and nodding along. When she heard the last two sentences, her eyes suddenly widened. “Goathead?! That black wooden carving?!”

“So you have already noticed it.”

“I did notice it… but you say it can talk?! And it is your first mate?” Alice’s face was full of amazement. “I thought it was just… that is unbelievable!”

“…You are a doll that can walk and talk,” Duncan looked at Alice with a straight face. “And you still think a talking Goathead is unbelievable?”

Alice froze for a second. She lowered her head and looked at her own hands, then muttered as if she had just realized something: “Ah… I suppose so?”

Duncan shook his head and turned to leave. “That’s it then. Rest here. Come find me if you need anything.”

Alice’s voice came from behind him: “All right, Captain.”

After leaving, Duncan did not go anywhere else. He went straight back to his own captain’s cabin and sat down beside the wide chart table. The wooden Goathead on the table immediately stirred and creaked as it turned its head toward Duncan.

“Ah! The Captain has returned! It seems you have settled that young lady in! You see, just as I said, she is a gentle and harmless young lady. She will not hinder your voyage in the least and can help keep you company so you do not feel bored. I see you have already decided to keep her on the ship. Are you planning to assign her any duties? The Vanished does not need many hands. The deck cleans the deck, the cannons polish the cannons, the water tanks tend to the water tanks… perhaps she could manage the galley? You never seemed very satisfied with the food on board… Ah, speaking of food, we should first replenish some provisions. The salted meat and hard cheese in the storeroom may be a little too old by now. Rough seafarers will not be picky about what they eat at sea, but the great Captain Duncan certainly-”

Duncan felt as if his brain were about to boil. In that moment he once again became certain of one thing: with this noisy Goathead around, he really did need a “normal person to talk to” like Alice!

“Quiet,” he snapped, glaring at the Goathead. Only after the latter fell silent did he go on: “You stayed very quiet while Alice was here. I thought you had finally learned how to hold your tongue.”

“One must not interrupt when the Captain is interviewing a new crew member. That is the rule at sea, even for your loyal first mate and second mate and boatswain and-”

Duncan did not wait for Goathead to finish. In fact, if he did not interrupt, this Goathead would never finish. “Keep an eye on that doll these next few days.”

“Ah… ah? Keep an eye on that young lady? You still do not trust her? Oh, oh, that is true. A necessary degree of caution is what a captain-”

“She has many secrets, and she did not tell them all. Perhaps it is because she truly does not know some of them. Or perhaps… she is hiding things on purpose,” Duncan said calmly. “Whatever the case, she is still a ‘cursed Doll’, and she bears the label ‘Anomaly 099’. On that ship before, they used layer after layer of seals to keep Alice from ever leaving that wooden box. Now the sealed doll is strolling about quite freely on my ship. I need to take a little time to make sure that Alice really is a harmless doll… at least harmless while she is on the Vanished.”

Chapter 15: Touching the Flame

After he took the helm with his own hands, Duncan truly held control over the Vanished. He could also sense any movement anywhere on the ship. Even so, out of caution, he still ordered Goathead to keep constant watch over the “cursed Doll”.

He knew he was no expert in the field of occult studies. He knew little about the supernatural forces of this world. A doll that could walk and talk was far beyond his knowledge. Alice’s behavior might be harmless, but if that doll girl had any effects that could not be seen with the naked eye, he would very likely fail to notice them.

In this respect, Goathead was more professional than he was.

Even putting that aside, Duncan knew he could not watch over the Vanished every moment. Although he had already decided to live on this side of the world, when necessary he would still have to return to the other world behind the door. At that time, he might not be able to sense anything happening on the Vanished.

When he thought of this last point, Duncan’s eyes changed slightly. Without a word, he glanced at Goathead on the edge of the chart table. The obsidian-carved eyes of the latter answered with a hollow gaze.

When he went back to the other side of the door, when he returned to his small single apartment… would this Goathead sense it? When he left the Vanished, what was the situation on the ship?

These questions that suddenly rose in his mind made Duncan feel somewhat restless. Under Goathead's hollow gaze, however, he did not show anything. Instead, he split off a bit of attention to check on Alice's situation.

Of course, he had no habit of peeping. That did not change even when the other party was a "non-human being". He only roughly sensed what was happening below the deck. Even with just the information passed through his link with the Vanished, he could at least tell where Alice was and whether she was trying to damage anything.

After all, beneath the harmless, elegant, and pretty exterior of that doll girl lay the essence of a cursed Doll, a dangerous individual that ordinary people in this world called "Anomaly 099".

She was still in her room. She really might just be examining the furnishings and setting up a place to rest.

Duncan let out a small breath. At the same time, Goathead suddenly spoke beside him: "Captain, what are your plans next? If you are feeling bored, your loyal-"

"Quiet." Duncan glanced at Goathead, then pressed both hands on the edge of the chart table. As his thoughts shifted, the feeling he had when his hands were on the helm rose up once more. The emerald flame once again flowed like water.

In the burning blaze, Duncan's body once more became a spirit form. The streaming fire spread out from the chart table, flowed out of the captain's cabin, up to the upper deck, climbed the masts and the rigging, and made the translucent Spirit-Sails on the masts billow in the wind.

As the many main sails, side sails, and jibs adjusted their angles nimbly in the sea breeze, the huge three-masted ship began to slowly pick up speed on the vast, boundless ocean. Duncan's gaze fell on the enchanted sea chart in front of him. As he had expected, the grayish white mist that had been coiled over the enchanted sea chart changed at once. The silhouette that represented the Vanished started to move slowly forward, and the mist around the silhouette faded away along with it.

After a brief moment of thought, he tried to focus his attention on the enchanted sea chart. The faint emerald flame wrapped around the chart table, extending his will as the captain. In this subtle “connection”, Duncan finally became vaguely aware of the secret of this enchanted item.

With a thought, the silhouette on the enchanted sea chart that represented the Vanished suddenly grew a little larger, then at once shrank back to its original size.

Duncan was “zooming” the scene shown on the enchanted sea chart, and this fanciful attempt actually worked. For now, no matter how he zoomed in or out, the edges of the enchanted sea chart still showed nothing but fog. Yet Duncan was already sure that this chart could record every inch of ocean that the Vanished had explored. It could also present the details around the Vanished precisely and in real time!

Under Goathead’s hollow gaze, Duncan’s face did not change at all. He looked as cold and serious as a true captain calmly studying the enchanted sea chart. Even so, a faint excitement rose in his heart.

His eyes swept over the flames rising from his own body. His mind sensed the state of the Vanished and the changes in the enchanted sea chart.

This strange green fire really was the key to controlling the Vanished, and also the key to controlling many of the eerie objects on this ship.

Perhaps… this was the power of the Captain?

Duncan pondered this Power of Flame. He understood very well that, if he wanted to truly master this ship and survive in this strange world by taking the ship as his foundation, he had to understand his own abilities.

First, he had to gain full control over this flame.

As for the “plans” Goathead had just asked about…

Duncan looked at the enchanted sea chart as it slowly changed in front of him, and at the mist slowly clearing around the silhouette of the Vanished. His intentions were very simple.

Since he knew too little about this world, since the whole map was still covered in fog, then revealing the map first could not be wrong.

After all, one set sail in order to roam the seas.

Anyway, in the minds of the people of this world, “Captain Duncan” was already a world boss that wandered the wild places everywhere. Even if he and the Vanished behaved and stayed at sea, that would not improve his reputation in the slightest.

As for whether there would be any danger in sailing aimlessly like this, Duncan had his own view: before he took the helm himself, this ship had already been drifting everywhere. The Vanished had never dropped anchor or moored anywhere, so where would any “extra risk” come from?

Compared with that former blind drifting, sailing with the sails up at least let him disperse the fog on the enchanted sea chart. This meant he was no longer completely passive and lost in the mist.

Duncan rose from behind the chart table. The green flames on his body slowly faded. Yet in his perception, the translucent Spirit-Sails on the Vanished’s masts did not vanish with them. Some of the green fire clinging to the masts and rigging still burned, continuing to carry out the captain’s will.

Combined with what he had observed the last time he held the helm, Duncan had a faint understanding in his heart.

Although the Spirit-Sails had only flared up in the blaze after he “took the helm”, neither the towering sails nor all the self-moving things on the ship actually relied on the captain’s own power. This ghost ship had its own source of power.

He still did not know what kind of “energy” made the ship move. But it was clear that all he needed to do as captain was to give the ship its orders.

Then the ship would faithfully carry out the captain’s commands.

Duncan stepped away from the chart table and turned his head to look at the small door at the very back of the captain’s cabin.

Behind that door was his private bedroom as captain. During his first few days exploring the ship, he had always used that room as his resting place.

Now he needed a quieter environment in order to study what else he could do as the captain of the Vanished.

Before that, however, someone still had to watch over this ship that was already in full sail.

He looked at the wooden Goathead on the edge of the chart table and spoke in a very matter-of-fact tone: “You take the helm.”

“Ah?” Goathead froze for a moment, sounding a little surprised. “But Captain, you-”

“I have things to do. Do not disturb me during this time.” Duncan seemed not to care about anything Goathead wanted to say. He simply gave his orders in a completely natural way. At the same time, in his other layer of awareness, through the information carried along the deck by the spreading green fire, he could clearly see the many… connections hidden deep within the ship.

Masts, rigging, sails, rudder, cannons…

Everything was connected in the unseen. Some kind of “nerves” or “blood vessels” ran through the entire ship, and all of these connections ultimately converged in the captain’s cabin.

Goathead was faintly linked to all of it.

Perhaps this mysterious and eerie Goathead was the Vanished itself. Or perhaps it was some kind of “control mechanism” meant to take over the whole ship in an emergency.

Duncan was not the one who had built this ship, so naturally he did not know how it worked. Still, he thought that the real Captain Duncan must know what Goathead was capable of.

From another angle, since Goathead always called himself the “first mate”, it was only natural that he should be able to take the helm in the captain’s place when the situation required it.

Duncan had to take a small risk and do something he had never done before, but which a true captain had to know and would certainly do.

After all, a captain had to rest at some point.

One second later, Goathead let out a cheerful and noisy cry. “Ah, yes, Captain. You can focus on your work. Your loyal-”

Duncan paid him no attention. He only waved his hand casually, turned, walked into the bedroom at the back of the captain’s cabin, and shut the door behind him.

Chapter 16: Walking the Spirit Realm

The door closed behind him, shutting out Goathead's hollow gaze.

Yet Duncan could still clearly sense the Vanished and every small change on this ghost ship. In that shared perception that felt like an extra limb, he "saw" a series of sails on the Vanished finely adjusting their angles to the sea breeze, while the black wheel on the steering platform at the stern turned slightly, making the Vanished even steadier on the waves.

As he had expected, Goathead had temporarily taken over the helm and was carefully carrying out his duties as First Mate. But Duncan could still seize control of the ship himself at any time.

Compared with when he steered it directly, the Vanished was now a little slower and less nimble. But Duncan's main goal right now was to disperse more of the fog on the enchanted sea chart. He had no clear destination or route anyway, so he did not care about this small loss.

After he confirmed that Goathead showed no unusual movement and that the special Doll made by that Brother under the deck was also staying quietly in its room, Duncan let out a small breath and looked around the not very large cabin.

This was his private captain's cabin and also the most comfortable and refined room on the Vanished. Besides a soft bed, there was a classical wardrobe by the wall opposite the door and a shelf holding many strange monstrous curios. Across from the bed stood a dark brown desk, but there were no books on it, only a few ornaments and tools for writing and drawing.

Beside the desk there was a window that looked straight out over the distant sea. On the wall next to the window hung several hooks. The pirate sword and flintlock pistol Duncan now carried had originally hung from those hooks.

Duncan walked to the desk, set the sword and pistol within easy reach, then opened a drawer and checked the powder and lead bullets stored in a wooden box.

A small brass spirit compass lay beside the bullets and powder bag. Duncan picked it up and saw that the needle under the glass cover still spun wildly, as if it was always dragged by an invisible field of chaos. A line of tiny words was engraved on the base of the spirit compass.

“We are all The Lost Ones.”

Duncan turned the spirit compass idly in his hand, watching the needle spin around like a drunk.

He had checked everything here many times. He had found this room during his first explorations, and the things inside, including that one line of words, were most likely left behind by the original Captain Duncan.

After he went over all the information he had in his mind, Duncan let out a breath, set the spirit compass back on the desk, and lifted his right hand to rub his fingertips together.

A tiny green flame lit at his fingertips. In its glow, half of Duncan’s hand turned transparent and unreal, almost like a spirit form. But under his conscious control, the flame did not spread everywhere as it had before. It stayed in place above his finger like the flame of a candle.

When the flame steadied, Duncan brought his other hand close to feel it. Then he took a quill from the side and touched the flame with the end of the pen.

He felt no heat. The quill did not catch fire. Only a faint green color spread along the shaft, making the pen glow with a ghostly light.

Duncan did not “feel” any feedback from the quill at all. That was completely different from when he had touched the enchanted sea chart and the helm with the flame.

Duncan quietly noted this new experience in his mind. This spirit form fire had no temperature and did not ignite things. It most likely only reacted to Anomaly objects on the Vanished and gave no feedback at all when it touched ordinary things.

Then what if it touched an Anomaly that came from outside the Vanished? Would the flame react?

Duncan thought about it. For a moment, the image of a certain Brother’s special Doll flashed in his mind. Alice seemed to be an Anomaly that came from outside the Vanished.

Would she be affected by this spirit form fire?

But he only thought about it for a moment, then pushed this wild idea aside.

Because even though Alice was not human and carried the curse as Anomaly 099, she was also an independent being who could walk and talk and had her own thoughts. Now she was also a crew member of the Vanished. Duncan had already started to treat her as a “person” without thinking about it.

He could not accept using a living person to test his flame. After all, he still was not sure what lasting effects it would have on an affected Anomaly, or whether it would be harmful.

After that, Duncan ran a few more tests. He studied the nature of the flame while also checking whether any of the items in the cabin had any hidden supernatural traits.

In the end, his gaze fell again on the small brass spirit compass with the message on it.

The brass spirit compass lay quietly on the desk, its needle spinning madly under the glass. Duncan kept the flame burning as he fixed a rather unfriendly stare on the needle, and for a moment he thought he saw it freeze.

Then it went right back to spinning in place as if nothing had happened.

Duncan: "…"

This thing had definitely reacted to his gaze just now!

He had been wary of this spirit compass from the beginning. It still bore the handwriting of the original Captain Duncan, and he worried that the dead ghost captain might have left some power or "trap" on this personal item to guard against thieves. Because of that, he had never tested the spirit compass with his flame. But after seeing it react, he suddenly made up his mind.

Duncan reached out and picked up the spirit compass. The cold touch flowed into his fingertips. After one glance at the still-spinning needle, he set the thing in his right hand, the one that held the spirit form fire, and slowly closed his fingers around it.

The pale green flame flowed at once like burning oil, seeping between his fingers. A layer of ghostly fire spread over the surface of the spirit compass. Countless phantoms rose and faded in the light. In the next instant, the wildly spinning needle jerked to a stop and pointed straight toward some place in the vast sea.

Duncan’s heart stirred. For one brief moment, he clearly felt the “feedback” coming from the spirit compass and confirmed that it was indeed an Anomaly that his spirit form fire could control. But before he could study the details of that feedback, a sudden “pull” slammed into him.

Duncan only felt his body sway. In the next second, his vision blurred. The furnishings of the captain’s cabin vanished without a trace. The walls and ceiling broke apart and dissolved like falling snow. In the drifting fragments of light and shadow, endless darkness filled his sight.

Stunned, Duncan stood at the center of the gloom, every alarm in his mind ringing. His first reaction was to reach for the pistol and sword that should have been at his side, but a moment later he found that only the brass spirit compass remained. He was still gripping it in his hand.

Duncan blinked. In his sight, countless fine threads of light suddenly spread out around the brass spirit compass.

These lines of light spread through the darkness, weaving together and stretching outward like a growing net. In the gaps where the light crossed, countless points of starlight appeared. Some floated alone. Some gathered into streams like rivers. Against the web of shining threads, they formed a brilliant starry river.

Duncan watched these visions in front of him in confusion. He was on guard and a little uneasy, but for some reason he did not feel any real sense of danger. In fact…

Among the dim web of light and scattered stars, he instead felt a long-lost sense of peace and comfort.

A moment later, a strange feeling came over him. Duncan’s eyes were drawn against his will to one cluster of starlight in the net. When he looked at it, he felt that the light was shaking and about to fall, as if it would sink into the dark at any second.

He reached out toward that starlight without thinking.

At that moment, a huge force pulled at him. Duncan felt as if his very soul flew up. He rushed toward the starlight that was about to fall into the dark. The dense web woven by the spirit compass rushed backward in his vision, and the starry river around him suddenly began to twist and spin.

As he hurtled forward, he glanced down at his right hand that had been gripping the spirit compass, only to see that the compass had vanished at some point. At the same time, just before he touched the dim star of light, he caught a shadow forming in the darkness out of the corner of his eye.

The shadow appeared as naturally as if it had always been at his side and fell with him toward the dim point of light.

Duncan only vaguely saw that the shadow seemed to be a bird with its wings spread. Before he could make out any details, his vision went black.

Heavy sensations from the Mortal Realm world rushed into his limbs. With them came the stench of rotting flesh and the harsh sound of heavy chains scraping along the ground.

Chapter 17: The Cave

Cold. Damp. The stench of rotten meat. The scrape of chains against stone.

Many strange sensations flooded into Duncan’s mind, but for a time he could not manage to open his eyes. He felt as if his soul had been split in two. One part still stayed on the Vanished, while the other part had been stuffed into a completely unfamiliar body. This body was hard to control, like an old broken machine. A rush of mixed and chaotic sensations ran through its nervous system, wrapped in a dull and numb feeling. He tried to open his eyes and move his fingers, but he could not feel those parts of the body at all.

This awful feeling lasted for several seconds before the numbness and slowness in the nerves finally began to fade. Duncan felt his “body” waking from a long winter sleep and slowly regaining the ability to move.

He finally opened his eyes and saw what lay around him.

He saw a dim space that looked like an underground chamber. Torches burned on the distant stone walls, and their shaking light showed a terrible scene all around. Duncan saw many people, or rather, many dead bodies, thrown in a jumble on the wet muddy ground and rocks. Most wore ragged clothes. A few still had whole garments on their bodies.

Drops of water fell from the top of the cave. In the distance he could faintly hear the sound of dirty water flowing, like an underground river or a sewer. The sound of chains scraping seemed to come from the depths of a passageway that led off from the cave, and it was already fading.

Duncan blinked, trying to understand what had happened. He lowered his head and looked at his right hand. It was a thin, completely unfamiliar hand, with tattered sleeves around the arm. The brass spirit compass he had been holding the whole time was already gone.

He lifted his head and looked to his side. He still remembered that when he had moved through that starry web of light, he had seen a shadow following him. The outline of that shadow had looked like some kind of bird. But now, of course, he saw nothing.

That bird-like shadow seemed not to have come with him into this Mortal Realm space.

Duncan slowly flexed his hand, forcing down his nervousness. Then he tried rubbing his fingers together.

A very weak green flame rose from his fingertips.

To be honest, this little flame looked much weaker than what Duncan was used to, but it still made him feel a bit calmer. As the flame burned, his still-confused mind also steadied, and he felt more clearly a certain tearing and connection on the level of his spirit.

He clearly sensed that the other part of his spirit was not here. He sensed the Vanished, and sensed himself sitting at the desk there, with the brass spirit compass in his hand.

This feeling was very strange, but Duncan quickly began to understand what was happening.

His spirit had gone through some kind of projection, or extension. A part of his mind had crossed a distance he could not guess and had now slipped into another unfamiliar body.

And even in this projected state, he could still clearly feel the existence of his “real body”.

This had to be connected to the brass spirit compass. Was this the power of that Anomaly item?

Some guesses rose in Duncan's mind, but he did not let them run wild for long. After he confirmed that his real body was still safe and that his spirit was still under his control, only temporarily placed in this distant, nameless body, he calmed down a little and got ready to find out what was going on with this "new body".

First, he could be sure that this place was not on any ship.

This was land, the land he had drifted on the sea for so many days without finding!

Second, this gloomy cave clearly was not a good place. The bodies thrown all around did not look like any kind of proper burial. As for the body he now occupied… just what bad luck had trapped it in this mortal hell?

Duncan took a deep breath and pushed himself up to sit. This body had been leaning against a large rock the whole time, and the pose had not been comfortable at all.

But as he breathed in and sat up, a huge sense of wrongness rushed through the body. He felt the air he had drawn in spill right out again. A strange, empty feeling came from his chest, and even the motion of getting up felt twisted.

Startled, Duncan lowered his head and saw a big hole.

The hole gaped where the heart should have been. Everything that had once been there was, of course, gone. A chill wind blew through the opening, carrying with it the breath Duncan had just taken in and not yet let go. It drifted out into the damp air.

From a certain angle, Duncan could even clearly see the scene behind his own back.

“What the hell?!”

Even with nerves as tough as his, even after all the strange sights he had seen on the Vanished, Duncan still broke out in a cold sweat for a moment. Goosebumps rose on his skin in waves, and every hair on his body stood on end.

But right after that sharp shock, he realized that he was still standing here in one piece and even had the strength to curse.

Even with his heart gone and a huge hole in his chest, he did not feel any pain at all from this body.

“So this is… a corpse?”

A moment later, Duncan came to his senses. He understood his situation more fully and quickly calmed down.

Taking over a corpse and making it move might not be something worth too much fuss. After all, he already had a ghost ship that could sail on its own and a wooden goat First Mate who could nag a person until their brain boiled. Lately he had also met a cursed Doll who could split up and act alone and was good at riding the winds and waves on the Boundless Sea. Which of those things was not more shocking than “a dead man talking”?

At least he had only lost his heart. Alice’s head was often not on her neck at all…

With all these wild thoughts spinning in his mind, Duncan steadied himself faster than he would have believed. He checked how well this body could move and slowly got used to how the hole in his chest changed his motions. Then he stepped toward the bodies thrown around the cave.

“As I thought…”

Duncan looked at the first corpse and did not feel surprised at all when he saw the horrible hole in its chest.

It was a middle-aged man with a haggard face and ragged clothes, who looked like a beggar from the street. He had been dead for a long time, but his eyes were still wide open in anger, showing the struggle and despair of his last moment.

Duncan walked on and saw one corpse after another that had lost its heart. They lay miserably on the cold stone. Only two were different. Those two had terrible wounds on their heads, as if they had slammed into the rocks with great force and died on the spot.

Duncan could not help making a guess. Perhaps these two had killed themselves before they could suffer the pain of having their hearts cut out.

To be honest, what lay in this cave would be far too much for an ordinary person. Even Duncan felt it was hard to take after walking around and checking all the bodies. In the end he had to find a relatively clean rock a bit farther away and sit down. He slowly steadied himself and, as he cooled down, tried to work out the truth behind all this.

It was clear that this was a shocking mass murder. But from the cold, uniform way the victims had been killed, it seemed to be more than murder. It hinted at some kind of evil ritual.

Duncan called out the spirit form flame again and felt the link between himself and his real body. He knew he could cut off this “projected state” at any time and return to the safety of the Vanished.

But he felt that he had to find out what had happened here.

Even if it was only to gain some information about the land.

Duncan let out a breath and felt the wind leaking through his chest. He rose from the rock where he had been resting and looked toward the passage that led deeper into the cave. He remembered that the sound of chains scraping had come from that direction.

There were not only bodies in this underground space. Other people were moving here as well. Those who could move freely in a place this horrible should be able to give him some answers.

Rushing in to check the situation would of course not be very safe, but Duncan did not care.

After all, his heart was wide open now.

Chapter 18: Sewer

Before leaving the cave where he had been hiding, Duncan first tore some rags from the nearby corpses and wrapped them around himself.

It was not because he could not stand the chill in the cave, but to cover his open chest a little. The hole in his chest did not affect Duncan's "life" at all, yet as someone who was a normal person at heart, walking around with a completely chilled chest felt a bit too strange. Putting something over it at least gave him some comfort and lessened the eerie feeling of the "draft" blowing through him.

Duncan also thought about the chance of suddenly running into other people in this underground space. By common sense, having a big hole in his chest would probably not help when talking with strangers…

So after this simple treatment of his "wound", Duncan carefully left the gloomy, damp cave. He stepped into a passage connected to the cave and slowly walked deeper inside.

This temporary body he occupied was not "convenient". The fatal damage in his chest did not only hurt his flexibility. Duncan could clearly feel how weak this body was. The arms and legs were so thin that even walking was slow. It was nothing like the body of the ghost captain, which was so strong it clearly went beyond that of a mortal.

Duncan could not see this whole body yet, but from the parts he could see, he guessed it belonged to a teenage boy. A boy whose body had grown weak from long-term, severe malnutrition. Even though a powerful ghost captain’s soul was controlling this body now, the strength of the soul did not seem able to break the physical limits of such a frail vessel.

Sadly, he had no other choice now. Duncan could only control this barely usable body and slowly explore the deep passage. He knew that with this temporary body, he would be helpless in any real danger. All he could do was pray this shell would last a little longer.

The passage was deep, damp, and dark, but there seemed to be hidden vents. A faint airflow kept moving past nearby. Every so often, he saw torches or oil lamps hanging on the walls. Their presence proved that people still came here.

After following the passage for quite a long distance, Duncan suddenly saw the road ahead open up. Traces of human construction appeared in his view. At the end of the passage there was a fork. The passages connected to it had smooth walls and high half-round arches. The brick floor was black and wet. Along both sides, two channels flowed with nauseating sewage.

On the walls to both sides of the path, he could also see openings that looked like drain pipes. Sewage poured out from some of these outlets into the channels below and flowed toward an even darker distance.

“…A sewer?”

Duncan reacted quickly. What lay before him was clearly a rather large sewer system. The place that had held so many bodies earlier must have been a natural cave that happened to connect to this sewer.

A huge sewer, a natural cavern connected to it, and hidden corpses.

Countless guesses flashed through Duncan’s mind. While his thoughts spun, he carefully studied every detail of this “sewer”.

It was large in scale and finely built. The main supporting parts seemed to be made of reinforced concrete. If needed, it could probably even serve as some kind of underground shelter.

To build something of this size, the city above the sewer had to be quite large. Its technology must also have reached a certain level.

Technology did not exist in isolation. Behind every piece of engineering there had to be countless related industries and techniques supporting it. Even a sewer could show Duncan the construction, planning, materials, and maintenance level behind it, as well as the residents' way of life.

This was enough for Duncan, who was now badly short on information, to gain some valuable knowledge about the civilized world.

Duncan walked along the sewer. After only a short distance, he suddenly stopped, and his gaze fell on a nearby wall.

A lamp was set into the wall. It had a glass shell, and outside it there was a metal cage that looked quite sturdy.

Compared with the torches and oil lamps he had seen in the cave, this wall lamp was clearly brighter. Inside the frosted glass, a bright flame burned steadily. Its light was enough to illuminate a long stretch of the sewer.

Duncan moved closer and examined it carefully. For him now, anything from outside the Vanished, especially creations of modern civilization, held great appeal.

After studying it for a while, Duncan finally understood what this light source was. It was a gas lamp.

But this gas lamp seemed a little different from the ones he had seen in books. Besides its shape, the most obvious difference was a few thin symbols on the glass cover.

The symbols seemed to have been added when the lamp was first made. They curved and twisted like pictographs. Duncan did not know these symbols, but he was reminded at once of the mysterious runes he had seen on that mechanical ship and on Alice's "coffin".

Although the content was different, they had a similar… "feeling".

It was something sacred, something ritual.

Duncan stepped back a bit. He looked toward the deeper part of the sewer and saw a bright gas lamp burning every so often along the walls.

For an underground facility that almost no one visited except for necessary maintenance, the lighting here even felt a bit excessive. And on the shell of each gas lamp, there might be similar mysterious "runes".

This gave Duncan a feeling, as if these densely spaced gas lamps were actually fighting against something in this deserted underground darkness. As if the humans of the civilized world behind them were fighting against something.

Duncan walked along the path lit by the gas lamps. At the same time, his eyes watched the surrounding walls, floor, and arches for any useful clues. Suddenly, out of the corner of his eye, he noticed something odd.

He stopped between two gas lamps. This was one of the darker sections in the sewer. He looked up at a slant and saw that high on the wall, near the arch of the sewer, dark red paint had been used to draw something.

Duncan narrowed his eyes and tried hard to make it out. At last he saw what those rough lines formed. He saw many hands reaching up toward the sky, as if devoutly worshiping something. In the direction those hands crowded toward, a sphere hung high, shining with blazing light.

Under this picture of worship and crowding, there was a line of crooked writing. The strokes trembled, as if filled with intense fanaticism and expectation. The letters were not from any script on Earth, yet Duncan understood them naturally—

“The False Sun will fall in the end. The true Sun God will be reborn from blood and fire! All life returns to the Sun, all order returns to the Sun!”

Duncan stood silently in the sewer. He raised his head, staring at the dim border of the gas lamps’ light, staring at the dark red graffiti, staring at that blazing Sun that seemed soaked in blood and worshiped by crazed believers.

It was as if he had been staring at another world for a long time.

He stayed like this for a long while, until a burst of noise suddenly came from deeper in the sewer. Several footsteps reached Duncan’s ears.

He quickly turned his head toward the sound and saw a few robed, hooded figures walking over from ahead. Their heads and faces were hidden in the shadows of their hoods, like grim ghosts appearing in the filthy depths of the sewer.

Duncan did not hide. In fact, there was almost nowhere to hide in this straight stretch of sewer, and this clumsy, temporary body could not pull off any “blind-spot dodging” tricks. So after thinking it over for a moment, he simply stood in the middle of the sewer and calmly watched the very suspicious hooded figures walking toward him.

Since this body could not run and was doomed to be a one-use shell, he might as well trade it for a little more information before it was gone.

The next second, the hooded figures coming from the depths of the sewer noticed Duncan.

Chapter 19: Underground Assembly Hall

The robed, hooded figures naturally noticed Duncan, who stood in the middle of the path without dodging.

Duncan still looked the way he had when he first left the cave. His thin and dried-up body wore tattered clothes. The rags he had wrapped around his upper body hid the big hole in his chest. He stood in the middle of the path, looking as if he had been frightened still by the sudden appearance of these “hooded people”. The robed figures were clearly surprised too. They froze for a moment, and then the one in the lead suddenly shouted: “A sacrificial victim has escaped!”

Right after that, Duncan saw them running toward him. One of them shouted as he ran: “Hurry! Cut him off! Don’t let him get away!”

Duncan shrugged. He just kept watching these figures who, in every way, did not look like good people, running toward him while his face stayed blank. After weighing the situation, he had no intention of running at all. But the people on the other side still shouted as they charged: “Don’t let him run!” “A sacrificial victim has escaped!”

Duncan’s honest choice to stand there without moving actually made the whole scene awkward. The ones who were running and shouting clearly felt something was wrong halfway. Their cries stopped on their own, yet they still had to keep running toward him. Duncan could almost smell the mix of embarrassment and anger from under their dark hoods. Then these embarrassed and angry people surrounded him from front, back, left, and right.

Only then did Duncan look around at the figures around him. After hesitating for a moment, he said: “Should I have tried to run just now? The mood seemed to call for it…”

The robed figures acted as if they had not heard Duncan’s dry joke. They only gave him a wary, cautious glance, then turned to look in the direction behind Duncan. Two of them ducked their heads and whispered to each other. Duncan faintly heard what they said:

“Why is there one out here?”

“Did those hounds from the Church find this hideout… but he doesn’t look like someone they let out…”

“We’ll take him back first. There is something wrong with this escaped sacrificial victim… we have to deal with him quickly.”

“Let the Envoy decide.”

Duncan had no idea who these people were, and he did not know what this “Envoy” they mentioned was. But thinking of what he had seen along the way and the word “sacrificial victim” they used, he already had a rough guess about some of the truth here.

He did not know how a “normal sacrificial victim” was supposed to react, and he had no wish to cooperate in their little “play”. He was outside the Vanished now, and using only a temporary body, so he had very little to worry about. After briefly looking around, he simply asked: “Where are you taking me?”

The robed figures were clearly surprised that this “sacrificial victim” spoke so calmly. Even though black veils on their hoods hid their faces completely, Duncan could still guess their expressions. One black-robed man glared at the “sacrificial victim” through his veil and lowered his voice: “You have no right to ask questions — take him.”

Several black-robed men stepped forward at once, but before they could lay hands on him, Duncan took a step on his own and said: “No need to drag me. I’ll go with you.”

The black-robed men looked at each other. They probably thought this “sacrificial victim” was not right in the head. The leader only waved his hand and said: “Even better. You can’t escape anyway… come with us, and you might at least greet glory in a decent way.”

The black-robed men closed in around Duncan, blocking every “escape route” in front and behind, and led him deeper into the sewer.

The foul and dirty smell in the sewer was enough to make anyone sick, but the black-robed men seemed not to notice it at all. They walked calmly along the moldy, filthy path. Duncan followed them in silence, his face blank, while he pricked up his ears to listen to their talk. The black robes did not speak much, but in a few short exchanges, Duncan still heard some useful words, like “Pland”, “governor”, and “Church”.

“This is the city-state of Pland?” Duncan suddenly asked, as calmly as if he were chatting with old friends.

“Obviously…” one of the black-robed men answered without thinking, then suddenly realized something and gave Duncan a startled look. “You’re quite calm, kid. Do you know what’s going to happen next?”

“I can roughly guess,” Duncan said with a nod, even showing a small smile. Then he tested them with another question: “The true Sun God… right?”

The black-robed men clearly paused for a moment. They seemed to get the wrong idea from Duncan’s strange reaction. One of them whispered to his companion: “Wait, could he also be a believer of the Lord?”

“Impossible. He’s clearly an escaped sacrificial victim…” another black robe whispered, then glanced at Duncan. “You are clever, but don’t think that will spare you from the sacrificial rite… Our Lord has already judged your fate. You had better accept it gladly.”

Duncan did not comment. He knew his overly calm reaction had made these suspected cultists imagine the wrong story. They probably thought he was just pretending to be calm and acting as a “believer” to try to live. But only Duncan knew the truth.

This temporary body had trouble even moving normally. The muscles on his face were stiff, as if the nerves at the edges had died… of course all that was left was a calm, blank expression.

He did not care what these cultists thought. He only wanted to gather as much information as possible during this “one-time expedition”. So he casually asked: “You think the ‘Sun’ in the sky now is the False Sun? You think it will fall one day?”

“The false Sun will certainly fall in the end!” This was clearly a topic that could excite these cultists. Duncan got exactly the heated reaction he had hoped for from one of them: “Even those dogs of the Holy See have to admit in the history books that the Sun in the sky only appeared after the Great Annihilation, as a twisted and bizarre thing! The one that truly brought life and order to all things in this world was the Sun God. But our Lord’s divine authority was stolen by that vile impostor… That vile impostor will fall from the sky sooner or later!”

Then Duncan heard the cultists around him all join in: “The False Sun will fall sooner or later!” “The true Sun God will soon awaken!” “The extra seawater in this world will be driven back into the void of deep space by the Sun God’s power. The land will return to an age of plenty and stability!”

As he listened to these cultists, who were clearly getting carried away, Duncan's thoughts spun rapidly. He knew fanatics like these could not be judged by common sense, and what they believed was mostly twisted and altered information. But some of what they let slip was still worth noting—

The "Sun" hanging in the sky was a fake…

The true Sun had had its divine authority stolen…

They believed the true Sun was a fallen deity, and they believed this deity would "rise again from blood and fire"…

They had also spoken of the extra seawater in the world, and of an age of plenty and stability… What did those words mean?

Duncan's mind was full of thoughts, and the cultists soon calmed down again. They still remembered their task, and that they were escorting an escaped "sacrificial victim". The ones closest to Duncan fell back into silence, while the two walking at the very back muttered softly:

"Don't you think this 'sacrificial victim' is a bit strange?"

"Something is off about him… I feel uneasy."

"Maybe when he ran earlier, he stayed too long in the lightless underground, and something down there messed with his mind…"

"All the better. The Lord's power will purify him."

Duncan listened to the talk behind him. He paid special attention to the phrase "lightless underground". Just as he hoped to get more information from their chatter, the black-robed leader stopped walking.

"We are here."

The cultist in the black robe spoke in a low, cold voice.

Duncan felt a hint of regret, but then the sight in front of him took all his attention.

Ahead was the end of this stretch of tunnel, the place where several sewers met. In this wide space, like a small underground hall, there was an assembly of black-robed cultists!

Chapter 20: sacrificial rite

This sewer system was huge. In Duncan’s eyes, it already went far beyond what a city needed just to drain waste. The runed gas lamps everywhere and the reinforced structures that were sturdy enough to act as shelters made him guess a lot about what this underground facility was really built for.

No matter what the builders had in mind at the beginning, one fact was obvious: in the depths of this vast structure, hidden from the eyes of the surface world, this dark, cold place had become a nursery for some kind of evil power.

A Cult that claimed to worship the Sun in name, yet only made people feel a chill.

At the junction of several sewer corridors was a wide underground space. Solid concrete pillars held up a brick-built dome. Metal pipes crossed and joined around the dome like a web. Bright gas lamps lit the whole place and also lit up the crowd that had gathered in this “meeting point”.

At a glance, there were at least hundreds of black-robed figures squeezed into this foul, damp place. In the middle of them was a raised platform. A tall figure in a black robe stood on it. That was clearly the person of highest status among them.

The person on the platform did not wear a hood like the others. Instead, he wore a golden mask. The mask’s design was strange, like a disk that sent endless rays of light spraying outward, but its surface was also covered in many broken cracks.

Behind the masked man stood a strange totem on the platform—a tall wooden pole. A blazing fireball was fixed to the top. The core of that fireball seemed to be some kind of metal. Its surface was full of small holes, and the flames spurted out from those holes.

This was the scene Duncan saw when he was “escorted” here.

The black-robed people gathered in the hall noticed him as well.

“On the way here to the assembly site, we caught a runaway sacrificial victim!” One of the black-robed men who had been escorting him stepped forward and spoke respectfully to the “Leader” on the platform, his tone clearly eager for praise. “This sacrificial victim stayed in the dark for too long. His mind is already a little confused. Please show your power and let our Lord’s glory descend upon this pitiful body!”

The Cult leader on the platform, wearing the Golden Mask, turned around. He stared closely at Duncan’s blank face. His voice held a trace of surprise and coldness: “A runaway sacrificial victim?”

Duncan did not react at all. He only looked around this place with curiosity, including the Golden Sun Mask on the Cult leader’s face and the blazing fireball totem behind him.

Maybe these symbols were strange and eerie to ordinary people in this world. But Duncan saw it almost at a glance. These things were imitating the Sun.

They were not imitating the glowing orb in the sky now, the one bound by torrents of fire and two layers of rune rings. They were imitating the Sun Duncan knew, the Sun that shone with ten thousand rays of light and burned fiercely.

These people really worshipped the Sun. They worshipped a Sun that seemed to have “fallen” in some ancient age, and they worshipped it as a kind of God.

Duncan raised his head. His expression was calm as he used his gaze on the black-robed priest looking down at him from the platform. But maybe because the muscles of this body's face had rotted, that calm look only made him seem even more like some dull, mindless thing in the priest's eyes.

The priest in the Golden Mask stared at Duncan for less than two seconds. Then he turned his head and ordered a person standing beside the platform: "Go check the place where the sacrificial victims are kept. Be quick and report back."

After giving that order, he nodded to the black-robed men who had "escorted" the sacrificial victim back. There was a hint of praise in his tone. "You did well. Even if this is only a tiny merit in our Lord's eyes, when sunlight shines upon all things again, it will become your eternal glory."

It was only a bland, routine compliment, but the black-robed men acted like they had been greatly encouraged. They became excited, praising the "true Sun God" as they pushed Duncan to the front of the platform. Only then did the masked priest finally speak to Duncan: "Poor one who walked onto the wrong path… have you felt the deep cold among lightless rock and mud?"

Duncan did not understand what this charlatan was talking about at all, so he stayed silent. The priest clearly did not care whether this "sacrificial victim" could respond. His words were not really meant for Duncan. They were for the congregation around them, and for the "Sun God" he believed in:

"Cold and darkness are the suffering left to this world by the false Sun. Under the false Sun's rule, the dark ocean of the Abyssal Deep ravages the world. Only scattered, broken pieces of land let living beings cling to life. Yet even on these broken lands, mortals can hardly escape suffering. Old Shadows coil below the ground. In lightless tunnels they writhe, with claws that feed on man. Above the ground, hatred and conflict fill the world. Humans' pure souls are stained by the breath exhaled by the Eldritch God…

"How can we endure this long suffering? How can we endure the twisted and absurd world brought by the false Sun?

"We cannot endure it. We only wish for our Lord to return. We only wish for the true Sun God to descend upon the earth again, to burn in blood and fire, and to bring order and prosperity back to the Mortal Realm!"

Under the masked priest's passionate and stirring tone, Duncan could clearly feel the atmosphere in the hall change. The black-robed congregation grew more and more excited. At first they only echoed him. Soon those echoes turned into fervent shouts:

"We only wish for the true Sun God to descend upon the earth again! To burn in blood and fire!"

"We only wish for the true Sun God to descend upon the earth again! To burn in blood and fire!"

"May the true Sun God descend upon the earth again," the priest on the platform cried. Then he pointed at Duncan. "And today, our Lord will wake further from His sleep—the blood of the lost shall soothe the wounds left after the Sun's shattering!

"Bring the sacrificial victim up!"

Several black-robed men rushed over from the side, but Duncan moved even faster. He did not wait for anyone to push him and simply climbed up onto the altar by himself.

This body did not work very well, but climbing a platform was still easy enough.

Once he climbed up, he stood right in front of the masked priest. The priest was still frozen in the dignified and mysterious pose he had held when he gave the order just now. The change came so suddenly and so far outside his past experience that the head of the Cult did not react in time. He and Duncan stared at each other through the Golden Sun Mask, and the area around the altar suddenly fell into a strange silence.

Duncan seemed not to notice the change in the air at all. He only felt he had collected more information about this world, and he was very eager to see if, before this temporary body “broke down”, he could witness a few more rare scenes.

“So, uh,” Duncan rubbed his hands together with a kind of curious expectation and asked seriously, “and then? What do we do next?”

The masked priest: “…”

“Did you not hear me?” Duncan frowned—but because the muscles on his face did not work well, the frown did not really show. “I said, what’s the next step?”

Only then did the priest finally react. Even through the mask Duncan saw a flash of confusion in his eyes, but it vanished quickly. The priest pressed down his voice and said, “The Shadows in the dark truly did affect your mind. But don’t worry. The highest and holiest Sun will end your suffering… bring the sacrificial victim before the totem!”

Two black-robed men walked onto the platform at once. They grabbed Duncan’s arms and dragged him toward the Solar Totem Pole with the fireball on top. Duncan had no idea what came next, so he could not “cooperate ahead of time”, but he still did not resist. He stood obediently under the blazing fireball, held in place by the two black robes.

Even though Duncan did not struggle at all, the two black-robed men still used all their strength to grip the sacrificial victim's arms, as if they were afraid he might break free and resist at the very last moment. Their strength was an anomaly. Duncan could feel the bones of this temporary body slowly cracking apart. He looked at the two black-robed men with real surprise.

Right after that, the masked priest walked closer.

Duncan's attention went straight to him. He saw the priest pull out a strangely shaped dagger from his robe. The dagger was crooked and twisted like dried finger joints. Its blade was pitch-black, like it was carved from obsidian, and its surface reflected the firelight of the totem, making it look especially eerie.

Duncan quietly got ready to cut his Soul Projection. He knew this temporary body had almost collected all the information it could.

The Cult priest's benediction rang out over the altar:

"O highest and holiest Sun God! Please accept this sacrificial rite upon the high platform! I offer You this sacrificial victim's heart. May You return from blood and fire!"

Duncan immediately stopped his action of cutting the Soul Projection and stared at the Cult priest in front of him like he was an idiot.

Chapter 21: Good News, the ritual Went Very Smoothly

After hearing the words of that benediction from the Cult priest, Duncan at once stopped cutting his Soul Projection and returning to the Vanished.

He stared at the masked priest in front of him like he was an idiot. He stared at the little obsidian dagger in the man's hand, raised high in the air. He looked at the congregation around the altar as they all grew excited again and chanted the name of their "Lord", chanting the name of that "true Sun God" that legend said had fallen long ago and shattered into pieces.

They wanted to offer him, this "sacrificial victim", to the Sun God. The method was to offer up the sacrificial victim's heart.

Now Duncan finally understood where the horror back in that cavern had come from. He understood what kind of mad and evil acts these cultists had been committing.

Then he saw the masked priest take a step toward him, and a layer of pitch-black flame suddenly rose on the surface of the obsidian dagger in the man's hand.

This striking supernatural phenomenon instantly made Duncan curious. He guessed that the dagger might be some kind of "anomaly" item. He guessed that the priest might be a "special human" who could wield extraordinary power. He wondered how many such special humans there were in the civilized world, and what role they might play in society.

At the same time, he watched blankly as the little knife wrapped in black fire stabbed down, plunged into his chest, and cut through several layers of ragged cloth with a dull, hollow sound.

The flames burned a few times inside and did not burn anything at all.

On the Solar Totem Pole behind him, the blazing fireball suddenly gave off a series of unsettling cracks and pops. Mixed into those pops seemed to be some tearing, dizzying noise. Duncan vaguely felt that something had spread out from the fireball. It was a kind of cold and insane “touch”. He could not describe it well, not only because this temporary body had dull senses, but also because this feeling was beyond any experience he had ever known.

He only knew one thing: in a world where extraordinary phenomena truly existed, this priest’s sacrificial rite ritual had clearly gone very, very wrong.

The sudden change of the “Sun symbol” on the Solar Totem Pole at once drew the attention of the nearest congregation. With a few suppressed cries, the hall quickly fell quiet again after its earlier frenzy. Even the two black-robed men gripping Duncan’s arms seemed cowed by something. In panic, they let go and knelt toward the Solar Totem Pole in terror.

The priest holding the obsidian dagger stood frozen in place. He still held the blade, but stared fixedly at the “sacrificial victim” in front of him. Through the openings in the mask, Duncan saw a pair of eyes full of confusion and chaos.

Duncan tugged at his stiff lips and finally squeezed out a twisted smile. He slowly raised his right hand and laid it on the priest’s hand that clutched the obsidian dagger. Threads of green flame flowed out like water, seeping and winding around the dagger.

In almost an instant, Duncan felt “feedback” coming from the dagger. But strangely, that feedback felt weak and hollow, as if the dagger was only some cheap imitation. It was like an empty shell that held just a little bit of “borrowed power” inside.

Still, whether the dagger was fake or not did not matter much to him.

He smiled at the priest and said calmly, “I have to say two things.”

The next second, the priest felt his connection to the obsidian dagger suddenly get disrupted by some outside force. His fervent, burning faith in the Sun smashed into something like an unshakable wall and was cut off at once.

“First, I am a broad-minded person—look, my chest is this broad.”

Duncan ripped aside the already ragged cloth on his chest, which had been cut again by the dagger. A shocking hole appeared. Through that horrifying hole, the priest who was presiding over the sacrificial rite ritual could see clearly the scene behind Duncan.

“Second, try not to offer expired food to your Lord.”

Duncan gently pushed the priest’s hand away. For some reason, after he wrapped the obsidian dagger in the green flames of his spirit form, the priest seemed to lose most of his strength. Even with Duncan’s frail and weak limbs, he could easily shove this tall, burly priest aside.

Only after being shoved did the priest seem to finally snap out of it. Huge terror and anger washed over him. His muscles trembled as he raised his hand to point at Duncan. He tried to restore order on the altar with a furious shout: “Filth of true resurrection! This is a resurrected Restless Soul! You have defiled this sacred sacrificial rite ritual! Filth… which reckless Necromancer stands behind you?! Are you not afraid of the power of the Sun?!”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about.” Duncan glanced at the obsidian dagger in his hand. As he felt the faint power inside it, he spoke casually. Then he looked up at the priest again and listened to the crackling noise from the Solar Totem Pole behind him. A bold, strange idea suddenly popped into his mind. “But I suddenly want to satisfy my curiosity.”

He raised the obsidian dagger high. In full view of the still-panicked and terrified black-robed believers around him, he pointed at the masked priest and shouted:

“O highest and holiest Sun God! Please accept this sacrificial rite upon the high platform! I offer You this sacrificial victim’s heart. May You return from blood and fire!”

The next second, he saw the flames on the obsidian dagger suddenly surge higher. The icy presence spilling from the Solar Totem Pole behind him instantly gathered and focused, aiming at the masked priest not far away.

Duncan saw raw terror appear in the priest’s eyes. The man clearly wanted to leave the altar at once, but the dagger was faster than he was.

The dagger flew out of Duncan’s hand. It was pulled by some invisible force, wrapped in roaring black fire and faintly twining green flame. It shot straight into the priest’s chest. With a single, shrill scream, the Cult leader’s chest was pierced through, and his heart turned to ash in an instant.

A moment later, the dagger returned to Duncan’s hand. In that single trip out and back, the last trace of power within it seemed to be completely drained.

Given: inside the range of the Cult altar’s sacrificial rite, there were two people. One had a heart. One did not. Some Eldritch God insisted on having a human heart to taste today. Question—who would lose their heart?

Of course, it had to be the one who still had a heart.

Even if the logic made sense, the smoothness of the whole thing still went beyond Duncan's expectations. He had not thought that his wild little "experiment" would actually work. Only after the Cult priest fell to the ground did Duncan finally turn his head and glance at the now-calm totem behind him. His tone turned odd as he muttered, "So as long as the words are right, it doesn't matter who says them?"

The fireball on the Solar Totem Pole did not answer his question, of course. But the cultists around the altar had clearly reacted by now. Panic spread, as expected, but along with it, the fury of the most fanatical believers burst out. This anger even overshadowed the fear they had felt earlier when the totem showed its Visions.

The cultists closest to the altar reacted first. They charged at Duncan while shouting the Sun God's name. These boldest believers quickly drove more people to move. A large mass of black-robed figures rushed forward like they had lost their minds. Some even pulled short swords and daggers from under their robes.

Duncan had actually been planning to shout, "I offer the hearts of everyone on this altar to the Sun God" and test the appetite of this strange Eldritch God. But when he saw that some of the charging cultists had even pulled out revolvers from their robes, he dropped that idea at once.

Taking into account the time it took for the sacrificial rite ritual to take effect and the rule that "within seven steps a gun is both accurate and fast", he simply gave the cultists the middle finger and cut off his Soul Projection.

Let this mob of madmen keep on being mad. He was going back to the Vanished.

At the same time, on the vast Boundless Sea, a steady pattern of footsteps sounded on the deck of the Vanished.

A doll named Alice, wearing a gorgeous Brother long gown, walked out of her room and came to the door of the captain’s cabin.

This time, the ornate wooden chest did not follow behind Miss Doll. She had left it inside her room.

The captain had said that she could move as she wished in the cabins under the deck, and that she could also walk on the deck. If there was anything she did not understand, she could come straight to the captain’s cabin to find him.

Alice remembered all of that very clearly.

Julian, grandson of the Zhengde Emperor of the Grand Ming Empire and the own son of Empress Kang Ning, glanced at his proud and self-satisfied eldest Brother, his second Brother who understood how to weigh gains and losses, and his birth mother whose expression he could not read at all…

[Hmm, it really seemed like none of this had anything to do with him?]

So the young man calmly accepted the title of “Shame of Transmigrators” and began a lazy salted-fish life of eating and waiting to die.

Until a bowl of chicken soup arrived.

“Ahahaha! Chicken soup is here!”

Chapter 22: Crew Member Code

Alice stopped at the door of the captain's cabin.

The doll raised her head, looked at the dark oak door in front of her, and noticed a line of words on the doorframe, written in elegant cursive letters: "Door of The Lost Ones."

It was not strange at all for such a line of words to appear on the doorframe of the captain's cabin of the Vanished, but Alice still frowned without thinking. She was not curious about the door, but about why she could even recognize "writing".

She had no memory of learning letters. In fact, she had no memory of any "learning" at all. She did not remember ever gaining experience of moving about outside or talking with people. Yet this knowledge simply existed in her mind by itself.

She could read the letters on the captain's doorframe. She also understood what the different pieces of furniture in a room were used for. It was impossible to learn such things just by lying in a wooden crate and listening to people talk outside—so where had this knowledge come from?

Before today, Alice had never thought about this question. But for some reason, after talking with that "Captain Duncan", a strange thing rose up in the doll's mind, which was supposed to run calmly forever: the idea of "curiosity".

She thought back carefully. The change seemed to have started after Duncan asked about the origin of the name "Alice"… In that moment, she began to question some of the things in her mind that had always felt natural. She tried to recall where her name came from, and then something in her mind loosened.

Alice did not know if this loosening was good or bad, but she did not like the feeling of confusion. So she soon shook her head and pushed the doubt aside. She steadied herself at the captain's door, then placed her hand on the oak doorknob and pushed forward gently.

The door did not move at all.

Alice froze for a moment and tried pushing again, but the wooden door felt as if it were cast from solid steel and did not budge.

Right as she wanted to try again, a voice suddenly came from inside the captain's cabin—a hoarse, low voice, as if it came from a rotting piece of wood: "The door opens outward, lady."

This was not Captain Duncan's voice. Alice jumped in fright, but she reacted quickly. She let out a hurried "oh" and pulled the door outward. This time, the door opened very easily.

Only then did she remember that when the captain had brought her here before, he had indeed pulled the door open outward.

It seemed that the "everyday knowledge" that had appeared in her mind out of nowhere was still only knowledge. After sleeping in a wooden crate for so many years, she still lacked real experience of living. Alice reflected on this a little, then carefully stuck her head in and looked into the captain's cabin.

The captain's cabin was empty. The striking chart table sat quietly under the lamp. A thin mist floated over the surface of the enchanted sea chart on the table, and the dark wooden carving of Goathead was turning its gaze from the edge of the table. A pair of eyes carved from obsidian stared at her in a hollow way.

Goathead spoke, more polite than Alice had imagined, and said: “Please come in, lady. The captain is busy. You can wait for him here. Also, try not to stick your head in like that. It will make some overly nervous fellows on the Vanished think that someone hates them. It is very troublesome to calm them down—and if your head falls off again, that would be a problem too. I have no hands, so I cannot help you pick it up…”

It really talked! This wooden carving really talked!

Even though Captain Duncan had said before that the Goathead on the chart table could talk, it still stunned Alice to suddenly hear a wooden carving rattle off so many words at her. She took a moment to react, then answered: “Ah, okay. But my head actually does not come off that easily, and when they installed it last time, I even… Wait, you said there are some nervous ones on the Vanished… does that mean there are others on this ship…”

Only after that did Alice slowly realize what Goathead’s words had hinted at. She looked around in surprise and nervousness. For a moment, she felt that this captain’s cabin, and even every single thing on the Vanished, was swaying in the dim light and turning into “strange objects” like that eerie Goathead. Goathead’s voice then came into her ears again: “Is that so strange? It takes many hands to keep such a huge ship running. Did you think the great Captain Duncan would personally scrub the deck?”

What Goathead said actually made some sense. Alice’s mind, which had only just awakened and was not very quick yet, still felt that something was wrong, but after thinking for a long time she could only nod: “That is true… so there are many like you on the Vanished…”

“There is only one loyal Deputy to the captain. The rest are a bunch of dim-witted fellows. You do not need to think about talking with them—they have no interest in talking with people anyway," Goathead cut her off before Alice finished. "But since you are the ship's new recruit, it is normal that you do not understand many rules and principles. As Captain Duncan's most loyal First Mate and Second Mate and… I need to tell you some basic knowledge that you must know to live on this ship. After all, the captain would never lower himself to explain such things to a new recruit… lady, are you ready?"

Alice listened in a daze. She had already forgotten why she had come to the captain's cabin in the first place. She only felt that every time this Goathead opened his mouth, a long string of words came pouring out. After a few exchanges, the pace of the conversation was completely out of her control. When he suddenly threw out that long chain of titles, her whole head buzzed. When he finally finished speaking, she could only nod without thinking: "Ah, ah, o-okay… okay?"

"Very good. Then next come a few rules that every crew member of the Vanished must know. They will help a new recruit adapt faster and fully receive the protection of the Vanished and the great Captain Duncan while sailing on the dangerous Boundless Sea…"

Goathead was clearly very pleased with Alice's answer. He spoke while shaking his wooden head, and his tone was full of pride—

"First, Captain Duncan is the absolute master of the Vanished. Captain Duncan is always right. Even if the Mortal Realm comes into conflict with Captain Duncan's words, you must still take Captain Duncan's judgment as the standard.

"Second, any crew member may only move in the areas that Captain Duncan allows. You must not take even half a step into any area that Captain Duncan has not ordered open, because those areas do not exist.

“Third, if you step into an unpermitted area and somehow still stay alive for a time, you must stay where you are and wait for Captain Duncan to bring you back, or calmly wait for death. You must never return on your own, because what you return to will not be the Vanished.

“Fourth, the Vanished always sails on the correct course. Never question the captain’s sailing plan. If you find that the scenery around the Vanished is different from what you expected, or if you find that the Vanished has entered a ‘deeper’ sea area, then this is a normal part of the sailing plan.

“Fifth, the captain will sometimes leave the ship, but he will always return. While the captain is away, the Vanished will continue to sail normally, but all crew members are strictly forbidden to go near the steering platform at the stern. The rudder system feels insecure when the captain is gone, and the ropes at the stern will strangle any rash fool who shows a ‘usurping’ attitude.

“Sixth, on the Vanished there are, and will only ever be, six basic rules for crew members.

“Seventh, the door of the captain’s cabin opens outward.”

Goathead seemed to have explained this “common knowledge” to new crew members many times before. He spoke of these rules very smoothly and naturally. But when Alice heard the last two, she immediately heard something wrong: “Wait, Mr. Goathead, in the sixth rule you said…”

“Sixth, on the Vanished there are, and will only ever be, six basic rules for crew members,” Goathead answered at once. When he talked about these basic rules, he never hesitated.

For a moment, Alice was not sure whether something was wrong with herself or with this “First Mate” in front of her: “But you just mentioned a seventh rule…”

“Seventh, the door of the captain’s cabin opens outward,” Goathead answered very naturally.

Alice stared blankly at the dark Goathead carving on the table. After doubting her ears, she started to doubt her own brain—but then she soon remembered that she did not have a brain. So she checked again: “These two… are not in conflict?”

“There is no conflict at all.”

Listening to Goathead’s firm answer and looking at his hollow, pitch-black eyes, Alice opened her mouth, but then suddenly swallowed all her questions.

Chapter 23: Bird

Alice did not understand many things in this world.

But at least, she had heard countless low whispers while inside the wooden crate, talks filled with fear and tension. From the mouths of those crew members and wardens whose nerves were extra tight because they were in charge of escorting Anomaly objects, she had built up the most basic understanding of certain “unusual matters”.

If something clearly went against common sense but still truly existed, then the first thing to do was to follow the existing safety rules. Only after keeping a safe distance should one think about study and analysis. That was the way to stay alive.

Alice actually did not feel much about the fact that she was “Anomaly 099”. She did not know what she could do, or what she had done, that made humans fear and guard against her like that. She did not know how an intelligent “Anomaly” was supposed to think to be “normal”—at this moment, she was simply thinking like a person.

Since Goathead said that the crew member rules had, and would only ever have, six items, then there were six. Since Goathead had mentioned a seventh rule, then she would also remember that seventh one.

But she still could not hold back some questions: “When I tried to push the captain’s door just now, it really did open outward—that is such a natural thing. Why do you have to stress it in the rules?”

The wooden Goathead quietly stared into Alice’s eyes. After a full two seconds, he spoke, more brief than ever before: “Sometimes, it can open inward.”

“Then…”

“If you see the door open inward, you must never go in. On the entire Vanished, only the captain has the right to do that.”

This was the first time since they started talking that Goathead had spoken in such a serious, even slightly threatening, tone. He had not been this serious even when he was explaining the crew member rules.

Alice was startled by his extra solemn tone.

Then right after that, Goathead’s tone turned light again. He spoke cheerfully, as if the serious topic had never happened: “All right, the necessary introduction process for a new crew member has ended. Now let us talk about something else… Ah, right, lady, did you come to the captain’s cabin for something? If you do not know how to use some facility on the ship, there is no need at all to bother the great Captain Duncan. If you just want someone to chat with, then you have come to the right place. I am very good at finding topics and I know countless great deeds related to this ship… Not interested in great deeds? Then I can introduce you to the most famous dishes on the Boundless Sea. I know a thing or two about cooking…”

Once Goathead started talking, he immediately got into the mood. Alice tried several times to interrupt but never found a chance, and by the time she realized that things were going very wrong, it was already too late.

Anomaly 099, the doll Miss Alice, today faced the second Great Terror on the Vanished, other than Captain Duncan.

At the same time, in the cabin on the other side of the wall, Duncan was quietly listening to the sounds coming from the enchanted sea chart room.

He had just woken up. His soul had returned to the Vanished from a distant body. He had not heard the start of Goathead and Alice's talk, but he had heard those "crew member rules" and the part about the "captain's door opening outward".

It was important information, an unexpected gain.

Duncan had not yet finished digesting the information he had just gathered from those cultists when he unexpectedly heard the conversation between Goathead and Alice. Both the strange and eerie "crew member rules" and the information hinted at by Goathead at the end were extremely important to him.

As expected, Goathead had known when he pushed the captain's cabin door inward to return to the "other side". For Duncan himself, that action was simply going back to his small apartment. But for this side, the Vanished, it seemed to mean that "the captain had temporarily left".

Goathead had no doubt about this at all and saw it as something Captain Duncan would naturally do.

So… had the "real Captain Duncan" of this ship also pushed open the door of the captain's cabin in the past and gone to some mysterious "world"? And had this not only happened once, but many times, so that it became something completely normal in Goathead's eyes and even became part of the Vanished's crew member rules?

This news was a good thing for Duncan. It meant that he would not need to worry too much when he went back to the "other side" in the future. Even if more new crew members joined the ship, he could openly disappear in front of everyone by using this method, and he would not have to worry that anyone would copy him, follow, and discover his “secret”.

But on the other hand, Duncan also could not help thinking more. This was related to the “six plus one” crew member rules that Goathead had purposely brought up.

What did these crew member rules really mean? On what were these rules based, rules that sounded bizarre, dangerous, and even self-contradictory? Some parts sounded as if they existed only to stress the captain’s authority, but that clearly was not the whole truth. Those strict limits on behavior were more like a way to let the people on the ship live in some danger-filled environment, a way for the crew members to avoid invisible dangers by following fixed rules.

Duncan frowned slightly. He was thinking about his true place within these rules. Judging from the content of the rules, he, the “captain”, seemed to be the only one who held the greatest freedom and control. He did not need to fear the “invisible risks” on the ship. He was even the one who decided the range of many risks. But… all of this assumed that he was the “real Captain Duncan”.

That was the part most worth worrying about.

But then he suddenly remembered his recent exploration on the Vanished, and how he had walked around the cabins as he pleased.

Goathead had never reminded him about the crew member rules and treated him as the real Captain Duncan. While he moved about on the ship, he had never run into any “eerie danger”, and there could not be a second “captain” jumping out to give him any limits on where he could go.

From this point of view, the dangers mentioned in the “crew member rules” by Goathead did seem to be things he did not really need to care about.

Duncan let out a light breath and continued to listen carefully to the sounds from the enchanted sea chart room.

Half a minute later, he hated that he had no way to turn off his ears.

A trash-talking doll and the noisy Goathead started to talk with each other, and the latter clearly held an overwhelming advantage. His clattering nonsense rolled through the enchanted sea chart room like the waves on the Boundless Sea, and even Duncan, who was hiding in the cabin and secretly listening, could hardly bear it.

He felt that he should hurry out and rescue that poor doll, Miss Alice. With her lack of social experience, Alice was clearly no match for Goathead. But after a slight hesitation, Duncan still stopped.

He had just finished a strange “soul journey”. He still had much information to sort and even more experience to sum up. He had to figure out what exactly had happened to him just now and whether this process was under his control. From what he had seen so far, this ability to project his mind to a distant place would be his best tool for gathering information on land in the future.

Under normal conditions, he would also have to worry that staying in his room too long to study his new ability might draw Goathead’s needless attention. But now Alice was outside to pull that noisy thing’s attention away… which could not be better.

He silently said sorry to the doll, Miss Alice, in his heart, then lowered his head to look at his right hand. The next second, his expression froze.

The brass spirit compass, a bit larger than a pocket watch, had vanished at some point.

Yet he clearly remembered that until just a short while ago, he had been gripping that spirit compass tightly in his hand!

Duncan’s eyes suddenly grew sharp when he realized that he had not noticed the change in his hand at all. This kind of slack and carelessness had never happened since he came to this strange and eerie ghost ship.

In the next second, he closed his right hand slightly. A dim emerald flame quietly appeared between his fingers. Then he stood up from behind the desk, ready to use the link between this spirit form flame and supernatural objects to check whether there were any Anomaly traces in the cabin.

But just as he straightened up, Duncan’s movements suddenly stopped. Some subtle connection rose from deep within him. He looked, without thinking, toward the direction of that link, and in the corner of his eye he saw a few feathers, half real and half illusory, drifting down from the air.

Duncan looked in surprise to where the feathers were falling and saw a patch of phantom light quickly appear and gather in front of him. In just two or three seconds, the phantom formed into a snow-white…

Pigeon.

The missing spirit compass hung on that pigeon’s chest, and a familiar Obsidian Dagger lay quietly at the pigeon’s feet.

Chapter 24: Pigeons?

The snow-white pigeon stood blankly on the desk. The brass spirit compass Duncan had been searching for hung around its neck, and the familiar Obsidian Dagger lay by its feet.

Duncan stared at the pigeon in a daze, and the pigeon stared back at him in the same way.

It was not easy to read a bird's face, but somehow Duncan felt he could see this one's expression. Not only that, he even seemed to see a kind of "wisdom" shining in its slightly red eyes. Those two little bean-like eyes just stared straight ahead. When Duncan looked over, one eye clearly turned its attention to him, but the other eye still seemed to be watching the ceiling of the captain's cabin, its gaze wandering all over.

After several seconds, Duncan finally twitched the corner of his mouth and muttered without thinking: "A… pigeon?"

Why was it a pigeon? Why did a pigeon suddenly appear? Why was his brass spirit compass hanging on this pigeon? How did that dagger get here?

In short, all his questions boiled down to one thing: on this abnormal ship, was it even possible for anything normal to happen?!

While Duncan's mind was full of question marks, the dazed pigeon finally seemed to "wake up". It bobbed its head and took two steps on the desk, leaned toward Duncan, stretched its neck as far as it could, and let out a loud: "Coo!"

“…” Duncan looked at the bird without a word. For some reason, many classic images of pirate captains from his memories suddenly floated up in his mind. Then he lowered his head to glance at his own captain’s uniform and murmured: “A captain with a bird at his side was kind of standard, but normally it should be a parrot… what was with a pigeon?”

After hearing Duncan’s words, the pigeon immediately nodded very seriously and spoke in a stiff, oddly pitched female voice: “teleportation complete!”

All the muttering in Duncan’s heart and at the tip of his tongue was cut off at once. He almost choked on his own saliva. He stared wide-eyed at the White Dove in front of him, utterly stunned.

He remembered how he had felt when he first stepped onto this ship and, in the captain’s cabin, saw the talking Goathead for the first time.

But at least this was no longer his first day on the Vanished. He was already used to the Anomalies of this world. So the pigeon talking only surprised him for a moment. The next second, his face grew serious. Green spirit form fire rose in his palm as he watched the pigeon with gaze, staying on guard: “Where did you come from?”

The pigeon tilted its head. One eye stared straight at Duncan, while the other drifted toward the ceiling: “Address error. Please check the address again, or contact the system Administrator.”

Duncan: “…?”

His face froze for a second, but the wave in his heart was even bigger.

What the pigeon said did not match the “style” of this world at all. These were not words Goathead, Alice, or any of those black-robed cultists would ever use. Instead, they were terms far more familiar to him as Zhou Ming, a man from Earth.

Yet the pigeon seemed not to notice the change in Duncan's eyes and expression. It only lowered its head to peck at its own wings, then shook the brass spirit compass on its chest and began to stroll lazily around on the desk.

After a few steps, it ran over to the Obsidian Dagger. It used its claws to nudge the dagger a few times toward Duncan and spoke again in that strange, stiff female voice: "Pick up the Solar Axe and embrace the glory of battle!"

Duncan suddenly stood up from the desk. His chair scraped harshly against the floor. He stared hard at the pigeon, which still looked innocent and calm, while a feeling that was both absurd and eerie filled his mind.

This pigeon could not possibly be something that had always been on the Vanished. It was almost certainly not something that had always existed in this world.

Only Zhou Ming could understand the phrases it spoke!

Perhaps the noise from the chair hitting the floor was too loud, loud enough to reach the enchanted sea chart room. Duncan suddenly heard Goathead's voice in his mind: "Captain? Are you alright?"

Duncan still stared at the pigeon on the desk. He knew Goathead did not dare to peek into the captain's cabin directly, so he answered in his usual calm, low voice: "I'm fine."

"Miss Alice came to see you. Should I…"

"You entertain her for now."

"Yes, Captain."

Duncan let out a breath and glanced at the door that led to the enchanted sea chart room.

Goathead’s noisy attack on Alice was still going on. The doll had already tried several times to get up and leave, only to be stopped every time. Duncan felt he should probably go out and rescue that poor doll, but right now… he had something more important to confirm.

For now, Alice would have to suffer a little longer.

Duncan sat back down at the desk, ready to see if he could talk with the pigeon in a normal way. Only then did he notice something he had missed before.

A faint line of fire stretched out from the spirit form flame jumping between the fingers of his right hand. The thin stream of flame was as fine as a hair. It extended a dozen centimeters into the air before fading away.

On the strange pigeon, a wisp of ghostly emerald flame also twined around it, hidden in the gaps under its wings. That flame also stretched out into the air and vanished halfway.

Duncan frowned and lifted his right hand. With a thought, the flame leaped. The pigeon on the desk vanished at once.

The next second, the pigeon appeared on his shoulder. It lowered its head, pecked at his hair, and let out a loud: “Coo!”

Duncan snapped his fingers again, and the pigeon on his shoulder reappeared on the desk.

The brass spirit compass hung on the pigeon’s chest. Its shiny shell reflected the green light of the fire.

Duncan frowned. “…Is it connected to this brass spirit compass?”

He could already tell that the pigeon had a certain bond with him, a connection even closer than the one between him and the Vanished. This might also explain why the pigeon “knew” some things that only he knew, strange bits of “knowledge” from Earth. He just could not be sure why the pigeon had appeared.

After thinking it over, he could only place his doubts on the strange brass spirit compass.

From his first tests with the spirit form fire until now, every Anomaly had started from this compass. The experience of soul traversal, the time he used mental projection to control a corpse, the compass vanishing just now and then reappearing on the pigeon’s chest… all of it seemed to begin with this thing.

Duncan watched the pigeon for a moment, then reached out toward the spirit compass.

He wanted to take it off and study it carefully.

The pigeon neither dodged nor tried to stop him. Yet Duncan’s fingers never touched the surface of the brass spirit compass. His fingers passed right through it and pressed into the soft fluff of the pigeon’s chest.

It was like passing through an illusion.

The pigeon hopped in place twice, as if Duncan had tickled it. It opened its beak and squawked: “It’s KFC Crazy Thursday today, send me 50…”

The corner of Duncan’s eye twitched. He tested it twice more, refusing to give up, and finally had to admit that he simply could not take the brass spirit compass off the pigeon. It had clearly undergone some kind of change and turned into an illusion bound to the pigeon. He could neither remove it nor touch it.

Or maybe… the pigeon was now the real body of the brass spirit compass.

A flood of wild guesses rose in Duncan’s mind, and even he did not know how many of them he should believe. The only thing he could be sure of was this: the pigeon’s appearance was closely tied to his use of the brass spirit compass for soul traversal, and that experience might also have changed the form of the compass itself.

This might be the true nature of the brass spirit compass, its innate property as an Anomaly, or some kind of “price” for using it. As for why the pigeon was so strange… that was not because of the spirit compass, but because of Zhou Ming, the man from Earth.

He could not prove or disprove any of this yet, unless he found a manual for the various Anomalies on the Vanished.

For now, he at least had to decide what to do with this Anomalous pigeon.

After a short moment of thought, he decided to give the pigeon a name first.

“I have to give you a name,” he said seriously to the pigeon, tapping his finger lightly on the desk. “I think you can understand what I’m saying, right?”

The pigeon tilted its head. Its two bean-like eyes drifted as it looked at Duncan: “AI?”

Chapter 25: Communication Was Hard

The pigeon kept its head tilted, as if it felt Duncan had not heard clearly. Very soon it repeated itself, even louder: “AI!”

Duncan finally understood what the bird meant. “You mean your name is AI?”

The pigeon nodded proudly and paced back and forth on the desk. “Coo!”

Duncan rubbed his brow. He felt that talking with this bird was even stranger than talking with Goathead, mostly because of the pigeon’s odd, slippery way of speaking. “Do you know how you were born? Or… how you appeared here?”

The pigeon thought for a moment. Its two eyes drifted and stared in different directions at the same time. “Ah, the page is gone. Try refreshing it?”

Duncan: “…”

He found that he could not understand what was going on in this bird’s head at all. He could not even be sure if the strange lines it suddenly blurted out had anything to do with the topic.

But he was certain of one thing: the bird was thinking. It was seriously trying to talk with him.

It just clearly had its own idea of what “communication” meant.

Duncan spoke with the pigeon that called itself “AI” a little longer. Their talk always stayed like two parallel lines. They each said their own things. If he said it was related, he could not see where the lines met. If he said it was unrelated, the pigeon answered every question… and sometimes even gave a line or two that actually seemed to fit his questions.

In the end, the talk did not lead very far. Duncan could only frown and mutter, “What kind of cursed thing are you this time…”

He felt it would take a very long time to build normal communication with this bird. That process might even be harder than getting used to Goathead’s endless chatter.

The pigeon squatted on the desk across from him, blinking its small eyes innocently and, from time to time, muttering that he should send her 50.

Duncan ignored the bird’s murmurs. He rubbed his fingers together, watching the green flame of spirit form jump at his fingertips. At least he could be sure of one thing: even though the brass spirit compass had merged with the pigeon in front of him, at its core it was still an Anomalous item that he could control.

Ghostly green spirit form fire rose up. At almost the same time, emerald flame rose between AI’s feathers. The brass spirit compass hanging on her chest sprang open with a snap. Under the clear glass cover, the faint pointer slowly steadied under Duncan’s will, and the dial full of strange symbols was gradually filled with flame.

AI did not react at all. She simply bathed in the spirit form fire as if it were the most natural thing in the world, as though she were waiting for Duncan’s order.

Before the brass spirit compass was fully activated, Duncan took the initiative to disperse the flame.

In the process, Duncan also summed things up silently in his heart:

[The spirit compass still worked… it just had a strange “medium” added to it. For now he could not tell what role this pigeon would play. It might even be some kind of help…]

[He still did not know the details of this spirit compass. Before he was ready, he had better not attempt a second “traversal”… During the next test he had to keep a close eye on any changes in the spirit compass and the pigeon.]

[There was a link between the pigeon and himself. When he roused the spirit form fire, that link became clearer. He could even control, to some degree, where the pigeon appeared… but that was as far as his control went.]

[AI clearly had her own will. She acted according to her own thoughts, and any orders he gave her might not be obeyed. In this, she was different from the other “items” on the Vanished.]

[She could talk, had some thinking ability, and judged problems on her own… Compared with ordinary Anomalous items, this pigeon seemed closer in nature to Goathead.]

After summing up what he knew so far, Duncan finally turned his gaze to the Obsidian Dagger.

Its blade looked like a dry, twisted finger, with a black surface that gleamed faintly.

This was the very thing the black-robed priest with the golden mask of the Sun had held when he presided over the evil sacrificial rite in the underground gathering place of the sewers. Judging by how it had been used, it should be a ritual blade.

Duncan had reached that gathering place, which was probably beneath the city-state of Pland, by using mental projection, and had returned in the same way. He had thought the whole process was purely at the level of spirit or soul, but now this ritual dagger sat in front of him, very real.

After a short pause, Duncan reached out and picked up the dagger.

A cold, hard feeling spread from his palm. This was a real object.

Duncan released a trace of spirit form fire and let the flame coil around the blade. From the empty, hollow feedback, he could tell that the supernatural power that had once filled the ritual dagger had already faded away.

Just as he had judged back at the sacrificial rite site, this thing was not a true Anomaly. It was more like an extension of some supernatural power, or a temporary item “poured” full of power by artificial means.

Duncan still did not know what kind of system this world’s Anomalies followed, but he guessed this dagger was not especially rare. At the very least… it looked like something that could be produced in batches.

“Did you bring this back?” he asked, raising his head to look at AI resting on the desk. He lifted the Obsidian Dagger a little. “And you brought it especially for me?”

The pigeon stared at Duncan with its red eyes, its whole body motionless, giving no reaction at all.

Duncan: “…?”

He asked the question again. The pigeon still did not move, like a lifeless statue.

The sudden Anomalous change made Duncan frown. Just as he was about to use spirit form fire to prod AI and see if he could force her awake, the bird suddenly “came to life”. She hopped twice in place and shouted loudly:

“Pick up the Solar Axe, pick up this the Sun war axe, pick up this the Sun war axe…”

“Alright, alright, I get it. You don’t have to answer every single time I asked,” Duncan quickly waved his hand, forcing the pigeon to quiet down while he searched for the right words. “Then do you know how you brought this dagger over? Or, can you carry physical objects when you traverse? Is that it?”

The pigeon thought for a moment, then lowered its head and pecked Duncan’s finger. “Storewide discounts, free shipping on every item.”

“I’ll… just pretend I understood that,” Duncan said.

He sighed. It seemed that this was the limit of what he could communicate with the bird.

Then he rose from the desk and looked toward the enchanted sea chart room.

Goathead and Alice were still outside, locked in warm, friendly “conversation”. The doll had not made a sound for a long time, while Goathead had just started explaining the seventeenth way to cook kelp stew.

Duncan felt he had to go rescue his only current crew member out there—and the one whose “style” was actually the most normal.

On the other hand, he had been in his cabin for quite a while, and had stirred up some Anomalous movement in the meantime. He felt he should go out and show himself, just to put Goathead’s mind at ease.

But before he left, he hesitated and glanced at AI, who was running around on the desk.

Should he take the pigeon out as well? If he did, how was he supposed to explain it?

Duncan hesitated for only two seconds, then decisively grabbed the pigeon and set her on his shoulder.

He was going to operate on the Vanished for a long time, and in the foreseeable future this pigeon would surely follow him as well. He did not yet know what habits the bird had, but as an Anomalous being that could think and talk, it would be very hard to hide her away somewhere like a dead object.

Having one more “crew member” on the ship was something he could not really hide. If he tried to hide her now and she was exposed later, it would actually harm the image of “Captain Duncan” far more.

So he might as well bring the pigeon out openly and say she was his new “trophy”. He did not need to explain anything to Goathead. A captain did not owe explanations to his first mate.

The first mate would fill in the blanks himself.

As for the strange phrases the pigeon blurted out from time to time—words that would surely make no sense to the people of this world—he did not have to explain those either.

He would just let Goathead and Alice imagine it in their own way.

With the fat pigeon perched on his shoulder, Duncan straightened his clothes and his posture, then walked calmly toward the enchanted sea chart room.

The pigeon puffed out her chest proudly and cried, as if making an announcement: “Authentic Herbal Tea, the true good voice, welcome to our show, brought to you by…”

Chapter 26: Night Without Stars

To be honest, Duncan suddenly found that when the pigeon on his shoulder started talking, he could hardly walk with any composure, even if his nerves had been thicker than a main support beam.

At that moment he very much wished he could be a normal pirate captain with a parrot on his shoulder. At worst, a monkey would have been fine too.

But he had already pushed open the door to the enchanted sea chart room. It was impossible to turn back now.

In the room where the chart table stood, Goathead was cheerfully chattering away about the twelfth legend related to fish stew. The sound of the captain’s cabin door opening finally cut off this noisy fellow. His black wooden head turned at once toward Duncan, and his tone rose with obvious delight: “Ah, Captain! You finally came out. I must tell you, Miss Alice is a truly excellent conversation partner. I have not chatted so happily with anyone in many years, you know…”

Duncan ignored Goathead’s loud babbling and looked first at the victim sitting opposite the chart table. He saw a headless doll sitting very straight in the chair, holding her own head in her hands while pressing her ears tight.

Even so, Alice’s eyes still looked as empty as if she had just sat through twelve advanced math classes in a row. She did not react at all, even when Duncan walked right up to her.

Duncan: “…”

“She pulled her own head off,” Goathead explained before Duncan could speak, “though I do not know why she would do that…”

How powerful was Goathead’s endless chatter, that it could actually force a cursed Doll to pull off her own head just to resist the sound waves?!

While Duncan was still shocked by this, the overly excited Goathead finally noticed the strange newcomer the captain had brought out. His wooden head tilted a little. His pitch-black eyes suddenly fixed on the pigeon on Duncan’s shoulder: “Hm? Captain, what is that on your shoulder…”

“Her name is AI. From now on, she is my pet.” Duncan spoke in the simplest way he could, using as few sentences as possible to avoid any slipups, and at the same time he watched Goathead’s reaction to these words.

“Your pet?” Goathead was clearly stunned for a second, then he seemed to start filling in the blanks by himself. “Ah, just now the Vanished did sense you leave the ship for a short time… Did you go walking in the Spirit Realm? Is this a trophy you brought back while walking in the Spirit Realm?”

Walking in the Spirit Realm?

A term he had never heard before suddenly appeared. Duncan thought of the brass spirit compass placed in the captain’s cabin, of the handwriting left by the real Captain Duncan in the past, and of that strange soul traversal experience of projecting his soul far away. In his heart he quietly matched these things together. Once he felt his guess was almost certainly right, his expression stayed calm as he nodded: “I just went to clear my head a bit.”

As soon as Duncan finished, Goathead began to flatter him as expected: “Ah! As expected of the great Captain Duncan. Even a simple walk in the Spirit Realm lets you bring back a trophy. This is a pigeon, yes? For it to become your pet, it must be extraordinary. You even hung your spirit compass on her. Is this perhaps… ah, of course, your judgment is always correct. But what is special about this pigeon? Could it be that she…”

From Goathead’s flattery, Duncan heard something hidden. His heart stirred as he realized that Goathead clearly recognized the brass spirit compass now hanging on AI’s chest, and that this spirit compass was obviously very important to the real Captain Duncan. So important that it should not have been casually left on some newly appeared “pet”.

But even though he sensed something was wrong, he had no way to fix it. The spirit compass was now already “bound” together with the pigeon. It even seemed that, from the feedback of controlling the flames of spirit form, the pigeon herself now felt like the true body of the spirit compass.

Duncan thought quickly, but his face stayed calm and still. While he was distracted for that brief moment, AI, who had been squatting quietly on his shoulder, suddenly let out a loud coo. Then she flapped her wings and flew right in front of Goathead.

Goathead’s pitch-black eyes locked on the pigeon at once. AI tilted her head in a very serious way and tapped his face with her beak: “Recharge some Q coins?”

Duncan: “…”

“An Anomaly with intellect?!” Goathead was also clearly stunned, but he reacted quickly, his tone full of surprise. “This pigeon can talk?!”

Duncan gently reminded him from the side: “You can talk too.”

The pigeon AI took two steps across the table, then walked away while muttering to herself: “Is this normal is this normal is this normal…”

Seeing this, Duncan rubbed his fingers together. Green flames suddenly leaped up. The pigeon pacing on the table vanished in an instant, and the next moment she appeared back on his shoulder.

“Yes, an Anomaly with intellect. And I control her directly,” Duncan said as he nodded to Goathead. “Any other questions?”

Goathead answered at once: “Ah… of course not, of course not, then there is no problem at all. Everything is under the control of the great Captain Duncan.”

Duncan ignored Goathead after that. Once he ended the topic, he turned his attention to Alice, who was still dazed while holding her head. Maybe that earlier, broad-minded experience had made his nerves tougher, or maybe he had just gotten used to it after seeing it a few times. Now, when he looked at Alice sitting there with her head in her arms, he did not feel it was that creepy. Instead, he thought she was actually… a little cute.

He reached out and patted the doll Miss on the shoulder: “Wake up, wake up.”

Alice’s body shuddered at once, as if she had just woken from a long nightmare. The head she was holding in her hands opened its mouth and spoke: “Cap… cap… cap…”

Duncan: “Put your head back on first.”

Only then did Alice react. She hurried to put her head back in place in a fluster. With a click, the joint locked, and her voice finally flowed smoothly: “Ah, Captain, you are back? Just now it felt like… Is Mr. Goathead finished talking?”

Goathead on the table spoke at once: “No, we had just reached certain legends about fish stew. We can talk about that next time…”

Duncan cut him off with a few blunt words: “Shut up.”

“Oh.”

Beside them, Alice clearly flinched the moment Goathead opened his mouth. This proud cursed Doll actually showed a horrified expression. Even though Goathead shut his mouth at once under the captain's order, she still looked at the chart table with lingering fear.

Duncan suspected that for quite a long time in the future, this doll Miss would not dare step into the captain's cabin again.

Thinking of this, he finally asked with some curiosity: "Why did you come looking for me? What is it?"

"I…" Alice looked a bit blank, as if her original reason for visiting the captain's cabin had been completely erased by the long talk with Goathead. After a few seconds, she finally remembered. "Ah, right, I just wanted to ask if there is a place to take a bath on the ship. My wooden crate was soaked in seawater earlier, and now my joints feel a bit… uncomfortable."

By the end, the doll Miss's expression was clearly awkward. But the one who really should have felt more awkward was Duncan. After all, he was the one who had thrown that crate off the ship before.

And he had thrown it several times.

His embarrassment flashed by. Duncan forced his expression to stay steady and said in a calm tone: "Just for that?"

Alice sat on the chair, very stiff: "J-just for that."

"For many long-range sea ships, fresh water is a very precious resource. Taking a bath is a luxury and something you have to restrain," Duncan started seriously. Then he suddenly smiled a little. "But you are lucky. The Vanished is not an ordinary ship. Fresh water is not a problem here. Come with me. There is a place to bathe in the cabin under the middle deck. To get there, we have to cross the upper deck first."

Alice stood up at once. She truly did not want to stay in this place with Goathead even one more second.

Before leaving the room, Duncan looked back at Goathead: “You keep steering.”

After giving his order, he pushed open the door of the captain’s cabin and led Alice out onto the deck.

By now the veil of night already hung low.

Over the Boundless Sea, the night sky was clear.

After many days of clouds, this was the first time Duncan stood under a clear night sky in this world.

He suddenly stopped and tilted his head back, staring up at the veil of night without moving.

The sky was pitch-black and starless. No heavenly bodies existed there.

The only thing he could see was a faint, gray-white “crack” that seemed to tear open the entire sky. It stretched across the horizon, and along its edges fine cracks spread outward like ripped flesh. A dim, pale halo slowly leaked from the rift, like a stain of blood spreading through deep water.

This “Pale Scar” across the sky lit the whole Boundless Sea. It was more than twice as bright as the moonlight in Duncan’s memory.

Chapter 27: Not Enough Everyday Common Sense

In some ways, this sky with no stars or moon, only a single wound, shocked Duncan even more than that Sun trapped in rune rings.

Because no matter how much of an Anomaly the Sun was, it only shone on the world beneath his feet. In Duncan's understanding as a person from Earth, the so-called "Sun" was just one star among billions.

All the twisted Visions were limited to the space under the sunlight. Beyond that sunlight, the sky could still hold countless stars full of possibility. For a being bound by gravity, the world under the sunlight was basically the entire world. Even so, Duncan could at least understand and accept the scale of such Visions.

Yet in the night sky before him, Duncan did not see any object that could be called a "star". There were no stars, no Moon, no distant river of starlight.

There was only that torn wound, covering the heavens in a way he could not understand, sending out pale mist-like light.

The whole Boundless Sea lay under this snowy, pale night.

Beyond the Sun lay distant nothingness and even greater Visions.

Duncan did not say anything. He only stared at the sky, while countless questions and guesses circled in his mind.

Where were the other planets? Had they never existed? Or was the world under his feet a lone body in the empty vacuum of the universe, so far from all other stars that its night sky was pitch-black and starless? What was that Pale Scar stretching across the heavens? A torn rift in space? A solid, touchable structure hanging in the sky? Or simply an illusion, floating above the dangerous Boundless Sea?

“Captain?”

At last, a voice pulled Duncan out of his silence. Alice the doll watched the ghost captain, who had suddenly stopped walking, with some nervousness. She saw his face grow even darker and more serious than before, and it scared her: “Are you all right, sir? Is the sky about to change? A huge storm? I once heard the seafarers outside my crate talk about that…”

“…Nothing.”

Duncan spoke softly. Then he suddenly lowered his gaze from the sky and looked at Alice with a calm face. It sounded like an answer, and also like he was talking to himself as he repeated: “There is nothing.”

“Then we…”

Duncan walked forward again, his expression as calm as if nothing had happened: “Come on. I will take you to the cabin. You can wash there in the future too, if you need to wash.”

Once again, this world showed its strange, twisted side to the outsider, and this strangeness seemed to have no end.

Duncan already knew that he did not know how many shocking Visions were waiting for him in the future. If he got worked up every time, then his whole life would be nothing but getting worked up.

If his decades of life on Earth had given him any useful experience, then there was one lesson that helped him most now:

If a problem really existed, then find a way to solve it. A problem would not vanish just because you denied it, just as this bizarre sky would not turn into a starry one because he questioned it.

There had to be a reason for the world to look like this. Since all things could exist here, that made their existence a fact that could not be argued away. No matter how absurd or strange, they were still objective reality. If he could not understand it for the moment, that was his problem, not the world's.

As the current captain of the Vanished, Duncan felt he would probably have a long time to slowly get to know this world.

Alice did not know why the captain stayed silent along the way. She only knew that the air around Duncan suddenly grew heavy. Yet after they reached the target cabin, that heavy feeling faded at once.

Duncan brought the doll Miss to the place where she could bathe. It was a bathroom prepared for the higher ranking seafarers. For a classical sailing ship, such a bathroom was a kind of "luxury" facility. Normally, it would never be for common sailors.

In ancient times, life on sailing ships during long ocean voyages had been very harsh. Limited fresh water, rotten food, terrible medical care, and the mental pressure of long journeys troubled every explorer who dared to challenge the sea. On Earth, many of these problems were not fully solved even by the early industrial age.

From what Duncan knew, early sailing Ocean-Going Vessels on Earth did not even have toilets prepared for regular crew members. Ordinary sailors usually handled their personal needs on grating boards hanging over the sea, which also meant they had to watch the wind direction. Bathing was an even harder problem. Using spare sails as bathtubs and washing with seawater was how many easygoing sailors solved it. Many seafarers in the age of sail simply chose not to bathe for weeks or even months.

After all, compared to scurvy, the plague, and mass hysteria born from crushing mental pressure, a bit of hygiene trouble was the least of their worries.

Yet, ironically, on this ghost ship that everyone feared, those harsh living problems were solved.

The freshwater tank on the Vanished refilled itself. The food stored in the hold showed no sign of rotting. The ghost captain could not get sick, and Alice's neck problems were not caused by life at sea.

Aside from the frequent spikes in blood pressure when dealing with Goathead, this ship was actually quite livable.

"The pipe next to the tub leads to the freshwater tank. You can draw water straight from it. The plug for the tub hangs over there, do not lose it. For now the conditions are limited, so the ship does not supply hot water, but I do not think that will bother you," Duncan said as he introduced the facilities in the cabin. These simple bits of knowledge were the result of his own exploration over the past few days.

"Just being able to rinse my body is enough. Having salt water in the joints really does not feel good," Alice was not picky at all. She looked around the cabin with curiosity and excitement while listening to Duncan. She nodded as she spoke: "I am only a doll. I do not care much about hot baths."

Duncan nodded, then his expression turned a little odd. He glanced at Alice and spoke with some hesitation: "By the way, do you know how to take a bath? Do you have this kind of… everyday experience?"

Alice really froze for a moment. Then, thinking carefully, she answered very seriously: "I think… it should be fine? I just need to take my joints apart and rinse them, then put them back on after washing…”

Duncan: “…?”

He looked at Alice. Alice looked back at him with an innocent face.

“Have you thought about how you are going to put them back on after you take them all apart?” Duncan realized that his casual question had hit the mark. This doll who had never left her crate really had no experience in this area. “I cannot help you with that.”

Alice: “…That is true, I guess.”

“And I strongly suggest that you do not take your joints apart too often,” Duncan added with some feeling. “Even if your body structure allows it.”

Alice looked confused: “Why?”

“If you take them apart too often, they will start to fall off,” Duncan said at last, unable to keep the helpless tone from his voice. He had never imagined that living on a ship with a cursed Doll would come with this many ‘little details’. No novel, film, or drama had ever covered that. “I do not want you suddenly falling to pieces in front of me while walking on the deck one day. There is no one on this ship who knows how to maintain a doll’s joints.”

He paused, then added: “Your neck problem is already bad enough.”

Alice pictured that scene and immediately shrank her neck: “Ah, all right, all right, I understand… I know what to do now…”

“You had better,” Duncan said. He looked again at this doll whose life experience was not very complete, still a bit worried. Then he turned to leave. “I have many other things to do. Try not to cause too much trouble.”

“Yes, Captain. Thank you, Captain,” Alice said happily. But just as Duncan was about to step out of the cabin, she suddenly spoke again: “Ah, right, Captain…”

Duncan stopped and turned his head a little: “What is it?”

“Captain… I suddenly feel like you are not that scary,” Alice looked at his back and chose her words carefully. “Goathead said you are the most terrifying captain on the Boundless Sea, the most unpredictable disaster on all the route, but…”

“But what?”

“But you seem pretty easy to talk to. You even feel a bit like a worried parent…”

Duncan did not turn around. After two seconds of silence, he suddenly asked: “Where did you get the idea of a family… Do you have a family?”

Alice hesitated at once, then slowly shook her head: “I do not think so.”

“Then do not talk about parents. Just stay on the ship and behave. I will make the arrangements for your life on this ship.”

“Oh. Yes, Captain.”

Chapter 28: Pale Night

Life in the Mortal Realm was not the same as life in strange stories. The biggest difference was that when you lived in the Mortal Realm, you had to think about a whole pile of real and trivial details –

Did a moving cursed doll need joint maintenance? Would Alice, who took her joints apart all the time, someday fall to pieces in the middle of a walk? Had the salted meat and hard cheese on the ghost ship actually gone bad?

What about superheroes who entertained guests by day and fought evil at night – did they ever sleep? And after fighting a superhero, did the forces of evil still have to go to the market for groceries?

Stories never talked about these things. People in stories always came and went like the wind, dressed in spotless white. The cursed doll in a story only needed to crawl out of some dark corner to frighten people. The ghost captain in a story never had to worry that all the salted meat and hard cheese on his ship had expired a century ago.

But a cursed doll in the Mortal Realm felt itchy all over after soaking in seawater, and even taking a bath meant thinking on the spot about how to clean the grains of salt out of every joint…

Standing outside the cabin, Duncan sighed. He now saw even more clearly that surviving on this ship for a long time would take more than just determination.

He also had to think about a whole stack of practical problems, especially now that the number of crew members had increased.

There were actually not many daily supplies on this ghost ship. Duncan knew that very well.

This ship had an unlimited supply of fresh water, but that was the only thing that was unlimited. The food in the hold would not refill itself once eaten, and the only edible things there were salted meat and hard cheese. Because of the Vanished's special nature, they showed no sign of rot, but Duncan still had good reason to suspect they had been stored for at least a century.

Besides that, this ship had no spare clothes that fit Alice's size, though the cursed doll had never mentioned needing any. There was nothing for leisure either – not even a chessboard or a deck of cards.

The Boundless Sea was vast and endless, yet it was very hard for the Vanished to get real supplies from this wide ocean. The ship seemed to have no reliable home port where it could rest and refit, and it had no channel at all to trade with the civilized city-states on land.

Goathead seemed to pay no attention to such problems, but Duncan was already thinking about them seriously. He had to find a way to improve the Vanished's current shortage of supplies.

Beyond that, he was also thinking about how to build contact with the city-states on land.

Drifting blindly on the sea forever was an extremely inefficient way to explore. Information about this world had to be taken from the land. This was Duncan's deepest realization after his walk through the Spirit Realm.

Even aside from that, for the sake of his own body and mind, he needed to try to have more contact with those city-states on land, to touch the civilized society of this world. Otherwise, after drifting for so long, he really was afraid he would turn into a twisted, gloomy, reclusive ghost captain.

Thinking of this, Duncan turned his head a little and looked at the pigeon AI, who was squatting obediently on his shoulder, preening her feathers.

His gaze mainly fell on the brass spirit compass on AI's chest.

The pigeon tilted her head at her Master and suddenly blurted out: "Open a branch base! Lay down fungal carpet! Hey, do you even know how to run things?"

For a moment Duncan fell silent. This pigeon seemed deranged most of the time, yet every now and then the words she blurted out hit so exactly on point that he could not help wondering if she was acting stupid on purpose.

For now, walking in the Spirit Realm seemed to be the only workable way to "go" to the city-states on land.

Even though this method seemed to have far too many uncertainties, and the last time he used it a mysterious accident like "AI" had appeared, Duncan knew he would soon make another walk in the Spirit Realm. It was not only to gather information from the land, but also to test and master a very useful ability as quickly as possible.

Just as important as Spirit Realm walking was AI the pigeon's "special ability" to bring back a ritual knife from far-off land.

If she could bring back a knife, could she bring back more things? What were the rules and limits on the items this bird could carry? Could this process be controlled by people?

After thinking for a while, Duncan decided to ask the pigeon directly: "Do you know how you brought that knife back?"

The pigeon thought for a moment, then said in a deep tone: "You need more crystal ore."

Duncan: "…"

He decided to give up talking with this pigeon for now. It would be more reliable to try this himself the next time he carried out a Spirit Realm walk.

…

Inside the cabin, Alice finally figured out, with some fumbling, how to use the water pipes, and roughly worked out how she was supposed to take a bath.

On a ghost ship with such limited conditions, she could only bathe in cold water, but for a doll, that was no problem at all.

But before jumping into the tub, Alice decided to greet everything in the cabin first.

She patted the huge oak tub, then knocked on the pillars that held up the cabin. She tapped the floor with the tips of her shoes, then stood on tiptoe to tug at the ropes and hooks hanging from the ceiling.

“Hello, my name is Alice,” she said happily to all these cold objects, greeting them the same way she had greeted that Mr. Goathead earlier. “From now on, I will be living on this ship.”

Nothing in the cabin answered her greeting, but Alice did not mind at all.

Goathead had said that the Vanished was alive, and that many things on this ship were alive.

Even though they did not seem to have real minds like Goathead, and could not even communicate, that did not stop Alice from treating the whole Vanished as a “neighbor” who needed to be greeted.

The Vanished was a living thing, and so was she.

Sure that her greeting had been polite and proper, Alice felt even happier. Then she took off her fine dress and clumsily climbed into the oak tub that was now filled with water.

First step, take off her head and rinse it – her neck joint was not very strong anyway.

Miss Doll felt that her plan was very reasonable.

…

In the deep night, the city-state of Pland finally ended a whole day of noise. Under the pale glow of the night sky, this prosperous “Sea Jewel” slowly sank into sleep.

But in the still darkness, the gaze of the Night Watcher watched over the sleeping city.

On the highest building in Pland, the Great Bell Tower, a young woman with long gray-white hair and an unusually tall, straight figure stood at the window, looking down at the city.

Her features were very beautiful, but a striking scar across her left eye made her look fearsome. She was taller than most men and wore light silver-gray armor and a battle skirt. Her body clearly had been well trained, with full, well-shaped muscles in all her limbs. Within easy reach beside her lay a greatsword that gave off a faint silver glow. Runes shaped like waves were carved into the sword’s hilt, and dim light shimmered along the blade like rippling water.

Behind the woman came the constant sound of machinery. The movement of the Great Bell Tower was running smoothly, driven by a steam engine. Complex and precise gears and linkages ran through the roof and the floor, turning the four clock faces above and the Mimicry Orrery hidden deep inside the building.

From the sound alone, this huge and delicate machine was in excellent condition. No evil power had disturbed its sacred steam core.

But Inquisitor Vanna still felt a faint unease. A bad premonition gnawed at her, as if something was about to happen, or had already happened, and she was fated to be powerless before it.

Footsteps came from the stairway. The gray-haired woman turned toward the sound and saw a priest in the long robe of a sea priest coming up from the stairwell. The priest held a copper censer in his hand, and clean-smelling smoke slowly coiled around him.

The priest walked to the central pillar of the movement in the room. He took down the old censer hanging on the pillar's rail and hung up the new one. He watched the smoke drifting from the censer and made sure it floated unhindered among the turning gears and linkages. Only then did he softly recite the name of the Storm Goddess and turn to look at the gray-haired woman standing at the window.

"Good night, Inquisitor. You are standing night watch in person again?"

"I keep having a bad feeling. It has been this way for days – tonight it is even stronger."

"A bad feeling? About what?" The priest lifted his head, worry in his deep eyes. "Did the Goddess send you a prophetic vision?"

"It is not that clear," the young female Inquisitor shook her head. "I only vaguely feel… something is drawing near this city."

Chapter 29: The People Who Protect the City

Gods of supreme power dwelled in the keystones of this world. With sight beyond time and space, they cast their gaze on the workings of the world. Devout believers who turned their hearts toward a god and held the power of Spiritual Insight could, through their secret link with the God, glimpse some part of the Mortal Realm’s future, or changes taking place at that moment in some hidden corner of the world.

This kind of sight was not bound by time or space, but it carried the hidden risk of corruption by Subspace. For devout believers with firm wills, however, this dangerous and powerful gift was their greatest reliance when they guarded the fragile lights of civilization scattered across the endless sea.

Inquisitor Vanna had seen a similar vision for several days in a row.

In a half-dreaming state, she saw the boundless sea darken like ink. Then a thunderous roar rose from the depths. The sea split in two, and a terrible trench opened straight down to the seabed. A huge ship wreathed in flames rose from the ocean floor and slowly floated upward in midair like a flying vessel. Behind it walked an invisible giant, its whole body covered in starlight, taking step after step toward the city-state of Pland.

In Inquisitor Vanna’s life so far, a prophetic vision on such a terrifying scale had appeared only twice.

The first came in her childhood. She woke from a nightmare overflowing with blood, and soon after, in an attack by cultists, she lost her parents and received the scar that would stay on her face for life.

The second came four years ago. In a dream she saw a Black Sun rise beneath the city-state, and because of it she wiped out the largest cell of the Sun cult that had slipped into the city. To this day, the cultists' lingering minions still hid in the vast, complex, ancient tunnels under Pland, locked in a pointless struggle with the Church's Guardians.

This was the third time. She saw a ship return from the Deep Sea, bringing an unnameable giant back into this world.

She had lied to the priest before her. The prophetic vision she saw was in fact very clear – so clear that even she, an Inquisitor, had been unable to sleep for days.

The priest looked into the calm gray-white eyes of the woman before him and hesitated for a long time before speaking: "But when you prayed to the Goddess, you did not seem to receive a bad answer?"

"The Goddess does not have to warn us of every risk. Sometimes hardship itself is the test," Vanna said calmly. "Enough about that. What news is there from the Explorer Association?"

The priest nodded at once: "The contact at the Association just sent word. The sacred relic kept at their headquarters has sensed that ship appear in the southwestern sea. But the telegraph apparatus on board seems to have broken down. Right now we cannot contact them. We only know that the ship is moving at its normal speed and on its normal course toward the coastal waters near Pland."

"It vanished from the sacred relic's senses for a time, then appeared out of nowhere on another stretch of sea far off its planned route. Now it cannot be contacted and is sailing straight toward the city… and before it went missing, it was on a mission to escort an Anomaly.” The Inquisitor’s brows slowly drew together. Years of dealing with eerie things made her instincts prickle with warning. “If I remember right, that ship is called the White Oak, isn’t it?”

“Yes, the White Oak. Its captain is Lawrence Creed of the Explorer Association, a very experienced captain. Because of the special cargo, the Church was informed before the ship left the city-state of Lunsa.” The priest tried to recall the details as he spoke. “Ah, and the priest traveling with them is a registered priest of the Deep Sea Church.”

“So they are our brothers of the Church… I hope things are not too bad,” Vanna said gravely. “In any case, something is wrong with that ship. The entire route from Lunsa to Pland lies inside the Explorer Association’s safe zone. Yet that ship vanished once from the sacred relic’s senses. I suspect the White Oak very likely left the Mortal Realm for a short time, and may even have gone somewhere it should never go.”

“Inform the Guardians at the Harbor. As soon as the White Oak enters port, they are to keep it under watch. Until all inspections are complete, no person and no item may leave that ship. Has the Security Corps responded?”

“Rest assured. Your uncle – the Governor – has already ordered the constables to secure the area around the Harbor and has raised the Harbor’s alert level. From now until the alert is lifted, all ships entering or leaving Pland will temporarily dock at the backup Harbor on the western side.”

“Good. My uncle has always been a cautious man.” The tight look on Vanna’s face finally eased a little. “As long as he does not let those ordinary people in the Security Corps get mixed up in this.”

The priest looked into Vanna's pale gray eyes, chose his words with care, and asked: "Do you think… that ship has already been corrupted?"

"We cannot be sure yet. But a ship that briefly leaves the Mortal Realm and then returns is rarely completely normal. Perhaps some item on board has unknowingly changed into an Anomaly. Perhaps it is some hidden mental illness in a crew member. It might even be an extra sailor or a captain who has been replaced. For a sea ship that has already shown abnormal signs, it is never wrong to treat it with the highest caution."

"Ah… I hope that ship and its crew are all safe," the priest said, placing his hand over his chest and murmuring the name of the Storm Goddess. "May the Storm Goddess protect all who bravely challenge the sea."

"May they all be safe," Vanna echoed softly, lowering her eyes. Then, as if to remind the priest before her, she added: "But if they are not so fortunate, we must also be ready."

"Yes. I understand."

Vanna nodded. She was about to turn her attention back to the city outside the window when hurried footsteps suddenly sounded from the stairs.

Moments later, a Guardian in a black uniform trimmed with silver ran up from the stairwell, the emblem of waves and a dagger painted on his chest.

"Inquisitor!" The young Guardian took two quick breaths, then spoke urgently: "We have found a worship site of the Sun cult in the sewers and captured a group of cultists!"

Vanna's face grew sharply serious at once: "Those cultists who worship the Black Sun? Wait – you said you found a worship site, not a hiding place? They dared to hold ritual Worship again?!"

"Yes. It was a place used to hold rituals. We found evidence that sacrificial rites had been performed there," the Guardian said quickly. "We also found a large number of victims in a nearby chamber not far from the ritual site – most of them had had their hearts taken in sacrifice. Only… something about the ritual site itself is not quite right."

From the Guardian's face Vanna saw a mix of absurdity and confusion. She took up the heavy greatsword beside her, the one that bore the Storm Goddess's divine blessing, slung it onto her back, and strode quickly toward the stairs: "Lead the way. I will go to the scene myself."

"Yes!"

The heavy, blessed greatsword clinked against her metal shoulder guards with a clear sound. Her quick steps carried her down the long stairs inside the Great Bell Tower. Vanna came out onto the small square in front of the tower and saw several Guardian squad members already gathered there, waiting. Two Steam Walkers stood at the edge of the square, their spider-like mechanical bodies giving off constant clicking sounds.

Vanna did not stop. She only gave the Guardians a signal to move out and walked straight toward one of the walkers. The huge machine, as large as two double-wheel carriages, looked like a mechanical spider crouched on the ground. Wheels were set along the edges of its steel limbs to let it glide over flat ground, and steel hooks were mounted for rough terrain. On either side of the upper carapace were gun pods fitted with rotary guns.

Purely technological creations had a hard time harming Anomalies or Visions directly. But overwhelming firepower could wipe out the heretic cultists hiding behind them and pulling the strings. Of course, these machines could not show their full power in the sewers, but they were very useful for blocking off exits.

A spray of holy 8-millimeter rounds could, in the blink of an eye, send a whole crowd of fleeing heretics off to Subspace to serve their master.

The gray-haired, gray-eyed Inquisitor leaped straight onto the walker’s carapace. With the sword on her back, she stood steady in the night. Two other Guardians climbed skillfully into the gun pods on either side of the carapace. A series of hissing sounds came from the cylinders and pressure pipes as they built up and released steam. White vapor sprayed from the joints of the walker’s limbs. The huge mechanical spider rose, jumped in a single stride onto the nearest main road, then switched to gliding mode and sped toward the closest sewer entrance.

Chapter 30: Traces of Ruin

The huge, heavy mechanical spider folded its long, jointed legs up against its belly and used the wheel structures on the outside of those legs to race along the flat road. Inquisitor Vanna stood steady on the metal shell of the machine as if she had been cast onto it. The night wind, carrying a faint smell of the sea, swept through the streets. The cold air made her mind even clearer.

The cultists who worshipped the god the Sun were a deadly hidden threat to modern civilization. Unfortunately, this kind of hidden threat was not the only one.

Malicious gazes were always watching from the depths of Subspace, fixed on the Mortal Realm. Foolish mortals were always trying to reach for those ominous powers. Between the dealings of Elder Gods and mortals, twisted entities left behind from ancient times, forbidden spawn, and lingering echoes of corruption hid deep inside the city-states. They were always stirring, always ready to move, trying to pry apart the order that held society together.

Among all these threats, the Suntists were the ones that made the Guardians of the city-state of Pland the most wary and the most troubled.

They were not only cultists, but also products of a lost part of the Old World’s history. Compared with most foolish and blind ordinary cults, the most dangerous thing about these heretics who worshipped the Black Sun was that they actually had a kind of “faith”. It was fanatical and twisted, and their lower ranks were a messy mix of all sorts of people, but in the upper levels of this hateful cult, there really was a “core belief” that had not changed for hundreds of years.

This belief centered on the “Age of Order” under the ancient light of the Sun. It formed its own complete system, and they even had a matching “true Solar calendar” that modern civilization refused to recognize. They firmly believed they were the descendants of an ancient civilization that had long been lost, and that this glorious ancient civilization would one day rise again.

As an inquisitor of the Deep Sea Church, Vanna had little interest in the cultists’ twisted theories, but she knew that it was these very ideas that gave the Suntists a unity and stubbornness far beyond that of other heretics. Because of this, they could survive strike after strike and keep growing in the shadows of many city-states.

Even so, the way they had suddenly sprung back to life in Pland still surprised Vanna.

After the huge crackdown four years ago, the believers of the Sun inside Pland had been badly weakened. According to several investigation reports, those heretics had already moved most of their key members to nearby city-states like Lunsa, Morka, and even farther Cold Harbor. The ones left in Pland were only some stubborn fools who had been bewitched, and who were not important enough to follow the bishops when they moved.

These lackeys hid in the sewers. They survived only by using their knowledge of the underground and the bit of twisted divine blessing the Black Sun had given them to dodge the Guardians’ hunts. Four years passed. Their numbers kept shrinking, and all they could do now was struggle on and cling to life.

Yet today, four years later, they had suddenly gathered again. They even dared, at the risk of exposing themselves, to hold a sacrificial ritual in a public assembly hall. Who had given them such courage?

Or rather… was something big about to happen in this city-state? Was there some reason strong enough that those cultists would risk having their last tiny spark stamped out, just to draw the gaze of the Black Sun onto Pland?

From inside the mechanical spider came the vibration and noise of its steam core running at full speed. A faint scent of incense drifted out from its pressure vents and was carried over by the night wind. Vanna forced herself to stop these wild thoughts and looked up at the sky.

World’s Wound hung high in the night sky. Its pale light poured down, shining on the uneven roofs, chimneys, and towers of Pland. The strike team was passing along the edge of the industrial district. Huge steam and hot-fluid pipes stretched between the factories, crossing overhead like the blood vessels of giants threading through the sky above the streets.

Vanna vaguely remembered the past, the night that was burned deepest into her memory and was also the most terrifying. That midnight, thick with the smell of blood, her uncle had carried her on his back as he fled from a sea of fire. The streets were full of walking corpses trapped in a mass hallucination and shadows of swollen, shrinking flesh. They had escaped along the factory pipes, while the stink of blood and the chemical oil seeping from the pipes made her want to retch.

A sudden jolt ran through the mechanical spider under her feet. Vanna snapped out of her memories.

The flat road came to an end. Ahead lay an abandoned area on the edge of the city. The road surface there was full of holes and dips, uneven and rough. The two mechanical spiders left their gliding mode. They stretched their long legs out again and began to race forward at high speed over the bumpy ground.

Before long, the team reached an abandoned sewer entrance.

Another eight-person squad was already waiting there. They had sealed off the area around the entrance to keep any unrelated people from getting close.

Vanna greeted the subordinates here, then followed the officer in charge straight down into the depths of the sewer.

They passed through deep corridors and filthy narrow paths. In the end, Vanna reached the secret assembly hall. Here, she saw more guardian warriors, as well as Church priests who were carrying out a purification ritual.

A temporary sacrificial altar stood in the center of the hall. The wooden platform looked as if it had been burned by fire. On top of it she could still see the desecrated totem built by the Suntists. The totem had already been burned, but its basic structure was still complete.

Around the platform were dozens of cultists, their hands tied, squatting on the ground. Most of them were shaking with fear. A few moved their lips, muttering their blasphemous prayers in silence.

But with the ritual site destroyed and the storm goddess already watching this place, these heretics' prayers were useless.

Not far from the sacrificial altar lay the bodies of the victims found in nearby caverns. These sad, murdered people had been placed on linen sheets covered in runes. Morticians who had rushed here were checking the condition of each corpse.

Several Church priests walked around the sacrificial altar. The bronze chains in their hands swayed softly. The censers at the ends of the chains gave off pure white smoke. Wherever the smoke touched the ground near the altar, it was instantly dyed with an ominous black shadow, and then more white smoke washed over it and carried that corruption away. The breath of the Black Sun left here would be cleared bit by bit in this process.

“Inquisitor, please come this way. This is where we found something strange,” a young guardian said, pointing at a few bodies beside the sacrificial altar. “Please be careful. The ground here is not very clean.”

Vanna walked straight toward the bodies. When she saw the state of one of them, she frowned without thinking.

It was a cultist wearing a Golden Sun mask. There was no doubt he was the priest directly in charge of the sacrificial ritual at this defiled altar.

There was a terrible hole in the middle of his chest.

“…What is going on here?” Vanna frowned. “Did this fanatic heretic get too worked up at the end of the ritual and end up sacrificing himself too? I have never heard of the cultists of the Black Sun having such a rule.”

“That is exactly what is so strange. He did not sacrifice himself,” the guardian who had brought Vanna over said at once, shaking his head. His expression looked a little odd. “According to the cultists we captured at the scene… their ‘envoy’ was sacrificed by a sacrificial victim.”

“Sacrificed by a sacrificial victim?” Vanna raised her eyebrows. “What kind of nonsense is that?”

“It really does sound like nonsense.” The guardian spread his hands helplessly. “In fact, when we got here, most of the cultists were already half-mad.”

“Already half-mad?”

“Yes. Their sacrificial ritual clearly went very wrong. Many of them fell into madness. Some had even started hacking each other to pieces. They all seemed to see each other as… ‘monsters’ possessed by some terrible thing.

It was because they rushed out of the hall in their madness that they alarmed the constables on patrol nearby and exposed the whole affair. By the time we arrived, there were only a few who could still stay clear-headed and answer questions. And those last few who could still speak clearly all insisted that a sacrificial victim sacrificed the envoy."

"Madness? Cutting each other down? And they thought others were monsters possessed by something?" Vanna's expression grew serious at once. "Have you checked them? Was it caused by corruption from the Black Sun?"

"We could not find any marks of outside corruption. It looks more like a kind of spontaneous madness. The thing that drove them mad seems rooted inside their own minds," the guardian said. He lifted his hand and pointed at a young woman in a black dress who was moving among the cultists. "Heidi is already here. If we can confirm that these cultists have not been corrupted by the Black Sun, we will have to try using hypnosis."

Chapter 31: Remnants

Vanna looked up at the woman in the black dress who was checking the cultists' mental state. The woman noticed her gaze, looked up as well, and gave her a small nod.

The woman looked only a bit over twenty, yet she had a calm, steady air that felt far more mature than her age. Her black hair was coiled up at the back of her head. Pale blue crystal earrings hung from her ears, catching and reflecting the light of a nearby gas lamp when they swung.

"…Heidi is here too… Did City Hall send her?" Vanna asked the young guardian beside her.

"No. When this happened, Heidi just happened to be nearby. She came as soon as she heard the news. Is that a problem?"

"No, nothing is wrong. Heidi may be an employee of City Hall, but she has worked with the Church for a long time. We can just file a field record afterward," Vanna said, shaking her head. She quickly turned her attention back to the matter at hand. As she examined the cult priest who had lost his mind and died, she asked casually: "What else did the cultists who could still talk say? What was the situation at the time?"

"Their words were very confused. Two of them said that the normal sacrificial ritual had already ended. Then someone suddenly caught a runaway sacrificial victim near the hall. So the envoy decided to offer this sacrificial victim to the Sun," the guardian said, trying to recall the details. "Those two cultists were standing far from the altar and did not see clearly what happened on the platform. They only said that the sacrificial victim had a hole through his heart but did not die. Instead, he shouted the Sun's name at the top of his lungs and named the envoy as the new sacrificial victim. Then the envoy was sacrificed."

"…A person chosen as a sacrificial victim called out the name of an eldritch god on the spot and just like that turned the ritual leader into the one who got sacrificed?" Vanna felt as if she had heard some wild story. It sounded absurd, but these words came from a guardian of the Church who had been strictly trained and was loyal and reliable. She had no choice but to take it seriously, and her expression grew strange. "How could something so ridiculous happen? If this really worked, then at all those cult rituals, wouldn't any victim who could talk fast enough be able to turn the tables and kill the heretic priests?"

"Exactly. Even the worst priest still holds absolute control when leading a ritual. How could a weak ordinary person push the ritual into such a runaway state with a single sentence? Besides, we have examined this priest. He clearly bears the marks of corruption from projections coming from the deep layers of the world. He was a true 'baptized one'. And according to the cultists at the scene, he was holding a ritual dagger with divine blessing at the time…"

The young guardian shook his head as he spoke, then walked over to another body lying nearby.

"But… please take a look at this. This is the 'sacrificial victim' who turned on the priest."

Vanna glanced at the guardian, then let her gaze fall on the lifeless corpse. In the next second her eyes sharpened.

It was a thin young man. He was so skinny that his build was closer to that of a boy. The most striking anomaly on his body was the empty hole in his chest.

“…He had already been sacrificed…”

“Yes. This was a sacrificial victim who had already been offered up,” the guardian said in a serious tone. “Judging from the traces at the scene and the cultists’ statements, this ‘sacrificial victim’ had probably already lost his heart before he was pushed onto the platform. So the real situation then was that a walking corpse, in front of everyone, went up onto the platform and killed the priest leading the ritual, treating him as the new sacrificial victim.”

“…A necromancer’s trick?” Vanna muttered to herself as she thought it through. “No. The power of the Black Sun greatly restrains necromancers. Their walking corpses could never stroll right up to the totem of the Black Sun. Was it a revenant controlled by some anomaly?”

“Have you checked the lighting nearby?” she suddenly asked, looking up at the guardian beside her. “Within five hundred meters, is there any underground space that is completely dark?”

“We checked. There are no lightless caverns. Even cultists know how dangerous lightless caverns are. In the caves where they dumped bodies, they still left torches and oil lamps. They were very careful about that.”

Vanna did not speak for a moment. She bent down over the young man’s body, filled with doubt. She carefully examined the “sacrificial victim” who had, in front of so many witnesses, managed to sacrifice an extraordinary priest and send the ritual into a complete runaway state. At the same time, she reached out and lifted the corpse’s stiff eyelid, trying to find some trace left by heretical power.

Suddenly, it seemed as if a faint light flashed at the edge of her vision. She thought she saw the young man’s corpse crack its eyes open a little. Pale green fire flickered in the empty eyeballs. A tiny spark leapt out and landed on the tip of her extended right index finger, then drifted away on the wind.

Vanna’s gaze turned cold. In an instant she drew the dagger at her waist with her left hand and, without any hesitation, sliced off her own right index finger. Then she reversed her grip and drove the dagger straight into the corpse’s forehead. The priest’s dagger, its blade covered in runes, suddenly burst into roaring flames that swallowed the corpse whole.

She took less than a second to do all of this. By the time the fire engulfed the body, she had already straightened up and stepped back two paces. She pulled out a small bottle of holy oil, which had been blessed with divine power, from her belt. She bit out the cork and poured the oil onto her right hand, which was gushing blood. When the holy oil touched flesh and blood, it gave off a loud hiss and thick white smoke.

Stabbing pain rushed through her hand, but Vanna’s face did not change at all. She saw that the guardian who had been beside her all this time had already drawn the steel sword at his waist. With one stroke, he chopped off the head of the “sacrificial victim” burning in the flames. Then he threw a dose of medicine into the fire, a mixture of seaweed extract and silver powder.

With sharp crackling blasts and flames that surged up almost to the ceiling, the twisted corpse turned to ash in the blink of an eye.

The fierce fire did not spread to any of the other bodies nearby.

The guardians around them had all reacted. Half of them drew runic steel swords and closed in around Vanna. The other half pulled out large-caliber revolvers and quickly formed a ring of guards farther out. The two priests on site also drew revolvers from beneath their robes. As they pointed the guns at the raving cultists who had grown restless because of the sudden change, they held censers over the gun barrels, blessed the weapons with divine power, and chanted the name of the storm goddess Gamona.

“Inquisitor!” The young guardian with the steel sword finally rushed to Vanna’s side. “Are you all right? Just now…”

“There was some kind of power left in that ‘sacrificial victim’. It slipped past all the protections the goddess gave me and even past my psychic ward,” Vanna said, waving her hand. Her gaze dropped to her right hand. The goddess’s gift was taking effect. The finger cut off by the dagger was wriggling as it slowly grew back. Yet even as the pain slowly faded, she did not feel any calmer.

“Something is wrong. This was not just the work of the Black Sun. Some other powerful force also visited this sacrificial ritual… and that force has not fully left. It still wants something,” the inquisitor said quickly, making her judgment. “Move everyone and everything we have seized to the Cathedral and keep them under strict watch. All further examinations and interrogations will be done inside the Cathedral. This whole site must go through complete purification. Is there anyone else in the area?”

A guardian beside her answered at once: “Yes. We rescued a group of people from another cavern nearby. They were imprisoned as ‘future sacrificial victims’. They are being kept in a nearby pipe room for now.”

“Take them too. Bring them all to the Cathedral. They may be victims, but they must still go through strict checks before we send them home,” Vanna said quickly. Then she seemed to remember something. “Where is Heidi? Is she all right?”

“I am here.” A calm female voice sounded nearby. The woman in the black dress, the “psychiatrist” hired by City Hall, walked over at an unhurried pace and nodded to Vanna. “Do not worry. I did not react at all just now. So what exactly happened?”

“…Just like in many classic tales, the cultists provoked something more evil than themselves,” Vanna said, giving the “psychiatrist” a look. “I strongly suggest that when you examine these cultists and put them under hypnosis later, you add extra layers of protection. Something that should not have appeared showed up here… and it has left remnants behind.”

Chapter 32

As the night faded, the Pale Scar that filled the whole sky also slowly dissolved. Duncan stood on the aft deck, head tilted back, using his gaze on the sky. He did not let any detail of this moment between night and day escape him.

He saw the scar become transparent and unreal bit by bit, like a dream slowly waking. The gray-white mist of light that leaked from it merged with the sky first, then the scar itself. Throughout the whole process, the position of that “scar” never changed.

Duncan blinked as more guesses rose in his mind. Since the mark in the sky did not shift, did that mean it was not some distant astronomical structure? Did it mean it was only a phantom “printed” on the background of the atmosphere, moving in sync with the Boundless Sea?

Or was it because the planet on which the Boundless Sea lay—if this really was a planet—and that scar happened to move in perfect step with each other? Or was the scar actually moving, but his observation time was too short for the naked eye to notice?

All kinds of guesses rose and fell in his mind, but Duncan knew very well that until he had enough evidence and reliable experiments, these were only guesses. A natural phenomenon could have countless possible explanations, but without theory and proof, everything was empty talk.

The Sun rose.

First, a golden glow appeared along the line where sea met sky. Then a huge glowing structure suddenly rose from the sea. Wrapped in magnificent, blazing light, the spherical glowing orb locked in place by double layers of rune structure appeared in Duncan’s sight.

Driven by the slow turning of the rune structures, the Sun rose in solemn majesty. The imposing process seemed to carry a sound with it—a deep, powerful, slow rumble echoed faintly in Duncan’s mind. But when he really focused to listen, the sound suddenly vanished.

He frowned, wondering if he had only imagined it, yet the memory of that sound was so clear that he could not deny it.

Was that… a proclamation the Sun sent to this world as it rose? Or just one of the many illusions brought by the Boundless Sea?

No one could answer Duncan’s doubts. The vast Boundless Sea kept all its secrets as always.

The pigeon AI squatted comfortably on Duncan’s shoulder as usual. Then AI suddenly stood up, flapping its wings hard. It stared at the sea and loudly chattered: “Get some fries! Get some fries!”

Duncan could not help but laugh. He glanced at the strange pigeon and suddenly felt that having this bird around was not so bad. The odd phrases it blurted out from time to time always gave him a bit of “hometown” familiarity.

“Sadly, there are no fries on this ship,” he said, flicking the pigeon’s beak as he turned toward the captain’s cabin. “But you are right about one thing. We need to get something to eat.”

A short while later, the captain of the Vanished had prepared a traditional ghost ship breakfast for himself. In the captain’s cabin, Duncan simply used the chart table as a dining table, setting a few plates on the empty space beside the enchanted sea chart. Today's breakfast was the same as yesterday's dinner, yesterday's lunch, and every meal before that: jerky, cheese, and plain water.

Duncan sat at the chart table and carefully, almost ritualistically, spread a napkin over his lap. Goathead sat quietly opposite him. On his left was the cursed Doll Alice, who had come early to say hello. The strange pigeon squatted on the tabletop to his right.

Duncan suddenly felt that this scene finally fit his ghost ship captain persona. There was the goat wood carving that represented demons, the cursed Doll he could not throw away, the talkative bird that knew knowledge from other worlds, and the ghost ship captain seated at the head of the table. If someone took a picture, it could go on a movie poster without any editing…

But only the people on the Vanished knew what the food situation on board was really like.

Duncan sighed and looked down at the food on his plate. The movie-poster opening scene was over. What came next was the real life of firewood, rice, oil, and salt aboard the Vanished.

He picked up his knife and pressed it hard into the cheese. The scrape of hard things rubbing together gave off a squeaking sound. Then he poked the jerky beside it with his fork, and the jerky hit the plate with a clear, ringing clink.

Alice watched this curiously and finally could not help asking: "Captain, today's food is the same as yesterday's, right?"

"Tomorrow's will be the same too," Duncan said, looking up at the cursed Doll. "Do you want to try some?"

Alice thought for a moment, then picked up a strip of jerky with her hand. She put it in her mouth and chewed twice, then spat it out with a “ptoo, ptoo”: “It’s not tasty at all!”

“Even if it tasted good, you couldn’t swallow it—do you even have a stomach?” Duncan reached out and took the half strip of jerky from Alice’s hand. “I only meant to let you try it, and you really did.”

As he spoke, he glanced at the food on his plate again, now with some worry.

These were the only food he could find on the ship. The jerky felt like thick salted cardboard. The cheese was like loose firewood mixed with sand, and no matter how he handled it, it kept a strange smell. He had tried boiling the jerky in water, roasting it, even pan-frying it, but after all that effort he still could not improve the taste or texture.

The good news was that at least the food had not rotted and would not poison anyone. The bad news was that the power of time still turned these things, which had not decayed, into something he strongly did not recommend putting in a human throat. Duncan had every reason to believe that this cheese was several times older than he was, and if the animals that became the jerky were still alive, they would have seen at least a century of storms and change.

The captain of the Vanished might not have to worry about scurvy, but Duncan still longed for a healthy diet. At the very least, he hoped the food on his plate could be a little younger than he was.

Being the same age would be fine too.

The “Vanished supply plan” and the “land exploration plan” he had thought through yesterday rose in his mind again.

But none of that could be done in a short time.

Duncan sighed and kept cutting the “firewood” on his plate as if he were taking revenge on it. AI, who had been tilting its head on a nearby table for a long time, finally walked over. The bird first looked at its Master, then at the things on the plate: “Crystal ore reserves insufficient?”

Duncan glanced at the pigeon, pinched up some crumbs of cheese that had fallen off, and tossed them to it. AI pecked twice, then suddenly froze in place like a machine that had just crashed…

The bird stayed stiff like that for a full three or four seconds before it suddenly moved again. It flapped its wings wildly and flew to a nearby shelf, squawking in a furious voice: “I would rather starve today, die outside, and jump off from here than eat that again…”

Duncan felt a little hurt, and Goathead, who had finally been quiet for a while on the other side of the table, could not help starting to make squeaking wood-scraping noises.

Before this thing could drill into itself to make fire, Duncan finally nodded: “If you have something to say, just say it.”

“Yes, Captain,” Goathead finally got his chance to talk and became noisy at once. “I have wanted to ask since yesterday. This one you brought… is called ‘AI’, right? Why can I never understand what it says? I thought about it all night yesterday. What does ‘recharge Q-coins’ even mean?”

Duncan raised his eyebrows at once. He had truly not expected Goathead to hold this question in until now. He had actually underestimated this thing’s self-control.

“You don’t need to worry about it. This bird’s way of thinking is very strange,” Duncan said. He did not stop his woodworking, and the knife and fork in his hands kept making the sound of chisels and axes. He casually gave the excuse he had already prepared. “It seems to use a language only it can fully understand when it talks to people. If you hear it enough, you can roughly guess what it means."

"Is that so?" Goathead fell into thought. "But I keep feeling that there is some kind of logic hidden in its words… as if there is a complete, self-consistent set of knowledge behind that language. You found AI while you were walking in the Spirit Realm, didn't you? Then could it be some projection from the depths of the Abyssal Deep? You know, the deeper you go, the more often information from misaligned times appears as projections. Among them are many lost ages we have never known, and even some fragments of the future. Maybe AI is talking about things from another timeline?"

The cutting in Duncan's hands paused for a moment, so briefly it was almost impossible to see. Then everything went on as usual, and he said in a calm tone: "Then I wish you luck in working out the logic behind AI's language as soon as possible."

Goathead's words might have been random guesses, but the information hidden in them still stirred waves in Duncan's heart.

While he walked in the Spirit Realm, had his soul drawn near to the deeper layers of this world? In those deeper places, would one see more projections from misaligned times? Could those projections even show scenes from different timelines?

When Duncan walked in the Spirit Realm, he had not seen any "scenery from different timelines", but Goathead had not been wrong about one thing —AI really did come from another time and space.

Then… was this pigeon brought into this world by an Earth human named "Zhou Ming", or was it truly, as Goathead said, from the deeper layers of this world?

Chapter 33

This breakfast tasted like wax—and the texture was even worse than wax.

After finishing this less-than-satisfying breakfast, Duncan's mood did not improve at all with his stomach filled. Instead, he grew a bit more restless because some of the things Goathead had mentioned by accident had stirred up a pile of messy guesses.

He looked at the pigeon AI, who was strolling leisurely on a nearby shelf, and felt his wild thoughts grow even more absurd.

He had always thought this pigeon, who kept talking in Earth phrases, was born because he carried the soul of an Earth human. He believed that while he walked in the Spirit Realm, the individual "Zhou Ming" had reacted with the brass spirit compass and thus brought this strange bird AI into being.

But what if… things really were not like that?

If things were really as Goathead had said, and this pigeon was only some kind of phantom that had run out from a "deeper" place and happened to take shape beside him?

Then the Earth phrases AI sometimes blurted out would have nothing to do with Zhou Ming's memories. They would instead be a projection of some piece of history that this world itself had recorded…

The possibilities behind this left Duncan upset and uneasy.

Alice stood up. Her voice cut off Duncan's wandering thoughts: "Do you need me to wash the dishes?"

Duncan looked at Miss Doll in some surprise. She scratched her hair in embarrassment. “I just feel that since I’m already on the ship, I should find something to do. Otherwise I’m just here for food…”

“But you don’t eat at all,” Duncan reminded her. “Still, it’s nice that you want to help. Take the plates to the washroom and have a talk with the sink. If it doesn’t mind, you can wash them.”

After he said this, he did not wait for Alice to answer. He stood up, walked toward the door of the captain’s cabin, and added casually: “I’m going to inspect the deck. Don’t come to bother me if nothing’s wrong.”

The pigeon, still strolling on the shelf, fluttered at once onto Duncan’s shoulder and left the room with him, leaving Alice and Goathead staring at each other across the chart table.

“Is the captain in a bad mood?” Alice asked Goathead carefully after a moment’s hesitation.

Goathead answered in a deep tone: “The captain’s mood is like the weather on the Boundless Sea. Don’t try to guess it. Just accept it.”

Before Goathead could go on, Alice quickly asked again: “Oh right, the captain just told me to talk with the sink… how do I talk with it?”

“That’s simple. You go wash things. If you get splashed all over, that means the sink doesn’t like you. Speaking of which, do you know how to wash dishes? If you don’t, I have some theoretical experience…”

Before Goathead could finish, Alice quickly gathered up the dishes on the table. She rushed toward the door while shouting: “No need, I’ll learn it, thank you, Mr. Goathead, goodbye!”

The captain’s cabin fell quiet at once. Only the dark Goathead remained on the table, his hollow eyes fixed in a gaze at the direction everyone had gone.

After a long time, a sigh came from the chart table: “If only I had legs…”

Then his gaze returned to the enchanted sea chart.

The mist around the Vanished was still slowly thinning, and the steering task the captain had left him still had to be done well.

Under precise control, this huge and “living” ghost ship sensitively adjusted the angles of its sails and continued to sail on the Boundless Sea. Goathead began to hum a sea shanty of unknown age. His rough, hoarse humming, almost like noise, echoed in the captain’s cabin:

“Hoist the sails, hoist the sails, the sailors who left home keep moving forward;

“In wind and waves, in noise and crowds, only a single plank stands between us and death; “Take in the jib, spread the main sail, loose the ropes, hold the rail! We have already reached the middle of the sea!

“Stay far from the fish, stay far from the fish, sailors must pass beyond those routes where Spawn gather;

“Stay far from the fish, stay far from the fish! We must reach the harbor safe and sound—strong drink and warm hearths lie ahead…”

Duncan walked one round through the supplies storeroom and then another through the kitchen, and only then returned to the midship deck of the Vanished.

No matter how many times he searched, he could not find anything more edible on this ship than jerky and cheese.

The good news was that he did not have to eat maggot-filled biscuits like the sailors of the age of sail on Earth. The bad news was that this ship did not even have maggot-filled biscuits.

He pushed aside his earlier wild thoughts for now and, taking the now quiet AI with him, walked to the edge of the deck.

He gazed at the Boundless Sea and kept thinking:

[No matter what, I have to find a way to resupply the daily necessities on the Vanished… Even if I should not care too much about quality of life on a ghost ship, I still cannot really live like a ghost…]

[Alice might need clothes to change into. There are no dresses on this ship that suit her.]

[I must build contact with the city-states on land as soon as possible… the Vanished has been drifting at sea for too many years. In that time, the city-states on land may have developed to a level even that Goathead could not have predicted. From the things I saw before in that sewer, at least the city-state of Pland is a strong and advanced great city. The revolvers those cultists carried also show how far human society's technology has come…]

[An ancient ghost ship may not be so unbeatable when facing a civilized society that has developed for a century. The Vanished still has some lingering power, but if only that power remains, things will be bad…]

Duncan glanced at AI on his shoulder.

Maybe… after resting and saving his strength today, he should try another walk in the Spirit Realm.

"Coo?"

AI tilted its head. It finally made a sound a normal pigeon should make.

Duncan could not help but smile. Just then, the corner of his eye caught a flash of ripples on the nearby sea.

His attention was drawn by the movement. He instinctively looked out past the ship's rail a few more times and then noticed that something really seemed to be swimming under the water nearby.

After a brief pause, Duncan suddenly slapped his own forehead.

“Hey! What is wrong with me… This is the sea! Aren’t there fish in the sea?”

This sudden “possibility” lifted Duncan’s mood at once. He knew that setting up contact with the land and arranging a stable supply line for the Vanished could not be done in a day. But could this vast ocean itself not help him a little?

There were fish in the sea—and he was already sick of the jerky and cheese on the ghost ship!

Duncan’s enthusiasm flared up. He remembered that in one of the storerooms under the deck there were heavy fishing rods for sea fishing, and mounts on the rail along the deck edge where the rods could be fixed. As for bait… he wondered if the jerky and cheese would work.

And so, while the cursed Doll washed dishes in the washroom and the talking Goathead focused on steering the ship, the captain of the Vanished busied himself back and forth between the deck and the cabins.

Duncan soon found what he wanted. He carried three heavy fishing rods and the “bait” back to the deck. A bit clumsily, he fixed the rods to the mounts along the rail, baited the hooks, and cast the lines. Then he dragged over an empty barrel to use as a seat while he waited.

In truth, Duncan had no experience with sea fishing. All his fishing experience came from ponds and a small river back in his old hometown. He did not know if this sudden idea would really let him catch any fish, but he was idle anyway, so why not try? What if it worked?

He treated it as a way to rest and recover before his next walk into the Spirit Realm, while also keeping a bit of hope for better meals in the future.

Duncan sat down between the rods. During the long wait, his mood slowly returned to calm.

The sea was fairly calm today. There were quite a few clouds in the sky, but no prophetic vision of a storm.

Duncan sat on the barrel, leaning against a winch used to fasten the ropes. As the ship swayed gently, he narrowed his eyes.

Before he knew it, he slipped into a half-dreaming, half-waking state.

He dreamed that he was walking barefoot on a calm sea. The water was deep blue, and the sunlight was warm.

The familiar and “normal” Sun from his memories hung high in the sky, bright but not scorching.

He heard the sound of splashing water. Following the sound, he saw fish suddenly jump out from the calm surface nearby.

It was a school of small golden fish, each only about the size of a palm. They blew bubbles in the air and waved their tails as if they were swimming in water, slowly circling around Duncan.

These fish that swam through the air drew closer bit by bit. Zhou Ming looked at them with curiosity, at their round bulging eyes, their fine scales, their mouths opening and closing, and the faint ripples, like water waves, that floated behind them.

Zhou Ming suddenly felt that these fish were very beautiful, and also…

Very fragrant.

They must be very, very fragrant.

Chapter 34: Harvest

A sudden crash of waves jolted Duncan awake from his dream.

He snapped his eyes open. The vision he had seen in that half-dream state had already faded, leaving only faint fragments. He only remembered seeing fish swimming in the air, circling around him and looking especially delicious—but what had those fish looked like again?

Fish… could fish really swim in the air?

Duncan blinked. That strange feeling of the Mortal Realm tearing and blending with his dream left him dazed for a moment. He looked at the three fishing rods fixed in the rod rack; none of them showed any sign of a bite. Out on the distant sea, though, the surface had begun to swell, and one wave after another was already slapping against the hull of the Vanished.

Then the waves grew higher. In a way he could see with the naked eye, each new wave grew stronger as they rolled in from afar in an endless rush. The huge hull of the Vanished rocked in the wind and waves, and the roar of the surging water filled his ears.

Duncan looked up at the sky. The weather still seemed fine. There were just more wind and waves, but it should not be enough to turn into some great storm or other extreme phenomenon.

“This might not be the best weather for fishing…”

He muttered to himself, wondering if he should reel in the lines. But just then, out of the corner of his eye, he suddenly saw the tip of one rod bend sharply!

Sea-fishing line made for strength went taut in an instant. The short, thick rod bent like a bow as if it had hooked some huge creature. It creaked with a harsh sound, and even the wooden rack holding it groaned under the pull. All of this sent Duncan one clear signal:

A fish! A big one!

He instantly dropped the idea of packing up to rest. The passion of a fisherman flared in his chest. In two strides he reached the rod that had hit the jackpot. One hand grabbed it to keep it from tearing free of the rack, and the other began to carefully adjust the tension of the line.

“I knew it! There is no way I was going home empty-handed!”

Duncan talked to himself in excitement as he wrestled with the huge thing on the other end of the line. It was a hard fight. Whatever lay at the end of the line clearly had no intention of surrendering. A tremendous force pulled on the rod; even with Duncan’s strength and the support of the rack, the stalemate still felt dangerously close to breaking.

The wind and waves around the Vanished grew little by little, but for Duncan, this slight rocking was nothing.

He was only getting annoyed by that stubborn “prey” and worried that this hard-won chance to improve their meals might slip away for nothing.

The line was stretched to its limit. The big fish was about to tear free from his hands.

After who knew how long of holding on, Duncan finally steeled himself. A cluster of ghostly emerald flame suddenly spread out from the hand gripping the rod.

The green flame flared, flowing like water. It ran swiftly along the rod and the line. The fire of his spirit form burned all the way down, turning the line into a blazing trail that plunged straight into the sea. A second later, deep down in the water around the Vanished, a hazy outline of emerald fire appeared out of nowhere. In the light of that ghostly flame, a vast shadow took shape in the sea.

That shadow looked like a huge, pulsing mass of flesh. It almost covered the entire stretch of sea for hundreds of meters around the Vanished. Countless dark growths stretched from its edges, constantly changing and multiplying. They writhed and waved through the ocean like thousands of arms, churning the water around the Vanished and driving the rise and fall of the unseen waves.

Duncan heard strange sounds coming from the sea. While he kept up the struggle with his “prey”, he leaned out curiously and glanced around.

He saw nothing, just the rolling waves, not much different from before.

Yet he clearly felt the force pulling on the rod weaken a little.

His prey was running out of strength. That fact brought a bright grin to his face.

He began to reel in hard, tightening the line and dragging his catch out of the water bit by bit…

…

Alice was startled by the roar and howl from outside the cabin. Violent rocking came from under her feet, and all the furnishings in the cabin clattered together in a series of ringing crashes. She grabbed a nearby rail in a quick reflex and barely kept herself from falling. Her face showed shock and doubt as she asked: “What happened?”

The Vanished was shaking as if a great storm raged outside. From deep within this ancient ghost ship came a low, oppressive rumble, as if it were roaring and bellowing, fighting against the terror rising from the Deep Sea, resisting some huge beast that was trying to swallow it whole.

Everything in the cabin was rattling and ringing. At first, Alice thought it was all just from the ship's shaking. But soon she realized many of the noisy objects were actually clattering in place—making sounds as they talked to each other. Alice could not understand this language that only the Vanished itself could comprehend.

She only knew that something outside had probably gone wrong.

The doll decided to go up to the deck and take a look—she stumbled out of the cabin, one hand on the wall to keep from falling as she ran toward the deck.

After almost tripping several times over whipping ropes and barrels rolling about, she finally reached the top of the stairs. She pushed open the wooden door that kept swinging in the wind and saw monstrous waves rising on the Boundless Sea.

The sky was black as ink. Ominous, heavy clouds had almost clumped into solid masses, pressing low over the sea. Wall-like waves rolled and surged under the dark clouds, rising and falling around the Vanished as if to encircle it.

Alice had never seen such a sight before. She did not know if this was normal at sea, but she did know she had to find the captain now.

She looked around the deck and, almost without effort, spotted Captain Duncan standing at the edge.

…

The wind and waves around him were a bit annoying, but to Duncan, who was about to succeed, they were only trivial distractions. From the feedback of both the line and the green flame, he could clearly feel that his prey had stopped resisting. The huge creature was being dragged out of the water bit by bit.

“Come on up!”

He shouted in delight and gave the rod one last hard pull.

A big fish burst out of the sea—truly big, almost half his own height.

For a brief instant, Duncan locked eyes with the fish hanging in midair.

“…Pretty ugly.”

That was his first thought.

It really was a very, very ugly fish. Its pitch-black body looked covered with some kind of overgrown, lumpy growths. Weird gray-white patterns sprawled messily along its fins. Many bone-like spines jutted from its head, and a pair of pale, empty eyes under those spines stared straight at Duncan.

Duncan felt very uneasy. He had the strange sense that the fish was staring at him with ill intent.

But the next second, he saw the fish suddenly convulse. For some reason, the eyes that had been staring at him burst apart out of nowhere, and blood streamed out at once.

The fish fell heavily onto the deck and thrashed and twisted like it had been shocked by lightning. In just a few seconds it went still. Blood seeped from its mouth and its burst eyes, dripping onto the deck bit by bit.

Duncan watched in surprise as the hideous fish quickly lost all life at his feet. He vaguely recalled something he had read in books: most fish from the Deep Sea really were very ugly, and because they lived under heavy pressure for so long, when they were pulled up to the surface their blood vessels could burst from the change, even killing them quickly because of it. So the fish in this world were like that too?

While he was still spacing out, another series of sharp thuds suddenly came from nearby.

Duncan looked over in curiosity and saw several smaller “strange fish” falling onto the deck one after another.

They looked much like the half-man-high monster fish, but were only about half a meter long. And just like the big one, by the time Duncan’s gaze fell on them, they were already bleeding heavily all over and soon lay at death’s door.

Duncan stood there, a bit stunned, and only after a long moment did he react: “Is this like the Calabash Brothers saving Grandpa, coming one after another in a line?”

…

Alice gripped the nearby rail tightly, nervously watching the savage fight not far away, a scene enough to drive an ordinary person mad.

She saw Captain Duncan standing at the edge of the deck, ghost-green flames roaring from his body. He stood like a burning giant facing the sea. Three hooked chains stretched out from the deck at his feet, and terrible flames burned along one of them.

She saw a vast shadow suddenly appear in the Boundless Sea. Then a tentacle, almost thicker than the mainmast of the Vanished, rose from the water. Countless eyes full of malice opened along its surface, and numberless sharp teeth ground and chewed between those eyes, as if ready to bite the entire ship into pieces in the next instant.

Alice almost cried out. She wanted to warn the captain to dodge, to rush in and help, but before she could move, the tentacle crashed down toward him.

She saw Captain Duncan lift his head. In the blaze of the flames, his face actually showed the joy of a bountiful harvest—he was staring at the countless eyes on the tentacle, and the countless eyes on the tentacle were staring back at him.

The next second, all the eyes on the tentacle burst apart at once. Hundreds of sharp teeth let out a shrill, agonized screech. Then the tentacle simply broke off in midair—as if some huge body hidden beneath the surface had cut off its own limb on purpose and thrown the badly wounded end onto the deck.

The tentacle crashed down. Foul, sticky flesh spilled from the severed end, splattering all over and landing at the captain’s feet.

Chapter 35: Calm and Normal

The sea grew calm.

Alice saw the tentacle lying on the deck and pieces of flesh filled with some great power scattered at the captain's feet. Life quickly drained out of that flesh. At the same time, the huge thing lurking beneath the water around the Vanished began to dive away faster. After paying one tentacle as the "price", it left the waters around the Vanished in a rush, almost as if it were fleeing in panic.

As that vast shadow sank back into the Deep Sea, the ocean returned to calm with a speed that was shocking. The dark clouds in the sky, black as ink, vanished completely along with it.

…Maybe they had not been clouds at all.

Alice looked up at the sky. She still remembered what those clouds had looked like. Thinking back to their outline as they faded, she finally faintly matched them with the shadow that had been under the water around the ship.

The thick clouds above had looked like a patch of shadow—the shadow cast onto the sky by some enormous creature in the sea.

The crackle of burning flames came from the edge of the deck, snapping Alice out of her daze. She quickly looked toward the captain and saw that he had already returned to his usual appearance. The tall man wore a cheerful smile. He had already noticed Alice standing not far away and waved for the doll to come over.

When Alice walked up to him, Duncan nudged the big fish on the deck with his boot and said in a slightly proud tone: “Look, I caught a big fish!”

“A b-big fish?” Alice’s expression went blank. She stared at the lump of flesh by Duncan’s feet. Among the twisted, rolling meat, countless eyes, split open in the flesh, still half-open and half-closed, gazed up at the sky, while jagged teeth between the eyes glinted with a metallic cold light.

As Duncan’s boot nudged it, about half the eyes on the severed tentacle suddenly blinked, then all closed at once.

“Yeah, a big fish,” Duncan said happily. “Look, it took quite a bit of effort to haul this thing up here.”

Even though she was only a doll, Alice still felt as if some “muscle” at the corner of her eye twitched for a moment. She opened her mouth to speak, but did not know where to even start correcting him.

She looked at the “fish” at Duncan’s feet.

A hideous big fish lay there—black and dull, with pitted, uneven skin. Strange gray-white markings spread around the fins. Bony spines jutted from its head, and a pair of lifeless fish eyes met her gaze.

There were also many “small fish” scattered across the deck nearby.

Alice suddenly lost all expression and words. She stared wide-eyed at the scene before her, at the “fish” lying on the deck, at these things that, a second ago, had not been “fish” at all.

The doll, lacking any real life experience, did not yet understand what “questioning one’s life” meant. But in that moment, she truly began to doubt everything. She even wondered if she was dreaming—where had the tentacle and all those chunks of flesh gone?

Maybe her moment of blankness was too obvious, because Duncan immediately noticed Alice's odd reaction. He raised an eyebrow and looked at the doll: "What is it? Is something wrong?"

"I…" Alice opened her mouth, but just as she was about to correct him, the rules Goathead had told her earlier suddenly surfaced in her mind.

On the Vanished, Captain Duncan was absolute authority. His words were absolute "fact"—if the Mortal Realm disagreed with what Captain Duncan said, then the captain's judgment was the one that counted.

"Nothing is wrong!" Alice snapped back to herself and blurted out quickly. Then, as if to cover how tense she sounded, she hurriedly changed the subject: "By the way, Captain, that storm just now was really scary…"

"Storm? You mean those waves?" Duncan looked at the doll in puzzlement. "Those waves were not small, but they were far from a real storm… Then again, you have never seen a true storm."

Alice said: "…You are right."

If Captain Duncan called that storm that had almost covered the whole sea "waves", then they were waves. If Captain Duncan thought what he had dragged onto the deck were "fish", then these things were fish.

"…I feel like you are a bit tense. Are you really all right?" Duncan still picked up on something off in Alice's tone. He looked at his "Crewman One" with some concern. "Are you seasick? Can you even get seasick?"

"I am fine. It was just that the ship was shaking so hard just now, I…" Alice looked at the captain's concerned face, unsure whether she should feel comforted or even more afraid. She could only stiffly change the subject: "Right, these… 'fish' you caught—what are you going to do with them?"

"Do you even need to ask?" Duncan laughed at once. "Of course we are going to eat them!"

Alice’s expression froze at once: “…Eat them?”

“What else? Have you not noticed how boring the food stores on the Vanished are?” Duncan was clearly in a very good mood. “I plan to cut up the big one, stew part of it and roast part of it. These few smaller ones, we will salt and dry into fish jerky…”

He happily talked through his plan, but even though he sounded confident, he was actually not sure he could pull it off. His cooking skills were only average. He had no experience dealing with such a huge sea fish, and as for making dried fish, he had only some theoretical knowledge and no practice at all.

But how would he know if he did not at least try?

The only problem… was not to poison their stomachs.

Even in the joy of such a rich haul, Duncan still kept some reason. He looked down at the big fish by his feet with care, wondering whether this gift from nature might be poisonous.

The safest way was to find some unlucky soul to taste it first.

He first thought of Goathead in the captain’s cabin, then ruled that option out at once. Then he glanced at the cursed Doll across from him—but that doll would not work either.

Alice did not even have a stomach.

At last, he looked at the pigeon on his shoulder.

The pigeon tilted its head and looked back at him.

No matter how you looked at her, AI did not seem like a normal creature. But if he had to find some living being with flesh and blood on this ship, it seemed only this pigeon was left…

A moment later, Duncan left the deck with his “harvest”. Lunchtime was close, and he could not wait to improve the meals on the Vanished.

Alice stood there in a daze for a while, then walked to the door of the captain’s cabin.

She had not planned to seek out Goathead. Ever since she had seen how terribly chatty this “First Mate” could be last time, she had developed a deep awe of the entire captain’s cabin.

If she could help it, she never wanted to step through that door on her own.

But what had happened today was just too strange. She felt it was still necessary to consult the experienced Mr. Goathead and see whether this was actually something normal on the Vanished.

She was not breaking any crew member rules. She was only asking about the situation. That should not count as a taboo.

After hesitating for a good ten seconds, Alice finally worked up her courage and pulled open the door to the captain’s cabin.

The next second, she stared in shock. Goathead had already turned to face the doorway and was staring fixedly in her direction—as if he had been waiting for her to come.

“What happened out there?” Goathead spoke, unusually brief and to the point.

Alice sensed that something was off from this uncharacteristic behavior. She quickly turned to shut the door behind her, then walked to the chart table and told him everything she had seen.

When she finished speaking, Goathead fell into an unusually long silence—for nearly a full minute, he did not say a single word.

The carved wooden Goathead could not change expression, but Alice could plainly feel that… things seemed to have gone a bit beyond this “First Mate’s” understanding.

Alice suddenly grew nervous and leaned forward without thinking: “So this is not something that normally happens on the Vanished? Has the captain really…”

“The Vanished is perfectly normal,” Goathead finally snapped out of his silence and answered quickly, cutting off Alice’s words as if to plug some gap at once. “Listen. The Vanished is perfectly normal. It is always normal, and the great Captain Duncan is exactly as he has always been!”

“Then… it was just how you reacted…”

“Things are a bit beyond what I expected—but that is only because my imagination and understanding are lacking,” Goathead’s words became smooth again as he slowly recovered from his shock. His mood clearly rose, and even his tone grew passionate and excited. “Yes, the great Captain Duncan—he should be even greater and stronger! There is nothing abnormal, Miss Alice. Listen, everything on the Vanished is as it should be! Let the captain do whatever he thinks is right. Do not keep talking about this… All you need to do from today on is remember this fact:”

“There are fish in the Vanished’s galley, and fish are delicious ingredients.”

Chapter 36: At the Turn of Day and Night

Turning such a huge fish into lunch was not easy at all.

It took skill, and it was hard physical work too.

Luckily, Duncan was driven by a fisherman’s sense of duty and a strong desire to improve their meals, so he tackled today’s catch with plenty of energy.

He worked in the galley for a long time. At last he managed to pry off the bony spines on the ugly monster’s head and clumsily cut its plump body into several pieces. There was hardly any meat on the head, so he tossed it aside for now. The belly and back, though, had some very good cuts, perfect for turning into ingredients aboard the Vanished.

It looked a little odd for a dignified captain to be busy in the kitchen himself, but Duncan actually enjoyed it. He only wondered what those ordinary people who feared the Vanished like a calamity would think if they saw this scene. Would they be shocked that the dreaded ghost captain also had such a down?to?earth, domestic side, or would they first praise Duncan’s excellent fishing skills?

He thought of this while he was cutting up the strange fish. In his good mood, he could not help but laugh. He wondered if, one day, he might actually invite some people aboard as guests. The Vanished would not always be another word for disaster. He did not plan to stay a cold?blooded, heartless ghost captain forever. Once he understood this world better, he fully intended to connect with modern civilized society.

When that day came, he would serve those guests fish.

After the rough but simple butchering, Duncan put most of the fish into a wooden barrel lined with sea salt, then rolled the heavy barrel into a storage room at the back of the galley. He left the smaller pieces for later. He planned to salt them and hang them to dry on the deck. If all went well, the sea breeze would turn them into dried salted fish.

It was a pity he had not found any strong liquor on the ship, or he would have had a few more ways to cure the fish.

Having fresh fish every day was great, of course, but Duncan knew fishing always depended on luck. Today’s haul was impressive, but the future might not be so kind, so he had to think about how to process and store the extra food.

After all, even though the dried meat and cheese in the stores of the Vanished showed no signs of decay, he had no idea if that was because the Vanished itself was special, or because those “dried meats” and “cheeses” were some kind of Anomaly. Letting hard?won fish rot would be a real shame.

At the very least, salted dried fish would be better than century?old salted meat, if only for a change of taste.

Duncan kept the freshest, best?looking cuts and threw them into the pot with some of the dried meat. In this case, the dried meat only served as seasoning.

It was a wasteful way to cook. Any real chef who saw what Duncan was doing would probably have their blood pressure shoot through the roof. The best use for such tender fish would have been to make a raw fish dish, and the second best would be to pan?fry or grill it lightly. Duncan knew that very well, but he chose this method to be safe.

He did not dare eat some unknown creature from the sea raw. In theory, sea fish did not carry parasites harmful to people, and as this “ghost captain” he probably did not need to fear ordinary poisons anyway, but what if he was wrong?

Compared to that, stewing was the most reliable way to deal with an unfamiliar ingredient.

He would try it this way first. If he confirmed the fish was really edible, then he would think about other recipes.

By the time he finished, it was almost late afternoon, and his very late “lunch” was finally ready.

He ladled out a bowl of fish soup. The rich smell made his mouth water, but before he ate, he carefully speared a piece of fish, blew on it to cool it, and set it down in front of the pigeon, AI.

A normal pigeon did not eat meat, of course, but AI could not really be called a normal pigeon.

Duncan wanted to satisfy his curiosity. On the Vanished, there were far too many things he needed to test.

As for what he would do if this Anomaly pigeon really got poisoned after eating the fish… Duncan already had a plan.

First, he had already prepared the ingredient as carefully as he could, so letting the pigeon try it was more of a formality. Second, if anything really went wrong with AI, he could use the green flame at once to pull her entirely into a spirit form state. He had already tested this before. In spirit form, AI reacted the same way as the brass spirit compass. She was like an “object” controlled by the fire of spirit form. He could even break down and reassemble spirit form AI and teleport her to any spot near him. Under those conditions, ordinary toxins definitely would not work on her.

AI tilted her head as she watched Duncan. After she realized the piece of fish was for her, she first pecked at the tabletop beside it with her beak. Her eyes wandered between Duncan and the ceiling as she asked: “You sure this melon’s ripe?”

Duncan said: “Just say if you’re going to eat it or not.”

AI flapped her wings and copied his tone: “Just say if you’re going to eat it or not!”

Only then did she lower her head and peck at the cooled fish. At a shocking speed, she finished off a piece of food that clearly was not meant for a pigeon!

After she finished, AI stretched her neck hard, then strutted proudly across the table. She seemed in a very good mood. After circling once, she came back in front of Duncan and squawked loudly: “So tasty! So tasty!”

Duncan stared at the pigeon, dumbfounded. Somehow a thought popped into his head: this thing now combined “pigeon, ‘so tasty,’ and broken record” all in one!

With all three key traits in place, it was practically the pride of Humans on Earth. If you filled out one of those free?form nine?square meme charts, this thing might even qualify as an Earthling…

After a while longer, Duncan confirmed that the pigeon showed no Anomalous reaction, and finally he relaxed completely.

So the captain of the Vanished and his pet hid in the kitchen, feasting away.

The fish really was delicious, just like what Duncan had seen in his dream.

…

The setting sun slowly sank toward the high walls at the edge of the city. The tall chimneys, pipes, and towers of the city?state of Pland were bathed bit by bit in pale golden light.

From the high ground in the city center, where the Storm Cathedral stood, came the deep tolling of the Great Bell. At the same time, the shrill whistle of steam gushing from relief valves rose into the air. A huge plume of white vapor burst from the tops of the side towers of the Cathedral, spreading like cloud and mist over the sky above the hill, refracting the golden sunlight from the sea.

This was the signal of the turning of day and night. It was a reminder that the power of the Sun was about to fade quickly, and that the World’s Wound would soon take the dominant place in the sky.

After that, the order of the mortal world would go from solid to unstable, and the influence from the world’s deep layers would grow stronger and stronger as the veil of night descended. This process would continue until the Sun rose again the next day.

Under the veil of night, cautious people chose to stay at home. Those who had no choice but to go out tried their best to stay where the lights were bright. Gas lamps that had received the divine blessing of the Clerics could drive away the malice in the veil of night as much as possible.

Even so, this was at least a prosperous and stable great city?state. Under the protection of the holy Storm Cathedral, even the deepest influences of the world’s deep layers were held down below a safe limit. The Anomalies that appeared in the city once in a while were only small problems. Ordinary citizens knew how to keep their homes safe, and at night the Church Guardians took over the Constables’ duties, keeping order in the city after nightfall.

Yet just as even the brightest streetlamp could not banish every Shadow, even right under the noses of the Church Guardians there were always fools who longed for darkness and upheaval. They feared and hated the current order of the world and, in their frenzy, yearned for some “glorious age” that even they had never seen.

Fortunately, in a city?state where the forces of order held the upper hand, these subversives could only curl up in the Shadows most of the time.

At the edge of the city?state, deep inside a sealed sewer entrance, several figures in black robes huddled in the corner of a small room.

This had once been a rest room for sewer maintenance workers, but it had been forgotten as the city’s layout changed. This neglected corner had become a refuge for cultists on the run. A dim Oil lamp hung on the wall. Its flickering light fell on several gloomy faces, full of fear and simmering hatred.

A man of about thirty lay on a bed made of ragged cloth on the floor. His teeth were clenched, his face pale, and his breathing weak and uneven. The others sat near him. One of them cursed under his breath: “Those damned Church jackals…”

“We lost so many of our brothers, and even the Envoy died in the ritual…” another said hoarsely. “How could such a holy ritual suddenly lose control…”

“That sacrificial victim… It was clearly because of that sacrificial victim. He was obviously a servant of the Heretics…”

“Listen,” one of the robed figures suddenly said. He tilted his head in the posture of the Listening Rite, then pointed upward. “That’s the dusk Bell and the whistles.”

“…nightfall is coming,” the first robed man, the one who had been cursing, said in a low voice. Uneasily, he looked at the “brother” lying on the floor in such a terrible state. “Damn it… I hope he can make it through this night…”

Chapter 37: The Cycle of Life and Death

The dusk Bell and the steam whistles that marked the change of day and night echoed faintly through the deep, damp ramps and shafts. In the cramped darkness of the sewers, that signal of the approaching veil of night made the cultists hiding in the abandoned rest room even more depressed.

One of them was seriously ill, with no clear cause. Now he was about to die—die here, in this dimly lit underground world.

“He’s still alive… for now,” one cultist said hesitantly. He glanced at the “brother” lying on the floor and saw that the man’s eyes were half?open, the eyeballs slowly rolling in their sockets. The poor fellow could still hear what was happening around him, but he no longer had the strength to open his eyes.

“He’s only alive for now,” another cultist said in a low voice. “The dusk Bell has already rung. He cannot die in this room. The Lord’s protection will grant him rest in the darkness.”

The man on the makeshift bed twitched his fingers twice. He clearly understood his situation. He did not want to die like this, but death had already sunk its teeth into his shadow. From the sound of it, his dear “brethren of the Sun” were already thinking about removing this “hidden danger” from their Sanctuary World before true death arrived.

An unbearably heavy silence filled the room. The dying man’s faint breathing sounded loud in the stillness. After an unknown stretch of dead quiet, the black?robed man who had cursed the Storm Church finally broke the silence: “Wait a little longer. At least… a person doesn’t change the instant he breathes his last.”

“…Then we’ll wait a bit more,” the black?robed cultist with the low voice said, softening slightly. He glanced at the man who was still struggling to breathe, then could not help muttering, “But why did he suddenly fall ill? Are you sure this is just an ordinary sickness?”

“I know him… He runs a failing antique shop in the Lower City, the kind where everything on the shelves is fake,” said another cultist who had barely spoken before. “He was already sick. His health was never good. Maybe staying in the sewers too long, and the fright from earlier, made his condition worse.”

Hearing this explanation, the low?voiced cultist finally relaxed a little. He was not a high?ranking priest, but he had followed the Sun for many years and, by now, could be considered an “expert” who knew quite a bit about occult studies. He knew very well how many long?lasting, hidden dangers could remain after a failed sacrificial rite, and any believer who had taken part in that rite might become a “carrier” of those hidden threats. This man who had suddenly fallen into extreme weakness… could very well be one such carrier.

If it were not for the rule that “all children of the Sun are as brothers,” and for the fact that several soft?hearted cultists were watching, he would long ago have thrown this unlucky fellow out into the endless darkness outside.

After a long silence, the black?robed cultist suddenly moved. He took a pale golden charm amulet from his robe and tucked it into the chest of the dying “brother.”

“What are you doing…” one of the cultists beside him asked curiously.

“This sacred charm amulet cost me dearly. I traded a great deal to get it from the Envoy,” he said in a low, earnest voice. “May the Lord’s grace protect our brother. The light of the Sun may keep him from further corruption in the darkness.”

The two cultists beside him did not doubt him at all and looked at this Church senior, who had “given away” his charm amulet, with admiration. They pressed their fists to their brows and murmured devoutly: “All children of the Sun are as brothers…”

The low?voiced robed man also pressed his fist to his brow and whispered after them: “All children of the Sun are as brothers.”

…

After the Sun sank completely below the horizon, the starless, moonless sky appeared once more before Duncan. The Pale Rift stretched across the heavens, its cold light shining down on the Boundless Sea and on the Vanished sailing upon it.

Duncan stood near the stern deck. He pulled his gaze back from the sky and let out a small sigh.

No matter how many times he looked, he would never see stars in that pale, cold glow, because they simply were not there.

But compared to the last time he saw this starless night, his mood was much better now.

On one hand, he had already accepted the many strange things about this world and was actively adapting to his new life. On the other hand, today’s fish had truly been excellent.

He was an optimist. Any tiny improvement in life was enough to make him happy—and the gifts of nature had turned out to be more plentiful than he had imagined.

If things kept going at this pace, even if he could not build stable contact with the lands on shore for a while, he could at least improve the living conditions on this ship.

Lost in these wandering thoughts, he turned his head to look at the pigeon standing on his shoulder and joked: “Tell me… would it be easier if I just did what a pirate captain is supposed to do? Like find a busy sea route and rob whoever passes by…”

The pigeon tilted her head, her two eyes looking in who?knew?what directions. “Does that sound right, does that sound right, does that sound right…” she muttered.

“True, it doesn’t really fit my personality,” Duncan said with a laugh. “And it’s easy to say, but to rob people you first have to find a sea route where merchant ships actually pass.”

The vast sea around them was empty. He had no idea how far the Vanished had drifted from civilized waters. Ever since the collision with the ship that had been carrying Anomaly 099, he had not seen another vessel on the horizon. Even if he wanted to become a robber, he would not know where to find victims.

Just then, a voice came from the side and interrupted his wandering thoughts: “Captain, are we going to rob someone?”

Duncan followed the sound and saw Alice sitting on a high plank nearby, looking this way with curiosity.

Under the glow of the Pale Scar in the sky, the Doll in her court dress sat high on the ghost ship. Her mercury?like long hair shone with a cold luster in the night. She sat with proper poise, curiosity in her eyes. The whole scene looked like a classical, mysterious painting.

For a moment, Duncan was a little taken aback. After all the chaotic “Mortal Realm chores” they had gone through lately, he had almost forgotten the elegant, mysterious impression this Miss Doll had given him when she first lay in that wooden crate. Seeing Alice so quiet now actually left him a little stunned.

Alice had no idea what the captain was thinking. She simply asked again with curiosity: “Captain, are we going to rob someone?”

That line did quite a bit of damage to her image.

Duncan looked at the Doll, half amused, half helpless, and asked: “Do you like robbing people?”

“No,” Alice shook her head. “It doesn’t sound very fun.”

“But I ‘robbed’ you onto this ship,” Duncan reminded her with a smile.

“…That’s true,” Alice thought for a moment and nodded, then asked again right away: “So are we going to rob someone now?”

“No,” Duncan waved his hand and walked unhurriedly toward his captain’s cabin. “I also think robbing is pretty boring. Compared to that, a walk is a much better after?dinner exercise.”

Duncan returned to the captain’s cabin. After briefly telling Goathead to take the helm, he went into his bedroom as he had last time and closed the door.

He had decided to make his second walk into the Spirit Realm tonight.

But unlike last time, this time he would test this ability through the pigeon, AI.

A wisp of ghostly green flame danced at Duncan’s fingertips. As it flared, the pigeon that had been pacing on the table vanished in an instant and then reappeared on his shoulder.

Feeling the faint, subtle link between himself and AI, Duncan slowly calmed his mind. He recalled the “feeling” he had when he activated the brass spirit compass last time, and began to use the fire of spirit form in his hand to reach out to AI—

The invisible green fire turned into a thin line that wrapped around AI’s wings. In the next second, the White Dove was suddenly engulfed in flame!

As the flames burned, the White Dove’s feathers turned ethereal. The rising green flame seemed to reshape her flesh and bones. AI spread her wings within the fire, and the brass spirit compass hanging at her chest snapped open. The dial, carved with countless occult studies runes, glimmered faintly, and the pointer at its center spun wildly before snapping to a stop, pointing straight into the distance.

The surrounding scene broke apart and scattered. The familiar dark space appeared before Duncan’s eyes, followed by the familiar streams of light and countless spark?like “lamps.”

Following the feeling in his heart, Duncan looked toward those lights, searching for the next suitable “target” to contact.

Suddenly, one cluster of light drew his attention.

He did not know if this was what Goathead always called “Captain Duncan’s intuition,” but he chose to follow this feeling. Whoever was behind that light, they were now fated to cross paths with Captain Duncan.

…

In the abandoned sewers at the edge of the city?state of Pland, the Suntists who had narrowly escaped the Church Guardians sat in wordless silence.

The world above had already fallen into deep night. Down here, only one weak light protected the abandoned room.

Even the most brutal, inhuman cultist felt nervous and afraid as the darkness drew closer.

On the rag bed beside them, the dying man was about to breathe his last.

As his breathing grew lower and more labored, several pairs of eyes turned to the dying man at the same time.

They stared hard at the “brother” on the floor. Every one of them knew the man would not survive the night.

Under the gaze of those eyes, the man’s chest rose and fell one last time. He breathed out the final breath of his life.

“May the Sun continue to shine on your soul in the dark,” the low?voiced black?robed cultist said slowly. Then he waved his hand. “Take him…”

The next second, his words stuck in his throat.

Before his eyes, the body with its eyes tightly shut began to breathe again.

Chapter 38

Chapter 38. Offline

The corpse was breathing. It was as if it had walked along the edge of the land of death and then turned back to the Mortal Realm.

The black-robed cultists in the room stared blankly at this scene. Some of them had not even realized that the man in front of them had already “died” once. The moment when life turned to death had been so short that anyone not watching closely could hardly notice it. They only felt that the breath of their dying “companion” had suddenly become steady and strong for some reason, which was very strange.

The next second, the man lying on the ground opened his eyes.

He seemed to have stayed in darkness for too long. Even the dim oil lamp in the room felt harsh to him. He blinked to get used to the light. Then his eyeballs slowly turned, as if he had only just noticed the three black-robed figures gathered around him.

“Thank the Lord for His protection!” A younger black-robed cultist finally reacted and could not help shouting in excitement. “You made it through! I thought you were going to…”

“Wait! No! Step back!” The deep-voiced cultist suddenly realized something. He threw out an arm to block the others and stared hard at the man who had just woken up, his gaze sharp and wary as he backed away. His voice carried a threat as he said: “His breathing stopped completely just now. I definitely did not see wrong… something is not right!”

Duncan finally adapted to his surroundings. The ringing in his ears slowly faded from his mind. He saw the figures gathered around him, and his first thought was: [Why is it still these people when I open my eyes? Why am I still in the sewer?]

Walking the Spirit Realm should have been random. When he chose his target, he had just followed his intuition and tapped at random. Yet somehow, both times he opened his eyes, he ended up in the middle of these cultists. What kind of twisted fate was this?

Then, from their reactions, he noticed that something was wrong, and a second later he became aware of the black robe on his own body.

Duncan stayed silent for two seconds. Then understanding dawned in his heart.

Last time, he had been the sacrificial victim offered up by the cultists in a sacrificial rite. He had closed his eyes as a victim and opened them again… now as a “cultist”.

He really did have a special connection with this group.

“…Something is not right!”

At that moment, a deep, hostile voice cut through the confusion in Duncan’s newly “awakened” mind. He followed the sound and met a cold, wary stare.

The owner of that stare was fixing a cold, divine gaze on him. Beside him, the other two black-robed cultists finally reacted as well. They backed away and took up guarded stances.

Duncan froze for a moment and suddenly realized that, just like last time, he had possessed a corpse.

He had just sat up like a zombie in front of these cultists’ eyes.

Once he understood the situation, their nervous reactions made perfect sense. Duncan's mind started racing. He could still feel the numbness and sluggishness lingering in this body. It had not fully faded. Moving was difficult. Doing anything under the noses of several cultists would not be easy. For now, he had to calm them down somehow—

And while he was quickly thinking of a way out, scattered, blurry fragments of memory suddenly floated up in his mind.

In those broken memories, he "remembered" many experiences that did not belong to him. He remembered "himself" hiding in the sewers. He remembered "himself" offering all the money from home to the envoy of the Sun. He remembered "himself" joining those dark, mad, bloody, sinful rituals to cure his illness, drinking the blood of innocent people in exchange for "the Sun's divine blessing"…

At the end of that string of jumbled memories, he "saw" the scene of the sacrificial rite. He saw many people in black robes like his own standing beside a high platform. A young sacrificial victim was pushed up onto it. The young sacrificial victim wore a stiff, twisted expression that threw the entire ritual into chaos…

He saw "the envoy of the Sun" have his heart ripped out in the sacrificial rite. Everyone around the altar fell into madness. cultists began slaughtering each other. Surging flames poured out of the Sun totem. Angry roars and hollow whispers filled the gathering place. The original master of this body and the last few surviving cultists fled in a panic…

Duncan did not know how long he stayed dazed. Perhaps it had only been a moment. The flood of unfamiliar memories in his mind slowly calmed again. A pitiful and hateful life broke apart into pale fragments, lying in his heart like something to be read—like some kind of "nourishment".

These were the memories of this body's original master. There was not much left, but the source was beyond doubt.

Duncan blinked. This was something that had not happened during his last "Spirit Realm walk".

Last time, he had gained no memories from the corpse he possessed. The brain of that "sacrificial victim" had been nothing but a blank… so why had things changed this time?

Was it because the body he had taken over was still "fresh"? Or was it because the pigeon AI had strengthened the power of the brass spirit compass?

Duncan slowly sat up from the floor. No matter what caused this change, now was not the time to stare into space. Those tightly strung cultists had clearly sensed that this "true resurrection" was not right.

As Duncan moved, the three cultists immediately stepped back half a pace. The deep-voiced man broke the silence, one hand pressed to his belt: "Don't move yet—tell me, what is your name?"

"…Ron," Duncan said after a brief search through his new memories. The name came out naturally. "Ron Strain."

"He is called Ron." The young black-robed cultist opposite him quickly lowered his voice and whispered to the deep-voiced man who seemed to be their leader.

But the deep-voiced man did not relax at all. He still stared hard at Duncan. Then he began to chant in a strange rhythm: "In the name of the Sun, may our Lord's light shine on all. In the name of the Sun, may our Lord's divine blessing descend!"

Hearing the cultist across from him suddenly start raving, Duncan was stunned for a second. Then he felt a burning heat in his chest. He instinctively reached under his clothes and pulled out the thing heating up there. It was a golden Sun charm amulet—waves of strange heat were rising from its surface!

The next second, the charm amulet suddenly burst into fierce flames. The fire seemed full of malice and lunged straight toward Duncan's heart!

"The Lord's glory is devouring him!" The cultist who had just finished the prayer reacted at once when he saw this. He drew the short sword at his waist and shouted: "His soul has been replaced! Kill this heretic filth!"

The other two cultists were a bit slower to react, but they still moved a heartbeat later. A moment ago they had thought Duncan was their "companion". Now they drew their short swords and daggers without hesitation, charging at him with murderous intent while shouting: "Kill him!!"

Duncan gripped the Sun charm amulet now burning fiercely in his hand and watched the three figures rush toward him. The next second, another shadow suddenly appeared at the edge of his vision.

A bird wreathed all over in pale green flames, like a wraith-like undead creature, tore through the air. Wrapped in a stream of icy fire, it swept over the ceiling. It let out a strange, shrill screech, and with every beat of its wings it scattered invisible ash and feather fragments.

Of course the three cultists had their attention stolen by this "undead bird". They looked up without thinking and glanced at AI, who had taken on spirit form.

In the next moment, all their movements slowed. Their connection to the Mortal Realm suddenly seemed distant and dull. The three black-robed figures looked like they were being played frame by frame in midair, leaving overlapping afterimages behind them. Their bodies drifted downward in a slow, almost comical way and finally froze less than two meters in front of Duncan.

Terror filled their eyes as they watched the undead bird circle the ceiling once, then land on the shoulder of the black-robed “companion” opposite them. They saw the Sun charm amulet in the man’s hand still burning fiercely, but the next second, the flames turned a dim green, becoming the same fire that burned on the undead bird.

Duncan squeezed the Sun charm amulet in his hand. Tendrils of green spirit-form fire coiled around its surface. The flames shooting out of the charm amulet curved halfway around in front of him, then settled down like a tame pet, curling slowly around his arm in a friendly way.

Holding the Sun charm amulet that had been completely taken over and changed, he walked unhurriedly up to the three cultists. Looking into their horrified eyes, he spoke with a hint of regret in his voice: “It would have been so much better if you had just pretended you knew nothing.”

The next second, the figures of the three cultists flickered violently in midair and then vanished.

The skeletal-looking undead bird wrapped in green flames hopped twice on Duncan’s shoulder. With the crackling sound of burning fire, it let out a sharp, hoarse cry: “Oh no, the page is gone. Try refreshing?”

Chapter 39

Chapter 39. The Captain Set Foot on Land

When the pigeon said that, both its words and its tone were the same as always—silly, joking, and completely unserious.

But now it was an undead bird burning with ghostly flames. Semi-transparent flesh wrapped bones and tendons filled with fire. Its call was mixed with crackling bursts, like the wails of wronged souls leaking out when the gates of the underworld opened.

As it turned out, the distance between creepy and clownish was often not that great.

The spirit-form fire curling around Duncan still burned. He watched with his own eyes as the three cultists vanished in front of him, but he was not sure of the principle behind it.

He only knew that this was AI's ability.

A few seconds later, after he confirmed that the three cultists truly were not coming back, he tilted his head a little and asked the pigeon on his shoulder: "…Where did you send them?"

AI flapped its wings and used its beak to preen its now semi-transparent feathers. It thought for a moment before suddenly blurting out: "Sent back into the Shadows!"

Duncan frowned. Lately he had started to learn how to understand the real meaning behind AI's words: "…You mean you banished them into some kind of… parallel space? Or turned them into something that can’t be touched?”

The pigeon lifted its head and stared at Duncan with its wandering eyes: “Coo, coo!”

Now it was pretending to be a real pigeon again.

But Duncan believed he had already grasped the truth. He pressed a finger lightly on AI’s head, then once again looked around this dimly lit “Sanctuary World”.

Under the shaking light of the oil lamp, everything in the small room was clear. The believers of the Sun who had once hidden here had vanished completely from this world. Now, the only ones standing here were a ghost ship captain who had descended by taking over a cultist’s corpse—and his pigeon.

Yet somehow, Duncan had a feeling. He felt as if the three cultists were still here, right beside him, trapped in this room, squeezed into some gap in a dimension that no method could detect or touch.

He could even “feel” those cultists shouting and struggling in vain, feel their hopeless wish to reach the Mortal Realm again as an invisible barrier forever shut them out of it.

That feeling spread wordlessly through the air, until at some point Duncan saw proof of it. When the oil lamp on the table flickered a certain way, when the light and shadow crossed at just the right moment, he suddenly saw a mark appear on the nearby wall. It looked like the deep gouge left by a sword swung with full force—but when he looked again, the flames of the oil lamp wavered, and the mark vanished without a trace.

That was the last time those three believers of the Sun made contact with the Mortal Realm.

Duncan let out a quiet breath, turned with the pigeon, and left the room.

Outside the abandoned break room was a passage much narrower than the sewer corridors he had seen before. The deep, long passage stretched in both directions. One end led to a branching tunnel. The other connected to a ramp slanting upward.

Even though this area had been abandoned, the city's administrators still clearly kept up some basic maintenance of these underground facilities—at least the gas lamps along the passage were still lit.

Duncan quickly judged the direction of the passage. Then, using the fragments of memory left in his mind, he worked out the route to the surface and soon strode toward the sloping ramp.

He walked faster and faster.

Fresh air began to appear. A cool breeze blew Duncan's hair back. He heard faint, distant sounds, probably the roar of some factory on the surface running through the night, and, even farther away, the sound of waves… the sound of nighttime surf breaking against the rocks along the shore.

Duncan almost broke into a run.

Now free of the spirit-form flames and back to normal, the pigeon AI flapped its wings on his shoulder and called out happily: "The times are calling! The times are calling!"

Duncan suddenly stopped. He stared into the pigeon's eyes: "Don't talk randomly when we're outside—normal pigeons don't talk."

AI thought for a moment, then beat its wings hard: "Aye, captain!"

Duncan was genuinely surprised. The pigeon had actually responded to him correctly for once. He did not know whether it was a coincidence or something else—but soon he stopped thinking about it.

He had to get ready to face this world.

He definitely could not walk outside in a black robe. In the memories he had “devoured”, this suspicious robe was only worn at secret rituals for the Sun’s believers. On the streets of the city above, showing up in such clothes meant getting tied to a tree and beaten by half a dozen patrol squad members.

The city-state of Pland had very strict curfews. Wandering at night seemed quite dangerous. Ordinary people who wanted to go out after dark had to carry permits and file in advance—this cultist whose body he had taken clearly did not have such legal papers. So if he wanted to move through the city, he had to avoid the night patrols.

Those responsible for keeping order in the city at night were called “Guardians”. They seemed to be the armed force of the Deep Sea Church. In the memories Duncan had absorbed, this body’s original master felt deep fear and hatred toward those armed priests…

Duncan quickly sorted through the memory fragments in his mind. Since they came from a corpse, the pieces were messy and vague. He could not piece together a complete life story of a “member of modern civilized society”, nor could he assemble all the details about the city-state of Pland. But even the most basic parts were enough to give him a rough idea for his next moves.

First, he took off the black robe at the foot of the ramp leading to the surface. Underneath was normal clothing that would not draw attention outside.

He considered burning the robe, but flames and smoke might draw the patrols. In the end, he only rolled it up and hid it in a corner near the ramp.

The Sun charm amulet was also something that might bring trouble. But it could also hold valuable information. After some hesitation, Duncan decided to keep it. Later, when he returned to the Vanished, he could use this charm amulet for another test and see if AI could bring it back as well.

He could study it safely aboard the Vanished.

After carefully smoothing away all traces of the hidden robe, he straightened himself up a bit, trying to look like an ordinary citizen instead of a cultist who had been skulking around, filthy and hunted, in the sewers. Only when all that was done did he step onto the ramp.

The rest of the way was not far.

Duncan hurried up the sloping path. Ever fresher air filled his chest. He could now clearly hear the sounds of distant factories and waves. A few minutes later, he even saw a faint, cold light spilling across the steps ahead.

He strode forward a few more steps, and that pale light finally bathed him completely.

He had reached the surface.

Solid, steady ground, washed in a dim, pale glow.

Duncan’s eyes widened. He saw a city—a city standing on the Boundless Sea, a city that represented mortal civilization. A huge scar in the sky stretched over it, lighting up the tightly packed rooftops, towers, and buildings in the distance. Not far ahead lay a somewhat worn-down fringe district. Farther away, on higher ground, he could see many distant, grand structures. That was the Upper City, where the great Cathedral and City Hall stood.

Duncan suddenly started laughing. No sound came out, but he laughed until he was out of breath.

After a short while, he forced himself to stop. He took a deep breath of the cold night air, then strode off in a direction he remembered.

cultists also had their own “normal lives”. Aside from a few “priests” who made harming others their full-time job, the Sun Church, like most other cults, relied on large numbers of ordinary people to keep running. These bewitched grassroots believers were mostly poor citizens from the lower layers of the city, overlooked old people, naive youths who had barely stepped into society, or people like the one whose body Duncan now occupied…

A sick, unnoticed ordinary person running a shady little antique shop in the Lower City, struggling against life and taxes.

The miserable life of the antique shopkeeper named “Ron” had come to an end. His debt to some evil deity had been wiped clean with his last breath. But he had still left a place for himself in this world… and Duncan liked that place very much.

Chapter 40: Landing

Vanna jolted awake from a bizarre, chaotic dream and found that it was still deep night outside the window. The cold, pale light of the World's Wound fell on the windowsill engraved with the runes of the Deep Sea, making everything look calm and quiet.

Yet the scenes from that strange dream still stood out clearly in her mind.

A ship – a great ship wreathed in green ghostly flames – had sailed out from the line where sea and sky met. It rolled over the city-state of Pland like a crushing mountain. In the ghostly fire, countless shouts and desolate songs roared together, as if they meant to overturn the whole world.

At the same time that the great ship descended, she had seen a blazing sun rise from deep within Pland. It was not the Sun people knew, the Sun bound by ancient runes, but a burning star like the "ancient Sun" the Sun believers described. It rose from the depths of the city-state; its flames melted the land, and everyone turned into flowing wax statues, running like molten wax through the streets.

The great Cathedral of the Deep Sea Church had stood quietly at the center of that city of living fire, like the heart of a purgatory. In the dream, she had prayed toward the Cathedral, hoping for the Storm Goddess's guidance. But the great Cathedral answered only with noisy, meaningless bells. No guidance came…

Vanna sat up in bed and, still in her nightclothes, walked to the window. She glanced at the quiet city outside and the "World's Wound" in the sky, but the unrest in her heart only boiled harder.

A moment later, the young Inquisitor drew her gaze back from the city. She went to the dressing table by the bed and pulled open a drawer.

There lay a dagger inside, its blade bending in strange curves – a ritual dagger. At the base of the blade, the runes of the Deep Sea Church glimmered faintly, as if stirred by some unseen force and resonating in answer.

Vanna's eyes rested on the glowing runes for several seconds. Then she drew the blade across her palm, opening a cut. As blood seeped out, she held her hand across her chest and softly spoke the name of the Storm Goddess, trying to seek the God's guidance.

But for some reason, she heard only unreal roaring waves. The "Psychic Sensing" state that she usually entered with ease did not respond at all tonight.

It was as if an invisible Veil had suddenly fallen around her, cutting off her link with the Storm Goddess Gamona.

Vanna's brow slowly furrowed.

Interference in the link between a believer and a God was very rare, but not impossible. The mapping between Subspace and the Mortal Realm was deep and complex, far beyond mortal understanding. Even a God's power could sometimes be weakened or strengthened for a time, layered through the influences of Subspace, the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the Spirit Realm. On top of that, the endless struggle between the Gods, and between the Gods and the Elder Gods, never truly stopped. In extremely rare cases, it was possible for a believer to suddenly lose the God's voice.

But the Storm Goddess Gamona… should not be like this.

The Boundless Sea surrounded mortal civilization. The Storm Goddess's power ran through every dimension and touched the whole Mortal Realm. Any God might lose contact with the Mortal Realm for a time; even the Death God sometimes left loopholes like the "Revenants". But the Storm Goddess… that was impossible.

This was one of the reasons the Deep Sea Church could become the most powerful Church upon the Boundless Sea.

So was the problem in herself?

Vanna naturally began to doubt her own condition. But when she looked at her palm, she saw that the cut she had just made was already healing fast.

The Goddess's divine blessing was still there. It took effect without the slightest delay.

Vanna recalled once more that noisy, grotesque nightmare, and the ominous signs she had seen over the past many days.

There had to be a link between all of it.

The ghost ship burning with green flames… the ghost ship…

Vanna quickly searched through her occult studies knowledge in her mind, comparing fragments, and her gaze suddenly grew serious.

She was not an expert in seafaring and rarely dealt with those absurd tales that passed among superstitious sailors. But even in orthodox Church texts, there was one ghost ship that held a special place.

It was an ominous ship that had returned from Subspace. Its captain was the terrifying man who, a century ago, had led to the Viseran Thirteen Isles being swallowed by a Border Collapse – Captain Duncan.

Vanna straightened suddenly behind the dressing table, but at once she remembered: it was the middle of the night. The Cathedral's archives, like any other library, were not open at this hour.

And for safety's sake, she should not talk with anyone about the dream's contents in the few hours right after such a "prophetic vision dream" ended. If the dream truly pointed to that "Captain Duncan", then he might well use the link formed by the dream to sense mortals discussing him in return.

After all, he was a "ghost" who could return from Subspace…

The safest course now was to wait patiently. She had to wait until the Sun once more took its place as the world's ruler, until the link forged by the dream slowly faded. Then she could go to the archives to look up related records, or seek out the Archbishop in the Cathedral to discuss these ominous prophetic visions.

No matter what, if these prophetic vision dreams truly pointed to that "Captain Duncan", if they really warned that the legendary Vanished now had its eye on Pland, then as Guardian of the City-State she had to stop that terrifying ghost captain from making landfall, no matter the cost…

…

A tall, gaunt shadow moved quickly along the empty streets of the Lower City, its thin figure casting a fleeting outline under the gas lamps.

The city was completely unfamiliar. The buildings were completely unfamiliar. Vague, half-formed memories drifted in his mind, and the commoners' district, under curfew, felt cold and eerie.

Yet as Duncan walked through these shabby alleys, he was in an unusually good mood.

He had done it. Not only had he successfully carried out a second walk in the Spirit Realm, he had also managed to control a body and come to the surface – to the surface of the city-state of Pland.

He was making contact with the civilized society of this world. He was seeing this era's buildings and this era's technology with his own eyes.

And he was using a complete body this time – no gaping chest, no opened skull. A body that looked normal from the outside would make his next moves much easier.

To be honest, this body's health was not very good. Even though his Spirit Realm walking state let him ignore most of the body's problems, Duncan could still clearly feel its sub-healthy condition. But he had no complaints. He even felt it was only natural.

After all, from his two experiences so far, Spirit Realm walking always took over a corpse that had been dead for some time. How could anything still jumping around be a corpse?

A distant barking came from the end of the street. Duncan cautiously slowed his steps and hid himself in the shadows between two buildings.

He did not know if it was a patrol dog led by one of the Church Guardians on night watch, but there was no harm in being careful.

Above the nearby buildings, huge pipe structures crossed over the low houses. The light of the "Pale Scar" spilled between those pipes in broken bands of shadow and glow. Now and then, steam leaked from valves along the pipes, spreading into a hazy mist in the night.

The barking faded into the distance.

Duncan stepped out from his hiding place, looked up and down the street for any movement, then absently soothed the pigeon AI, which shifted on his shoulder, before following his memories toward the opposite side of the street.

Among a row of low, two-or three-story buildings was an old door. A dirty signboard hung above it, and on either side of the door the walls held grimy, poorly cared-for display windows. It was a shop, not a small one by the look of it, but clearly neglected and doing poor business.

This was the place the shards of memory in his mind had led him to.

He walked up to the old door and looked up at the sign. A row of letters could just be made out in the dark:

“Ron Antique Shop,” Duncan muttered under his breath. “A simple, straightforward name…”

After that, he felt around by the door. His memories were not very clear, and he searched for quite a while before finally finding a spare key on a hidden hook under the window ledge.

The original owner of this body had not kept the key on him, nor carried anything that could show his identity or lead someone back to this antique shop. It seemed like the caution of a seasoned cultist. But for a ghost captain who could seize memories, this kind of surface-level caution meant nothing.

Duncan opened the door of Ron Antique Shop, slipped inside, and quickly shut it behind him.

The wooden door banged shut, but the sound did not carry far into the night. The signboard above the door shook and tilted a little. The letters on the board squirmed in the cold, pale night, and in the blink of an eye, new words emerged on the wood –

“Duncan Antique Shop.”

Chapter 41: Inside the Antique Shop

The inside of the antique shop was just as Duncan had guessed – messy, worn-down, and steeped in the feel of failing business. Just from the dust piled up around the display windows, a visitor could imagine how badly the shop's owner had let his life fall apart.

He first saw the display tables along the walls. Their low, sturdy tops held large vases, statues, and some totem-like things of unclear meaning. Behind the tables, the walls were divided into cubbyholes for smaller "goods". The counter stood straight across from the door, a long bar-like structure. The shelves behind the counter were dusty as well, filled with dark-toned picture frames and small ornaments.

Behind the counter he could also see a staircase leading up to the second floor. It lay in dimness, its structure hard to make out for now.

There was a small door under the stairs. In his "memories", that door should lead to a storeroom at the back of the shop – half of which was piled high with junk.

It was hard to imagine that the cultist he now possessed had actually lived off this shop that looked like no one would ever visit, and even had spare money to make offerings to the Sun God's priests.

Duncan walked toward the counter at the back. The old wooden floor creaked under his feet. As he passed the stairs, he noticed the lamp fixed to the wall.

It was an electric lamp.

Duncan’s brow furrowed at once.

The lamp’s style was unfamiliar. The iron frame and dull lampshade both had an exotic look. But the tungsten filament bulb inside was clear at a glance – the light source was electric.

So in this world, electricity was already this widespread? Even ordinary commoners in the Lower City used electric lights in their homes?

Then why had the light sources in the sewers earlier been gas lamps, oil lamps, and torches? Why were the streetlights outside also gas lamps?

A huge doubt rose in him. It clearly went against common sense, especially in a place like the sewers. Compared to clean, safe electric lights, gas lamps that used flammable gas and open flame had obvious disadvantages!

He had thought before that technical limits forced the city’s administrators to use gas lamps down there for light. But now it seemed that, at least in the city-state of Pland, technology had already developed to the point where electricity had entered ordinary homes!

A huge sense of wrongness filled Duncan’s heart. He tried to search his memory fragments for matching knowledge, but all he got were answers like “this is common sense” and “the city is planned that way”.

It seemed that either this kind of knowledge was simply not public, so the cultist he possessed knew nothing about it, or it was so basic that it left no deep impression in the cultist’s mind at all, and so the memory blurred quickly after death, leaving only a vague feeling of “of course it’s like this”.

With this unsolved confusion in his heart, Duncan reached out and turned on the electric lamp. With a soft click of the switch, bright light immediately lit the area around the stairs and the counter.

There was another switch on the wall opposite, used to control the lights in the rest of the first floor, but Duncan did not plan to touch it yet.

It was late at night now. One small light in a closed antique shop could still be explained as “the shopkeeper getting up and moving around”. But if every lamp suddenly blazed on, it could draw unwanted attention.

By the limited light near the stairs, Duncan first glanced over the goods closest to him. The first thing that caught his eye was a wooden, totem-like object less than half a meter tall. Red and blue paint formed a strange mask-like pattern on the wood. Beside it stood what seemed to be a ceramic antique vase. In front of them lay price tags marked with absurd sums.

Original price: four hundred and twenty thousand. Discounted price: three hundred and sixty.

It fairly radiated a kind of self-mocking despair.

Duncan quickly looked away and swept his gaze over the rest of the shop.

If there was a single genuine piece in here, he would ram the Vanished straight into Pland’s city walls.

Nothing could have been more fake. He did not even need a real collector to appraise them; anyone with a normal mind would never believe a true antique was being sold in an antique shop down in the Lower City. Would anyone who really dealt in antiques open a market in this kind of slum quarter? The oldest thing in the whole shop was probably the sign over the door…

But Duncan was not surprised that this kind of shop existed. The shopkeeper knew he was selling fakes. The people who came here did not really expect to put a thousand-year-old statue in their homes either. Everyone knew the score. Commoners in the Lower City also needed some way to satisfy their spiritual needs. The “antique shop” sign over the door was not hung for others – it was hung so the buyers could show it to themselves.

After all, under the overpasses back on Earth there had been people selling "jade" too – bracelets going for ninety-eight a piece, proudly called old-mine icy jade. Take one home and bump it on a doorframe by accident, and you would chip glass all over the floor. Did the buyers and sellers really not know what was going on?

Duncan had no interest in the shopkeeper's miserable past life. He cared about only one thing: this place could serve as the first "foothold" on land for the captain of the Vanished.

A forward base for learning about the world on land and about modern civilized society.

He had already made up his mind. As long as Spirit Realm walking allowed it, he would keep this body going as long as possible and use this "antique shop" as cover for his movements in Pland. And if AI's training went well later – if AI could truly transport physical objects in a stable, controlled way between the Vanished and Pland – then this antique shop would also become a secret warehouse for transferring supplies.

Duncan went behind the counter and sat down on a chair, carefully sorting through the fragments of memory in his mind and picking out every point that might pose a risk.

The original owner of this body had been a believer of the Sun God, but in the whole Church system he was only a lowest-level member. Because the city-state's authority had kept cracking down on cult activity, the space for Sun God believers in Pland had been squeezed to the limit. Their members were extremely cautious in how they contacted each other. They always wore full hoods and masks to any gathering, and many low-level members had contact with the Church's upper ranks only through one or at most two specific “handlers”. For the Duncan of today, this was without doubt a good thing –

It meant that even among the cultists, only that one person knew “his” identity and contact methods in the Mortal Realm. Once that person was gone, no one else would know his unspeakable heretic identity.

He could then walk right in front of the city-state’s administrators as an upstanding, clean citizen.

And the even better news was that, after carefully combing through his memories, Duncan confirmed that this biggest hidden danger had already vanished.

Because “his” handler had been one of the three black-robed cultists he saw when he first woke up…

Those three unlucky fools had already been “taken care of by the pigeon”.

He relaxed a little inside and shifted into a more comfortable position on the chair.

With the greatest risk gone, if there was still anything to worry about, it was the other Sun God believers who had taken part in the sacrificial ritual in the Underground Assembly Hall earlier, and, behind those believers, the larger and more secretive, dangerous Sun God Church.

If his memories were right, four years ago the city-state of Pland had carried out a harsh strike against the Sun God Church that lurked in the city. Since then, that heretic faith had never recovered in the city-state. Forget holding rituals; on normal days, they were already thankful if they could hide themselves well enough not to be dragged out by the Church Guardians.

But now, these extremely low-key cultists had suddenly done something very high-profile.

The purpose of a sacrificial ritual was to please a God, and also to gather power or strengthen the God's influence on the Mortal Realm. The cultists in the hall at the time – even that priestly "Envoy" who led the ritual – had all been only rank-and-file members of the Sun God Church. Would rank-and-file members like that organize such a big scheme all on their own?

Duncan's memory fragments were not many, and a low-level cultist would never have touched the Church's core secrets. But even just reasoning from the information he had, he could guess that those cultists who had suddenly stirred things up must have been acting under orders from higher up.

That heretic sect that worshipped the "true Sun God"… they wanted to do something big in Pland. The sacrificial ritual that he had accidentally ruined was probably only the smallest splash before the start of that great event.

Duncan did not feel much for this "city-state of Pland". But if he wanted to use it as his starting point, then he had to think about how a bunch of madmen like those "Sun God cultists" running wild in the city-state might affect him.

Chapter 42: What He Saw in the Book

The city was under curfew, so it was not a good time to go out exploring. Duncan stayed in the antique shop the whole night. The excitement of finally setting foot on land kept him going, and he tirelessly searched through the entire building.

The original master of this body really had been a cultist, but at the same time he was also an ordinary person who needed a normal life. He needed the conveniences of modern civilization to survive, needed to talk to people, and needed all kinds of everyday goods.

He needed to deal with the entire city.

And all of that would leave a lot of clues. Even with his memories blurred and broken, Duncan could still roughly work out how people lived in the city-state of Pland, and what the era's technology and living conditions were like.

Behind a secret compartment in the counter on the first floor, he found a small stash of cash: a handful of loose coins and several blue and green notes of different values. This was the legal currency used in most city-states, certified and issued jointly by their governors and the Boundless Sea Chamber of Commerce. The main unit was called the "Sola", with the "Peso" as a subsidiary coin worth one-tenth of a Sola. The cash Duncan found added up to just over two hundred Sola, and according to the information in his memories, that was about enough to keep a family of three in the Lower City alive for a month.

So it seemed that even though business in the shop had been poor, and even though most of his property had been donated to the Church, the original master of this body still managed to maintain a basic standard of living—proof that this antique shop still had a steady trickle of customers.

The first floor of the shop had only two parts. About two-thirds of the space was the storefront in front of the stairs. The remaining third was a "warehouse" behind a small door under the stairs, and at the back of that warehouse there was another door—the building's rear entrance, which was probably also used for bringing in goods.

The layout on the second floor was a bit more complicated. Besides a washroom, there were two rooms, one large and one small, and a narrow shaft shared with the neighboring building that held pipes and ducts. The big and small rooms sat on either side of the stair landing, and they were both surprisingly clean.

There was also a tiny kitchen on the second floor, but judging from the layer of dust on everything, it probably had not been used for at least half a month.

After checking everything, Duncan went back to the main bedroom on the second floor. He looked around the room, which was even smaller than his old studio apartment, and his gaze fell on the small cabinet beside the bed.

There was a framed picture there, and inside it… was a black-and-white photograph.

The photo showed a family of three: a plainly dressed young man and woman with a little girl who looked only four or five years old. They stood in front of an obviously painted garden backdrop, faint smiles on their faces as they looked toward the camera.

Duncan walked up to the frame, picked it up, and studied it carefully, trying again and again to match it with the vague, scattered fragments in his memory.

The original master of this body… was not in the photograph.

The people in the picture seemed to be this body's relatives… very close ones.

When he fixed his gaze on the young couple, Duncan seemed to feel a faint sense of longing rising up from the depths of his borrowed memories.

But everything else about the photograph was blurry and indistinct. It was as if all the deeper memories about them had vanished from this world with the original master of this body's last breath.

He set the photo down and wondered what kind of expense a black-and-white portrait like this would be for a commoner in the Lower City. He also wondered how far photography had developed in this world, and what principles the equipment used.

At the same time, his gaze drifted to the neatly made bed, and a faint doubt rose in his heart.

Would a cultist who had completely fallen into the faith of the Sun really spend so much time keeping his room this clean?

The storefront downstairs was clearly neglected, so how was the bed in this bedroom kept so immaculate?

He walked out the door and crossed to the smaller room opposite the stairs. Inside, the bed and desk were just as tidy and clean.

He sorted through his memories and confirmed that the original master of this body had left the shop several days ago to go to the Secret Assembly Hall for a gathering of the Sun's believers—that had been his last time leaving. The details were already hazy, but there was no impression of him tidying up the rooms before he went.

So that meant… there was someone else?

Someone else had been living together with this cultist? A relative?

Duncan frowned slightly. While he searched for matching clues in his mind, he walked over to the desk in the small room. His eyes passed over the neatly arranged paper and stationery and finally settled on a book.

The book lay in the most prominent spot on the desk. Its cover was a deep blue, decorated with gears and connecting rods, and the title was written in elegant cursive letters:

"The Art of Steam and Gears – General Textbook III"

Duncan frowned. He already vaguely realized that this room must belong to "someone else", yet he still picked up the book without thinking.

There were no books to read on the Vanished, and he had not found a single scrap of writing in the master bedroom or anywhere else in the shop. This book in his hands might help him understand more about this world.

He opened the cover, and the illustrated pages came into view. It really was a "textbook" on engineering techniques and the principles of steam machinery, and between its paragraphs he could see many notes left by the book's owner.

The neat, delicate handwriting looked like it belonged to a young woman.

Duncan rubbed his forehead. The original master of this body seemed to have had almost no relatives or friends. Most of the scenes—or rather impressions—in his memories carried a cold, lonely tone. But after combing through them several times, he finally “recalled” someone, dimly… a girl with dark brown hair.

She seemed to be the only person that the cultist named Ron still cared about, in a way, when he breathed his last.

Duncan’s gaze fell on the pages. He did not bother with the parts full of specific technical terms and diagrams. Instead, he picked out the sections that read more like editors’ notes and discussions of concepts.

A line of text suddenly caught his eye:

“…Fire, or to be more precise, the special flames produced by burning oils from the Deep Sea and crystalline minerals from nearshore deposits, is the keystone that keeps modern society running and protects our civilization…

“The prosperity and order of modern civilization are built on fire and steam… Clean, convenient electricity cannot replace the exorcising effect of fire, nor can it keep large machines running steadily for long periods of time… Experiments have proved that steam is the most stable form of power when exposed to the influence of the deep layers of space…

“In this chapter, we will discuss three typical designs for steam cores and explain the mechanical principles and design ideas behind them…”

Duncan’s eyes froze for a moment.

He remembered the gas lamps, torches, and oil lamps he had seen everywhere in the sewers before, and the gas streetlights along the roads of the city. He also remembered the puzzlement he had felt when he saw that lone electric lamp in the shop.

So… this was the reason behind those seemingly “strange” things?

Even in the risky environment of the sewers, people still insisted on using open-flame lamps. Even with electricity already developed to a certain level, they still lit the streets outside with gas lamps—all because “fire” could, to some extent, hold back the spread of certain “Dangerous Aberrations”?

A vague, hard-to-name feeling rose in Duncan’s heart. His gaze moved down the page to the complex schematics, the dense notes, and the careful annotations left by the book’s owner.

They were machines he simply could not understand.

And they were definitely not the “steam engines” he had known in his previous life.

The intricate gears, the extremely complex cylinders, and the pipes and valves linking each part all went far beyond the concept of a simple steam engine. They looked more like devices that had jumped out of some fantastical illustration manual, full of a strange, contradictory beauty.

This was the “heart” that kept this world’s civilization moving forward.

Lost in thought, Duncan slowly put the book back where it had been.

Because he could no longer make sense of it at all.

As someone from Earth, even with his past experience as a teacher, he could not make heads or tails of these steam-powered mechanisms pushed to such extremes.

Yet even so, a faint sense of insight still surfaced in his heart:

The development of civilization in this world seemed to be walking a path completely different from the one he knew.

To survive in a world surrounded by threats, mortal nations had taken on all sorts of bizarre forms. But no matter how strange a world was, as long as it could still be called a “civilization”, there had to be reasons and logic behind how it had grown to this point.

The gas lamps burning in the sewers, the electric lamp glowing in the shop, and the steam engines drawn in the book—born from the gathered wisdom of countless people—all faintly revealed a certain… tenacity.

Chapter 43: Good Morning, Mr. Duncan

Duncan put the book back, then checked the rest of the furnishings in the room. He did not find anything else of real value. There were pitifully few belongings in this small bedroom, and it did not seem to be used often. The most useful clues were still that textbook and the two old notebooks in the desk drawer.

The notebooks were filled with notes on steam engines and engineering principles, with a few complaints about certain teachers or classmates scattered between the pages.

It was easy to reach a conclusion from that: the person living here was a young student still in school.

Duncan slowly sorted through the fragments of memory in his head. After he put everything in the room back where it had been, he returned to the main bedroom.

He sat on the edge of the bed and thought for a while. Then he stood up and walked to the standing wardrobe beside him, opening its door almost by muscle memory and pulling out one of the drawers.

A few bottles of strong liquor lay hidden in the back of the drawer, along with half a box of pills used to ease pain and calm the nerves. These were things the cultist named Ron had left behind in the world.

He had suffered from a serious illness that had already worsened beyond any cure. Cheap liquor and painkillers that only helped for a while were always kept in the drawer, but such things obviously did nothing to extend the life of a man trapped in sickness.

So this man, who had lost all hope in life, turned to the Church of the Sun. The preachers told him that the healing power of the Sun could cure all stubborn illnesses in the world and purify the body and mind of those who converted. And to a certain extent, those cultists really did keep that promise:

They had bloody, twisted rituals that used fresh blood as a medium, channeling the life force of innocent people into the bodies of sick believers. Duncan did not know how those rituals worked, or whether they could truly cure incurable diseases. He only knew, from the fragments of memory that remained, that after one such ritual the cultist named Ron had indeed improved, and so he became even more devoted to the Sun, going so far as to donate more than half his property to the “Envoy”.

But Duncan was not very interested in what had happened among those cultists who were already dead.

He reached deeper into the drawer and soon felt a hidden compartment. After fiddling with it for a moment, he found a revolver and a box of bullets still in good condition.

The city-state of Pland did not forbid citizens from owning guns, but they needed proper paperwork. A fake antique dealer living in the Lower City clearly lacked the money and status to get a gun license, so this was without a doubt an illegally owned weapon. Out of caution, the original master of this body had left the gun in the room instead of taking it to the gathering. He probably used it to protect his shop in daily life. But now, it belonged to the captain.

Of course, Duncan knew this was just an ordinary weapon. Compared to the “anomaly” creatures on the Vanished—or even to the old-fashioned flintlock on his ship, which might have special powers that surpassed this revolver—it was nothing. But he was someone in the Mortal Realm now. He knew moving around the city-state of Pland was not the same as acting on his ship. The body he was using now was made of flesh and blood, and many parts of this city were far from safe.

After all, he could not solve every problem by having the pigeon take care of people—when AI moved in earnest, she made too much noise and would easily draw unnecessary attention from the Church’s forces in the city.

Just then, a faint sound suddenly caught Duncan’s attention.

He heard the scrape of a key from the direction of the shop’s front door downstairs, followed by the sound of the lock turning and hurried footsteps.

Duncan quickly tucked the revolver against his body, and only then did he notice that it was already broad daylight outside the window—he had been busy in the antique shop all night. The pigeon AI suddenly started chattering on his shoulder: “You have a new short message!”

“Quiet,” Duncan said quickly, glancing at the pigeon as he walked toward the door. “Stay in the room until I give the word. And if there’s anyone else around, don’t speak.”

AI flapped her wings at once and flew to a nearby cabinet. “Aye, captain!”

Duncan hurried out of the room, and just as he reached the top of the stairs, he heard the quick footsteps already coming up. A young, breathless girl’s voice rose from below: “Uncle Duncan? Is that you back?”

A moment later, a girl in a brown long skirt and white blouse, with long dark brown hair, came into Duncan’s view.

She looked only seventeen or eighteen, slender and small, with what seemed like a bit of morning dew still clinging to her hair. Her features were not especially striking, but she had the fresh prettiness of her age. She stared up at Duncan standing at the second-floor landing, eyes wide, her face full of happy surprise.

Duncan did not answer. He simply stood there on the second floor. sunlight from a narrow window behind the stairs shone against his silhouette, hiding his expression in the glare. He silently looked at the girl for several seconds before finally speaking, slowly: “What did you just call me?”

“Duncan… uncle?” The girl looked puzzled for a moment, then grew a little nervous. She grabbed the stair rail beside her and peered up carefully, as if trying to see the middle-aged man’s face through the backlight. “Did I say something wrong? Did you… did you drink again? You haven’t come home for days… I just saw the light on downstairs…”

Her face and voice were all too clear to Duncan. She obviously did not yet know how—or had never thought—to hide her emotional reactions.

From the memories he had devoured, this girl should be the original owner of this body’s niece, and his only living relative.

Duncan could faintly tell that the girl did not think anything she had said was strange. She had no idea that the way she had addressed him—“Uncle Duncan”—was wrong from the very start.

Where had things gone wrong? Why would this young lady, who in theory could not possibly know his secret, so naturally call him “Duncan”?

Countless guesses surged through his mind. At the same time, he also found a few matching fragments in his memories related to this young lady—the child with dark brown hair, the last figure the original master of this body had been reluctant to leave behind in the living world.

“Nina,” Duncan said. His expression did not change and his voice stayed calm; the storm of thoughts in his head did not show at all. “Did you stay at school last night?”

“I’ve been staying at school these past few days,” the girl on the stairs answered at once. “I thought you’d be like before, gone for at least a week, so after I tidied up the house I went to stay with a classmate… Madam White, who manages the dorms, agreed. I only rushed back today because I suddenly remembered I left a book at home… Are you okay? You seem… a bit strange…”

“I’m fine, I was just a little groggy from sleep just now.”

Duncan answered in a natural tone and then started down to the first floor. An unbelievably wild guess had already formed in his heart, and now he had to confirm it.

He passed by Nina on the stairs. The young girl turned sideways to let him by, watching his eyes curiously. When he was almost down to the first floor, she suddenly asked, “Uncle Duncan, are you going out again later? Are you… going to stay home for a few days?”

“…It depends,” Duncan said without looking back, still unsure if his expression was natural enough. He only followed the tone that should exist in his borrowed memories as he answered his “niece”. “I’m just going to check the door. If nothing’s wrong, I’ll be home for the next few days.”

“Ah, okay. Then I’ll go buy some groceries later. There isn’t much food left at home…”

The girl spoke quickly as she thumped up the stairs, her footsteps fast and her voice carrying a light, cheerful note.

Duncan had already reached the shop’s front door. He took a light breath and pushed it open.

He turned around and looked up at the sign hanging over the entrance. On the old, grimy board, a line of letters stood out clearly: Duncan Antique Shop.

The first few letters were just as old as the rest. There was no sign they had been added later. It was as if they had always been there from the very beginning.

Duncan frowned and slowly walked over to the display window. Leaning forward, he studied his own face in the reflection on the dirty glass.

It was indeed a stranger's face. It did not belong to the stern, gloomy ghost captain, but to a middle-aged man with a scruffy beard, sunken eyes, and a tired look—the face of the cultist named Ron who had died in the sewers.

Duncan slowly straightened up. He could hear the district coming to life around him. The clear jingle of bells came from shop doors opening onto the street. Bicycle bells and the murmur of people talking gradually filled the road. Someone walked past the antique shop—probably the neighbor from next door—and called out to him:

"Good morning, Mr. Duncan—have you read today's paper? The Deep Sea Church seems to have taken down a big cultist hideout. That's quite the event!"

Chapter 44: An ordinary person’s Breakfast

A copy of the Pland City Bulletin cost twelve pesos, about the same as a shabby breakfast or the cheapest dessert in the Crossroad District. You could buy a paper from a newsboy passing by, or walk a little farther to the newsstand at the end of the next street and get one there.

Duncan had a few coins in his pocket. He bought a local paper at the newsstand. The boss of the stand was a middle-aged man buried in his own reading. When he heard Duncan drop the coins into the tin box, he just waved a hand to tell him to take a paper, never even lifting his head.

Duncan leaned over a little to see what the man was reading. It was an analysis of past lottery results, bright lines in all colors outlining every kind of unrealistic fantasy.

He lowered his head and looked at the paper he had just bought. The front-page headline was the piece of news that interested him most:

“The honorable Church Guardian forces, led by Inquisitor Vanna Wayne, successfully destroyed a gathering site of the Sun god’s cult, capturing a large number of cultists on the spot and rescuing several citizens…”

The photo of “Her Excellency the Inquisitor” was printed beside the article. To Duncan’s surprise, she was a rather young woman. There was a clear scar at her left eye, yet she was still a beautiful lady. Standing with her subordinates, she was half a head taller than every man around her.

Inquisitor Vanna wore close-fitting light armor and a battle skirt, and carried a two-handed greatsword that looked as if it had walked out of an age of cold steel. She was like a dashing female knight from a medieval painting. Yet behind her and the group of Church Guardians, one could see a huge steam engine, and on its metal body there were even obvious gun turrets…

It was a strange and eerie image, everything at odds and yet somehow in harmony.

Duncan's gaze stayed on the photo for a long time.

News of a cultist gathering being wiped out counted as good news for him. Here, he did not have to worry about his identity being exposed, so he could watch those villains who held live sacrifices get dragged away without any guilt at all. But more than that, he cared about the information hidden in this picture.

A female Inquisitor who specialized in hunting cultists. Fully armed steam-powered armored automatons. Church troops that carried both cold steel and firearms…

Information like this was almost impossible to get aboard the Vanished, but inside a civilized society, you could see it all clearly for twelve pesos in a newspaper.

Just as Duncan had thought before—during the century when the Vanished drifted blindly, the times had already changed.

Even if you did not look at it in the simple way of "who could fight harder," the mortal civilization represented by the city-state of Pland had already grown into something that could only be called… impressive.

The street corner was not a good place to read. Duncan rolled the paper up and tucked it under his arm. He still remembered that there was a "niece" named Nina waiting for him back at the antique shop, so he turned and started walking back.

Compared to wandering aimlessly through the city on his own, a local who trusted him from the start was obviously a better source of information.

As for the Vanished, Duncan was not worried. Even while he walked in the Spirit Realm, he could still clearly sense what was happening aboard the Vanished, and the state of his other body. Goathead was steering the ship in his place, and Alice looked quite well-behaved. He should be able to stay active on this side for a while longer.

Anyway, the crew regulations of the Vanished already said that “the captain will occasionally leave the ship.” The captain going off to walk the Spirit Realm for a day or two did not seem like such a big deal, right?

And as he kept walking the Spirit Realm, Duncan felt his control over this special “mental projection” growing more and more skilled. Maybe soon he would be able to control both bodies at the same time. Then there would be even less reason to worry about the ship while he was walking the Spirit Realm.

At that moment, a sweet smell suddenly drifted over from the side. Duncan stopped without thinking and turned his head. He saw a cake shop by the street, with fresh pastries being set out at the front.

This was the Lower City of Pland, so of course there were no high-class dessert shops. But even the cheapest, rough cakes here were enough to make Duncan stop in his tracks.

He still had a few coins in his pocket, less than twenty pesos in all, but more than enough to buy a slice of cake.

After a brief hesitation, he walked up to the cake shop and paid for the most ordinary honey cake they had. The shopkeeper wrapped it in some thick, coarse paper. It felt rough and scratchy under his fingers.

Holding the newspaper and the cake, Duncan headed toward the antique shop. For some reason, his mood became lighter.

Walking along the street. Talking to people. Buying things. Going back home.

Such simple things gave him a feeling as if he had lived another life. He almost savored the act of breathing on land. He treated these ordinary routines as a precious kind of life experience.

Life aboard the Vanished was not bad either. Goathead was noisy but reliable, and Alice was an interesting one. But being able to experience life on land was not bad at all.

Before long, Duncan reached the antique shop again. Before he pushed the door open, he looked up at the sign above the shop. The line of letters reading “Duncan Antique Shop” still sat there quietly, carrying the worn look of something that had not changed in more than ten years.

He pushed the door open. The bell chimed with a clear sound. Right after that, hurried footsteps came from the stairs.

A young girl with long brown hair rushed down, then stopped short at the foot of the stairs. She held onto the post beside her and stared wide-eyed at Duncan, her expression tense and worried.

“Uncle Duncan, where did you go?” she blurted out. “You said you were just going to look at the door, but you were gone in the blink of an eye… I thought you had run off to the tavern or the casino again…”

Duncan looked at the young lady in surprise. He could tell that she truly was nervous and worried.

She was worried about the only family she had left in the world, the person she depended on to live. Even if that person was a drunken, gambling, bitter wreck of a man, and secretly tainted by the bloody business of cultists.

A faint, hard-to-name feeling rose in him, but his face did not change. He said: “I just went out for a walk and bought a few things.”

As he spoke, he walked over to the counter of the antique shop, planning to set the newspaper and the cake down. Nina seemed to relax all at once, then turned and ran upstairs. As she ran she called: “Uncle, wait a bit, I’ll bring breakfast down—at this hour you definitely haven’t eaten yet, have you? I made corn and beet soup…”

Before Duncan could say anything, Nina had already vanished up the stairs. A short while later, she came back down again, carefully carrying a big tray.

On the tray was a simple breakfast for two.

Duncan watched the girl with a slightly blank expression as she bustled around. She cleared a space on the counter with practiced ease, set out the food, then went to the side and brought over an extra chair for him…

Her hands were very quick, and she moved with a kind of happy energy that seemed to come from nowhere.

Duncan watched her work and wanted to help, but found there was no place for him to step in.

He had dealt with many young people of that age, but he had hardly ever seen a child as diligent and efficient as her.

If this were Earth, she would only be the age of a high school student. Even here, she still looked like a student.

Duncan suddenly thought that living with an “uncle” who had fallen into a cult could not have been easy. Yet this young lady named Nina seemed to have fully adapted to this life that was in no way happy, and had even found her own supports within it.

“Let’s eat,” Nina said now that everything was ready. She glanced at Duncan and went on in a tone that sounded as if she had repeated these words many times. “Doctor Albert said that if you eat breakfast regularly and keep a good mood, in the long run that will work better than strong liquor… better than painkillers.”

Duncan did not answer at once. He only looked quietly at Nina. Before her expression could turn awkward and tense, he picked up the cake he had set aside, unwrapped it, and placed it in front of her.

Nina’s eyes widened in surprise as she stared at the thing in front of her. “This is…”

“Cake. I bought it from the corner shop,” Duncan said casually. “You’re still growing. You should eat something nourishing for breakfast.”

But Nina froze. She just stared blankly at the cheap pastry. After a long moment she seemed to come back to herself, and muttered under her breath, almost to herself: “Are you really all right?”

“Of course I’m fine,” Duncan said, his expression quite natural. “I just suddenly remembered that I haven’t bought you any sweets in a long time.”

“That’s true. It’s been more than a year…” Nina muttered. Then she suddenly smiled and picked up the table knife. “Then we’ll split it half and half. Doctor Albert also said that you need nourishing food.”

Duncan felt very strange, but after a brief silence he still nodded.

“…All right.”

Chapter 45: History

This feeling was very strange.

Duncan could clearly sense things far away. He could feel the Vanished drifting on the vast Boundless Sea. That living ghost ship, under Goathead's control, was constantly opening up new routes on the enchanted sea chart. A cursed doll whose head was not very solid wandered through the cabins like an explorer, getting to know every corner of the ship. The deep, dark sea rose and fell around them, hiding countless strange things.

At the same time, through another line of sight, he was sitting in an antique shop in the Lower City of the Pland city-state. The sounds of people and carts from the street drifted in and only made the quiet inside more obvious. A human girl named Nina sat across from him, taking small bites of the cheapest cake the Lower City could offer.

He was Captain Duncan, master of the Vanished, a moving calamity on the Boundless Sea—yet here he sat like an ordinary person, eating his breakfast in the calm heart of the city.

He did not know if it was an illusion, but he felt that some part of his heart that had always been hanging and uneasy was slowly settling down. Maybe it was the nerves that had been taut for so long on the ghost ship, or maybe it was something else, but whatever it was, it did not feel like a bad thing.

It seemed she sensed his gaze. Nina, still eating her cake, suddenly looked up at him curiously and asked: "Uncle Duncan, aren't you going to eat?"

Duncan glanced at the food on her plate. "Is that enough for you?"

“It’s enough. Eating too many sweets is bad for you.”

“Mm.”

He nodded, picked up the cake, and took a bite. He carefully tasted the rich flavor he had not enjoyed in a long time, feeling the crude sweetness slowly melt in his mouth. Then he clearly sensed this body begin to process the food he had eaten.

His heart settled a little. Things were as he had expected.

This body was much more “useful” than the first shell he had occupied. Its “parts” were all intact, and it had not been dead for long. His soul had taken over and almost restarted its life force without a break. It was completely different from that open-chested corpse from before.

Now he had breath, blood flowing, and a beating heart. The heartbeat seemed a bit slow, but still within the range of a normal person.

He probably did not need to worry about the body rotting anymore, or plan how to soak himself in preservative. And this way it was also much less likely he would be exposed in front of ordinary people.

But there was one thing Duncan still was not sure about.

He knew this body should have been ill. In the memories he had devoured, the impression of long, heavy sickness was deeper than any other memory. The strong liquor and painkillers he had found in the cabinet earlier were proof enough.

He did not know exactly what illness this body had suffered. The time and cause of the sickness belonged to very old memories, already blurred. But one thing was clear: right now, aside from the weakness that came with an ordinary person’s body, he felt no problems in this body at all.

Had the disease vanished? Had this body healed itself because of his walk in the Spirit Realm? Or was his projected soul limited in what it could feel, so he simply could not sense the problem, while this body's health was still slowly getting worse?

Duncan thought about this as he calmly ate. Then he suddenly looked at Nina, who was eating across from him, and asked: "Don't you need to go to school today?"

Nina lived in the Lower City. Her family's finances were not good, but the city-state of Pland had clearly reached a point where basic education was quite common. She studied at a school run together by the Church and the City Hall, focusing on steam engine studies. This kind of school was like a vocational high school, meant mainly to send trained steam artificers to the factories and the Cathedral.

Half of Nina's tuition was paid by her uncle, and the other half came from City Hall subsidies.

For a city-state that had entered the industrial age, it was worthwhile even for the authorities to pay to train artificers like her. And it was undeniable that these very practical schools at least solved the literacy problem for commoners.

Nina was eager to learn. In her uncle's memories, this girl had done quite well in all her classes.

"I don't have any classes this morning," Nina said with a nod. "Only two history lessons in the afternoon. And I need to go tell Madam White that I won't be staying in the dormitory for the next few days…"

Duncan suddenly stopped what he was doing and looked at Nina carefully. "Don't you think staying here to take care of someone like me will hold you back? You could live at school for long stretches. That might be better for your studies."

Nina froze. She stared blankly at her "Uncle Duncan," then suddenly got angry. "You shouldn't talk like that! You're only sick, that's all. You just need to obey the doctor and take your medicine. Dad and Mom entrusted you to me…"

"No, your dad and mom entrusted you to me," Duncan corrected her seriously, picking his words with the help of the memories in his mind. "You were only six years old then."

"But I'm seventeen now," Nina said, puffing out her cheeks as she stabbed her fork into the last bit of cake. "You're even worse than I am at taking care of yourself. If I really moved out, you'd have the room in a mess in less than three days. In fact, you can let me help take care of the shop, at least with the cleaning. The window is so dirty you can barely see through it…"

Duncan listened helplessly to the girl's rambling lecture. He had not expected an offhand "test" sentence to get such a big reaction.

But slowly, he could not help smiling.

From this girl named Nina, he felt a kind of warmth… a warmth like standing in sunlight.

"All right, I was only speaking casually," he said, shaking his head as he stirred the last bit of soup in his bowl. "History in the afternoon… how have your history lessons been going lately?"

"Uncle Duncan, are you really all right?" Nina opened her eyes wide in surprise. "You never… well, at least in the last two years, you've never asked about my schoolwork."

Duncan opened his mouth, about to say something, but the girl went on talking on her own: “We’ve been doing ancient history lately. Old Mr. Morris has been telling us about what happened after the Great Annihilation… To be honest, it’s pretty interesting. Ancient history sounds a lot like stories. It’s much more fun than modern or recent history.”

Duncan thought for a moment, then asked seriously: “Sounds like you’re doing well. Then let me test you. What is the basic idea of the Great Annihilation?”

Uncle Duncan was very strange today. Nina could not say exactly how, but he was different from usual.

But Nina did not think too hard about it. Compared to her uncle’s slightly odd words and actions, what mattered more to this simple young lady was that Uncle Duncan finally seemed to have some spirit, and even looked to be in a good mood.

She was happy that Uncle Duncan had asked about something she had just learned.

So she began to explain, wearing a proud smile, and told Duncan what she had just studied:

“The Great Annihilation happened about ten thousand years ago. For reasons we still don’t understand, minority peoples with unusual cultures, like the elves, the Senkin, and the Gyproans, record different dates in their own calendars. But overall, scholars agree that the Great Annihilation took place at the end of the Age of Order about ten thousand years ago…”

Duncan listened with a calm face.

Inside, his mind was full of questions.

Elves? Senkin? Gyproans? What was this? So there were other intelligent races on land besides humans? And elves… was that the same kind of “elves” he was thinking of? Were there elven city-states out on the Boundless Sea, living in the steam age?

All sorts of bizarre images rose in his mind, while Nina’s voice still came from across the table:

“…Different city-states record the Great Annihilation in slightly different ways, but there are some things they agree on. Before the Great Annihilation, the Age of Order was far more prosperous, stable, and safe than today. There were vast continents then. The seas were not as endless as they are now. And neither the seas nor the lands had anything like the ‘border of the Mortal Realm’ that we talk about today…

“The time after the Great Annihilation is called the Deep Sea era. The Deep Sea era has lasted to this day and shows no sign of ending. Its biggest feature is that the Boundless Sea covers almost the whole world. Less than one tenth of the old era’s land remains, and it is broken up into islands of many sizes or ‘mistbound expanses’. The city-states we have now stand on the more stable islands, and all kinds of ocean-going ships are the only way for the islands to trade and stay in contact.

“In the early Deep Sea era, the remnant folk of the Old World suffered heavy blows. The old civilizations were almost all destroyed. The first kingdom to rise from the ruins was the ancient kingdom of Critt, the oldest civilization of the Deep Sea era that we can still trace. Even though that ancient kingdom lasted less than a hundred years, it left behind many legacies that deeply influenced later times. These include the very first and simplest ways of classifying the many anomalies and manifestations of the Deep Sea era, as well as a lot of precious knowledge on how to survive in the Deep Sea era…”

Chapter 46: Anomalies and Visions

The Great Annihilation was the turning point of all history in this world, and it was also the beginning of what people now called the Deep Sea Age.

From what Nina told him, Duncan finally roughly understood what kind of earth-shaking change had once happened in this world, and he also realized that this world had not always been as strange and dangerous as it was now.

If the historical records were true, the world before the Great Annihilation had been a prosperous, safe paradise.

At that time, the ocean was not yet the Boundless Sea. The limited waters back then did not cover more than ninety-five percent of the world's surface like they did now. Humans still lived on wide, safe land, and even in the seas there were no dangerous Visions such as the Spirit Realm, the Abyssal Deep, or Subspace.

The "Age of Order" written in the history books actually felt more like the world Duncan was familiar with. Modern people might look back with shock and disbelief at that Age of Antiquity where no "Anomalies" existed, but to Duncan, it was the current shape of the world that was utterly wrong.

The history books did not give a detailed explanation of this key event, the "Great Annihilation". Archaeologists had been working on it for years, but the city-states and peoples still fiercely disagreed about ancient history. No one knew how the so?called Great Annihilation had actually happened, or what the disaster itself really was. Thick chaos and mist shrouded that upheaval, and beyond the mist lay only the Deep Sea Age they lived in now.

Seawater from who knew where drowned more than ninety percent of the land. The survivors of civilization built city-states and fleets on the remaining islands and scraps of ground. The Boundless Sea and the mists over it brought with them strange things called “Anomalies” and “Visions”, which still threatened the survival of civilization to this day.

But Nina did not know that the man in front of her was a ghost captain from another land, quietly drawing knowledge from her words. She only thought this was Uncle Duncan testing her homework. Uncle Duncan had not been in such a good mood for a long time. She felt simply happy, and even felt that this moment was especially precious, because she worried that at any time Uncle Duncan might turn back into how he had been before… and from her past experience, that was almost unavoidable.

As soon as the liquor stopped working or the painkillers ran out, Uncle Duncan would become especially irritable, quick?tempered, and hysterical.

So before Uncle Duncan fell ill again, she wanted to show him all the progress she had made. Maybe that could make his good mood last for another day or two.

“…Old Mr. Morris is very interested in the history of the Critt Kingdom. He is an expert in that field. He told us that even though the ancient kingdom of Critt only lasted for a hundred years, it was the first civilization to stand up from the ruins and fight against Anomalies and Visions after the Deep Sea Age began. The experience they gathered in that hundred years still guided most people in the world even today. The most important part of it is their way of classifying ‘Anomalies’ and ‘Visions’…”

“The way they classify ‘Anomalies’ and ‘Visions’? You’ve already learned that?” Duncan raised his eyebrows, and his words still carried a bit of mental guidance.

He had cared about this ever since he started listening. Now he was even more sure that, in the eyes of ordinary people in this world, the unnatural things were strictly divided. Some things were called “Anomalies” and even had numbers, but other things… seemed to be called “Visions” separately, instead of being lumped together with all the rest as “Anomalies” like he had first thought.

Back on the Vanished, he had never heard any detailed knowledge about this from Goathead. Now the things Nina was learning at school could finally make up for this gap in his basic understanding.

Nina nodded. She thought back to what she had heard in class and said: “The simplest way Old Mr. Morris taught us to tell the difference between Anomalies and Visions is by scale.

“Usually, Anomalies are smaller in scale. They are often limited to a single object, a single animal, or even a single ‘person’.

“Most Anomalies can be moved by people, and their range of influence is limited. Many Anomalies only affect a single target at any one time. If you know the right methods, most Anomalies can also be safely sealed or isolated. Some of the less harmful Anomalies can even be ‘used’ like tools through special methods.

“Visions are much larger in scale than Anomalies. The smallest Vision is as big as a whole house. Larger ones can cover an entire city?state, or even more… so large it is hard to imagine.

“A good number of Visions cannot be moved by human hands at all. They are either fixed in one place, or they move according to their own will. Their ability to affect things also far surpasses that of Anomalies. Most of the time, a Vision can affect an unlimited number of targets within the area where it works, so much so that it is almost the same as a ‘natural phenomenon’. That is why they are called ‘Visions’.

“Unlike Anomalies, almost all Visions cannot be sealed or controlled. They exist in the world like natural phenomena, working without any outside interference, and they naturally affect every target within their range that meets the conditions. Because most Visions are dangerous, all people can do is stay away from these dangerous Visions, or use special methods to keep themselves from becoming targets inside a Vision’s active range…

“Luckily, the most dangerous Visions usually do not move. The pioneers helped us find out where those dangers are, so we can safely keep our distance from them…”

Nina spoke very seriously. Then she suddenly seemed to remember something and quickly added: “Oh, right. Old Mr. Morris also especially reminded us that these rules and traits are only ‘usually valid’. Anomalies and Visions are things that go against common sense, so no matter how people sum up their experience, there will always be Anomalies or Visions that do not fit the definitions and suddenly appear. Sometimes an Anomaly and a Vision can even switch places, and there are cases where Visions can be interfered with or destroyed by human hands.

“For example, in the year 1830 of the New City?State Calendar, there was an Anomaly in the city?state of Lunsa called ‘Mycelium’ that entered a runaway state. The local Church guardians paid a heavy price to banish that runaway?state Anomaly to a nearby island. In 1835, that island was reclassified and promoted to a Vision and became what was later known as Fungal Isle—but in 1844, the great Saint Paladin gave his life to contain Fungal Isle inside his own ash urn. The Vision ‘Fungal Isle’ was struck from the rolls that same year. It turned back into an ‘Anomaly’ and was renamed the ‘Paladin’s Mushroom Jar’. It is now sealed in the sacred relic vault under the great Cathedral of Lunsa city?state…”

Duncan listened with full attention to everything Nina said. His mind worked quickly, while his calm expression hid the waves in his heart.

In this short breakfast alone, the information he gathered had already surpassed everything he had learned in all those days on the Vanished.

Building contact with the land and setting up an outpost in a city?state on the surface had indeed been the right idea. Civilized society was where most of the world’s information was gathered.

He looked without thinking at the girl still talking in front of him and felt a lot of emotion.

A normal civilization that had developed to the industrial stage would surely try every way it could to compress and collect the basic knowledge needed to run society into its education system. A child living inside that system might find it hard to notice what a treasure those textbooks they saw every day really were.

They were knowledge that countless people had built up over countless years, then sorted and organized again and again into forms that were easiest to learn. Those books were the most delicate “compressed rations” of knowledge in the world, meant to turn a blank sheet of a person into a working part of society with the smallest possible cost of time and effort.

Even Nina, who normally loved to study, could not feel this. Only an “outsider” like Duncan could see how precious this knowledge was, and how easy it was to absorb.

Nina did not notice what Duncan was thinking. She only remembered what her respected history teacher had said in class—

“…So at the end of the last class, Old Mr. Morris said one more thing to us. He said that people had summed up countless rules while dealing with ‘Anomalies’ and ‘Visions’, but only one rule was truly always valid. That rule is: ‘No matter how many rules we sum up, there will always be Anomalies or Visions in this world that do not follow them.’

“Scholars also call this rule the ‘Eternal Clause Zero’. By default, it is placed at the very beginning of all books and papers in the related fields. Based on it, people came up with the famous ‘Perpetual Miscalibration Law of Anomalies and Visions’. Up to this day, that law has never been broken…”

Chapter 47: Before the Sacred Icon

Nina was very happy, because it had been a long time since she had sat down for a normal meal like this with Uncle Duncan and talked about what was happening at school. It had been even longer since she had seen a smile on Uncle Duncan’s face.

It even made her think of the past, of the time before her uncle fell ill. She had lost her parents when she was six. Since then, this man who was like a father to her had become her only family in the world. But four years ago, a sickness whose cause even the doctors could not find had turned her uncle into someone else. The days since then… to be honest, had been very hard to endure.

Her uncle still paid for her schooling and kept up her basic living expenses, but Nina could feel that every bit of color that had once belonged to the “future” had slowly faded from this small, familiar, cozy shop. It had been washed away by the hard liquor, the pills, and those gloomy, oppressive gatherings with the shady “friends” who dealt with her uncle.

She no longer dared to hope that life could go back to how it had been a few years ago, but even a small improvement was something worth being happy about.

Duncan was happy too, because he had finally come into contact with more information about this world and finally touched the threads of its history. Even if it was only a part of it, it gave him the joy of having the fog briefly pushed aside.

The completely lost prehistoric “Age of Order”, the “Great Annihilation” that reshaped the order of all things, the Deep Sea Age that had lasted to this day, the Anomalies and Visions spread across the world… all these things that he had once not known at all, or only half understood, now finally had clearer outlines.

Breakfast ended. Nina stood up to clear the dishes. Her movements were quick and practiced, and it was easy to see that she did this kind of housework often. Without a doubt, she was the one who cleaned the upstairs bedroom too.

A man weighed down by serious illness, sunk in decay, and pouring most of his energy and passion into cult activities clearly would not be doing these things.

But as he watched the girl busy herself, Duncan still could not hold back in the end. He stood up and took the large tray from Nina’s hands: “Let me carry this. You look like you have trouble going up the stairs with it.”

Nina stared at Duncan in surprise. She had just opened her mouth to say something more when he was already striding toward the stairs.

The girl could only hurry after him, following behind while she reminded him: “Uncle Duncan, be careful. The doctor said your condition is still unstable…”

“The doctor… Doctor Albert?” Duncan did not look back. He went up the stairs while he searched his broken memories for a matching image, but only caught a few brief flashes. “It doesn’t matter. He still can’t figure out the cause of the illness anyway. The most effective medicine he prescribed was just painkillers.”

“…You should still listen to the doctor’s advice,” Nina muttered as she followed Duncan up to the second floor and walked toward the kitchen. “At least he knows how to keep you healthy…”

Before Nina could finish, the sudden sound of flapping wings cut her off.

She and Duncan looked toward the source of the sound at the same time and saw a shadow flash past the crack of the half?closed master bedroom door.

“Uncle Duncan, something just flashed past inside your room!” Nina said in surprise, then stepped forward and grabbed the doorknob. “Could it be the cat from next door…”

“Hey, don’t…”

Duncan only had time to get out half a warning before Nina pushed open the half?closed door. The pigeon hiding in the room then appeared before the two of them.

AI was standing on top of the cabinet, one claw holding a French fry halfway to its beak. The sudden opening of the door froze the entire bird in place. It stayed there with one claw still pushing the fry toward its mouth, its two little pea?green eyes staring blankly at Nina and, with the other eye, at the wall on the other side.

Then it saw Duncan. Its wings flapped twice with a loud noise: “Ah… coo?”

The corner of Duncan’s eye twitched. Not far away, the window stood wide open. That was clearly AI’s escape route. In the distance, straight out from the window, he could vaguely see a pier bathing in the sunlight.

This pigeon had gone to the docks to score some fries and flown back with them…

“A pigeon?” Nina finally reacted. She stared in surprise at AI on the cabinet. “Uncle Duncan! There’s a pigeon in your room!”

“I see it,” Duncan said with a blank face. “I don’t know it.”

AI instantly threw away the fry, flapped over with a fluttering sound, and landed on Duncan’s shoulder, bobbing its head.

“Fine. It flew in this morning,” Duncan sighed. “It might be someone’s tame pigeon, but it isn’t very bright. I gave it something to eat and then it refused to leave.”

AI listened and let out a loud coo.

If there had not been an outsider present, and if Duncan had not given an order earlier, it would surely already be loudly crying out “ah, yes, yes, yes” by now.

Nina did not doubt her uncle’s words at all. She only looked at the pigeon with shining eyes, then slowly came closer, watching its reaction while she asked Duncan: “Then… are you going to keep it? Can I keep it?”

The girl’s thoughts were written all over her face. In her eyes, AI was clearly just a pretty and cute white dove. AI tilted its head to look at Duncan and gave a questioning coo from its throat.

Duncan suddenly felt that this bird was easier to understand when it did not talk…

After a moment, he pretended to hesitate, then nodded: “You can—but only if this pigeon is willing to stay. It might fly away at any time. You can’t complain when that happens.”

Nina’s face lit up at once. “Great! I knew it, Uncle Duncan, you really are reasonable deep down!”

…

In the central prayer room of the great Deep Sea Cathedral, the city?state Bishop Valentine, wearing a black priest’s robe embroidered with gold, stood with a solemn face before the holy image of the storm goddess.

He was tall and thin, with sparse white hair and eyes as calm as deep water.

The great candelabrum in the prayer room burned quietly. The sacred flames lit the chamber. The holy statue of Gamona towered on the dais. This goddess had no face; her head was covered by a black veil, and a long dress patterned with many waves fell from her body down to the edge of the platform. Though it was only a stone statue, the power of divinity still showed itself here. The whole image gave off a strong sense of presence. Anyone standing near it could feel a faint sense of being watched by a gaze and being sheltered.

That feeling of being under a gaze and under protection was real. It was under that gaze and that shelter that Vanna, who had come to discuss a matter with the Bishop, could calmly and openly speak of all the scenes she had seen in her dreams.

“…If what you saw in your dream was accurate, then that truly was the Vanished.”

Bishop Valentine of the city?state turned around and looked at the young Inquisitor who had come to him early in the morning. In terms of Church ranks, the battle?focused Inquisitors and the ceremony?focused city?state Bishops were on the same level. But when it came to judging supernatural events, it was completely normal for an Inquisitor to seek advice, or even guidance, from a Bishop.

“So it really was the Vanished?” Even though she already had an answer in her heart, Vanna still could not help widening her eyes after hearing the Bishop’s judgment. “I thought that…”

“You thought that ship was now just a legend, like all those ghost?ship tales the jumpy sailors brag about in taverns?” Valentine knew what Vanna wanted to say. The old man with sparse white hair shook his head, his voice deep. “The existence of the Vanished is a fact recognized by all the city? states and the Church. It is not a legend. You can find records of it in the Church archives.”

“I know that. The Vanished did truly exist. In Pland’s City?State Archive you can even find some of the construction blueprints and launch records for that ship from more than a century ago. But all of that solid, verifiable material only covers the time when the Vanished was still a ship sailing in the Mortal Realm, and when Captain Duncan was still human…”

Vanna spoke in a serious tone. She glanced at the holy statue behind the Bishop, and her expression grew even more careful when she mentioned certain words.

“The key point is that the records clearly state that the ship fell into Subspace. A century ago, thousands of fleeing dead from the Viseran Thirteen Isles saw with their own eyes as that ship and their homeland were swallowed by a Border Collapse and plunged straight into the shadows of Subspace. In the decades after that, there were always reports claiming that the Vanished had appeared again in the Mortal Realm, but all of them lacked real proof. Quite a few scholars doubted that the ship had ever truly ‘returned’…”

The young Inquisitor spoke as she looked at the old man before her.

“Is it really possible for something swallowed by Subspace to appear again in the Mortal Realm?”

“…So far, nothing except the Vanished has ever returned to the Mortal Realm after falling into Subspace. Even for the Vanished, only later sighting reports exist, and scholars in every field doubt whether that ship truly came back. That is indeed the truth. But that is not the key point…” As the old man spoke, his gaze suddenly fell on Vanna, and a strange kind of seriousness appeared on his face. “The key point is, Inquisitor, are you afraid of something?”

Chapter 48: Vigilance

Before the statue of the Storm Goddess Gamona, the candles of the divine blessing burned with a calm, steady light. Daylight fell from the dome above, spilling around the statue and making the city-state's Bishop, cloaked in pitch-black robes, seem as if he bathed in divine grace.

Bishop Valentine raised his head in that light and quietly fixed his divine gaze on Vanna's still-steady gray eyes. His words seemed to carry a kind of magic. Faintly, Vanna heard the sound of gentle waves rising and falling in her mind, and then the rolling crash of thunder followed. With the help of that outside force, the power of the Goddess finally tore through the veil and exploded in her heart.

Vanna suddenly sucked in a deep breath, as if she had broken free from suffocating depths and leapt back onto dry land. Her chest rose and fell sharply, and her heart pounded. The feeling of the God's divine gaze pressed down on her like a vast weight. In that half-dazed state, she heard Valentine's voice continue in her ears:

"The Vanished had records in history. The prophetic vision dream you experienced was also an objective fact. With both of these in place, your normal reaction should have been to first assume the threat exists, and then seek a solution. Yet just now, you subconsciously questioned whether the Vanished truly exists. That means you are, deep down, avoiding the message that the prophetic vision dream brought to you.

"Inquisitor, you are subconsciously denying the existence of the Vanished. That itself is proof that the ship is real. It seems it truly is drawing near the borders of the civilized world."

Vanna felt a thin layer of sweat form on her forehead. Yet that "veil" that had always hung between her and the Goddess now felt as if it had vanished. This actually eased her heart a little, and the Bishop's words made her realize what had happened:

Without knowing it, she had already been influenced by the Vanished.

This was exactly the trait many terrifying Visions or Anomalies possessed: they twisted the perception of those who came into contact with them, making people subconsciously ignore and deny them. In this way, the influence grew larger and larger without anyone noticing.

This kind of subconscious ignoring and denial was originally a natural defense of intelligent beings, an instinct to avoid danger. But when dealing with an Anomaly, that very instinct became the source of carelessness. In the end, it quietly turned people into victims of Visions and Anomalies.

As an Inquisitor who often dealt with supernatural powers, Vanna knew this kind of knowledge very well. But she had never thought that she herself would fall into such a "mental trap". Her own strong will had not worked at all?

"I don't know when I came under its influence," she said calmly. Standing before a Bishop who was also a devout Believer, Vanna did not hide the weakness that had just been exposed. Being affected by a Vision or Anomaly and slipping into a mental anomaly was the most normal thing in the world. Shame and concealment would not help. "After waking from the prophetic vision dream, I came straight here. I did not speak with anyone on the way, and I did not touch any scrolls or relics. I believe I did not suffer any outside corruption in that period."

“But you just now clearly showed a deliberate avoidance of the prophetic vision dream… so the influence must have started earlier,” the Bishop said. Valentine focused his divine gaze on Vanna’s face, as if he watched every change in her eyes and every shift in her breath. “Have you come into contact with anything abnormal lately? It may have been corruption from the Vanished, leaving an anchor in your subconscious ahead of time.”

“Lately…” Vanna frowned. Then she suddenly remembered the “sacrificial victim” who had fallen at the Black Sun ritual site in the sewers. She remembered the green fire flashing in the person’s eyes, and she remembered her own severed finger.

Her eyes widened. Vanna suddenly looked straight at the Bishop and asked: “The day before yesterday, I led the team to clear out that Black Sun ritual site in the sewers. After I came back, did I report any nameless corruption at the scene? Did I report that there was a ‘sacrificial victim’ there who had been corrupted?”

The Bishop shook his head: “No… you sent those cultists to the Cathedral and then went straight back.”

Vanna’s heart gave a jolt. “What about the others who joined the operation that day? Did anyone report anything like that?”

“There were no such reports at all. Every file only recorded matters related to the Black Sun heretics.”

Under the Goddess’s statue, the Bishop gazed at Vanna, and Vanna gazed back at the Bishop.

“It seems we have found the moment when the corruption first ‘came ashore’,” the Bishop said with a quiet sigh. His expression stayed calm, but in his eyes, strength brewed like a storm about to break. “In the holy name of our Lord Gamona, Inquisitor, are your memories from that night still clear and complete?”

Vanna took a deep breath: “In the holy name of our Lord Gamona, I still remember every detail from that night.”

The Bishop nodded. He turned and lit a special incense, then set the bronze censer at the base of the statue. As he did so, he spoke in a steady voice: “What happened at the time?”

So Vanna laid out everything that had happened in the ritual site beneath the sewers, just as she remembered it. She did not skip a single detail. With the help of the holy incense, her memory and her thoughts were clearer than ever. The events of that night returned to her as if they were happening again.

She still remembered the moment the sacrificial victim suddenly opened his eyes. She remembered the emerald flame that leapt in the hollows of his eye sockets. She remembered the fire falling onto her finger, and how she had decisively carried out the purification by cutting that finger off. On the way back to the Cathedral, she told herself in silence: the corruption has been completely purified, the corruption has been completely purified, the corruption has been completely purified…

She muttered those words to herself the whole way back. Every Guardian walking beside her muttered the same words as well.

No one thought anything about it was wrong.

Looking back now, she felt how terrible and eerie that scene really was. Under the bleak night sky, the Church’s squad of Guardians walked through silent, empty streets. Every single one of them murmured the same sentence to themselves over and over until they returned to the Cathedral.

And during all of this, they still believed they were acting normally: watching the captured heretics, cleaning the filthy ritual site, escorting the cultists on the way back…

"…The spirit-form flame fell upon the soul. The purification you carried out at the level of the flesh by cutting off a limb was useless. It only gave you a deceptive comfort," Valentine said at last. "The correct action would have been to burn incense at once, sprinkle holy oil on the ground to form a temporary holy ground, and then call upon the Goddess through a ritual prayer to carry out purification of the 'spirit'."

"…This was my fault," Vanna said heavily. "I should have been more alert and more quick to react."

"It was a mistake, but not a sin," the old man said with a shake of his head. "You are very powerful, but as an Inquisitor you still lack some experience. Luckily, you have now broken free of the influence. That means the corruption left on that sacrificial victim was not too strong. It only interfered with you on a mental level. From the incense ritual just now, I could roughly judge its strength."

Here he paused, as if he weighed and judged something in his mind. Then he went on: "The Guardians who acted with you should have been affected even less. They only stood around you. Their influence should fade quickly as they keep praying in the Cathedral.

"In general, the corruption you all suffered at the time was fierce and strange, but the source had already been cut off. So the later effects were not truly frightening. From your performance just now and from the incense's feedback, I would say that even if you had not come here today, you would have noticed something was wrong by yourself in a few days.

"More than this, we need to worry about what comes next."

“The future…” Vanna repeated the Bishop’s last word. Her expression slowly grew serious.

Yes, the future. This matter was not over.

The scenes shown by the prophetic vision dream were warnings sent down by the Goddess. What she had come in contact with so far was most likely only the prelude to a coming storm.

“The Vanished has not appeared within the sight of the civilized territories for many years,” Valentine said. “Many people believed it had already gone back to Subspace and become one of the countless shadows in the deepest parts of the world. But now, it seems that Captain Duncan still clings to the Mortal Realm.”

Bishop Valentine spoke slowly as he turned, gazing up at the statue of the Storm Goddess.

“A century ago, the Vanished fell into the depths of Subspace,” he said. “There was no clear proof, but many eyewitness reports mentioned a great storm roaming the nearby sea at the time. In some ways, that storm played a role in the ship’s fall…

“The storm is our Lord’s divine authority.”

Vanna frowned: “You think Captain Duncan means to… take revenge on the Goddess?”

“It is hard to say,” Valentine replied. “Even for a ghost returning from Subspace, the idea of taking revenge on a deity is almost unthinkable. Gods dwelled in the Divine Realm. The Divine Realm lay hidden above the Mortal Realm. Everything in the world only ever fell downward from the upper world. No one ever heard of anyone climbing in the opposite direction, from the Mortal Realm up to the higher ‘Divine Realm’…

“But if Captain Duncan wishes to take revenge on our Lord’s agents in the Mortal Realm… that is very possible.”

“The holy Storm Grand Cathedral, as the headquarters of the Deep Sea Church, is a Pilgrimage Ark that sails hidden on the Boundless Sea,” he went on. “It comes and goes without a trace. The Pope, His Eminence who sits aboard that ark, holds the power to wield the storm in the Lord’s stead. He is not an easy target.

“By comparison… the city-state of Pland, fixed upon the sea, obvious, and open to the world, naturally becomes a better choice. Aside from the Storm Grand Cathedral, Pland is the Storm Goddess’s greatest faith anchor in this world… and it is a faith anchor anyone can visit.

“From that point of view, it is only natural that a vengeful wraith would choose to land in Pland.”

Chapter 49: Two Looming Stormclouds

The gods dwelled in the Divine Realm, far from the world of the Mortal Realm. People believed that special dimension was the keystone of the world. Unlike common belief, this “keystone” did not sit at the bottom of everything, but at the very peak of all dimensions.

In the records left behind by the ancient kingdom of Critt, their scholars described the structure of the world they knew like this:

The world’s keystone lay at the very top, guarded by eternal truth and order. The Divine Realm rested within that keystone, existing by itself from the beginning.

Below the Divine Realm lay the Mortal Realm, where all living beings dwelled. The people of the dust enjoyed the afterglow of order at this level and could live in a world that was relatively stable and rich.

Below the Mortal Realm lay the Spirit Realm, which slowly slipped away from mortal understanding. In the Spirit Realm, the gods’ divine blessing had already thinned. Twisted, uncanny forces started to gain the upper hand.

Below the Spirit Realm lay the Abyssal Deep Sea. It was no longer fit for living things. Strange, weird powers ruled there, and it hardly counted as part of the material world at all. It was more like a hollow reflection of nothingness.

Beyond the Abyssal Deep Sea, lay the very bottom of the world: the depths of Subspace, where the shadows of all things gathered. The true bodies of extremely dangerous Elder Gods and many other wicked beings lurked within Subspace.

In the records of ancient Critt, the gods made a covenant within the keystone. That covenant was the source and standard of all laws in the world. Order flowed down from there. It set the rules by which the world operated and soaked into all things. As one went deeper and deeper, the power of order weakened and was gradually overcome by the forces of Subspace. The “keystone” where the gods resided and the depths of Subspace were like the upper and lower ends of the world. Order flowed one way between those two ends.

This was the ancient gift left to later ages by that brilliant civilization that had led the way in the era of the Deep Sea ten thousand years ago. Over the long ages since, countless Scholars studied this “layered structure” with all their strength and never found a fault in the model. By now, it had already become the world’s accepted “World Standard Model”.

In this standard model, mortals of the dust could fall into deeper places, but there were very few who could return from the deep layers to the “shallows”. Every once in a while, there might be one or two lucky souls who returned to the Mortal Realm from the Spirit Realm. But no one had ever heard of a being who defied the heavens and traveled from the Mortal Realm to the keystone dimension where the gods dwelled.

Because of this, the return of the Vanished from Subspace to the Mortal Realm became the most outrageous Vision in this world. Its return voyage broke everything people believed about the World Standard Model.

But on the other hand, the existence of the Vanished also fit that classic doctrine about Anomalies and Visions: the law of permanent misalignment for Anomalies and Visions.

No matter how one looked at it, Bishop Valentine and Vanna did not believe that ghost captain had the power to take revenge on the Storm Goddess herself. Even if he had the heart for it, he still could not do such a thing.

For the keystone and the world of the Mortal Realm were not continuous. Unlike the link between the Mortal Realm and the Spirit Realm, or between the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep Sea, there was no chain of steady falling or direct exchange of matter between the keystone and the Mortal Realm. So far, no Scholar had found any proof of a direct connection between the keystone and the Mortal Realm. Not even a deity could descend with its full self. At most, a deity could send down projections or commands as symbols of its will.

So how could a single ghost ship ever “strike back” at the Divine Realm?

If the ghost captain could not take revenge on the Storm Goddess herself, then of course the only choice left was the Goddess’s Believers in the world of dust.

The Storm Grand Cathedral, as the headquarters of the Deep Sea Church, was a Pilgrimage Ark that sailed hidden on the Boundless Sea. It appeared and vanished without a trace. The Pope, His Eminence who sat upon that ark, held the power to wield the storm in the Lord’s name, and he was not an easy target.

So the city-state of Pland, fixed upon the sea, obvious to all, and open to the outside, naturally became a better choice. In this city-state, eighty percent of the people were Believers of the Storm Goddess.

Vanna had already decided in her heart that the ghost captain had come for revenge. After all, a hundred years ago, the Vanished had fallen into Subspace in a storm. Aside from revenge, she could think of no other reason to explain why the Vanished, which had been missing for so many years, would suddenly return to the Mortal Realm and point its prow at the city-state of Pland.

But what exactly did that ghost captain plan to do?

Vanna frowned and, deep in thought, slowly spoke: “Bishop Valentine, do you think… the Vanished is connected to the recent unrest among the Suntists in the city-state?”

After speaking, she paused and then added: “In last night’s dream, I saw a burning Sun appear in Pland together with the Vanished. Two disasters arriving at the same time may be the prophetic vision the Goddess gave me…”

“But don’t forget, in the underground ritual site, that ‘sacrificial victim’ who had been corrupted killed the Black Sun priest,” the Bishop said with a shake of his head. “That priest was an ‘Envoy’ who had undergone baptism. At least at that ritual site, the Vanished and the Black Sun seemed to stand on opposite sides.”

For a moment, Vanna said nothing, only sank into thought at the Bishop’s words. Across from her, after a brief silence, the old man spoke again: “As for those cultists who worship the Black Sun, I did receive some reports about them this morning from the city-state of Lunsa…”

Vanna immediately looked up: “Reports?”

“The Sun heretics are not only rising again in Pland,” Valentine said with a nod. “They have been stirring in many city-states lately. A large number of Sun heretics have recently passed through Lunsa and Morka Harbor as transfer points and are gathering toward Pland. Some of them were caught. During interrogation, those heretics mentioned ‘Sun fragments’.”

“Sun fragments… the remains that flaked off after that so-called ‘true Sun god’ in their mouths broke apart?” Vanna reacted at once. “They believe one of these Sun fragments is hidden in Pland?”

“That is how it seems for now,” Bishop Valentine said. “No one knows where those heretics got their information. It might have been some ‘revelation’ they received in their crazed state. In any case, they are now convinced that part of their ‘lord’s’ remains lies hidden in this city.” His expression stayed calm. “They see this as the hope for the Black Sun’s revival.”

“…That group of madmen,” Vanna muttered a curse under her breath. “To revive that dark, blasphemous Sun, how many lives have they already taken?”

“‘Black Sun’ is what we call it. In their minds, the Sun god shines with brilliant light and represents the truest order,” Valentine said, shaking his head. “You cannot expect that pack of deranged cultists to keep any conscience when their hands drip with blood. They are sure that everything they say and do is righteous. When dealing with them, only two languages are useful. One is caliber. The other is poundage.”

Hearing this remark, which carried a very Deep Sea Church style, Vanna could not help but twitch the corner of her mouth: “Sounds like we are going to be busy.”

“The Boundless Sea was never peaceful, and the city-states sit in the Boundless Sea as well,” Valentine said. “Captains must face the storms of the ocean. We must face the storms brought by fools on land. Inquisitor, be ready. The city-state of Pland may be facing a challenge.”

“Two challenges,” Vanna corrected him very seriously. “Aside from the Black Suntists, there is also that strange and terrifying ghost captain. If the Vanished and the Black Sun really are not on the same side, then our troubles have gone from one to two."

Bishop Valentine paused in thought: "There is another possibility. Going by what happened at the sewer ritual site, the Vanished might end up fighting the Black Suntists."

"…Then two troubles would merge into one world-ending trouble, Bishop Valentine," Vanna said as she looked at the old man, whose thoughts were clearly starting to drift. "A ghost ship returning from Subspace and a group of cultists fighting over Sun fragments, all clashing inside the city-state of Pland, and possibly joined by a Black Sun descent in the middle of it… I can't imagine anything worse than that."

Valentine sighed and admitted that Vanna was right.

"In any case, we should first work with the Constable forces and round up all the Sun heretics who have slipped into the city-state," Vanna said. Now that she had thrown off the mental interference of the Vanished and moved into her area of expertise, her thoughts grew noticeably sharper. "We should remove the threat of the Black Sun before the situation grows serious. That is a goal we can realistically achieve.

"As for that ghost ship… we have no idea what it plans to do next, so there is nothing we can do for now. All we can do is strengthen our monitoring of the Spirit Realm and the seas around the city-state…"

Here, the young Inquisitor could not help but shake her head. Her expression was serious yet helpless: "Damn it, who could ever guess what a ghost captain plans to do next…"

…

"I want to add a bit more ketchup…" Duncan waved to Nina across the table and said: "Pass it over, I can do it myself."

Nina quickly handed the ketchup bottle over: “Okay, Uncle Duncan.”

It was already noon. Duncan and Nina sat in the small kitchen on the second floor, eating lunch. The food in the antique shop was very simple—a kind of salty fried pancake that was a local specialty of Pland, served with ketchup or hot sauce, plus a thick vegetable soup. It was hardly some fine feast, but both Duncan and Nina ate with real enjoyment.

Duncan had not eaten such a normal lunch in a very long time. Nina also had not eaten such a normal lunch in a very long time.

Duncan felt that he had begun to like this place.

Chapter 50: Public Visions

After lunch, Duncan watched Nina clear the table. He had wanted to help wash the dishes, but she firmly stopped him with the excuse: “Uncle, your health isn’t good. The doctor said you should stay away from cold water.” So he had no choice but to lean near the stairs, reading the morning paper while watching the girl bustle around in the kitchen.

This everyday scene, like something from an ordinary family’s home, made him feel a little strange inside.

Just then, Nina’s voice came from the kitchen: “Uncle Duncan, is there any news in the paper?”

Duncan lowered his head and glanced at the newspaper. First he saw the date: “New City-State Calendar, August 14, 1900.” Then his eyes fell on a story about a Church Inquisitor leading a team to arrest dozens of cultists. It was clearly the biggest front-page headline in the whole paper.

“It says here an Inquisitor led a team and caught dozens of Sun heretics,” he said casually. “It also says this is the largest heretic gathering the Church has broken up in the past four years. After that there are some reminders, telling citizens to stay safe at night and to watch for heretical beliefs around them.”

“Ah, I heard about that on my way here too!” Nina quickly put the clean dishes into the cupboard. “So scary. My teacher told us before that those cultists who worship the Sun even offer living people as sacrifices to the Sun god… Who would be so utterly insane as to believe in a cult like that?”

Duncan suddenly did not know what to say. Whatever he said, it felt too awkward. Should he mention that he had recently had an immersive experience with the full sacrificial-rite package on that altar? Or should he say, Your Uncle is exactly that kind of raving mad cultist?

But one thing was obvious. From Nina's reaction, she clearly did not know that her "Uncle" was a Sun heretic. She even had normal values like an ordinary person. She thought those live sacrifices in the Sun faith were something terrifying.

In her eyes, her "Uncle" was only a man who had become irritable because of illness, drank too much, and had a few "strange friends".

The body Duncan now occupied might indeed have belonged to a man with blood on his hands, but at least that man had raised Nina to this day. Until now, he had kept the girl outside the faith of the Sun god.

Maybe one day in the future, a cultist named "Ron" really would fall all the way, and drag his last living relative into that bottomless abyss. But at least before today, none of that had happened.

And it would not happen in the future either.

"Uncle? Why did you suddenly stop talking?" Nina turned curiously at the silence behind her, a look of concern in her eyes. "Are you feeling unwell again?"

"No, I just drifted off a little," Duncan came back to himself and shook his head. "You're right. That really is something only madmen would do… The paper also tells citizens to stay safe and report any heretical behavior in time. So for now, try not to wander anywhere except school and home."

Nina nodded, then suddenly let out a small "ah", looking a bit nervous and hesitant. "But… but I already made plans with a classmate. In a couple of days we're going to visit the City Museum…"

“The City Museum?” Duncan asked offhandedly. “Which City Museum?”

“The one near the school, by the edge of the Upper City, the ocean City Museum,” Nina explained. “I heard they’re showing near-shore mineral specimens… Is it alright if I go?”

“If you want to go, then go,” Duncan thought for a moment, then nodded. “Right now the streets are full of Church guardians and city-state constable patrols. Those cultists probably won’t be bold enough to jump out in the next few days.”

Nina nodded happily. “Mm!”

“Do you still have to go to school this afternoon?” Duncan asked again.

“Mm. This afternoon is history class. I really don’t want to miss old Mr. Morris’s class,” Nina said, nodding. “He’s a very famous expert in the field of history… But it’s strange. Someone as famous as old Mr. Morris, why doesn’t he teach in an Upper City university? Why did he come to a public school in the Lower City instead? More than half of the classmates don’t even like history. They all sleep during his class…”

Duncan calmly shook his head. “How would I know?”

What a joke. Never mind that history teacher, old Mr. Morris. Duncan had only just met Nina herself. He would have to rummage through hours of memory just to remember where Nina’s public school was.

And even the original master of this body probably had not known much more about his niece’s situation. When Duncan took over his life, that man had already sunk too deep and for too long into the Sun heresy.

Nina still had class in the afternoon, so she did not stay long in the antique shop after lunch. She quickly tidied up, grabbed the textbook she had left at home, and then the girl jogged out of the house. From the antique shop to that public school in the Lower City, the trip took nearly an hour. If she did not waste even a minute, she might just avoid being late for old Mr. Morris’s class.

Of course, the city had public transport. Even in the relatively backward Lower City, steam-engine trams and trackless buses rumbled through the streets. But those needed tickets costing four to six peso.

Nina had smiled and told Duncan that running more was good for one’s health.

If she had a bicycle, her way to school would become much easier. Duncan had seen people riding such vehicles on the streets of the Lower City.

In a society that had already developed steam machinery, bicycles were not so expensive that ordinary people could never afford them. But for residents of the Lower City, they were still far from cheap. Even the most ordinary bicycle could cost a family of three half a month to a month of living expenses. It was a real burden.

Duncan did not know where the identity he now held would go in the future. But as he watched Nina jog away and disappear around the corner of the street, he still felt that, if he had the ability, he really should treat this young lady better.

If only for the vegetable soup and salty pancakes she had made before.

All the more so because she was a hardworking, eager student.

Maybe he should seriously think about ways to make money in these “Civilized City-States”.

With all kinds of thoughts turning in his mind, he put down the newspaper, slowly walked to the end of the second-floor corridor, opened the narrow window there, and stared blankly for a moment at the city street bathed in sunlight.

In this world, “Anomalies” and “Visions” had long gone hand in hand with the progress of civilization. Neither the authority nor the Church hid matters of the extraordinary from the public. Even a young lady like Nina, still in school, could learn about Anomalies and Visions directly from her textbooks.

She even knew the classification standards for Anomalies and Visions that the ancient kingdom of Critt had left behind, standards that were still in use. She also knew the public numbers and names of some Anomalies and Visions whose rules had already been partly understood.

Yes, this part of the knowledge was openly shared with the whole society, though not all of it.

The authority and the Church of every city-state recognized a common list. On that list, the most famous or most dangerous Anomalies and Visions each had their own special number. These numbers were not eternal. In special cases, some Anomalies and Visions might be destroyed or transformed for various reasons, and their numbers might be reassigned or left empty. But no matter how that changed, one thing was always certain:

Any Anomaly or Vision that had its own independent number and name was sure to have some special danger or power.

The authority had made part of the register of Anomalies and Visions public. On one hand, this was to make sure every citizen could know about these particular dangers and have basic self-protection. On the other hand, it was because some Anomalies and Visions were simply too close to everyone’s daily life.

These things had already seeped into every corner of ordinary life and into every part of society’s operations. People could see them at any time. There was no way to hide them, and no need to hide them.

Duncan lifted his head and silently turned his gaze to the sky.

Vision 001, the Sun.

The huge glowing orb that ran across the sky, the great Vision that had ruled the heavens in the Deep Sea Era, had been born on the morning of the second day after the ancient kingdom of Critt collapsed.

Range of influence: the whole world. Scope of influence: limitless. It moved and operated on its own, and no human power could interfere with it. It fit the definition of a Vision.

History records said that on the day the ancient kingdom collapsed, the sea raged and the city-states shattered. The entire first royal dynasty went bravely to their deaths in the darkness, their blood soaking the sea. Then Vision 001 rose from the ocean. From that moment on, the Boundless Sea finally had peaceful daylight.

The ancient kingdom of Critt was the first city-state civilization built by survivors after the Deep Sea Era began. It lasted only one short century, yet left countless legacies that still blessed the world today.

The word “Critt” in the ancient tongue meant “Eternal Night”.

That had been a veil of night lasting a full century.

All of this was written in Nina’s history textbook.

Chapter 51: Dual Operation

This world had gone through astonishing upheavals. With the “Great Annihilation” as a turning point, even the basic laws of the world had been turned upside down. The Deep Sea Era after the Great Annihilation and the Age of Order before it could almost be seen as two completely different “worlds”.

But even so, some people still worked tirelessly, sorting through all the historical materials passed down since the Great Annihilation. They tried to piece together the true shape of history from the broken and even contradictory archives of the various city-states.

Unfortunately, maybe because the break in transmission had been too complete, or because the contradictions between the city-states’ records were too chaotic, people still had not found any relatively complete and trustworthy history from before the Great Annihilation.

No one knew what the world of the Age of Order had really looked like.

But fortunately, the world after the ancient kingdom of Critt had left behind a relatively clear historical line. City-states on the Boundless Sea had risen and fallen, split and merged again and again, but the continuation of civilization itself had never been cut off. The memory of that ancient kingdom had remained, whether written in books, carved into stone, or passed down generation after generation in old, hidden families and societies. Much had been lost, but a rough thread still remained.

Scholars believed that the reason civilization in the Deep Sea Era could survive under such harsh conditions and endure to this day owed more than half of its credit to the sacred miracle that shone upon the world:

Vision 001, the Sun.

This was the Vision with the widest influence and greatest power that humans currently knew of. In fact, because its scale was so vast, and its existence felt so “natural”, many scholars argued about whether the Sun itself was really a Vision or a natural phenomenon. But the very first recorders after the fall of Critt, the survivors of that ancient kingdom, had simply called it Vision 001. That old number had been handed down ever since and had never changed.

Clearly, not all Visions were terrifying and harmful. Vision 001 brought safety to the world for half of every day. In the daytime under the Sun’s light, the corruption from the world’s deep layers was almost completely held below the surface of the sea. Only because of this stable daylight had the city-state civilizations been able to develop to what they were today.

According to records left by the ancient kingdom of Critt, after the Deep Sea Era began and before Vision 001 appeared, for a full century the entire world had been shrouded in the veil of night. The cold, dim glow of the World’s Wound had shone on the Boundless Sea for one hundred years.

So the people of the ancient kingdom had called their land “Eternal Night”, and even used it as the name of their era.

Duncan stood at the narrow window, deep in thought as he looked at the world under the sunlight.

What had the world before the Great Annihilation really been like?

Before those terrible hundred years of Eternal Night arrived, had this world once been lit by the Sun’s light?

It most likely had. No matter how incomplete or contradictory the ancient records of the various city-states were, they all agreed on one point: the Age of Order had been an era of light, safety, and prosperity.

But no matter what, that bright and prosperous era was gone. The Boundless Sea of today was lit by Vision 001. Everyone knew this and felt grateful for the daylight it brought.

In such an age, those cultists who worshipped the “true Sun” of ancient times, and even used that to attack the Sun now hanging in the sky, calling it the “false Sun”, naturally seemed especially twisted and extreme, and were rejected by the world.

They were not only attacking the Sun in the sky. They were attacking the very thing human civilization in the Deep Sea Era relied on to struggle and survive to this day.

Yet Duncan knew that the Sun those cultists worshipped very likely was the true form of the Sun that had existed before the Great Annihilation.

In a way, those cultists had grasped a part of real history. Sadly, in this age, that truth had become the very root of their madness.

Duncan did not believe their grand wish could succeed. He did not believe they could really use live sacrificial rites to create a blazing, fusing star. The distortions of this world went far beyond imagination. The state of the Deep Sea Era could never be explained simply by “the star was gone”.

The night sky here did not hold a single star.

Duncan went back to his room and closed the door. He waved at the cabinet beside him, calling AI down from where the bird had been grinding its beak on the cabinet top.

The pigeon landed on his shoulder and tilted its head. “Who is calling the fleet?”

Duncan ignored the bird. He walked to the bed and, from the corner of the mattress, took out the Sun emblem he had hidden earlier. Then he thought for a moment, went back to the cabinet, opened the door, and found the drawer where the liquor was stored. He took out two bottles of strong liquor.

Something seemed to be stuck to the bottles. Curious, Duncan turned one in his hand and saw a small slip of paper. On it, in Nina's handwriting, were the words: "Drink less."

The note seemed to have been stuck there a long time.

Every bottle had such a note, and not a single one had ever worked.

Duncan chuckled, closed the drawer and the cabinet, then took the two bottles and the Sun emblem back to the bed. He poked AI again so the bird could see what he was holding.

"If you can, try to bring these onto the Vanished."

The pigeon flapped its wings at once and let out a proud cry. "Dear, express delivery, postage paid!"

Duncan nodded and lay down in a comfortable position, starting to prepare for the crossing.

He had been away from the Vanished for too long. The ship would be fine without him watching it, but as captain, he could not keep himself locked in this room forever.

Nina had classes this afternoon, and after class she had a few other things to do. She would be busy until very late. Duncan had already talked with her and asked her to stay one more night in the school dormitory, and come back tomorrow afternoon after school.

During this time, Duncan would just take the chance to study the details of Spirit Realm travel. At the same time, he would test the plan he had thought of before: to see whether he could control both bodies at once without completely cutting off the Soul Projection.

From how he sensed the Vanished while he was “on this side”, this should be possible.

Now that he occupied this “fresh” body, the link between him and the true body on the Vanished was clearly much stronger and more stable. That gave him confidence and inspiration.

After his thoughts slowly settled, Duncan let out a soft breath. A tiny, ghostly emerald flame burned to life on his shoulder. With a sharp crackling sound, the pigeon AI turned into its Undead-bird form in the blink of an eye, and the brass spirit compass in its chest snapped open.

Boundless darkness, glowing lines, flickering starlight. The familiar feeling surged over him like a tide, and the route back to the Vanished appeared as the brightest route in that darkness.

Duncan’s consciousness rushed along that route, and in the blink of an eye he felt his main awareness awaken in the captain’s cabin of the Vanished.

But before he completely left that dark space, he forced himself to “brake” by relying on his control over the fire of his spirit form and his own soul, trying to keep his link with that “antique shop” room…

On the Vanished, in the captain’s cabin, Duncan slowly opened his eyes.

He looked down at his hands, then around him. What he saw were familiar furnishings. In his ears came the familiar sound of waves.

He slowly rose from the chair. In the depths of his awareness, though, the sensations of another body were clearly coming through.

A faint smile slowly appeared on Duncan’s face. Then, following his own understanding, he began to use that distant link to feel and control his other body in the antique shop.

He tried several times.

In the city-state of Pland, on the second floor of Duncan’s antique shop, the “antique shopkeeper” lying quietly on the bed suddenly opened his eyes.

The next second, that body on the bed began to turn its head bit by bit with a stiff expression, looking left and right around the room like a zombie. Then it slowly moved its hands and feet, as if someone were forcing a rusty machine to move, and finally managed to get its limbs working.

If an outsider had seen this scene, they would probably have been scared into running straight to the nearest constable to report that someone here was possessed by a Malevolent Spirit.

From another point of view, that report would not have been wrong.

In the captain’s cabin of the Vanished, Duncan let these strange thoughts spin in his mind while he awkwardly used a kind of “remote view” to control that body and slowly make it move.

It was very hard. To command a body with only a distant link while his consciousness was not inside it was harder than asking a beginner to control a twenty-eight-jointed Puppet on strings.

But after many attempts, he finally managed to make the body in the city-state of Pland sit up on the bed.

The next second, the picture coming from that distant body in his mind spun wildly.

The body had fallen face-first onto the floor.

Duncan sighed. “Alright, looks like I’ll have to practice for quite a while.”

Chapter 52: The Captain Was Not Home

A single will watched through two viewpoints at the same time, controlling two bodies doing completely different things. For Duncan, this was a very new experience.

It was also an extremely hard challenge.

He felt he no longer counted as an ordinary person, but even so, it was not easy to control two bodies at once without strain. He tried hard to get used to this feeling of splitting his attention. After fussing with it for a long time, he only managed to barely control the body in the antique shop, make it crawl back onto the bed, and lie there like a corpse again.

But judging from the feedback coming from deep inside his consciousness, he believed that sooner or later he could master this skill of using one mind for two bodies. It would just need a very long time to get used to it and to train.

After he settled the body in the antique shop and left a bit of attention there, Duncan finally let out a quiet breath.

Right after finishing his walk in the Spirit Realm, the most important thing was to make sure his link to the “remote body” was still there. This was directly tied to whether the foothold he had finally found in the civilized world could be used for a long time. Once this matter was settled, his mood became much lighter, and he had the energy to focus on other things.

The sound of flapping wings came from beside him. The pigeon AI ran over to Duncan in a few quick steps. The bird puffed out its chest, its eyes and tone full of pride: “teleportation succeeded!”

Duncan’s gaze went past the pigeon and fell on the tabletop behind it.

A pale gold emblem of the Sun and two bottles of strong liquor were lying there quietly.

A smile slowly appeared on Duncan’s face, and then the smile grew brighter and brighter.

It worked! Having this pigeon carry “cargo” while walking the Spirit Realm was workable! And it was not limited to extraordinary items. Even ordinary things could be teleported over!

With a satisfied smile, he stood up and picked up the things on the table. First he checked the emblem of the Sun, making sure there was still a faint power flowing inside this extraordinary item. That power was the might he had taken over and reshaped with the fire of his spirit form. Then he picked up one of the bottles of liquor, took off the cap, and held it under his nose. A strong smell of alcohol rushed out at once.

Duncan lowered his head and glanced at AI, who had already started strutting proudly back and forth on the tabletop.

Efficient, good quality, and free delivery—he was starting to like this mumbling, odd pigeon.

The pigeon also noticed its master’s gaze at once. It rushed to Duncan’s side, tapped the tabletop with its beak, and loudly chattered: “Some fries! Some fries!”

“There are no fries on the ship for now, but I think that won’t be a problem for long,” Duncan said happily, grabbing the pigeon and cupping it in his hands. He stared into its little pea eyes. “I just don’t know how much you can teleport each time, whether you're limited to dead objects, and whether there will be any 'packet loss'… We have to run a few more tests…"

The pigeon thought for a moment, then tilted its neck up: "Packet loss? Ah, the page disappeared…"

"…Yes, that's exactly what I'm worried about. Your name always makes you feel a bit unreliable." Duncan's thoughts drifted for a moment. The fact that the pigeon had successfully teleported more things onto the Vanished greatly excited him. It made him think of more practical experiments, not just sending supplies to the ship. But this bird's floating intelligence and loose logic always stopped him from fully relaxing. After thinking it over, he still felt they needed to do more tests before truly setting up a "supply line" between the Vanished and the shore.

With a rough plan for his next step in mind, Duncan finally rose from the chair. He walked toward the door that led to the enchanted sea chart room, but he stopped after only two steps.

He stood there and rolled his joints, then stretched his legs and arms, feeling the sensations coming from his limbs.

Flexible, strong, with no trace of fatigue or stiffness at all. It was as if he had only been sitting at the desk for a short while.

Yet he knew very well that he had "left" the Vanished for more than a day. While he was walking the Spirit Realm, his body had remained in the captain's cabin, keeping the posture of sitting at the desk the whole time.

Duncan carefully felt his bones and limbs. With his precise sense of his own body, he could almost be sure that this body had completely kept the state it was in at the moment of entering the Spirit Realm. It was as if… the instant his consciousness left, this body entered some kind of "stasis."

Was this also one of “Captain Duncan’s” special powers? Or… because his true nature now was half a ghost, he was like a ghost and never grew tired?

He wondered about it curiously, but had no clue at all.

He had already started learning the history of this world and the rise and fall of the Civilized City-States, but he still could not solve the mystery of his own body.

Still, no matter what, this did not seem like a bad thing. This body did not need much “maintenance.” That meant he could feel safer about putting part of his attention into other things.

Duncan was good at taking things lightly. Or rather, he was good at putting puzzles that had no answer yet off to one side. Once he talked himself through it, he walked to the door and pushed open the way into the enchanted sea chart room.

Captain Duncan had returned.

The oak door let out a soft creak, breaking the silence in the enchanted sea chart room. The next second, the wooden carving of Goathead at the edge of the chart table suddenly started clacking. The block of wood quickly turned its head toward the sound. Under its hollow gaze, it slowly spoke: “Name?”

“Duncan Abnomar,” Duncan said, glancing at Goathead. “I’m back.”

“Ah! The great Captain Duncan has returned to his loyal Vanished! My apologies, Captain. Your walk in the Spirit Realm was rather long this time. I need to make an extra check… After all, that is the rule you set. How do you feel? How is your mood? How is your body? What did you gain from this long walk in the Spirit Realm? Did you find something interesting? Would you be willing to share this journey with your loyal First Mate and the rest, details omitted? Did you notice I just said ‘details omitted’? Miss Alice said that makes speech more concise. You might like this kind of concise—”

“Shut up. All the words you saved got paid back in the nonsense after that,” Duncan said, giving this noisy thing a look. “While I was gone, did anything happen on the ship?”

“Ah, Captain Duncan’s strictness and humor are as always. Your lesson is correct—everything on the ship was normal. Your loyal ‘details omitted’ perfectly carried out the steering duty you gave me. Also, Miss Alice came by twice, but nothing serious. Once she was fighting with the cables, once she was fighting with the anchor chain…”

Duncan had been about to walk through the enchanted sea chart room to go check the deck, but he stopped at once when he heard Goathead’s words. He stared, full of question marks: “Why was she fighting with the cables and the anchor chain?”

While he was walking the Spirit Realm, he could sense what happened on the Vanished, but he had not spared much attention to watch closely. He had only vaguely felt Alice wandering all over the ship to “explore”… How had she managed to turn the ship into such a lively place while he was away?

“Oh, Miss Alice was actually trying to be helpful,” Goathead answered at once. “She thought it was bad to do nothing on the ship, so she wanted to find some work. She went to sort the cables and maintain the winches—but I forgot to tell her the cables are ticklish and the anchor chain needs a nap…”

Duncan: “…”

“Captain, are you angry?” Duncan’s sudden silence made Goathead nervous at once. It shook its wooden head back and forth. “It really wasn’t anything big. Besides, a new crew member on a ship always needs time to fit in before they get along with the old sailors—now they've already reached the 'hitting' stage. That means Miss Alice is blending into the group very fast. In fact, she is quite popular on the ship. Most of the Vanished's—"

Goathead had only gotten halfway through its chatter when hurried footsteps suddenly rang out from the deck outside. The door to the captain's cabin was yanked open. Alice rushed in, flustered: "Mr. Goathead, why are the cannonballs in the magazine rolling around and not letting me—"

Duncan silently looked at Alice.

Alice also saw Duncan standing by the chart table. Her whole body went stiff as she stared at him awkwardly.

"Well, this makes the third time," Goathead on the chart table let out a sigh. "Now she's fighting with the cannonballs… I admit Miss Alice's 'fitting in' process on the ship may be just a tiny bit too lively…"

Alice shrank her neck (maybe tightening her joints), nervously watching Duncan's blank face: "Captain, you're back, huh…"

"Mm." Duncan nodded, calm and mild. "Looks like you had a very good time on the ship while I was away?"

Alice: "…"

Chapter 53: “Spawn”

While he had “left” the Vanished, Alice’s activity on the ship had gone a bit beyond Duncan’s expectations.

He had always thought this Brother doll had the air of a graceful and proper young lady—even though she could spin her head, surf around, and talk trash. Under normal circumstances, she really was elegant and quiet. She was careful about whatever she did on the ship. In a strange place she was honest and well-behaved. When she had nothing to do, she would even lie quietly in her crate like an ordinary doll, giving off a harmless-to-people-and-animals sort of vibe.

But now, it seemed she was only that quiet when he was nearby.

The way the mood in the room suddenly sank made Alice a little nervous. She carefully glanced at Duncan’s expressionless face: “Captain, you’re not mad, right? I can explain…”

“I know. You were trying to help, you just didn’t succeed,” Duncan looked at the doll Miss and sounded a bit helpless. “But since you know a lot of things on this ship are ‘alive,’ next time you want to do something, could you check with me or my First Mate first?”

Alice nodded again and again at once and answered loudly: “Yes, Captain! No problem, Captain!”

Then she quickly turned her head toward Goathead and muttered under her breath: “Is ‘failed helping’ even a thing people say?”

Goathead, for once, was brief: “Now it is.”

“All right. If you really want to help, go check the dried fish hanging on the deck, or go to the kitchen and tidy the pantry where we keep food. Clear out some space. We might get a chance to restock food on the Vanished in the future,” Duncan said with a sigh, looking at Alice. “Don’t mess with the cannons under the deck or the magazine. They aren’t like Goathead. They don’t have a full mind. Those dangerous things only react to outside stimuli on instinct. If the magazine thinks it’s being damaged or invaded, then I’ll only be able to rescue you with a broom and a dustpan.”

As soon as Alice heard that, she shrank her neck again, agreed in a rush, and turned to leave the captain’s cabin.

But watching the doll’s retreating figure, Duncan still could not help showing a small smile.

She was indeed an interesting one. A little bit of chaos was nothing. In fact, this dead-still ghost ship really had become livelier because of all her fussing up and down.

“Looks like you’re in a very good mood, Captain,” Goathead’s voice came from the side. “Ah, you’re holding something… What is that? Is it what you gained from this walk in the Spirit Realm? Like that little knife last time?”

Duncan glanced at the emblem of the Sun in his hand. He had left the liquor back in the cabin and kept the emblem with him to study later when he was bored.

“It’s a trophy,” he nodded. “Same as that ritual knife from last time.”

“Oh! As expected of the great Captain Duncan! You always come back loaded with spoils, and they are always extraordinary items that clearly hold strange power at a glance… Wait, is that a Sun charm amulet?”

“You recognize this?” Duncan raised his brows. “Yes, a Sun charm amulet. A few bold cultists shoved it into my hands—hard to refuse such enthusiasm.”

“I… do know a little…” Goathead seemed to be studying the emblem carefully, and its voice sounded slightly hesitant. “Those madmen who follow the ancient, true Sun treat such things as a sacred relic. They believe that if they cast metal into the shape of the true Sun and quench it in human blood, they can pour the Sun’s power into the sigil. With this method, they can mass-produce extraordinary items with weak power… This kind of charm amulet is a badge for Suntists who hold a certain rank. It is also what they use to confirm kin and tell Believers from Heretics…”

“Telling Believers from Heretics… it does have that function,” Duncan said with understanding. “Though personally, I don’t think that function is very useful.”

“What happened to those bold cultists afterward?” Goathead seemed to hesitate while asking this. “Most of them are stubborn, ignorant fanatics. Even the lowest pirates don’t want to deal with people who chase after ancient things like that. If they dared to offend…”

“They’re no longer in this world,” Duncan said, watching Goathead’s tone while controlling his own expression. “Seems you don’t like these people who call themselves ‘Believers of the Sun’ either?”

After dealing with Goathead for so long, Duncan had almost figured out the rules for this strange “First Mate.” He was basically sure that as long as he, “Captain Duncan,” properly held command of the ship, Goathead would not have any runaway state or strange outbursts. On that basis, Duncan’s courage in talking with it had slowly grown.

Now, he could carefully and actively ask it for some information.

“Who would like those madmen who chase the ancient, true Sun? The ‘light’ and ‘order’ they long for are no longer welcome in this world,” Goathead answered Duncan’s question as usual. “Even the Vanished bathes in the sunlight of this era. Even the Evil Spirits wandering in the Abyssal Deep of the Deep Sea would not like the ‘Sun’ from before the age of the Deep Sea—probably only that group of cultists thinks the true Sun’s revival would be a good thing…”

Goathead paused there for a moment, then added with a sigh: “But then again, ninety-nine out of a hundred of those cultists are just brainwashed idiots. They never knew what they were really following and worshiping. They treat the so-called ‘Sun Spawn’ as prophets and saviors. They long for the ancient world those Spawn describe as if it were heaven. But in my eyes, the Sun Spawn never saw those zealous cultists as their people at all… They’re no different from the Spawn in the Deep Sea.”

Sun Spawn? What did that mean? And from the sound of it, there were also Deep Sea Spawn? What were those supposed to be?!

Duncan’s heart stirred. A brand-new, strange term had jumped right into his face and brought fresh confusion. He casually toyed with the Sun emblem in his hand, acting like he was just asking offhand: “Sun Spawn? I haven’t run into them.”

“That’s normal. The Sun Spawn don’t dare appear in the civilized world just anywhere. Even if they disguise themselves as humans, the hounds of the Holy See can sniff the stink of Heresy from their shadows in minutes. In the end, they are still a kind of ‘Spawn.’ As remains of ancient things, they ought to stay obediently in history’s gutter… Sigh, among every kind of ‘Spawn,’ only they can stir up this much trouble.”

Duncan suddenly found that Goathead’s habit of rambling from time to time was actually very useful. Even if nine thousand out of ten thousand words it said in a day were nonsense, as long as his luck was good, it could still spit out valuable information!

Since he still had not fully grasped Goathead's bottom line, Duncan could only make indirect, roundabout questions and did not dare ask too bluntly. Even so, with these indirect questions he quickly gathered many clues he had not been able to get back in the city-state of Pland—

Spawn. This seemed to be very important information. There existed some beings in this world called "Spawn," and without exception, they were not welcome in the civilized world. Goathead called them "remains of ancient things."

Those cultists who worshiped the "true Sun god" were great in number, but it seemed that most of them were just small fry—ignorant, blind, brainwashed fanatics. In their Church structure, there was a ruling class above them… those were the ones called "Sun Spawn."

The Sun Spawn did not often show their faces in the civilized world. They seemed to have hidden places unknown to the world. From there, they influenced the Sun's cults on land by remote means, secretly gathering sacrificial victims and energy.

Lastly, and this was what mattered most for Duncan right now:

Goathead held deep contempt for those cultists and for the "Sun Spawn" standing behind them.

This meant that the Vanished—or in other words, the "real Captain Duncan"—was not on the same side as these beings called "Spawn"… they should even be considered hostile to each other.

It seemed telling Goathead about his dealings with the Suntists during this walk in the Spirit Realm had been the right decision—otherwise, he had no idea when he would have learned all this useful information.

Knowledge this secret would never be written in Nina’s textbooks.

Duncan left the captain’s cabin. Holding the Sun charm amulet, he walked along the deck of the Vanished, lost in thought.

There were many kinds of Spawn. From the information Goathead had let slip—Spawn were all remains of ancient things. Together with the fact that the Suntists followed the “ancient, true Sun” from before the Great Annihilation, he had good reason to suspect that these so-called Spawn were very likely products of the Great Annihilation. Their birth might even trace back to the “Age of Order” before the Great Annihilation took place.

On the surface of the sea, there were “Sun Spawn.” In the Deep Sea, there were also “Deep Sea Spawn.”

Without noticing, Duncan walked to the rail. He leaned out and looked down at the deep, blue sea outside, feeling a bit curious.

So… the ocean was not just full of fish after all.

Chapter 54: underground sanctum

In the end, Duncan still did not understand what exactly the “Spawn” were.

Mr. Goathead was vague on this point. It even seemed that he himself did not know the true nature of those ancient things that wandered along the edges of the civilized world. As for Duncan, he could only form a rough idea from the limited clues he had—

The Spawn were products of ancient ages and held hatred toward the modern world. They had strange and dangerous powers yet hid quietly in the dark. Except for the Sun Spawn, the other Spawn almost never appeared in the civilized world. Instead, they lurked on the fringes and threatened the safety of every Explorer.

Among all this information, there was one more detail that was especially concerning:

The Sun Spawn seemed able to disguise themselves as humans—only the supernatural of the Church could tell these disguised Sun Spawn apart from ordinary people.

Duncan thought of the recent changes in the city-state of Pland, and of those believers of the Sun who had kept a low profile for years and then suddenly became loud and active again.

Were the cultists’ high-profile activities… carried out under orders from the Spawn? What were those ancient and bizarre beings plotting in the city-state of Pland?

Duncan stood at the edge of the Vanished's deck and for a long time let his gaze rest on the rolling, restless sea below.

There were Spawn in the Deep Sea as well, ancient beings different from the Sun Spawn. "They" threatened the safety of every long-distance fleet sailing between the city-states.

Duncan felt both wary and curious about these things that lived in the Deep Sea.

He believed that even though he had never dealt with them before, as long as the Vanished kept roaming the sea, sooner or later he would run into those strange beings. It would do no harm to make more preparations before that day came.

Whether it was gathering information, learning to better control his own power, or uncovering more of the Vanished's potential, all of it was planning for the future.

Of course, he was not exactly afraid of the hidden dangers in the Deep Sea. After all, he had drifted across the ocean with this ship for so long that he could roughly guess how many strange things lurked there. The Spawns were only one of countless eerie threats. As the saying went, when you had too many lice you stopped itching, and when you owed too many debts you stopped worrying. As the captain of the Vanished, there were already plenty of things out here he had to be wary of.

He pondered on the deck for a long time and realized that what he most needed to worry about right now was whether the "supply route" he had finally found would be affected. Those Spawn of the Deep Sea would not interfere with his fishing, would they?

The pigeon AI did have the ability to transport supplies, but he still did not know how much she could carry or how reliable she really was. Besides, the city-state of Pland was an orderly place. The provisions brought onto the ship there had to be bought with money. So it was hard to say when that supply line would truly become useful.

On top of that, the rich haul from the last fishing trip was still fresh in his mind. Duncan knew very well that improving life aboard the Vanished ultimately depended on nature's gifts.

But now those "Spawn" had become a hidden danger—they might end up interfering with those gifts from nature.

Duncan felt a little troubled. He just hoped the weird things in the sea would not interfere with his fishing.

…

Bright gas lamps shone, driving away the shadows in the underground facilities of the Cathedral. Deep Sea runes carved along the long corridor gave off a reassuring power. The lines in those runes, symbolizing waves and shorelines, linked together as if weaving an invisible giant net that wrapped the underground structure of the entire building in a sacred, quiet atmosphere.

Vanna walked through the underground sanctum of the Cathedral. This holy and quiet place slowly calmed her slightly restless mood.

The storm Goddess ruled over the mightiest powers upon the Boundless Sea. Yet she did not only have the violent side that symbolized "storm". This ancient deity also commanded the power of stillness and sealing.

Just as the sea itself had two faces—calm and storm existing side by side—the Goddess's divine authority was the same. The underground of the great Cathedral symbolized the "mirror world of the Storm".

Many deities in this world were like this, with two sides or at least with two-sided traits. The Death God also held dominion over vitality, and the God of Wisdom also possessed divine authority over the loss of reason, foolishness, and madness. Ordinary people might not know much about this, but as a high-ranking cleric, Vanna was very well-versed in such matters.

She also knew that because many deities were two-sided, this had given rise to certain very controversial, almost heretical ideas. Some scholars even believed that the entire world was two-sided. In some other dimension, they said, there might exist a “Wasted Expanse” that was a complete mirror world of the seas and lands. There, a boundless, dried-up earth stretched out in all directions, with only rare rivers and oases dotted across the drought. That Wasted Expanse might even hold an intelligent civilization strangely similar to the world of the Mortal Realm, a civilization that mirrored all things in the Mortal Realm…

Such outrageous guesses, built entirely on imagination, were of course not accepted. Even Valentine, the bishop of the city-state of Pland, who was famous for his open mind, merely snorted when he heard such talk—

In the old man’s own words, the Subspace at the bottom of this world was already enough to give people a headache. Certain folk theologians really did not need to keep hanging more things underneath the Subspace, did they?

Vanna suddenly shook her head, pulling her wandering thoughts back under control.

In the quiet depths beneath the great Cathedral, a person’s thoughts easily drifted out of control. The “mirror world of the Storm” gave people an overly peaceful mental hint. The comfort granted by the Goddess’s Sanctuary World could greatly weaken a mortal’s mental defenses. This effect was invisible yet powerful, and even an inquisitor like Vanna, who had undergone harsh training, could not fully resist it.

Yet on the other hand, this special environment also had its own special uses.

For example, it could make certain crazed, fanatical cultists open their mouths.

Vanna stopped at the end of the underground sanctum's corridor. Several doors there led to different "interrogation rooms", and a statue of the storm Goddess stood quietly in the vestibule between those doors.

This statue was different from the Goddess statue aboveground in the Cathedral. The one above had both arms spread open, as if receiving the worship of all people, surrounded by endless majesty. The one underground, however, had her hands clasped over her chest, quiet and gentle, like a maiden leaning in to perform a Listening Rite.

Yet no matter which statue it was, a veil of light gauze always covered the face. That symbolized the unknowable nature of the deity.

This statue with clasped hands for the Listening rite was the storm Goddess's other aspect: the Calm Sea Maiden.

She suppressed the waters beneath the surface of the sea and protected the peace of the Undercity.

Vanna bowed before the statue of the Calm Sea Maiden, then turned and pushed open the door of a nearby interrogation room.

The creak of the hinges broke the silence of the underground facility. When the door swung open, a spacious yet dimly lit room appeared before Vanna.

A large table stood in the center of the room. Heidi, dressed in a long black dress, was just rising from beside the table. On the other side of the table was a chair fitted with restraint chains. A heretic of the Sun sat quietly in that chair.

The heretic's eyes were dull. He slumped sideways against the armrest, as if both his reason and strength had been drained from his body, leaving only a muddled shell behind.

The heavy scent of incense still hung in the room. Heidi's medical case sat open on the table. Inside were a large empty syringe, writhing thorny vines, and a golden spike that looked as if it still carried traces of blood.

"Oh, Inquisitor Vanna, you came at just the right time," Heidi said when she heard the door open. She turned her head in greeting. "I just finished a 'treatment'."

Vanna's gaze swept over Heidi's medical case, and her expression was as calm as ever. "Honestly, I still find it hard to connect all of that with the word 'treatment'…"

"These are all standard tools for a psychiatrist… All right, I admit I probably use them more often than an ordinary doctor," Heidi said with a shrug. "But I'm a 'hypnotist' hired by City Hall who often works for the Church. The 'patients' I deal with are nothing like normal patients. Especially cultists like this—no swaying crystal or low-frequency pendulum works as well as a triple dose of 'Midnight Draught' in one shot."

"…I rather suspect the reason you always give cultists a triple dose is just that your big syringe can only hold that much," Vanna muttered, teasing her old acquaintance. Then she shook her head. "But that doesn't matter. As long as you can pry their mouths open… Tell me, what did you get?"

"I did, and I got quite a lot. The situation is strange," Heidi answered at once. "I've already performed deep hypnosis on several cultists and used some special methods. Now I'm basically certain… these cultists who took part in the sacrificial ritual most likely did not go mad only after the ritual ran out of control…"

“They didn’t go mad after the ritual ran wild?” Vanna immediately frowned. Even after speaking with Bishop Valentine, she had already understood that this matter would be more complicated than expected, but Heidi’s words still went beyond her expectations. “What do you mean?”

“I searched through their memories and found that their thinking—or rather, their way of understanding things—had already gone wrong before that final, failed sacrificial ritual even began. To be more exact, it seems those cultists were affected by some kind of… cognitive filter even before the ritual started. Because of that, in their memories… Hm? Inquisitor Vanna, you don’t seem all that surprised?”

Chapter 55: The Dinner Soup

The lack of surprise on Vanna's face did not escape Heidi. This "psychiatrist", who often worked with the Church, immediately guessed something from the inquisitor's reaction.

After a brief hesitation, she asked carefully: "It looks like… there's something very big behind this incident, isn't there?"

Vanna nodded. "Very big."

Heidi thought for a moment. While she quickly packed up her medical case, she said, "I have a day off tomorrow. I might just…"

"Heidi, you may already be connected to this matter," Vanna said, glancing at her. "I'm sorry, but everyone who was on the scene at the time, myself included, was exposed to a certain kind of cognitive corruption. The mental problems you found in these cultists actually happened to every one of us. It's just that… thanks to the Goddess's blessing, our corruption wasn't deep, so we 'woke up' by now."

"…Damn it, I knew I'd run into something like this sooner or later in this line of work," Heidi finally stopped packing the case and pressed a hand to her forehead. "I really should have listened to my father and inherited his business as an antique appraiser. Or even listened to my mother and gone to the public school in Crossroad District to be a history teacher… That would have been much safer than dealing with cultists."

"Try to look on the bright side. At least your work now lets you live a decent life in the Upper City," Vanna said, shaking her head. In front of Heidi, who was about her age and had known her for many years, she seemed much more easygoing than she was with her subordinates. “Anyway, tell me about your findings. They might help the Church and City Hall grasp the situation.”

“…It’s actually simple. There’s one obvious wrongness,” Heidi sighed, explaining the clues she had dug out of the cultists’ subconscious. “On the night of the sacrificial ritual, a sacrificial victim went out of control before the Sun’s totem and reversed the sacrificial rite on the priest who was leading the ritual. But according to the clues we found at the scene, that ‘sacrificial victim’ who caused the runaway was actually a ‘corpse’ that had already been sacrificed once. He truly resurrected and walked up onto the platform, right?”

Vanna nodded. “Of course. I remember it very clearly.”

“Then here’s the problem… Since that sacrificial victim had already been through the rite once, why didn’t a single cultist at the scene recognize him? Leaving aside the ordinary cultists, why didn’t even that priest himself realize that the person standing before him was a sacrificial victim he had personally offered up not long before?”

Vanna slowly furrowed her brow. “…The cultists at the scene watched as a sacrificial victim who had been offered up not long before appeared again right in front of them, yet not a single person noticed the anomaly… Their memories were altered. Their understanding was twisted.”

“Even we didn’t notice that obvious wrongness at the time, did we?” Heidi said with a bitter smile, spreading her hands. “In fact, until an hour ago, I still hadn’t realized I’d overlooked something so self-evident. And only just now did I learn from you that my own mind had been affected.”

For a moment Vanna said nothing. She turned and walked over to the cultist who was still in a dazed state.

The cultist, under the double hypnosis of a heavy dose of nerve drugs and strong incense, only swayed his head slightly and stared blankly at the tall lady before him.

Vanna suddenly looked back and asked, “These cultists hacking each other to pieces after the ritual went out of control—was that also because their perception was chaotic?”

“Yes. I ‘saw’ some flickering images in their memories,” Heidi answered. “Those images seemed to burn in very deep impressions, making them firmly believe that the others at the ritual were possessed and controlled by evil spirits or something similar. They didn’t think they were slaughtering their own companions. They thought they were driving evil spirits out of the others’ bodies…”

“That was most likely their souls instinctively sounding the alarm. A cultist is still a cultist. After all, there’s a Black Sun behind them giving them ‘divine blessings’. When a huge and eerie danger appears, cultists who have received divine blessings are very likely to sense something,” Vanna analyzed from experience. “Their mad hallucinations actually revealed a bit of the truth. Unfortunately, these untrained ordinary people had no idea how to judge the meaning of those warnings and instead fell into a state of collective frenzy.”

Heidi looked at the serious-faced Vanna. After hesitating a few times, she finally spoke carefully: “So… what exactly is behind all this? Is it even more twisted than that ancient Sun?”

Vanna thought for a moment and gently shook her head. “It’s better if you don’t ask, Heidi. Your connection to this matter isn’t deep yet, but if you learn more, certain links that can’t be severed might take shape.”

“All right. If even you, an inquisitor, say so, then I’d better focus on keeping myself alive,” Heidi said as she picked up her neatly packed medical case. “I really am going to give myself a vacation. Don’t worry, I’m not running away. In a couple of days the City Museum is going to have an exhibition on the ocean, and I’m quite interested in it.”

Vanna nodded. “Visiting the City Museum’s ocean exhibition is a good way to relax. The Goddess’s divine blessing also fills those displays.”

Heidi smiled and headed for the door with her case. But just as she was about to push it open, she suddenly stopped, turned back, and looked at Vanna uneasily. “Tell me… has the corruption really faded?”

“Relax. Of course it has,” Vanna said, spreading her hands helplessly. “We only ran into some ‘residue’. You’ve been in this quiet underground sanctum for so long that the Goddess’s divine blessing has long since cleansed away the influence on you.”

“Then I’m relieved,” Heidi finally let out a long breath and pushed the door open. “See you next time then, Inquisitor Vanna.”

Vanna watched Heidi leave the room.

Beside her, the Suntist, made groggy by the strong incense and nerve drugs, half-opened his eyes and stared blankly at Vanna.

Modern medicines, incense passed down from ancient times, the quiet environment of the sanctuary, and the “divine blessing” of the Sun deeply rooted in the soul—these tangled, chaotic forces twisted together and gathered, producing a subtle effect inside the cultist.

In the cultist’s eyes, Vanna’s figure appeared hazy and blurred.

He saw the inquisitor standing ahead, straight and firm.

He saw a vague shadowy figure standing behind Vanna. It was an almost transparent apparition, and ghostly green flames burned around it.

That tall apparition stood motionless behind Vanna, its face expressionless.

…

Duncan sat expressionless in the enchanted sea chart room, watching the doll Alice bustle about in front of him.

She was carrying a large tray. On the tray were shining, polished dishes and a big bowl of steaming soup.

From the smell, it might have been fish soup.

Clearly, after getting more familiar with the environment on the Vanished, this doll of a miss had come up with a new idea: she wanted to “do something for the captain in her own way”.

“Dinner?” Duncan looked curiously at the doll as she set the dishes and fish soup before him. “What made you suddenly think of doing this?”

“I finished organizing the pantry in the kitchen, and then I saw the… fish meat in the barrel,” Alice said, her face full of smiles and pride. “There are many jobs on the ship I can’t help with, but I can at least cook. From now on, I’ll cook for you.”

“It’s nice that you have the heart for it,” Duncan did not quite know how to judge this strange doll. Faced with Alice’s sincere smile, it was hard for anyone to say no. He was just a little curious. “But as a doll, do you even know how to cook?”

“I can learn. It feels pretty simple,” Alice said as if it were obvious. “For the basics, I just have to ask Mr. Goathead. He already told me lots and lots of things about cooking…”

Duncan, still expressionless, glanced at Goathead beside him, then at Alice.

One was a wooden carving, the other a doll made of who-knew-what. Put together, they couldn’t even make one full digestive system, yet they had teamed up to study cooking. One actually dared to teach, and the other really dared to listen?

He had no idea what he should be feeling. He just picked up the spoon and stirred the fish soup in the bowl, thinking that at least it smelled right. But in the next second, his movements froze.

After a brief silence, he reached in and fished a long, silvery-white hair out of the spoon.

“Your hair fell in,” Duncan said, his face still blank.

“Ah, I didn’t drop just my hair in,” Alice said at once, waving her hands. “My whole head fell in… But don’t worry, I pulled it right back out. I didn’t even need anyone’s help!”

Duncan: “…?”

Chapter 56: Lower Deck

This whole thing was just too creepy, so in the end, Duncan still could not bring himself to finish that bowl of fish soup.

After all, every time he thought about the doll's head bobbing and rolling in the soup pot, he felt as if the whole dinner had gone sprinting straight toward something out of "The Grudge" and a Death God story. Even though Alice's real style was actually silly and slapstick, her head dropping into the pot like that was still a bit too horrific…

The doll looked a little hurt. She stared at the food Duncan had set aside and grabbed the lace trim at the hem of her dress with both hands: "Captain, are you angry?"

Duncan, exhausted in both body and mind, glanced at the doll: "If there's anything on the ship that makes you unhappy, you can just tell me directly…"

"Ah? I'm not unhappy at all…"

"Then try not to go into the kitc—" Duncan started to say offhand, but he quickly noticed Alice's face growing more and more downcast. In the end he could only shake his head helplessly and change his tune: "Forget it. Your intentions were good. I really am happy about that. It's just, with cooking… if you're not used to it, accidents happen. Once you get familiar with it, it'll be fine."

Alice instantly perked up: "Then I can still try again later?"

Duncan held it in for a long moment, then finally nodded: "…Just be careful."

He had thought it through. This cursed doll clearly could not stand just idling away her days on the Vanished. Maybe there really was some kind of "nature" in her that made her need to do something on this ship before she could feel at ease. And she was an independent being with her own thoughts and personality. Duncan felt he could not keep dealing with this doll only by knocking her down.

Compared to that, letting Alice help out in the kitchen was better than letting her keep picking fights with ropes, anchor chains, and cannonballs. At least the pots and pans on the Vanished had relatively better tempers.

He lowered his head and glanced at the fish soup set beside him. To be fair, the taste of the soup was actually quite normal. The seasonings on the ship were limited, but the heat had been handled perfectly. And as a doll with neither taste buds nor a digestive system, for Alice to achieve this level just by listening to a few bits of theory (and that theory came from Goathead, who also did not eat human food) was already pretty impressive.

Two beings who did not eat human food had managed, working together, to cook something a person could eat. What more could he ask for? Duncan felt that as long as this doll was more careful in the future, she really could handle work in the kitchen—at least then, as captain, he would not have to cook for himself anymore.

"Then… Captain, should I make you something else?" Alice's voice came from beside him just then, interrupting Duncan's thoughts. "I also learned how to do grilled fish and fried fish fillets from Mr. Goathead. The kitchen already has everything we need…"

"Not now. I'm not hungry," Duncan shook his head. This body of his did not actually need much food. Keeping three meals a day was mostly just to hold on to his habits as a human. And this bowl of Alice's 'special soup' had already wiped out his appetite for half a day. He simply stood up from the table. "I'm going to walk around the cabins."

"You're going to the cabins?" Alice froze for a moment, then seemed to remember something. Her expression grew a bit tense. "Then… could you go and take a look 'down below'?"

"Down below?" Duncan frowned.

"The deeper decks—the places I'm not allowed to go," Alice said. "I keep hearing creaking sounds from down there. Sometimes it even sounds like someone is muttering under the floorboards. Maybe you could go and see… is something going on down below?"

Seeing the nervous look on the doll's face, Duncan felt his heart slowly tighten.

The Vanished's deep layers… that was the one place he had not yet explored.

The deepest part gave him a feeling that was far too strange and dangerous. Back then, he had not yet truly "taken the helm," nor had he mastered the fire of spirit form. So in his previous attempts, he had always stopped at the hatchway leading down into the cabins of the deep layers. Of course, he had planned to explore further someday—but now it seemed plans could not keep up with changes.

Just then, Goathead's voice suddenly came from the side: "Ah, sounds like the bilge is getting restless. Captain, are you going down to take a look?"

Duncan had not even spoken yet when Goathead started rambling to himself: "Now that I think about it, it really has been a long time since you checked down there. The bilge needs a bit of comfort from its captain, you know. It's been soaking in the Boundless Sea for a very long time… Will you be taking your consecrated lantern? It’s still in the old place, just behind the door… You’ve been staying on the upper levels this whole time. The fellows down below have been noisy beyond belief. You have no idea how annoying they are. Sigh, I’m the quiet type, you see. I can’t stand those creaking sounds in the middle of the night…”

Duncan gave Goathead a silent look, and Goathead immediately fell quiet.

Truthfully, after hearing some of what Goathead had just muttered, Duncan felt even more of a resistance toward that eerie bilge. From the sound of it, the place had clearly been affected by the Boundless Sea on a deeper level and had already become a structure that counted as “wrong” even by the standards of the Vanished.

But that resistant thought stayed in his mind for less than a second.

Sooner or later, he would have to explore the other parts of the Vanished in more detail, and sooner was better than later. Reason told him that the earlier he did this, the better.

The Vanished was huge. It was not just astonishingly long; its inner hull was divided into many layers. The areas Duncan understood so far were only the upper structures of the ship—the deck, the upper cabins below the deck, the magazines and gunnery deck, and then another level below that with storerooms, the freshwater tank, and some of the crew cabins. Based on his earlier attempts, he could easily imagine how much more massive structure still lay hidden in the darkness beneath those areas.

Those structures lay below the waterline. Judging by their depth, they were completely soaked in the Boundless Sea.

Dark, grim, echoing with hollow wind or distant howls—the deeper one went, the stranger the environment inside the Vanished became.

Duncan did not truly understand his own ship—and letting that situation drag on was definitely not acceptable.

He was already this ship's captain. The Vanished was his foothold and his base of operations in this world. He could not remain so half-informed about his own foundation. Even just to survive long-term on the Boundless Sea, which was full of Anomalies and Visions, he had to understand both the potential and the dangers of the Vanished.

Who knew whether a crisis would arrive tomorrow? Who knew whether, in the very next second, the Vanished would collide with some Spawn from the Deep Sea, or with the crumbling border of a Mortal Realm?

What was more, Goathead had just mentioned something else: the bilge needed comfort from its captain.

The "captain" had stayed away from the lower decks for far too long… If this kept up, it sounded as if something bad might happen.

Duncan got up, went to the door, and found the consecrated lantern that Goathead had mentioned.

It was a very old consecrated lantern. Its copper frame was shaped like a hexagonal prism, wider at the top and narrower at the bottom. Glass panes were set into the copper frame, leaving the whole thing a little blurry. But inside that glass cover, Duncan did not see anything like a wick.

He did not show any curiosity, nor did he ask Goathead about it. After a brief and silent moment of thought, he tried to call up the ghostly green fire of his spirit form and poured that power into the consecrated lantern.

A bright green flame immediately jumped to life inside the glass. The old, simple lantern began to shed a steady glow.

Where the consecrated lantern shone, a cold, bleak atmosphere slowly spread for some reason, yet standing in that glow, Duncan felt an odd sense of calm and control rising in him. He seemed to sense his power spreading out with the light. Everything the glow touched, every tiny detail, reflected clearly in his mind.

The dove AI suddenly fluttered over and landed on Duncan's shoulder.

It had already turned into that phantom, half-flesh, half-bone undead bird form—even though Duncan had not actively "activated" the dove at all. Under the light of the consecrated lantern, it still completed that "transformation" on its own.

Duncan glanced down at the consecrated lantern in his hand and decided this was probably a very good item. It seemed able to spread his power into the surrounding environment with very little loss and maintain a kind of "field" there. That field had the functions of detection, warning, and even control. This trait clearly made it very suitable for long-term exploration in unfamiliar or dangerous areas.

"Captain… can I go with you?"

Duncan turned and saw Alice standing behind him. She stared curiously at the consecrated lantern, her face full of eagerness. "I've never been to the lower decks! Mr. Goathead said I can't go down there without your permission…"

Duncan thought for a moment, then nodded slightly: "You can."

He still did not know what was in the lower decks, but no matter what, they were still part of the Vanished. Since he had already taken the helm, the bilge should not hold any danger that was too great. Bringing this doll along might even give him an extra pair of hands.

Goathead, left back at the chart table, did not comment. In his view, the captain going to inspect the Vanished was a perfectly normal thing—and taking along a helper was just as normal.

Outside the cabins, the veil of night was slowly falling. The cold glow of World's Wound shone on the sea, and on the empty deck of the ghost ship. The half-transparent spirit form sails billowed in the air, slowly adjusting their angle with no one guiding them.

Duncan held the consecrated lantern, carried his saber and flintlock pistol, and walked with Alice across the empty deck, through the top two levels of cabins, and down the wooden stairs toward the deep interior of the Vanished.

The staircase at the end of the seafarers' quarters was exactly where Duncan had stopped during his earlier explorations.

A strange dimness clung around the sloping stairway that led downward. In that gloom, he could only make out the supporting pillars and parts of the walls in a vague way.

"It's so dark down there." Alice stood at the top of the stairs, watching the shadowy space below with some nervousness. "Isn't there any light down here? Every other place has those oil lamps that never go out…"

"No, there is light down there," Duncan said slowly as he held the consecrated lantern. Under the power spreading from the lantern, he could finally see the space below more clearly than before. "…It's just that the light down there is black."

"…Huh?" Alice froze, needing a long moment to react. "There's such a thing as black light?"

Duncan did not reply at once. He only carried the consecrated lantern and walked down slowly. Not until Alice followed him did he speak in a soft voice: "After all, we've already gone below the surface of the Boundless Sea."

Chapter 57: Timid Alice

The captain’s words were like a cool night wind, passing down through the increasingly dim stairway. Alice instinctively hugged her arms and moved closer behind Duncan. As they went lower and lower, she finally saw what the captain meant when he said “the light down here is black.”

There really was light in the lower cabins—at least in terms of structure and layout. The cabins she saw had the same supporting pillars as the levels above, and on those pillars hung the ever-burning oil lamps. Those oil lamps were burning, yet the flames actually made the area near them darker than the places farther away.

Yes— the closer it was to an oil lamp, the dimmer the light became. The lamps themselves were almost wrapped in a layer of shadows, so that she could only faintly make out their outlines. But a little farther away from the lamps, the brightness instead began to grow. In the far corners of the cabins, the light level was almost the same as in the upper decks.

From the stairs above, the space below had looked strangely dark exactly because there were two lamps hanging on either side of the stairwell. From a visual standpoint, it felt as if those lamps were actively giving off darkness, canceling out and erasing the light that originally existed in the cabins.

Alice stared wide-eyed at the cabin that was dim overall. After a long time, she finally muttered: “This… this can’t be reasonable, can it…”

“You, an unreasonable doll, are asking me to talk about reason?” Duncan looked over at the clearly nervous Alice. “Under the surface of the Boundless Sea, the things that make sense are the most unreasonable things of all.”

When he said that, his expression was quite calm, as if he had long grown used to this kind of weirdness. But in truth, his reaction inside was almost exactly the same as Alice’s. Even the undead dove on his shoulder suddenly flapped its wings and blurted out its true feelings: “Does this make sense, does this make sense, does this make sense…”

Duncan ignored the noisy dove on his shoulder. Instead, he carefully observed this cabin he had never set foot in before, adjusting the angle of the consecrated lantern as he walked, trying to use the changes in light and shadow to read the environment.

Below the Vanished’s waterline… the light in the cabins was inverted.

The lamps did not seem to give off any light at all. Instead, they were absorbing the light that originally existed in the space, as if… they were some kind of mirror shade of the world.

Yet the spirit form glow that Duncan’s consecrated lantern released still followed the normal rules of light. It was bright around the lantern and grew dimmer as it spread outward.

What principle lay behind this? Was it only the influence of the Boundless Sea, or was it mixed with the Vanished’s own traits? Was the “bright environment” in the cabins real? If those oil lamps that “absorbed the light” were put out, would this place become bright?

For a moment, a bold idea really appeared in Duncan’s mind. He actually found himself wondering what would happen if he extinguished all the oil lamps on this level. But in the next instant, he forcibly cut off that clearly wrong thought.

He could not put out the lights here. Even if it looked like these lights were responsible for the darkness in the cabins, there had to be a reason they were burning here.

He suddenly remembered something. In the city-state of Pland, he had learned that “burning flames can dispel eerie dangers.” In that statement, the real effect came from the flame itself, not from the light it gave off. Did that mean that, under certain conditions, light and darkness in this world could become inverted, and under that inversion, only the flame itself could be trusted?

Did this also indirectly explain why the light from electric lamps had no exorcising effect—because that was only light, lacking the essential element of “flame”?

“Captain?” Alice’s voice suddenly came from the side. The doll’s tone carried both tension and concern. “Is there some sort of Anomaly here?”

“There is no Anomaly.” Duncan’s expression did not change as he answered calmly, while slowly walking forward.

Those oil lamps that “absorbed the light” burned quietly on the pillars on either side. Some coils of rope were piled around the pillars. As Duncan walked between them, the lamps hanging from the posts crackled softly, and the ropes on the floor slowly wriggled backward, making way for their captain.

For some reason, a sentence suddenly rose up in Duncan’s mind:

Light and shadow are illusions brought by the Deep Sea. Beneath the untrustworthy surface, only the flames themselves still loyally guard the Vanished’s treasures.

He looked at the quietly burning flames and nodded slightly, as if offering his approval and thanks.

In the very next second, every oil lamp in the cabin flared up visibly. Under each glass cover, the flames leaped higher.

The entire cabin became even darker…

Duncan: "…"

He suddenly regretted praising them so early. He should have waited until he was ready to head back before giving these oil lamps any encouragement.

Alice followed behind. The doll carefully studied the surroundings. She saw huge wooden barrels and some crates stacked in the corners of the cabin, as well as some closed rooms and corridors leading to unknown places. In a low voice she muttered: "This seems like another storeroom… Was this ship once a cargo ship?"

"If it were a cargo ship, the cargo wouldn't be stored this deep—there's a thing called transport cost," Duncan shook his head and said casually. "These are long-distance supplies, meant for the Vanished itself to consume during long ocean voyages."

Alice blinked: "Long-distance supplies?"

Duncan did not answer. He simply walked forward to inspect the goods closest to him.

Some of the barrels were full of a kind of oil, dark brown and sticky, but without a very strong smell. It might have been some kind of fuel, and it had clearly been here for a very, very long time. Duncan even suspected these fuels were "stock" from before the Vanished became a ghost ship. They had probably been used for lighting or warding off evil, but after the ship turned into a ghost ship, many things in the cargo holds ended up like this—no longer of any real use.

In another group of barrels, Duncan saw something more familiar.

Cheese older than he was. Salted meat hard enough to crack stone.

Duncan silently put the lids back on.

On this level, most areas were piled with supplies. Although a good part of them seemed useless on the ghost ship as it was now, they were enough to prove his earlier judgment about the Vanished.

This ship had at least originally been built for some kind of long-distance expedition. It could carry a huge amount of supplies, and there were strict safety measures between the various supply holds to prevent fire from spreading or pests and rats from ruining the provisions.

Thinking of the large number of cannons on the upper decks and the sizable magazines, he could almost picture the ambitious dream of exploration this ship had once carried—the farthest sea routes, the most dangerous journeys, facing the most deadly environments and the most vicious enemies. Such an expedition would need a whole ship full of loyal, skilled sailors, and a steadfast captain to see it through.

Now, however, that possible exploration plan had long since blown away on the wind. The ambitious Vanished had become the most terrifying calamity on the Boundless Sea. The sailors had disappeared without a trace, and only a ghost captain was left, still in control of this ghost ship that no longer had a goal.

He and Alice kept moving forward. After passing several separate holds, they entered a corridor. If the layout on this level matched the one above, then the stairs leading further down should be at the far end of the hallway.

“I feel… like it’s getting more and more creepy…” The doll hugged her arms as she carefully looked around and spoke in a small voice. “Do you hear the wind? How can there be wind inside the cabin?”

“I hear it. Don’t be nervous, it’s normal,” Duncan said casually. Then he glanced at the doll. “Why are you so timid? You at least have the title Anomaly 099, don’t you?”

As he spoke, he also thought of the information he had gotten from Nina before. In this world, many registers of Anomalies and Visions were open to the public. These registers helped people avoid dangers they might encounter in daily life or recognize early signs that an Anomaly was entering a runaway state. But these registers were not complete. The parts open to ordinary people only covered Anomalies and Visions whose threats were controlled, or whose nature was special enough that they might draw near to everyday life. The Anomalies and Visions that ordinary people would never have a chance to encounter in their whole lives clearly were not included.

He had tried to ask Nina about Anomaly 099, but the girl had never seen that number anywhere in her textbooks.

That meant this “cursed doll” Alice either carried some special secret, so that the authority and the Church had sealed away all information about her, or… she was so dangerous that she had always been strictly kept outside the borders of civilized society, with no chance to ever come into contact with ordinary people.

Either reason was enough to add a bit more mystery to this doll in Duncan’s eyes.

But this doll, wrapped in layers of mystery, only shrank her neck when she heard Duncan’s words. Her face was full of nerves as she said: “Having a number doesn’t make you brave. I’m Anomaly 099, not ‘Courage 099’…”

Duncan sighed. In his heart, he thought that the one in front of him was probably the most embarrassing Anomaly in the world. It was really something that the sailors who had escorted her before had managed to get so nervous over her…

Chapter 58:

Duncan had always been very curious. What was so special and dangerous about this gothic doll who called herself “Alice” that the sailors escorting her had been so nervous, and that she could still hold the title of Anomaly 099 in a world where strange and deadly things appeared one after another?

It was true that a doll that could move on its own and think clearly was already uncanny. The way she sometimes ran around clutching her head, or split herself up and acted separately, was indeed terrifying to look at. But in Duncan’s eyes, that level of weirdness still fell far short of the standard for a high-rank designation. The simplest comparison came from a piece of information he had heard from Nina:

Anomaly 196 – Blood.

It was a dangerous Anomaly sealed by containment in the underground sanctum beneath Pland Cathedral. Its true form was an amount of fresh blood equal to all the blood in an adult male’s body. This Anomaly had a certain kind of mind. It could flow and spread on its own and would actively try to replace the blood in a nearby “host” that met its conditions, seizing the body to escape. The way to stop it from flowing and spreading was to store it in twenty?two separate blood jars and keep it frozen. But if anyone bled within ten meters of its storage point, the seal failed at once. The blood in the bleeding person’s body would be replaced by Anomaly 196, and the host’s sanity would be taken over along with it.

This Anomaly ignored all countermeasures below the Saint level and would kill any suitable host without exception.

As one of the most dangerous Anomalies managed by the city?state of Pland, information about Anomaly 196 – Blood was always open to the public. That way, if the Anomaly ever leaked into the city, the authority could quickly locate it and take action.

Duncan had no idea what this so?called “Saint” really meant, but from the name alone he could tell it must be some very powerful supernatural rank. Perhaps that Inquisitor Vanna who had appeared in the newspapers was a Saint. And how many Saints like her, who might be able to fight Anomaly 196, could there even be in the entire city?state of Pland?

Yet this was only Anomaly 196, something ranked between one and two hundred. Alice’s number was Anomaly 099.

Within the top hundred.

According to Nina, there was some uncertainty in how Anomalies and Visions were numbered, and it was not always easy to compare their strength. But in general, the higher?ranked Anomalies and Visions tended to be more dangerous or stranger and harder to control. Or else they had once caused terrifying destruction or triggered some special historic event, earning their high-rank designation by being recorded in history itself.

In any case, a number within the top hundred meant bizarre properties and a level of danger that were extremely troublesome for the civilized world. It either meant the thing itself was awful to deal with, or that it had done something shocking in the past. And yet this doll named Alice, this cursed Doll…

Duncan turned and glanced back at Alice, who was honestly following behind him. She noticed the captain’s gaze at once, lifted her head, and gave him an innocent, slightly cowardly smile: “Hehe…”

There was no way to expect this one to figure out her own level of danger. He would have to look for clues later in the historical archives of the Pland city?state.

But how could an antique shopkeeper idling away his days in the Lower City ever get close to that kind of “classified information”? The “antique trade contacts” left behind by that cultist Ron were clearly useless. Most of the junk in that shop had a history no longer than last week…

Duncan thought quietly as he walked. The ghostly green fire of his spirit form burned steadily inside the consecrated lantern in his hand. Its light slowly spread deeper into the ship’s interior. The ambient light here, twisted into an “Inversion” state by the weirdness at the bottom of the hold, mixed with the glow of the consecrated lantern. Together they formed a warped, dizzying play of light and shadow.

To an outsider, this scene would probably look extremely eerie, gloomy, and terrifying.

Yet Duncan’s heart felt a faint calm. His power soaked into the glow of the consecrated lantern and seeped bit by bit, like trickling water, into the depths of this sealed?off hold. The structure of this part of the ship, which had been completely unknown to him before, slowly grew clear in his mind and sent back a subtle “sense of touch”.

The last fragment of the Vanished that was not under the captain’s control was returning to its proper track. Duncan could feel ever more sharply that, as he explored, the faint “restlessness” in the ship around him was gradually settling down.

It was just as Goathead had said. The bilge of the Vanished had been soaked in the Boundless Sea for far too long, so it had stirred up some “abnormal activity”. But as long as the captain came down in person to soothe it, the order aboard the ship would slowly return.

“You really are afraid of the seabed. Even just coming into a cabin below the sea level scares you like this,” Duncan suddenly said to Alice behind him. “So why insist on coming along?”

“I… I didn’t think that far at the time!” Alice forced herself to sound calm. “What I thought was, no matter how we walk, we’re still on the ship… I don’t even have the concept of ‘cabins below the waterline’! I’m just a doll!”

“You don’t even have a digestive tract, yet you’re studying cooking. Don’t use ‘doll’ as an excuse,” Duncan said casually. “You’ll need to study the ship’s basics properly from now on.”

Alice let out a depressed little “oh”. After a brief silence, Duncan asked curiously: “Why are you so afraid of the Deep Sea? Or rather… why are you so afraid of being ‘soaked in the sea’? I know the Deep Sea is dangerous. Many people are afraid of it, and you’ve said that before. But now it looks like… your nerves are worse than I thought. It’s already to the point that just standing in a cabin below the waterline and thinking about the seawater outside makes you jumpy… Stop tugging at the lace on your clothes. There are no spare clothes for you on the Vanished right now. If you ruin that one, you’ll have to sew it yourself.”

“Oh.” Alice quickly loosened her hands, then unconsciously started pulling at her buttons instead. “I… I never thought about it at all. I’m just scared. I can’t be scared?”

Hearing the doll’s nervous tone, Duncan did not comment. He looked toward the end of the corridor and saw a staircase slanting downward appear in his view.

That was the deeper place. It might lead straight to the bilge—the part of the ship that touched the Boundless Sea the most.

Duncan and Alice stood at the head of the stairs and looked down. By the light of the spirit flame from the consecrated lantern, they did not see any cabin structure below, but a single door standing in the darkness.

When he saw that door, Duncan frowned.

The layout here was not quite normal. First of all, the path to the bilge seemed too long. The stairways between cabins on the upper decks were connected, so one could reach each level quickly. But on this deck, the stairs leading deeper were at the very end of the corridor. You had to walk almost the entire way through the cargo area to get there. Without a doubt, this hurt the efficiency of movement within the ship.

Second, there was an extra door at the bottom of the stairs.

Duncan hesitated for a moment, then picked up the consecrated lantern and slowly walked down.

Alice hesitated even more, but in the end she obediently followed. Now she absolutely did not dare go back to the upper decks alone. Staying behind the captain was the only thing that gave her a bit of safety.

Soon Duncan reached the door. He raised the consecrated lantern and lit up the surroundings, trying to see if there were any words around the door. As expected, a line of letters on the doorframe entered his sight:

“The last door of the hold.”

“What does that mean?” Alice stared curiously at the letters on the frame. “The last door of the hold… Normally, shouldn’t the sign say what the room is for?”

“Clearly it’s a warning,” Duncan said thoughtfully as he drew back his gaze from the frame. He rested one hand on the handle and, before pushing it open, reminded the doll beside him: “If we go in and see any other doors, don’t touch them.”

Alice nodded nervously. She then saw Duncan push open this “last door of the hold” in one motion.

A strange, pale glow washed over them.

They stepped forward into a wide open space.

When she saw what lay beyond the door, Alice’s eyes widened at once: “Th?this…”

She stumbled over that “this” for a long time before finally managing to squeeze out one sentence: “C?captain! The bottom of the ship is broken! It’s broken!”

She shouted at the top of her voice, but Duncan did not answer right away. He was also staring, dumbfounded, at the scene around them.

The deepest layers of the Vanished, the bilge structure that had been soaking in the Boundless Sea—were shattered.

Everywhere he looked, the cabin was torn into pieces. Countless huge cracks and glowing voids cut through it. Hundreds of fragments of the hull floated apart in the open space, yet still kept a kind of “broken order”, preserving the outline and structure that the bilge ought to have.

Beyond the great fissures between those many fragments, Duncan could clearly see the “view” outside the bilge—

It was not the deep, dark Boundless Sea he had imagined, but a pale, murky nothingness, filled with countless obscure streaks of light rushing past at great speed.

Chapter 59:

Duncan and Alice stood at the end of the staircase leading to the bilge and faced a bizarre, chilling sight. The entire bottom of the Vanished lay in a shattered state, and beyond the broken hull stretched a kind of void filled with endless, dim light.

Was this the Vanished's true "bilge structure"? And what was that thing outside this shattered hull?

Could such a scene really exist beneath the surface of the Boundless Sea?

Duncan walked forward carefully, taking two steps into the broken cabin. He stepped onto the largest fragment of planking and looked back in the direction he had come from.

The "last door" still stood quietly where it had been, fixed onto a floating plank. Behind it lay a dark staircase slanting upward. Yet around the door, there were no walls that ought to be there. There was only emptiness.

The door floated alone in this space.

Duncan circled around to the back of the door with great care and found nothing there at all. Looking through the open doorway, he could directly see the broken cabin on the other side.

"Captain…" Alice's nervous voice drifted over. The doll looked around in fright, then finally fixed her eyes on Duncan. "Th?this… this is normal, right?"

In truth, Duncan was even less sure than the doll. At least Alice could blindly place her trust in the captain. Where was this “captain” supposed to find confidence right now? But seeing Alice so on edge, and remembering those “crew member rules” Goathead had mentioned, Duncan forced down his unease and kept his usual calm, serious expression.

“Don’t worry,” he said lightly. “The Vanished is a ship beyond anything you can imagine.”

“Yes, yes, it really is beyond imagination…” Alice said in awe. Duncan’s steady manner clearly eased her a little. She started to look around with curiosity at the broken hull and the chaotic light outside. “Captain, out there… it doesn’t look like there’s water.”

Duncan thought for a moment, then looked at Alice with sudden interest: “Do you think that outside is below the surface of the Boundless Sea?”

Alice froze: “Huh? Why are you asking me?”

Duncan’s face stayed calm: “Because you have experience.”

“That’s only because you threw me…” Alice started to blurt out, but quickly swallowed the rest and answered honestly instead: “I don’t think so… The sea should be all water. No matter how wrong the Boundless Sea is, there still has to be water under the surface. But outside it looks just like… just like…”

“A void filled with chaotic streams of light,” Duncan finished as he shook his head and slowly walked forward. He came to the edge of the plank beneath his feet and looked down at the shifting lights outside the hull. “The bottom of the Vanished… is not inside the Boundless Sea.”

Alice stared: “Huh? Then where is it?”

Duncan did not answer. He tried to look mysterious—mainly because he did not know either.

But he still had a vague guess. Perhaps this ship was actually sailing through several different dimensions at the same time. On the surface, the Vanished looked as if it was sailing on the Boundless Sea of the Mortal Realm. In truth, different parts of the ship might belong to different dimensions altogether.

That would also explain why the deeper he went into the Vanished, the more eerie and sinister the surrounding cabins became. Perhaps the truly eerie thing was not the cabins themselves…

If this dim, chaotic space outside the hull was not the Boundless Sea, then what was it? It did not look like the Spirit Realm, and it was not like the dark space he saw while crossing through the Spirit Realm either. Was it somewhere “deeper”? The Abyssal Deep? Subspace?

With countless guesses and ideas swirling in his mind, Duncan slowly drew the pirate sword from his waist. Holding the consecrated lantern in one hand and the long sword in the other, he carefully reached toward the edge of the fragment beneath his feet. He was extremely cautious now. Even though the gaps between the fragments looked small enough to jump across in a single step, he did not dare move blindly. He had to test them with the sword first.

Who knew if something might suddenly emerge from those fissures and swallow anyone who tried to cross?

A second later, his eyes widened slightly in surprise.

He saw the tip of the sword vanish. At the edge of the fragment across the gap, a piece of sword tip suddenly appeared out of nowhere.

Duncan frowned and tested in different directions. The same thing happened again and again.

He finally began to understand.

These areas that looked like cracks were actually still continuous in space. The bilge structure that seemed shattered to pieces was, in reality, still whole.

He straightened and looked around at the cracks and the flowing lights beyond them, a realization forming in his heart. The “fractured” scene was only a visual effect. It had not broken the true continuity of space. The hull of the Vanished was not really ruptured here. For some reason, the “view” outside the ship had simply appeared inside.

But what had caused that? Was it overlapping space? Or a flawed projection from a higher dimension down to a lower one?

Duncan instinctively searched through all the reliable and unreliable knowledge in his mind, trying to explain this strange phenomenon. Alice, meanwhile, watched the captain poke around at the edges of the cracks, sometimes shining the consecrated lantern everywhere, sometimes jabbing with the sword. After a long time, she finally could not hold back: “Captain… are you using a special soothing ritual to… calm the cabin?”

With his back to Alice, Duncan silently sheathed the sword and forced himself to say: “…Yes.”

“Oh! Amazing!” Alice’s eyes lit up at once. “Then are you going to perform a soothing ritual on all the fragments here?”

“…This is enough,” Duncan said stiffly, keeping his face stern. Then, before the curious doll could ask more questions, he quickly shifted her attention. “Let’s walk a bit farther ahead.”

As he spoke, he raised the consecrated lantern and carefully took a step forward. As he set his foot down, he tensed every muscle and nerve in his body, ready for anything that might happen as he crossed the crack. But nothing happened at all.

Just as when he had tested with the sword, he simply “skipped over” the process of crossing the gap. It was like walking in a normal cabin. He stepped straight onto the fragment on the other side.

Alice watched in amazement as the captain strode ahead, moving freely as if the cracks underfoot did not exist. She tried to copy him and followed. But when she reached the gap, she grew nervous again and, in the end, could not help speeding up and taking a leap…

And of course, she crashed head?first into Duncan’s back.

Duncan felt a sudden rush of air behind him, then something solid slammed into his back. His body reacted at once. He spun and swung up his arm—

The next second, he was looking with a blank expression at a headless doll behind him, flailing wildly with both hands. Alice’s head, several meters away, rolled along the planks while stammering: “So… so… sor…”

“Stay right here and don’t move. I’ll go get you,” Duncan sighed. As he hurried after Alice’s head, which was still rolling slowly away, he reflected inwardly on why he had brought this useless doll down here in the first place. He picked the head up with practiced ease. “Have you considered putting a screw in your neck?”

Alice’s head seemed not to hear the second half of his remark. Her eyes suddenly widened as she stared off to the side: “Th?th?there’s… a doo…”

Duncan frowned and looked in the direction indicated by Alice’s frantic gaze.

A pitch?black wooden door stood quietly on a fragment at the far end.

A door. There was another door. So there really was another door.

When he had seen the warning on the door at the foot of the stairs, Duncan had already wondered if this classic situation would happen. Yet when he now saw that this “bilge space” really did contain an extra door, his heart still gave a little jolt.

Just then Alice’s body stumbled up to them. Duncan handed the doll her head as he looked toward the door: “Was there a door over there just now?”

Alice popped her head back onto her neck with a little “pop”, rolled her shoulders, and glanced that way: “I don’t think so. It only showed up after we walked over.”

Duncan answered with a noncommittal hum and, holding the consecrated lantern, carefully walked toward the door.

In truth, he no longer needed the lantern’s light in this strange cabin. The chaotic glow seeping in from beyond the cracks, though dim, was enough to give the whole space a basic level of brightness. Even so, he kept the consecrated lantern in his hand at all times. It was a necessary precaution.

Goathead had never reminded him about anything like this, but Duncan had already decided: as long as he was in a cabin below the waterline, he would never let this lamp go out.

The new door looked ordinary. Its black boards were not much different from the “last door” at the foot of the stairs, and its style and material were similar to most of the doors used on the Vanished.

Duncan lifted his head. Above the frame of this door, he saw a line of letters, as if poured in copper and set into the wood:

“This door leads to the Vanished.”

Chapter 60: The Other Side of the Door

This door led to the Vanished.

The letters on the doorframe were cast in brass and looked as if they had survived a century. Under the light of the spirit flame consecrated lantern and the hazy, chaotic glow that filled the hold, every stroke of those letters seemed plated with frozen time, giving off an ancient, mysterious air.

Duncan stared at the line of letters for several seconds, then turned away without expression.

Alice's voice came at once from the side: "Huh? Captain, are we leaving already? Don't we need to check this door? We don't have to open it, just take a look…"

"There's nothing more to see. This is already the end of the bilge," Duncan said casually.

But just then, a faint knocking sound suddenly came, making him stop.

Duncan turned and glanced at Alice behind him. Alice nervously looked around, then finally turned toward the dark wooden door: "It sounded like it came from behind this door…"

Duncan stopped where he was, his face serious as he fixed his gaze on the wooden door that the knocking had come from. He waited patiently for several seconds, then heard two more knocks. The sound was faint and blurry, as if it came through an incredibly thick Veil, as if the door was wrapped in something invisible, but it was definitely not an illusion.

After a short but fierce struggle in his mind, he finally walked back to the door. Alice followed, crowding close, nervously watching for whatever might happen next.

Duncan held the consecrated lantern in one hand and gripped his longsword tight in the other as he studied the dark wooden door. Only then did he notice that the door was not fully closed. Along the edge he could see a gap about a centimeter wide.

The door was only pulled to, as if someone had left in a hurry and forgotten to shut it, or as if something inside had left that crack on purpose to lure the unwary in.

Duncan raised the consecrated lantern and cautiously shone it through the gap, his eyes peering at whatever lay on the other side. At the same time, he braced his longsword beside the crack, ready to stab anything that dared squeeze out.

Yet he never could have imagined what he was about to see—

On the other side of the gap was a room.

It was a small room that looked like it had been around for years. The wallpaper on the walls was dull and wrinkled. The slightly messy furniture seemed long uncleaned. Directly facing the door was a single bed. Beside the bed stood a desk with a computer, some books, and a small ornament on it.

A tall, thin figure was bent over the desk, writing quickly. The figure wore an ordinary white shirt you could buy from a street stall. His hair was messy and unkempt, and his body was on the skinny side, clearly not used to exercise.

Duncan stared through the crack, staring at the familiar scene “over there”, at that room, at the hunched figure at the desk. The figure seemed to sense something. He stopped writing, snapped his head up, and jumped to his feet, running toward the door.

The figure ran up and stared out through the crack, staring straight at Duncan.

Duncan stared back, staring at that familiar face—that was his own face!

For a few seconds they only stared at each other. Then the figure on the other side suddenly grew agitated. He began to shove the door hard, as if trying to get out, but the door did not move at all, as if it had been poured into the surrounding space. So he tried to break the lock, using tools to pry at the crack. He pounded on the unmoving door, trying every way he could to escape, but nothing worked.

The man inside finally gave up these useless attempts. He slapped hard near the gap and shouted something toward this side through the door. But from outside, Duncan could only hear vague, drifting noise, not a single clear word.

Duncan watched all of this in shock and confusion, watching the “himself” trapped in the room. He knew what the man inside was trying to do. His gaze slowly dropped to the door handle beside him.

The handle was right within his reach.

From this side, the door might be very easy to open.

Yet he only looked at the handle and did not take the next step.

The man trapped in the room seemed to grow discouraged. He shouted again toward the outside one last time. After he realized his voice could not reach beyond the door at all, he ran back to the desk, bent over, and quickly wrote something on a sheet of paper. Then he rushed back and held the paper up for Duncan to see.

Through the crack, Duncan saw a line of messy words on the paper: “Save me! I’m trapped in this room! The windows and the door won’t open!”

Duncan suddenly laughed.

His smile slipped through the gap and fell into the eyes of the “Zhou Ming” trapped in the room. Zhou Ming’s eyes slowly widened. He looked stunned, and then gradually angry, as if feeling mocked.

The next second, Duncan’s pirate sword thrust forward, slid through the narrow crack, and stabbed straight into the body of the “Zhou Ming” on the other side.

Zhou Ming was run through by the blade. He opened his mouth as if screaming. In the blur Duncan seemed to hear a string of hoarse, chaotic sounds in his ears. Duncan did not move at all. He only tightened his grip on the hilt and pushed the sword in deeper, leaning close to the door as he said softly:

“If you can’t write Chinese, then don’t write it.”

The pigeon AI, who had been quiet the whole way, suddenly flapped her wings and let out a hoarse sound: “This is an illusion. What are you trying to hide?”

In the next second, the figure on the other side of the door began to melt like a wax statue and quickly faded into twisted, chaotic light and shadow. The room that had looked so real and so familiar shed its disguise just as fast. In Duncan’s eyes its true form appeared: a dim, old cabin, empty and bare, sealed in time and frozen decay.

The sword in his hand felt hollow, as if from the very beginning it had pierced nothing but air.

The other side of this “extra door” was only a cabin?

Duncan studied the space beyond the crack in surprise, but now, no matter how he looked, it seemed to be just an ordinary cabin.

But… was that cabin really “real”?

Duncan slowly pulled the longsword back from the crack, let out a small breath, and stepped back half a step.

The strange scene he had just experienced was still deeply burned into his mind. He did not know whether it had been a simple illusion or something else entirely. But one thing was certain. This door hid weirdness and danger far beyond what he had imagined.

If the illusion the door showed came from twisting his own memories and perception, then the danger beyond the door had already surpassed the power of “Captain Duncan”. But if it was not based on his own knowledge and memories, if some thing had “fabricated” the scene instead, then the situation was even worse.

Because in this world no one should have known what that room looked like. No one should have known that the person called “Zhou Ming” even existed.

But whatever was on the other side of this door knew.

He took a deep breath.

His caution just now had been right. No matter what, he could not open this door.

At the same time he felt a little afraid in hindsight. Just now, for a brief instant when he looked at the handle, a thought had flashed through his mind. He had wanted to open the door and let that “himself” out.

“Captain…” Alice’s voice suddenly sounded, waking Duncan from his thoughts. He looked up at the doll and saw worry and fear on the doll’s face. “Captain, are you all right? What’s inside that door? Why do you look so serious…”

Duncan shook his head: “It’s nothing. What’s behind this door is not something you should see. We’ve already reached the very bottom. We can go back.”

As he spoke, he reached out and tried to push the door, to see if he could close it.

That narrow gap really did not let him rest easy.

But the door did not budge. Even when he used all his strength, it stayed as firm as if it were fused with the very space around it.

Just like the sealed windows in his old single apartment.

Duncan pulled his hand back, thoughtful. The door could not be closed, but he certainly was not going to try to open it any further.

“Ah? Oh… oh, okay!” Alice did not pay much attention to the captain’s attempt to close the door. She froze for a moment, then reacted, her face breaking into a happy smile. “Then let’s hurry back. To be honest, this place is pretty creepy. I’m getting nervous again…”

Duncan only gave a noncommittal grunt, then turned with Alice and walked toward the “last door” that led to the stairs.

This place was far too strange. Even he did not want to stay any longer.

After that, no more Anomalies appeared.

They passed smoothly through the shattered bilge, through the cargo hold where the lighting was in Inversion, and through the dark stairs and corridors, until they returned to the cabins above the waterline.

The moment they returned to the normal cabins, Alice felt her whole body suddenly relax. It was as if some barely noticeable Shadows that had been wrapped around her had been driven away. She saw the lights around them return to normal, and the cabin no longer felt gloomy and oppressive. As for Captain Duncan beside her…

The captain looked no different from before. He did not seem to have felt the oppressive atmosphere earlier, and he did not seem to feel any special relief now. The environment deep inside the Vanished had not affected him at all.

Only, on the way back the captain was clearly very quiet, weighed down with thoughts.

“Captain, are you tired?” Alice asked cautiously. “Do you want me to make you something to eat? You didn’t really have dinner…”

Duncan stopped his thoughts and looked at the doll beside him.

On the doll’s face was genuine concern—just like Nina’s.

He suddenly relaxed, and the bit of gloom in his heart seemed to quietly fade.

“This time, don’t drop anything strange into the pot.”

“My head is not something strange!”

“Especially your head.”

“…Oh.”

Chapter 61: Unstable Voyage

Duncan took Alice back to the upper deck of the Vanished. The cold World's Wound still hung high in the veil of night.

Duncan had thought he had been exploring inside the ship for a very long time, even wondering if an entire night had passed. But looking now at the deep veil of night, it seemed he had only been down below for a few hours.

Yet the bizarre Anomalies he had seen in just those few hours were already more than enough to leave a deep impression.

He still remembered the cabin where light and shadow were in Inversion, and that door at the bottom of the ship. Especially that door. What exactly was behind it?

The consecrated lantern in Duncan's hand was already out. He and the doll walked slowly toward the captain's cabin, neither of them saying much. The doll seemed to already be running through recipes in her head, while Duncan's attention fell on the structures around the deck.

He compared what he remembered, confirming that the dim, ruined cabin beyond the door really was a part of the Vanished. The two had exactly the same style, and there was a faint continuity in their structure.

And now, thinking back, he kept feeling that there had been something else at the very deepest part of that ruined cabin, hidden in the darkness.

That was a "hidden area" of the Vanished, an area unknown even to its own captain, something Duncan could not sense or detect at all.

Did Goathead know about that door? Did it know what lay beyond it?

Should he ask it?

They reached the captain's cabin, but Duncan's thoughts were still in turmoil. He went in with Alice and saw Goathead still resting quietly on the chart table, its hollow black eyes turning toward the door at the sound.

Duncan turned to hang up the consecrated lantern, and behind him he heard Alice already greeting Goathead with some excitement: "Mr. Goathead! I went to the bilge with the captain! The bottom of this ship is amazing! The very lowest cabins are all broken apart—and there's a very strange door!"

Duncan instantly stopped worrying about how to bring up the subject with Goathead. He had almost forgotten that he had a curious, clueless doll with him. Alice's chatter had already opened the conversation for him, hadn't it?

He did his best not to laugh out loud. While he pretended to calmly tidy the room, he pricked up his ears to listen to his two "crew members" talking. Goathead's voice sounded, not at all surprised: "I knew you'd be amazed! Miss Alice, now you see what a great ship the Vanished is, don't you? It can sail in different dimensions at the same time, all while staying safe!"

As Duncan listened, his heart stirred.

Things were indeed as he had guessed. The strange scene outside the cracks in the hull at the bottom of the ship… it was because that place no longer belonged to the time and space of the Boundless Sea!

At the same time he was doing fast calculations in his heart. The curious Alice was fascinated by the strange scenes in the lower decks of the Vanished. She did not dare to ask too many questions of him as "captain", so she preferred to quiz the talkative Goathead. But if he kept standing here eavesdropping, it would look suspicious, and might even make Goathead turn the topic toward him—if it told Alice, “Ask the captain,” he would have no way to answer…

Thinking of this, he immediately made up his mind. He straightened his expression, returned to his usual seriousness, and said calmly: “You two talk here. I’m going to walk outside for a bit. Goathead, Alice is one of the crew now. As long as it’s nothing too secret about this ship, you can tell her.”

As soon as Alice heard that, a happy smile spread across her face. Goathead answered at once, all eagerness: “Of course, Captain. Your loyal—well, you know the rest—has always treated new members warmly…”

Duncan pushed the door open and left the captain’s cabin.

But the second he stepped out, he focused his mind again. Using the close link between himself and the Vanished, he carefully watched what was happening inside the captain’s cabin.

Once he focused his mind on one place, the vague sense he had of the ship turned into clear, real-time surveillance. Everything in the captain’s cabin showed up sharply in Duncan’s mind. He “saw” Alice drag over a stool and sit across from Goathead, excitedly talking about her exploration of the lower decks of the Vanished and describing all the strange sights in the bilge.

She seemed to have completely forgotten about making a late-night snack for the captain—but Duncan did not mind at all.

He appreciated the doll’s godlike assist at this key moment much more.

Under the veil of night, AI suddenly flapped her wings and fluttered up to a nearby mast, as if to stand guard. Duncan walked slowly forward like a captain making a normal patrol of the deck, while in his mind the conversation in the captain’s cabin came through clearly.

Alice had already brought up that strange door with Goathead. The doll's voice sounded nervous: "…That door looked kind of scary. The captain wouldn't even let me get close to it…"

"Of course you can't get close. That door isn't something you can touch. Even I can't touch it—and don't give me that look, I know I don't have hands or feet. When I say 'touch', I mean in another sense… contact, control, understanding, peeking. Do you understand? In that sense, that door must not be touched. If you touch it, you're done for, got it?"

Alice seemed startled by Goathead's unusually serious tone. She hesitated for a second or two before speaking again: "Then… what is that door, really?"

Duncan, pacing on the deck, focused his mind at once. But he heard Goathead fall silent. After a long moment, it spoke in a low voice without answering directly: "You really didn't touch that door, right?"

"I didn't!" Alice answered quickly. But then she hesitated and went on, less sure: "But… but the captain went up to look. He looked through the crack, and he poked at something on the other side with his sword…"

As soon as Alice finished, Duncan suddenly felt the whole ship shudder. Then all the main sails and side sails let out a low wail in the wind, and all the masts and ropes creaked in response—and right now all of that was under Goathead's control!

He looked up in surprise at the swaying masts and rigging, as if he could feel the panic of the one controlling them through their movement. In his mind came a shout from the captain's cabin, Goathead's voice: "What did you say?! You said a crack? That door was open a crack?"

"Y-yeah…" Alice sounded frightened. "The door was only pulled to. There was a crack, about… about as wide as a finger…"

“The captain looked through the crack? And then? He also stabbed through with his sword… Did anything happen to him then? When he led you away, did he seem hesitant or dazed?”

“No,” Alice answered at once. “The captain just looked very serious, then he took me back pretty quickly. On the way he seemed to be thinking about something, but he wasn’t dazed at all. Ah, he even talked with me about cooking. I’m going to the kitchen in a bit…”

“Forget the kitchen for now! Do you know what is behind that door?”

“Ah… what is behind that door?” Alice sounded lost and afraid. She had never seen Goathead so serious and urgent before. It felt to her like the ship was about to sink.

Goathead’s tone suddenly dropped very low. It spoke slowly: “Behind that door is Subspace.”

Duncan, walking on the deck, stopped in his tracks.

Behind that door was Subspace?

He was stunned. The huge wave rising in his heart almost disrupted his monitoring of the captain’s cabin. Then another thought came to him—

The shattered bilge, the dim, chaotic turbulence of light and shadow outside the cracks there—the Vanished was sailing through different dimensions at the same time, and whatever lay outside the bilge was clearly a time and space different from the Mortal Realm. And in the bilge there was a door, and on the other side of that door was Subspace…

Could it be that the lower half of the Vanished was actually sailing inside Subspace?!

And from what Goathead said, this way of sailing did not sound stable. The bilge not only needed the captain to calm it often, but that door was also supposed to stay tightly shut. Now there was a crack… what did that mean? Did it mean that the “sealing” of the bilge had failed? Or that something from Subspace was trying to enter the Vanished?

He remembered how he had tried to close that door before leaving the bilge. No matter how hard he pushed, the door had stayed fixed with that crack open, as solid as if it had merged with space itself.

He had not thought much of it at the time. But now, remembering it, a strange idea rose in his mind.

Maybe… when he had tried to close that door, something on the other side had been bracing against it, stopping him from shutting that passage…

Chapter 62: Interwoven Layers

It was very possible that the bottom of the Vanished had been sailing in Subspace the whole time. This shocking news made Duncan feel very complicated all of a sudden.

He had always known the Vanished was strange and dangerous, but he had never thought it was this strange. He did not know much about Subspace. He might even be less knowledgeable than Nina's history teacher. But at least he knew that Subspace was the most dangerous thing in this world. It was the "Bottom of All Things" that could keep the Saint awake at night and make the Gods deeply wary. It was so terrifying that on ships about to set sail, some superstitious sailors did not even dare to say the word "Subspace" out loud.

Even though Subspace was not a rational deity and would not turn its gaze on people just because they spoke its name, people still feared to mention that word at sea.

But the Vanished, this ghost ship that had wandered for a century, might have been sailing partly in Subspace the whole time. There was even… a door in its lower hull that led into Subspace.

The dim, ruined cabin on the other side of that door was perhaps the part of the Vanished whose structure had been completely taken over and corrupted by Subspace. And that door itself was a seal.

Duncan lowered his head without thinking and looked at the dark deck beneath his feet. His gaze seemed to want to pierce through the planks, to see that broken cabin and the chaotic light and shadow outside it.

He suddenly felt as if he were standing on a powder keg that had already been lit. The small crack of the door was the fuse, and he still did not know how long that fuse was.

But after a brief moment of shock and tension, Duncan slowly came back to himself. Goathead's behavior seemed to reveal another piece of information.

Judging from how panicked it became after hearing what Miss Alice said, it seemed that as long as "Captain Duncan" peeped at Subspace through that crack in the door, something truly terrible was sure to happen afterward.

Even now, Goathead was still in the captain's cabin, asking Miss Alice over and over about the captain's mental state after that. It kept asking if the captain had said anything on the way back, if he had made any strange sounds, or brought out any unusual shadows.

But Duncan knew his own condition very well. He knew he was completely normal now.

The "vision" behind that door had indeed frightened him for a while. He had even, for a brief moment, thought about opening that door. But all of this was only a change in his mind. During the whole process, he had not felt the slightest touch of… "supernatural power".

That fleeting thought passed as quickly as it came, and he did not feel that the door had left any long-term effect on him.

Duncan lowered his head and looked at his own hands, silently checking himself again and again.

Here, his name was Duncan Abnomar. He was the captain of the Vanished.

In another time and space, his name was Zhou Ming. He was an ordinary middle school teacher, trapped in a small studio apartment inside the fog.

Maybe… Goathead was just too nervous? It was only a crack in the door, not an open passage into Subspace.

The Vanished rocked gently on the waves. The masts and ropes creaked. The semi-transparent spirit form sails were still a bit unstable, showing the tension and… “dereliction of duty” of the one controlling them.

Duncan looked up at the sails, then steadied his mind and spoke in a deep voice in the back of his mind: “First Mate, hold your wheel and keep the sails steady.”

“C-captain?” Goathead’s voice sounded at once, with a hint of panic. “Ah, yes! Yes, Captain!”

Duncan did not answer. He simply kept his usual silent and serious air in the mental link. He waited for Goathead to speak. Sure enough, after a few seconds Goathead broke the silence: “Captain, I just heard Miss Alice say… the door in the lower hold opened a crack…”

“Yes,” Duncan replied calmly. “I checked it.”

“You did check it. Miss Alice said you confirmed what was on the other side of the door…” Goathead seemed to be picking its words with care. “Do you feel now… I mean, any slight confusion in your mind? On the other side of that door…”

“Subspace, I know,” Duncan cut him off before Goathead finished. “Do I look out of my mind to you right now? Do not talk in such a roundabout way.”

“Of course, you look completely without any anomaly!” Goathead said at once. “Maybe I am just too nervous. After all, this has never happened before. Ever since you sailed the ship back, the barrier between the Vanished and Subspace has always been stable. I… did not expect the situation to change. This is by no means doubt toward you."

Sailed the ship back? Back from where?

Duncan caught the information hidden in Goathead's words at once and quickly guessed a bit of the truth. But he did not show any reaction. He only said, as if in passing: "From what I can see, the crack in the door is still stable for now, but it may grow wider. I want to hear your thoughts."

"…If it is stable now, that is already good news, Captain," Goathead said, not suspecting anything, but sounding very worried. "As for my advice… to be honest, I do not know what to do. You left that door there with your own hands, and you closed it with your own hands. You never told me what plans you had afterward, and you never said what changes might follow. You have always handled everything in the lower hold yourself…"

"…Right," Duncan followed along at once. "You probably have no advice to give on this."

It seemed Goathead also did not know the full story about the door in the lower hold.

It only knew that on the other side of that door was Subspace, and that nothing good would happen once the door opened. More information… was actually in the hands of the "real Captain Duncan".

But where was he supposed to find the "real Captain Duncan" now?

"Captain…" Goathead's voice sounded in his mind again. "Do you have any plans for what comes next?"

Plans? What plans? Was he supposed to run onto land? With Captain Duncan's reputation as the enemy of the whole world, the Vanished would probably draw an entire fleet to hunt it down the moment it appeared near any city-state. Other than drifting on the sea together with this ship, what else could he do?

Duncan rolled his eyes and tilted his head back helplessly to look at the sky. AI, who had flown up to the mast earlier to pretend to stand guard, now flapped down and landed on his shoulder. The pigeon bobbed its head and squawked: “It is a trap! Abandon ship and escape!”

“Escape? Escape my ass…” Duncan blurted out. Then he suddenly realized something. “Wait, you can hear my conversation with Goathead?”

He had been talking with Goathead through the mental link the whole time. Why had this pigeon suddenly flown down just to say something that fit the moment so well?

The pigeon flapped its wings and looked very full of itself: “Damn it, do not talk. I have my own understanding!”

Suddenly, Duncan felt a little curious about what pigeon soup would taste like.

But he had not forgotten that Goathead was still waiting for him to speak. After steadying himself, he ignored the pigeon on his shoulder that clearly needed a good boiling and went on speaking in his mind: “Just do your own job. I will keep an eye on that door from time to time, as always.”

“Yes, Captain!”

The Vanished slowly steadied. The sails adjusted their angle again, letting the huge ship keep moving forward on the Boundless Sea.

The bow cut through the waves. Fine spray slapped against the hull with a rushing sound.

After ending his talk with Goathead, Duncan walked slowly to the edge of the deck and looked down at the dark sea beneath him.

The water reflected the cold, pale glow of the World's Wound.

He would keep an eye on the door in the lower hold, but simply "watching" that door would not change anything.

He needed more knowledge. He needed to understand and control his power further. Maybe… he also needed some help.

The ship did not have these things. The city-state of Pland might.

Tomorrow, Nina would come back from school. In the days after that, she would return to the antique shop every day after class. Her "Uncle Duncan" would have to be in the shop then.

Before that, he had to move his "main consciousness" back into the city-state. Until he could skillfully control two bodies at the same time, this kind of frequent switch in viewpoint was his only choice.

While making the transfer this time, he also had to let AI run some further tests.

He wanted to see if AI could bring things from the Vanished to that antique shop. If she could, he needed to find out whether there was a limit to what she could carry, and whether "packets" would be dropped if she carried too many items…

All kinds of plans brewed in his mind. At the same time, Duncan let his eyes roam over the rolling waves outside, as if he were casting a gaze on the sea.

The reflection of the World's Wound in the sea looked hazy and chaotic. The scattered pale light was like formless streams of light.

The World's Wound?!

Duncan froze. He suddenly felt that the sky reflected in the sea looked vaguely familiar.

He jerked his head up and looked at the huge crack in the sky, like a wound.

Inside that giant “wound”, dim, chaotic light flowed. Around the wound, the sky was filled with drifting luminous mist. Looking closely, that so-called mist was actually made of countless overlapping, tangled, blurry streams of light.

Just like… the scene outside the broken cabin at the very bottom of the Vanished.

Chapter 63: Return to Port

Duncan kept his eyes fixed on the huge wound in the sky, which gave off a dim glow. It was as if he wanted to find some detail he had seen before in the chaotic flowing light and mist, to prove the shocking guess in his mind.

Was the scene outside the bottom of the Vanished the same as the World's Wound?

If what lay beneath the ship's bottom was Subspace, then was the World's Wound also a part of Subspace? Or at least connected to it in some way?

But in the end he could not see any clues, and the guess in his mind could only stay a guess.

The wound was far too distant. Even if he took out a spyglass, he could not see any more details. From what he could see now, it only looked a little bit like the scene outside the bottom of the Vanished. Rather than saying the two were the same, it was more likely that his nerves were too tight after exploring the lower hold, so he saw danger and connection in everything.

Duncan stood on the deck in the sea breeze for a long time. He thought while he let his mood slowly calm down. He also paid attention to Goathead's side and saw that his "First Mate" seemed to have calmed down as well and was now carefully steering the Vanished.

But Duncan could still keenly feel a vague tension spreading over the ship. This tension seemed to have no single source and soaked into the whole "living" ghost ship. The tall masts, the crossed sails, the ropes piled on the deck… these silent things in the dark all seemed to be whispering nervously and heavily to each other, talking about “that door”.

This was the first time Duncan had directly sensed the emotions of the “ship” in his mind.

It seemed that after he came back from the lower hold, his bond with the ship had grown deeper.

Now the entire ship was watching the captain, watching for any anomaly in him after he had peeped at what lay beyond that door.

The evening wind blew against his face. Duncan took a deep breath and slowly walked toward the captain’s cabin. His fingers tapped lightly on the rail by the side of the ship as he said, almost as if talking to himself: “Relax, this matter is nothing special.”

This time he clearly felt the change. The tension that filled the ship slowly faded. The ropes were no longer taut. The sails lifted with more spirit, and even the faint creaks from under the deck gradually died away.

It seemed the ship had finally confirmed that the captain was still the captain.

Duncan came back to the door of the captain’s cabin. But instead of pulling it open and walking in as usual, he hesitated a bit, took hold of the handle, and pushed the door inward.

The door opened. Inside was a mass of rolling black mist.

Duncan stepped toward the black mist. The pigeon AI, who had still been resting on his shoulder, suddenly flapped her wings and flew to a mast not far away, crying as she went: “Road ahead closed, road ahead closed!”

Duncan looked curiously at the pigeon that had suddenly fled, but still took one more step forward.

He returned to his familiar studio apartment.

Zhou Ming lowered his head and checked his body at this moment: familiar hands, familiar shirt, familiar trousers. He was not as strong as Captain Duncan but just an ordinary human being.

Then he lifted his head again and looked around the room.

Everything was exactly the same as when he had left. There was not even more dust.

Zhou Ming looked thoughtfully at the furniture in the room. Then he suddenly turned his head toward the door. He looked at the door of his studio apartment and recalled the door he had seen in the lower hold of the Vanished, remembering the position and angle of that crack.

He stood in the matching spot, first imagining that someone was standing on the other side of the door. Then he looked in the direction opposite the door.

From the crack in the door, one could indeed see the center of the room and the somewhat messy desk there. On the desk sat a computer and other odds and ends. He usually worked at that desk, reading and writing or grading his students' homework and test papers.

Zhou Ming slowly opened the door a crack and bit by bit moved his eye up close to it.

At that moment, he felt his heart pounding. His reason told him that his thoughts made no sense, but he could not help thinking… would an eye suddenly appear on the other side of the crack? Would a ghost ship captain with a gloomy, stern face suddenly appear? Would a pirate sword suddenly stab in?

He pressed closer and peered outside.

Outside there was only rolling, surging black mist, just like always.

Zhou Ming let out a sudden sigh of relief. Yet for some reason he also felt a weird sense of loss, as if his expectations had been dashed and he had missed out on some fun.

He shook his head hard, throwing off that strange mood, and then slowly walked to the desk. Everything he had left in the room before leaving was still there, including the scrap paper covered in random doodles, the neatly arranged journal, and the computer screen that still glowed even though the power had been cut.

It seemed that nothing had changed.

Zhou Ming exhaled, but suddenly his expression froze.

There was a change!

His eyes locked on a corner of the desk. In that unremarkable spot, there was now a small new object. It was an extremely delicate ornament, a lifelike model, a ship… the Vanished.

Zhou Ming felt as if lightning had struck him. He sat frozen in his chair for a full half minute. He was a hundred percent sure that this ornament had never been on his desk before… especially since the ornament was a “model” of the Vanished!

After a long time, he finally blinked and reached out to carefully pick up the “model” that had somehow appeared on his desk. He held it in his hands and examined it closely in front of his eyes.

This lifelike “ghost ship” was only a bit more than half a foot long. It weighed about the same as any ordinary model in his hands. Yet it was so detailed. Zhou Ming studied it for a long time. He could even see every rope and every bucket on the deck…

Compared with the real Vanished, the only difference in this ship might be its size.

All of a sudden, Zhou Ming seemed to think of something. He brought the ship closer to his face and carefully “pried” open the door of the captain’s cabin at the stern with a fingertip. He peered through the tiny doorway and searched inside.

On the tiny chart table inside, he could not see any sign of Goathead.

Likewise, he could not see Alice anywhere on the ship.

Zhou Ming felt a strange feeling rise in his heart. He did not know why he had thought that “Alice” would show up on this miniature version of the Vanished. That was clearly far too ridiculous.

Maybe it was the appearance of this ship itself that was too ridiculous.

Zhou Ming held the tiny Vanished in his hands and thought for a very long time.

He did not know how the ship had appeared on his desk, but it was clear that the link between his sealed-off studio apartment and the “world beyond the door” was deeper than he had thought.

The change might have happened after he began “steering” the ship. It might also have happened after he peeped at Subspace through that crack in the door.

He leaned back against the chair and let his mind slowly grow calm.

He found that he could still “feel” what was on the other side of the door. He could feel the Vanished and feel Goathead. He could even… feel the distant city-state of Pland and the other “body” in that antique shop.

He did not know how long he stayed lost in thought like this before he suddenly blinked as if waking up. He looked at the ghost ship still resting in his hands, then looked at an empty shelf at the far end of the room.

He had bought that shelf years ago, but until the Visions came, he had never found a chance to fill it. Now there were only a few decorative crystal bottles he had been tricked into buying online. All the other compartments were empty.

Zhou Ming carried the Vanished over and carefully set the delicate “model” on the shelf.

After placing it, he stepped back two paces and carefully looked at his “work”, seeming quite pleased with the spot he had chosen.

How this thing had appeared here was still a mystery. But at least… in these days of being trapped, he could decorate his little home a bit more.

…

A loud, long steam whistle broke the calm on the sea. Vanna, who had arrived early at the Harbor, walked at once to the edge of the lookout tower and gazed toward the docks.

The entire Harbor had been cleared ahead of time. The once busy main port of Pland was now empty. There were no ordinary loading workers or clerks on the docks anymore. In their place stood fully armed constable units and Guardians from the Church.

Twelve Steam Walkers blocked all roads leading into the dock area.

Out on the water beyond the harbor, between the gently rising waves, a handsome steam-powered ship was slowly drawing closer.

The White Oak.

Chapter 64: The White Oak Ran Into Duncan

The White Oak had returned. After a long loss of contact and a drift off The route, this advanced steamship under the Explorer Association finally came back to the city-state of Pland.

Many people had been waiting for this ship to come home. Countless eyes stared at the silhouette that slowly drew closer over the sea, watching it with tense, almost gaze.

Inquisitor Vanna saw that, as soon as the White Oak's whistle sounded, the people on the pier moved at once.

The workers in charge of mental guidance for docking ships were already in position. They began to send signals to the White Oak with lamps and flags. Guardians under the Church went to activate the Deep Sea sacred relics that had been placed all over Pier One the night before. These were many bronze Boundary Stele. The base of each stele was carved with the name of the storm Goddess Gamona, and the groove at the top was filled with holy oils and spices. Once these Boundary Stele were activated, the area where the White Oak would dock would be sealed off and become a "Sanctum" under the Goddess's gaze.

Farther back stood Constables sent by City Hall. These ordinary people were not good at dealing with supernatural things, so their main job was to use heavy firepower to block every intersection. Ordinary guns and cannons could hardly deal with strange, shapeless curses. But if something with a solid body, something already under corruption, ran off the White Oak, then eight-millimeter bullets and four?pound guns would still be very useful.

Sometimes Vanna could not help feeling grateful for the progress of technology. These fruits of engineering gave weak, powerless ordinary people at least some strength to take part in events that involved the supernatural. The results of that progress were mixed, good and bad, but at least… support from rotary machine guns and artillery had greatly reduced the Church's casualties in these past years.

Vanna's gaze passed over the pier and went to the distant sea.

The White Oak let out a second blast from its whistle. Guided by the Light-Signal lamps on the shore, the ship began to slow. It then stopped at a distance from the pier.

A priest standing beside Vanna finally let out a small breath and said in a low voice: "The White Oak followed the order. It looks like the ship is still under 'human' control, at least."

"We cannot say that yet. Many people under the influence of an Anomaly or Visions still looked normal until the very moment they changed," Vanna shook her head. "Send the second set of signals. Dispatch the inspection boat. Tell the Coastal Guns to stay ready at all times. As soon as anything strange happens on that ship… open fire."

The order from the Inquisitor spread down the chain very quickly. Since the White Oak's communication device had already been damaged, the people on shore could only talk with the ship by lights and flags. After a complicated exchange of lamps and flag signals, three lights lit up at the bow of the White Oak. Right after that, a rope ladder dropped down from her side.

A small fast boat left the pier and rushed toward the White Oak, driven by a small Steam Engine.

A full Guardian squad rode that boat. It included eight combatants, one Commander, and one Deep Sea priest. These loyal Clerics lit incense on the small boat and chanted the holy name of the storm Goddess. When they came close to the White Oak, they did not board right away. They first circled once around the big ship and sprinkled Holy Oil mixed with seaweed extract into the nearby sea.

Once these oils fell into the sea, they began to glow faintly at once. The light slowly spread and joined together, until it formed a ring that fully wrapped around the White Oak.

Only after all this did the Clerics on the boat truly move in close to the White Oak and climb aboard along the rope ladder.

All of this fell into the eyes of Vanna up in the watchtower.

Letting a ship that had once gone missing at sea “come home” was extremely dangerous, especially when it was a long-range ship that had carried Anomalies. The White Oak could not come alongside the pier directly. First, it had to accept a boarding inspection from the small boat at a safe distance. Only after the first check showed no clear sign of corruption by an Eldritch God could it move closer to Pland’s pier. Even then, the people on the ship still could not disembark. They had to undergo a second round of checks by the Clergy. At the same time, the whole ship would face a much stricter, complete search and purification. After that, everyone on board would still have to stay under observation in the Cathedral on the pier for several days at the least, or several weeks at the longest. The entire ship also had to be fumigated with incense and purification for at least a week.

Only when all these steps were finished, and nothing went wrong at any point, would the civilized world dare to welcome these people who had gone astray at sea back home. If any step went wrong, the White Oak and her crew members would have to be buried in the ocean.

The storm Goddess would receive the souls of these poor people.

This rule, cold to the point of cruelty, did not come from anyone's malice. It was the "way of survival" that human society had found after growing to this day.

Of course, there were also city-states that did not want to follow, or failed to follow, these harsh rules. Most of those city-states now appeared in the first two units of the second volume of the middle-school history textbook and were standard questions on the final exam.

Time passed second by second. Everyone waited for the Guardian squad that had boarded the ship to send back a signal. There were only two possible signals. If everything was safe, the squad would send a docking request through special Psychic Communication. If the ship had already fallen to corruption, the squad would fight until the last person and try to blow up the Nitroglycerin on their small boat before they all died.

On an Ocean-Going Vessel the size of the White Oak, if it really fell under deep corruption by Subspace or something like it, a small boarding party like this could not possibly come back alive.

Vanna crossed her arms and tapped lightly on the metal of her arm guard.

All of a sudden, the bell in the small Cathedral on the pier began to ring. The steam relief pipes on both sides of the bell tower let out three long blasts.

The priests in the Cathedral had received the coded message from the inspection squad. The Cathedral's bells and whistle blasts now told every group on the pier:

The ship was safe. The White Oak was asking to dock, and there was a special situation to report.

Vanna finally let out a breath.

At least for now, that ship seemed normal. That alone was the best news.

As for the “special situation” to report… she was not surprised at all.

A ship that had gone missing in such a strange way coming back into port, and there was nothing special to report? That would have been the truly strange thing.

The White Oak slowly drew alongside the pier. This long-range ship that had gone through so many twists and turns finally came back to the pier of the civilized world. The people on board had not been allowed to disembark yet, but they could surely relax a little now.

More Church Guardians began to board in an orderly way to prepare for a full search and questioning. Vanna also left the watchtower. She personally led a group of priests down to the pier. She walked across the long gangway and finally set foot on the deck of the White Oak. There, on the foredeck, she saw the tall, broad-shouldered captain with graying hair.

The old captain looked a bit worn out. It was clear he had been working under heavy stress for too long. But when he saw the Church’s Inquisitor coming closer, the old man still straightened at once and stepped forward to meet Vanna.

“Hello, I am Inquisitor Vanna of the Deep Sea Church of the city-state of Pland, Captain Lawrence,” Vanna said. She did not like empty formalities, so she chose to get straight to the point. “Let us skip the self-introductions. First, I must apologize. I hope you and your crew members can understand these strict checks by the authority of the city-state and the Church.”

“Of course, Inquisitor,” Lawrence nodded at once. He had wanted to say “Inquisitor miss,” because Vanna looked about the same age as his own daughter, but at the last second he changed it to the more respectful title. “I expected this long ago. After all… we were out of contact for so long.”

Vanna nodded: “Tell me briefly what the White Oak went through. Why did you lose contact? And why did you later show up on an unregistered route? As for the cargo you were escorting, Anomaly 099, what is its status?”

At these words, Lawrence’s face filled with dismay and tension. He sighed and, almost without thinking, glanced quickly around. Only then did he speak slowly: “You may not believe this. We… ran into that legendary ship, the Vanished…”

Right in front of him, the stern-faced Inquisitor miss suddenly froze like stone. A strange expression fixed on her face.

Lawrence could not tell what this expression meant. To him, it looked almost the same as how he had felt a few days ago after being rammed by the Vanished.

“Inquisitor… ma’am?” Lawrence asked carefully. “You…”

“Captain Lawrence,” Vanna seemed to wake up all at once and stared hard at the captain. “Say that again.”

“I said you may not believe this…”

“The second half.”

“We ran into that legendary ship, the Vanished…”

“I believe you.”

Lawrence blinked: “Then…”

“You and your people may have to stay at the pier a few more days, Captain,” Vanna said with a very serious face. “This matter is serious. Very serious. You… wait. You ran into the Vanished, and everyone still lived?”

The Inquisitor miss’s expression shifted a little. A hint of doubt appeared in her eyes. Seeing this, Lawrence quickly spread his hands: “Our people are fine. But the Vanished took Anomaly 099. That is the Doll spirit coffin. I suspect that ghost ship came for the Doll spirit coffin.”

“The Vanished took Anomaly 099?” Vanna frowned. Then she asked: “And after that? It just let you go?”

“Y-yes,” Lawrence grew nervous as well and faintly felt he had guessed something. “Inquisitor, recently in the city… did something happen…”

“…There is no harm in telling you, since it now seems your ‘contact’ may be deeper than ours,” Vanna sighed and looked at the old captain. “Captain Lawrence, you may not be the only person who has dealt with the Vanished lately. Let us find a quiet place. I need to know more.”

Chapter 65: Guillotine

The captain’s cabin of the White Oak had been turned into a temporary Sanctum.

The smell of incense drifted through the room. charm amulets painted with Storm Runes hung on every door and window. priests had also placed bronze Boundary Stele in the four corners of the room and tied strips of cloth soaked in Holy Oil to the tops of the stele. Last of all, a copy of the Storm Canon from the great Cathedral was brought into the room to serve as the “pillar” of the Sanctum.

Only after all these arrangements were complete did Captain Lawrence and Inquisitor Vanna enter the cabin together.

“I hope you do not mind this ‘remodeling’ of your room,” Vanna said calmly. She kept the reserve and proper manners that suited a high-ranking Cleric. “It is all for safety.”

“Of course. All for safety. Right now, safety is exactly what I lack the most,” Captain Lawrence nodded in full understanding at once. He looked around at all the holy objects in the room and felt himself relax a little. “With all these here, ordinary twisted things of corruption would probably die just from stepping inside and taking one look…”

“You can feel at ease talking with me about the Vanished in here,” Vanna nodded. “Start from the very beginning. Where did you see that ship, and how did it appear?”

Captain Lawrence took a breath and began to calmly retell the most terrifying day in his memory: “It was like this…”

Captain Lawrence spoke in great detail. In front of a professional Inquisitor, he even told her exactly what he had eaten for breakfast that day and the exact time the sailors had started their meal. For the parts he truly could not recall, he turned to the captain’s log and the sailors’ journals for that day.

Experienced captains all knew one thing. Before many Anomaly events fully appeared, there were often signs that seemed ordinary. At the time, people might find it hard to see the links between these things. But later, professionals looking back could find clues in those daily details and draw lessons to warn others.

Every captain on the Boundless Sea kept a log of the voyage. At the same time, reading one’s own log was, besides reading Church classics, the only safe “reading” on the Boundless Sea.

When Vanna finished listening to this shocking account, her bold brows had slowly drawn together.

The situation was more serious than she had thought, and also stranger than she had thought.

She had first believed that when Captain Lawrence said “we ran into it,” he meant only a brief encounter, or at most that they had brushed past that ghost ship. In that case, the terrifying captain of the Vanished might have only taken the cargo and left the crew unharmed. She had never expected that it had actually been a direct collision.

The whole White Oak had crashed right into the hull of the Vanished. The whole ship, from top to bottom, had been swept over once by that green ghostly flame.

According to Captain Lawrence, at that time the White Oak had even started to transform into the Vanished. He had clearly seen his own body shifting into a spirit form state.

The Holy beacons on the ship had been shut down. The sacred relic in the hold had not reacted. The defensive materials added into the hull had done nothing. The priests could barely protect themselves. The whole ship had sunk deep into the Spirit Realm and could not send any call for help to the outside. It was fair to say that, at that moment, the White Oak had already become that captain's prey. There had been no chance for any "lucky escape."

The only reason Captain Lawrence could still stand here now was that the Vanished had given up this prize without hesitation.

"Inquisitor," after he finally finished his story, Captain Lawrence could not help speaking when he saw that Vanna stayed silent for a long time. "What do you think the Vanished was trying to do back then? Did it really only want Anomaly 099?"

Vanna looked at him: "Was that not what you always thought?"

"I… I did always think that, but now I am no longer sure," Lawrence sighed. "Especially after you just said that ghost captain recently stretched his power into the city-state of Pland… I keep feeling it cannot be that simple."

"No one can guess what that ghost captain is thinking," Vanna shook her head. "All we can do now is carry out the most thorough checks on the White Oak to keep it from bringing in any 'intruder.' You and your crew members will also have to suffer some hardship. Before the investigation is over, you may not meet with anyone except Church priests… including family visitors."

Captain Lawrence lowered his head: “I understand.”

He paused for a moment, then added: “Then… about the theft of Anomaly 099…”

Vanna knew what the captain was worried about.

The strange, terrifying Visions on the sea hung over civilization as a threat. But before thinking about such distant, great dangers, this captain was first a normal man who had to feed his family. Losing Anomaly 099 was a burden too heavy to place on an ordinary person.

“Do not worry. The Church will report this matter to the city-state authority and the Explorer Association,” she said in a calm voice. “The appearance of the Vanished counts as force majeure. The loss of Anomaly 099 is not your fault. Even if a Cathedral ship had been in charge of the escort that day, the result would likely have been the same.”

The expression on Captain Lawrence’s face clearly relaxed a little.

Yet there was one thing Vanna did not say aloud. In the end, Anomalies always walked the line between sealing and a runaway state. Every year, new Anomalies lost control. City-state residents died under the influence of strange things again and again. For hundreds and thousands of years, the Church had fought these Anomalies in their runaway state. In this long, huge balance of terror, the loss of a single Anomaly was not impossible to imagine, even if its number was under one hundred.

But as an Inquisitor, she could not say such things.

“Also…” At this moment, Captain Lawrence broke the silence again, though he sounded a bit hesitant. “I would like to ask… what exactly is so special about Anomaly 099?”

He paused there, then quickly added: “Of course, when I took the escort job I did receive a file, but it mostly covered how to keep Anomaly 099 sealed and how to handle it in the first stage of a runaway state. It did not say anything about where this Anomaly came from or what would happen in a full runaway state… You know, it is an Anomaly numbered under one hundred. The more ordinary people around it know about it, the more likely it is to go into a runaway state. I do understand that rule.

“But now Anomaly 099 has already been taken by the Vanished. By the rules, it should now count as fully in a runaway state, so…”

“I can tell you,” Vanna said with a nod before Captain Lawrence could finish. “Anomaly 099 has already left the control of civilized society. By regulation, its data will be shared with the Adventurer Association and the supernatural teams of the city-states to help capture and reseal it later. You are a member of the Adventurer Association and the last person to come into contact with Anomaly 099, so you should know this information.”

She stopped to think for a moment. Then, as she sorted through what she knew, she spoke slowly: “Anomaly 099, Doll spirit coffin. On the outside, it looks like a fancy wooden box, like a spirit coffin. Inside it is a Doll in a sleeping state. The Doll has silver hair and a purple dress. Her body is similar in size to a human.

“This Anomaly was first found in the northern Frost Sea. The Doll inside looks almost exactly like Ray Nora, the queen of Frostholm who was executed by Rebel decapitation about half a century ago. But there is no clear proof that links the two.

“This Anomaly has no will of its own. It has no mind. But it is very likely that, driven by instinct, it will actively sense the outside world and affect it.

“You should already know the sealing method for Anomaly 099, so I will not repeat that. As for its danger…

“First, the Doll spirit coffin has a ‘settling’ tendency. Once it stays for a long time in one area, it will treat that place as its own territory. After that, it becomes very hard to move it again. It will start to spread its influence in its settled place. At the same time, the strength of the seal will quickly weaken and it will become easier and easier for it to enter a runaway state. This is also a shared trait of quite a few Anomalies. Because of this, Anomaly 099 must be moved and resealed often to keep it from overgrowing.

“Next, when the Doll spirit coffin is in a runaway state, all humanoid beings within a certain range around it will be used as test targets. That includes humans, elves, Senkin, and gyproans. This range can be as short as a hundred meters or as long as nearly a thousand. It will grow with the time Anomaly 099 has ‘settled.’ The exact check standard is still unclear. What we do know is that whoever is chosen as a target will at once lose control of their body like a Puppet on strings. They will then move without knowing it, kneel, and bow in the direction of the Doll spirit coffin, just like city-state citizens bow to their Queen. As soon as this action is complete… the victim is decapitated on the spot.

“This decapitation cannot be dodged, blocked, or resisted. Any blessing on the victim or any armor they wear is useless. The only condition is that ‘the Doll has chosen you.’ Once the victim finishes the action, they will be in a state as if they have already been decapitated. After the decapitation, the Doll will stay quiet for four to six hours. Then it will start looking for the next target, until no one is left alive in range or the spirit coffin is sealed again.

“When the Doll spirit coffin is in a runaway state, it can move. Its speed is very fast and its strength is very great. It will break free from capture in all kinds of shocking ways. The spirit coffin itself is also very tough. So once it goes into a runaway state, its danger grows even further.

“In the several runaway state events of the Doll spirit coffin, only one Saint lived through it. But that Saint happened to have the bloodline of the northern city-state of Frostholm. Because of that, we cannot tell whether it was the Saint’s power that stopped the curse, or whether his bloodline simply met the Doll spirit coffin’s ‘pardon’ condition.”

While he listened to the young Inquisitor’s calm and smooth explanation, Captain Lawrence felt the hair on his body stand up one by one.

His first thought was: the authority’s money was truly not easy to earn!

No wonder the pay for escorting Anomaly 099 was almost five times the pay for escorting normal Anomalies. This kind of deadly power ignored defense and dodging, and it only needed the condition “the Doll has set its eyes on you” to take effect. On an Ocean-Going Vessel where there was no way to run, it was almost a sure thing that once it entered a runaway state, everyone on board would die.

Only the captains in the Explorer Association, who specialized in “extreme survival,” would take on a job like that.

At the same time, he heard Inquisitor Vanna’s voice continue: “Because of such strange and terrible power, when the Church filed Anomaly 099, it gave this ability a special name. The name came from the tool used to execute the Frostholm queen by Rebel decapitation half a century ago:

“Alice Guillotine.”

Chapter 66: A Beautiful Morning on the Vanished

“Alice! Watch your head!”

The beautiful morning aboard the Vanished began with the captain’s powerful shout echoing across the deck.

Duncan stood outside the captain’s cabin, pointing at a doll’s head hanging from a nearby beam. The corner of his eye twitched for a long moment before he finally saw a doll’s body in a deep purple Brother long dress scramble up from the side and hurriedly take down the head dangling in midair.

With a crisp “pop” in the air, Miss Doll snapped her head back in place, then trotted over: “Hehe…”

“Hehe what? What are you ‘hehe’-ing about? Why did you hang your head at my door first thing in the morning?” Duncan glared at the cursed Doll, who liked to pull tricks every few days. To be honest, if anyone opened their door early in the morning and saw a head drifting in the breeze at the threshold, they would jump out of their skin. It was only because he had been on this ship long enough, and his nerves were tougher than before, that he didn’t faint on the spot. “And don’t tell me you were on lookout – we have a pigeon for that.”

“I washed my hair this morning…” Alice hunched her neck and answered carefully. “It just wouldn’t dry, so I thought I’d hang it up higher to let the wind blow on it…”

Duncan: “…”

Alice peeked at Duncan nervously: “Captain… are you mad?”

“You… are reasonable.”

Duncan held it in for a long time before he could squeeze out that line. While he fought the twitching of his facial muscles, he had to admit that, judging from Alice’s lifestyle as “Anomaly 099”, there was nothing wrong with hanging her head higher to let it air-dry.

The winch on the ship even treated taking naps as a habit, and the bucket used to scrub the deck rolled to the stern every afternoon to bask in the Sun. Life on this ship demanded a broad mind.

From that angle, this doll Alice, who had adapted to life on the ship, really had become one with the vessel…

“I’m glad you’re not angry, Captain!” Alice immediately smiled. She seemed to have not only adapted to life on this ship, but also gotten used to, or rather understood, the captain’s temper. She still felt awe toward this powerful ghost captain, but she was no longer just simply afraid as she had been at first. Now she was much more relaxed, even daring to bargain with him: “Then later, can I still hang my head…”

“No. Anywhere is fine except in front of the captain’s cabin door. Find yourself another spot.” Duncan shot the doll a look. “I don’t want to open my door and see a crew member’s head hanging there, or a headless body swaying around outside.”

Alice could only lower her head honestly: “Oh, okay.”

Duncan still watched her, looking thoughtful.

“Captain?” Alice felt a little creeped out under his gaze. “Why are you staring at me like that…”

“I just suddenly thought of something,” Duncan said as he pondered. “You shed hair, right? Do you lose hair when you wash it too? Then… will you go bald?”

Alice froze on the spot. Her expression looked just like pigeon AI when it glitched and locked up.

After a long moment, her eyes suddenly widened. She stared at Duncan in shock: “I… I… I never even thought about that! Captain, you…”

Her voice was almost breaking into a sob at the end, but she still didn’t dare say the last few words. What she actually wanted to ask was, “Captain, are you a devil?” but she was afraid Mr. Goathead would scold her for that, for underestimating the captain’s power and making the greatest calamity on the sea sound too kind…

Duncan didn’t care about whatever words Alice swallowed back. His thoughts had already wandered far: “Look, you can walk and jump and talk, but your body is still like a real doll’s. You don’t need to eat or drink, and even if a joint falls off, you can just shove it back in. So can I understand it this way: your hair is a nonrenewable resource. If you wash it too much, you’ll go bald… and if you comb it too much, you’ll go bald too?”

Alice was about to cry: “Captain, why would you think of something so scary…”

Duncan: “Actually, I’ve wanted to ask ever since you cooked that fish head soup.”

Sad as she was, Alice still blinked at that: “But I only cooked fish soup…”

Duncan replied with perfect confidence: “Nonsense. There was fish, there were heads, and there was soup. How is that not fish head soup?”

Alice: “…Captain, you’re reasonable.”

The beautiful morning on the Vanished began with everyone agreeing that the other was reasonable.

Miss Doll left in a daze, as if she suddenly had some major life issue about her future to think over. Duncan, meanwhile, felt in a good mood. He took in a breath of sea breeze, then ate a simple breakfast. It was made up of fish fillets Alice had grilled yesterday, chopped cheese, and strong liquor from the city-state of Pland. It was not very delicious, but it was currently the top-tier meal on the Vanished.

Inside the enchanted sea chart room in the captain's cabin, Goathead watched the cheerful Duncan curiously: "Captain, what happened to Miss Alice? I noticed she returned to the cabin absentmindedly and bumped into her door twice when she went back to her room… She seems very preoccupied?"

"She's facing a major life challenge. I think for quite a long time you won't have to worry about her fighting with the strange things on the ship," Duncan said, swirling the liquor in his glass with a mischievous grin. "But I really am curious about one thing…"

"Ah? Curious about what?"

"If a cursed Doll's hair all falls out, will she really turn into a bald doll?" Duncan began to discuss very seriously with Goathead. "For an supernatural thing like that, shouldn't there be some kind of supernatural power to guarantee… hmm, to guarantee a certain state? It's a pity I didn't have time to discuss it with Alice before she ran off."

Goathead: "…"

Duncan gave this usually noisy fellow a curious look: "Why aren't you saying anything?"

Goathead held it in for a long time before finally squeezing out a line: “You truly deserve to be the most terrifying calamity on the Boundless Sea… Even if you killed me, I could never think of a question like that.”

Duncan shrugged and stood up from behind the chart table.

“I’m going to head out again,” he said to Goathead. At the same time he snapped his fingers, and a cluster of emerald flame burst out of thin air. The undead bird-form pigeon AI descended from the fire and landed on his shoulder. “Same as usual, you’re in charge of the helm.”

“As you command, Captain. Your loyal, et cetera, will not let you down!” Goathead answered in an immediately rising tone, then asked curiously, “Captain, you seem… very keen on Spirit Realm walking lately. Is there something on land that has caught your interest?”

Duncan didn’t answer right away. He thought for a moment before speaking: “I suddenly realized recently that after a century of development, this world has become a little more interesting.”

He gave this answer after weighing it carefully. The sentence did not reveal any specific information, nor did it expose his lack of knowledge. At the same time, it planted a reasonable seed that would make it seem more normal when he later started paying frequent attention to the world on land. If necessary, it could also serve as a reasonable motive for the Vanished to return to the civilized world.

Besides, this answer should not clash too much with the image of “Captain Duncan”.

The greatest calamity on the Boundless Sea could also be someone who just wanted entertainment – and someone who wanted entertainment could accept anything.

As expected, Goathead showed no strange reaction at all, as if every decision Captain Duncan made was only natural: “Oh, you’re right. After so many years, those frail city-states should have come up with something to interest you. It’s normal if you want to use them to pass the time… In that case, should the Vanished make some preparations? Which one are you planning to invade? Pland? Lunsa? Or the more northern Frostholm?”

Duncan silently nodded along at the first half of Goathead’s words, thinking that this top lackey really did know how to read his master’s mood and play along. But when he heard the second half, his blood almost ran cold. The guy had gone from cooperating to egging him on. He had to cut him off at once: “When did I ever say I was going to invade any city-state? Something interesting has just appeared. Wouldn’t it be a shame to destroy it?”

“Ah… yes, you’re right. My suggestion was too rash,” Goathead quickly changed his tune. “I thought you planned to sail over for a spin in the future… Of course, since you have no such idea, that suggestion should be thrown out. Actually, that’s good too. After all, the big city-states still have some strength. Rushing too close would be a bit risky…”

“Don’t casually bring up invading city-states in the future.” Duncan gave Goathead a look and then added another layer of warning just in case. “We’ve been off track from the world for a hundred years. Now I need to get a new grasp of how civilized society has changed. That may involve many long-term changes. Before I give a clear order, don’t make any extra plans.”

“I will strictly follow your orders, Captain.”

Chapter 67: New Connections

Goathead was a dangerous fellow. Duncan had known that from the start. Its danger was not only that it was an Anomaly with unclear origins, but also that it had once sworn loyalty to the real Captain Duncan and even now still acted and thought according to the old rules.

In Goathead's eyes, the city-states on land were meaningless, the mortals in the city-states were ignorant and laughable, the weak city-state fleets were all food, and plundering and hunting them down was the Vanished's natural "daily routine".

Duncan did not know how long it would take to adjust Goathead's way of thinking, but he knew the process had to be subtle. Using reasonable excuses to change his own behavior and the Vanished's style of action was the safest way.

He cast one last glance at Goathead, who was quietly on standby on the chart table, and confirmed that it had already taken over the Vanished's sails and steering system. Only then did he push open the door and walk into his cabin.

This afternoon, Nina would return to the antique shop, and before that, he needed pigeon AI to complete more test tasks.

The door leading to the captain's room closed. In the dim light, Goathead quietly fixed its gaze on the door for a long, silent time. Only after it was sure the captain's consciousness had set out on a Spirit Realm walk did it mutter to itself softly: "Truly not affected by Subspace…"

In the gloom, the wooden Goathead creaked as it turned. It seemed to be looking around the room, yet also as if its gaze passed through the walls and swept over the whole ship.

“Oh, Vanished, Vanished… just what terrifying thing did you dredge up back then…”

…

Duncan had already returned to that familiar dark space. He felt his will stretch out among countless starlights and faint light lines. The two ends of its path were the Vanished and the antique shop in the city-state of Pland.

It seemed that as this “double connection” lasted longer, the feeling grew clearer as well. Now he did not even need to focus on purpose to sense what was happening on the antique shop’s side, and he could even remotely control the body in the shop to do some simple daily activities.

That was obviously a good thing. An antique shopkeeper who “slept” in the store more than half the time would clearly arouse suspicion. Even if that body just got up now and then to move around and stood at the door for a minute or two, it would dispel many unnecessary gazes.

Duncan did not immediately transfer his main consciousness to Pland. Instead, he stopped in the dark space, carefully feeling the changes within it, then turned to look beside him.

In the vast darkness, AI, in her bone-pigeon form, was circling silently. Her ghostly body scattered flecks of green fire as she flew. At the center of the area where AI circled were a few vague phantoms.

Among those phantoms were the Sun charm amulet he had brought aboard the Vanished earlier, an old, simple short dagger, a piece of cheese, a round cannonball, and a stiff dried salted fish.

These were all “test items” he had prepared before setting out, meant to further test AI’s ability to carry objects and any changes during the process.

The short dagger had been found in the cabins and might once have belonged to a sailor. It was a mindless “ordinary item”. The cheese was taken from the kitchen and had the property of not spoiling. The cannonball came from the magazine. The dried fish was one of the catches from the last fishing trip, just dried in the last two days. It was not fully dried yet, but already hard as a board.

Duncan watched AI circling around those phantoms and nodded slightly: “So this is how you carry objects every time.”

AI flapped her wings and gave a hoarse, sharp cry: “Hold on tight, hold on tight!”

Duncan chuckled, then focused his mind, ready to project his main consciousness.

But the instant he gathered his attention, he suddenly saw a strange glimmer appear at the end of the stream of light pointing toward Pland.

Duncan stopped at once and stared in surprise at that light which was now shining among the countless dim stars. It seemed the glow had already been there all along, but only turned from dark to bright in the instant he focused, as if being noticed had made it start to give off a clear sense of presence.

What was that?

Puzzled, Duncan tried to move toward that glimmer. With just a thought, he crossed the vast darkness. The glimmer swelled quickly before his eyes and turned into a flowing stream of light.

Only then did he see that between himself and that flowing light there was a faint line of connection, just like the link between his real body on the Vanished and the spare body in the antique shop.

Was this… another spare vessel waiting to be chosen?

Such a thought surfaced in Duncan's mind, but he soon shook his head. The flowing light in front of him was on a much larger scale than the light points that represented bodies. With such a broad glow, it was more likely not a vessel, but some huge object that had formed a connection with him.

Hesitating, he finally made up his mind and reached out to carefully touch that light…

The next second, a vast and unfamiliar sensation surged into his mind. He could not see the things around him, but he felt sea wind brushing over his body and waves gently rising and falling around him. He felt many people moving around him, even walking on his body. He heard voices talking from all directions, but all the sounds were mixed together and seemed to come through thick curtains, completely unclear.

He vaguely realized that he was sensing the environment through the perspective of some huge object. But this giant was not suitable for his spirit to descend into directly, or perhaps some power was protecting it and blocking his power from fully entering. Because of that, all his senses felt delayed and muffled.

This giant seemed to be resting on the sea near the shore, with many people gathered there.

A tense and serious atmosphere filled the crowd. They seemed to be solemnly dealing with some dangerous factor, and everyone's conversations were low and brief.

Duncan tried hard to focus, wanting to hear what exactly those voices, muffled as if through thick curtains, were talking about.

He worked at it for a long time before he finally picked out a single word that kept being repeated from the overlapping buzzing voices – the White Oak.

Duncan drew back the hand touching the light stream and stared, a bit stunned, at the floating glow before him.

The glow drifted in the darkness, faintly forming the outline of a ship.

The White Oak… The name sounded somewhat familiar, but he could not remember when he had heard it.

Duncan thought hard, digging through his memories until some rough impressions surfaced. He recalled the ship he had crashed into while he was steering for the first time in the Spirit Realm. He remembered that when the Vanished passed straight through it, he seemed to have seen its name on one side of the hull… That ship seemed to be called the White Oak.

Right after that, he remembered the newspaper he had bought in Pland. In an inconspicuous section, it had mentioned this as well, saying that the long-distance ship White Oak, missing for several days, would be docking soon…

Duncan stared blankly at the floating glow before him.

This was the White Oak, the White Oak that had been responsible for escorting Anomaly 099.

It seemed that the old captain who had tried to shout at him and his crew members had finally reached Pland safely. That was actually quite pleasing.

Clearly, he had formed a connection with this ship.

Had the connection been formed after that Spirit Realm collision back then? Because the flames of the Vanished had spread onto the White Oak at the time?

A faint guess rose in Duncan’s heart, and he used it to speculate about all the properties of his spirit form flames. At the same time, he thought about whether his link with this steamship could be put to use.

After drifting on the Vanished for so long, he treasured every single thread of connection between himself and the civilized world.

Now it seemed that although the White Oak had docked, it was still under some kind of lockdown and surveillance. Those tense people were probably professionals from the city-state who specialized in dealing with supernatural Visions.

Clearly, for the people in the city-state, a ship that had been lost at sea carried a dangerous risk, and its experience of having had zero-distance contact with the Vanished was probably another major issue waiting for review.

Duncan was quite aware of his own fearsome reputation and that of the Vanished.

After thinking it over, Duncan cautiously backed away and did not touch the cloud of light again.

As the number one boss on the Boundless Sea, he had no intention of dealing with the Guardians of the City-State. And while he still did not know what those Occult Specialists were like, he also did not want to expose the fact that the White Oak had already formed a connection with “Captain Duncan”.

He definitely did not want anyone to discover and sever his link with this steamship. The connection was already in place, as firm as an anchor chain beneath the waves. He could be patient. One day, the surveillance on the White Oak would be lifted.

By then, he might even be able to have a calm chat with that old captain.

He could ask what exactly the old captain had been shouting at him back then when the wind and waves were so strong.

Chapter 68: Reliable Pigeon Courier

A cool sea breeze suddenly swept across the deck, making Captain Lawrence-M, who had just stepped out from inside, rub his arms without thinking. He did not even know whether this urge to get goosebumps came from the cool wind, or from what that young Inquisitor had just told him.

Anomaly 099, the Doll spirit coffin, after entering a runaway state, not only gained the ability to move and a strong tendency to escape its container, but also kept expanding its range of influence. Inside that range it would constantly check for humanoid targets and carry out unconditional Decapitation. Only the Saint might be able to resist this almost causal Decapitation effect…

During the past half-month of sailing, he and his crew members had been living side by side with this dangerous Anomaly. Although in fact, aside from running into the Vanished at the end, nothing truly dangerous had happened during this escort voyage, when Lawrence-M thought back on it now, he still felt a little shaken.

But it was only a lingering fear, nothing more.

He was a member of the Explorer Association, a veteran ocean explorer. His job was to deal with the Boundless Sea. Unlike those fishermen who only worked in the safe nearshore waters, more than half of his seafaring life had been spent dealing with all kinds of Anomalies and even Visions.

Whenever he accepted a transport job involving an Anomaly, the authority or the Church would warn him in advance about the danger of the trip. That part of the commission contract was always the shortest section, usually only one line: this task is deadly; specific details cannot be disclosed.

Every captain who made a living sailing between city-states knew what they were facing. More than half of them spent their later years haunted by this deadly career. After many years dealing with the Boundless Sea, Anomalies and Visions always left something on your fate.

Many colleagues of his age had already retired. Some were trapped in endless nightmares. Some had mental problems from different degrees of the curse. Some came back from long voyages with maimed limbs… or ended even worse.

Captains and sailors on deep-sea ships earned pay far beyond what any city-state resident could imagine, and they also carried “occupational diseases” far worse than in any other profession.

Captain Lawrence-M felt he was not a very noble person. He did this job mainly to earn money. Of course, when he was young, he had a strong passion to explore the sea. But like most people, the passion of youth was hard to carry through a whole life. And now… he felt that last bit of passion was almost burned out.

While his mind was still sound, while the Boundless Sea had not fully tangled itself around his fate, he should find a time to retire.

Lawrence-M let out a small sigh, turned around, and slowly walked toward the captain’s cabin.

The priests’ search and questioning of the whole ship had not finished yet. Before that, he still could not leave the White Oak. After that, he and everyone else would be transferred to the Cathedral for Quarantine Observation and a series of mental evaluations.

His gaze swept over the familiar fittings around the ship.

It was a very good ship, and very new. He had commanded her for only five years. As the captains on the Boundless Sea liked to say, “the honeymoon between captain and ship isn’t even over yet.” To be honest, he felt quite reluctant to retire from her.

But retiring now was still better than dying in some future voyage, or spending the rest of his life in an asylum.

…

In the Lower City of the city-state, inside Duncan’s old, shabby antique shop, the middle-aged man lying in the bed on the second floor slowly opened his eyes. The slightly old and moldy ceiling reflected into Duncan’s vision.

“Whew…”

Duncan let out a light breath. The senses from this body quickly became clear and steady. He felt his way of controlling this body shift from remote manipulation to direct command. After two or three seconds, he braced himself with his arms and pushed his body up.

The pigeon AI fluttered over, rubbed its beak on the headboard by his pillow, and noisily squawked: “Darling, welcome home. Do you want to eat first, or bathe first, or…”

Duncan had just been about to stretch when that one line from the pigeon almost made him cramp. He slapped a hand down on AI’s head at once: “Why do you know all that kind of phrasing?!”

AI was clearly no ordinary bird. After being smacked by Duncan, it acted as if nothing had happened. It cheerfully paced a few steps to the side, still chattering: “With one punch, it landed right on his nose, blood spraying everywhere, his nose knocked to one side, as if he’d opened a sauce shop…”

Duncan simply set this not-quite-right-in-the-head bird aside and stopped paying attention to it. He got out of bed and looked toward the nearby table.

On the table quietly lay all the test items he had prepared earlier on the Vanished:

The Sun Charm amulet, a dagger, a piece of cheese, a cannonball, and a salted fish.

Everything was there. With so many random and unrelated things piled together, AI had not “lost a package.”

This pigeon was actually more reliable than Duncan had expected.

Duncan walked over and checked each item on the table. After making sure every item was present and undamaged, he could not help glancing back at the pigeon pacing on the bed. A bit of praise rose in his heart for the bird.

Then he saw AI pacing in a neat square at the head of the bed. It had already gotten to the line: “When Luda looked, he saw Zento lying straight on the ground”…

Duncan: “…”

He hid his praise deep in his heart, then sat down at the table and began checking the “goods” one by one.

First was the Sun Charm amulet. It had not changed at all. As an supernatural item that had already been fully reworked and controlled by the fire of his spirit form, the gentle power inside it still flowed quietly. Two consecutive trips walking through the Spirit Realm did not seem to affect the nature of this item.

The dagger, which did not have any supernatural properties, also did not look changed. Aside from its old-fashioned style, its blade was still sharp, and the sheath was still well maintained.

Duncan's eyes fell on the piece of cheese he had taken from the Vanished's galley.

The cheese showed no sign of being an Anomaly. It was still in that unfit-for-eating state. It did not rot quickly or vanish in thin air after leaving the Vanished, as Duncan had imagined.

He then looked at the cannonball.

The cannonball sat quietly on the table and showed no reaction to the captain's gaze.

Duncan nudged the cannonball and knocked on its cast-iron shell.

Its supernatural traits had faded away.

On the Vanished, even the cannonballs were "active." Of course, that did not mean each cannonball had its own independent "mind." It meant the ship's entire ammunition system was controlled by a unified "consciousness." As a sub-unit of that consciousness, every cannonball on the Vanished would immediately adjust its position and line up for "inspection" whenever the captain used his gaze on them.

From Duncan's observations over some time, there were probably two "consciousnesses" controlling the combat systems of the Vanished. One belonged to the ammunition system, and one belonged to the dozens of cannons under the deck. These two consciousnesses seemed to be in charge of loading and firing during battle, each controlling every "member" inside its own system.

The cannonball in front of him had clearly fallen out of that higher consciousness's control after leaving the Vanished and had become a plain, ordinary lump of iron.

Duncan became thoughtful.

If he brought this cannonball back to the Vanished, would it rejoin the ammunition storage? Would the Vanished still "recognize" this sub-unit that had gone away and returned?

His thoughts stretched out further. The ammunition on the Vanished was limited. The cannonballs it fired would not come back. (The eight cannonballs he had used earlier to weigh down Alice's coffin had not come back either.) So… could the ship's ammunition be resupplied? And how did new ammunition added to the ship become sub-units of the Vanished?

His thinking expanded another step: could the Vanished upgrade its artillery system? Could more advanced cannons and more advanced shells work if they were mounted on that ship?

The Vanished was a ghost ship. That meant it was hard for it to resupply or "upgrade" as easily as an ordinary vessel. Anything carried aboard was just an "external item." If it could not smoothly become a part of the Vanished, then these external items could not gain the convenient "self-operating" traits that the rest of the ship's systems had.

But if there was a way to turn those things into parts of the Vanished itself… that ghost ship might wield an even greater power.

And at the same time have far better living conditions.

Duncan could not help thinking a lot along these lines.

The more he came into contact with modern Pland, the more he felt that the Vanished from a century ago was not as glorious and perfect as its fearsome reputation.

That ship might have eerie and terrifying power, but it did not even have electric lights, and it certainly did not have fries. Its weapon system still used old muzzle-loading cannons. Who knew how strong they really were? And again, there were no fries.

The sails of spirit form were useful, but having a steam engine as backup power would clearly be nice too. Yet the ship did not even have a boiler to heat water.

And still no fries.

Duncan silently glanced at the pigeon that had hopped up onto the windowsill and was staring blankly outside.

The pigeon turned its head back and blinked its tiny green-bean eyes at him: “Want to go down to the docks and get some fries?”

“Shut up. Don’t mention fries.” Duncan turned the bird down with mixed feelings, then finally shifted his attention to the last item.

The salted fish was a pure natural food, processed from a delicious gift hooked out of the Deep Sea. It tasted pretty good and was one of the few things that counted as “from outside the Vanished.”

After walking through the Spirit Realm, this salted fish also did not look any different.

[Let’s use it to make soup for Nina tonight.]

Chapter 69: City-State Life

After checking all the test items, Duncan had a clearer understanding of AI's transport ability and of the nature of the things on the Vanished.

AI could carry several different items at once. Those items could be organic, inorganic, supernatural, or ordinary. The type of item did not affect the stability of the transport process, and the transport did not change the nature of the items themselves.

Some things on the Vanished that clearly had "the ability to act" were actually sub-units under a larger controlling consciousness. For example, the cannonballs were sub-units of the ammunition system. Once these sub-units left the Vanished, they lost their active nature and became plain, ordinary objects.

AI's transport process did not seem to cost it much "energy." Whether it carried only the ritual dagger the first time or a whole pile of items now, the bird still came back lively and bouncing around. Of course, this might be because the total "cargo" he had asked it to carry so far was still too small and far from its limit.

For now he had only tested different kinds of items. He still did not know whether AI's transport ability had limits on "weight" or "size." That needed further testing.

Duncan summed up the known information point by point. After making sure he had thought through everything, he finally let out a breath and slowly leaned back in his chair.

He knew his current tests were still far from perfect. There were many possible variables he had not considered carefully enough. Even just from the angle of “types of test items,” his samples were too few. They were not enough to build up valid data.

In the future, he would at least need to choose more types of items. He would also have to use different weights and sizes to test AI’s transport limits and the stability of repeated transports. Only with enough control samples would his test data be reliable and trustworthy.

He was very careful in this area, and that caution was not for nothing—because he had a very bold plan… or rather, a very bold idea.

Since AI could teleport items between land and the Vanished intact, and without being limited by the type of item, then… could it deliver a person?

If it could deliver a person, could it deliver someone who did not quite count as a person? For example… Alice?

Duncan knew a single person’s ability was limited. If he relied only on his own power to walk through the Spirit Realm and act as a link between the Vanished and the city-states on land, sooner or later he would run into problems—too few hands, too many things to watch. If he had a helper, things would be much easier.

The teleportation ability AI showed gave him a very good idea.

Of course, Alice was not a very good choice for a helper. This “Anomaly 099” with a high-rank designation might look elegant and mysterious when she sat quietly, but as soon as she moved, she revealed just how weak and useless she was. For now, though, Duncan really had no other candidate.

Thinking that his only usable crew member was such a helpless good-for-nothing who might even stew herself while cooking, Duncan could not help sighing.

The “enemy of the whole world” status of the Vanished really gave him a headache. Duncan guessed that he had almost no chance of finding allies in the human world. If he insisted on looking, he would probably only draw in a group of edgy villains—the kind of people who opened their eyes every morning hoping for the world’s doomsday, who spent Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays cutting gas pipes, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays holding demon sacrificial rites, and Sundays fighting guerrilla battles with Church guardians…

Those types could probably team up with Goathead very quickly. They would have a great time together planning which city-state to invade next, but they were absolutely not the kind of help Duncan wanted.

“…Sigh, at least Alice is obedient,” Duncan muttered to himself as he stood up, talking under his breath. “If I train her carefully, she might grow into something… maybe.”

Even if she could not become a helper, it would still be good to let that Doll see the human world. After all, she had been locked in a coffin for so many years. She had no idea what the outside world looked like.

After sorting out his thoughts, Duncan began putting away the pile of things he had brought over. He would not return to the Vanished for now. Many of these things could not be carried with him, so of course he had to leave them in the shop.

There were not many hiding places on the second floor of the antique shop. Nina might come upstairs at any time to help tidy the room. Some things that clearly did not look like daily necessities would be especially suspicious if left in the bedroom—for example, a cannonball from a century ago. But after a short think, Duncan found reasonable homes for them all.

The Sun Charm amulet could simply be kept close to his body. The salted fish could go straight into the kitchen, which looked perfectly natural. As for the century-old cannonball and the century-old sailor’s dagger, those were even simpler—

Duncan brought those two things down to the shop on the first floor and set them in an inconspicuous corner beside the counter. After all, this was an antique shop. There were as many odd-looking things here as anyone could want. Nowhere could hide a dagger and a cannonball better than the pile of shabby fake junk on the first floor…

As for the last item, the piece of cheese from the Vanished’s galley, Duncan also found a very suitable place for it.

The trash bin.

After finishing all this, Duncan patted the nonexistent dust off his hands and felt very satisfied with his arrangements.

Then he glanced at the sky outside.

The Sun, sealed and bound by two rings of runes, hung high in the sky. It was just noon.

Nina would return home later today. Before that, he planned to go out and walk around a bit, to learn more about this city.

Anyway, it did not look like the antique shop would get any business today.

The weather was a bit cool. Duncan put on a dark brown coat, and before going out he tidied his somewhat messy, decadent hair, trying his best to make this body—once tormented by alcohol, drugs, and sickness—look a little more spirited. Then he left the antique shop.

As soon as he stepped out the door, he heard wings flapping from the second floor. The pigeon AI flew out of the room on its own and landed on his shoulder. It rocked its head and, full of pride, chattered: “Go to Twin Immortals Bridge, take Chenghua Avenue…”

Duncan gave the bird a sideways look at once. He had originally planned to leave the pigeon on the second floor to watch the house. After all, having a pigeon on your shoulder when you went out drew way too much attention and felt strange. Besides, Duncan and AI were linked by spirit flame. If anything happened, he could always summon it with his spirit form fire at any time. There was no risk of delay.

He just had not given the order before leaving, so the bird had “gotten on board” by itself.

Looking at the smug expression of this crafty bird, Duncan finally sighed with a helpless smile: “…Fine. Follow me if you want.”

With the pigeon still on his shoulder, he walked to the main road across from the antique shop. After following the main road for only a short distance, he heard the clear chime of a bell mixed with the sound of a steam engine drawing near. He looked up and saw a brown double-decker bus with blue stripes along its sides driving down the main road and slowly stopping at a nearby stop.

It was a very common public transport in the city-state of Pland, driven by a steam engine. The fare was six peso and it could reach most parts of the Lower City. According to the route map on the back of the bus, the line’s last two stops also passed along the edge of the Upper City, at a place called Crossroad District.

Duncan had an impression of “Crossroad District” in his mind. He knew that street and the area around it were seen as the “border zone” of Pland. It had fairly busy businesses and fairly respectable housing. Many residents of the Lower City took Crossroad District as the goal and dream of “moving up a level in life.” Many mid-level citizens who could not afford the high costs of the Upper City but still wanted a decent life also lived there. There were also cinemas, the City Museum, and several higher-end restaurants in that area.

Nina’s school was near Crossroad District, and the City Museum she had mentioned was also next to it.

Duncan thought for a moment, then quickly walked to the stop and boarded the bus before it started moving.

There were not many people on the bus. More than half of the seats on the lower deck were empty. Beside the driver’s seat stood a young conductress in a dark blue uniform. She had shoulder-length hair and light makeup. When she saw someone get on, her hand went to her ticket pouch out of habit, but then she noticed the pigeon on Duncan’s shoulder.

“Sorry, you can’t bring pets on the bus, that’s the rule,” the young woman said, raising her hand to point at the pigeon on Duncan’s shoulder. “That includes pigeons.”

Duncan looked at AI. AI flapped its wings innocently and tilted its head at him.

“Go cling to the roof.”

“Coo, coo.”

AI flapped its wings and flew out of the bus, “coo-coo-coo” cursing all the way.

The young conductress-Miss stared blankly at the man who could talk with a pigeon, and at the pigeon that really seemed to understand human speech. For a long moment, she could not say anything.

“Is it okay now?” Duncan had to remind the conductress, who seemed a bit dazed. He pointed up toward the roof: “You can’t control a bird sitting on the roof, right?”

The conductress finally came back to herself: “Ah… yes… the fare is six peso, full ticket.”

Duncan reached into his pocket, took out two coins, and traded them for a blue ticket. Then he found a seat by the window, sat down quietly, and got ready to enjoy his first bus ride in this world.

The steam engine started. With a light vibration and the sound of machinery grinding, the bell at the front of the bus rang out clear and bright. The bus gave a gentle jolt, and the view outside the window began to slide backward.

Duncan leaned back comfortably in the seat and felt the tremors and acceleration as this piece of mechanical engineering moved.

Steam engines were a good thing. Civilized society was a good thing. Technological progress was a good thing.

If he had the chance, he definitely wanted to install a set on the Vanished too—even just a boiler that could heat water. Then people on the ship could take hot baths in the future.

Just as his thoughts were spreading out, Duncan felt the bus suddenly jolt. The scenery outside the window slowly stopped.

The young conductress-Miss pushed open the window near the front, leaned out, and shouted to the street: “Getting on? There are seats! All big seats!”

Duncan blinked, then let out a soundless laugh.

In that moment, he suddenly felt that this city-state, which was still unfamiliar to him, was filled with the breath of everyday life.

Chapter 70: One of Us

In a world where supernatural Visions existed, the land was sealed off by a boundless sea, and Guardians and Anomalies fought without end in the city-states, how did ordinary people survive?

Duncan still did not understand this city-state well, but at least in the places he had seen, the ordinary people of this world still lived in order and stability.

They worked, studied, and rested. They ran shops and traded goods. On their days off, they went out to cinemas and restaurants, to parks and the harbor. They visited the city museum and chatted with their neighbors after dinner. Their lives were not very exciting, but they were usually peaceful.

The steam-engine bus started and stopped, sometimes at a stop, sometimes by the roadside. Passengers got on and off at any moment. The silent driver only spoke a couple of words to the conductor now and then, but most of the time he focused on driving. The young conductor kept glancing up at the roof from time to time—she still seemed to be thinking about that pigeon.

Duncan sat in his seat, watching everything around him with curiosity, watching these lives that belonged to ordinary people.

It seemed that aside from needing to know that Anomalies and Visions existed in the world, and treating that knowledge as a kind of “safety code” to follow, the lives of these ordinary people were not much different from what he had seen on Earth.

When they neared Crossroad District, the bus stopped again. This time it stopped at a proper platform, and many passengers got on there.

Duncan looked curiously at the view from the platform. He watched the distant chimneys standing tall and the steam pipes crisscrossing above the roofs. Then, all of a sudden, he faintly felt an unusual heat rising near his chest.

The heat came from the Sun badge he had hidden close to his body.

Duncan, who had been enjoying the scenery, froze for a moment. He instinctively touched the place where the badge was hidden. The next second, he felt that the badge was not only hot, but also trembling slightly.

He did not know what was happening, but clearly the badge was resonating with something nearby. Through the link already formed between him and the badge, he clumsily searched for the source of that resonance. A moment later, his eyes locked onto a figure outside the bus window, hurrying through the crowd.

The figure wore a black coat and looked like an ordinary passerby, but the “directional sense” coming from the Sun badge clearly and unmistakably pointed at him.

Duncan stood up at once and strode toward the door. As his thoughts moved, the pigeon AI also received his command. She flapped her wings, flew down from the roof of the bus, and landed on his shoulder.

The conductor standing near the door stared in surprise at this scene. Only after Duncan stepped off the bus did she mutter under her breath: “How did he train that pigeon…”

But the little episode of daily life quickly slipped out of the young Miss conductor’s attention. She turned to the passengers who had just gotten on and said: “Come over here to buy your tickets… the child needs a ticket too. No way that kid is under one meter ten… Four years old? There's no way that's four. Once you cross the line, it's a full ticket!"

By then, Duncan had already walked into the crowd. He moved quickly through the busy platform and the intersection, tracking the figure in the black coat.

The man in black walked very fast. The dense afternoon foot traffic along the street made it easy for him to slip out of sight. In just a few minutes, the figure had already vanished from Duncan's view.

However, the Sun badge kept resonating. The directional sense from deep inside it continued to point Duncan toward the right direction.

Duncan followed the badge's guidance as he kept tracking, thinking quickly at the same time.

There was no doubt the man in black was suspicious. The badge had to have sensed something for it to react so suddenly… perhaps it had sensed a power of the same origin, coming from the true Sun god.

From Goathead, he already knew that this badge could recognize its own kind and guide the Sun's divine blessing. Under normal circumstances, only believers of the Sun god could use those functions or feel the badge's guidance.

Duncan had used the fire of his spirit form to seize control of the badge. Back then, he had thought his flames had destroyed most of its abilities as well. But now it seemed… the badge's power of recognition was still there.

Only now, that recognition served him instead.

Guided by the badge, he gradually left the crowded main street. After twisting through several turns, he walked into quieter, emptier side lanes.

He saw the suspicious figure again. The man was hurrying across an intersection up ahead, still seeming completely unaware of the tracker behind him.

Vaguely, Duncan felt the badge on his chest grow even hotter than before. The resonance became clearer and stronger.

Duncan quietly stirred the fire of his spirit form and read the information coming from the Sun badge. A flood of clear, directional sensations poured into his mind at once.

The feeling was strange. Although the Sun badge had no will of its own, Duncan almost felt it was excitedly pushing messages at him. It was telling him, a man who did not believe in the Sun god, where all the other believers were.

He even wanted to remind the badge to calm down a bit. Not long ago it had still been the Sun god's sacred relic. Even if it was acting as a guide now, it did not need to get as excited as a pocket hand warmer.

At the same time, he became more and more sure that he was approaching a secret assembly hall where many believers of the Sun god gathered.

Just as he had expected, more "Sun heretics" had gathered in the dark corners of this city-state. The group that had been wiped out in the sewers before had only been one small part of these cockroach-like cultists.

He did not know what these cultists really wanted, but he knew they must understand ancient history, the Sun faith, and the Age of Order far better than Nina's teachers.

If he wanted to learn the secrets in the deep layers of this world, he had to contact forces from the supernatural field. It was very hard to get close to the Church and the city's authority by normal means. cultists were much easier—he just had to blend in with them.

Or beat them into one big pile. That worked too.

Duncan was thinking about this when he suddenly stopped.

He had reached the end of a narrow lane. The sneaky man in black had just slipped into a nearby alley, and the signal from the Sun badge was clear and strong. There was not a single passerby in sight.

Through the Sun badge, he sensed more “kin signals” gathering near where he stood.

Duncan quietly raised the collar of his coat, hiding half his face in it. Almost the moment he finished the motion, he heard many footsteps in the shadows of the nearby buildings.

One figure after another appeared.

There were more than ten people, dressed no differently from ordinary citizens. After all, no cultist would walk around the city at noon in a full robe, just like a proper assassin should not wear a glaring white hooded cloak while doing business on a busy street.

Only the constant heat and clear directional signals from the Sun badge let him be sure that every last one of these people appearing around him was a follower of the true Sun god.

Duncan raised his head and looked toward the end of the lane. The man in the black coat he had been tracking stood among them, watching him warily. Beside him, a tall, thin young man said a few quiet words to his companions before finally looking Duncan’s way.

The tall, thin man spoke: “This is private property. Why did you sneak in here after us?” He still seemed to be trying to give off the feeling that they were all ordinary citizens and that Duncan was the suspicious one. Since he did not know who this follower was, he neither attacked rashly nor relaxed his guard.

Duncan muttered inwardly that an amateur like him really was not suited for this kind of professional tracking work. At the same time, he was curious what these cultists planned to do with him if he played dumb. Would they pretend to be a group of dutiful local thugs and scare him off, or would they zealously grow their cult, tie him up, and offer him as a nice meaty sacrifice to their Sun god?

The tall, thin man frowned and spoke impatiently: “Didn’t you hear me? I’m asking you a question…” As he spoke, the figures around him all took half a step forward without drawing attention, forming a vague circle.

Duncan shrugged. He casually pulled the Sun charm amulet from his coat and said in a sincere tone: “I’m one of you.”

First, he would try to get on their good side. Maybe that would make them talk more.

If they still did not believe him, then he would beat them into one big pile.

Chapter 71: Gathering in the Gutters

The moment Duncan took out the Sun charm amulet, a few seconds of silence fell over the group. His plain words “I’m one of you” drifted through the air, and they led to more than a dozen surprised and cautious glances being traded back and forth. Then the tall, thin man who looked like a small leader suddenly lowered his voice and said quickly: “Put that away! Watch out for Church spies nearby!”

So the charm amulet really worked? Was this thing really so convincing among Suntists?

Duncan was amused, but on the surface he kept his blank, mysterious posture with half his face hidden by his collar. He put the charm amulet away and said calmly: “If there really are Church spies nearby, your big group gathering here is much more eye-catching than my charm amulet.”

As soon as he finished, a scruffy, unshaven man blurted out: “No way. Us gathering at most will bring the constables over and get us charged for disturbing public order…”

“Shut up!” The tall, thin leader stopped his underling’s nonsense at once. Then his gaze fell on Duncan. “This is necessary caution. After all, the city isn’t very safe right now. Walk over here, and don’t make any extra moves.”

Duncan walked toward them calmly. The other man looked him up and down carefully. After staring at him for a long time, the tall, thin man finally asked in a low voice: “Are you a believer who lives in this city?”

Duncan thought for a moment and nodded: “Yes.”

The original master of this body had indeed lived in the city, and Duncan lived here now as well. On questions this obvious, he decided to tell the truth.

His plan was simple. He would find a way to blend into this group of cultists, then see what information he could pick up. If he did not get exposed, he would listen and ask more. If he did get exposed, he would have AI transform and deal with all of them.

The tall, thin man had no idea what dangerous thoughts this “Church brother” in front of him was turning over in his mind. He went on and asked: “As far as I know, the Deep Sea Church attacked a few days ago…”

“The assembly hall in the sewers,” Duncan said without the slightest burden, cutting in smoothly. “A Sun rite was going on there at the time. The ritual went out of control, and we lost many people—but I escaped.” While he spoke, he watched the reactions of the Suntists around him. He could feel the tension in their bodies clearly loosen. Only the tall, thin little leader in front of him still stayed cautious. “Three others escaped with me, but we got separated. Now I’ve completely lost contact with the Church—until I met you. The Sun gave me guidance.”

The tall, thin man only grunted, neither agreeing nor denying it. Then his gaze fell on Duncan’s shoulder: “What is that?”

“My pet,” Duncan said casually. “Can’t you tell? Just an ordinary pigeon.”

AI shook her head at just the right time and let out a loud “coo.”

“This pigeon is loud…” The tall, thin man finally seemed to relax. Deep down, he probably also felt that those rule-bound Church people would never have the habit of running all over the city with a bird on their shoulder. He nodded and said: “Come with me. It’s not safe to talk outside.”

Duncan let out a breath in his heart. It seemed that the first step of his plan to fish in troubled waters had worked.

Then he followed the group of cultists as they walked deeper into the alley.

The alley was deeper than he had thought. It seemed to lead into the most forgotten, darkest core of this rundown district. The group of cultists led Duncan through turn after turn, past old pipes that constantly vented steam, across narrow lanes where sewage flowed, and finally into a cluster of low, shabby buildings. The deeper they went, the more the dark and broken side of this prosperous steam metropolis revealed itself before Duncan.

He had thought that the place where he and Nina lived was already part of the city's lowest neighborhoods. Now he suddenly realized that their shabby antique shop was actually one of the more "respectable" spots in the Lower City.

Most of the rundown houses along the road looked lifeless, as if they had been abandoned for a long time. But in the shadows of a few houses, Duncan seemed to feel a numb or gloomy divine gaze, as if homeless people hid in this forgotten district and watched the intruders coldly.

In the end, those chilling gazes quickly pulled back. The dozen or so people led by the tall, thin man were clearly enough to make the squatters here feel afraid.

"See this? This is the most prosperous city-state on the Boundless Sea, Pland," the man in black who had first caught Duncan's attention muttered. It sounded like he was talking to himself, yet also as if he was speaking to Duncan. "It's the same everywhere. Lunsa is like this, Cold Harbor is like this. Even that place the elves call the 'land of peace and justice,' Lightwind Harbor, is like this… They claim that so-called 'Sun' shines fairly on the world and brings light and order to all things, but how much sunlight ever reaches these gutters?"

Duncan did not answer. He only looked up.

Above the low, shabby buildings, steam and fuel pipes from the Upper City and the industrial districts crisscrossed the sky. Huge valves and pressure assemblies sprawled like strange beasts over the rooftops. sunlight leaked through gaps between the pipes and fell on the sewage between the buildings, bringing out an even stronger stench.

Most of that sewage came from leaking pipes nearby, formed from condensed steam. As the city ran day after day, chemicals from the factories mixed into it, and it piled up in the Lower City.

Duncan did not need to live in the city long. One look was enough for him to guess how this kind of “urban abscess” had formed.

He quietly glanced at the angry man in black. His expression stayed calm.

Whether they were bewitched by the Sun’s spawn or driven by their harsh lives, these cultists did have their reasons for becoming what they were. But so what?

These cultists, who believed the city-state had forced them to live in the gutters, still came down to the Lower City to grab helpless poor people as living sacrifices. The countless ragged people in that cave had not included a single respectable person from the Upper City.

As a “foreigner” who still did not understand this world well, Duncan felt he had no need to judge this city-state too much. But at least as a former sacrificial victim, he felt these cultists really were scum.

In silence, he finally reached the cultists’ base.

The base was under an abandoned factory.

These cultists who crawled through gutters always seemed able to find a suitable one and turn it into their gathering spot. Or maybe this prosperous steam metropolis simply had countless gutters, perfect for breeding dark and blasphemous things.

They climbed over the half-collapsed factory yard wall and opened an iron door leading down into the underground structures. Duncan had wanted to take a good look at the factory itself to satisfy his curiosity about this “age of steam,” but he never got the chance. They led him straight down a slanted stairway and into the cultists’ “secret base.”

This place might once have been the factory’s warehouse, or maybe a machinery room, but it had clearly been emptied out. In the large space, only the remaining pipe system on the ceiling and dead gas lamps on the walls remained. Darkness was dangerous, and even cultists knew that, so they had lit oil lamps fueled by whale oil all over the underground. In the light of many oil lamps, Duncan saw more than a dozen cultists gathered here.

After the Church had destroyed one sacrificial site so badly, there were still so many Sun believers gathered here? Where had all these cultists come from? Were they like mushrooms and moss, springing up on their own wherever there was a gutter?

Duncan stared in surprise at the figures gathered in the wide basement, and the cultists watched him with the same mix of curiosity and wariness. The tall, thin man walked over again, with several strong, burly cultists following close behind to stand around Duncan.

Duncan frowned and said: “What, you still have to search me again after I come in? I didn’t know there was such a rule.”

“If you really were a Church spy, a body search wouldn’t help,” the tall, thin man said. He took a strip of cloth from his coat and handed it to Duncan. “Relax. This is just a stricter test, only necessary caution. We’ve lost many comrades over the years for all kinds of reasons. Hold this, then repeat after me."

Duncan glanced at what he was given. It was a filthy strip of cloth, as if torn from some old garment. Dark brown stains marked its surface, like dried blood.

Was this another tool Sun believers used to test their own?

Duncan was a little surprised. He could not help thinking that these people really were professionals who spent all day being hunted. He had not seen much of their fighting ability yet, but their skills at guarding against spies from outside and traitors inside seemed maxed out.

He took the strip from the man and heard the tall, thin man mutter a few lines in a low voice: "In the name of the Sun, may the Lord's radiance shine everywhere…"

As soon as Duncan heard it, he felt it was extremely familiar—just not long ago, a cultist had recited this to him.

That cultist had even given him an amulet.

Without changing his expression, Duncan lifted a finger slightly. A tiny green flame no one could see seeped into the ordinary-looking strip of cloth in his hand. Then he kept a straight face and copied the tall, thin man in front of him, repeating the lines of prayer.

The strip of cloth that seemed soaked with old blood stayed quietly in his hand, showing no sign of reaction.

The tall, thin man's gaze stayed on the strip for a long moment. At last he nodded lightly, took the cloth back from Duncan, and said with a smile: "Welcome back into the Lord's glory, brother."

Chapter 72: News from the Assembly Ground

To be fair, these cultists were actually quite cautious.

They did not trust this strange “comrade” just because Duncan took out the Sun Charm amulet. They also did not believe his story just because Duncan could describe what had happened in the sacrificial site in the sewers. All the way here, they watched his every move and every word. Even after they reached the assembly ground, they still carried out an extra test to confirm this stranger’s identity. For a group of cultists who lived in hiding, this was already the best they could do.

But all their screening methods treated Duncan as an ordinary human.

Those methods meant nothing to the captain of the Vanished.

The tall, skinny leader took the inconspicuous strip of cloth back from Duncan’s hand. He seemed completely unaware of how the power inside this extraordinary item had changed. After welcoming the new comrade, he raised his hand and pointed to a corner of the assembly ground and said: “Comrade, rest here for now. You are not the only unfamiliar face in this place.”

Duncan nodded and walked toward that unremarkable corner. At the same time, he watched every face that appeared in the assembly ground.

Unlike what he had seen earlier in the sacrificial site in the sewers, he was surprised to find that these Suntists were not wearing those distinctive black robes. They were dressed like ordinary citizens. They did not hide their faces under hoods either, but calmly showed their faces.

Duncan asked the believer beside him, curious: “When you gather here, do you not need to hide your faces?”

The believer he asked looked very surprised: “…The local believers here in the city-state of Pland all had to hide their faces during gatherings before?”

Duncan frowned slightly at once: “You are not from Pland…”

“We came from Lunsa,” another believer nearby said calmly. After confirming that the stranger in front of them really was a comrade of the Church, the Suntists here had clearly relaxed their guard. “We only settled down last week, but before we could even make contact with the local brothers and sisters, that attack happened…”

“Everyone here came from Lunsa?” Duncan was a little surprised. He finally understood why there were still so many Sun believers in the city even after the sacrificial site in the sewers had been destroyed.

“Yes. The comrades gathered here all came from Lunsa, though there are also groups from other city-states. Everyone is scattered in different safe houses,” another believer joined the conversation. “Sigh, we have all heard more or less about the situation in Pland. In the past four years, that damned Governor and the Church’s hyenas kept cracking down on our work… You have not had it easy either, but at least that is over now.”

Duncan only nodded without agreeing or denying. Then he heard the cultist he had questioned at the start speak again: “That pigeon on your shoulder is really… unusual.”

The corner of Duncan’s eye twitched.

Duncan knew that more than one person here was paying attention to the pigeon on his shoulder.

If you really thought about it, a pigeon was nothing strange. But coming to a secret meeting while “wearing” a pigeon like this did make things weird.

He could only casually brush it off: “It is my pet. It can help me with many things.”

While he was brushing it off on the surface, Duncan’s thoughts were already racing. Large numbers of Suntists were pouring into the city-state of Pland. This confirmed a suspicion he had had before:

The usually low-key Sun Church had suddenly staged something grand and flashy down in the sewers. These cultists really were preparing something big!

By sneaking in and muddling along this time, he had actually stumbled right onto the right trail!

At the same time, he also understood why the cultists attending this gathering did not hide their faces and were dressed like ordinary citizens.

Back in the sewers, the Sun believers had hidden their identities completely. The lower-level believers only had one-way contact with their superiors. All of that was to resist round after round of purges from the Church and to avoid leaks if traitors appeared inside the Church or key members were captured. It was a desperate choice made by the local Church when they had no other options.

But the rabble in front of him, who had only just gathered in Pland from different city-states, clearly had no such experience yet. After all, they were just cultists, not some disciplined special forces unit.

On the other hand, they had no need for such disguises either. Everyone gathered here was a “countryman” from the same city-state, already familiar with one another. Hiding their identities during meetings would be pointless.

Dressed like ordinary citizens, they could instead run the moment a safe house was exposed and scatter into the crowds of commoners in the Lower City, where management was lax.

Thinking along these lines, Duncan let his gaze sweep over the assembly ground. All of a sudden, he felt a pair of eyes fall on him.

He looked toward the source at once and saw the owner of that gaze.

A petite girl with short black hair was standing a dozen meters away.

The girl wore a black dress trimmed with white lace. Her face was delicate and quiet, and she looked about the same age as Nina. The most striking thing about her, though, was the dark red collar around her neck. A small silver bell hung from it. It looked a little cute, yet also strangely unsettling.

When Duncan turned his gaze toward her, the girl just happened to look away, very casually, as if nothing had happened. Her shift was so smooth that it showed no flaw, but Duncan was sure that earlier stare had definitely come from this young lady.

Why was there such a young child among these cultists?

Doubt rose in Duncan’s heart. He glanced again at the girl’s clothes and bearing… For some reason, he kept feeling that this girl did not fit in with this place at all.

As he was thinking, the creak of hinges suddenly came from nearby. The tall, skinny cult leader ordered the basement door to be shut, then walked to the center of the assembly ground.

All eyes in the room turned to the leader at once. Duncan also pulled his thoughts back and watched the change in the scene. He saw the tall, thin man stand in their gaze with calm confidence, a faint smile on his rather grim face. Then the man took something from his coat and raised it high for everyone to see.

It was a pale gold Sun mask—the very same type of mask that the cult priest who had led the sacrificial ritual in the Underground Assembly Hall had worn before.

“Offer respect to the Lord’s radiance, and silently recite the true words under the Lord’s gaze,” the tall, thin man said loudly, his tone filled with devotion. “Bow your heads to this mask that bears His divine blessing. May the Sun’s Spawn rest their protection within it and help me guide the brothers and sisters gathered here.”

The cultists around him immediately chanted the true God’s name of the Sun in unison. Then they pressed a clenched fist to their brows and bowed their heads in a gesture of reverence. They were not paying respect to the tall, thin man standing in the center of the assembly ground at all, but to that Golden Mask, as if the mask itself were the true body of some higher being and the man holding it was only a vessel.

Duncan also went through the motions among the crowd of cultists, copying their gestures. But he had no idea what the so-called true words were, so he simply muttered a few lines of the multiplication table under his breath and started carefully watching the cultists’ movements, trying to work out the meaning behind each step of the ritual.

The tall, skinny man solemnly put the mask on his own face.

The next second, Duncan immediately sensed that something about the man had… changed.

He could not tell exactly what the feeling was. It was as if, in the instant the other man wore the mask, his whole bearing changed, and as if an extra shadow had appeared behind his figure. Duncan stared at the Golden Sun Mask, shaped in imitation of the Sun, and saw the lines on its surface slowly shifting. In that moment, the mask seemed to come alive. It felt as though some distant and mighty consciousness had projected a faint trace of its power into it, turning an otherwise ordinary item into something extraordinary.

With that single act of “putting on” the mask and that brief ritual, the ordinary person wearing it had been “sanctified” and turned into a symbol of some kind of divine authority.

The cultists around him cried out in unison: “May our Lord’s radiance endure forever! May our Lord’s path descend upon the mortal world!”

Duncan recited the multiplication table up through the sixes, all while his mind raced, trying to recall.

He had also seen a priest wearing a Golden Mask in that assembly hall in the sewers before. But at that time, the priest had already finished the “putting on” part. On top of that, Duncan still did not understand what was going on around him, and the temporary body he was using had been in bad shape. So he had not realized that this seemingly ordinary Golden Sun Mask had anything special about it, nor had he wondered why the priest wearing it was called an “Envoy” by the common cultists.

Now it seemed… Could this so-called Sun mask actually be a “communication device” used by those “Sun Spawn” hiding outside civilized society, letting them remotely control believers and observe the world? Or, more accurately, was it some kind of mental projection device?

Once he suddenly realized how interesting that item was, Duncan’s gaze on the Golden Mask changed at once.

[This thing… might be fated to end up with me.]

Chapter 73: Incomplete Memories

Duncan quickly drew his gaze back from the Golden Mask that carried the gaze, lowered his eyes slightly like the other cultists around him, and put on the look of someone ready to listen devoutly to the teachings of the rite.

He had not heard anything useful yet; he could not draw that twisted cult entity's attention too early.

And in the instant he lowered his head, that feeling of someone's eyes sweeping over him came again.

Duncan frowned slightly and looked in that direction, following his sense. Sure enough, it was that girl in the black dress with the strange bell on her neck secretly watching him again—and the moment his gaze turned toward her, she quietly turned her head away once more.

This made Duncan even more puzzled.

He was sure he did not know her. In the memories of this body's original master, there was no trace of this girl either. Why would a follower of the Sun he was meeting for the first time keep watching him like this?

[Is it really just because the pigeon on my shoulder looks so special?]

As he let his thoughts run wild like that, he suddenly heard the believer leader's voice from the front. After putting on the Golden Sun Mask, the leader had already become some sort of avatar form of divine authority. Even his voice now sounded deeper and more imposing. Duncan could not tell whether the man was forcing his tone lower on purpose, or if the mask had truly mixed another consciousness into his voice:

“The benediction is over. The Lord has witnessed our devotion and awe. Grace has already shone upon our souls. Brothers and sisters, be grateful. For every extra day we endure in this harsh, dark world, we draw one day closer to the time when the blazing Sun is reborn and order is reforged.”

The “priest” wearing the Golden Sun Mask spread his arms as he spoke in a highly seductive tone. Then his gaze suddenly fell on a corner among the believers, and his voice turned gentler and more friendly.

“But before we continue with today’s gathering, we must first welcome two comrades. In these harsh times, they were once trapped in darkness, but thanks to the Lord’s guidance, they have returned to the flock… Introduce yourselves. Just briefly is enough.”

[Two comrades?]

Duncan suddenly remembered that this leader had indeed told him earlier that he was not the only unfamiliar face in this assembly ground. Then he looked toward the direction that the leader’s gaze was fixed on—and saw the girl in the black dress.

For some reason, he did not feel surprised.

“You can call me Shirley,” the girl stepped forward half a pace and spoke easily. “Both my parents were believers, but four years ago they were killed by the Deep Sea Church’s lackeys. I have been hiding in the Crossroad District all these years and have never contacted any other brothers and sisters… I am lucky you came.”

Her voice was not loud. She sounded quiet and well-behaved. If he had not seen it with his own eyes, it would have been hard to connect such a child with blood-soaked cultists.

“Welcome back among us, young sister,” the leader nodded, then looked around at the cultists. “Shirley’s parents died in the great purge by the Church four years ago. We found their names on the list from that year. Next is the other comrade.”

The leader’s gaze finally fell on Duncan.

“Duncan, I live in the Lower City,” Duncan had already prepared and stepped forward calmly. “A few days ago, the Deep Sea Church destroyed a sacrificial ritual in the sewers. I am one of the survivors.”

His introduction was very brief, but his attitude was honest and open. And the news about the Deep Sea Church raiding a cult stronghold in the sewers was already widely known. It had taken up the front page of several newspapers. So as soon as he finished speaking, a few cultists nearby began whispering to each other. The leader in the center of the assembly nodded and added: “He is also a comrade who has endured many trials. Even after suffering at the hands of those Deep Sea Church hyenas, he still tried every way to return to the Lord’s embrace. He carries a token that bears the divine blessing, so he can be trusted.”

As the leader finished speaking, the cultists who had not known the details all turned their eyes toward Duncan. Some nodded, some sighed. Duncan kept most of his face covered and recited the multiplication table backwards again…

“The brief introductions are over,” the leader finally moved on to the part Duncan cared about. “Next, I will announce the latest situation.”

Duncan’s ears pricked up at once.

“…At present, many comrades are still converging on this city-state. They include ordinary believers with firm faith, as well as powerful Envoys and priests. Our strength in this city-state is steadily growing. The day when order is reshaped is drawing near…

“But it cannot be denied that the Deep Sea Church’s lackeys have also reacted. In recent days, the city-state’s authority has been checking outsiders more and more strictly. Several of our gathering points have already been destroyed by the authority. Therefore, all brothers and sisters moving in the city must be extremely careful. The work of collecting sacrificial victims can be slowed down for now. The Lord’s Spawn has already given us instructions. The power we have gathered recently has passed the halfway mark. For what is still lacking, the Spawn will personally make up the rest…”

The cultists around him seemed deeply moved and began praising the Sun God’s mercy and greatness. Duncan immediately thought of the sacrificial ritual he had seen in the sewers before. These cultists really were using that kind of ritual to gather power. And from the sound of it… the hidden manipulators called the “Sun Spawn” were going to take part in person this time?

For now, it seemed the power this group had collected was still not enough, since Pland’s City Hall and the Church had already noticed their movements. But if those Spawn joined the field themselves… the cultists’ plan would probably still go forward!

Just then, he heard the leader continue: “…Our main task now is still to confirm the exact location of the Sun fragment. Remember, our goal is always to bring the true Sun God back into the world, and recovering the lost Sun fragment is the most crucial step!”

Duncan’s heart skipped a beat—Sun fragment? What was that supposed to be?

[If you piled up enough Sun fragments, could you fire a big shot with Aton's Spear?]

He felt the pigeon on his shoulder suddenly grow restless. AI shook its body hard while letting out a low coo from its throat.

Through the link carried by the fire of his spirit form, he could vaguely sense what the pigeon wanted to do.

It wanted to rant, to shout at the top of its lungs, to tell Duncan to grab the Sun-powered battle-axe and muster the troops again.

But it could not speak. Here, it was only a pigeon.

This left it terribly frustrated.

"Quiet," Duncan could only mutter under his breath, rubbing the pigeon's head with the back of his hand to calm it down. At the same time, a cultist standing closer to the leader spoke up: "Can we now at least determine the Sun fragment's rough location? Is there any way to… detect it?"

"The Sun fragment is currently in a dormant state and cannot be detected by any means yet," the leader shook his head. "But the Lord has given us guidance. The fragment should be hiding near Pland's Lower City. Also, since we have new comrades joining us today, I will explain the situation once more:

"Based on the intelligence we already have, the fragment first appeared in the mortal world eleven years ago. It very likely triggered some kind of large-scale extraordinary phenomenon—perhaps a major fire, perhaps abnormal high heat across an entire block, or perhaps mass spontaneous combustion or shared hallucinations. This is the direction of our current investigation.

"The city-state's authority keeps detailed records on extraordinary incidents over the years. The great God-Touched are already trying to seek out those records. Among the ordinary people living in the Lower City, some may also still remember the ‘strange events’ that happened here eleven years ago. Our task is to gather clues of this kind in order to infer the Sun fragment’s location.

“But remember, all such inquiries must be done with extreme care. Although the authority’s control over the Lower City has always been lax, the Deep Sea Church’s hyenas sometimes have an unusually sharp nose… They are already on alert.”

As the leader explained the current situation to the surrounding congregants, Duncan’s mind was also racing. He paid special attention to that time point of “eleven years ago.” According to the leader, eleven years ago was when the extraordinary object known as the “Sun fragment” first appeared in the world. But Duncan noticed that date because of something else.

Eleven years ago, Nina had been only six years old when she lost her parents.

It seemed to have been because of a fire.

Was that really just a coincidence? Could there be such a perfect coincidence?

Duncan tried hard to sort through the messy, broken memories in his head, but more than half of them had vanished along with this body’s original master. No matter how hard he tried, he could only recall one or two vague fragments: the original master of this body charging out of the flames, holding his dying niece in his arms; a building he could no longer clearly see burning fiercely and collapsing behind him; and, in the distance, city streets twisted and dim like a mirage, with countless frantic people screaming and running through them…

Chapter 74: There’s a Mole, Cancel the Deal

Duncan still failed to dig up any more memories from his mind.

Even though the original master of this body had truly cared about Nina, and everything related to Nina had once been the deepest memory in his mind, years of illness and heavy drinking and drug abuse had ruined it. When the cultist named Ron let out his last breath, there had not been many warm memories of his family left in his numb head.

There was only one thing he could be sure of: eleven years ago there really had been a great fire, and it had happened in the Lower City—that fire had taken the lives of Nina’s birth parents and forever changed the path of that child’s life.

It might have been a coincidence, but there was an even greater chance that what had happened was really tied to the “Sun fragment” that these Suntists were searching for.

If that was the case, then a fragment of the Sun had appeared by accident in the city and started a fire. Innocent citizens lost their lives. A child became an orphan in the flames. And years later, that child’s only remaining relative had fallen and become one of the cultists who followed that same fragment of the Sun…

In the dark, it felt like some cursed fate circling around the Sun, trapped in its pull like gravity.

Right then, one of the cultists around him suddenly spoke, cutting off Duncan's thoughts: "These days I asked around among the residents nearby. I never heard about any famous big fire in the Lower City eleven years ago… but someone did mention that back then a factory had a leak. Poisonous gas from the storage tanks spread across several blocks. A lot of people fell into hallucinations and went mad. That incident even made the papers at the time."

Duncan raised his head in surprise and saw that the speaker was an ordinary-looking female cultist.

Before he had time to think over what she said, he noticed the cult leader's gaze turn toward him: "Brother, you just happen to be a local here. Do you know anything about this?"

Duncan froze for a moment and suddenly realized that he had become the focus of the whole scene. To these out-of-town cultists who were trying to gather information, a "local who lived in Pland's Lower City" was without doubt a great source.

Feeling the gazes around him, he thought for a second and quickly came up with an answer: "Eleven years ago I wasn't living here yet, so I don't know the details. But I did hear people mention the factory leak…"

While he fobbed them off like this, he looked at the woman who had spoken earlier: "So there really was no big fire in the Lower City eleven years ago?"

"At least from what I found out, that's how it is," the woman nodded. "According to what I heard, Pland's Lower City hasn't had any large fires for at least twenty years… There are small ones, like kitchen fires, but those obviously don't count."

Duncan blinked and said nothing.

He clearly remembered that Nina's parents had died in a great fire eleven years ago. In the fragments in his mind, there was even the scene where "he" carried Nina out of the burning building.

Where did it go wrong? Did something get scrambled when this body inherited its memories? Or had that fire back then not happened in the Lower City at all? Or… was it simply because this cultist here had failed to find out the truth…

A faint doubt rose in his heart. Because this matter involved Nina and "himself", he could not help but pay more attention to it. And just then, he heard another voice from across the room. It was the girl named Shirley: "That factory leak eleven years ago… was it the one in the Sixth District?"

"The Sixth District? Mm… that sounds right," the woman nodded. "They say the impact was huge at the time. The chemicals left many people with long-term side effects. Quite a lot of residents in the Lower City still remember it today."

A few cultists nearby nodded in agreement when they heard this. It looked like they had found out more or less the same thing.

"A factory leak…" The leader standing in the center of the gathering suddenly broke the silence. His deep, commanding voice cut through the cultists' chatter. "An apparent industrial accident is very likely an supernatural incident disguised by The authority. And it happened exactly at the Node eleven years ago… This is a very important clue. Next we will investigate in this direction and see whether this so-called factory leak points to the holy fragment of the Sun."

The cultists present all nodded and accepted the order at once. Then the masked leader continued: "In addition, we must not only pay attention to supernatural events that happened in the Lower City eleven years ago. We must also watch the unusual things in the city-state of Pland in recent times.

“Even though the fragment of the Sun is still asleep for now, the day of its awakening is close. Its activity is growing every day. Four years ago, our brothers and sisters in the Church tried to wake that fragment ahead of time. Their attempt failed, and the failure of the ritual even drew the furious slaughter of the Deep Sea Church. But that attempt was not completely useless—the stimulus of the awakening ritual deepened the connection between the fragment of the Sun and the Mortal Realm. That is enough for it to gain the power to affect the Mortal Realm for a short time before it fully awakens, and that may help us find it.

“In the near future, pay close attention to the newspapers in the city-state, and to every rumor in the streets and alleys. Any event that looks unusual may point to the fragment of the Sun. Do not let any clue slip past. Understood?”

The cultists all lowered their heads and accepted the command with respect. Duncan, however, focused on another key Node the leader had mentioned:

Four years ago!

Four years ago, the Deep Sea Church in the city-state of Pland had indeed wiped out the largest Sun heretic stronghold in the city in one stroke. They said the scale of the incident had shaken the whole city. It had also been the battle that established the fame of the city-state’s current Inquisitor, Vanna—and after that, the Suntists in this city had never recovered, even up to today.

All this time, Duncan had only known that surface-level information. Now it seemed the truth behind it all was that the Suntists in the city had tried to wake a sleeping fragment of the Sun ahead of time?!

Without noticing it, a chain of truths that had been hidden in the past unfolded before Duncan’s eyes. He quickly pieced together the fragments of information in his mind and thought about how to get more out of these cultists. But right then, a strange smell suddenly slipped into his nose.

It smelled like burning sulfur mixed with the sour, acrid stench of some chemical.

The next second, the other ordinary cultists around them smelled it too. Some looked at each other, as if searching for the source of the stench. The leader standing in the center of the gathering reacted at once. He suddenly pulled from his coat a charm amulet modeled after the Sun—the very same kind of Sun charm amulet Duncan carried. Its surface was burning with illusory, half-transparent flames.

The sharp, acrid smell was coming from that fire.

“Filthy impurities… the flame has been deceived!” The leader glanced at the burning Sun charm amulet, his voice suddenly filled with both shock and anger. “There is a heretic hiding among us!”

The room burst into an uproar at once. Duncan’s first reaction was that he had been exposed. He didn’t know how, but it seemed the Sun charm amulet on the leader had finally recognized him as a “heretic” who did not believe in the Sun at all.

Thinking of this, he let out a small sigh and was about to release the dove. But before he could move, he heard another sigh come from across the room—

The sigh came from the girl in the black dress, the maiden named Shirley. She shook her head in regret: “I knew A-Dog wasn’t reliable. The disguise couldn’t even last three hours.”

Before her voice even fell, a mass of pitch-black flame suddenly exploded into being at the girl’s side!

The flame was born out of thin air. It had the shape of fire, yet was black as shadow. It ignited on the girl's arm and, in one second, spread across almost a third of her body. In the next moment, Shirley's right side looked like fuel for the black fire. It crackled as it burned. The flowing flame streamed downward, the part in midair twisting into a black chain, and the part that fell to the floor condensing in a heartbeat into a bony, burning monster!

It was a pitch-black hellhound, a huge dog more than half as tall as a grown man. Its body looked pieced together from countless twisted, piled-up bones. Where there should have been flesh, there was only burning black fire and writhing shadows. Its skull was jagged and ferocious. Where its eyes should have been were empty sockets filled only with blood-red mist, packed with endless hunger and malice!

A black chain extended from the huge dog's neck all the way to Shirley's arm, faintly merging with the girl's body.

"A Abyssal Hound… a summoner from the Cult of Annihilation?!" The leader in the center of the gathering was both shocked and furious at the sight. "What is the meaning of this?! Are you people who worship the Abyssal Deep planning to start a war with the Suntists?!"

Chapter 75: Beaten into a Pile

Seeing how things suddenly turned out, Duncan, who had been about to stand up openly and confess that “the mole is me”, quietly stepped back again instead. He switched to the mindset of a bystander watching a show and looked at the situation in the hall.

So he was not the only mole here after all—the girl in the black dress had felt out of place to him from the start. At first Duncan had only thought her quiet, very young air did not fit this cult gathering, and that was why she gave him that feeling. He had never expected it to be like this.

He noticed two terms the leader had just used: Abyssal Hound, and Cult of Annihilation.

The Abyssal Hound obviously meant the huge black skeletal dog the girl had summoned. The Cult of Annihilation, on the other hand, did not sound like some lively civic group that could be registered openly at City Hall. This girl really was not a follower of the Sun at all. She belonged to some other cult?!

Just how many strange dark cults were still hiding in the gutters of this world?

While Duncan’s thoughts were turning, the girl who had summoned the Abyssal Hound had already lifted the black chain on her arm a little. She kept a guarded stance while her eyes swept over the hall. There seemed to be a mocking smile at the corner of her mouth: “Cult of Annihilation…

Sorry, I don’t have much to do with them. Unlike you bastards who have to be some Eldritch God’s lapdogs to sleep at night, I only work for myself!”

“You can’t fool anyone with that excuse. Only the Cult of Annihilation knows how to summon the horrors of the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea. I advise you to give up, heretic. You are standing on the Sun God’s ground. Even the Abyssal Hound’s spells can’t save you here!” The leader in the center of the hall stared hard at Shirley. His voice was low and full of threat. “Speak. What are you people trying to do?! Annihilation and the Sun are not allies, but we have never been enemies either. Why did you disguise yourself and sneak into our holy gathering?”

“I only wanted to dig a bit of intel out of you mutts’ not-so-bright heads, that’s all—” Shirley’s mouth curled up. The chain linked to her body suddenly gave off a series of clanking sounds. The strange metal links writhed slowly like living things. “And I said it already, I’m not from the Cult of Annihilation…!”

Before the girl could finish, a series of crackling sounds suddenly rose all around them. The oil lamps set in every corner of the room seemed driven by some unknown power and burst into blazing flames all at once!

The bright flames from the oil lamps lit the whole basement as bright as day. Above each lamp, a small fireball rose and floated up. Each fireball looked like a tiny Sun, and they began to radiate a vast power. At some point, the leader in the center of the hall had also gripped his Sun charm amulet with all his strength. The amulet’s sharp, flame-shaped spikes cut into his palm. Blood seeped into the charm amulet and burned like oil, setting his entire hand ablaze as he held it. The fire on his hand echoed from afar with the suddenly changed oil lamps.

Clearly, this seasoned cult priest had only been stalling with a few sentences. While Shirley was not paying attention, he had already activated some kind of supernatural power.

“Give up and surrender, heretic.” A threatening voice came from under the golden Sun mask. “The power of the Sun God has already sealed this place. I know the abilities of you Annihilators. You can borrow spells from the demons you summon and use those spells to harm others. The Abyssal Hound’s own Shadow Breath is indeed fearsome—but this place is sealed now. You and your dog cannot borrow any power from the Abyssal Deep or the Deep Sea!”

Duncan’s fingers moved slightly inside his pocket. He wondered whether he should step in to help. It might look like two groups of cultists tearing at each other’s throats, but the girl named Shirley might know some things. And right now she clearly seemed outnumbered.

Just then, the leader wearing the golden Sun mask stretched toward Shirley the hand that gripped the Sun’s burning emblem. The voice from under the mask was low and tempting, as if some unseen power was mixed into his words: “Give up your resistance. Convert in the Sun God’s domain and then tell me everything you know. The merciful Sun will forgive your sins… Kneel, young sister… You cannot use your spells…”

Yet Shirley seemed deaf to the Sun priest’s threat. She only turned her head to glance at the burning oil lamps, then at the Suntists around her who had already drawn short swords, daggers, and even revolvers. She asked calmly: “It must be pretty hard for you to keep this Warding Field up, right?”

The Sun priest gave a cold snort: “Hmph, this is the power granted by my Lord…”

Before he could finish, the girl in the black dress suddenly moved!

Shirley suddenly took a big step forward. Her right arm, wrapped in black fire, swung up. The black iron chain howled through the air, and the Abyssal Hound at its end was lifted high as she whirled it around. The giant dog, several times larger than an ordinary hound, was swung in a full circle with monstrous strength and then crashed down with a terrible boom, slamming into the Sun priest's chest.

The crisp sound of breaking bones rang out. The Sun priest had been focusing all his strength on maintaining the barrier, so he had no time to react at all before being hit by the flying dog. He shot backwards like a ragged sack and slammed into the wall opposite, then stopped moving.

Duncan: "…"

He really had not seen that coming.

It all happened in a flash. The sudden turn left every cultist there stunned. The Suntists were still waiting for their leader's order. In the next second they saw their boss flying away, and right after that, the howling of the chain in midair tore through the air again!

Shirley raised her arm again. The black chain clattered. With another burst of monstrous strength, she swung the Abyssal Hound up like a meteor hammer. The giant dog traced a terrifying arc through the air. After several loud crashes—bang, bang, bang—several more cultists spat blood and flew backward!

This time, the cultists finally reacted. Ignoring their shock, they all roared and rushed at the girl who was lifting the chain again. More than a dozen daggers and blades swung through the air. In answer, Shirley spun the Abyssal Hound in a full circle and cursed at the top of her lungs: "Go to hell and keep your damned god company! You mongrel trash!"

The giant dog tore through the air. Every cultist it hit flew back with snapped bones and torn muscles. Shirley's skill with this living meteor hammer was almost supernatural. For a while, all Duncan could see on the field were chains whipping through the air, the giant dog howling, and the girl darting and spinning among them, her hand rising and the dog crashing down again and again…

Right then, several gunshots suddenly rang out!

The Suntists who carried revolvers had finally found an opening. After realizing that there was no way to take down the brute-strength girl in close combat, they pulled their triggers without hesitation.

Brass bullets cut through the air. Two hit the chain, bursting into brief bright sparks. The others drilled one after another into Shirley's body.

"Ugh…" The girl's body suddenly swayed. The impact and pain of the bullets tearing into her made her lose her footing for a moment. Yet in the very next second, just as the cultists thought the tide had turned, the howling of the chain rang out again.

"A-Dog! Block my sense of pain!"

The Abyssal Hound spinning through the air let out a chaotic roar. In the next instant, it smashed straight into a cultist with a gun and sent him flying. His head hit a pillar in the distance, and he instantly turned into a fresh mini version of Alice…

In the center of the hall, the whirling "meteor dog" grew even more fierce than before!

Duncan quietly took two steps back, lowering his presence as much as he could while he waited for it all to be over.

Right now he mainly worried about blood splattering on him—he had changed into these clothes only today. It would be hard to explain things to Nina when he got back.

As for that woman warrior who wielded a fine "meteor dog"…

She probably did not need his help.

She was in great shape.

The entire fight did not actually last very long. The black-dressed girl's whirling hunting hound hit hard and moved fast. This basement, where there was no way to escape, was like her own private killing ground. Duncan just stood in the corner silently reciting the multiplication table a second time. Before he finished, the battle was already over.

When every cultist had been beaten into one big pile, the basement finally grew quiet.

Shirley finally stopped. She held tight to the iron chain that bound the Abyssal Hound and stood in the middle of the room, panting hard. Suddenly, her eyes caught the figure standing in the corner by the wall.

She had finally noticed Duncan, the last "cultist" left in this gathering.

Even though she felt stunned and puzzled by this strange "cultist's" calm look, Shirley still did not hesitate. She dragged the dog along and walked toward her last target.

Her hostility was plain to see.

Chapter 76: The Hound Sees Through the Human Heart

Watching Shirley stride toward him with murder in her eyes, Duncan could not help letting out a sigh. [So in the end, this mess still landed on my head.]

He was not very nervous. To be fair, he knew he had almost no combat experience, while the young lady in front of him looked like a female warrior who could charge into Longridge Slope seven times and come back out again. But he still did not panic at all.

First, he had a dove that specialized in Delayed Slash. AI's power took effect instantly within its range and triggered faster than a gun. If Shirley really swung the dog at him, she would probably be beaten by the dove's high-ping attack while still in midair and die from packet loss.

Second, he controlled the spirit form flame that had strange effects on all supernatural things. This fire could even control the Vanished, so this Abyssal Hound before him was probably not harder to handle than that pile of monsters on the Vanished, right? At worst, he would let the flame possess it and coil around its whole body. After that, it would be his area of expertise: [Young lady, I can tell your dog and I are destined to meet…]

Last, and most important—this body was not his real body anyway.

Right now, he was only using an avatar form. From a biological point of view, this avatar form seemed alive, but in essence it was still just a corpse driven by Ghost power. Duncan did not need this body to stay physiologically intact for it to move. Just like the previous avatar form in the sewers that kept moving even after it lost its heart, he only needed this body to “exist” so he could keep using it.

He even suspected that even if his current avatar form was chopped into pieces, he could still control it to go home in batches…

The only thing that worried him was that if Shirley smashed all his bones with a meteor-hound strike, how he should explain to Nina afterward why her Uncle’s bones were suddenly so special…

So he stood there calmly, watching the girl in the black dress walk up to him. The black iron chain in her hand swung in the air, and that bizarre, terrifying Abyssal Hound followed at her side with an odd, hard-to-read gait, slowly padding along beside its master.

Because of the fierce battle earlier, the girl’s arms and cheeks were stained with blood. This completely broke the first impression of a quiet, well-behaved girl and instead made her look eerie and dangerous.

“You’re really not afraid. You really are strange.” Shirley stopped two or three meters in front of Duncan, frowning at the “Suntist” in front of her. At the same time, her right hand slowly, quietly lifted. “Have you given up resisting?”

Duncan thought for a moment: “If I say I’m not with them, would you believe me?”

As he spoke, he rubbed his fingers quietly inside his pocket, letting the phantom spirit form flame slowly wander between his clothes and skin, in case this young lady decided to start swinging the dog the moment she got upset.

Shirley froze for a second. An “are you kidding me” expression slowly appeared on her blood-stained face. “Do you think I—”

Before she finished, the Abyssal Hound beside her suddenly spoke human words. A hoarse, low voice came from its throat woven of bones: “I believe him.”

“Huh… huh?” Shirley stared in shock at her summoned creature. “Dog, did I just smash your brain? This guy—”

“Please wait a moment,” the Abyssal Hound shook its head, then, under Duncan’s blank gaze, walked off to the side, stretched its neck, and went: “Uuurgh—”

The extremely loud retching echoed through the blood-stained basement. The terrifying demon from the Abyssal Deep, from the Deep Sea, turned its insides upside down on the spot. It vomited up clouds of choking, acrid black flame, ash, and pitch-black slime like acid. The concrete floor hissed as the corrupted stuff ate into it, and within seconds a large pit sank into the ground.

Duncan watched the scene with a blank face, wondering if he had just found a weakness in Shirley’s fighting power—this young lady was strong, ruthless, and her fighting style was weird and hard to guard against, but she clearly was not good at long battles.

The key was her way of fighting: a person could take it, but the dog could not.

So the atmosphere in the room stayed awkward like that for two or three minutes. When the Abyssal Hound finally stopped vomiting, Duncan could not help leaning over to look at it. “…Are you okay?”

The hound instantly lowered its head. Its tail, made of coiled bones, tucked tightly between its legs. “Thank you for your concern. I hope my rude display did not offend your eyes. Do you have any other orders? If not, we will take our leave…”

Duncan had not even had time to react to what was wrong with this dog when Shirley cried out first: “Dog, are you really okay? Did I actually smash your head just now?! You are never this polite when you talk to humans. No one who stands in front of you ever lasts more than ten seconds before you start cursing their mother…”

By now Duncan had faintly caught on. He suddenly looked at the vicious, terrifying-looking Abyssal Hound, and his eyes grew serious.

From the few words he had heard earlier from the Sun priest, this “great hound” was some kind of demon summoned from the Abyssal Deep, from the Deep Sea. For the moment, he did not care what the so-called Cult of Annihilation was, or what strange things filled the Abyssal Deep, or why people could even summon a dog out of it. One thing was at least clear:

This “dog” was afraid of him. This demon from the Abyssal Deep, from the Deep Sea… it probably had a kind of “sight” very different from that of an ordinary person.

“Do you know who I am?” Duncan asked calmly. “Have you seen me before?”

“I don’t, I don’t,” the Abyssal Hound said without even raising its head. “I truly don’t know you… but you are definitely a big shot, no doubt about that…”

Duncan frowned and asked: “In your eyes, I don’t look like a human, do I?”

The Abyssal Hound hesitated. It raised its head with great care and glanced at Duncan, then said, hesitating: “You… do look like one… and also don’t look like one…”

Duncan withdrew his gaze and looked at Shirley.

The girl in the black dress was staring at them in shock and doubt. She had finally put away her first wave of hostility. In its place was thick bewilderment and wariness.

This young lady seemed a bit reckless, but she was clearly not stupid. After her “pet dog” showed such abnormal reactions again and again, even the most impulsive person would cool down at this point and start to sense that something was wrong.

She quietly tightened the chain between her and the Abyssal Hound as she stepped half a step back without drawing notice, and watched Duncan carefully. “You just said you’re not with them…”

“That’s right.” Duncan spread his hands. “You might not believe it, but I also sneaked in here to gather information…”

“I believe you,” Shirley said crisply.

This time it was Duncan’s turn to be surprised. He suddenly realized that the impression this girl gave him kept changing. At first, from her looks, he had thought she was a quiet, well-behaved child, but then she showed a violent, bloody side. Just now he had thought she was a simple-minded reckless type, yet now she adapted to the situation and backed down even faster than he had imagined…

[What kind of family raises a child like this?]

With that strange thought circling in his mind, Duncan also felt a little thrown off by how straightforward her attitude was. He steadied himself before asking: “Back at the gathering, why did you look at me twice in a row?”

“Dog kept watching you,” Shirley answered, a bit unwilling but still cooperative. “I was just curious and followed his gaze for a couple of looks…”

“Dog? This one?” Duncan frowned and glanced at the pitch-black Skeletal Hound. “Earlier I heard that priest mention the Cult of Annihilation—is that a church that worships the Abyssal Deep Sea? What is your relationship with this Cult of Annihilation?”

“I have nothing to do with them!” Shirley said at once, with extra emphasis. “If they worship the Abyssal Deep Sea, that’s their business. Dog and I know each other for other reasons!”

Duncan’s eyes fell on the chain between the girl and the Abyssal Hound.

From the information he had just gotten, worshipping the Abyssal Deep Sea, being able to summon demons from the Abyssal Deep, and normally using those demons’ power as spells in battle, all seemed to be trademarks of the Cult of Annihilation. That Sun priest had judged Shirley that way only because she had summoned a Abyssal Hound—although he had suffered a “flying dog meteor hammer” for that wrong guess, Duncan still believed that at least under normal conditions this information was correct.

The only problem was this strange girl in front of him.

She seemed very resistant to anyone linking her with cultists—even though she had a hound from the Abyssal Deep, from the Deep Sea.

“Fine, then you have nothing to do with them,” Duncan shook his head and asked again. “So why are you here? What are you investigating?”

Shirley pressed her lips together. She clearly did not want to answer that question, but the tense signals pouring off the hound beside her made her understand that this ordinary-looking middle-aged man was probably extremely dangerous. She had better cooperate.

“I…”

Shirley opened her mouth, but the moment she spoke, a loud blast exploded in the basement. A blazing fireball suddenly flew in from the side!

Chapter 77: Thoughts About Fire

The blast roared through the basement and a blazing fireball suddenly flew in from the side—but before it got close, Duncan had already reacted.

His senses were much faster than his body. The instant the anomalous energy appeared in the basement, he sensed something was wrong. Now he did not have time to think and raised his hand to block on instinct!

A hint of heat came from his fingertips. The next second, the erupting spirit form fire surged into the fireball with a backdraft-like blast. Duncan caught the burning mass that had shot out from the corner of the basement out of thin air. The blazing flames were almost instantly dyed a ghostly green. The explosive energy turned obedient in a moment and began to burn quietly in his hand.

Holding the fireball that had turned into a ghost-green spirit flame, Duncan slowly turned his head toward the direction of the attack.

The instant his gaze moved away, the Abyssal Hound called Dog suddenly leaped back. A rift churning with countless shadows and black mist appeared out of nowhere where it landed. It jumped in without hesitation, and the black iron chain dragged Shirley along with it. Before she flew into the rift, she spat hard to the side. Several blood-stained bullets landed on the ground.

In the next second, the girl and the hound vanished from the basement.

Hearing the noise, Duncan turned back in surprise, only to see the hem of the girl’s dress disappearing into the rift. This strange man-and-dog duo had run off while he glanced away.

[I still had a whole pile of questions left to ask!]

And all because some cultist with abnormal vitality suddenly launched a sneak attack.

Duncan felt a subtle irritation rise in him. He looked again toward where the fireball had come from and saw the cult priest wearing the Sun mask slumped crookedly against the corner of the wall, holding up his arm with his last breath. He seemed stunned that the fireball he had summoned with all his strength had not only been caught out of thin air but even had its control taken away. Even through the Golden Sun Mask, Duncan could see the dull stare in his eyes.

“Not finishing off an enemy after a fight is a really bad habit…”

Duncan’s face darkened. Muttering to himself about a certain dog-swinging girl who did not know how to finish an enemy, he slowly walked toward the badly wounded but still living cult priest.

He was still holding the quiet, ghost-green flame ball in his hand. The power leaking from it silently spread through the basement.

With each step Duncan took, the oil lamps and torches set around the basement seemed to feel some strange call. The dancing flames were dyed ghostly green one after another. In this eerie light that crept closer and closer, the Sun priest wearing the mask finally felt a fear stronger than ever before—

He felt his link to the god the Sun quickly weaken. As each lamp was “seized”, the Sun’s gaze melted away from his soul like snow in spring!

Under this enormous terror, a trembling voice finally came from behind the mask: “You… you’re not an ordinary heretic. What are you…”

When the last lamp turned into ghost-green soul fire, Duncan stopped in front of the priest. He lowered his head slightly. His face looked especially grim in the light of the spirit form fire. “I hadn’t finished my questions, and you cut me off. That’s very rude. Didn’t your mother teach you better?”

As he spoke, he also noticed the condition of the Sun priest.

He felt he had wronged Shirley—half of this cultist’s chest had already collapsed, and his broken ribs might have pierced his heart and lungs. It was obviously a fatal injury, so in theory there was no need at all to finish him off.

The priest was still alive only because some stronger, stranger power was keeping him hanging on. That was probably the “god the Sun” these cultists kept talking about.

Even so, Duncan could clearly see that life was rapidly flowing out of the priest’s body. Each breath grew weaker. It was only a matter of time before he died.

He did not know why, but it was clear that the Sun’s divine blessing was quickly leaving this priest.

“It seems the Sun’s divine blessing isn’t very reliable,” Duncan shook his head with a sigh. “Your lord has already abandoned you.”

He had only spoken casually, but he had not expected that sentence to provoke the half-dead priest. The man’s eyes bulged with rage, and driven by huge anger he burst out with his last bit of strength. Under Duncan’s surprised gaze, he suddenly pulled a blood-stained strip of cloth from his sleeve!

“I offer this body to my lord! May the Sacred shroud purify the heretic before me!”

The priest shouted. Filthy clots of blood and bits of organ splattered across the Golden Sun Mask. He raised the “Sacred shroud” high in his hand and offered the most complete and crazed sacrifice to his lord—

He sacrificed all of himself, only to ignite the Sacred shroud and die together with this heretic who had stolen control of the flames!

Yet Duncan only watched this final crazed sacrificial rite with a calm gaze —although he had indeed been startled when the priest suddenly pulled something from his sleeve, once he saw what it was, he relaxed completely.

It was the same strange strip of cloth the man had used earlier, when Duncan first entered the gathering, to verify his “identity as a fellow believer”—he just had not expected that this strip also carried a grand name like “Sacred shroud”.

Just as Duncan expected, the Sacred shroud stayed perfectly still. The cult priest’s most extreme final sacrifice did not wake any sacred miracle at all.

A hint of confusion showed in the eyes under the mask. The cult priest forced his body upright and stared in despair at the silent sacred relic in his hand. He spat another mouthful of filthy blood in stubborn disbelief. “I offer this body to my lord…”

“I guess what you really want is this.”

Duncan could not bear to watch anymore. He shook his head and pointed at the blood-soaked strip of cloth.

The next second, a tuft of ghost-green flame burst into being!

The spirit form fire ignited the Sacred shroud, ignited the filthy blood the cult priest had coughed up, and ignited the flesh of this madman. In the spirit flame, the priest let out a roar full of shock and rage. “No, no, no… it shouldn’t be like this… the lord will not abandon me, the lord… the lord will punish you, heretic… who are you?!”

In the roaring flames, the cult priest's voice finally grew weak and faded. The life force propped up by supernatural power still could not withstand this fire that burned the soul directly—or rather, it was exactly because of that supernatural power that he turned to ash under the backlash of the spirit flame.

The spirit form fire finally faded away. The Sun priest leaning in the corner had been completely burned to nothing. Only a scattered pile of clothes and the Golden Sun Mask, shaped in imitation of the Sun, were left on the spot.

Even the so-called "Sacred shroud" had burned to ash in the fire after serving as the "medium".

Duncan frowned.

To be honest, this was not the first time he had seen a corpse—the "sacrificial victims" in the underground caves before, and that priest who had been "sacrificed", had already toughened his nerves. At this moment he was only a bit surprised.

Normally, his spirit form fire only acted on supernatural items. He had tested this in many ways while on the Vanished—any supernatural object burned by the fire would be "seized" and turned into Captain Duncan's property. If something was not supernatural, then even a piece of paper would not be affected by the spirit form fire.

Just now, the spirit form fire had produced real burning. That was because he had triggered it on purpose—he was worried that the cultist would really do something with that Sacred shroud, so out of caution he ordered the Sacred shroud to burn itself. From the result, the Sacred shroud had indeed obeyed the order faithfully.

He had not expected, though, that the spreading flames would also burn the cult priest to ash. That did not match the conclusion he had gotten from his earlier tests.

It was normal for the Sacred shroud to burn away, because it was an supernatural item and would be affected by the spirit form fire.

It was also normal that the cult priest's clothes were left behind untouched, because those clothes were clearly "ordinary things". To ordinary things, the spirit form fire was like a phantom in another world and had no effect at all—unless the clothing itself was enchanted or woven with some supernatural material.

It was also normal that the Golden Sun Mask remained completely intact. Duncan was very interested in this obviously supernatural item, so as soon as the fire began to spread he had given an order to keep the mask from being damaged.

Then… why had this cultist been burned to ash by the spirit form fire?

Confused, Duncan squatted down and carefully examined the dark gray ash.

It looked about the same as the ash left after the Sacred shroud burned.

Duncan had never tested his spirit form fire on a living person before, let alone used the flames on purpose to take a life. This cult priest should count as the first real victim of his fire.

At least, the first real victim while he was consciously in control.

Slowly, a bold idea suddenly rose in Duncan's mind.

Could it be that… mortals who had received "divine blessing" from worshipping a specific deity could also be treated as "supernatural items"?

Chapter 78: Cleanup Work and a Good citizen’s Duty

Duncan’s thoughts led nowhere, because he had no idea where to find a second Suntist who was still breathing to test his theory on.

This kind of thing depended on luck.

Duncan slowly stood up. One by one, the pale green spirit flame lamps in the basement flickered in the still air. In their wavering light and shadow, his thoughts spread out again.

A cultist who believed in a God and had received divine blessing might be seen by the fire of his spirit form as an “extraordinary item”. Then… what about an ordinary person?

When this flame burned on an ordinary person, could it do anything beyond those surface “light and shadow effects”? If not, then how deep did one have to believe in a God before the flame would treat them as a valid “extraordinary target”? It could burn cultists who believed in an Eldritch God, so what about people who worshiped the True Gods?

Duncan calmly watched the dim lamps in the room, then suddenly gave a faint smile.

“They are human.”

So his thoughts stopped there. He did not follow this line any further.

This flame was a powerful force. Power itself was not a sin, but a weak will could easily invite corruption. Ever since he had found out that he held a power beyond imagination, Duncan kept reminding himself of this. No matter how famous “Captain Duncan” became, no matter how strong the fire of his spirit form was, he had to always watch the limits of himself as a “human”.

He could not treat people as things just to test or control his power, even in this strange world, even if those he faced were not always “human” in the standard sense.

Striking in a fight was one thing. Looking for the weak to test his blade on, just to satisfy his curiosity, was another.

Duncan let out a soft breath. He looked at the ghostly green ball of flame still burning in his hand, then waved his hand to dismiss it.

The flame obeyed him faithfully and vanished into the air without a sound.

Duncan smiled. He was, and would always be, the master of this flame.

After the fire of his spirit form faded, the basement quickly shifted from eerie back to normal. One after another, the pale green lamps returned to the bright, clear state they had at the start. Duncan looked around at the messy scene and thought about what to do next.

That strange girl named Shirley was gone, and it seemed she had used some kind of extraordinary method to escape. He knew nothing in that field and had no idea where to look for her. It was truly a pity.

He still had many questions for her. Now it seemed there would be no chance.

But Duncan still felt that he might run into that girl again someday. This was not a baseless guess. Her goal was clearly to cause trouble for these Suntists and to pry something out of them. Lately, the activity of Suntists in the city-state of Pland was at its peak. Countless similar gatherings were going on in the dark. With Shirley and “Dog” and their way of doing things…

They were bound to stir up some lively, big trouble sooner or later.

Duncan had the Sun emblem on him, whose authority he had seized. It let him sense the activities of Suntists in the city. For now, its sensing range did not seem very large, but as long as he strolled around the city when he had nothing else to do, he might bump into some new fun.

As for this mess here, Duncan had no interest in cleaning it up.

He only picked up the golden Sun mask left behind by the Sun priest from the pile of ashes on the floor and carefully wiped off the ash and dust on its surface. This was his trophy, and he meant to take it back to the Vanished to study.

That priest had been burned very clean. Every item on him that touched the supernatural field had turned to ash. The Sun mask was the only “relic” he had left in this world.

“…A palm-sized charm amulet is one thing. This thing might be a bit too big…” Duncan muttered, weighing the Sun mask in his hands. “And if I run into professionals from the Deep Sea Church, they might use some special method to detect it…”

It would be hard to carry this mask on him and safely bring it back to the antique shop. Even if he managed to get it there, Nina might find it, and that would surely cause trouble.

The best way was to send it straight to a completely safe place.

As he thought, Duncan looked back at the pigeon perched on his shoulder. A brand-new test idea came to him. If he did not go along, could this pigeon travel through the Spirit Realm on its own and take things back to the Vanished?

The pigeon tilted its head and stared at Duncan, eye to eye: “Big hammer for eighty, small hammer for forty!”

Duncan laughed: “Think of it as working overtime. Later I’ll find a way to get you some fries on the ship. Try and see if you can take this mask to the Vanished by yourself.”

The pigeon flapped its wings at once. As it flew toward the mask in Duncan’s hand, it let out that sharp, feminine voice of its: “I wanted to say no, but you are offering far too much!”

Before the words even finished, light and shadow flashed in front of him. The pigeon and the mask vanished from his sight at the same time. In the perception deep in his mind, he clearly felt AI’s presence suddenly appear in the captain’s cabin on the Vanished.

The delay was barely even a second!

This pigeon was so fast! So it could teleport items this quickly?

As Duncan was still marveling in his heart, his vision blurred. AI, in her bone-pigeon form, sprang out of thin air and landed on his shoulder. The bird flapped its wings, and her undead body returned to that of a white dove. She proudly lifted her head: “teleportation successful!”

Seeing the state she was in when she popped back out, Duncan nodded to himself. Things made sense now. Of course the bone pigeon was faster than AI.

Then he straightened his clothes and checked that there were no suspicious bloodstains left on him and that he had left no trace at the scene. In fact, he had not touched anything since he came in, afraid of leaving fingerprints or the like. Only then did he carefully use his coat to pad his fingers, open the iron door, and go back out through the stairway he had used to come down.

The Sun, bound by two rings of runes, had already sunk close to the horizon. Gorgeous evening clouds spread over the uneven roofs of the Lower City. High in the sky above the sunset, that faint streak of the Pale Rift had begun to show itself.

One look at the sky made Duncan drop the idea of continuing to investigate the city. Nina would be coming home from school soon.

That child's "Uncle Duncan" had only just gotten better. He could not stay out all night now.

Duncan quickly left the abandoned factory and walked toward the main road along the route he remembered. He passed through twisted little alleys and through an area where pipes crossed, sewage flowed, and strange smells filled the air. At last he began to faintly hear the sounds of traffic from far away.

The sky was not fully dark yet. He should still be able to catch the last bus.

But Duncan suddenly stopped.

At the intersection not far ahead, he saw four people in uniform. Two of them wore dark blue constable uniforms with epaulettes, with batons and revolvers at their waists. The other two wore black coats cut somewhere between a trench coat and a formal suit, with a faint Church style to them. At their waists he could see not only holsters for large revolvers, but also long steel swords that seemed out of place in this age.

The two people in black coats had one more eye-catching item at their belts: a consecrated lantern decorated with runes, clearly used for night patrols.

They seemed to be handing over their shift at the intersection. Duncan paused, then quickly understood.

They were constables under City Hall and Guardians under the Church.

Constables kept order in the city by day. Guardians protected the city-state's peace under the veil of night. Now the Sun was sinking. The time of day and night changing was almost here, the moment when secular power and holy power traded places.

This was one of the world's unique "sights".

The four of them seemed not to notice Duncan.

Duncan walked over calmly. He had hesitated for a moment, but soon reminded himself that he had a clear conscience.

A law-abiding citizen taking a walk before dark was not committing a crime.

One of the Church Guardians doing the handover finally noticed someone walking toward them. The tall young man raised his head, saw Duncan, and at once waved his hand and called out in warning: "citizen! It is getting dark. Go home quickly. It is not safe outside."

"Officers! I want to report something," Duncan said, picking up his pace. He walked over and spoke with great sincerity: "Just now I heard a lot of noise from that abandoned factory over there. Earlier I saw many shady types sneaking in and out…"

He paused here, then added: "I read in the newspaper before that we should actively report strange gatherings and odd noises around us…"

—

Chapter 79: lamplight in the Shabby Alley

Far from the abandoned factory, deep in a shabby alley, a plain old little house suddenly lit up with an oil lamp.

In the flickering light, one could see the room's simple, worn furniture, the slightly moldy ceiling, the peeling, faded wallpaper, and, in the corner of the room, a black crack that slowly squirmed and shrank.

A terrifying-looking skeletal hound lay beside the crack, motionless like a dead dog drained of all strength. On the other end of a black iron chain, Shirley, in her black dress with white trim, carefully adjusted the oil lamp's wick, then came to the window to check the sky outside, still worried.

"…The World's Wound is out…" the girl breathed softly. "Good thing we got home before the veil of night fully fell. Otherwise we might have died in some stinking ditch like a dog."

The Abyssal Hound lying like a corpse on the floor nearby lifted its head at once. A harsh, cracking sound came from its throat: "Say what you want, but leave dogs out of it."

"You can still talk? I thought you lost half your life on that Abyssal Deep jump," Shirley said, turning to glance at Dog. "Can you tell me now? Why did we suddenly have to run, and using the most dangerous Abyssal Deep crossing at that? Didn't you say there were countless demons waiting in the Abyssal Deep, in the Deep Sea, to chew up your black bones?"

“No matter how many demons there are in the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea, I can still dodge them. I might not be able to beat them, but I can outrun them. But just now… if we hadn’t run, we might not have run at all,” the Abyssal Hound said, finally sounding as if it had caught its breath. It lifted its head a little to look at Shirley. “You should be glad I reacted fast and opened the crack the moment that scary fellow looked away. As long as his gaze was still on us, I couldn’t even open an escape path!”

Shirley frowned and slowly walked up to the Abyssal Hound: “So what was it, exactly? Why were you that scared? That man called ‘Duncan’… Dog, have you seen him before? Is he some big shot in the Church of Annihilation, or does he have some Abyssal demon standing behind him?”

The Abyssal Hound seemed to recall some extremely terrible feeling. All its bones clattered once, and then it lowered its voice and muttered: “I have never seen him. I do not know him.”

Shirley’s eyes went wide at once: “You got that scared of someone you’ve never even seen before?!”

“Even if I have never seen him before, as a Abyssal demon I can still ‘see’ shadows worse than death!” The Abyssal Hound suddenly raised its head. Its hollow, red eye sockets stared straight at Shirley. “Inside a human shell, he had a damned whirlpool of light and shadow that made even me feel mentally deranged with just one look. How could I not be afraid?!”

It paused, as if trying to find the right words to describe its feeling to Shirley, who was human. It thought for a long time before slowly speaking: “When he talked, I could hear ten thousand overlapping voices howling at the same time. When he cast his divine gaze, I could feel my entire fate, from birth to death, laid out flat on the ground for someone to view. Let me tell you, the last time I met something that scary was that time I saw the ‘Holy Lord’ from far away in the Abyssal Deep, in the Deep Sea. But the Holy Lord cannot move. Today we met someone who can walk and move.”

Dog’s frightened tone and stare—though his eyes were just two glowing holes—made Shirley’s skin crawl. Even so, she still muttered under her breath: “How come I did not feel anything back then… I even thought he seemed pretty nice…”

“That is why I sometimes envy you humans and your slow, dull senses. That screen of ignorance really is the greatest gift the world gave you. It lets you die with a smile in the middle of mad, twisted doom,” the Abyssal Hound said weakly, flopping back down. “Stay blind and clueless. The world will be a bit nicer that way. Poor little dogs like me are not so lucky. Every few days I get to see something that can scare a dog to death…”

“How in the world can there be a Abyssal demon as cowardly as you, damn it,” Shirley could not help giving Dog a sideways look. Then she seemed to think of something and said hesitantly, “But the way you put it, I feel like maybe we shouldn’t have run. If he really is some super powerful big shot, like you said, maybe we could latch onto him. Look, he was actually quite nice to us just now. He even asked us things. And he seemed to be at odds with those Sun bastards. Isn’t that a chance? I could act cute, play the spoiled girl a little. If he turned out to be a backer…”

Before the girl finished speaking, the black iron chain clattered. Dog, who had been lying there like a corpse a moment ago, suddenly jumped up: “Drop that crazy idea right now! Your level of insanity is already enough to open a Subspace channel!”

It paused, then kept warning her, still uneasy: “Listen. Never deal with those things that wear a human shell but are unspeakable inside. They are more cunning than pure demons and more vicious than real humans. Their calm talk with you is always only the appetizer to a feast. Do not be fooled by how friendly he seemed just now. Do you really think that if you told him everything you know, he would let you walk away whole?”

It seemed the Abyssal Hound’s never-before-heard harsh tone had worked. Shirley looked a bit cowed. She finally gave up her bold idea, but still grumbled: “I know, I know. But Dog, you sound like an old nagging mother…”

The Abyssal Hound flopped down on the floor: “Of course I do. I raised you!”

Shirley snorted, then looked out the window at the sky. Seeing that the veil of night had already sunk low, she stepped toward the window.

The black iron chain went taut as the girl walked. The Abyssal Hound, who had wanted to lie and rest, was helplessly dragged along the floor. This huge, heavy Abyssal demon was pulled around in Shirley’s hands as if it weighed nothing. “What are you trying to do now? Can you not let me lie here for a while? We fought such a big battle today. I am exhausted…”

“I did most of the fighting, all right?” Shirley said, still looking outside without turning back. “I am checking the situation out there… It’s completely dark now. The street lamps have only just turned on.”

“This is the Slum Quarter, after all. The authority already does well enough by keeping these street lamps at the most basic level of warding. Do not expect them to light up before the dusk bell like in other districts,” Dog grumbled. He glanced back at the oil lamp on the old dining table. “Turn the lamp off later. Oil is expensive.”

Shirley pressed her lips together: “…We can put it out before we sleep. Otherwise it will be too dark in here.”

Dog’s stomach rumbled, but he said nothing.

Within the city-state, the city's administrators and builders strictly planned the position and number of "street lamps", the most basic warding devices. The gas lamps spread across the city could keep the whole district under protection after nightfall. Because of that, surface homes were safe whether they used electric lights or oil lamps. It was even safe to put out the lights inside after the street lamps were lit.

But even the most prosperous city had forgotten corners. In the depths of the Shantytown, which was even older and more run-down than the Lower City, gas lamps were far fewer than in other areas. They barely managed to keep day and night safe, and that kind of "just barely enough" state was clearly not enough to make people feel at ease.

So, in the Slum Quarter, oil lamps and tallow candles that burned with real flame were things every family needed.

If the street lamps were late by a while, the firelight at home could at least hold back the darkness after the Sun went down for a time.

Of course, there was another important reason many poor families used oil lamps and candles. They could not afford the relatively high cost of switching to electric power.

Electric lights were bright, clean, and safe. In the worry-free districts, they had long been the first choice for lighting in every home. But in this little house in the Shantytown…

The only thing that could still give Shirley and Dog a sense of safety was the wavering flame in that old lamp.

In the dim lamplight, the voice of the Abyssal Hound broke the silence: "… Are you still going out for a while longer these days?"

"Mm."

"Still going after those Sun bastards?"

“I am going to get information out of them.”

“Same thing, more or less… But from the looks of it, they do not seem to know very clearly what happened eleven years ago either. Look at today. Even they were asking the locals.”

“That was because today’s group just happened to all come from Lunsa. Next time we might get something.”

“Fine, as long as you are happy.”

“Just make my disguise a bit more reliable next time, Dog. Do not let it fall apart halfway through again.”

“I just hope we do not run into that scary man again. I suspect our aura leaked early today because there was such a strong ‘interference’ at the scene…”

“All right, all right. If you say so, then so it is…”

Chapter 80: Home Visit?

Before the last streak of sunset faded at the horizon, Duncan saw the familiar front of the antique shop.

The gas lamps along the street were already lit. Their faint yellow light shone on the sign above the door and the dusty gray walls. Warm light also glowed in the display windows on either side of the entrance. Clearly, Nina had already come home—she had turned on the lights on the first floor and was waiting for Duncan to return.

Strictly speaking, from Duncan's point of view he and Nina had only just met. Yet for some reason, when he saw the lights on downstairs, he felt a strange… guilt.

[Was this guilt because I had gone out and stayed away too long?]

Duncan stepped forward and pushed open the front door of the antique shop. The bell hanging above the entrance rang with a clear chime. A second later he heard hurried footsteps coming from the stairs.

A girl in a plain long dress ran down from upstairs like a gust of wind.

"Uncle Duncan!" Nina stopped on the stairs and looked at Duncan at the door with surprise and joy, and also a bit of disbelief in her eyes. "I thought today you were going to…"

"I took a walk in the city and didn't notice it was almost dark," Duncan shook his head. "Sorry. I actually meant to go to Crossroad District to pick you up after school, but something unexpected came up."

“You went to Crossroad District?” Nina looked at Duncan in surprise and confusion. Her eyes ran up and down him, as if checking whether Uncle had been drinking again outside, or was dull from medicine. “To… pick me up after school?”

Uncle Duncan was showing another side that was both strange and familiar, and Nina once again had no idea how she should react.

“I was just a bit curious about how you’re doing at school now,” Duncan said casually. “Anyway, let’s not talk about that. From now on you don’t need to worry about me going out to drink or hanging around with my ‘friends’. If I come back late, it will be because I had proper business to take care of. All right?”

Nina stared blankly as Uncle Duncan came in and closed the door. Seeing how steady his steps were and how full of energy he looked, she nodded without thinking.

“It’s getting late,” Duncan said as he walked toward the stairs to the second floor, speaking to Nina who stood by the stairway. “Have you eaten?”

“Not… yet,” Nina answered, still not used to how Uncle had changed, so her voice sounded a little hesitant. “When I came back and saw you weren’t home, I didn’t know if you were coming back tonight, so… I didn’t cook. But I bought some bread. I was planning to…”

“Just eating bread isn’t nutritious enough. Come on, there’s something good in the kitchen,” Duncan was about to step onto the stairs. He turned back and smiled at Nina. “I’m cooking today.”

Uncle was going to cook?!

Nina felt as if she had just heard some sort of wild tale, but before she could ask anything, she saw Uncle Duncan already striding upstairs. She had no choice but to hurry after him. At the same time, her gaze fell on AI, who was perched steadily on Duncan's shoulder, and she was startled: "Uncle, has this pigeon been with you the whole time?"

"Yeah. It's quite clingy," Duncan said offhandedly. "Oh, right, I gave it a name. It's called AI."

"AI? For a pigeon… that's such a strange name…" Nina scratched her hair. She had already followed him up to the second floor and watched Uncle Duncan actually head for the kitchen. At last she couldn't hold back and asked: "Did you buy anything?"

"It's just a piece of dried salted fish," Duncan said. He found the salted fish he had stored away in a kitchen cabinet, lifted the hard thing, and waved it at Nina with a rather proud look. "It doesn't look like much, but it makes a very good soup."

"Fish?!" Nina's eyes opened wide in surprise. "What day is it today? Fish is so expensive, normally we would never… huh?"

She finally saw the dried fish clearly. The plain-looking thing left the girl very confused. She blinked at it for a long time. "What kind of fish is that? I've never seen it before."

Duncan had known Nina would react like this.

Of course, the residents of the city-state had seen fish before. The Boundless Sea was dangerous, and in the Deep Sea there were things called "Spawn" that threatened human safety. But not every sea area was as strange and extreme as the Deep Sea. Under the protection of the Gods and the city-state's own defenses, the waters close to the city, the Shallow Sea, and a few blessed routes were relatively safer. These regions provided precious resources for the city-state's civilization.

People gathered seafood and minerals from the Nearshore Waters, and hunted whales and other fish of great industrial value along the routes under the Gods' protection. These things kept the city-states alive and supported their industrial growth.

With all that, the job of "fisherman" naturally existed.

But the seas of this world were nothing like those of Earth. Even the "safe" waters were only safe compared to the Deep Sea. So in this world, even nearshore fishing was something extremely specialized and dangerous, and it called for extraordinary knowledge and combat skills.

To people living in the city-states, fish was a familiar yet expensive ingredient.

Even though the sea was right beside them, and there were countless fish in it.

Nina had not eaten fish for many years. Even before her uncle fell ill, a commoner like her had very few chances to see fish served on the table.

Ordinary fish were already that rare, let alone a gift from the Deep Sea.

Duncan even suspected that this Deep Sea fish he had caught on the Vanished was appearing in the city-state of Pland for the first time. Not to mention a commoner young lady like Nina—probably even the city-state's Governor and the senior priests of the Church had never tasted anything like it.

Nina was in for a treat today.

"Don't worry about what kind it is. Just wait and eat." Duncan knew there were some things he could not explain clearly, so he simply did not try. He turned back into the kitchen and began to prepare dinner.

The strange fish was not small. Even after it had been dried, it was still quite large, and there was no way they could finish it in one pot of soup. So he cut the salted fish into two pieces and decided to use the head section first. The rest he could thread with a rope and hang back in the cupboard to dry even more. It might taste better that way.

Uncle really did start cooking.

Watching his familiar figure busy in the kitchen, Nina felt as if she were dreaming.

She did not actually care at all what was going on with that strange fish Uncle had brought out. She was not even truly concerned about tonight's dinner.

Compared to those small details, the changes in Uncle were far stranger, and far more worth paying attention to.

The sound of knife on chopping board rang out. The gas stove hissed, and the broth in the pot bubbled with a soft gurgle.

Nina felt a little dazed. How many years had it been since she had seen a scene like this?

A trace of hesitation appeared on her face. After a moment, as if suddenly making up her mind, she stood at the kitchen door and spoke to the busy back inside: "Uncle, tomorrow… Mr. Morris is coming for a home visit."

"A home visit?" Duncan, busy cooking, froze for a moment when he heard this. "Mr. Morris… your history teacher?"

Nina nodded. "Yes."

"Teachers at that school actually do home visits?" Duncan dropped the prepared pieces of fish into the pot, then put the knife into the sink and turned back to glance at Nina in surprise. "I thought that was a 'special feature' only the schools up in the Upper City had."

"The school… doesn't really have that rule," Nina said carefully, watching Duncan's expression. "But Old Mr. Morris is a bit special. He… cares a lot about his students.”

For a moment, Duncan said nothing.

This was a bit beyond what he had expected.

He had never thought that, while he was moving around the city-state as “Captain Duncan”, he would suddenly have to deal with something like this!

He had thought about having to deal with the Church, thought about dealing with the constables, even the City Navy and the Military Police Corps. Whether he wanted it or not, all his plans were filled with spirit flame, blades, and the Vanished’s more than a hundred broadside cannons.

But he had never planned for an old man who taught history at a public school to appear in them.

[Why is the Mortal Realm always so full of surprises?]

“Uncle?” Nina grew a bit worried when she saw Duncan stay silent for so long. “You don’t want to, right? I can tell Old Mr. Morris… In fact, I already told him today. I told him your health wasn’t good, so you couldn’t really handle a home visit this time. He didn’t say anything then…”

Seeing Nina’s slightly nervous reaction, Duncan’s thoughts started to turn.

It seemed that Old Mr. Morris had not asked for a home visit just this once.

[So how many times has Nina turned him down with the same excuse?]

“…He teaches history, right?” Duncan suddenly asked again.

Nina didn’t know why her uncle was asking this again, but she still nodded. “Yes.”

“Good. I’ve been wanting to talk to a professional in the field of history,” Duncan said with a smile. “When is he coming tomorrow?”

Chapter 81: Memory Deviation

A scholar who for some unknown reason had gone to a commoners' school to teach history, a teacher well versed in ancient history who also seemed to get along quite well with Nina—his coming was an unexpected situation for Duncan, but also an opportunity.

Old Mr. Morris's learning in his field would surely help Duncan solve many questions. And if he could build a good relationship with such a professional, it might bring unexpected convenience in the future—a well-regarded old scholar was bound to have some connections in the city-state.

Nina did not know why her Uncle Duncan had suddenly agreed to the home visit. She did not think too deeply about it; she only felt especially happy.

In that hazy moment she even had an illusion—as if her life was really moving in a better direction, slowly… going back to how it had been in the past.

Outside the window, the veil of night deepened. The pale, cold light of the World's Wound shone on the windowsill of the antique shop's second floor. Under the quiet night, the whole city slowly grew still.

In this world filled with strange and eerie things, most people had no such thing as nightlife.

"Come eat," Duncan called to his dazed "niece" by the window. He set the pot of fish soup on the table, along with the bread Nina had bought that afternoon and the onion rings he had just fried on a whim. In his eyes this dinner was not really rich, but considering how special the "fish" was, this meal might even count as a feast in a place like the Lower City. “You still have to get up early for school tomorrow.”

“Oh, all right, Uncle Duncan.”

Nina answered and obediently came to the table. The aroma of the fish soup had already spread. She sniffed in surprise and looked at Duncan in disbelief. “It smells so good… Uncle, when did your cooking get this good?”

“You call this good cooking?” Duncan could not help laughing. He thought that his cooking skills were probably only a little better than Alice’s, and yet someone was actually praising him. “Was I really that bad before?”

“‘Bad’ isn’t enough to describe it. You used to cook by the standard of ‘as long as it doesn’t kill you’. And even though your cooking was awful, you always wanted to ambitiously try new dishes, and every time you dragged me along to be your test subject…” Nina chattered on and on as she recalled the old days, actually a bit animated. “Once you made something so disgusting that even you couldn’t eat it. You had to throw it into the trash, then you dragged me to the family restaurant on the next street for lunch. When we came back, we saw the neighbor’s dog squatting by the trash can at the door, throwing up all over the place. After that, whenever the dog saw you, it walked around you in a big circle…”

As Nina spoke, her voice slowly faded.

“Forget it. That was years ago, and you never liked me bringing it up…”

Duncan stayed silent.

In the memories left in this body, there was not the slightest trace of what Nina was recalling. These were almost the only good memories she had with her uncle, yet they had all vanished completely with the wayward man’s last breath.

Nina silently broke apart the dry, hard bread and used the rich soup to soften it bit by bit.

Duncan suddenly reached out and ruffled the child's hair.

Nina looked up in surprise. "Uncle?"

"Your uncle's new recipe experiment was a success," Duncan said with a perfectly serious face.

Nina stared at Duncan in a daze. Her expression changed several times as who knew how many thoughts circled in her mind. In the end, all those expressions turned into a smile she could not hold back. "Uncle, you look so funny when you act all serious!"

"Don't make fun of your lord," Duncan glanced at Nina, then as if suddenly remembering something, he added casually, "Oh, right. I'm planning to sort the shop out properly over the next while. If you see anything strange and unfamiliar on the first floor, don't touch it."

He was preparing for the coming shuttling between two places and the flow of "supplies" back and forth.

As AI's abilities were developed, he would have to teleport cargo back and forth between the Vanished and the antique shop more and more often. It would be hard to hide all of that from Nina's eyes—so it was better to give her a little warning ahead of time.

Nina did not doubt him at all and quickly nodded. Duncan then went on: "Also, I'm thinking of adding another pair of hands at the shop. That way, if I go out during the day, someone can stay and look after the place. Of course, it's only an early plan, it might not work out. I just wanted to tell you in advance so you won't feel strange if you suddenly see a stranger in the shop one day."

This time, he was laying the groundwork for Alice's arrival—just laying the groundwork, for now.

Bringing that doll girl into the city-state still involved many problems. Teleporting her here was only the least of them. He also had to think about how to keep Alice's true nature as a "doll" from being discovered. Alice looked almost no different from a real person. As long as she wore long gloves to hide the joints of her hands, there would be no big problem. At most she would need a veil to cover that face of hers, which was even more delicate than a living girl's. Those were all small issues. The real problem… was that thing's head.

He was bringing Alice over to help him. He could not have that one running around in front of people, clutching her head and bolting away all day.

Nina, on the other hand, looked at Duncan in surprise. "Uncle, you're actually going to hire a shop assistant? That's a big deal… Do you already have someone in mind? What kind of person is it?"

Duncan thought for a moment and carefully filtered out a whole string of less-than-flattering adjectives from his mind. Then he put on a straight face. "I have an initial candidate. She's a… hardworking young lady."

He considered it carefully. "Hardworking" seemed to be the only praise that still fit Alice.

Then he saw Nina's expression suddenly turn subtle.

The young lady looked her uncle up and down several times and finally could not help herself. "A young lady? Uncle, don't tell me you…"

Duncan had seen enough of the world to know what she was thinking the instant he saw her face. He knocked his fingers on the table at once. "Eat your food properly! What are you imagining!"

Nina instantly tried to hold back her laughter, making little snorting sounds as she lowered her head and kept eating. After tasting a piece of fish, she opened her eyes wide in surprise again. “It’s really good!”

Duncan laughed and tore off a bit of bread, tossing it to the pigeon pacing nearby. “Then eat more. There’s plenty left in the kitchen.”

On the small second floor of the antique shop, Nina and her Uncle Duncan finished this simple yet long-lost kind of dinner.

After dinner, once everything was cleaned up, Duncan called out to Nina just as she was about to go back to her room to rest.

There were some things he wanted to confirm.

“Nina,” he said, looking at the girl who had just come out of the kitchen with the dishes. “I have something I want to ask you.”

“Huh?” Nina was a little curious. “What is it?”

“Do you still remember… things from when you were little?” Duncan chose his words carefully as he spoke, while recalling the information he had heard at that cultist gathering. “When you were six.”

Nina frowned. She did not know why her uncle had suddenly brought up something from eleven years ago, but she still began to think.

It had been eleven years, and she had only been six back then, so when she thought back on it now, she did not actually feel much sadness.

“I was still very young then, so there are many things I can’t remember clearly. I only remember that day was very chaotic… there were panicked adults everywhere. Some people said a factory near Crossroad District had a leak. Some said there was mass hysteria on Lower Third Street. Some even said something had happened in the Upper City… A lot of it I didn’t understand at the time. I only matched the pieces later, when I heard the adults talking about it again."

Duncan thought for a moment and looked into Nina's eyes. "Then do you remember a big fire? I carried you out of the fire that time. Your parents… they were in that fire…"

He was only testing the waters, but to his surprise Nina's eyes suddenly went wide. "The fire? Uncle, you really remember that there was a big fire back then?!"

"…Of course I remember," Duncan said. Her reaction told him at once that something about it was wrong. "Is there something wrong with the fire I remember?"

"I also remember there was a fire. A huge, huge fire," Nina said quickly, a little excited. "But later, when I told the adults around me about it, not a single one of them remembered. They all said I'd been scared silly, that there hadn't been any fire at all… When I got older, I even went to look for the newspapers from back then on purpose…"

She stopped there and slowly shook her head, a strange look on her face. "But even in the newspapers there was no mention of any big fire… All the records only said that a factory had leaked chemicals, and that the chemicals had caused mass hallucinations…"

Chapter 82: The Fire That Existed Only in Dreams

Nina went back to her room to sleep.

In this world, most people went to bed early and got up early. After the Sun faded, the hours were dangerous. The faint glow of the World's Wound pushed the whole world's distortion to its peak. Even in cities, where lights offered some protection, people still had to face the veil of night with great care.

People could not go out and gather, and there were not many ways to have fun. Reading at night was not as dangerous as reading at sea, but it still easily led to mental fatigue, hallucinations of sound and sight, and sometimes even drew unnecessary attention from the veil of night. So, all in all, the safest thing was to sleep early and wait for the Sun to rise the next day.

But Duncan did not feel sleepy at all.

He put out the lights in the room and stood by the window in just his shirt. He casually enjoyed the view of Pland's night under the veil of night while he thought back to his talk with Nina after dinner.

Nina remembered a great fire. The leftover memories in this body also held such a fire. In that fire, "he" carried a girl who was only six out of a collapsing, burning building. Far off on the streets, crowds ran wild through thick fog.

However, only the two of them remembered that fire. Nina had gone to other lords to talk about it, but they treated it as confused memories from a little child scared out of her wits. The newspapers from eleven years ago clearly recorded the “truth”: at the border between Pland’s Lower City and Crossroad District, there had only been a factory leak that caused mass hallucinations. There was no record of any fire.

Duncan frowned a little. The other suspicious point lay in “himself.”

According to Nina, “Uncle Duncan” also did not remember this fire. All along, she had been the only one who remembered. When she was little, she had even told Uncle Duncan about the fire—though back then he should still have been “Ron”—and Uncle Duncan had been one of the lords who thought she had only been scared silly and misremembered everything.

But now, scenes of the fire had appeared in Duncan’s memory. They were remnants of this body’s original master, buried in the deepest part of the mind.

Where had the problem started? Why, in Nina’s memory, had her Uncle never remembered the fire, yet Duncan had found matching images in this body’s deepest memories? Had Nina’s Uncle been lying all along? Or had the memory been sealed away until a ghost captain took over this body and the memories in the deep layers finally rose to the surface?

Duncan tapped the window frame with his fingers without thinking as he quietly sorted the timeline in his mind.

He pieced together what he had learned from those Suntists:

Eleven years ago, a fragment of the Sun first appeared within the city-state of Pland. The supernatural phenomena caused by that fragment might have covered a very large area.

That same year, Nina became an orphan. In both her memories and Duncan's, there had been a great fire in the Lower City. But aside from the two of them, no one remembered such a fire, and there was no evidence at all that it had ever happened.

After that, the fragment of the Sun lay dormant in the city-state and showed no further activity. The only record left from that year's incident was the "Crossroad District factory leak."

For several years, Nina and her only remaining relative relied on each other to survive.

Four years ago, the Suntists God in Pland tried to awaken the sleeping fragment of the Sun ahead of time. They held a dangerous sacrificial ritual, but the ritual failed before it could be completed. A newly promoted apprentice Inquisitor, Vanna, led a team and smashed it. The Cult's power suffered a heavy blow. After a large, sweeping purge, the Sun God's Church was driven out of the city-state.

But even though that ritual had not reached its final step, the cultists' attempt to "awaken" it might still have had some effect. After that, the fragment of the Sun slowly began to stir from its slumber.

Around the same time, the "Uncle" who lived with Nina fell ill with a strange sickness. The pain slowly dragged him down. In the end, he accepted the temptation of the Suntists still hiding in the city and became one of the Cult's lackeys.

Not long ago, news that the fragment of the Sun was active again began to draw Suntists back to this city. The cultists who had lain low for four years once more held a sacrificial ritual. What happened after that… was Duncan's intervention.

Many things along this timeline seemed faintly linked, yet they all lacked key evidence.

The most suspicious part was still eleven years ago. What kind of supernatural manifestations had the fragment of the Sun really triggered back then? Had that great fire truly existed or not?

Had the city-state's authority erased the truth of the incident and wiped away all traces of the fire? Had they announced it as a factory leak that caused mass hallucinations, just to keep order?

But that still could not explain why so many people had no memory of the fire at all—unless the authority had gone to great trouble to reshape the memories of everyone involved.

There was another point. In this world, Anomalies and Visions were openly known to the public. Even small children knew about the existence and danger of supernatural things. The authority clearly knew this and had always ruled the city by "warning people early so that citizens knew how to protect themselves." If it had really only been a fire caused by an supernatural power… why would they have to hide it?

Unless… there had been an even bigger problem behind that fire, something so dangerous that even letting the news spread would have sent that danger into a runaway state.

Duncan suddenly frowned.

Or there was another possibility.

supernatural phenomena were strange by nature. Many times, the harm they caused was not limited to the physical world. They could twist human perception and even twist evidence already written on paper. What if people's memories and understanding of that incident, and even the records kept by the city-state's authority and the Church, had all been corrupted by the fragment of the Sun?

Duncan felt that his own imagination was going too far. As a half-trained "beginner" in the field of Anomalies and Visions, his thoughts were maybe running wild. But once this idea appeared, he could not stop thinking about it.

People's memories, the authority's records, even the words written in black ink on white paper in old files from ten years ago—all of it could be twisted and replaced. In the past he might not have believed such a thing, but now he believed it more than anyone.

Because the place he stood in was now called "Duncan Antique Shop."

Everyone here knew their old neighbor, Mr. Duncan, who ran the antique shop.

Duncan let out a soft breath. He lowered his head and looked through the second-floor window at the street lit by gas lamps.

Only one question remained.

No matter whether the great fire eleven years ago had really happened or not, no matter whether the fragment of the Sun had corrupted the memories of those involved and the city's records, one point was crucial:

Why did Nina remember that fire.

…

In the Upper City, inside a mansion that belonged to the Governor.

Vanna woke from a nightmare.

But this time, the nightmare was no longer about the Black Sun, nor did it point toward that ship, the Vanished, which had returned from Subspace.

She had simply dreamed about her childhood.

On that night filled with fog, smoke, blood, and maddened crowds, twelve-year-old Vanna had been carried on her Uncle's back as they fled from a gang of rioters.

In the dream, she seemed to return to how helpless and fragile she had been back then. The martial skills she was so proud of, and her powerful divine magic, were gone. All she could do was run in panic as madmen and shadows chased them. She and her Uncle climbed over the pipes and valves above a factory. In the thick smoke and heat, she looked down at the city in terror and saw endless flames rising everywhere, covering the whole district as far as she could see…

The young Inquisitor, still in her nightgown, sat on the bed and took a deep breath as she looked at the sky outside the window. The pale light of the World's Wound still hung high in the heavens, and the chronometer clock by the window showed that it was only just past midnight.

She felt as if she had been trapped in the nightmare for a century.

Vanna got up and turned up the electric lamp. She walked to the dressing table and looked at herself in the mirror. She softly spoke the name of the Storm Goddess. Only after she felt her heart calm did she sigh and murmur to herself, as if to comfort herself: "At least I won't be dreaming about that ship anymore…"

As soon as she finished speaking, she suddenly heard footsteps in the hallway outside her room. Then came a knock on the door: "Vanna? Vanna, did you have another nightmare?"

It was her Uncle's voice—the most respected Governor of this city-state.

"I'm fine." Vanna steadied herself, straightened her clothes, and went to open the door.

Dante Wayne stood at the door. The gray-haired, gray-eyed middle-aged man, not very broad in build, had clearly just woken up too. He had thrown on a coat, and when the door opened he looked at his niece with concern.

He had lost one eye in an old incident, and now he wore an eye made of ruby. Delicate golden lines could be seen inside that eye, and around it the socket still carried the fierce scars left eleven years ago. They made his face look frightening.

But Vanna had long since gotten used to it. She knew that her Uncle was actually a gentle and fair man.

“I had a nightmare,” she said, rubbing her eyes with a helpless tone. “I didn’t think it would wake you.”

“It’s nothing. At my age, I sleep lightly anyway,” Dante said as he looked at Vanna with concern. “You dreamed about your childhood again?”

“Yes. I dreamed of that time again.”

Chapter 83: Ghosts Also Entangled with the Mortal Realm

Her Uncle brought some calming herbal liquor. The herbs and the alcohol together slowly eased Vanna's restless mood. She opened the door to the balcony, stepped out into the wind, and looked toward the distant Cathedral.

Dante's voice came from behind her: "Every time you come back to stay, you have these nightmares, and they always take you back to your childhood."

"…For an Inquisitor, this is a weakness I shouldn't have," Vanna said in a low voice. She was more than a head taller than her Uncle, but in front of the elder who had raised her, she never minded showing her true feelings. "It troubles me."

"…Have you talked to Heidi?"

"She recommended four kinds of brain surgery and two kinds of nerve-piercing therapy," Vanna sighed. "Considering our years of friendship, I didn't hit her."

"…That sounds like her. She doesn't deal with normal people much," Dante said, shaking his head. "I didn't think that after all these years, you would still be trapped by that night's nightmare."

"I always thought I had already moved past it," Vanna said, rubbing her brow. "Maybe it really has something to do with this big house. Every time I come back here, I dream of those scenes again… Maybe I should perform another exorcism ritual for this place. Otherwise I keep feeling that the shadows of that disaster are still sealed inside these walls…”

Uncle Dante thought about it for a moment. He did not object, but asked thoughtfully: “Did you see that fire in your nightmare again this time?”

Vanna nodded. “Yes. There was fire everywhere. You carried me out of the fire. I remember clearly that we fled along the factory pipes to escape the district. Nearby, a burning building was slowly collapsing in the flames…”

She stopped there and looked at her Uncle. “…You don’t remember any fire, do you?”

“It’s not just me. No one remembers it,” the city-state’s Governor said, slowly shaking his head with a serious expression. “I only remember the leaking gas pipes and those crazed cultists… There were many people involved that night, but it seems only you saw a sea of roaring flames.”

Vanna did not speak for a long time. She stayed silent and thought for who knew how long before she suddenly spoke softly: “Aside from the ‘fire’ part, your memories and mine match… Back then I didn’t understand anything, but now I know that this must be the work of some supernatural power. So many years have passed, and I have even advanced to become a Saint, yet this influence still has not faded.”

“That means either the source of this influence has a very high rank and burned an everlasting mark into your soul, or the source itself did not vanish when the incident ended. Instead, it has stayed hidden somewhere in the city-state. I have been investigating this for years, but sadly, there has been no progress.”

Dante’s voice carried a hint of apology at the end. He was not only sorry that he could not ease his niece’s pain, but also regretful that, as the city-state’s Governor, he had still not been able to solve an old case.

The “Great Chaos” eleven years ago had left scars that ran too deep.

Vanna knew that this matter was not only a knot in her own heart. It had also weighed on her Uncle all this time. But she was not good at comforting others. After thinking for a long time, all she could do was change the subject: “I remember we arrested a lot of cultists back then. From the later reports, that incident was even bigger than the ‘Black Sun’ incident four years ago.”

“Yes. We arrested thousands. There were so many that I even wondered how that many cultists could hide in just one city-state, Pland,” Dante sighed. “And it wasn’t just one sect… There were Suntists who followed the Black Sun, Annihilators who worshiped the Abyssal Lord, and even Enders who worshiped Subspace itself… All those maggots from the sewers crawled out that night and ran around wrecking everything in a frenzy.”

Vanna looked at Dante. “But according to the later interrogations, among the thousands of saboteurs the authority caught, not one could be called a ‘mastermind.’ Not a single one knew why the chaos had started that night. It was less like those cultists had planned to cause trouble together and more like the madness buried deep in their minds had all exploded at the same time. They had fallen into a collective runaway state.”

Dante did not speak for a moment. He thought quietly, then suddenly looked into Vanna’s eyes: “Your nerves aren’t just because of the nightmare, are they? You brought up all this so suddenly. Does it have something to do with the unrest in the city-state lately?”

Vanna did not avoid the question. “It does have something to do with it. Suntists are gathering toward the city-state. They are looking for an Anomaly called the fragment of the Sun. At almost the same time, the Vanished has reappeared in the Mortal Realm, and its ‘course’ seems to point faintly toward Pland. We still don’t know if these two things are really connected, but this sense of turbulence… it keeps reminding me of the chaos eleven years ago.”

“…I have already ordered all the Harbors to strictly inspect everyone coming and going, and I have spoken with the Governors of other city-states. Quite a few Suntists were dragged off ships. We have basically cut off their way into the city-state. As for the ones who are already inside Pland… that will mostly depend on the Church. Guardians are the professionals when it comes to hunting down and locking onto supernatural crimes.”

When he said this, the middle-aged Governor suddenly stopped. He seemed to weigh whether he should bring something up now. After a moment of hesitation, he still made up his mind. “As for the Vanished, I can’t do much in the supernatural field. But in the secular world, I have an idea.”

“In the secular world?” Vanna frowned. She was just about to say how that ghost ship, the Vanished, could have anything to do with the “secular” side, when she suddenly remembered a certain rumor. “Wait, you mean…”

“The captain of the pioneer exploration ship, the Radiant Star, Lucretia Abnomar, and the pirate lord in the Northern Seas, Tyrian Abnomar, captain of the Sea Mist,” Dante said slowly. “It’s true that the Vanished is a ghost ship beyond the Mortal Realm’s understanding. But as long as it once belonged to the Mortal Realm, the Mortal Realm still holds the ‘anchor points’ of its existence… I wonder how Captain Duncan’s two children will react to their ‘father’ returning to the world again.”

Vanna’s eyes slowly widened. She was used to dealing with enemies in simple, direct ways and had never thought about the Vanished from this angle. But soon she frowned. “I’ve heard that those two hardly deal with any city-state powers at all… On the Boundless Sea, they each rule their own territories and keep distant, even tense relations with all the city-states."

"That's normal. After all, they are the children of that ghost captain, and the Radiant Star and the Sea Mist were once the two escort ships of the Vanished. Even though they parted ways more than a hundred years ago, in the eyes of most city-states, anyone who had anything to do with that ghost captain meant the curse and danger. It's not so much that they keep their distance from the city-states as it is that the city-states have been avoiding them."

Vanna looked at her Uncle with a frown. "So you're counting on them to help Pland fight their own father?"

"It's only an idea, but it's worth a try," Dante said, surprisingly serious. "After all, we all know that the Radiant Star and the Sea Mist parted ways with the Vanished more than a century ago. Lucretia and Tyrian had already broken with their father before the Viseran Thirteen Isles incident. And there were even rumors, more than half a century ago, that some Deep-Sea Captains personally saw the Sea Mist fighting the phantom of the Vanished in the Northern Seas. At that time, the Vanished had already become a legendary ghost ship. That might show those two captains' attitude when it comes to facing their own 'father.'"

"More than half a century ago… At that time, the Sea Mist was still the main flagship under the Frostholm Queen's command. Captain Tyrian might have only been protecting the city-state under orders," Vanna said slowly as she thought. "But you're right. At least it proves that the Sea Mist really does have a record of fighting the Vanished."

But she still had doubts. After a few seconds of thought, she spoke them aloud: "What if the Radiant Star and the Sea Mist ignore Pland?"

“That’s why this is only a try,” Dante said quietly. “I’ll spread the word and find ways to get news of the Vanished’s return and its course toward Pland onto those two captains’ desks. That’s all I’ll do. How they react after that will be up to them.”

Chapter 84: Captain Duncan's Children

Even a ghost had once been a member of the Mortal Realm. No matter how terrifying the Vanished that had fallen into Subspace a century ago were now, they were still ships forged by artificers of the Mortal Realm. Just like Captain Duncan: before he became one of the shadows of Subspace, Duncan had also been a human.

For ordinary seafarers, everything connected to the Vanished was inevitably shrouded in a veil of "the curse" and strangeness. That terrifying ghost captain seemed like a creature born straight out of Subspace. No one would wonder whether a calamity that roamed the Boundless Sea had personal joys or sorrows, or any human relationships at all. In many people's minds, "Captain Duncan" was almost like a symbolic natural phenomenon—he simply existed, with no need to trace where he came from.

Fear built high walls in mortals' hearts, making them instinctively avoid thinking about what details lay beyond those walls.

But Vanna, an Inquisitor who specialized in facing this kind of fear, knew how to pick out what was real from a tangle of legends, exaggerations, and ravings.

That terrifying captain of the Vanished… when he had still been human, before the Viseran Thirteen Isles incident, he had also had close friends and family members. Under his command had been loyal sailors and adjutants.

He had needed to go to the harbor to maintain and resupply his ship, and to deal with the authority of the city-states.

He could not have been born a moving calamity.

Captain Duncan had a pair of children: his elder son, Tyrian Abnomar, and his daughter, Lucretia Abnomar—and they were still alive in this world.

It was said that some power of the curse had extended their lifespans, allowing these two captains to wander the world, immortal like their terrifying father.

Each of the two captains commanded a powerful ship and lingered for long years on the edge of the civilized world. Their relations with all the city-states were cold and faintly hostile. Many people could not even imagine that Captain Duncan still had a pair of children active in the world. Only a small number of people who knew history and kept their reason understood their story.

On the other hand, though they stayed distant from all city-states, these two captains at least still stood on the side of humans—the terrifying curse of the Vanished had not driven them to follow in Captain Duncan’s footsteps.

Lady Lucretia Abnomar’s ship, the Radiant Star, was a powerful vanguard exploration vessel. This lady was passionate about probing the limits of the world. It was said she had once reached the very edge of the Known World and there witnessed marvels beyond ordinary imagination.

No one knew what she searched for at the World’s Edge, but on rare occasions she would send envoys to visit the explorer associations of certain city-states and share some of the knowledge she had discovered along her routes. This faint, benevolent contact was proof that she still stood on the side of humans.

It was said that the explorer association of the Cold Harbor city-state had even awarded this mysterious lady an Honorary Member medal, though no one knew whether she had accepted that “honor”…

Tyrian Abnomar was a being even “closer” to the human world than his younger sister, yet he was more dangerous. More than half a century ago, he had served the Frostholm city-state in the Northern Seas. Now he was the most powerful pirate captain in the Frost Sea region.

This moody captain controlled nearly half of the main routes of the Frost Sea. His flagship was the Sea Mist, and more than a dozen warships fought under his command. In truth he had already become a semi-official power on the Frost Sea, alongside Cold Harbor and Frostholm. The islands he occupied had developed enough to stand on equal footing with a city-state, far beyond the concept of a mere “pirate band.”

As for how Captain Tyrian had transformed from a general under the Queen of Frostholm into a pirate leader, people told many different stories—

Some said that he had been the mastermind behind the Frostholm rebellion half a century ago, the one who personally sent the Frostholm Queen to the guillotine. After that, he had plundered the city-state’s wealth and used it to build his powerful pirate fleet.

Another version was the complete opposite. A few scholars believed that Tyrian Abnomar had fought for the Queen of Frostholm until the very last moment of the rebellion. He had eventually become a pirate and repeatedly attacked ships traveling between Frostholm and Cold Harbor because he had been left disheartened, driven by an obsession with avenging the Queen.

Vanna did not know how much truth or falsehood lay in all these tangled rumors. Considering the characters of those two captains, they probably had no interest in explaining themselves to the world either. But one thing was certain: the return of the Vanished to the world was absolutely something they would have to pay attention to, guard against, and even prepare to meet with all their strength.

After all, these siblings had betrayed the Vanished with their own ships more than a century ago—and now their furious father had returned from Subspace.

Of course, just as Dante Wayne had said, this was only a spare card. It would be good if it could be played, but they could not place all their hopes on it.

What they could truly rely on was still their own strength.

…

When the bell tower of the Cathedral in the district chimed and the special rhythm of the steam whistle broke the night's silence, the city-state that had lain quiet all night slowly woke.

sunlight spread slowly along the distant rows of buildings. In the light, the "World's Wound" in the sky grew faint and faded away. The sounds of carts, horses, and pedestrians drifted up from the streets. The city surrounded by the Boundless Sea had passed through another veil of night and now welcomed the sunrise in peace.

Nina had gotten up early to make breakfast. The smell of mushroom sauce and toasted bread helped Duncan shake off the drowsiness of this human body in the morning. Listening to the bicycle bells ringing from the street outside, he suddenly said: "Do you want a bicycle?"

"A bicycle?" Nina froze for a moment, then waved her hand. "That's really expensive… And I don't really need one."

"It would make it easier for you to get to school," Duncan said. "You don't need to worry about the money. I'll figure something out."

He had already thought it over carefully. Although this antique shop did not look like much, judging from the stock piling up and rotating in the warehouse and the cash kept in the store, it ought to have steady sales in ordinary times. It was definitely more than enough to support two people.

Nina's current state of poverty was completely because her original uncle had donated more than half of the family property to a Cult. Most of what remained had been squandered on strong liquor, gambling dens, and drugs.

Now that degenerate life had ended. With those enormous, wasteful expenses cut off, he did not need to do anything special. As long as he kept the shop's business running normally, he could give Nina a life a little better than before.

Of course, he did not actually know how to run a shop, and the supply channels he knew of in his memories were a bit vague. But… that was something he could slowly get used to.

The most important thing was to let Nina truly feel at ease and get used to the change that her "uncle" had become reliable again.

Nina lowered her head and took small bites of the slightly stale bread. After a while she still repeated: "It's really expensive…"

Duncan opened his mouth and was just about to say something when he suddenly heard knocking from downstairs.

"This early… someone came before we even opened?" Nina paused when she heard the knocking, muttering under her breath. Then she stood up and walked out. "I'll go down and see!"

The girl ran downstairs in a hurry. Duncan casually broke off a piece of bread and tossed it to the pigeon pacing on the table: "Tell me… besides keeping the shop open, is there any faster way to make money? How about you start a logistics company?"

The pigeon immediately hopped two steps to the side and flapped its wings in outrage: “You really came just to make fun of me.”

Then it started to ramble on. “Then Jade flew into a rage and swung up the Serpent Halberd…” “Elder Tang raised both fists, beating Kieran until he spun like a top…” “When they finally looked up, a blood bar appeared above Tathagata’s head, filling the whole screen, and the three brothers broke out in a cold sweat”…

Duncan was completely stunned: “…”

He could understand that the pigeon could not speak when Nina was around and had been holding it in, but he could not understand what had happened to the bird’s brain after holding back that long—what kind of mess was in its vocabulary?!

But before he could open his mouth to speak to the pigeon, Nina’s voice suddenly came from downstairs. She sounded rather nervous: “Uncle Duncan! There… there are two constables here to see you…”

“Constables?” Two constables coming to look for him so early?

Duncan froze for a moment, then immediately ordered the pigeon to stay in the room. He got up and hurried downstairs.

As soon as he reached the first floor, he saw Nina looking back nervously toward the stairs, and the two constables in deep blue uniforms standing at the door of the antique shop.

Chapter 85: Reward

Duncan steadied himself and walked toward the two constables at the door.

His conscience was perfectly clear. He had not caused any damage or clashed with the authority. Captain Duncan's name might be infamous out on the Boundless Sea, but what did that roaming calamity have to do with him, an honest and proper antique shopkeeper?

Come to think of it, the most suspicious thing he had done was attend a cultist gathering—and afterward he had even gone out of his way to report it!

Wait… report?

Duncan suddenly remembered and immediately had a vague guess about why the two constables had come. His steps forward became much more confident. Nina, however, clearly did not share that calm. When she saw her uncle coming downstairs, she hurried over to meet him. Keeping her voice low where the two constables could not hear, she whispered urgently: "Uncle, when the two constables ask questions later, you have to answer honestly…"

Duncan stumbled a little at that. He looked at his "niece" with a strange expression: "Is that really the kind of person I am in your mind?"

Nina looked a bit aggrieved at this "uncle" whose reputation was so bad, who used to be visited every few days because of drunkenness or fights at the gambling hall. "…Otherwise, why else would the constables come to see you?"

Duncan: “…”

He sighed helplessly, walked to the shop door, and gave the two constables in deep blue uniforms a bright smile: “Good morning, gentlemen. How can I help you?”

“Mr. Duncan Strenn,” the older of the two constables spoke, polite and official. “We have found this place according to the registered address. The lead you reported to the patrol yesterday has been confirmed. On behalf of City Hall, we thank you for your contribution to maintaining order in the city-state and have brought you your reward money.”

As he finished, the younger constable stepped forward and handed over a paper packet that looked rather thick.

Nina, standing to the side, already had her eyes wide open.

Duncan had already guessed why the two constables had come, figuring it must be follow-up on the cultist den he had reported. He had not expected them to bring the reward directly to his door. Somewhat surprised, he took the packet. On the disposable wax seal at the flap he saw the words “435 Sola.” For a resident of the Lower City, this was a very generous sum.

“So there was money too…” Duncan squeezed the packet, feeling the thickness of the notes. “I didn’t even think about that at the time.”

“Of course there’s a bounty—the Governor takes cracking down on crimes inside the city-state very seriously, especially recently. Any effective report will be rewarded in a real and generous way,” the younger constable said with a smile. “And the lead you provided… was rather unusual.”

At that, Duncan could not help feeling a stir in his heart. Pretending to be casual, he asked: “By the way, I heard something wrong over there and didn’t dare get too close to look. What exactly happened?”

The two constables exchanged a glance, then took two steps forward into the shop. Nina blinked at this, then quickly went to close the door.

“We didn’t go to the scene. The Guardians were the ones handling it. But according to the reports… the scene was very brutal,” the younger constable said. He had not yet fully learned the detached, official tone of the veterans. “You did the right thing by not approaching rashly and finding the patrol to report it at once. Otherwise you would definitely have been in grave danger.”

When the young man finished, the other constable spoke as well: “Ordinary citizens do not need to know the details. We only want to remind you of one thing—cult activity in the city has been increasing lately. Do not mention your report and reward to outsiders.”

Duncan paused for a moment, then quickly understood.

This was the Lower City, where sewage and poisonous vapors sank and gathered. The things Pland least wanted to see in the light all hid in these old, winding alleys. Whenever heretics and malevolent spirits began to stir, they would inevitably hide in places like this as well.

Although the street where the antique shop stood was considered one of the more presentable parts of the Lower City and still some distance from the most rundown shantytowns, in terms of filth and hidden rot, the entire Lower City was not much different.

On the other hand, even setting aside the possibility that cult members might be hiding among the ordinary people of the Lower City, someone who “reported others to the authority and collected reward money” was very likely to be viewed with suspicion here.

Constables who knew the local situation were certainly aware of this. Their reminder was part of routine procedure, but it was also genuinely well meant.

Duncan thought about it and felt that their warning was right.

This place really was prone to cultists—he still had that Sun emblem tucked in his pocket.

“Thank you for the reminder,” he said sincerely. He did not know what the average constable in this place was like, but at least these two made a good impression. “Would you like to sit and rest a while?”

“No need,” the older constable waved his hand and turned toward the door. “We still have patrol duties.”

The younger constable turned back before leaving. “If you come across similar leads in the future, you’re welcome to report them in time. The safety of the city-state affects every one of us.”

“Of course.” Duncan squeezed the packet in his hand, a heartfelt smile spreading across his face. “I’ve always been a good citizen who cares about order in the city-state.”

The two constables left the antique shop of “good, enthusiastic citizen Mr. Duncan.” Only when the two uniformed figures disappeared down the street did Nina finally come back to herself and look at her uncle. Uncle Duncan was opening the packet and counting the blue and green notes inside. The pleasant sound of the bills rustling made it all gradually feel real to her. “Uncle… is this really a reward from City Hall? You actually… really…”

The girl opened her mouth for a long time, but in the end she still could not bring herself to ask, “You actually really did something good?”

But Duncan knew what Nina was thinking and what she was puzzled about. He laughed. “I just reported some illegal activity on my way home yesterday. Your uncle has always been keen on public welfare.”

Nina: “…”

“But I really am surprised the reward is this high.” Before Nina could speak, Duncan lowered his head again and looked thoughtfully at the bills in his hand, muttering under his breath: “This is a lot faster than making money through business…”

There was another thought he did not say out loud: according to the information he had, there were still countless cultists from various city-states hiding in this city.

All of that was money!

Nina did not catch that for a moment. “Uncle, what did you say?”

“Nothing.” Duncan waved his hand. While he considered this new way to make money in his heart, he said casually: “Aren’t you supposed to be going to school? Head out early so you won’t be late. Right, when is Mr. Morris coming for the home visit?”

“This afternoon. I only have one class this afternoon,” Nina said, as if she had just thought of something. “Uncle, are you going out today?”

Duncan nodded. “Yeah, I need to go out for a bit, but I’ll be back before your history teacher comes.”

As soon as she heard that, Nina shot him a suspicious look. “Uncle, what are you going to do?”

Duncan gave an especially bright smile. “Your uncle is going out hunting.”

He already had an idea. Since the Sun badge worked so well and the authority handed out money so readily, he would be a fool not to use this channel. Even without the “report them and get paid” part, he would still have to make trouble for the cultists, at least to keep the area around him safe. Now that he knew he could fleece them once more after causing them trouble, why not?

But Nina was a clever young lady. Even without knowing the rest of Duncan's secrets, she guessed at once what "hunting" in his words really meant. The girl's fine brows knit together at once. "…Uncle, this isn't right. Yesterday you said you were going to run the shop honestly, straighten things up here, and hire a shop assistant…"

"Caring about public security and running the shop steadily don't contradict each other," Duncan said with a grand wave of his hand. "Go to school. Your uncle knows what he's doing."

What he had not expected was that, after hearing this, Nina instead found a chair beside him and sat down.

"Nina?"

"Uncle, this is dangerous." Nina raised her head, her eyes fixed on Duncan.

Duncan: "Uh… actually…"

"I have to keep an eye on you." Nina sat there stubbornly. "Those two constables just said the city isn't safe right now… It's one thing to run into danger by accident, but how can you go looking for it on purpose?"

Duncan stared blankly at the girl who was only seventeen.

He suddenly realized that she truly was worried about him—in a stubborn way she believed was right and safe, she was worrying about the "Uncle Duncan" in her eyes, who had been seriously ill for many years, had a weak body, acted recklessly, and lately seemed desperate to earn money.

"I don't want a bicycle." Nina lowered her head and muttered softly.

"Go to school." Duncan suddenly let out a breath, smiling as he stepped forward and pressed a hand on Nina's head.

Nina looked up in surprise.

“You’re right. It is dangerous.” Duncan looked at Nina very seriously. “I won’t go anywhere. I’ll wait for you here in the shop.”

Chapter 86: A Better Plan

Nina went out to school. Just like many times over the past years, she once again believed in her uncle's promise, believed that Uncle would be waiting for her in the shop when she came home from school.

Or maybe she had long since stopped believing, but still stubbornly acted as if she did.

Duncan stood behind the display window on the first floor of the antique shop, watching Nina's running figure as she turned quickly at the end of the street and disappeared from his sight.

Uncle Duncan would be waiting for her in the shop when she came home. He had promised.

"AI, come here."

As the thought flashed through his mind, a stream of green flame suddenly swept through the air, and the pigeon appeared in front of Duncan.

The bird tilted its head and looked at its Master with its little bean-like eyes.

Through the connection formed by the fire of spirit form, Duncan could clearly sense the pigeon's position and its state. Although he still could not fully share its five senses, this level of perception already let him do many things.

Duncan lowered his head and looked into AI's small eyes: "You are actually very smart. You can understand everything I say, and you can do many things, right?"

The pigeon immediately flapped its wings proudly: “Loyal beyond words, loyal beyond words!”

“Then I have a bold idea I want you to try.” Duncan smiled, then took from his coat the Sun emblem that had now turned into a “cultist proximity alarm.”

He carefully wrapped the emblem in a cloth so it would not be exposed in front of ordinary people, then cautiously tied it to AI’s back with a strip of cloth.

The pigeon cooperated from beginning to end, even using its beak to help Duncan knot the strip. It seemed to understand completely what its Master wanted to do. Except for not being able to express its thoughts clearly, it was as smart as a person.

“Just fly around the city. When the emblem heats up, search for the place it resonates with, and try to narrow it down to a specific building,” Duncan told the pigeon carefully. “I will sense your position… Right, stay around the Lower City and the Crossroad District first. Don’t go to the Upper City. I’m not familiar with that area, and with only your position I won’t be able to tell the address.”

The pigeon flapped its wings and tilted its head: “Some fries?”

Duncan kept a straight face: “If you can locate even one, I can bury you in fries.”

Without another word, the pigeon flapped its wings and shot toward the door, as if afraid its Master would change his mind.

Duncan watched with a smile as the pigeon flew farther and farther into the sky. In his perception he clearly tracked the bird’s current position and the general state of its surroundings. Then he returned to the room, took a map of the city-state of Pland, and spread it on the counter. While looking at the map, he recalled the layout details of the Lower City in his mind and, through his perception, kept tracking AI, constantly confirming the bird's position.

It turned out to be even easier than he had expected. The connection formed by the fire of spirit form was more stable than at the start. AI's flight path in his mind was almost a clear, bright guiding line. With the help of the map and his memory, it was not hard at all to pinpoint the bird.

This was a good method.

Duncan let out a light breath and shifted into a comfortable position behind the counter. He had promised Nina he would not go out and "look for danger," so of course he had to keep that promise.

But he could send the pigeon out to hunt while he stayed home writing denunciation letters…

Honestly, this was an even better plan. A pigeon that could fly was far more efficient at searching than him riding around the city in a carriage at random. Of course, there was a drawback: after finding a cultist's lair, he would no longer be able to sneak in and gather information himself. He would only get the value of reporting them.

But Duncan did not care much about that small regret. Based on his experience at the last gathering, the cultists who could be found easily were basically a bunch of small fry at the bottom, running around gathering news. Their information value was limited from the start. And if AI really sensed some "big fish"… he had follow-up ways to scoop that big fish out alone.

After all, AI's ability was not just flying around with a sensor on its back. Its main job was doing deliveries…

If he really found a big fish, he would have AI open a door on the spot and teleport the person onto the Vanished. His true body was on the ship, and there it would be even easier to question them slowly.

He also had not yet tried letting the pigeon teleport humans. He could not use innocent citizens for that kind of experiment, but those cult priests who had nothing better to do than kill people and dig out hearts were different.

When necessary, they could be “consumables.”

So Duncan leaned back in his chair, sensing AI’s position while he ran through his plan in his head, feeling more and more that it was perfect. He had already drafted his denunciation letters, interrogation outlines, and the capture and teleportation procedures. Now he only lacked a two-legged money bag known as a “Sun believer.”

The only thing left to consider in this whole plan was how he would explain it to Nina if his denunciation letters really worked and the authority later issued a reward—he had promised that young lady he would not go out “hunting.”

Duncan thought about it for a long time, then suddenly remembered something—

In this world that had already entered the industrial age, things like “banks” existed.

They were the inevitable result of the development of the economy and productivity, and also a necessary condition for it.

Although the banking system in this world was far less convenient and widespread than on Earth, it at least had basic account functions.

The city-states across the Boundless Sea had even built a circulating financial system between them on that basis. Although maintaining this system was far harder than on Earth, they had still created it.

The original master of this body had not done very well in life and had never opened an account in any city-state bank. That was quite normal in the Lower City. Usually, only respectable people from the Upper City reached the “level” where they dealt with banks. But the banks themselves were open to all citizens.

There was a bank in the Crossroad District.

Duncan made up his mind. He decided to go to the Crossroad District in a day or two and open his first bank account in this world. Then, if his activities in the human world expanded, money transfers would also become more convenient. And even if he did not think about the future, later when he wrote denunciation letters he could skip the part about leaving an address and just leave an account number.

Of course, whether this would actually work still needed to be tested when the time came. After all, the original master of this body did not have much experience dealing with the city-state’s security departments—or to be precise, not much positive experience. But Duncan still felt this approach was reasonable.

In a world that was not very safe, anonymous reports should be a normal choice for many enthusiastic citizens who wanted to be careful.

As for today… he decided to stay quietly inside the antique shop.

That was not only because he wanted to strictly keep his “agreement” with Nina. It was also because this was the first time he had let the pigeon fly so far away and then relied on the power of the spirit form fire to locate it. His lack of practice meant he had to focus especially hard, so he needed a stable environment.

Another reason was that he really ought to do business seriously for a day. Since the shop had come into his hands, it had not actually opened properly yet.

Duncan stretched and stood up from behind the counter. He walked slowly to the front door and hung the “Open for Business” sign outside.

He now had a few more plans and a new scheme. And the beginning of all this had only been an agreement he made with a seventeen-year-old young lady. It really was… an interesting experience.

…

Near the Crossroad District, inside a ruined abandoned factory, Church guardians in long black coats edged with silver had already set up a cordon around the area. Inquisitor Vanna, wearing light armor and carrying a divine blessing greatsword on her back, walked down the sloping staircase into the abandoned basement level of the factory, accompanied by two priests of the Deep Sea.

Everything here still stayed as it had been at the start. After the first group of guardians received the report and discovered this meeting place, they had sealed the scene until now.

In the large basement, the nauseating stench of blood was especially strong, mixed with the acrid smell left when fire scorched chemical substances. cultists’ bodies lay scattered all over the floor. But aside from the corpses of these Sun heretics, the investigators had found no trace of the “attacker” at the scene—no extra bodies, not even extra scraps of clothing.

Vanna frowned slightly.

This had been a one-sided crushing battle. The attacker had been far stronger than these cultists, who were mostly ordinary people. And things seemed to have happened so suddenly that a good number of these Sun heretics had been killed before they could even resist.

Who had done this?

Was it a rogue extraordinary with a personal grudge against these cultists? Another powerful heretical cult? Or some bloody sacrificial rite gone into a runaway state, where these death-seeking heretics had summoned from the deep layers a monster they could not control at all?

The young inquisitor fell into thought.

Chapter 87: Vanna’s Investigation Conclusion

The meeting place held only the cultists’ bodies strewn all over the ground. There was no evidence that could prove the attacker’s identity, which made the investigation very difficult.

But one thing was certain: whoever had carried out this attack was definitely not an ordinary person.

A special acrid smell lingered in the air. It was the mark left when “flame” had been corrupted.

Vanna carefully inspected the oil lamps left in the basement. Beside her, a priest took special powders and reagents from his toolkit to analyze whether anything that should not exist in the Mortal Realm still remained in the lamps.

Fire was the most special thing in this world.

Fire was visible order, the handwriting of the Gods when they made a covenant with the world, the proof that “civilization still endured.” In the burning of flame, all changes in all things would leave a mark.

If an extraordinary-level battle had taken place here, then corresponding traces would definitely remain in the flames.

After the priest began his work, Vanna returned to the center of the basement and looked at the corpse of a Sun heretic lying there.

“The bones all over the body are fractured in dozens of places, as if he was hit head-on by a charging bull. It’s really hard to imagine what kind of weapon could cause this,” a coroner beside her said. “Pure blunt force. No spell traces found.”

“Blunt force… blunt force strong enough to break dozens of bones at once?” Vanna frowned slightly. “What is it, a meteor hammer a meter wide?”

The coroner shook his head: “Compared to that, the ashes over there at the far end are more suspicious.”

Vanna went to the far end of the basement and saw the “ashes” he had mentioned.

A full set of clothes lay scattered on the ground. Between the garments was fine, dark ash. It was easy to picture that there had once been a person lying here.

“No doubt, this was some kind of extraordinary power. From the traces, it may be a kind of Mutant Flame,” Vanna gave a quick judgment and said to the coroner beside her. “Normal fire can hardly burn a person into ashes like this while leaving the clothes whole afterward.”

“There are impact marks on the wall. This cultist seems to have been smashed into the wall by a huge force first, and then burned to nothing by the flames,” another priest at the scene said. “In this whole place, only this one cultist was killed by extraordinary power—and by a kind of extraordinary power we have never seen before.

“Also, in a corner of the basement we found a patch of floor that had been badly corroded by an unknown force, but no remaining matter. That may also be the effect of extraordinary power.”

“It could be a spell cast by a person, or it could be the work of an Anomaly,” Vanna said casually. “This place was discovered because a citizen reported it, right?”

“Yes. An enthusiastic citizen heard anomalous noises in the abandoned factory and reported this place to a constable and guardian changing shifts at the street corner at dusk,” the priest beside her nodded and said. “These cultists were actually very cautious. They erased their activity traces after entering the city-state and successfully hid in the Lower City without being found. If not for this attack, they might have stayed hidden even longer.”

“Now that one nest has been exposed, it means there may be more hiding in the dark,” Vanna said in a low voice. “The alleys and gutters of the Lower City will be the focus of inspections for a while. We must—”

She was halfway through speaking when a guardian hurried over from the side, holding something in his hands: “Inquisitor, look at this!”

Vanna looked up at once and saw that the guardian was holding a small tray. On the tray were several copper bullets, stained with blood and slightly misshapen.

“We found two revolvers that had been fired at the scene. These bullets should have been shot from those guns,” the guardian reported. “The blood on the bullets is very likely from the attacker!”

Vanna’s gaze fell on the bullets, and at first glance she noticed the shape of the deformed tips. The bullets were stained with blood, which meant they had been shot into living flesh. But the way the tips had shrunk and warped was not something soft, fragile flesh could cause.

Unless every one of these bullets had hit bone exactly—or the person who was shot had an extremely tough body.

And how had these bullets, which had already entered a body, ended up lying here at the scene?

Vanna thought it over carefully and saw only two possibilities. Either the attacker had performed surgery on themselves at the scene to remove the bullets, or the attacker had some special physical ability and had forced the bullets out of their body with sheer bodily strength.

Whichever it was, one thing was clear: this powerful attacker had killed all the cultists here without slowing down even after being shot several times, and then had calmly removed the bullets from their own body after it was over.

Vanna looked at her own hands.

She could do this herself. And it was precisely because she could that she understood how difficult it would be for a mortal body of ordinary flesh and blood.

“The one who killed these cultists should be an extraordinary whose body is extremely strengthened, using some kind of large blunt weapon,” after weighing it in her mind, Vanna turned to a subordinate and said: “The other side has rich combat experience, strong will, and tremendous strength. Considering the weapon used, the person is likely very tall as well and may also command some Power of Flame. A first judgment is that they are hostile to the Sun heretics, but we cannot yet be sure they stand on our side…

“Notify guardians and constables at all levels. In the near future, watch for anyone who fits these traits. If a suspected target is found, report first and do not make rash contact.”

The guardian serving as her aide lowered his head at once: “Yes, Inquisitor.”

Vanna let out a quiet breath and roughly outlined in her mind what the attacker who had rampaged through the meeting might look like: a two-meter-tall hulk swinging a giant spiked club or a meteor hammer, with superb fighting skills, calm and tenacious, able to summon flames.

That was probably about right.

…

Duncan saw off his second customer with a smile and watched the plump lady walk away slowly, feeling quite pleased.

That lady counted as a regular customer of the shop. Today she had taken a liking to a pair of vases to give as a gift to her new neighbor.

Those vases were wholesale goods from the market. Although their production date was last week, they already had eight hundred years of history. The original price was more than two hundred thousand; after the discount, it was twenty-six, and it even came with a pair of stone ornaments from the Soland Dynasty period that had left the factory last Wednesday.

The regular customer knew the goods were fake, but from start to finish she believed that Shopkeeper Duncan was genuine.

After tossing a few crumpled bills into the drawer, Duncan sat back down behind the counter, feeling his restless mood calm a little.

At least for now, running this antique shop was still a novel and interesting thing for him.

Of course, the money he earned from this little business was quite limited. The profit from selling two vases plus two ornaments was just over six sola. And after most of the day had passed, only two customers had come into his antique shop. He did not know whether that “customer flow” was a lot or a little for a normal day, but it was clearly not as promising as reporting cultists.

Duncan split off part of his attention to keep track of AI.

The pigeon was skimming low over the Fourth District. Unfortunately, the Sun charm amulet tied to its back had shown no reaction so far.

Of course, that was normal. Even though many cultists had flooded into the city-state of Pland now, they had not reached the point of blooming everywhere. On top of that, they deliberately split up and hid in all kinds of forgotten corners, so it was naturally hard to find them.

Hunting needed patience.

Duncan enjoyed the quiet time at his ease. While he watched the pigeon's movements, he also occasionally checked what was happening over on the Vanished, or controlled his body on the ship to stroll around on deck. He watched the strange sight of Alice fighting weird things on the ship and then being chased until she ran around clutching her head, and suddenly felt that this strange life of his was not bad at all.

Just then, a crisp, pleasant bell sound suddenly came from the door, cutting off his idle wandering thoughts.

"Welcome."

Duncan spoke casually as he lifted his head toward the door and saw an elderly gentleman with graying hair pushing the door open and coming in.

He was an elderly gentleman dressed with great care. His dark brown coat was new and neat, the leather shoes on his feet were polished bright, and in his hand he carried a black Gatekeeper's cane whose material was hard to tell. His hair and bow tie were both perfectly in place.

This was not the sort of outfit one usually saw in the Lower City. It looked more like someone respectable from the Crossroad District, or even the Upper City.

Duncan did not have much idea of what counted as a “respectable person” in this world, but at a glance he could tell that this elderly gentleman was not an ordinary customer.

“See anything you like?” He smiled, like a real antique shopkeeper. “If you’re meant to have it, take it home.”

Chapter 88: A Genuine Piece

The old gentleman walked into the antique shop and looked around with curiosity. The worn display window, the cheap iron shelves, and the almost randomly placed “antiques” all showed the shop’s true nature almost perfectly:

Aside from the money it took in, nothing in the whole place was real.

Even so, this elderly gentleman, whose clothes and bearing looked nothing like an ordinary citizen of the Lower City, still examined the items in the shop with great interest. Only when Duncan’s voice came from the counter did he finally turn his gaze.

“An interesting way to put it,” the old gentleman said with a laugh. “Taking away what fate has linked to you… Leaving the items aside, that sentence by itself is quite beautiful.”

“Fate alone is not enough. You also need money,” Duncan replied with a smile. “Luckily everything here is cheap. Is there anything you like?”

“Uh… I didn’t come here to buy anything,” the old gentleman started. “Actually…”

Before he could finish, Duncan went on warmly: “Even if you don’t buy, it’s still good to have a look. Maybe something will catch your eye, right?”

The old gentleman could not help showing a helpless look. “But… all your things are fake.”

“That’s right,” Duncan said as if it were only natural. “Would real goods sit here? I don’t even have a security door on this place. I rely on making sure thieves can’t make back their costs.”

The old gentleman’s face clearly twitched. He had not expected the owner of a fake-antique shop to be this frank about it. He choked for several seconds before managing: “…Then…”

“For those who are good at convincing themselves, they can treat my place as an antique shop and enjoy a bit of self-satisfaction. The realists can treat it as a general store and go for cheap and practical things. As for those who both see reality clearly and still want to fool themselves, I can only congratulate them on finding a gold brick in a trash heap. There is only one genuine piece in the whole shop, and they just happened to grab it. That is a very fated encounter.

“Anyway, spending thirty or fifty is mainly about having fun. Even if you suffer the worst scam in here, it will not cost you more than a hundred, and you will still get a fine product of modern industry. When you think about it, that’s quite a bargain, isn’t it?”

The old gentleman listened, stunned, to Duncan’s stream of crooked logic. He clearly had little experience with this kind of talk and could not react for a moment. Then his gaze suddenly fell on a corner near the counter, and his expression changed slightly.

Duncan had been happily immersed in the joy of doing business. When he noticed the shift in the old gentleman’s gaze, his heart gave a small jolt, and something came to mind. Before Duncan could speak, the old gentleman reached toward that corner and said: “This thing…”

Among a pile of junk, he had found a dagger. Its style was very old, but its condition was excellent.

He took the dagger out.

It was exactly the old item Duncan had hidden in the junk earlier, something he had brought back from the Vanished – one of only two genuine pieces in the entire antique shop.

The other lay deeper in the pile: a cast-iron cannonball.

At first Duncan tried to divert the old gentleman's attention. But then he noticed the change in the man's expression and the professional air with which he examined the patterns on the dagger's sheath. Duncan realized at once:

This old gentleman might be a professional.

Duncan frowned slightly and let his gaze run over the dagger.

It was not actually a big problem. The thing was not an supernatural item. It did not carry the curse, corruption, or any other "specialty of the sea". Even though it was taken from the Vanished, in essence it was no different from an ordinary relic.

It was a plain, unremarkable object. If Duncan reacted too strongly, that would look more suspicious.

"This thing…" the old gentleman said again. He looked up at Duncan with some surprise and asked: "Is it also one of the shop's 'goods'?"

He spoke very gently, but the meaning under his words was clear: how had a real item ended up mixed in with this pile of fakes? Was it some kind of mistake?

From the other man's reaction, Duncan guessed at once that he knew his stuff. Pretending not to recognize the item would not be right. It was better to admit it just enough. He reined in his smile and put on a slightly mysterious look: “You see? You have just met something tied to you by fate.”

Then he cleared his throat and said seriously: “Most of the goods in this shop are discounted. A few are exceptions, like the one in your hand.”

The old gentleman immediately looked back at the shelves. His eyes swept over those “modern handicrafts” whose price tags listed tens of thousands, crossed out and marked down to a few dozen. Who knew what he was imagining. Suddenly this shabby, bluffing antique shop seemed mysterious and interesting in his eyes.

He carefully set the dagger on the counter, as if he was about to ask the price, but just then a bell rang at the door and cut him off.

Duncan looked toward the door and saw Nina’s figure.

“Uncle Duncan, I’m back!” Nina called toward the counter the moment she stepped through the door, without even lifting her head. “Has Mr. Morris arrived yet?”

“I haven’t seen him,” Duncan said, glancing around the shop. “I’m just serving…”

Before he finished, the old gentleman in front of him coughed twice and pointed to himself: “My name is Morris.”

Duncan: “…?”

“Mr. Morris!” Nina now saw the old gentleman at the counter and cried out in surprise. Then, like any student who ran into a teacher after school, she visibly tensed up. She snapped to attention, standing straight. “Good afternoon!”

Duncan looked at Nina, then at the old man, his gaze going back and forth twice. The air finally turned properly awkward.

“I wanted to introduce myself at the start,” the old gentleman said, spreading his hands helplessly. “But before I could speak, you cut me off, and then you began showing me the goods in your shop…”

Nina now understood what had happened. Then she noticed the dull-looking dagger on the counter and hurried two steps forward: “Teacher, don’t buy that! Everything in my family’s shop is fake!”

Duncan gave the young lady a strange look. He thought to himself that this child was far too honest. In front of her teacher it had taken her less than a second to sell out her own family’s secrets. Though, given the level of the shop’s goods and Morris’s eye as a history expert, whether she sold them out or not did not really matter…

On the other side, after hearing Nina’s words, the old gentleman Morris shook his head and pointed to the dagger on the counter: “This one is real.”

Nina froze: “…Huh?”

“This dagger should date back about one century. It was one of the utility daggers favored by seafarers from central city-states such as Pland and Lunsa at the time. But because the forges that made them went bankrupt, and because items taken to sea are easily damaged by wind and waves, very few survive today, and most are in terrible condition…”

As he spoke, Morris carefully picked up the dagger from the counter. He drew the blade out a little and went on in an amazed tone: “I… I have never seen one in such good condition. It is as if it was still in normal use not long ago. The blade is sharp enough to slide through paper. There is not a single flaw on it…”

“It even still has its original sheath,” Duncan added from the side. “If you look closely, you will see even the clasp on the back of the sheath is original.”

Hearing this, Morris hurried to examine the sheath and its fittings again. The surprise in his eyes grew even stronger. “This… I really did not notice before… My heavens! This thing is like it was just taken out of the pocket of a sailor from a century ago! If I did not have enough confidence in my own eye, I would suspect it was an amazing forgery… But even the patterns where the blade joins the hilt, and that special flaw at the end of the hilt, they all…”

Here he suddenly grew uncertain. He looked up at Duncan, then at Nina. The history expert actually lost his confidence: “It really isn’t a forgery?”

When Nina heard this, she quickly waved her hands: “My uncle could never fake something this real…”

Duncan’s eyelid twitched. He looked at his niece: “Go upstairs and do your homework!”

Nina blinked. “I don’t have any homework today…”

“Then go read a book!”

Nina stuck out her tongue and tiptoed toward the stairs. After a few steps she looked back at her history teacher: “Mr. Morris, don’t forget you’re here for a home visit…”

“Of course. I have many things to talk about with Mr. Duncan,” Morris replied with a broad smile. The old gentleman looked full of energy. “Go upstairs and read for now. Don’t worry, I won’t complain about my own student behind her back.”

Nina looked doubtfully at Uncle Duncan and at her teacher. She clearly had not expected the “home visit” to begin like this.

But the next moment, for some reason, she suddenly smiled.

The girl ran lightly up the stairs.

Chapter 89: Something Was Wrong with Nina

Watching Nina run lightly up the stairs, Duncan still did not understand what was going on. He scratched his hair in confusion and muttered: “What is that child grinning about…”

Then he heard Morris’s voice from beside the counter: “To be honest, you are very different from the impression I had of you, Mr. Duncan.”

“Very different?” Duncan raised one eyebrow. “What kind of impression did you have of me?”

As he spoke, he walked out from behind the counter, hung a “Temporarily Closed” sign on the door, and moved a chair to the side of the counter. Once he was sure the other man was a teacher here for a home visit and not an ordinary guest, it would clearly be improper to keep him standing.

“Thank you,” Morris said with a nod. After sitting down, he looked toward Duncan with a gentle, scholarly smile. “I have never met you, but I have heard of Nina’s family situation from some channels. Forgive me for being rude, but according to the rumors I heard, Nina has an uncle who drinks, gambles, and has a violent temper. That child lives in a terrible home atmosphere, so at school she almost has no friends. The other students are not very willing to talk to her.”

Duncan was at the side brewing coffee. When he heard Morris’s words, his hands paused for two seconds without thinking. Then he finished what he was doing at his usual pace. He carried two cups of coffee back to the counter and pushed one toward the old man: “I hope you don’t mind that I only have this cheap stuff here. Even the best coffee in the Lower City is about this level.”

He sat down across from the old man. Each of them held a steaming cup of coffee. The ancient dagger lay between them, but for now neither of them paid it any attention.

“Strictly speaking… those rumors are all true,” Duncan said slowly. “I was ill before, a serious illness. When painkillers stopped working, I could only rely on strong liquor to numb my nerves. That was a very ruined period of time. Unfortunately, it happened to fall in several key years of Nina’s adolescence. Now it seems that it affected her more than I thought.”

Morris studied Duncan carefully. After a long moment, he spoke in a thoughtful tone: “Is that so? But to me, you do not look like someone who has just come out of such a state. You look more like a gentleman who has never fallen into it at all, someone who has always been cheerful and positive. The quick wit and humor you show when you speak do not look like they were dulled by alcohol.”

As he spoke, he took a sip of coffee. He did not comment on the drink. He only added as if in passing: “I think my judgment of people is usually quite accurate.”

“Maybe I just adjusted my mindset quickly,” Duncan said with a relaxed smile. He had to admit the old man’s eye for people was very sharp, but he believed that no matter how sharp it was, it could not see the secret hidden inside this body, so he did not feel nervous at all. “Nina is almost an adult. I am her only guardian. I have to show a bit of responsibility.”

“In any case, that is good for the child,” Morris said, giving Duncan a deep look. “She is at a crucial stage in her studies. Many people say that after graduating from a public high school, you can only go and tighten bolts in a factory. But they always overlook one thing: knowledge itself is a precious wealth. One day in your life it will suddenly show its meaning, and that is often when you no longer have a chance to return to school."

The old gentleman spoke and then shook his head. "Sadly, most of the parents I have dealt with do not agree with this. Their attention is fixed on making their children graduate as soon as possible and find a job."

When Duncan heard this, he suddenly felt very close to him. He knew this talk well. When he had been a teacher, he had often said similar things to students or to their parents, but no one had listened to him…

But soon Duncan put away this feeling of meeting a colleague. After he thought for a moment about the environment he was in now, he shook his head slightly:

"Because this is the Lower City, Mr. Morris. Your view is very wise and far-sighted, but most people here really do need to pay off last month's bills as soon as they can. You cannot say their sight is too short just because of that."

"That is true. Many people actually want to look farther ahead, but the high walls of life always block our view of the distance," the old gentleman said with a sigh. "Sorry. When you soak in books for too long, you tend to ignore the practical problems of life… You are someone who thinks things through. It seems some of my worries were unnecessary."

"Worries?" Duncan frowned. "By the way, has something happened with Nina at school recently? Have her grades dropped?"

"Her grades have always been very good, but recently… she has been a bit absent-minded," Morris said, choosing his words. "She daydreams in class, sleeps during self-study, and even gets distracted in lab. In last week's chemistry class, she even set the lab bench on fire. These things never happened before… at least they never happened with her."

The old gentleman paused, then added: "In the quiz two days ago, her results did not actually drop. But if this state continues, it is hard to say what her grades will be by the time she graduates. It is true that the paths open after public high school are limited, but there is still a difference between assembling machines in a factory in the Lower City and maintaining a steam core in the Cathedral in the Upper City. As Nina's guardian, you should take this seriously."

"Nina has been absent-minded in class a lot lately?" Duncan frowned again. "She has not told me anything about that…"

"A girl this age will not tell you much," Morris said, shaking his head. "At first I thought something had happened at home, or that her 'drunken uncle' had done something lately and that was affecting her state at school. That is why I came for this home visit. But now it seems… that is not the reason."

For a while, Duncan did not speak. He tried to recall whether Nina had showed any odd behavior in front of him over the past few days, and thought over her daily routine. After a few seconds, Morris asked again: "You are the person who knows her best. Has that child had any odd changes lately? For example, not resting well, or feeling unwell?"

Duncan thought for a long time and could only spread his hands: "… Shameful as it is, I cannot think of an answer."

He really could not. A week ago, he had not even known Nina. How could he know what changes she had compared to before?

Morris did not seem surprised by Duncan's answer. He had probably already lowered his expectations for "Nina's uncle" based on neighborhood rumors before he came. So now he simply said out of habit: "You should pay more attention to her. Especially for a girl this age, material support alone is not enough."

When Duncan heard this, a thought suddenly popped into his mind: "Could she be in love?"

To be honest, this idea came at least in part from Zhou Ming's experience as a People's Teacher…

When Morris heard this, his expression turned a little strange. The old man gave Duncan a weird look: "It is a girls' school…"

Duncan thought for a moment and said with a serious face: "A girls' school is fine too."

Morris's eyes widened slightly.

This old gentleman, who had always devoted himself to his studies, was deeply shaken.

"Ahem, all right, I was only speaking casually," Duncan said. Seeing the old man's reaction, he knew this topic might be a bit beyond his range, so he quickly coughed twice to break the awkwardness. "I will have a good talk with Nina. She should be willing to tell me."

"Ah… oh, of course," the old gentleman finally reacted. He still seemed caught in his shock, and his words came half a beat slow. "From what I know… Nina is a very honest, very straightforward child. If you talk to her properly, she should not resist much."

Duncan nodded: "Besides that, is there anything else? Has Nina been strange in any other way at school lately?"

"Other than being absent-minded and distracted, not really," the old gentleman said after thinking for a moment, then shook his head. "I mainly came today to talk about this and to understand her real home situation. By the way, speaking of that, Nina's parents, was it because of…"

"The accident eleven years ago," Duncan said. "There is an official record of it. The chemical plant leak in the Sixth District."

"So that was it," the old gentleman sighed. "I remember that accident. At the time, my daughter and I happened to be near the Crossroad District. When the chemical plant leaked, the disturbance was huge. The affected crowd even pushed all the way to the edge of the Upper City… The later investigation said many cultists took the chance to cause trouble that night, and that they were the ones who sabotaged the plant…"

Duncan's heart moved. Keeping his face calm, he asked casually: "Wasn't there also a big fire in the Lower City that night?"

"A fire? I do not remember any big fire," Morris said with a frown. "You must be mistaken."

"…Seems I remembered wrong," Duncan said with a smile, pressing his forehead. "I really should stay away from alcohol."

Chapter 90: First Big Business at the antique shop

Duncan had already expected Morris’s reaction. He had only brought up that topic to confirm his guess.

Just as his earlier information had said, someone like Morris, an ordinary person, knew nothing about any great fire. That sea of flames existed only in Nina’s and Duncan’s memories.

Strictly speaking, until Duncan took control of this body, that fire had existed only in Nina’s own memory.

The topic passed quickly. Morris did not become suspicious because of this strange question. Next, he told Duncan a bit about Nina’s studies and her class, and asked some questions about Nina’s family.

It was clear that this elderly gentleman, who cared so much about his students, had wanted to know these things for a long time. But Nina’s uncle’s rotten, degenerate life had delayed it until today.

The memories Duncan inherited from this body were limited. He actually did not know the answers to many of the old gentleman’s questions. Fortunately, his mind was flexible. He could answer by relying on what memories he had and filling in the rest with imagination. As for the things he really could not handle… he pushed them onto his former decadent life, the harm of alcohol, and swore that he would turn over a new leaf.

He was very experienced with “home visits”. He knew what teachers usually asked and what they cared about. Even though this was now a different world and a different identity, that experience still came in handy.

When they finally finished this “proper business”, Mr. Morris’s attention, as expected, fell on the second thing he cared about most.

The old gentleman looked at the well-preserved antique dagger on the counter. The eagerness in his eyes was obvious to anyone: “Is this thing… for sale?”

Duncan smiled at once: “This is an antique shop.”

The antiques in an antique shop were, of course, for sale.

At this moment he had thought it through. The dagger came from the Vanished, but the more he thought about it, the more he felt there was no real danger in selling it. There were countless items aboard the Vanished, and not all of them were connected to anything supernatural. A dagger like this, put anywhere else, was just an ordinary antique. Why shouldn’t he sell it?

Compared to the pile of fakes in the shop, the cargo holds of the Vanished were the real way to make money.

Once his thoughts fell into place, the world suddenly felt wide open. Duncan’s mood brightened. He suddenly realized he had been sitting on a treasure hoard all along. Those things he had treated as scrap were treasures simply placed in the wrong spot, just waiting for some wealthy, fated buyer to appear. Looking at the Mr. Morris in front of him… wasn’t this a fated buyer?

Morris had no idea what schemes were turning in the mind of the antique shop’s owner. All of his attention was now on the well-preserved dagger. After hesitating for quite a while, he finally spoke carefully: “How much?”

Duncan: “…”

The world did not feel wide anymore, because he had no idea what price to name.

Even if he had inherited this body’s memories completely, he still would not know what price to ask. From the day this shop opened, it had never sold anything genuine. And antiques had no fixed pricing standard. He was a complete layman. What would be a proper price to ask right now?

Duncan thought fast. First he ruled out following the price tags on the fake goods in the shop and asking two or three hundred thousand. Even if this dagger was genuine and in excellent condition, it was only a little over a hundred years old. And from what the old gentleman had just said, daggers of this type from a century ago were rare but not unique. The sailors back then had used them as utility knives. That alone meant its value was limited.

It was relatively recent, not unique, and had no special historical background. It was a modern piece in excellent condition, but with only average value for collectors or display. Mr. Morris clearly liked it, which let him raise the price a little, but not too much. Besides, the man was Nina’s teacher. That relationship also had to be taken into account.

Duncan thought his way around the whole circle in just a couple of seconds. In the end, he still shook his head and smiled: “You name the price, Mr. Morris. You are the teacher Nina respects the most. I really can’t charge you the same as an ordinary customer.”

He understood clearly how limited his knowledge was. For him to guess a reliable number now was harder than getting Goathead to stay silent for three days. Whether he went too high or too low, it would just show how little he understood. Better to give Morris a step to stand on and let the old gentleman help him judge the value.

He believed Mr. Morris could probably guess his intention.

As for whether he would lose out on this deal… Duncan was quite relaxed about that.

It was a business with no cost at all. How much could he really lose? With no preparation, he could still get an unexpected sum of money, gain some experience, and get to know a professional in the field of history. In any case, it was still a profit.

Morris fell into serious thought.

He did not think about too many other things. Most of his attention was still on the dagger.

“Three thousand… three thousand four hundred sola. That’s my estimate,” Morris finally said. He seemed to have weighed it very carefully before settling on that number. “Mr. Duncan, you might feel this price is a bit low. But you have to consider the dagger’s age and its place in history. An item like this, one that isn’t unique, depreciates heavily on the market. Of course, its condition is very good. That is rare. But you also have to consider that not every collector will be interested in it…”

The old gentleman seemed to be working to explain the reasoning behind his price. Duncan listened while his mind started to calculate quickly.

In the Lower City, the entire monthly expenses for an ordinary family of three came to just a bit over two hundred sola. And most commoners in the Lower City ended each month with almost nothing left over, if they had any surplus at all.

This dagger was worth almost a year and a half of income for an ordinary Lower City household.

This was what a “genuine piece” was worth here. And this was not even a particularly valuable genuine piece.

He did not know whether he should sigh over the antique trade's "three years with no business, one deal to eat for three years", or over the shocking gap between lower-city life and the so-called refined hobbies of upper society.

Maybe he should simply sigh over how very rich this old gentleman in front of him was.

"Deal." He let out a quiet breath and said to the old gentleman with a smile.

He did not even consider wasting time haggling.

No matter what, this was a huge sum for Nina and him right now. Reporting a cultist den did not bring in anywhere near this much.

Not long ago he had still been worrying about ways to make money. Now he suddenly found it was no longer such an urgent problem.

The world was unpredictable.

Morris, however, felt Duncan had agreed a bit too readily. He even felt a little guilty about it: "Actually… at this price, you are taking a loss. By a normal estimate, given how many of these daggers are still in existence and its condition, it should be at least ten or twenty percent more expensive… but…"

The old gentleman rubbed his nose, looking a little embarrassed: "Recently I have been spending quite a lot collecting old items. My funds are a bit tight…"

This old gentleman was even more honest than Duncan had imagined.

"I think it's a very good price. Let's take the difference as 'fate'," Duncan said with a smile. Then, as if he suddenly remembered something, he got up and went behind the counter. "By the way, to celebrate this 'big deal', I have a little gift for you."

Morris watched with curiosity and some expectation as Duncan took a small purple crystal pendant out of one of the pigeonholes behind the counter.

The old gentleman had sharp eyes. At a glance he saw the tag from some glassworks still hanging on the pendant.

Morris: “…”

“A pendant that calms the mind and wards off evil. The crystal has been blessed. It can show the right direction amid illusions and the curse. Ancient Hypnotists used it to protect their minds against the dangers lurking in the dreamscape,” Duncan said, pushing the pendant toward him with a very serious expression. “It has protected one generation of Masters after another. Now it is fated to be yours…”

Morris hesitated, then pointed at the tag on the pendant: “But it says here it was made by Johnnie Glassworks…”

“I know. I forgot to tear that off,” Duncan said, face expressionless, as he pulled off the tag. “It’s a free gift. How could my shop have that many genuine items to give away?”

Morris stared for a second, then could not help laughing: “All right, fair enough. Thank you very much for the ‘gift’. With this, I hope my daughter will nag me a bit less.”

As he spoke, he accepted the pendant, then fumbled in his coat for a moment before taking out a bank checkbook. “I didn’t bring that much cash with me. This bank check can be cashed at any Pland City-State bank in the Crossroad District or the Upper City. Is that acceptable?”

Duncan smiled: “Of course.”

As he spoke, his gaze fell on Morris’s bank check.

When he first heard Nina mention her history teacher, he had already felt some doubt. Now that he had actually met Mr. Morris, that doubt stirred again.

From his clothes, his manner, and his professional skill in history and artifacts, this old gentleman was clearly not an ordinary person. Even without knowing what the Upper City was really like, Duncan could tell that a scholar like this should have been teaching at a university in the Upper City, not at a public school in the Crossroad District.

Even if he set aside all other factors, there was one obvious question:

Could an ordinary public school history teacher really pull out a year and a half of a Lower City family’s income so easily, just to buy a collectible he happened to like?

Chapter 91: Distorted History

The so-called “public schools” of the Pland city-state were completely different from the true universities in the Upper City. These schools, funded and supported by City Hall, were not institutions for training real scholars. Their main purpose was to train skilled workers for the factories in the Lower City and for the Church’s steam engines, and to give the general public basic literacy education in the process.

Under that premise, it was easy to imagine the level of resources at the public school in the Crossroad District.

This was Duncan’s first time meeting Morris in person, but even from a first impression he could tell the old gentleman’s academic skill was extraordinary. This was a man who could pick out a genuine relic from a pile of junk at a glance and state its year and historical background with accuracy. An expert like that would have been more than qualified to teach in a university in the Upper City.

Frankly, leaving such a deep reservoir of knowledge in a public school in the Crossroad District was a waste. Nina had already said that almost none of her classmates cared about what the old gentleman-professor taught. If they managed to stay awake through a whole class, it already counted as “respecting the teacher”.

And on top of that, Mr. Morris had just taken out a large amount of money to buy a dagger from a century ago. People who carried a bank checkbook around were rarely ordinary citizens.

Duncan thought it over. Asking bluntly, “So why are you so rich?” would be too abrupt. But with a bit of verbal polish, the question could sound quite natural:

“Actually, I’m a little curious. For a scholar like you, why stay on as a teacher at a public school in the Crossroad District?”

“…You’re not the first to ask me that,” Morris said with a small smile, as if he was already used to such questions. He carefully put his things away as he spoke. “But there isn’t much to it. I’m old, and I grew tired of the intense academic atmosphere at those universities in the Upper City. Rather than fighting with youngsters for the little funding that exists, I would rather find a quiet place to finish my research. And if, in my later years, I can pass my knowledge on to more young people, isn’t that a good thing?”

The old man did not seem to be telling the whole truth. But Duncan saw that he did not wish to dwell on it, so he did not push. He only added casually: “But Nina told me her classmates don’t really treasure what you teach them. In the harsh life of the Lower City, isn’t chasing after the glory of the ancient kingdom of Critt a bit too distant?”

“Even in the darkest, filthiest alleyway, as long as a mind with spiritual insight is still thinking, ‘history’ will always have value,” Morris said, shaking his head. “It is precisely because of the thousands of years of history behind us that we have managed to come this far.

“Mortal life is very brief. It is our inheritance of history, and our respect for it, that lets civilization live far beyond the limits of any single person. That is also the key difference between us and those strange, blind things in the Deep Sea. They may be ancient, but they do not know how to record civilization, and so they can never truly wipe us out.

“Of course, Mr. Duncan, you’re not wrong either. In the Lower City, very few people are willing to listen to my long lectures. But even if I manage to influence only one single student, I still feel that my years have not been wasted."

Morris spoke slowly and calmly. Then he seemed to realize something, and a gentle, apologetic smile appeared on his face: "Forgive me. Occupational habit. I started preaching a bit."

"It's all right. I think it's very worthwhile 'preaching'," Duncan said at once, waving his hand. "To be honest, I'm quite happy to talk with you. Look, you're a history expert, and I'm an antique dealer. In a way, we're colleagues."

[From the "teacher" side, they were colleagues too, Duncan added silently.]

"To be honest, if I judged only from the first impression when I walked into this antique shop… I really wouldn't believe your word 'colleague'," Morris said, spreading his hands. "But now I somewhat believe it. You at least have one genuine piece."

Duncan kept a very calm expression. In his heart he thought: it was far more than one genuine piece. The moment the old gentleman filled out the bank check, Duncan had already mentally gone over every cargo hold on the Vanished. If he weren't worried about crashing the market, he would already be planning the interior design of his eighth branch shop.

Steadying himself inside, Duncan kept up his relaxed smile: "Nina told me you're actually more specialized in ancient history, especially the history around the ancient kingdom of Critt?"

"Strictly speaking, there is only 'after', not 'before'," Morris corrected at once. "The ancient kingdom of Critt was the Dawn of Civilization in the Deep Sea era. Before that ancient kingdom, there was the Great Annihilation. That was the break in civilization. No one can say clearly what the world looked like before that point in time. At best we have contradictory accounts from the wild tales passed down in various city-states."

Duncan looked thoughtful: "A break in civilization… like a 'Horizon Limit' crossing the river of history…"

Morris clearly heard that term for the first time: "Horizon Limit?"

"A concept," Duncan explained. "Applied to the event of the Great Annihilation, you can see it as an invisible wall in time. All information on the far side of the wall can't be transmitted to this side. Whether it's optical observation or chains of cause and effect, everything is cut off at that boundary. You can never stand on one side and learn what happened on the other, as if the timeline of all things only suddenly appears starting from that boundary."

"That is a very interesting description!" The old gentleman's eyes opened a little wider, and there was even a faint light in them. "A Horizon Limit across history… a wall of time… Yes, that is very apt! Mr. Duncan, forgive my earlier mistaken impression and… my condescension. You are more professional than I thought. Do you also often study ancient history?"

"No, I don't know much about ancient history. I just have a flexible way of thinking, and sometimes I come up with odd metaphors," Duncan said modestly at once. He knew he should appear a bit ignorant right now. "But I really am curious about the Great Annihilation. You just said that in formal scholarship there is no accepted view of history before the Great Annihilation, but there are many conflicting accounts in the 'unofficial histories' of different city-states? What sort of records are those?"

"Just wild tales and strange legends… but yes, I've studied a few," Morris said slowly after thinking for a moment. "For example, there was once a record in Pland. It was a hand-copied manuscript from New City-State

Calendar year 1069. The original no longer exists. In that copy, the world before the Great Annihilation was described like this:

“The world was a sphere, floating in a boundless sea of stars. Countless celestial bodies lit the night as stars. In the sky there was one Sun and three Moons. Humans occupied three continents. One of the continents was frozen in ice year-round, so people built a device called ‘the dome’ to cover the land and create ‘eternal spring’. The dome’s power source was modeled after the Sun in the sky and used some component in seawater as fuel, almost everlasting…”

Morris paused there, as if giving Duncan a moment to think, remember, and sort things out. Then he continued:

“And on an island near Cold Harbor, explorers found an inscription carved into rock. It also described the world before the Great Annihilation. Scholars put in huge effort to decipher it, and were left deeply puzzled.

“The stone text said that a homeland called ‘Homeworld’ had already been exhausted. All people had boarded a gigantic ship named ‘Abinix’. This great vessel could cross the sea of stars and used dust and gas captured from the void as fuel. After the ship had sailed for forty-seven thousand days and nights, it was suddenly caught in a ‘great flash and vortex’. The ship then broke apart and vanished in the whirlpool. The descendants survived by rising from the sea and left their memories of the homeland carved in a cave.

“Of course, even those records are not as bizarre as the tales left by the Elves of Lightwind Harbor.

“Elves have lifespans of a thousand years. Their history should have been more detailed and reliable than that of any short-lived race. But for some reason, the history of Lightwind Harbor is the most fragmented and absurd of all city-states. Many of their archives have even been twisted by some unknown force into unreadable Lost Tomes. Because the corruption is so severe, they had to be sealed away. And in the narrative poems the Elves pass down by word of mouth, the world before the Great Annihilation is described like this:

“The world was a dream, a single breath taken by the Great Demon God Saslokar while half-asleep. The Elves were born in that dream and kept Saslokar sleeping peacefully. But one day, this demon god dreamed of a Great Flood. Saslokar woke in fright, and the flood spilled out of the dream into the Mortal Realm. The Elves were swept into the Mortal Realm by that flood. The demon god Saslokar vanished upon waking, and the Elves could never return to that peaceful, gentle homeland. So, after the flood, they settled down in the Deep Sea era.”

Chapter 92: Endless Speculation

Morris let out a sigh.

“When people like us, who dig through history, fight our whole lives to come up against the high wall of the Great Annihilation,” he said, “when we spend our lives seeking relics and comparing ancient texts, trying to glimpse the scenery on the other side of that wall… what we end up facing is just this kind of bizarre, absurd stuff.”

Deep weariness and frustration lay on the old man’s face. He looked like a traveler who had spent most of his life on the road, reached the end of the journey, and still could not see the destination, yet had to accept the limits of the Mortal Realm.

“History before the Great Annihilation is shattered and full of contradictions,” he went on. “The records of different city-states are like strange tales, or like dreams that have nothing to do with each other… There is no decisive proof that any one record is correct, and no theory that can pull all these contradictions together.”

Duncan did not speak right away, because his thoughts rose and fell like waves. In these unbelievable “scraps of unofficial history” that Morris described, he felt as if he were going through a baptism in a storm of information.

As a “foreigner” who had lived through an information age and had a decent talent for association, he could imagine or guess at many things from the other man’s words—

The dome that covered the whole continent might have been some kind of artificial ecological system, a power system that shared a source with the Sun, drawing fuel from substances in the seawater. That might have been fusion technology.

The gigantic ships that sailed through the void, catching dust and gas clouds in space for power, might have been one or several colony starships.

As for the so-called dream of a demon god… and the seawater that flowed from that dream into the Mortal Realm… he could not picture what that was for the moment, but it sounded like a fantasy concept, something completely different in style from the technological feel of the first two strands of history.

He could find explanations or guesses for many things, yet these things still could not be pieced together in any way.

Just as Morris had said, they were more like separate dreams that had no connection, each sketching a completely different Pre-Cataclysm History.

They were contradictory and broken, and could not be used at all to rebuild what the world before the Great Annihilation had looked like.

“Maybe you are right,” Morris’s voice came from behind the counter, breaking Duncan’s thoughts. The old man held his forehead, his tone low. “Around the key event of the Great Annihilation, there may be a kind of ‘Horizon Limit’. We cannot observe the ‘events’ beyond that horizon, so the history before the Great Annihilation becomes, for us, a concept we can never truly trace back.”

Looking at the emotional Morris, Duncan’s own thoughts still did not stop. Little by little, he instead came up with a rather bold idea: “Then… what if all those records are true?”

Morris raised his eyes and looked at Duncan in surprise: “Oh?”

“What if all those records are true?” Duncan rubbed his chin and spoke in a thoughtful tone. “What if the history recorded by each city-state or each race really is the true shape of what they knew as ‘the world before the Great Annihilation’?

“Maybe our ancestors ten thousand years ago really came from completely different ‘homelands’, with entirely different civilizations. The Great Annihilation trapped these exiles from different worlds on this sea. Before the legacy of their civilizations was completely cut off, the descendants of those exiles barely managed to record what they knew. Ten thousand years later, those records became the ‘contradictory histories’ that trouble scholars today…”

His thoughts grew livelier. After a pause, he went on: “Maybe the nature of the Great Annihilation was not the world’s Doomsday at all, but a ‘Great teleportation’.”

Morris stared at Duncan in surprise and suddenly said: “…The Brock Bendis school’s hypothesis? The World Drifting Theory? That is a rather obscure school of thought. I did not expect your study of ancient history to be so deep.”

He meant it as praise, but Duncan instead became a bit dazed: from the sound of it, someone had already thought of this possibility?!

He blinked, but did not let his surprise show. He only acted as if he were following the topic and said: “It’s just bits and pieces I picked up, but I really like this hypothesis.”

“I like it too—though it is very obscure,” Morris shook his head. “But like every other hypothesis, without evidence it can only stay a hypothesis.

“The Clark school once suggested that interference from Subspace with the Mortal Realm twisted all historical records. The Vilentim school believes that the world before the Great Annihilation was made of countless separate lattices that were cut off from one another. The scholars of the Bologna City-State even insist that the world before the Great Annihilation never existed at all, and that all records of Pre-Cataclysm History are illusions made by Shadows in Subspace…

“To say something I probably shouldn’t, even some heretical cults have their own take on world history. The Enders, who worship Subspace, firmly believe that Doomsday has already begun and is chasing our civilization along the river of history, swallowing it piece by piece. The contradictory historical records of the city-states are, in their view, the result of real history slowly being torn apart by Subspace. The Great Annihilation is a barrier standing in front of Doomsday. When the history after the Great Annihilation is also torn apart by corruption, that will be the day the whole world falls into Subspace…”

The more Duncan heard, the more shocked he became. After a long time, he finally shook his head without thinking: “I really did not know there were so many strange and wild theories…”

“Ordinary people do not step into this field,” Morris said. “Studying history from the angle of occult studies is a dangerous business, after all. But there is one clear truth: if tens of thousands of scholars have already spent centuries, even millennia, groping in a field that seems to have no exit, then they have already put forward every hypothesis that can be imagined.”

Duncan slowly understood what the old man meant.

For people who had truly spent their lives buried in stacks of texts and piles of relics, putting forward some hypothesis that could explain the present was simple. As scholars, they were never short on imagination or vision.

What they lacked was evidence—evidence that could prove even one of those hypotheses.

“…No evidence at all has survived?” Duncan asked. “Nothing at all from before the Great Annihilation, nothing that can prove that any of those ‘unofficial histories’ have a basis in fact?”

“None has been found so far,” Morris said slowly. “Ten thousand years of time, and in between them one Dark Age after another. Countless city-states have risen and fallen across the Boundless Sea. It is far too hard for anything from the Age of Antiquity to survive…

“What has made it down to us is either hand-copied manuscripts of doubtful origin, or stories passed on by word of mouth. And even those may have already changed form during the process of being passed along.”

Duncan did not speak for a moment.

In the depths of his mind, far away on the Vanished, the waves rose and fell gently. The boundless sea was as it had always been, covering the whole world.

It also covered all truths that might exist.

He could not help sighing: “Studying ancient history really is full of difficulties.”

“Yes. We face not only shattered ‘years’, but also an empty present with nothing to lean on,” Morris sighed. “On the limited land of the city-states, if there were anything we could dig up, we would have dug it up long ago. If we cannot, then it means the things that can prove our history are hidden where mortals cannot reach.”

“Like the seafloor?” Duncan suddenly said.

“The seafloor? Ha, what a frightening and bold idea,” Morris laughed. “But that really is the last hope many historians cling to when they reach the end of their road…

“They imagine that the seafloor holds the evidence, mountains of relics, cities of ancient civilizations, and ruins that can explain everything. But what use is that? When we dive down, we can only touch Shadows. Mortals cannot reach the deepest places of this world.”

He paused for a moment, then spoke again: “But that did give rise to another hypothesis… It never became its own school of thought, but quite a few people have guessed that the lost ‘Old World’ in history is actually just below the surface of the Boundless Sea. Some even try to locate it exactly at a certain ‘depth’ between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the Spirit Realm—the world from before the Great Annihilation lies sleeping at that depth.”

“Why do they say that?” Duncan was curious. This very serious, yet completely baseless hypothesis caught his interest.

Morris thought for a moment and explained: “Because many broken ancient histories mention that the world before the Great Annihilation was covered on all sides by a ‘Starry Sky’. And, as everyone knows, the ‘Starry Sky’ lies right at the boundary between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the Spirit Realm.”

Duncan almost choked on his own saliva: “Cough, cough… what?”

“Are you all right?” Morris was startled by Duncan’s reaction. “That should not be anything unbelievable…”

“I am fine, I just got too caught up in what you were saying and choked,” Duncan quickly waved his hand. “The Starry Sky is between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the Spirit Realm, of course I know that, of course I know…”

Chapter 93: This Is Common Sense

Duncan quickly adjusted his expression and his mood so he would not look like a “foreigner” with scrambled common sense. But his thoughts could no longer calm down. They surged like stormy waves.

It turned out that when you suddenly arrived in a strange and anomalous world, then in those first days—no matter how strong your ability to adapt, no matter how well you acted—at any moment, some ordinary piece of “common sense” could smack you in the face with the local worldview. Ordinary historical knowledge could be learned in a systematic way. Deep, specialized knowledge did not matter much in daily life. But “common sense” was something that only made you yell in shock when you ran right into it.

In this world, there were no stars in the sky. That was common sense.

In this world, the Starry Sky lay in the Deep Sea, at the boundary between the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep Sea. That was also common sense.

As for this second piece of so-called “common sense”, Duncan could only think: [What the hell.]

He had never come into contact with this field and had never gone down to that depth. He had raced the Vanished through the depths of the Spirit Realm. He had seen the chaotic streams of light that leaked in from Subspace in the ship’s lowest deck. But he had never seen that “Starry Sky” between the waters of the Abyssal Deep and the Spirit Realm… and that happened to be a blind spot in his knowledge so far.

As Duncan kept up his side of the conversation with Morris, his mind spun quickly.

Stars… hidden deep in seawater… What kind of strange sight would that be? Was the “Starry Sky” Morris spoke of the same “Starry Sky” Duncan knew about? What was the true shape of the place where the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep met? Was it a stretch of even deeper, darker ocean? Or was it a special spatial structure that was only called a sea?

For some reason, Duncan suddenly thought of that girl named Shirley, and of her inseparable pet and weapon, “Dog”.

Dog was a “Abyssal Hound”. In the terms of this world, that was a kind of demon summoned from a depth of the Abyssal Deep into the Mortal Realm.

Duncan could not imagine what kind of internal structure such a skeletal hound might have. From its appearance, it clearly was not a “marine creature”… so it was not too bold to guess that this so-called “Abyssal Deep Sea” might not really be a “sea” at all.

It might be an extremely vast and strange space, and… it was wrapped in the Starry Sky.

As Duncan sketched a possible spatial model for the Abyssal Deep Sea in his mind, Morris noticed that the antique shopkeeper in front of him suddenly seemed a bit distracted. The old mister looked at Duncan with curiosity and asked: “Do you also study Astrology?”

“I just… have some interest,” Duncan tugged at the corner of his mouth. In his heart, he thought that after he had already accepted the fact that this world had no Starry Sky, hearing the word “Astrology” again all of a sudden felt very strange indeed. “The Starry Sky is hidden so deep… it cannot be easy to explore it.”

“That is, of course, extremely dangerous,” Morris said. “But thankfully, we can also observe projections of the Starry Sky through some indirect scientific methods. For that, we must thank technological progress. After the Spirit Realm lenses appeared, navigators on ocean-going vessels went mad much less often during navigation.”

Morris laughed. He seemed not to have found someone willing to discuss these questions with him for a long time, and he was in high spirits now. “You must know, a century ago, navigator was always the deadliest job on an ocean-going vessel… I have always wanted to collect a set of the earliest Spirit Realm lenses, but I really have no way to get any.”

Duncan blinked. He did not care at all what the old mister said last. He only felt that a question which had bothered him for a long time finally had an answer:

In a world whose sky had no celestial bodies, how did ships on long voyages calibrate their route?

The answer was that they still relied on stargazing—using special scientific instruments to observe projections of the Starry Sky reflected from the depths of the Spirit Realm.

Before New City-State Calendar 1800, navigating ships was even a deadly job.

After all, ordinary ships did not have the Vanished’s “enchanted sea chart”, which updated in real time like satellite positioning. They did not have a reliable goat First Mate either.

“You really are a very learned man,” after they had talked through many issues, Duncan finally could not help saying with real feeling, “Nina is very lucky to have a Teacher like you.”

“I am also very glad to see that she has an Uncle like you,” Morris nodded with reserved politeness. “Now all my doubts are gone. You are not only a responsible guardian, but you also have broad interests and a strong desire to learn. To be honest… it has been a very long time since I last talked so happily with someone.”

The old man spoke and gave a slight sigh. “My life now is good in every way—quiet, peaceful, free from many petty matters in the Upper City. The only problem is that most of the time it is hard to find anyone willing to listen to me talk about these dull things… Even the other Teachers I work with often cannot keep up with my train of thought. It is rare to find someone like you, who can listen to me talk this much.”

“I am happy to be your listener,” Duncan grinned at once when he heard that. “I have a special interest in history.”

“I can see that,” Morris, the old mister, smiled in satisfaction. Then he glanced toward the shop window, and only then did he realize how much time had passed. He hurried to his feet. “Oh, by the Goddess, I have already been here the whole afternoon?”

“If you do not mind, you could stay the night,” Duncan said offhandedly. “You can try my cooking.”

“…I should still be able to catch the bus back to the Crossroad District,” Morris looked at the slowly sinking Sun and politely declined Duncan’s kindness. “Thank you for the invitation, but I think I should go home. The city has not been very peaceful lately. If I stayed out all night, my family would worry.”

“That’s true… then I won’t insist,” Duncan thought for a moment and stood up to walk him out. “I’ll call Nina down first.”

Morris had just opened his mouth to speak when Duncan had already turned his head toward the second floor and called: “Nina! Mr. Morris is going home. Come down and see your Teacher off!”

Footsteps came from the stairs. Nina, now in a simple house dress, ran lightly down. She greeted her Teacher first, then glanced at the sky outside and looked at Duncan in surprise: “You two have been talking for this long?!”

“We had a very pleasant talk,” Morris said with a smile. “Your Uncle is a man with broad interests who enjoys learning. We discussed many questions about history.”

Duncan stood beside them with a serious face, nodding silently.

So-called “discussion” really meant that the old mister had talked on his own while Duncan pretended to understand and muddled through as he listened. But since the old mister himself put it that way, Duncan certainly would not say otherwise—and to be fair, he felt he had been a pretty good listener. He had asked questions at the right times so the conversation could keep going. For an old scholar who usually suffered from having no one to listen to his rambling, was that not the best kind of “discussion” there was?

Nina looked suspiciously from her Uncle to the smiling old mister. She wanted to say that her Uncle was not exactly known for broad interests and a love of study, but when the words reached her lips, she swallowed them back. Then she suddenly grew a little nervous, tugged on Duncan’s sleeve, and whispered: “Did you two talk about me?”

“Just a few little things from school,” Morris said. Though he was getting on in years, his hearing was excellent, and he immediately heard the girl’s whisper. “Your Uncle will tell you. Don’t worry, I did not complain about you.”

As he spoke, the old man picked up the Gatekeeper's cane he had left by the door when he came in. He also checked the old dagger tucked inside his coat. Only then did he say goodbye to the uncle and niece and slowly walk out the door.

After seeing the old mister off, Duncan looked at the sky outside, then simply hung up the "Closed" sign and locked the shop door. At this hour, he did not expect any more customers.

Besides, he had just earned a large sum. Ordinary "business" did not feel all that important anymore.

Nina watched Duncan bustle about—locking the door, tidying the counter. She felt full of questions. But before she could speak, Duncan suddenly looked up at her with a smile and said: "In a couple of days, I'll take you to buy a bicycle."

"Ah?" Nina froze for a second. "Why…?"

"I already got a bonus from City Hall before this, which was enough money," Duncan said, raising the bank check in his hand. "And just now I made a big sale. I think… we can afford to live a little better. At the very least, a bicycle would be very useful, don't you think?"

"A big sale…" Nina finally caught up. "Ah, you really sold that dagger to Mr. Morris?"

"I did," Duncan nodded. "I sold it for more than three thousand sola."

Nina: "…!?"

The girl, who had a very clear sense of money, was shocked by the number. Then she looked at her Uncle Duncan with a very strange expression.

"Teacher came for a home visit, and you kept him here talking all afternoon," she said. "Then you sold him something worth more than three thousand sola… What will people think if this gets around later?”

Duncan thought for a moment, then said with a straight face: “Our shop will become famous?”

Nina: “Are you serious?”

Duncan spread his hands. “What else could I do? The old mister liked that piece. I couldn’t just give it to him for free. It’s rare for the shop to have something genuinely valuable.”

Nina put her hands on her hips, her cheeks puffing out. But in the end, the breath she had been holding suddenly turned into a smile.

Chapter 94: Nina’s Strange Dream

Outside, the sky over the street was slowly growing dark.

After seeing Morris off and tidying up the first-floor shop, Duncan finally had time to bring up what Nina’s teacher had said during the home visit.

After all, that had actually been the main reason Mr. Morris had come by today—though the two of them had ended up drifting off topic as they talked.

At the dining table on the second floor, Duncan was spreading butter on a slice of bread as he asked with concern: “Have you not been sleeping well lately? Or are you feeling unwell? I heard from your teacher that this has been going on for several days.”

Nina looked a little nervous. She had more or less guessed that her teacher would mention these things during the visit, but until very recently, she had never imagined that her uncle Duncan would really start paying attention to how she was doing at school.

A strange feeling spread through her heart. It had been a long time since anyone cared about her like this. She felt awkward and uneasy, but also faintly warmed.

“It’s just that I’ve been… really sleepy,” Nina said.

“So it seems what Mr. Morris said was true.” Duncan watched Nina’s face carefully. “Is it something with your health? Or something else? If you have anything on your mind, you can tell me.”

He paused for a moment, then added after thinking it over: “Of course, at your age there are probably things you don’t want to tell an adult like me, and that’s normal. You’re growing up, you have your own personality and your own thoughts, and all of that should be respected.

“But you still need to remember this: when people run into trouble, asking for help is nothing to be ashamed of. If it’s something I can help with, you can just say it. We’ll figure it out together.”

He tried his best to make his words sound steady and kind. That was not easy for him. He had never had a blood relative this age to take care of before. Still, he did have some experience dealing with students, so he simply talked to Nina the way he would talk to a teenager. In his opinion, his attitude was already gentle and reliable enough.

“I… I’m really fine, really!” Nina still was not used to such a kind uncle, but deep down she did not reject it. She waved her hands hard and met Duncan’s gaze. “It’s just that I’ve been feeling really sleepy lately. I keep waking up all of a sudden when I’m asleep, and sometimes I… dream.”

“Dream?” Duncan frowned and suddenly thought of something. “Nightmares? Do you dream about that big fire when you were little?”

Maybe because he had been focused recently on the fragments of the Sun and that eleven-year-old cold case, his thoughts went there at once. But Nina shook her head. “No, it’s not about when I was little.”

“Then what is it?”

“I keep dreaming that… that I’m standing somewhere very, very high. It feels like the tower of a building in the city. The streets below me are all pitch-black. Everywhere is ruins and ash,” Nina said slowly, trying to recall. “The ruins and ash are like a huge scar. It runs from the center of the Lower

City all the way to the Crossroad District, and then to the edge of the Upper City, like it's going to tear the whole city apart.

"I'm trapped in that very high place. I want to leave, but something like an invisible wall stops me…"

Nina thought for a moment, then shook her head lightly. "The dream is always like that. If you say it's scary… actually, nothing really scary shows up. No danger comes close to me. I just watch the city get crushed by something I can't see, and it leaves that scar. And I'm stuck there, unable to move. Every time I wake up I feel exhausted, and then I start nodding off in class the next day…"

Duncan listened carefully to the girl's description, and his frown deepened bit by bit.

What Nina described was definitely not the fire she had gone through in her childhood, nor was it anything in Duncan's own memories.

It sounded more like a static "display," showing her some scene from Pland in a time and place neither of them knew.

If this had been Earth, Duncan would only have treated it as a recurring odd dream. But in this strange world filled with Anomalies, he could not help feeling alarmed.

First there was Nina remembering a fire that seemed to exist only in her mind and Duncan's, and now there were these unending strange dreams that felt almost like a prophetic vision.

"When did these dreams start?" Duncan asked, his expression growing serious.

"About a week or two ago? Maybe earlier… I don't really remember," Nina said. She took a sip of vegetable soup, her voice a little muffled. "I didn't pay much attention at first…"

When Duncan heard that, he almost said, “You should have told someone earlier,” but then he suddenly remembered something. At that time, Nina’s “uncle” had still been a good-for-nothing, drowning himself in cult activities and alcohol.

Back then, she had not had any reliable person she could talk to at all.

He forced the words back down and changed what he was going to say: “Have you consulted any professionals? Like a doctor?”

Nina raised her head. “You mean… a psychiatrist?”

“Yes, a psychiatrist.” Duncan thought for a moment, then nodded at once.

In this world, psychiatrists were an indispensable profession. There were too many things lurking in the veil of night and the Deep Sea, watching the city-states with hungry eyes. The minds of ordinary people were easily affected by those whispers and breaths. Big and small problems would appear—nightmares, auditory hallucinations, visual hallucinations, Cognitive Shifts, even personality disorders.

These illnesses troubled many, many people, so treatment in this field had developed to an unbelievable level. The most skilled psychiatrists even used supernatural power to straighten out a twisted mind.

Nina’s constant strange dreams should also count as one of the “symptoms” psychiatrists watched for.

“I haven’t,” Nina muttered. “Their fees are really expensive… and I’m just having some weird dreams.”

“But those dreams have already started to affect your life,” Duncan said, his voice very firm. “Dreaming of such strange scenes again and again might be a sign of danger. You should have learned about things like this at school.”

As he spoke, his thoughts were racing. These repeated weird dreams of Nina's clearly had a problem. No matter what, since he was now living in a world full of strange Anomalies, he had to stay alert whenever elements from the supernatural realm showed up.

But he himself was an outsider when it came to theory. He would have to find some professionals to deal with this.

And it happened that he also wanted a chance to meet some "professionals" from civilized society, and see how they handled incidents that might involve the supernatural.

Nina still seemed hesitant, but in the face of Duncan's serious expression, she finally surrendered. "Then… then this weekend we can go to the community cathedral first and ask the Deep Sea priest there to give me a calming divine blessing. That doesn't cost much. If it doesn't work… then we can find a psychiatrist who specializes in this stuff. Is that okay?"

The cathedral? A priest of the Deep Sea? A priest who served the storm goddess Gamona?

Duncan's heart stirred. He felt that this was also a good idea—he had been wanting to meet those priests who served deities.

"All right, then it's settled," he nodded at once. "You're going to the City Museum this weekend anyway. When you come back, we'll stop by the cathedral."

"Mm!"

After dinner, Nina went back to her room early as usual. Duncan returned to his own room and at once saw AI's lazy form sprawled across the windowsill.

The pigeon had spent the whole day flying around outside and had come back with nothing to show for it.

Duncan closed the door behind him, then walked over to the window. When the pigeon saw its master, it lazily raised one wing in greeting and grumbled: “Let everything be destroyed already, I’m tired…”

“You really worked hard today.” Just one look at the half-dead bird told Duncan how exhausted it was. He stepped forward and unfastened the “cultist detector” strapped to the pigeon’s back while soothing it: “This job really isn’t easy. They’re all hiding very deep, and the Deep Sea Church has been watching closely lately. They’re bound to be even more careful…”

AI rolled its eyes, shook its wings once, and then lay flat again, not moving at all.

Duncan could not help laughing at that. “Even so, we still have to keep doing this… Of course, having you fly around all day might be a bit too much. I’ll arrange a better balance between work and rest for you.”

He had already decided to treat hunting cultists in the city as a long-term task.

After today’s “big job,” he was no longer under such urgent pressure for money. He did not need to rely on “hunting” to cover household expenses. But making trouble for those cultists was meaningful in itself.

On one hand, he might be able to fish out a big target from among them and use that to get the information he needed. Higher-ranking priests were sure to know more secrets about the Sun, and perhaps more details about the fragments that had appeared eleven years ago. Those were exactly what Duncan cared about most.

On the other hand, there was also that seemingly feral dog-eared supernatural girl active in the city-state. She was also constantly going after the Suntists. She might know certain secrets of the supernatural world.

Duncan wanted to try his luck and see if he could talk to her again about the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the demons of the Abyssal Deep.

After his talk with Morris, he was now intensely curious about that layer of “Starry Sky” hanging above the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea.

Noticing the serious look on Duncan’s face and sensing its future of forced overtime, AI let out an extremely human-like sigh.

“Ah…” The bird’s tone was full of sorrow. “A pitiful thick barrier has already come between us…”

“Your vocabulary is pretty impressive,” Duncan said.

Chapter 95: Infiltration

Another small group of Heretics of the Sun who had slipped in from Cold Harbor on smuggling boats had been dragged out and locked in the cathedral near the Harbor District.

Vanna came back from the dungeon beneath the cathedral and stepped into the lounge off the upper sanctuary. The regional Bishop in charge of this cathedral was already waiting in the room.

“Inquisitor Vanna,” the slightly thin Bishop greeted the young Inquisitor with a bow. “May the waves protect your soul.”

“May the waves protect your soul,” Vanna replied, then walked with somewhat tired steps toward a chair at the side. “In the Harbor District alone, this is already the second batch of Heretics of the Sun thrown into the cells, isn’t it?”

“Yes. Three days ago we caught more than a dozen,” the Bishop said with a nod, his eyes tinged with worry. “They were trying to kill a citizen when they were discovered and stopped in time. Now this is the second batch. They drew a meter reader’s suspicion while holding a dark ritual in an apartment building.

“We never realized that so many cultists had infiltrated…” He shook his head slightly. “Luckily we found them early. Otherwise, who knows how many people their dark rituals would have killed.”

“Pland is the main hub of the Boundless Sea, and everything has been calm for the last four years,” Vanna said with a nod. “That made many people’s nerves go numb.

“But… we still don’t know if we discovered this early or late. Those Heretics who arrived ahead of time might have been active in the dark for a while already. They only exposed themselves recently.”

The Bishop glanced at Vanna’s face, hesitated for a moment, and then asked: “I heard other districts have caught quite a few as well?”

“Yes. Almost every district in the city-state,” Vanna answered without hiding anything. “Right now, the underground cells of almost every cathedral are holding captured Heretics of the Sun. Some cathedrals only have a few. Others have dozens.

“But most of them are just the lowest-level lackeys, moving around the city-state to gather information. They haven’t had much training, so they expose themselves easily.

“We still haven’t found any of the real upper-level priests.”

By the time she finished, even Vanna’s own tone had turned unconsciously grave. A faint uneasiness showed on her face.

Ever since the hunt for the Heretic cultists seeking the “fragments of the Sun” had begun, Pland’s authorities and the Church had reacted at once. They launched a sweeping hidden search all across the city and urged citizens everywhere to report suspicious behavior.

The results of this wave of action were impressive.

In a very short time, a large number of cultists who had not yet had time to react were exposed and captured. These bloodstained cultists now almost filled the underground prisons of the various cathedrals.

Their number was nearly equal to the total number of cultists discovered within the city-state over the last four years.

Yet up to this moment, all those arrested were only the ones running around at the bottom. At best, they included a few low-ranking priests carrying mass-produced sacred relics who had only just received a divine blessing.

The true high-level powers were still hiding in the shadows.

That was what made Vanna feel faintly irritated and uneasy.

“Every day we have results, but we still can’t grasp their ‘core,’” she said to the Bishop in front of her. “It gives me the feeling that the situation is still getting worse somewhere outside our sight.

“With so many cultists moving inside the city-state, there must be a high-level commander arranging everything behind them. But that commander still hasn’t shown up.”

The Bishop thought for a moment, then spoke slowly: “According to the interrogations so far, these lackeys only follow the orders of ‘Envoys.’ These so?called Envoys are a group of low-level priests. They use imitation masks of the Sun, and through a Listening Rite, they hear the voice of the spawn of the Sun directly…

“Do you think it’s possible that a spawn of the Sun has already slipped into the city-state and is hiding here?”

“A spawn of the Sun hiding in a human city-state? Honestly… that doesn’t quite fit with how things work,” Vanna said, frowning. “They might have great power, but they leave obvious traces behind. Their foul, filthy aura can’t be hidden.

“There are cathedrals and patrolling Guardian squads all over the city-state. In theory, there shouldn’t be any blind spots.”

“So it’s only a guess,” the Bishop said with a slight shake of his head. “I also know it’s very hard for a spawn of the Sun to hide in civilized society.

“But those low-level Envoys really do carry the masks of the Sun with them. Even if they are not directly controlled, they must be in contact with the spawn of the Sun to some degree.

“After all, mass-produced sacred relics are still sacred relics. Those cultists also have to think about the cost of their actions. They wouldn’t make arrangements that are totally meaningless.”

“I read yesterday’s interrogation records,” Vanna said, touching her fingers lightly to her chin as she thought. “Those Heretics are mainly asking about the supernatural incident that happened in the city-state eleven years ago…

“They think it has something to do with the fragments of the Sun?”

“That’s how it looks now.” The Bishop nodded. “We don’t know where their information came from, but they seem very sure that fragments of the Sun were what caused the ‘great chemical plant riot’ in Pland eleven years ago. I remember you were also…”

The Bishop suddenly stopped. His eyes fell on the striking scar around Vanna’s left eye, and he lowered his head slightly. “Forgive me. I spoke out of turn.”

Vanna lifted a hand without thinking and brushed her fingers over the scar on her face. Then she smiled calmly and shook her head. “It’s fine. It’s just a scar. You’re right, I was also there when that riot happened. There’s nothing that can’t be said about it.”

“There were cultists involved in that riot as well,” the Bishop said in a low voice. “Afterward, among the rioters who were arrested, more than a hundred were Heretics of the Sun.

“But now, the Heretics of the Sun who infiltrated the city-state are asking about the truth of what happened eleven years ago again… As if they really don’t know what happened here back then.

“Don’t you think that’s strange?”

“Either the Heretics of the Sun in Pland acted on their own eleven years ago, so the cultists in other city-states don’t know the truth here,” Vanna said quietly, “or… the appearance of fragments of the Sun in Pland eleven years ago was only an accident, or the work of some third party.

“The Heretics who took part in that riot were only being used as tools.”

She added calmly: “According to the interrogation records back then, the ‘rioters’ we captured were all in a confused state.

“Their frenzied runaway state didn’t look like it came from their own will. It looked more like they had been pushed into madness under the influence of some overwhelming power.”

“…They chased after twisted, eerie things, only to be ruled and driven mad by that eerie power,” the Bishop sighed. “In that dazed state, they became fuel for the fire of chaos, and in the end they were thrown aside in the ashes.

“It’s a truly pitiful kind of life.”

Vanna did not answer at once.

She simply stood up in silence and walked to the window of the lounge.

Through the glass, she could faintly see the Harbor District. The full lockdown there had already ended. Many of the piers and jetties had gone back into use. But Pier One was still under the highest level of lockdown.

That beautiful, brand-new steamship, the White Oak, still lay quietly at the end of the pier. As planned, it was under non?stop surveillance and underwent a purification ritual once every day.

The crew of the White Oak had been transferred to the central cathedral. As people who had made close contact with the Vanished, they were now under the highest level of watch.

Heretics of the Black Sun were imprisoned in the dungeons under the cathedral. A “Homecoming Ship of the Lost” that had encountered the Vanished was moored in the harbor.

And a whole group of seafarers who had come face-to-face with Captain Duncan were staying inside the central cathedral…

Just thinking about it was enough to give someone a headache.

The sun was already sinking, though it was not yet time for day and night to trade places. The Bishop lit several oil lamps in the room ahead of time. The wavering flames were reflected faintly in the window glass.

Vanna withdrew her gaze from the Harbor District. “I heard the notice about Anomaly 099’s runaway state has already been sent to the Harbor District?”

“Yes. It was just delivered this afternoon. Would you like to look it over?” the Bishop said. As he spoke, he took a folded document from his robe. “It arrived a little later than we expected, for some reason.”

“Let me see it.”

Vanna reached out and took the document, then began to read it by the fading light at the window. At the same time, she explained casually: “Being a little late is normal. Anomaly 099’s runaway was very unusual. It broke out of its seal during direct contact with that ghost ship.

“The Bishops of each city-state had to think very carefully about the wording and implications in this notice, so that the information it points to stays under control.

“Otherwise, a document that’s supposed to help captains avoid risks on the sea might end up creating too many ‘connections’… and link them to the Vanished instead.”

In the dim light of the approaching sunset, the oil lamp closest to Vanna suddenly flickered.

As the word “Vanished” slipped out of her mouth without a thought, the flame inside the lamp gave a tiny crackling sound.

Chapter 96: gaze

Inside the captain’s cabin of the Vanished, Duncan was sitting by the window with his arms folded across his chest, eyes closed as he rested. He slowly opened his eyes.

He glanced around at the familiar furnishings of the room, checked the state of his body, and let out a small breath of relief.

Right now, he had once again shifted his main consciousness to the Vanished. The body left in the city-state of Pland remained in the antique shop. He was a bit rusty as he controlled that body to tidy the first-floor shop and hang the “Closed for the Evening” sign on the door.

In the captain’s cabin, Duncan slowly rose from the chair. As he flexed his arms and legs, he looked toward the nearby desk. He saw the pigeon AI strolling along the edge of the tabletop. The Sun mask he had sent here earlier still lay quietly on the desk. In the afterglow of the sunset pouring through the window, the mask’s golden surface shimmered with a trancelike sheen, as if illusory flames were flowing through its golden patterns.

In front of the antique shop, the Duncan there as shopkeeper finished hanging the wooden “Closed for the Evening” sign. He turned and greeted a neighbor who happened to be on the way home. With a faint smile, he chatted with this “old neighbor” about today’s weather and how business had been lately.

His expression in front of the antique shop looked a little stiff, and his speech was somewhat slow, but the neighbor did not grow suspicious. A useless gambler who had been drowning in alcohol not long ago was now actually living seriously—that alone was shocking enough. Compared to that, a slightly sluggish reaction was nothing. How energetic could a body ruined by alcohol be, anyway?

Back in the captain's cabin, a faint smile appeared on Duncan's face. After using his "remote interaction shell" to complete a first attempt at socializing, he casually picked up the Sun mask lying on the desk.

There was still much to do in the city-state of Pland, but not everything could be done overnight. The city-state had strict curfew rules after nightfall. At night it was better for his human body to stay obediently in the shop so as not to draw attention. The hours after dusk were best left to the "true body" on the Vanished.

He planned to use this time to study the mask he had taken from that Sun priest.

The mask felt icy cold in his hand, as if cast entirely from metal. It was heavy, with real weight.

Looking at the golden object in his hand, Duncan's thoughts suddenly grew lively. The first thing he wondered was whether this thing was pure gold. If it was, then after he finished studying it, melting it down might fetch a lot of money…

For now he had no financial pressure in the city-state, but money was something one could never have too much of in human society. What if he needed it later?

There were many ways to fleece those Suntists. He could squeeze information out of them, turn them in for bounties, or get supernatural items that suited him. If there were extra supernatural items he did not need, it was perfectly normal to do a little processing and sell them off.

This was called multi-directional development and sustainable wool-gathering.

He thought it over for a moment, then rubbed his chin and sighed with feeling: “Every part of a Suntist is a treasure…”

AI, who had been strolling around, suddenly stopped. She tilted her head at Duncan and let out a sharp female voice: “Have some humanity, would you! Have some humanity!”

“You, a bird, have no right to say that to me.” Duncan glared at the pigeon, then rubbed his fingertips together, ready to summon the spirit form flame. He would first “clean” the mask from inside to outside, and after he controlled its permissions, he would carry out a deeper “test”.

A wisp of faint green flame burned at his fingertips. Duncan was about to channel the fire into the mask when he suddenly heard a vague voice. The sound was weak and hazy, as if whispering in the depths of his heart:

“…it might instead connect them to the Vanished…”

Duncan’s movements stopped at once.

He looked at the pigeon beside him and asked: “Did you hear a voice just now?”

The pigeon thought for a moment, then flapped her wings and began to sing loudly, hopelessly off-key: “Hear~ the sound of the sea crying~ lamenting whose heart has been hurt again~”

“Stop, stop, stop… I should never have asked you!” Duncan hurriedly pressed the pigeon down. In his heart he complained that talking with this bird was like a quantum state—nothing said or heard ever lined up. After holding the pigeon still, he focused his mind at once, trying to trace the brief sensation that had stirred in his heart when that “whisper” sounded.

He was sure he had not imagined it. He was sure he had heard a voice just now, a young and calm female voice.

At the same time the voice sounded, he had vaguely sensed a kind of “connection”. It was much weaker than the link between him and his remote body, but it definitely existed.

Duncan temporarily put the matter of the Golden Sun Mask aside and glanced again at the spirit form flame still burning quietly at his fingertips.

That faint connection also seemed to be based on the burning of the fire.

He closed his eyes slightly, feeling the “sense of direction” the flame gave him. In the darkness that followed, he seemed to see a glimmer of light appear before his eyes.

That faint light was vaguely like a “window”. There seemed to be a figure moving inside it, but he could not see clearly or hear what was happening on the other side.

Even so, Duncan still sensed the flame’s guidance in the unseen. He opened his eyes and searched in the direction where the light had appeared in the darkness. Suddenly he saw a mirror hanging beside the cabin door.

It was just an ordinary oval scrying mirror with a simple, dark wooden frame. It was not an supernatural item, no different from what many regular households used.

But Duncan could feel that his flame now needed a medium to strengthen this suddenly formed, weak link. Thinking of the blurry scene he had seen in the dark and the faint sense of its direction, a mirror seemed very suitable.

In many occult studies rituals, mirrors held an important place. They were seen as symbols of “insight” and could be used to extend the mind’s perception, to observe truths that were originally invisible and unknowable.

Duncan walked up to the mirror and casually touched the surface with the flame in his hand.

The green spirit form flame flowed like water, rippling across the glass surface. A film of light, faintly glowing green, formed a channel in an instant. In the next second, the glimmering window he had seen in the darkness appeared crystal clear on the mirror!

He leaned in curiously.

Within the faintly rippling curtain of light, he saw a room lit by lamps. A tall, unusually large young lady stood near the window, using the last light of day to read something. She seemed completely unaware that a gaze was peering through the glass beside her, watching the scene inside the room.

Vanna’s eyes moved across the document, checking every word and sentence.

This notice had been drawn up through joint discussion by bishops from all the city-states and personally reviewed and approved by His Eminence the Pope, who presided over the great Storm Cathedral. The discussion and drafting of the notice had been completed remotely in a state of Psychic Resonance, under the Goddess’s gaze and protection throughout, to ensure that no Anomaly or Vision interfered with the wording during the process.

These very special notice documents had only one purpose: to inform every long-distance voyager sailing on the Boundless Sea that a high-ranked Anomalous item had broken away from the control of the civilized world.

This was necessary.

On the Boundless Sea, Anomalous items that entered a runaway state did not disappear from the world forever. The Deep Sea devoured everything, yet never devoured the “Anomalies” that fell into it. Those that slipped free of control often wandered along the edges of the civilized world in even stranger, harder-to-guard-against ways, like packs of wolves roaming around a pasture, chasing and threatening the safety of voyagers. Almost every year, long-distance seafarers died after encountering runaway state Anomalies.

As guardians and sealers of Anomalous items, each Church had to inform all captains who might encounter them whenever an Anomalous item under its name entered a runaway state. No one saw this as hurting the Holy See's "face", because it was the Church's duty and obligation.

Sending out timely notices about runaway states might one day save an unlucky ship that ran into an Anomaly, or make it possible to re?seal and contain a runaway state Anomalous item.

Normally such notices reached Harbor offices within twenty?four hours of a runaway state incident. But this notice about "Anomaly 099" was a little late.

Because this runaway state incident involved not only Anomaly 099 – doll spirit coffin, but also Visions 005 – the Vanished.

The Pope and the bishops had to weigh every word in the document carefully, to make sure the information disclosed was accurate, yet also avoid drawing the attention of the Vanished when people read it.

Vanna's face was as calm and dark as still water. She read the document word by word, checking that the phrasing followed the sacred, unseen structure of prayer and could avoid the gaze of that ghost captain on the Vanished.

And on the window glass beside her, in a seam of light and shadow neither she nor the regional bishop could perceive, Duncan was craning his neck, trying hard to peek at the document's contents.

[ghost captain, deeply shocked.jpg.]

Chapter 97: Who Is Drafting the List?

The view shown in the mirror seemed to be based on a window. Duncan felt like someone pressed right up against the panes, peering through the glass at the room inside. In the room, there was a tall, unusually large young woman. Her side profile looked somewhat familiar.

After thinking for a moment, Duncan remembered where he had seen that face. This was the widely respected inquisitor from Pland, Vanna Wayne!

Her figure had appeared in the newspapers.

Why was he seeing this scene? Why was he suddenly looking through a window at this believer of the Storm Goddess? Was there some hidden connection? When had this connection formed? Why had he never noticed it before, yet now suddenly sensed this invisible “thread”?

Countless thoughts flashed through Duncan’s mind, but in the next second, the jumble in his head was cut off by something his gaze swept across.

He saw clearly what the inquisitor in the mirror, Miss Vanna, was reading.

It was a document written in a strict format, the paper stamped with the holy symbol of the Storm Goddess. The very first line read: To all captains on the Boundless Sea and their accompanying priests and guides, Anomaly 099 – doll spirit coffin has recently entered a runaway state. Witnessed by the Most Holy and All-Seeing, the cursed item has been lost in the storm.

The runaway state of this Anomaly and its traits are hereby announced as follows…

Duncan's eyes slowly widened. His gaze went past Vanna's shoulder. The document described Anomaly 099 in wording that read like a specific kind of prayer. He saw mention of a dangerous curse with the power of decapitation, saw the origin of the doll spirit coffin, and saw records related to "Alice Guillotine"…

In his shock, his gaze slid downward. Near the end of the document he saw a record of the White Oak being "attacked". However, the key part of the last sentence was blocked by the inquisitor's tall figure, and he could not see it no matter how he tried.

Duncan leaned left and right in front of the mirror, anxious, and muttered without thinking: "Move a bit, move a bit to the side…"

In the lounge, Vanna suddenly felt as if a strand of breeze brushed past her earlobe. She turned her head reflexively and saw that the window was open a crack. The cold sea wind of evening was blowing in.

The flames of several oil lamps in the room wavered. Their soft light drove away the malice that spread through the world as the veil of night approached, and brought her a special sense of peace.

She set the document aside and turned to the regional bishop: "Put it away. The bishops of the city-states must have made thorough arrangements. This is very safe."

The regional bishop nodded, stepped forward to collect the document, and turned up the electric light in the room. Its brightness drove away the gloom of the changing day and night even more than the oil lamps. "Will you have to hurry back to the central Cathedral tonight?"

“Valentine Bishop is still waiting to discuss matters with me,” Vanna nodded slightly. “Things have been unsettled in the city-state recently. We may need to carry out a large-scale benediction to strengthen the Cathedral’s protection over the entire city-state.”

As she spoke, she looked up at the chandelier hanging from the ceiling. The electric bulbs in it made the room as bright as daytime. “…If only electric lights could ward off evil,” she said. “They’re so bright, and their range is much wider than fire…”

“Who doesn’t think so?” The regional bishop spread his hands. “It’s a pity that electricity has no sanctity.”

Vanna shook her head and said nothing more. After bidding the regional bishop farewell, she walked out of the lounge.

After Vanna left, one oil lamp near the window suddenly flickered a little, then quickly grew steady again.

The scene in the mirror slowly faded. When the green film of light vanished, the glass once again reflected the captain’s cabin.

Just now, when the inquisitor, Miss Vanna, had turned her head, Duncan had finally seen the last line of the document. For him, the most useful information in that line was just a few words:

Visions 005 – the Vanished.

“So the classification of the Vanished really is ‘Visions’… and the number is actually that high.” He returned to the desk, muttering thoughtfully, but then grew puzzled. “But then again, how are these numbers arranged?”

Nina’s textbooks had mentioned many Anomalies and Visions by number and name. They also mentioned this “list” and said the rules behind it came from the ancient Critt Kingdom. But they were vague about how the numbers for those Anomalies and Visions were set and who decided them.

They only said that each Church had the right to interpret and the duty to publish, and that under normal circumstances, the earlier an Anomaly or Vision was on the list, the stranger, more dangerous, or more historically significant it was. At first Duncan had not thought much about it, but now a doubt suddenly rose in his mind.

Were these numbers arranged in the order of discovery?

If it was by order of discovery, then the Vanished, which had only a history of a hundred years, could never hold such a high number. There were plenty of Visions older than the Vanished in this world. In theory, all the high-rank designations should have been filled long ago.

But if they were not ordered by discovery, and instead sorted by level of danger, then wouldn't the numbers have to change all the time? Every time a new Anomaly or Vision was found, they would have to reassess its danger, then adjust the entire "ranking list". That would become a huge project, and very awkward to use.

Although the textbooks said that the danger level of Anomalies and Visions did not always match their ranking one hundred percent, they also clearly stated that in most cases, those with earlier numbers were more terrifying and dangerous than those behind them.

That raised a question worth thinking about: if the current list of Anomalies and Visions was fairly stable and rarely changed, then whoever arranged it was almost like a prophet. When making the list, that person would have had to foresee the "rank" of every Anomaly and Vision, not only assigning accurate numbers when new ones were discovered, but also leaving "empty slots" in advance for powerful Anomalies and Visions that would appear in the future.

Because of the wording "Visions 005 – the Vanished", Duncan had suddenly felt puzzled by this "list" and the person behind it. But soon he set those doubts aside for now.

Because at the moment, something was more important than the rules behind this “supernatural items ranking”—Alice.

That cursed doll from the Harmonious Church actually had such a big background!

“I’m going out for a bit.”

Duncan tossed the words casually to the pigeon on the desk and strode out of the captain’s cabin.

Goathead in the enchanted sea chart room heard the cabin door move and turned his head with a creak. When he saw Duncan, he greeted him out of habit: “Surname…”

“Duncan Abnomar—skip that part. Where is Alice?”

“Ah, great cap…” Goathead finished confirming the name and had just started his usual long speech when the captain cut him off. His neck creaked with the words stuck in his throat before he finally reacted. “You’re looking for Miss Alice? She might be in her room counting her hairs…”

“Counting her hairs?” Duncan froze. “What new problem has she picked up this time… Forget it, I’ll go myself. You just keep steering the ship.”

After saying this, he did not wait for a response. He turned and left the cabin in a hurry, leaving Goathead atop the enchanted sea chart table, staring blankly at the door that had already shut again.

“I didn’t even get a chance to say more…” After holding it in for a long while, Goathead finally reacted, sounding terribly depressed. “Has my ability to start a conversation gotten worse?”

As soon as he finished speaking, the door in the corner that led to the captain’s cabin opened a crack. The pigeon AI squeezed through with great swagger and flapped to the table.

“Want five coins’ worth of chat?” the pigeon asked, tilting her head and blinking her little eyes.

“Sure, sure, as long as someone will chat with me!” Goathead brightened at once. Since everyone on the ship counted as “his own people”, he was not picky about his conversation partner at all. “What do you want to talk about? By the way, can you actually talk normally? I always feel you…”

“Get some fries.”

“Huh?” Goathead froze. “No, I mean, are you really aware that you…”

“Get some fries.”

“…If what you want to talk about is sea cuisine…”

“Get some fries.”

“Can you say anything else?”

“Get some fries.”

Goathead: “…”

Duncan paid no attention to what happened in the captain’s cabin after he left. He walked straight across the upper deck and soon reached the seafarers’ quarters below. After taking a moment in front of Alice’s door to sort out his thoughts, he knocked and said: “Alice, it’s me.”

A stammering voice came quickly from inside: “P-please… p-please… come in…”

Hearing that, Duncan raised his eyebrows without thinking and pushed the door open.

The doll in the long Brother-style robe sat at the table by the bed, facing a dressing mirror on the desk. She held her own head in both hands, silver-white hair cascading like a waterfall. The head turned its gaze toward him, and a pretty, delicate face slowly broke into a smile. “C-cap… cap… captain, g-g-good eve… eve… evening…”

Duncan said: “Put your head back on.”

“Pop.”

Chapter 98: Alice Knew Nothing

Imagine this scene: you were on a creaking ghost ship. You pushed open a wooden door at the deepest end of the corridor. A dim oil lamp swayed gently. In the flickering light, a headless doll in a Brother's long dress sat in front of a dressing mirror. The doll held her own head in her hands. The head turned toward you and slowly showed a stiff smile…

Duncan felt that if he had not already been on this ship for so many days, and if he were not already so familiar with Alice, he would have already taken an instant step forward and drawn his gun by now.

Alice, however, had no idea how creepy she had just made things. She obediently pressed her head back onto her neck with a soft pop. Her reactions became quick and lively again. She smiled brightly and greeted Duncan: "Good evening, Captain! Were you looking for me?"

Duncan finally pulled himself together. He looked this doll up and down suspiciously for a long moment and asked: "What are you doing here? Why did Goathead say you were in the cabin counting hairs?"

Alice rolled her neck left and right, then used her fingers to smooth her slightly messy hair. Her expression looked a bit embarrassed: "I was just… checking how much hair I had left."

Duncan stared at the doll as if he were looking at an idiot. Then he finally noticed something on the edge of the table. It was a spool from who knew where, with a few strands of silvery white hair wound around it. The source of those hairs was obvious…

Duncan kept a blank face: “…”

Alice noticed the captain’s gaze at once. She picked up the spool and explained to Duncan very seriously: “Look, this one is called Miffy, this one is Polly, this one is Femia, and this one, its name is…”

Duncan finally was shocked: “You even gave every hair that fell from your head a name?!”

“To keep a memento,” Alice said with a solemn look, with a bit of sorrow hidden in it. “Didn’t you say it yourself? I’m a doll, and dolls don’t grow hair on their own… If one day it all falls out, I can still hold the list and remember the wonderful times I spent with them…”

This doll left Duncan a bit dazed. He even forgot for a moment why he had come here. After staring in silence for a long time, he finally forced out a sentence: “I was only making an offhand remark back then. You didn’t need to take it to heart… No wonder you’ve been staying in the cabin these past two days. So you’ve been doing this every day? Counting hairs and naming each one that falls out?”

Alice nodded in the most harmless way: “Mm-hm.”

Duncan kept his face stiff. After a while he sighed and said: “Fine. Later I’ll look around in the city-states and see if there is any artificer who specializes in this field and can help you…”

Alice gasped: “You’re going to tie someone up and bring them onto the ship?”

Duncan glared at her: “…I’ll buy you a few wigs as backups! How could it make sense for the Boundless Sea’s mobile calamity to run to a human city-state to kidnap a dollmaker?”

“Well, a mobile calamity sneaking into a human city-state to buy wigs doesn’t sound very right either…” Alice muttered without thinking, but she swallowed the rest of her words halfway through. “Ah, I’ll stop talking, heh heh…”

“Don’t just giggle foolishly,” Duncan suddenly felt a wave of exhaustion. He waved his hand and said: “Forget it, you distracted me so much I almost forgot business—Alice, sit down. I came to you for something serious.”

When Alice saw the captain’s serious expression, she knew it was no time for jokes. She quickly put away her ingratiating smile. While she gathered up the spool, she hurried to sit on the wooden chest by the bed. Her back was straight, her hands folded on her knees, every bit the picture of elegance and poise.

Duncan sighed. For some reason, his composure always broke easily in front of Alice. Even when he had first come to this world, he had stayed cold and calm in front of Goathead. Even when he had possessed the body of a sacrificial victim with his chest cut open and faced a floor full of remains, he had kept his expression steady. Only when facing this unnervingly weird doll did his expression and aura hover between breaking and not quite breaking.

Thinking it over, this was probably the power of “style.” The style that Alice brought really made it hard for anyone to keep a straight face.

He crooked a finger to the side. A chair in the room creaked and scooted over behind him at once. He sat down on it, trying to force his expression back to gloomy majesty, and fixed his gaze on Alice’s eyes.

“Ray Nora. Does that name mean anything to you?”

“Ray Nora?” Alice blinked. Her face showed pure confusion. “Never heard of her… She sounds like a woman? And it feels very elegant and noble… Is she an acquaintance of yours?”

“In theory, she should be someone ‘you’ know, but you say you don’t… Fine, I believe you.” Duncan was not very surprised by Alice’s answer. He went on: “Then what about the city-state of Frostholm? Are you familiar with it? Does it leave any impression on you?”

“Frostholm city-state?” Alice thought for a moment. “I heard about it when I was in the box. It seems to be a city-state on the Frost Sea. There is also a place called Cold Harbor, a gateway between Frostholm and the Central Seas. But I don’t know the details. I only ever heard the names.”

“Then what about ‘Alice Guillotine’?”

The doll looked completely puzzled: “I know Alice, that’s my name—but what is a guillotine?”

Duncan asked several more questions in a row, and the answers he got were all more or less the same.

This result was basically within his expectations.

Alice was utterly in the dark about all of this. Just as she had said on the first day they met, she had no idea about her own past. She did not know the truth behind “Anomaly 099,” she had never understood that city-state of Frostholm, and she had never even heard of the Frostholm Queen who had died half a century ago.

Even though her face was exactly the same as that Frostholm Queen’s.

Duncan had not expected many direct answers when he asked these questions. He only wanted to test whether Alice would have any special reaction when she heard these “key words.” Now the test was over, and the doll was still the same simple-minded doll as before.

He believed that this timid doll would not dare fake her real reactions in front of him—and her level of intelligence probably did not support such advanced tricks anyway.

So… perhaps what he should focus on was not the doll, but the “spirit coffin”?

Duncan’s gaze slowly sharpened. His attention fell on Alice’s ornate, heavy wooden chest.

That ornate chest, once used to contain the doll, still sat in the room, and Alice was sitting steadily on top of it now.

Alice liked her chest very much. She used it as a stool and a storage box, and sometimes even slept inside it—though the room had a perfectly normal bed.

“Open the chest and let me see,” Duncan said.

Alice felt a bit puzzled, but she still quickly hopped down from the chest and casually opened it.

Duncan stepped forward to look.

Inside, the chest was lined with soft red velvet. In one corner lay a small pile of odds and ends: a comb, a spool wrapped with hair, a pocket mirror, and several small metal trinkets.

“I found them on the ship, in other cabins,” Alice said carefully, pointing at the clutter in the corner of the chest. “I asked Mr. Goathead. He said these were ownerless things. I… can I keep them? I think they are very pretty…”

Duncan looked at those old ornaments.

Perhaps, a century ago, someone on this ship had worn them at the tips of their hair or on their chest.

They were traces from when the Vanished had still belonged to the Mortal Realm.

“They’re yours. Keep them,” Duncan said with a nod. But then his gaze suddenly caught on a small object in the pile of clutter. He could not help reaching out to pick it up. “This thing…”

It was a small hair clip, so delicate it did not seem like something that should appear on the Vanished. It looked like a silver-white feather, with tiny breaking waves carved along the edge. Though a century had passed, it was still as bright as new—completely different from those old items.

Duncan frowned. For some reason, when he saw this hair clip, a faint feeling of… longing rose in his heart.

There was even a name that almost slipped from his lips.

But he still could not remember what that almost-spoken name was.

Duncan blinked, a bit bewildered, not knowing where this sudden feeling from deep inside had come from. But gradually, he understood.

Just as, the moment he came onto this ship, he had known the name “Duncan Abnomar”… just now he had once again touched the “echo” still remaining in this body!

He lowered his head to look at the hair clip in his hand, wondering how such a delicate, tiny thing could resonate with the greatest calamity on the Boundless Sea. But soon, Alice’s voice jolted him out of his thoughts: “Captain? Captain, you…”

“Sorry, I can’t give you this hair clip,” Duncan came back to himself and said to Alice. Then he felt that sounded a bit too cold toward the doll miss, so he added: “When I get a chance later, I’ll buy you some new ones in the city-states—these things are all old anyway.”

“Really?!” Alice’s face lit up with delight. “Captain, you’re so nice!”

“Don’t praise me yet,” Duncan shook his head and casually put the hair clip away. “I haven’t finished the serious business… Alice, I’m going to tell you some things now, about your ‘true nature.’ You need to listen carefully.”

Chapter 99: The First Step of Testing and Control

After confirming that Alice had no reaction to any of the “key words,” and knew nothing about the ability called “Decapitation,” Duncan decided to tell this muddle-headed cursed doll what he had just learned.

By now he already had a vague guess. Perhaps the key to the anomaly Anomaly 099 – Doll spirit coffin was not Alice the doll herself… but her “spirit coffin.”

The wind and waves on the Boundless Sea were gentle. The cabin swayed softly with the swell. In the flickering light of the oil lamp, the ghost ship’s captain slowly told the past and present of the doll’s spirit coffin—and almost scared the doll into curling up into a ball.

Duncan, expressionless, looked at Alice, who was now sitting in the corner of the bed, back against the wall, clutching her head: “Did you really need to get this nervous?”

“Th-this… this really sounds terrifying!” Alice’s tone had changed. She sounded like an ordinary young lady who had just listened to a ghost story. “All that talk about indiscriminate Decapitation, and about only stopping after everything in range is dead, and about constantly expanding its territory… Th-this… I didn’t know any of that!”

“I do believe now that you really didn’t know,” Duncan glanced at Alice. “But this is indeed the information on Anomaly 099 – Doll spirit coffin.”

Alice held her head, her neck stiff as she looked at Duncan: “Then…”

“So I have two guesses now,” Duncan said. “First, those ‘Decapitation’ incidents might be an ability you activated unconsciously. You yourself are an anomaly, and your power is very likely just a passive area effect. Even in your previous ‘asleep’ state, it would not have stopped the Decapitation effect from occurring.”

As Duncan spoke, he slowly rose from his chair. He walked to the ornate wooden chest and tapped it with the tip of the long sword in his hand.

“Second, the ‘Decapitation’ power of the Doll spirit coffin might not come from you, the doll, but from your ‘spirit coffin’.”

“spirit coffin… you mean my chest?” Alice’s eyes slowly widened. Her gaze followed Duncan’s movement and fell on the wooden chest by the bed. The slow-on-the-uptake doll finally seemed to catch on: “You mean…”

“The full name of Anomaly 099 is ‘Doll spirit coffin’… In other words, you and your chest together make up the complete ‘Anomaly 099.’ When I first saw you, I subconsciously assumed you were the ‘main part’ of it… because I didn’t yet know the full name ‘Doll spirit coffin’,” Duncan rubbed his chin as he thought aloud. “Now that I think it over, the word ‘Doll spirit coffin’ itself… its emphasis seems to be on the latter half.”

Alice blinked. Her mind worked hard for a while, then she clapped her hands: “Oh! I’m the accessory that comes with the chest!”

Duncan gave the empty-headed doll a blank look: “…You don’t have to sound so proud when you say that.”

Alice seemed not to hear the mockery in Duncan’s tone. She only gave her wooden chest a troubled look and spoke in a slightly worried voice: “So that means… my chest has been ‘Decapitating’ people all along? But I’ve lived in it for so long and never felt it was so evil and dangerous… and I've never felt it had any special power…"

"Nonsense. You're part of Anomaly 099 yourself. How could your feelings be any reference?" Duncan frowned. "And feel your own neck. I seriously suspect the reason your head falls off every now and then is because you've slept in that chest for too long!"

Alice instantly felt the captain had a point, and her expression became complicated at once. But then she grew confused again: "But if that's true… if 'Decapitation' is an inherent property of my spirit coffin, it has been on the ship for so long. Why haven't we seen its power activate?"

As soon as she finished speaking, she met Duncan's quiet gaze. The slow-reacting doll miss suddenly felt a wordless pressure crash down on her head—she had grown lax after living on the ship for a while, and only now suddenly remembered what kind of person this captain was.

Duncan simply gazed at the doll in silence. Only after Alice had curled herself into an even smaller ball did he speak in a low voice: "The only humanoid creature on this ship besides you is me. So what you mean is…"

"I don't mean anything!" Alice almost jumped up. She waved her hands frantically as she spoke: "Please listen to my excuse—I mean the chest…"

"I never said I was going to do anything to you," Duncan looked at her helplessly. "You're now a crew member of the Vanished, and I'm your protector on the Boundless Sea. You really don't have to be this afraid—can you sit properly? It makes it look like I'm bullying you."

Only then did Alice let out an "oh" and slowly scoot back to the edge of the bed. But because of her interruption, other thoughts rose in Duncan's heart. Yes, no matter whether the main body of the Doll spirit coffin was the doll or the spirit coffin, Anomaly 099 had stayed on the Vanished for so long that it had long exceeded the interval for each of its “checks.” Yet this anomaly had always remained harmless… Obviously, it was being suppressed.

Then what was suppressing it—the Vanished, or himself, the “captain”?

Duncan lowered his head and looked at his own hands.

He knew he held rather great power. That power not only allowed him to completely take over the life of a cultist named “Ron,” but was so strong and strange that it made an upper-level anomaly like Alice tremble at first sight, and made “Ah Gou,” a demon of the Abyssal Deep, tuck his tail. He still did not know the essence of this power, but that did not stop him from slowly recognizing how special he was.

On the other hand, the Vanished itself was the fifth-ranked Vision on the Boundless Sea—“Vision,” not anomaly.

That meant that as long as something was within the Vanished’s range, there was a “field” working around the clock, constantly exerting influence on everything inside it.

With both captain and ship suppressing it, Anomaly 099 naturally stayed harmless. But if he really followed his plan and brought Alice to the city-state of Pland… then things could very easily slip out of control.

So he had to figure out a whole series of things—Was the body that produced Anomaly 099’s effects Alice the doll, or this wooden chest? Was it he, the captain, suppressing Anomaly 099, or was it the Vanished? If Alice and the chest were separated, would Anomaly 099’s effect still appear? If it was he, the captain, who created the suppression, what was the range of that suppression?

His thoughts spread further—

If it was the “spirit coffin” that produced the Decapitation effect, would it be safe to bring only Alice herself to Pland? If the spirit coffin was an anomaly component that could be separated out, could his flames also affect it alone? If he used fire to completely dominate this chest, would that be equivalent to controlling the formerly uncontrolled Decapitation effect—just like he used fire to control AI and the brass spirit compass?

A pile of questions lined up in Duncan’s mind, and these questions gradually formed a complex plan for comparative tests. But at the end of that plan, he found one discouraging fact:

He lacked many of the necessary conditions to run those tests.

The Vanished was not a proper testing ground, because the ghost ship’s power would interfere with the accuracy of the results. He also had no suitable test subjects—because Anomaly 099’s Decapitation effect was very costly in terms of lives… it burned through the “testers’” lives.

Duncan lifted his head and looked at Alice, who was sitting obediently at the bedside—the doll miss was gazing at her beloved chest with some sadness, all her tangled feelings practically written on her face.

Perhaps noticing the captain’s gaze, Alice suddenly broke the silence. She spoke softly: “From the day I became conscious… I’ve always lived in this chest. It is my bed, my home, and my Sanctuary World. When I sleep inside it, I feel very safe.”

Duncan did not speak. He only quietly looked at the doll before him.

“Now I know why those humans were so afraid,” Alice reached out and gently stroked her wooden chest. “What they feared was ‘us.’”

“I had originally planned to bring you to the city-state of Pland on my next walk in the Spirit Realm,” Duncan said in a low voice. “I need a helper over there.”

Alice’s eyes seemed to light up, but they dimmed again at once: “Ah, that might not be very good…”

“The plan is postponed, not canceled,” Duncan said, his expression and tone not changing much. “We just need more time to confirm your… ‘your group’s’ power and grasp the conditions under which this ‘Decapitation’ effect takes hold. The human city-states on land can already use various clever methods to seal or even make use of many anomalies. And this is the Vanished. There is even more we can do here.”

Alice gave Duncan a puzzled look. From the captain’s calm, deep gaze, she realized this was not just empty comfort.

“You have a plan?”

Duncan thought for a moment, then raised his fingertip and lit a faint ghostly flame.

“First, we might need a little fire.”

Chapter 100: Illusion and Reality in History

“Captain, are you sure this is really okay?” Alice watched the “little flame” in Duncan’s hand with deep worry. Both her hands kept tugging at the lace on the hem of her dress. “Don’t burn my house down…”

Duncan held a cluster of spirit form fire in his palm. While he searched for a place to start on Alice’s spirit coffin, he glanced back at the Doll with a helpless look and said: “My spirit form fire is completely under control—do you not trust my power?”

As soon as Alice heard that, she started waving her hands: “I do, I do…”

Only then did Duncan look away and steady himself.

With the current conditions on the Vanished, it was almost impossible to run a full set of tests on Alice’s spirit coffin. But that did not mean he could not at least do some “preliminary research”. Now that he had grown more and more skilled at controlling the spirit form fire, he had faintly grasped a way to use this flame to probe the inner secrets of supernatural objects.

He still did not dare use this flame on Alice’s body. But if it was only to study her wooden box… that was another story.

After making some preparations, Duncan finally reached out his hand and stretched the little flame at his fingertip toward the surface of the ornate wooden box.

The flame sank into the box in silence, like an unreal reflection. Alice stared with wide eyes, watching every tiny change in front of her. After two or three seconds of stillness, she saw phantom-like light spread through her field of vision—

The spirit form fire started to burn on the box, burning from the inside out! In the blink of an eye, the whole box took on a half-transparent look. In this strange, half-real scene, the blazing flames raced through every detail inside the box, as if they were rebuilding its “skeleton”!

“Hey, Captain, Captain, it’s on fire, it’s on fire!”

The Doll cried out in panic, but her shouting got no answer. Duncan had already put all his focus into controlling the flame and sensing the spirit coffin. With a solemn expression, he fixed his gaze on the dancing fire and the unreal wooden box in front of him. Alice’s voice in his ears sounded faint and distant, as if it came from another world.

Duncan’s mind slowly calmed down. He felt the world around him grow quieter and quieter. Even the endless wind and waves of the Boundless Sea seemed to drift far from his senses. He felt his power seep into a vast “place”, and more and more “perceptions” flowed into his mind through the channel the flame had opened—

This feeling was completely different from when he had used the fire to reshape the Sun charm amulet before!

If he had to compare, using the flame on the Sun charm amulet had felt as easy as filling a cup of water. But now he felt his fire surging nonstop into a great lake. The sizes were not on the same level at all.

So this was the gap between mass-produced supernatural items and an Anomaly ranked 099?

Understanding flashed through Duncan’s heart. In that instant, he suddenly felt the connection through the flame reach a peak. The flow of power became as smooth as a river. Right after that, a flood of “memories” rushed into his mind!

The sound of waves… Waves crashing on a strange shore. A cold wind blowing past tall walls. Massive walls stood in the distance, dim and blurry as if frozen in ice. And people… a swaying, dark crowd where he could only see outlines…

Duncan’s view floated at some point in the air, about two or three meters above the ground. He looked around in shock, but saw only an unfamiliar city-state and a high platform on the shore. Around the platform gathered countless black shapes. They looked like a crowd of people, vague and flickering, but he could not see a single face clearly.

A loud droning hum came from every direction. It sounded like people whispering and talking, yet it was strangely loud and noisy. Duncan tried to pick out the words. In the end he found it was not people talking at all, but countless “voices of the heart”—chaotic thoughts in their minds, muttered words under tense, heavy air, prayers to a God, and pleas spoken in fear.

Those “shadows” did not open their mouths, yet their voices swept over the platform on the shore like a storm.

Duncan’s heart stirred. He suddenly turned his head.

In the pale and dim sky far away, he saw a tall shape.

A guillotine—its sharp blade gleamed with cold light in the gloom.

With the little historical knowledge in his mind, and by linking it to the origin of Anomaly 099, Duncan realized where he was.

He looked under the guillotine. As his understanding settled, a blurry figure beneath the blade quickly became clear.

He saw the Queen. The Frostholm Queen who had been executed by rebels half a century ago. Her silver hair hung like a waterfall, and her pale violet eyes still shone bright in the dimness. She wore a dress that looked a bit too thin for the cold wind, yet she gritted her teeth and did not let her body tremble at all.

She really did have the exact same face as Alice.

Something strange rose in Duncan's heart. He looked at the lady whose face was exactly the same as Alice's. Even though he knew this was the "real one" recorded in history, he still could not help but first picture the lively Doll on the ship in his mind. The next second, a voice suddenly came from nowhere and cut off his thoughts—

"Your time is up, Frostholm 'queen'."

The voice was cold and distant, yet it echoed beside the guillotine as if it had pierced the Veil of history.

In the next moment, two phantom figures suddenly appeared beside the guillotine. They walked to the Frostholm Queen, as if to push down her arms and force her to kneel under the blade. But the Queen's posture did not move at all. Her figure stood firm, while those two tall phantoms were as weak and powerless as children.

Duncan heard the noisy sound around him grow even more violent than before. Countless black shadows started to sway. Here and there, some clear shouts mixed into the chaos. That same cold and distant voice rang out again, this time with a bit of anger: "Silence! Keep order on the execution ground!"

More phantom figures appeared around the guillotine. The Frostholm Queen was finally forced down beneath that cold instrument of death. She knelt in the freezing dust, yet still raised her head and calmly fixed her gaze on the tall walls of the distant city-state. Above her neck, the heavy, sharp blade began to rise, ratcheting upward with the squeak of a winch…

Duncan frowned. Even though he knew this was only an illusion recorded by history, when he saw “Alice’s” face, he still stepped forward without thinking, reaching out his hand…

But just as he moved, the Frostholm Queen under the guillotine turned her head a little. She looked toward where Duncan was floating, looking straight at the place that should have been empty in her own time and space. She opened her mouth and spoke, clear yet soft:

“Whoever you are, please do not corrupt history.”

Duncan stopped in shock. Right after that, he was even more shocked to hear someone beside the guillotine cry out: “Who are you talking to?!”

The Frostholm Queen had already looked away. She seemed to suddenly understand something. A faint, relieved smile appeared on her once-cold face. She turned her head, as if speaking to the executioner next to her: “Do it, before the Sun sets.”

The guillotine dropped.

Boundless darkness surged in from all directions. The illusion of history tore into scattered pieces of light. Duncan felt his link with “this place” weaken fast. He knew this “echo” had reached its end. As the scene kept breaking and falling away, he still heard some broken, messy voices. They came and went, now near, now far. He could only make out a few fragments —

“…The Frostholm Queen is dead. We have cut off the channel for the Vanished to return to the Mortal Realm…”

“…Ray Nora tried to build a second Vanished… She colluded with the Shadows of Subspace. The evidence is ironclad. Death is too light a sentence for her…”

“…The new Governor will soon restore order. All documents related to the Abyss Exploration Project will be destroyed… Those who report others actively still have a chance at mercy…”

“Pursue the rebel ship the Sea Mist and the mutinous navy with all our strength… their lives or deaths do not matter… Wait, what is that sound… Get out, this place is going to collapse!”

Cries of shock, shouts, the huge cracking roar of massive things breaking and falling, the howling rush of great waves…

Duncan tore free from the endless darkness, as if surfacing from a Deep Dive. At the very end of that darkness, what he heard was a chain of thunderous crashes, as if a whole cliff had crumbled off the coast into the sea.

He had witnessed a piece of history with his own eyes, and then heard that history fall into the void in the dark.

He had seen a phantom inside history, and that phantom had asked him not to corrupt history.

He slowly opened his eyes and saw the familiar cabin. He heard the familiar sound of waves. He also saw the familiar Doll sitting on the edge of the bed, happily playing by pulling her head off with a “pop” and then pushing it back on with another “pop”.

Duncan: “…?”

Chapter 101: The Open-Minded Alice

Duncan stared at Alice with a blank face, as if he were looking at an idiot.

The echo of history in his mind had not fully faded yet. The calm, all-seeing eyes of the Frostholm Queen from half a century ago still lingered in his thoughts. But that solemn afterimage, which should have filled him with heavy feelings, now smashed right into Alice, this idiot Doll. The clash did not only grind it to pieces, it even started to twist it into a joke under the repeated “pop-pop-pop” of her pulling off her own head.

He watched her like that for quite a while before finally losing his patience: “…What are you doing?”

“Ah! Captain!” Alice finally reacted, late as always. She hurried to hold her head with one hand and looked at Duncan. “Oh, I keep feeling like some hairs are stuck in the joint of my neck…”

Duncan’s face stayed blank: “If you yank it off a couple more times, you’ll have to give the new hair a name again.”

“I already did! If it falls out, they’ll be called the Williams family…”

Duncan used all his strength to keep his expression under control and stopped himself from throwing this Doll out of the cabin.

After a few seconds, he let out a long breath. His mood slowly calmed down.

To be fair, Alice's presence had indeed brought some much-needed cheer to the dead, gloomy atmosphere on the Vanished. But sometimes she brought too much cheer… Even Goathead often could not keep up with this Doll's pace. As for Duncan, most of the time he had no idea what kind of structure was inside this thing's skull.

It might even be solid.

Duncan's gaze slid over Alice, and he could not help recalling the "echo" he had just seen in that dark space. His expression grew serious, and the details in that echo made him frown.

He was sure that he had seen the Frostholm Queen, Ray Nora, the one who was said to have been executed by rebels half a century ago. She was the "original" mentioned in the background information of Anomaly 099, the one this Doll Alice was modeled after. He had seen the scene of her "execution", and the cause of that scene no doubt lay in the "Doll's spirit coffin" before him.

The spirit form fire had linked him to the spirit coffin.

But what was the nature of those images? Was the spirit coffin consciously showing him something? Were they passive "recordings"? Were they the memories of Anomaly 099? Were they real fragments of history, or distorted "visions" with some kind of correction mixed in?

In his mind, he saw again the calm look of that young Queen when she gazed at him, and he recalled her soft request—

"Whoever you are, please do not corrupt history."

Who was that line meant for? Was it really meant for him? Did those words truly cross time itself? Or was it only an illusion drawn by the spirit coffin, reacting to his "visit" in some way? And after the Queen said those words, a frightened voice under the guillotine had asked her who she was talking to…

Those linked reactions had all felt so real. So real they sent a chill down his spine.

As for the end of that “echo”, the voices he heard from the dark made Duncan even more uneasy.

One of the charges against the Frostholm Queen in her rebel-led trial had been “trying to bring the Vanished into the Mortal Realm” and “building a second Vanished”. There was also that “Abyss Exploration Project”, which seemed to be one of the reasons she had been abandoned by everyone… Yet he had never heard Goathead mention any of this!

Goathead often bragged to him about the “great deeds” of the Vanished—how many ships it had swallowed on some route, what kind of huge uproars it had caused in certain city-states. Even if eight out of ten things he said were not reliable, if there really had been a City Lord who “colluded” with the Vanished, Goathead would have told the story long ago. That guy would happily make up three thousand words for no reason at all, let alone for something this big!

Unless… the whole thing was fake, a charge the rebels had fabricated for the Queen.

“Captain? Captain, are you okay?”

Alice’s voice suddenly came from beside him and cut off Duncan’s wild thoughts.

Duncan let out a slow breath and forced the messy thoughts in his head back down. He glanced at Alice, wanting to find a little trace of “Frostholm Queen Ray Nora” in her. But he quickly shook his head and said: “I’m fine. I just saw a bit of the ‘record’ stored inside the spirit coffin.”

“Record?” Alice’s eyes went wide with curiosity. “What kind of record?”

“The scene of the Frostholm Queen’s beheading fifty years ago,” Duncan said calmly. “I saw her—she really looks exactly like you.”

Alice at once reached up to touch her neck. Miss Doll did not know whether she should feel nervous or feel that this was nothing special. She hesitated for quite a while before finally managing to squeeze out a line: “Could I actually be that Frostholm Queen? After I was beheaded, I didn’t die, but instead got changed by some supernatural power and became what I am now?”

Duncan thought about it for a long moment, then answered honestly: “If you didn’t talk, didn’t move, and just lay quietly in that box, I really would think so.”

Alice tried to process that, but failed to get it.

She soon tossed that little confusion aside though, and instead looked very seriously at her spirit coffin: “Then after you… burned it with that ‘fire’, did it change in any way? Did you manage to control it?”

Only then did Duncan turn his full attention back to the wooden box and carefully feel the link that still remained between him and it.

The flame had faded, but the mark it left was still there.

In his unseen senses, he could clearly “see” the mark he had left inside the spirit coffin, and he could feel the thin threads of connection between him and it. It was a bit like the link between him and the mutated Sun emblem, but it was far more complex and far more subtle.

Putting aside the huge mystery of the information stored inside the spirit coffin, he had indeed managed to establish a connection with the thing. But unlike the simple structure of the Sun emblem, he had no idea how to control the spirit coffin.

He could not even sense any “option” for control in it.

He could only be sure of one thing: the spirit coffin was now very calm, very… “tame”.

After the flame passed over it, it seemed to be completely “domesticated”, as if it had become… a part of the Vanished.

“I’m not sure. We may need more tests to know whether it’s truly safe, and even more tests to figure out whether the ‘beheading’ effect comes from the spirit coffin or from you,” Duncan said with a shake of his head. “But from what I can feel right now, it is very ‘obedient’, just like most other items on the Vanished…”

As he spoke, he turned his head to look at the Doll beside him.

“The key now is you—do you feel any Anomaly?”

Alice pointed at herself in surprise: “Me? I don’t. Why are you asking?”

“You and your box are one whole. Together, the two of you make ‘Anomaly 099’. Now that I’ve used the flame to seize the spirit coffin’s authority, you as the Doll might be affected,” Duncan said, looking at Alice very seriously. He knew this Doll was slow to react, so he had gotten used to spelling things out for her. “Move around a bit. If anything feels wrong, tell me.”

Only then did Alice finally react. She quickly jumped up to check herself. She ran around the room twice, then hopped in place a few times. At last she returned to the box and crooked her finger at it.

The box did not move at all.

“It… it, it won’t listen anymore!” Alice cried out, finally noticing something big was wrong. “Before, all I had to do was give an order and it would float right up!”

Something stirred in Duncan’s heart. When Alice had crooked her finger at the box, he had indeed felt a tiny response from the spirit coffin. But…

The spirit coffin was waiting for his command.

His eyebrow twitched, and he suddenly felt a bit awkward: “Maybe… after coming into contact with the spirit form fire, the spirit coffin now sees me as a higher-level ‘master’.”

Alice stared at the Captain in shock. Then her expression turned pitiful and wronged in a way that could be seen with the naked eye.

“But it’s fine. I can remove my hold on it,” Duncan said at once, even more embarrassed the more aggrieved the Doll looked. He waved his hand quickly. “It will still obey your orders.”

Alice blinked, then turned and crooked her finger at the box again. This time, she finally saw the box respond to her command once more, just as it always had.

Miss Doll at once broke into a huge smile. After letting the box land back on the floor, she rushed over and hugged its lid tight: “Great! I thought you weren’t going to listen to me anymore!”

Duncan watched Miss Doll’s emotions flip so fast with a very odd look on his face. After holding it in for a while, he finally said: “Sometimes… I really envy your open-minded attitude toward life.”

When Alice heard this, she froze, then took a long time to think, and still did not get what he meant…

“Forget it. As long as you’re happy,” Duncan sighed. “Are you sure there’s nothing wrong with your body?”

“No,” Alice lowered her head to look herself over. “Nothing feels uncomfortable at all. Actually… I feel kind of better than before?”

“Better than before?”

“I can’t explain it. I just feel… my body is very light? And there’s a steady, safe feeling too?” Alice thought hard, searching for words to describe her feelings. “It’s a bit like the feeling I had when I used to lie inside the box, that kind of peace. But now I’m standing outside the box, and I still feel just as safe…”

The Doll kept talking and thinking at the same time. Before Duncan could help her analyze it, she had already waved it off in her own open-minded way: “Oh well, it doesn’t matter. It’s not a bad thing anyway!”

Chapter 102: Goathead’s Nemesis

Alice accepted the fact that her crate had been rebuilt as a part of the Vanished without any fuss, then quickly pushed everything about Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm out of her mind. Her easy-going attitude was something Duncan could never hope to match.

According to the doll herself, she was so calm because she saw all of this as something outside of her, something that did not really belong to her.

Alice sat back down on the lid of her wooden crate with a happy smile and said: “Anyway, I live on this ship now and I don’t plan to leave. It is no big deal if the crate becomes part of the Vanished. The Frostholm queen thing is even simpler – I don’t even know her. I don’t know if I am her, or what kind of person she used to be. It was all half a century ago anyway… let history stay history.”

“As long as you can take it easy.” Duncan simply looked quietly into Alice’s pale violet eyes. After a long time, he nodded slightly.

In the end, he still did not bring up the “details” in the echo, and did not mention what Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm had suddenly said to him before her execution.

After all, even if he did, this doll would not know anything… and it was good that she could stay this carefree.

Duncan let out a soft breath and said: “All right. For now we have a basic grasp and control of your spirit coffin, but we still do not know if the Decapitation effect of Anomaly 099 is under control as well. We will have to run more tests when we get the chance. I will go now."

"Take care, Captain~"

Leaving Alice's room, Duncan went back up to the deck. Full of thoughts, he walked slowly toward the captain's cabin, sorting through the problems they had run into so far.

He had set out to find out whether Anomaly 099's Decapitation power was controllable, but in the end he still had no answer. Instead, he had accidentally touched on an old case from half a century ago… the Frostholm queen who had been executed by rebels, the charge that she had colluded with the Vanished, and a mysterious plan called "Abyssal Dive". These things circled in his mind and would not fade.

Besides these, there was one more thing that bothered him.

Duncan reached into his coat and took out something.

It was a small hair clip shaped like a silver-white feather wrapped by sea waves.

No matter how he looked at it, it was not something a rough male seafarer would own.

Whenever he looked at it, he felt a distant and hazy sense of nostalgia. This hair clip seemed to have had a special meaning for the real "Captain Duncan" of the past.

Duncan was full of questions, but he knew he could not ask Goathead about this directly.

He put the hair clip away and, heavy with thoughts, returned to the captain's cabin. Goathead was still there, diligently steering the ship. To Duncan's surprise, the pigeon AI, who was supposed to wait on standby in the bedroom, was there with him.

The bird was standing proudly on one of Goathead's horns, arrogantly rubbing its beak against Goathead's forehead.

Duncan opened the door and saw this scene. He could not help asking with curiosity: "Since when did you two get so close?"

The pigeon flapped its wings and stayed silent, acting aloof. Goathead creaked as he turned his head, his obsidian eyes staring straight at Duncan, and said: "Great Captain… next time you take AI walking through the Spirit Realm, could you bring back some fries?"

Duncan froze: "…How did you also start with this 'get some fries' thing?"

Goathead's voice almost trembled: "Please, get some fries… just so your pigeon will shut up…"

Duncan stared, dumbfounded, at the bird-and-goat pair. After a moment he roughly guessed what had happened and burst out laughing: "You finally met your natural enemy, huh?"

"I changed the subject seventy-six times! Seventy-six! I used everything I ever learned, across a thousand years of history, from poetry and songs to cooking and frying, from sacrifices to the gods to breeding sows! But every answer I got was 'get some fries'!" Goathead sounded on the verge of breaking down. "How do you usually deal with this pigeon?"

"Simple. Just talk less to it. If you don't talk to it, it will quiet down on its own very soon," Duncan spread his hands. "I guess you can't do that."

Goathead thought for a moment, then sighed: "…Then you should still get some fries later."

Duncan did not answer. He just beckoned to AI, and the pigeon flapped over at once to land on his shoulder. Only then did he sit in his chair and, as if casually, turn to Goathead and say: “The ruler of the city-state of Frostholm half a century ago, Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm – do you know anything about her?”

“The Frostholm queen? The one the rebels executed half a century ago?” Goathead paused in surprise. “I did hear about that. I remember we even fought a battle near there decades ago… but apart from that we did not have much contact. Why do you bring this up all of a sudden?”

Duncan looked calmly into Goathead’s eyes. He knew this “First Mate” was not lying.

Goathead truly did not know much about that Frostholm queen. The Vanished had never had any contact with that city-state.

Not only that, back then the Vanished had even clashed with that city’s guard forces – just like it had clashed with ships from other city-states and other routes.

Since, in Goathead’s memory, the Vanished had never been an ally of Frostholm, it meant the charge the rebels had put on the Frostholm queen fifty years ago was completely made up.

Of course, it might still be too early to draw that conclusion. After all, it was an old case from half a century ago, and there might be many twists buried in history. He also only had Goathead’s side of the story. This First Mate might be speaking honestly, but what he knew might not be the whole truth – yet none of that really mattered.

Duncan had no intention of overturning the Frostholm queen’s case from fifty years ago. He only wanted to know what was connected to the Vanished and to Alice.

“Did you know? Alice looks exactly like the Frostholm queen from fifty years ago. The so-called Anomaly 099 is very likely something born when the executed Frostholm queen was cursed by the Boundless Sea,” he said, idly playing with the pigeon on his shoulder. “And the main ‘crime’ that queen was executed for by the rebels back then was ‘colluding with the Vanished’.”

Goathead froze.

Duncan rarely saw this fellow stunned.

“Colluding with the Vanished?! Are the foolish humans in those city-states so bad at even betraying their own sovereign that they have to make up such a laughable excuse?” After several seconds, Goathead finally burst into loud laughter. He clearly found it absurd. “Do not blame me for laughing so loudly. Those humans are too stupid and weak. They would probably even blame the Vanished’s curse if they tripped and fell at their own door! This ‘crime’ is far too ridiculous.”

He paused, then went on: “But you said Miss Alice looks a lot like that Frostholm queen? That really is… unbelievable. If Miss Alice really did come from a transformation of that Frostholm queen… then this whole thing is full of irony.”

“Yes. If there really is a link between them, it is full of irony.” Duncan leaned back, settling into a comfortable position. “The Frostholm queen never had any contact with the Vanished while she was alive, yet the rebels forced a crime of colluding with the Vanished onto her. And now, half a century later, Alice really has become a crew member of the Vanished. The charge those rebels once forced on her turned real across time.”

“No wonder you rushed off to see Miss Alice as soon as you came back. So you found key information about Anomaly 099,” Goathead at once began to flatter him. “You truly are the great Captain Duncan. Every one of your trips brings back a harvest! That reminds me of something a mariner once said, or maybe it was a…”

Duncan immediately glared at Goathead, then casually lifted the pigeon from his shoulder and set it down in front of him: “You two can talk.”

Goathead: “…!?”

…

In the city-state of Pland, inside the central Cathedral, Vanna handed a freshly signed document to her attendant and said: “Send this document to the western Cathedral – this is the last search warrant.”

The young Guardian Warrior took the document: “Yes, Inquisitor.”

Vanna let out a small breath and worked her neck, which had gone stiff from paperwork. She felt that dealing with pens was even more tiring than swinging her greatsword against heretics.

On the edge of the desk, an oil lamp burned quietly, and thin smoke rose from a brass censer. These two things were necessary protections when handling paperwork at night – even in the holy Cathedral, proper warding was still needed.

“I hope there won’t be any more trouble tonight.”

The young Inquisitor muttered this while stretching.

Almost as if to answer her words, just as Vanna finished speaking, a slightly hurried and sharp bell suddenly rang from the main building of the Cathedral.

The Guardian Warrior, who had just picked up the document and had not yet left, stopped at once when he heard it. He looked out the window in confusion, then at his superior whose stretch was only halfway done: “The night signal bell is ringing… what’s happened?”

“It’s the bell that gathers the Listening Rite.” Vanna quickly picked out the message in the sound, and her face grew serious at once. “Seven short rings in a row, from the Nameless King’s tomb… have they found a new Anomaly or new manifestations?”

Chapter 103: The Nameless King’s Tomb

The night signal bell rang three times, and before the third ring ended, Vanna had already reached the great hall.

Old Bishop Valentine was already waiting there. The respected elder wore a black priest’s robe and stood in silence before the holy statue of the storm Goddess Gamona with his eyes closed in prayer. When he heard someone step into the hall, he knew without turning that it was Vanna.

“Inquisitor Vanna,” Valentine said in a deep voice, “the Grand Cathedral of Storms has sent an order to gather Listeners.”

“Directly from the Grand Cathedral of Storms?!” Vanna was startled. She quickly stepped to the front of the statue, letting her whole body fall into the glow of the lamps. “So it isn’t just that they found a new Anomaly or new manifestations?”

“If it were only a new Anomaly or new manifestations, the signal bell would not ring three times in a row.” Valentine shook his head. “The news came straight from the Gravekeeper at the ‘tomb’. They say the body of the Nameless King is stirring. We still do not know what message He is trying to send, but it seems… the existing list is changing.”

As he spoke, the old Bishop turned his head and quietly met Vanna’s eyes.

“This time we need to send a Listener into the tomb itself to hear the information straight from the body of the Nameless King. Right now the Deep Sea Church is on duty at the tomb, and the Listener will be chosen from the followers of the storm Goddess. The specific person has not been decided yet. You and I are both on the list of candidates."

Vanna steadied herself and asked calmly: "When do we leave?"

"Now." Valentine nodded and motioned for Vanna to follow. He walked toward the back of the Goddess's statue, where a door covered in sacred symbols already stood open, showing a deep, long passage beyond. "The psychic channel is ready."

Vanna bowed to Gamona's statue, then turned and followed the old Bishop.

They passed through the door and then along the long passage. In the flickering lamplight, the two devout believers reached the deepest part of the ancient Cathedral – a special secret room at the end of the corridor.

It was a small room. Unlike the Cathedral's main concrete and brick structure, this little chamber was built entirely of stone. Gray, uneven stones were packed tightly together to form the walls and ceiling. In the center of the room, the floor dipped into a fire pit. Flames crackled there, burning fiercely in the stone hollow – yet there was no fuel at the base of the fire, as if the flames had condensed from the air itself.

Aside from the flames in the center, the chamber held no furniture or decorations. Only a faint sound of running water came from nowhere, echoing from all directions. Every wall looked wet, and even the floor seemed to have tiny streams flowing over it at any time. It gave the feeling that this stone room was not a part of the Cathedral at all, but… a flooded cave on the seabed.

This was not Vanna's first time in this chamber. As an Inquisitor, whose rank in the city-state was equal to that of a Bishop, she also had the right to use this psychic channel. This unremarkable room was the “port” that built the Channel.

Every city-state’s central Cathedral had similar facilities, and every Church had its own version of the same art. The priests of the storm Goddess used such “flooded caves”. The priests of the Death God built their connecting paths in “pale chambers”. These gloomy places actually had a wondrous purpose: they could peel a user’s spirit from the body and send it into a vast psychic space shared by all, no matter how far apart the city-states were or how wild the storms on the Boundless Sea became.

These sacred miracles were made possible by the divine blessing of the gods. They let distant branches of the Church on the Boundless Sea communicate in time. In older ages, when ocean-going ships were not as reliable as they are now, this was even the only way many city-states could keep in touch and confirm each other’s survival.

The chamber door slowly closed. The big dark metal door gave a dull thud, and the complex runes carved across its surface began to move quickly, tangling and locking together like living things, sealing the room completely.

Vanna and Valentine stood together by the fire pit at the center of the chamber. They lowered their heads, gazing at the leaping holy flames, and quietly recited the holy name of the storm Goddess Gamona.

The faint sound of water kept coming from all around them, and as they recited the name it grew louder. In the end the sound turned into waves, even roaring. A damp breath filled the whole room. In the growing humidity, Vanna saw the trickling streams on the floor suddenly turn into rolling waves that began to rise very fast.

She kept her eyes on the flames in the center of the room. The fire burned as steadily as ever, blazing within the rising waves.

Vanna closed her eyes and calmly let the phantom seawater drown her completely.

The cold touch faded quickly. When she opened her eyes again, she no longer stood in a flooded stone chamber. Instead she was in a vast, hazy space. It seemed to be a plaza, almost without end, old and grand. Many huge pillars stood at the edge of her sight. The tops of those pillars were all broken, as if shattered and scattered into the distant sky. A dim flow of light hung over the plaza, and something seemed to hide deep within that light, but it was not something mortal eyes could pierce.

Vanna steadied herself. She saw that many figures were already standing on the plaza – black silhouettes that only had outlines. She could not see their faces, but from the familiar auras each one gave off she knew they were all devout Saints of the storm Goddess. They came from many city-states, from the moving Cathedrals, and even from the Grand Cathedral of Storms.

Only Saints could be candidates to become Listeners – for some “voices”, only powerful Saints could complete the Listening rite and stay conscious.

“Looks like we are among the last ones.” A shadow drifted closer. Because they knew each other well, Vanna recognized him as Bishop Valentine even before he spoke. The old man’s tone sounded a bit embarrassed. “I was also the last to arrive at the last meeting…”

“Do the Saints from other city-states live in their secret rooms or something…” Vanna muttered. “Every time a summons goes out, half of them gather in less than ten minutes…”

“Ever since Saint Folsom wrote ‘first’ on the attendance book in the plaza twenty years ago, they have been competing to arrive early,” Valentine shook his head and said. “Honestly, I do not understand it. The Goddess will not give them extra favor for that.”

Vanna did not comment. Just then, a sudden rumbling sounded from the far end of the crowd, cutting off her thoughts and all the talk between the Saints' shadows.

Vanna and Valentine both looked up at the same time and saw the ground at the center of the plaza rising. The cracked old stone tiles rippled like water. In the overlapping waves, something huge was rising quickly. First came a pale spire, then slanted stone walls and old pillars.

In almost a moment, the thing came fully into Vanna's view – a huge building made of pale giant stones.

It was a gloomy "palace", an ancient building raised in a long-lost age. A pyramid formed its main body, with several obelisks and towers around it. No city-state in the world used such a style, and its heavy, suffocating air felt nothing like a place meant for the living.

Rather than a palace, it was more like a giant tomb.

In fact, that was exactly what it was – a tomb belonging to some ancient, mighty being.

Like everyone else, Vanna's gaze was drawn to the base of the great pyramid. Under countless watching eyes, the tomb's gate finally opened.

The heavy pale stone doors slid aside, and a very tall figure slowly walked out of the tomb.

It was the Gravekeeper of the Nameless King's tomb.

In Vanna's eyes, it was hard to say whether "he" was still a living human.

His body was wrapped in layer after layer of shroud. One half of his body and shroud were burned almost pitch black, while the other half was bound in heavy rune chains. Some of those grim chains even stretched straight out of his flesh, their tips wrapped around pulsing blood vessels and nerves.

This ancient Gravekeeper looked like a terrible creature made of mortal flesh, iron fetters, and a deathly curse. He stepped out of the Nameless King’s tomb and walked with heavy steps toward the shadows gathered on the plaza.

Even though this was not her first time seeing the Gravekeeper, Vanna still drew a breath without thinking, feeling her muscles tense.

Then she saw the Gravekeeper walk straight toward her.

The choice had been made.

The Gravekeeper passed every person on the plaza without hesitation until he stopped in front of Vanna. Only one eye was exposed on his head, the rest wrapped in shroud and chains. That single eye looked calmly at Vanna – though she was already quite tall, the Gravekeeper still stood a whole head above her.

“You may enter the tomb.” The Gravekeeper spoke, his voice hoarse, as if from a corpse. Then he raised his right hand, which looked as if it had been burned by fire. In it he held a quill and a roll of parchment.

“Write down what you hear.” The Gravekeeper gave his brief order.

Chapter 104: The Note

Looking at the quill and parchment sheet the Gravekeeper handed to her, Vanna took a quiet breath and forced her emotions to calm at once.

“How long can I stay inside?” She raised her head and fixed her gaze on the nameless Gravekeeper.

The Gravekeeper lowered his head a little. This being, who carried both the aspect of life and of death, seemed to weigh the strength of the soul before him, then gave a cold answer: “An instant, or eternity.”

This answer meant the message about to come from the burial chamber would be brief and singular, but it might point toward a very, very dangerous “source”, and the Listener might die because of it.

Vanna nodded lightly and withdrew her gaze from the Gravekeeper.

She stepped toward the great tomb not far away. The Gravekeeper followed behind her, dragging his decayed, dark chains across the ground with a sharp, grating noise. The shadowy figures gathered on the plaza only watched in silence, seeing off a chosen Saint as she went toward the mausoleum.

At the mausoleum’s gate, Vanna stopped. She looked up at the towering pale stone door. The ancient, desolate air it gave off stirred her heart a little.

This was not the first time she had seen this tomb in the psychic conclave, but it was the first time she had been chosen to enter it as a Listener.

Vision 004, the “Nameless King Mausoleum” — this ancient burial place, lodged in some strange rift of time and space, was not a Vision controlled by the Deep Sea Church. It was an ancient relic guarded in turns and shared by all the orthodox Churches. From the outside, it was a mausoleum in the heavy style of the ancient kingdom of Critt, and all the evidence that existed showed that this tomb really was a legacy left by that old kingdom. Yet no one knew who had built it, and no one knew why this ancient mausoleum had become a “Vision”.

People only knew that the Master inside this tomb would, from time to time, send messages to the outside world. The corruption carried in those messages was, in most cases, enough to kill a mortal. Yet on the other hand, the messages were reliable and precise enough to reveal the “true information” about certain powerful Anomalies and Visions directly.

Whenever the Master of the tomb sent a message out, a “Gravekeeper” would come forth from the burial chamber and choose a Listener to enter the mausoleum. The Gravekeeper himself was part of Vision 004. He had no name or surname, was loyal to his post, and kept its secrets. He would first choose from the souls gathered near the plaza, and if there were none, he would randomly take a chosen one from anywhere in the world.

In the age before people had summed up the patterns of Vision 004, such “random choosing” had taken hundreds, even thousands of lives — until, thousands of years ago, the birth of a natural-born Saint broke this terrible cycle for the first time.

That Saint came back alive from the Nameless King Mausoleum and made public the first gift from the “Nameless King”: the first list of Anomalies and Visions.

Everyone knew that the classification system and list of Anomalies and Visions were a gift left to later generations by the ancient kingdom of Critt.

Very few, however, knew how that gift had truly entered the world. The ancient kingdom had left behind Vision 004, and only after thousands of failed selections did Vision 004 finally manage to reveal the first version of the register.

Only after that did the major Churches slowly learn how to use the psychic conclave to approach the tomb on purpose and send Saints as “Listeners”, so that this ancient Vision could be used by people in a relatively safe way.

“Enter the mausoleum and prepare the Listening Rite.” The Gravekeeper’s low, hoarse voice came from behind her, and Vanna stepped forward.

The sound of the stone door closing slowly came from behind her, and the Gravekeeper’s presence faded from the air at the same time. That ancient Warden once more became part of the mausoleum. Now he watched every move of the soul that had entered the tomb through invisible senses.

Pale flames flared up along both sides of the corridor leading to the chamber. Vanna followed the path lit by the fire deeper into the tomb. Her gaze swept over the walls on both sides. On the walls built of massive stones, she could just make out “markings” that looked as if they had been scraped out by fingernails.

“Walk straight ahead. Do not look back.”

“Do not ask the Gravekeeper about the Master of the chamber, or about his name.”

“Do not run, do not shout, and do not pray to any deity.”

“Keep humility and awe, but do not kneel.”

“After you enter the chamber, do not speak.”

These were the records left over countless years by countless “Listeners”. In ancient times, most Listeners died in this passageway. Among them, perhaps one in a hundred, or even one in a thousand, had enough strength to leave these warnings for those who came after, in the last moments before their death.

These precious “reminders” had long since been written into the manuals each Church used to train Saints. Vanna knew them by heart and did not dare forget a single word.

But at that moment Vanna suddenly felt a bit curious. She had heard that there were reminders left by her predecessors in this passage, but she had not expected to find only these reminders. What about the hysterical ones, the ones who went mad, the ones who lost hope at the end and begged in despair, or raged and destroyed things? Had they not left any traces in this passage?

Human nature was complex. Before the Churches managed to gain control over Vision 004, the Gravekeeper had brought hundreds and thousands of people in here. Among them there must have been those whose minds broke, those who blamed heaven and earth, and surely there had been people who carved mad ravings on the walls of the passage, even curses spat at the curse itself… Yet all the way here, Vanna had seen only the encouragements and admonitions left by her predecessors, as if…

As if only steadfast and noble souls were allowed to leave marks here.

Vanna felt a bit confused, but in the end she did not call out to the Gravekeeper to ask her questions.

In theory, she could speak to the Gravekeeper while still in the passage. That did not go against the tomb’s “rules”, and there were indeed records of the Gravekeeper answering Visitors and even taking the initiative to explain things. But this was Vanna’s first time entering as a Listener. She was very cautious and dared not do anything extra.

With her nerves stretched tight like this, the young Inquisitor finally reached the end of the passage. In the wavering light ahead, she could already see the “Nameless King Chamber” at the very deepest point.

She stepped through the stone door at the corridor’s end.

A wide, ancient burial chamber appeared before her eyes.

Inside the great pyramid-shaped room, the four slanting pale stone walls were covered with blurred markings. Two rows of dark metal braziers stood on either side of the entrance. Pale flames burned in them, sending up hazy smoke. In the center of the chamber there was no coffin or anything like it — only a stone chair. On that chair sat the Master of the mausoleum.

It was a headless body that seemed to belong to a tall man. His limbs were held fast by chains. His arms and chest were covered in thick black hair like an animal’s. His feet were twisted and deformed, like warped animal limbs, and at the same time looked as if they had been burned by fierce flames, blackened and rotten.

This body simply sat still on the throne, as if it had no reaction at all to Vanna’s visit.

But Vanna remembered clearly what she had been taught. The moment she saw the “Nameless King”, she took out the parchment sheet and the quill. She gathered her mind to face the coming mental corruption and got ready to write down what she heard…

Vanna opened her eyes.

She saw that she was lying flat on the ground of the gathering plaza. The distant, towering broken pillars linked the chaotic sky with the shattered earth. Farther away, clusters of shadowy figures were gathered.

Several shadows were walking toward her. One of them seemed to be Valentine, the Bishop.

“You are awake. Leave.”

The Gravekeeper’s hoarse, low voice suddenly came from beside her. Startled, Vanna raised her head with difficulty and saw that she was lying right at the entrance of Vision 004. Out of the corner of her eye she saw the tall Gravekeeper turning to step through the stone door of the mausoleum. Then there was a loud rumble. The huge tomb sank quickly down beside her and vanished into the plaza’s floor.

Before Vanna could react to what had happened, several shadows had already reached her side. One of them spoke in Valentine the Bishop’s voice: “Vanna, are you all right? I saw you walk out of the mausoleum and collapse right at the door…”

“I…” Vanna slowly pushed herself up. She felt as if all her strength had been drained away, but now it was slowly returning, and that let her head clear bit by bit. “How long was I inside?”

“An instant,” another Saint’s shadow beside her said in a deep voice. “You went through the door, it closed once, and then you walked back out again.”

Vanna froze for a moment. Then she heard Valentine the Bishop speak again: “What about the parchment sheet? Look at what you wrote.”

“Oh, right, the parchment sheet!” Vanna finally came fully to herself and at once felt that she was indeed holding something. She quickly lifted her hand — and in the next second, her gaze froze.

The parchment sheet that had been whole in her hand was now, for some reason, only a tiny torn scrap. On the little piece a few centimeters long, there were only a few scrawled numbers and letters:

“Anomaly 099 – Doll.”

Chapter 105: After the Gathering

Anomaly 099 – Doll.

That was all that remained on the parchment sheet. It was the only piece of information Vanna had brought back from the Nameless King Mausoleum.

The moment she saw those scrawled letters, Vanna's face went blank. She could feel that Valentine the Bishop and the other figures beside her were just as stunned. After a brief silence, one of the Saints' shadows suddenly spoke in a low voice: "An existing Anomaly has been changed out of nowhere… and it happened outside the civilized world's sight."

"It has fallen into the hands of the Vanished," another Saint said with a nod. "Maybe that ghost captain did something…"

"But what kind of change could give this result?" The Saint who had spoken first sounded deeply worried. "Doll: spirit coffin and Doll differ by more than just a few letters… and this change stirred the Nameless King Mausoleum directly, even making the Gravekeeper suddenly call a Listener into the chamber to deliver this piece of information…"

The Saints discussed in low, grave voices, and in the end their gazes all fell back on Vanna. By then Vanna had mostly recovered. With Valentine the Bishop's help she stood up, looked at the scrap of paper in her hand, and said: "…I don't remember anything that happened in the chamber. I only remember walking in the passage."

"Forgetting what happened inside the chamber is normal. Your mind is protecting itself. That is why we need the parchment sheet and the quill the Gravekeeper provides, to record the useful information," Valentine the Bishop said slowly. "But your parchment sheet has only these few words left. That is… not quite right."

Vanna stared blankly at her own hands. After a long time, she muttered hesitantly: "Did I tear the parchment sheet myself…"

"In theory, it could only be you," Valentine the Bishop said as he looked at her. "There is no one else inside the mausoleum. The Gravekeeper never interferes with the exchange between a Listener and the Master of the chamber, and the Master does nothing beyond delivering the message."

Confusion swelled in Vanna's heart. Before she could speak again, a deep, solemn female voice suddenly came from the edge of the plaza and cut off the Saints' discussion: "The time for this gathering to end is almost here."

The Saints all straightened at once and turned toward the source of the voice. Vanna quickly composed herself and looked to the figure at the far end of the plaza — a woman in what seemed to be splendid robes stood there in silence, casting her gaze over each of the gathered Saints.

There were no attendants at the woman's side. She stood there alone, yet her presence and authority were more than enough. Like the other "souls", she appeared as a black silhouette, but her shadow was clearer and more solid than anyone else's, so solid that one could faintly see the outline of her features and see that she was a dignified, noble-looking woman.

Filled with awe, Vanna bowed her head slightly to that figure.

That was the leader of the Deep Sea Church, the vicar of the Storm Goddess Gamona in the mortal world, the Pope who sat in the Storm Cathedral. This supernatural, blessed by the deity, was so powerful that even her soul had changed in nature. Even in this field of the psychic conclave, she could faintly show the full outline of a "human" form.

Even the Saints, whose power far surpassed that of ordinary supernaturals, could only barely keep a human outline in this gathering place.

Vanna felt the Pope's gaze fall on her.

"You have already done very well, Saint Vanna," the Pope said with a small nod. Her voice was solemn yet gentle, soothing Vanna's faint disappointment. "How much information a Listener can bring out of the chamber has never been something we can control, and many times the information does not only exist on the parchment sheet."

"You mean…" Vanna looked up in curiosity and asked, mustering her courage.

"The less content remains on the parchment sheet, the more dangerous the information the Master of the chamber has given. It was your Spiritual Insight warning you, driving you to destroy the words you wrote in the chamber, so that that dangerous Truth would not be revealed to the world. This single piece of information is enough. It is enough for the Storm Cathedral to use as a reference to chart the coming course and to offer specific prayers to our Lord for guidance."

Vanna listened carefully to the Pope's words, and her mood slowly settled.

She knew this was not a casual comfort. Her Eminence the Pope would not do anything so meaningless. Since Her Eminence had said this, it meant that this matter had, to some extent, already gained the Goddess's approval.

She had already brought out information of enough value from the Nameless King Mausoleum.

"Disperse for now," the graceful Lady said softly. "This gathering is at an end. The Storm Cathedral will carefully evaluate the signal Vision 004 has given this time. If necessary, I shall issue further decrees or summon the Saints again."

Vanna quickly steadied herself. She bowed toward the Pope in salute, and then her figure slowly faded in this vast, chaotic space. The shadows of the other Saints disappeared from the plaza one after another. In the blink of an eye, the place was silent again.

In the great gathering ground, only the old cracked stone slabs, the pillars that held up the chaotic sky, and the spirit projection of the Storm Pope Helena remained.

This Pope, favored by Gamona, did not leave. After dissolving the gathering, she still stood quietly on the plaza, unmoving, staring at the empty space in the center.

After who knew how long, Helena suddenly turned her head and looked to a spot not far from her side. The air there rippled like water, and in an instant a tall, thin figure appeared in her sight.

The tall, thin figure seemed to be wearing robes. Like Helena, his features could also be faintly made out — he was an elderly man with a stern expression.

Then another figure appeared beside the tall, stern old man. This one was a short, plump elder, his face also faintly visible and wearing a kind smile.

“Banster.” Helena first nodded to the tall, stern old man, then looked toward the short, kindly smiling elder. “Rune — what is this? Are you both very free? Does the Church of Death and the Truth Academy not need to patrol the border?”

“The border has been stable lately. Reliable monitors are in place,” said the tall, thin elder called Banster, in brief words.

“We have temporarily handed the patrol duties at the border to reliable people,” the short, plump elder named Rune said with a nod. “This time we mostly came to see how things are on your side… It looks like the civilized world is not very peaceful."

"The last time the mausoleum had a similar situation was also during the period when the Deep Sea Church was on watch," Banster said, his face blank. "About a hundred years ago, I think?"

"You know perfectly well," Helena said calmly. "Of course it was a hundred years ago. That time I went into the mausoleum myself as the Listener. Back then I was not yet the head of the Storm Cathedral. I remember it clearly."

"Yes, last time it was you who went in. I remember it very well too," Rune said, stroking his beard with some emotion. "You were also thrown out by the mausoleum right after you went in and stayed dizzy for a long time before you woke up. And just like that little young lady today, the parchment sheet you took into the chamber ended up as only a small slip, with only a few scrawled letters on it. Helena, do you still remember what message you brought out of the chamber a century ago?"

The head of the Storm Cathedral was silent for a moment before she said softly: "I remember it clearly — 'Vision 005 – the Vanished'."

Rune nodded lightly. "Yes. You were the first to bring back the news that the Vanished had become a Vision… And the few letters you brought back then were confirmed in less than a month. The phantom of the Vanished roared past the edge of the Church of Death's great cemetery, and this unlucky fellow Banster here watched his brand-new escort ship get swallowed whole before he could even cut the ribbon. Only the ribbon rope was left…"

Banster, Pope of the Church of Death, gave Rune a blank look.

Helena seemed not to hear Rune's last few words. She only stayed silent in thought, and after a long time she slowly said: "Whether it is 'Doll' or 'Doll: spirit coffin', it is only an Anomaly ranked near the nineties. It cannot be compared to a Vision ranked fifth."

"There is no comparison, but you also know that the key is not the information left on the slip," Rune said, his expression finally turning serious. "It is the part that could not be left. It is the Truth that can push even a Saint's mind to the edge of collapse, so that, driven by instinct, they must destroy it and bury it in the chamber. The fact that Anomaly 099's name has changed from 'Doll: spirit coffin' to 'Doll' alone is nothing. It is the information related to it, but now hidden, that is deadly…"

"At present, the only direction for our guesses is that this is connected to that ghost ship," Helena said. "But a few days ago, when I sought enlightenment from the Lord…"

She stopped suddenly there, then shook her head, as if she did not intend to continue that topic.

"Why did Frem not come?" she asked, looking at the two figures before her. "Does he not always enjoy a spectacle too?"

"Frem and his Flamebearer Church are busy with something very important," the short, plump Rune said with a smile. "The leaders of the four orthodox Churches cannot all crowd over here just to watch the fun…"

"Something very important?" Helena frowned. "What is he doing?"

"Patrolling the border," Banster said, brief as ever.

Helena: "…"

Chapter 106: Duncan’s Gift

The phantom seawater faded as fast as a dream at dawn. Vanna’s mind returned to her body. After one deep breath, she snapped her eyes open and saw that she still stood in the rocky chamber that felt like an underwater cave. A blaze burned fiercely before her.

She looked to the side and saw Bishop Valentine also opening his eyes.

The memories of the psychic conclave were still clear in her mind. Vanna looked down at her palm without thinking. Of course, her hand was empty. The parchment sheet that had only existed in the hall of the gathering had not come back with her to the Mortal Realm.

“We only just sent out a notice, telling the Deep-Sea Captains about the Doll spirit coffin’s runaway state,” Bishop Valentine sighed. “Now it seems we have to issue a new notice again.”

Vanna flexed her wrist and looked at the bishop, deep in thought: “The problem is… how do we write that notice? Other than the fact that Anomaly 099’s name changed, we don’t know anything.”

The old bishop did not speak for a moment. Clearly, he also felt this was a tricky problem.

Vanna had brought back news from Vision 004. Yet that message was only the new name of Anomaly 099. She had probably heard more detailed information from the Master of that tomb, maybe even heard about the new traits Anomaly 099 gained after it was renamed “Doll”. But that part of the content had clearly been left forever in the main burial chamber along with the shredded parchment sheet.

“At this stage, we can only first announce that Anomaly 099 has been renamed from ‘Doll spirit coffin’ to ‘Doll’, and at the same time correct every description of Anomaly 099’s traits to ‘possible mutation’,” Valentine finally said after a long silence. “It is an Anomaly within the first hundred numbers. A change in its name will definitely come with a chain of effects. Its power, trigger conditions, sealing conditions, and even its outward signs are all very likely to have changed as well. If we keep dealing with it according to the old data, something big will probably happen…”

Vanna nodded in silence.

Anomaly 099’s number had not changed. Its absolute danger and strangeness probably had not changed much either. But for humans, it had already turned from a known Anomaly into an unknown Anomaly. The experience piled up with countless lives had turned to nothing, and “the unknown” had become its greatest danger now.

After the last notice went out, the captains on the Boundless Sea might still have tried, when they met Anomaly 099, to re-contain and seal the Doll spirit coffin using the experience in the old files. But starting today… when anyone ran into “Doll”, their only choice would be to get away at once and hope the Guardians of the four Orthodox Churches could seal it again.

The chamber fell silent for a while. Vanna and Valentine both thought about their own concerns. The mood lasted for who knew how long before Vanna suddenly broke the silence: “…All the numbers for the Anomalies and Visions in the world come from Vision 004, right?”

“Of course,” Valentine nodded. “Why did you suddenly ask that?”

“I’m thinking… who exactly are the nameless corpses in that tomb, and that Gravekeeper who is always so silent,” Vanna said thoughtfully. “They obviously are not humans, and they’re not beings of the Mortal Realm either. They’re not a God, and they’re not the Shadows of the Elder Gods in Subspace… Why would a Vision that can interact with the outside world choose this way to ‘help’ people? And how does the Master of the tomb decide the list of Anomalies and Visions?”

Valentine looked into Vanna’s eyes and waited until she finished asking all her questions. Then he sighed: “This was your first time entering the tomb as a Listener. Most people come out of there with just as many questions as you. But sadly, after so many years, even though we know more and more about Anomalies and Visions, we still cannot touch the true nature of Vision 004. That tomb… never explains anything about itself.”

“I remember you also entered that tomb once,” Vanna turned her head and looked at the old bishop with curiosity. “What information did you bring out back then? Was it also about Anomalies or Visions?”

“Not exactly,” Valentine shook his head. “Most of the time, the tomb does announce things related to Anomalies or Visions. But the Master of the tomb also sometimes passes out other things. Sometimes they’re even very… strange or useless pieces of information. When the Gravekeeper summons you, no one can be sure what the Master of the tomb wants to send out. The only thing we can be sure of is that any message from the tomb is true…”

Vanna still looked at the old bishop, curious: “Then what message did you bring out that time?”

The old bishop looked a bit torn. “It wasn’t very useful. Just… one sentence.”

His intent to dodge was obvious, but Vanna was stubborn and did not notice at all. “So what was it exactly?”

Valentine gave the hard-headed Inquisitor a helpless look and spread his hands: “On July twenty-fourth, the weather in Pland will be clear, with a southeast wind of force four to six.”

Vanna: “…?”

“Don’t look at me like that. Sometimes that’s the kind of information it gives,” Valentine said, rubbing his forehead. “Anomalies and Visions are unfathomable, and this ‘unfathomable’ nature shows up in all kinds of ways. I just happened to get a very special case… If you want to laugh, could you at least turn around? I’m already this old…”

“Sorry,” Vanna tried hard to keep a straight face, then turned away as she spoke. “But to be honest, I’m a little jealous. Hearing a weather report is better than going through something this bizarre and eerie today. Nothing happening is the best outcome, isn’t it?”

“…Fine, I’ll believe you,” he muttered.

…

At the edge of the Upper City, in an older stand-alone house, Heidi stared without expression at her slightly uneasy father: “So… the other day you went to visit a student’s home. You spent several hours chatting idly with the student’s parents, and only took twenty minutes to talk about the student’s situation. Then, when you left, you spent more than three thousand Sola to buy an old dagger and a fake crystal pendant made of glass?!”

Morris sat behind the table. A purple crystal pendant lay on the table, its tag already removed. The shelves behind him were full of all kinds of collectibles. He wiped sweat that wasn’t actually on his forehead, looking a bit embarrassed. “The pendant didn’t cost money. It was a free gift…”

“That makes it even worse that you treated it as my birthday present, doesn’t it?!” Heidi groaned and covered her forehead. “You could at least have pretended you picked it with care…”

Morris thought about it seriously, then spread his hands in helplessness. “There really wasn’t a second real item in that shop. There was nothing else I could choose.”

Heidi: “…”

After they glared at each other in anger for a few more seconds, she finally couldn’t hold it in and gave up first. “Forget it, forget it. It’s not the first time anyway… Why are you always the one getting taken advantage of?”

“I didn’t lose this time! The one who lost out was that Mr. Duncan,” Morris said at once. “I bought that dagger for twenty percent less than market price.”

Heidi had been shaking her head and sighing, but froze when she heard her father mention that name. “The shopkeeper of that antique shop is named Duncan?”

“Ah, yes, his name is Duncan Strenn,” Morris said casually. “There has always been a rumor that he’s a drunkard and a gambling addict, but after actually meeting him I found out that rumor really does people harm. He’s clearly a witty, humorous man with very broad knowledge… Hm? Why do you have that look? Is there something wrong with that name?”

Heidi opened her mouth and hesitated before she answered: “Sigh, I’m working on a very tricky ‘case’ right now, and it happens to be linked to that name. Hearing it just makes my nerves twitch a little.”

“It’s a very common name. There are plenty of people with it,” Morris nodded, then got a bit curious. “What kind of case is it?”

“It’s not your field, so don’t ask. It definitely can’t be the same person anyway,” Heidi waved a hand. “How could a terrifying ghost-ship captain and a shopkeeper who runs an antique shop in the Lower City be the same man?”

“Of course not,” Morris let out a breath of relief when he heard that. He knew his daughter often worked as a consultant for City Hall and even the Church on dangerous cases, sometimes even involving the supernatural, so he was naturally a bit nervous about that. Now he relaxed and let his gaze fall back on the crystal pendant on the table. “So, do you still want this pendant or not?”

“Yes! Of course I want it!” Heidi grabbed the pendant off the table. “It’s rare enough that you remember to bring me a gift at all, even if it’s a freebie.”

Morris thought for a moment and then offered a very serious suggestion: “Actually, you could pretend that I spent more than three thousand Sola on the pendant, and the dagger was the free gift.”

Heidi hung the pendant around her neck and gave Morris a look. “If you really spent over three thousand Sola to fall for that scam, I would tie you up and drag you into my treatment room myself!”

Chapter 107: Highly Contagious

Gentle waves rose and fell. The Vanished sailed smoothly across the Boundless Sea. After many days under sail, this ancient ghost ship still had not found any island or beacon that could serve as a mark of the route.

The long drifting journey seemed to have no end, but its captain still had many things to keep him busy.

Duncan returned once more to the captain’s cabin. The golden Sun mask still lay quietly on the table, but before he dealt with that, he had other matters to think about.

He could make arrangements for Alice later. The follow-up tests and research on Anomaly 099 were not urgent either. The Frostholm rebellion from half a century ago was even less something he needed to investigate right now. But aside from these matters, there was one more thing that was closely tied to himself.

Duncan raised his head and looked at the mirror hanging on the wall.

The green flames that had once floated on the mirror’s surface had long since faded. The distant scenes that had once appeared in the mirror had also vanished without a trace. Yet Duncan could still faintly feel that the weak and blurry “connection” had not disappeared with the reflection. It was still there, pointing far away toward the great Cathedral at the center of the city-state of Pland.

This connection felt a bit like the link between himself and the “antique shopkeeper” and the “White Oak”, but even weaker and more ethereal. If he had to describe it… it was like some kind of offshoot, a secondary channel branching out from a clear and solid link.

Duncan closed his eyes a little. On the table beside him, the brass spirit compass on AI's chest quietly opened a narrow gap. A dim green flame burned quietly inside it.

Duncan returned again to that dark space filled with countless starlights and streams of light.

But this time, he did not carry out a full "Spirit Realm walk". He only stayed at the Critical Threshold of entering the Spirit Realm and watched carefully as the faint lights and the scattered points of light moved through the darkness.

He first saw the brightest "star". That star pointed toward the antique shop and stood for his other body. That body was cleaning the storeroom and checking the stock at the same time.

He then saw a hazy, shapeless cloud of light, much larger than any normal star. That represented the "White Oak", a steamship that had once crashed head-on into the Vanished and been completely burned through by the fire of his spirit form.

Finally, in a patch of hazy starlight that looked almost no different from the rest, he picked out the "star" that had a faint link to himself.

Duncan leaned closer in curiosity, wanting to study this cluster of starlight.

But as soon as he drew near, he felt a subtle repelling force spread out from that starlight.

The repelling force was not very strong. It felt like a pure, firm will that was protecting itself. Duncan felt that if he forced the fire of his spirit form to spread toward it, he could probably burn away this instinctive protection. But he still stopped at once and kept a distance from that starlight.

The master behind this starlight should be that Inquisitor named “Vanna”, a Storm Saint and a powerful supernatural. If he acted too recklessly, he might startle the starlight’s master first, and in the worst case, might even alarm the “God” who stood behind that Saint.

While he still knew very little about the Gods of this world, Duncan did not plan to take that risk.

From another angle, this faint sense of rejection might also be reminding him that these stars were not all the same.

When he first took over the body of that “sacrificial victim”, he had not felt any rejection. There had been no rejection when he took over the body of the newly dead cultist Ron, either. So why did this repelling force appear around Vanna’s starlight now?

Was it because she was still “alive”? Was it because a living mind would instinctively resist indescribable corruption? Or was it because of… the protection given by faith and divine grace?

Duncan stepped back a bit. While he thought about what these stars meant, he reached slowly toward another cluster of starlight that was closest to him.

He stopped at the last moment before touching that starlight.

There was no repelling force.

Then he tried many times around him. None of those stars pushed him away when he drew near. In some of them, he even faintly felt some new… “elements”.

He felt a vivid sense of life, and even sensed those stars trembling and shrinking in instinctive fear. That was life drawing back when it faced the Shadows of an irresistible death.

Duncan returned to a part of the darkness where the starlight could not reach and looked down at his own hands.

Strands of emerald flame moved through the dark, tracing out illusions of light between his fingers.

It seemed that as he walked the Spirit Realm more and more often, his control and perception of the flames had grown sharper and more precise. Now he could actually sense the presence of life inside those stars.

Duncan frowned slightly and looked toward the far reaches of the endless darkness. The countless points of light stretched densely through the chaotic dark. The sight was almost grand.

Out of caution, he had never explored the far parts of this dark space. But just by looking at how vast the starlight was, he could imagine how many light points there really were here.

At the start, he had thought that all the stars here stood for “corpses” that had just died and met certain conditions, because the first two times he “attached” to someone, he had taken over corpses. But now he felt the presence of life in some of the stars. That meant his first guess was wrong.

Among these stars were not only the dead but also the living. He had simply happened to take over two corpses at first.

The “Inquisitor” named Vanna was also among these stars, and she was without a doubt alive.

Could it be that the countless stars here represented all the living and the dead in the whole world?

Duncan frowned in the dark. The guess rose naturally in his mind and seemed reasonable enough, but he quickly shook his head. He felt he could not jump to a conclusion so fast.

There were many stars here, and the population of this world was far smaller than Earth's. Even so, the stars he could see at a glance still did not seem enough to match the whole world's people. And it was one thing to count the living. How was anyone supposed to define the number of the dead?

Did it include every dead person since ancient times? Or only those whose bodies still remained? Did any body remnant count, or did the time since death have to be within a certain limit?

Besides, there were also clusters of light like the "White Oak" here… Even a ship could show a matching projection here. How was that supposed to be explained?

So it was still too early to rashly treat the starlight here as "all the living and the dead in the world". At the very least, he needed enough proof before he could make such a claim.

But no matter how the stars here tied back to the Mortal Realm, one thing was clear: most of the starlight did not resist Duncan when he drew near. Only Vanna, this "Saint", showed this kind of self-protective response.

That was probably the work of the God she worshiped.

Duncan felt a little curious about the power of "faith" in this world.

But no matter how strong the shield Vanna had built through faith was, it clearly had a flaw. That barrier had not stopped the captain of the Vanished and her from forming a kind of hidden link on the deep layers.

That left only one question: when and how had this link been formed?

Duncan thought hard in the darkness, thinking about what connection he could have with that Inquisitor he had never met and why such a link had appeared out of nowhere. After he ruled out one guess after another, a very bold thought suddenly rose in his mind—

Could it be that it came from the very first “sacrificial victim” he had possessed?!

Duncan recalled the first time he set foot on the land of the city-state of Pland. He thought back to that Sun sacrificial rite. He had caused chaos at the ceremony in the role of the sacrificial victim and then left the “body” he had possessed behind at the scene. Not long after that, Inquisitor Vanna had led a raid on the cultists’ stronghold, captured the cultists who had stayed at the scene, and had surely taken part in cleaning up the “remains” there.

If he had to say so, the only “intersection” between him and that Inquisitor, that young lady, could only have happened then.

All they shared was a body he had once possessed and a place where they had once both been present.

“That alone… was enough to create a link?!” The more Duncan thought about it, the more possible it seemed. He lowered his head in surprise and looked at his own hands. After a while, his shocked expression turned into a very strange, helpless smile. “What kind of space-time fellow traveler infection route is this supposed to be…”

Chapter 108: The Illusory Sun

Duncan was starting to understand why people in the world feared and hated the Vanished so much, and why they treated the captain of the Vanished like a walking plague.

Because in a way, this moving calamity really was like a plague.

In a dark, chaotic space, Duncan quietly turned his gaze on the little flames jumping between his hands, feeling the power hidden inside this fire that acted so gentle toward him.

Fire was the most special thing in this world. It was not only the bearer of light and warmth; it also protected mortal civilization so it could grow in a world full of danger. It kept the balance between the supernatural domain and the Mortal Realm, and it symbolized the Gods' divine blessing and protection over the mortal world.

In almost every field that involved the supernatural, "fire" held a special place and role.

But his fire seemed to carry some faint yet extremely dangerous… traits. Even among the supernatural, it was more terrifying than any other flame.

It held extreme corruption, extreme secrecy, and an extreme power to seize and to profane.

From what he knew for now, the spirit form fire already had the power to corrupt and twist supernatural objects. It could also be used to occupy the bodies of the dead, and it could hide inside the souls of the living. Even the Saint’s power could not fully purge it. As long as the right moment came, the fire would smolder inside the soul and build a secret path leading to the Vanished.

This was basically a plague that was almost impossible to detect or wipe out. At least for now, the so?called power of the Saint seemed to do nothing against this kind of flame.

Duncan let out a soft breath.

He still did not know what use this faint link between him and Vanna could have. But at least for now, it seemed that as long as there was a suitable “medium” and some kind of “trigger”, he could directly see and hear what was happening around that Saint. From what he had sensed earlier by the “mirror”, he should also be able to project his own power to some extent to the Saint’s surroundings—the most effective way would be to corrupt the “fire” near the Saint.

When the passage formed, he clearly sensed that there was “fire” beside Vanna, and that fire was responding to his gaze. Together with the experience he had gained while controlling the spirit form fire before, he could be sure that “fire” had to be one of the conditions for building the link.

As for what exactly counted as a suitable “medium” and “trigger”… for the first, he could at least be sure for now that “mirrors” and “fire” could act as carriers for the projection channel—in the “technical” terms of the supernatural field, they were “ritual tools”. As for the second…

Duncan recalled the words he had heard when the link had suddenly formed:

“…it might instead connect them to the Vanished…”

Right after hearing that sentence, he had sensed the passage form. So the trigger was probably hidden in those words.

“The word ‘Vanished’…”

Duncan’s understanding of the supernatural field was limited, but even with what little he knew, he understood how special “names” were in the supernatural.

The name Duncan Abnomar, and the name “the Vanished”, both carried power.

He had, for the moment, a rough answer in his heart:

When Vanna, this “carrier”, spoke the name “the Vanished” near fire and a mirror, the link between her and the Vanished would be strengthened at once. If, at that moment, Duncan then took the initiative to answer that “call” from his side, the passage would form.

As his thoughts slowly calmed down, Duncan also drew back his gaze from the distant “stars”.

He bore no grudge against the Deep Sea Church, and he had no malice at all toward that young inquisitor lady. Naturally, he did not plan to use this link to harm her. But if this connection could now and then bring him some useful information… that would not be a bad thing.

The dark, chaotic space and the scattered lights faded like flowing water. Duncan opened his eyes and saw that he had “returned” to his own cabin.

The Golden Sun Mask, made in imitation of the Sun, lay quietly at his hand. The pigeon AI was crouched on the table near the mask, dozing.

Earlier, he had sent the bird off to chat with Goathead, but for some reason Goathead had not wanted to talk and had sent the bird right back.

After a brief hesitation, Duncan reached out and picked up that Sun mask.

Although there had been a few small accidents and he had somehow run into a lot of unexpected information, things had finally gone back on track —he now had time to study this “Sun sacred relic”.

He first turned the mask over a few times, checking the details of its shape and the exact material it was made of. While he was doing that, he suddenly noticed that one corner of the mask seemed to have been chipped.

From that chipped spot, a dull, murky color faintly showed through.

Duncan frowned. The next second, the pigeon that had been napping on the table suddenly opened its eyes. It flapped its wings, hopped around, and squawked: “Iron plated with copper! Iron plated with copper!”

When Duncan heard the pigeon, the chipped part of the mask looked even more glaring to him. He quickly scratched at the damaged spot with his fingernail and studied it for a while. At last, with a blank look, he reached a conclusion—

It really was damned iron plated with copper, not even gold?plated.

Some spots on the corner of the mask had even started to turn green…

“Isn’t this just cheating people!”

The gap between what he had expected and what he had found finally made Duncan mutter out loud. He stared, very depressed, at the heavy lump of iron in his hand and thought of the “resell” plan he had had before he started studying the mask. His heart felt icy. “I was counting on squeezing a few more layers of profit out of those cultists… even a mass?produced sacred relic shouldn’t be made like this, right?!”

The pigeon AI rolled its eyes at his grumbling, flapped its wings, and squawked: “Can you even guarantee your melons are ripe?”

It took Duncan a moment to get what the pigeon meant—it was basically asking, “Are all the goods in your shop actually genuine?”

He thought about the pile of defective modern industrial products back in his shop, looked at AI with a blank face, and said: “Shut up.”

After that, he ignored the annoying bird beside him and turned his attention back to the golden mask.

Now that he had confirmed this thing really was a cheap, mass?produced item, he no longer had any worries about his “test”.

A faint green flame rose from his fingertips and flowed like water over the patterns on the surface of the Golden Sun Mask. Under Duncan’s control, it then slowly seeped into the inside of this “sacred relic”.

A mass?produced sacred relic was still a sacred relic. Even if this thing was really just iron plated with copper, the runes carved inside it and the Sun?shaped design on its surface still had to be able to produce an supernatural effect. Since that Sun priest could use it to communicate with his “deity”, it meant this Sun mask could be studied according to the usual rules for supernatural items.

Duncan actually had quite a bit of experience in the field of studying supernatural items. His main method was to set them on fire whenever things did not add up—the most recent example was burning Alice’s coffin box with the green flame. Facts had proven that this research method worked very well.

As he felt the flames gradually invade the inside of the mask, Duncan also focused his mind and began to sense what information might be hidden inside this supernatural item.

This was a mass?produced piece, and its “rank” was definitely far below Alice’s doll spirit coffin. Duncan believed he would soon figure out how this thing worked and what it could do, then corrupt it in reverse and usurp it for himself.

With that thought in mind, he probed into the truth hidden deep inside the mask—yet in the very next second, things went far beyond his expectations.

A blast like roaring thunder suddenly exploded in his mind, as if a passage had been blown open inside the depths of this seemingly ordinary mask. His spirit, which had sunk into the mask, suddenly felt a vast, scorching power spill out everywhere. Right after that, he felt as if he had “passed through” a tunnel, or pushed open a great door, and grand, magnificent visions flooded into his mind!

It might have lasted only a second, maybe even less. It was just a few flashing images—in those images, he saw a blazing fireball burning fiercely, hanging alone in the dark void of space.

The Sun—a true, burning star, pouring out a vast gravity…

In that shocking heat and rending gravity, Duncan faced the scorching of that fierce sun directly. Yet he did not turn to ash in the Sun. That star seemed to be only a phantom from ages long past. It kept the majesty and presence it had once truly possessed, but it could no longer really affect the Mortal Realm at all.

Duncan could only stare in shock, his gaze fixed on this blazing sun burning in illusion, and then watched as it slowly turned by a small angle in his sight.

On the far side of the Sun lay dim, pale flesh and countless curled, withered tendrils. Those hateful limbs, stretching for millions of kilometers, all crowded around a half?open, half?shut, gigantic eye that had been dead and decaying for who knew how many ages.

The burning corona blazed on a false shell woven and held up by that flesh and those tendrils—releasing a power that tried its best to imitate the Sun, yet was, in the end, only a replica.

A faint, drifting voice, almost like a hallucination, sounded by Duncan's ear:

"Flame Usurper… extinguish me… please…"

Chapter 109: Flame Usurper

A violent feeling of falling came out of nowhere and tore Duncan's spirit away from the blazing sun. He felt as if a powerful gravity were dragging him through a deep, long tunnel. The burning corona and the flesh that held it up rushed away from his sight. The next second, he felt a solid pressure against his back.

It was the back of his chair.

Duncan snapped his eyes open and gasped for breath. He felt his heart beating harder than it ever had. On his retinas, it was as if there was still a blinding light left behind by that burning star.

The truth of the flesh beneath that sea of fire was etched even more sharply into his mind.

After a few more seconds, these strong impressions slowly faded in his mind, and only that one vague sentence still echoed in the depths of his memory—

"Flame Usurper, extinguish me, please…"

Duncan frowned slightly. He was sure he had really heard those words.

Was that… sent to him by that "Sun"? Had that thing sensed his spying and then sent him this… signal that sounded like a plea for help?

Duncan rubbed his forehead. While he guessed at the truth behind this "help" signal, he went over the details of that blazing sun again in his mind.

There was no doubt that this was what the followers of the “ancient true Sun” worshiped—the “true Sun” they talked about.

To be honest, in that brief moment when he first saw it, Duncan had really felt a surge of emotion. The sea of fire of that blazing sun had shocked him so much that he almost thought he was truly seeing the “Sun” from his own memories and understanding, the very star he had once seen from Earth…

The more stirred up he had been then, the more stunned and lost he had felt after seeing the truth on the far side of the Sun.

The front of that Sun really was exactly the same as the “real Sun”, completely matching what the Suntists had described. But that sight was only the outer shell of the Sun. Inside it… was nothing but an unnameable mass.

Duncan recalled that pale, murky flesh and the shriveled, decaying state of the tendrils that crowded around the eye.

The “creature” wrapped inside the shell of the Sun did not seem to be in good shape.

In fact, Duncan even thought it was already “dead”—the feeling of lost life was so strong that even from far away, just peeking at it, he could feel that breath of “death” rush at him from the depths of his soul.

It was basically the burning corpse of an Elder God.

And that corpse of an Elder God was asking him for help, hoping someone would come and extinguish the flames on its body.

A corpse crying for help—this was both contradictory and horrifying, bizarre beyond reason, yet it still fit the already twisted “logic” of this world.

Duncan slowly sorted out his tangled thoughts and remembered that, during that brief glimpse, there had been another very striking detail: the way that “Sun” had addressed him—it had called him “Flame Usurper”.

Was that unnameable mass of flesh really calling out to him? Had it truly sensed the approach of this uninvited guest and spoken because of that? Was it really not just shouting blindly in a haze?

If that plea really had been meant for him, then this was a very clear form of address—Flame Usurper…

Duncan lowered his head and rubbed his fingertips together, watching a small flame burn quietly there.

The green spirit form fire waited obediently for his command, ready to corrupt other flames and seize the power of other anomalies.

A second later, Duncan dispelled the spirit form fire in his hand.

Whether that “Sun” had really been speaking to him or not, and whatever exactly “Flame Usurper” was supposed to mean, none of it was something he could deal with right now. The cultists in the city?state of Pland were still hiding in the shadows. He neither had the ability nor the standing to deal with the “Sun god” behind them.

Besides, how was he supposed to “help” that burning Sun? Use this little bit of spirit form fire of his to burn over that whole giant mass? He would burn himself out long before he finished! And anyway, just because the thing had asked him for help did not mean it was “on his side”—who knew what would happen if that Sun were extinguished? What if the flames were actually a seal, and once they went out, the unnameable thing inside the Sun would wake up and go on a rampage? Would it still remember the favor of him “putting out the fire” then?

It was never a wise idea to casually deal with something that was basically a deity.

Duncan shook his head, feeling only a bit of sighing in his heart—the so?called “Sun god” really was not the Sun he knew.

Maybe, in this world, he really would never see true sunlight again.

The Golden Sun Mask, made in the shape of the Sun, still lay quietly on the table. The shine on its surface had grown dull, as if the energy inside it had already been used up.

Duncan reached out, wanting to pick up the mask, but the moment his fingertips touched it, a faint cracking sound reached his ears.

The mask, which had been very solid iron (plated with copper), suddenly seemed as if it had gone through millions of years of weathering and decay. In the next second it turned to dust in his hand and scattered away on the air.

AI hopped over, flapping, and spread its wings in front of Duncan as it gestured: “Happy, pop, all gone!”

Duncan paid no attention to the bird begging to be smacked. A faint understanding rose in his heart—

This mask was, in the end, only a mass?produced sacred relic made as an imitation. Those Suntists seemed to be best at using all kinds of rituals to make this kind of limited?effect replica. These replicas had a bit of the power of a real item, but their lifespan was always worrying.

The function of the Sun mask was probably to act as some kind of communication channel. Lower?ranked priests used it to contact the deity they believed in, or the “spawn” under that deity. Just now, he had forced the mask to unleash all its power with the spirit form fire, letting it briefly have the effect of a genuine item and letting him glimpse the image of the Sun god through the passage—and those few seconds had directly used up the mask's entire "lifespan".

"Maybe I'll have to find a way to get a real one in the future…" Duncan said thoughtfully as he watched the ashes drifting in the air. "If it takes one of these every three seconds, they really can't stand the burning…"

He did not plan to actually "save" any Sun god, but he was still quite interested in the secrets those Suntists were hiding, and he was full of curiosity about the history before the Great Annihilation. He felt he would keep doing research in the field of the supernatural. The wool on those cultists… still had to be plucked.

But as his research went deeper, he would have to find ways to pluck some higher?quality wool.

After a short rest to recover his strength, Duncan left his cabin.

Goathead, who had been spacing out by the chart table, turned his head at the sound. He first checked to see whether the pigeon had come out with Duncan. Only when he saw that Duncan was alone did he breathe a sigh of relief. "Ah, great Captain, your loyal and—details omitted—servant has been dutifully steering in your stead. I wonder if your latest 'voyage afar' went smoothly? I sensed your soul traveling very far again, but this time it didn't seem to be a human city?state? If you plan to go that far next time, you could actually tell me beforehand…"

"How much do you know about the 'true Sun god' those Suntists believe in?" Duncan waved a hand and asked directly.

After spending some time with Goathead, he had come to understand the other's temperament more and more, and he had grown more confident in his own "captain" identity. When they talked and he asked questions now, he was no longer as cautious as at the beginning. It felt fine to casually ask some questions that were not directly related to the essence of the Vanished.

It also let him test, while he was at it, just how much this strange Goathead really knew about the supernatural.

“The true Sun god?” Goathead was taken aback for a moment, then spoke with some hesitation. “To be honest, I don’t really know. I only know that the cultists who follow the Sun god are all both mad and foolish, but I don’t know what kind of thing the deity behind them actually is… Still, the Sun god’s ‘divine blessing’ does exist. Those cultists do gain some strange powers once their faith is devout enough. That’s also why this cult could slowly grow.”

As he spoke, Goathead gradually reacted. “Ah, why did you suddenly bring this up? Don’t tell me you just…”

“I was just thinking,” Duncan said slowly, sighing, “if a so?called ‘deity’ is being roasted over a fire by its own believers, and those believers don’t know anything about it, and keep working overtime to throw more wood on the fire every day, while they mistake the ‘corpse oil’ rendered from their deity for the divine blessing that deity has granted them… then the whole thing is a bit ironic. It would be too much even as a joke told in hell.”

The enchanted sea chart room grew quiet. Goathead actually did not pick up the thread of the conversation. This made Duncan glance at him in surprise. “Why aren’t you talking? Aren’t you usually very chatty?”

Goathead spoke in a rather muffled tone. “…This topic is way too terrifying. I don’t dare say anything, and I don’t dare ask anything. I can only say, Captain, your insight is truly impressive…”

Duncan could not help but laugh.

He did not know if it was his imagination, but he was starting to feel that even this Goathead before him did not seem as sinister and dangerous as at the beginning. The atmosphere on this ship… seemed to be slowly getting better?

Chapter 110: What a Coincidence

In the city-state of Pland, inside an antique shop in the Lower City, Duncan sat behind the counter with a copy of the city-state's daily paper in his hands, looking as if he was casually reading it.

Suddenly, he blinked twice. His once-distant gaze came back into focus. He glanced at the newspaper in his hands and calmly turned it right side up.

The front-page headline carried the latest big news in the city-state: His Excellency Bishop Valentine of the Deep Sea Cathedral would soon preside over a large-scale benediction. When that happened, more than ten cathedrals across the entire city would ring their Great Bells and pull their steam whistles, calling on the power of the Storm Goddess to bring a divine blessing down upon the city.

As a prelude to this benediction, Governor Dante Wayne had offered his congratulations to the Deep Sea Cathedral last night and sent a gift…

The front page also printed a portrait of the city-state's Governor. He was a middle-aged man with a stern expression, gray hair, and a tall, thin build. The most striking thing was the scary scar across his face, and a prosthetic eye that had replaced one of his real eyes.

It was clearly the mark of some near-fatal accident.

Duncan let his gaze drift over the paper, but in his mind he saw the face of the young Inquisitor named Vanna. That Inquisitor had a scar near her eye as well. It did not affect her sight, but it was very noticeable.

He recalled the information he had gathered recently:

The Governor of this city-state, Dante Wayne, was Vanna Wayne's uncle. The scars on their faces were said to come from the same incident. Eleven years ago, there had been a factory leak and a cultist riot in the "Sixth District" near the Crossroad District. Dante Wayne and Vanna Wayne had been wounded by rioters there, leaving them both with permanent scars. That accident also pushed them to become staunch supporters of the Deep Sea Church and to take an active role in fighting cult activity in the city-state…

None of this was secret in the city-state. It could be found in official records and in street gossip. Ask around a little in the Lower City, and this was exactly what people would tell you.

Eleven years ago again. The "factory leak" in the Sixth District again…

Duncan turned the page in silence while he pieced together and sorted all the clues he had been collecting lately in his mind.

The Sun fragment. The great fire in Nina's memories. Nina's recent nightmares. The accident that had struck Inquisitor Vanna and Governor Dante back then. And that mysterious maiden Shirley, who seemed to be investigating the truth herself… All of these things circled around the "factory leak" in the Sixth District eleven years ago. Now the Suntists were stirring again in the city. Behind them, their "Sun god" was something burning, something like an Eldritch God.

That thing was still crying for help.

Duncan did not plan to deal with that Sun god yet, but he worried that this nameless fire smoldering in the dark might spread to Nina.

He had sent the pigeon out early in the morning to search the city-state for traces of cultists, and it was still wandering outside. Nina was upstairs packing her books and would soon leave for school. The street outside the shop was growing livelier. The sounds of carts and passersby drifted in through the door, bringing a sense of life and energy.

Light footsteps suddenly came from the stairs. The old wooden boards creaked softly. Nina ran into Duncan's field of view, holding her schoolbag in one hand and a piece of bread for lunch in the other: "Uncle! I'm going to school!"

"Slow down. Don't trip. It's still early," Duncan said with a helpless look at the young lady. Then he remembered something. "Right, today is the day you go to the City Museum?"

"Yes! I made plans with a classmate!" Nina turned back, her face bright with a wide smile. "I won't come home for lunch. I'll go straight to the City Museum with my classmate. You can fix something for yourself."

"Got it, got it," Duncan said with a smile, waving his hand. Then he reminded her again: "Slow down, and watch out for the traffic on the road…"

"Okay, okay, goodbye, Uncle!"

With the girl's clear shout, her light footsteps, and the jingle of the bell over the door, Nina's figure vanished from Duncan's sight.

She crossed the road in front of the antique shop and ran quickly into Pland's morning light.

Duncan watched Nina leave and remembered that earlier home visit, and what the old gentleman Morris had told him:

Nina had few friends at school. Most of her classmates did not like to talk to her much.

But even if she had few friends, it seemed there were still one or two classmates who were close to her. Someone was willing to invite her to the City Museum, and she herself looked very happy about it. That was, of course, a good sign.

He had already asked about it yesterday. The classmate going to the City Museum with Nina was a quiet girl who also lived in the Lower City. The two had only become friends recently, but they got along well.

Duncan set down the newspaper in his hands.

Nina had gone to school and would not come back in the afternoon. Today was a workday, and the antique shop probably would not have much business.

Staying here to watch the shop felt like a waste of time. Maybe he could go out into the city, and at the same time… investigate a few things.

Duncan sensed AI's current location in his mind and gave the pigeon the order to "keep patrolling". Then he put on his coat, hung the "closed for a while" sign on the door, locked up the shop, and walked to the nearby station.

There were many people at the station. This was the rush hour when people took the bus to work and school. Duncan blended into the crowd and walked to the signboard beside the stop, studying the route map on it.

His gaze fell on one of the routes. It clearly marked a place: the Sixth District.

That was where the "factory leak" in the official records had happened.

Duncan looked away and waited patiently in the crowd. Buses came and went. Several steam engine buses took away half the people on the platform. After a long time, he finally saw an old bus sway toward them from the end of the road. The number plate on its front showed it was the one he was waiting for.

Duncan squeezed onto the bus with a large crowd.

The old bus was packed. citizens hurrying to work filled every seat and every bit of standing room in the aisle. Duncan silently squeezed his way to a spot near the back door and waited patiently for the bus to start.

With the hoarse, straining growl of the steam engine, the badly overloaded bus started moving. The conductor began to struggle through the crowd of people packed like sardines, calling for people to buy tickets as he squeezed his way toward Duncan. His dark blue uniform was so crushed it was going out of shape.

“Sixth District,” Duncan said to the conductor with a friendly smile.

But the conductor, dizzy from being squeezed on all sides, froze for a moment when he heard Duncan. It was as if he had not processed it. “Huh? Where are you going?” he asked.

Duncan frowned: “The Sixth District—I saw it on the route map. Doesn’t this bus go there?”

The conductor froze again. Then he looked up at the route map posted on the side of the carriage. It was only then that he seemed to wake up and hurriedly nodded. “Oh, oh, of course it goes there. Hardly anyone goes to that place usually. I almost forgot… Four pesos.”

Hardly anyone went to the Sixth District? The accident had been eleven years ago. Had the area around that factory still not been rebuilt?

A hint of doubt rose in Duncan’s heart, but he bought the ticket without showing anything. Then he watched the conductor push back into the crush of bodies like a warrior charging through thousands of men.

After that, all he could do was quietly wait for the bus to reach his stop.

But just then, he suddenly felt a gaze from nearby.

That look was very brief, as if someone had only brushed their eyes over him by accident before turning away at once. But Duncan's sense for anomalies was sharp. He could feel that the gaze had truly been fixed on him. When it shifted away, he even faintly sensed… fear and a wish to hide. That made him follow the feeling in his heart and look in that direction.

In the next second, he saw a small figure in the crowd of passengers at the back of the bus, trying hard to shrink away.

He saw the figure, and the figure saw him. The person froze at once and stood rigid on the spot, as if she no longer even dared to try to hide.

It was a girl in a black dress, about the same age as Nina by the look of her. Around her neck was a strange collar, and a small bell hung from it…

It was Shirley.

Duncan raised his eyebrows at once. He had not expected things to turn out such a coincidence. Then he began to squeeze his way toward the girl. By now she was completely stiff, staring at Duncan as he came over, her face full of nerves and even fear. She did not just stop trying to dodge. She did not even dare to turn her head.

Duncan slowly came to a stop in front of her and greeted the girl with a smile: "We meet again—are you on your way to school at this hour?"

Shirley forced herself to squeeze out a smile. She had once bragged in front of Dog that she was going to cling to this big boss's thigh, but now that she had realized how terrifying Duncan really was, her smile looked worse than crying: "S…sir… hello…"

Chapter 111: The big boss's Lecture

During the morning rush, the bus was packed. Even near the back there was hardly any space. The short Shirley was squeezed into the crowd, her neck hunched as she held herself still, looking like a pitiful little animal.

If Duncan had not seen with his own eyes how she had swung a dog around and smashed a whole room full of cultists, he might really have believed this young lady was harmless.

He slowly squeezed to Shirley's side. His tall adult frame won a slightly looser corner for the girl and opened a small space where the two of them could talk. Duncan noticed keenly that Shirley was trembling a little. She was very nervous, nervous enough that it had turned into fear.

"What are you afraid of?" He glanced at Shirley. "I'm not going to swallow you whole."

Shirley pulled a long face: "S…sir, are you going to cook me first?"

Duncan: "…"

He could more or less guess why the girl was so afraid. Earlier, that "Dog" had seen some of the "truth" hidden beneath this human body of his. After escaping, the hound had surely added all kinds of details when describing its feelings to its mistress. That must have left a deep impression on her.

He did not know exactly what image he now had in Shirley's mind, but it was probably about the same way the captains on the Boundless Sea saw the Vanished. Once you met one, the best thing to do was start writing your will at once—and write fast, because you were likely to die before you even finished…

Duncan felt helpless about this. He did try to act as friendly as he could, but he could not change the fact that a demon from the Abyssal Deep of the Deep Sea had a very different kind of "sight" than humans. That "Black Sun" had even begged him for help in a vision, sounding quite sincere. Yet when he thought about the appearance hidden beneath that corona shell, did he not still feel wary himself?

He could only hope that, in the eyes of that Abyssal Hound, he looked a little better than the eerie Eldritch God inside the Sun that he himself had seen—at least enough to have proper facial features…

Thinking of that Abyssal Hound, Duncan frowned slightly and looked at the girl in front of him: "Is Dog with you right now?"

"A…Dog usually hides in places other people can't see…" Shirley swallowed hard and answered, not daring to refuse. Then she lowered her voice. "But it can 'know' what's happening around me…"

"Oh, then give it my regards," Duncan said with a nod. "We parted in a rush last time. I still have many questions I didn't get to ask."

As soon as he said that, he felt Shirley shiver again…

"Relax," Duncan said with a helpless sigh. He could already faintly sense some strange looks turning their way. "Why are you so tense just talking to me? I have no ill will toward you or Dog."

"Th…that's really good…" Shirley nodded stiffly. Then, as if she wanted to prove she was relaxed, she struggled to find a topic for a long moment before her eyes landed on Duncan's shoulder. "Y…you didn't bring your pigeon this time?"

“Pets aren’t allowed on the bus,” Duncan said casually. “I let it out to go hunting.”

“You let a pigeon… go hunting?” Shirley stared at Duncan with wide eyes, feeling as if her words were falling apart. But she quickly nodded. “Right, you’re right. Pigeons are good for hunting. Sharp eyes, fast flight…”

Her thoughts were a bit of a mess, and she was close to losing track of what she was saying. Just then the bus suddenly jolted, and the conductor’s voice came from the middle of the carriage, cutting off her broken train of thought: “Sixth District! Anyone getting off?”

When she heard the shout, Shirley clearly let out a breath of relief. As if she had been rescued, she began hopping as she called out that she was getting off. At the same time she squeezed forward and, with oddly fluent speech, said goodbye to Duncan: “I’m getting off. It was very nice to see you today. Next time we’ll…”

Before she could finish, she saw Duncan squeezing forward as well. The bright look on her face turned dull in an instant.

“I’m getting off at this stop too,” Duncan said with a blank face.

Shirley’s face went stiff. She knew it would be strange to say she was not getting off now. Besides, this big boss might be following her on purpose. If she kept trying tricks at this point, she might anger him, and then he really would cook her and eat her…

The girl’s imagination ran wild, and she ended up scaring herself quite badly. Just then she heard the conductor urging her from the side, so she shrank her neck again and started walking toward the door with stiff steps.

When she had just reached the door, the conductor’s voice suddenly came: “Wait a second, child. Did you not buy a ticket?”

Shirley froze and stared in surprise at the conductor in the dark blue uniform, as if it had never occurred to her that someone would call her out, or that her fare-dodging would be noticed. In that brief daze, the conductor had already confirmed it. “You didn’t buy a ticket. I remember now. First you…”

“I know this child. She probably just lost her ticket,” Duncan’s voice suddenly came from the side. “I’ll buy another one for her.”

The conductor turned his head and gave Duncan a doubtful look, then glanced at Shirley’s tense face. After thinking for a moment, he said nothing more and only nodded. “All right then.”

Duncan took out a few coins to buy a ticket for Shirley, then followed her out of the carriage. They got off beside an old, empty platform.

The bus was packed with passengers, but only the two of them got off in the Sixth District.

Duncan first looked around at the surroundings. All he saw was the most ordinary kind of Lower City neighborhood. The buildings around them were old, and there were not many people walking near the station, but it was far from the total ruin he had imagined. The worn shopfronts along the street were open for business as usual. The scattered pedestrians were fewer than in livelier districts, but there were still always a few people walking along the road. In the distance, factory chimneys spewed smoke, and he could see a newsboy on a bicycle passing through a junction at the end of the street.

Overall, this was just a quieter, less developed district, but the residents seemed to be living their lives as normal.

The factory leak here eleven years ago had clearly left some traces, but the impact was not as serious as he had imagined…

After roughly taking in the situation around them, Duncan withdrew his gaze and turned it back to Shirley.

After getting off, the girl had stood obediently in place, like a small animal caught in a trap, not moving at all. Even though Duncan's attention had not been on her at first, she had made no attempt to run.

She looked completely ready to let fate decide what happened.

Seeing how meek and harmless she looked, Duncan could not help but feel amused. If he had not seen this hot-tempered girl's fierce fighting with his own eyes, he might really have been fooled by her act.

He shook his head and walked up to Shirley. "What are you doing in the Sixth District?"

Shirley straightened up at once. "I…I heard the scenery here is nice!"

Duncan looked her up and down. "I've wanted to ask since just now. Are you… pretending to be obedient?"

"I…I'm not pretending!" Shirley stood even straighter than before. "I'm always very obedient!"

Duncan shook his head. He had seen plenty of children suddenly pretend to be sweet and cute like this, and this young lady's act was not even very good. But he did not say more. He only lifted his head to glance at the distant street and spoke in a casual tone: "The Sixth District… Eleven years ago, there was a factory leak here, and they say cultists were behind the accident."

Shirley blinked, looking confused. "Why are you bringing that up all of a sudden?"

"Enough, don't play dumb. You were asking about what happened eleven years ago at the Suntists' hideout," Duncan said, giving Shirley a look as he started walking forward. “This place is the focus of all the official records. The factory where the ‘leak’ happened is just up ahead.”

Shirley froze for a moment, then hurried to follow, her short legs moving quickly as she looked at Duncan in surprise. “Are you… also investigating the accident from eleven years ago?!”

After she confirmed that the big boss really did not eat people—at least not for now—and that they had the same goal, her courage grew a little. She even dared to ask questions on her own now.

“Yes, I’m a bit interested,” Duncan said, neither fully admitting nor denying it. But after only a few steps he suddenly stopped again and looked at Shirley curiously. “Do you often ride without paying?”

Shirley opened her mouth. “I…”

One look at the girl’s face told Duncan the answer. He shook his head. “Fare-dodging is bad.”

Shirley almost burst into tears when she heard that. Dog had lectured her. The uncles and aunties in the neighborhood had lectured her. Even the city-state’s constable had lectured her. But she had truly never thought that one day she would be suddenly lectured by a big boss on the level of an Eldritch God—and that this kind of big boss would lecture her about not riding the bus without paying… Had the moral standards of the big bosses in Subspace really grown this high these days?!

Ever since Dog had described the terrifying being inside this “Mr. Duncan” to her last time, she had faintly started to link this big shot with the Shadows in Subspace.

Chapter 112: Run-Down District

Shirley followed carefully at Duncan's side. The temporary quiet didn't relax her; it only made her feel more of a suffocating fear frozen inside the silence. She knew the fear wasn't entirely her own. Most of it came from "Dog".

Dog was feeling afraid, and its emotions spread over to her through the shackles of the symbiotic pact.

To ease the pressure in that silence, she muttered under her breath: "I never used to get caught when I skipped fares… Dog always helped cover for me…"

"You mean that 'disguise' the Abyssal Hound gave you?" Duncan raised an eyebrow. He remembered that Shirley had slipped into a Cult den before by relying on some kind of disguise power from Dog, a sort of cognitive interference. But he soon shook his head: "It doesn't feel reliable at all. Last time they saw through it, and this time even a ticket seller caught you."

As soon as Shirley heard that, she swallowed a bellyful of complaints. Dog's disguise hadn't failed at all! They had only been exposed because some terrifying being's gaze wiped it out. Was it really proper for a big shot like that to play this kind of joke on her…

But she didn't dare say any of that out loud. After holding it in for a long time, it turned into a dry laugh: "Ah-haha… you're right, you're right…"

Duncan shook his head. He didn't care what was going on in Shirley's mind. He was only a bit curious about what this girl was investigating:

“Why are you so focused on that ‘accident’ from eleven years ago?”

Shirley fell silent at once. She seemed to instinctively not want to answer that kind of question. But then she pressed her lips together, as if realizing that hiding something like this in front of a being almost like a Subspace Shadow was meaningless. She spoke in a low voice: “It’s nothing much. I just want to figure out… what really happened to my parents…”

After she said it, she hurried to add: “Someone like you must think this kind of thing is boring. I know, our mortal obsession with family must look…”

“No, I understand,” Duncan cut her off before the young lady could start rambling. He could guess well enough what he looked like in Shirley’s eyes, and anything she said next would be full of flattery and nonsense. “That really is a very important reason.”

As he spoke, he looked at Shirley. His gaze became more serious: “Were your parents caught up in that ‘leak’ eleven years ago? Or were they attacked by cultists?”

Shirley looked at Duncan in some surprise. She didn’t quite understand why this big shot, who clearly did not live or work like normal people, cared so much about such things. But she still nodded honestly: “They… disappeared eleven years ago. Fine, calling it ‘disappeared’ is a bit dramatic. They died. But they died without any clear cause… and after that, it was just me and Dog relying on each other…”

The girl’s voice grew a little low. These memories were not pleasant for her. Duncan did not let her go on: “How did you meet Dog? Those Suntists said you were a believer of the Cult of Annihilation, and that only Annihilation believers can summon Abyssal demons. But you don’t seem to accept that.”

“I don’t believe in any ‘cult’! The only damned one I believe in is myself!” Shirley blurted out. Then she quickly lowered her voice and tried to look well-mannered and polite. “Dog and I… met eleven years ago.”

Duncan suddenly stopped walking and fixed his eyes on Shirley: “Eleven years ago? So…”

“Right after that so-called ‘factory leak’,” Shirley also stopped and lowered her head as she explained. “I don’t remember the details. Dog says it doesn’t remember either… It was probably summoned by some Annihilation believer, but whoever summoned it must have been killed by a guardian of the Deep Sea Church. Then, for some reason, it just ended up ‘bound’ to me…”

Shirley hid a lot. In that vague and brief account, far too many details were skipped.

Duncan could feel the girl’s evasions and omissions, but he did not mind too much.

It was a very normal kind of self?protection. Even when facing an overwhelming being she could not resist, she still instinctively tried to avoid laying her entire past bare.

He could probably threaten Shirley into telling him more, but that might not bring out the whole truth. Besides, there was still not even basic trust between him and the girl, so this topic could end here for now.

Duncan shook his head and looked at the slightly run?down streets on both sides, and at the passersby who moved more slowly and lazily than people in other districts. He sighed softly: “…I hardly see any children. Everyone on the street is either old or middle?aged. There aren’t many young people either.”

“Old districts are all like this,” Shirley said, as if it was only natural. She sounded like she knew what she was talking about. “Anyone who can manage it moves to the Crossroad District. The ones who can’t move are either the elderly or people just muddling along. And a place like this could never have a neighborhood school, so of course children won't stay. They all go off with the adults…"

Listening to Shirley's serious-sounding analysis, Duncan only gave a noncommittal grunt.

He could imagine how old neighborhoods like this tended to age, but even so, the lifeless mood on these streets still felt a bit too strange.

While he was thinking, Duncan noticed an old man with graying hair sitting in front of a shop by the street. The man seemed to be basking in the sun, but when he noticed the unfamiliar faces on the road, he turned a somewhat dazed and puzzled gaze toward them.

Duncan led Shirley straight over.

"Good morning," Duncan greeted the old man sitting in the doorway in the sun. "We're from the Fourth District and wanted to ask… how do we get to the cathedral?"

He didn't actually care where the cathedral was. He had just picked a random excuse to strike up a conversation with a local.

"The cathedral? The cathedral isn't open these days. Who knows where that nun went off to," the old man in the sun roused himself a little from his laziness and sat up, looking curiously at the strangers before him. "How strange. We hardly ever get outsiders who want to come here… What are you here for?"

"Visiting a friend," Duncan said casually. "People usually don't like coming here? Why?"

"All because of that damned factory," the old man complained angrily. He clearly wasn't happy with how desolate the district had become. "How many years has it been? The area around the factory is still a ruined wasteland where nothing grows. Everyone says the chemicals from that leak back then were never really cleaned up. People from the nearby districts even go the long way around when they pass by. Who would dare come close to this place…”

Duncan and Shirley exchanged a look. Then he asked: “I saw an old newspaper that said the area around the factory had already been cleaned up…”

“The newspapers… the newspapers talk about good news all the time! The paper also said the new governor would revive the western industrial zone!” The old man spat to the side. “And what happened? The West Side gets worse every day, and our old factory is still a pile of ruins. Let me tell you, when that factory was still running this place was great. Back then, the Sixth District was one of the richest neighborhoods in the whole Lower City. Now look at this mess…”

Once the old man started complaining, he went on and on. It was rare to have strangers around to listen, and the laziness he’d had while sunbathing vanished without a trace. Seeing this, Duncan quickly cut in: “By the way, I noticed there aren’t many children around here… and not many young people either. Did they all move away?”

“Move? Nobody moves from here. However shabby this place is, at least everyone still has their old houses. Do you think they can just afford the rent in other districts?” The old man shook his head. “There aren’t many young people because the young ones have grown old. As for children… tch…”

The old man suddenly let out a sigh.

“There hasn’t been a single child born here in eleven years!”

“No newborns in eleven years?!” Duncan finally widened his eyes a little. “Really?”

“Would I lie? I’ve lived here most of my life,” the old man said, rolling his eyes. “If you ask me, it’s all the factory’s fault… The land around it is tainted with corruption…”

Duncan said nothing. He slowly straightened up and looked toward the end of the district, toward the spot on the map where he had seen the ruined factory marked.

Beside him, Shirley was still chatting curiously with the old man. She asked about the factory, about the residents who had stayed in the Sixth District, and about how many people had moved away over the past eleven years.

However, the old man seemed to have lost his patience. He waved his hand irritably and muttered more complaints, brushing off most of Shirley’s questions.

“Let’s go,” Duncan suddenly said to Shirley, diverting her attention before the hot?tempered girl could flare up. Then he glanced at the old man, who had gone back to basking in the sun, and gave a slight nod. “Thank you.”

“Oh, you’re welcome,” the old man waved a hand. “Take care.”

Chapter 113: Searching for a Great Fire

Walking down the road, Shirley looked rather annoyed: “Why wouldn’t that old man answer my questions! He acted like he didn’t hear me at all when I talked to him… Is being short really that easy to ignore?!”

“I don’t think your height is the main reason. It’s because you kept chasing him about the factory,” Duncan tilted his head slightly and glanced at the girl. “And instead of wasting time on a local who doesn’t want to cooperate, wouldn’t it be better to go and see the factory with our own eyes?”

Shirley pressed her lips together and said no more. Ahead of her and Duncan, at the end of the street, they could already faintly see the factory that had been abandoned eleven years ago.

In the Lower City, many factories stood close to residential areas, sometimes only a single wall away from where people lived. The limited land within the city?state and the blockade of the Boundless Sea meant the city planners could not spare enough ground for separate industrial zones. Every piece of solid ground was crowded with people. There was no such thing as “moving industry out” or “a plant in the suburbs”.

Most people in this world had no time to worry about the health risks of industrial pollution. For the general public, the safety that modern technology brought to the city?state was far more important than the dangers of the factories. Gas lamps, heavy firepower, the Steam Grid, potions and mechanical ships — these things had made the population of the new Age of City?States nearly three times that of the Old Era. Anyone who understood how a modern city?state worked could see one fact clearly: factories were the bones and flesh of modern civilization. They could no longer be separated from the city?state.

In fact, as Nina's textbooks described, these industrial facilities were not only gathered in the Lower City. City planners tried their best to move the most dangerous ones toward the outer edges of the city?state, but some things still had to be placed in its very heart, even right beside the great cathedral. There was the sacred Great Bell tower, and the "central steam core" that sent Holy Gas through pipes to the entire city.

All of these were, at their core, enormous machines. They held terrible power and great risk, yet they still had to stand beside the city's heart.

In Nina's engineering and mechanics textbooks, the writers even gave a special explanation for this.

People had to "grant sanctity to the holy steam" and "rely on the power of the great cathedral to keep the bell tower's timing in order". Machines were not only machines. They were also pure, sacred hearts that kept modern civilization running. People had to place these pure engines of steel under the God's gaze, so that the Shadows of Subspace would not corrupt their oil and bolts.

Duncan recalled what he had read in Nina's textbooks, then looked up at the factory still standing abandoned in the middle of the district. A strange feeling rose in his heart.

This bizarre, absurd world… really did keep testing his view of reality.

He and Shirley reached the factory. A thin perimeter wall, collapsed in many places, was the only barrier between the factory grounds and the surrounding residential blocks. Between the plant and the nearby houses lay a narrow ring of wasteland. Nothing grew on the barren ground. Only scattered chunks of masonry and long?rusted metal scraps lay there.

No matter how important factories were to the city, no matter how used people had become to living beside them day and night, a factory was still a factory. When these giants went into a runaway state, they still left huge scars in the city.

But in a city?state where every scrap of land was precious, it still struck Duncan as odd that a scar like this had been left “unhealed” for eleven years.

“…Land in a city?state should be valuable,” he said thoughtfully as he stood at the edge of the wasteland, looking at the abandoned workshops ahead. “Leaving this place empty like this… doesn’t make much sense.”

“Didn’t that old man say it already? The corruption here couldn’t be cleaned up…” Shirley didn’t seem to be thinking that deeply. “Some corruption can only fade slowly with time.”

“Maybe…” Duncan shook his head. His gaze moved over the rows of pipes and storage tanks along the edge of the factory grounds as he tried to reconstruct how the accident had once unfolded. He saw several broken lengths of pipe. One tank’s base had collapsed, and the whole vessel had toppled over, crushing part of a nearby building. It looked like the carcass of some huge beast.

From these signs alone, it did look very much like a leak had happened here.

But Duncan still frowned slightly.

The old man sunning himself had said there was still corruption lingering around the factory, and that it had even kept the entire Sixth District from seeing a single newborn in eleven years. Yet around the factory he saw no warning signs, and no patrols or guards.

Things did not add up. It was not a major anomaly, but these small irrational details were still enough to stir doubt.

“Are we… really going in?” Shirley’s voice sounded at his side. Her expression looked a little tense. “There might really be corruption here…”

“Can’t your Dog give you some advice?” Duncan glanced at Shirley. “This place is deserted. You can let that Abyssal Hound out for some air. And I don’t believe you’re really afraid of whatever ‘corruption’ is here — the tension in your eyes looks a little too fake.”

Shirley dodged Duncan’s gaze. She raised her hand and replied: “Fine, fine… mainly, Dog isn’t in great shape…”

As soon as the girl finished speaking, the crackle of flames suddenly sounded out of thin air beside her. A sheet of pitch?black fire spread along her arm and half her body. The flames gathered into chains, and at the end of the chains, in thick smoke and dark fire, the figure of a Abyssal Hound emerged.

Duncan watched the process with interest. When Dog finally appeared, he smiled and nodded to the Abyssal Hound: “Long time no see, Dog — you ran off pretty quickly last time.”

“We left in a hurry, in a hurry, please don’t hold it against us,” Dog tucked its tail the moment it appeared. When it heard Duncan’s voice, its whole body visibly seemed to shrink by half. It drew in its limbs as much as it could and lowered its skull carefully. “What do you need done? I’m good at all kinds of things. I can fetch plates, sweep the floor, entertain a child, whatever you like…”

Before the Abyssal Hound even finished, Shirley was already covering half her face beside it, clearly thinking: [I've been cowardly enough this whole way, and you still manage to set a new record.] Duncan couldn't help but laugh. He raised a hand and pointed at the factory ahead: "I don't need anything done. I just want to borrow your eyes. You can see things ordinary people can't, can't you? Take a look at that factory and tell me what's wrong with it."

"Listen to you, as if my eyes were worthy of your notice…" Dog flattered him at once, but still turned its head toward the factory as it spoke, muttering, "I've been watching this place since just now and didn't see anything… It still looks the same now, just an abandoned…"

Dog's voice cut off. It suddenly crouched low, a warning growl rumbling in its throat — yet the next second, it shook its skull and made a puzzled sound: "…Huh?"

Seeing this, Shirley tensed at once: "Dog, what did you see?!"

"I… I don't know. For a moment, I think I saw… fire? It looked like a huge fire, surging out of the factory like a giant wave, but… it vanished in the blink of an eye…"

Dog's voice was full of doubt, but Shirley suddenly became excited: "You're sure you saw fire?! A real great fire?!"

Dog shook its massive skull. "It was just a flash. It might have been a hallucination. I am a Abyssal demon after all. Having a hallucination now and then, being a bit unsound in the head, that's normal…"

"But a great fire is different!" Shirley's voice grew urgent. "We've been searching for so long. We finally found traces of 'the fire'. This has to be it, Dog. It must be here…"

Shirley was halfway through her excited words when she felt a large hand rest on her shoulder. Her voice cut off. A delayed sense of tension ran through her as she stiffly turned her head — and saw the terrifying “Mr. Duncan” quietly watching her.

“Why did you react so strongly to ‘the fire’?” Duncan looked into Shirley’s eyes and asked slowly.

“I…” Shirley opened her mouth. “It’s noth—”

“You’re also looking for a ‘great fire’ from eleven years ago, aren’t you?” Duncan did not care about the girl’s attempt to change the subject. Her reaction had already made him think of something. “A fire that doesn’t exist in any official record, but that you experienced yourself. Am I right?”

Shirley’s body went a little rigid. She swallowed slowly. “H?how did you…”

“I’m looking for it too,” Duncan said with a smile. “It seems we’ve come to the right place.”

Chapter 114

In front of the ruined, abandoned factory, the Abyssal Hound Dog raised its hollow eye sockets and fixed its gaze on the collapsed workshop, as if trying to observe this ruin in the Mortal Realm from another dimension.

Shirley stood beside Dog, a little nervous as she looked around. Only after she checked Duncan's expression did she finally lower her voice and ask: "Dog, are you sure there is really no lingering corruption here?"

"If you mean the so called 'chemical leak' in the mouths of ordinary people, you can relax. The corruption here probably faded away years ago…" A hoarse, low voice came from Dog's throat. "But if you mean some kind of corruption from the supernatural side of things… that I cannot guarantee."

"Did you find anything?" Duncan asked from the side.

"…No, really no," Dog lowered his skull a little. "I only saw 'fire' for a brief moment just now. But now it is gone. It may have been some kind of 'after echo'… a memory left and frozen in this ruin. Many supernatural powers leave similar traces in the Mortal Realm. But if we want to figure out what kind of supernatural power it was… we probably have to go in and take a look."

"Then we go in," Duncan said with a nod. He stepped toward a gap in the abandoned factory wall. "You two, follow."

Shirley hesitated for a moment but still walked after him. Dog shook his head left and right, the black chains on him clattering. The Abyssal Hound looked at Duncan's back with cautious curiosity: "You… why are you also interested in what happened eleven years ago? Ah, of course, I am only asking casually, just a tiny bit of curiosity. A big shot like you must have your own…”

“Just treat it as my personal interest,” Duncan cut the Abyssal Hound off. “You really do not need to be this nervous in front of me. It makes me feel uncomfortable.”

“Alright, alright, we are not nervous, we are not nervous…”

Hearing this reply that sounded very nervous no matter how you listened to it, Duncan could only shake his head helplessly. Then he looked at Shirley beside him with some curiosity: “In your memory, there was a great fire. But except for you, everyone else forgot that it ever happened. Is that right?”

“…Yeah.” Shirley nodded. By now she had already realized something. “From the way you are acting… you also know about that fire, right? That fire really existed, right?”

“Yes, I know,” Duncan nodded slightly and spoke in a calm tone. “So now I am even more curious about who erased the traces of that fire’s existence.”

At the same time, his thoughts churned in his heart. He had not expected things to develop in such a coincidental way, nor that in the city-state of Pland there would be a third person who knew about that “fire” besides himself and Nina. His chance encounter with Shirley, their shared investigation, the fire whose traces had been wiped away, Dog’s illusion just now… all these things seemed to be drawn together by an invisible force, gathering as if planets circling the Sun.

This feeling, of everything being pulled together by a hidden power, already made him very wary.

Nina’s schoolbooks had once given a rough outline of some “common sense” about the supernatural. They mentioned that powerful Anomalies or Visions often had the ability to interfere with the development of the Mortal Realm. They could even guide events like weaving a script, using subtle mental guidance. Too many coincidences in a row, or clues that kept appearing one after another, were often alarming “prophetic visions”.

These signs usually meant that the people involved had already been influenced by some Anomaly or Vision and were unconsciously taking part in, or even pushing forward, the event.

And faced with this kind of invisible yet harmless push and influence, the fire of his spirit form was not of much use.

Thinking of this, he secretly glanced at Shirley.

The girl and Dog were carefully on guard against any movement in the ruined factory. Shirley seemed to have no extra or complicated thoughts at all. Or maybe it was because this “Great Terror” was standing right beside her, leaving her no space to let her mind wander?

“This really looks like just an ordinary ruin…” Dog’s low voice broke Duncan’s thoughts. “I do not sense any trace of supernatural power.”

Shirley raised her head, studying the crisscrossing pipes overhead and the warped beams of the ceiling.

This was the first workshop they entered after coming into the factory. It had been heavily damaged in the accident eleven years ago. Some powerful explosion had blown open the roof, shattered the high pipes, and brought down the building materials. sunlight poured through the huge hole above and spilled into the ruin, making the scene inside look like the jagged bones left behind by a dead giant beast.

However, aside from the blast and the collapse, there was not the slightest trace of a fire in the workshop.

“It doesn’t look like a fire ever happened here…” Shirley muttered under her breath.

“The lack of fire marks is the biggest problem,” Duncan’s deep voice suddenly came from the side. He was also looking up, his gaze on the broken pipes and roof structure. His brows slowly furrowed. “With damage on this level, and with a clear explosion having taken place, there should have been a fire along with it. No matter how big or small, it should at least have left some burned traces in the workshop… yet there is not even a hint that a single spark ever existed here.”

As soon as Duncan finished speaking, Dog answered in a heavy tone: “Yes. The way it looks now, it is like… every element that had anything to do with ‘fire’ was deliberately erased. But because it was erased too cleanly, it actually left a more eye catching blank space instead.”

“Erased…” Duncan whispered. He walked slowly toward the deeper part of the workshop. After he passed a pile of twisted, abandoned machines, he stopped and casually glanced at a hole in the nearby wall.

He suddenly froze, his eyes opening a little wider.

Fire. A towering sea of fire.

He saw waves of blazing flames roaring up from the other side of that hole. Outside the factory, the whole stretch of wasteland was rolling with flames. The blaze rose like a surging ocean, leaping into the air and then crashing down onto the ground. It rushed toward the nearby streets and houses. Thick smoke billowed upward. Countless madly fleeing figures ran through the fire, like a mirage of hell.

This fierce and terrifying scene of burning suddenly broke into Duncan's sight. But in the next second, just as he turned his head, intending to call Shirley over, the image of the burning sea of fire suddenly vanished.

Duncan blinked hard a few times, then walked to the hole in the wall and looked out. All he saw was an empty stretch of wasteland and, at its edge, a few ruined houses that no one lived in anymore.

Dog noticed Duncan's strange behavior at once and asked: "Did you see something?"

"I also saw it just now. Fire," Duncan answered in a low voice. "But when I turned my head, it was gone."

"Then the 'after echo' left here is very strong," Dog quickly judged. "For it to replay twice in such a short time is not a mark an ordinary supernatural power can leave behind. It looks like that group of cultists were right. The 'shard of the Sun' they were looking for really did appear here… we just do not know what triggers the echo…"

Duncan did not reply. He simply walked back to the place where he had first seen the echo and stared thoughtfully at the spot where he had been standing.

It looked as if there was nothing there.

After thinking for a moment, Duncan slowly raised his hand and rubbed his fingertips together.

A tiny, ghostly green flame quietly jumped out from his hand.

The moment that ghostly green flame appeared, Dog's neck shrank at once. Then he quickly retreated three or four steps. The black chains on him rattled. Shirley also followed and backed away half a step, looking at Duncan in horror: "You… you really plan to eat cooked food now?!"

“What are you afraid of?” Duncan looked at this pair without any expression. “This is not for roasting you two.”

As soon as he spoke, he pointed with his fingertip toward the ground.

The ghostly green flame flowed down like a stream and fell silently onto the floor. In the next second, a half transparent fire of spirit form rippled and spread over the ground, sweeping across several meters around Duncan’s feet in an instant.

Shirley watched this scene in growing confusion. Suddenly, her eyes widened. “…Ah!”

Where the flame passed, something appeared on the ground that had been empty before.

It was a patch of ash. A curled, human shaped patch of ash.

It was a human burned into ash. In their final moment, that human had been looking with a rigid gaze toward the same place Duncan had just been staring at.

All at once, something came to Shirley’s mind. She raised her head and looked around the empty factory.

Under Duncan’s deliberate control, the ghostly green fire of spirit form swept across the entire workshop like a gentle breeze.

And so, the erased traces finally reappeared for a brief moment before the eyes of these visitors.

Chapter 115

The ghostly green fire of spirit form floated like a band of light and swept across the whole workshop in a few seconds. This disturbance from a higher supernatural power moved like a wind, lifting the Veil that had been laid over the Mortal Realm, and the truth hidden beneath that Veil appeared before Shirley and Duncan.

Ashes. Ashes everywhere. Human shaped ashes, broken heaps of ashes, walls blackened by smoke, a roof melted by heat. Machines whose shells had been twisted and turned brittle by the licking flames were piled together with lumps of almost shapeless slag. The whole factory zone looked like a fiery purgatory that had only recently cooled. The fire was out, but the power that had melted everything seemed to still linger in the air.

Shirley stood in the middle of the burned ruins, dazed. Her eyes were a little blank. Dog quietly came to her side and used his bony back to gently support her.

Soon, the ghostly green fire of spirit form faded away, and everything in the factory returned to its original state.

Duncan looked at his own hands with a bit of regret. This was, after all, only an “ordinary” body. It could not compare to his true form. The fire of spirit form he could call upon here was limited. When he spread the flames over such a wide range, he could only keep it going for a short while.

But even such a brief “replay” was enough to reveal a crucial truth.

“There really was a great fire… I knew I did not remember wrong…” Shirley muttered to herself. “I have been searching for it for eleven years. It was here all along…”

“But this fire was wiped away,” Dog said softly. “Some power wove a Veil over the Mortal Realm and filtered out every trace connected to ‘fire’… This Veil can even block the sight of Abyssal demons.”

“Was it the shard of the Sun? Or the one who carried the shard into the city-state?” Shirley frowned. Then she noticed that Duncan had been strangely silent for a while and could not help looking at him. “What do you think…”

“This place is still different from the fire scene in my memory,” Duncan shook his head before she could finish. His gaze swept slowly over the factory fittings as he recalled the details he had seen when the Veil was briefly lifted. At the same time, he compared them with the fire in his memory, and with the building and surroundings from when ‘he’ had escaped the fire with Nina. Finally he confirmed his judgment. “This is not the place.”

“Ah?” Shirley was stunned. “The fire in your memory… was not here?”

“The details do not match at all,” Duncan said in a serious tone as he walked slowly toward the factory gate. His eyes passed the fallen door and looked at the ruined street outside. “To be more exact, the scenery of the whole Sixth District… seems wrong.”

Shirley and Dog looked at each other by instinct. She lowered her voice and asked: “What do you think is going on?”

“How would I know? I am only a dog,” Dog shook his skull. “And eleven years ago, I was even more confused than you.”

Duncan heard their voices behind him and turned his head slightly. “Is this factory the only suspicious place?”

“Maybe… probably…” Shirley answered without much confidence. “Anyway, based on what I heard, this factory was the center of the chaos eleven years ago.”

Duncan did not comment. In the next two hours, he, Shirley, and the Abyssal Hound checked every part of the abandoned factory that was still safe enough to enter.

Strangely, apart from that Veil laid over the Mortal Realm, they did not find any trace left by supernatural powers or supernatural objects.

“This is not right…” After they finished a rough check of the last building, Dog finally voiced his doubt. “That Veil that covers the fire must be the work of some supernatural power. But we searched the whole factory zone and never found the ‘source’ of the Veil… that makes no sense.”

“Does there have to be a source?” Shirley asked, curious.

Duncan was just as curious, but he did not show it. He kept his face tense and waited quietly for Dog to explain.

Anyone else would probably never guess it, but of the three “people” on site, the only Occult Specialist was actually the dog…

Dog himself did not think too much about it. As a Abyssal demon, a lot of knowledge about the supernatural was basically common sense to him. He explained without hesitation: “The force that hides the traces of the fire is clearly a continuous power. It needs a source to keep it going until now. Also, after Mr. Duncan’s fire faded, the Veil closed up again. That means there is something behind it supporting this Veil. It might be a powerful Anomaly object, or a powerful supernatural being. Either way, whatever it is, it must exist somewhere in the city-state…”

As he spoke, the Abyssal Hound raised his skull and swept his hollow eye sockets across the distant streets and the further city.

“We did not find the source of the Veil inside the factory. That means the thing that keeps the Veil standing is projecting its power here from far away. Or… the scale of the Veil is far beyond what we imagine, and we only lifted a tiny corner of it. If it is the second case…”

Dog suddenly lowered his voice, sounding a little nervous: “If it is the second case, then this will be very hard to handle. An ordinary Anomaly could never cover such a large area. It would have to be a Vision. An unknown Vision…”

“The shard of the Sun can not be counted as an ordinary ‘Anomaly object’. After all, according to those cultists, that shard is the corpse of the Sun god,” Shirley suddenly said. “Maybe this is the shard’s way of hiding itself.”

“A higher Anomaly that can think, then?” Dog murmured. “To avoid being controlled, it actively created the Veil, erased every trace of its own existence, and hid somewhere behind the Veil? That is indeed possible. If it is the corpse of a deity, it might already be able to think even before it wakes.”

Shirley pinched her chin and thought seriously. Then something seemed to occur to her. She looked at Dog in surprise: “So you are actually this knowledgeable, Dog? And you cannot even read…”

“I am a Abyssal demon! A shadow shaped from the flesh of the Abyssal Lord! This knowledge was carved into my memory from birth, alright?” Dog rattled his chains impatiently. “And speaking of not being able to read… you have the nerve to talk about me?!”

Duncan watched Shirley and her Abyssal Hound with interest. This strange pair clearly had many secrets, and that made him even more curious. But before he could ask anything, Shirley suddenly seemed to remember something. She looked up at the sky with some panic. Seeing the Sun slowly climbing toward the highest point, she cried out: “Ah! It is already noon!”

Duncan raised his brows: “You have other plans?”

“I…” Shirley answered nervously. “I have to be home before noon!”

Duncan looked quietly at the girl. “Did you not say your parents are gone? Who will lecture you if you go back late?”

“It is not a lecture… I have an appointment with someone!” Shirley waved her hands quickly. Maybe because of what they had gone through together in the factory, she dared to act a little bolder in front of Duncan. “I… maybe we can continue next time?”

Duncan glanced at the Abyssal Hound beside her. Dog instantly shrank his neck. “It is up to you. If you want to keep exploring, I and Shirley…”

“No need,” Duncan shook his head. “Continuing to search here will not give us much more. We will talk again after we find new clues. Since you two have other matters, go.”

Shirley’s face lit up at once. She clearly had not expected the big boss to let her leave so easily. But she did not dare run off without another word. She carefully confirmed: “Then… Dog and I will go first, alright? In the future, if you want to find us…”

Duncan only smiled and looked at her kindly. “If we are fated, we will meet again.”

He smiled gently at Shirley and Dog. In his eyes, on the black chain that bound the Abyssal Hound, a tiny green spark was quietly smoldering.

After his unexpected link with Vanna last time, he had gained a deeper understanding of the fire of his spirit form. This was the result, a small test.

This mark was something he had released on purpose. It was stronger than the little flame he had left on Vanna, yet it was gentle and harmless.

Shirley suddenly felt a chill run over her skin. Duncan’s smile was so warm, yet she wanted to shiver.

In the end, she still held her expression steady and said goodbye as politely as she could, then hurried away with Dog.

Chapter 116: Everything Was Normal

Shirley quickly left with Dog, while Duncan withdrew his gaze from the distant intersection and let it fall again on the factory ruins.

After the fire of the spirit form faded, the invisible Veil closed again, and the factory returned to its former “normal” appearance—the traces of the blaze were wiped clean, and the omnipresent ash sank into nothingness.

Duncan’s line of sight slowly lifted, moving above the factory, up into the sky.

He imagined a thin, gauzy curtain quietly draped over everything, hiding the truth beneath the Mortal Realm. The Sixth District did not have many residents left, but there were still a few thousand people. And right under the eyes of those thousands, the invisible Veil had covered the truth for eleven years.

The residents here had even forgotten that fire from their memories. They only thought it was a “chemical corruption” leaked from the factory that left the district in ruins.

Thinking of this, Duncan suddenly frowned.

The truth inside the factory was a great fire, and Dog had also confirmed that there was no chemical corruption residue around the factory. Since there was no so-called “corruption” at all… then what had kept the entire Sixth District from seeing a single newborn for eleven years?!

If the break in newborns was not caused by chemical corruption… was it some power from the supernatural field that stopped new lives from appearing in the Sixth District?

Duncan looked at the sky, deep in thought.

It seemed… that invisible Veil was even larger in scope than he had imagined.

…

“Did we get out… did we really get out?”

In a shabby alley a ways away from the Sixth District, Shirley poked her head out of the shadows. She carefully checked the street nearby for patrolling constables, then lowered her voice and spoke toward the corner of the wall beside her.

At the corner of the wall, a clump of inky shadows coiled there, as if formless darkness had turned thick and sticky. Dog hid inside that shadow and spoke in a low, muffled voice: “We didn’t get out. Some big shot let us go.”

“Same damn thing.” Shirley waved a hand and plopped right down on the ground, not caring at all how she looked. “Hell, I was scared to death… I didn’t even dare breathe too loud, couldn’t swear the whole time, had to pretend to be all obedient… Dog, you have no idea…”

“I know. I can see more things than you. Did you forget?” The voice in the shadows spoke in a faint tone. “How did it feel? Walking next to a smiling Subspace shadow, was that more tiring than dealing with a bunch of fierce constables and Guardians?”

“…Stop talking, I’m getting chills.” Shirley rolled her eyes. “It’s all your fault for scaring me like that last time. If I didn’t know anything, I wouldn’t have been scared today… Tell me, why do big shots like that have to pretend to be ‘ordinary people’? He even squeezed onto the public bus like an ordinary person, even bought a ticket! Who would think they’d run into him that way?!”

Dog went quiet for two seconds. “…Maybe it’s just a hobby. Maybe he’s watching you. That’s what I’m most afraid of… We’ve already dealt with a being like that. I’m afraid our fate is already tangled up.”

Shirley shivered a little and asked carefully: “You mean… we’ll really run into him again? Give me a break…”

“Did you forget what he said when you parted?” Dog sighed. “He will find us.”

Shirley did not speak for a moment. She just lowered her head in silence. After a while, Dog suddenly said: “What is it? Scared now? Regretting it? It might be a bit late for that… I warned you before. Once you step into the supernatural field, you have to be ready to deal with all kinds of higher-order powers. Most of those things are beyond human imagination—if you had listened to me a few months ago and not started digging into those old events, you could still be living your peaceful life…”

“Like hell I regret it!” Shirley cut him off fiercely, still keeping her head down. “I never regretted it from the start, and I never will! Stop saying that depressing crap to me!”

“Alright, alright, I won’t say it—have you rested enough? We should get moving. Didn’t that ‘new friend’ of yours make an appointment with you?”

“I… I’ll wait two more minutes.” Shirley scratched her hair, her voice a little muffled. “My legs are a bit weak. Let me rest a bit…”

Dog said nothing more, only let out a hoarse purring sound. The writhing shadows hiding him slowly shrank and melted into Shirley’s own shadow.

…

At lunchtime, Vanna stuffed a piece of bread spread with jam into her mouth. She gulped it down in big bites while reading the briefing papers at her hand. She felt a bit choked, so she grabbed the glass next to her and took several big gulps.

Her uncle Dante's voice came from across the table, full of helplessness: "Vanna, eat a little more elegantly—and stop drinking wine like it's water."

"Heretics don't wait. The sooner I shorten my meal, the sooner I can send those heretics to meet their lord." Vanna looked up at her uncle as she struggled to swallow the food in her mouth. "And it's not like we're at some banquet outside…"

"Even family meals need proper manners—behaving like this, you'll never get married." Dante looked, head aching, at his niece, who had reached marriageable age and had not brought home even one boyfriend. "Sigh, actually, I should say you already can't get married…"

Vanna finally slowed down. The young Inquisitor looked a little embarrassed. "I… an Inquisitor's duties are rather…"

"The Deep Sea Church doesn't forbid priests to marry. Inquisitors also have normal families. I've read the Storm Canon too." Dante shook his head. "Seriously, there really isn't anyone suitable?"

Vanna lowered her head and poked the bread on her plate with her table knife. "The main problem is that none of them can fight."

"…You really should ask if that vow can be taken back." Dante sighed, looking deeply worried. "You shouldn't have made that oath so casually when you took your rites back then, especially the first line, insisting that only someone strong could walk beside you. Bishop Valentine should have stopped you…"

Vanna lowered her head even more. Though tall and strong, she now looked completely embarrassed. Being scolded by her uncle, she was just like when she was a child, even her voice sounded muffled: “You can’t just take back a vow. It’s a sacred promise made before the Goddess. And… I wouldn’t call it casual. Almost every female Guardian has that line in her vow. It’s a symbol of the courage the storm gave us, and it is to prove to the Goddess that…”

Dante silently looked at his niece, who was a head and a half taller than he was. “Did you ever think that one day you might train yourself to be unbeatable?”

“…That was for the second and third lines of the vow…” Vanna muttered.

“…Sigh.”

This had become a topic the uncle and niece brought up every few days in the past year or two, and every time it ended in awkwardness. This time was no exception.

But Vanna quickly adjusted her mood. She finished the battle on her plate at an amazing speed, then gathered the papers at her side and got up to leave: “I’m done eating, Uncle, you… huh?”

Vanna suddenly stopped. She stared in surprise at Dante Wayne’s face and pointed at his ruby prosthetic eye. “Uncle, the wound around your eye is bleeding… Are you alright?”

“Huh?” Dante froze for a moment. He quickly raised a hand to touch it. Seeing the blood on his fingers, he hurriedly stood up to get a mirror and checked his artificial eye. He saw, to his shock, that the edge of that ruby eye was slowly seeping blood. The blood ran along the wrinkled scars around the wound. There was not much of it, but it looked frightening.

“Don’t move yet.” Vanna rushed over and pressed her hand near Dante’s eye while quietly reciting lines from the Storm Canon: “May the sea wind moisten the flesh and make this body whole again.”

Under the sacred prayer, Dante felt a slight itch around his wound, and the little bit of bleeding soon stopped. He sounded a bit helpless: “No need to make such a fuss. This isn’t the first time over these years. It’s cold stone and metal after all. A little ‘small conflict’ with living flesh now and then is normal.”

But the expression on Vanna’s face did not relax at all. She kept staring at Dante’s ruby eye. After a long time, she asked: “Do you feel anything else? Any burning pain? Or do you see any phantoms through this ruby gem eye?”

Dante blinked. He looked at Vanna. The blessed ruby gem eye clearly reflected everything it saw—

Flames burned fiercely behind Vanna. Ash and char marks covered the dining room. Shapeless charcoal and melted heaps hung down from the ceiling like an inverted omen.

The ruby gem eye grew slightly hot, then slowly cooled again.

Dante smiled. “Of course not. Everything was normal.”

—

Chapter 117: The City Museum

Getting off the carriage and stepping onto the stone square in front of the City Museum, Heidi could not help taking a deep breath. The cool, slightly salty sea wind blew past, as if it also blew away the fatigue and anxiety she had built up after working for so long without a break, bringing her a trace of ease.

This young psychiatrist had not taken a day off for almost a month. Lately she had been dealing with raving, deranged cultists almost every day. She even felt that the madness in those cultists' heads was slowly infecting her own mind, leaving her fighting insomnia and bad dreams every night.

Thankfully, today she finally did not have to think about those mad cultists and their twisted, diseased minds.

Another gust of sea wind blew in from the end of the street, stirring the hem of Heidi's dress. She raised a hand to press down her long skirt and the wide-brimmed hat on her head, then looked up at the large white building ahead, with its sleek dome and pretty side wings.

This maritime City Museum in the Crossroad District was one of the largest museums in the city-state of Pland—and also one of the most legendary.

Heidi walked toward the City Museum. Not far away, a guide was explaining the museum's background to a group of visitors. The guide's rather carrying voice drifted into Heidi's ears:

"…This large building, built in 1802, was originally the property of the Parr Brothers Oceanic Trade Company. At its height, as Pland's largest storage center, it handled astonishing amounts of wealth and was seen as a symbol of the city-state's peak of commercial prosperity. But a great upheaval in 1822 completely changed the fate of this building…"

Someone asked at just the right moment: "What happened back then?"

"They say—just a rumor, mind you—that one of the Parr Brothers' ocean-going cargo ships ran into a strange dense fog on its way back to port. In that fog, the unlucky ship saw a ghost ship wreathed in flames and passed right by it…

"That cargo ship somehow escaped the fog and even returned safely to the Harbor. But the mad shadows stayed in the hearts of every crew member on board and quickly spread through the Parr Brothers' entire fleet. In the months that followed, every ship under their name began to suffer terrible disasters. Crew members kept mutinying and disappearing. Some even performed bloody sacrifices to please some unknown deity…

"…Ships on long voyages hit storms on seas that should have been calm, or struck icebergs in warm waters. Mutinous sailors blew up explosives on board, sabotaged boilers, even hunted down their own crewmates… Disasters like that kept happening, and in the end they completely ruined the Parr Brothers' business, forcing their ocean trade company to file for bankruptcy restructuring at the end of the same year…

"After that, the Parr Brothers divided up what remained of the company's assets and donated part of it to the city-state's authority, including this building in front of us… It then went through several renovations and changes of function. Until in 1855, it was finally converted into a maritime City Museum, and has remained so to this day.

"They say that even today, the shadows from nearly a century ago still wander this maritime City Museum… The shadows of the Parr Brothers sometimes return to the museum and stop for a while in their old office. Or staff in the old ocean trade uniforms appear in the exhibition halls and ask confusedly for directions to the office area…

“Of course, of course! These are only rumors. The inside of the City Museum has already been inspected and blessed by Church priests, and a squad of Guardians is stationed here to make sure no supernatural disasters break out. Everyone can visit with peace of mind—but if any of you really are interested in those spooky stories, you can try the ‘Adventure Chamber’ in the side wing of the museum. Before going into the chamber, though, you have to go to the Cathedral on the square for a temporary baptism and a will test…”

The voices of the guide and the tourists slowly faded. Heidi moved past the crowd toward the front, but suddenly her steps felt a bit heavy.

An ocean trade warehouse from a century ago. Distant sea fog that brought disaster. A fleet under a curse. Shadows wandering in the City Museum…

Heidi had been dealing with cultists every day lately and had heard plenty of “rumors” through various official channels. She suddenly felt that choosing the City Museum as a sightseeing spot for her day off might not have been a good idea… With this time, she might as well go wander around the Lower City instead, or let herself be talked into it by her father and go visit that strange antique shop.

But after less than two seconds of hesitation, the young psychiatrist suddenly made up her mind. She strode toward the main entrance of the City Museum.

Telling just the right amount of spooky stories when introducing a spot was a common trick for guides. More than half the horror tales in this world involved sea fog, ghost ships, and mutinous sailors. If the City Museum had its ghost stories, the antique shop might have things even scarier than ghosts —could a psychiatrist who dealt with lunatics all day really be afraid of that?

No one could stop her from enjoying this hard-won day off! Not even an Eldritch God from Subspace!

With her resolve firm and her steps light as the wind, Miss Psychiatrist strode through the ticket gate like a warrior marching off to battle, passed through the doors of the City Museum, and stepped into this ancient building that had stood for nearly a century.

There were fewer visitors inside the City Museum than she had expected. Perhaps because it was not a public holiday, the first-floor hall even felt a little empty.

A few members of the museum’s mental guidance staff were helping confused visitors find the route to the main exhibits. At the far end of the first-floor hall, a towering wall held the huge skeleton of a whale and fine models of all kinds of sea vessels. A guide dressed as a captain was explaining the early age of sailing warships to several children.

Two girls who looked only sixteen or seventeen, probably still in school, were walking together toward the door that led to the main exhibition area. They chatted and laughed along the way, looking very close.

The lighting in the hall was bright, and the atmosphere was pleasant.

Heidi let out a small breath of relief and followed behind the two young girls, walking toward the hall of the main exhibits, ready to enjoy this quiet time.

Then she caught a faint strange smell.

It smelled… as if something was burning…

…

Near the Crossroad District, Duncan stepped off a steam bus. He bought a light magazine at a nearby newsstand, planning to use it to pass some time.

His investigation around the factory ruins had not made much progress. After Shirley and Dog left, he wandered around the Sixth District for a long time and asked the locals about various things. But clearly, citizens who were ordinary people could not possibly glimpse the truth behind the Veil. The residents of the Sixth District only remembered the little bit of information the authorities had released. Everyone believed the district's decline was caused by chemical corruption left behind by the factory and by the city-state authority's neglect. It was no different from what that old man sunning himself had told him.

The truth was covered by the Veil. Records in the Mortal Realm had been altered, and what the city-state authority released was only the information after it had been edited. But Duncan could not decide, based on this alone, that the Veil had been created by Pland's City Hall or the Church—for in a world where supernatural phenomena existed, a powerful Anomaly or Vision could just as easily blind everyone.

In the face of powerful Anomalies and Visions, even the so-called "Mortal Realm" was a canvas that could be smeared over and rewritten.

Now it seemed that the source of that "Veil" was not in the factory at all, and might not even be in the Sixth District. If this so-called "source" was the fragment of the Sun, then it should be hidden somewhere even deeper.

The investigation could not continue before he had more leads.

Duncan sat down on a bench by the street. He read the light magazine absentmindedly while thinking about what to do next.

Those Suntists were searching for the fragment of the Sun, throwing the city-state into turmoil. Nina's memories and dreams vaguely pointed toward that fragment. She was very likely connected to it in some way. And through the Sun mask, he had glimpsed the Sun's true form. That unspeakable thing, shaped like an Eldritch God, had already seen him and had called to him for help…

Before he knew it, he seemed to have fallen into a tangled skein of threads.

The city-state of Pland was his first landing point in the civilized world. He had thought it was a peaceful, prosperous, and tranquil place, but he had not expected this "first stop" to be so far from peaceful.

Duncan sighed and shook his head slightly. Just then, from the corner of his eye, he suddenly saw a strange column of smoke rising above a nearby block.

Within the smoke, firelight faintly leaped.

Duncan froze for a moment and rose from the bench. He noticed that many other people on the street had seen the smoke and flames as well. Many pedestrians stopped in their tracks. Then he saw someone run across the street in a panic and heard a shout:

"It's on fire! the City Museum is on fire!!"

Chapter 118: The Fire Scene

Thick smoke rose into the air, with faint firelight flickering inside it. People were running along the street, shouting in panic, and the moment Duncan heard their cries, his eyes widened a little.

The Ocean City Museum… the one near Crossroad District… Nina!

This afternoon, Nina had gone with her classmates to visit the Ocean City Museum near Crossroad District. That was exactly the direction where the smoke was rising!

Duncan started forward at once, wanting to run straight toward the museum. But he quickly realized that getting there from this part of the city would not be easy. Even if the smoke looked close to the naked eye, the winding streets would waste a lot of time. Taking a cab was not realistic either—not only was traffic here not that convenient, but even if he did manage to flag down a car, no driver would want to head straight into a burning building.

His mind raced. He was anxious, but he did not lose his calm. After he quickly sorted through the situation, a bold idea appeared in his heart.

“AI!” he ordered silently, suddenly speeding up as he slipped into the shadows of a nearby alley.

A flash of green spirit flame swept past. AI, who had been patrolling nearby, appeared out of thin air, flapped her wings, and landed on Duncan’s shoulder.

Duncan turned his head to look at the pigeon and had already sorted out his plan in his mind.

He knew this bird could carry physical objects across space and keep the “cargo” perfectly intact during the trip. He also knew her carrying capacity was quite large—so far, none of their tests had reached her limit.

So… could she “carry” him to the Ocean City Museum?

The bold thought quickly grew firm, and Duncan could not help a small sigh in his heart. He had never tried having AI carry a living person through space. It was a very dangerous experiment. And lately he had not managed to find any cultist willing to sacrifice themselves for the sake of research. Originally he had planned to wait for AI to bring back some “prey” before arranging human trials. He had not expected something like this to happen so soon… but maybe that was just as well.

Since he could not find a test subject, he would use his own body and soul, which were not afraid of death, as the first experimental target. No matter what, AI could at least keep the “cargo” intact during transport. That meant this body should arrive whole in the streets near the Ocean City Museum. And if this body really died again in the teleportation because of some mysterious power… he would just project himself from the Vanished again and possess it. He would treat it as a second upload.

“I want you to ‘deliver a shipment’,” Duncan said as he patted AI’s wing. “Deliver it to the Ocean City Museum in Crossroad District—the big white building you flew past this morning.”

AI tilted her head. As clever as a human, she had already guessed Duncan’s intention the moment she saw the dark smoke on the horizon: “A trip that starts the moment we say go?”

“Just tell me if you can do it.”

“Then let’s…”

“Do it.”

Without another word, the pigeon beat her wings hard. A burst of green spirit flame exploded out of nowhere, turning her into a skeletal dove made of spirit flame. She rose into the air and circled quickly around Duncan.

In the next second, the ghostly green blaze flashed and vanished. Duncan’s avatar turned into a stream of light and disappeared into the whirlpool of fire.

One second later, a snow?white pigeon shot up from the shadows deep in the alley and soared toward the next street, heading straight for the thick black column of smoke that was growing more and more intense.

Near the Ocean City Museum in Crossroad District, fire squad members who had rushed over from the fire station were already trying to fight this sudden blaze. Thanks to the District’s good basic infrastructure and the museum’s special status as a public building, there were not only resident fire units nearby but also plenty of emergency pumps and evacuation exits.

By the time the fire squad members started trying to put out the flames, some of the people trapped inside the museum had already escaped through the emergency exits on either side of the main building. They gathered anxiously at the edge of the plaza.

People were talking in terror about the flames that had suddenly burst out in the corridors and halls. They spoke of strange, howling explosions from the depths of the museum and twisted, impossible shapes in the fire. Some people were clearly having hallucinations under the pressure and kept describing scenes that were far too terrifying. That only made the panic spread faster.

But the professionals were already at work. The priests from the Cathedral on the plaza and the resident Guardians were very experienced at handling early signs of corruption caused by mass mental stress. Two priests had already walked into the crowd. They lit censers beside the people who were most agitated, trying to calm their emotions. Several Guardians began to split the crowd apart, taking away those who showed potential signs of corruption, preparing to give them later mental comfort and a Will Test.

In the shadows of a building a few dozen meters from the museum plaza, a cluster of green light and flame suddenly rose up.

The ghostly green flame swirled and gathered, like a door opening in midair. Duncan stepped out from it. Threads of fire still clung to his clothes, drifting away on the wind as he walked out of the shadows. AI flapped her wings and settled neatly back onto his shoulder.

Duncan glanced back at AI and quietly noted down this new experience and the feeling of performing a “live teleportation.”

Just as he had expected, AI had reached the Ocean City Museum by “flying,” not by instantly arriving as she did when Teleporting between the antique shop and the Vanished.

That meant AI’s teleportation had to be built on anchors. When she teleported between the antique shop and the Vanished, the anchors were the antique shopkeeper and the “Captain.” But when she carried one of those anchors with her, she could only fly honestly through the space of the Mortal Realm to get from place to place.

As for what it felt like to be “carried” in flight by AI… it was strange.

He had not lost consciousness during the process, but he could not clearly see his surroundings either. Through the link of the spirit flame, he could vaguely share AI’s senses. He could faintly see views from high above and feel the air rushing past his body. But all these shared senses seemed to be separated by a layer of the Veil. They were not as clear or direct as his own body’s senses.

Maybe it was because AI’s body was too different from a human’s. Or maybe it was because AI had her own will and could not be completely taken over.

But those were small problems, and Duncan did not care about them right now. Unlocking AI’s “new function” in a moment of crisis was already a huge gain. He could study the details later. For now, the most important thing was to find out how Nina was.

Flying was not as fast as true teleportation. It had taken a few minutes to get here from the nearby district. But compared to running or taking normal transport, this speed was already amazing. He had not lost much time on the way.

Duncan could already see the burning building. The white main structure of the Ocean City Museum had three floors. The fire on the first and second floors was the fiercest. Thick smoke poured from several windows on the second floor, and flames burst and rolled out of some of them. A column of smoke also rose from the rooftop, with faint tongues of fire licking out from it.

The way the flames were spread made it look as if a giant pillar of fire had exploded on the first floor and punched straight through the upper floors and the roof.

The fire squad members had opened several hydrants at the edge of the plaza. Huge jets of high?pressure water blasted toward the museum’s main building, trying to cool the outer walls and prevent this century?old structure from collapsing in an even more deadly way. Some survivors had gathered at the edge of the plaza, accepting comfort from the priests or answering questions from officials.

Duncan walked straight toward these survivors, looking carefully to see if Nina was among them.

Halfway there, he heard some of the survivors trembling as they described what they had seen.

“…The fire just appeared in the air! It really came out of nowhere! It was like it had been burning for a long, long time but no one could see it, and then it suddenly showed itself!”

“There was a howling sound, a sharp howl, like a demon laughing!”

“…A man whose whole body was burned black crawled out of a room—Goddess above! He was wearing clothes from decades ago… He crawled out of the room, but that room wasn’t on fire before! The fire only started after he came out!”

The survivors at the edge of the plaza were deeply terrified. Many of them were talking over each other as they described what they had seen. Duncan walked up beside them and saw a priest of the Deep Sea Church in a long robe, with a short black beard, frowning deeply.

“The panic rate is too high. A third of them are mentally unstable,” the Deep Sea priest said quickly to the Guardian warrior beside him. “They show signs of being corrupted by supernatural power… There may be something unclean inside the museum. When will support from the main Cathedral arrive?”

“At least half an hour.”

“…That’s not good. We don’t have that long. If there really is something unclean, at this scale it will probably go into a runaway state in ten, maybe fifteen minutes…” The black?robed priest glanced at the burning museum, then suddenly turned to an attendant at his side. “Have the constables take over things here.”

Then he grabbed the front of his priest robe and tore it off in one motion, revealing a black shirt and trousers underneath. He raised the Storm Canon in his hand and shouted a short, loud benediction:

“Please, bear witness! We go forward without fear!”

The other Guardians shouted together: “Please, bear witness!”

Right after the benediction, a faint mist rose around the Storm believers, wrapping their bodies like protective waves. In the next second, they charged toward the burning building.

(A young man from Earth named Colin died in a car accident, crossed into a chaotic era where supplies were scarce, and obtained a “Bronze Immortal Gate”…)

Chapter 119: A Pair of Friends

From the moment the Deep Sea priest judged that there might be an supernatural Runaway inside the museum to the moment he finished his self?blessing and led the charge into the fire, only about ten seconds passed.

Duncan watched the group rush toward the flames. The fire squad on the plaza immediately moved to support them, working with practiced skill. They used the hoses to cover the entrance, cooling it down and clearing a path. Another team quickly formed up. On top of their standard protective gear, they hung the insignia of the Deep Sea Church and something like amulets. They also rushed into the Ocean City Museum.

The constables who stayed at the edge of the plaza took over calming and guiding the rest of the citizens. They began contacting the nearby Cathedral to receive the fire survivors who had already been marked as possibly corrupted.

They were well trained and worked together tightly. It was not just something they had drilled countless times. It felt like something they had done in real disasters countless times.

This was the face of a city?state that had survived in a strange world full of supernatural phenomena and grown prosperous. They could quickly pick out the shadow of the supernatural in any disaster. They could suppress corruption before it exploded beyond what Mortals could bear. Both supernatural and ordinary people received full education and training in these matters, until their basic responses became muscle memory. Only then could the whole group keep living on.

Duncan saw all of this, but he did not have much time to think about it. He checked every soot?covered survivor at the edge of the plaza, but Nina was nowhere to be seen.

He suddenly looked up at the museum.

From inside the burning Ocean City Museum, a somewhat familiar aura was drifting out.

He started to walk toward the museum, but after only two steps, a constable blocked his way: “Mister, it’s dangerous ahead. Please leave it to the professionals.”

Duncan glanced at the constable, nodded, and turned away.

Arguing with the officials here would only waste time and get in the way of the professionals’ work. Duncan was a practical man, so he simply gave up on the main entrance of the museum. He circled quickly to the other side of the plaza and hid himself in the shadows of a building.

The next second, a white dove flew straight across the plaza and dove right through a side window of the museum that was spitting flames.

Some people saw this and only thought it was a poor pigeon, scared and half?stunned by the smoke and fire. After a few sighs, they stopped paying attention.

Inside the Ocean City Museum, Duncan stepped out of a vortex of ghostly green flame.

Smoke, firelight, and heat rushed toward him at once.

Duncan did not fear these things, but he could feel this mortal body’s functions straining under the conditions inside the burning building. If he just walked forward like this, his soul might be fine, but this body would definitely not survive.

But he was not acting blindly. Before he rushed in, he already knew what he had to do.

The place was full of fire—and fire was very obedient.

Duncan held his breath. A faint trail of ghostly green flame flowed under his feet, then vanished in an instant. With that brief contact, he had already formed an invisible link with the flames around him. Just like in the underground sun cultists' gathering place beneath the abandoned factory, he felt the surrounding fire submit to him.

Even the burning air itself began to change. It no longer affected this body's breathing.

Duncan took a gentle breath and walked toward a door that was sealed by raging flames.

"Back."

The fire pulled back at his word. It retreated and slowly died out behind him, revealing a corridor full of smoke and scattered embers.

Duncan glanced over his shoulder, then looked at the signs on the nearby walls. He judged that he had "landed" in an office on the edge of the main exhibition area. The corridor in front of him was a service passage used by the museum staff. At the end of it lay the main exhibition halls. On one side were stairs and a shaft lift leading to other floors.

He stepped into the corridor and moved forward, searching ahead while he focused his mind, trying to sense where Nina was inside the museum. Honestly, he had no idea if he could pull it off.

It was his first time trying something like this. His senses might now be far beyond a normal person's, and Goathead had said "a captain's intuition is the surest compass," but for him, trying to sense someone's aura from far away like this was still an unfamiliar, high?level trick—something he had only seen in stories.

He was only trying it now because, back on the plaza, he had felt a faint trace of a familiar aura from inside the museum for a moment. That gave him the idea to try.

Duncan walked down the corridor. The flames along the way retreated and went out one by one. He still could not sense where Nina was, but suddenly, he felt something else.

“Hm?”

He muttered in confusion and turned toward the direction his senses pointed. Not far ahead, on the lower level beneath a staircase, a “mark” was growing clearer and clearer in his perception, pulsing faintly.

The mark’s owner seemed to be very much alive and kicking.

Duncan hesitated for only a moment, then broke into a run, heading straight toward the source of the feeling. He ran through the flames that kept backing away and dying out. He went down a staircase that was already starting to crack and loosen, while pushing his control over the fire as far as his body could safely handle, trying to suppress the blaze in the whole building.

At the same time, the mark in his mind grew sharper. In the end, he even began to faintly hear the “voice” coming from it—

“…My hand? Hey, these are just small burns. Give me two or three days and they’ll be fine…

“Yeah, I’ve always been pretty strong…

“Don’t worry, I blocked up the crack under the door. The smoke won’t get in for now… You’re really smart, you even knew there was a water room here… Uh, you checked the route map before? The teacher talked about it in class? Safety education… um… I might not have listened very well, hahaha…

“You said you saw a dog just now? You must’ve seen wrong. How could there be a dog in a place like this, hahaha…

“…What do we do about this one who fainted? You don’t know either? All right… at least she’s still alive… It’s fine, we’re definitely going to be rescued…”

He was not mistaken. That was Shirley’s voice.

Duncan recognized the mark. It was the little bit of fire he had placed on Shirley not long ago, and her voice was now reaching his mind through that mark.

Back on the plaza, that instant when he had felt a trace of familiarity from the museum seemed to have come from this mark as well. He had not tried to contact it on purpose, but because he was too close, he had sensed its presence anyway.

This mark was the first one Duncan had ever actively released, so there were still many things about it he did not understand. But now it seemed that the connection between spirit flames was even more useful than he had imagined.

As that thought passed through his mind, another question rose up:

Shirley was talking to someone, and from the sound of it, that person was her friend… Who was with her?

…

The closed water room had become a temporary shelter. The narrow, cramped space kept out the disaster drawing closer outside. Water still ran in the sink not far away. The electric light had gone out, and the flickering firelight coming through the window was the only source of light. Nina curled up carefully beside the sink, and she could almost count her own heartbeats.

They were beating abnormally fast.

Her new friend, the girl named Shirley, was checking the seals on the doors and windows. Shirley's hands had been burned by the flames, but she acted as if nothing were wrong and kept working busily. On the floor not far away lay another lady. Nina had never met this woman before. On the way here, in the chaos, she had seen a loose brick knock the lady out. She and Shirley had dragged her into this room together.

From the woman's clothes and style, it was clear she was not a poor person from the Lower City like Nina, but a proper young miss from the Upper City. Unfortunately, in the face of disaster, proper ladies and the poor of the Lower City did not seem very different.

The sound of water from the sink suddenly grew weaker, then stopped.

"…The main pump just shut down," Nina said. She had been listening to the sounds in the room the whole time. "The fire is very big."

Her "new friend," who was a whole head shorter than her, walked over and squatted down in front of her. In the dark, their eyes were on the same level.

"Are you really scared?" Shirley asked quietly.

"I'm very scared of fire…" Nina hugged her legs tightly. Even her voice was shaking a little. "Really, really scared of fire."

"…Actually, I'm pretty scared too," Shirley said after a two?second silence. "All right, I'm the most scared—I'm more afraid of fire than anything…"

“You can’t tell at all,” Nina said, shaking her head. “You were charging around like crazy just now.”

“I was charging around because I was scared,” Shirley said, flopping down to sit beside her. “I’m so scared that if I ever stop, I’ll never have the courage to rush in again… But now it’s fine. The two of us are damn well stuck in here, and there’s nowhere left to run, so we can only sit here like two idiots and wait.”

In the dark, Nina reached out and bumped Shirley’s arm. She suddenly noticed that Shirley was trembling too.

So Shirley really was very scared as well.

“You swear,” Nina said softly. “I thought… you were a very well? mannered, good student.”

“At a time like this, there’s no point in pretending. I’ve always been like this,” Shirley said, a bright smile on her smoke?blackened face. “And… forget it.”

She seemed about to say something more to Nina, but in the end she swallowed it back. She turned her head to glance at the door and said: “Come on, use that smart brain of yours. How long do you think we can stay alive in here?”

Nina raised her head and looked around: “I… don’t know either. But as long as we keep the smoke out, we’re safe for now. This room is very sturdy, and it’s at the bend of the stairs. It shouldn’t collapse for a while.”

Shirley gave a careless “oh,” then hesitated for a moment before speaking again, slowly: “So… I mean, if I—if I had a way to get us out of here, but it might be pretty scary, would you… want to try it?”

“A way?” Nina looked at her in confusion. “What way?”

“Well…” Shirley stood up, then suddenly sat back down again. “Ah, forget it. Let’s wait a bit longer. It’s not time yet. Not yet…”

Nina: “…?”

Chapter 120: Rescue

Time suddenly seemed to slow to a crawl. In the darkness and the scorching heat that crept closer and closer, Nina felt her mind start running out of control.

She seemed to remember her childhood. She remembered running up and down the antique shop with her uncle, ‘helping out’ and only making a mess of everything. She remembered her uncle explaining the stories behind those ‘antiques’, which all turned out to be made up. She remembered her first day at school, the first time she saw a steam engine in a textbook, the first praise she got from a teacher, the first friend she made… and the first friend she lost.

Her head felt like a tangled ball of yarn, and her thoughts grew more and more confused.

Smoke had already started seeping into the room bit by bit. It made it hard to breathe and also harder to think.

In the end, all those noisy, scattered memories turned into the image of being swallowed by flames.

A great fire… a fire that existed only in her memories seemed to blaze up again before her eyes.

Nina stared in a daze at the floor not far away, her gaze unfocused, as if that patch of ground would suddenly burst into flames in the next second. Just then, she felt a cold hand press against her forehead.

Shirley looked at her friend with some worry and asked: “Are you alright? Your eyes suddenly went blank… and you kept mumbling something under your breath.”

Nina hurriedly shook her head, grabbed Shirley’s arm, and said: “I… I’m fine. Thanks… I just suddenly thought about my family.”

Shirley froze for a moment when she heard the word “family”, then asked, as if casually: “Who do you have at home?”

Nina thought for a moment, slowly lowered her head onto her knees, and said: “Only an uncle… my parents have been gone for many years. I grew up with my uncle. I promised him I would come home early today…”

Shirley seemed a bit uneasy with this topic and did not really know how to comfort her friend, so she forced herself to keep talking: “You… you must be very close with your uncle, right? What does he do?”

Nina spoke slowly: “He’s just an ordinary person. Our family runs an antique shop in the Lower City. He manages it by himself…” When she noticed the surprise on Shirley’s face, she quickly waved her hands. “Not the kind of very impressive antique shop you’re thinking of. There aren’t any real antiques.”

Shirley hurried to flatter her: “That still sounds amazing! A shopkeeper! Owning your own store, even in the Lower City… your family must be doing pretty well, right?”

Nina kept waving her hands: “Actually it’s very average. My uncle’s health wasn’t very good a few years ago, and business at the shop isn’t great. We haven’t saved much money… But I think my uncle is really amazing. He can even chat with Mr. Morris M for a very long time! He knows a lot of things. Even Mr. Morris M says he’s a very learned person…”

After listening to Nina’s story, Shirley pretended to nod very seriously and said: “Then once we get out of here, I definitely have to meet your uncle…”

Nina smiled and was just about to say something when a loud bang suddenly came from the door. The next second, the flimsy washroom door was kicked open from the outside and crashed to the floor!

The moment she saw this, Nina’s first reaction was that the blaze in the hallway outside would flare up because the door was broken and sweep inside. That was what she had learned at school. But in the next second, she only saw a familiar figure step through the doorway—the burst of fire she expected did not appear.

Shirley was also startled by the crash of the broken door. She turned her head in shock, and the moment she saw the figure in the doorway, her whole body went stiff.

She saw that Subspace Shadow’s avatar form standing quietly in the doorway. In the corner of her eye, the last tongues of flame were crawling at that figure’s feet and fading away. She got up in a daze, wanting to back away with a trace of fear. For a split second she even considered whether she should push this new “friend” Nina toward the door, but before she could do anything, Nina had already stood up behind her.

Nina looked at the figure in the doorway in surprise and joy and called out: “Uncle Duncan?!” In that instant, it was as if all her fear and pressure vanished with his appearance.

Duncan also looked at the young lady with some surprise and said: “Nina?” He had actually followed the mark he had left on Shirley to find this place. He had planned to find Shirley as a helper and then continue searching the remaining parts of the City Museum together, but he had never expected to run into Nina right here.

In the next second, his gaze fell on Shirley.

So that meant… the voice he had heard through the mark earlier, the one talking with Shirley, had been Nina. The “classmate” Nina had mentioned who wanted to come along was Shirley?!

His mind quickly turned a corner, and Duncan understood. Then he noticed how fast Shirley’s expression changed. Before this Summoner, who seemed to have quite a bit of “fate” with him, could speak, he took a step forward, looked around, and said: “Looks like you are all fine.”

In the next second, he noticed there was actually a third person in the room: a young lady in a long dress lay unconscious on the floor, but she still seemed alive.

Shirley finally got her ability to think back. Her mind suddenly replayed everything Nina had just told her. After a long moment, she slowly turned her stiff neck, her face like she had seen a ghost, and said: “Nina… he is… your uncle?”

Nina said happily: “Yeah!” Then she rushed forward, threw herself at Duncan, and asked: “Uncle, how are you here?! Has the fire outside gone out?!”

Duncan answered offhand: “Not yet, but the fire is under control.” He knew such a vague statement would sound suspicious under normal circumstances, but right now Nina was clearly in a state of confusion. The still-shaken girl only clung tightly to his arm, repeating over and over: “That’s great, I thought today I was going to…”

Duncan cut Nina off and said: “Alright, whatever it is, we can talk after we get out. This isn’t the place for talking.” His gaze then swept over Shirley and the lady lying on the floor. “We need to take this lady with us.”

Nina reacted a bit late and said: “Ah… okay!” She hurried over to try to pull the lady up, and Shirley rushed over to help. But because of the difference in height, it was not easy for the two girls. So Duncan took a few steps forward, ready to do it himself.

But just as he reached out to help the lady up, something suddenly entered his sight and made him stop.

It was a purple crystal pendant that looked somewhat familiar.

Duncan paused for a moment and slowly recalled that home visit from old Mr. Morris M, and some things the man had mentioned in their talk.

Nina’s voice came from the side and broke his thoughts: “Uncle?”

Duncan shook his head lightly, glanced at Nina, then let his gaze casually sweep over Shirley at the side. He smiled slightly and said: “The world is small.”

After he spoke, he helped the lady up. With the two girls’ help, he hoisted her onto his back.

The group left the washroom. There were no more flames in the corridor outside, and even the thick smoke had, for “unknown reasons”, faded by more than half. Shirley looked at the dark passage ahead and hesitated before asking: “Which way do we go?”

Duncan raised his head and was about to point out a direction when he suddenly sensed something through the Power of Flame that had spread through the City Museum earlier. His thoughts moved, and he changed his original plan, striding toward another exit to the side and saying: “This way.”

With the fire itself retreating and guiding them, they quickly left the place. Not long after they were gone, a squad of figures suddenly came around the bend in the corridor ahead and appeared near the washroom.

It was the Deep Sea Church Guardian squad that had rushed into the blaze earlier.

The squad members were covered in soot, but the ocean divine blessing on them had not yet faded. They had charged in ready to die, yet the flames in the City Museum had suddenly died down so fast that they came out unharmed.

The leading priest frowned slightly as he looked around and muttered: “The fire here is out too… even the smoke has dispersed.”

One Guardian said quietly: “Fire going out is a good thing.”

The priest spoke in a low voice: “It is a good thing, but under normal circumstances a fire of this size doesn’t go out so easily.” As he spoke, he suddenly noticed the washroom door nearby that had been smashed in.

A Guardian stepped forward at once to inspect it and said: “Someone has been here…” After confirming the marks around the doorway, he deftly took out a censer and a prayer book, and then put a Custom Lens Harness on his head.

The lens array looked like half a helmet made of copper tubes, cranks, and a series of lenses. On the edges of some lenses, one could see complex runes etched into the glass.

The Guardian set the censer on the ground, then adjusted the lenses on his head and began to examine all the remaining traces nearby.

He reported quickly: “No supernatural power left behind… they were a few ordinary people. I can’t tell the exact number; their traces are very mixed. It should be the visitors who were trapped earlier… The door was broken inward. It looks like someone outside smashed it open and rescued them.”

The priest asked: “No supernatural power, confirmed?”

The Guardian replied: “None.”

The priest said: “…Keep searching upward.”

“Yes!”

Chapter 121: Miss Psychiatrist

At an emergency exit on the west side of the City Museum, Duncan led Nina and Shirley out. When fresh air and bright daylight hit them together, Shirley could not help being the first to cheer: “Yes! We got out!”

Duncan glanced at the girl, but before he could say anything, he suddenly felt the young lady on his back move a little. The fresh air and the jolting along the way had finally woken her up.

Duncan quickly found a spot nearby and let her down from his back.

Heidi slowly came to.

Pain. Her forehead hurt as if someone had hit it with a brick, and then came the discomfort in her lungs from breathing in some smoke. Those were Heidi’s first sensations as her consciousness returned. Then she suddenly opened her eyes and began to cough violently.

Only after the confusion and the harsh coughing did she suddenly realize she had been saved. She was somewhere outside the City Museum. Bright sunlight and fresh air surrounded her, and several figures stood in front of her.

Nina crouched down beside the young lady, looked at Heidi with concern as she opened her eyes and tried to get used to the light, and said: “You’re awake. How do you feel? Does anything hurt?”

Heidi’s eyes finally focused and adapted to the bright light outside. She quickly judged the situation and recognized the two young girls in front of her and said: “My head hurts… Did you save me? Ah, it’s you two…”

Shirley froze for a moment and blurted out: “You know us?”

Heidi shook her head as she sat up and looked around, coughing twice, and said: “I don’t. But I remember seeing you in the City Museum.”

Nina spoke quickly: “You were knocked out. Shirley and I dragged you to a safer place for the moment. Then my uncle rushed into the fire to save people and carried you out too. You’re safe now.”

Heidi’s gaze quickly fell on Duncan. She spoke while trying to stand up, as if wanting to bow in thanks: “Your uncle… ah, is it this mister? Thank you…” But before she could finish the motion, she almost fell again.

Duncan caught her and steadied her and said: “No need to be so polite.”

Heidi stood there weakly, bowing her head in gratitude and lingering fear, and said: “Thank you. If it weren’t for you, I would have burned to death in there for sure… This fire was terrifying… I’m so grateful. I really don’t know how I should…”

Duncan smiled at the lady and said: “You don’t need to be so formal. We actually have a bit of a connection… Do you know Mr. Morris M?”

Heidi froze for a moment and looked at Duncan in confusion and said: “That’s my father… You know him?”

Duncan pointed at the purple ‘crystal’ pendant on Heidi’s chest and said: “This pendant of yours is something you took from my shop.”

Heidi glanced down at the pendant on her chest, her expression going blank: “…Huh?!”

Duncan laughed and held out his hand and said: “Small world, isn’t it? Let me introduce myself properly. I’m Duncan Strayne. I run an antique shop in the Lower City. This is my niece, Nina, and this here is…”

Shirley jumped in at once, as if afraid that if she was a step late, her name would come out of some very terrifying being's mouth and pick up the curse or something like that, and said: "I'm Shirley! You… you can just call me Shirley!"

Heidi took Duncan's hand. Her head still felt a bit dizzy, but she did her best to pull herself together and said: "Heidi Underwood. I'm a psychiatrist."

Duncan raised his eyebrows without thinking and asked: "A psychiatrist? You're a psychiatrist?"

Heidi said with some pride: "Ah, yes. I may look a bit young… but I'm a psychiatrist with an Advanced License." She then started patting herself down and finally dug out a wrinkled business card. She held the card out to Duncan with both hands and said: "This is my business card. If it can be of use, I'm always willing to provide free consultations for you…"

A psychiatrist from the Upper City with an Advanced License really might be a useful connection.

Duncan took the business card and glanced at it. It listed the address of a clinic in the Upper City, Heidi's name, her license number, and a line of code made up of five numbers and letters.

Before that line of code, there was a note: "express dispatch code".

Duncan's gaze lingered on the "express dispatch code" for a moment. He remembered that it seemed to be part of Pland's postal system, but not the same as ordinary letters. He vaguely recalled seeing special facilities for sending and receiving "express dispatches" somewhere in the Lower City, but the original Master of this body had never actually used them.

They were expensive. The postage cost almost ten times that of normal letters, and the original Master of this body had no relatives or friends worth spending that kind of money to contact in a hurry.

Duncan only roughly knew that this special kind of “mail” used High-Pressure Steam Conduits and Standard Capsule Pods for fast delivery. It could carry not only letters but also small parcels. Even counting the manual handling at the ends and any possible delivery delays, it took at most a few hours to send something to any corner of the city-state.

What could he say… He could only sigh that she really was a high-end psychiatrist from the Upper City, even using such expensive things just to take appointment requests…

After quietly sighing to himself, Duncan put the business card away carefully. Then he heard Heidi suddenly speak: “By the way, do you need… post-disaster mental evaluations?”

Duncan gave her a puzzled look, and the young Miss Psychiatrist quickly explained: “Of course it’s free—I don’t mean anything else by it. It’s just that after an accident, people’s minds are very easy to hurt. Especially in a place like the City Museum, where there are many exhibits with historical attributes. Heavy mental stress plus the influence of certain items… it’s easy to leave shadows on the mind.”

Heidi seemed to be choosing her words carefully. She wanted to share some very professional, high-level “knowledge” that was even a bit removed from ordinary life with the people in front of her, but she also worried that this kind of “popular science” might be insulting. So she tried her best to sound sincere and gentle. Duncan could see her effort, but what he was thinking about was something else—

He himself certainly did not need any mental evaluation. After being a “captain” for so long, he was well aware of how special he was. Forget some mental pressure from a fire like this—even if something crawled out of the Abyssal Deep Sea, to say hello to him, the one who would need a sanity check afterward would be the other side.

As for Shirley… a tough girl who could swing Abyssal demons around and fight cultists for three hundred rounds hardly needed a mental evaluation. The mental shock she got from this whole fire was probably smaller than the shadow left in her heart when she saw him kick the door open…

But Nina… Nina might really need a psychiatrist's help.

It was not just because of today's fire. It was more because of her poor mental state these days and those dreams that felt a lot like prophetic visions.

This needed a professional to handle. His own power was useless in this field. Before, he and Nina had discussed going to the Cathedral when they had a chance, but now that a high-level psychiatrist was willing to help… it would be a waste not to use it.

Duncan glanced at his "niece", reached out to ruffle the girl's hair, and said: "Nina might need help. But not just because of today's fire—she's been having strange dreams lately, and her mental state is very poor."

Nina muttered at once: "I'm actually fine…"

Heidi smiled, pointed at herself, and said: "It's free. My usual consultation fee is…" She accidentally poked the place where the brick had hit her and cried out: "Ow, ow, ow!"

A big lump had swollen up where the brick had hit her forehead, and it hurt whenever she touched it.

Shirley, who had been quiet for a long time, joined in the fun and said: "Exactly, it's free. Don't waste it. She still owes us a favor anyway…"

Nina hesitated for a moment and finally nodded slightly and said: “Then… alright.” But then she looked at Heidi in confusion. “What do you need for a mental evaluation? Can we do it here? Do I have to answer some questions? Or fill out forms?”

Heidi explained with a smile: “We at least need a quiet environment, and I need to be in better shape—at least until this big bump on my head goes down a bit. I’m a professional, not like those lousy doctors who write you a diagnosis report after asking a few random questions. How about this: tomorrow is a school rest day. If Miss Nina has time, I’ll visit you in the afternoon. I’ll ask my father for your address.”

She paused as she spoke and gently touched the wound on her forehead.

She said: “As for now, I need to find a place to treat this wound first… hiss…”

Duncan thought for a moment and said: “There are constables keeping order at the square, and there are medical staff there too. Do you need us to go with you? In your current state…”

Heidi waved her hand and said: “No need. I’m completely awake now.” She then looked back at the City Museum, which was still sending up faint smoke. A trace of lingering fear and undisguised regret came to her face. “Sigh… my rare day off… completely ruined.”

Duncan said casually: “Having a ruined day off really is a terrible thing. But the good thing is we just survived a disaster, right?”

Heidi spoke, then sighed again and muttered: “Alright… that’s true when you put it that way. Sigh, I just hope certain heretic elements and moving Calamities can behave themselves a bit. Then at least my next day off might come a little sooner… Ah, sorry, I shouldn’t complain about this in front of strangers. Please don’t mind me.”

Duncan said: “…?”

Chapter 122: The Figure at the Edge of the Square

After asking clearly where the relief station near the square was, Heidi left on her own, holding her head. Duncan, however, had no intention of going over to deal with the official personnel there—mainly because Shirley was standing beside him now, and this girl who could summon Abyssal demons clearly did not want to have anything to do with the Deep Sea Church.

He watched Heidi's figure grow smaller in the distance and let out a soft breath. Then he turned to Nina first: "You didn't get hurt, did you?"

"No." Nina was still a little shaken. She had been unconsciously clutching Duncan's sleeve, and only now suddenly realized it and let go. Then she looked at Duncan in surprise. "You still haven't told me. Why did you show up at the City Museum?"

"I happened to be dealing with something nearby," Duncan said with a smile. "Then I suddenly heard the City Museum was on fire, so I came to save you."

Before she could say anything else, he reached out and rubbed the girl's hair, comforting the recently frightened Nina: "All right, it's over. As long as you aren't hurt."

"…I'm not a little child anymore!" Nina shook her head. Then her gaze fell on Shirley, who was standing beside her. She was about to speak when a strange look suddenly appeared on her face, as if she had remembered something that didn’t quite fit. She looked Shirley up and down. “Shirley… why do I suddenly feel… that you’re a bit…”

A moment ago, Shirley’s attention had been completely on Duncan. Now, when she saw Nina’s reaction, panic showed plainly on her face. Her eyes opened a little wider. In her fluster she glanced at Duncan, and there was even more fear in her expression.

Duncan’s heart stirred when he saw this change, because this young lady’s face looked exactly the same as when she had been caught skipping the tram fare. He glanced thoughtfully at Nina and went back over, in his mind, how he had dealt with Shirley before and what identity she was playing now—

Known facts: both times he had dealt with Shirley were when Nina was in class at school. Also known: Shirley’s real personality was awful, rough, and hot-tempered, nothing like a “quiet, well?behaved child.” Also known: one of Dog’s abilities as a Abyssal demon was to interfere with an ordinary person’s judgment to maintain a disguise…

And her current “identity” was Nina’s new friend at school. That identity was full of holes.

Duncan rubbed his chin, set a hand on Nina’s shoulder, and jerked his chin toward Shirley. “Do you really know her?”

“Of course. Her name is Shirley. She’s a new friend I made, but…” Nina frowned. “But for some reason, just now I suddenly couldn’t remember when she showed up at school…”

Duncan turned his head and let his gaze rest quietly on Shirley, who was already trying hard to lower her presence. After a long moment he spoke softly: “You still have a chance to explain yourself, or I…”

He had barely finished speaking when Shirley burst out in a rapid rush of words: “I’m sorry, I was wrong, I only slipped into the school because I wanted to investigate something, but I really didn’t hurt Nina, and just now in the City Museum I even blocked the falling beam for her, please believe me, I really didn’t know she was your retainer, I don’t know what a big shot like you is into, please, just let me—”

Duncan hadn’t even had time to say the rest before he was stunned by this barrage from the girl who had once swung a dog around, her voice on the verge of tears. His first reaction was that this girl was incredibly gifted and might even serve as a good sparring partner for Goathead…

Then he cleared his throat twice and cut off Shirley’s babbling. “She’s not a retainer. She’s my niece.”

As he spoke, his gaze fell on Shirley’s hands.

They bore signs of burns. Thanks to her amazing healing, only faint scars were left, but she really did seem to have been hurt in the City Museum.

If she wasn’t lying—and she probably didn’t dare—then she really had done it to protect Nina.

Shirley, of course, had no idea what Duncan was thinking. Her mind was almost blank. “If… if you say she’s your niece, then she’s your niece…”

Only then did Nina slowly react. She looked at her uncle in surprise, then at the “friend” in front of her. “Wait, you two… already know each other? And Shirley, why did you—”

“By chance,” Duncan said calmly. He did not let Shirley speak, because who knew what this girl might blurt out in front of Nina. “Looks like we have a lot to talk about. Don’t you think so, Shirley?”

Shirley was almost in tears. She looked at Duncan with a long face. “If you say so, then—”

“You say so.”

“…Yes, that’s right.”

“Uncle, don’t be so fierce to Shirley,” Nina said. She was still completely confused, but she could see that, for some reason, this new friend was very afraid of her uncle, and her uncle was not being very polite to Shirley either. That made her uneasy and puzzled at the same time. “My head is a mess right now… can someone explain what is going on?”

“We’ll talk slowly when we get home,” Duncan sighed. He looked up at the City Museum, which was still sending out smoke, then turned in the direction he had come from. “It’s too chaotic here. And the two of you are covered in soot. We need to go back, wash up, and change clothes.”

Shirley stammered, “I… I’m coming too?”

Then, before Duncan could answer, she nodded hard to herself. “You’re right!”

Duncan sighed, half helpless and half amused. No matter why Shirley had approached Nina at first, from now on she would definitely be harmless at Nina’s side. He shook his head and prepared to leave with the two girls.

Just then, his gaze happened to sweep over the edge of the City Museum square.

A figure standing near the crowd at the edge of the square suddenly caught his eye.

It was a figure in a black coat, back turned to them, looking toward the burning building. From the back, it seemed to be a tall, thin man. His coat looked like a long trench coat, its long hem almost covering his whole body. The strangest part was that he was holding a large black umbrella on this bright, sunny day.

There was no wind and no rain, and the sunlight was not even very strong. Yet a tall, thin man in a long coat stood at the edge of the square under an open umbrella, watching the fire. No matter where you put it, that scene would look strange. But many people were gathered at the edge of the square, and not a single one was looking in the direction of the man with the umbrella.

“Uncle?” Nina noticed Duncan suddenly stop and looked curiously toward where he was staring. “Is something over there?”

“There is a man over there holding an umbrella on a sunny day. It’s very strange,” Duncan said casually.

“A man with an umbrella on a sunny day?” Nina froze. “Where? I don’t see him…”

“I don’t see him either,” Shirley said, rubbing her eyes and following Duncan’s line of sight with curiosity. “Maybe your eyes are playing tricks on you…”

“You both can’t see him?” Duncan’s brow furrowed at once. He glanced at Shirley and Nina, then turned his eyes back toward the square—and in that instant, the man with the umbrella had already vanished.

“Uncle?” Nina looked at Duncan, worried. “Did you breathe in too much smoke just now? Are you feeling sick?”

“…I’m fine. Maybe my eyes just played a trick on me.” Duncan only shook his head and answered lightly so Nina would not worry.

But his gaze still stayed on the square. Before he finally looked away, he fixed his gaze on that spot one last time.

If it was only a strange man with an umbrella, then it was no big deal.

But if it was a figure only he could see, that was a different matter.

He remembered that figure.

…

Vanna led a squad of elite guardians to the Ocean City Museum, but by the time she arrived, the sudden blaze was already nearing its end.

A soot?covered Deep Sea priest came up to the Inquisitor with several guardian warriors who had also just rushed out of the fire.

“The fire suddenly died down on its own,” the Deep Sea priest reported at once after saluting Vanna. “But we didn’t find any traces of supernatural power left at the scene.”

“Died down on its own?” Vanna’s face grew serious at the report. “…You led the team into the fire. Did you find anything odd?”

“Among the citizens fleeing the scene, there was a large number showing extreme panic, hallucinations, and babbling. I suspect there is supernatural corruption in the City Museum,” the priest said with a nod. “But we searched the place and found nothing… The only abnormal thing was that the flames suddenly died down on their own.”

As he spoke, the priest made a gesture of prayer to the Goddess and added, “But it was also because the fire faded that the guardians and I were able to retreat safely.”

Vanna thought for a moment and nodded slightly. “All right. When the fire is completely out, I’ll have people search the City Museum again from top to bottom, to see if any exhibits have changed…”

After giving these brief orders, the young Inquisitor raised her head. Her gaze swept over the citizens who were receiving aid and mental guidance, as if she were searching for someone in the crowd.

Just then, a voice called from not far away: “Vanna! I’m here!”

Vanna looked up and saw the bedraggled Heidi waving hard at her from the crowd.

Chapter 123: Sealed in Memory

Heidi ran up to Vanna, out of breath. Nearby guardians reflexively moved to block her when they saw her approach, but they soon recognized that this disheveled, soot?covered miss was the senior advisor to the City Hall and the Church, so they let her pass at once.

“So you personally led the team?” Heidi looked in surprise at the fully armed Vanna, then glanced at the elite church troops behind her. “And you brought so many people?”

“A fire at the City Museum isn’t an ordinary incident,” Vanna said briefly. Then she looked Heidi up and down several times, and only relaxed after confirming that her friend was unharmed. “Looks like your vacation is ruined.”

“It’s ruined again!” Heidi said, her face full of sorrow and resignation. “Why am I always this unlucky… ah, ow…”

Vanna noticed the unusual lump on Heidi’s head. She stepped forward, laid her fingers lightly near the wound, and at the same time looked toward the direction Heidi had run from. Her brows drew together slightly. “Did you just escape from there?”

“I was rescued by someone… ah, that feels much better…” As the pain in her forehead slowly faded, Heidi’s thoughts also began to clear. Then she froze for a moment, as if she had suddenly recalled something. She quickly looked around, then hurried close to Vanna. “I need a quiet place under a divine blessing, preferably inside the Cathedral.”

Seeing her friend suddenly grow serious, Vanna reacted at once. She did not ask anything. Instead, she turned to the priests she had brought. “Take over order at the scene. Seal off the City Museum. Raise the corruption level to Spirit Realm—”

She had not finished when Heidi spoke in a low, urgent voice: “Abyssal Deep level.”

“Adjust it to Abyssal Deep level. Clear all ordinary people within two hundred meters of the square!” Vanna’s heart lurched, and she gave her orders at once. Then she turned to the bearded local priest. “Take us to the nearest Cathedral. We need a separate prayer room—prepare No.16 Sacramental Incense.”

The priest who had just escaped the fire bowed his head at once. “Yes. Please follow me. It’s near the square.”

Vanna took Heidi away from the square at once. Together with the guiding priest, they rode toward the community Cathedral near the plaza. Before they arrived, Vanna noticed that Heidi’s face had started to flush in an abnormal way.

“What’s happening?” Vanna frowned and touched Heidi’s forehead. The burning heat beneath her fingers made her voice change at once. “Why are you this hot?!”

“I may have come into contact with something in the City Museum,” Heidi said quickly. “I used self?hypnosis to seal some information in the depths of my memory. The hypnosis just wore off… I’m starting to remember it bit by bit.”

As she listened, Vanna’s eyes widened slightly, and in her heart she quickly reached a judgment—

Severe supernatural manifestation and corruption, able to affect the Mortal Realm world through cognition alone.

“Stop remembering at once. Slow your thoughts,” Vanna said, pressing a hand on Heidi’s shoulder. “Look into my eyes. Shift your attention somewhere else. If you can’t, then hypnotize yourself again!”

“I’ll try.” Heidi took a slow breath and fixed her gaze on Vanna’s eyes, deep and calm like the sea. She tried hard to control the memories rising in her mind, to keep herself from recalling that vast and solemn river of fire, that sea of flames surging and rolling in the dark void. But the memories still leaked out bit by bit, like blood seeping from a wound, impossible to stop.

Suddenly, a faint coolness rose from her chest, and Heidi, who had felt as if she were about to be swallowed by fire, came to herself a little.

She looked down by instinct and saw that the glass “crystal pendant” that could only count as a free trinket in a Lower City antique shop was glowing faintly on her chest.

That tiny bit of light was almost impossible to see with the naked eye, yet it was like an anchor rooted firmly in the Mortal Realm, pulling her scattered spirit back together.

The next second, she heard the priest’s voice from the front. “We’ve reached the Cathedral!”

With the powerful Saint Vanna personally escorting her, Heidi was rushed into the Cathedral. Thanks to the priest’s earlier Psychic Transmission to the Cathedral, a prayer room had already been prepared, and incense with strong soothing and protective effects was burning.

In the faint smoke from the incense, the holy statue of the storm Goddess Gamona looked down quietly at Heidi and Vanna as they hurried into the room.

The priest was left outside the prayer room—because he might not be able to withstand the mental corruption that could follow.

As Heidi stepped into the prayer room, Vanna heard unreal waves crash by her ears. A feeling as if a supreme, great being was directly casting a gaze over her swept across her soul. Right after that, every lamp and candle in the Cathedral flared up, roaring, their flames laced with sharp crackles!

She looked up at the statue of the storm Goddess and saw it suddenly grow distant yet towering. An indescribable air of majesty poured out from the statue and slowly gathered around Heidi.

“The Lord has cast a gaze…” The manifestations in the prayer room made Vanna’s heart jump, but then she slowly let out a breath. She looked at Heidi and saw that the flush on her face was fading. “You are safe now. Release your memories. Let us see what you saw.”

Heidi did not speak. She only nodded lightly, then took off one of her earrings. There was a tiny shifting mechanism at its end. She pressed it with a fingernail, and a spike only a few millimeters long popped out.

Without a trace of hesitation, she gripped the earring tightly, letting fresh blood seep into her palm.

This was the deepest mental suggestion she had planted in herself when she first became a psychiatrist—when the Platinum Spike pierced her palm, all unclean things sealed in her memory could be released.

In the next second, the unreal, layered sound of waves in the prayer room suddenly grew very clear, while all the burning candles turned dim and flickering. It was as if the whole room were covered in shifting, blurry veils. Those veils rippled layer upon layer around the Goddess’s statue, and within them vague phantoms appeared—

It was a scene Heidi had urgently sealed inside her own memory.

It was only the instant truth she had glimpsed in a single flash.

In those swaying, unreal veils, Vanna saw what Heidi had seen before:

In a pitch?black void, a column of flame shot up, more blazing than any fire in the world, more shocking than any power humans had ever created. It was like a towering wave of flame sweeping out to devour all things, and even someone like Vanna, the Saint, felt every muscle in her body tighten the moment she saw it!

How far did that flame surge through the darkness? Hundreds of thousands of kilometers? A million? Even farther?

What was that? Pure fire? Or something more primal than fire, a kind of power that could touch truth from before time?

Vanna did not know when she had stopped breathing. She watched the stream of fire rise in the darkness, then slowly fall. The flowing fire was like thick ointment, forming a grand, ragged arc in the empty dark. Only when the vision slowly faded, and the unreal layered sound of waves eased around her, did she begin to recover her senses.

She did not know how much time passed before she suddenly felt something like sea wind moistening her thoughts. The storm Goddess's gentle comfort woke her. She looked at Heidi and found that Heidi too was staring at her in shock, as if fixing a gaze on her.

"This… is what you saw in the City Museum?"

"Maybe… I think so…" Heidi's heart pounded. Even though this scene had been drawn from her own memory, the way self?hypnosis worked still made it feel beyond anything she had imagined. "But this thing… doesn't seem like the kind of 'exhibit' you can keep in a single City Museum…"

"This can't be any kind of 'exhibit'," Vanna said quickly. "Even if we can't judge how large it really is, I know by instinct that it can't be stored inside any building… You could not have seen it in the Mortal Realm.”

Heidi paused, her brows tightly knitted. After a long time she spoke, unsure. “I might have seen it while I was unconscious… and done the self?hypnosis while I was unconscious. What I saw may not have been its real body, but its ‘projection’ on the spiritual level.”

“Are you sure?” Vanna looked at her. “I’m not questioning your skill as a psychiatrist, but… finishing a temporary containment seal against mental corruption while unconscious is not easy.”

“I am confident,” Heidi said, nodding slowly but firmly. “I received strict training in this field at Truth Academy. I can rely on my subconscious to complete the containment of dangerous information even when my main consciousness is in a runaway state. But because self?hypnosis in that state is uncontrollable, it makes me forget many key details. So I can’t tell you the exact circumstances under which I saw this ‘projection’, or what the trigger or medium was.”

“…All right. I believe in your professional skill,” Vanna said, staring at Heidi for a while before letting out a slow breath. “It seems… you really did see something truly extraordinary.”

Chapter 124: The Fragment’s Reflection

Incense burned in the prayer room under the divine gaze of the Goddess’s statue. The two longtime friends fell silent at the same time. Only the divine blessing sent down by the God gently soothed their still-frightened hearts. A faint, calm sound of waves echoed in Vanna’s ears. It was the whisper of the storm Goddess Gamona.

The Goddess still watched this place, with an attention unlike ever before.

After who knew how long, Heidi finally calmed down. She carefully broke the silence: “What exactly did I see?”

Vanna hesitated for a moment before speaking softly: “Maybe… that was exactly what those Suntists have been searching for.”

“What those Suntists have been searching for?” Heidi froze for a moment. “You mean…”

“The Sun fragment,” Vanna nodded lightly before Heidi could finish. “Maybe only a Sun fragment could match the power you saw in that vision.”

As she spoke, Vanna slowly lifted her head and looked up at the statue of the storm Goddess, murmuring thoughtfully: “After all… those Heretics claim that the Sun fragments are the remains that fell from the so-called ‘true Sun’…”

Heidi paused, and her expression changed slightly: “If something like that really appeared in the Mortal Realm, the city-state of Pland couldn’t still be as safe as it looks now…”

“So it must have been under some kind of seal,” Vanna nodded. “Our information says a Sun fragment appeared in the city-state of Pland eleven years ago. But now it seems that so-called ‘appearance’ was only a bit of its power leaking out. For the past eleven years, it has probably stayed asleep…”

“And now those Suntists want to wake that thing up?!” Heidi looked horrified. “Do they want to destroy all of Pland?!”

“It’s not your first day dealing with cultists,” Vanna glanced at Heidi. “You still don’t understand their state of mind? For those fanatical Heretics, as long as they can awaken the ‘Black Sun’, sacrificing one or two city-states in a sacrificial rite is nothing. They wouldn’t even mind letting the whole world burn, just to become kindling for the Sun God’s recovery!”

Heidi opened her mouth but did not speak for a long time. Vanna steadied her own emotions, then slowly said: “The key now is what exactly happened when you saw that vision—what happened to you, what happened around you, and what happened inside The City Museum itself. Only by figuring these out can we know in what state that fragment is sleeping, and where it is actually sleeping.”

“…No, I can’t remember the details,” Heidi tapped her forehead lightly. “But I can now be sure that I really saw its projection while I was unconscious, and that I put myself under emergency hypnosis to preserve the important clues… Let me think. At the time, someone rescued me and temporarily placed me in a room on the first floor of The City Museum… After I came out, they told me that room was close to the main exhibition hall…”

As Heidi struggled to recall, she asked, thinking aloud: “Can’t we take this to mean that the clue is inside The City Museum?”

“It’s hard to say. From the viewpoint of occult studies, what you saw was not the fragment itself, but a little ‘shadow’ leaking from a huge supernatural existence into the Mortal Realm. The City Museum is not necessarily where the fragment sleeps. There might only be a ‘rift’ there, and because the mental defenses of humans are weak while they are unconscious, your mind accidentally crossed that rift and saw what lies on the other side.

“Rifts that hover at the edge of the Mortal Realm are often unstable. It might have been at The City Museum before, but now it may have already shifted somewhere else.”

Vanna explained patiently, then suddenly shook her head: “Of course, we will still carry out a top-level search of The City Museum and keep it under watch afterward. Anomalies and Visions are always irregular. It’s possible that the fragment really stayed in The City Museum in some sealed form. Even if it did not, we might still find some clues in the burned ruins to explain why the ‘rift’ appeared at The City Museum in the first place…”

“But the follow-up search has nothing to do with you. For safety, you’d better stay away from The City Museum for the next month.”

“Of course, I’d love to keep my distance from all this,” Heidi nodded at once. “I’ve already had more than enough bad luck!”

Vanna silently looked at this friend who had been unlucky since childhood. She seemed about to say something, but in the end she said nothing. She simply stood there under the Goddess’s statue in silence. After half a minute, she suddenly asked: “Who rescued you?”

“Two girls still in school, and a man who looked to be in his forties,” Heidi thought for a moment. “Funny enough, one of those girls is exactly the student my father visited at home a few days ago, and the man is her uncle… I told you about him, right? His name is Duncan Strayne. He is an antique shopkeeper.”

“…I’m a little allergic to the name ‘Duncan’ right now,” Vanna’s mouth visibly twitched. “Even though I know it can’t be the same person…”

“My reaction was the same when I first heard that name from my father,” Heidi spread her hands. “Speaking of that, I promised that gentleman I would go to his place tomorrow afternoon to give his niece a psychological evaluation, and it will also be a proper visit to thank him. Everything was a mess today, and I said goodbye in a hurry. It really wasn’t very polite.”

“Strictly speaking, it’s not only that ‘niece’ who needs a psychological evaluation,” Vanna’s expression suddenly turned serious. She stared straight at Heidi. “All three of them do.”

“Why…” Heidi spoke without thinking, then suddenly realized. “Ah!”

“Right. They were all next to you at the time, and you saw the shape of the Sun fragment while you were unconscious,” Vanna looked straight into Heidi’s eyes. “If that really was the remains of one of the Elder Gods, its corruption may have already spread to them through your mind. The scope of that corruption might be small, but for an ordinary person, it could still be fatal.”

Heidi was stunned.

…

In the Lower City’s antique shop, Duncan had already closed up early. He sat in a relaxed posture on the chair behind the counter, while Nina and Shirley sat facing him, one on each side.

The two of them had taken a shower in the simple bathroom upstairs. Nina had changed into clean clothes, but Shirley still wore her black dress—not because Nina refused to lend her clothes, but because their body sizes were too different. Shirley herself had turned down those outfits that would hang far too loose on her.

Of course, whether she had other worries when she refused was another matter… Maybe Shirley thought that taking Nina's clothes would be like accepting a gift from an Eldritch God's retainer. Only she knew for sure.

On the other side of the counter, the pigeon AI was strolling about at ease.

A big pile of fries was stacked on the table behind it—that was what Duncan had promised it.

AI had finally gotten the fries it had been longing for. Nina had come home safe and sound. Duncan had rescued his niece and had become even more familiar with the Power of Flame.

Everyone was happy.

Except Shirley.

She was almost in tears—she had wanted to cry several times today.

"So… Shirley, you actually aren't my classmate… You just used some kind of 'detective trick' to sneak into the school and investigate something," Nina looked at the friend she had finally managed to make, her expression a bit complicated. "You don't even like steam and machinery…"

"I can't even understand those textbooks at all…" Shirley spoke carefully. She answered Nina, but her eyes kept drifting toward Duncan from time to time. "Sorry, I… I'm sorry."

But Nina seemed not to notice Shirley's apology. She only frowned in confusion: "But how did you do it? I… thinking back now, you always suddenly appeared in my classroom, and you often showed up around me, but you never really attended class. Even the teachers and classmates nearby never seemed to notice you, you…”

Shirley quickly glanced at Duncan again. After she confirmed that his expression was still calm, she muttered under her breath: “It was actually just a little supernatural trick…”

“supernatural?” Nina’s eyes widened in surprise. “Are you a Church investigator?”

“No, no, I’m not with the Church, I…” Shirley stole another look at Duncan. She remembered the warnings this big boss had given her earlier when Nina went upstairs to bathe. She still had no idea why this big boss wanted to play a ‘pretend to be human’ game in this antique shop, but she still obeyed his orders honestly. “I’m more like a wild… a wild supernatural…”

Nina looked utterly shocked. “…There are wild supernatural too?!”

“If you’re not registered anywhere, then you’re wild,” Shirley spoke as if she had given up on something, her tone a little reckless. “The dogs in the Church… those troublesome people, isn’t that what they usually call people like us?”

Nina listened to Shirley’s explanation in a daze. Then Nina looked her up and down several times. That careful gaze made Shirley feel very uneasy, and she instinctively tried to dodge: “Why are you looking at me like that…”

“Then you’re amazing!” Nina suddenly said, very seriously.

Chapter 125: Getting to Know Each Other

Nina’s attention seemed stuck on a very strange point, but for Shirley, that was a good thing.

Shirley had already, deep down, started to see this seemingly simple, ordinary girl as the retainer of some Subspace Shadows, and not just any retainer, but a cherished-daughter-level retainer. The fewer bad impressions Shirley left in front of this retainer, the better her odds of surviving when she faced the big boss.

Nina had no idea how many worries hid behind Shirley’s stiff, awkward smile. The young lady was now both amazed and a little excited, because she had never been this close to a real supernatural before (her usual visits to the Cathedral did not count). What she knew about such things came only from books, and in her eyes, Shirley, who had used some kind of “supernatural illusion” to slip into the school and investigate, was now surrounded by a mysterious and powerful glow.

She even forgot, for a while, about Shirley’s small “deception” toward her, and instead put all her attention on the unusual life and adventures of an supernatural—even if those adventures were mostly things Nina made up herself: “Where do you usually live? Do you have your own secret base or something? Or a very mysterious organization?

“Do you usually hide in caves? Or in sewers? Do you have some warehouse-like place to store all kinds of ritual items?

“Were you born with special powers? Or do you have some powerful supernatural item? Are you one of those legendary ‘Arcanists’? I heard there is an ancient profession like that. Arcanists can cast spells without relying on any god. They say their power comes from their bloodline…

“What do you usually eat? Do you have to drink herbal brews or strange animal blood all the time? Huh? You eat normal food too? Really?”

Nina’s questions came one after another, crackling on without end. By the time Shirley answered half of them, sweat had already formed on her forehead—not because she could not answer, but because Duncan was sitting right beside them!

From the start, Duncan had been quietly watching Shirley, with a warm and gentle smile—on the surface, he looked just like a parent who showed up to greet a child’s classmate visiting the house.

Plain, kind, completely harmless.

But every time he smiled, Shirley broke out in a new layer of cold sweat.

“You seem really scared of my uncle,” even Nina, slow as she was in such things, noticed Shirley’s strange behavior. When she also recalled Shirley’s reaction back at The City Museum, she could not help asking: “What exactly happened between you two?”

“N-nothing! Really!” Shirley almost jolted upright in her seat, waving her hands hard. “What… what could happen between me and your uncle, I’m still a child…”

When Duncan heard that, he felt something sounded off. He knew he could not let the two young ladies keep going on their own. Before Shirley’s wild talk got any worse, he coughed twice to interrupt: “It really was nothing. She just tried to ride without a ticket once, and I happened to catch her.”

“Just because of that?” Nina looked at Shirley in surprise. “That shouldn’t leave such a big shadow, right… But Uncle is right, fare-dodging is bad.”

Shirley was almost in tears. “I really won’t dodge tickets anymore, okay?!”

Nina nodded, then suddenly seemed to think of something. She looked at Shirley very seriously: “Then… can you tell me what you’re actually investigating? Did you become friends with me because of your ‘investigation’?”

Shirley’s back went ramrod straight, and her eyes started to drift to the side, but halfway over they met Duncan’s calm gaze.

“I am investigating the fire from eleven years ago,” Shirley suddenly lowered her head a little, as if something had finally clicked in her mind—or as if she had just decided to give up. Her voice dropped. “The one in the official records, the factory leak incident in the Sixth District…”

“The fire from eleven years ago?” Nina’s eyes went wide at once, her tone full of shock. “Wait… you know about that big fire too?!”

“…You know too?!” Shirley also looked shocked. She stood up straight from the chair. “You went through that fire as well?”

“Of course I know. My parents died in that fire—that year I was six, and Uncle Duncan was the one who saved me,” Nina spoke quickly, gesturing without thinking. “But all this time, everyone said the poisonous smoke in the streets confused me. They all said there was no big fire at all. Even the later newspapers said it was just a factory accident…”

“That year… I was six too. My parents also died in the fire. I remember it clearly,” Shirley stared straight into Nina’s eyes. “But the people around me also told me there was no fire back then… No wonder, no wonder Dog said it smelled a familiar scent on you…”

As soon as she finished, Duncan's voice came from the side: "So it was Dog that led you toward Nina, and that's why you slipped into the school—and you didn't know why you had to do it, so you were just as shocked when you heard Nina just now."

Meeting Duncan's calm gaze, Shirley quickly nodded. Nina, however, looked puzzled: "Dog? Who is Dog?"

"Dog is…" Shirley began, then hesitated the next second. She glanced at Duncan, then at Nina. "Dog is my friend. It's right beside me, but its appearance might be a little scary…"

As Shirley said this, she felt extremely strange inside—because there was clearly a Subspace Shadows sitting right here that was countless times scarier than Dog, and this Subspace Shadows even lived with Nina day and night. Yet she had to go along with the big boss's "personal hobby", pretend that Dog was the scariest thing here, and treat the big boss as an ordinary person…

To be fair, in her daily life Shirley used Dog's disguise ability to move around everywhere. She had dealt with cultists, with constables, and even with priests from small local Cathedrals. But all of that put together was not as tense and frightening as sitting in this antique shop for ten minutes.

In her eyes, this ordinary-looking shop was almost on the same level as an entrance to the Subspace.

Nina only looked around curiously, trying to find a sign of "Dog" near Shirley. After peering about for quite a while, she finally asked in curiosity: "Then let 'Dog' come out and meet me. Since it's your friend… what is there to be afraid of?"

Shirley was still a little hesitant, but Duncan suddenly tapped the table lightly and said to Nina: "Then you have to be mentally prepared. I've seen Dog. It’s really ugly.”

“…Now I’m even more curious,” when Nina saw the reactions of Uncle Duncan and Shirley, her curiosity only grew. “I really want to meet this ‘Mr. Dog’ and find out why your friend has such a strange name…”

“All right, since you want to see it,” Duncan shook his head and looked at Shirley with a bit of helplessness. “Let Dog come out and say hello. After all, it’s also today’s ‘guest’.”

Under normal circumstances, Shirley would never expose the secret between herself and Dog. In an orderly city-state, walking together with Abyssal demons was an extreme taboo. If the priests of the Church of the Deep Sea sensed even a trace of the Abyssal Deep’s aura, they could point an Eight-Pound Cannon and a Six-Barrel Machine Gun at her without a second thought.

But now, a Subspace Shadows-level existence was asking her to summon Dog.

“…Okay.”

She nodded, then slowly raised her arm.

In the next second, under Nina’s shocked and slightly nervous gaze, pitch-black flames and thick smoke suddenly rose around Shirley!

Chains stretched out from the flames, and at the end of the smoke and dark fire, the form of a Abyssal demon took shape.

The Abyssal Hound appeared in the flames, then in a single second it shrank into a ball, wrapped its front paws around its head to hide its scariest eye sockets, and, inside a puff of black smoke, greeted Nina in a muffled voice: “Good evening, Miss. I am Dog, Shirley’s friend and guardian dog. My looks do not meet the mainstream human sense of beauty, but you can view me with an abstract and tolerant eye. That way I am just a clever stack of bone shards and a patch of fire with a slightly unusual color…”

Duncan gave Shirley a calm look: “Honestly, I’ve never seen a dog that acts this much from the heart… Judging by personality alone, it’s actually quite cute.”

On the other side, Nina stared, dumbfounded. She stared at Dog for a long moment before finally letting out a cry: “Ah!”

Shirley hurried to speak: “I told you you might be scared…”

But before she could finish, she heard the second half of Nina’s shout: “This is amazing too!”

Shirley was speechless: “…?”

“Y-you… hello?” While Shirley was still stunned, Nina had already begun to greet Dog, testing the words. “Mr. Dog? Uh, are you a ‘mister’?”

“Abyssal demons have no gender, but if you wish, you may call me that,” Dog answered in a muffled voice, sounding a bit surprised as well. “You… are not afraid of me?”

“It’s not so bad. You do look a little scary, though,” Nina thought for a moment, then broke into a bright smile. “But I’m pretty brave~”

Chapter 126: What Did You See

Watching Nina go from shock and nerves to pure excited curiosity in just a moment, Shirley really could not hold back and muttered under her breath: “At this point, you are way past just being brave…”

Nina did not hear what Shirley was whispering. All of Nina’s attention was already drawn to the pitch-black skeletal hound in front of her. She jumped down from the chair and walked around Dog twice, carefully studying him from head to toe. When she finally saw Dog’s hollow eye sockets, filled with blood-red light, she did get a fright, but it was only a little scare.

“So amazing…” she repeated again. She even looked like she wanted to reach out and touch Dog’s bony head, but at the last second she pulled her hand back. Instead, she lifted her head to look at Shirley: “This is my first time seeing an supernatural being with my own eyes… What is Dog? Is he a creature summoned by a spell, or…”

“He is a demon,” Shirley answered honestly. She sounded as if she wanted to scare Nina, to make Nina realize at least a bit how dangerous Dog was. “The most dangerous kind of demon.”

Nina was indeed a little stunned. She had not expected that this creature who, aside from his ugly appearance, seemed polite in every way would actually carry the name of “demon.” Her face was full of disbelief: “He is… a demon?”

“Strictly speaking, a Abyssal demon,” Dog raised his head a little. His hollow eye sockets turned their gaze on Nina. “Miss, this is probably the first time you have seen a Abyssal demon. Do not let my existence give you the wrong impression of Abyssal demons. My kin come in many shapes, and what they have in common is that they are especially cruel and merciless…”

“Abyssal Deep…” Nina froze for a moment. She finally woke up from the mix of nervousness and novelty of seeing an supernatural being for the first time, and she recalled what the books had said: “Shirley, you…”

“As you can see, I am bound to Abyssal demons,” Shirley lifted her arm and showed Nina the chain that had fused into her body. “So I do not want people to know my secret. Do you understand? If people from the Deep Sea Church find out, they will throw me into a fire without a second thought, or throw me into the Boundless Sea.”

Shirley’s expression was very serious. From this, Nina realized something. She gave Shirley a slightly complicated look, then looked at Dog again: “… I read in a book that in the Deep Sea within the Abyssal Deep, there are crazed, evil creations everywhere. They are the waste expelled from the holy body of the Abyssal Deep. From birth to their end, they are ruled by chaos and madness. But Mr. Dog looks…”

“Dog is special,” Shirley said quietly. “Normal Abyssal demons have no heart and do not understand human feelings. But Dog does. Even he does not know why this change happened to him. Because of it, he cannot survive in the Deep Sea of the Abyssal Deep anymore.”

Nina stared in a daze, half understanding, and nodded: “Oh.”

While she spoke, she fell into a short silence. Then she suddenly scratched her hair and looked at Duncan with some distress: “Uncle, my head feels all messy.”

She thought back over the chaotic things she had gone through today, the time she had spent with Shirley, and then looked at Dog in front of her. A strange sense of unreality, as if she had stepped outside the Mortal Realm, finally and clumsily rose up inside her.

“You went through a lot today,” Duncan’s gentle and calm voice came, like a candle lighting up in the dark. It made Nina’s suddenly dazed mind settle down again. “Feeling a bit confused is normal.”

Nina blinked and finally realized what she had been ignoring. She looked straight at Duncan: “Uncle, if you already knew Shirley… did you know her secret too? Do you know Dog as well?”

“Earlier than you did,” Duncan showed a faint smile. “But before this, I did not know she was the ‘friend’ you kept talking about.”

“Then…” Nina hesitated for a moment. “Then are you also investigating what happened eleven years ago? Are you two investigating together?”

“More or less. We happened to work together once or twice,” Duncan nodded.

“…Why do I feel like I am the only one you both kept in the dark?” Nina muttered, a little slow on the uptake. “And you are investigating what happened eleven years ago… Was there really some secret in what happened back then?”

“Right now we still do not know. But we both agree that there was a great fire back then that was erased from the records,” Duncan said in a low voice. His eyes fell on Nina. “I am sorry. I did hide it from you, because this is not a field you can deal with right now. It is too dangerous.”

“What about you, Uncle?” Nina suddenly got a little angry. “Uncle, are you not in danger?”

As soon as she said this, Duncan had not even replied yet when Dog and Shirley both covered their faces at the same time. Shirley even muttered softly: “Of course your Uncle is dangerous. Your Uncle is the most dangerous one…”

Duncan gave Shirley a silent look, then turned back to Nina and shook his head lightly: “Your Uncle is an adult. And as for me, I am much stronger than you think.”

Nina’s gaze moved back and forth between Duncan and Shirley. Her expression changed several times. No one knew how many messy thoughts were spinning around in her head. Just when Duncan thought this young lady might get stubborn or start sulking like an ordinary teenage girl, Nina suddenly sighed.

“It is getting dark,” she looked up at the sky outside the door, as if all the things they had just talked about had never happened. “I will go cook. Shirley, you stay too. It is not safe to travel after dark.”

“Ah… ah?” Shirley did not react at first and could not keep up with Nina’s train of thought. Then she quickly waved her hands. “No, no, that is not necessary. If Dog and I hurry back, we can still make it…”

Before she finished, Duncan’s voice came from the side: “Stay here. The Sun will set in a few minutes. When it does, the streets will be full of Guardians. Are you sure you want to cross a locked-down district in that situation?”

Shirley’s whole body stiffened. She turned and glanced at the sky outside the shop, then at Duncan’s calm face. She finally realized that there was no way she was leaving this antique shop today.

“Then… all right,” the girl sat down in defeat. She forced a smile and looked at Nina. “Is there anything I can help with?”

“No need. I always cook at home,” Nina smiled as she walked toward the stairs leading to the second floor. But just as she was about to step onto the first step, she suddenly stopped. She stood there and looked at Shirley very seriously. Only after a few seconds did she speak: “Shirley, are we friends?”

Shirley was stunned. Her first reaction was to glance at Duncan, but Duncan turned his eyes away. She had no choice but to turn back and look at Nina again. After a few seconds of short but painful silence, she shook her head: “…No.”

But right after that, she nodded: “But I can try.”

Nina smiled. Even though the answer was not very certain, she looked as if she had already received the perfect reply. She ran upstairs quickly, her footsteps fast and light.

Shirley stared blankly as Nina ran up to the second floor. Only then did she suddenly hear a calm voice from the side: “Thank you.”

It was Duncan speaking.

Shirley jumped in fright. She quickly sat up straight in her chair and turned to Duncan: “Why are you thanking me?”

“Nina has no friends at school,” Duncan was already used to how tense she always became. He kept his tone mild. “So when she mentioned a few days ago that she had made a new friend at school, she was very happy.”

Shirley blinked in confusion. She had not quite understood.

“So first of all, thank you for not casually telling Nina that you are her friend. And second, thank you because you said you can try.”

“I… do not really understand,” Shirley was still very confused. In fact, she was more confused than before. “Here, you are just playing the role of an ordinary person, right? Nina seems to have no idea how special you are. At school, too, she has almost no presence. If Dog had not guided me, I almost did not find her the first time I went there. But by normal logic, someone like her, favored by you as a ‘retainer’…”

“Not a retainer. A niece,” Duncan corrected her again. Then, with a very serious expression, he looked at her. “Now that Nina has gone upstairs, I have a question for you.”

“Please, go ahead. Please…”

“It was Dog who guided you to get close to Nina, right?”

“…Yes.”

“Because Dog ‘smelled’ a certain aura on Nina? And from that, he judged that Nina was connected to the fire eleven years ago?”

“Yes.”

“What kind of aura exactly? The same aura as that factory, or something else?”

This time, Shirley did not answer. She turned her eyes to Dog.

Under Duncan’s gaze, Dog hesitated for a few seconds, then finally lowered his head:

“There are ashes floating around her. Countless ashes, Mr. Duncan.”

Chapter 127: Sharing Dinner

Some things were never meant to be discussed in front of Nina.

Hearing the scene that Dog described, Duncan’s heart gave a sudden jolt.

Ashes floating around her… a great many ashes. What did that mean?

In that factory covered by The Veil, hidden ashes lay everywhere. Ashes were the marks left by flame, the proof that a great fire had once existed, and the symbol of things already destroyed. So the ashes around Nina…

He raised his head and looked at the stairs leading to the second floor.

Nina was busy in the kitchen upstairs. From here, he could faintly hear the sounds of her cooking. The clatter of pots and pans sounded light and cheerful. That optimistic girl had been through a lot today, yet she was still in a good mood at this moment.

He drew back his gaze and looked at Shirley, who was sitting across from him.

“So after Dog told you he had found a very suspicious target, you found a way to slip into the school and tried to look for clues around Nina. At the same time, you started approaching the Suntists moving around the city and tried to look for clues from them too, to uncover the secret behind the fire eleven years ago…”

Shirley nodded lightly: “Yes.”

“I am guessing you are actually not looking for a fragment of the Sun, are you?”

“…What would be the point of looking for a fragment of the Sun?” Shirley asked in return. “Find a ball of flame and ask it why it burns? What I want to find… is the person who set the fire back then.”

“This is not an ordinary flame,” Duncan looked calmly into Shirley’s eyes with his gaze. “If that really is a fragment of the Sun, its power is far more than enough to burn down one factory. Shirley, you are doing something very, very dangerous.”

“If I am honest, please do not be mad,” Shirley thought for a moment and lowered her head obediently. “Just sitting in front of you already feels dangerous enough to me…”

“…Ha. Maybe,” Duncan paused for a second, then could not help but laugh. After that, he rose from behind the counter and slowly walked toward the stairs to the second floor. “I was only giving a friendly reminder. How you judge it is up to you.”

“Wait,” Shirley suddenly stood up. She hesitated for two seconds before speaking again. “From how you reacted… you really did not know about Nina’s special side before?”

Duncan stopped and thought for a moment. Then he raised his hand and pointed at his own eyes: “It seems the ‘eyesight’ of this body I am using now is not very good. There are some things I really did not notice.”

This body…

Shirley sharply caught those words, but she did not dare to ask anything. She only watched him as he continued to walk up the stairs, and she could not help asking with some curiosity: “What are you going to do now?”

“Do? I am going upstairs to eat dinner, of course,” Duncan looked down at her as if it were only natural. “You two come up as well. It is dinnertime.”

It was dinnertime.

What did it feel like to eat at the home of a big boss from Subspace?

Shirley had no idea how she should describe all the strange thoughts flashing through her head as she followed that big boss upstairs. She was nervous yet expectant, curious yet afraid. Even though she knew it was very likely just an ordinary everyday meal, she still could not stop guessing what kind of terrifying and bizarre things might appear on the table later.

In this seemingly ordinary antique shop lived a Shadow from Subspace. This was the nest of a Subspace Shadow, the collapsed gap between the Mortal Realm world and the world of the deep layers. In such a nest, even if a spawn of an Eldritch God appeared on the dining table, she would not find it strange at all.

With a mind full of wild guesses and a tense heart, Shirley went upstairs and entered the slightly narrow kitchen. Then she saw what was on the table.

It was only a plate of hard bread that had just been reheated, a pot of vegetable soup that was the most common in the Lower City, and some tomato sauce and mushroom sauce.

The most eye-catching thing on the whole table was just a pot of fish soup. In the pale broth floated a few chunks of fish meat that had already been cut and prepared so that their original shape could no longer be told. A fresh, fragrant smell drifted over and made Shirley’s stomach twist with hunger.

“I used the remaining half of the salted fish in the kitchen to make soup,” Nina said to Duncan with a smile, then looked at Shirley. “Uncle bought this fish. You should try it. It tastes really good.”

Shirley sat down at the table in a bit of a daze. Her eyes swept over the simple dishes. Duncan saw this and could not help but smile: “What is it?

Are the dishes too ordinary, so it surprised you instead? Or do they not suit your taste?”

“No, no… This is already much better than what I usually eat…” Shirley replied at once, then added, “But I really did not expect it to be this ordinary.”

“This fish looks a little strange,” Dog also stretched his head over to look at the food on the table and spoke in his dull, muffled voice. “I feel… a bit of a familiar aura.”

“What do you know about good food?” Shirley glanced at him. “You usually gnaw on stones like they are biscuits…”

“Mr. Dog does not eat food?” Nina looked amazed.

“Abyssal demons do not eat human food. In fact, they do not need to eat at all,” Shirley nodded. “Sometimes they just gnaw on stones or steel plates to grind their teeth.”

Dog’s head shook as he hummed in protest: “That hurts my feelings. Have you forgotten how I tried everything to steal food outside to feed you back then? Sometimes I also eat…”

As he spoke, he lay his front paws on the edge of the table and leaned closer to the pot of fish soup. But after staring at the soup for two seconds, the second half of his sentence cut off sharply.

In the next instant, the Abyssal Hound suddenly yanked his gaze away, slipped back to where he had been lying before, and then slumped down, not moving at all.

Shirley was stunned by his reaction: “Dog, what is wrong with you?”

The first thing Dog did was look at Duncan. What he saw was Duncan’s gentle smile.

“What is it? You do not like fish?” that indescribable vortex of light and shadow asked with a smile.

Dog’s head swayed left and right. All of a sudden, he felt that all the friendly talk, the kind and easy smile, and the sense of working together were nothing but illusions. In the twisted light and shadow deep inside that unspeakable vortex, there was only terror.

A Deep Sea spawn with a rank higher than his had been chopped up and boiled into soup, and even its very nature had truly been turned into “food”… This horrifying thing was happening right there on the table.

“I… do not like fish.”

The Abyssal Hound spoke in a muffled voice.

In the corner of his eye, that freshly cooked fish soup still sent up steaming heat and a smell that was delicious to human noses.

He knew that what was in that pot really was fish now. No matter what it had been before, now it was fish.

The essence of the spawn had long since been twisted and rewritten. Without the eyes granted to him by the Abyssal Lord, even he could never have recognized what those chopped pieces of meat used to be.

Now, it truly was harmless food. Even if Shirley ate it, nothing would happen.

But Dog himself was not going anywhere near that table today, no matter what.

Duncan did not know why Dog suddenly had such a strong reaction to the fish soup. He guessed it had something to do with the special diet of Abyssal demons, so he did not pay it much attention.

His attention was on Nina.

Nina did not look much different from usual. She might have more on her mind now, but this sensible child had chosen a way of handling her feelings that would not put anyone in an awkward spot.

On the other hand, Duncan already knew that something was “hidden” around Nina.

Or to put it another way, that vast and invisible Veil from the factory had silently spread over and settled on Nina too.

He did not dare make a direct judgment yet, and there was no way to be sure what the ashes drifting around Nina really meant. But there was no doubt that during the fire eleven years ago, Nina must have been in an extremely special position.

Just as special as that factory.

Yet Nina knew nothing. She had lived eleven years in complete ignorance.

“Uncle?” Nina finally noticed Duncan’s gaze and looked at him in confusion. “What is wrong?”

Duncan did not answer. He only reached out his hand and gently patted the top of Nina’s head.

Nina froze for a moment, then shook her head from side to side: “I am not a little child anymore.”

“I know, you are not a little child,” Duncan smiled. Between the strands of Nina’s hair that swayed, tiny ghostly green lights flashed for a second and vanished. “But you are still a child.”

Nina puffed out her cheeks a little.

“Uncle, are you going to keep going out with Shirley to… ‘investigate’?”

She finally could not hold back her question.

“Within a safe range,” Duncan answered very seriously.

“…Can you not go?”

Duncan shook his head: “I cannot.”

Nina went quiet for a moment, then asked: “Then what can I do?”

“Eat your dinner properly,” Duncan smiled and pointed at the table. “Then sleep well, study well, protect yourself in the end, and trust your Uncle Duncan.”

Nina stuffed a piece of bread into her mouth until her cheeks were puffed out.

“All right. I got it.”

Chapter 128: Changing Course

The second floor of the antique shop was not very big. Besides the kitchen and the washroom, there were only two rooms, one for Duncan and one for Nina. The temporary guest Shirley obviously could only sleep in Nina's room.

"Actually, I can sleep in the hallway…"

Watching Nina busy getting things ready for her, Shirley looked a little uneasy. "Or I could just make a bed on the floor downstairs…"

"That won't do," Nina said as she spoke, glancing toward the door. Uncle Duncan had already gone back to his own room. Now only she and Shirley were here, plus Dog, who was lying nearby, dozing. "How can we let a guest sleep in the hallway? And downstairs… downstairs is all Uncle's 'treasures'. He would never agree."

"His treasures?" Shirley froze for a moment and tried to recall what she had seen on the first floor. She had been so nervous earlier that she had not even taken a good look at the place, but now that she thought back, the first floor just seemed like a pile of messy junk. To say that this was the collection of a Subspace Shadow was honestly a bit absurd.

But she quickly came back to her senses. Here, that "Mr. Duncan" only played the role of an ordinary person, and the Nina in front of her seemed to truly not know that her Uncle had other faces.

At that thought, Shirley's expression turned strange again. In the bright light from the electric lamp, she quickly glanced at Nina and asked in a low voice: “Are you really not angry?”

Nina stopped making the bed and raised her eyebrows: “Angry? Why?”

“…I actually lied to you for quite a long time,” Shirley said softly. In her whole life she had rarely been this embarrassed and quiet, but ever since she met “Mr. Duncan”, she was getting more and more used to speaking in a low voice. “At first I only approached you because of Dog’s hint, but I didn’t think you would believe me so easily, or even… just accept me as your ‘friend’ so simply. I think you should be at least a bit angry.”

“…No one had taken the initiative to talk to me at school for a long time. Back then I thought…” Nina muttered, then quickly shook her head. “But I’m really not angry. No matter what the reason was, you really did keep me company, talking, shopping, and going to The City Museum with me.”

Shirley did not really accept Nina’s calm reaction. Or rather, she had long since gotten used to a much colder kind of human relationship, so next to Nina, who seemed to give off a warm glow all the time, she felt especially out of place: “You really are a strange person.”

“Am I?” Nina finished making the bed and sat down, tilting her head a little. “But someone did say that about me a long time ago… ‘This child has such a big heart.’ I think that’s how they said it.”

As she spoke, she waved Shirley over: “Come sit too. Why are you just standing there?”

Shirley froze for a moment, then sat down beside Nina with some hesitation. Her feelings grew even stranger.

She had never imagined things would end up like this.

She was being watched by a Subspace Shadow and had no choice but to take shelter in its “lair”. She was sharing a room with that Subspace Shadow’s “retainer”, and ever since earlier, Dog had curled up into a tight ball from some nameless fear. She knew how dangerous and strange the true situation was at this moment, maybe only a step away from death. Yet when she opened her eyes, all she actually saw was the warm yellow light of the lamp, and a girl whose smile felt just as warm.

“The electric light is really bright…”

As if she wanted to break the tension, or maybe just could not think of anything else to say, Shirley suddenly muttered in a low voice.

“You don’t have electric lights where you live?” Nina sounded surprised.

“I live in… an older part of town. There aren’t any electric lights there yet,” Shirley said, a little embarrassed. “After nightfall we still have to use oil lamps.”

“Ah…” Nina opened her mouth and felt a little uncomfortable, then forced herself to change the subject. “Do you want to change into pajamas? You can wear mine. I have one from two years ago. It should fit you.”

“…Okay.”

“Let’s go to bed early today. Tomorrow is a rest day. In the morning I’ll walk around with you nearby and, by the way, buy you a new dress. Your skirt was all burned.”

“…I don’t have any money.”

“Then treat it as a gift from me.”

“…Okay.”

…

Duncan stood at the bedroom windowsill and quietly looked toward the Sixth District. His expression grew calm.

The two girls had already fallen asleep in the next room. After everything that happened today, he did not know if Shirley felt tired, but Nina definitely was.

He closed his eyes a little and turned his head to “look” to the side.

In the darkness of his vision, two tiny green flames leaped up.

They were in the direction of the next room. The two flames were Marks he had left. One came from Shirley, and the other showed Nina’s position.

Duncan still did not know what the ashes circling around Nina meant, nor what secrets were really buried in this city-state. He did not know where that “Veil” came from, nor who was pulling the strings behind everything.

But he could feel that he was getting close to the truth from eleven years ago. Bit by bit, he was prying at the thick fog that hung over this city-state, condensed from some kind of supernatural element.

Leaving a mark on Nina was one layer of insurance. This mark let him sense her condition at once and served as a locator in an emergency. And if he later figured out what the “ashes” around Nina were, he could also use the mark’s power to intervene right away, at least isolating Nina from any harmful supernatural forces around her.

But one layer of insurance was not enough.

Duncan looked at his own hands.

This body was still too weak and too far from his true body. The power the true body could send over, and the power this body could handle, were both limited, while the danger hidden in this city-state was likely beyond his expectations.

He took a light breath and slowly closed his eyes.

In the next second, Duncan aboard the Vanished opened his eyes, stood up, and pushed open the door of the captain's cabin.

Goathead's noisy voice came almost without delay: "Oh, great Captain! Your loyal et cetera is currently recalibrating…"

"In which direction is the Pland city-state?" Duncan glanced at Goathead and cut him off with skill born of practice.

"Pl… the Pland city-state?!" Goathead was caught off guard. Even his stiff wooden face showed a flash of shock, but he quickly reacted, and his tone turned oddly excited. "The Pland city-state! A human city-state! Is the great Captain Duncan finally going to launch a plundering expedition?! Is this your target? Are we going to attack the Harbor directly, or raid the merchant ships passing by the city-state? We could also slowly corrupt the coastal waters and seal off their shoreline step by step. The City Navy might be a bit of a prob…"

"Shut up. Don't make extra plans," Duncan walked straight to the chart table and knocked on it. "I'm only asking you: which direction is the Pland city-state?"

"Oh, oh, all right, all right, as you wish…"

Goathead's voice dropped and stretched out strangely as he began to speak, and in the next second, Duncan noticed a flickering point of light appear at the edge of the fog-filled enchanted sea chart.

"The Pland city-state you are looking for… should not be too far off," Goathead said respectfully. "Ah, sadly, the enchanted sea chart has slept for too long. It can only mark Pland's general position. The sea conditions and markers along the way are still hidden in the unknown…"

"It looks quite far," Duncan glanced at the bright point in the mist, judged the size of the charted sea around the Vanished, and frowned slightly. "At full speed, how long will it take us to get close to Pland's coastal waters?"

"Half a month? Maybe a month? That's actually already very fast. We haven't really gone all the way to the edge of civilization yet," Goathead started rambling. "You could also choose to let the Vanished move at full speed in the Spirit Realm, but that wouldn't be very safe. The Spirit Realm itself isn't much of a threat to us, but in the Abyssal Deep Sea, there are many reckless beings who might cause trouble…"

The Abyssal Deep… the Deep Sea…

Duncan subconsciously thought of Dog, but quickly shook his head. "Then let's sail in the Mortal Realm sea for now and move toward the Pland city-state. One last question: can we avoid being discovered by the city-state?"

He fixed his gaze on Goathead's eyes.

As the captain of the Vanished, this question was a little risky.

He was supposed to have complete control over this ship and to fully understand everything it could do.

But he still asked. He was testing this First Mate bit by bit.

Goathead's obsidian-carved eyes showed no emotion. He simply stared back at the captain, and after a few seconds of silence, spoke as usual: "… We can hide in the mist. If needed, we can briefly slip into the broken reflections of the waves. That way, at least when we are more than fifteen nautical miles from shore, human city-states and ships will not be able to sense the Vanished approaching.

"But any closer won't work. A God's gaze will notice, and the city's great Cathedral will raise the alarm."

"All of that is experience from a century ago," Duncan said calmly. "Does it still work now?"

“Of course,” Goathead replied lightly. “A mere century. The Gods would not have made any progress in a single century.”

Duncan let out a small breath. “Very good. Then let the Vanished move toward the Pland city-state and pay attention to hiding itself.”

“May I ask something?” Goathead spoke again. “What… are you planning to do exactly?”

“I just want to run a test,” Duncan thought for a moment, then showed a small smile. “To see if the Wi-Fi is any better this way.”

Goathead froze. “…Wi… what does that mean?”

“I’ll have AI explain it to you later.”

“No! Your loyal et cetera has absolutely no interest in what it means!”

Chapter 129: Night

The Vanished picked up to full speed.

In the pale glow cast by the World's Wound, the translucent spirit form sails billowed without wind. The huge, complex forest of masts and ropes creaked as if moved by countless unseen hands, adjusting their angles quickly and precisely. Duncan felt the hull under his feet sway and tilt, the bow turning toward some direction in the Boundless Sea. The fine sound of waves slapping against the hull mixed with the "sensory signals" that the Vanished itself sent back, echoing softly in the depths of his mind.

For some reason, the moment the ship changed course, he suddenly felt that the mood on the ship had quietly changed. The scenery around was clearly exactly the same, but…

It felt as if he heard the ship let out a quiet sigh of satisfaction.

Duncan left the captain's cabin and strolled onto the deck. In the night, he raised his head and cast his gaze at the swollen sails and towering masts, then reached out and tapped a nearby railing, saying thoughtfully: "Are you also bored with drifting around without a goal?"

The Vanished did not answer. Only a faint creaking rose from beneath the deck. Several ropes nearby rustled, sliding over like snakes and swaying back and forth beside Duncan.

"…That is not cute. It's actually a bit scary," Duncan gave the ropes a look. "This is how you scared Alice into running for her life last time, isn't it?"

The ropes swayed in place twice, then slipped away quickly.

Duncan took a light breath, ready to enjoy the cool night wind at sea. But suddenly, a distant “tug” appeared in his consciousness.

At first he did not react to what it was, but then he realized that the tug came from the Pland city-state.

In the Pland city-state, Duncan on the second floor of the antique shop suddenly blinked and immediately looked in a certain direction. That was Nina’s room next door.

In his sight, a cluster of ghostly emerald flame was flickering rapidly in that room. It was not Nina, but the mark left on Shirley.

That flame had sensed supernatural power growing and sensed that its host’s emotions were fluctuating abnormally.

What happened to Shirley?!

Duncan did not hesitate. He got up, rushed out of his room, and came to the door of Nina’s bedroom. He knocked lightly, but there was no response inside.

He hesitated for a moment, but in the next second he felt the mark on Shirley flicker again.

There was no time to overthink at a moment like this. Duncan pushed open Nina’s door.

Just like when she was little, Nina still did not have the habit of locking her door when she slept.

The bedroom was dim. Only the faint light of the streetlamp outside shone in through the window, outlining the shapes of things in the room. Within his field of view, Duncan did not see anything out of the ordinary.

Shirley and Nina were quietly sleeping on the bed. One had her head toward the foot of the bed, and the other lay sideways across the other's stomach.

…Their sleeping positions were very artistic.

Of course, Duncan had no interest in studying how the two girls slept. He had already noticed the deep frown on Shirley's face, and on the arm she normally used to summon Dog and form the symbiotic pact with the chains, faint black lines were slowly crawling.

Duncan frowned slightly, then activated the mark he had left on Shirley, trying to use the special nature of the spirit form flame to search for the source of "corruption" in the room.

In his view, Shirley's current state, together with the mark's warning, was without a doubt a sign that supernatural power was starting to produce corruption.

A tiny green flame rose up beside Shirley. The ghostly green fire lit the surroundings, but after flickering a few times, it stayed right where it was.

There was no corruption in the room.

Duncan's brow furrowed. He leaned closer and studied the tight frown on Shirley's face.

Because he did not know how much the spirit form fire might affect living people, he could not release a large mass of flames to "scan" the whole room the way he had in the factory. But even a single spark of spirit form fire should react to unfamiliar supernatural power.

corruption… was not in the Mortal Realm? On the mental level? Or was it something else?

Duncan fell into thought. Then he seemed to think of something, quietly left the room, and closed the door. Back in his own bedroom, he saw the Pigeon Spirit dozing on the windowsill.

“Spirit Realm Walk.”

Amid AI’s angry cooing after being woken, Duncan once more entered that dark space filled with endless starlight. Then he calmed himself, and like when he had sensed the White Oak and Vanna before, he focused on the starlight around him that belonged to his own Marks.

This was not hard, because those Marks had been left on purpose by him and were much clearer and more stable than the “sparks” on Vanna. Duncan almost instantly locked onto the point of starlight that belonged to Shirley…

Shirley opened her eyes in the dark and found herself lying on a small bed that was both familiar and strange.

Feeling her way in the dark, she sat up. Her mind stayed sluggish for a long while before she slowly woke. She looked around in confusion and finally made out some outlines in the darkness.

Some familiar yet distant memories slowly woke up. After she saw the scene around her clearly, Shirley’s eyes flew wide open.

In the next second, she jumped down from the bed, letting out a string of furious curses, so furious that her voice even trembled, the tremble carrying fear and panic: “Damn, damn, damn… damn it! It’s this again, this again! Damn it!”

The loud stream of curses shattered the quiet in the dark, but the voice was not the one Shirley was used to. It was younger, more childish, a child’s voice that had only existed in her memories. She landed on the floor and saw that her hands and feet had become as thin and small as they were in those memories. She wore a light pink nightgown, exactly the same as in her memory, with the familiar little dog clumsily stitched over the torn cuff.

“Stop messing with me! Stop messing with me!”

Shirley shouted in the dark room and rushed to the closed door. She kicked and punched, trying to break the mottled wooden boards, but the door was as unmoving as if cast from steel and concrete. She threw her head against it, even bit the doorknob, but it was all just a meaningless way to vent. With her small body she could only slam into it again and again, while the Time-Stream flowed past, while a little morning light crept in through the nearby window, while the sound she least wanted to hear on this early morning came from outside the door.

She heard someone get up in the next room. She heard footsteps, and the sounds of things being packed.

She heard one set of footsteps approach the door, and a very gentle, very familiar voice spoke softly: “Shirley, Shirley? Are you up? Are you still angry?”

Shirley’s pounding stopped all at once, as if all strength had been drained from her. She leaned against the wooden door, pressing herself to it with everything she had. She did not want to listen, yet greedily took in every sound from outside.

“Shirley, Dad and I are going to buy you a cake. Today is your birthday… When we come back, you won’t be angry anymore, all right?”

“Don’t go…” Shirley suddenly spoke. At first it was just a tiny mutter, but soon the mutter turned into a shout. “Don’t go… Don’t go! Don’t go! Don’t go!”

At last she cried out, shouting even though she knew it was useless: “Don’t go! Don’t go out! Don’t go out, damn it! Don’t go out!”

But time still moved on to the next second, like a memory carved into her mind that could never go back. The footsteps outside the door went farther away.

The sound of a bag being picked up, her parents' distant, blurry conversation, the turn of the doorknob, opening, closing, and the key turning once, then half a turn more.

Shirley slowly sat down in the dark and began to count her own heartbeat.

When she reached the one thousand two hundredth beat, shouts of "Fire!" came from far away.

When she reached the one thousand six hundredth, the stinging smell of smoke and choking fumes began to seep through the crack under the door.

When she counted to one thousand eight hundred, the street outside was full of frantic shouting, and harsh red light flooded the window, as if the whole city-state had been dropped into molten lava.

When she reached the two thousandth heartbeat, a heavy dull crash came from the front door. The door had been broken, as if some huge beast was stepping in with heavy footsteps, coming closer step by step to this locked room.

Then the door of the room finally fell. The wooden door that Shirley could not have broken even with all her strength shattered like torn paper.

A terrifying creature appeared there. It was a huge black Hellhound, a nightmare twisted together from bone, shadows, smoke, and burning ash. For a six-year-old child, this demon from the Abyssal Deep was almost a giant. Now its empty, blood-red sockets had already locked onto the "living thing" in the room.

Shirley calmly fixed her gaze on the Hellhound in front of her.

This was a Abyssal Hound, but it was not yet her Dog.

It was not the Dog who had a “heart”, not the Dog who rummaged through trash bins to find food for her, not the Dog who tried to tell bad jokes to make her laugh and ended up only teaching her a pile of swear words.

The Abyssal Hound stepped into the room.

The sound of flesh and bone being chewed rang out.

Shirley lay on the floor, feeling her limbs being devoured by the Hellhound. The piercing pain was muffled and numb as it spread through her mind through the Veil of eleven years of memory. She kept counting her own heartbeat, counting how long until Dog would become her Dog, and calculating how long she would have to stay here this time. Based on past experience, would it be a week? Or two weeks?

Her consciousness slowly started to blur. Even in this pitch-black dream, the distant, dull, and numb pain finally began to catch up with her. In her ever more vague vision, she suddenly saw a figure appear on the bed not far away, in the deepest darkness of the shadows.

The figure did not seem to have appeared all of a sudden. It was as if he had been there from the very beginning, from the start of this dream, from the start of every dream, and even—Shirley did not know why she would have such a shocking thought—even from eleven years ago.

He just sat there, yet she only noticed his existence for the first time now, as if a long-standing fog had suddenly split open, letting her glimpse what lay behind it.

A faint glimmer of ghostly green flame emerged from nowhere, lighting up the figure’s face: gloomy and imposing. Shirley had never seen this face before, yet she felt a strange familiarity.

“No offense meant.”

The gloomy, imposing figure spoke.

Chapter 130: Your Fearsome Name Is Known to All

“No offense meant.”

The figure spoke. Almost the instant he spoke, Shirley suddenly heard a booming sound from nowhere. It was an unreal roar. It did not belong to this dream, nor to this memory. It exploded right inside her skull, and as it boomed, the distant crackle of flames and the frantic shouts of the crowd vanished at once.

The whole world fell into absolute silence.

The next second, Shirley realized her body had changed. She was back to being seventeen. She was no longer wearing the familiar nightgown from her memory, but her usual black dress. The arm that the Abyssal Hound had devoured was somehow whole again. A pitch?black chain stretched out from that arm. At the far end of the chain, Dog lay curled in the corner of the room as if asleep, quietly sprawled there, the bloody glow in its eye sockets flickering faintly.

Shirley jolted upright and stared, shocked and tense, at the figure sitting on the bed.

She did not know who this figure was, but she knew one thing: some powerful being had broken straight through the curse of the Abyssal Deep and invaded her dream.

Even she, the “master of this dream”, had not sensed him ahead of time. That meant the intruder was so powerful that she had no way to resist him at all.

“Y-you… who are you?!”

Duncan slowly stood up. In this realm of consciousness, he appeared in his original form as “Captain Duncan”. His towering height pressed down on the room, and Shirley instinctively backed up half a step.

“You have never seen me like this. That reaction is normal,” Duncan said in a low voice. “I noticed you were having a nightmare, so I came to take a look.”

“Noticed… came to take a look…” Shirley blinked in confusion, then slowly came back to herself. “Wait, you are…”

“Let me introduce myself properly. I am Duncan,” the gloomy, imposing man said with a small smile. “Duncan Abnomar.”

He spoke his real name because he was not worried that Shirley would dare spread this around. Even if she did lose her head, that very sensible Abyssal Hound would make sure she kept the matter buried in her heart forever.

“Duncan… Mr. Duncan? You’re Mr. Duncan?!” Shirley stared, eyes wide in shock. A faint, panicked throb spread through her heart. But then confusion followed. “But… aren’t you called Duncan Strain? What is ‘Abnomar’?”

Duncan was silent for a moment: “…?”

This young lady’s reaction left him at a loss. He stared at her for two seconds before finally speaking, his expression odd: “You… have never heard that name?”

Shirley thought for a moment, then shook her head honestly. “No.”

Then she suddenly realized something and looked frightened. “I… should have heard that name?”

Duncan suddenly realized this girl really had never heard the title of the “moving calamity of the Boundless Sea”. Her reaction could not be faked. It seemed that no matter how fearsome Captain Duncan’s reputation was, there were always some people whose knowledge was just that limited. The thought left him a bit deflated, and he could not help asking: “…Are you illiterate?”

To his surprise, Shirley actually lowered her head and said nothing.

“Forget it. It’s not important,” Duncan said. Seeing her reaction, he ended the topic at once. His gaze slowly swept over the small room. Outside, the noise of streets and the sea of fire had already faded, as if a farce had been cut off halfway. Only a dim, dark?red glow still spread beyond the window. Duncan’s eyes came back to Shirley. His face was calm. “This is something you went through back then, isn’t it?”

Shirley still kept her head lowered. “…Mm.”

“…I did not come here to pry, but I sensed your secret while I was entering this place,” Duncan said, very sincere. “I’m sorry.”

Shirley froze. She had never imagined that a being as terrifying as an Eldritch God would apologize to her. The chaos in her head tightened into waves of cold sweat. She hurriedly stumbled back two steps. “N-no, it’s fine. How could you apologize to me…”

“Whatever the case, peeking into a lady’s dreams is not polite—even when it’s a ‘little’ lady like you,” Duncan said with a faint smile. Then his gaze fell on the Abyssal Hound. “When will it wake up?”

“I don’t know…” Shirley looked a little lost. She looked at Dog, still sleeping. “This nightmare has never changed like this before, I—”

She had only said half the sentence when she heard a faint clatter of bones from inside Dog. The hound, fast asleep a second before, gave a small shake of its head. The red light in its hollow eye sockets brightened, and the next moment the terrifying giant hound suddenly leaped to its feet.

Maybe the nightmare from just now still affected her. Shirley instinctively stepped back half a pace. But she quickly came to her senses and walked over to Dog.

“Shirley…” Dog finally woke up. It suddenly noticed the room around them. A second later, its gaze fell sharply on Shirley’s arm. There was a hint of panic in its voice. “I…”

“It’s fine. Just a nightmare,” Shirley said with a smile. She stepped forward and hugged Dog’s huge, ugly skull. “You had a nightmare too.”

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry…” Dog kept whispering the words. The chain linking it and Shirley clinked softly. “Does it hurt? Does it hurt a lot…”

Shirley turned her head aside, a little embarrassed. “Don’t be so dramatic… Someone else is watching…”

“Someone else?” Dog froze for a moment. Only then did it notice there was another person in the room. It saw Duncan clearly, saw the captain’s uniform on him and that gloomy, severe face. More importantly, in its sight it could also see layer upon layer of eerie green flames floating behind Duncan.

“Holy—!” Dog let out a shocked cry. The next second, it reflexively yanked Shirley behind it and used its huge body as a shield between her and Duncan. All the bones across its body rattled and shook, but it still forced itself to stare in Duncan’s direction. “I-it’s the ghost captain?!”

Seeing this reaction, Duncan raised an eyebrow. “Shirley doesn’t recognize this form of mine, but you do?”

“Dog?” Shirley reacted as well. “Dog, you’ve seen him before?”

“Do I even need to? Any Abyssal demon that has seen him has basically already been sent into Subspace by now!” The black smoke inside Dog’s body swelled and sank in panic. “The moving calamity of the Boundless Sea… Why is he in your dream?!”

“The moving calamity of the Boundless Sea?” Shirley was still lost. “Why have I never heard you mention that…”

“Of course you haven’t! There are tons of things I haven’t told you—there are plenty of Calamities in this world. How could I tell you about every single one? And under normal circumstances, who would ever think you’d run into a ghost captain on land?!”

Shirley listened, dazed. She seemed as if she still wanted to ask something, but Duncan suddenly broke the silence. He quietly fixed his gaze on the Abyssal Hound that was acting like it was facing its greatest enemy. “I always thought only people in the Mortal Realm were this afraid of me. I did not expect to have this kind of reputation among Abyssal demons as well.”

Dog edged back half a step, keeping a fully defensive stance as it spoke. “You’re underestimating yourself. Your fearsome name is known from the Deep Sea of the Abyssal Deep all the way to the Mortal Realm. Even heartless Abyssal demons know, by instinct alone, to avoid your Vanished… Honestly, it’s only because Abyssal demons don’t have hearts. Otherwise, even the dreadfiends that crawl over the ashen wasteland would be tattooing you on their backs for courage…”

Duncan thought about it and suspected the creature was actually trying to flatter him—in the way it thought of as flattery.

At the same time, Shirley also heard Dog muttering in a low voice—but the muttering came only through the mental link formed by the chain, and only she could hear it. “Shirley, in a bit I’ll find a way to hold this shadow off. You try your best to wake up. The other side should be only a Psychic Projection. I can tie him up for a while. As long as you can get out of this dream, he won’t be able to chase you…”

Shirley did not react at first—or rather, her thoughts were not on the same wavelength as Dog’s at all. “Uh… and then what?”

Dog’s tone grew urgent. “Then you hurry to the next room and ask that Big Shot for help—tell him you’re being hounded by the Vanished. Be sincere. You can even volunteer to become his retainer in exchange for protection. At this point we can’t worry about whether it’s dangerous or not. Compared to being torn apart by the Vanished and dragged into Subspace, becoming the retainer of some Subspace Eldritch God at least barely counts as ‘alive’…”

Shirley did not react at all.

“Shirley?” Dog grew even more anxious. “Shirley, don’t zone out! Take advantage of the disturbance in this dream and find a way to wake up! Getting a big boss to deal with a big boss is our only—”

Before Dog could finish, Shirley finally answered him through the mental link:

“Dog… Those two big bosses you’re talking about sound like the same person…”

Dog was stunned: “…?”

The exchange in the mental link took only an instant.

The Abyssal Hound lifted its head, looking a little dazed.

In its sight, the ghost captain who commanded the fire of spirit form simply watched them quietly and showed a smile as cold and dark as Subspace.

Chapter 131: Breaking Free of the Dream

Duncan looked at the jumpy Dog and put on the gentlest smile he could manage. He felt there was probably some misunderstanding between them, and it would be best to clear it up sooner rather than later.

But just as he was about to speak, he suddenly saw the bloody light in Dog's eye sockets flicker. Even though you could not read expressions on a skull, he could still somehow feel the Abyssal Hound's emotions surge violently for a moment.

The next second, he heard Dog's stammering voice. "Y-you're the 'Mr. Duncan' we've been dealing with these past two days?"

Duncan paused, then glanced at Shirley beside him.

He did not see any obvious exchange between Dog and Shirley, but it was clear that the two beings linked by the chain had a very convenient way to share information.

"That's me," Duncan said with a small smile and a gentle tone. "Do I still need to explain anything? Or is there something you want to know?"

"Nothing!" Dog almost shrieked, backing away with its whole body. "We don't need to know any 'knowledge' or 'Truth'. We have absolutely no desire to pry into your mysteries!"

"…I keep feeling there's some misunderstanding between us, but somehow the more I try to explain, the less sense it will make," Duncan sighed and shook his head helplessly. “Forget it. Let time slowly help us build some trust. For now, there are a few things I want to know.”

Dog drooped its skull. “P-please, go ahead.”

Duncan frowned slightly. He was actually quite curious why he, a ghost captain with a fearsome name in the Mortal Realm, had such a huge impact among Abyssal demons as well. In his impression, the Deep Sea of the Abyssal Deep was a “place” especially close to Subspace. The demons that lurked in the deeper layers of the Abyssal Deep should be closer to those “bottom?layer Shadows” than mortals in the Mortal Realm were. In theory, they should not be so fearful and resistant toward the Vanished that returned from Subspace.

Yet now it seemed that those demons, who were already “dangerous beings” from a human point of view, were just as afraid of the Vanished as humans were. That puzzled him a lot.

But before he could get to the bottom of that, his attention went back to the nightmare right in front of him. It came from the depths of Shirley’s memory and very likely replayed the truth from eleven years ago.

“I want to know more about this dream,” he said, turning his gaze to Shirley. “I know it is a very painful memory for you. If you don’t want to talk about it, you can refuse.”

“…There’s nothing I don’t want to say,” Shirley only shook her head lightly. “I should be thanking you. You broke the nightmare and spared me some suffering… What you saw is just what I went through back then.”

“A great fire…” Duncan nodded slightly, then looked toward Dog. “What I saw was how you and Shirley first ‘met’, wasn’t it?”

Dog turned its skull aside. “At the time I was just a Abyssal demon.”

“Then how did you suddenly gain a ‘heart’?” Duncan asked curiously. “From what I just saw, you had almost killed Shirley back then.”

“…I don’t know,” Dog said after a few seconds of silence. Its ugly skull swayed a little. “When I first became self?aware, what I saw was already Shirley lying on the ground, barely breathing.”

Duncan gave the Abyssal Hound a long look. His gaze then followed the chain at its neck and came to Shirley’s body, half of which was black and twisted, fused with the chain in a symbiotic pact.

“And after that, you two… merged together?”

“More or less,” Shirley said in a low voice. She hung her head so that her eyes and expression were hidden in the Shadows of her hair. “Honestly, I don’t remember it that well. I was only six then, and for a long time after that I lived in a daze… If you really want to know how I slowly went from being almost killed by a Abyssal demon to having this kind of relationship with it, you can grab a psychiatrist and have them hypnotize me. Maybe then…”

“No need.”

Shirley’s words were suddenly cut off. Right after that, she felt a large hand press down on the top of her head, to her surprise.

The hand was actually warm.

“Sorry. I didn’t mean to tear open your wounds. I only want to know the details from eleven years ago,” Duncan said softly as he pressed down on the girl’s hair. He knew his questions were not pleasant for Shirley, who had just escaped a nightmare. “You should know that, in the incident eleven years ago, it wasn’t only the shard of the Sun that appeared. Countless cultists were moving in the shadows as well. And a Abyssal Hound… in theory, it should have been a summoned creature of the Cult of Annihilation.”

Shirley raised her head slightly, still a bit blank. She heard Duncan continue: “A demon?type creature from the Deep Sea of the Abyssal Deep suddenly gaining humanity is, in itself, a kind of ‘mutation’. Have you ever thought that this mutation might also have been triggered by something during that incident?”

Shirley blinked and said a bit slowly, “The shard of the Sun?”

“I’m not sure… No one knows what form the shard of the Sun really takes, or what power it truly has. But in the doctrine spread by the Suntists, the ‘true Sun god’ doesn’t have any divine authority like ‘granting humanity’ or anything similar,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “So whatever gave Dog humanity might be something other than the shard of the Sun… something else that was there.”

“You mean, what appeared in the city?state of Pland eleven years ago might not have been only the shard of the Sun?!” Shirley finally caught up. Her eyes flew wide open.

“It’s only a suspicion,” Duncan said. He patted Shirley’s shoulder lightly and then drew back his hand. “I’ve always felt there is something very off about the whole matter. The shard of the Sun is a ‘sacred relic’ that points to the cult of the Sun. According to those cultists, its power is actually quite simple and, in occult studies, only tied to the ‘true Sun god’. Yet in that chaos eleven years ago, even in the files the authorities made public, the cultists they caught already included Annihilators and Enders—people who had nothing to do with the ‘true Sun god’ at all… What were they doing mixed into it?

“Of course, you could explain it by saying that the shard of the Sun was so powerful that even people who did not believe in the Sun god were affected, so they all went mad on the same day. But that still can’t explain something as strange as Dog… ‘appearing’—a demon whose very nature is madness suddenly gaining sanity in the middle of the incident. How does that make sense?

“And if you push it further, there are many other suspicious points, including but not limited to the Veil that covered the ‘fire’, the fragments of memory left in your mind and in Nina’s, and the strange phenomena in the Sixth District… We have always lumped all of those oddities together and blamed them on the shard of the Sun. But now that I think about it carefully, are all of them really within ‘the Sun’s domain’ of power? If so, this so? called true Sun god would be a little too omnipotent.”

Duncan spoke the doubts in his heart. Some of them had already arisen long before today. It was only after seeing Dog’s mutation from eleven years ago that he became even more certain of his suspicion.

The great fire eleven years ago might indeed have been caused by the shard of the Sun. But in that whole incident, there had absolutely been something else at work as well!

Shirley was still a bit dazed. She was not good at thinking about things this complicated. While she stared blankly, she heard Dog’s voice ring urgently in her mind. “Shirley, are you okay? When he touched your head just now, was he releasing the curse? Are you still clear?headed? Are you…”

“I’m fine,” Shirley replied in her mind, half amused and half helpless. “Dog, you’re way too nervous.”

“Of course I’m nervous! How could I not be? You just made direct contact with a source of corruption strong enough to drive an ordinary person insane on the spot!” Dog sounded as panicked as could be. “So what do you feel?”

Shirley thought for a moment and uncertainly touched the top of her head.

In her memory, the last time someone had stroked her hair like that and gently comforted her as if she were a small child had been many, many years ago.

“…Warm.”

She spoke in a soft, dazed voice.

Dog was startled at once. “Shirley, has your brain really gone wrong?”

“…Shut up!”

Duncan, however, had no idea what Dog and Shirley had just exchanged in that brief instant. He only stared thoughtfully at the window, where dim red light still spread, and suddenly asked, “What’s outside?”

Shirley was stunned. “Huh?”

Duncan lifted a hand and pointed at the window. “Outside this room. What is there?”

“I… don’t know,” Shirley said, blinking. She suddenly realized that, in this nightmare that had haunted her again and again, something impossible had appeared. “I’ve never thought about that. Every time I dream, I’m trapped in this room…”

“But you’ve broken free now,” Duncan said. He walked to the door of the small room and turned back, speaking softly. His words were like a lure in the dark, throwing an entirely new choice in front of Shirley and Dog. “Do you want to try, while you’re awake… to go see what the edge of your dream looks like?”

Chapter 132: Edge of the Dream

Duncan said with a gentle smile: “Do you want to see, while awake, what the edge of your own dream looks like?”

To Shirley, the words Duncan spoke with a smile sounded like a deep temptation rising from a dark, bottomless sea trench. A shiver spread in her heart. She instinctively resisted this suggestion, yet an uncontrollable urge also rose——

In this nightmare that had tormented her for eleven years, outside this locked little room, on that street she had never seen with her own eyes eleven years ago… what was out there?

She subconsciously took a small breath and turned to look at the small window not far away.

A dull, dried-blood shade of deep crimson filled the little window, so she could not see the street outside. On that fire-lit morning eleven years ago, she had never managed to look out of the window, so in this dream the scene outside was hidden in chaotic light, impossible to make out. Even the living room outside this room was only a blur of darkness when she looked through the doorway.

The dream reflected her own memories and understanding. Eleven years ago she had not escaped this little room. Eleven years later, could she really walk out of it now?

Shirley could not help muttering under her breath: “Can someone really walk around inside their own dream… I don’t even know what’s out there at all… What if it’s all just nothing?”

Duncan’s voice came from the doorway: “A dream is a reflection of a person’s subconscious, and the subconscious often keeps ‘details’ that even the person cannot notice.” He paused, then said: “Maybe you were trapped in this room the whole time eleven years ago, but the light and shadows outside the window, the sounds, and the things your ‘instinct’ remembered have all filled in your dream. In those details, we might be able to glimpse a few clues.”

“Of course, it’s your decision. If you refuse, I won’t keep prying into your dream—I will stay here. Don’t worry, as long as I am here, this nightmare won’t go on. Sleep in peace. Tomorrow you will still have a clear, sunny morning.”

Shirley bit her lip lightly. It was as if she had to use a lot of strength just to make up her mind: “I… want to go out and take a look.”

“All right.” Duncan nodded and stepped aside to clear the doorway. “I’ll go with you.”

A Subspace Shadow, a moving calamity, had taken the initiative to say he would walk with her—this should have been a terrifying invitation, yet for some reason, this time Shirley suddenly felt relieved.

It was as if a warm light suddenly appeared in this endless dark nightmare, letting her relax just a little.

She felt she had to be insane, slowly stained by madness from living alongside an Eldritch God.

Duncan followed behind Shirley. The two of them stepped together through the wooden door of the little room and entered the living room from Shirley’s childhood memories.

Dog walked beside them as well. The Abyssal Hound looked very tense, always watching the surroundings with care. From time to time it tilted its head as if listening, paying attention to any sign of an Anomaly on the street.

Seeing this, Shirley grew curious: “Dog, what are you doing?”

Dog said in a deep voice: “Reconnaissance. We’re walking into an unknown region of a dreamwalking field… Any further, and it will be an area that doesn’t exist in your memories. In theory, the things ahead will lean more and more toward the imagination and strong emotions in your subconscious, and when fear is the main force, those imaginations and strong emotions often create some… not very friendly things.”

Shirley was surprised: “Dog, you even know that much?”

“I know a little.” Dog shook its head. “I am, after all, a proper Abyssal demon…”

Duncan did not pay attention to Shirley and Dog’s conversation. He was carefully watching the living room for any clues.

A hazy, chaotic darkness covered the small, shabby room, as if some smoke that could not be dispersed filled the air. He saw a wooden shelf by the wall, a table and chairs on one side of the living room, and an old chronometer clock hanging on the wall. The hands on its face were blurred and twisted like trembling smoke, spinning in circles without any meaning.

On the floor in the middle of the living room, he could see a patch of deep claw marks.

Those were the marks Dog had left when it broke in back then.

Other than that, there were no bloodstains in the living room, no corpses, and no trace of fire. The “fire” seemed limited to the street outside, or maybe, simply in Shirley’s subconscious, the flames had never spread into the room.

They crossed the living room and came to the front door.

The door had a huge hole smashed in it. Only the frame remained, with a few broken pieces of wood still hanging there. It was clearly another masterpiece of the Abyssal Hound.

Beyond it lay the street that had been swallowed by the fire.

Shirley suddenly stopped walking.

She had already come this far, yet all at once she realized what she was truly afraid of and resisting.

“Shirley?” Dog noticed her hesitation and looked up at her in curiosity.

Shirley bit down hard on her lip as if she had not heard Dog. She stared fixedly at the street outside the door, at the thin fog filled with warped red light. Every cell in her body, every nerve, seemed to tighten, shrink back, and tremble with fear.

It was as if she saw her parents, who had gone out that day and never come back, lying fallen in front of the house. She did not even dare to picture what that scene would look like, did not dare imagine what would happen the moment she stepped out.

Then she heard the soft clink of chains.

Dog took the lead and walked forward, stretched its head to look toward the street, then pulled back.

“Shirley, it’s fine. There’s nothing scary outside. Even if there is… you can’t see it anymore.”

Shirley looked in some surprise at the Abyssal Hound's empty eye sockets. She pressed her lips together: "Thanks."

Then she took a step forward and walked out of the doorway of her home from eleven years ago.

The street was filled with a thin mist. In the sparse, dark-red fog she could vaguely make out the outlines of houses and streetlamps, and the warped, uneven surface of the road.

Buildings in the distance shook unnaturally in the fog. The fire had already burned them down to bare frames, black or dark red in color. Their edges trembled like formless flames, and from somewhere came the crackle and pop of exploding timbers, as if the blaze was still spreading in places they could not see.

Fine sparks, dust, and ash floated in the air, mixed with a choking smell.

Duncan frowned slightly.

The flames on the street had died out. Only the traces of burning remained. The ash everywhere and the suspicious melted heaps in the corners of the street proved that the great fire had been real.

But he did not see any clues that might be related to fragments of the Sun.

But when he thought again, that also seemed normal. After all, this was only Shirley's dream, a stage woven together from her memories, understanding, and imagination, not a true restoration of everything as it had been eleven years ago.

With that thought, he walked slowly beside Shirley along the street that had been burned by the fire.

Suddenly, his steps stopped.

Shirley turned back in surprise: "Mr. Duncan?"

Duncan frowned and waved his hand lightly, tilting his head to listen to the sounds around them.

Just now, it seemed he had heard a faint voice whisper something by his ear.

He tried to make it out for a long moment, then suddenly walked toward a pile of ash by the roadside.

It was a twisted heap of black ash, with some charred fragments mixed in that seemed not entirely burned. Next to the ash a few embers still glowed. If one looked very carefully, one could just barely see that the heap of ash faintly formed the shape of a curled-up… “person”.

Duncan stared at the ash for a long time, then slowly bent down and tilted his head, performing a Listening Rite——

“…I… don’t want to die…”

The heap of ash whispered softly.

Duncan’s eyes opened a little wider.

And Shirley, who was close behind him, also heard the whisper. The girl’s reaction was much more direct:

“What the hell is this?!”

Duncan glanced back at her, and Shirley quickly changed her wording: “Uh, I mean, this is really scary…”

“…I still liked your straightforward version better just now.” Duncan’s mouth twitched. In truth, the whisper from the ash had startled him too, but Shirley’s shout had completely covered that. Then his gaze fell on the many other heaps of ash along the street.

Soft, continuous, overlapping whispers drifted with the floating ash and sparks down the street, reaching his and Shirley’s ears.

“I don’t want to die…” “Help…” “…Go home…” “Somebody help…”

A chilling feeling spread from deep in the heart. Shirley moved closer to Dog without thinking, feeling every muscle in her body tighten.

She dared to swing a demon hound around to fight cultists, but she had little resistance against this kind of pure eerie strangeness.

Besides, this was still her own nightmare. The hardest thing for a person to fight is always the fear in their own heart.

But just then, she suddenly felt confused:

[Is this really my nightmare?]

[Is this really just a dream? At this “edge of the dream” that had already gone far beyond my memories and understanding, why would these “voices calling for help” appear, voices I should never have touched or even been able to imagine?]

Shirley instinctively looked toward Duncan, only to see him also turning his gaze. His deep eyes were full of scrutiny and thought.

“This might not be a simple dream.”

Duncan said in a low voice.

Chapter 133: Eerie Shadow

To be fair, Duncan was not any kind of expert in the supernatural field, and he knew little about disciplines related to dreams and the mind. But he could still vaguely judge that the scene on this street was not only what Shirley had “seen in her dream”.

Because those whispering, pleading ashes gave him a strange sense of déjà vu——

He thought of that factory, of the people there who had been burned to ash in the fire and hidden by the Veil.

Of course, the ashes in the factory had not asked him for help. Those ashes had given him a more direct and violent sign, letting him see the “echo” of the great fire eleven years ago with his own eyes.

Instinctively, Duncan felt that the ashes on this street in Shirley’s dream had some connection to the ashes in that factory.

He lifted his head and looked around. In the wavering, dim red light, the whole street showed the ruin left by the great fire. Amid the falling sparks and dust were countless piles of ash, and suspicious black shapes printed on the nearby walls.

He spoke: “Back then you were only six years old. No matter how much your subconscious may have noticed, it should not be enough to support such a huge dream world—and to create all these embers that call for help, and such large areas of phantom images in the distance on top of that.”

Duncan said quietly, and his voice suddenly made the tense and uneasy Shirley feel a little steadier.

Shirley raised her head and looked at Duncan standing beside her. The “Mr. Duncan” here did not look like the one she usually saw. Here he appeared as a gloomy and dignified captain. To be honest, he still looked pretty frightening like this. Even without Dog’s kind of “true sight”, she could feel a deep pressure coming off him.

But in this nightmare that was becoming more and more unfamiliar, such a powerful being still gave her a bit of comfort. At least for now, this being was standing on her side.

“Let’s keep going and see how far the reach of this dream goes.”

Duncan’s voice suddenly came from beside her. Shirley froze for a second, then quickly grabbed Dog and hurried to follow him.

Amid the endless faint whispers of plea coming from the piles of ash, the two people and one hound walked through the street covered in embers and sparks, slowly heading toward the cluster of buildings that twisted and shook in the shadows.

They walked along the street for who knew how long. Duncan kept carefully watching for changes in the scenery along the way, and what made him feel strange was that the view on this street remained the same as before.

No more twisted phantoms appeared. Things did not grow more blurred or bizarre, nor did any of the “dangerous dream creatures” Dog had described show up.

Duncan suddenly stopped, his brows slightly furrowed.

“Mr. Duncan?” Shirley looked at him curiously. “Did you find something again?”

“…How far have we already gone from the ‘origin’?” Duncan lifted his head and looked back in the direction he and Shirley had come from. The house they had set out from was already gone, swallowed by the hazy red mist.

“‘Origin’?” Shirley was stunned for a moment. “Oh, you mean the room where I was dreaming? We should… be pretty far already. I feel like we’ve walked at least most of a block.”

“Shirley, something isn’t right.” Dog suddenly reacted at this time. It stared tensely at the surrounding fog, its voice low. “Let’s stop for a moment.”

Shirley still had not caught up. She looked confused: “What is it?”

“A dream takes the dreamwalker’s subconscious base of knowledge as its ‘center’. In this dream, that base for you is that room, and all your memories and emotions are inside that room,” Dog explained quickly. “Everything outside the room is a ‘projected addition’ of the dream. In theory, the farther you go from that room, the more these projected scenes should drift away from reason and common sense. The edge of the dream should grow more absurd and dangerous, and there may even be cliffs that vanish into nothing. But we’ve already gone this far… and this dream still continues!”

Duncan listened and nodded slightly. He did not have such clear and complete theoretical knowledge as Dog, but his guesses were roughly the same.

Shirley finally understood. She took a light breath: “So… I should have already walked out of my own dream domain. In theory, this place should already be so twisted that I can’t recognize anything, or it should be a total void… So where are we now, exactly? Is this still my dream?!”

No one could answer Shirley's questions. Duncan could only look around with a thoughtful expression.

Everywhere he looked were charred streets. The district after the fire was like an ugly scar carved deep into the city-state, and this scar of burning stretched all the way to where his sight ended. He did not know how many more blocks it cut through ahead.

He looked in another direction and saw several tall buildings near the district. One factory's distillation tower stabbed straight up into the sky through the smoky haze. Pipes coiled around the surface of the tower, and its frame was jagged, like a strange mountain peak.

Duncan could not help staring at the tall distillation tower, thinking that if one stood atop it, perhaps one could overlook the entire fire zone.

All of a sudden, his gaze froze.

The scene Nina had once described to him rose in his mind:

From a very high place, overlooking the city after it had been burned by fire, with streets like a scar that cut across the entire city-state…

This was the scene Nina had seen in her dream—only from a different angle!

An astonishing idea flashed through Duncan's mind. He turned his head to look at Shirley: "We… may already have walked into another dream."

"Another dream?" Shirley was stunned. "Whose dream?"

"Nina's. Come with me." Duncan spoke briefly, then at once strode toward the distillation tower.

He did not summon AI into the dream to "give him a ride", because first, he did not know if that pigeon could enter this dream by walking through the Spirit Realm the way he had. Second, he still needed AI "on watch" outside, to monitor whether any other supernatural force tried to interfere with his actions.

Luckily, the distillation tower was not far from this block. It belonged to a factory next door, and a straight alley connected the two streets.

Shirley followed in a daze. She still had no idea why Mr. Duncan said she had already walked into Nina's dream. Duncan, however, moved quickly, now and then lifting his head to look at the tall tower.

He was trying to find Nina's figure.

If this really was Nina's dream, then her figure should be standing on that distillation tower. It was already the highest building in sight here, and its location perfectly matched the conditions needed to look down on the entire burn zone.

But even when the two people and one hound were almost at the factory, Duncan still did not see any figure on the distillation tower.

He felt some doubt in his heart, but before he could think more, a strange feeling of being under a gaze suddenly came from not far away. It made him stop dead in his tracks.

Duncan lifted his head and looked toward the direction his senses pointed to. In his sight, a tall, thin figure in a strange black long coat, holding a black parasol, had appeared at some point at the corner of the street!

In this dreamscape full of traces of the fire, where embers still lingered on the street, such an umbrella-bearing stranger suddenly appearing was beyond strange. And this time, not only Duncan saw that figure; even Shirley beside him suddenly stopped.

"There's someone over there!" Shirley cried out.

“You see him too?” Duncan asked without thinking. As soon as his words fell, a murky, eerie muttering suddenly came from the direction of that figure.

It was not any language Duncan knew. The sound was so complex and twisted, with quivering tones and layer upon layer of echoes, that he even doubted it was any “language” at all. But he could still hear a hint of shock in it——

The umbrella-bearing “stranger” seemed very surprised. It was as if he had never expected to meet a few wandering “uninvited guests” here.

And the moment the muttering ended, that strange umbrella-bearing figure suddenly moved!

Duncan could not see clearly what the other did, but out of the corner of his eye he sharply noticed several dark shapes suddenly dart out from the hem of the stranger’s long coat. They were pure “shadows”, rushing along the nearby walls and street toward them. Right after that, the umbrella-bearing figure in the distance vanished into thin air. In the next second, his body appeared again by riding one of the shadows racing toward them, and he lunged straight at Shirley, as if by teleportation!

But by then Shirley had already reacted. Her mind was linked with the Abyssal Hound, and she had a reaction speed as fast as the hound’s. At the very moment that figure finished forming and had not yet acted, she suddenly raised her right hand——

“Anyway, beating the crap out of him first can’t be wrong!”

The girl yelled, with a strange excitement in her voice. The black chain in her hand creaked as she swung Dog in a wide circle and smashed it toward the enemy!

Chapter 134: Feast in the Fire

Shirley's way of fighting was the same as always.

It was simple, rough, and effective, with a wild, carefree air, like a hound running free across the sky. In the whistle of the iron chain, all beings were equal.

The eerie figure that had jumped here through the shadows clearly had not expected that the "Summoner Maiden" in front of him, the girl who carried Abyssal demons with her, was actually a close-combat fighter. By normal logic, the best move on seeing a spellcaster was to rush in at once and start a brawl. But if, after you closed the distance, the caster suddenly pulled out a meteor hammer, that was another matter entirely. So the scene Duncan had seen once before played out again:

The iron chain creaked. Shirley swung the dog down, and the dark figure was hit square on the spot. With a loud bang, he was sent flying backward, almost with a whistle in the air as he went.

With a boom, the figure crashed straight into a nearby building where the embers had not yet gone out. Dust and sparks burst upward, and then there was no more movement.

"Is that it?" The fight had gone so smoothly that Shirley herself had not reacted yet. She held Dog in one hand and peered into the distance, tense and wary. "Why did the impact feel…"

Before she finished, Dog suddenly cried out from the other end of the chain: "Watch out!"

Shirley’s muscles tensed all over. The next second, she finally noticed that the shadows at her feet had somehow grown a little darker than before. Then a blurred “whip” with no clear outline snapped out of the shadows!

The black whip sliced through the air with a vicious ripping sound, lashing straight for Shirley’s neck. At the last critical moment she twisted aside and jumped back, but it still struck her arm. Blood sprayed at once.

Shirley clicked her tongue and did not care at all about the pain. She backed off fast, and only then saw that part of her shadow had been left where she had just stood. From that slice of shadow, the strange tall, thin man holding an umbrella quickly rose up. She also finally saw what that “whip” that had hit her really was—it was a “limb” stretching out from the hem of his coat!

The shadow around him looked as if it carried a thick smoke. Inside it, flesh kept writhing and changing shape, rolling over and over, as if it was always in a state of constant rotting and rebirth. It was both disgusting and terrifying.

Shirley had only glanced once at that tentacle-like limb when a wave of nausea rose from deep in her chest. The next moment she heard the strange man under the umbrella give a low, muffled mutter. The bizarre “limb” that stretched from his coat hem turned into a whip again and lunged straight at her face.

She raised the chain in her hand on instinct, ready to swing Dog again. But at that moment, a ghostly green flame suddenly appeared at the edge of her vision.

The instant that green flame appeared, she noticed the tall, thin figure opposite her suddenly freeze, as if some fear from his deepest instinct had stopped him. In the next second, the figure quickly backed away. Thick black smoke churned under the black parasol, and low, blurry hisses kept coming from within. The green stream of fire spread outward, almost brushing the edge of that smoke. In the faint glow of the spirit flame, the black smoke under the big umbrella was dyed with a pale, sickly color.

Shirley instinctively glanced toward Duncan. She saw that he was just standing quietly where he was, but phantom-like flames kept spreading out from him as the center. Wherever the flames reached, the buildings around them, the sparks drifting in the air, even the silhouettes of far-off structures, all slowly took on a ghostly green hue.

It was like some spreading plague. Wherever that strange fire went, everything was steadily being infected.

So this was the power of this big shot? Or was it only the tip of his strength?!

Shock and doubt rose in Shirley's heart, but she had no time to think. The attacker, now retreating as fast as he could, was clearly being suppressed and cowed by the spirit flame that filled the surroundings. Following the rule that you never hold back in a fight, Shirley took advantage of her weakened enemy, swung the chain again, and hurled the dog with all her strength at the attacker!

An even stranger feedback than before came up through Dog's senses. Shirley felt as if she had smashed into a puddle of rotten meat. She saw the figure with the black umbrella shatter under her blow. With a disgusting tearing sound, its black "coat" split apart. Several shapeless chunks of meat wrapped in thick smoke fell out of the clothing, then began to scurry all over the ground as if each piece had its own will, splitting into even smaller fragments as they ran.

The overlapping shrill cries of countless voices sounded from inside every fragment!

It was an utterly horrifying and bizarre sight. Charred, twisted alien limbs were torn to pieces and crawled, split, and fled in all directions across the street where the embers had not yet died. The shrieks were so sharp they seemed able to pierce mortal sanity. They rose and fell one after another, growing more and more numerous and more and more warped as the fragments kept splitting. In the end it felt as if the whole world were filled with their harsh, wailing screams.

For the first time since the fight started, Shirley felt a chill run through her. She gripped the chain in her hand, but had no idea how to use her usual “tactics” against these screaming fragments that kept splitting and writhing. Soon, though, she noticed that the scattered pieces were not trying to fight anymore—they were all fleeing.

Fleeing from the green flames that were still spreading.

By now they had split into hundreds, even thousands of pieces, like a swarm of black insects crawling and rushing along the street. They scrambled madly for the far end of the street through the gaps between the green flames. Again and again, some fragments were “caught” by the nearby spirit flame—one careless brush, a glancing touch from a spark was enough for flame to spread over them and burn them through in an instant.

But that burning was not the end. It was only the beginning. The fragments burned by the spirit flame did not die. Instead, they suddenly turned around and began to chase, attack, and gnaw on those chunks of flesh that had not yet escaped the fire zone and had not yet been touched by the green fire.

It all happened very fast. In barely half a minute, half of the scattered, fleeing chunks of flesh in the street had already been burned and tainted by the spirit flame. The pieces corrupted by the green fire hunted and devoured the “companions” that had been one body with them only a second before.

At the far end of the street, a faint wall of green fire had already closed together, sealing off every route of escape.

The burning street had become a hunting ground. The countless fragments split from the same black-clad attacker turned into a swarm locked in a death match. The shrieks that had risen and fallen without end finally began to fade, replaced by an even more horrifying sound—

The sound of chewing, spread across the whole street.

The attacker had tried to break himself apart to flee. Now he had become his own feast.

Goosebumps broke out all over Shirley's body, and she could feel Dog trembling as well. She shivered a little on the street littered with hot ash. Then, in the next second, she felt a warm hand press down on her shoulder.

"Don't be afraid," Duncan said softly, trying to comfort her. "Bugs are most afraid of fire."

Shirley's shoulder twitched. A very strange feeling rose in her heart. The comfort of being watched over and soothed by a powerful being mixed with the chill of being stared at by something unspeakable. She forced herself to look up at Duncan by her side, only to see him frowning.

"To be fair, it is a little disgusting," Duncan said, watching the "swarm" devouring one another. He spoke to Shirley from the heart: "Even I didn't expect it to end up like this."

[Who would believe that?!]

"Y-yeah… it is," Shirley said weakly, pretending she believed him. Whatever the big boss said was right. "It is a little disgusting…"

"At least it's almost over," Duncan said, sounding a little more relaxed.

Almost over.

The sound of spreading fire and feeding along the street was fading. Both the hunters and the hunted were finally running out of life and turning into heaps of ash that the wind blew away. The strange attacker thus faded into nothing. The spirit flame that had spread everywhere also began to draw back and die down.

Only then did Shirley finally swallow hard. She looked at the small drifting piles of ash and, gathering her courage, asked: “Is… is it over?”

But Duncan shook his head: “…Not necessarily.”

Shirley looked at him in surprise and confusion. She saw him walking forward. From a nearby mound of ash, the last chunk from the attacker crawled out. The shapeless, hateful flesh wobbled and squirmed. It still seemed to want to flee, but after just a few steps it stopped.

Duncan stopped in front of the fragment and bent down. A point of emerald flame danced between his fingers.

“I’ve heard many strange and creepy stories,” Duncan said slowly, explaining to Shirley. “Those stories taught me one thing. If you ever find that your enemy can split apart, you should assume the first one you met is only a split-off piece. You always have to assume there’s a main body hiding behind the split, waiting there so hack authors can write sequels.”

He tapped his fingertips and set the little green flame onto the surface of the last fragment.

“I don’t much like sequels,” he went on. “And I like it even less when some inexplicable main body hides behind the scenes and only jumps out to stab people after the ‘heroes’ have all let their guard down.”

The emerald flame flared up. The foul fragment gave a sudden shudder. Then many insect-like legs sprouted from its underside, holding it up as it wobbled to its feet.

Duncan slowly straightened and fixed his gaze on the attacker’s last remaining fragment.

“Go home,” he said. “Take my gift with you.”

Chapter 135: The End of the Dream

The spirit flame drew back and sank into the chunk of flesh.

The remains corrupted by the fire trembled as they crawled up, then crawled faster and faster, soon vanishing at the far end of the street.

That lump of mindless flesh had set out on the road home. But whether it could really make it back to some “main body”, or would simply burn out halfway and scatter on its own, or be intercepted and purified by something else, even Duncan had no way to know.

All he could do was clear away as many hidden dangers as lay within his reach.

From the moment Shirley started fighting that strange dark figure, he had been quickly analyzing what this “attacker” who appeared in the nightmare might be, and guessing at the pattern of its abilities. After seeing how it reacted to the spirit flame, he became more certain that this sudden attacker was probably only a split-off “pathfinder”.

Once it met the spirit flame, the attacker had no will to fight at all. Its first reaction had been to shatter and try to break out in every direction. That could be read as a panicked attempt to flee. But it could just as easily be read as a “pathfinder” trying to send information away. If this vast dream was truly woven by some hidden hand behind the scenes, then the arrival of an “intruder” like him was important intelligence.

Duncan watched the direction where the fragment had vanished, deep in thought. After it crawled a certain distance, the thing simply disappeared inside a burst of rising smoke and dust. That made him even more sure of his guess:

The sudden attacker knew this dream far better than he and Shirley did. In this place it had easier ways to move and knew some unseen “passages”. That was how the figure with the umbrella had managed to appear nearby without him sensing it at all.

By contrast, he, Shirley, and Dog were first-time “explorers” here. In the dream they were like headless flies, and finding those things that were hiding would not be easy.

But that was all right. The Fire Seed had already been spread, and a faint sense of connection was still flickering at the edge of his perception. Duncan believed that the flame he had sent out would bring something back. As long as that bit of spirit flame continued to spread, a clearer sense would form. Sooner or later, he would find some of those hidden beings in the spreading fire—and then Nina and Shirley would no longer have nightmares.

“Mr. Duncan…” Shirley looked at him, a little frightened by his sudden silence. She hesitated for a long time before finally mustering her courage and asking: “Do you know what that thing just now… was?”

She meant the attacker who had held the black umbrella.

“…Hard to say,” Duncan answered after thinking for a moment and shaking his head. Then he looked around at the burned-out street and added, thoughtful: “But do you remember that figure I mentioned before, the one standing at the edge of the square when we were coming back from the City Museum?”

“The one only you could see?” Shirley remembered at once. “Ah, so the one who attacked us just now was the one you saw…”

“I can’t be sure it’s the same one,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “But it is definitely the same ‘kind’. And I suspect it is related to those cultists who worship the Sun. Both times it showed up in scenes tied to ‘fire’. That is very suspicious.”

“So it’s connected to those cultists…” Shirley blinked, then reacted quickly: “Could it be the ‘Sun Spawn’ they talk about?!”

“Let’s suspect that for now, though we don’t have any real proof,” Duncan said with a quiet sigh. “But more than the attacker’s identity, I’m bothered by why that thing appeared in your dream and Nina’s dream… What link is there between the scene at the City Museum and your dreams?”

As he spoke, he lifted his head and let his gaze sweep over the tall tower.

He still could not see Nina at the top of the tower, but Duncan was almost certain that this was the place Nina had seen in her dream.

“This really is Nina’s dream?” Shirley looked around in wonder, full of disbelief. “How did you know?”

“She told me about this dream,” Duncan said, raising a hand to point at the nearby tower as he spoke. “In the dream, she was standing on top of the tallest distillation tower, looking down at the city-state after the fire. This spot is about two blocks away from the little house in your nightmare. I don’t know why, but your dreams are clearly linked to each other on a deeper level.”

Shirley was amazed and seemed to want to ask more. But all at once Dog beside her seemed to notice something: “Hey, Shirley, look. The umbrella that guy was holding is still here!”

Shirley and Duncan both looked toward where Dog was pointing. Sure enough, a big black umbrella was lying quietly by the side of the street.

Their attention had been on the attacker before. After his main body split apart, the umbrella had fallen by the road, and for a while none of them had noticed it.

Duncan walked over. At last he had a chance to examine the black parasol up close. But when he saw the inside of the canopy, he couldn't help letting out a small "Huh?"

He had imagined what the umbrella that the attacker had carried in his hand the whole time might be like. It might be an supernatural item etched with runes. Or it might be something that looked plain on the outside but was actually an Anomaly with many hidden traits. In any case, given the attacker's eerie and terrifying powers and form, the umbrella's style should have tended toward the sinister.

Yet everything under the canopy was completely different from what he had imagined—

He saw an extremely complex man-made structure. Delicate hexagonal grids were packed densely along the frame, forming something like a kind of… solar panel. In the deep purple gaps between the grids, he saw fine pipes and bundles of wiring. At the center of the umbrella there was a delicate device like some sort of control core that linked the handle to the surrounding grid array. Its precision and complexity far surpassed any steam engine in the city-state of Pland.

Duncan stared at the thing, stunned.

His first reaction was simple: it felt like technology.

This was definitely not an supernatural item. Its style was completely different from that of any "Anomaly", and it was not a machine built by the city-states of today. This umbrella was a piece of technology, extremely delicate and complex.

It… came from a civilization beyond anything the modern city-states could understand!

“What is this thing?” Shirley asked in shock and confusion as she looked at the inner structure of the umbrella. She could not understand at all what it was and lacked Duncan’s knowledge from another world. To her it just looked a hundred times more complicated than she had imagined, to the point that it made her eyes swim. She reached out without thinking: “It looks kind of like…”

“Don’t touch it!” Dog cut her off at once. “It looks like some kind of Blasphemous Archetype.”

Shirley froze. “Blasphemous Archetype? What’s that supposed to be?”

“A creation from some forbidden history,” Dog said in a low, serious voice. “Something that shouldn’t exist in the Mortal Realm, but has been forced to stay in the Mortal Realm anyway. I don’t really know how to explain it to you… because I don’t know the principles behind it myself. Just remember this: in the long river of this world’s years, some stretches of history have been ‘locked’. The things born in those forbidden histories are Blasphemous Archetypes. In most cases, their very existence is harmful to living beings in the Mortal Realm. If you see one, do not touch it.”

Shirley quickly pulled her hand back, tense. Duncan gave Dog a thoughtful look and asked: “Is that also knowledge that Abyssal demons are born with?”

“More or less,” Dog said, shaking his head. “Not every Abyssal demon knows about these things. I just happened to be born closer to the head of the Abyssal Lord, so I ended up with a bit more knowledge in my skull.”

Duncan only grunted without answering, his eyes still on the strange black umbrella. Just then, as if it had lost some kind of “support”, the umbrella suddenly began to crumble and collapse before his eyes.

The delicate grid structure slowly turned transparent. The frame and wiring faded and turned into pale gray dust that scattered on the wind. The complex device at the core melted and flowed down like heated wax. Before it vanished completely, Duncan caught, out of the corner of his eye, a tiny line of text on one of its parts.

It was neither the common tongue of the city-states today nor any language he knew. Yet the meaning of the words still surfaced in his mind:

“K-22 Spectral Filter Crystal Core.”

A second later, the whole umbrella, including that last part, scattered away on the wind.

Duncan slowly straightened. Just then Shirley, standing beside him, gave a small cry: “Ah! What’s happening to my hand…”

Duncan looked at her arm and saw that not only her arm but her whole body was becoming transparent and blurry.

Shirley turned pale with fright. “Help help help help…”

“Help my ass!” Dog cut her off. “You’re about to wake up! This is the first time you’ve woken up properly from this dream—hurry up and thank Mr. Duncan!”

Only then did Shirley realize what was happening. She quickly looked at Duncan, and saw that his figure was also fading away in the dream.

Duncan smiled and waved to the girl in front of him: “Good night—and good morning. Don’t forget to wake Nina later so she can have breakfast.”

Chapter 136: An Ordinary Morning in the antique shop

A streak of morning light lit up the city-state of Pland, which had slept through the night. The Sun, locked in place by the double rune rings, slowly rose into the sky like a burning wheel. Under the great power of Vision 001, the things in the veil of night that did not belong to the mortal world finally began to fade.

The Shadows in the streets and alleys, the whispers in empty places, the murmurs hidden in the waves along the shore, the empty gaze lurking deep in narrow lanes, and the dreams that wrapped around people’s hearts.

Shirley opened her eyes.

She saw a ceiling that still felt unfamiliar. She saw sunlight coming in through the nearby window, falling on the low cabinet by the bed and on the desk beside it. The small room was clean and tidy, very simple, yet still much, much better than the place where she lived.

She smelled food. She heard a bit of noise from the direction of the kitchen. She saw Nina sprawled on the bed in a starfish pose. Today was a rest day. This girl could sleep in as much as she liked, because she had an “uncle” she could rely on, and there would be breakfast waiting when she woke up.

Shirley sat up in a daze. It took her a few seconds to fully remember why she was here, and what she had gone through in her dreams.

Then she reached over and pushed Nina: “Nina, time to get up… get up and wash up for breakfast.”

Nina answered in a sleepy mumble: “I’m so tired… let me sleep a little longer…”

Shirley froze for a moment. She suddenly didn’t know what she was supposed to do next.

She had been away from this kind of life for far, far too long. So long that there was a gap of a full eleven years. But she still vaguely remembered that she used to be like this too, and that she had once been allowed to live like this.

She slowly climbed out of bed and changed into her own clothes. As she listened to the sounds from outside, she reminded herself in her heart that this was not some peaceful, safe little home. In truth it was only a nest, dressed up like this for fun by a Subspace Shadow and his Retainer.

Yet this nest actually felt more like a “home” than the place where she and Dog lived.

Shirley drifted off in her thoughts, but Nina’s sudden shout cut through her wandering mind: “Wow! It’s already this late?!”

Shirley looked back and saw Nina sitting up in bed, her hair a total mess and her eyes wide open. Nina lifted her head to glance out the window, then finally noticed Shirley standing nearby. Her head wobbled a bit: “Shirley? Why are you… oh right, you slept over at my place last night…”

Then Nina jumped off the bed and cried out as she moved: “Ah, no time for this, I have to make breakfast…”

Halfway through her fussing she heard the noise from the kitchen and smelled the scent of food. She stopped, then seemed to wake up a second time: “Oh, Uncle is making breakfast today… right, Uncle’s health has been better lately… no, wait! School! I’m going to be late for school!”

Before she even finished, Nina rushed toward her desk to pack her things. But after only two steps she suddenly stopped, raised her head, and looked at the calendar on the nightstand: “Wait, no, today is a rest day…”

Then she turned in a little circle where she stood and dove headfirst back into her pillow: “Then I’ll sleep two more minutes…”

Shirley just stood nearby, completely confused, watching Nina jump out of bed and go through a dizzying series of actions, only to end up right back where she started as if nothing had happened. She never even found a chance to say a word. Only when Nina flopped onto the bed again did Shirley carefully move closer. But before she could speak, Nina suddenly sprang up again and stretched hard: “Ah, now I’m awake.”

Shirley: “…?”

“Shirley, what’s wrong?” Nina turned her head, now full of energy as she looked at Shirley. “Why that face?”

Shirley asked: “Do you… wake up like this every morning?”

Nina looked blank: “Huh? Like what?”

“I mean…” Shirley waved her hands in the air, as if she didn’t know how to explain. “You jump up first, then do this, then that, and then this and this…”

“Oh, I get really muddled when I first wake up,” Nina somehow pulled the right meaning out of Shirley’s strange, abstract gestures. She nodded while talking and went to change her clothes. “But now I’m totally awake! Oh, right, Shirley, did you sleep well last night? I toss and turn a lot when I sleep. I didn’t bother you, did I?”

“I…” Shirley had just opened her mouth when a rush of memories suddenly flooded in. She remembered that closed little room, that early morning, the sound of footsteps leaving and the door being locked, and then the Abyssal Hound breaking down the door. But after that came an unbelievable grand adventure, a bold exploration.

A bit eerie, a bit scary, but… pretty impressive.

“I slept very well,” she said with a little smile. “Actually, I move around a lot in my sleep too. Dog always says I’ll tear my own bed apart one day while I’m sleeping.”

“Uncle used to say the same thing about me,” Nina said as she finished changing. She gave a big yawn, then stepped forward, grabbed Shirley’s hand, and pulled her toward the door. “Come on, let’s eat first, I’m a little hungry.”

Shirley let herself be dragged out the door in a muddle. Then she saw Duncan coming out of the kitchen, wiping his hands on his apron. It was clear he had just finished cooking.

“Mr. Duncan…” Shirley tensed up again without even thinking. Even though she had seen it with her own eyes, the thought that a being like him had just been working in the kitchen made the whole thing feel strange and wrong to her. But she quickly forced that feeling down and lowered her head to greet him honestly: “Good morning.”

Just like the big boss had told her, she treated this place as a normal, ordinary place and tried to act like a normal person visiting someone else’s home.

Even though Shirley herself had no idea what “normal” guests were supposed to do when visiting someone, at least it was never wrong to say good morning.

“What are we having for breakfast?” Nina was already heading toward the kitchen, stretching her neck to peek around Duncan’s back as she walked. “It smells so good!”

“I fried some little sausages, bought them on my way back yesterday,” Duncan said offhand. Then he pressed down on Nina’s head and firmly turned her toward the washroom. “Go wash your hands first!”

Then he looked over at Shirley, hands on his hips: “You too. Don’t just stand there. Go wash your hands, and wash your face while you’re at it.”

Shirley jumped a little, then hurried after Nina to wash her hands and face. She was the first to finish and came back to Duncan, holding out her hands: “…They’re clean.”

As soon as she said it, she felt embarrassed. She suddenly thought she looked really silly. She was almost an adult, yet after washing her hands she actually held them out like this to show the Lord. She felt more like a seven-year-old child than a seventeen-year-old. She didn’t even know why her brain had suddenly shorted out like that.

But Duncan did not mind at all. He only nodded, then turned back toward the kitchen as he asked in a casual tone: “How did you sleep?”

Shirley lowered her head: “Mm, fine… better than before.”

“Did the wounds you took in the dream affect the Mortal Realm?” Duncan asked again.

Shirley was startled. She suddenly remembered that she really had been struck once by that strange attacker in the dream, like being hit with a “whip”. She quickly lifted her left arm and saw a faint scar there.

Because of her powerful self-healing, the scar had almost finished closing by now and she barely felt anything. But there was no doubt that when she was hurt in the dream last night, her body in the Mortal Realm had taken the same injury.

And at that time she had been trapped in the dream, so even though her body in the Mortal Realm was hurt, she had not been able to wake up.

Duncan saw the mark on Shirley's arm. His gaze paused for a moment, then he gave a small nod.

It went against common sense, but it was not beyond what he had expected.

That strange dream had never been just a simple dream.

"It seems that getting hurt in that dream will also affect the Mortal Realm at the same time," he said to Shirley very seriously. "In the future, if I'm not with you, don't explore that dream on your own. Your combat power is strong, but it doesn't work well against that splitting monster."

Shirley nodded quickly: "Mm, I understand."

Duncan thought for a moment, then added: "Also, if you get trapped in that nightmare again, you can call me directly."

Shirley blinked, as if she hadn't reacted yet: "Call you?"

"Call my name, the full name I told you in the dream," Duncan said calmly. "Or call the Vanished. It's best if you call near glass, mirrors, or other things with a reflective surface. Then I can hear you more clearly."

Shirley listened, and suddenly something clicked in her mind. At the same time, through the mental link between her and Dog, she felt a wave of nervous emotion coming from Dog's side.

"You want… to make me your Retainer?" she asked, lifting her eyes, tense and troubled.

“I don’t know what a Retainer really is,” Duncan said. “I’m not asking you to offer me anything. You’re Nina’s friend, and now you’re working with me too. I’m just giving you a bit of extra protection.”

Shirley drew in a breath, but still didn’t dare answer too quickly. Just then, Nina’s cheerful voice sounded from the kitchen doorway: “What are you talking about?”

“You don’t have to answer me now,” Duncan said quietly to Shirley, then looked up at Nina. “Why did washing your hands take so long?”

“I couldn’t clean the gunk at the corner of my eyes,” Nina rubbed her eyes. “I rubbed till they almost hurt…”

“Drink more water in the next few days,” Duncan said helplessly, giving this young lady a quick look. Then, as if in passing, he asked, “By the way, did you have that dream again last night? The one where you stand somewhere high and look down at a fire?”

“No,” Nina thought for a moment and shook her head. “Last night I dreamed my belly was being pressed down by a horse, and then by a cow. It was so heavy… Uncle, why did you suddenly ask?”

“It’s nothing. I just remembered that psychiatrist is coming to visit again today,” Duncan shook his head and put away the thoughts on his face. “Let’s eat.”

Chapter 137: “Two Descendants”

North of the city-states of Pland and Lunsa, beyond the busy “Great Cross route” where merchants sailed back and forth, cold air hung forever over a sea known as the Frost Sea. Under this strange chill that seemed as if it would never fade, the Frost Sea took on a look very different from other waters.

Here, the sea had a deep, heavy quality, sharply different from the warmer seas. Small chunks of drift ice often appeared where currents met islands. Mysterious giant icebergs rose from below the surface from time to time, turning into temporary barriers or moving pieces of land. For some seafarers struggling to make a living in the Frost Sea, they became markers on their routes or emergency havens in a storm. Strange cold mists, icy winds, and phantom lights were also unique sights here, giving birth to countless weird legends, so that even the two main city-states on this sea, Frostholm and Cold Harbor, were wrapped in a cloak of mystery.

But compared to the great icebergs that could be tracked and predicted, and compared to the supernatural Visions that in most cases existed only in rumor, what the captains who lived off the Frost Sea talked about most often was a different thing. It was a terrible fleet that had been active for half a century, a real force wrapped in layers of myth and fog— the Sea Mist Fleet led by Tyrian, son of Duncan Abnomar, whose reach spread across a third of the sea routes in the Frost Sea.

On the edge of an island sealed and hidden by special sea currents and thick fog, an iron-gray, hard-lined ironclad warship lay quietly in a dock. Service crew and sailors moved busily around it, loading fuel and resupplying fresh water and ammunition.

If someone who knew a bit of Frostholm's history stood here, they would notice at a glance that the sailors still wore Frostholm navy uniforms from half a century ago. They would also notice the white badges on their shoulders or chests— in Frostholm's tradition, those badges were a sign of mourning.

In the captain's cabin on the upper deck of the warship, a man in a black navy cloak was reading through some documents.

He was thin, with a high nose and deep-set eyes. His neat short black hair was trimmed close. Over his left eye he wore a black eyepatch made of some unknown leather. That eyepatch, almost a symbol of a pirate, made his already gloomy face look even sharper and more dangerous. The shape of his brow and features faintly resembled that of the "ghost captain" who once made the world tremble.

A large parrot with bright, patterned tail feathers perched on a wooden stand nearby. It was staring with full attention at a brass device beside the thin man. The device was a set of precise, complex lenses. A ring of levers and small lenses surrounded it, and in the center sat a large scrying crystal. It looked very luxurious and gave off a strong sense of mystery.

The thin man spoke without looking up: "Polly, if you touch that, I'll send you to the Radiant Star next month to keep those puppets and ghosts company."

"Ah, cruel!" the big parrot screeched at once, shaking the wooden stand. "Ah, cruel! Tyrian is such a cruel captain!"

"…I really should find out which bastard taught you that line," Tyrian Abnomar frowned. "Can't you say something else?"

The large parrot flapped its wings proudly. “Polly learned it herself! Polly learned it herself!”

Tyrian rubbed his forehead. “Damn, and there’s that line too…”

Just then, a knock on the door suddenly came from the side, breaking off the exchange between Tyrian and the parrot.

“Come in,” Tyrian said, turning his head.

The door to the captain’s cabin opened, and a tall, bald man walked in.

His skin was pale, like the skin of a corpse that had been dead for a long time. A permanent, murky gloom lingered in his eyes. A faint smell of the sea clung to him, mixed with a chill that seemed to come from a grave.

A moving corpse. A body that had stayed behind in the Mortal Realm.

Tyrian looked at the “Living dead” who had entered: “Aiden, how much fuel has been loaded?”

“Almost finished, Captain,” the tall bald man, Aiden, lowered his head slightly. His voice was hoarse and rough, and a thin white mist of cold air drifted from his mouth and nose as he spoke. “The boilers are already heating up.”

“Good,” Tyrian gave a small nod. “Any movement from Cold Harbor?”

“As quiet as a rock,” Aiden said, with a touch of contempt in his tone. “They don’t dare step into our waters. Even with only half the Sea Mist Fleet left in the Frost Sea, those cowards don’t have the courage to cross the route.”

“They’re smart, very good at calculating gains and losses. They were like that half a century ago,” Tyrian said with a small smile. “Go get ready. We’ll leave port on time.”

“Yes, Captain.”

The First Mate, who carried the cold aura of death, pushed open the door and left the room. Tyrian’s gaze slowly followed him out, then drew back.

His First Mate was a Living dead. In fact, in the entire Sea Mist Fleet, other than Tyrian himself, the “Immortal”, every member was this kind of Living dead, stuck halfway between the living and the dead.

His loyal subordinates had served faithfully in this fleet for half a century.

In a way, he himself, a man who could not die because of the curse of Subspace, was no different from his crew members.

Tyrian shook his head. At that moment, the brass device by his hand suddenly made a mechanical sound. He turned toward it and saw the complicated levers and lenses moving and shifting quickly, focusing their combined point on the scrying crystal at the center. A second later, the scrying crystal gave off a faint light, and a blurred image began to form inside it.

A young lady with long, straight black hair and a black silk dress appeared in the scrying crystal. Her delicate features carried a hint of cold, mysterious charm, with a quiet, mage-like air. Behind her, many magical mechanisms were running on their own, and tiny points of ghostly, phosphorus-blue fire floated in the air like scattered stars.

“Lucretia,” Tyrian glanced at the lady in the scrying crystal and nodded slightly. “I really didn’t expect you to remember to send a greeting before your elder brother sets out.”

The young lady in the scrying crystal was just about to speak. She froze when she heard Tyrian’s words: “You’re leaving today?”

Tyrian frowned: “…You didn’t contact me because I’m leaving today?!”

“No,” the lady in the scrying crystal, with her mage-like mystery, calmly shook her head. “My Deep Sea detection device exploded.”

The corner of Tyrian’s mouth twitched. Then he heard his younger sister continue: “Everything else is easy to repair. I just can’t find a replacement for the core crystal lens.”

Tyrian kept his face blank.

“Do you have any new ones over there?” Lucretia asked. “I’ll trade border minerals and samples.”

“Spirit Realm lenses that match your precision needs can only be made in two city-states,” Tyrian finally could not stop a sigh. “The main trade channels are controlled by the Truth Academy. The number that actually reaches the outside world is very, very, very limited. It’s only been two months since you broke your last detector…”

“I found some very interesting samples. They may have drifted up from the Abyssal Deep sea area,” Lucretia said.

“Abyssal Deep samples won’t do either,” Tyrian said. “Even though those things really can be sold to the Truth Academy…”

“I also collected phantoms left over after the Border Collapse.”

“That’s not…” Tyrian held his forehead in one hand, feeling a headache. “The main thing is that right now I really don’t know where I’m supposed to find you a whole new set of lenses…”

Lucretia thought for a moment. “Rob someone?”

“I can’t always rely on robbery,” Tyrian sighed again. “The Sea Mist Fleet is preparing to run formal business. Right now we mainly make money by collecting protection fees…”

“Oh, then forget it,” Lucretia finally shrugged. The first half of her sentence let Tyrian breathe a little easier, but the second half made this famous Pirate Lord tense up again. “Then I’ll ask again tomorrow.”

“You…” Tyrian started, then gave up. “Forget it. I can’t stop your exploration plan anyway,” he said at last with helpless resignation. (In just these few minutes, even he didn’t know how many times he had sighed.) “Tell me about your situation, my ‘honorable’ great explorer younger sister. You wander all year along the border of the civilized world. Have you really found any signs that our world is heading toward Doomsday?”

“I can hear the mockery, brother,” Lucretia said with a straight face. “You’ve always looked down on my sense of urgency. You’ve never truly cared about what I’ve found on the border. I can understand. You focus on more practical matters. That is why I’m even more grateful that you still help me as much as you can, even when you don’t understand. But you must not forget our father… the warning he gave.”

“That our world is nothing but a pile of dying embers…” Tyrian leaned back in his chair and spoke softly, like a sigh. “To this day I still don’t know what he saw on that day. But one clear fact is that he was already mad when he gave that warning. And now you’re repeating what he did back then, even trying to uncover the truth that drove him insane.”

Tyrian shook his head and looked seriously at the figure in the scrying crystal. “Lucretia, one Vanished in this world is already bad enough.”

Chapter 138: The Radiant Star

Wasn’t one ship like the Vanished in this world already bad enough…

In the Divination room, lit only by dim candlelight, Lucretia sat quietly in a high-backed chair padded with velvet cushions. She used her gaze on the scrying crystal resting on the table, yet for some reason her thoughts drifted away, back to something long ago, to an afternoon a century in the past…

That figure, already a little blurred in her memory, stood on the deck, facing the sunlight that was slowly sinking toward the horizon. His tall body seemed to turn into wavering, unreal flames in the sunset. In a low, heavy voice she had never heard before, he told her:

“Our world is nothing but a heap of dying embers…”

By now, she of course knew that even then, Father had already fallen into madness. Soon after, he completely abandoned his humanity and chose to embrace the “divine blessing” of Subspace. Yet she still sometimes wondered: if that day she had talked with Father a little longer, if she had seriously asked what he meant by those words, asked what exactly he had seen at the edge of the world, would things have unfolded differently afterward?

Perhaps Father would still not have escaped his insane end. Perhaps the birth of the Vanished was already a “fixed fact” carved into the long river of years, something no one could change. But at least, she would know how it had all happened. She would know where she should go to seek the truth—rather than, like now, steering a ship under the curse, wandering fruitlessly in this border region where even the Holy See's inspectors were unwilling to go deep…

"Lucretia, are you still listening?"

Tyrian's voice suddenly came from the scrying crystal, pulling the young lady who had been staring blankly at the table back to herself. Lucretia shook her head, pushing her tangled thoughts aside for now.

"Big Brother," she looked solemnly at Tyrian inside the scrying crystal, her tone turning serious. "Do you still remember what Father said before his last voyage to the border? The time he did not let us go with him…"

"Of course I remember." Tyrian nodded. "He said he had found a clue to Anomaly 000 and was going to find 'a cure for this world.' Back then he not only refused to take the two of us, he also refused the escort of several other warships. And after he and the Vanished returned, both he and that ship were no longer quite the same."

"Yes. All the crew members on the Vanished stopped speaking, as if they were under a silence curse. Father was still clear-minded enough to talk with us. He said he hadn't found Anomaly 000, and even if Anomaly 000 did exist, it was not the origin point of the world's distortion. The so?called cure had never existed from the very beginning. After that, until the day he stood on the deck in the sunset and told us 'the world is a heap of embers,' he never again mentioned anything related to that border voyage…"

Tyrian in the scrying crystal stayed silent. After an unknown length of time, it was Lucretia who spoke again: "After that, I went and contacted the Holy See fleets that patrolled near the border. That included the Flamebearer, the Deep Sea priests, the scholars of the Truth Academy, and even those gloomy death cultists. I asked them about Anomaly 000, but they all said there was no such thing as an anomaly or Vision numbered zero…"

“I also asked around,” Tyrian said in a low voice. “I got the same answer as you. In this world, there is no anomaly or Vision numbered zero. It’s not that it doesn’t exist yet. There simply isn’t an empty slot for it.

“The very first list that leaked from the Nameless King’s tomb already set down all the numbers. Unfound or still?forming anomalies and Visions all have their own reserved slots waiting to be filled. Even things like the Mycelium Bottle and the Fungal Isle, which evolved over the course of history, were later matched to positions that had been planned ahead of time. But at the start of that entire list, there is no slot for number zero at all…

“That’s why I say Father must already have been unstable before he sailed for the border. He could not possibly have been ignorant of this information.”

Here, Tyrian suddenly stopped. Then he raised his head and fixed his gaze on Lucretia in the scrying crystal. His expression grew very serious: “Why bring this up all of a sudden? We haven’t talked about it for half a century. What are you planning to do?”

“…Relax. I won’t dive headfirst into that grand wall of fog like Father did.” Lucretia rarely showed much expression, but this time she still smiled. “I’m looking for clues Father left behind. I’m not trying to walk his old path.”

Tyrian stayed silent for a moment, then slowly nodded. “…Good.”

Lucretia did not speak for a while. The two siblings, separated by a vast distance and rarely meeting face to face over the past century, each had their own thoughts. Only when the faint sound of a distant foghorn from the Sea Mist came through the scrying crystal did Lucretia suddenly break the silence: “You really are going to Pland? Just because of that governor’s ‘invitation’?”

“The ‘invitation’ isn’t important. I don’t care about that city?state’s so? called safety problem. But the governor said in his letter that the Vanished had appeared again in the Mortal Realm, and he sounded very certain. I have to go see for myself.” Tyrian’s face was solemn. “That ship hasn’t shown itself in almost half a century. For it to appear again now is very suspicious.”

Lucretia thought for a moment, then asked: “You ran into the Vanished once fifty years ago. I remember you were still in Frostholm then… was what you saw back then really the Vanished?”

“…Absolutely. Hard as it is to believe, it was truly the Vanished.” Tyrian’s voice grew low. “I wouldn’t mistake the position of even a single mast, or the layout of a single set of rigging.”

“Then… the one standing on that ship back then, was that really ‘Father’?”

Tyrian lowered his head slightly, hiding his face in shadow. “…It was him. Though I’d much rather that thing wasn’t him.”

Lucretia looked at her Big Brother in the scrying crystal. After hesitating for a moment, she spoke softly: “Be very careful. If that really is him, you’ll be in great danger.”

“I know.” Tyrian let out a quiet sigh. “He’s already a frenzied ghost completely twisted by Subspace. I would never let my guard dow—”

Lucretia shook her head, expressionless. “No, I mean if that really is Father, once he sees you turned the Sea Mist into a big lump of iron, he’ll hit you even harder than he did fifty years ago.”

Tyrian froze, then glared at once. “What is that supposed to mean? This is an efficient modern refit! What’s wrong with steam boilers and rapid?fire guns? And you have some nerve to talk. At least I kept part of the original.

Does your ship still have even a single plank from the Radiant Star of those days…”

The scrying crystal went dark.

Lucretia let out a quiet breath and rose from her chair.

Her Big Brother was still in good shape. A little provocation and he was full of energy, and he still had a strong curiosity about modern things. That was good.

In a long, endless life, what one feared most was the decline of the mind and the decay of the soul.

Light footsteps came from the dimness, mixed with the rubbing of mechanical parts and clockwork. Lucretia turned toward the sound and saw a clockwork automaton with the shape of a woman walking toward her. The automaton looked about sixty percent like her, yet its whole body was made of obvious rivets and mechanical joints. Its steel?and?ceramic shell had been shaped into a maid’s dress. In the dim light, it looked rather eerie.

As the automaton walked, the spring mechanism on her back kept clicking softly. She came to Lucretia, offered the black tea in her hands, and her jointed mouth clacked as she spoke in a slightly stiff female voice: “Mistress, please have some tea.”

“Thank you.” Lucretia took the cup and asked casually: “Lunie, where are we now?”

The clockwork automaton named Lunie answered: “The Radiant Star has just passed ‘Fog Horn Isle’. We are now sailing along the edge of the Eternal Veil. Do you wish to enjoy the view outside the window?”

“…Open the dome.” Lucretia took a sip of black tea and set the cup back on Lunie’s tray. “It’s already morning. I should bask in the Sun.”

“Yes, Mistress.”

Lunie bowed slightly and backed away.

At the same time as the automaton’s voice faded, the entire Divination room gave a slight tremor.

The squeaking of moving machinery rose in a continuous chain. The humming and grinding of giant springs and magic units working together sounded like a piece of music. Driven by countless gears and rails, the walls of the room began to pull back and unfold. The room that had been dim and candlelit was suddenly flooded with sunlight. In the sunlight, the entire room opened slowly like a mechanical flower, and in the end bloomed into something like a high stage.

This was the upper deck of the Radiant Star. The room where the “Sea Witch” Lucretia resided had blossomed into a towering stage at the very front of the deck. Around this blooming mechanical flower, one could see the full shape of the Radiant Star—

The ship had been split in half.

The front half of the vessel had been completely rebuilt. Countless runes and magical devices covered the hull. It looked less like a ship and more like a giant magical mechanism. Strange materials taken from the border region or from the sea had reshaped the deck. Everything in sight shimmered with a faint, bizarre, dreamlike color, as if a never?ending magic ritual was running between the dense arrays and clusters of crystals.

The rear half of the ship was completely different. There, half of the hull had become almost ghost?like and half transparent. A thin veil of shifting light wrapped the stern of the Radiant Star. In the floating glow, one could faintly see that part of the structure still kept the vessel’s original form—

A sailing warship built a century ago, with a style faintly similar to the Vanished.

Chapter 139: Those Who Guard the Border

A century ago, the Radiant Star, like the Sea Mist, had once been an escort warship of the Vanished.

Yet very few people knew what these two legendary warships had gone through after their break with the Vanished, or how they had step by step become what they were now.

The Sea Mist, under the command of “Steel Vice Admiral” Tyrian, had, after many twists and turns, once become the main warship of the city?state of Frostholm. People called it “the Unsinkable” and “the Breathing Corpse.” That ship had been heavily damaged many times in battle. Yet it was as if an undying soul ruled over it, dragging it back again and again from a fate that should have sunk it for good. After one refit after another that almost broke the rules of shipbuilding, it gradually turned into a steel behemoth.

Legend said that ship even fed directly on steel and seabed ore. During night voyages when no one kept watch on it, it would slowly grow new turrets and armor plates on its own.

As for the Radiant Star, which had passed into the hands of the “Sea Witch” Lucretia, it was wrapped in an even thicker veil of mystery because it rarely approached the civilized world. In truth, apart from a few members of the Explorer Association and the Holy See fleets that often patrolled the border, the ordinary captains on the Boundless Sea had no chance at all to see what this ship looked like.

Those who had been lucky enough to see the Radiant Star described it like this:

“It clearly no longer fully belongs to our Mortal Realm. That ship has truly sunk at least once and has lost half its structure in the Boundless Sea. Half of its hull looks like a ghost, showing its shape from a century ago. The other half, under the power of that witch, has been twisted into strange and bizarre forms. The bow is hung with cursed things from the Deep Sea, and machines and magic equipment clang and rattle everywhere. The crew has long since died. Soulless clockwork automatons and cursed little dolls run about on the deck instead of normal seafarers.

“Without a doubt, that ship is a corpse still sailing the sea—or rather, half a deformed corpse dragging half a soul.”

Lucretia’s gaze swept slowly across her flagship, and she gave a small, satisfied nod.

The Radiant Star was in good condition. Her crew members were all in good spirits.

She knew how the world described her ship—and she also knew how people described her Big Brother’s Sea Mist. She knew many captains feared the two of them as siblings, second only to their fear of their Father, who had returned from Subspace.

But she did not care. She usually dealt with very few humans, and those people either had great courage or deep knowledge, or at least had gone through some real adventures. Those people could talk with her in a calm and rational way. That was enough.

She and her Big Brother were still seen as part of the Mortal Realm, still seen as “standing on the side of humans,” and even though many believed the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star were under the curse, that view of them did not change.

In the end, there were simply too many cursed things in this world. Almost every city?state lived side by side with countless anomalies and Visions. Some even described modern human civilization itself as “cursed.” In a world where everything was under the curse, there was no harm in leaving some room for two strange ships.

Lucretia walked down from her stage that bloomed like a mechanical flower and headed toward the bow deck. Two clockwork puppets with comical masks clanked past in front of her, and a big little doll sewn from velvet, silk, and ribbons ran up from the side. It squeaked in a shrill voice: “Mistress! Mistress! Good morning! Good morning!”

“It’s almost noon,” Lucretia said casually. She stepped past the little doll and stood at the bow, gazing into the distance.

She saw a huge gray?white wall of fog, like a vast curtain at the World’s Edge, standing far out on the sea. It linked the sky with the ocean, magnificent and awe?inspiring.

That was “the border.”

The grand wall of fog had many names—the world’s border, the grand mist, the fog barrier. Its most formal name was the “Eternal Veil.”

But Lucretia preferred to simply call it “the border.”

Father had called it that in those days.

Under normal conditions, the Eternal Veil was like a ring wall that covered all known seas. It only rose and fell slightly within a relatively fixed range. It did not shrink or expand. It was just a stable natural phenomenon.

But on rare occasions, a part of its barrier would suddenly “appear” within the territory of civilization and, as it collapsed inward, would trigger terrible disasters. This wall of fog, which appeared out of nowhere and then collapsed in the Mortal Realm, would drag the nearby solid matter toward the deep layers of the world and could even open a door straight into Subspace. This terrible disaster was called “Border Collapse.”

For captains who often sailed the Boundless Sea, Border Collapse was something even more terrifying than storms, whirlpools, or mass hysteria.

The only good news was that such collapses did not happen often.

Lucretia spent most of her time in the border region. She watched the border and studied it, trying to summarize the rules of the thick fog’s movements and to find the cause of its sudden inward collapses. A hundred years ago, her Father had done the same.

Yet to this day, no one had uncovered the secrets of the Veil.

What had Father discovered back then? Or what had he “heard” that made him suddenly decide to pass through that thick fog and search for Anomaly Zero?

Lucretia drew her gaze back from the border.

In the borderlands, one should not keep one’s gaze on the Eternal Veil for too long. There was no clear proof that the thick fog could devour minds or influence thoughts, but on the Boundless Sea, especially far from the civilized city?states, staring too long at any target on the sea carried a natural risk.

Who knew what kinds of things could spread along with “gaze” in this place.

A long, mellow whistle broke the stillness of the border sea.

Lucretia followed the sound and saw tiny shadows appear at the edge of the great fog wall. Those shadows slowly drew closer until they showed the outlines of warships.

They were three ships, the latest ironclad warships, driven by powerful steam cores. They were sailing toward the position of the Radiant Star, but this was only a chance meeting.

The other side blew their whistle first. It was a greeting. In this borderland, no matter who you met, as long as it was not an Eldritch God from Subspace, it was something to be glad about.

“Mistress,” Lunie walked over. A stiff voice came from inside the clockwork maid. “It is a patrol squadron of the Holy See… confirmed by sight, Flamebearer Church.”

“…Only the Flamebearer and those storm cultists would patrol this close to the Eternal Veil,” Lucretia said softly. “They really are a bunch of people who don’t care whether they live.”

“Should we answer them?” Lunie asked.

“…Blow the whistle back,” Lucretia said in a low voice. “To the civilization we still keep alive.”

…

There were not many customers in the antique shop today. Aside from an unremarkable pair of ornaments sold in the morning, no one had stepped through the door.

Nina sat beside the counter with a mechanics textbook in her hands, studying the fine and complex mechanical structures drawn on the pages. From time to time she picked up the notebook next to her and sketched things in the blank spaces. Duncan sat behind the counter. While curiously flipping through Nina’s history book, he jotted down a few notes in his own notebook.

Only Shirley had nothing to do. She wanted to go home but did not dare. She wanted to talk to Nina, but she could not understand what Nina was studying. After wandering bored among the shelves for a long time, she finally could not help muttering: “Is reading really that fun?”

“Of course it is!” Nina looked up. “And my final exams are coming. I have to hurry and review.”

Duncan also looked up at Shirley. “If you’re really that bored, you can find a book to read… I’ve got a brief history of the Age of City?States here. Do you want to read it?”

Shirley glanced at the books near Duncan’s hand, opened her mouth, and showed an awkward expression. “I… I can’t read…”

Duncan stopped turning the pages. Beside him, Nina also raised her head in surprise.

“Why are you so shocked?” Shirley widened her eyes as if hurt. “I… I already told you I sneaked into school. Is it really that strange that I’ve never gone to school? I was raised by a dog…”

Duncan really was a little surprised, but seeing Shirley’s reaction, he felt more moved than anything else. “You can’t read, and you still had the nerve to sneak into school. I don’t know if I should say you’re too confident, or that you trust that mutt’s unreliable cognitive interference ability too much.”

“Dog’s cognitive interference is very reliable!” Shirley argued at once. “It’s just… just…”

The girl’s face turned a little red. She didn’t seem to dare finish that sentence. Duncan guessed what she wanted to say and smiled slightly: “You already dare to argue with me. See? There’s nothing to be afraid of, is there?”

“That’s right, that’s right, my uncle is very kind,” Nina, the silly girl who understood nothing, chimed in beside them. “He was pretty irritable for a while before, but he’s fine now, isn’t he?”

“I…” Shirley opened her mouth, but suddenly didn’t know how to talk to this “uncle and niece.” She held it in for a long time and still couldn’t manage a second word.

Duncan shook his head with a smile. Just as he was about to say something more, a faintly familiar presence suddenly appeared in his senses.

Duncan paused for a moment. The next second, he knew exactly who that presence belonged to Vanna. That young Inquisitor was approaching the antique shop… and fast!

Chapter 140:

Duncan sensed Vanna’s presence rushing toward the antique shop. It did not come in a straight line. It kept changing direction and even paused in strange places.

What was an Inquisitor who lived in the Upper City doing suddenly coming to this Lower City antique shop? And why was her route so strange?

The moment the aura of that young Deep Sea Inquisitor appeared in his senses, Duncan frowned a little and, without thinking, glanced at Shirley.

Was she here for Shirley? Had the Deep Sea Church finally found the summoner in the city who traveled with Abyssal demons? Or was she here for him? He had always acted very carefully. He had left no clues that could point to the Vanished. At most, the original identity of this body as a Suntist might be exposed… but that still should not alarm a full Inquisitor, right?

The way that aura approached—fast yet winding—did not look at all like someone just strolling past. It felt full of purpose.

His thoughts rose and fell in an instant. Duncan quietly looked at Nina, who was reading beside him, then stood up and walked toward the front door of the antique shop.

Shirley noticed his movement and followed him without thinking: “Mr. Duncan? What’s going on…?”

“Stay in the shop.” Duncan gave Shirley, who no matter how you looked at it should count as a Heretic, a look and told her to stay where she was. Then he went to the door and looked toward the direction of the aura he sensed.

Then he understood why Vanna's aura was getting closer so fast—

She had come by car.

A dark gray car driven by a steam engine screeched to a stop at the shop's door. The door opened and two people stepped down. One was Vanna. She had changed into regular clothes, but her height still drew the eye at once. The other was the psychiatrist he had met once before, Miss Heidi.

Duncan: "…"

He thought for a moment about all the wild scenes he had imagined after sensing an aura rush toward him. Maybe he should stop assuming every supernatural matter involved people in spotless white robes drifting in and out like the wind. Thinking about it now, those brief pauses while Vanna came over were probably just her waiting at traffic lights…

Then he saw the psychiatrist lady wave to him in high spirits and greet him cheerfully: "Mr. Duncan!"

Duncan's mouth twitched. When he saw Vanna in ordinary clothes, he already knew he had overthought things. Even so, as he walked up to them, he deliberately gave this Inquisitor a few extra looks and showed just the right amount of surprise: "And this is…?"

"Ah, you must recognize her. There's no one in this city who doesn't," Heidi said with a teasing smile. "Our respected Inquisitor, Miss Vanna. But she's off duty today, so relax a little—she's my friend. When she heard what happened at the City Museum, she insisted on coming along to thank you in person…"

"Friend?" This time Duncan's surprise had some real feeling in it. He really had not expected this. "I didn't think you would bring such a big shot over…"

“Calling me a ‘big shot’ is a bit much, Mr. Duncan,” Vanna said.

It seemed she had been quietly sizing up the antique shopkeeper from the start. She finally spoke with a slight smile. Her voice was a little hoarse and low, with a hint of magnetism. But to Duncan, this was not the first time he had heard the Inquisitor’s voice.

“Just treat me as an ordinary guest. As Heidi said, I’m off duty today. I came mainly to thank you for saving Heidi at the City Museum, and also to learn a few things… Don’t worry, it’s nothing like a formal interrogation.”

Learn a few things?

Duncan’s expression did not change. He kept his usual friendly smile, stepped aside, and invited the two special visitors into the shop: “Then let’s not stand in the doorway. Please, come in—business is slow today anyway, so we might as well make the place lively.”

He spoke as he walked back into the antique shop. As soon as he went in, he saw Shirley craning her neck, peeking toward the outside. He casually rubbed the girl’s hair: “Calm down later.”

Shirley froze: “Calm down for wha—”

The next second, she knew why she had to calm down.

She saw the Inquisitor who stood at the very top of Pland’s Church when it came to force step inside. The “big sister” over one meter ninety tall walked past the little shorty under one meter sixty, and the pressure she brought was not only visual.

Shirley almost blurted out without thinking: “Wo—wow, you’re so tall!”

Vanna stopped without thinking and glanced at the girl standing nearby, whose expression was strange and whose whole body was tight. She nodded to her in a friendly way: “Hello.”

“Her name is Shirley,” Duncan said casually from the side. “She helps out in my shop. She was also there when the trouble at the City Museum happened. Miss Heidi should have mentioned her to you.”

“So you’re Shirley?” Vanna nodded, matching the description she had heard with the real person in front of her. “You really are a cute little girl.”

At this time, Nina, who had been reading by the counter, also heard the commotion. She ran over, and the first thing she saw was Vanna’s astonishing height. She recognized this famous Inquisitor at once and let out the same startled cry as Shirley.

“…This is why I don’t like going out with you,” Heidi finally could not help speaking up from behind Vanna, where Nina had not noticed her for a long time. “You just stand there and grab all the attention—I’m supposed to be the main character today, you know?”

“But I don’t want to attract attention this way either,” Vanna looked at her friend with a straight face. “I’ve already done my best to look ordinary today.”

“…Forget it, I’m used to it.” Heidi sighed, then greeted Nina and Shirley one by one. After that she took out the visiting gift she had brought and handed it to Duncan.

“I don’t know what you like, but I can’t come to thank you with empty hands. My father asked me to give this to you. He said someone as well-read as you, who is interested in history and occult studies, should like it.”

“You’re too polite. It was just a small favor at the time,” Duncan said in return as he reached out and took the gift. It was a wooden box that already looked quite old. He opened the lid right there, but when he saw what was inside, he became a little puzzled. “This is…?”

Inside was a book, a beautifully bound and expensive book, the kind respectable scholars in the Upper City would keep in their homes. On the hard dark purple cover, a line of elegant cursive letters read:

“City-States and Gods”

“This is a book from my father’s collection. It’s already very hard to find on the market now—its author was the great naturalist and theologian Mr. Maldano Victor from a century ago,” Heidi said with a smile. “It describes the historical changes of the Age of City-States and how various deity faiths, including the four True Gods, influenced civilized society. He said you should like things in this field.”

Duncan quietly looked at the exquisite book in the box, and a smile slowly appeared on his face.

“Of course, I really do like it. Please thank Old Mr. Morris for his kindness for me.”

After some polite words and a bit of friendly small talk—and since there were no other guests today anyway—Duncan simply closed the front door of the antique shop and treated the fairly spacious first floor as a sitting room.

Nina brought over two more chairs. Duncan brewed the best coffee in the shop for the two guests. Shirley pretended to straighten the shelves but actually just looked for a corner to lower her presence. Vanna looked around the small shop that seemed ordinary on the surface with some curiosity, while Heidi had already skillfully set her “medical box” on the counter. At the same time, she said to Nina: “Let’s get straight to the point. I heard you’ve been troubled by nightmares for a while, and often seem absent-minded?”

“Ah, they’re not really nightmares, just a strange dream that keeps going on…” Nina had not expected Miss Heidi to be so direct. She paused for a moment before answering. “I always dream that I’m standing somewhere very, very high, like on top of a tower. Then I see several blocks at my feet that have all been burned to ash. But nothing scary actually appears…”

“Stop,” Heidi raised a hand in a gesture, opening her medical box as she spoke casually. “Recurring scene, high place, fire, no specific frightening images, but the dream itself comes back so often that your mind can’t rest… Let me think…”

Nina leaned forward to peek into Heidi’s medical box. The first thing she saw inside were chisels, axes, saws, and all kinds of bottles and jars. She shrank her neck at once: “Um… Miss Heidi… can I not get treatment? I don’t think I’m that bad actually…”

Duncan also saw what was in Heidi’s medical box, and his eyebrow twitched: “Excuse me, but… are these really things you need for Mental Therapy?”

Was this elegant and gentle-looking physician in front of him actually a psychiatrist, or a vet?!

Chapter 141:

It turned out that in this world filled with strange things, the craft of “Mental Therapy” was much more hardcore than Duncan had imagined. It was so hardcore it no longer felt like a “technique” and was heading straight toward “industrial work”…

Luckily, that box of tools was not prepared for Nina. The psychiatrist lady noticed the horrified looks on the uncle and niece’s faces. She gave a smile that said she had seen this reaction many times before, then took a printed form from the very bottom of the box and handed it to Nina: “Fill this out roughly first.”

Nina let out a breath of relief at once: “I thought those… tools were for me.”

“These are for my work—when I work for the authority and the Church,” Heidi said with a small smile. “I often have to deal with dangerous people who are extremely stubborn and paranoid. Normal methods can’t pry open skulls that have been reinforced by Heretic thoughts.”

The more Duncan listened, the more he felt something was off. On the side, Shirley, who was trying hard to lower her presence but still could not help eavesdropping, shrank her neck even more. She quickly slipped to a spot farther away. While pretending to dust the shelves, she muttered through the mental link to Dog, who was in a hidden state: “So scary, so scary… this place is so scary… Mr. Duncan is already scary enough, and now there’s an Inquisitor here… and that Heidi too…”

Dog’s voice sounded in her mind, even more timid than she was: “How should I know?! Who would imagine you could get caught by a ghost captain while moving around on land, and then, while staying by that ghost captain’s side, you’d run into a Church Inquisitor coming over as a guest—are we the ones who’ve gone mad, or has the world gone mad? Would you believe it if someone told you this?”

While secretly watching what was going on by the counter, Shirley grumbled in her heart with a bitter face: [Who would believe that? If you told a fish it would one day die in a car crash, it wouldn’t believe it either…]

“…Don’t mention ‘fish’. I’m scared…”

Shirley paused: “Dog, when did you start being scared of fish?”

“And stop talking to me. Don’t let that Inquisitor notice anything—technically I’m in a hidden state right now, but when I’m near Mr. Duncan, I always feel like all my abilities work only half the time…”

Shirley hurriedly pulled back her thoughts and walked to the other end of the shelves. The people by the counter clearly did not put any attention on the unremarkable Shirley.

Nina looked at the form in front of her and found that it was full of very standard psychological test items. It was no different from the psychological forms she usually had to fill out before occult studies class at school or before visiting the City Museum. There were just more items, and a few questions that were not usually asked.

As she started filling it out, she asked curiously: “I heard before that your treatment methods are more professional. I thought you wouldn’t use the same kind of forms ordinary doctors use…”

“Forms are the basic step in psychological measurement. The difference between me and those half-trained people is that their diagnosis often ends once the form is done,” Heidi said with a smile. She took off the purple crystal pendant from her neck and played with it as she spoke. “My treatment only starts while you’re filling it out.”

Vanna’s gaze fell on Heidi’s crystal pendant without her noticing. She asked with some curiosity: “I keep seeing you wear this new pendant these two days… You seem to like it?”

Heidi paused, lowered her head to look at the pendant in her hand, as if she remembered something, then shook her head: “It’s just rare for my father to bring me a gift, that’s all. Ah, Vanna, did you know? This pendant was even ‘bought’ by my father from this shop.”

She put special stress on the word “bought”, as if she had to deny that the thing was just a free gift. Duncan, next to her, nodded with a gentle smile: “It really is a product of my shop—I hope this pendant has brought you good luck.”

Vanna could not help looking a couple more times at the “crystal” pendant that was obviously a fake. A sentence almost slipped out of her mouth: Even a famous scholar like Morris could fall for this?!

Luckily, she still cared about the feelings of Duncan, who was right there. That sentence circled around her windpipe once and then went back down into her lungs. At the same time, Nina quickly finished ticking off all the boxes on the form. She pushed the form to Heidi and said: “I’m done. Could you see if there’s any problem?”

“I already finished reading it while you were filling it out—including all the tiny details in your expressions and movements,” Heidi said directly as she put the paper away. “You have a psychological shadow that has been buried for many years, right? Have you had extra stress recently, making you think of that shadow from time to time? In the last two days, your strange dreams have eased… Is it because the stress has disappeared, or has it shifted?”

Nina could not help widening her eyes, as if Heidi had hit some secret in her heart. Then she subconsciously glanced toward Duncan, a bit of hesitation on her face.

“We need a quiet and private place to do further mental relief and release,” Heidi said, looking up at Duncan. “Of course, first I need the consent of you, her Guardian, and also Miss Nina’s own cooperation.”

“Go upstairs,” Duncan nodded and looked at Nina. “Is that okay?”

“Okay.” Nina nodded very obediently, with no sign of refusal, though a trace of nervousness still showed in her eyes. That trace did not escape Heidi’s gaze.

“Don’t worry, Nina. It’s just a simple relaxation technique—you don’t really have any problem. You’re just a bit stressed and anxious,” Heidi said with a smile. A calming and trustworthy aura seemed to spread from that smile. Her voice was gentle, and the tension in Nina’s heart unknowingly faded away. At the same time she closed her medical box and set it aside. “I think we won’t even need any tools, incense, or medicine. I’ll just ask you a few questions.”

Only then did Nina completely relax. She nodded to Duncan, then led Heidi up the stairs to the second floor.

The sound of their two sets of footsteps slowly faded up the stairs.

Shirley still hid far away, focused on tidying the clutter in the corner.

At last, only Duncan and the Inquisitor sitting across from him were left by the counter.

Today was the first time Duncan had seen this Inquisitor face to face—the one who, by chance, had been left with the flame mark of the spirit form on her body. Right now, he could feel more and more clearly the mark left in Vanna's body, and he sensed that this originally extremely weak mark was slowly growing stronger because he was near.

Even without physical contact, that tiny spark still drew more power from the "source" and began to smolder and spread in Vanna's soul.

After noticing this, Duncan deliberately controlled the growth of that mark. He did not want this mark to be noticed by that unfathomable storm Goddess. If that happened, he would lose Vanna as this special "Node".

He was very curious about Vanna. Strictly speaking, he was interested in her identity as a priest, and in the faith behind her.

On the other hand, Vanna was also curiously observing this place and the "Mr. Duncan" sitting opposite her.

She had indeed come today to accompany Heidi and pay a visit of thanks, but there was another reason. There had been far too many suspicious points in that great fire at the City Museum.

In theory, that fire absolutely should not have gone out in such a short time, yet it had suddenly put itself out. In the blaze, Heidi had seen a projection that seemed like a fragment of the Sun. And Duncan, this ordinary person, had rushed into the fire to save people and brought the trapped ones out without a scratch. There was no solid evidence to connect these things, but her intuition told her she should come to this antique shop and take a look.

"Mr. Duncan," Vanna was the first to break the silence. She looked at Duncan with a calm face. "I have some questions about the great fire at the City Museum. May I ask them?"

“Of course,” Duncan nodded calmly. “I was there at the time, so I should be able to provide some information.”

“Thank you for your cooperation,” Vanna nodded slightly. “When you rushed in to save people, the fire at the City Museum was still burning then, right?”

“Yes,” Duncan nodded without hesitation. Because he did not know how much evidence this Inquisitor already had from the scene, he decided to tell the truth in parts where there might be proof. “The fire was huge at the time, especially in the corridor leading to the main exhibition hall. It was almost all burning.”

“But you all came out without a scratch,” Vanna asked next. “Can you tell me what happened after you went into the City Museum?”

Duncan put on a thinking look and pondered for two or three seconds before speaking, as if uncertain: “I also think it’s amazing that I could come out alive… But the fire inside the City Museum suddenly went down at that time. Can you imagine it? It wasn’t put out by the fire hoses outside, and it wasn’t because the fuel burned out. The fire just disappeared all at once. Even the smoke was gone…”

He clicked his tongue in wonder as he remembered, then finally raised his hand and gestured: “That must have been the Goddess’s blessing, right?”

As soon as he finished speaking, he heard a crash from Shirley’s side—she had accidentally knocked over a wooden carving in the corner.

“Careful!” he shouted at once, turning his head just like a real shopkeeper scolding his employee. “I already broke that thing’s base once. It’s glued back on now. Don’t knock it off again!”

“…The Goddess protects everyone in the city-state,” Vanna’s expression changed in a subtle way as she looked into Duncan’s eyes. “I can see that you really are… an honest man.”

Duncan answered with a serious and open expression: “Of course. People like us who run an open shop live by not cheating anyone.”

Chapter 142: Inquiry and Treatment

Duncan looked completely sincere, with the kind of confidence that said: “If I open my doors to sell counterfeits, then I’ll at least let every sucker know exactly what they’re buying. If you can find a single real thing in my back room, I’ll give up the whole shop.” That calm, stubborn honesty clearly startled Vanna. She stared at him for a long moment before finally reacting: “Your honesty… really is impressive.”

“Do you have anything else you want to ask about that fire?” Duncan didn’t care about the odd tone in her voice. He asked calmly: “I heard afterward that The City Museum was sealed off that very day?”

“In fact, we strongly suspect that the fire at The City Museum involved supernatural influences.” Vanna did not hide this. Rumors of that kind had already spread through every street and alley, and the occult studies scholars at City Hall were publicly warning citizens not to go near the square in front of The City Museum for the time being. For the citizens of Pland, the existence of supernatural events did not need to be kept secret. Only the details and the truth behind them needed to be hidden. “The fire died down very quickly, far beyond what is normal… Mr. Duncan, please try to remember. After you went into The City Museum, you really didn’t see or hear anything unusual?”

“…No,” Duncan frowned. “In that situation, I didn’t have any attention left to spare on what was changing in the fire scene. I was just an ordinary person, after all, not a trained Guardian."

He paused there, then raised his eyebrows: "Does the Church suspect that we few who escaped from the fire might be connected to the 'supernatural factor' behind it?"

"It's my personal suspicion," Vanna said seriously. "Please forgive me. Watching for any uncontrolled supernatural danger in the city-state is my duty as an Inquisitor. And I'm not saying you were the one who started the fire. supernatural power can stain an ordinary person, whether they meant it or not. I'm worried that all of you may have been passively dragged under the influence of some supernatural power during that fire. I'm worried for your safety."

"I understand." Duncan actually relaxed more than before. He really wasn't angry at all, because he could tell this Inquisitor was simply doing her job. "You've been observing here for quite a while. Have you found any clues?"

"…I really haven't found anything." Vanna shook her head. "There's no residual supernatural power here. The distribution of Shadows and the flow of aura inside and outside the whole building are completely normal. I think… you really were just ordinary persons swept into an supernatural incident."

Duncan thought for a moment and couldn't help adding: "Maybe… you could check again? What if there's some lingering supernatural power here that hasn't been found yet? Like you said, it's for our safety too…"

"I have confidence in my own judgment." Vanna lifted her chest a little before he could finish, and her tone grew firm. "By the Goddess's grace, my eyes are the most effective detection tools, especially in daylight. No Heretic power or Shadows from the deep layers can escape my sight—even the Eldritch Gods and Demons that are best at hiding have nowhere to run in front of me!"

She had barely finished speaking when another loud crash sounded not far away. Shirley had finally dropped the base of that wooden carving from earlier.

“I… I wanted to see if I could move it to a safer place…”

“Just leave that pile of things alone! If you’re bored, go wipe the windowsill!” Duncan said helplessly to Shirley, who was trying hard to play the shop assistant. Then he turned back to Vanna and, after struggling for a while, squeezed out: “…You’re right.”

“This child looks pretty clumsy.” Vanna glanced up at Shirley and spoke casually. “And she looks… a little nervous?”

“It’s her first day helping out,” Duncan said honestly. “She’s not an official shop assistant. She’s my niece’s friend. She came here to learn a few things and earn a bit of money for her family. Kids from the Lower City start working early.”

Vanna nodded. That sounded completely normal to her. After thinking for a moment, she turned her gaze back to Duncan: “There’s one more thing I want to confirm. After leaving The City Museum, did you have any lingering discomfort? Any nightmares?”

Duncan didn’t answer right away.

Someone had had nightmares. Shirley had not only had them; she had stood with him on the edge of a nightmare and seen impossible things. But that could not be said.

The Inquisitor in front of him was a “good person” who protected the city-state’s order, but in the eyes of the authority and the Church, Shirley was an out-and-out Heretic. In this world where everyone’s nerves were stretched tight, even the most fair and righteous Inquisitor would find it hard to show much tolerance or sympathy to a “Heretic” at a first meeting.

“No, everything has been normal.” Duncan shook his head. “But may I ask something? What kind of nightmare would it be? If something similar happens to us in the next few days, I want to recognize it quickly and go to the nearest Church for help.”

“It should be related to flames,” Vanna answered. “The scale is extremely large—flames violently erupting in the dark void, bending as they burst out and forming a magnificent arc. Considering you just escaped a fire with your lives, short-term trauma Shadows might also make you dream of something similar. Ordinary people can’t tell the difference between that kind of normal dream and a nightmare under supernatural influence. So I suggest that as long as you dream of flames, you should go to the nearest Cathedral at once.”

Duncan frowned.

Flames violently erupting in the dark void, forming a grand arc…

That didn’t sound like Nina’s dream. It wasn’t Shirley’s dream. It wasn’t like the ruins of the burned site he had seen last night either.

If he had to say, the serious look on Vanna’s face when she described that scene made him think, for no clear reason, of one thing… the Sun Fragment.

Only fragments of the Sun would have that kind of power and make an Inquisitor so solemn.

Duncan weighed it for a moment. Then, still staying inside the role of a “helpful citizen and ordinary person”, he carefully adjusted his wording and suddenly asked: “Let me ask something… Is this connected to those Suntists causing trouble in the city recently? Those cultists seem to spend all day on the Sun, flames, sacrificial rites and the like. It sounds like they’re ready to set the city on fire at any time.”

Everyone already knew there were Suntists active in the city and that the authority was hunting them, so even an ordinary person could have asked this question. Vanna clearly didn't overthink it. She nodded: "It's possible they were behind it… But it's enough for you to know that much. Don't dig any deeper. That's dangerous for ordinary persons."

As a high-ranking Inquisitor, Vanna knew that not long ago, a cultist stronghold in an abandoned factory had been reported and destroyed. She had even gone to the scene herself to investigate. But she didn't need to know all the details, so she naturally didn't realize that the "helpful citizen" who had reported that cultist nest was the antique shopkeeper standing in front of her.

Duncan also didn't mention his own report. From Vanna's answer, he had already vaguely confirmed his guess and fallen into deep thought.

Even the upper ranks of the Church believed this matter was tied to the Suntists. That meant it really had been a Sun Fragment. When the fire broke out at the City Museum, the influence of the Sun Fragment had truly appeared for a short time in the Mortal Realm and had alerted Vanna when she later went to handle the scene.

Then the "dream image" Vanna had described… could that actually be what the Sun Fragment looked like?!

A huge jet of flame, erupting fiercely in the dark void… That was nothing like what Duncan had pictured the first time he heard the name "Sun Fragment"!

In his first imagination, a "Sun Fragment" that cultists hunted for, and that could be sealed and kept asleep in a city-state, should have been something like an Anomaly—some physical object that had a vague link to the Sun, but in truth didn't have much to do with the real Sun. But if he went by Vanna's description…

Duncan tried hard to picture it. He thought back to his memories of the star called “the Sun” from his life on Earth, and more and more it felt like that thing… sounded exactly like a “solar prominence”!

From the scene alone, it was basically a solar prominence erupting into space!

His face did not change much, but inside his mind, his thoughts were surging—

Sun Fragments… so they were actually literal?!

At the same time, in Nina’s bedroom on the second floor, Heidi had already finished the usual questions and mental guidance for her “patient”.

She had more or less confirmed that Nina’s dreams were not ordinary nightmares, nor just recurring dreams caused by stress. But whether those dreams had been harmed by an supernatural influence still needed further judgment.

“We might need a short, gentle hypnosis session.” Heidi picked up the purple crystal pendant in her hand and spoke in a soft voice to the girl in front of her. “Don’t be nervous. Just follow my mental guidance and answer a few more questions.”

Chapter 143: hypnosis

Staring at the faintly swinging crystal pendant in Heidi's hand, Nina swallowed nervously. Even though Heidi had told her to relax, this was her first time receiving hypnosis treatment. It was hard for her to control her reaction.

While her gaze was drawn to the crystal pendant, she also noticed a simple-looking rune bead bracelet on Heidi's wrist. The bracelet was woven from tough silk cord and strung with many colorful stones. On a few of the stones she could see marks that looked like runes.

Noticing Nina's gaze, Heidi smiled and gave her wrist a little shake. "I'm a 'student' of the Truth Academy. I follow and serve God of Wisdom Rahm. You can't really tell from the outside, but on the official records, I'm actually a Cleric."

A Cleric… so she wasn't only a psychiatrist, but also a member of the Truth Academy?

Nina had of course heard of the Truth Academy. Its name sounded like a school, but its true form was one of the four Churches of the True Gods. Together with the Deep Sea Church, the Cult of Death, and the Flamebearer Church, it helped maintain the order of civilization in the Deep Sea era. Unlike the other three Churches, the Truth Academy didn't feel very "theological". It leaned more toward pure knowledge, and toward researching and spreading cutting-edge technology. Its believers built their relationships through master and student and through schools of thought.

Other Churches were rooted in Cathedrals and holy places, and their daily work was preaching faith and holding mass. The Truth Academy, however, had countless universities and laboratories in each city-state. When a higher-ranking priest met a lower-ranking priest, the usual greeting was to toss over a difficult problem and see if your faith in the Lord had reached a passing score. Its style was very strange.

Because the Truth Academy was so unusual, it actually had the fewest members among the four Churches of the True Gods. And among those members, the ones who had the right to wear its badge in daily life and be registered as official Clerics were even rarer—because the questions were truly hard.

Even in an ordinary university, they might not get more than a few top students in a whole year who were qualified to devote themselves to Rahm. That was even more distant from a poor child like Nina, who studied in a public school in the Lower City.

In Nina's eyes, Heidi suddenly seemed to be surrounded by a halo. That halo didn't relax her at all. It only made her more nervous.

It was the kind of awe a vocational school student felt when she saw the top graduate of a famous university.

Heidi, of course, noticed the change in Nina's expression, but she didn't mind. She played casually with the pendant in her hand and slowly began to speak, her tone as gentle as before: "Can you tell me about your childhood? Just now you said your parents died in an accident. That might be the Shadow in your heart… Can you tell me about it?"

"Actually… it's not something I can't talk about." Nina thought for a moment. "I've told a lot of people, but everyone says I was too young back then, that I don't remember clearly, that I'm just talking nonsense. Eleven years ago, there was a leak at a factory in the Sixth District. There were also many cultists running around causing trouble. They arrested a lot of people later. Do you know about that?”

“Of course.” Heidi nodded. “I was only in my teens back then. When the accident happened, my family just happened to be staying near the Crossroad District. We saw the crowd charging past…”

“Then do you remember a big fire back then?”

“A fire?” Heidi tilted her head slightly and unconsciously stopped playing with the crystal pendant. “What fire?”

“See, you don’t know about that fire either. But in my memory, there’s always been a big fire. My parents died in that fire. But everyone says I remember it wrong…”

Heidi listened quietly to Nina’s story. After a long time, she nodded gently and asked: “So that should be the Shadow in your heart. You’re afraid of a fire that only you know existed. You’re afraid of when this strange thing will appear around you again and take away the people close to you, while no one can help you—and no one can even notice what you’re going through.”

Nina nodded lightly.

“Have you been under any pressure recently?” Heidi asked again. “With your studies, with daily life. These new pressures may be making the old gloom in your heart stronger…”

Nina stayed silent for a moment, then said hesitantly: “Maybe it’s because my uncle’s health was bad for a long time, and a while ago it got worse. That made me very worried…”

She paused there, then quickly added: “Ah, but he’s better now. I feel like I’ve relaxed a lot too. I haven’t had that strange dream in the last two days…”

“Worried about your family’s health…”

Heidi spoke softly, deep in thought. She listened to the girl’s murmurs, which sounded almost like sleep-talking, and watched Nina leaning against the headboard, half asleep. Then she casually put down the crystal pendant.

As a psychiatrist trained at the Truth Academy, and someone who had to deal with the supernatural, she didn’t need swinging pendants or burning vapors for hypnosis. A few sentences were enough.

The pendant’s only real use was to lock Nina’s gaze, help her relax, and lower her guard against words.

The young psychiatrist let out a quiet breath. Her eyes were gentle as she looked at Nina, who had completely relaxed, and watched her sink into deeper sleep.

“I can tell your life has been very hard,” she said softly. “You’ve buried all your tension and fear deep in your heart, and you’ve gotten used to living like this. You hope it will make things easier for the people around you, but you ignore yourself. But now you can relax. Sleep well. Leave all your pressure inside a dream that is about to fade. When you wake up, those worries will no longer belong to you.”

Half asleep, Nina’s voice sounded faintly: “…Thank you…”

Heidi smiled. To let Nina fall into an even deeper layer of relaxation, she asked casually, as if without thinking: “By the way, your uncle wasn’t well before, right? What illness did he have? Just now I saw Mr. Duncan and he looked quite healthy.”

This time Nina stayed silent much longer before whispering: “He was only weak, that’s all. Now… he’s completely better…”

However, Heidi no longer heard Nina’s answer.

At the very moment she asked that last question, she had already slumped over at the foot of Nina’s bed, falling into a sleep even deeper than her patient.

On Heidi’s right wrist, the hand-woven rune bead bracelet was glowing faintly. It was one of the badges believers of the Truth Academy often wore. It showed that the wearer was a Monk who had gone through strict training, received the care of God of Wisdom Rahm, and stood firm against the madness of Heretic powers. Every rune stone on it represented one of Rahm’s blessings.

After a few seconds of flickering, one red agate bead on the rune bead bracelet made a tiny cracking sound, then quickly crumbled into dust and drifted away.

Downstairs in the shop, Vanna asked Duncan a few more questions. On one hand, she wanted to know whether there were any details about the fire at The City Museum that had been missed. On the other, she wanted to confirm whether Duncan and the others had been influenced by the Sun Fragment.

As they talked, the strangeness and awkwardness of a first meeting slowly faded. The mood in the room grew warmer and more familiar.

Duncan could feel that this high-ranking Inquisitor of the Church truly cared about the safety of the survivors from that day’s fire. She wasn’t only doing it to strike at Heretics or to look for clues. Her concern was sincere, from the heart.

He didn’t know whether this young Inquisitor cared this much about every single person in the city-state, or if she was paying special attention to the people in this antique shop because of her connection to Heidi. But the sincerity Vanna showed now was enough for him to keep a good impression of her.

“Speaking of which, Miss Heidi and Nina have been upstairs for a while now, haven’t they?”

While they talked, Duncan thought of his niece and looked up at the stairs leading to the second floor.

“That’s true.” Reminded by him, Vanna reacted as well. She frowned slightly. “Normally Heidi’s treatment process is very quick…”

“…I don’t think you can use Miss Heidi’s usual treatment methods as the standard. Physical hypnosis and kinetic anesthesia are quick on anyone,” Duncan said, the corner of his mouth twitching. “But it is true that the two of them have been up there for too long… Do you think something happened?”

Vanna shook her head. “No. Heidi is a professional who trained strictly at the Truth Academy. She wouldn’t mess up a simple hypnosis session. Most likely she just started chatting with Nina. She can be like that sometimes—after dealing with stubborn cultists so often, she treats chatting with a normal person like a holiday. Let’s go up and take a look?”

“Let’s go up and take a look.”

Duncan and Vanna both stood and went to the second floor. One after the other, they walked to Nina’s bedroom door. Before they could push it open, they both heard sounds from inside—

Two alternating snores.

Chapter 144

“I’m very sorry, I’m very sorry, I don’t even know what happened…”

Heidi apologized with a face full of embarrassment. As a veteran psychiatrist, and a professional who had finished all her studies under the strict standards of the Truth Academy, her shame at this moment was hard to describe. Honestly, when Vanna had woken her up with that helpless look, Heidi had almost felt that her whole career was over…

At the same time, Nina had just woken up from her nap on the bed and looked completely confused. She had no idea what had happened. She only stared in a daze as Heidi apologized to her, then finally turned her eyes toward Duncan: “Uncle Duncan, what happened? Why did Miss Heidi…”

“The psychiatrist who was hypnotizing you was sleeping even more soundly than you were,” Duncan said helplessly. He sighed and pointed at the side of the bed. “She even drooled on the floor.”

His words were very blunt. As soon as he finished, Heidi could hardly lift her head.

In this awkward and messy mood, only Vanna still kept a serious face. She looked around the whole room at once, as if she were searching for or sensing something. At last her gaze fell on Heidi: “Are you really all right? Why did you fall asleep first during a hypnosis session?”

Hearing her friend’s serious tone, Heidi slowly came back to herself. She frowned and tried to recall carefully. After a moment she shook her head slightly: “There’s nothing wrong with me. I must have been too tired lately, and after I finished the session I relaxed too much, so I drifted off.”

“You finished the session, then?” Vanna still did not seem reassured and asked again.

“Yes, it was finished.” Heidi thought it through once more, then nodded. “I asked Miss Nina a few questions. I only got drowsy and fell asleep after she answered.”

Duncan noticed how especially serious Vanna looked and could not help asking: “Is something wrong?”

“No… I’m just a little worried about Heidi,” Vanna said, shaking her head. “She has never had something like this happen before. But it’s probably just like she said. She’s too tired. She’s been working nonstop lately, and the rare day off she had was ruined by the fire at the City Museum.”

As soon as Nina heard that, she instinctively turned to Heidi and said: “Sorry. It looks like I took up the little free time you had…”

“No, no, you don’t need to apologize,” Heidi said quickly, waving her hand. “And if you look at it another way, I actually got a good nap here. I haven’t slept this soundly in a long time.”

After Vanna confirmed that there was indeed nothing abnormal about Heidi, she looked up at the sky outside the window. Then she stood and turned to Duncan: “It’s getting late. It looks like we should take our leave.”

“Don’t you need to rest a bit?” Duncan asked with the concern of the master of the house. “Miss Heidi still looks a little tired.”

“I’m much better already,” Heidi said with a small smile. “It’s not safe to stay out at night. I have to get home before the Sun goes down—my father worries about that a lot.”

Hearing that, Duncan did not say anything more. He helped Nina down from the bed, then looked at the two guests: “Then let me walk you downstairs.”

He escorted Heidi and Vanna to the front door on the first floor. By then, the Sun was already sinking toward the distant horizon.

Vanna went to start the car’s steam core. The strange steam machines of this world seemed to need almost no time to heat their boilers before starting. Duncan saw the dark gray car quickly give off the light hum of running machinery, while Heidi suddenly turned back before stepping out of the shop. She glanced at Nina beside her, and in the end her eyes fell on Duncan.

“I can see that you are a very responsible guardian now, but for a while before this you seemed to neglect Nina a little—and her tension and anxiety came from that,” Miss Psychiatrist said honestly and directly. “Of course, her condition is much better already, and after this session it will improve even more. But even the best treatment needs to be reinforced. The best healing for the mind still comes from a family’s care.”

[Nina’s tension and anxiety? And that earlier period… was before I took over this body?]

Duncan understood at once. He nodded to Heidi and thanked her sincerely: “Thank you for your help. I really wasn’t in a good state for a while before. That was my fault.”

“Actually, I should sit down and talk with you more carefully. Speaking with family after a session is also a very important part of the process, but we really don’t have time today,” Heidi said with a sigh as she took half a step back. “When I get home, I’ll sort out Nina’s condition again and write some follow-up suggestions in a letter for you.”

The two special guests finally said goodbye and left.

Watching that eye-catching car drive farther and farther down the street in the sunset of the Lower City, Duncan let out a small breath. His first face-to-face meeting with the Church's Inquisitor had been even more peaceful and smooth than he had expected.

After Vanna and Heidi left, Shirley finally crawled out of a corner on the first floor. The young lady stared nervously toward the door and only dared to come closer when she saw Duncan and Nina come back: "They really left?"

"They left, they left, relax," Duncan said, glancing at Shirley with a helpless tone. "You were hiding way too obviously. That actually makes people suspicious, you know? It's a good thing that Inquisitor didn't think too much about it."

"Of course I'm scared! That's an Inquisitor! The highest fighting force the Church has in the whole city-state!" Shirley's eyes went wide. She seemed afraid Duncan would not understand her worry and rushed to explain: "The highest-ranking clergy I usually meet are just the priest at the local Cathedral and the Guardians on patrol. And even then I have to duck out of their way—it's not like you don't know I have a mutt like Dog with me…"

She paused there and let out a sigh: "Ah, of course it's normal if you don't understand how I feel. To a being like you, the city's Inquisitors probably aren't much different from the priest at the local Cathedral…"

Nina looked at Shirley, then turned to glance in the direction where Vanna and Heidi had left. She frowned: "Shirley, someone like you… a 'wild supernatural'… would the Church really arrest you? You haven't done anything bad. Miss Heidi and Miss Vanna are both very nice people…"

“It has nothing to do with whether I do bad things or not,” Shirley said with a sigh. “The Church doesn’t arrest every wild supernatural, because in this world there are always some people who touch supernatural power for strange reasons. They aren’t all heretics, and the Church also allows a few free supernatural folk to live honestly among the common people—but they would definitely arrest me and Dog. By their standards, as long as you have anything to do with demons from the Abyssal Deep or Subspace, no matter what you are like right now, you are a potential heretic in the future.”

Nina frowned. This was a field she had never dealt with before, and Shirley’s words made her feel a little torn. But Duncan quickly broke through her thoughts: “Nina, how are you feeling now?”

“Me? I’m fine,” Nina answered at once. “I think Miss Heidi’s ‘treatment’ worked pretty well. I talked with her for a while and took a little nap. I feel much more relaxed!”

“Really? That’s good.”

Duncan nodded lightly and did not say anything more. He started walking toward the stairs. Only then did Shirley seem to suddenly react. She looked at the sky outside and could not help letting out a cry of despair: “Ah, I was planning to go home today…”

“You can just think about it,” Duncan said without turning his head. “Take a look at the sky outside. Are you really planning to spend the night playing cat and mouse with the Church’s Guardians?”

Nina also laughed. She stepped forward and patted Shirley on the shoulder: “Just stay here with peace of mind. You can keep me company and chat with me before bed—going home can wait until tomorrow!”

…

On the way back to the Upper City, Vanna held the steering wheel, and Heidi sat in the passenger seat beside her, yawning.

“Yaaawn… That nap felt really good…” Heidi yawned again and asked casually: “So, what did you talk about with that antique shopkeeper? Did you notice anything wrong?”

“No anomalies at all,” Vanna answered while watching the road ahead. “That shopkeeper was just an ordinary person, and so was that young lady named Shirley. There were no signs that the whole antique shop had been touched by any supernatural power or evil will. They really should have just escaped by luck. And you? Did you notice anything while dealing with Nina?”

“Everything was normal,” Heidi said with a nod. She raised her hand and touched the crystal pendant that she had put back on her chest. The rune bead bracelet on her wrist, which represented the Truth Academy, slid down a little. One bead in the circle was already missing, but she did not notice it at all. “But Nina did mention something during the hypnosis. It was a bit strange.”

“Strange? What was it?”

“She mentioned that she had been caught in a big fire when she was little, the fire during that factory leak incident eleven years ago,” Heidi said offhandedly. “But you know, eleven years ago there wasn’t any…”

She had only said half of it when a sudden squeal of brakes and the shaking of the car cut her off. Vanna brought the car to a sharp stop and stared wide-eyed at her friend: “A big fire?! Nina said she remembered a fire eleven years ago?”

“Yes,” Heidi said, a little dazed. “Why are you reacting so strongly?”

Vanna did not speak for a moment. Her face changed twice in quick succession. From her reaction, Heidi sensed that something was wrong: “Should we turn around right now? We can go back and ask her properly…”

“No.” After thinking for a moment, Vanna suddenly shook her head, then turned her attention back to the road ahead.

The car started moving again. Under the ever-dimming sky, the scenery of the streets on both sides began to slide backward faster and faster.

Heidi looked at her friend in the driver’s seat, worried and puzzled. She seemed about to ask something, but before she could speak, Vanna shook her head slightly.

“I know you’re confused, but don’t ask for now. Until I’ve confirmed a few things, don’t mention this to anyone else.”

She paused there, then spoke again in a low voice, almost to herself: “Maybe… we came a bit too hastily today.”

Chapter 145

Heidi wisely did not keep asking.

She knew that she and Vanna were different. In name, she was also a member of the clergy and even held official certification from the Truth Academy. But compared with facing those dangerous hidden powers head-on, she was actually better at pure research and thinking. She could pry secrets out of cultists' minds and pick out the shadows that heretics left behind in the whispers of a collective hallucination, but that was completely different from the work of an Inquisitor.

She herself lacked sensitivity to certain threats.

But Vanna had spent years fighting heretics and hidden powers head-on. She might already have sensed some kind of shadow. Their trip to the Lower City today had probably brushed against something by accident.

When they were almost home, Heidi asked a question: "Was there something wrong with that antique shop?"

"The antique shop was completely normal," Vanna said as she slowed the car, a thoughtful look on her face. "But in our city-state… something might not be normal."

The sky was completely dark now. The bell that marked the change from day to night and the whistle from the central steam core sounded at the same time, cutting through the clouds above the city in the fading sunset. In the Upper City, the gas lamps along the streets had already been lit half an hour earlier. Heidi reached her front door, hearing the sound of the car behind her fade into the distance.

At night, the city went under curfew, but the order only applied to ordinary people who lacked the power to protect themselves. The Church's Inquisitors were clearly not affected. Before Vanna returned to the great Cathedral, she still had to swing by the City Museum to inspect the place and meet with the Guardians in charge of sealing off the scene. Her rest days were often like this—she never really rested.

Heidi could not help thinking again of her own ruined day off. She sighed and opened the door to go inside.

Lights were on in the spacious living room, but no one was in sight. The house was quiet everywhere. The daytime maid they hired to handle cleaning and laundry had gone home before the Sun went down, so this huge house felt a bit empty.

But Heidi was long used to it. Her father was the sort of man who, once he went into his study, could not be dragged out easily. Her mother's health was poor, and she often rested in the bedroom. For this family of three, the house was a bit too large, and most of the time it was this quiet.

But that did not mean the house lacked warmth. Heidi had a very good relationship with her parents. It had always been good.

She smoothly took off her coat, put away her hat and medical bag, and glanced at the study with its light still on. She did not disturb her father, who was probably buried in his books, but went as usual to her parents' bedroom and knocked on the door: "I'm home—are you in there?"

Her mother's voice came from inside, carrying helplessness and a bit of pretend anger: "You're getting home this late!"

Heidi stuck out her tongue at the door and quickly smoothed her expression. Then she pushed the door open with a smile, muttering as she went in: “I went out with Vanna. You really don’t have to worry. She could beat up the whole city with one hand…”

The light in the room was quite dim, because anything too bright would irritate her mother’s eyes. Her mother had been hurt by chemical fumes in the factory leak accident eleven years ago, and her eyes had never been right since.

Heidi let her eyes adjust to the dim light and saw her mother leaning against the headboard. She was a kindly old lady in soft pajamas, working by touch on a knotted craft that was unique to the city-state of Pland. In the shifting shadows of the dim lamp, she looked up at Heidi and spoke with a hint of helplessness: “Just keep running around with Vanna every day. Sooner or later you’ll end up like her, unable to find a husband. I know for a fact that she sneaks off to the marriage help center every weekend, picks someone there, and beats him up. The Cathedral gets complaints about her every single day…”

Heidi’s expression turned a bit odd at once: “Uh… please don’t say that… Vanna is an Inquisitor now…”

“So what if she’s an Inquisitor? She still ate lunch at our house for years,” the old lady grumbled, her hands still moving quickly. “If you ask me, that child turned out this way because of her uncle’s upbringing. Her mind is strangely stubborn. At her baptism she just had to swear these vows. Swear if you want, but she took all Three Great Vows at once. Normal nuns pick just one. She insisted on all three to prove how devout she was, and now she’s trapped herself and can’t get married at all…”

Listening to her mother’s endless chatter, Heidi could only smile awkwardly. She finally waited until the old lady paused for breath halfway through and quickly seized the chance to change the subject, looking at the craft in her mother's hands: "Are you almost done weaving it?"

"I wove it and took it apart, over and over, and now I'm finally a little satisfied," her mother said with a smile, holding up a ribbon of silk that looked like a colorful sash. The fine silk cords were woven with special techniques, leaving intricate open patterns and studded with pretty stones and beads. It was a kind of handiwork unique to the city-state of Pland, very complex and time-consuming. People believed it brought blessings and drove away evil. "I wonder if by the time it's finished you will have found a good young man…"

Heidi glanced at the almost finished knotwork sash and ventured a cautious suggestion: "Then maybe… you could take it apart one more time. It might still be in time…"

"You're just trying to make me angry!"

Heidi quickly smiled along and slipped out of the room.

Her mother's muttering followed her from behind as Heidi shut the door. She tiptoed toward the kitchen, but as soon as she started to walk, she saw her father standing in the hallway.

The refined, gray-haired Morris looked helplessly at his sneaky daughter: "I heard you come home a while ago… Did you get your mother worked up again?"

Heidi waved her hands quickly: "No, no, we were just chatting."

"Did you give the gift to Mr. Duncan?" Morris asked.

"I did—Mr. Duncan was very happy," Heidi said, nodding. Then she could not help looking at her father a few times. "But I really didn't expect you to be willing to give away one of your favorite books…"

“That was only a collectible—but he saved your life,” Morris said calmly. “In fact, I don’t think it is enough. In a few days we should pay him another visit to thank him properly.”

Heidi suddenly remembered her little ‘mistake’ during Nina’s hypnosis session today, and her expression turned a bit awkward: “We don’t have to… be that formal, do we?”

“It’s not about formality. Mr. Duncan saved your life, and I’m not just your father, I’m also Nina’s teacher. Besides, Mr. Duncan is an antique dealer with a strong thirst for knowledge and a real eagerness to learn. From a social point of view, this is a relationship worth cultivating,” Morris explained casually. “I like a word that Mr. Duncan often uses. He calls it a kind of ‘fate’…”

“All right, all right, your thinking makes sense, it makes sense,” Heidi said, feeling a headache the moment her father—who was not even good at socializing himself—started trying to teach her social etiquette again. “Then go visit him next time if you want, but please don’t buy random things again, okay…”

“That depends on whether any collectibles appear that can catch my eye,” Morris said offhandedly. Then he thought for a moment and asked, as if casually: “You went with Vanna today, right?”

“Yeah. She happened to have a day off today, so I rode in her car.”

Morris thought for a bit more, looking a little hesitant: “It feels like… you and Vanna are very close.”

“I’ve always been very close to her,” Heidi said, feeling a bit baffled. “We’ve known each other since we were little…”

“No, I just think…” The old gentleman suddenly began to stammer a little. He did not even know why, but right then he suddenly remembered something Mr. Duncan had said to him during their last visit to the antique shop:

“A girls’ school is fine too…”

“Father?” Heidi looked at her father’s strange expression and could not help calling out.

“Ah, it’s nothing.” Morris snapped out of it, feeling that his thoughts just now had been a bit too wild. He hurried to pull himself together and tried to change the subject so his daughter would not notice. As his eyes shifted, his gaze suddenly fell on Heidi’s wrist.

The bracelet that represented the protection of the God of Wisdom Rahm was missing a red agate bead.

The old man’s expression changed sharply, but then he noticed how completely normal Heidi looked. He forced himself to get his emotions under control, calming down as he spoke in a seemingly casual tone: “Did you lose a bead on your bracelet? Did you knock it off by accident?”

“Bracelet?” Heidi froze for a second and raised her wrist to look. She saw the empty place in the string, but her expression was perfectly natural: “Hasn’t there always been one missing here?”

Always been one missing?

Morris slowly brought his breathing and heartbeat under control, and also tried to steady his feelings and his flow of thoughts, as if afraid that thinking too intensely might draw some dangerous gaze. At the same time he began to remember, to recall what the bracelet on his daughter’s wrist had looked like the last time he saw it.

After two seconds, he finished stabilizing and shielding his own thoughts. Only then did he ease his expression and ask in his usual tone, as if casually: “By the way, you only went to that antique shop today, right?”

Chapter 146: Ashes

Heidi did not notice anything strange in her father's tone.

"Yeah," she nodded calmly and said: "I just went to Mr. Duncan's antique shop with Vanna. I chatted with Mr. Duncan for a bit, then gave Nina a hypnosis treatment, and after that I came back with Vanna."

When she reached the end, she hesitated for a moment. She wondered whether she should tell her father about what she had heard from Nina about the fire, and about Vanna's strange reaction after hearing it. In the end, she still pushed that thought down.

She remembered Vanna's unusually serious expression in the carriage very clearly. This matter might involve dangerous hidden powers, and it might already be serious enough that just speaking of it could draw some prying gaze. Her father, like her, served God of Wisdom Rahm as a Truth believer and could barely be counted as half an supernatural, but like most Truth Believers, he was closer to a pure scholar and was not good at dealing directly with dangerous things.

Morris kept his gentle, calm expression. He nodded lightly and said, as if in passing: "You stayed there quite a while… Did you forget the time while chatting with Mr. Duncan? He really is a very curious man."

"Uh… not really," Heidi looked a bit embarrassed at once. "It's just… I lost some time while giving Nina the hypnosis treatment."

"During Nina's hypnosis?" Morris raised his eyebrows when he heard his student's name. "It didn't go well? Is her mental state very bad? Was she affected by that fire at the City Museum?”

Heidi almost wanted to roll her eyes at this string of questions from her father: “You really do care about your student, huh—relax, she’s fine. She was only a bit anxious to begin with. After my relaxation and guidance, she’s completely okay now. It won’t affect her final exams. When I said it delayed me… I meant something else.”

Morris made a curious sound: “Oh?”

“Ahaha, I’ve probably just been a bit too tired lately,” Heidi gave two awkward dry laughs. “After I hypnotized her, I fell asleep myself, and slept straight until evening…”

“You fell asleep yourself while you were hypnotizing Nina?” Morris’s expression finally changed a little, but he quickly brought it back under control. “That’s not like you.”

“People slip up sometimes, and I haven’t had a vacation in ages,” Heidi waved impatiently. “Come on, stop asking. I’m already an adult, but if I come home a little late, you and Mother both get this tense and throw questions at me one after another…”

Morris only looked quietly at his daughter for a few seconds. Then his face showed the same gentle look as always, and he shook his head with a smile: “Alright, then I won’t ask. There’s food in the kitchen. Just heat it up a bit. I’ll go check on your mother.”

“Okay.” Heidi nodded. After saying goodbye to her father, she headed toward the kitchen. But after only a few steps, she suddenly turned back. “Oh, right, you still plan to go visit that antique shop again later, don’t you?”

“Yes,” Morris was already standing at the bedroom door. The wall lamp on the corridor wall beside him cast a dim yellow light, spilling mottled shadows across his aging face. “Is something the matter?”

“I left in a hurry today, so I didn’t have a proper talk with Mr. Duncan about Nina’s situation. I’ll write him a letter later. When you go over, you can take it with you.”

“No problem,” Morris nodded. Then, as if speaking more to himself, he muttered softly: “I really do have to go again…”

Heidi left, but the old historian with graying hair still stood quietly at the bedroom door. He seemed to be deep in thought. After nearly ten seconds, he finally let out a soft breath and pushed open the dark wooden door.

The light in the bedroom was still dim. In the tastefully decorated room, only a small wall lamp was lit. The yellow light fell down, faintly outlining the shape on the bed.

Morris turned and carefully locked the door, then slowly walked to the bedside.

“Dear, are you alright?”

He spoke softly to the heap of writhing ashes on the bed that still kept a human outline.

From that pile of ashes, which had a blurred human shape and drifted and writhed without stopping, there came a faint whispering sound, as if answering him gently. Among the ashes, the almost-finished knotwork sash made a light rustling sound. Bright silk cords, pulled by the ashes, slowly threaded back and forth, weaving one knot after another, slow yet steady.

“Yes, it’s really beautiful. Your handiwork has always been good,” Morris heard the reply in that faint whisper. He smiled, praising his wife’s weaving as he said: “I still have the one you made for me hanging in my study.”

The room fell quiet. In the dim light, time itself seemed tricked into freezing at this moment. But after half a minute, Morris still broke the silence: “Heidi went out today. When she came back, one red agate bead on her bracelet was gone.”

The ashes on the bed suddenly went still and let out a low murmur.

“I still don’t know exactly what happened,” Morris spoke slowly. “If that was one of our Lord Rahm’s protections taking effect, it means Heidi ran into a danger today that was strong enough to pierce her rational defenses. But Heidi herself doesn’t know anything. I didn’t sense any malicious intent on her either. It looks more like she brushed past ‘something’ without knowing, and passively triggered the bracelet’s protection…”

Morris suddenly stopped and performed a Listening Rite, tilting his head toward the faint murmurs coming from the ashes.

“Yes, after I reminded her, Heidi noticed the missing part of the bracelet. That’s the problem—she believes that red agate bead never existed in the first place,” Morris nodded. “This is a kind of self?protection. It might come from her own intuition, or it might come from the ‘enlightenment’ of the God of Wisdom. But either way, this protection is stopping her from learning more about certain things…

“As for me? I want to go investigate. I’ll go by myself.”

The pile of ashes on the bed rose and fell slightly.

Morris shook his head. “There may be some risk, so I’ll do prayer and divination in advance. But I must go. I’ve actually been to that place once. It only looked like an ordinary antique shop. A diligent shopkeeper and a studious child lived there. I didn’t sense any malice or evil power lurking in it at the time…

“So if the dangerous factor only appeared in that shop today when Heidi visited, then the master of that shop might also be under threat. My student lives there, so I have to go see.

“After all, I am her teacher, and also a Servitor of the God of Wisdom…”

Morris spoke softly. Then he heard faint whispers from the ashes on the bed again. He tilted his head, listening with the Listening rite for a long time, before slowly shaking his head.

“No. We can’t alarm the people at the Cathedral… They might handle it more effectively, but their overly forceful style could also put my student in danger. For the Church’s Guardians, suppressing heresy and wiping out evil always comes first. And…”

Morris paused and let out a quiet sigh before he went on: “And honestly, I don’t really want to draw the Cathedral’s attention. After all… I am a man whose faith has already wavered, and who hides a heretic.”

His voice grew low. His eyes, carrying the power of gaze, rested gently on the pile of ashes on the bed—rested on his wife, who had already died in a great fire eleven years ago.

Rested on the shadow she had left in the mortal world.

The ashes slowly rose. A stream of ash seemed to gather into the shape of an arm and lightly brushed across Morris’s face.

“I know… I know…” Morris lowered his head, as if talking to himself, yet also as if confessing to some unseen presence. “I am someone whose faith has wavered, and I’m too cowardly to fall completely. The God of Wisdom gave me eyes that could see through falsehood that day, but I weakly closed them and made an unrealistic wish. I wanted to keep you in this world, yet I couldn’t completely lie to myself… and instead, I trapped myself in this most awkward state…”

He raised his head and lightly closed his hand around that drifting strand of ash, but his fingers passed straight through the dust.

“I really wish I were as ignorant as Heidi. Then I could see your other form clearly… I haven’t seen you for eleven years.”

A soft sound came from the ashes, like sand rubbing together, or like a small, warm fire crackling. Morris listened to the sound, and his heart slowly calmed down.

“I understand, I understand… This will all end. Every stage has its curtain call. No matter what answered my wish that day, one day it will come to claim its destined price. I’ve actually been ready for a long time. When it comes to take that price, I will make myself disappear from this world, cleanly and completely. Not even the shadows of Subspace will be allowed to use this one ‘wish’ to reach into the Mortal Realm. But…”

Morris raised his head and fixed his gaze on the outline of ashes in the dim light.

“But before that day comes… stay with me a little longer.”

Chapter 147: Appearing in the Mortal Realm?

“Uncle Duncan, I’m off to school!”

With a cheerful shout, Nina thumped down the stairs. She turned and waved toward the second floor, then ran toward the front door.

The rest day was over. It was a school day again.

But before she reached the door, Nina suddenly stopped. She saw a figure moving behind a shelf not far ahead—the figure stepped out. It was Shirley.

“Ah, Shirley,” Nina stopped happily and waved at the girl in front of her. “I was wondering where you went—want to walk together?”

“Together?” Shirley blinked in confusion. “Together where?”

“To school, today is…” Nina spoke without thinking, but halfway through she realized, and her face turned a bit awkward. “Ah, sorry, I forgot…”

Shirley was not her classmate and did not go to school. The pleasant time they had spent together on campus had only been a play. Nina knew that, but it had still truly happened, and many times she still forgot.

Shirley’s expression also turned strange for a moment, and there was apology in her eyes. But she quickly pulled herself together and shook her head lightly: “I won’t be going with you. My… ‘investigation’ at that school is already finished.”

“Yeah, that’s true,” Nina pressed her lips together, then soon went back to her usual bright smile. “Sorry, I forgot. Then I’ll head out first, okay?”

“Mm,” Shirley nodded, then as if suddenly remembering something, added: “Oh, Nina, I… I’m going home today.”

“Going home?” Nina froze. In just two days, she had already taken it for granted that Shirley was one of the people who belonged here, so when the other girl mentioned going home, she couldn’t react for a moment. “You’re not staying here anymore?”

“I have to go home. I was only staying here for a while,” Shirley waved her hands as she finally said something she had wanted to say for a long time. “I already talked to Mr. Duncan. He agreed.”

Nina did not say anything for a while and only stared blankly. After several seconds, she finally asked in a hesitant voice: “Then… then will you come back later?”

If she could help it, she really never wanted to come back here again. She even wanted to steal a boat ticket and run off to Frostholm to lie low.

That heartfelt desire to run flashed through Shirley’s mind for a second, but then she suddenly felt as if a gaze had passed through the second?floor floorboards and fallen right on her. She hurriedly shrank her neck without thinking. “I… I’ll come visit you when I have the chance. My home isn’t that far away anyway. Ha, haha…”

Nina tilted her head. For some reason, she felt that Shirley’s reaction just now had been a bit odd. But she soon stopped thinking about it. She was happy again because of the promise that Shirley would “come find her when she had the chance,” and that was enough. So she waved cheerfully, then turned and ran out the door like a gust of wind, disappearing into the street outside the antique shop.

Shirley stared blankly as Nina ran off like the wind. After a moment, she shivered and suddenly came back to herself, realizing that a figure was standing on the stairs not far away, calmly watching her.

She quickly turned around and bent in a bow with a level of politeness she rarely showed in her life. “M?Mr. Duncan, good morning!”

“You’re much more polite now. This is how a girl your age should act,” Duncan said lightly as he walked down the stairs. “Did you explain everything clearly to Nina? You’re going home today?”

“I… I did explain it,” Shirley kept her head down. She didn’t even dare to raise her voice, afraid that the big boss would get annoyed and go back on his word. “And you agreed that I can leave today.”

“Why are you nervous again? You were fine yesterday. Does your nervousness reset every morning?” Duncan shook his head, half amused and half helpless. He stepped forward and patted Shirley’s rather thin shoulder. “Relax a bit. I never said I would lock you up somewhere. I only invited you to stay here as a guest for two days. When you want to go back, you can go back. When you want to come, you can come anytime.”

“I… I understand,” Shirley nodded again and again, then added helplessly, “A?actually, I’m not that nervous. It’s Dog that keeps getting nervous. Whenever you get close, it gets nervous on instinct, and then that nervous feeling spreads to me.”

“Dog, huh… Well, that can’t be helped. Its nerves seem to come from the sharp senses of Abyssal demons,” Duncan shrugged, then looked at Shirley again. “But are you really not going to think about it? You could stay here. The place you and Dog live in seems a bit shabby, and it’s not very safe after nightfall. Compared to that, this is a very safe place.”

A Shadow of Subspace calling his own lair a safe place—those words were both reasonable and ridiculous at the same time. Shirley thought it over for a long while and still couldn't find any point to argue with (and mainly, she didn't have the nerve to argue). In the end, she could only let out a silly laugh: "Ah… ahaha… um…"

"Forget it, I was just saying. Don't get hung up on it," Duncan saw her reaction and knew how it was. He waved a hand. "If you want to go, then go. You already know how to contact me now. If you discover any new clues about those Suntists, remember to call me anytime."

Shirley nodded silently.

After these two dreamlike days, she finally had permission to leave this place. She had been given the chance to get away from this terrifying being. But when the chance truly appeared… she suddenly found she didn't quite know what to do.

Chatting and joking with a "friend." Living under the care of an "elder." A warm bedroom, bright lights, good food, and a peaceful life without fearing nightmares or hiding from Guardians.

Now, she was allowed to leave.

For some reason, an absurd thought rose in Shirley's mind—

A bright world had opened its doors to her for a brief time. Now, those doors were about to close.

Not long ago, this had been what she dreamed of—honestly, it still was. She was just… a little conflicted.

Through the mental link, she suddenly heard Dog's low mutter: "Our life is going back on track, Shirley."

"Yeah, it's going back on track."

Shirley murmured softly in her mind. Then she raised her head, wanting to say goodbye to Mr. Duncan.

But just then, Duncan’s expression suddenly changed a little.

In some unseen way, he sensed a presence flash by in the distance. That presence… was one of the Marks he had left behind!

“Mr. Duncan?” Shirley noticed how his face suddenly grew serious and immediately tensed up. “You…”

“I sensed a presence,” Duncan said softly, not waiting for her to finish. He lifted his head and looked into the distance. “It seems to be coming from that direction.”

Shirley did not understand at first. “A presence?”

“It’s the little flame I left on that ‘little bug’,” Duncan lowered his head slightly and fixed his gaze on Shirley’s eyes. “Do you remember the Umbrella Fiend that attacked you at the edge of the dream?”

Shirley froze for a second, then her eyes went wide. “The fragment you let ‘go home’? But… but that was in the dreamscape…”

“Yes, that attacker appeared in the dreamscape,” Duncan’s tone grew meaningful. “But now I’ve sensed that mark in the Mortal Realm.”

Shirley stared, wide?eyed. She suddenly remembered what Mr. Duncan had said to her in that nightmare—

Maybe, that was not just a dream.

“Shirley,” Duncan’s voice suddenly came, cutting off the girl’s thoughts. He lowered his head a bit, a smile on his face. “Before you go home, want to come investigate with me again? Of course, if you don’t—”

“I want to go!” Shirley answered at once before he could finish, her attitude so firm that she even scared herself. Then, as if to smooth over the awkwardness, she quickly added, “Th?that ‘thing’ appeared on the street after the great fire. It must be connected to that fire back then…”

Duncan pressed down on Shirley’s shoulder. “Then we’ll go together.”

“How are we going?” Shirley drew a slow breath. “You can pinpoint where that thing is, right? Are we taking the bus again like last time…”

Duncan shook his head with a smile. “Now I have a more convenient way to travel.”

Shirley blinked in surprise and was just about to ask what this more convenient way was when, out of the corner of her eye, she suddenly saw a shadow swoop down from the second?floor stair landing. At the same time, a string of sharp, strange female cries rang out: “Twin Immortals Bridge, via Chenghua Avenue… seats! Seats in the back… sunflower seeds, drinks, mineral water! Feet in, both sides, pull your feet in!”

The sudden darting shadow and the sudden shout both startled Shirley. When she finally saw what it was, her eyes went even wider than before: it was that weird pigeon! The one that could eat almost its own body’s worth of fries in a single meal!

The next second, under Shirley’s dumbfounded gaze, AI had already swept in a fast circle through the air. emerald flame burst up around it. A moment ago it had been just a chubby, harmless?looking white dove, but in the blink of an eye it turned into a terrifying skeletal dove in spirit form.

Shirley: “…?!”

Her neck stiff, she slowly turned her head, wanting to confirm something with Duncan. But before she could speak, her vision suddenly blurred…

Amid AI’s nonstop chatter of “Seats, seats in the back,” a vortex like a doorway of flame flashed into being. The next second, a swift white dove shot out of the antique shop and flew straight into the distance.

Chapter 148

A swift white blur swept over the old, filthy alleys of the Lower City, over the crisscrossing pipes and relief vents above the factories, over a desolate station and its empty streets, and finally darted into a narrow, shabby alley.

ghostly green flame suddenly blossomed, spreading through the air like a doorway. The vortex within that blazing gate pulsed once, and Duncan stepped out.

Shirley, still a little dazed, followed right behind him.

Duncan looked back at the girl behind him, gave her a quick once-over, and finally asked in a low voice: “How do you feel? Anything uncomfortable?”

“I… I’m okay,” Shirley said. She was still dizzy, but the dizziness came more from suddenly being dragged through the air by the big boss than from any real physical discomfort. She glanced up at AI, who had reverted to a white dove and was perched on Duncan’s shoulder. After a long moment, she used the mental link to speak with Dog, who was in his hidden state, hiding inside her soul: “Dog, can you beat that dove?”

“…Don’t even ask. If you ask, the answer is no,” Dog replied, sounding sullen. “Forget the bird the big boss keeps. I couldn’t even beat the fish the big boss stews…”

Shirley froze. “Why are you suddenly talking about fish?”

“Because I’ve figured it out. Anything near that being probably stops obeying normal rules…”

Duncan had no idea Shirley was muttering with Dog. He only checked Shirley again with his own eyes, then felt the feedback from the mark he had left on her, and finally relaxed completely.

In truth, he was quite confident in AI's ability to transport living people. Not only because he had already tested it on his current mortal body, but also because afterward he had AI perform a lot of "live tests" outside, using all kinds of birds, beasts, and other small animals. Every test had gone perfectly, proving that this pigeon could carry living targets without harm—yet even with so many trials, he still instinctively checked on Shirley again.

After all, AI was full of mysteries. No one knew how many strange traits it still hid, waiting to be discovered. Being a little more careful when using the "Bone Dove Express" never hurt.

Once he finished checking on Shirley, he turned his attention to the surroundings.

In front of him lay a cold, deserted alley. At the far end he could faintly see the crumbling street beyond. Old, poorly maintained pipes stretched overhead between the houses on both sides, and at some joints thin streams of steam hissed out.

It was the kind of scene common in many parts of the Lower City.

But Shirley still recognized where they were at a glance.

"This is… the Sixth District?" Her eyes widened in surprise. "Mr. Duncan, was this where you sensed that mark appear?"

"That's right, the Sixth District. We've come back here again, but…" Duncan let out a breath, then frowned slightly. "The mark's signal faded about a minute ago."

"…Faded? Did it go out?"

Shirley asked in shock, but Duncan did not answer. He only stared thoughtfully in a certain direction.

In Shirley's "dream", he had planted a tiny flame into the fragment left behind when the attacker split apart. He had ordered that fragment to return to its "main body". Not long after, when Shirley's dream ended, he lost his sense of that flame. Only just now had that mark suddenly reappeared in his perception, guiding him here.

Here, to the Sixth District in the Mortal Realm.

The spirit form fire that should have spread only within the dream had suddenly sent a signal back from the Mortal Realm. Shirley's own dream, at its edges, had linked to the sights in Nina's dream. The umbrella-wielding monster that attacked Shirley in the nightmare had once appeared at the great fire at the City Museum in the Mortal Realm…

Without realizing it, many clues that seemed to contradict each other yet faintly connected were lining up in Duncan's mind. He felt as if he were about to touch that unseen Veil.

Or rather, even though that vast Veil covered the whole city, it still had a "gap" somewhere. That gap was in the Sixth District—at some place he and Shirley had overlooked last time.

He was looking toward the spot where he had last sensed the mark's "signal".

The mark's trace had appeared only briefly, then faded quickly a minute ago. But Duncan did not believe the flame he left behind had gone out. Even if he could no longer fix its location, he could still sense that little fire burning on, and that it had grown far stronger than before.

Since the flame was still burning and growing, that meant its "mission" was not over yet. It was still chasing, devouring, and assimilating that attacker, maybe even spreading into a roaring blaze. The way it flickered into the Sixth District for a moment and then vanished again might mean the Veil here was unstable, with a gap that opened and closed for a short time and let the two layers of the world overlap and connect.

He had to find that gap—the gap that seemed to link the dream and the Mortal Realm.

Several days later, Duncan once again led Shirley through the bleak, run-down streets of the Sixth District. This time they did not waste time asking the locals anything. They headed straight for the deepest part of the neighborhood.

“The abandoned factory is the other way…” On the way, Shirley raised an arm and pointed at a large building in the distance.

“We are not going to that factory,” Duncan said quickly. “We’re going this way.”

“Oh…”

Shirley answered softly, then hurried her short legs to keep up with Duncan.

Dry yellow leaves drifted by on the wind and fell under Shirley’s feet. She stepped on them as she walked, hearing the faint crackle of them breaking. It sounded like stepping on charred splinters of wood, like tiny tongues of flame murmuring and popping.

She lifted her head and looked around, but saw only an ordinary street. Old houses lined the road, standing in the drifting leaves, facing the unwelcome visitors with cold indifference.

Then Shirley suddenly noticed that something was wrong.

She did not know when it had started, but there was no one else on the street anymore.

The Sixth District really was quiet. In most places there were few pedestrians, and the few residents looked listless, cold, and withdrawn. But it had never been so empty that she could not see a single person!

An unpleasant feeling spread from the bottom of her heart. It vaguely reminded her of the dream she had been trapped in. She instinctively moved a little closer to Duncan—just as he suddenly stopped. With a thump, she crashed straight into his waist.

In the next second, Shirley drafted her full last words and even imagined three different designs for her gravestone. Then she quickly remembered that people crushed by the Subspace Shadows probably did not leave a body behind anyway…

Duncan's calm voice cut off the young lady's wild thoughts: "Looks like we're here."

"I'm so, so sorry, I really didn't mean to, please… huh?"

Shirley blurted out a string of pleas without thinking. Only then did she realize that the big boss in front of her did not seem angry at all. Right after that, she finally noticed that she had stopped before a building that looked as if it had been abandoned for who knew how many years.

It was a cathedral.

A community cathedral, the kind seen everywhere in the city-state of Pland, stood at the end of the lane.

It had the Deep Sea Cathedral's iconic slender spire, but dead vines and rotting grime hung everywhere on its black roof tiles and white stone walls. The main door, carved with complex sacred sigils, stood slightly open. The stained-glass windows beside it had fallen to pieces, leaving almost only warped iron frames. Through the crack of the door and the gaps in the broken windows, they could vaguely see a dark interior.

This had once been a sacred building, but now the air of ruin and neglect filled every crack between its bricks.

“…Is this the ‘cathedral’ that old man at the crossroads mentioned last time?” Shirley recalled their last trip here to investigate the Sixth District. “I remember he said a nun lived here, but that the nun was often not in the cathedral…”

“Falling into this state can’t be explained by ‘often not at home’,” Duncan said casually as he walked toward the cathedral’s main doors. “Rather than saying that nun often goes out, I’d say this place looks like it was forgotten eleven years ago.”

Shirley watched him walk toward the cathedral. She instinctively felt tense and repelled by that building, but after a moment’s hesitation she still followed in Duncan’s footsteps.

The next moment, Duncan pushed open the half-closed cathedral doors, and the scene inside the small cathedral appeared clearly before their eyes.

Warm, bright candlelight fell into Shirley’s eyes. Inside, the small cathedral was neat and spotless, lit from end to end. At the far end of the rows of benches, the statue of the Storm Goddess Gamona stood quietly amid the lights.

A nun who had been kneeling devoutly before the statue in prayer heard the door open, rose, and turned around.

She saw the visitors standing at the door and showed a gentle smile. “It has been a long time since anyone came to visit this cathedral.”

“Oh… looks like this really is the place.” Duncan looked at the smiling nun before him and said quietly, his expression calm: “The gap in the Veil.”

He blinked. In his eyes, the smiling nun kept the appearance of a living person for one instant, then in the next became a human-shaped heap of writhing ash. Behind her, the cathedral itself fell into a bizarre state of superposition—flames roared over intact benches, while ash and sparks drifted down from the roof. The scene after a fire had burned everything to ruin and the scene of the intact cathedral overlapped at the same time, creating a strange and torn vision.

It was as if two completely different facts had been forced together inside this cathedral.

Chapter 149

On the outside, the community cathedral looked as if it had been abandoned for countless years, yet inside it was bright and spotless. At the same time, in Duncan's eyes the lit cathedral clearly carried another layer: a ruined scene, like another "fact" superimposed over it.

It gave Duncan a certain feeling. This little cathedral felt like an "error space" laid over the Mortal Realm, or a forgotten place trapped in a crack between time and space. Two completely different histories had once crossed here, yet the cathedral had remained at that crossing point, and time inside it had never moved forward again.

It had neither been destroyed nor survived that fire.

Then… what did the sister who stayed here alone know?

"It has been a long time since anyone came to visit this cathedral," the nun in a black priest's gown repeated softly. She smiled as she lifted her head, yet her gaze seemed to pass right through Shirley and Duncan standing before her. "Where are you from? Strange faces… you're not residents of this place, are you?"

Before them was a bright and cozy scene, yet under the nun's smiling, almost divine gaze, Shirley shrank her neck without knowing why. A chill crawled up her spine. She whispered nervously to Duncan: "I… why do I feel this place is so weird… Outside it looks so ruined, but inside…"

Duncan did not answer. He just patted Shirley's shoulder. From the girl's reaction, he had already guessed that she could only see one "face" of this cathedral, most likely the side that had not been destroyed. But he did not yet know how to explain his guess to her—if they let Dog out now, then with the "eyes" of that Abyssal Hound, he probably could see the cathedral's real state.

But before he figured out what exactly this nun was, it was better not to let Shirley summon Dog out on impulse.

"We were passing by," Duncan said calmly to the nun, his face unchanged, as if he were just a citizen here to visit the cathedral. "Have you been here all this time?"

"Me? I have always lived in this cathedral," the nun replied with a small nod. "I have always been here in prayer, praying to the Great Presence."

"But the people in the neighborhood said the nun from this cathedral has not come back for a long time," Duncan went on, watching her reaction. "They said this cathedral has been neglected for a long period, that it looks almost abandoned."

The nun listened quietly to Duncan, showing no strong reaction at all, as if her heart had settled into an eternal calm.

She only gave a faint smile. "Oh? Is that so? But I have always been here… Perhaps they forgot the days of prayer and thought the cathedral was closed instead."

Duncan neither agreed nor denied it, but he had already confirmed that not only this cathedral had a problem. The entire Sixth District outside the cathedral had a problem.

This abandoned cathedral lay deep within the neighborhood. From the outside alone, it was clear it had been neglected for more than ten years. For ordinary people in this world, a cathedral was not only a place for spiritual comfort—it was also a facility that helped keep an area safe, guarding against evil forces after nightfall. It was where many commoners went for help when they suffered mental troubles or were tormented by nightmares. Yet such an important facility had been abandoned for eleven whole years, and the residents of the Sixth District felt nothing was wrong with that. They only mentioned lightly that “the nun hasn’t been around recently”?

Imagine a neighborhood that had its water and power cut off for eleven years straight, and the locals felt nothing was strange about it. If outsiders asked, they only said lightly, “The water and power people haven’t been on duty lately.” How bizarre would that be!

As for the nun in this cathedral… Duncan still was not sure what that mass of ashen humanoid shapes, which kept revealing its true form in his sight, really was. But from their brief conversation, he could feel that she… did not seem hostile.

Not only that, but her mind seemed to be in a strange state. He could not say she lacked reason entirely, but she certainly was not truly clear-headed.

Duncan probed with a few indirect questions, and the nun in the cathedral answered them all calmly. Yet that very calmness in her answers… was a sign of her unsound mind.

Under normal circumstances, if a stranger suddenly walked into a cathedral and started bombarding the duty nun with a string of unrelated questions, the nun should at least feel something was odd.

She still had reason—but not much of it left.

“Do you wish to offer a prayer? Or do you need help with calming your mind and driving away evil influences?”

The nun asked with a gentle smile and a soft voice.

“Thank you, but that won’t be necessary,” Duncan said, shaking his head. He let his gaze sweep casually around them, then asked as if offhand, “By the way, what about this cathedral's guardians?"

Every cathedral was supposed to have guardians stationed in it. Even the smallest community cathedral in the Slum Quarter kept a guard force enough to handle ordinary threats. This cathedral should have been no exception.

"The guardians… the guardians are resting in the cathedral. They only appear after nightfall," the nun said, her smile unchanged. "Do you need something from the guardians?"

Duncan did not answer. His eyes slowly moved over the benches beside the nun.

In his vision, the phantom of a great fire that had burned everything, of collapsed heaps of ash and rubble, lay over the brightly lit cathedral like overlapping frames of film. In that other superimposed layer, there were more than a few… charred bodies.

"Are the guardians resting over there?" Duncan raised his hand and pointed into the distance. In Shirley's eyes, there were only two empty rows of benches in that direction.

The nun paused for a moment, then followed Duncan's pointing finger with her gaze. After a brief silence, she said softly, "Shh… they are sleeping."

Duncan made a small sound of acknowledgment and then asked casually, "May we look around?"

"Of course. The cathedral is open to visitors," the nun said with a light nod. "Please feel free to walk around. I will continue my prayers—if you need help, you may call me at any time."

After saying this, the strange nun really did turn and walk back toward the Goddess's statue, leaving Duncan and Shirley completely to themselves.

It was only after the nun left that Shirley, who had been tense for so long, finally let out a deep breath. At this point she did not even have the energy to be afraid of Duncan, because the eerie atmosphere filling every corner of the cathedral had already made Dog, still in his hidden state, restless. That strange tension was flowing straight into her mind through the mental link, making her instinctively edge closer to Duncan. “W-what is going on in this place… Why does that nun feel so creepy? She looks normal, but somehow everything about her feels wrong…”

“There seem to be two cathedrals here,” Duncan said softly, giving a simple, blunt explanation. “One has already burned down, and the other is still intact. They are superimposed on this place in time and space. As for the nun in the cathedral… she is neither dead nor alive.”

Shirley froze. It took her a full half minute before she managed to speak again in confusion and shock: “What do you mean?”

Duncan gave her a look. “You really should read more books later—if that doesn’t work, I can teach you.”

Then, without waiting for Shirley’s reply, he walked straight toward the back of the cathedral.

The nun had said the cathedral was open to visitors, so of course he was going to “take a look around” as he pleased.

Shirley stood dazed for a moment, then hurried to follow him. They walked past the neatly arranged benches and passed by the statue and prayer altar at their far end.

The serene nun was already kneeling before the statue of the Storm Goddess, both hands lightly pressed to her chest as she devoutly offered benediction. It was as if she had completely forgotten the visitors, as if she had been kneeling here for the past eleven years, maintaining an unbroken prayer.

Duncan blinked, and the nun turned again into a writhing mass of ashen humanoids piled beside a charred, broken prayer altar. Tiny sparks of fire fell from the dome above like drifting leaves.

Suddenly sensing something, he lifted his head to look up at the statue of the Storm Goddess.

The statue in its long dress stood quietly on the high platform, but a jagged crack ran straight across its head!

In that brief instant, Duncan saw the core of the truth hidden in the double-layered cathedral. He clearly saw a dim fissure opening where the Goddess's stone head should have been. Inside that crack, faint, chaotic light and shadow stirred, like a terrible eye lying sideways. In the depths of its pupil were scenes that absolutely did not belong to the Mortal Realm. The "holy" aura that should have surrounded the Goddess's statue had vanished without a trace. On this eerie, frightening stone figure, only cold and emptiness coiled.

In the next instant, that horrific sight vanished as if it had never been. Gamona's statue still stood quietly on the high platform, gazing down on everything with solemn majesty, radiating a presence that brought both comfort and awe.

The nun kneeling before the Goddess's statue suddenly opened her eyes. She tilted her head slightly and looked calmly at Duncan.

"Do you wish to offer a prayer to the Goddess?"

Chapter 150: The Secret in the underground sanctum

“Do you wish to offer a prayer to the Goddess?”

To be honest, in that instant, Duncan’s first instinct was that there was something wrong with Storm Goddess Gamona—that this deity, who was supposed to shelter humans, had a cruel hidden side. Because of that, terrible shadows lurked deep in the city-state, and the twisted look that had flashed across the statue was the proof.

But the next second, another doubt rose in his mind: if Storm Goddess Gamona really had a problem, then why were all the other cathedrals in the city perfectly normal?

He had seen other cathedrals of the Church of the Deep Sea before. There was a community cathedral near the antique shop, and back then there had been another beside the Ocean City Museum. Even though he had not gone in to investigate them carefully, he had lingered nearby, and the aura those cathedrals gave off was clearly different from that of the strange cathedral before him.

He had also dealt with other clergy, from the lowest priests and guardians to people like Vanna, an Inquisitor standing at the very top of the city-state. All those who served Storm Goddess Gamona day and night were normal. They were even more strong-willed and clear-headed than most people.

He ignored the nun and lifted his head to look at the statue.

After that brief, startling glimpse, the strange crack in the statue's head did not appear again. Even in the overlaid image of the cathedral, the statue only looked blackened by smoke, as if the crack had sensed something and taken the initiative to hide.

Duncan frowned.

The weirdness of this cathedral was clearly an exception. So if the problem was not with Storm Goddess Gamona… then what he had just seen might be some other power using this cathedral as a Node, trying to corrupt the Mortal Realm.

But what exactly was that thing?

The shape of that crack did not seem related to the Sun God at all, and it did not make him think of any fragments of the Sun. If anything… the murky light and shadow surging within the crack reminded him of the chaos outside the hull of the Vanished.

"Do you wish to offer a prayer to the Goddess?"

The nun's voice came again. She sounded neither impatient nor urging. It was as if some key word had been triggered, so that as long as Duncan and Shirley stood near the statue, she kept repeating the same question over and over.

Shirley looked a little at a loss. She instinctively turned to Duncan. Duncan finally responded. He calmly fixed his gaze on the nun and asked: "Are you offering this prayer to your Goddess?"

It should have been a question with an obvious answer. Any normal believer would have given a clear yes at this moment. But the nun's reaction made Shirley's eyes widen.

"I… don't know," the nun said, shaking her head with a calm face, as if she did not feel there was anything wrong with her answer. "I am only praying.

She told me to pray here.”

“Who is She?” Duncan frowned at once.

“The Great Presence.” The nun smiled.

Yet in the nun’s gentle smile, Shirley felt a chill rise in her heart.

“I do not pray to any deity,” Duncan said quietly. He unobtrusively pulled Shirley back half a step, out of the area of the prayer platform. “Including the Goddess you speak of.”

“Oh, what a pity.” The nun let out a soft sigh, bowed her head again, and no longer paid any attention to Duncan and Shirley.

Duncan stared at the writhing cluster of ashen humanoids for a few seconds. After he confirmed that the ash really was no longer paying him any mind, he turned away and walked toward another part of the cathedral.

This small cathedral was limited in size, with almost no place to hide anything. Apart from the main hall that housed the statue, there were only a few rooms connected to the hall and a single basement.

Duncan first led Shirley to check the nearby rooms. They found nothing worth noting. In the end, they found the stairs leading down to the basement at the end of a corridor on the outer side of the main hall.

“Are we really going down there?” Looking at the pitch-black stairs before her, Shirley was clearly uneasy. She could not help glancing back toward the main hall. “That weird nun won’t suddenly come after us, will she?”

“That ‘nun’ is obviously trapped in the main hall and cannot stray far from the statue,” Duncan shook his head and said. “But if she really does come to attack… then we will have to fight. In that state… it’s hard to say she is still a living human.”

Shirley swallowed. Normally, she was quite bold. But no matter how bold, this was her first time sneaking into a cathedral of the Church of the Deep Sea to stir up trouble. Years of ingrained tension and awe made her heart pound wildly.

But she knew she had better not refuse. Compared to a nun who had mutated from a mortal and a shadow from Subspace, she had a rough idea of which was more dangerous.

Just then, Duncan spoke again, making Shirley, who had finally steeled herself, jump all over again: “Right, summon Dog.”

Shirley’s eyes went wide at once. “Huh?! Summon Dog? Inside the Storm Goddess’s cathedral?!”

“This place is probably no longer the Storm Goddess’s cathedral,” Duncan shook his head and said. “It’s hard to say what exactly holds the upper hand here now. Go ahead and summon Dog. Look, even I am standing in this ‘cathedral’. Could a Abyssal demon be more out of place than me?”

Shirley thought about it and felt that this actually made some sense. Of course, even if it had not made sense, she would not have dared to disagree. So she honestly raised her arm and summoned Dog into the Mortal Realm.

Black flames and swirling smoke rose up. In the blink of an eye, the huge Abyssal Hound appeared in front of Duncan.

As soon as the summoning ended, Dog, very well-practiced in his job, dropped down at Duncan’s feet. His skeletal tail wagged like a five-speed electric fan. “I salute you, great Dun—”

“Enough, you don’t have to do this every time,” Duncan cut him off with a wave before he could finish. Having one noisy Goathead already gave him enough of a headache. He really did not want another dog with the same style hanging around him. “You should already sense that something is wrong with this cathedral. Now see it with your own eyes. I may need your ‘eye for detail’ later.”

Dog nimbly scrambled up from the floor and turned his head to look around the corridor and the stairs leading down to the basement at its end. A faint light flickered in his hollow scarlet eye sockets.

“This place really is cursed…” the Abyssal Hound’s voice was hoarse and low. “Just looking at it makes my eyes swim…”

He paused, as if making a deeper judgment, then turned slightly to Duncan and said: “It’s a little like that abandoned factory from before, but more twisted than that. This distortion has probably already pushed the Mortal Realm to the limit of what it can bear… Yes, it looks like we really have found one of the key points on this layer of the Veil.”

“The distortion has already pushed the Mortal Realm to its limit… no wonder I can observe it directly,” Duncan nodded in understanding. His gaze fell on the stairs ahead. “We have already checked the whole cathedral. What is left now… should be only this basement. In most cathedrals of the Church of the Deep Sea, the area ahead is called the ‘underground sanctum’.”

“I’m starting to get excited,” Dog said, shaking his ugly head so that the chain around his neck clattered. “This is the first time in my life I’ve marched openly into a forbidden area of a cathedral of the Church of the Deep Sea… I’ve never seen what it looks like down there!”

Shirley gave Dog a strange look at once. “Can you not sound like some creep about to sneak into the ladies’ restroom?”

Dog: “…”

Duncan ignored this pair of dog-bred brats. He had already stepped past Dog and gone down the stairs, arriving at the door that led into the underground sanctum.

For such a small community cathedral, this so-called “underground sanctum” was only a spacious basement. The door leading into the underground sanctum was an oak door reinforced with a steel frame and Sacred Sigils, and marked with a divine blessing.

Duncan set his hand on the door and pushed gently. He found that the door was not locked, but when he pushed harder he felt some resistance, as if something on the other side was bracing against it to keep it from opening.

“There is something on the other side of the door.” Duncan stepped back a little and studied the black oak door before him.

For some reason, once he reached the doorway of the underground sanctum, that strange “overlapping” scene faded. All he saw before his eyes now was this single door.

It was as if the two “branches” that had been overlaid within the cathedral had converged here, leaving only a single Mortal Realm.

“Should we just smash the door open?” Shirley came up behind him. She had already lifted the chain in her hand, eagerness written on her face. Dog also made ready—by wrapping his paws around his head and curling himself up into a meteor hammer.

“…That might destroy clues,” Duncan stopped the dog-swinging maiden from using her traditional technique. He laid one hand on the rune-covered door. A tiny flame rose between his fingers and quickly traced along the grooves and lines on the door. “In theory, this door should count as an supernatural item, so…”

In the next second, the cathedral door that had once been given a divine blessing turned into tinder for the fire of spirit form. Ghostly green flame flared up along its surface. The door faithfully carried out its Master’s command.

It burned itself away.

As the door turned to ash and scattered, the thing that had been braced against it appeared before Duncan and the others and fell to the floor with a thud.

It was a nun in a black robe and skirt—covered in wounds, a longsword still clutched in her hand. Even in death, she still glared at something in the darkness.

When Shirley saw the woman’s face clearly, a chill rose from the depths of her heart.

“Is that… the nun we just saw?”

Chapter 151: The Fear of Abyssal Demons

Duncan bent down to examine her.

It really was that nun—the same nun who had just been speaking with Duncan and Shirley, and who, in theory, was still in the main hall praying.

But now she lay here, dead near the entrance to the underground sanctum. Until the moment Duncan pushed the door, she had been using her own body to brace it shut.

It seemed she had been trying to keep something from entering the underground sanctum. Yet judging from her last state before she fell, it also looked as if she had fought desperately against something inside the underground sanctum, then shut the door before she died to keep that thing from escaping.

“She looks… like she just died…”

At this point, Shirley also mustered her courage and stepped closer. She leaned from behind Duncan to peer at the body. Only after two or three seconds did she speak carefully.

“Yes, it looks as if she died not long ago. She even…” Duncan spoke as he placed his hand on the nun’s arm. “She even still has warmth.”

The corpse at the entrance of the underground sanctum still held residual heat. The blood on her wounded body had not yet dried. This even gave Duncan the illusion that when he and Shirley first stepped into the cathedral, the battle in this basement had still been going on, that this nun had still been alive. Maybe… even when they began to search through the cathedral, this nun had still been breathing.

But that was impossible.

This cathedral had been abandoned for eleven years. The supernatural manifestation that had taken place in the city-state of Pland had also happened eleven years ago. If this cathedral really was a key Node on the Veil, then everything here should have happened and ended eleven years back. The nun who had fought to her last breath in the underground sanctum… could not have died only just now.

Duncan's expression grew serious. He slowly straightened up and looked past the doorway.

As he had expected, the underground sanctum of this community cathedral was only a slightly more spacious basement. There was no light in the hall. Even the ever-burning oil lamps and gas lamps meant to repel evil had long since gone out. Only the faint glow pouring in through the doorway lit the scene within. In the dimness, he could just see a statue of the Goddess standing quietly at the center of the room. On both sides, columns hung with scripture banners stood in rows, and niches for storing holy relics were set into the walls.

Duncan stepped over the nun's corpse and searched the basement for signs of battle. He saw gouges on the walls and pillars where blades had struck, pockmarks left by bullets, and scorched marks left by fire. These had all been left by the fight.

But the one thing he did not find was an "enemy". He did not find any of the "intruders" that nun had fought so desperately against before she died.

He turned his head to look at Dog, who was following behind Shirley with his head lowered, cautiously observing everything around them. “Dog, can you see anything?”

“I see signs that time and space have been badly twisted… On the surface, there doesn’t seem to be that kind of ‘overlapping Mortal Realm’ we saw in the cathedral above, but in fact the distortion of time and space here is worse than anywhere else,” Dog said, his tone unusually grave. As the only occult specialist in this three-‘person’ team, his analysis was far more systematic than Duncan’s wild guesses. “In my sight, the whole underground sanctum is shrouded in a thin mist. The wrong time and space have completely replaced the Mortal Realm. But… apart from this distortion of time and space, I haven’t found anything else.”

“What about the ‘intruders’ who attacked this place?” Duncan frowned. “That nun can’t have been playing a mind game with the air, can she?”

“…There are no intruders,” Dog said, sniffing—though he did not actually have a respiratory system. “No scent of living beings. No scent of Abyssal demons or creatures from the Spirit Realm.”

He paused again, then added: “Please trust my judgment on this. A Abyssal Hound’s greatest talent is hunting. Telling prey apart by their scent in any environment is a basic skill for a predator, unless…”

Duncan raised an eyebrow. “Unless?”

Dog quickly swept his gaze around, suddenly much more cautious. He lowered his voice as he came up beside Duncan. “Unless something from Subspace came out… I can’t track that. But if it really is something from Subspace, you should be more familiar with it than I am…”

As soon as Duncan heard that, his face went blank. “Sorry. I’m not familiar at all.”

Dog hastily lowered his head. “If you say you’re not familiar, then you’re not familiar…”

Duncan thought for a moment. He knew Dog definitely did not believe him, but he really was not familiar with Subspace. On the other hand, Dog’s words had indeed reminded him of something.

He recalled the crack he had glimpsed in that instant when he looked at the statue of the Goddess in the cathedral’s main hall. He remembered the chaotic light and shadow leaking from that crack. He remembered the strange manifestations he had seen beneath the hull of the Vanished.

Subspace… was it really something from Subspace that had escaped?

“If it really did come from Subspace…” Duncan frowned, half speaking to himself. “How did it end up barging straight into the Storm Goddess’s sanctuary? Isn’t this supposed to be the safest, best-defended place? And judging from the traces at the scene, it doesn’t look like the intruders attacked from outside. It looks more like they appeared directly inside the sanctuary and then tried to break out…”

“That, I don’t know,” Dog said, shaking his head. “The secrets of the Four Great Churches are a blind spot in the knowledge of Abyssal demons. And Subspace is an officially recognized taboo. Even Dreadfiends do not pry into its mysteries. In fact, from my point of view, humans are even crazier than demons in this field. They actually dare to study Subspace, and after all these years nothing has gone wrong…”

“Humans have always been a bold species,” Duncan said offhand. Then he looked at Dog. “But I am a bit surprised. The Abyssal Deep of the Deep Sea lies right next to Subspace, yet you Abyssal demons are even more afraid of that place than humans? Isn’t Subspace basically your front yard?”

“People who live beside a volcano don’t do it because they love drinking lava,” Dog said, hanging his head as he explained to the big boss. “We live right next to Subspace, so we know better than humans how terrifying it is to fall in.”

Duncan looked thoughtful and finally asked the question he had failed to ask last time. “…So that’s why you fear the Vanished returning from Subspace just as much as humans do?”

Dog shrank his neck and gave Duncan a very careful look, as if he were afraid that talking about this topic might accidentally offend the Master of the Vanished standing before him. But since the big boss had brought it up, he did not dare refuse to answer. He could only say honestly: “Actually… if the Vanished had only returned from Subspace, it would not have been that scary. The key point is that, during the earliest period, that ship kept ‘falling’ back out of the Mortal Realm from time to time. It was like it was bouncing between two dimensions, going back and forth nonstop between Subspace and the Mortal Realm…”

Duncan had only asked casually, but he had not expected to hear information like this. His heart stirred at once. “Bouncing between the Mortal Realm and Subspace?”

“Yes. Each time it passed, it went straight through the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep, sweeping up everything it encountered along the way, like a cannonball charging blindly forward,” Dog said, and his voice clearly trembled at the memory. “I still remember a terrifying scene. The ship fell from the upper layers like an ever-burning meteor of fire. Flames wrapped around screaming humans and a twisted hull. Those mindless, brawling Abyssal demons scattered in panic, but in an instant an immense force swept them into the flames. They fused with those humans into grotesque, twisted lumps, which were then torn apart and scattered into the depths of the Abyssal Deep…

“The Vanished punched through the layers like that, crashed into the depths of Subspace, then two days later crawled back out from below, and then… did it all over again.”

As he spoke, Dog gulped with difficulty. A rough rasping came from his throat, along with the sound of corrosive fluids seething.

“Back then, even some of the most mindless, dull Abyssal demons stopped fighting for a short time. Every day they just stared blankly in the direction of the Spirit Realm. Fear even outweighed their urge to attack, becoming their new instinct… and I was one of those marked most deeply by that fear.”

Duncan listened with a blank face. After a long moment, he finally said: “Then… I understand why you have such deep psychological shadows.”

Dog mustered his courage and looked up at Duncan. “You… you really didn’t know any of this yourself?”

Duncan almost lost his composure. He didn’t know a damn thing! He hadn’t done any of that! Why did every old mess have to be dumped on his head?

But no matter how much he complained, he could only grumble about it in his heart. In front of Dog, he could only keep a straight face. “…Maybe I just didn’t notice.”

Dog: “…”

Seeing how crushed the Abyssal Hound looked, Duncan sighed and added: “I’ll pay attention from now on.”

His tone was very sincere.

Dog was so moved he did not even dare move.

After that, Duncan fell into brief thought.

If everything Dog said was true, then the Vanished… had once gone through a period of complete runaway state? It had not simply sailed back from Subspace. For quite a long time, it had been “bouncing” back and forth between the Mortal Realm and Subspace?!

Chapter 152: When in Doubt…

Duncan had not expected that a casual question would make Dog spill such important information about the Vanished. He had already heard this Abyssal Hound talk about the Vanished's fearsome name in the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea, but who would have thought that this fame had been "smashed out" in such a blunt and brutal way?!

A ghost ship that kept shaking between Subspace and the Mortal Realm was like a cannon shell flying back and forth between a rooftop and the foundations. Each time it rocked, it smashed through the "floors" of the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea. Nothing survived wherever it passed. Every solid thing that touched it was dragged into Subspace. And from the sound of it, this had gone on for quite some time.

No wonder Abyssal demons like Dog had carved fear of the Vanished into their bones. A calamity that showed up every few days to slaughter people in front of you suddenly stopped, and then the captain came down from the ship, smiling and greeting you. Who would not have their knees buckling? Even if Dog did not even have tendons in his legs, they would still cramp.

After all, just because the ship had stopped in the Mortal Realm now did not mean it would stay. What if… a certain ghost captain suddenly wanted to go back to Subspace to visit some relatives?

But compared with the huge mess the Vanished had made back then, Duncan cared more about the state of that ship itself at the time, and what kind of state the real Captain Duncan had been in.

Was that kind of “shaking” something the real Captain Duncan had done on purpose? Or had it been some kind of out-of-control lost voyage? Had Goathead known what was happening back then? If all of this had been done on purpose, what had “Captain Duncan” and Goathead been trying to do? And if it had all come from the runaway state…

…then things would get even crazier.

Would the Vanished… go into a runaway state again?!

All this time, the Vanished had been Duncan’s greatest support, and also where his true body was. The safety of that ship was the same as his own safety. He explored that ship and took control of it so he could make that safety more sure. But if the whole ship had the hidden danger of a runaway state and might suddenly “smash” back into Subspace from the Mortal Realm again… then was the control he had over the Vanished right now still of any use?

Could he pull back a ghost ship that was charging madly toward Subspace?

The Vanished’s current steady sailing on the Boundless Sea might only be a short-lived balance. Its real normal state might actually be “runaway state”. That possibility spread through his heart beyond his control and made Duncan grow restless.

What troubled him even more was the big door at the bottom of the Vanished’s hull that led into Subspace, and Goathead’s tense reaction after learning that the door had opened a crack. That seemed to faintly prove his worries—

The Vanished was not stable, and Subspace’s call to that ship had never stopped, not even for a moment.

Duncan took a slow breath without showing anything on his face and forced himself to calm down.

No matter how much he thought about it, he still did not have enough power to meddle in things related to Subspace. He still knew too little about the occult.

If he wanted to gather more knowledge about Subspace, dealing with more supernatural events was one way. And right now, this cathedral in front of him… this cathedral that might once have been invaded by Subspace.

“We should pay more attention to this place,” Duncan said as he shook his head. “If something from Subspace did invade the underground sanctum, then what happened eleven years ago is much more complicated than anyone imagined…”

He raised his head and looked at the big door that had once been sealed.

“The nun here held this door before she died,” Duncan said. “Maybe to keep what was in the sanctum from getting out. But can a single door really block intruders from Subspace?”

“Invasion from Subspace also depends on the situation,” Dog said, thinking it over. “In most cases, the Mortal Realm is protected by the Gods… fine, I don’t really like Them, but the Mortal Realm really is under the Gods’ effective shelter. Subspace has a hard time affecting this side directly. What can come over here is usually not the true body. At most it’s some projection, some corruption, or even just illusions thrown out by using people’s minds as a lens…”

Dog stopped mid-sentence and stared at Duncan, suddenly nervous.

In his eyes, the light-and-shadow vortex inside this human body was spinning in chaos. Mad gleams kept rising from it, enough to send even demons’ minds into a runaway state.

This ghost captain who had come back from Subspace… damn it, he himself was the biggest Subspace invasion in this place!

“Keep talking. Then what? What about Subspace invasion?” Duncan asked.

In Dog’s eyes, the very embodiment of a Subspace invasion lowered his head and curiously asked about Subspace invasions.

“I… I mean, under normal conditions, a Subspace invasion can be blocked by the holy facilities in a cathedral,” Dog said. “And since what comes in isn’t the true body, as long as you cut off the invasion channel, the part that stays in the Mortal Realm will soon fade away…” Dog swallowed hard as he explained Subspace invasion to the walking Subspace invasion. “Of course, what a terrible price you have to pay in the process is another story…”

“So that’s how it works,” Duncan said with a knowing nod. When he looked again at the nun lying on the ground, his eyes were filled with even more respect than before. “She must have used everything she had to try to stop that disaster.”

“But she didn’t really succeed, right?” Shirley’s voice suddenly came from the side. Because what Duncan and Dog were talking about was either too advanced or too scary, she had not found any chance to speak until now. “The big fire eleven years ago still happened…”

“The fire eleven years ago was caused by the fragment of the Sun, but in this cathedral we have found traces that seem to come from Subspace. We still can’t say how these two things are linked,” Duncan said, shaking his head. Then it was as if something had just come to him. With a thoughtful look, he slowly walked to the statue of the Goddess standing in the middle of the underground sanctum. “But… I suddenly feel curious about one thing.”

He raised his head and looked up at the statue of the Goddess, which was a little different from the statue of Gamona in the cathedral on the surface. This statue stood in the dim light, with no sign of damage on its surface.

“What are you curious about?” Shirley came over, gave the statue a careful glance, and asked in a small voice.

“This Storm Goddess—what was She doing?” Duncan raised his hand and pointed at the statue. “The cathedral was invaded, the priest died in battle, and only a ghostly shadow that keeps praying was left outside like a leftover soul. Why did the God here have no reaction at all? At the very least… She should have given some warning to the believers in the other cathedrals and asked them to come support this place, right?”

“I don’t really know much about the Gods either, but this does sound suspicious,” Dog muttered. “Even though the Gods aren’t closely tied to the mortal world, they really do care about their own ‘holy places’. These buildings that gather congregations are like ‘anchors’ for the Gods in the mortal world. Now one of those anchors got pulled out in silence, and after eleven years… there has been no reaction at all. That’s not right.”

Duncan thought for a moment, then suddenly raised his right hand. A tiny flame appeared out of thin air on his fingertip, its ghostly green light shining around the statue.

With a clatter of chains, Dog instantly backed away two steps: “W-What are you going to do?”

“When in doubt, light a little fire,” Duncan said with a smile. “Maybe we can burn something that is hiding into showing itself.”

Dog jumped in fright and almost reminded Duncan that this was the underground sanctum, and they might bring Gamona’s gaze down on them. But before he could say it, he held it back. This place had already been messed up to this degree. Who knew how much holiness it still had? And the big boss in front of him was about to do his proper job as a “Subspace invasion”. Why was he even talking?

Even so, he calmly edged a few more steps away and tugged Shirley to stand farther back as well.

If some kind of divine punishment really struck in a moment, the big boss might not be afraid, but he and Shirley would not be able to take it.

Duncan noticed Dog's movements, but he did not care.

Of course, he did not want to draw the Storm Goddess's gaze onto himself. But in the main hall of the cathedral just now, he had already confirmed that this "holy place" had been completely corrupted. Even the statue was wrapped with the power of Subspace. Thinking about how the abnormal state here had been hidden for eleven years without anyone finding it, it was clear that the deity's link to this place had already been cut.

Now, this place that had once been holy had long lost its holiness. Only shadows remained.

The spirit form flame burned in silence and dropped to the floor like drops of water. The hazy, unreal fire quickly rippled through the underground sanctum and filled the whole room in the blink of an eye.

Then the flames that had spread to every corner slowly went out without a sound.

Shirley and Dog looked at each other. After a long moment, Shirley finally spoke in a careful voice: "Did you… find anything?"

Duncan looked in mild surprise at the little flame still jumping on his finger, then at the empty underground sanctum where nothing at all had happened.

Was there really nothing here? Or… was the Power of Flame not enough to pry up the Veil that covered this place?

He frowned. And just then, a very faint whisper, almost like a hallucination, suddenly entered his ears—

“Who is there?”

Duncan started and snapped his head up, looking toward where the voice had come from.

Gamona’s statue stood quietly in the dark.

Chapter 153: Space-Time Lock

In the dark, the statue of the Storm Goddess Gamona still stood quietly in the center of the underground sanctum, veiled and looking down at the mortal world.

Of course, by strict doctrine, the “Goddess” in the underground sanctum was another side of Gamona and should be called the “Maiden of the Still Sea”.

Duncan stared hard at the cold stone statue. He was sure he had just heard a voice, a whisper like something from a dream, coming from that statue.

Yet Shirley and Dog, who were standing right next to him, still showed no reaction. Clearly, Duncan was the only one who had heard that voice.

“Mr. Duncan?” Shirley had also noticed Duncan’s strange behavior by now. She widened her eyes a little in nervousness and leaned against Dog without meaning to. “Did you find something?”

“Did either of you hear any sound just now?” Duncan pinched out the flame on his fingertip. As he spoke in a low voice, he moved closer to carefully study the statue of the Maiden of the Still Sea.

“Sound?” Shirley and Dog looked at each other and shook their heads. “No.”

The statue of the Goddess did not react at all to Duncan’s closer approach. No other sound came.

Duncan felt that he might have been a bit reckless this time.

He had thought the link between the Storm Goddess and this cathedral had already been cut. When he summoned Dog and burned down the chapel door earlier, no manifestations had appeared. So he had slowly loosened up while exploring. He had not expected that one burst of fire would draw the deity's gaze—if that faint question just now really had come from Gamona.

So he did a small bit of self-reflection in his heart and decided that the next time he was reckless, he should be a little more careful.

At the same time, as he was reflecting, a new doubt suddenly rose in his mind:

Judging from the state of this cathedral, before he and Shirley came in it had clearly been completely abandoned and forgotten. The link between the Storm Goddess Gamona and this place had also clearly been blocked. In theory, his flame should be another "invading force" inside this cathedral. Burning with his fire should only have made the corruption and blocking of this cathedral even worse, like lighting another fire on ruins that had already been badly burned. So how…

…had the link between the Storm Goddess and this place instead grown stronger for a moment after he lit his fire?

Wasn't he the intruder here? Shouldn't his flames be very destructive to the power of a deity that held the attribute of order? How had he ended up "burning the Goddess awake"?

The more Duncan thought about it, the more confused he felt, but he did not let his thoughts run wild for long.

In the end, he still could not be sure whether that faint whisper had really been Gamona's voice. He was just guessing based on that idea. The real problem in front of him now was thinking about what to do next with this strange cathedral.

After that whisper died away, nothing else happened. Duncan did not know what a Goddess usually did with Her time, but right now She did not seem to plan on keeping Her gaze on this place. The rest of the underground sanctum still stayed as it had been at first. The fire he had released had not lifted the Veil the way it had in the abandoned factory.

He still could not sense anything on the far side of the Veil. The flames he had left in that split body of the umbrella fiend were still missing without a trace. He could only be sure that the fire was still burning and had even started to spread, but he could not touch the “dimension” where those flames were.

This cathedral was indeed an important node on the Veil, but with only his and Shirley’s strength, it seemed hard to pry this place open.

With the condition of his current body, and with the distance between the Vanished and the city-state of Pland, it was also hard for him to call up a larger scale of flames. It would be hard to make a bigger stir here.

As these thoughts flashed through his mind, a faint idea took shape in Duncan’s heart.

It was time for him to once again play the part of “enthusiastic citizen Mr. Duncan”.

This cathedral had been hidden until today. Some nameless force had been blocking outsiders from peeking into it. So what if… he forcibly took the lid off?

He was very curious how the Deep Sea Church of the city-state of Pland would react, and even more curious about what the Storm Goddess would do. Since he could not open the Veil here by himself, he might as well turn this place into a big news event.

Of course, this time it would not work to just find a few patrolling Night Watchers and report it to them. That might only get the first group of investigators who came killed. He had to think carefully about how to turn this place into big news in a way that was both safe and effective.

As he thought, a small smile appeared on Duncan's face without him noticing. It was the smile of a mischief-maker planning a big piece of trouble. But this smile scared Shirley and Dog beside him. Dog, especially, clamped his tail down on the spot: "M-M-Mr. Duncan, do you have a plan?"

Duncan waved his hand as soon as he heard the question. "Nothing much. I just plan to do my part to uphold the city's order."

Dog let out a gurgling sound in his throat. He thought that even if you said those words to the mad demons of the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea, no one would believe them. The look on the big boss's face just now had clearly been the smile of a Subspace intruder who had finally figured out what a Subspace invasion really was and was getting ready to carry one out…

"All right, there's nothing more to see here," Duncan said. He did not care about Shirley and Dog's reactions. He only glanced back at Gamona's statue and gave it a meaningful look, then turned and walked toward the exit door. "We shouldn't stay here for long."

The group hurried toward the exit, but before they left, Shirley could not help stopping again. "Mr. Duncan, wh-what about this dead nun?"

Duncan also stopped. He quietly looked at the young woman who had died after fighting with all her strength.

She was still very young, so young that it made one feel regret. She had not been a Guardian whose job was fighting for the Church, yet she had died here in the dark of the underground sanctum with a sword in her hand.

Duncan suddenly realized a problem.

A nun… Why had a nun been guarding the sanctum? Under normal conditions, shouldn't there have been a whole squad of specially trained Guardians stationed here?

He thought back to the scene he had seen in the main hall earlier.

That squad of Guardians seemed to have died in the main hall of the cathedral. And from the scene he had seen in that "overlaid Mortal Realm", those Guardians had not died in battle. It was more like they had all suddenly dropped dead while they were sitting on the benches in prayer.

The Guardians who should have been stationed in the underground sanctum had suddenly died in the cathedral's main hall, with no sign of battle on their bodies. The nun who should have stayed in the main hall had instead died alone in the sanctum in battle. The intruders seemed to be from Subspace, yet they had left no trace after the fight. After that, the cathedral had been sealed and forgotten, while some sort of "echo" of the nun had returned to the main hall to go on with the daily prayers…

Duncan's attention came back to the Mortal Realm. He quietly looked at the nun for a few seconds and said softly: "I'm sorry. I can't bury you. You will have to stay here for now. Maybe someone will come and find out the truth of what happened back then."

For this matter, he really did need to borrow the hands of some "professionals".

Duncan stood up and walked toward the exit that led to the main hall. Behind him, Shirley could not help speaking up: "Ah, we're just leaving her here?"

“This is called preserving the scene,” Duncan said without looking back. “Come on. The investigation here is not over yet. It’s just that from now on, we won’t need to do the work ourselves.”

Shirley let out an “oh” as if she half understood, then pulled Dog along and followed Duncan’s steps. They left the underground sanctum and walked toward the stairs ahead that led up to the main hall.

A faint knocking sound came from behind them.

Duncan stopped short and turned his head toward the source of the sound.

A dark wooden door stood at the entrance to the main hall. The door was slightly ajar. Iron bands and rivets had been used to strengthen it, and faint traces of holy runes could be seen on the panels.

Shirley glanced back, and her eyes slowly grew wide in horror.

Then she turned her head again and saw Duncan’s face set in a deep, dark expression.

“T-The door…” Shirley raised her hand and pointed toward it. Her mouth opened and closed a few times, but no words came out.

“I see it,” Duncan cut her off. He walked back to the sanctum’s entrance, looked at the dark door, and reached out to push it lightly.

The door was not locked, but when he tried to push it further, he felt resistance.

Someone on the other side was holding the door.

He drew back his hand and thought in silence for a few seconds, holding back the urge to light another fire and burn the door open.

He already knew what things would look like after opening the door. The strange phenomena here made him give up the idea of using crude methods to keep trying again and again.

“Twisted space and time… it really is twisted to quite a degree,” Duncan said.

At the same time, in the great Deep Sea cathedral in the upper city, the calm-faced Vanna finished her daily prayers. After assigning today’s work to her subordinates, she sent all her attendants away and went alone into the depths of the grand, holy building.

This was the archive of the great cathedral. Under the Goddess’s gaze, this archive held all the records of supernatural matters that were not fit for the public eye.

In a sense, this place stored the history of the city-state of Pland. It stored the Church’s “memory” of this land.

Chapter 154:

The archive was managed by an old priest. He was already quite old, with a hunched back and thin, messy white hair. On his head he wore a complex lens array made of brass cranks and crystal lenses, and his clothes still smelled faintly of machine oil.

The old priest sat behind a dark, ring-shaped desk. Using the lenses, he studied a mechanical device that looked like a Rubik’s cube. With the help of several delicate tools, he had taken the cube apart into a pile of tiny parts. The light of a gas lamp shone on the pieces, making them glimmer.

When Vanna walked over, her tall figure blocked the light at the side. Only then did the old priest raise his head. He pushed the lenses away from his eyes with a finger. When he saw who it was, he smiled and said: “Oh, Inquisitor, what kind of help do you need today?”

“Where are the records of all kinds of disasters and accidents in the city-state around the year 1889 kept?” Vanna nodded to the old priest as she asked.

“The disaster records for 1889?” the old priest muttered. He tapped a spot on the wide ring-shaped desk. At once there came a soft sound of gears rubbing under the tabletop. A section of the desktop slid down, and from inside rose a mechanical console covered with cranks, numbered dials, and little levers.

With a chorus of creaks and clicks, the old priest began to operate the clever machine with practiced ease, moving the levers and numbered dials. After he entered the needed information, Vanna heard the deep growl that large machines made when they started to work. She felt the floor under her feet tremble a little. Countless gears and rods ran happily under the push of a steam core. Then she heard a clear ding from the device in front of the old priest, and a strip of printed paper slid out of the machine.

“Go straight along this aisle. At the third row of shelves, turn left. Walk to the end and turn right. One of the shelves there has its lights on. The row with the light is the one you want. The contents are mixed. Every event that could be called a disaster is recorded, even the smallest steam scalding accident. If you need help, just ring the bell.”

As he spoke, the old priest handed her the paper strip. He gripped it with a prosthetic hand. The brass palm and forearm had a fine mechanical structure, and through a small clear window on the back of the hand, one could see a cluster of gears ticking away inside.

Vanna thought that he was probably a Guardian veteran who had retired from the front lines. In the civil departments of the Storm Church, this kind of veteran was not rare.

Their bodies were already damaged, and they had proved their faith and loyalty with blood and sacrifice. With the help of steam-engine or magic prosthetics, they could go on serving the Holy See. Posts that dealt with files and archives became the final home for some of these veterans.

In a way, this was a kind of favor to the warriors. The archive department was fairly easy and well supplied, a place fit for them to grow old in peace. From another angle, it was also a good use of talent. The bodies of these veterans might no longer suit fighting Heretics, but their wills were still tough. And the work of guarding books and records had always needed a tough will.

A trace of respect rose in Vanna’s heart. She took the paper strip with both hands and lowered her head slightly: “Thank you.”

“When you are done, remember to put the books back properly, and do not touch any books that are not in the register,” the old priest said, waving his hand. “Many of the books here have been sitting for a very long time. Do not disturb them for no reason.”

After he finished, he returned to his “work” and paid no more attention to Vanna.

Vanna did not mind. Holding the paper strip printed with entries from the register, she walked toward the depths of the archive. On both sides of her, bookshelves so tall that she could only call them grand stood in neat rows. One after another, they reached up to the dome above, like ancient guards standing in formation and looking down at the small figures below. Bright electric lamps and carefully placed gas lamps lined the spaces between the shelves, making the place as bright as day. Even between the deepest shelves, not a single patch of dark shadows remained.

Vanna found the shelf the old priest had mentioned. A row of small bulbs lit up along it, marking the files she was allowed to read.

The files were not placed very low, but luckily Vanna was tall. She did not need a ladder to take them down, which made her feel relieved.

Pushing a ladder back and forth in such a huge library would not have been an easy job.

She took a quiet breath, found the starting point of the files on the shelf, pulled out the numbered volume, and began to read quickly.

What she wanted to find was simple: the great fire eleven years ago, or rather, the fire that had been packaged as a factory leak accident.

In fact, this was not the first time she had investigated this matter. As an Inquisitor, she was always a little sensitive to every “unusual event”, including things that happened to herself. After she learned that only she still remembered the great fire from her childhood, she had secretly looked into some records from that year. But those short and shallow searches had not given her anything useful.

At the time, she had soon put the matter out of her mind.

After all, she had been only twelve when the accident happened. She had not yet been a believer of the Goddess, and she had not had any special mind. It was not impossible for a panicked child, who had also breathed in toxic smoke, to have some false memories. There was no need to get stuck on this. So after she read a few public files, she had let the matter go.

But now she had suddenly found that someone else in the city-state of Pland had gone through the same great fire she remembered.

The doubts and countless guesses she had once pushed aside rushed back at once. Her “professional alertness” as an Inquisitor roared in her mind.

Because of this professional alertness, she had refused Heidi’s suggestion to “turn back to the antique shop” at the time. Instead, she had calmly waited until today and come straight to this archive hall, which enjoyed the Goddess’s favor, to look into the original records that were not open to the public.

The reason was simple. There was a dangerous air around this matter. Wiping away the memory of a great fire sounded easy, but in fact it touched the minds and memories of tens of thousands of people. The event had also been tied to large numbers of cultists and their acts of destruction that year. If all this had truly been the work of some “hand behind the curtain”, then that hidden hand would never sit still while someone noticed the truth.

The scraps of memory left in her own mind, the scraps left in the mind of the girl named Nina F… these “remnants” were very likely the mistakes left by that hidden hand. The one behind the scenes might not yet have noticed these mistakes, but if he did… she herself was not afraid. But Nina F and her uncle, and the girl named Shirley, were all ordinary people.

So at the time, she had refused Heidi’s suggestion and had asked Heidi not to bring the matter up again. On one hand, she did not want to alarm the enemy and wanted to investigate in secret. On the other hand, she wished to avoid dragging innocent people into danger.

Before she had enough information, she absolutely could not show any interest in that antique shop beyond what was needed.

As she slowly flipped through the file in her hands, Vanna’s thoughts rose and fell.

For some reason, the moment she sensed a shadow, she also felt as if countless unseen eyes were peeping at her and following her. That awful feeling of being watched from the dark was like thorns in her back and made her a little restless.

She put down the file and picked up the one next to it.

At the same time, she thought about the things that had happened in the city-state recently.

Many of the the Suntists active in the city had already been arrested. It seemed that the firm actions of the city-state had scared those Heretics, or perhaps all the channels they used to slip in had truly been destroyed. In any case, the number of the Suntists in the city had dropped a lot, while the Heretic prisons under the great Cathedrals were now packed full.

The goal of those the Suntists in the city-state had long since been found out.

They were searching for the “Sun fragment” that had briefly appeared eleven years ago and might still be hidden somewhere.

The Sun fragment… the great fire eleven years ago…

And the “vision” that Heidi had glimpsed earlier in the City Museum.

Vanna’s hand stopped turning the pages. Clues that had not caught her attention before suddenly linked together in her mind. As she once again examined the fire in her memory, those clues stood out even more.

The young Inquisitor took a light breath. She was now sure that these events were linked and that the great fire eleven years ago had truly happened. At the same time, her eyes drifted over some words in the file:

“…On X month, X day, in the XX block, a serious Heretic worship event occurred. Three households of residents built altars in their homes and offered blood and prayers to some unknown abomination that had never appeared in any record. This caused panic and nightmares among a large number of nearby residents. Later, the sacrificial ritual was reported and destroyed, but the clues left on site could not be linked to any known Eldritch God or Evil Spirit…

“By theory, such a ritual should not have had any effect. It should have been only the blind trial of ignorant fools, driven by their private desires. But the mass panic and nightmares among local residents did happen. Later investigation proved that the area had indeed been affected by supernatural power at that time…”

Chapter 155:

Vanna’s gaze stayed on this record for a few seconds. The sharp sense of an Inquisitor made her smell something worth notice in these short lines.

Heretic sacrificial behavior that had suddenly appeared among ordinary residents. A sacrificial target pointing to an invalid existence. A ritual that completely failed to meet any proper rules, yet in the end still drew the attention of supernatural power. A small area of mental derangement. No follow-up investigation…

Vanna suddenly thought of something. She put down the file in her hand and quickly opened a record she had looked at just now.

It had also happened in 1889, a little earlier. In a street-side shop in the Lower City, a sudden stabbing had occurred. At first, it had been a case for the security bureau and should not have appeared in the Church’s archive at all. But the later investigation showed that the attacker was a “customer” who had suddenly suffered a mental break inside the shop. The suspect insisted that he had seen blasphemous shadows on the shop window and had taken up a knife to “fight back” in order to escape the hunt of “unseen things”.

In the later investigation, the Church had found signs of Heretic worship in the shop’s basement. However, the ritual sigils at the scene were so messy that they could not point to any valid entity. Through questioning, they learned that the shop’s master, who had been doing secret ritual worship, did not understand any true occult rites at all. His clumsy sacrificial attempts had been done under “unknown guidance”.

Again, it was a messy sacrificial ritual that should not have worked in theory. Again, it had caused mental derangement in a small area. And again, there had been no further conclusion to the case.

Vanna frowned a little. These two cases seemed to have no link with the factory leak eleven years ago, or with the great fire that had been erased. The times did not match at all, and they had not been her focus today. But to see two Heretic worship cases with such clear similarity appear so close together in the records still touched her nerves as an Inquisitor.

After a moment, she put down the two files and went on searching the shelves for later records. This time, she kept some of her attention ready and actively looked for any cases that might be tied to Heretic worship.

She did not know how long had passed before she suddenly stopped.

The third record was also from a time before the “factory leak” accident. It had happened on the edge of the Upper City. A maid who worked in a rich household had suddenly gone mad. She had badly injured three servants and the male master of the house, then locked herself in a storeroom. When the Church Guardians and constables arrived and broke down the door, the maid had already taken her own life.

In the storeroom, they had found symbols of a sacrificial rite that the dead woman had carved with a dagger before she died. In her room, they had found traces of Heretic sacrifices. Once again, they pointed to another “invalid” entity, and the steps of the rite did not match any known rules. Only this time, the useless sacrificial activity had not driven others mad. It had only driven the sacrificer herself insane.

It was already the third one…

When she had seen the first two cases, Vanna had only paid a little extra attention to them. But after seeing this third record, her face had turned completely serious.

In her mind, she quickly lined up the information from these records and began to analyze them by their time and place.

The events were very scattered. In time, they were separate. In place, they were in different areas. In theory, the people involved had no contact with each other.

None of them had much to do with the factory that had leaked eleven years ago. The later investigations had also found no trace of the Suntists in them.

Vanna calmed herself and kept searching through the later files. Not long after, she found the record of the factory leak.

It had been a major event with a very wide impact. The number of Heretics caught afterward had been the highest in twenty or thirty years. So the whole case had been given a file of its own. The thick folder was quite heavy and held many pictures and interrogation reports.

But it did not take Vanna long to read through all of it.

She had already read the same material many times in other places. In the past few years, she had looked up the records of this old case more than once.

It seemed that even here, in the archive deep inside the Cathedral, there was no more information about the factory leak eleven years ago.

Vanna put the factory file back as well and kept looking through the later records for a while. Then she suddenly noticed something:

After the “factory leak” accident, no more records of Heretic worship like the three earlier cases appeared.

The factory leak had happened in the middle of the year. There had still been a full half year afterward.

This gave Vanna a certain feeling. It was as if all those Heretic worship events that “should not have worked, yet still worked” had all crowded into the time before the factory leak. After the factory accident, it was as if they had hit a node. All Heretic worship had ended suddenly after that…

Of course, common sense could explain this too. After the factory leak, the Church and the authority had arrested thousands of cultists. That large-scale sweep had cleared the Heretic forces in the city-state. So it was quite normal that no more Heretic worship events had happened in the next half year.

But for some reason, she still felt that the logic behind these seemingly unrelated events should not be so simple.

She stopped beside the tall shelf. After thinking quietly for a long time, she went back to where she had started and pulled out the first file about Heretic worship again. She read as she thought.

These cases were far too scattered and had been buried in a heap of messy disaster records. If she had not stubbornly decided to go through everything today, and had not planted the thought of “something is wrong here” in her heart ahead of time, she might not have noticed anything strange even now. But the strange was still the strange. Once she sensed it, that feeling of wrongness grew in her like a seed taking root and sprouting, making it hard for her to ignore the warning of her instincts.

While Vanna was carefully reading the records, the sound of slow, unhurried footsteps suddenly came from nearby. With it came a faint smell of machine oil mixed with incense.

Vanna looked up and saw the old priest who managed the archive walking toward her.

He limped as he walked. Clearly, it was not only his right hand. His legs had also been hurt.

“There are not many people in the archive at this hour, so I came over to take a look,” the old priest said with a smile: “Have you found the information you wanted?”

Vanna let out a slow breath and put the file back in its place: “I found some information, but I did not find the answer I wanted.”

“An answer?” The old priest sounded a bit curious. “What kind of answer are you looking for?”

“…How long have you been here?” Vanna did not answer him directly. Instead, she suddenly asked a question that did not seem related.

“Ah, that has been a very long time. Let me think… almost twenty years now,” the old priest said with a smile. “Ever since a homemade bomb from those Heretic madmen blew off one of my hands and one of my legs, I have stayed here.”

Vanna thought for a moment, then asked with some curiosity: “Is it always this quiet here? Do other people come to read these files like I do?”

“Most of the time, it is very quiet,” the old priest said with a smile. “People do come to look up files, but not many. Books are the memory people have of the world, and this archive is the deepest part of that memory. What is stored here are old cases that have already been dealt with, or sealed files that have been judged unfit for the public. Once they are sealed, they are buried in the depths of time together with the past.

“Countless new things happen in the city-state every day. Everyone is busy walking toward tomorrow. They do not have much time to come back and turn these sealed files. And besides…”

The old priest paused for a moment. He lifted his head and quietly looked up at the shelves of books that almost reached the dome. After a long time, he spoke softly.

“And besides… sometimes the files that are sealed away are not just records of the past. Sometimes, pieces of history itself are sealed in those pages. The past, present, and future of our world all rest on an unsteady base. If you turn too many things in this archive, it is not very good for your body or your mind.”

“…That sounds a bit like the Flamebearers’ warnings.”

“Yes. The Flamebearers like to warn about things like this. They guard history. They always fear that something will spread from ancient times and corrupt the foundation of our world. They are so sensitive about it that some people even think those Enders, who shout about doomsday corruption, are Flamebearers who have fallen…”

The old priest spoke and then shook his head with a smile: “When I was young, I was close with a few friends from the Flamebearer sect, so of course I heard a lot of their theories. Their teachings are different from those of the Storm Goddess, but at least we all serve the True Gods. Some of their ideas are still worth listening to.”

For some reason, as she listened to the old man speak, Vanna’s mind slowly calmed down. She felt a bit of respect for this senior who had given most of his life to the Church, and she did not mind talking a little more with him. So she asked casually: “Do you still keep in touch with those friends?”

“No, I do not,” the old man said, shaking his head slowly. “One morning, I suddenly realized that I had never known their names. So most likely, they have already died for their faith…”

Chapter 156: The Missing Year

The old man's tone was very calm, as if he was quietly telling a story and had only happened to appear in that story for a short while.

"Sorry, once you get old you tend to talk too much," the old priest smiled and looked at Vanna as he said: "Do you have any friends from other churches?"

"…I have a friend. She is a clergy member at the Truth Academy," Vanna thought for a moment. "But she doesn't really talk to me about the teachings of the God of Wisdom Rahm."

"Ah, a believer of the God of Wisdom… That's normal. Their doctrines usually need at least a university education to understand, and sometimes you even have to pass an advanced mathematics exam," the old priest nodded as if it were only natural. "By comparison, the followers of the God of Death are much easier to deal with—after all, we are all going to die."

At this, the old man paused. He glanced with some curiosity at the neatly arranged case files behind Vanna and asked: "Inquisitor, can you tell me what you are looking for?"

Vanna suddenly hesitated.

She did not know whether she should tell this old priest about that secret. The hidden fire might point to a very dangerous shadow. She could not be sure whether that "shadow" was using some method to watch the city-state, nor could she be sure that the old man in front of her could really help. If she spoke too frankly, she might startle the snake in the grass.

But after a brief hesitation, she still decided to reveal a little.

This was the deepest part of the Deep Sea Cathedral, the sanctuary favored by the Storm Goddess. The old priest who guarded the archive hall was a resolute warrior. He stayed here to provide help to visitors in times like this.

“I am looking for a file—though calling it a file isn’t very accurate, because it might never have existed in the first place,” Vanna began slowly, choosing her words with care. “Strictly speaking, it is a lead. Something that happened in June of 1889. It may point to a great fire, but all related records have been erased.”

“A great fire in 1889?” The old priest thought for a moment. “I don’t remember any great fire…”

He suddenly stopped and looked at Vanna with a thoughtful expression.

“So the erased records also include our memories, don’t they?”

“At least they include people’s memories,” Vanna nodded lightly. “I don’t have enough evidence. Aside from my own ‘awareness’, I have no way to prove that fire ever happened. I don’t know what power is manipulating this either. I’m… only suspicious.”

She suddenly felt a little embarrassed. As an Inquisitor, she was used to doubting and investigating, but this situation was completely different from anything before. She did not even know who she was doubting, or whether that target was human or ghost. She had started an investigation based only on her own thoughts, which did not match her usual calm and steady way of doing things at all.

Yet the old priest only nodded calmly: “Your piety and your character are evidence enough, Inquisitor.”

As soon as he finished speaking, the old priest strode to a pillar between the nearby shelves and tapped several raised bumps on it with his mechanical prosthetic hand. In the next second, a deep rumble came from under the floor, followed by the creaking and clanking of gears and linkages starting to move.

The archive's main door closed. Some of the shelves inside began to move slowly. Certain shelves slid closer together and locked into place, and in the open space that appeared, pillar after pillar rose from the floor, each one covered in intricate runes.

As the pillars rose, a faint sound of waves echoed gently in Vanna's mind.

"…There's no need to make such a big scene," Vanna felt a bit at a loss because of the old priest's actions. "This is only a preliminary investigation…"

"Past experience has taught me there is no such thing as 'preliminary' when you investigate a great threat," the old priest walked slowly back toward Vanna. He raised his brass mechanical hand and said: "And I think anything that can interfere with cognition on a large scale, even erase specific historical events, counts as a 'great threat'."

"…But sealing off the archive hall so suddenly might attract a lot of attention."

"It won't. The archive is randomly sealed several times every month so that the holy devices and shelves can 'stretch their legs' a little," the old priest laughed, showing a row of uneven teeth. "'Don't let ancient scrolls stay quiet for too long'—that's the rule."

"Then I have no more questions."

"You just went through many records. Judging from your expression, you must have found something, right?" the old priest nodded slightly. "I can help."

“I found some records of ‘heretical worship’—they are not directly related to what I’m investigating, and they are all rather scattered, but I feel something is wrong,” Vanna answered frankly. “Those heretical worship cases had common traits. They were concentrated in the first half of 1889, and they all stopped abruptly after the factory leak incident in the Sixth District…”

The old priest listened carefully to Vanna’s description, then, under her direction, found the corresponding case files.

“These are them,” Vanna pointed at the documents that had been pulled out. “Sacrificial rites that should have been ineffective, yet they caused real spiritual damage. Each case was small in scale, but every one of them was true heretical worship. All the closing reports look perfectly normal. The ones who should be arrested were arrested, and those who should be sentenced were sentenced. But I think every one of these cases… was not really investigated thoroughly.”

“For cases on this scale, catching and sentencing the offenders already counts as a complete investigation. But you are right. When several similar incidents stack together… things change,” the old priest flipped through the records and frowned. “All the people who carried out the sacrificial rites were ‘mysteriously enticed’, yet the source of that enticement could not be found…”

He muttered to himself, then suddenly looked up.

“Inquisitor, you only checked the files from 1889, correct?”

“Yes,” Vanna nodded, and then she immediately realized something. “You mean…”

“The incident you care about did indeed happen in 1889, but have you considered that these strange heretical worship cases might not have started in 1889?” the old priest spoke quickly, then looked toward several other rows of shelves. “The earlier records are here. The lower three rows from the bottom are all available. You can read them.”

Vanna went toward those shelves at once and began to check the records together with the old priest.

After only a short time, they almost simultaneously found similar heretical worship cases in the files they were reading.

There were entries from 1888, 1887, and even back to 1886.

“There’s another record here… a sacrificial incident that happened in the Harbor District. And here, this one was only two months after the last one!”

Vanna flipped through the ledger in her hands as fast as she could, feeling her heart pounding. She looked up to tell the old priest what she had found, but suddenly noticed that the old priest was standing frozen in front of a shelf, staring at one spot without moving.

“Did you find something?” Vanna frowned at once, a little nervous.

“There are no records for 1885,” the old priest murmured softly, almost like talking to himself. “They should be here, on this row, right after 1884… But now, it jumps from 1884 straight to 1886…”

…

“Let’s stop here,” at the edge of the Sixth District, Duncan looked back toward the way he and Shirley had come and let out a small breath. “We won’t get anything more by investigating around here.”

They had spent a long time in that little church, but with the two of them together still not matching a single dog’s level in occult studies, they clearly were not enough to solve the strange Space-Time Lock in the underground sanctum.

Before they left, the underground sanctum had already returned to its original state. The nun who was caught somewhere between ashes and the living still prayed devoutly in the main hall of the church and barely reacted when Duncan and Shirley departed.

The exterior of the church was still dilapidated. The area around the building was still empty and deserted.

But Shirley no longer cared much about what secrets might be hidden inside the church.

“I… can I really go home?” she asked.

She looked at Duncan with obvious tension, and in her uneasy voice there was also a faint, hard-to-name hesitation.

“Of course you can. I have never restricted your freedom to leave,” Duncan smiled and ruffled her hair. Although Shirley was about the same age as Nina, her body was so small and thin that Duncan could not help treating her as an even younger child. “Today’s investigation is over. You can go home.”

Shirley instinctively turned her head to glance in the direction of her home. She wanted to lift her foot, but suddenly hesitated again: “Then… will we keep investigating after this?”

“Of course. This matter is far from over,” Duncan raised an eyebrow. “What is it? Are you reluctant to go?”

“Ah, n-no, no!” Shirley waved her hands at once. “I just… just mean, next time we investigate…”

“I’ll find a way to contact you, and you can come find me on your own as well,” Duncan said with another smile as he rubbed Shirley’s head. “And not just for investigations. If you run into any other trouble, you can come straight to me for help.”

Shirley blinked. She felt something was a little strange, but in the end she still nodded lightly. Before she turned to leave, she could not hold back her curiosity: “Then… what are you going to do next?”

“Me?” Duncan paused, thought for a moment, and said: “I’m going to buy a bicycle this afternoon.”

Shirley stared at him, dumbfounded: “…Huh?”

“Buy a bicycle,” Duncan repeated in all seriousness. “I promised Nina. It’s been several days already. It’s about time I kept that promise. Why, is there something wrong with that?”

Shirley opened and closed her mouth for a long time before she finally forced out a sentence: “A-Dog said you ought to at least do something that a Subspace invader is supposed to do…”

Before she even finished, a shadow suddenly leaped out of the air beside them. Dog’s hoarse voice rang out hurriedly from within the darkness: “I never said that!!”

In the next second, the shadow vanished as if it had never been there—obviously Dog was afraid someone might see him if he stayed out too long.

Duncan: “…”

He held back for a long time before he finally managed a helpless smile: “All right, then. The Subspace invader is going to buy his niece a bicycle now—we part ways here.”

Chapter 157: The Captain’s Big Shopping Trip

Duncan had meant what he said—after he said goodbye to Shirley, he really did go to the shops near the Crossroad District to buy a bicycle for Nina.

At the same time, he planned to finally do something he had long intended to do but had been delaying again and again: open a bank account for himself.

Inside the Pland City-State Bank, Duncan sat waiting while the clerk at the front counter prepared the last form for him. Waiting was dull, so he let his attention wander as he observed his surroundings.

Perhaps because it was not a rest day, and also because few citizens from the Lower City needed to handle banking business, the hall felt rather empty. The hall itself was not very large, and of the five service windows, three were idle. Staff in black uniforms chatted idly behind the unused windows. Bright electric lamps shone on the glass of the counters, casting a lazy sheen.

Duncan’s gaze moved upward. He saw long cast-iron pipes rising from behind those counters. The pipes went straight up like slender pillars into the ceiling, then ran neatly in parallel and extended somewhere behind the hall. A deep, rhythmic clicking came from under the floor, as if some mechanical system was running down below.

The clerk who was preparing his forms finally confirmed the last item. She handed the papers to Duncan and said in a routine tone: “Please check that everything is correct, then sign at the bottom. Your account number and seal pattern are on there. The handling fee for a bearer account is 6 sola and 5 peso."

Duncan took the form and looked over the contents with interest. His mind filled at once with guesses about the city-states' civilization and their economic system, but he was no expert in such things. After letting his thoughts wander for a short while, he focused on the end of the form. He memorized the short string of numbers there, signed his name, and handed the form and the fee back across the counter.

The clerk took the form, glanced at it casually, then placed it on a punch-card machine. With a crisp series of clicks, the punch-card machine punched a dense array of holes into the blank margin along the edge. Then she rolled up the form, stuffed it into a metal cylinder, and fed it into one of the pipes beside the counter.

There was a metallic clank. The pipe sealed itself. The hiss of steam pressure and the sound of something speeding along inside the pipe reached Duncan's ears. His eyes followed the sound upward and saw one of the curved pipes near the ceiling tremble slightly—the document had been sent somewhere far away.

"Please wait a bit," the clerk behind the counter said casually. "If the pipes are working properly today and the machine at the other end happens to be in good condition too, you'll get your receipt within half an hour. But if that fault light over there comes on, you'll have to come back tomorrow."

It was a peculiar process.

To Duncan, the efficiency seemed nothing special. But to this world, this was already the advanced achievement of city-state civilization in the Deep Sea era.

He watched everything with a mix of curiosity and emotion, and at the same time he heard the clerks chatting.

A young man at the next window was sighing: “I heard the Truth Academy is talking with the main branch. They want to install some kind of new machine that can boost the main branch’s processing efficiency by several times…”

“That’s called a large Sorting Engine. The city-state bank in Morka has been using them for a long time. There are some in Pland too. The tax office and the mathematics institute each have a few smaller ones. The Great Cathedral has one as well. I heard it’s used to manage their archives,” the clerk sitting opposite Duncan joined in without thinking. “If you ask me, the main branch is only thinking about this now. They’re slow enough as it is.”

“That has nothing to do with us anyway,” another bored clerk joined the conversation. “Those things are expensive and heavy. When you count the steam core that drives them and the supporting punch-card machines and Analytical Engines, a single Sorting Engine can fill this entire hall…”

“I heard the Truth Academy is gathering people to research the next generation of Sorting Engines too. Supposedly they’ll be half the size of the current big ones, with performance almost the same, and they run on electricity instead of steam…”

“Electricity? No steam core? What if the machine gets possessed while it’s running? Those things have to keep crunching huge amounts of data. Without Divine Steam to protect it, malevolent spirits would be drawn to the bearings and gear trains way too easily, don’t you think?”

“How would I know… Maybe they’ll have a priest stand next to it. The machine computes, and the priest burns incense and holds mass for it at the same time…”

“…That doesn’t sound like it saves much trouble. It just adds another member of the clergy to the setup…”

“Hey, how much space does a priest take, and how much space does half a Sorting Engine take? Have you seen real estate prices in the city center?”

It seemed that no matter the world, people’s idle chatter at work drifted in the same wild directions. The clerks’ talk soon shifted from Sorting Engines to housing prices in the city, but from Duncan’s point of view, everything they chatted about was fresh and fascinating. He listened with such interest that he even forgot the boredom of waiting.

The idle talk did not last long. With a loud clank from one of the nearby pipes, their discussion about “which is more expensive, priests or housing” finally came to an end.

The clerk opposite Duncan opened the brass tube next to the counter and took out a small metal cylinder from inside. This one was clearly a different model from the one sent out earlier. It was heavier, and the cap was sealed with a complicated locking mechanism. The clerk spent a while working at it with a special tool before the lid finally came off, revealing the item inside.

It was a rectangular metal plate, only about half the size of a palm. Letters and symbols had been stamped into it, and along its edges there were rows of randomly arranged holes of different sizes. The short string of numbers Duncan had just memorized was stamped at one end.

“This is your bank seal card,” the clerk said as she handed the metal plate to Duncan. “It can be used at any bank in the city-state of Pland, and at the Boundless Sea Chamber of Commerce banks in other city-states as well. But deposits and withdrawals in other city-states will be delayed three to seven days. That’s the time needed for transoceanic telegraphs or Spirit Realm communications.”

“Thank you.” Duncan took the metal plate and examined this device that seemed to represent the city-state’s level of technology. His eyes studied the fine little holes, and on the counter he noticed the machine that read these metal plates.

These devices, so different from anything on Earth and yet just as much a product of human thought, were the “footprints” left by city-state civilization on its march through the Deep Sea era.

“Do you have any other business today?” the voice from behind the counter asked.

“Ah… nothing else, thank you,” Duncan came back to himself. He smiled, stood up from the chair, and then, just as he was about to leave, he seemed to remember something. He stopped and asked casually: “By the way… can machines really get possessed?”

“Of course they can. Why is that strange?” the clerk replied at once, as if it were something she did not even need to think about. “In this world, everything except Subspace can be corrupted. Isn’t that common knowledge?”

Duncan paused for a moment. He had asked only out of idle curiosity, but for some reason her answer touched his thoughts. He felt a faint spark in the depths of his mind.

After a short silence, he nodded slowly: “…Right. In this world, everything except Subspace can be corrupted.”

Then he left the bank.

According to his plan, he still had a big shopping trip to complete today. Besides buying a bicycle for Nina, his shopping list held a pile of things that would probably scare Nina half to death if she saw it written out.

The money from selling that dagger to Old Mr. Morris, plus the bounty for reporting the cultists, was enough to support a family of three living comfortably in the Lower City for one or two years. Most of that money was still untouched. Duncan felt it was time to put it to use.

So during the next half day, Duncan practically swept through the markets and shops near the Crossroad District…

Around four in the afternoon, in the shadow of an alley near the Crossroad District, Duncan set down the last bundle with a clatter and let out a long breath.

He looked with satisfaction at the pile of goods stacked like a small hill in front of him.

Flour, vegetables, seeds, spices, fresh meat, preserved foods, dried mushrooms of all kinds, wine—and cheese.

Edible, normal cheese that was younger than he was.

There were also piles of pots and pans and all sorts of things that Duncan thought “might come in handy.”

Once he moved all this onto the ship, the living conditions on the Vanished would change dramatically.

At the very least, the kitchen could start producing proper human food on a regular basis.

Duncan nodded in satisfaction and called out casually: “AI!”

The flutter of wings came from above the nearby buildings, and AI landed neatly on his shoulder.

The next second, the pigeon glanced at the pile on the ground and squawked in horror: “Are you making fun of me?!”

Before it even finished its shout, the bird rolled sideways and let itself drop toward the ground. Duncan had not actually said what he wanted it to do yet, but the creature had clearly, and very cleverly, realized what was coming.

Duncan only chuckled, reached out, and caught the pigeon in midair as it fell: “It’s fine. If you can’t carry it all in one trip, you can always make a few more runs…”

Chapter 158: Rose Doll House

To be honest, the pile of stuff in the little alley was not actually that big. After all, Duncan was working alone. Even though he had bought a bicycle ahead of time to haul goods, there was still a limit to how much he could move at once. AI's reaction was actually very easy to understand—

The bird was bargaining. It wanted more fries.

From a certain point of view, this bird was just too easy to read.

"Do you know what this is?" Duncan grabbed the pigeon and held it in front of a basket of potatoes. "This is called a potato, also called a tuber."

AI blinked its little green pea eyes and stared at the basket for a long time. It actually reacted. It stretched its neck hard and cried: "Smells so good! So good!"

"As long as you know. Do your work properly. This whole basket is for you—once it's all fried into fries, it'll be enough to stuff you to death dozens of times over." Duncan chuckled, then casually tossed the pigeon away. "Send this stuff back to the Vanished—just put it straight on the deck. 'I' will meet you there."

AI flapped its wings in the air. Before it even landed, a mass of ghostly green fire wrapped around it. It turned into an Undead bird and circled the pile of goods twice. The "cargo" inside the flames started to fade rapidly. But then it suddenly stopped, landed on the pile, and tilted its head at Duncan: "Do I need to specify the next memory address?"

Duncan stared for a long moment before he realized the bird was asking what he wanted done next…

Then he could not help grumbling inside. This bird's vocabulary was way too huge and weird. It was like everything Earth humans had ever made up on the internet was stored in its head. After spending this much time together, Duncan could more or less guess what it meant from context, but most of the time his conversations with AI were brushing right up against the edge of his own knowledge.

Could it not try learning how to talk like a normal person?

But grumbling was grumbling. Duncan still nodded and answered AI: "Send these off first. I still need to go buy some more…"

This time AI was really scared. It shot straight up, and in the blink of an eye a big ball of fire swept away everything piled on the ground. As it vanished from Duncan's sight, it shouted loudly: "So terrifying! So terrifying!"

Duncan only shrugged at this, then turned and walked over to the bicycle he had just bought.

It was a very ordinary bicycle. It had a black frame, shiny silver rims and handlebars, a brand-new bell, and a sturdy, practical basket and rear rack. It had no special features. It was not beautiful, but not ugly either. Its biggest advantage was probably that the quality was pretty good.

At first, Duncan had wanted to pick out a pretty ladies' bicycle for Nina. But after going through all the shops in the Lower City, he gave up on that idea—because there simply were none.

In the Lower City, a bicycle was just a bicycle. It was a tool that helped with daily life, but even more a tool of production. All the bikes looked more or less the same. There were no fancy categories like men's models, ladies' models, mountain bikes, or road bikes. People of different sizes could just adjust the handlebars and seat to ride more easily. Other than that, the bicycle had no special function or “positioning.”

Most ordinary people in this world did not seem to have the spare energy to chase or customize a “more refined life.”

In these city-states of the “Deep Sea era,” a lot of things were still different from the “other world” that Duncan knew. Even if they looked similar on the surface, the details were always filled with this world’s own special traits. And it was exactly these almost-but-not-quite details that kept reminding Duncan that he was “living abroad.”

He swung himself onto the bike. This brand-new way to get around was light and easy to use. It carried him quickly out of the alley and toward the busier commercial streets not far away.

Nina would like this bicycle.

Leaving the Crossroad District and heading northwest, riding up toward higher streets, he truly entered the range of the Upper City. Normally, the citizens of Pland called this place “the line where real respectable life begins,” unlike the Crossroad District, which only counted as “a stage where the middle-class citizens dressed themselves up.”

Unlike what Duncan had first imagined, even though Pland had a clear administrative border between the Upper City and the Lower City, there was no physical wall between the two. To go from the Lower City to the Upper City, you just needed to pass through a few completely open junctions. These junctions did have constable booths set up, but they clearly did not stop citizens from moving back and forth.

Of course, that was only during the day. From what Duncan had heard, after nightfall, strict travel bans were enforced between the Upper City and the Lower City. Even if you had a night pass, you still needed extra paperwork to cross the checkpoints between the two districts.

Right now, it was daytime. The junctions were wide open.

Duncan rode straight into the Upper City. Ever since he had arrived in this city-state, this was his first time visiting this area.

He had to admit, the Upper City really was a completely different place from the Lower City.

You could see it in almost every aspect—cleaner and wider streets, taller and grander buildings, newer and more advanced city facilities, and gas street lamps and “nighttime Sanctuary Worlds” in numbers that clearly far surpassed the Lower City.

Duncan slowly stopped his bike in front of a little kiosk near a junction.

It was a nighttime Sanctuary World, meant to help citizens who, for one reason or another, failed to make it home in time after nightfall. A sign by the door listed a brief explanation:

“Provides shelter for the night. Inside there is a gas lamp, calming holy oil, and the Storm Canon. After entering, please lock the door and wait for rescue. The Night Watch Guard holds the key.”

Duncan had also seen similar facilities in the Lower City. But in a whole block there might be only one or two, and they looked old and worn. It was hard to tell if they still worked.

He pulled back his gaze, got back on his bike, and continued slowly down the street.

From time to time, his eyes swept over the shops lining the road.

The bright windows and carefully arranged, elegant displays were something the shops in the Lower City could not compare with. But Duncan was not focused on these unimportant details.

He still had a lot to buy. Stocking supplies for the Vanished was something that had been put off for too long. And…

Duncan stopped the bicycle and raised his head to look at a shop by the street. A small smile appeared on his face.

Some things simply could not be bought in the Lower City—only the "respectable people" of the Upper City were willing to spend so much money and energy on things not related to survival. For example, the place right in front of him.

He locked his bicycle, stepped forward, and pushed open the shop door. With the clear, pleasant sound of a bell, a plump old lady behind the counter put down her newspaper and looked up. A kind smile spread over her face as she stood and said: "Welcome to the Rose Doll House… Oh, a gentleman. Are you here to choose a companion for your lover or a junior in your family?"

"I'll just look around first." Duncan answered simply, then raised his head and curiously looked around this shop called the "Rose Doll House."

Everywhere he looked, there were dolls—delicate, elegant, mysterious, cute, playful… dolls of all kinds.

Back on the street, he had already seen the shop through the window. But only when he stepped inside did he realize the interior was even bigger than it seemed from outside. Almost every visible space was packed with doll-related things. Even the space under the stairs was filled with different storage boxes and stands, plus all sizes of accessories and blank "bodies" waiting to be assembled.

This was a shop that specialized in selling dolls and doll-related items. Its style was classical, and it had a quiet, mysterious atmosphere.

And in this big doll shop, there was only one kindly looking old madam watching the place. At the moment, Duncan was also the only customer.

An old-fashioned shop full of dolls. A smiling old lady. A single customer.

Duncan’s attention was drawn by the dazzling array of dolls, while the shop’s master watched this strange guest with a bit of curiosity.

It was not rare for men to visit doll shops. Respectable gentlemen in the Upper City often bought fine dolls as gifts for their partners or juniors, and some men themselves loved collecting dolls. What really made the old shopkeeper curious was not the customer’s gender, but his plain, simple clothes.

Duncan wore the same worn-out coat he usually wore. It did not look like the clothing of a rich man who lived in the Upper City—and dolls were not cheap collectibles.

But the old lady only glanced at him out of curiosity and soon looked away.

It was not polite to judge a customer by his clothes. A seasoned businesswoman should not judge guests by their appearance. Besides, everyone had the right to appreciate the goods.

After looking around for a while, Duncan finally pulled his gaze back and let out a quiet breath.

He had to admit, he was a bit overwhelmed.

The doll craft in this world was more advanced than he had imagined. All those strange “parts,” so many that he could not even name them all, had already gone beyond his understanding of what a doll was.

His understanding of a “doll” was a useless crew member who was timid, weak, had a bad neck, and not much of a brain.

Duncan looked at the chubby old madam and decided he should humbly ask a professional about the ways of dolls—especially about maintaining joints and putting in hair.

But before he could speak, he suddenly froze.

He stared blankly at the old lady in front of him. She quickly noticed, smiled, and pointed at her own ear: “Elves from the city-state of Pland are indeed rare.”

Duncan: “…”

He admitted, the Elves of Pland might really be rare. This was also the first time in his life he had ever seen an Elf.

But the bigger reason he was stunned was that he had never expected there to be a chubby, middle-aged Elf old madam in this world…

Chapter 159: Who Isn’t Bullying Who

After the Deep Sea era began, the sapient races that survived from the Old World and built up city-state civilizations were not just humans. Other than humans, there were also the @#?%, the Senkin, and the Elves—three other races that lived in this world and developed their own cultures.

This was written in Nina’s textbooks. Duncan had known it long ago. From very early on, he had been extremely interested in these “nonhuman races” mentioned in the books, especially the Elves. This race, always appearing in all kinds of fantasy stories and wrapped in a mysterious halo, actually existed in this world. That had once made his curiosity explode.

The pictures in Nina’s textbooks described how Elves looked. The illustration was the same as the Elves in his own imagination. They had long pointed ears, tall and slender bodies, beautiful faces so pretty it was hard to tell if they were male or female.

This made him build up a first impression of Elves in this world: a long-lived species with lifespans of a thousand years, generally very good-looking, elegant, and mysterious.

But in this shallow first impression, he had never pictured what long-lived Elves would look like when they grew old. He had not even thought this race would have visible changes in appearance after aging, just like humans.

Now he understood that his idea of “Elves” in this world had been far too shallow.

The shopkeeper of this “Rose Doll House” was an Elf—a plump, kindly smiling Elf old lady. Aside from the pointed ears and green eyes, and the faint trace of the beauty she had had in her youth, she did not look much different from any ordinary, neighborly old madam.

Staring at others was impolite.

Duncan reacted quickly. He pulled back his overly curious gaze and rubbed his chin a bit awkwardly: “This is the first time I’ve seen an Elf.”

He was not worried that his “ignorance” would expose anything. Elves truly were rare in the city-state of Pland.

Each race had its own city-states. Because travel was hard in the Deep Sea era, most commoners hardly ever left their homeland in their entire lives. Only brave deep-sea explorers and trade caravans traveled between city-states, and even they were only passing through. They almost never settled down in a city-state of another race. All the city-states were like this. More than ninety-nine percent of the residents were of the “main race.”

A person who lived in their own city and rarely went out might never see the “nonhuman folk” living on the other side of the city in their whole life.

“That’s very normal,” the Elf old madam said with a laugh. “All the Elves in this city put together probably don’t even reach a hundred. And that count includes the dozen shut-ins at the mathematics institute who have been holed up there for two hundred years and never go out. Is there something I can help you with?”

Hearing her reminder, Duncan remembered what he had come for. He glanced back at all the dolls filling the windows, counters, and stairway space, and said while thinking: “I want to buy some things for a doll. And if possible, I'd also like to ask some questions about dolls… but as soon as I came in, I got overwhelmed."

"Oh, looks like you're a 'beginner.'" The old lady nodded. "Is it a female doll? Is it for your own collection, or…?"

"Female, my own 'collection,'" Duncan answered without thinking. Right after he said it, he felt something was off and the corner of his mouth twitched. "This hobby isn't strange, is it?"

It had been fine until he asked that. Asking made it sound even stranger…

"Of course it's not strange. Collecting and caring for dolls is a tasteful interest." The old lady did not seem surprised at all. Maybe that was the calm that came from running a shop that had been around for several hundred years. "Are you planning to buy clothes for your doll, or accessories?"

Duncan thought for a moment: "Let's start with a wig…"

"This way." The old lady led Duncan to a corner of the shop, then asked: "What size is the doll? One-quarter? Or one-third?"

Duncan said: "…The same size as a real person."

The old lady's steps paused without her meaning to. She turned back: "That… is rare. A doll the same size as a person? It must be very valuable."

"…I'm not really sure how much she is 'worth.'" Duncan tried to hold back his own discomfort and kept a straight face. "Someone gave her to me…"

"Then it seems you have a very generous friend." The old lady smiled. As she spoke, she opened a wooden box near the ring-shaped counter and laid its contents out on the counter beside it. "Large dolls are rare, and matching parts are even rarer. Everything we have is here—there are wigs and hair accessories."

Duncan coughed twice and muttered as he leaned closer: “I don’t really know if he’s generous or not. He’s a captain… it’s a complicated story.”

His eyes fell on the things the old lady had taken out.

They were finely made and well cared for. It was clear the maker had put a lot of effort into them.

He chose carefully, trying to imagine what Alice would look like wearing these things. But halfway through the picture in his mind, he could not continue.

The thought that the elegant, beautiful, and mysterious cursed doll would one day go bald and have to live relying on a wig was such a huge mismatch that even he himself could hardly accept it.

And he was the one who came up with the idea.

But soon Duncan hardened his heart. Since he had already started bullying her, he might as well carry it all the way. With that mindset, he picked one that looked pleasing to the eye…

A lavish golden wig, with matching silver hair ornaments.

Yes, silver hair ornaments. As a kind of luxury item only the upper classes had access to, doll accessories were not cheap at all.

Looking at the wig set in front of him, Duncan could not help imagining how Alice would react when she received it. That silly girl might clutch her head and cry, or she might turn and run, just like anyone who had to face their fate when it came to hair loss. It would take a bit of mental adjustment. But no matter how Alice reacted then, he himself was already starting to feel happy now.

While picking things out, he casually said: “By the way, can I ask about some ways to maintain and care for dolls?”

“Of course.” The old lady smiled kindly. “Dolls need careful attention.”

“It’s like this… What should I do if a doll’s joints keep coming loose?” Duncan spoke while acting it out with his hands. “Mainly the part where the neck connects to the head. It’s a ball joint, and for some reason it got loose. Her head keeps falling off.”

“Damage and deformation of the ball and the socket will both cause a joint to loosen. If it’s not because of poor care later or rough handling, then the design or material probably wasn’t good from the start,” the old lady answered at once. “If it’s already at the point where the head often falls off, normal repair won’t help much. You could think about replacing the whole joint.”

She thought for a moment, then added: “But replacing the joints on a large doll is not easy. You might not be able to do it yourself. You can bring the doll here. I can help replace the joint—we only charge for the parts.”

After listening, Duncan thought it over and decided this did not sound very reliable.

Alice’s “guillotine” ability was actually the smaller problem. The main issue was that Anomaly 099 was not an ordinary doll! Could her joints even be replaced?

If he told her they had to go into the city and operate on her, take her whole neck apart and put in a new one, she would probably turn and run on the spot…

So Duncan brushed past that topic and moved on to asking about techniques for putting new hair into dolls…

The old shopkeeper patiently explained many things. After she finished, she added: “…From what you said, your doll is the kind that came with its own hair. For this kind of doll, if you try to re-root or add hair later, unless the original maker does it in person, it is very hard to reach a perfect result. And since you also said her head joint already has problems, I suggest you have a new head sculpt made for her directly…"

Duncan: "…"

The old shopkeeper was quite enthusiastic: "You don't really want to, judging by your reaction? Don't worry. Our craftsmanship here has always been top notch. In several hundred years, we have never disappointed a customer. Not a single old client has ever complained…"

Duncan thought that all those "old clients" of hers probably did not even have bones left now, so of course none of them could come back to complain. But he definitely could not say that out loud. He could only give an awkward smile and grab at the first excuse he could find: "That's not it. It's just that… if the head is replaced, then she wouldn't be her anymore, right?"

He had only said it casually, but he did not expect the old lady's eyes to light up at once. Even her smile became more sincere than before: "Ah, that way of thinking is not simple at all. Many people only see dolls as objects. Even when they love them, very few think the way you do."

Duncan suddenly felt a bit embarrassed: "Ahem, now that you say that, I feel a little shy…"

"I'm telling the truth." The old shopkeeper sighed. "Dolls need to be cared for with your heart. From the moment they are given human form, they should no longer be treated as dead things. There is a saying among doll makers—dolls that are treated with care have their own souls. You should even believe that they have their own joy, anger, sorrow, and happiness."

At once, the image of Alice's harmless "hehe" smile popped up in Duncan's mind. He nodded again and again: "You're right. You're right."

Chapter 160: The Most Outstanding Dollmaster

On the Vanished, bright sunlight shone on the freshly scrubbed upper deck. A spiral of green flame was slowly fading in the air above the planks. Alice stood by the open space, staring wide-eyed at the huge pile of things that had appeared on the deck.

“Th-this… what is all this?!”

Miss Doll cried out in shock. Before her voice even faded, Duncan’s voice came from not far away: “You’re stuttering like your head just fell off – have you never seen pots, pans, fruit, and vegetables?”

Alice turned her head a little stiffly. She glanced at Duncan, then at the big pile of supplies that had suddenly appeared on the deck. She thought hard for a moment, then planted her hands on her hips with perfect confidence. “Never!”

Duncan: “…?”

“I haven’t,” Alice went on, still very sure of herself. “I’ve stayed in that box all these years. Where would I have seen these things?”

Duncan froze for a second, then slapped his forehead. “…I forgot. All right, you’re right. In some ways, you’re even more illiterate than Shirley.”

Alice had been about to step forward and study what all the things that AI had just teleported over were for. When she heard Duncan’s words, she turned back with suspicion. “Shirley? Who is that?”

“Someone I met in the city-state. Maybe one day in the future you’ll have a chance to meet her,” Duncan said after thinking for a moment. “I feel the two of you are quite fated.”

“Oh.” Alice made a sound and soon tossed the matter to the back of her mind. She walked over to the big pile of supplies on the deck and circled around it again and again.

“So this is flour… This is meat? It really isn’t the same as the dried meat on the ship… These are vegetable leaves? They feel so fragile, and cold… This round thing is – ah, it broke…”

“Stop messing with the eggs!” Duncan saw that this clueless Doll was about to cause more trouble again. He hurried over and slapped away her hands that were poking at everything. “I’m using all this to improve life on the ship.”

“Hehe…” Alice let out her trademark laugh and pulled back her hands, a little embarrassed. “I’m just curious – I’ve only ever heard of most of these things.”

Duncan gave the Doll a helpless look, but he also understood her somewhat.

Alice’s head (if she really had that organ in her skull) held a lot of “innate knowledge”. She knew how to talk with people and knew that many things existed in the world. She had even formed her first impression of the world by using the Listening rite to listen to the sounds outside the box. But she had always been sealed away. Strictly speaking, she had only truly come into contact with this world not long ago. And the first thing she encountered was the Vanished, a stage absolutely unfit to be a beginner’s village.

She knew far too little about the Mortal Realm.

For a while before this, the only things she could touch were the things on the Vanished. The ship's limited space and objects were still easy enough for her to adapt to. But now, Duncan had dumped in front of this Doll a whole heap of new things from the Human city-state.

Even a leaf of greens or a bag of flour was an unbelievable object to Alice.

"Human city-states really are incredible places…" Miss Doll looked at the pile of things on the deck and at the colorful packages. She spoke with heartfelt wonder. "They must be much, much bigger than the ship, right?"

"…Very big, but still much smaller than the Boundless Sea." Duncan answered casually. He let his gaze rest on Alice's eyes, which were full of surprise and expectation, and once again remembered what he had promised her.

He had said that he would take Alice to see the city-state.

"I'll deal with the trouble over there as soon as I can, and I'll figure out the secret about you," he said very seriously to the Doll in front of him. "For now, you just have to wait patiently."

Alice's face instantly bloomed into a bright smile. "All right."

She still looked as carefree as ever.

Yet just looking at this carefree Doll slowly eased the anxiety Duncan had built up in Pland. He let out a small breath and pointed at the things on the deck. "Help me carry them all to the galley – and that pile of odds and ends next to them goes to the captain's cabin."

"Oh, okay!" Alice agreed at once. As she stepped forward to help, she asked, "Are we going to use these to make tonight's dinner?"

Duncan looked back at her, doubtful. "We can… but do you know how?"

“Of course not!” Alice said as if this was perfectly natural. “But I can ask Mr. Goathead for advice. He said his cooking is amazing and he has mastered more than ninety percent of the cooking secrets in the world…”

“He dares say that and you actually believe him!” Duncan’s eyes widened at once. “Don’t you dare ruin the ingredients I worked so hard to get. I’ll make dinner. If you really want to seriously learn how to cook food people can eat, just watch how I do it. Don’t learn from that Goathead – he doesn’t even have a digestive tract.”

“Oh…” Alice nodded, then glanced at AI, who was pacing on the deck nearby. Her eyes turned. “Is AI going ‘over there’ again later?”

“Of course. There are more things for it to deliver later.”

“You’re still buying things?” Alice asked curiously. “What else are you going to buy?”

Duncan turned his head and let his gaze rest on Miss Doll’s eyes. After a moment, a faint smile appeared on his face.

“I’m buying things for you.”

Alice: “…?”

…

In the city-state of Pland, inside the Rose Doll House.

Duncan felt that this kindly old Elf madam had probably misunderstood him, but he had no intention of explaining.

Most of all, he had no way to explain. How was he supposed to tell her that there really was a Doll in his home who had a soul and her own joys and sorrows, and that this Doll had lately been worried about her hair getting thinner and thinner? If he said that, the old madam would probably go report him to the Cathedral even in the best case…

But in the eyes of the Rose Doll House's shopkeeper, Duncan had already become a true kindred spirit who genuinely loved Dolls and was willing to pour a lot of effort into them. In Pland's upper society, many people bought Dolls, and quite a few were truly keen collectors. But very few people showed such heartfelt concern for a Doll as this Mr. did today. It gave her the feeling that when he spoke of his "Doll", he was not talking about an "object" at all, but about a living person, even a "friend" this Mr. cared very much about.

Even many Dollmasters did not have such an attitude.

The two of them talked very happily. Duncan finally heard many things about Dolls from the mouth of a professional, though he did not know how much of this knowledge could actually be used on Alice. The gallery's shopkeeper clearly had not met such a like-minded customer in a long time. After a good talk, the old madam could not help but smile and sigh.

"I've lived in this city for three or four hundred years. I've outlasted seventeen governors, and the Humans I've met are beyond counting – yet almost none of them truly understand 'Dolls'… Ah, you may not like hearing this, but in my eyes, Humans really are a species much colder than Elves."

"I don't know much about Elven society," Duncan said at once when he heard this, seizing the chance to guide her into talking more about Elves. "But I've heard that in the Elven city-state of Lightwind Harbor, the finest craftsmen in the world gather there. The Elves' unique crafts are famous all over the world…"

"Elves are indeed good at delicate crafts. We are a race naturally sensitive to both mathematics and art – so most of the famous Dollmasters in this world are Elves as well," the old woman said frankly, her tone filled with a natural pride. But she quickly changed the topic. "But when it comes to the Dollmaster trade, many colleagues from other races hold a prejudice against Elves… People often say that Elves don't really have such a great talent for craft. The reason we can produce so many Dollmasters is only because our lives are long enough, and we grind the skill out bit by bit…"

Duncan suddenly did not know how to pick up this topic. "Well… all right, colleagues are enemies. Seems it's the same everywhere. What do you think of those comments?"

The old woman laughed. "Me? I think they're right!"

Duncan: "…?"

"I think they're right," the old woman repeated, her face full of a cheerful smile. "Every Undead Festival, I go to the graves of a few old colleagues to say hello and tell them, 'You were right' – if they have the ability, they can get up and hit me!"

Duncan: "…"

Were all the Elves in this world like this? Why did he feel that something about this style was off?!

"Ah… just joking," the old woman finally shook her head, probably having noticed the look on Duncan's face. "There aren't really so many enemies. We all just act as each other's companions for a short stretch of time. And if we really talk about this Dollmaster trade… I've always felt that the most outstanding Dollmaster in this world is not any 'Master' among the Elves, but a Human."

"A Human?" Duncan asked casually.

"Yes. ordinary persons nowadays probably don't know this name anymore…" The old woman spoke slowly, with a hint of feeling. "Her name is Lucretia Abnomar. She is the daughter of that famous 'Captain Duncan'. She was the most outstanding Dollmaster I have ever seen…"

Duncan: “?!”

Chapter 161: Another Layer of Connection

In the eyes of the Rose Doll House's shopkeeper, the most outstanding Dollmaster in this world was a Human named Lucretia Abnomar, the daughter of the famous "Captain Duncan".

As soon as the old madam said this, the entire shop fell silent for several seconds. Then Duncan's earth-shaking cough finally broke out. "Cough, cough, cough…"

"Guest, are you all right?" The shopkeeper was startled by Duncan's reaction. Like every Elf who had dealt with short-lived races for many years, her face at once showed the worry that the Human in front of her might suddenly drop dead. "Do you need me to fetch a doctor?"

"Cough… I… cough, I'm fine," Duncan finally managed to stop coughing. It still took him a moment before he could wave a hand at the old madam in front of him, because at the same time he also had to calm the cursed Doll on the Vanished, who had just been frightened by him. "I just choked on my own saliva. What did you just say? Lucreti…"

"Lucretia Abnomar, Mistress of the Radiant Star, one of Captain Duncan's two children," the shopkeeper said, wearing an expression that clearly said, "This all happened in just the last few decades. Why are you Humans so easily shocked?" "The most outstanding Dollmaster in the world…"

Duncan had just managed to catch his breath, but when he heard the old madam's words, another mouthful of saliva went straight into his lungs.

“Pft -”

At the same time, on the deck of the Vanished, Alice, who had just been frightened by Duncan’s violent coughing, was startled again by his shout of “Bloody hell!”. Miss Doll, holding a big basket of vegetables and fruit, stared at the captain, who was acting strangely today. “Are you all right?”

“I’m fine,” Duncan said after taking a breath, calming himself little by little. He had finally learned, after this period of practice, to control his two bodies skillfully, and now he had almost become flustered again. To keep from acting too strange in the city-state, he first waved at the Doll in front of him. “Go back to the cabin on your own for now. I have something to deal with.”

“Are you really all right?” Alice still looked over with doubt, Duncan’s face reflected in her pale violet eyes. “Do you want me to check your body, maybe pat your back so your breath will go down…”

“Do you know how?”

“Nope.”

“Then go, go, go!”

“Oh.”

After finally shooing away the silly Doll, Duncan quickly focused his attention back on the city-state of Pland. He raised his eyes and looked very seriously at the slightly plump old Elf madam in front of him. “That famous Captain Duncan… he is that legendary captain of the Vanished…”

“Shh, don’t just say that name out loud!” The shopkeeper quickly cut him off. “ordinary persons like you don’t know. If you casually speak the name of such a Great Terror and great curse, misfortune will cling to you! Be careful or that ship will come into your dreams!”

“…You’re right,” Duncan choked for a moment, forced down the strange feeling in his heart, and nodded. “That captain… not only has a daughter named Lucretia, but also has two children?”

“Yes. That was a hundred years ago. I’ve even seen the two of them. The son is named Tyrian Abnomar. Later he served as some kind of general under the Frostholm queen, but not long after that there was a rebellion in Frostholm. The kid took a group of people and became a pirate. The daughter is Lucretia Abnomar, the most outstanding Dollmaster…”

The old madam rambled on, then paused and sighed again. “But all that was many years ago, at least many years for Humans… In Pland, few people mention them anymore. Even in the Elven city-states, people do not dare speak casually about things related to that ship. But what is there to fear? Those two siblings were not like their father, who went mad. They are still fine and serving as captains now…”

“Wait!” Duncan’s eyes widened at once. “You’re saying the two of them are still alive?!”

“Alive, yes. They are said to be cursed by Subspace with undying immortality,” the old madam sighed. “They will probably live even longer than I will…”

Duncan: “…”

“Guest, are you really all right?” The shopkeeper, the old madam, finally could not help asking again. “Your face hasn’t looked right for a while. Do you dislike this topic? That’s normal. Most Humans don’t like to hear me say these things. They don’t even dare listen in broad daylight…”

“I dare listen, I dare,” Duncan came back to himself at that and quickly straightened his expression and posture. He almost stared burning holes into the shopkeeper in front of him. “Tell me a bit more about those two siblings. And you just said… you’ve seen both of them?”

“A century ago,” the old woman said slowly, with a tone of remembrance. “I was already running a shop on this street then. The two siblings came to buy things from me. Lucretia bought a one-third-scale Doll, and Tyrian paid. They were still young then, and their father… was still a normal Human. Oh, let’s not mention him. We can’t mention him.”

“Then more than ten years later, on the road to Lunsa to meet with colleagues, I saw Lucretia alone again. By then she had already become an outstanding Dollmaster and artificer… Her clockwork-driven automata were things even I could not make…”

The shopkeeper started rambling again, talking about stories that would already count as history for most Humans, but were only parts of a life of memories to her.

It seemed that no matter the race, older people liked to reminisce and ramble like this. Once someone gave them a start, such topics never ended.

Duncan’s feelings were still surging like waves, but his face was already calm. He listened carefully to every word the old woman said and stored all this shocking information in his mind without missing a single piece.

For the ordinary persons in the city-states, the cursed captain from a century ago and his cursed children could only be a distant story. But for an Elf who had lived here for several centuries, many so-called “secret histories” were just things she had seen in her early years. She spoke of many things related to Lucretia, and also mentioned Tyrian and his “Sea Mist” a few times.

However, she clearly did not know as much about Tyrian and the Sea Mist as she did about Lucretia.

“Tyrian Abnomar once served the Frostholm queen. That was half a century ago, not so far from now. Some older Humans have also heard about this,” the shopkeeper said casually. “But they’ve only heard about it. The city-states in the Frost Sea region were rather closed off decades ago and had limited dealings with Pland…”

Duncan felt his heart pounding. Of course he knew who the Frostholm queen was. There was even a life-sized Frostholm Queen Doll in his home that bounced around all day. But he had never thought that the queen who had been executed by rebels half a century ago would form another kind of connection with him like this – through a “firstborn son” whose existence he himself had only just learned about.

“The Frostholm rebellion half a century ago…” He chose his words carefully, trying his best to act like a normal guest who just liked gossip. “I’ve seen it in history books, but the writing is very vague…”

“That matter was vague to begin with,” the shopkeeper waved a hand. “They say it was tied to ‘that ship’. Who would dare record it clearly?”

“Tyrian Abnomar took his men and became a pirate after the Frostholm rebellion?” Duncan asked again. “Is he still active in the Frost Sea now?”

“Seems so,” the shopkeeper recalled. “Anyway, that’s what a fellow Elf who did business at sea told me more than twenty years ago.”

“Then… do Tyrian and Lucretia still stay in touch?”

“How would I know?” The shopkeeper waved her hand. “I’m just an ordinary old madam who runs a shop on a street in Pland. At most, I saw them once in my early years and just happen to remember a bit more than you Humans do. How could I know everything?”

“Well… that’s true.”

Duncan smacked his lips and realized he seemed a bit too concerned about this matter, so he wisely did not keep asking.

But the old woman across from him suddenly seemed to remember something. She stood up from behind the counter. “Ah, right. Speaking of Lucretia, I suddenly remembered something. It’s been kept here with me for many years. I wonder if you, Guest, would be interested?”

As she spoke, the shopkeeper walked to a low door in the corner by the stairs. She opened it and rummaged around in the storage room inside. After fussing around for quite a while, she finally took a box more than half a meter long from the very back of the storage room and set it on the counter.

“This is…” Duncan looked in confusion at the thing she had taken out.

“A Doll,” the old woman said with a kindly smile, carefully lifting the lid. “Her name is Nilu – do you remember what I just mentioned? Many years ago, Lucretia and her brother bought a Doll from my shop. But that Doll was actually one of a pair of sisters. The one she took away was a sister named ‘Lunie’. The one left here is named ‘Nilu’.”

Chapter 162: Nilu

Duncan quietly fixed his gaze on Nilu, the doll lying in the box.

It was just an ordinary jointed doll. Her look matched the “court maiden” style that had been popular in the city-states a century ago. She had beautiful curly golden hair and a dress trimmed all over with lace. The joints in her arms used an old-fashioned ball-joint structure, even more obvious than Alice’s. Her face was made of porcelain, and around her mouth and eyes were the telltale seams that marked an old-style doll.

To be fair, this doll was made with great care and had been kept in very good condition. It was hard to believe she had already been lying in this box for a full century. She was far from Alice, that “doll” who was almost no different from a real person, but this little one named Nilu could still be called pretty.

A hundred years ago, Lucretia had bought from this shop the other doll that formed a pair with this little one, a doll called Lunie. Now the one that had been left behind back then, Nilu, lay quietly in the box in front of Duncan.

And Duncan himself had only wandered into this shop on a whim today. His first goal had only been to mess with… to buy a wig for Alice, and to ask a bit about how to maintain and care for dolls.

Fate really was a strange thing.

“This doesn’t look like something that’s been kept for a whole century,” Duncan said thoughtfully. “She only looks a little old.”

The shopkeeper said slowly: “Things made by elves are always famous for being long-lasting. We usually have to use them for a very, very long time. My skill at making dolls is nothing grand enough to call myself a master, but it should still be far above many of my peers. I would never want a child I crafted so carefully to fail at keeping someone company for at least one or two centuries.”

“…I understand, but for humans this is already an antique,” Duncan raised an eyebrow. He quickly pulled himself out of his thoughts and realized this well-preserved doll was not some simple item. “I don’t think I can afford her.”

He had not forgotten that a single century-old dagger had already earned him more than a year of an ordinary person’s living expenses from old Mr. Morris. This finely crafted, well-kept doll in front of him… there was no way she would be cheap.

“An antique? I never thought of it that way,” the shopkeeper chuckled, her plump face full of good cheer. “She’s not expensive. In fact, if you buy that wig and the matching silver hair ornament, I can sell this doll to you at cost – the original cost from back then, 142 sola.”

This time Duncan was the one who was surprised: “Why?”

“Maybe it’s just that you and she are meant to meet,” the shopkeeper said slowly. “Nilu has been lying here quietly for many years, and not a single fated master has come to take her away. This ‘younger sister’ who was left behind all alone is actually very lonely. Today I almost had no guests at all, yet you, a gentleman who truly loves dolls, came and chatted with me for so long. You even happened to mention Lucretia, the young miss who took Lunie away a hundred years ago. I feel there might be some guidance from fate here…”

“Fate…” Duncan’s mouth twitched. He usually liked using that word to fool other people, yet he had not expected to have it used on him. Then he understood, and the look he gave the elven old woman turned odd: “So the real situation is that she won’t sell, right?”

“…It is fate.”

“Because she has a bit of a link to that ‘Abnormal’ family that was under The curse, so she simply won’t sell at all, right?”

“…It really is fate.”

“Does this doll have any other traits like The curse? Like coming back on her own after someone throws her away? Or going into the kitchen while people sleep to look for a knife…”

The old woman finally opened her eyes wide, and her voice jumped by an octave: “I even hired a priest to drive out the evil! I still have the exorcism certificate…”

Duncan chuckled: “See? So it really is because people suspect this doll is carrying The curse and so she won’t sell, right?”

The old woman said nothing.

“I run an antique shop in the Lower City,” Duncan sighed. “An antique shop in the Lower City. You know what that means.”

“…I really don’t like dealing with business folk, especially ones like you,” the old woman shook her head with a sigh. “All right, yes, that is the real reason. Nilu stayed unsold for a long, long time, and the longer she sat there, the older she looked, so I simply pushed her into storage. If you really want her, then take her at a discount for 75 sola. At least let me earn back what I spent on the priest for the exorcism…”

“Deal.” Duncan agreed before she could even finish.

Either way, he really had grown very interested in this doll. Even though there was no proof at all that this little one had any connection with Lucretia, just the factor of “fate” was enough for him to decide to buy her.

This was his instinctive reaction after suddenly learning that “he” had somehow produced a pair of children. Who knew when those siblings might show up, and who knew what trouble they would bring. Now that he had found something related to Lucretia, whether it would be useful or not, he wanted to keep it by his side first and study it slowly.

In a world that held supernatural powers and all kinds of strange things, objects that carried a “connection” like this often played a role in occult studies.

“Then I’ll leave Nilu in your care,” the shopkeeper said. Duncan’s quick answer clearly stunned the old madam, and she looked as if she already regretted not asking for a higher price. But she soon shook her head and pushed the box with the doll toward him. Before Duncan could reach out, she could not help speaking again: “You must take good care of this child. I can see you truly love dolls, sir, but I still have to remind you: don’t treat Nilu as some cheap piece of merchandise.”

“Of course,” Duncan said as he took the wooden box and closed the lid. Then he glanced at the wig and hair ornament he had picked out earlier. “How much are these two together?”

“425 sola. Fixed price.”

Duncan’s face instantly twisted as if his teeth hurt.

In the Lower City, that was two months of living expenses for a whole family. But in the Upper City… it was only enough to buy two “accessories” for some rich person’s luxury goods.

He even wavered for a moment, wondering if he should just give up on them, but he soon pushed that thought away.

This was the gift he had promised Alice (even if Alice's mood might be a little strange when she received it). On the other hand, thinking of what he had gained in this doll shop today, this price did not seem completely unacceptable.

After comforting himself that way, Duncan let out a quiet breath and got ready to pay up without arguing.

Only when he was paying did he suddenly remember something, so he could not help asking one more question: "Right, back then, why did Lucretia only buy Lunie and not take Nilu, the younger sister?"

"…Do you really want to know?" The shopkeeper looked at him with a slightly mysterious air. "This matter… is another secret related to the Abnormal family."

Duncan instinctively leaned in closer: "Now I'm even more curious."

"Then you should settle the bill first."

Duncan froze for a moment, then paid with a helpless smile: "Can you tell me now?"

"Oh, it's actually nothing much," the old madam said offhand while taking the money. "Those two children simply didn't bring enough money back then. Lucretia left with tears in her eyes and said that when she had money in the future, she would definitely come back for Nilu as well. But looking at things now, she must have forgotten."

Duncan: "…"

He could not tell if it was this old madam's way of talking that was strange, or if all the elves in this world had a few screws loose.

…

On the gently rocking Vanished, rising and falling with the sea, Alice carried the last batch of supplies into the cabins and then came back up to the upper deck. At once she saw the captain standing quietly by the rail, as if he was lost in thought.

“Captain~~” The doll girl trotted over happily. “I’ve taken everything down to the cabins! The food and cookware went to the galley, and the rest went to the captain’s cabin!”

“Mm.” Duncan came back to himself and let out a soft breath. His gaze finally settled on Alice. “Good work.”

“Captain… are you feeling better now?” Alice looked Duncan up and down and asked, a bit unsure. “Your face suddenly looked really strange just now. Are you really all right?”

Duncan shook his head: “Don’t worry. It’s a small problem.”

He still felt a little unsettled. His head was full of the two names that had suddenly appeared, Tyrian and Lucretia, and the trouble they might bring. When he looked at Alice, this cursed Doll who absolutely had some link to the Frostholm Queen, his thoughts grew even harder to settle. In the end, though, he pushed many of those words back down.

No matter what link she had or didn’t have to the Frostholm Queen, Alice was just a doll who knew nothing. Talking to her about some things… it would be better to go talk to Shirley, that illiterate girl.

At least Shirley had a somewhat educated dog at her side.

He turned his head to look at the pigeon resting on the deck. Its outline flickered in the air, and then it vanished from above the deck in a burst of flame.

Alice watched the spot where the flame disappeared, wide-eyed: “Did AI go to ‘move cargo’ again?”

“Mm. There isn’t much this time,” Duncan nodded lightly. Then he looked at Alice and let a slight smile show. “It’s a gift for you.”

Alice’s eyes lit up: “A gift? A gift really for me?! Captain, you really—”

The doll girl had not finished the second half of her sentence when a whirl of ghostly green flame suddenly appeared over the deck beside them. In the blink of an eye AI finished her teleportation from the city-state of Pland to the Vanished, and as the flames rose, a new batch of supplies appeared before Alice’s eyes.

That doll could not finish the rest of her words at all.

The first thing that appeared before her eyes was a wig…

Chapter 163: An Exhausting Conversation

The skeletal pigeon, wrapped in spirit form flame, circled twice above the deck. The cargo from the city-state of Pland appeared in the fire. Alice stared blankly at the first thing that showed up in front of her, and only after a long moment did she lift her head to look at the captain.

To be honest, in that moment Duncan almost thought this doll was going to burst into tears and run off. That had been the most likely reaction in the long list he had imagined from Alice. Instead, he and this silly doll just stared at each other for a long time, big eyes to big eyes, until she finally gave a dazed little nod and said: “Thank you!”

Duncan: “…?”

“You really bought me new hair!” The next second Alice’s face broke into a wide, joyful smile, as if she had just received the most wonderful gift. “I thought you were just joking last time! Mr. Goathead said that wigs for dolls are very expensive things…”

Duncan: “…”

The reaction he had waited so long for did not happen. His persecution plan had run into a huge failure from the very start. The one who was supposed to be persecuted was overjoyed and even full of heartfelt gratitude.

He felt like a prankster who had suddenly lost his own fun.

“Captain? Captain, why are you spacing out again?” Alice’s voice suddenly sounded, pulling Duncan out of his daze. The doll was holding the wig in her hands, standing on tiptoe with her face almost pressed to Duncan’s nose. “You spaced out so many times today…”

Duncan blinked and leaned his face back a little, staring at the cursed Doll with a strange look: “I didn’t think you had such a big heart. Last time, when I talked about wigs, you were really depressed. I thought that when you got this gift, you’d at least have a bit of an inner struggle…”

“I was depressed about losing hair. Why would I be depressed about getting new hair?” Alice blinked, as if she thought Duncan’s whole view of the world was wrong, and explained: “I’m a doll!”

Duncan finally understood where the problem lay.

Alice was usually so lively on the ship that, aside from the strange bones in her neck, she looked just like an ordinary person. After spending so long with her, he had unconsciously started treating her like a human, and had forgotten how different her values were as a doll…

As a doll, why would she care about wearing a wig? Do humans care that much when they put on a new pair of shoes?

“Forget it, I was just thinking too much,” Duncan said, covering his face and waving a hand. As the greatest calamity on the Boundless Sea, he once again felt unable to keep up his image in front of Alice. “Anyway… as long as you like it.”

“I like it!” Alice said happily, hugging the wig. Then she craned her neck over Duncan’s shoulder to look at the rest of the things on the deck. “And the rest of this…”

“This is also for you,” Duncan sighed, trying his best to ignore the visual shock of an elegant, beautiful gothic doll hugging a wig with such joy. He turned and picked up a box from the deck. “Open it and take a look.”

Alice opened the delicate little wooden box curiously and saw a silver hair ornament made of diamond-shaped pieces linked together, lying quietly on the velvet lining.

She looked up in shock and saw the captain nodding slightly to her.

“Last time I took away the feather hair clip you found in the cabin,” Duncan said calmly. “Back then I promised to buy you a new one. I’m keeping that promise now.”

Alice froze for a long moment before she finally reacted. Her smile held a joy she had never shown before: “Thank you, Captain! Captain, you’re the best!”

“Don’t be so loud,” Duncan said, ears ringing from the doll’s sudden high-pitched voice. He could not help waving his hand. “It’s just a hair ornament. No need to get so excited.”

“It’s not just the ornament, there’s also the new hair you bought me!”

Duncan suddenly felt a little embarrassed. A strong sense of shame, the kind you get when you set up a prank and the target thanks you earnestly instead, wrapped around his heart: “…Don’t bring up that wig.”

Alice, however, did not notice the captain’s subtle mood at all. The doll with not many thoughts in her head was fully immersed in her joy, and soon her gaze naturally fell on the last wooden box on the deck.

It was a wooden box a little more than half a meter long – or rather, a wooden trunk – with elegant, old-fashioned decorations and brass locks and hinges that gave it a sense of quality at a glance.

For some reason, it also reminded her of her own “house.”

“What is this?” Alice put down the wig and hair ornament beside her, walked over, and pushed the trunk curiously. Then she looked up and asked.

“It’s also from the doll shop, but this one isn’t for you,” Duncan said casually. “You can open it and take a look.”

Alice made a soft sound of acknowledgment and opened the trunk curiously.

A finely made doll in a classical maiden style lay quietly inside the trunk.

Alice: “…?”

“You can call her Nilu,” Duncan’s voice came from beside her. “But unlike you, she’s just an ordinary doll… probably.”

Alice did not react for a long time. After nearly ten seconds, she finally moved. With a light click-pop, her head dropped straight into Nilu’s box and rolled together with the small doll inside…

“He… he… help me…”

Duncan sighed, picked up Alice’s head with practiced ease, and put it back in place. He looked at this embarrassing fellow helplessly: “Did you really need to react like that?”

Alice only held her head with both hands and twisted her neck back into place. Then she widened her eyes at her captain, her face full of disbelief: “Captain, you… you’ve got yourself a new doll…”

“What nonsense!” Duncan felt that something was very wrong the moment he heard that and quickly cut her off before Alice could spew more rubbish. “Didn’t I just say that Nilu is not like you? She won’t run and jump around the place. And what do you mean I ‘got myself a new doll’? That makes it sound like I have some kind of strange collecting hobby.”

“But if you bought a doll and brought her back, isn’t that…”

“There is a very special reason behind this,” Duncan said softly, letting out a breath as he stood and looked out over the distant sea. He tried to use the serious, deep look on his face to suppress the rubbish running around in Alice’s silly head. “This doll named Nilu and another doll named Lunie were originally a pair. Many years ago, my daughter took Lunie away. By coincidence, I found Nilu again today, left behind and gathering dust in the shop. I thought… I should buy her.”

Duncan did not hide the information he had just learned. He said it in a natural tone. No matter what, he now had to play the role of “Captain Duncan” well, and from that persona, he had to “of course know” about his own pair of children.

Alice, unsurprisingly, stared wide-eyed at her captain, her face full of shock.

“C-captain, you have a daughter?!” The doll held her head with both hands, as if afraid that in the next second it would leave home again from sheer shock. “I… this is the first time I’ve ever heard that!”

Duncan sighed in his heart. He was thinking that this was also the first time he had heard of it himself…

But his face stayed as calm as ever. He only gave a small nod: “Is that so strange? I also have a son, and I haven’t seen either of them for a century.”

“You also have a son?!” Alice was even more stunned. She even took two steps back. Then her eyes spun twice as her brain worked in some way, and she suddenly blurted out: “Then doesn’t that mean they also have a mom?”

Duncan: “…”

In that moment, he and Alice just stared at each other, big eyes against big eyes.

“I’m starting to regret opening this topic with you,” Duncan finally sighed after a long time, his face full of weary age. “I don’t want to talk about this.”

“Oh… oh, okay!” Alice had no idea what she had just imagined in her head. After a short pause she nodded again and again. Then she looked down at Nilu in the wooden trunk and suddenly understood: “Ah, then that feather-shaped hair clip I found in the cabin last time… was that your daughter’s?”

Duncan gave no clear answer.

He himself was not sure either. But thinking of the deep, involuntary feeling of nostalgia that had risen from his heart when he saw that hair clip, Alice’s guess was probably not far off.

Then he noticed that Alice had been sneaking looks at him the whole time. He noticed the strange look on the doll’s face, as if she wanted to say something but kept stopping.

“If you have something to say, just say it,” he said lightly. “Staring at me in secret like that is ruder than speaking without a filter.”

“Ah, it’s nothing, nothing, I just…” Alice waved her hands, then finally said hesitantly: “I just suddenly feel… that you still have some humanity.”

Duncan: “…Is that supposed to be a compliment?”

Alice froze at once. Then, as if she remembered something Mr. Goathead had taught her, she showed a guilty look: “Ah, sorry, Captain. I shouldn’t insult you by saying you have humanity…”

“I… thank you,” Duncan sighed, waving a hand, his face showing how tired he was in both body and soul. “Take your gifts and go back. I want some time alone.”

“Oh.”

Chapter 164: No One Answered the Call

Alice left in a good mood. It even looked like she could stay happy for many days. Duncan stayed alone on the deck, looking at the wooden box that held “Nilu”.

He controlled the “avatar” located in the city-state of Pland and left the Upper City. He was now riding a bicycle back to the antique shop. Before leaving that doll shop, he had talked with the old madam shopkeeper about many things related to Lucretia and Tyrian, but he did not gain anything more.

As the shopkeeper herself had said, she was only an ordinary citizen, just one whose life lasted longer than that of humans and who had personally seen some events many years ago. Aside from a brief meeting back then and some hearsay, she actually did not know much about those two “descendants of Duncan”.

On the Vanished, Duncan was lost in thought.

To his surprise, this body even had a pair of children, and they were still alive. From the sound of it, that pair of siblings were not ordinary people. One had once sworn loyalty to the queen of Frostholm and had now become the greatest pirate lord of the Frost Sea. The other had long drifted along the border of the civilized world, doing all kinds of mysterious explorations, and was respectfully called the “witch of the sea” by captains.

Such a pair of “children” only made Duncan feel troubled, and a little nervous.

Right now he was “Captain Duncan” of the Vanished, and it seemed he would have to remain “Captain Duncan” for the foreseeable future. So he had to find a way to maintain this identity. But if one day in the future… he really met that pair of siblings, what should he do?

Should he act like a kind father with dutiful children? Or should he act cold and ruthless? Should he greet them, or should he walk past them with an icy nod?

According to the shopkeeper, a hundred years ago Tyrian and his sibling had a “falling-out” with their father. After some mysterious “family dispute”, the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star parted ways with their flagship, the Vanished. That was all the world knew.

But what exactly had happened back then, probably only those three people knew.

Duncan let out a soft sigh.

Whatever the truth back then, one thing seemed certain: his relationship with that pair of siblings could not be the warm, filial bond between father and child. If they really met, it would be safer to lean harder toward the “unfortunate family” side of things…

He bent down and picked up the wooden box that held “Nilu”. On the velvet lining inside, the doll maiden, only a few dozen centimeters tall, lay quietly. This little thing, born a hundred years ago, was now a new “member” of the Vanished.

“Was ‘she’ really connected to Lucretia? Or did Lucretia still keep, by her side, the doll named ‘Lunie’ that she had bought a hundred years ago?”

Duncan had not thought much when he bought Nilu. But now his thoughts began to stir. Holding the wooden box, he returned to the captain's cabin.

Goathead was at the wheel like always. As soon as Duncan opened the door, Goathead's noisy voice rang out at once: "Ah! The great captain has returned to his loyal captain's cabin. It seems you brought many supplies from the city-state. Your loyal—etcetera—cares very much about the food on board. If you do not mind, I shall personally guide Miss Alice to become a proper…"

"Shut up. Stop messing around with that doll over the recipes. I don't want my next meal to look like a pot of Abyssal demons' vomit." Duncan glared at Goathead. "Where are we now, and how far are we from Pland?"

"Oh, we are still heading for Pland at full speed, and we have already made several successful Spirit Realm boosts on the way—like skipping stones along the edge of the Mortal Realm. Now the Vanished is only ten days away from that city-state," Goathead said at once, sounding pleased. "I guess before long, you will feel a clear rush of strength when you walk in the Spirit Realm. The Vanished's influence will become your greatest help when you move around inside the city-state…"

Duncan looked quietly at Goathead. Goathead stopped his babbling, stayed silent for two seconds, then suddenly added: "A loyal First Mate always understands his captain best."

"Good." Duncan nodded and walked toward his cabin with the box in his hands. Soon he stopped again. Words turned quickly in his mind, and at last, with a calm face, he asked in a casual tone: "Tell me, if Tyrian and Lucretia saw me again, how would they react?"

This was a test he had chosen after careful thought. It was the most normal-sounding question he could come up with, one that would not arouse suspicion yet could still give him some information.

He did not ask Goathead what he thought of those siblings, because that kind of question would sound too stiff. He also did not ask about what had happened between those siblings and the Vanished in the past, because that would expose his own situation. The question he finally chose fit his identity better and matched the way he and Goathead usually talked.

Goathead clearly froze for a moment. His voice stayed hesitant for a long time before it reached Duncan's ears: "You mean… your children… Sorry, Captain, I do not know if I should speak about your family matters, since you rarely mention them to me. But if I have to say it, if I have to say…"

The usually quick-tongued Goathead stammered several times before he finally went on: "If I have to say it, I think we might have another fight with Tyrian, just like back in Frostholm. After all, he always likes to solve problems with cannons. As for Miss Lucretia… she would probably stay far away…"

Duncan neither agreed nor disagreed, but suddenly he realized two things.

First, he remembered that Goathead had once mentioned that the Vanished had "fought a battle" near the city-state of Frostholm. That battle had actually been with Tyrian!

Second, Goathead's first reaction was strange, and he had even stressed that Duncan rarely talked to him about those siblings. From that line, did it mean this Goathead had never actually spent time with those siblings? Did he only know about them from what Duncan had "told" him?

Hadn't this guy been on the Vanished from the very beginning?!

Duncan's gaze narrowed a little, but nothing showed on his face. He only nodded to show he had heard Goathead's answer, then calmly kept walking and went back to his cabin.

The heavy oak door closed behind him, blocking Goathead's view from the room with the enchanted sea chart and letting Duncan's mood slowly calm down.

He let out a long breath, took "Nilu" out of the wooden box, and placed her on his desk. He stared at the doll for several minutes, then greeted her: "Hello, my name is Duncan."

The doll, of course, did not respond.

She really was just a doll.

Duncan suddenly felt a bit foolish. He gave an awkward smile and thought to himself: [Good thing no one on this ship has the guts to peek into the captain's cabin.] Then he opened the drawer at his side and took out an item.

It was a small, delicate hair clip shaped like waves and feathers.

This was an "old item" that Alice had dug out from the ship's cabin.

Duncan quietly let his gaze rest on the little hair clip. As before, that strange feeling of nostalgia slowly spread from deep inside him.

It felt like the only strand of "humanity" left by the original master of this body, a faint fragment of emotion that still remained in his heart.

"This really is probably Lucretia's…" Duncan murmured to himself. "Was it a gift he never managed to give her, or the only keepsake she left on this ship after she left…"

He slowly picked up the hair clip and turned it gently under the sunlight. The sunlight came through the window and made the silver edge of the hair clip shine.

A small cluster of green flames spread from Duncan's fingertips and, in the blink of an eye, engulfed the hair clip. Then the flames flowed through the air and wrapped around the doll Nilu.

Duncan calmed his mind and tried to feel whether there was any supernatural power left inside these two objects, or even the slightest “connection” that pointed toward some far-off place.

However, the flames soon faded. The doll and the hair clip showed no reaction.

Was it because they really were ordinary mortal objects? Or was it because Lucretia was now at the border of the civilized world, so far away that whatever “connection” remained in these two things had grown too weak for even the fire of the spirit form to catch?

Duncan frowned and let the flames spread out again. At the same time, with a feeling he could not even explain to himself, he tried calling out: “Lucretia… Lucy?”

He used the nickname for the name Lucretia—maybe the bond built by that nickname would be a little stronger than the formal name?

Nothing happened.

Duncan waited for a long time and, in the end, could only put out the flames in disappointment.

At the same time, in a distant border region at the eternal edge of The Veil, the clockwork doll “Lunie” suddenly stopped while she was wiping a table.

Inside this Engineering Construct that Lucretia had personally modified countless times, and that now almost counted as an Alchemical Lifeform, there came a sharp howl of gears and bearings spinning wildly, followed by a series of grating creaks.

With a click, the clockwork key on Lunie’s back popped out and fell to the floor. Her alloy-reinforced arms drooped stiffly, and a wisp of pale smoke slowly rose from the gap in the back of her maid shell…

Chapter 165: Lucretia’s Pressure

Along with a string of strange noises, the clockwork doll froze up completely like a rusted machine. Almost at the same time, Lucretia, who was in a nearby cabin, sensed the anomaly in her creation.

The cabin door was pushed open. A stack of flying colored paper sheets whirled into the room like a cyclone and, as they spun, gathered into a human shape. Lucretia, the “witch of the sea”, stepped out from the colored paper and, at first glance, saw Lunie, who had slipped down to sit by the table with her head hanging.

“Lunie?” Lucretia hurried forward and at once noticed the clockwork key lying on the floor nearby. She picked up the key and then moved closer, patting the mechanism box on the clockwork doll’s back. “What happened?”

A series of broken creaks came from inside Lunie. After a while, some of her parts finally began to move again, and a badly distorted voice sounded from her chest: “Old Master… is looking for you…”

With a clang, the clockwork key in Lucretia’s hand fell to the floor.

Lunie turned her head toward the sound and, by instinct, reached out to grope for her own clockwork key, trying to put it back into her back. But halfway through the motion she jammed again, and the sound of gears spinning idly followed.

Lucretia’s face changed sharply. When she heard the words “Old Master”, her pupils trembled. But the sounds of failure inside Lunie soon snapped her back to herself. She shook her head hard, forced down her swirling thoughts, and grabbed the clockwork doll's shoulders: "Lunie, stand by."

The clockwork doll slowly closed her eyes. "Command received, Lunie entering standby."

A short time later, deep in the Radiant Star's hull, in a brightly lit cabin, Lucretia was busy beside a workbench.

This was a laboratory that could be called "complete and advanced" even by the standards of the Truth Academy's headquarters. The wide room was filled with intricate machines and pneumatic tube lines that supplied power to various devices. Between the countless machines stood auxiliary devices covered in magic runes, along with many crystal containers or reactor boilers that gave off a faint light. A dozen automated mechanism dolls tended these self-running devices, so Lucretia could focus all her attention on the work in front of her.

In front of this "witch of the sea", Lunie lay quietly on the wide workbench.

The clockwork doll had already been taken apart. The outer shell shaped like a maid's outfit had been set aside. The fine-gold frame and all sorts of brass mechanism parts almost covered the whole bench. Only the part of Lunie's body above the chest still remained intact. That part lay at the edge of the platform. She stared blankly at her disassembled body and blinked her eyes from time to time.

"Is it… easy… to fix?" A slightly off-key voice came from Lunie's chest.

"Don't worry. The drive mechanisms just jammed all of a sudden and warped the bearings," Lucretia said as she worked without looking up. "The workload is large, but the repair itself is not complicated. Your 'heart' was not damaged."

Lunie slowly moved her eyes and saw the “heart” placed at the center of the workbench.

It was a delicate clockwork heart sphere made from countless complex metal plates joined together. It floated quietly above a pile of parts. The metal plates on its surface shifted from time to time, revealing the structure inside. When the plates turned to the right angle, one could clearly see that the inside of the sphere was covered in shining runes, and something even more slender floated at the center of those runes.

It was a piece of a finger—a very slim, very fragile finger, even thinner than the finger of a human child. A dollmaker had carefully crafted it a hundred years ago.

That was the true core and true essence of the mechanism doll “Lunie”—the last proof left in this world of a certain doll that had been created a hundred years ago.

Lucretia noticed Lunie’s gaze. She looked up at it, and her hands suddenly paused.

After a moment, she went back to work and spoke as if by accident: “I turned you into what you are now. Have you ever hated me for it?”

“Lunie… why would Lunie hate you?” The doll’s head on the workbench spoke in a stiff voice. “Mistress… gave Lunie life. Lunie is… glad because of that…”

“But at first, all of this was only because I was acting on a whim. For that whim, I destroyed your original body,” Lucretia said softly. “For a long time at the beginning, I did not realize that the border’s influence had given you real thinking. Back then, I only thought you were a machine and carried out many ‘experimental modifications’ on you without caring about the consequences.”

Lunie did not answer her Mistress. After a short silence, she suddenly spoke: “You are tense. You have something on your mind—under normal conditions, Mistress would not suddenly say such strange things.”

Lucretia stayed silent for two or three seconds. “…Do you remember what you just said? When I arrived at the dining room and woke you up.”

“…Memory search failed. Lunie does not remember.”

“You told me that ‘Old Master’ was looking for me.”

A strange sound came from the clockwork doll’s chest, not from a fault, but from confused thinking.

“Do you really not remember?” Lucretia raised her head and gazed quietly into Lunie’s eyes.

“Memory search failed. Lunie does not remember.”

“…Then it seems my terrifying father does not want me to have any chance to look back at his situation,” Lucretia said, a complicated smile appearing on her face. She slowly took out a warped set of gears, and her tone drifted. “He only sent a one-way signal to tell me… he knows where the Radiant Star is. He knows how to find me…”

“You are afraid.”

“Scared to death—but more than fear, it is a kind of… sadness.”

“Sad? Why?”

Lucretia looked into Lunie’s eyes. After a long time, she gently shook her head. “That feeling is too complex for you. You probably cannot understand it yet.”

“All right. Lunie will try to understand later,” the clockwork doll replied. Then she asked, “Do you think Old Master is giving you some kind of warning?”

“…I do not know, but it really does feel like a warning,” Lucretia said softly. “It even feels like a kind of declaration before a hunt… He has returned from Subspace, and he is even harder to grasp than the last time he came back. Maybe I should warn my Big Brother…”

“You really should remind Mr. Tyrian. He has already set out for Pland, and the governor of Pland said that the Vanished is approaching that city-state.”

Lucretia nodded lightly and said nothing more. She just lowered her head and went on working.

…

Duncan carefully put “Nilu” back into the antique wooden chest, then returned the feather-shaped hair clip to the drawer.

Then he stared at the box holding “Nilu” and felt troubled.

As a grown man, he felt that keeping a maiden-style doll in his bedroom was a bit wrong.

But aside from keeping it in his bedroom, he could not think of a better place.

Even though the first test had gained nothing and he had not found any hint of the supernatural in the doll “Nilu”, this was still an item related to “Lucretia”. Since he could not be sure whether it would be useful in the future, he did not dare leave the doll anywhere out of his sight.

After struggling with it for a while, Duncan sighed and set Nilu’s box for now at the head of his bed.

“If you really have something special, then show it soon,” he said as he looked at the ornate old box and shook his head. “Don’t be like Alice, who had to be thrown into the sea before she showed off that coffin-charging-through-the-waves stunt.”

The wooden box, of course, did not respond, but Duncan did not care.

He went to the window and looked at the sky outside.

The veil of night had already descended. The pale, dim glow of the World’s Wound shone over the Boundless Sea.

The great banishing power brought by the Sun had faded from the Mortal Realm. Twisted, ominous, corrupting forces were slowly rising all over the world. At this time of night, humans would enter Dreamwalking in order to avoid the world’s interference with their sanity.

But for Duncan… he had never felt any discomfort under the veil of night, nor had he seen the Shadows that frightened ordinary people.

Night was when his mind was sharpest.

He went back to his desk, quietly laid out a sheet of blank paper, and picked up a fountain pen.

He had just bought these things from the city-state of Pland.

After thinking for a moment, he wrote line after line on the paper:

In 1889, a fragment of the Sun appeared and caused the great fire of Pland;

Under the Veil of the factories in the Sixth District, a “Mortal Realm” burned by the fire was hidden;

Inside the Cathedral in the Sixth District community there existed a warped space-time that seemed to be a closed time loop. Two completely opposite Mortal Realms overlapped inside the Cathedral;

Dog’s “humanity” had an unknown source, but it was clearly not the power of the Sun fragment;

The statue of the Goddess inside the Cathedral in the Sixth District seemed to have been affected by a Subspace rift. The nun in the underground sanctum seemed to have died while fighting against the Subspace invasion…

Chapter 166: The Captain Awaits You in Dreamwalking

Over this period of time, Duncan wrote down all the known information one by one on paper. He then drew lines between them according to how they were connected. Among these clues, he threaded in Nina and Shirley's memories of the great fire, as well as their own "dreams" that had clearly already become distorted.

After he finished listing all the clues, Duncan started a new line at the bottom of the chart. He frowned, fell into thought, and while thinking, he wrote down a few sentences—

First, in this world, everything could undergo "corruption"—everything except Subspace.

Second, the Mortal Realm of this world was built on unstable foundations. Space was unstable, time was unstable, and even the Mortal Realm itself was not necessarily as unshakable as people perceived.

Third, the power of Subspace had already invaded Pland. The Visions inside that small Cathedral in the Sixth District were proof of it. The shard of the Sun from eleven years ago might not have been the key part of the whole affair at all. In terms of "rank"… it was far more likely that Subspace itself had brought about Pland's current Anomaly.

Duncan put down his fountain pen and looked at the three lines he had written. They were not clues, but "premises" and "conclusions" that had a great deal to do with Pland's current state.

His gaze fell on the first line. It was the shortest, yet it was the foundation of everything. The “inspiration” for it came from an offhand remark he had overheard when he went to open an account at the city-state bank.

Thoughtful, he picked up the pen again and drew a line from that item to one of the clues above—the Cathedral in the Sixth District that was in a Space-Time Lock.

The corruption had started from the Cathedral. It showed itself as disordered time and space and an overlay of different “world-lines”. The level of corruption was very high. By the look of it, even the Storm Goddess’s monitoring of the Mortal Realm had been affected… So how exactly was this kind of corruption being carried out? Was what had been corrupted… really only the Cathedral itself?

He recalled what he had said when he parted ways with Shirley—that this matter ought to be made bigger, but an ordinary citizen’s report was not quite enough.

As he thought, a faint smile appeared on Duncan’s face. He turned his head and looked at the pigeon pacing back and forth on the windowsill.

The pigeon stopped at once and stared straight at Duncan: “There’s murderous intent!”

Duncan ignored it completely and snapped his fingers.

A tuft of ghostly green flame burst out of the spirit compass in AI’s chest. The spirit compass opened, and its needle began to spin. The boundary between the Mortal Realm and illusion blurred in an instant. Duncan’s vision swayed, and he stepped into the state of walking in the Spirit Realm. That familiar dark, chaotic space and the countless starlights filling it appeared before his eyes.

He stood still in the depths of the darkness and took a gentle breath to steady himself. Then he followed a faint sense and drew near a point of starlight not far away.

He came to the starlight. Without actually touching it, he could clearly sense the mind of that young Inquisitor. On the other side of this starlight was Vanna's spirit.

Compared to the first time he had found this point of starlight, Duncan could clearly feel that the connection between him and Vanna had grown much stronger. Her last visit to the antique shop with Heidi had strengthened the link between them, and that strengthened connection could now be put to use.

Duncan turned his head and looked into the darkness beside him. AI, in spirit form, was circling in midair in boredom. When the bird noticed its Master's gaze, it flew over at once: "Who is calling the fleet?"

"Remember how we connected to Shirley's mind last time?"

AI thought for a moment and tilted its head: "You have to pay extra!"

"This time it will indeed be a bit harder. The other party is a devout Saint, so her will should be much firmer than Shirley's, and it might even draw the Storm Goddess's attention," Duncan said with a slight nod. But he still slowly stretched out his finger, inching toward that cluster of starlight. "Still, the connection between Vanna and me has already been strengthened. If we only make a shallow contact and do no damage, it shouldn't be a big problem.

"After all, this is just a righteous complaint from a concerned captain."

The next second, his fingertip touched the starlight.

Waves of illusory surf seemed to come from some boundless distance, then vanished in an instant. Before Duncan even had time to notice the sound of the sea, he felt himself make contact with a mind.

…

Vanna rubbed her eyes and lowered her head. She saw that she was holding a thick file in her hands. She looked up again and saw that she was sitting in her room. Her dressing table was in front of her, and in the mirror of the table, her slightly tired face was reflected.

A brief daze rose from deep inside her, but she quickly shook her head and remembered what she had been doing.

She had been continuing her investigation into records of Heretic worship in the city-state of Pland before 1889. After leaving the archives, she had borrowed a portion of the documents she had not yet had time to study in detail from the old priest serving as the Warden there and brought the files home.

At the archives, she and that old priest had discovered an abnormal gap in the records for 1885, but in the end they had not found the files that had vanished. This unusual matter had raised her suspicions. As an Inquisitor who specialized in investigating Heretic cases, she had already decided this would be one of the main focuses of her next round of investigations.

She would assign clerical priests to look up files in several other archives in the city-state. She would have them extract public security reports for the corresponding years from City Hall. She would send Guardian squads to visit and watch the sites where Heretic worship had taken place that year. She would consult Bishop Valentine to see whether they could receive further instructions from the Goddess…

Vanna already had a rough plan for what came next. Before this series of actions unfolded, she first had to finish compiling all Heretic worship incidents between 1886 and 1889.

She glanced at the sky outside and saw the World’s Wound hanging high in the night. Its pale glow spilled over the whole city-state.

She lowered her head again and saw that she was only halfway through the thick file in her hands. Maybe she had been reading for too long and her eyes were tired. The lines of text looked a little blurry.

Wait, no!

Vanna suddenly snapped to attention. She slammed the file shut and turned to look out the window.

It was midnight now, the time when the World’s Wound had the strongest influence. Reading books at this hour was an extremely dangerous act. Even Stewards who had gone through special training avoided reading any text for that one hour around midnight. Let alone that what she had in front of her right now was a highly dangerous historical file she had borrowed from the archives!

A trained member of the Clergy would not make such a mistake… This was not the Mortal Realm. This was her own dream, a dream that was being influenced!

Vanna’s gaze sharpened. The instant she realized her dream had been invaded, she began to search the surroundings for any trace of Intruders. In the next second, she saw them—

On the dressing table right in front of her, in that oval mirror ringed with patterns, a dark and stern figure stood quietly in the shadows. Illusory green flames quietly burned along the edge of the mirror.

The figure, his expression gloomy and imposing, stood there and fixed a calm gaze on Vanna through the mirror. Only when Vanna looked up did he show a faint smile. A deep voice came from within the mirror: “Good evening, Vanna. This is our first meeting—but I have watched you for a long time. You may call me…”

“Captain Duncan!” Before the voice in the mirror finished speaking, Vanna reacted. This well-trained Inquisitor sprang backward a full two meters, kicking the stool out of the way as she moved. The moment she landed, she forced her mind into focus, pulled her greatsword out of thin air, and swung it down in a leaping strike!

Duncan: “…?!”

There was a deafening crash. The entire dressing table shattered, and the mirror exploded under the blow into countless pieces flying through the air. Duncan’s image turned into scattered light in front of Vanna’s eyes.

Shards of glass clattered to the floor. Vanna gripped her greatsword tight and swept a fierce gaze around her like a lioness already in battle. At the same time, she began to murmur a benediction and tried to use the mental self-control techniques she had trained in to break free of this corrupted dream and force herself awake.

Yet just as she felt herself about to reach the world of the Mortal Realm, that deep, commanding voice sounded again, echoing in her ears:

“Your reaction surprised me a little.”

Vanna’s eyes flew wide. She looked toward the source of the voice and saw only the broken fragments of the mirror scattered all over the room.

On the surface of every shard, illusory flames began to quietly rise. Inside every shard, a Captain Duncan stood silently in the darkness.

This legendary Great Terror, the moving calamity of the Boundless Sea, looked at the fully alert Vanna with a hint of helplessness in his gaze.

“Relax a little, child. I only want to talk to you about something,” came the voices of a thousand Captain Duncans, shaking Vanna’s resolve. “It concerns Pland…”

“So it’s the mirror…” the young Inquisitor murmured to herself.

Duncan: “Hm?”

Vanna did not answer. Instead, she angled the tip of her greatsword down toward the floor and suddenly smashed her fist into the blade!

There was a thunderous boom. The powerful impact turned into a controlled shockwave that raged through the room. In the next second, every smooth, mirror-like surface in the room turned to dust. Not a single intact reflective surface remained!

The room grew quiet again. Vanna let out a soft breath and slowly straightened up.

She saw Captain Duncan standing quietly in front of her.

No matter how she blinked or shifted her gaze, Captain Duncan remained at the center of her vision, his eyes fixed on hers in a gaze.

“Your guess was not quite accurate. It is not just mirrors, but anything smooth as a mirror,” the ghost captain’s dark, imposing voice sounded directly in her mind. “Right now, I am in your crystalline lenses.”

Chapter 167: A High-Level Report

To be honest, Duncan regretted saying that the moment the words left his mouth—he was genuinely afraid this straightforward Young Lady Vanna would destroy her own eyes on the spot…

The young Inquisitor's reaction had gone far beyond his expectations. He had imagined that a top villain like himself taking the initiative to appear would certainly trigger strong hostility in Vanna, but he had not expected her actions to be so decisive and fast. In almost the blink of an eye she had identified key elements such as Dream Invasion and Mirror Mediums and had carried out targeted countermeasures. This was completely different from when he invaded Shirley's dream before.

From start to finish, she even tried her best to avoid communicating with him, the Intruder. That was an "emergency measure" to keep spiritual corruption from spreading when a dream was invaded.

In fact, the difference between a trained high-ranking Inquisitor and some bastard wild-path supernatural was not small at all. If Duncan's own power had not been so bizarre, and if this entire intrusion had not been built entirely inside Vanna's own mind, then any slightly weaker Intruder would probably have been thrown out after a single exchange with her.

Now Vanna had calmed down. She only quietly watched the ghost captain who had appeared at the center of her vision. She had not acted on the impulse to destroy her own eyes, perhaps because she had realized this dream had already been completely invaded and ordinary expulsion methods were unlikely to work.

She closed her eyes, but Duncan still stood before her in the darkness, his figure becoming even gloomier. His form flickered between real and unreal in the light of the spirit form flame.

“What do you want,” the young Inquisitor finally spoke, her voice as cold and hard as steel. “How did you invade my dream?”

Her attitude was full of hostility. Duncan only found it interesting. The way this Inquisitor acted now was nothing like the polite, calm manner she had shown when she visited the antique shop.

He truly did not know what kind of reaction she would have if she ever learned the truth of the antique shop.

“I only want to tell you one thing,” Duncan skipped the small talk and spoke bluntly. “If you truly care about the safety of the city-state, you should go to the Sixth District and take a look at that small Cathedral.”

After he spoke, he closed his mouth and stood quietly amid the surrounding flames, maintaining a mysterious and imposing presence.

Vanna froze when she heard the ghost captain’s answer.

In that instant, it was as if something pierced a layer of the Veil and lifted a corner that had always been hidden in her mind. “Sixth District, small Cathedral”—these two words carved themselves sharply into her thoughts, leaving her slightly dazed.

But more than that brief daze, the Mortal Realm of her dream being corrupted by Captain Duncan stirred her heart much more strongly. She tried to offer a silent Prayer to the Goddess in her heart. However, the Goddess’s power could not pierce this layer of illusion. She watched the “captain” in front of her with deep wariness, but could not read any emotions from that shadowy figure that she could use to judge him.

After a few seconds, she finally bit down lightly, forced herself to stay calm, and spoke in a low, steady voice: “You invaded an Inquisitor’s dream just for… this?”

“Judge for yourself,” Duncan said calmly. “I look forward to what you will discover there.”

As he said this, he had already begun to feel his connection to this dream quickly become unstable.

A powerful repulsive force was starting to take effect.

He noticed that Vanna had not calmed down as much as she appeared. Though she was speaking with him on the surface, this young Inquisitor was resisting him, the Intruder, every second with sheer willpower. Her mind was so firm that she had struggled to the very edge of waking by will alone!

This made Duncan realize that the exchange had to end quickly. After he passed on the necessary information, he needed to leave behind a mysterious image and withdraw calmly.

He did not plan to explain too much to her. He did not expect to make his friendly stance clear or build any trust with Vanna with just a few words. The conflict between “Captain Duncan” and a city-state Inquisitor was not something that could be solved by smooth talking. If he explained too much, he would only look more suspicious and might even draw Vanna’s attention toward unnecessary directions.

The spirit form flames spreading through the darkness slowly drew back. Duncan’s figure began to retreat in Vanna’s field of vision.

But in the last few seconds before the connection broke, Vanna still could not hold back her question: “What exactly are you plotting for Pland?!”

In the darkness, Duncan lifted his head. Suddenly, a strong streak of mischief rose in his heart.

He fixed his gaze on the young Inquisitor through the dream, the corners of his mouth slowly lifting. In the ghostly green light of the spirit form flames, Vanna heard the most absurd and baffling sentence she had ever heard since becoming an Inquisitor:

“Order some fries.”

The dream collapsed with a roar, and the connection was completely severed.

In the void of chaotic darkness, Duncan stepped back half a step and looked at the starlight before him, which was flickering unsteadily.

AI, now in the form of a skeletal pigeon, flew through the darkness and landed on his shoulder, flapping its wings.

“No matter what wild thoughts she has next, at least one thing is certain,” Duncan glanced at AI and murmured as if to himself. “The two key pieces of information—Sixth District and the small Cathedral—have now entered the field of view of Pland’s Storm Grand Cathedral. For whatever reason, they will definitely launch the highest-level investigation there.”

Duncan’s plan was simple and effective. All he needed was to pry the lid off that small Cathedral in the Sixth District and draw the attention of the Deep Sea Church over there. As for what Vanna and the priests behind her would think about everything afterward, that did not matter at all.

The greatest moving calamity on the Boundless Sea had personally come to an Inquisitor in a dream to report Heretic corruption inside the city-state. That alone was enough to make those priests ponder themselves to death. But before they finished puzzling it out, they would definitely throw all their strength at that small Cathedral. By then, whatever secrets the Cathedral hid would be dug out by them.

Of course, during this investigation, Vanna might waste some effort because of the existence of the Vanished, but that was just a minor detail.

When he thought back to the little stunt he had pulled at the end of the dream, a faint smile appeared on Duncan's face.

"Order some fries?" AI, perched on his shoulder, noticed the smile and tilted its head. "Finely dice them for a topping?"

"…Your language is getting more and more broken," Duncan frowned. "Still, having some fries tomorrow morning is not a bad idea. I can use the chance to teach Alice how to make some proper food."

…

Vanna's eyes snapped open.

There was no lamp light in the room. Only the pale, cold glow of the World's Wound shone through the window into the bedroom. In the dim light, all the furnishings seemed covered in mottled shadows.

Her heart was pounding. It felt as if hot iron bars had been shoved into her skull. The dull ache from severe mental exhaustion and extreme tension pulsed between her two temple points. Her nightgown had been soaked with sweat and now clung cold and uncomfortable to her skin.

But this discomfort was nothing compared to that dream that had been invaded by corruption.

Vanna sat up in bed and carefully looked around. She slowly blinked a few times, then closed her eyes and opened them again.

Each time, her heart thumped hard twice. She was testing whether she had really shaken off that ghost captain's "phantom", yet she still feared that his figure would appear in her field of vision the very next second.

Only after she confirmed that she had escaped the intrusion and that this was indeed the world of the Mortal Realm did she finally let out a long breath.

In all her years as an Inquisitor, she had rarely been this tense.

Vanna got out of bed and went to the dressing table not far away.

The dressing table stood there intact, and only her own reflection appeared in the mirror.

She stood in front of the mirror for several seconds, as if to check every detail in it. Then she shook her head hard, pulled open the drawer of the dressing table, and took out a Storm Rune Dagger carved with runes of storms and waves.

She held the Holy Relic, cut her skin, and let fresh blood soak into the runes. Then she offered a Prayer to the Storm Goddess.

In the short Prayer, she heard gentle waves sounding by her ear. The Goddess’s protection, as always, soothed her restless heart.

After reestablishing her connection with the Goddess, Vanna finally relaxed. Then she briskly changed out of her sweat-soaked nightclothes, put on clothes for going out as fast as she could, grabbed the greatsword by the bed, and pushed the door open to leave the room.

A short time later, a private car driven by a steam core broke the quiet of the Upper City center. Under the bright gas streetlamps, Vanna drove straight toward the Grand Cathedral.

She had to tell Bishop Valentine what had happened tonight as soon as possible, along with the strange things she had discovered in the archives earlier. The situation was already far more complicated than expected. This was no longer an affair that Inquisitors alone could handle.

If necessary, Pland might even need to contact the Storm Grand Cathedral that was patrolling the Boundless Sea.

Vanna’s gaze was firm. Her breathing was steady. Her thoughts were clear.

But suddenly, a bit of hesitation rose in her heart again.

She recalled the strange scene at the very end of that dream.

Order some fries… what did that even mean?!

Chapter 168: Warnings Spreading

The sleepy Bishop Valentine saw Inquisitor Vanna rush into the Cathedral in the middle of the night, and the moment he heard her first words, the old man woke up completely.

“Captain Duncan entered your dream?!” Bishop Valentine stared at Vanna in shock. He even wondered if he was still half asleep. “That ghost captain came to you on his own… just to tell you a location and have you investigate it?”

“It is absolutely true, even though I know how unbelievable it sounds.” Vanna nodded hard. On her way here she had already guessed this would be his reaction, but there was nothing she could do. Her confusion was no lighter than Valentine’s. “The small cathedral in the Sixth District… I spoke very little with that ghost captain, and this was the most important information he revealed.”

The old bishop fell silent. In the quiet, he turned around and looked up at the statue of the Storm Goddess at the far end of the sanctuary. After who knew how long, he finally broke the silence in a low voice: “Vanna, do you remember the corruption you picked up at that cult ritual site in the sewers? After that, we carried out an emergency purification. Now it seems…”

“I understand what you mean.” Vanna drew a slow breath, her expression still calm. “Now it seems our purification never actually succeeded. The Vanished is still chasing me, and that ghost captain has already extended his power into my dreams.”

“Are you still clear-headed?” Valentine turned back, his gaze fixed quietly on Vanna’s eyes.

“I am clear-headed. I tested it on my way here. I can fully recite my own name and the Goddess’s name, and recite passages from the Storm Canon.” Vanna nodded. “For now, the corruption seems shallow. Only my dreams are affected. It has not yet spread to my body and actions in the Mortal Realm.”

“Shallow corruption that we still cannot pull out…” Valentine’s tone grew low, his eyes full of worry. “Like an irreversible countdown. And you are the Inquisitor of the Pland city-state. No one can take your place in the short term…”

Vanna understood what the old bishop was trying to say.

She had already suffered mental corruption from a high-level supernatural power. As the Church’s Inquisitor, this “fortress” of hers was already being slowly breached. A fortress about to fall was unreliable, because no one knew how far this corruption would go. No one knew whether the Vanna who woke up the next morning would still be Vanna. Right now she still served the Storm Goddess, but in the next second… no one knew whom she might be loyal to.

If it had been an ordinary guardian or a Father who suffered this kind of corruption, the problem would have been easy to handle. A period of confinement and an exorcism ritual were simple enough. Or, if the city-state were peaceful, she could have temporarily handed her duties to a Deputy and gone into the deepest part of the sanctuary to receive the highest-level “Sacred Quarantine” and “Divine purification”. But…

Now this “Inquisitor” was in an irreplaceable position. Even if they requested aid from the Storm Church headquarters, it would not solve the problem quickly.

“I cannot leave my post.” After a short silence, Vanna shook her head. She knew she was giving the old bishop a hard problem, but she had to keep fulfilling her duties. “I have a very bad feeling. We are facing a real, massive crisis. This crisis might not even come from the Vanished or the Sun fragment. An even greater shadow is lurking inside the city-state. At a time like this, I cannot hand the Inquisitor’s duties to anyone, not even to my most trusted Deputy.”

Valentine heard a different kind of seriousness in Vanna’s tone and immediately frowned slightly: “A crisis beyond the Vanished and the Sun fragment? Have you discovered something recently?”

“I have been investigating some things in the archives. I was actually planning to tell you tomorrow morning, but now it seems the situation is far more complicated than expected, and its urgency needs to be raised.” Vanna nodded, her face unusually serious. “I began to doubt the time node of the Sun fragment’s appearance in Pland. Based on that, I called up records from 1889 and earlier. In them I found a large number of heretic worship records. They were all marked as low urgency, but they were strange and very dense…”

As Vanna slowly explained, Bishop Valentine’s eyes opened wider and wider.

“These records were just lying quietly in our archives?” When Vanna finished, Valentine cried out, his face full of disbelief. “All this time, no one noticed? Not even that missing year, 1885…”

“No one noticed. It is as if someone ‘stole’ a part of our city-state. Certain obvious pieces of the Mortal Realm simply vanished from everyone’s sight.” Vanna spoke in a low voice. “And that kind of disappearance… does not look like something the Sun fragment could cause.”

Valentine tightened his grip on his scepter. His knuckles turned slightly white from the force.

“What connection do you think there is between this and the information ‘Captain Duncan’ passed to you in your dream?” he suddenly asked.

“I am not sure. First, stealing Mortal Realm from a city-state is not an ability of the Vanished. Second, if this really were the work of that ghost captain, he would have no reason to then corrupt my dreams just to tell me key clues. That does not match the rough and chaotic behavior style recorded about him.” Vanna analyzed calmly. “Unless… he suddenly changed his nature, turned into some vicious demon who plays with the world. Or…”

“Or what?”

“Or he became someone very concerned about the city-state’s safety. A warm-hearted citizen who comes to me to report any dangerous factor he sees.” Vanna spread her hands.

“Ahem, that is a Subspace-level joke.” Valentine coughed at once, then glared at Vanna. “Do not joke like this when you know you are already under the gaze of a high-level supernatural being. It makes me doubt your mental state.”

He thumped his chest a couple of times. After he steadied his breath, he again fixed his gaze on Vanna: “Besides you, who else knows about the anomaly you found in the archives?”

Vanna thought for a moment, then shook her head: “Only I know. I went to check on my own…”

She suddenly paused, as if her thoughts had snagged for a second, then shook her head again: “I went by myself to check the files.”

“Good… If there really is a conscious hand behind this, they probably have not noticed that their scheme has been exposed.” Valentine let out a breath, then had to admit she had been right just now. “You really cannot leave your post now… You must already have an investigation plan for those records, yes?”

“Yes. It includes coordinated actions with City Hall.”

“Start tomorrow. I will give you every support.” Valentine nodded at once. “In addition, I will also report what happened here to the Pope. I hope the great Storm Cathedral can provide us with some help…”

As he spoke, the old man thought for a few seconds, then asked: “Can you still pray normally to the Goddess?”

“Yes.” Vanna answered at once. “My connection with the Goddess has not been affected by that dream.”

Valentine frowned: “But the Goddess has not given any revelation or warning about your mental corruption?”

“…No.” Vanna hesitated, then still nodded in admission. “The Goddess has not warned me.”

Valentine rubbed his chin. After thinking deeply for a moment, he suddenly raised his head and fixed his gaze on Vanna again: “For the time being, you must come back to the Cathedral to rest every night. Do not sleep anywhere outside the Cathedral. Also, you must carry the Storm Canon with you at all times when you are out. And if, while you are outside, you feel anomalous drowsiness or fatigue, you must immediately go to the nearest cathedral. Can you do that?”

“I can.”

“…Sigh, I hope you will not think of this as some kind of harsh treatment or doubt.” The old bishop sighed. Even though Vanna agreed very firmly, he still could not help explaining. “You cannot leave your post right now, and there is no priest in Pland ranked higher than you who can act as your ‘supervisor’. This is a necessary arrangement, made on the premise of keeping you able to perform your basic duties…”

“Do not worry, of course I understand.” Vanna showed a faint smile and instead comforted the old bishop before her. “I know as well as you what kind of dangerous things we are fighting. Compared to those seniors who died because they lacked experience and theory, we are already very fortunate to still be fighting under the protection of rules.”

She paused, then went on: “So, about the small cathedral in the Sixth District…”

“It must be investigated. No matter what purpose that ghost captain had in coming to you, we have to go and take a look at that cathedral.” Valentine nodded slowly. “And… when I tried to recall it just now, I could not even remember who is in charge there. It seems something really is wrong.”

“All right. I will personally lead a team there tomorrow.”

“Mm.” Valentine nodded slightly, then looked at Vanna with curiosity. “Aside from the matter of the small cathedral, what else did that ghost captain say to you?”

If he had not asked, it would have been better. The moment he did, Vanna’s expression turned strange.

Valentine asked: “…Why that look on your face?”

“He did say one more sentence. A very bizarre sentence.” Vanna’s face was full of hesitation. “I do not know whether we should take it seriously…”

“There is no ‘should’ about it. The more unbelievable something is, the more likely it is the key!” Valentine’s eyes widened at once. “What did he say?”

Vanna hesitated for two seconds, then finally let out a long breath and said very seriously: “Make some fries.”

Valentine: “…”

After a moment of silence, the old bishop finally spoke again: “Really?”

“Absolutely. As real as my faith in the Goddess.”

“…Ah. Then that really is… really a bit too unbelievable…”

Chapter 169: Stepping into the Veil

“Got it? Fries are made like this. It is very simple. Just make sure you neither burn them nor leave them half raw. You do not need to stick your face over the pot and stare the whole time, and you do not need to taste for salt. Remember?”

On the Vanished’s morning, Duncan stood in the kitchen, speaking very seriously as he guided a very nervous Alice. In the pot of oil in front of the two of them, still slightly pale fries rolled up and down in the hot oil, making a constant sizzling sound.

“I… I remember!” Alice stared unblinking at the boiling oil, one hand still gripping a kitchen knife. On the cutting board beside her lay potato chunks she had cut into terrible shapes. Those would become ingredients for other dishes.

Duncan looked at the pot, then at the doll beside it, and nodded slightly. In his heart he thought that such a simple task really should not be something this silly thing could mess up again. Then he noticed the knife in Alice’s hand and felt a little uncomfortable: “…Can you put the knife down first? When you finish cutting things, do not keep holding it.”

A cursed doll standing in the kitchen with a kitchen knife, radiating killing intent toward potatoes, was not a very lucky sight.

It felt as if the very next second the background music would switch to some scary track, and a blood-red health bar would pop up above Alice’s head, stabbing right out of the screen.

“Oh… oh!” Alice finally reacted. She hurriedly put the knife back on the side, then waved at the captain with great confidence. “Captain, you can go back now! I already learned this. You and AI just wait to eat!”

Duncan stared at Alice for quite a while. After he was sure this doll really was not going to make any more trouble, he finally relaxed a little. At the same time, a feeling of emotion rose in his heart.

After all this time, the Vanished could finally produce fries steadily.

…

On the second floor of the antique shop, at the dining table, Nina, who had a medical patch stuck on her forehead, raised her head curiously and glanced at her uncle: “Uncle, I have wanted to ask. You have been frowning all morning… and just now you suddenly looked like you relaxed and let out a breath…”

“Did I? I did not notice…” Duncan froze for a moment. His attention crossed the vast distance in an instant and fell back into this little antique shop. Then he smiled and shook his head. “It is nothing. I just remembered some numbers in the account book and did some mental math. I just worked it out.”

“Oh.” Nina nodded. “That makes sense. I thought your nerves were all tight just now.”

Duncan did not answer. He kept his calm smile, but in his heart he could not help muttering a line: [This young lady’s observation skills are pretty sharp.]

At this time Nina leaned forward and glanced at the small window at the end of the second-floor corridor that faced the street. After hesitating for a moment, she whispered: “Shirley did not come today.”

“…She has her own place to live.” Duncan looked at the young lady in front of him, whose face now showed a bit of loneliness. “And you still have to go to school today. How would you have time to go out and play with her?”

“I should have asked where she lives.” Nina spoke again. “Then when she does not have time to come find me, I can go find her.”

Duncan did not say anything at first. After two or three seconds of silence, he asked softly: “Do you like this new friend that much? You actually have not spent that much time together.”

“Shirley is really nice. She even saved my life in the City Museum.” Nina answered at once. “And… and…”

“And what?”

“And when she was staying here, I chatted with her and Dog at night and asked about her. I found out she has always only had Dog with her. They live in a little alley in the shantytown. At night there are not even proper streetlights there. The house lets in wind and rain, and I…”

“Nina.” Duncan suddenly interrupted the girl in front of him, his expression a little serious. “Friendship cannot be built on pity. That is even more true for a child like Shirley.”

Nina froze, then raised her head to meet Duncan’s eyes. After a moment she slowly scratched the hair at her temple. “Uncle, you suddenly said something very philosophical…”

Duncan: “…”

“But you did remind me. I might be a little bit sympathetic.” Nina went on. “But… I just want her to live better. I can feel it. Even though she was always strangely nervous when she was living here, she was actually very happy. I… if I make this kind of judgment for her, am I being a bit self-righteous?”

Duncan did not answer. He seemed to fall into brief thought. After a moment he smiled and shook his head. “Do not think so much. Next time we see Shirley, we will ask where she lives. As for now… hurry and finish eating. It is almost time for school.”

“Okay!” Nina nodded obediently. Then, as if something had suddenly occurred to her, excitement lit up her face. “Right, does that mean today I can… ride that new bicycle to school?”

“No.” Duncan lifted his eyelids and refused without hesitation. “Did you forget how badly you fell yesterday?”

As he spoke, the scene from yesterday after Nina came home rose in his mind. The girl’s first glance had landed on the brand-new bicycle parked on the first floor. She had almost jumped in place from excitement, then rushed to climb on and try it. After about thirty seconds, there was a loud crash, and she fell at the doorway…

She still had a patch on her forehead now.

“I… I thought riding a bicycle would be easy.” Nina lowered her head in embarrassment. “I saw that my classmates can all…”

Duncan sighed.

He really should have thought of it. If there had never been a bicycle in the antique shop and Nina had not had any friends for so many years, how could she possibly have had the chance to learn to ride? When he bought the bicycle, he had completely ignored this point.

“Take the bus to school today. Do not run there. Our family does not lack this little bit of fare now.” Duncan took a few coins out of his pocket and put them in front of Nina. “When you come back, I will teach you how to ride. It really is not hard. With how clever you are, you will probably learn it in a few days."

Nina was a little dejected at first, but soon she became cheerful again and nodded happily. "Oh!"

After a while, Nina ran out through the front door of the antique shop. Duncan stood at the small window on the second floor of the shop, watching the girl's figure cross the street in the morning light and run toward the bus stop not far away.

More and more carriages, traffic, and street noises were echoing through the alleys. This district was slowly waking up in the sunlight. Golden-red sunlight spread along the distant rooflines, like a shimmering, rising Veil.

A Veil of flame that swept across the entire city-state.

Duncan's expression suddenly froze. He frowned and fixed his gaze on the dense rows of houses in the distance.

The majestic scene of the flaming Veil sweeping across the city-state vanished from the glow of the clouds, as if the image that had just flashed into his mind had been a baseless illusion.

Yet the deep crease between Duncan's brows did not relax at all. He just kept staring into the distance, as if trying to find another layer of Mortal Realm overlapping behind that magnificent dawn.

Only after several minutes did he slowly pull his gaze back.

He focused for a moment, then beckoned toward the empty air beside him: "AI."

In the next second, a ball of ghost-green flame burst suddenly in the air. An undead bird coiled out of the fire and took shape. AI flapped her wings and landed on Duncan’s shoulder, burping loudly as she shouted: “Burp… who is calling… burp… the fleet?”

Duncan’s mood broke apart at once. He turned his head and stared, dumbfounded, at the pigeon that looked almost twice as plump as before. “…How much did you eat on the ship?”

AI flapped her wings and stretched her neck as far as it would go. “The hour of feasting has come… burp!”

Duncan looked at the bird without expression. After a moment he sighed. “No wonder Alice was fussing over there for so long and still brought so little food into the cabin. So you intercepted it all… Fine, we will call it not wasting food. Can you still fly? Head to the Sixth District.”

The pigeon let out a loud squawk at once: “Mission accepted! Mission accepted!”

In the next second, there was a flash of fire at the small window on the second floor of the antique shop. The swollen fat pigeon leaped out of the window and wobbled away through the air in the direction of the Sixth District.

At the same time, deep in the Sixth District, two dark gray steam cars were moving along an empty, chilly street.

The tall Vanna sat in the back seat of one of the cars. Her greatsword rested at her side, and she was quietly using her gaze to watch the scene on the street outside.

Because she was not sure what state that small cathedral was in, Vanna had not driven an eye-catching steam walker directly into the area. Instead, she had chosen to personally lead a small elite unit in quietly first, while the support team waited on standby in the nearby neighborhoods.

After entering the Sixth District, she had indeed sensed the “atmosphere” here at once… and it felt very wrong.

A community that was far too lacking in vitality. Residents who were sparse, lazy, and slow to react to outside stimuli. Old facilities that were long out of repair, even beyond what the Lower City’s bottom line should allow.

An aura lingered over everything. The entire district gave her the feeling… that time had frozen in a crack that the world had forgotten.

Chapter 170: Loosening

After a long time, Vanna finally pulled her gaze back from the car window.

Her main purpose in coming here today was to investigate that small cathedral, but after she entered the Sixth District, she already felt that the atmosphere of the whole area was not quite right. It made her faintly feel… that maybe every inch of this neighborhood needed to be investigated.

After thinking for a moment, she reached out and picked up a thick stack of papers from the seat beside her.

She had requested these files from City Hall before this operation. Using her authority as an Inquisitor and the relevant articles in the Special Execution Regulations for Anomaly Cases, she had obtained all the municipal records related to the Sixth District from the past few years. On the way here, she had already read part of them.

These documents from City Hall were not top secret, nor did they involve any high?level supernatural case, cold case, or major case. On the contrary, what Vanna had asked for was the simplest, most basic kind of information —

Gas meter readings, electricity payments, shop taxes, water supply, heating, garbage collection, security patrols…

Pages rustled as Vanna’s eyes swept quickly over the documents.

If the past few years as an Inquisitor had taught her any “case?handling experience”, one rule was absolutely vital—

The faint traces of supernatural Visions were often hidden in the most ordinary scenes of everyday life.

The Boundless Sea watched on all sides. Anomalies and Visions filled the Mortal Realm. Under the gaze of these things that threatened all living beings, the peaceful “daily life” inside the city?states was the greatest treasure in this world. The ordinary people of Pland might have already taken their peaceful days for granted, but those warriors who fought Anomalies and Visions year after year knew very well—

A shaft of sunlight in the morning, a hot meal on the table, a hawker calling on the street, and a good?night said before sleep—these were all unbroken chains of sacred miracles.

They were the grand scene Mortals had spent ten thousand years building in this crumbling world.

Any disturbance from an supernatural Vision would leave a scratch on that scene.

The Guardian at the wheel spoke from the front of the car. This young Church warrior had noticed the slight frown on Vanna’s face and asked: “Did you find something wrong? Are the municipal records missing?”

“On the contrary. All the municipal records are complete,” Vanna shook her head lightly. “The water, power, gas, heating, and sewage logs are all here, and they all stay at very even values—suspiciously reasonable.”

“Then your expression…”

“There are no public security cases,” Vanna lifted her eyelids slightly. “The section for public security is completely blank. Also, the records of newborns are blank, and the records of resident deaths are blank as well.”

The Guardian driving widened his eyes a little. In the rearview mirror, Vanna could see the look of disbelief on the young man’s face.

“A clear Anomaly, isn’t it,” Vanna said softly. “One neighborhood, all these years. The population neither rises nor falls. No public security cases at all, not even a single fistfight. Even the safest part of the Upper City can’t reach that level. Yet all the water, power, gas, and heating records are there. It feels as if…”

She paused and looked out the window: “As if all the residents here are a herd of tame phantoms… They live quietly inside this fenced?off place, neither increasing nor decreasing. There is no conflict inside, no contact with the outside. They only go on calmly consuming resources, sending a regular signal back to City Hall that says, ‘Everything is normal here.’ And yet, even though it is so wrong, no one has paid attention to it for so many years.”

The car fell silent. Only the dull sound of the steam core running could be heard. After an unknown time, Vanna suddenly felt the car jolt.

“We’ve arrived at the small cathedral.”

Vanna raised her head and saw, right outside the car window, the community cathedral that had somehow slipped out of the “view” of the main cathedral.

From the outside, it looked as if it had been abandoned for more than ten years.

This was the place that terrifying ghost captain had pointed out to her.

In her mind, she could not help seeing again those burning ghostly flames and that gloomy, majestic figure frozen at the center of her vision. In the next second, she took a deep breath, softly recited the holy name of the Storm Goddess Gamona F, picked up her weapon, pushed the door open, and stepped out of the car.

A bleak, cold wind blew from the end of the street, lifting the dry fallen leaves by the roadside. The black?clad Guardians followed beside the Inquisitor, cautiously closing in on the abandoned small cathedral.

The fallen leaves cracked softly underfoot, sounding like fire burning rotten wood, crackling and popping.

Suddenly the sound of flapping wings came from above. Amid the swirling leaves, Vanna looked up and saw a White Dove flutter down and land on the cathedral’s spire.

The dove tilted its head, as if curiously casting a gaze on the Guardians spreading out around the area.

“A White Dove… a good omen for calm seas…” For some reason, this odd thought flashed through Vanna’s mind. Then she ignored the dove that had suddenly flown in, stepped forward, and gently pushed open the half?closed doors of the small cathedral.

Warm, bright light filled her vision. A Nun with a gentle smile on her face appeared before her.

“Hello, Sister. It has been a long time since anyone came to this cathedral…”

The Nun’s soft voice reached the ears of the Guardian warriors.

…

One gas lamp after another stood in neat rows between the shelves. Their bright light drove away the Shadows among the ancient files. Heavy, slow footsteps echoed between the shelves, mixed with the old priest’s low muttering:

“Row seven, column six, row seven, column six… The records for 1885 should be here… they should be here…”

The old priest stopped in front of the shelf. He looked up and saw the shelf towering over him like a giant, silently gazing down. The files that carried the city?state's memories of history were arranged neatly in the giant's bones and flesh.

His gaze fell on several of the folders, and he slowly reached out his hand.

His brass clockwork prosthetic gave off a slightly rusty, grinding sound as it moved.

"Finally found it!" The old priest's eyes suddenly lit up, and he could not hide the excitement in his voice. "So it was hidden here… We searched for so long before, when I was looking together with Inquisitor Vanna!"

His fingers touched those few files.

Heavy, slow footsteps echoed between the shelves, mixed with the old priest's low muttering: "Row seven, column six, row seven, column six…"

"Finally found it!" The old priest's eyes suddenly lit up. He reached toward those files. His brass clockwork prosthetic creaked with a rusty grinding noise. "So it was hidden here. We looked for it for so long before, when I searched together with the Inquisitor!"

His fingers were just about to touch those files.

Heavy, slow footsteps echoed between the shelves.

…

The old priest suddenly stopped walking.

He lifted his head, his neck stiff as if it had rusted. He quietly cast his gaze over the huge shelves stretching out in neat rows ahead. One gas lamp after another burned between them, and the pillars carved with wave patterns stood silently among the shelves.

A gentle sound of waves suddenly rose in his heart, making the old man's cloudy mind clear for a moment.

"The archive's wards have been activated? Who activated them? Why? Was it me? When did I activate these wards? What am I doing here?"

The old priest shivered, and instinctively reached for the large?caliber revolver at his waist. The next second, he noticed something strange about his body.

The arm that had once moved so freely had somehow become stiff and heavy. The screech of grinding parts sounded like a pile of scrap metal that had been left to rust for years, crushing against itself.

Startled, he looked at the arm that had been replaced with a brass clockwork prosthetic, and saw only a limb covered in patches of rust. Verdigris and foul fluid seeped from the metal seams and stained the whole arm. As his gaze moved down, he saw his tattered clothes and a left leg that kept leaking black machine oil.

It was as if he had been trudging through this archive for years.

The old priest stared blankly at the marks on his body. The memories that had been sealed away finally loosened a little. He suddenly remembered many things, so distant they felt like they had happened in a past life—an Inquisitor visiting, investigating records, strange logs of Heretic worship, entire years that had vanished…

Then the Inquisitor had left the archive, while he stayed behind to keep searching for the missing records of 1885…

The gentle sound of waves rose again, clearer than before, yet still as if it came through a thick Veil, from another time and space.

But that distant, hazy sound of waves made the old priest's mind even clearer than before. As his memories loosened, his reason and judgment rushed back. In the next second, he realized what might be happening.

A vast Vision—not some single Anomaly, not a single malicious supernatural being, not a mastermind hiding behind the scenes, nor one isolated supernatural phenomenon, but a vast, all?encompassing Vision!

The city?state of Pland was right at the center of this gigantic Vision!

“This is bad!”

The old priest cried out and turned, dragging his no?longer?nimble body as he ran toward his post.

The next second, he forced himself to a halt.

A strange black figure had appeared in the archive without him knowing when.

Inside this enclosed room, that eerie figure was holding a bizarre Black Parasol, as if to block some sunlight that was nowhere to be seen.

Chapter 171: The Fork in History

The figure was tall, even a bit taller than Inquisitor Vanna. The figure was thin, as if the black long coat wrapped only a withered strip of flesh. In this closed room he held a big umbrella, its lowered canopy hiding the intruder’s face. Yet with just one glance, the old priest could see profane, twisted Shadows clinging to that body.

“The Black Sun’s dregs?” The old man stared at the figure in shock, then roared in anger: “You dare step into this holy archive!”

The next second, a loud bang shattered the archive’s silence. The old priest had already drawn the large?caliber revolver at his waist. The bullet, blessed by divine blessing, roared out with fire and thunder. But perhaps the old man’s body was too slow. Before the shot rang out, the figure had already moved. Two blurry shadows sprang from the hem of his coat. The first shadow blocked the bullet in midair. The other crossed ten meters in an instant and lashed the old priest’s shoulder.

A harsh screech of metal scraping rang out as the old priest’s body flew sideways and slammed into a nearby shelf. The huge shelf shook violently, and countless books and files tumbled down.

The strange black figure with the umbrella took a step and walked toward where the old priest had fallen. A low, chaotic muttering came from within its body, sounding like foul flesh rolling and boiling in a pot.

Yet in the next second, a furious shout came from the pile of fallen books, and the old priest leaped out of it. A sharp steel sword had appeared in his hand at some point. The sword whistled through the air as it slashed swiftly toward the figure that had invaded the archive.

The intruder stopped abruptly. The Black Umbrella tilted slightly and blocked the fierce strike. Sparks burst from the clash between steel and the umbrella ribs. The old priest rolled as he landed, and his longsword did not pause. It arced in a tight circle and came slanting in from another angle, cutting toward the intruder’s side!

The longsword spun and swung, iron rang on iron, and the old man’s mechanical limbs let out a low, hoarse roar. After many years of silence, the Storm Swordsmanship he had honed for decades once again showed its might. Continuous spinning and sweeping slashes poured toward the profane enemy like waves that would not cease. Between each arc traced by the blade, faint phantom waves took shape layer by layer. Those phantom waves grew more solid and heavy, and at last began to carry the impact and force of real surf!

The Storm Goddess’s power filled the unending arc strikes. The heavy pressure of the waves poured into the specially forged steel sword. Every cut came down with the tang of sea wind, making the air and the floor around them tremble.

The intruder’s Black Umbrella was unnaturally hard and did not budge under more than a dozen slashes, but the figure holding it kept retreating. Under the piling impact of the waves, it was forced back step by step to the edge of a nearby shelf. Faint, irritated growls and whispers came from within its body, full of a charm that could unsettle the mind.

But the old priest had already sealed off all unnecessary senses and paid no attention at all to the noise the intruder made. He knew his attacks must not stop. Storm Swordsmanship required continuous pressure, like waves that could not break in the middle. And the “dregs” split off from the Sunspawn all carried power that could not be underestimated. If his suppression faltered for even a moment, the enemy would slip free of the fight in the very next second.

At the same time, the old priest's heart was full of shock and doubt. How had this profane scrap slipped into the archive? This cathedral was saturated with the Goddess's power. It held countless mechanisms and wards, with over a dozen layers of open and hidden guards from inside to out. Even the Sunspawn itself would be blocked if it came in person. How could they have failed to notice the intrusion of a single "dreg"?

"Could it be… that this dreg did not enter the cathedral through normal space and time?"

Just then, a sharp sound of something cutting through the air suddenly rang out. Every muscle in the old priest's body tensed at once. As a seasoned warrior, he reacted instantly. His longsword did not stop, only shifted its angle a little, ready to meet the intruder's sneak attack.

A sharp pain shot up from his side.

The unbroken flow of sword light stopped. The old priest stared in shock at the tentacle that had pierced his body. Blood slowly dripped from the hem of his ragged clothes. His brass prosthetic limb radiated scorching heat, and the heavily worn, rusted gears inside gave out one last burst of noise before grinding to a halt with a squeal.

Only after another second did the old priest realize what had happened—he had grown old.

He, and all the gears in his body, had grown old.

With a disgusting sound, the ugly tentacle slowly withdrew back into the intruder's clothes. The inhuman thing slowly approached the old man, who was still using his longsword to support himself and barely remained standing. It lowered the Black Umbrella and revealed a “head” that kept swelling and shrinking, changing shape like a blooming flower of flesh. A hoarse voice came from its “pistil”.

It was Common Speech, barely recognizable:

“Go tell your god that this ugly age is over. The Sun will rise again from history…”

“History…” The old priest’s body trembled. He had not yet fallen, but he no longer had the strength to lift his sword. All at once, he understood: “You have corrupted history?!”

The intruder seemed to laugh. Though it was only a blooming flower of flesh, a hint of mockery still seemed to show in its trembling “petals” and crooked teeth: “On the day the great fire rose, everyone’s wishes were fulfilled.”

The old priest slowly lowered his head. Life quickly drained from his aged body. He seemed at last to give up his struggle in the mortal world and quietly wait for the final moment to come.

The intruder seemed rather bored by this outcome. It raised the umbrella again, ready to leave.

Yet in the very next second, a thunderous grinding of metal suddenly rang out. From the mechanical prosthetics that had completely stopped came once more the sound of gears turning and oil pumps building pressure. The intruder turned its head in shock and saw only a flash of sword light rushing toward it.

“Please bear witness!”

The old priest let out a roar. The steel sword slashed at the intruder’s body without the slightest hesitation. This time there was no Black Umbrella to block it, and no tentacle to interfere. The blade, carrying all of his remaining strength, sliced through the enemy almost like tearing a strip of cloth.

Caught off guard, the intruder was cut in two by a single stroke. The two halves of its body fell to the floor.

But in the very next second, each half of the severed body began to emit a sickening squirm of flesh. Countless tiny tendrils sprouted from within, spreading outward as they groped for each other and began to fuse back together.

The intruder slowly reshaped itself, and low, angry growls came from deep inside it.

But the old priest had already lowered his sword, and his body slowly toppled to the floor. With his cloudy eyes, he watched the intruder stand up again bit by bit, and a look of relief appeared on his face.

He knew that even his last strength could not kill this monster. Even as a dreg, it was still a dreg of the Sunspawn, far beyond what a dying, aged Guardian with only a steel sword could truly oppose. But at least, before his death, he had proved his loyalty to the Goddess.

The Storm had borne witness. It could end now.

The intruder stood up again. In its anger, tendrils thick with corruption spread from its body, and rows of sharp teeth jutted from the edges of those tendrils.

In the old priest’s sight, he saw flames rise up behind the intruder. Fire spread through the archive. The entire cathedral burned in a roaring blaze.

The statue of the Goddess collapsed in the distance with a crash.

A Pland completely consumed by flames appeared in his vision. A History Branch where a shard of the Sun had successfully descended and all of Pland’s Guardians had been wiped out unfolded before his eyes.

The old man’s consciousness sank slowly into this History Branch born of corruption. Yet suddenly, out of the corner of his eye, he saw something else.

A tuft of ghostly green fire was spreading discreetly through the blazing inferno, flowing along the seams between light and shadow, along the phantoms rising in the flames. The green flames split and flowed everywhere.

Behind a collapsed shelf nearby, a small tongue of green flame seemed to suddenly “catch a scent”. It sprang forward like a hound that had found its prey, pouncing on the intruder just as it was about to deliver the final blow.

The old priest watched all of this in a daze. His consciousness was already drifting between reality and illusion, and he could hardly tell whether what he saw belonged to the Mortal Realm or was only a hallucination. He saw the intruder suddenly wrapped in green flames. The body that held the power of the Sunspawn melted like wax. He heard its dying screams echo through the entire archive, filled with unbelievable madness and terror.

Then everything went quiet.

The sea of fire faded. The corrupted history withdrew for the moment back into the depths of the Veil. The archive, wedged between two History Branches, fell into dead silence. No one visited. No one came.

Only an old man who had died with his sword in hand lay quietly on the floor. His half?open eyes stared toward the distance. In one eye was the reflection of a Pland that had survived in peace. In the other was the reflection of the History Branch where the Sun had destroyed the world.

But he no longer belonged to either one. He had neither died in that great fire, nor survived it.

Cooling blood flowed from beneath the old priest’s body. As if guided by a powerful will, the blood crept quietly over the floor, gathering into a trail of footprints that slowly extended toward the nearby Administrator console…

Chapter 172: Vanna’s Discovery

Vanna stood quietly at the stairs leading down to the underground sanctum, looking at the black door that had just restored itself before everyone’s eyes.

Three hours earlier, she had led her team to this abandoned cathedral. Inside, she saw warm and bright lamplight, a main hall that looked completely normal, a nun quietly at prayer, and a clean and tidy pulpit.

Two hours earlier, she had shaken off that obviously strange “nun”, led the Guardians to find the underground sanctum, and, after opening the sanctum door, finally seen the truth inside—an underground space buried in darkness, a sword-wielding nun who seemed to have fallen in battle only a short time ago, battle marks all over the cellar, and no sign at all of the intruders.

Two minutes earlier, she had finished a careful search of the underground sanctum. Together with her subordinates, she had carried the nun’s body out, planning to send it to the central cathedral for an autopsy and burial.

Then, once the nun’s body was brought outside the sanctum, it turned into ash in front of everyone and scattered on the wind. At the same time, the basement door that had been violently pried open two hours ago returned in a blink to its original state. Now it stood quietly at the end of the stairs, as if mocking the explorers standing on the steps.

“Inquisitor…” A Guardian warrior with a short beard stepped close to Vanna’s side, his voice low. “There seems to be some kind of space-time loop here…”

Vanna nodded lightly and said nothing.

What rose up in her mind instead was last night's horrifying dream, and Captain Duncan, who had invaded and corrupted that dream.

The ghost captain's words in the dream echoed in her head: "If you truly care about the safety of the city-state, you might as well go to the Sixth District and take a look at that small cathedral…

"I am very curious what you will find there…"

Was this what that "Captain Duncan" had wanted her to see? A sealed loop of time and space, a small cathedral corrupted and cut off by some unknown power, and a nun who died fighting mysterious intruders? Why did he want her to see these things? What did everything here mean?

Vanna frowned hard. When she set out this morning, her mind had been full of the Vanished and whatever scheme that ghost captain might be hiding. She had wondered if guiding her to this small cathedral was some way to corrupt or attack her as an Inquisitor. But now she suddenly began to doubt that first judgment.

Could it be… that the ghost captain really only wanted to give her a clue? Like some eager passerby… reporting a heretic in the city-state to her?

This thought surfaced in Vanna's mind. Not long ago, she had said the same thing to Bishop Valentine in a joking tone. But now she could not help running that joke through her mind again, a joke so absurd it reached the level of Subspace.

The next second, the young Inquisitor shivered, and her expression sharpened.

She was actually starting to think about that ghost captain in a "harmless" way. This had to be the effect of his mental corruption! She must not let herself go down that path…

“Inquisitor?” Her subordinate’s voice sounded again beside her, waking Vanna from her daze. The short-bearded Guardian looked quite worried. “Did you… hear or see something?”

“…No. My mind is very clear.” Vanna shook her head and spoke to this rather reliable subordinate. She knew this man had met with Bishop Valentine before they set out, and that he was likely carrying the task of “watching” her, his own commander. She felt no resentment at all about this —after all, she had suffered corruption from Captain Duncan. At a time like this, even going on a mission in chains would have been normal.

“The time and space here have reset. Should we go down and look again?” the subordinate asked.

Vanna thought for a moment, then turned her head and asked: “What is the ‘nun’ in the main hall doing now?”

“She is still at prayer,” a Guardian who had just returned from the main hall answered at once. “It seems nothing we do outside the main hall can draw her attention.”

“Good.” Vanna nodded slightly. Her gaze fell on the door at the end of the stairs. After a long pause, she bit her lip. “We are going down again.”

She led the Guardians back to the entrance of the underground sanctum and pushed the door once more, feeling the familiar resistance. The door was being held from the other side. It was the nun’s body.

Last time, she had told her subordinate to pry the hinges with a crowbar and open a path while damaging the door’s runes as little as possible.

This time, she placed her hand on the door panel, took a soft breath, then suddenly clenched her hand into a fist and knocked once, very fast.

In a hundredth of a second, the whole door trembled in a way no human senses could catch. Then the sturdy door suddenly shattered into endless dust. Wood splinters and metal powder drifted down and were blown aside by the aura swirling around Vanna.

The nun’s body toppled from behind the door. She had no extra damage beyond the wounds she already carried.

Only then did the Guardians at the scene hear a very deep hum. It spread as if it were drilling into their brains, then faded again in a blink.

The warriors turned awed gazes toward the young Inquisitor, but Vanna was used to such looks. With a long sword on her back, she drew the consecrated lantern from her belt with her left hand and stepped forward as soon as the door burst apart.

The glow of the consecrated lantern lit the dark underground space once again. Everything she saw was exactly the same as the first time she had come in. As expected, time and space here had already returned to the starting point.

After another detailed search, Vanna and the warriors returned to the fallen nun’s side.

Not long ago, Vanna had tried to carry this nun’s body out of the underground sanctum. Now she already understood that this body was probably like the warped time and space here. It had become part of the closed loop and could no longer leave this place.

She let her gaze rest quietly on the nun’s bloodstained face. Vanna did not know how long she stayed lost in thought before she suddenly whispered: “You are still fighting in this looping time and space…”

The underground sanctum fell into a brief silence, until a Guardian’s voice suddenly broke it: “Inquisitor, what do you think… she was really fighting against?”

Vanna thought quietly. After a long time, she raised her head with a thoughtful look and began to lay out the information point by point:

“The underground sanctum is an excellent place for a seal. Once the door closes, it becomes a cage.

“The cathedral’s Guardian unit is missing, and it is clear they did not take part in the battle in the underground sanctum.

“The nun locked herself in here and came in carrying a weapon. That means she already foresaw a battle before she entered.

“There are no traces of intruders here. But if time and space here form a closed loop, the intruders should also be trapped in that loop. No matter how fast they ran, in the instant we opened the door, they could not have had time to erase every trace…”

The Guardians beside her listened to each point their commander made. One of them suddenly reacted: “A cleric only seals themself in like that and prepares for a ‘final battle’ in one case…”

“Yes. Only one case.” Vanna spoke softly and slowly stood up. “When a cleric discovers that a gate to Subspace is about to open inside their own soul.”

“Subspace invasion!” a Guardian gasped in a low voice. “What she was fighting here… was her own shadow?! But… but how is that possible? This is a cathedral, and…”

“And no one received any alarm from this cathedral,” Vanna cut in before the subordinate could finish. She knew very well how many things were wrong here. “A cleric who is completely corrupted by Subspace becomes a vessel and opens a gate to Subspace inside their soul. But that process usually takes time. In a place like this cathedral, even if things were urgent, the watchers here should have had a chance to send out an alarm. Yet it seems the corruption that struck this nun advanced very fast… so fast that she only had time to grab a sword and lock herself in here…”

She paused, then went on, thinking aloud: “…It is also possible the alarm was sent, but because of Subspace interference, it never reached beyond the cathedral.”

“…But this is not a ship sailing at sea,” a nearby Guardian warrior muttered in disbelief. “We are on land. The cathedral is under wide protection. How could Subspace power corrupt a priest so quickly and also cut off all contact with the outside for this whole area?”

“You are right. It does not make sense. Nothing here makes sense. But even stranger is this…” Vanna said softly as she looked around the underground sanctum. The light of the consecrated lantern shone over the dark walls and pillars. In the shifting light and shadow, it felt as if countless evil secrets hid there. “If Subspace once corrupted this place, then where did it go?”

Chapter 173: The Fire Spreads

Subspace corruption did not fade on its own, just as justice did not enforce itself. After so many years fighting the twisted Shadows in the deep layers of the world, Vanna knew this very well.

If this cathedral had once been corrupted by Subspace, and the duty nun here had already fallen to that corruption, then the thing that had invaded this place would never simply vanish on its own. Taking into account the eerie “afterimage” nun in the main hall and the wrong atmosphere hanging over the entire Sixth District, it was clear that the door of the underground sanctum had not stopped the intruders here. So… where had the invading Subspace power gone?

Vanna raised the consecrated lantern in her hand. The Whale Oil, filled with holy power, burned quietly inside the lamp. Wherever its glow spread, everything in the underground sanctum came into her sight. The blade slashes and bullet marks all over the walls were like words carved again and again by the closed loop of time, calmly telling her their secrets.

…Words?

Vanna suddenly frowned, as if a flash of lightning had gone off in her heart.

If this nun, who died in the underground sanctum, had already seen her fate when she closed the door, would she have tried to leave some kind of record, to warn whoever came to investigate later?

That was how a well-trained cleric should react!

“Check this place again,” she lifted her head and ordered the warriors loudly beside her. “Every mark. Sword cuts, bullet marks, bloodstains, all of it—this sister very likely left some kind of message before she died!”

“Yes!”

The Guardians moved at once. Each of them held a consecrated lantern as they spread out and began an even more detailed, more focused search of the underground sanctum they had already swept once.

Vanna did not stand idle either. Once she realized the fallen nun might have left a message before her death, she went back to where the nun had died, back to the entrance of the underground sanctum, and carefully checked the floor and walls near the door.

She had just destroyed the sanctum door, but she was sure there would be no message on it. The sanctum door was part of a precise seal, with the holy symbols of the Goddess carved into it. Leaving marks on it would weaken the sanctum’s protection. The nun would never do that.

The sword-bearing nun still lay quietly on the ground. Blood that had not yet clotted slowly flowed beneath her.

Vanna crouched beside the body and examined the nun from head to toe. Then, based on the angle at which the nun had fallen when they forced the door, she guessed her posture and position at the time of death. She bent down at the most likely angle, pried open the nun’s clenched hand, and checked the condition of the sword.

Suddenly, her movements stopped.

Vanna’s gaze fell on the ground beside the nun.

There was a row of sword marks there. At first glance they looked like a messy scrawl, as if someone at the edge of death had scratched the ground with an unsteady blade.

In their earlier inspections, Vanna and her subordinates had all overlooked them. This time, the young Inquisitor finally realized that these seemingly chaotic scratches were actually a kind of “message”, badly distorted and carved over and over again.

“Over here.” She lifted her head and called loudly to the searching Guardians. Then she lowered her eyes again and carefully tried to read the information hidden in the sword marks.

She stared for a long time before she finally picked out a few characters:

“1885.”

It was only a line of numbers.

The Guardians had gathered beside her now. Standing at Vanna’s side, they too managed to see the numbers in the sword marks. The short-bearded Guardian in the lead clearly did not understand what they meant. He looked at his commander in confusion. “Inquisitor, these numbers… Inquisitor?”

He saw the shock on Vanna’s face. The moment she saw the numbers, her eyes widened as if thunder had exploded in her heart. Even this Inquisitor, who always showed a calm and steady face to her subordinates, could not control her expression.

Vanna snapped back to herself at her subordinate’s call. She drew in a sharp breath and felt her heart pounding. The memories of searching through the archive alone rose up again. She remembered those strange records of heretic worship, the files reaching back from 1889, and the missing records for 1885…

All these memories finally gathered on this underground sanctum and on the messy sword marks before her: 1885.

“1885… She used her last strength to tell us that she actually died in 1885…”

Vanna muttered to herself under her breath. The Guardians beside her looked at each other. One of them frowned. “But why would she go out of her way to stress that?”

“To prove she did not die in 1889…” Vanna answered without thinking, but stopped halfway and showed the same baffled look on her face. “Right… why would she stress that year? If she died in 1885, there is no way she could know there would be another disaster in the city-state four years later…”

The young Inquisitor sank into confusion. Many clues had already surfaced, and they seemed about to merge into one whole. But right in the middle, a huge gap yawned open, and she could not bridge her thoughts.

If the numbers this nun left were meant to show the year of her death, then that year had to have a special meaning. The “warning” she wanted to send had to be hidden in that year. But… what warning could have such a strong link to the year 1885?

Did this nun see something in her final moments? Had she already foreseen that the records for 1885 would vanish from the archive of the central cathedral? Or did she know why those records would disappear?

Sadly, the truth had faded with her cooling blood. The moment the underground sanctum’s door closed, the secrets this nun knew were doomed to be lost. All she could send across time and space to Vanna with her life was this hard-to-read line of numbers.

Vanna looked up and saw the Guardians focusing their gazes on her. In several of those eyes there was not only concern, but also careful watchfulness.

“I visited the archive at the central cathedral earlier,” she said to her subordinates after ordering her thoughts. “In the archive, all records from 1885 were gone for some reason. It seems that this year is definitely…”

She suddenly stopped.

The scenes of searching the archive rose again in her mind for no clear reason, as if some other force kept urging her to recall them. She remembered herself walking again and again between the huge shelves, and between these images she suddenly heard the gentle sound of waves.

Vanna slowly opened her eyes wider.

She still could not recall anything other than reading files alone, but she already knew that something might be wrong with her memories of the archive. Her Spiritual Insight gift was warning her. The Goddess was warning her too!

“Back to the central cathedral,” she suddenly said to the subordinate beside her. “I need to go to the archive!”

The Guardians looked at each other, not sure at first why the Inquisitor had become so tense and grim. But they did not hesitate for long and accepted her order at once.

Just as the Guardians were about to leave, one of them glanced down at the ground beside him and suddenly cried out: “The writing is disappearing!”

Vanna looked over at once toward the sound. A faint cluster of ghostly green light was reflected in her eyes.

Her breath caught at once.

On the ground, the marks the nun had carved before she died were fading bit by bit, like pencil lines being erased from a page. Wherever a sword mark vanished, tiny sparks of ghostly green flame flickered, so small that the naked eye could barely catch them. No one knew where these “sparks” came from. It was as if they had always been spreading in a dimension human sight could not reach, and now they had suddenly stepped into the view of people in the Mortal Realm.

Vanna could not have been more familiar with this ghostly green fire.

It was the master of this flame who had guided her to this cathedral!

In that instant, countless guesses surged up in her mind. Some were about the Vanished, some about the ghost captain, and others about Subspace and the number 1885. Yet none of her guesses fit.

No one could explain what role that ghost captain was really playing. Vanna also could not understand why his flame would erase the marks right in front of her at this moment. But one thing was very clear to her—this was no place to stay. She had to get back to the central cathedral at once.

In the blink of an eye, the marks on the ground were gone. The ghostly green flame that had appeared from nowhere also slowly faded from everyone's sight.

"Do not go near this patch of ground. The flames may still be spreading outside the range we can see," Vanna warned her subordinates. "Now pull out of this cathedral. Second squad will stay outside the cathedral, set up a cordon, and wait for orders. Everyone else, return to the central cathedral with me."

The Guardians answered in unison: "Yes!"

Vanna nodded. After a brief thought, she added another order: "Also, notify the reserve forces in the nearby blocks… We are sealing off the entire Sixth District."

In the main hall of the small cathedral, Vanna led the Guardians through.

One Guardian glanced toward the statue of the Goddess without thinking and suddenly cried out: "That praying 'nun' is gone too!"

Chapter 174: Before the Storm

The nun who had been quietly praying in front of the Goddess’s statue was gone.

Only the empty floor remained in front of the pulpit. Bright gas lamps lit the vast main hall and its rows of seats. Vanna and the guardian warriors searched the not?so?large hall from end to end, but they still did not find that strange nun.

Of course, Vanna knew that the nun had most likely “never existed” from the very beginning. The real body had clearly died years ago in the underground sanctum. The figure praying in the main hall was only a projection. But even so, the sudden disappearance of that projection still filled everyone with uneasy confusion.

“Nothing in the corridors and side rooms either!”

The last two guardian warriors who had gone to search also came back to the main hall. Their report confirmed one thing: the nun’s phantom had completely vanished from this cathedral.

Vanna frowned slightly and thought quickly.

The phantom was gone, but when had it disappeared?

Was it when she entered the underground sanctum for the second time? When she saw the real nun’s last numbers written before death? Or…

When that strange, ghostly green flame flared up out of nowhere and wiped away the traces on the floor?

If it was the former, then the phantom might have vanished because she, the “observer from the Mortal Realm”, had seen through the truth and broken part of the illusion here. But if it was the latter… then it meant that the ghost captain had made a move.

That ghost captain had erased the traces in the underground sanctum and, at the same time, wiped away the nun’s phantom in the main hall— for reasons no one knew.

Staying here would not yield anything more. The urgent task was to report what they had found to Bishop Valentine, then go to the archives and confirm the warning she had just sensed.

Vanna quickly led her squad members out of the cathedral. As they crossed the doors and looked back again, they saw, as expected, a cathedral that was completely abandoned and in ruins.

Vanna let out a breath. At least she had brought her subordinates safely out of that strange place. Then, on a sudden impulse, she lifted her head and looked up above the cathedral.

A plump white dove stood on the high spire, tilting its head as it watched them, looking completely harmless.

[Why is this dove still here?]

Vanna could not help feeling a little curious, but she quickly pushed the doubt aside. After arranging personnel to stay and guard the small cathedral, she turned, got into the car, and headed back toward the Central Cathedral.

The white dove spread its wings and flew away from the cathedral at high speed.

But the dove did not go very far. Once it left the line of sight of the guardians posted around the cathedral, it darted straight into a nearby alley.

Ghostly green spirit form fire surged up in the empty alley, twisting into a door and a vortex. Duncan stepped out of the flames, then frowned slightly and looked thoughtfully in the direction of the cathedral.

Bringing this matter into the open had been the right choice. Drawing in Vanna and the official power behind her had produced far more than he expected. The investigation had moved forward. Professionals were professionals; what they knew went far beyond what amateurs like Shirley and Dog could manage.

When he was close enough, Duncan could use the mark he had left on a target to directly listen to what happened around them. Because the mark on Vanna had been strengthened during her last visit to the antique shop, this listening even allowed Duncan to sense, to some extent, the young Inquisitor's emotional shifts. Just now, he and AI had stayed above the cathedral, and through this link he had "watched" the guardian squad's entire investigation inside.

Duncan stood in the shadows of the alley, quietly sorting through the information he had just gained.

It was very likely that the nun had been fighting her own Subspace projection. There had never been other intruders. Had the intruders crawled out through the rift in her own soul?

The clerics of this world… once completely crushed by corruption, would they actually turn into a direct "channel" that linked Subspace and the Mortal Realm?

Did this happen only to clerics, or did all humans carry this hidden risk, with corrupted clerics simply being far more dangerous?

Of all the things he had learned, this was what drew Duncan's attention the most, and what surprised and puzzled him the most.

Duncan did not know much about the True Gods of this world and the Churches under their names. But from what he had observed, he could at least confirm that these Churches stood on the side of order and protection. Their clerics kept the city?states safe in the extraordinary realm, and they were the firmest line of defense against the corruption that seeped from the world’s deep layers.

Yet now he knew that this firm line of defense could, under certain conditions, itself turn into a “pipe” between the Mortal Realm and Subspace… Why?

If this transformation did not happen only to clerics, but could turn any human into a Subspace channel once certain conditions were met, then what would that mean?

The Subspace that everyone feared so much, its ties to the Mortal Realm, to mortal life in the world, seemed far more complex than he had first imagined.

Besides this, there was also the string of numbers “1885” that the nun had left behind.

It was something Duncan and Shirley had not found when they explored this place before, and now it surprised him greatly.

If Vanna’s judgment was right, then the nun had not died in the fragment incident of the Sun in 1889, but had already died in 1885. For the years after that, this small cathedral must have been shrouded in twisted time and space!

What did that mean?

Duncan’s thoughts rose and fell. He slowly lifted his hand and rubbed his fingertips together. A small ghostly green flame quietly burned in front of his eyes.

He could clearly feel the spirit form fire spreading—in invisible dimensions, along the “other side” of the city?state of Pland— and sending faint feedback to him without stop.

This was his third source of confusion.

Shortly after Vanna found the string of numbers in the underground sanctum, the numbers vanished into thin air. spirit form fire had briefly appeared at that moment, so the young Inquisitor would surely think it was the work of “Captain Duncan”. But in fact…

Duncan was even more confused than she was.

He had not erased that string of numbers. He had no idea why the flames he released earlier had suddenly appeared in the underground sanctum and burned away “1885” so precisely. It gave him a feeling that the fire had not spread through space to the cathedral, but had spread through time back to the year 1885.

Duncan suddenly froze.

Maybe… it was not an illusion…

For some reason, he suddenly remembered when he had studied Alice’s wooden box. He remembered the scene he had glimpsed of the Frostholm queen’s execution half a century ago, and the warning he had heard then—

“…Please do not corrupt history…”

Duncan’s face grew dark, his brows slowly knitting together. He thought of something he had heard not long ago:

In this world, everything except Subspace could be corrupted.

…

Vanna hurried back to the Grand Cathedral. She had wanted to go straight to the archives to confirm the severe sense of wrongness in her memory, but she went to see Bishop Valentine first and told the old man what she had found at the small cathedral in the Sixth District.

After listening to Vanna's report, Valentine stayed silent for a long time. He frowned deeply and thought for a while before muttering with a pained expression: "Subspace… this really is the worst kind of trouble among all kinds of trouble…"

"When we were about to leave, the string of numbers pointing to 1885 in the small cathedral and the nun praying in the main hall both disappeared. It seemed related to the power of 'Captain Duncan'," Vanna added. "But we did not stay in the cathedral to run repeated tests. We were worried about the risk of corruption spreading."

"…A wise caution," Bishop Valentine nodded lightly. "We still cannot be sure what attitude that ghost captain really has. For now, it seems that he did give us an important piece of information, but then erased some clues at the end… In any case, he is not our 'friend'."

Vanna thought for a moment and looked at the old man in front of her: "Has there been any reply from Church headquarters? Have you reported our situation to His Eminence the Pope?"

Bishop Valentine looked at Vanna and nodded. "I have reported everything here to the Storm Cathedral. His Eminence the Pope said he will send support as soon as possible— but the Cathedral ship is still some distance from Pland. Even the fastest courier vessel will not reach us in just a few days. So… we must be ready to rely on ourselves."

As he spoke, the old bishop sighed softly, turned around, and gazed at the statue of the Storm Goddess.

“Disaster is brewing, and we do not know when it will break out. Whether Pland, this Sea Jewel, can wipe away the coming gloom will depend on our own ability.”

Chapter 175: Storm Clouds Over the City

At some point the sky had turned gloomy. Thick, heavy clouds like solid masses piled over the city?state. The slightly salty sea wind swept through the streets again and again, as if trying to drive the cold straight into people’s bones.

Old Captain Lawrence stepped out of the cathedral’s front gate and hunched his neck against the cold wind blowing in his face. He looked up at the sky and started to grumble about the terrible weather: “Damn, what rotten luck. I finally finished the observation period, and now I have to walk half an hour home in this wind…”

On the streets around the cathedral square, people walked quickly, as if a downpour could start at any moment. They were thinking about laundry not yet taken in at home or windows left open. The first thing the old captain thought of, however, was his bad?tempered wife. He had been in “quarantine observation” in the cathedral for many days and had not even sent a message. Wouldn’t he get a storm of loving blows, maybe even a bruised nose and swollen face, when he finally went home?

Lawrence rubbed his arms and hands, sighed, and was ready to step into the cold wind. But after only two steps, he saw from the corner of his eye a cathedral guard hurrying toward him. A little further away stood the young therapist in charge of counseling… Heidi, or Hailey, or something like that.

“You’ve got to be kidding…” Lawrence muttered without thinking. The cathedral guard reached him, gave a polite bow, then solemnly held out an arm to block his way. “Sorry, Captain Lawrence. We just received an urgent notice. For now… you still cannot leave.”

“Wasn’t the observation period already over?” Lawrence had already guessed as soon as he saw them, but he still could not help letting his face fall. “You’d better have a good reason.”

“The details are not convenient to tell you, but…” The young church guard also looked a bit troubled, yet he still spoke in an official tone. “It is a direct order from the Inquisitor. The situation has changed. All ordinary people who have had contact with the Vanished must continue to stay in the cathedral.”

Lawrence’s mouth twitched. The moment he heard the words “the Vanished”, he knew he had to obey the order, but his bad mood was something he could not control. The old captain frowned. “Fine, an extension, I get it—but who is going to explain it to my wife? I’ve been gone for…”

“Sorry to interrupt,” before he could finish, Heidi’s voice came from the side. “Do you have some worries?”

Lawrence turned to look at Heidi. During his days of quarantine observation in the cathedral, he had dealt with this young therapist a few times. He knew that although she looked young, she really was a reliable expert, and she had indeed helped him and his crew calm a lot of their tension and anger. So his expression eased a little. “I’ve been away from home too long. My wife is not exactly gentle. I was supposed to be on vacation after my last shipping run. I can’t spend the first half of my time off in quarantine at the cathedral and the second half lying in bed nursing my wounds…”

“…True, no one wants to run into something like this,” Heidi sighed, clearly understanding. She took a glass tube of potion from the medical case she carried and handed it to the old captain. “But things are complicated right now. It’s best to follow the orders from the Grand Cathedral first. Don’t worry, someone will go and contact your family.”

“What is this?” Lawrence took the vial, looked doubtfully at the liquid inside, then looked at Heidi with the same doubt. The therapist’s medical case always seemed to have strange things in it, which made people nervous.

“It calms you down, eases your nerves, and also strengthens your mental defenses a bit,” Heidi said casually. “It’s to get you ready for the next stage of quarantine observation.”

“…Damn it, so there really is no room to bend the rules…” Lawrence felt a stab of pain in his teeth as soon as he heard “next stage of quarantine”. He pulled out the stopper and downed the salty, bitter potion in one gulp, then handed the glass tube back to the therapist.

The potion took effect quickly. The old captain shivered once in the cold wind. His eyes flickered a few times, then calmed down, and he let out a long, complicated sigh.

“Do you need me to walk you back?” Heidi asked in a gentle voice as she watched his expression.

“…No, I know the way,” Lawrence said. His mood was a bit low, but he quickly shook his head with a trace of acceptance. “Sigh, going back to stay there isn’t so bad. At least there’s someone to talk to. Some of those novice monks are actually pretty interesting to chat with…”

He turned in the cold wind and walked alone toward the cathedral’s great doors. Two guardians were already waiting there to escort the old captain back to the quarantine area.

But just as he was about to pass through the doors, Heidi's voice rang out again. "Mr. Lawrence, as a psychiatrist, I still have to give you some serious advice— it's about time you retired. The Boundless Sea is not good for your mental health."

Lawrence did not answer. He only lifted a hand in a distant wave to show he had heard, then slowly disappeared through the tall, solemn doors.

Only Heidi, with her medical case, and a guardian warrior in a long black coat remained in the square.

There had been a faint respect in the guardian's eyes when he looked at the old captain.

Then the guardian turned his head and looked at the psychiatrist beside him. "Miss Heidi, do you know what's really going on?"

Heidi rolled her eyes. "You're the one from the Church. If even you don't know, how would I, an 'external consultant' sent by City Hall, know anything?"

"But you and Her Excellency the Inquisitor…"

"She hasn't told me anything. In fact, I haven't even seen her since yesterday," Heidi shook her head, then looked curiously at the guardian warrior in front of her. "But I heard she suddenly issued a whole batch of investigation orders? This morning there was even a group of clerical priests who went to City Hall to borrow records…"

"Yeah, a whole pile of investigation tasks," the guardian sighed. "Pulling records, visiting neighborhoods, digging through old cases, and even setting up checkpoints at the Harbor to watch twelve different people who sell fries…"

Heidi: “…?”

“So now even we are guessing what actually happened,” the guardian sighed, raising his head to look at the dark clouds in the sky. “Tch, what awful weather.”

…

Morris sat upright at his desk. His fingers brushed lightly along the rough edge of a heavy tome. His thoughts slowly grew quiet, until he could even hear his own heartbeat.

He lowered his head and slowly opened the Rahm Sacred Tome in front of him. He turned, with practiced ease, to the chapters on mental protection and Discernment of Wisdom, and silently recited the teachings in his heart.

Only after finishing the basic self?suggestion and strengthening of his mind did he stand up. He lit the candles and incense on the nearby table in order, then dripped refined essential oil into three of the flames.

As the flames suddenly flared, he gazed at the mirror in front of the ritual table and looked at his own reflection. A slightly self?mocking smile appeared on his face.

“I really am getting old… Luckily I can still perform the details of these rituals correctly.”

The crackling of the candles slowly grew weaker. The smoke from the incense rose and slowly gathered above the mirror into a cloud that did not disperse. The cloud blocked the old man’s sight so he could no longer clearly see his own reflection. At that point, the protection of his mind and the blessing from Rahm, the God of Wisdom, were complete.

“I have turned away from you for eleven years… yet you are still willing to watch over me,” Morris sighed softly when he saw the ritual finish so smoothly. “Do you still have hopes for me…”

The room stayed quiet. Of course the God of Wisdom would not appear just like that. But Morris still tilted his head as if listening. In that silence he seemed to hear the deity’s instructions. His expression slowly calmed, and he opened a nearby drawer.

A beaded bracelet made from colorful stones lay quietly inside. There were twelve stones in total.

Morris hesitated for a moment, then picked up the bracelet and put it on his wrist.

In that instant he felt a rush of clarity in his head, as if a Veil that had covered him for many years had suddenly lifted. He glanced once more at the layer of smoke still hanging in front of the mirror, then finally made up his mind and pushed the door open to leave the room.

Heidi was not at home, and the big, empty house felt especially quiet.

The bedroom he shared with his wife was not far away on the left. The door was half open, the inside dim and silent.

Morris touched the rune bead bracelet on his wrist. He did not dare look toward the half?open door. Instead, he almost fled, walking quickly down the corridor, through the living room, and out the front door. He started the car parked in the yard and drove toward the Lower City.

At the same time, a white dove skimmed quickly over the low, old buildings of the Lower City.

Where no one was watching, the white dove flew through a second?floor window of Duncan’s antique shop. A moment later, a flicker of ghostly green light flashed behind the glass.

Duncan stepped out of the flames. He glanced at the bad weather outside, then at the clock hanging on the wall not far away— there was still a little time before Nina came home from school.

He went down to the first floor, opened the shop door, and carried out a chair. He sat in the doorway, his face calm, and quietly watched the street in front of him, lost in thought.

Chapter 176: A Warm Family

Nina appeared in Duncan's sight. The girl ran all the way toward him, a happy smile on her face. When she saw her uncle sitting in a daze by the door of the antique shop, she sped up and raised her hand to wave: "Uncle, I'm back!"

Duncan snapped out of his thoughts. He put his worries aside for the moment and stood up to greet his "niece". When he saw the girl out of breath, he paused, frowned a little, and said: "Didn't I give you money for the ride? Why did you still run back after school?"

Nina stopped in front of Duncan and took a few deep breaths. She scratched her hair in embarrassment, then reached into the schoolbag in her hand and started rummaging around. After a long while, she finally pulled out a small paper packet and handed it over: "I… passed by Doctor Albert's clinic on the way back…"

Duncan took the packet and pinched it lightly. He realized there were several pills inside.

"Doctor Albert said you've been using alcohol to dull the pain for a long time," Nina explained in a small voice, "and even though your health is better now and you've successfully quit drinking, people who drank for a long time can easily have bad reactions when they suddenly stop. This is medicine to ease alcohol withdrawal. If you start feeling unwell, you can take one…

“Also, Doctor Albert said that as long as your health hasn’t worsened recently, you can stop taking the medicine you used before. But he still suggests that, if you have time, you should go to his clinic for a full check-up…”

Duncan quietly listened to Nina’s soft, even slightly cautious explanation. He did not speak for a long time. Only after she finished did he silently tuck the little packet of pills carefully into an inner pocket close to his body.

Then he reached out and placed his hand on Nina’s hair, gently rubbing it.

“Uncle?” Nina looked up at him in confusion. She saw a hard-to-describe seriousness on Duncan’s face, and in that seriousness there was even a hint of worry. Her sensitive heart suddenly became uneasy: “What… what’s wrong? Are you feeling sick? Or…”

“I’m fine.” Duncan suddenly smiled. He bent down a little, his gaze meeting Nina’s eyes, and said: “But from now on, don’t use your fare money to buy medicine for me. Our family doesn’t lack money anymore. You can also bring more pocket money with you… if it’s not enough, just ask me.”

Nina stared blankly at Duncan. She felt that her uncle suddenly seemed a little strange, but she could not say exactly what was wrong. She stared for a long time before she finally nodded hesitantly: “Oh… oh…”

Then she thought of something. She craned her neck to look into the shop, and an expression that was both expectant and hesitant appeared on her face: “Uncle, um… you said that when I came back from school, you’d teach me to ride the bicycle…”

“The weather isn’t very good right now.” Duncan raised his eyebrows. “It might rain.”

“We’ll just stay by the door,” Nina said in a small, hopeful voice as she grabbed Duncan’s arm. “If it rains, we can go back inside right away…”

Duncan laughed and nodded helplessly: “Alright. Put your schoolbag away first. I’ll teach you to ride the bicycle. But we can only practice for a little while. I still haven’t cooked dinner.”

“Okay!”

Nina let out a small cheer, then dashed into the antique shop like a charging soldier. She tossed her schoolbag onto the counter and pushed out the brand-new bicycle. Her pushing posture was crooked. She wrestled with the doorframe for quite a while before she finally managed to get the bike in front of Duncan.

“…Honestly, I feel like you even need to learn how to push the bike from scratch,” Duncan said. He looked at Nina’s clumsy movements and could not help sighing with a half-laugh, half-cry expression. Then he walked up and steadied the handlebars. “But seeing how excited you are, just get on first. I’ll hold the bike for you. You just try pedaling and get used to keeping your balance while it’s moving.”

Nina nodded obediently. Once Duncan had the bike steady, she grabbed the handlebars, stepped on the pedal, and climbed up onto the seat. As she struggled her way up, she kept repeating: “Uncle, you have to hold it tight! Don’t you dare let go!”

“Alright, alright, just trust me…”

The slightly salty, cold wind blew over the old streets of the Lower City, whipping up fallen leaves and dust between the low, rundown buildings. Dark clouds hung very low, yet the rain that might fall at any time still seemed to hesitate in the sky, refusing to drop to the ground.

On the small patch of open ground in front of the antique shop, a girl's excited yet nervous cries rang out, mixed with the bike bell's random jingling and, every now and then, Duncan's instructions and teasing.

A pure black, old-fashioned private car stopped in the open space near the antique shop. An old man wearing an old-style woolen scholar's coat, carrying a Gatekeeper's cane, and wearing a short top hat pushed open the car door and looked toward the antique shop.

Morris saw that familiar, old shop, and he also saw the uncle and niece who were practicing riding the bicycle on the open space in front of it.

It was an ordinary Lower City street scene, a warm and simple bit of family life. Everything looked so normal. Even under the low-hanging clouds and the chill of the autumn wind, the scene in the distance still looked especially warm and peaceful.

However, Heidi had spent only half a day in that antique shop and had already burned through one of the God of Wisdom Rahm's blessings—and that was with a Deep Sea Inquisitor guarding her.

Yet afterward, neither Heidi herself nor Inquisitor Vanna had noticed even the slightest anomaly.

Morris took a quiet breath. Even as he looked at such an everyday scene, his heart started beating faster.

He clenched his teeth. Instead of calling out to the uncle and niece in front of the antique shop, he decided to finish his observation of the shop first. If possible, he truly did not want to drag unrelated people into an supernatural incident.

The old man searched in the pocket of his coat and took out a blessed monocle with a thin pale-gold chain. One end of the fine chain was clipped to the inside of his pocket, and the other end was attached to the frame. On the frame, Rahm’s name and many holy symbols were carved in ancient Critt letters. In the clear lens, faint light flowed.

“May wisdom grant me keen eyes, enlighten my mind, let me see the truth, and pierce the fog…”

Morris murmured a short benediction, then clipped the blessed monocle into his eye socket. He turned his face toward the antique shop and “opened” the eye he had chosen to seal eleven years ago…

Morris felt dazed for a moment. He lowered his head and looked at the blessed monocle in his hand. He saw Rahm’s name and the holy symbols carved on the frame. Faint light stirred in the clear lens.

“May wisdom grant me keen eyes…”

He whispered the benediction again and clipped the blessed monocle into his eye socket, then raised his head…

Morris felt dazed again. He lowered his head and looked at the blessed monocle in his hand.

A cold wind suddenly blew from the other side of the street, carrying a low murmur. The old scholar stopped the motion he was about to make, then suddenly raised his right wrist.

A bracelet woven from colorful stones and silk thread circled his wrist. There were eight stones in total.

The cold wind blew by, dragging fallen leaves and the chill of late autumn with it. The sounds in Morris’s ears seemed to fade away. The noise of traffic in the street and the bells from the Cathedral in the distance became so faint that they might have been coming from another world. He heard only the pounding of his own heart. The roar of his blood filled his ears like thunder. Amid that heartbeat, only the sounds from one direction stayed clear—

A girl’s happy yet nervous voice: “Uncle, hold it steady! Ah, it’s tilting, it’s tilting… the bike is going to fall!”

A middle-aged man’s warm voice, carrying a smile: “I’m holding it. It won’t fall. If you keep the handlebars straight, it won’t tilt… Pedal forward and keep going. That’s how a bicycle works. As long as you pedal and hold the handlebars, it won’t fall over.”

“You really have to hold it! I’m going forward!”

“Go on. I’m right behind you.”

Morris suddenly heard another sound, a creaking noise like grinding bones. As it came, his field of vision shifted and turned a little. He needed a second to understand what was happening.

He was slowly turning his neck, moving his gaze from the antique shop to the patch of open ground by its door.

A strong warning surged up from his soul. The bracelet on his wrist, which still held eight stones, let out a low, sobbing sound. Each stone became burning hot, like they were trying to drag a drowning person out of the water by force, pulling at his reason in vain. Morris could still think. He knew the divine blessings he had placed on himself before leaving home had been activated and were working. But he could only do this basic thinking—his neck kept turning, and his eyes, out of his control, were looking toward the most dangerous place.

[Close your eyes! Close your eyes! Close your eyes!]

Countless voices exploded in his mind, but his reason could not drive his muscles to finish even this simplest action. He turned his head, inch by inch, and finally, with both his eyes “opened” by the divine blessing, he saw the source of the voices.

He saw a frenzied, writhing vortex of light and shadow, and a mirror that seemed to reflect all times and all spaces at once, shattered into countless fragments. These things were mixed together, tangled into a barely human-shaped giant whose surface was covered in starlight. The giant bent down a little and carefully supported…

Supported a spraying arc of blazing flame.

A thunderous blast went off in Morris’s mind, and then the whole world fell quiet.

Chapter 177: madness threshold

After a thunderous bang, the whole world fell quiet.

Morris felt his consciousness drifting, as if it had completely left his body. He did not know where he was. He did not know what year it was. For a moment—or maybe for a long stretch of time—he even forgot his own name. He simply floated in a mindless state in a field of chaotic nothingness, surrounded by streams of light and shadow beyond human understanding and by deathly silence.

Morris spent a very, very long time piecing his shattered thoughts back together, slowly repairing a broken and incomplete sense of self—

He remembered that his name was Morris. He lived in the city-state of Pland. He was a history scholar. Today, he had planned to visit an antique shop in the Lower City to find out what had almost taken his daughter’s life.

He had found out.

It was a warm little Subspace family.

Countless roars and shrill noises like the splitting of the earth finally exploded. In that empty and silent chaos, something appeared again that he could sense. The humanity he had just pieced together almost got shattered again by this noise, but just before he was completely wiped out, he “saw” a layer of hazy fog gather from all directions and wrap around all his senses.

This “fog” protected his mind. Under a protection called the Veil of Ignorance, it cut him off from the noise and the chaotic streams of light and shadow. Morris could think again. Through the fog, he looked into the surroundings and found that he could no longer see those truths and pieces of knowledge that drove people insane. In the endless depths of the mist, only one cluster of flickering light caught his attention.

It was a dim glow formed by many light sources of different sizes. In the center was a red light, roughly the size of a human head. Around it spun dozens of tiny blue, green, and red points of light. They flashed quickly like some kind of matrix, seemingly without any pattern, yet as if they held a certain… “sanity”.

In the middle of countless chaotic light streams, these regularly flickering lights became the anchor that finally steadied Morris’s mind. After his first shock, he quickly realized what those little lights were—

He had faced God of Wisdom Rahm directly.

In every university and laboratory of Truth Academy, there was an image of Rahm. The Rahm Sacred Tome also had matching passages. This deity who held the divine authority of both wisdom and stupidity did not have a human shape. Rahm hid in the fog for long ages. When the silhouette appeared from time to time, it took the form of a flat surface covered in tiny lights, with dozens of points of light circling a round glow.

“My Lord!” Morris shivered and quickly bowed toward the luminous matrix that was sheltering him. “Are you here to guide me?”

Those flickering “lights” did not answer the old scholar. He only felt a deep, muffled vibration. After quite a long time, Rahm’s “voice” finally reached Morris from deep inside his mind—

“Return, contact, understand, transmit…”

“You…”

Morris stared in disbelief at that mass of light. He could not understand Rahm’s will. But this elusive God of Wisdom did not give him the chance to ask anything more. In the next second, a powerful sense of rejection surged up. In an instant, Morris was “pushed” out of that chaotic and terrifying place.

His body swayed. His brain felt as if it were boiling. Information from the mortal world flooded his senses again—the noise of traffic on the street, the distant ringing of bells, the cold wind, and the clear ringing of a bicycle bell.

Then came the sound of quick footsteps and a girl’s worried voice. The voice was very familiar. It was his student.

“Mr. Morris?! Why are you here… Are you alright?”

In a daze, Morris lifted his head and saw Nina standing in front of him. But in the very next second, the girl in front of his eyes turned into a burning arc of flame, with ashes swirling around her that seemed able to cover the whole city-state—then she turned back into human form.

His stiff gaze shifted sideways. He saw a giant covered in starlight looking down at him. Inside the giant’s body flowed maddening streams of light and shadow. Then the giant suddenly became a kind-faced middle-aged man. The man looked at him with concern, his eyes full of the Shadows of Subspace.

The distant street trembled as well. The ground under his feet twisted and writhed. The doors and windows of the shop were sometimes normal and sometimes turned into hollow black holes. The sky hung down at a crooked angle. Rivers of flame and shapeless limbs flickered between the clouds. A passerby on a bicycle rushed past. His body suddenly turned into cracked concrete, then returned to normal in the next second.

Morris lowered his head with great effort and looked at his own wrist.

He was wearing a bracelet woven from colorful stones and thread. Only four stones remained.

But the stones did not keep breaking, and his mind did not keep sliding further into madness. The world in his eyes was still badly twisted, but his ability to think and judge had come back—at least partly.

The old scholar quickly judged his current condition. Under Rahm's protection, he had entered a briefly balanced madness threshold state.

He had gone mad—but the god had made his madness look like sanity.

He might still recover, but he had to find a way to save himself before Rahm's protection ended and all the stones broke. Otherwise, this temporary madness threshold might collapse at any time. When that happened, no one would be able to pull his reason back from the chaos.

While Morris's thoughts crawled along slowly in his mind, Nina and Duncan were also watching the clearly abnormal old man with worried eyes.

They had been practicing with the bicycle when they suddenly saw Morris standing on the empty patch of ground to the side. At first, Nina wanted to run over and greet him, but halfway there she noticed something wrong with the expression on the old man's face.

His eyes were dull and empty. His mind seemed absent. He did not respond to anything around him, like someone standing there asleep with his eyes open.

“Could he have suddenly gone senile?” Duncan muttered. He waved a hand in front of Morris’s face, then turned his head to look at Nina. “Has your teacher been spacing out like this at school these past two days?”

“No,” Nina said, shaking her head. She stepped forward and held the old man’s arm as she spoke: “Teacher has always been very healthy. How could he suddenly get senile?”

“You never know with people his age,” Duncan said as he took Morris’s other arm. He looked up at the sky. “Don’t talk out here. It’s about to rain. Let’s get the old gentleman inside first.”

Nina answered softly and helped Duncan support the dazed Morris into the shop. Then she jogged back to the open ground outside and pushed the bicycle indoors.

Duncan helped Morris sit down on a chair beside the counter. The old man seemed to have regained a bit of thinking ability by then. He sat down stiffly, his head slowly turning from side to side, and at last his gaze settled on Duncan.

“Return, contact, understand, transmit…”

Rahm’s voice suddenly echoed in his mind.

The small bit of reason still left in Morris seemed to understand these four words a little.

Was this the will of the God of Wisdom? Did Rahm want him to keep interacting with the “being” in front of him?

For the moment, Duncan’s image in Morris’s eyes stabilized into human form again. The scene around him was still trembling and writhing, but at least he could no longer see the starry giant’s true body. That allowed his reason to gain a slight upper hand.

Morris had already realized that this man, who looked like an ordinary antique shop owner, was absolutely not a being that should exist in the Mortal Realm.

Even his “student”, that girl who always smiled gently and stayed sunny and optimistic, was not a normal human.

If he stayed here and kept talking with this “family”, he might soon pass the balance point of the madness threshold and fall from temporary madness into the abyss of permanent madness.

But the God of Wisdom’s voice seemed to have taken root in his mind, making him sit there against his will. At the same time, another, even bolder thought slowly rose up from the bottom of his heart.

In this god-protected madness threshold state, no matter how close his mind drifted toward chaos, it would not completely fall into a runaway state. As long as he did not cross that critical point, he could even face Subspace directly during this brief balance and still keep his self, still keep his humanity…

It was said that in the Critt Kingdom, the greatest and most insane knowledge pursuers would even use this on purpose. After a lifetime of preparation, they would take potions and perform a ritual to actively embrace the madness threshold. In their one and only chance, they would gaze into the truth of Subspace and bring precious knowledge back to the Mortal Realm, then go to their deaths without regret.

Now, he seemed to be standing on the same “battlefield” where those sages of Critt had once stood.

Slowly, the old gentleman’s blank, stiff face changed. A smile appeared. His cloudy eyes looked at Duncan, and he spoke slowly: “Hello, Mr. Duncan.”

Watching the change in the old man’s expression, Duncan suddenly felt a chill.

This old gentleman… why did his smile suddenly look so scary?

Chapter 178: Friendly

Duncan carefully watched the old man's expression. The strange feeling from just now had not faded. He could clearly see that Morris was not in a normal state, but unfortunately, he was no doctor.

"Do you need me to find a doctor?" he asked with concern. "How do you feel now? Do you have any dizziness or nausea? Or are you feeling dazed?"

Morris rubbed his forehead.

In his ears, Duncan's voice seemed mixed with ten thousand overlapping howls of noise. At the same time as the sound waves entered his ears, dazzling, multicolored "colors" also rushed straight at him. These "messages" felt crammed with knowledge no humans could understand, testing his mind every single second. Yet even in a madness threshold state, he still barely held on to his sanity and slowly shook his head: "I'm fine. I just need to rest for a bit…"

The "existence" in front of him, whose true form he did not know, was showing concern for him. But now, Morris did not dare even imagine what kind of "reality" lay behind that appearance of concern. Perhaps it was a thousand pairs of eyes staring at him. Or perhaps dense, writhing teeth and tongues. Were those caring words a whisper from Subspace, or a roar from the Abyssal Deep, from the Deep Sea?

He thanked Rahm for granting him this moment of dullness. He did not have to pay too much attention to that truth.

He only tried to respond as a "person", as normally as he could.

At the same time, he also tried to see whether he could actively shut the Eye of Truth he had opened when he got off the carriage. This God-given ability was what the followers of the God of Wisdom relied on when they explored the world. Yet now… its price truly deserved its place as the most dangerous divine blessing of the Four Gods.

He failed. The Eye of Truth was already open and could not be closed in a short time. And even if he closed it, what use would it be? A mind that had fallen into the madness threshold would not automatically recover just because he shut his eyes…

Morris thought in a daze. After a while, he slowly spoke: “I… just came to visit, to express my thanks… oh, yes, my thanks, on behalf of my daughter. Once again, thank you for your help at the City Museum last time. She asked me…”

He suddenly stalled, hesitated for several seconds, then picked up the thread of his thoughts: “She asked me to bring a letter. It’s in my pocket.”

The old man groped around and took a carefully sealed envelope from his coat pocket, then handed it to Duncan. Duncan took it and opened it on the spot. Apart from some greetings at the beginning, it contained a report on Nina’s physical and mental health and the doctor’s recommendations.

This was what Heidi had written after giving Nina hypnosis treatment last time. She had indeed said she would write a proper letter and send it over, and Duncan still remembered that.

“No need to be so polite. In that situation, stepping in to save her was only my instinctive reaction,” Duncan put the letter away and said to Morris with a serious face. “Also, thank Miss Heidi for me—since the hypnosis session last time, Nina has been much better and hasn’t had that strange dream these days.”

Morris nodded and pressed his fingers to the Sun acupoint at his temple. As he organized his words, he mentally reminded himself not to stare into Duncan's eyes: "Have you… been well these days?"

"Me? I'm fine," Duncan felt a bit baffled. He thought the old Mister's way of starting a conversation today was strange. "I'm in good health, full of energy, and in a good mood—other than today's terrible weather being a little depressing, there's nothing wrong."

The weather?

[Such a small change in the weather could make an Eldritch God feel "depressed"—was that the latest joke going around in Subspace?]

Morris felt his head was slightly better than before. After hearing Duncan's words, he even had the mood to mutter inwardly. At the same time, he heard Nina's voice coming from not far away: "Uncle! I put the bicycle away and closed the shop door! The wind outside is getting stronger and stronger… How is Mr. Morris?"

"He's much better, but he still hasn't told me what was wrong just now," Duncan turned back to look at Nina as she walked toward them. "Why don't you stay with the old Mr. later, and I'll send Miss Heidi an express dispatch or a telegram and ask her to come pick him up…"

"No, no, no, I'm fine," before Duncan finished, Morris suddenly raised his voice and waved his hands repeatedly. "There is no need to ask her to come. It's just an old problem. Resting for a while will be enough."

Duncan was startled by the old Mister's sudden intensity. He looked Morris up and down twice. After confirming the man's condition and attitude, he nodded: "All right, then I won't go. Nina, go upstairs and make some soup. A hot meal might make Mr. Morris feel a bit better."

Nina blinked and glanced in confusion between Duncan and her teacher. For some reason she felt the atmosphere here was a little strange, but she quickly nodded obediently: “Oh!”

The girl ran lightly up the stairs, and the thump-thump-thump of her footsteps gradually faded.

After Nina left, Morris also felt his mental pressure lessen a little again. Compared to the massive pressure Duncan brought, this bit of relief was almost negligible, but he still let out a quiet breath.

Then the old man who dealt with history all day fell silent for a moment, and only then carefully chose his words and spoke: “Was my behavior just now very out of line?”

Duncan’s eyes had been fixed on Morris’s changes the whole time. At first he only felt that the other man’s words and actions were unusually strange today. But slowly, he seemed to see a trace of a familiar… “feeling” in the old man’s reactions. As he tried to recall where that familiarity came from, he casually replied: “It was a little strange. So what exactly is going on?”

Morris was silent for two or three seconds before he spoke in a low, cautious voice: “In my line of work, constantly dealing with history and knowledge, the mind can sometimes be a bit sensitive.”

He only wanted to probe a little, to see what attitude this “Subspace existence” in front of him truly had, this being who always behaved kindly on the surface and had never caused any trouble while living here.

When Duncan heard that seemingly meaningful line, he immediately frowned. All of a sudden, he knew what that familiar feeling was!

Morris’s strange reaction had appeared on another acquaintance as well… on Dog!

The Abyssal Hound at Shirley's side, the Abyssal demon that possessed a special "true vision"! Dog had also been this terrified and nervous when he saw him—because the dog could see some of the "true situation" beneath this human body. The difference was, Dog was a Abyssal demon with an extremely high resistance to corruption, while Morris was a fragile human. So Morris's reaction would be even stronger. In other words…

Duncan vaguely guessed the truth and immediately raised his head to look into Morris's eyes: "You saw something you shouldn't have, didn't you?"

Morris drew in a cold breath.

But in the next second, the doomsday he had expected did not descend. On the contrary, he again felt the mental pressure on him rapidly lessen, even shrinking to a level that, even without Rahm's blessing, he could barely endure as a human!

Silently, Duncan shifted his "main consciousness" back to the Vanished, and only used the "remote control" skill of walking the Spirit Realm to control the body in the antique shop.

After this period of "practice", he could now direct his distant body normally even while controlling it remotely, and could sense the environment around that body. The only effect was that the power he could draw on would be weaker—but there were no enemies here anyway.

He wanted to see whether this would make Morris feel a little better.

"Feeling better now?"

Duncan's deep, gentle voice sounded beside him, jolting Morris back to awareness.

The old man hurriedly lifted his head. He saw Duncan's solid, clear, harmless human form. Out of the corner of his eye, he noticed that the surrounding environment had stabilized.

The chaotic lights and shadows had vanished. The noise was gradually dying away. The torn buildings, the flowing flames, and the crawling, twisted dark things all disappeared from his sight. His mind was rapidly recovering, and the dangerous madness threshold state even showed signs of improvement.

He looked at Duncan in disbelief. Duncan gave him an apologetic nod: “Sorry. I really didn’t expect a human to have such ‘good eyes’. In the past I only ever scared a Abyssal demon, and a Abyssal demon’s nerves are much tougher than a human’s.”

“I… I’m much better,” Morris swallowed. The process of his mind gradually recovering was actually uncomfortable too. He could feel his heart pounding as if it were about to burst. But at least this let him regain most of his ability to think—and let him analyze useful information from Duncan’s words. “I… ah, I never thought I would see your true form. I was too careless. These years of living away from my faith have made me lax…”

Duncan did not pay attention to Morris’s muttering at the end.

He was thinking quickly, wondering how he should wrap up the situation in front of him.

After all, this great Historian was not Dog. The latter could be dealt with by scaring him a bit, but the old Mr. could not be handled with such crude methods.

“I’m very curious,” he said suddenly in the middle of his thoughts. “Why can you see?”

“I…” Morris opened his mouth and, after a slight hesitation, chose to be honest. “I am a follower of the God of Wisdom Rahm.”

Chapter 179: Have Some Self-Awareness

Duncan recalled what he had read in books.

The God of Wisdom Rahm, one of the Four Gods who sheltered the world in the Deep Sea era. Like the Storm Goddess and the Lord of Death, this deity also wielded two mutually conflicting Divine Authorities—He was the Giver of Wisdom, and also bore the holy title “God of Folly” or “Gospel of Foolishness”.

There were not many believers who followed this deity. They usually needed to pass very harsh examinations to gain the right to convert. But once they successfully devoted themselves to this deity, the believers would receive two kinds of blessings at the same time.

The first was wisdom. It could let mortals perceive the truth, grasp knowledge, more easily understand the workings of all things, and sense truths that might interfere with their own fate.

The second was dullness. It could raise a barrier called “ignorance”, keeping one away from truths that came too early, and away from the corruption and temptation of Subspace—in this world ringed with danger, the dull were truly blessed.

It was obvious what meaning these two blessings from Rahm had in the Deep Sea era, a time full of Anomalies and Visions, when madness reigned beneath the Deep Sea and clouds shrouded the surface. The believers of the God of Wisdom might be few, but each one was the elite of civilization.

From upstairs came the sounds of Nina busy in the kitchen. Outside the door, the noise of carriages and horses in the street was growing sparse. Amid these everyday sounds, the first floor of the antique shop felt especially quiet and comfortable.

Duncan sat behind the counter, his fingers interlaced on the countertop, and looked thoughtfully at old Mr. Morris.

The God of Wisdom's blessing was a very good thing. But clearly, because of their professional habits and instinctive pursuit of knowledge, His believers faced even greater dangers in their daily lives.

Not even a god could withstand the output of such a total-party-kill engine —if this old gentleman of history were placed in some other story, the tentacles growing from his body by now would probably already be a foot long.

By now, Duncan already understood what was going on. He had some sense of his own uniqueness, but he was more curious at the moment: "Can all believers of the God of Wisdom see through me the way you do?"

"I'm afraid only the most outstanding ones, those most favored by the God of Wisdom, can…" Morris rubbed his head. To him, Duncan's voice was still mixed with some sharp noise, but at least most of it now was sound a human could understand. "You might find this a bit ironic… but most of Rahm's believers actually don't even have the… qualification to have their minds taken by you."

"Oh, so you are especially blessed," Duncan muttered with a somewhat odd expression, especially when he said the words "divine blessing". No matter how he thought about it, it sounded awkward. "The 'divine blessings' in this place of yours are really fatal… Wait, then why were you fine the last time you came?"

Morris was a bit surprised. He did not know whether Duncan truly did not know, or was maliciously playing the part of an ignorant mortal. But in the current situation, he did not dare let his thoughts wander. He could only force himself to rein them in while he answered: “Even Rahm believers who bear a divine blessing do not keep the Eye of Truth open at all times. The last time I came, I did not use any divine gift, but this time…”

The old gent gave a bitter smile and raised his hand to point at his own eye. The blessed monocle he had used earlier to enhance the ritual’s effect had already been removed, yet one of his eyeballs still glowed faintly with a whitish light. Between the sclera and the pupil, a ring of floating radiance could still be seen, easy to distinguish if one came closer.

Duncan was very curious: “…So you can’t end this effect now?”

“…I tried. It didn’t work,” Morris shook his head. “And even if I did manage to end it, it wouldn’t mean much. I have already seen… your appearance.”

“…I’m very sorry. I didn’t actually mean to,” Duncan felt rather guilty. “Will you be able to recover after you go back? Or will you need some special form of treatment?”

“I…” Morris opened his mouth, feeling extremely strange inside. In his earlier years he had imagined whether constantly studying history would lead him to form a connection with some eerie and dangerous existence. He had imagined what terrifying scene it would be to one day stand face to face with some being from the Abyssal Deep, from the Deep Sea, or from Subspace. But he had never thought the situation would look like this—

He really had met a maddening Subspace Shadow. This “Shadow” was very polite, even asking after his health and showing concern for a human who had been frightened half to death by “Him”.

But a being from Subspace… was His “concern” really the kind of “concern” a human could understand?

“I’m fine,” the old Mr. finally shook his head. “I’m already much better now. After you drew back your… presence, I think I should be all right.”

“That’s good then. It seems I will have to be more careful when I move around in the city-state in the future—there are still humans with eyes as sharp as yours among you. That’s a troublesome matter,” Duncan nodded, then asked curiously, “In that case, you didn’t just come to ‘take a look’ today, did you? Why did you open your Eye of Truth outside the antique shop? What were you looking for?”

Morris’s heart gave a heavy thump.

He met Duncan’s gaze and saw only an ordinary middle-aged face with a bit of curiosity and concern on it. Yet around that face, between the shelves behind him, those quivering, twisted things began to surface bit by bit again.

Only when the other’s voice suddenly rang out again did the distortions in Morris’s sight return to normal once more.

“You are hesitating. You have concerns. You don’t want to answer this question,” Duncan read the old Mister’s emotions from his eyes, and at the same time a vague answer surfaced in his heart. “Does it have to do with Miss Heidi?”

“How did you know…”

“Miss Heidi is a psychiatrist, and she also seems to be a believer of Rahm—though she doesn’t look as ‘senior’ as you,” Duncan answered calmly. “Now that I think about it, she seemed a bit strange when she left with Miss Vanna last time… If I then consider how you reacted to my question just now, it’s not hard to connect the dots.”

“…It is indeed as you say,” Morris sighed, knowing he could no longer hide it. “After Heidi went back, I discovered that a layer of the mind ward on her had been pierced. But at the time I only thought there was some dangerous object in this antique shop. I never imagined…”

He sighed again and looked at Duncan opposite him.

Duncan had already furrowed his brow.

[Heidi… That young psychiatrist had only given Nina a hypnosis session in the antique shop, and a layer of her mind ward had already been pierced?]

He had known nothing about this—Heidi herself seemed not to have noticed at the time either!

Morris looked uneasily at the middle-aged man across the counter. He saw that the other seemed lost in thought and did not dare to ask anything rashly. Taking advantage of this short silence, he worked hard to control his thoughts and repair his damaged mind, while at the same time sneaking a glance at the rune bead bracelet on his wrist.

There were still four colored beads left.

Rahm’s blessing was calm.

He finally let out a slight breath of relief. At that moment, Duncan also finally lifted his head from his thoughts.

“She probably doesn’t know anything about this, does she?”

“Yes, Heidi doesn’t know anything,” Morris answered at once. Only when it came to matters related to his daughter was his mind as clear as usual. “She didn’t even notice that her blessing had been damaged, and she certainly doesn’t know that I came here today…”

“Then I won’t disturb her. I’ll only offer my apologies to you,” Duncan said with great courtesy. “Let this cancel out the assistance I gave at the City Museum back then."

He paused there, then thought of another question that made him very curious: "Then could you describe it to me in detail? Describe the scene you just saw—if it's not too much trouble."

For a moment, Morris did not react. Seeing this, Duncan explained: "I'm very curious what I look like in the eyes of different 'observers'—a mirror can't solve that problem."

Duncan truly was curious about this. Understanding his "true form" in different people's eyes might help him grasp his special powers and uncover the secrets of this body as soon as possible.

Morris hesitated. In his mind he again saw that inhuman horror he'd seen at the door of the antique shop just now, and even felt his hard-won calmness starting to shake. But under Duncan's unblinking gaze, he finally swallowed and slowly spoke in a low voice:

"I… saw you as a giant filled with chaotic streams of light, your body draped in starlight, standing on a twisted, grotesque street. You were holding Nina—she was an arc-shaped stream of flame, erupting violently…"

At first, as he listened to the first half, Duncan only nodded slowly, thinking that this image did live up to his reputation on the Boundless Sea. But when he heard the second half, his eyes instantly widened and he almost choked on his own saliva: "Cough… cough, cough… What did you say? What is Nina in your eyes?!"

Morris jumped in fright but had no time to think it through: "A… an arc-shaped stream of flame, erupting violently… Is there some problem with that?"

Duncan: "…"

Chapter 180: The History Scholar Talks of History

What was wrong? A lot was wrong.

Duncan stared wide-eyed at the old gentleman in front of him. Very soon he realized that Morris had no idea what the jet of flame he had seen in Duncan's eyes really meant. This scholar knew nothing about the fragments of the Sun. He had most likely taken Nina for another "supernatural being", like Duncan's retainer, or some other thing that had slipped out of Subspace.

That was indeed what Morris thought. The moment he saw that erupting flame, he had taken his "student" as a being similar to Duncan. As for why this "Subspace family" had one who looked like a giant and another who looked like a mass of fire, he did not think about it at all. When it came to Subspace, strange was normal. There were no living people in that place anyway, and the big bosses there could grow in whatever shape they liked…

However, seeing Duncan's reaction now, Morris faintly realized that things might not be as he had guessed.

"Nina, she…" The old man spoke hesitantly. After the terror and shock from before, he now felt a new emotion rising in him—worry for his own student.

Even he felt this worry was a little ridiculous, because that jet of flame—no matter what its true body was—was clearly powerful to a staggering degree.

A being that strong could not possibly still be his frail and ordinary student.

Duncan shook his head.

“Nina is not the same as me—she is an ordinary person, and she always has been,” he said slowly, his expression very serious. “She herself does not know that there is anything special about her. As for the flame you mentioned… that may be ‘something else’.”

“I… do not quite understand.”

Duncan looked at Morris for a long moment. In the end, he still did not bring up the matter of the Sun fragment directly. Instead, he suddenly changed the subject: “Do you know much about the so?called ‘true Sun god’ worshiped by the Suntists?”

“The true Sun god?” Morris frowned. He did not know why Duncan had suddenly steered the talk here, but he still answered quickly: “Of course I know a bit. After all, those cultists have existed for a very long time, and many of their ritual acts of worship are part of historical research.

“‘True Sun god’ is what they call their own deity. But believers of the True Gods usually do not say it that way. We call It the Black Sun, or the Black Sun god. In some very old texts, ancient scholars even called It the ‘Creeping Sun Wheel’.”

“Creeping Sun Wheel?” Duncan raised his eyebrows. He had heard the name Black Sun before, but this title “Creeping Sun Wheel” was new to him. The name at once brought back the vision he had seen through the Sun mask he had used as a medium—the rotting limbs under a glorious corona, the eerie Eldritch Gods burning fiercely.

“Yes. Outside of specialist circles, very few people mention that name, because it comes from records passed down from the Ancient Kingdom Era. The earliest manuscript was written in the Critt script. That makes the title ‘Creeping Sun Wheel’ carry a certain mystical pull, and spreading it too widely among ordinary people might have bad effects.”

Morris nodded as he explained these details. While he talked about academic matters, he seemed to forget the terrifying “reality” behind Duncan. He slipped back into the mood from days ago, when he had visited this antique shop and chatted happily with the shopkeeper.

He even felt that the buzzing noise in his head had faded away without him noticing.

“The Critt Ancient Kingdom…” Duncan was quite surprised. “Those cultists who worship the Sun god have such a long history?!”

“…Yes. As unbelievable as it sounds, those heretics who worship the Creeping Sun Wheel can even be traced back to the High Age of the Ancient Kingdom. And if we remember that Vision 001?the Sun only rose from the sea after the Critt Ancient Kingdom collapsed…” Morris paused here. He seemed to struggle with himself for a few seconds before going on. “In truth, orthodox academia and the Four Gods Church have never been willing to face this question head on. If we look at the era when the Sun Vision rose, the faith in the Black Sun is actually older than the history of Vision 001.”

For a while, Duncan said nothing.

The history of the Black Sun being older than the history of the Sun Vision was a very reasonable fact, yet it was one that the Four Gods Church was not eager to admit.

Because admitting this fact meant admitting something else at the same time—that one claim made by the Sun believers was true:

The “true Sun god” had been the real Sun in the Age of Antiquity, and the later?rising Sun Vision was in fact only a “profane construct” that had stolen the Sun's divine authority.

"…So those Suntists were right. Before the age of the Deep Sea, it was their 'Lord' who shone on this world," Duncan finally said after half a minute of silence. "If the standard is 'the older, the more orthodox', then they are the orthodox ones."

"There are many factions in academia and many different claims. But this is the most heretical of all the heretical ideas—almost half a step over the line into true heresy," Morris sighed. "Yet the many manuscripts left from the Critt Kingdom do not let us dodge this problem."

"Let us say those cultists hold a few pieces of the truth," Duncan shook his head lightly. "But that does not change the fact that their faith is very dangerous to the world as it is now. No matter what their Lord was like before the age of the Deep Sea, Its current state is… tsk tsk."

Morris listened, and then he suddenly came back to himself.

He woke from the calm mood of discussing scholarship with an old acquaintance and stared at Duncan in alarm: "Wait, by that you mean… could it be that you…"

"I happened to meet It once," Duncan thought about it. He felt he should at least offer some weighty information to the old gentleman. After all, he had taken so much knowledge from this scholar for free that he felt a bit guilty. "How should I put it… It was so miserable that even I could hardly bear to look, and there was no hope of recovery at all. I do not think those Sun believers' methods can bring their Lord back. If anything, I think they are only pushing their Lord toward even greater madness and distortion."

He paused, then looked at the old gentleman across from him: "Do you want me to tell you what It looks like now? Maybe you could gain some inspira—"

Morris had felt his own mind trembling ever since Duncan started to speak. When Duncan paused for breath, Morris finally seized his chance. He let out a sharp cry: “No need!”

Right after that, he seemed to feel his reaction was a bit rude. He hurriedly coughed twice, then spoke with serious respect: “This is not knowledge I should be touching.”

“…Oh, right, sorry,” Duncan froze for a moment, then waved his hand quickly. “Then let us not talk about that. Let us talk instead about the Black Sun faith in the Mortal Realm. Those cultists have kept trying to resurrect their Lord, yet their crude live sacrifices have never had any effect. In history, have they ever achieved any ‘results’?”

“The Sun heretics have caused plenty of destruction, but if we are talking about truly ‘reviving the Sun’, that is not something mortal power could achieve,” Morris recalled slowly. “As far as I know, there are only a few records of the Black Sun’s power appearing on a large scale in history.

“The earliest record was in the Late Chaotic Dynasty. After the collapse of the Critt Ancient Kingdom, many unresolved historical problems piled up over a long time. Several city?states broke out into constant wars and famines. The Sun heretics took advantage of the chaos and carried out a bloody great sacrificial rite in a city?state named Charon. In the end they summoned a gigantic living fireball. That fireball floated over Charon for five days before it finally faded, and in the end it melted the whole city?state into a single piece of glass.

“Another time was in the classical Age of City?States. The exact cause is unknown now. All we know is that several small city?states at the edge of the civilized world vanished in a single night. According to eyewitness accounts, a huge glowing rift opened in the sky, and a Sun Wheel rose within it. The city?states were pulled up out of the sea by a huge force, torn into long narrow strips, and then fell into that rift.

“The most recent case happened at the very beginning of the New City? State Calendar, and it was also the strangest. That disaster left no eyewitness reports or records of damage at all. There was no proof, no records, no one who knew or remembered. We cannot even say for sure what year it happened or where it took place…”

Duncan listened in bafflement. At last he could not help speaking: “No one knows it even happened? How can that count as the Black Sun’s power appearing on a large scale? People do not even know which city?state was attacked?”

“Yes, that is how strange it was. This already went beyond what a normal scholar would study, but my position at the Truth Academy let me see some related documents,” Morris nodded, his face very serious. “That event did happen, because one morning a line of words suddenly appeared on the most sacred Chronicle Pillar of the Flamebearer Church.

“That one line mentioned a city?state that simply does not exist. It had only a single sentence:

‘Last message from Willheim. The Black Sun descended from history. We failed.’”

Chapter 181: History, corruption, and the Black Sun

That one line that suddenly appeared on the Chronicle Pillar. A city?state no one knew. A battle no one knew. A failure and sacrifice no one knew—a stretch of history that existed in no one's memory, leaving behind only this faint trace in the world after it died.

And even that extremely short sentence had probably cost the lives of more Flamebearers than anyone could count before it could be delivered into the Mortal Realm.

After hearing Morris's story, Duncan fell into thought once his brief shock passed.

The Flamebearer Church… he knew the rough situation of this sect.

After learning that this world had a "Four Gods faith", he had become deeply interested in these deities that had such a huge effect on the workings of the mortal world. The book Morris had previously sent him also happened to contain a lot about the Four Gods Church. Duncan had read up on the churches of all four True Gods, and among these Four Gods, the "Flamebearers" were the most unusual in his eyes.

The core of the Flamebearers' faith—their "belief"—was completely different from that of the believers of the other three Gods. The believers of the other three Gods followed storm, wisdom, and death, all concepts that were fairly easy to understand. The Flamebearers, however, followed something far more elusive: "history".

History was the memory of civilization, passed down like fire through the changing years. That was the core of the Flamebearers' belief. They thought that civilization began with "fire" and had used "fire" as its symbol ever since. In this world there were countless threats trying to disturb or twist the passing on of this flame. To fight those threats and keep the flame of civilization passing on steadily was their mission.

The Flamebearers followed and worshiped the Everburning Ember, Tarrigan, a giant who stood at the Dawn of Civilization. It was said that He kept and guarded the first bonfire mortals ever lit, and made that bonfire into a part of His own body. From the jumps and branching of the flames He told the correct history, and carved it into His own flesh. As civilization kept moving forward, this giant grew larger and larger. When He finally grew to His full size, mortal civilization in the world would gain true safety. No one would ever again be able to threaten the correct passing on of history—not even Subspace would be able to erase civilization.

That was the original text in the book Morris had sent. It was also the most important passage in the Flamebearers' scripture, the Flame Gospel.

In Duncan's view, the last part of that description was probably only the believers' wishful thinking, a big promise drawn by the Church, with a level of credibility that was open to doubt. But the part about the Flamebearers guarding history should all be true.

History could be corrupted, so of course it could also be protected—and the reverse was also true.

"…So they already did it once back then…" Duncan suddenly muttered, looking thoughtful.

"What did you say?" Morris did not react at first. "Did it once back then? What do you mean…"

“Nothing, I was just talking to myself,” Duncan shook his head lightly, then looked very seriously at the old gentleman in front of him. “The information you brought is very important.”

“The information I brought?” Morris was a little confused. “You mean that third record I just mentioned? The message that appeared on the Flamebearers’ Chronicle Pillar?”

Duncan nodded slightly, then suddenly frowned: “But there is something I am very curious about. Does the Black Sun have the divine authority to corrupt history?”

“This…” Morris hesitated. This clearly went beyond the knowledge range of a ‘history expert’. “I am not very clear on the matter of the Black Sun’s divine authority. Only experts who specialize in fighting Eldritch Gods would know that. But as far as I know, in theory the Black Sun should not have that ability…”

Duncan nodded, deep in thought. Morris watched this “Subspace shadow” in front of him with growing unease.

This “Mr. Duncan” always behaved with great courtesy and patience. He discussed academic issues with Morris, asking questions now and then and pondering the answers. The atmosphere was just like it had been when Morris last visited the antique shop. But the phantoms and noise that sometimes rose in his mind kept reminding Morris that he was walking along the edge of an abyss.

“Mr. Duncan” seemed to have become interested in the Flamebearers, in the “corruption and protection of history”. Why was that? Was this being, who likely came from Subspace, plotting something? Did the God of Wisdom Rahm have Morris stay behind and contact him in order to gain information on this point? What was the relationship between this Subspace shadow and the God of Wisdom? Were they in some kind of struggle?

Was he now taking part in a game between deities? Was he serving as the God of Wisdom's eyes and ears, spying on the other side?

All kinds of tangled thoughts rose and fell in Morris's mind. He became even more cautious. Once he realized what "role" he might be playing, he even felt a sudden sense of duty. It was as if Rahm stood behind him, watching this "Mr. Duncan" through his eyes.

While the old gentleman drifted off into wild thoughts, Duncan finally finished his own pondering. Duncan suddenly raised his head and muttered, half curious, half rueful: "Those 'Sun heretics' have done so many things, yet they are still active today… Haven't the normal people of the city?states ever thought about wiping out this group of madmen once and for all?"

"Wiping out a cult of an Eldritch God is easier said than done," Morris woke from his thoughts and shook his head without thinking. "Heretical faith is like mercury entering the body. It seeps through every crack. No matter how many you destroy, new ones will always appear. In the end, it is because the 'deity' behind them is still moving. As long as that Eldritch God still exists, Its corruption and infiltration of mortals will never stop. Even if all the adults in a city?state died and only the purest newborns were left, some of those newborns would still naturally grow minds that could be tempted…"

Morris spoke and shook his head. "Some people just live their lives quietly, honest and hardworking for most of their years. But because of a single moment of weakness after a setback, or a single wavering line of fear, or because they see something they should not see, or hear of something they should not know, they become heretics' tools overnight. Their minds fill with forbidden knowledge. They put on black robes and turn into believers of an Eldritch God. How can you ever fully clean away that kind of heretical corruption?"

As he said this, the old gentleman glanced at Duncan again without meaning to. His eyes grew a little strange.

Duncan looked puzzled: “Why are you looking at me like that?”

“Forgive my rudeness,” Morris took a light breath and gathered his courage. “But should you not be very familiar with this kind of… corruption among mortals?”

At first Duncan did not understand. It took him two seconds to catch Morris’s meaning, and his face turned helpless. “I do not do that sort of thing. I normally obey the law. When I see cultists, I even go and report them to the nearest constable of my own accord.”

Morris: “…?”

The old gentleman clearly had a bellyful of words in that instant, but he did not dare say a single one of them.

Duncan felt the topic had gone crooked. Before Morris could speak, Duncan quickly waved his hand: “I get what you mean. The believers of Eldritch Gods in the mortal world are only the ‘surface’. The real problem is that the Eldritch Gods themselves cannot be destroyed. Their corruption is like lingering poison, breeding crop after crop of cultists. Even if the Guardians fought for ten thousand years, they could never finish the cleanup. But is the Black Sun’s influence really that strong? I have seen that poor fellow. It is almost dead. Forget interfering in the mortal world—just speaking a word to me takes a last flare of dying strength. And even like that, It can still corrupt the Mortal Realm?”

Morris’s mouth twitched at once: “No matter how bad the Black Sun’s state is, that is only in your eyes. We… are all just fragile mortals…”

A strange feeling rose in Duncan’s heart. For a moment he wanted to tell the old gentleman: “I am human too. In what way do I not look human to you?”

But for the sake of the old man’s mental and physical health, he held the words back.

After blurting out what was on his mind, Morris seemed to think of something else. He paused, then added: “But your doubt may point to the key of the problem. If the Black Sun’s condition is really as bad as you say, Its corruption of the mortal world should not be this strong. At the very least it should not make the Sun heretics so hard to deal with… All of this may still be connected to those beings called the ‘Sun Spawn’.”

“The Sun Spawn…” Duncan muttered, thoughtful. He could not help thinking again of that tall, thin black silhouette that had appeared in Shirley’s dream before.

He did not have any clear proof, but he still felt that thing was very likely related to the legendary “Sun Spawn”.

The Black Sun was already in its twilight years and no longer had the strength to shine on this world. Yet Its spawn had gone on until today, continuing the Black Sun’s influence in another way. Because of that, the Suntists could not be wiped out, and their harm only grew greater.

But even here, one problem still had no answer:

The Black Sun did not have the ability to corrupt history, and Its spawn certainly did not.

Yet in the early years of the New City?State Calendar, the message from that city?state forgotten by history, Willheim, had said that “the Black Sun descended from history”. Now the city?state of Pland also showed signs of history being corrupted. What did that mean?

Could it be that… someone was “helping” the Black Sun to be resurrected from history?

Chapter 182: A Peaceful Tomorrow Will Still Come

The noise in his mind rose and fell, as if a huge source of interference was sometimes drawing close to his brain and sometimes drifting away. The antique shop in his field of vision stayed mostly stable, yet from time to time something dark flashed between the shelves, as if trying to show the reckless visitor the sinister Truth from Subspace.

Morris sat carefully at the counter, pulling back his thoughts and emotions. In the brief clarity granted to him by the God of Wisdom Rahm, he tried his best, within his limits, to think through one question after another.

The conversation was still going on. Until the “Mr. Duncan” across from him had said his fill, he, as the “conversation partner”, had to keep accompanying him.

However, Duncan was not speaking at this moment. He had also fallen into thought, thinking about things related to the Black Sun and the history of corruption.

That dead, yet noise-filled silence lasted for who knew how long before Morris suddenly heard a deep voice from across the table: “One last question. If something really is Corrupting history, how should that problem be solved?”

“Something is really… Corrupting history?” Morris raised his head a bit slowly and looked at Duncan in confusion. “Who are you talking about?”

“No matter who it is,” Duncan said calmly. “It might be Subspace, it might be the Black Sun, it might be some other Heretic God. If something is trying to Corrupt history, then how should it be dealt with? How do the Flamebearers handle that kind of crisis?”

Morris froze for a second, then shook his head hesitantly: “I… I’m sorry. I can’t answer that. It is already beyond what I know. Even among the Flamebearers, I’m afraid only the strongest Saints or Chosen Ones know the secrets of how history runs. Most Flamebearers are actually like the Guardians of the Storm Church. In daily life they only wipe out Heretics and carry out purification against corruption and the like. After all, a true corruption of history is almost impossible to happen…”

“…Right. It’s my question that’s too deep. It’s hard to make you answer this,” Duncan sighed softly. He realized his curiosity was too strong and had probably put a lot of pressure on the old Mr. in front of him, so he simply ended the topic. “Then let’s stop here for today.”

A wave of unprecedented relief rose in his chest, and Morris let out a long breath.

His head had grown groggy again a while ago. His thoughts broke off again and again. Many questions floated up in his mind, but he could not put them together. Now that Duncan was willing to end the talk on his own, Morris could not have wished for more.

Duncan raised his head and looked at the sky outside through the nearby glass window.

By the time of day, there was still a while before sunset, but the gloomy sky had already made it completely dark outside. The gas streetlamps lit up early, their pale yellow glow shining on the streets. Against the background of heavy dark clouds, the Lower City of Pland looked as if it had been thrown into the veil of night ahead of time.

“The weather looks bad,” Duncan withdrew his gaze and looked at the old man across from him. “Do you want to stay? Nina should have finished cooking by now.”

Morris’s heart started pounding at once. All of a sudden, he remembered a saying popular at the Truth Institute, used to describe the maddest and most legendary scholars who chased after knowledge— Swam in Subspace, bragged in front of an Eldritch God, watched the Gods’ war at the scene, and mooched a bowl of soup cooked by a Retainer.

If he treated this antique shop, already occupied by “Mr. Duncan”, as Subspace, if Mr. Duncan’s rank was equal to that of a God, and if there really was a struggle between this Subspace Shadow and the God of Wisdom… then he had already accomplished three of the four great sacred miracles…

At this point, if he went upstairs for a bowl of soup, he might actually be promoted to “legendary” on the spot!

Morris was a little surprised that he still had the strength to think about such nonsense right now. At the same time, he carefully gathered his words: “Actually…”

“Actually, you want to leave, right?” Duncan nodded before the old Mr. could finish. He still had some self-awareness. “Even though I want to say the weather is bad and staying for a bowl of hot soup might be better for your health, it looks like, compared with the comfort a bowl of soup would bring, the pressure of sitting in front of me right now is even greater?”

Morris hurriedly stood up and nodded along: “To be honest, every second is torture—of course, I don’t mean any offense, it’s just…”

“No need to say it, I get it,” Duncan waved his hand, a bit helpless. “If we could meet in a more relaxed way, I would really like to talk with you properly about history and the Gods. I'm very interested in knowledge—the kind of interest without any malice. But this time, it looks like it won't work."

Morris stood beside the counter and fell silent after hearing this. After quite a while, he finally met Duncan's gaze: "To be honest, I drifted off several times just now and almost forgot the 'truths' I saw. Your… curiosity and friendliness felt so real. You talked with me like a friend. This is the first time I've met someone like you who is so friendly…"

The old Mr. got stuck. For a moment he really could not find a positive word. Duncan saw this and laughed: "If you can't find a good word, then don't. Just don't go and report me to anyone after you leave."

"No, no, no! I would never do that!" Morris waved his hands at once, as if he was afraid Duncan would misunderstand. "No matter what, you truly saved Heidi's life, and you have always been friendly. I have no reason to report you—besides…"

The old Mr. hesitated, then spread his hands with a bitter smile: "Judging from how you look, you probably aren't afraid of being 'reported' anyway…"

"It would feel troublesome," Duncan said casually, "but probably not a big trouble."

Then he paused for a moment, looked up toward the second floor, and then looked back at Morris: "If the weather improves tomorrow, Nina will go to school as usual."

"Nina…" Morris blinked. He remembered the arc of blazing flame he had seen, and he remembered what he had just discussed with Duncan, especially the part about the Black Sun. Combined with Duncan's attitude just now, he already vaguely guessed something in his heart. “Nina… is she connected to what those Suntists worship…”

He did not finish the question, because Duncan gently shook his head.

“Nina is just Nina. You don’t need to be curious about the secrets behind her,” Duncan said softly. “Treat her like you always do, and then nothing will happen.”

“…I understand,” Morris lowered his head slightly. For some reason, after hearing Duncan’s words, he felt even more relieved than before. He stepped back two steps. “Then I should take my leave. Please say goodbye to Nina for me—I am not really in a state to ‘look’ at her again right now.”

Duncan made a sound of agreement, came out from behind the counter, and walked the old Mr. to the front door.

There were hardly any pedestrians left on the street. Only rows of streetlamps lit the cloud-covered district. A cold wind blew between the buildings, circling back and forth, and the dampness in the air grew heavier.

Morris pulled his coat tighter and pressed down the short top hat on his head. But before he walked to his car, he still could not help stopping. He turned back to look at Duncan, who was still standing in the shop doorway.

What he saw was a middle-aged man with a calm smile. The distant street view still shook from time to time, but it no longer looked like the terrifying Anomaly it had at the start.

“Mr. Duncan,” Morris suddenly said, “you actually like this place a lot, don’t you?”

“That’s right, I like it here quite a bit,” Duncan laughed and waved to the old man. “So go home without worry. Pland will safely welcome tomorrow—and every day after.”

Morris took off his hat, gave Duncan a small wave, then turned and walked toward the car parked by the roadside.

Duncan did not look away until the car started up and disappeared at the end of the street.

But he did not go back inside right away. Instead, he stood at the door, lost in thought.

The first question he thought about was whether the Old Gentleman would report him after going home…

His conclusion was that the chance was very, very small. If he had only been an ordinary cultist, or even a slightly higher-ranking Sun priest, then as a believer of the True Gods, Morris would have had a one hundred percent chance of reporting him afterward. But judging from today, in the other party's eyes he probably looked more like an Elder Gods-level being. That actually made the Old Gentleman's chance of reporting him drop to almost zero.

The reason was simple: to report a few cultists, two Constables would be enough to wipe them out. To report a Cult priest, a few Guardians could cut him down on the spot. But if what was entrenched in this place was a Subspace Eldritch God… then what level would you even report that to?

Forget about the local Cathedral—reporting it to the city's Bishop would be useless as well…

It would be more reliable to go back and mutter a few words to the God of Wisdom he believed in than to report it to the Church.

And even aside from all that, if Morris really did go to the Church to report him, Duncan still would not care much.

After all, even Vanna-F, the Inquisitor who stood at the peak of combat power in the Storm Church, still looked a bit weak in his eyes…

Compared with such minor details, what Duncan cared about more right now was actually Nina's condition.

That surging, burning arc of flame… this was the "truth" Morris had seen on Nina with the Eye of Truth given to him by the God of Wisdom.

"A shard of the Sun, huh…" Duncan lifted his head and looked at the dark sky outside, muttering softly to himself. "Just what the hell is the Sun in this world…"

Chapter 183: The Invasion After nightfall

“Teacher just left like that?” Nina came down to the first floor and widened her eyes in surprise when she heard that Morris had already left. Then she complained: “Uncle, why didn’t you ask him to stay a bit longer? The weather is so bad and you still let Teacher go…”

“It would be completely dark if he stayed any longer,” Duncan turned around and locked the front door, then spoke casually as he walked toward the stairs. “He drove here. A bit of rain won’t affect him much.”

“But Teacher didn’t look very well,” Nina followed him, muttering as she climbed the stairs. “He should have rested a bit more…”

Duncan thought for a moment. He figured that if the Old Gentleman really stayed here to rest a bit longer, then it would not be just “not feeling well” anymore. It might turn into ten straight Will Tests all failing. Then forget about tomorrow’s Sun—he might not even see tonight’s World’s Wound…

But there was no way he could explain that to Nina, so he only brushed it off with a few casual words and went to the dining table on the second floor.

Nina had already prepared a hot meal—beet soup, toasted bread, vegetable rolls, and sliced ham.

There was clearly enough for one more person.

“If we can’t finish, we’ll save it for tomorrow morning,” Nina muttered. Then she looked up at Duncan with some curiosity. “What did you talk about with Teacher? I couldn’t hear clearly upstairs just now, but it sounded like you two were talking quite happily…”

Duncan quietly watched Nina. He had been watching her like this for a while, watching this girl moving about busily.

She was just like always, always smiling. Even when she complained, she never really looked angry. She kept busy with this and that, as if she always had endless things to do, endless energy to use, and she was always looking forward to tomorrow.

Duncan could only see this kind of Nina. He did not have eyes that could see through reality like Morris, and he could not see the surging flame inside Nina.

If he had not just heard it with his own ears, he really would never have imagined that the shard of the Sun that tugged at the nerves of countless people was quietly “sleeping” right here, right under his nose.

The shard of the Sun… what exactly was it?

Duncan had once thought it was a tangible supernatural item. Later, through various clues, he confirmed that it was a solar prominence that had been stripped away. Yet now he had discovered that this thing was very likely sleeping inside Nina’s body…

If that thing really came from the “star” he knew, then what kind of change would a star have to go through to peel off such a strange… “shard”?

“Uncle Duncan?” Nina noticed the gaze from across the table and twisted her body in slight awkwardness. “Do I have something stuck on my face?”

“…No, nothing at all,” Duncan shook his head lightly. As he lowered his head to break the bread, he asked as if casually: “By the way, have you felt unwell recently? That strange dream from before… has it appeared again?”

“No,” Nina waved her hand. “The hypnosis Miss Heidi did for me last time worked pretty well. I haven’t had any strange dreams since then, and I’ve felt energetic every day.”

She paused for a moment, then looked at Duncan with some worry: “Uncle, is something wrong with you? I feel like… you’ve been a bit strange since you finished talking with Mr. Morris… Ah, it can’t be my last test score…”

“No, stop imagining things. Your Teacher didn’t come here to complain about you,” Duncan raised an eyebrow. “Eat first, eat first.”

Nina answered and lowered her head to eat. At that moment, though, Duncan seemed to sense something and looked in confusion toward a certain direction outside the window.

……

In the Lower City, deep in a shabby, dim alley, gas lamps lit in a hurry finally drove away the surrounding darkness before the veil of night completely covered the streets. In the dull light from the gas lamps, Shirley lay on the windowsill, a bit dazed as she looked at the dark street outside.

The clatter of chains rubbing against each other came from behind her, followed by Dog’s voice: “You’re leaning out to look again? What’s there to see?”

“I just can’t sleep. It’s so early and there’s nothing to do,” Shirley muttered. “I’m so bored…”

“…How about we go out tomorrow and keep making trouble for cultists?”

“…Feels like we’ll still find nothing,” Shirley thought for a bit and shook her head. “I don’t know if the people from the Church suddenly got better at their jobs, but lately the cultists in the city-state seem to have been caught clean. Even you can't smell their stink anymore…"

"The Suntists who were active in the city recently really are gone. Maybe they really were all caught," Dog came closer and flopped down lazily at Shirley's feet. "But I don't think you're bored because of that at all…"

Shirley rolled her eyes at once: "Then what else could it be?"

"…Are you thinking about 'over there'?" Dog lifted his head, faint light flickering in his hollow blood-red eye sockets. "Thinking about that warm house, that bright room, the hot meals, the days when someone called you to get up and urged you to eat. Or… are you thinking about that Subspace Retainer called Nina? Maybe even that Duncan…"

"Damn it, shut up! You're so annoying!" Shirley yanked hard on the chain in her hand, cutting Dog off roughly. "I'm not some whining little brat. How could I be that weak!"

Dog did not care at all about Shirley's rough reaction: "…Longing for light and warmth isn't weakness. It only proves you are still a Human."

"Ugh…" Shirley suddenly shivered, then looked disgusted. "Why the hell are you suddenly so mushy? And talking all fancy? 'Proves I'm still a Human'… Are you praising me or saying I haven't improved at all in all these years?"

"…Don't think that just because you've been fused with me, a Abyssal Demon, for eleven years, you've really turned into a Demon too. There's nothing wrong with calmly admitting the human side of yourself," Dog shook his ugly big head. "Besides, don't forget, the thing linking you and me isn't just this chain—how could I not understand it when your emotions change?"

“…Shut up,” Shirley turned her face away and looked outside irritably. “If you keep nagging, I’ll really take you to see Nina tomorrow. Then I’ll keep Nina company, you can keep Mr. Duncan company, and both of us will have a bright future—see if that doesn’t scare you till you pee yourself!”

Dog finally fell silent.

After a brief silence, Shirley could not help nudging the Abyssal Hound beside her with the tip of her foot, taking the initiative to break the quiet: “Stop worrying so much. I still have you with me, don’t I?”

“You’re even mushier than I am,” Dog shifted, the chain clanking. “Stop talking. If you keep going, I’m going to throw up—and then there will be another hole in the floor.”

The Abyssal Hound kept grumbling, but through the spirit link between them, Shirley could feel that “Dog”, who had almost eaten her alive and then raised her to adulthood, suddenly felt much better.

In the dim dusk and the faint glow of the streetlamps, the thin girl curled her lips, hiding the small smile on her face.

This was good. Everything had gone back on track. The familiar days had returned, and she only needed to keep living them. She must not think about peace and warmth that did not belong to her, especially when that peaceful, warm place still had a Shadow from Subspace lurking in it.

That warmth was far too dangerous.

Shirley let out a soft breath.

But in the next second, she frowned slightly. She felt as if something malicious was approaching, and the hairs on her back stood up.

Dog also suddenly rose from his lying position. Black smoke and flames burst from the huge Abyssal Hound’s body. The red light in his hollow blood-colored eye sockets flared as he swept the room with sharp wariness and hostility.

The room was dark. To save money, Shirley had blown out the Oil lamp on the table the moment the streetlamps lit up, so now only the light from outside shone into the room. In the dim, spreading light, the simple furniture inside cast mottled, strange Shadows on the floor and walls.

In the shabby home, everything was in plain sight, familiar and clear.

Yet for some reason, Shirley suddenly felt that all the furnishings in her home were a bit strange. In the staggered lights and shadows, in the corners of the table and chairs and the gaps at the foot of the bed, an unfamiliar, wrong kind of aura kept seeping out!

Shirley tightened the chain in her hand on instinct: “Dog!”

“I know,” Dog growled at the same time. “I’m looking! Something is coming in here… surrounding us… damn! What is this, my eyes are going blurry!”

Before the Abyssal Hound finished speaking, Shirley suddenly noticed that the light from the streetlamps shining in through the window was starting to twist and dim!

It was as if a heavy black curtain suddenly fell over the whole house. The street scene that had been clear a second ago turned blurry in an instant. The light from the streetlamps was cut into broken pieces, scattered as pale glimmers across the room. Then those pale glimmers and the shadows everywhere started writhing all at once. Together with a series of nauseating, low whispers and strange sounds, several figures abruptly surfaced from between the light and shadow—

They wore tattered black robes, and the arms exposed beneath the robes were thin as sticks. A pitch-black Black Codex hung at each of their waists.

The Black Codex looked soaked in inky filth, with black, suspicious liquid seeping and dripping from the books without stopping. On each of their chests hung an iron emblem like a wreath of thorns, and in the center of each emblem a pale, muddy flame flickered.

The black-robed figure in the lead raised a hand and pointed at Shirley. Muffled, hoarse syllables that no Human throat could make came from under the hood: “You shall perish…”

Dog’s shout finally reached Shirley’s ears: “Damn it, it’s a Ender!!!”

Chapter 184: Attack of the Enders

Dog's cracked, gong-like roar exploded like thunder and echoed through the shabby little house. The attackers in tattered black robes, who looked like ascetics, were clearly shocked when they heard a Abyssal Demon speak rational human words—and in the next second, something even more shocking happened.

Shirley flicked the chain. She swung the Abyssal Hound in her hand in a wide circle and smashed it toward the nearest "Ender".

She actually did not know much about the Enders. She only knew in a vague way that they were also a group of cultists, even more crazy and extreme. The "lord" they worshiped was even Subspace itself. Shirley did not know why a bunch of such madmen suddenly crawled out in the city-state of Pland, or why these madmen had found her. But that was not important—

Her experience crawling through gutters and back alleys had taught her one rule: when you met danger, you did not waste time thinking about things you could not figure out. Swinging your arms and beating the hell out of it worked better than anything else.

The huge Abyssal Hound howled through the air like a cannonball. In an instant it smashed into one of the robed "preachers". After a dull thud of flesh and bone, the attacker flew backward, slammed hard into a pillar not far away, twisted into a strange angle, and then slid to the floor.

Shirley yanked on the chain and dragged Dog back to her side, then swung him again toward the next enemy.

But in that brief moment, the black-robed figures had already reacted. They clearly had more combat experience than the lowest the Suntists Shirley had met before. Even though this rare fighting style had stunned them for a second, they still quickly pulled themselves together and scattered the instant the Abyssal Hound came whipping toward them.

One of them dodged past Dog's bony skull by a hair's breadth, slipped to the side, and raised a hand to point at Shirley. From under the hood came a hoarse, gloomy shout: "Thou Shalt Grow Weary!"

"What the hell are you mumbling about?!" Shirley was already in a foul mood. Hearing that muttering voice made her even angrier. She stepped, twisted her waist, and turned. The chain in her hand whistled out. Dog's skeletal body slammed into the screeching Ender and sent him flying.

But in the few swings it took to do that, Shirley suddenly felt something wrong with her body.

She felt a bit tired. It was not very serious, but the tiredness was real.

At the same time, her head started to buzz. Her anger rushed in her chest like a wild beast she could not hold back. A violent urge to drop all defense, charge straight in, and die together with the enemy slammed in her mind. It almost made her dizzy.

A strange creaking, cracking sound suddenly reached her ears. Shirley turned toward the sound and saw the attacker she had just smashed away getting up from the floor. He was covered in blood. Many of his bones were clearly broken, yet this "preacher" seemed to ignore pain that would have made an ordinary person faint. Blood still sprayed from him as he raised both hands high: "My hands and feet shall not die to the flesh—The curse!"

After that muttered shout, the Enders around them seemed to gain endless courage and strength. In the next second, Shirley watched in shock as these madmen's bodies started to change.

Their skinny, bony frames began to swell and twist. Thick bone spurs and tough, whip-like muscle cords grew from their limbs and stretched out like weapons. Their bodies tore and reshaped in great pain, turning ugly and monstrous, twisted and profane.

Yet these fanatics seemed to fall into a strange ecstasy in this pain. They cheered, shouted, praised—and then they rushed at Shirley.

"What the hell are these things?!" Shirley of course did not sit still and let them do as they pleased. The moment the first Ender's body began to change, she swung the chain so fast it hummed and hurled Dog at the closest enemy. The impact broke the target's tendons and bones. He did not die on the spot, but his mutation stopped at once.

However, just that single attack made Shirley feel even more clearly tired than before. A sharper, more painful wave of violent impulse stabbed through her mind.

She even began to hear noises that did not exist. Every muscle in her body felt like it was being gnawed by invisible teeth, full of cruel pain, as if every fiber was about to tear itself free.

"These 'preachers' are madmen who chose to embrace Subspace! Their words and bodies carry corruption!" Dog's voice suddenly rang in Shirley's mind, more anxious than ever. "Don't let them keep yapping! Whoever opens his mouth, you smash him! Don't look into their eyes. Don't listen to their shouting!"

In a flash, a cold gleam appeared at the edge of Shirley's vision. She moved on instinct, trying to dodge, but a bone spur still grazed her and stabbed into her arm. She hurriedly swung the chain to strike back and felt her hands and feet grow twice as heavy as before. This time, even black afterimages started to appear in her field of vision.

Another Ender took the chance to spread both arms and chant a vicious blessing: “Thou Shalt Not Heal…”

“Bang!”

“Get the hell out!” Shirley swung the dog in a full arc and smashed this raving preacher, who had already turned into a monster covered in bone spurs, straight into the wall. In the next second, she suddenly felt a sharp pain in her back.

A spear-like bone spur stabbed from a sneaky blind angle and drove deep into her back. If her body had not, after years of a Demon symbiotic pact, grown as tough and sturdy as a Abyssal Demon’s, that blow might have pierced straight through her.

Shirley’s body pitched forward against her will. Dog threw himself in front of the attacker who moved in to chase, opened his jaws, and spat out a blast of highly corrosive black flame mixed with acid.

The attacker was forced back for the moment, but Shirley’s state was terrible. She braced herself against the nearby wall, feeling blood run down her back without stopping, and feeling her muscles twitch out of control.

The corruption from the Enders was still working. Even though the Abyssal Demons’ resistance made her endure this Anomaly far better than an ordinary person, she had been caught off guard at the start and hit with weakening and The curse. Now she could clearly feel her body slowly sliding toward… a runaway state.

Her blood was boiling. The noise in her head grew louder and louder. Her muscles kept spasming. She saw smoke rising from the wound on her arm.

In that smoke, the torn flesh did not heal. Instead, ugly, disgusting flesh buds grew out bit by bit. Her blood writhed around the wound as if it had a life of its own, crawling and clumping, taking shape.

The wound on her back was probably in the same state.

"…Damn it, all that effort and I only took down three…"

Shirley spat blood to the side and grinned in a pained smile as she muttered.

"Already not bad," Dog's grumbling voice came from beside her. The Abyssal Hound sounded weak and listless. As Shirley's first barrier against corruption, he suffered even more from the Enders's influence. "These are priest-level ascetics, not the kind of rabble who crowd into a basement and let someone talk them into donating money… Fighting them like this was almost like storming the Cathedral in the city… You did not lose out at all."

"Damn it, a bunch of grown men this big, ganging up on one harmless little young lady like me—Lord above, that's shameless." Shirley lifted her head. Her face was covered in blood as she stared at the Enders gathering around her. Only viciousness shone in her eyes. "What did I ever do to you?"

Three Enders were still standing. All of them had turned into skeletal, blood-soaked monsters. Their tattered robes hung from their mutated bodies like The shroud, making them look even more grim and frightening in the dimness.

They did not answer Shirley, of course. Hunters did not bargain with prey.

Shirley coughed up blood and lifted her head to look around.

There had been a lot of noise in the fight, yet no Guardian had come, and not a single neighbor had been disturbed. Outside the window, the world was still hazy. The street was eerily quiet.

Clearly, some kind of “barrier” covered the whole house. The attackers had done their prep work very well before they struck.

All the furniture was destroyed.

The walls and pillars were ready to collapse.

The only wardrobe had been smashed to pieces by a stray hit in the fight. The few clothes inside, along with the little drawer where she hid her coins, had fallen to the floor, soaked in filthy blood and eaten away by acid.

The most valuable thing in the house, the oil lamp, had also been knocked over. The glass shade lay shattered across the floor.

“I only have so few things, and you still smashed them to bits,” Shirley finally could not hold herself up anymore. Her body slowly slid toward the floor, but she still lifted her head, staring at the enemy who was raising his bone spurs to finish her. “You bastards… I’m going to spray blood right in your face later…”

The bone spurs stabbed down through the air.

Then, in a blink, they slowed, leaving layer upon layer of afterimages, and finally stopped in midair.

A tongue of green flame suddenly flared into being in the room that should have been fully sealed by the barrier. In the fire, a huge, ferocious skeletal bird circled in the air. A shrill, strange female voice stabbed into Shirley’s ears—

“Our warrior is in combat with the enemy… teleportation successful!”

—

Chapter 185: Each Safe and Sound

An Undead bird made of phantom flesh and crystal-clear bone, a sharp and piercing strange female voice, roaring green flames—and a sentence no one could fully understand.

Shirley's dazed mind suddenly cleared. She stared in shock at the strange bird that had rushed in. The bird circled once more in the air. As it circled, the figures of the Enders around her froze one by one in mid-motion, locked into weird poses. It was just like what happened in a "cinema" when the people on the screen suddenly stopped moving because the film jammed.

One of these monsters had even been caught while stepping forward, so his body almost hung in midair. It looked eerie and frightening… and a little ridiculous.

The Undead bird circled again. This time, a door and vortex of green fire opened in the air. A tall figure stepped out of it and came to stand in front of Shirley.

"I remember I told you that you can ask for help when you run into trouble," Duncan lowered his head and gazed at the blood-soaked girl lying on the floor with a calm gaze. "Why didn't you call me?"

"I… I forgot," Shirley blinked. The moment Duncan appeared, she noticed that the corruption and The curse from the Enders were fading from her at high speed. As the harsh noise and wild thoughts in her mind died down, her head slowly cleared. A strange, tangled look crossed her face. "My head was a mess just now… Right, these guys kept howling like ghosts. They made my head spin…”

Duncan slowly turned his head and glanced at the attackers frozen in midair by AI’s High-Latency Strike.

It was his first time seeing such weird… things. They looked a bit like people and still wore scraps of human clothes, but their bodies had mutated so much they were hardly human anymore. Their limbs were twisted flesh, bone spurs jutted from every joint, and their faces wore crazed yet almost comical expressions—almost even uglier than Dog.

Duncan frowned and looked back at Shirley: “They did this to you? Where did they all come from?”

“They’re the ones who beat me up!” Shirley raised her voice at once. The moment the words left her mouth, she felt like something about that sounded off, but she quickly pushed the feeling aside. “I don’t know where they came from either. Dog said they’re Enders, those madmen who follow Subspace…”

“Enders… the ones who follow Subspace?” Duncan had still been somewhat relaxed, but his expression suddenly shifted when he heard the latter half of her words. It was as if he had thought of something. He looked at AI at once. “Don’t toss them yet!”

While he spoke, the frozen bodies of the Enders began to flicker, but AI quickly flapped her wings. The three attackers who had almost been pushed out of the Mortal Realm snapped back into the Mortal Realm, and AI’s sharp cry rang through the room: “Network connected, network connected!”

“Send them up to the ship,” Duncan nodded to the Pigeon Spirit. “I’ll meet them on deck.”

“Mission received! Mission received!”

AI shrieked twice, then quickly traced a fiery spiral in the air. In the rising flames of her spirit form, the three Enders vanished in an instant.

In the dim room, only Duncan, Dog, and Shirley remained, plus three corpses not far away that had been smashed flat into “preacher pancakes” by the meteor dog.

Shirley stared blankly at the scene before her, watching as those Subspace believers who had almost killed her and Dog disappeared from the room in the blink of an eye. The “battle” had ended in such a strange and easy way that it hardly counted as a battle at all.

Mr. Duncan had not even made a move. From start to finish, he had not cared what tricks or special curses the Enders had. He had simply appeared here, taken a bit of interest in those people, and then casually snatched them away, as if he had picked up a few stones by the roadside.

He might not even have realized that those cultists “had combat power”.

Just then, Duncan’s voice broke into Shirley’s wandering thoughts: “How bad are your injuries?”

Shirley snapped out of the thought of “Mr. Duncan is terrifying”. Her first instinct was to act tough and pretend she did not care about her wounds. But just as she opened her mouth, she bared her teeth in pain with an “ow”. The stabbing pain in her back and the ache in her arm hit her at the same time, and she could not help cursing: “Damn, that hurts…”

Duncan looked at her with concern: “Should I take you to a hospital?”

“Absolutely not!” Shirley jolted upright at once. Still grimacing, she forced herself to sit up. “I don’t have any money…”

Duncan stared at her: “You look like this, and you’re worried about money?”

“I wasn’t finished,” Shirley finally sat all the way up. “My body isn’t like other people’s. If I go to a hospital, they’ll definitely notice. If I draw the Church’s attention, I won’t be able to explain it. And look—”

She spoke as she raised her arm so Duncan could see her wound.

The wound was healing. After the Enders’s curse and corruption faded, her self-healing had returned. The ugly gash no longer bled. The corrupted matter in the wound was being squeezed out by the writhing flesh, and the growth of new tissue was visible to the naked eye.

The worst wound on her back was also slowly recovering. It still hurt a lot, but Shirley knew she had survived this time.

“As long as those Enders don’t keep yapping nonstop, I’m not afraid of them,” Shirley lifted her chin stubbornly. “On a normal day, a little cut like this would never knock me flat on the floor… ow, ow, that hurts…”

A soft cracking sound came from not far away, cutting off Shirley’s muttering.

She and Duncan both turned toward the noise and saw it came from one of the dead Enders. At some point, his twisted body had turned into a gray-white mass like weathered rock. It began to crumble bit by bit. Fragments flaked off, and before they even hit the floor, they turned to dust and scattered.

As the preachers’ corpses weathered and fell apart, the room that had been wrapped in The Veil also began to change. The Shadows that had clung outside the window vanished quickly. The streetlamps outside returned to normal, and the unnatural Shadows and cold malice in every corner of the house faded away.

“…The Enders gave themselves to Subspace. Now it’s time to pay the price,” Dog answered the doubt on Duncan’s face in a dull voice. “These scum will be devoured by Subspace. They won’t leave even a single speck of dust in the Mortal Realm.”

“…So this kind of cultist is pretty eco-friendly when they die,” Duncan murmured. “Saves the trouble of cleaning up the scene.”

Then he turned back to Shirley: “Feeling better? If you’re a bit better, come with me.”

As he spoke, a flicker of eerie green flame appeared in the air. AI flew out of the fire, circled once, and landed on his shoulder.

“Go with you?” Shirley didn’t react for a moment. “Go where…”

“You weren’t planning to spend the night here, were you?” Duncan pointed at the wrecked room. “Does this place still look livable to you?”

Shirley slowly pushed herself up along the wall. Her gaze swept across the old house where she and Dog had depended on each other for so many years.

Broken furniture lay everywhere. Corroded scraps were scattered across the floor. Anything valuable or not had been destroyed completely.

There had never been much to begin with.

Shirley lowered her eyes and stayed silent for a while.

“It seems the patrolling Guardians didn’t notice anything here. We still have time to pack up,” Duncan sighed. He knew how Shirley felt now, but he had no idea how to comfort her. “But no matter what, you can’t live here anymore. Even if you ignore the smashed things, you have to think about whether more attackers will come later. We still don’t know why those Enders came after you, but they’ve already marked you…”

Duncan did not go on.

He knew Shirley was a child far more mature than she looked. This girl had grown up in a harsh environment. She knew what mattered.

“I’ll… pack my things,” Shirley said in a dull voice.

“Need any help?” Duncan asked.

“No,” Shirley shook her head. “There isn’t… much.”

She really did not have much.

Duncan waited only a short while. Shirley gathered the things she wanted to take from a few dark corners: just some unremarkable old items, including a tiny little doll that was almost falling apart, a few pieces of clothing that had not been destroyed, and two slightly bent little metal boxes that rattled with bits of change inside.

She put everything into a worn little case, then carried it over to Duncan and lowered her head obediently: “I’m done.”

Dog turned his head to look at the little case in Shirley’s hand and muttered in a low voice: “You’re taking all of that… so we’re not coming back, are we?”

Shirley stayed silent.

Duncan looked quietly at the girl in front of him. A gentle smile slowly appeared on his face.

He reached out and patted the girl’s hair.

“Come on. Let’s go home.”

green flame rose into the air. The Undead bird spread its wings in the fire, blocking Shirley’s last glimpse of the little house.

Chapter 186: Local Specialty from the City-State

On the first floor of the antique shop, Nina sat anxiously on the chair by the counter. From time to time she got up to peek out the display window, but all she saw was the empty street under the streetlamps. Then she went to check the front door again, making sure it was still tightly shut.

She had the urge to go out and take a look several times, but each time, just before her hand touched the doorknob, she stopped. In her mind she recalled Uncle's hurried instructions before he left—do not leave this door, stay home and wait for him to come back.

"Uncle really is something… he just had to go out after nightfall even though there's a curfew…" Nina sat back down behind the counter again, muttering to herself, "If the patrolling Guardians see him, they'll definitely detain him again, and it's so dangerous…"

She had no idea how many times she had muttered this already.

Then she finally heard a bit of noise at the door. Footsteps sounded suddenly, followed by the turning of the lock.

Nina snapped her head up toward the door. She saw the door being pushed open as the bell hanging there rang with a crisp, pleasant chime, and that familiar figure finally appeared in her sight.

"Nina, I'm back," Duncan looked at the girl hurrying over from beside the counter and smiled a little. "See, it's not that late."

Nina rushed over in a few quick steps and bumped her head into Duncan's chest. Right after that came a long string of complaints: "You call this not late? Do you know what time it is now? Going out when there's a curfew is so dangerous! And you didn't even say what you were going to do, you just told me to stay home and wait…"

Nina's nagging complaints were like a storm at sea, once they rose they went on and on. But then she noticed a small figure hiding behind Duncan, and her complaining stopped at once.

Shirley, carrying a small suitcase, ducked out from behind Duncan with her head down. A little stiff and nervous, she waved at Nina: "Nina… and me."

Duncan turned around and closed the shop's front door to keep nosy people from noticing anything. Nina, after seeing what Shirley looked like, opened her eyes wide: "Shirley?! You… why are you here, and with Uncle… Wait, you're covered in blood!"

"Ah, don't worry, don't worry," Shirley waved her hands in a panic. Even though the wound on her back had not fully healed, she still tried to show the same bright smile as always. "I just ran into a small problem. I'm fine…"

"How is that a small problem?!" Nina hurriedly grabbed the small suitcase from Shirley's hand and quickly checked the blood on her. She soon noticed the torn place on Shirley's clothes and was shocked pale. "You… how badly are you hurt? We have to find a doctor right away! You…"

"I really am fine, hey, calm down!" Shirley quickly caught Nina's hand, looking completely helpless. "Did you forget? I'm not an ordinary person…"

Nina opened her mouth, as if she still wanted to say something, but suddenly heard Duncan cough beside them.

“Ahem.” Duncan cut off the two girls’ increasingly chaotic exchange and fixed his gaze on Nina. “Don’t ask so much for now. Shirley’s injuries shouldn’t be a problem—you should take her upstairs to bathe and change clothes first. We’ll explain the details later.”

Nina’s eyes moved back and forth between Shirley and Duncan as she muddle?headedly agreed. Shirley rubbed her stomach, a little embarrassed: “Um… is there anything to eat… I’d like to eat something first…”

Maybe she had burned too much energy while healing her wounds. Right now she only felt ravenously hungry—the pain in her body seemed far less urgent in comparison.

“Ah, ah, yes!” Nina froze for a second, then reacted at once. “I actually cooked enough for one more person tonight… I’ll go heat it up for you!”

Nina ran up the stairs at full speed. The thudding of her footsteps faded away. Shirley stayed behind, a little dazed. She looked around and saw the familiar first?floor shop, the shelves filled with fake antiques, the not?so? clean display window, and Mr. Duncan standing nearby with a half?smile.

She stared for several seconds before she finally muttered softly: “I’m back again…”

“Yes, you’re back again.” Duncan smiled, bent down to pick up Shirley’s small suitcase, and started forward. “We’d better take this chance to talk about how to explain those injuries of yours, and come up with a reasonable reason for you to live here for a while. Though I don’t think we need to work too hard on that. Nina will be very happy to see you stay.”

Shirley stared blankly at his back for a moment, then suddenly came to her senses. She hurried to catch up with Duncan in a few steps, reaching for her suitcase as she spoke quickly: “I can carry it myself! I can…”

Duncan only shook his head with a smile and looked up ahead.

The pale, cold light of World’s Wound shone over the boundless sea. The gently rolling waves reflected fine, broken scales of light. The cool sea breeze from the veil of night blew across the deck and stirred the hem of the captain’s uniform.

Duncan stood on the deck of the Vanished, looking at the three “Enders” in front of him. Their minds had not yet recovered, but their bodies were slowly returning to human shape.

So these twisted, warped things could turn back into normal people after all?

Footsteps came from not far away. Duncan looked back and saw Alice’s silver?white long hair flying in the night wind—the doll in a long dress ran over through the darkness, shouting happily as she ran: “Captain, Captain, I just heard Mr. Goathead say you sent something to the deck again? Did you buy something from the human city?state again…”

Alice stopped mid?shout in shock. The doll, who had run out to watch the fun, skidded to a stop beside the captain and stared in confusion at the three “human?shaped creatures” lying on the deck.

After staring for quite a while, the doll finally turned her blank gaze toward Duncan: “Captain… are these also local specialties from the human city? state?”

“…You could call them that,” Duncan thought for a moment. “I really haven’t seen them anywhere else. They keep popping up one batch after another in the city?state.”

Alice let out a muddled “oh,” then raised a hand to scratch her hair. Her head felt itchy—as if a brain were about to grow in there, but somehow still refused to appear.

“They look… human, right?” the doll muttered. “Captain, why did you bring three of these things up here? You didn’t buy them, did you?”

“I didn’t buy them. I picked them up on the way.” Duncan answered this scatter?brained doll offhandedly while keeping his attention on the three “Subspace believers,” whose bodies had almost fully recovered their human form. He noticed that one of them already showed signs of waking, and only then did he quietly let out a breath.

It seemed AI’s teleportation process was as reliable as ever. These cultists were still alive, and they could even wake up.

So… could he also have AI teleport ordinary people to the ship in the future?

Duncan began to calculate in his heart, and his mood slowly improved.

He had always wanted to find some cultists to serve as “test subjects,” to test AI’s long?range teleportation ability, the special environment aboard the Vanished, and Alice’s Guillotine power, but he had never found a chance.

The Suntists in the city?state had been almost completely swept up by a crackdown from the Deep Sea Church, and were now all stuffed into Cathedrals around the city. The scattered cultists among the common folk had either fled or gone into hiding, and after searching for a long time, he still hadn’t found any. He had already put this idea aside for the moment, and had not expected to run into a situation like this tonight.

A few Enders who worshiped Subspace had popped up out of nowhere.

What else could Duncan say? He could only thank nature for its gifts…

As he was thinking this, the “gifts of nature” on the deck finally began to wake up.

One Ender suddenly twitched. A hoarse, low groan came from his throat. Then his thin, twig?like arms suddenly pushed his body up. This worshiper of Subspace sat up and stared in shock at the strange surroundings.

The gentle waves and the cold sea wind pricked at nerves twisted by the influence of Subspace. A mild, deep voice sounded beside him: “You’re awake.”

“This is…” The cultist slowly turned his head. Duncan and Alice’s figures were reflected in his clouded eyes. His dull brain took several seconds to start working again. Then he suddenly jumped to his feet to face Duncan with open hostility and even took a small step back. “Who are you?!”

“Oh, right, you’ve never seen me,” Duncan smiled as he watched the other two Enders slowly wake. His voice sank to a low rumble. “Welcome to the Vanished—you can call me Captain Duncan.”

“…The Vanished?!” The first cultist to awaken froze for a moment. He clearly knew the name. After a brief dazed pause, his eyes went wide. “This is… this is the ghost ship that came back from Subspace?!”

“That’s right. Looks like you understand the situation. That will make things easier between us.” Duncan nodded. “First, I have a few questions…”

He hadn’t even finished when the cultist across from him suddenly raised both hands high. A kind of wild joy seemed to flood the madman’s mind as he shouted at the top of his lungs: “O Subspace! You have finally opened Your gate to us! Immortality in Doomsday! Salvation in disaster! All things destroyed, all things reborn! The Promised Ark has come… the Promised Ark has come!”

Whatever Duncan had been about to say was instantly choked off.

Just what kind of serious problem did this cultist have in his head?!

Chapter 187: Preaching the End

The Subspace believer who had just awakened fell into a strange ecstasy after learning that he was on the Vanished. He raised his hands and shouted wildly, the words so jumbled no one could understand them. His crazed runaway state even scared Alice, who stumbled back two steps—she only just managed to grab her head in time so it wouldn't fall off.

"This batch of local specialty is terrifying!" Miss Doll stared wide?eyed as she hid behind Duncan. "What's wrong with him?"

How was Duncan supposed to know? He hadn't even finished asking his own questions!

Then the other two Enders woke up one after another. Once they understood where they were, they also fell into the same sort of ecstasy as the first, screaming and raving, shouting things like "the Promised Ark" and "the gate of Subspace." No matter what Duncan and Alice said beside them, they were completely unable to communicate.

By this point, Duncan had more or less guessed why these Enders had gone into such a frenzy.

They were fanatics chasing after Subspace, and the Vanished was a ghost ship that had returned from Subspace. In the eyes of these madmen… did the Vanished count as some kind of "miracle"?

Were they crazed believers who had seen a miracle?

But their feverish excitement still seemed a bit too much.

The three cultists clung together, crying and laughing and shouting at the same time. They praised the greatness of Subspace while shouting the name of the Vanished. Now and then they even let out sounds from their throats that no human should be able to make. Their layered, trembling cries really did sound like roars echoing from Subspace itself. In the end they even knelt on the deck all at once and began kissing the deck of the Vanished!

That final act finally angered Alice, who had just been watching the spectacle from the side. Miss Doll's eyes went round. She ran over, grabbed a mop, and brought it down on one cultist's head: "I just washed this deck!"

Before Alice even finished shouting, two buckets and several mops nearby came rolling and hopping over as well, laying into the crazed cultists with a flurry of blows. The fanatics' wild, unhinged cries, Alice's scolding, and the clatter of buckets and mops all mixed together, and the Vanished, which was usually especially quiet most of the time, suddenly became noisy and chaotic.

Duncan stared, dumbfounded. The scene of "the cursed Doll and her lackeys beating up intruders" shocked him deeply. His first reaction was to wonder when this doll had gotten so close with everything on the deck. Only after that did he hurry forward to stop the farce: "Stop!"

The buckets and mops stopped at once. Alice still couldn't help snapping the mop across one Ender's head again, then gave him a kick for good measure before stomping away, muttering resentfully, "I just washed the deck, and they went and licked it all over…"

"I also think what they did was pretty disgusting, but this is a bit much…" Duncan gave the doll a helpless look, then turned to the cultists who had just been beaten soundly. "Have you calmed down yet?"

The Enders lay on the deck. Despite the beating they had just taken, they showed no sign of weakness or fear. Instead they were still full of energy, their faces twisted into creepy smiles. Their seemingly thin, bony bodies had an astonishing tolerance for pain, as if they had already thrown away the normal pain senses of human beings.

After hearing Duncan's words, one Preacher slowly turned his head. He looked into Duncan's eyes, and his muddied gaze took a long time to focus. Then a chilling laugh spilled out of his mouth: "Ha, haha… gatekeeper of the Promised Land, ghost at the helm, navigator of the Ark! I can see… I can see your heart! How pathetic… you have received this supreme blessing, yet you refuse His grace… You were qualified to step into the Promised Land, yet you turned it down! You… are dull!"

Duncan frowned slightly.

Alice immediately leaned in from behind him: "Captain, should I beat him up again?"

The buckets and mops beside her hopped closer at once, swaying behind Alice.

Like lackeys, and the lackeys of lackeys.

"Go wait quietly over there for a bit," Duncan waved his hand. He stared at the Ender who was still letting out strange laughs at him, his face expressionless. "From the sound of it, you know quite a lot about this 'ghost captain' of yours."

"Subspace whispers your name… whispers your dull refusal…" The cultist grinned. The blood from the beating trickled from the corner of his mouth and crawled along his chin as if it had a life of its own, like tiny tentacles. "You had already been granted that supreme blessing, so why run away… Don't you know that Subspace is the eternal and final destination of all things? You had already reached the end… why turn back from that end?!"

Duncan simply used his gaze on this cultist, who might have lost his mind or might just be caught in pure fanaticism. His face stayed calm, but his heart was stirred.

These fanatics who followed Subspace really did know a few things. Their insane faith had not only given them eerie powers, it had also let them learn some secrets related to Subspace. What this man was saying… might actually contain a part of the truth.

Had Captain Duncan fled from Subspace? Had he rejected Subspace's divine blessing?

Could it be that when the Vanished first fell into Subspace back then, the real "Captain Duncan" had not gone completely mad like the outside world claimed? That the Vanished's return voyage from Subspace had actually been a successful escape? That "Captain Duncan" still had some sanity left back then?

When did he completely lose his mind? And when did he die?

Duncan suddenly thought of Goathead's attitude whenever Subspace came up—wary, resistant, and even faintly afraid.

That seemed to indirectly confirm the Ender's words. It confirmed that escape.

Then the Ender fell back into a hazy state. He started muttering things only he could understand, sometimes suddenly bursting into joyful laughter, sometimes slapping his own body. His two companions never really sobered up at all, lost from beginning to end in a disturbing mental chaos.

These followers of Subspace were even more insane than the Suntists Duncan had seen, and even further from the normal sanity of the mortal world. They seemed to be in a constant state of mental unrest, their thoughts drifting between the mortal world and Subspace. Unless someone was talking to them or they were carrying out a specific task, they could not think or communicate normally.

Was it because they had been affected by Subspace? Or had they shattered their own reason on purpose, using this method to embrace Subspace of their own will?

What puzzled Duncan even more was this—how did such crazy, bizarre cultists, whose very appearance had changed, move around the city?state in their daily lives?

With madmen like these, they wouldn't even have time to hide. They would be surrounded and riddled with bullets by the Guardians' Steam Walkers within five steps of walking down the street!

After a while longer, seeing that the Enders still showed no sign of coming to their senses, Duncan had to take the initiative again: "Why did you attack Shirley?"

The three cultists reacted. One of them lifted his head in a daze, his body swaying left and right. "Attack? Attack who?"

"What you just did." Duncan's voice was cold and hard, his face like water. "You attacked a girl with a Abyssal Hound—why did you attack her?"

"Attack… oh, attack…" The dazed cultist suddenly bared his teeth and shouted loudly: "We were only putting everything back on the right track, so that the correct history can arrive smoothly! A loophole, a flaw, a little hidden danger… the hidden danger must be removed… She should have died in the correct history. She shouldn't have survived! As long as she lives… the loopholes will keep appearing…"

"The correct history?" Duncan's eyes changed slightly as he listened to the cultist's crazed ravings. He caught the key information at once and reacted instantly. "Pland's timeline went wrong—was that your doing?!"

“Went wrong? There’s nothing wrong, nothing wrong at all… We are only putting everything back on the right track!” The madman lifted his face, his eyes filled with martyr?like fervor. “The whole world should return to the right track! Doom was delayed for so many years. Everyone defied Subspace’s gift and the fate that should have come! We are correcting history onto its proper path!”

“Correcting history onto its proper path!” The other two Enders beside him seemed infected and also began shouting praises in a frenzy. After shouting, one of them even stood up, raised both hands high, and proclaimed some kind of truth: “Only by returning to the proper track can there be rebirth after total annihilation! Subspace will devour everything, and Subspace will reshape everything! The fire has gone out, the embers can hardly burn… only by lighting a second bonfire can the world continue to exist within that grace!”

Chapter 188: The Madmen

The clues finally seemed to line up.

History in Pland bore the marks of corruption. In the small cathedral of the Sixth District there was a warped, sealed boundary in time and space. On the statue of the storm Goddess, a strange Subspace fissure lay hidden. And Subspace… could Corrupt everything except Subspace itself.

Shirley was one of the few who still remembered that great fire from years ago. When the blaze broke out, she should have died like everyone else, yet somehow she fused with a Abyssal Hound and survived. And when everyone else's understanding was warped by the corruption of history, she still kept her memories of that fire.

Now, a group of Enders had attacked Shirley. These fanatics who worshipped Subspace were deranged, their words absurd, yet every sentence circled around "correct history" and "loopholes".

Duncan certainly did not believe any of their ridiculous "truths". Whatever they called "correct history", he took as the opposite. But one point was obvious – these cultists were tied to the historical distortions in the city-state of Pland. The Subspace power behind them was the true culprit. And people like Shirley, who still remembered that fire from back then, were mortal enemies in the eyes of these madmen who wanted to Corrupt the Mortal Realm with a false history.

But not every question had been answered.

How had these madmen suddenly discovered Shirley, this “loophole”? What was the connection between historical corruption and the “Black Sun”? The Black Sun did not have the power to Corrupt history, so what role did that “Sun god” really play in all this? And most important of all…

Was Nina, the suspected vessel of a Sun fragment, going to be marked by these cultists too?

Duncan stared coldly at the three crazed Enders and lifted a finger. A tuft of ghostly green flame suddenly ignited on one of them. The fire scorched the cultist’s body, which could almost be treated as an “supernatural item”. He let out a sharp scream and curled up on the deck, and the other Enders instantly fell silent.

“Fire… profane fire…” A cultist’s eyes bulged. Even as a crazed Subspace follower who felt no fear of pain, he still showed terror when he saw that green flame. “Profane, profane… such a profane thing!”

“If you don’t want to be burned alive, keep cooperating with my questions.” Duncan let flames bloom all across the deck. They wove into a net of fire that trapped the three cultists, scorching both mind and flesh. “Tell me – how exactly do you Corrupt history? Did you start from the Sixth District?”

“We are putting history back on its proper track!” Even under the threat of the ghostly flames, the Enders did not forget their lines. One of them craned his neck and shouted, “The Sixth District… the Sixth District was only a failed attempt, but that doesn’t matter, it doesn’t matter…”

The Sixth District was only a failed attempt?

Duncan frowned at once. The man had not answered honestly, yet he had still let slip something vital.

First, that fire back then really was the work of these Subspace followers, and not simply a blaze caused by the appearance of a Sun fragment as he had first assumed. Second, their attempt to Corrupt history seemed not to have fully succeeded – the great fire eleven years ago had not produced the result they wanted.

Then another key year suddenly surfaced in his mind – 1885.

That was the number Vanna had found under the small cathedral. It pointed to the year when the nun of that small cathedral died in battle, and, in theory, to the time when that cathedral had first been invaded by Subspace power.

The great fire eleven years ago, however, broke out in 1889, the fourth year after that nun fell.

In other words, it was four years after the small cathedral was invaded that the Enders started the fire of 1889 – and they called that fire a “failed attempt”.

A timeline slowly came into focus before Duncan’s eyes.

“You actually failed twice.” Duncan’s face was as calm and dark as still water as he fixed his gaze on the Ender writhing in the ghostly flames. “In 1885, you invaded a small cathedral and tried to use it as the origin point to spread your corruption of history. But a nun destroyed your plan with her life, sealing that year’s ‘invasion’ and her own ‘death’ inside the underground sanctum.

“Four years later, in 1889, you carried out your second plan. You started a great fire in the Sixth District where that small cathedral stood, hoping to overwrite the Mortal Realm with a ‘city-state consumed by fire’ History Branch. But you failed again. An unknown power erased all traces of that fire before it could keep burning…

“After that, you lay low in the city-state up to today, looking for chances to continue the plan, until you found Shirley, this loophole. You decided the failure back then was tied to her survival, so you wanted to get rid of this ‘hidden danger’ first?”

The ghostly flames burned bright. The Ender curled up in the fire. Even his pain-hardened flesh struggled to endure this agony that burned directly at his soul. Yet the madman still showed no intention of answering. Instead, he slowly split his mouth into a grin and looked at Duncan with a chilling smile.

“You don’t need to answer. I can see it in your eyes. You are mocking and furious, which means I am right.” Duncan ignored the other man’s taunt and went on in an even voice. “Next I have another question… What link do you have with that ‘Black Sun’? The fire of 1889 was triggered by a Sun fragment… Did you arrange that fragment?”

The Ender remained silent.

Duncan spread the flames to the other two men and watched them curl and twitch in the fire, but he still did not get a single word in reply.

“If you refuse to speak, I can only guess.” Duncan sighed and waved his hand, dispersing the flames. He had already realized that simple “pain” meant nothing to these fanatics who embraced Subspace. Their bodies and minds had long since mutated beyond human. “I guess you have some level of cooperation with those Sun believers… No, perhaps it is a deal with the ‘Sun spawn’ behind those believers. You help those Sun spawn revive their ‘lord’, and the method of revival… is to summon the Sun from ‘history’ itself?”

He glanced at the cultists who still kept silent, then continued, “In the early years of the New City-State Calendar, there was once a city-state known to the world only by name, Wilheim. The last message it left to the world was this: ‘The Black Sun descended from history.’ So this is not the first time you have done this, is it? You summoned the Sun that should already have gone out, dragged it out of history. That summoning process itself is the greatest corruption of history, isn't it?"

As all the scattered clues suddenly fit together, all the threads slowly linked into one. Things that had once been incomprehensible, even unbelievable, turned into facts he could now imagine. Duncan's imagination and memory ran at full speed. The known, the unknown, and the knowable slowly merged into a clear path in his mind.

Of course, many things still could not be explained. For example, how these Enders had even gotten mixed up with the Sun believers. What method they used to summon the Sun from history. Whether the ordinary Suntists and priests knew any of these secrets from the higher levels. He still had no answers.

Even much of what he had just pieced together was only speculation. Without an admission from the Enders before him, he lacked key proof.

The spirit-form flames on the deck slowly drew back, until only a ring of fire remained around the three cultists. Duncan stood before that wall of flame, looking down at the "preachers" with a blank face.

"You Enders who slipped into the city-state aren't just the three of you, are you?

"Where are the others hiding? What do you plan to do next? Keep erasing the 'loopholes' you talk about? Or wait for a chance to unleash an even greater corruption?

"Still refusing to answer?"

As Duncan threw out question after question, one of the cultists finally moved.

The scrawny fanatic slowly pulled at the corners of his mouth and lifted his head to look at Duncan. His voice was hoarse and muddy. "We did not hide in your so-called city-state… We hide in this cursed, twisted history that should have ended long ago… Once it began, it will not end… What the Flamebearer could not do, you cannot do either, ‘Captain Mister’…”

The cultist’s grin grew wider, his smile chilling to the bone. His voice sank low, carrying both temptation and cold. “I just saw it. Your humanity is so dazzling. Where did you pick it up?”

Duncan’s gaze shifted at once. He took a step forward, his tone heavy and stern. “What do you mean?”

“…Wish you a pleasant day, Captain Mister.” The preacher suddenly seemed to turn into someone else. The crazed believer became a polite citizen. He slowly pushed himself up and sat hunched on the deck, yet his eyes seemed to look past Duncan as they roamed over the vast, silent Vanished. “Ah… the promised land, the Promised Ark…”

Chapter 189: Alice’s Test

After that, Duncan got no more useful information from the Enders.

They just sat silently on the deck, breathing in the sea breeze of the Boundless Sea as if savoring every second. To Duncan’s questions they either answered with an empty, indifferent gaze, or with mad, twisted laughter.

But the last words they had spoken were already burned deep into Duncan’s mind.

These fanatics who followed Subspace, whose minds were broken and whose sanity score was probably already in the negatives, seemed to have gained knowledge that should never have existed at all through their crazed faith – truths that in theory had never leaked out.

They had “seen” that “Captain Duncan” carried an anomalous “humanity” inside, and that this “humanity” had been “picked up”. What did that even mean? Could they really tell that the soul inside this body was no longer the original owner’s?!

And these cultists had also said they were not hiding in the city-state… but in history cursed by the curse. What did that mean? Were these mad Enders not in normal space-time most of the time, and that was why they could avoid the city-state Guardians even while acting so bizarrely?

Duncan silently turned his gaze on the Enders who were grinning strangely. Thoughts surged in his heart, and at the same time he watched over the state of the entire ship, sensing whether there were any changes in the Vanished.

Goathead was still dutifully steering in the captain’s cabin, apparently paying no attention to what was happening on deck.

Every part of the Vanished was operating as usual. The words of the Enders had no effect on the ship.

Alice sat hugging her own head on a big wooden barrel nearby, idly tidying her hair. The doll’s brain had long since failed to keep up with the conversation between the captain and the cultists, so she had wandered off early.

After who knew how long, Duncan finally let out a quiet breath.

He had spent a bit too long on these cultists, to the point that he could almost feel himself being affected by their mad babble.

He had already gotten plenty of useful information out of them, and it did not look like there would be any more. There was no need to keep bothering to care about these madmen.

Just as his expression shifted, one Ender suddenly lifted his head. In his muddled eyes, the empty, illusory sails of the Vanished were reflected. He mumbled like in a dream, “Is it time to get off the ship?”

“There was never a place for you on this ship,” Duncan said flatly. “But before I throw you overboard, you can still be of some use.”

All three Enders raised their heads and slowly pulled their mouths into strange smiles.

Although they had been wildly ecstatic when they first came aboard, even going so far as to kiss the deck, now, hearing Duncan’s words, they showed no sign of disappointment or fear.

At first, Duncan had thought they would at least struggle a little, try to force their way into staying on this ship, even find a way to use it to reach the “promised land” of Subspace they yearned for. But there was nothing like that. Only a strange numbness filled their eyes.

It was as if, in some unseen moment, most of their personality and memories had slipped out of these bodies, or as if they had suddenly heard some far-off “calling” and calmly accepted their fate.

Duncan frowned, not bothering to guess what these already-crazed cultists were thinking. Instead he turned his head toward the doll staring into space not far away and said, “Alice, come here.”

The doll reacted at once. She deftly picked up her head, stuck it back onto her neck, hopped down from the barrel, and trotted over to Duncan. “Captain, you called me?”

“…Can you stop pulling your head off all the time?” Duncan grumbled with a frown. “Your joints aren’t that sturdy to begin with, and every time you take it off your intelligence seems to drop with it.” He shook his head, then pointed at the three cultists. “I’m going to have you run a little test.”

“A test?” Alice blinked. “What kind of test?”

“To see whether that uncontrollable ‘Guillotine’ ability of yours is still there.” Duncan raised an eyebrow. “Don’t tell me you’ve already forgotten about it.”

“I did forget!” Alice nodded with complete confidence. “I only just remembered when you brought it up!”

She paid no attention to the subtle shift in Duncan’s expression and turned to the “Enders”, waving at them. “Hello, I forgot to introduce myself just now. I’m Alice, the ship’s… cook?”

“You should tell them your other identity,” Duncan said casually. He spoke to Alice, but his gaze rested on the cultists. “Anomaly 099.”

The eyes of the three Enders finally changed. One of them could not help but glance at Alice, and a sudden seriousness appeared in his expression.

“I thought you were really numb enough to be beyond fear of life and death.” Duncan noted the change but kept his face calm. “In that case, I hope you madmen who fear not even Subspace will enjoy what comes next. What I need you to do is simple: stay near Alice, and then either survive… or die by decapitation.”

Alice listened at his side, then leaned in to mutter, “Captain, when you say things like that you really sound like a villain…”

Duncan gave the doll a speechless look. “…Whose side are you on, exactly?”

“Death means nothing to us…” While Duncan and Alice whispered, one Ender finally spoke up. He glanced at Alice and even took a step forward, a hint of mockery in his eyes. “It is only another pause in this long journey. You dull-witted one who rejected Subspace’s grace, obsessed with the veils of the Mortal Realm, you will never know the Truth beyond life and death…”

Duncan hurriedly tugged Alice’s arm. “Hear that? That’s what a villain sounds like…”

Alice nodded. “Oh.”

Then Duncan ignored the reactions of the Enders. He looked up at the night sky where the World’s Wound hung high and suddenly asked, “How long have they been aboard?”

“Several hours at least, right?” Alice thought for a moment. “My sense of time is pretty accurate!”

“Several hours… which means the check and trigger time for Guillotine has already passed at least once.” Duncan grew thoughtful. His gaze fell on the doll in front of him while his mind recalled the descriptions of Anomaly 099's properties. "But that's still not enough to be sure. We'll wait a bit longer, then run the next round of tests."

"Next round of tests?" Alice blinked in confusion. "How are we testing it?"

"Right now we can roughly say your Guillotine ability has not triggered, but we still can't tell whether that is because of the Vanished or because of me." As Duncan spoke, his eyes swept over the Enders, as if he was making very sure their heads were still attached. "After a few more hours, once we are sure at least one full check-and-trigger cycle of your ability has passed, I want you and these 'preachers' to leave the Vanished for a while."

"Leave the Vanished for a while?" Alice froze. "Go where?"

She lifted her head and looked past the rail. All she saw was endless ocean. The wind and waves were calm; the whole sea was soaked in the pale glow of the World's Wound, making it look almost like a boundless snowfield. On that endless sea, there was nowhere to set foot.

Duncan thought for a moment.

Now he had found "materials" for Alice's test, but to keep the process strict he also needed a "testing ground" where he could rule out his own interference. That test site could not be on crowded land, and it had to be outside the Vanished. There really were not many choices.

"We have a few lifeboats in good shape. I'll lower one into the water and temporarily cut its connection with the Vanished." Duncan looked into Alice's eyes. "You will drift on the sea for a while. I'll keep the main ship nearby and I won't abandon you."

The doll listened to the captain's plan and instantly shrank her neck. "Float on the sea again?! I'm still traumatized! And the visibility on the sea at night is so bad. What if you lose me? What if a gust of wind and waves carries the little boat away? What if the boat capsizes…”

Duncan cut off this embarrassing doll before she could finish. “Stop, stop, there won’t be that many ‘what ifs’. I’ll have AI circling above you to keep watch. And besides, you’re afraid you can’t get back to the ship? Last time you rode the waves back on nothing but a coffin lid. Even eight cannonballs couldn’t keep you down. This time you at least have two proper oars.”

Alice’s muttering was choked off, but only for a moment. She glanced worriedly at the sea nearby, then at the half-human, half-ghost, mindless Subspace believers, and grabbed Duncan’s sleeve hard. “Captain, you promised. You must not lose me later!”

Duncan: “…”

He really felt that the longer he kept this doll on board, the more useless she became. She was worse now than when she had been riding the waves of the Boundless Sea. Back then, at least, she had a bit of foolish courage…

Chapter 190: As If Yesterday Vanished

World’s Wound hung high in the night sky. A cold wind blew over the Boundless Sea. Fine waves rose and fell softly around them, and the little boat rocked like a dream that had not yet fully woken before dawn.

But Alice did not really know what it meant to “dream”. She had slept for a very, very long time, yet she had never truly dreamed the way humans did. She guessed that dreaming should be a state something like this.

She floated in a vast, vast place, and her thoughts drifted with it.

She lifted her head. In the distance there was only the sea. The far-off lights of the Vanished were like tiny candle flames floating on the surface of the water. It even gave her the feeling that the whole world had disappeared, leaving only herself, the little boat beneath her, and the endless Boundless Sea.

Oh, and the three Enders trussed up across from her.

Miss Doll drew back her gaze from the distance and looked curiously at the cultists tied up in front of her.

They were humans, the very bad kind. Alice did not know many humans, but she knew there were good ones and bad ones. Good people did very good things. Captain Duncan would praise them and sometimes even help them. Bad people did very bad things. Captain Duncan would despise them and sometimes report them. The three in front of her… were the kind the captain disliked the most.

They believed in Subspace and followed a vicious creed. For the sake of some great cause they had made up, they could kill anyone, even attack a pitiful young lady who only had a dog for company. If a city-state Guardian found them, the Guardian would shoot them to death in the street without hesitation. If sailors at sea found them, they would hang them from the mast. Even a vicious pirate, if he found them, would stuff these madmen into a wooden crate and throw them into the sea, using them as an offering to beg the Storm Goddess for protection.

But now they were tied up and sitting quietly. There was no sign of any mad urge to run wild. Alice could still remember how frightening they had looked when they first came aboard, all worked up as if they had taken the wrong medicine.

Now, as time passed, these Enders grew more and more obedient.

“Are you scared?”

After holding it in for a long time, Alice finally could not help speaking. She felt very uncomfortable out here. She knew this was a “safety test” she had to go through so she could move around in the human city-states, but drifting on the Boundless Sea still made her feel restless and uneasy.

One of the Enders answered the doll’s voice. His skull-like, skinny head slowly lifted, and he stared into Alice’s eyes: “Stupid filth, a clumsy shell… your soul is pale and hollow. Even Subspace would not take you…”

Alice froze for a moment. A few seconds later she reacted: “Hey, why are you insulting me?!”

The Enders opposite her only let out a string of hoarse, ugly laughter. Faced with Anomaly 099, which terrified the world, they did not seem afraid at all.

Or perhaps, just as they claimed, they had long since risen above the idea of life and death and no longer cared when death came in the Mortal Realm.

Alice could only sulk by herself, but after a while she shook her head and said: “I’m not angry anymore.”

Another Ender looked up at her once, but said nothing.

Alice kept talking to herself: “I shouldn’t be angry. You’re the ones who get to complain a bit. After all, you’re the ones tied up right now, not me, and you’re the ones doing this head-falling-off test, not me. The captain said that when the wind is fair you can’t get too pleased with yourself, because if the waves get big the ship will overturn, and if people act too wild they’ll die… And since you’ve already fallen this low, my lordly self can be generous and allow you to run your mouths a little.”

The Enders sat silently in the boat, listening to the doll ramble on, as if they had completely shut out her voice. But after a while, Alice still noticed they had some “little movements”—

They were secretly studying one another’s heads, moving their own necks from time to time, and now and then sneaking a careful glance her way, their eyes full of doubt.

Alice thought about it carefully and felt they were probably wondering why their heads were still on their necks.

These cultists clearly knew the information about Anomaly 099. They might truly not fear death, but they still felt curiosity. After staying so close to Anomaly 099 for so long, they found it hard to understand why they were still alive.

“Actually, I am a little scared,” Alice suddenly said. “I’m afraid your heads will suddenly fall off. The captain said I have the ability to decapitate people. When I first heard that, it scared me a lot. Humans aren't like me. When a human's head falls off, it can't be put back on…"

A sudden flapping of wings came from above. Alice looked curiously toward the sound and saw the dove AI suddenly fly off into the distance. After a short while, it flew back from the direction of the Vanished, emerald flame rising from its body.

AI circled twice over the sea near the little boat. Ghostly green flame surged up, and in the great whirlpool of fire an ornate wooden chest appeared out of nowhere, then fell with a splash into the sea beside them.

"My box!" Alice's eyes widened at once and she cried out in surprise. At once the words "swept out the door" popped into her mind, and her head almost fell off her neck. But then she noticed there seemed to be a note stuck to the chest. She quickly paddled twice with the oar at hand, drew close, and took the note off. On it was a single line of words:

"The Guillotine ability might also be connected to your wooden chest, so I'm sending it for testing along with you. Also: you are definitely overthinking that I'm kicking you off the ship again—stop it. Come back as soon as you finish the test."

Alice held up the note and turned it over, reading it several times, but did not understand it.

She could not read…

But soon she saw something else on the back of the note. It was a rough little sketch, showing her rowing the boat back to the Vanished, with a smiling face drawn at the end.

Miss Doll understood at once. No matter what was written on the front, the captain clearly did not mean to drive her away.

Relieved, she carefully put the note away, then casually fished the chest out of the sea and, with a bang, tossed the rather heavy box onto the little boat with one hand. Only then did she look up at the cultists across from her: “Are you hungry?”

The preachers did not answer. She did not mind and just muttered to herself: “The captain said you all deserve to die, but he also said that if you really get through the test without dying, he won’t kill you. He’ll send you back to the city-state to be used for… what was it again…”

Miss Doll stalled, trying hard to remember. At last she recalled what the captain had told her before: “Oh, to show how much a warm-hearted citizen cares about the safety of the city-state… He said you were worth at least seven bicycles. What is a bicycle?”

“Subspace will grant us food and warmth… Subspace will grant us peace… Subspace will bestow its divine blessing on all the dead, after all the Ends arrive as promised…”

One Ender began to mutter in a muffled voice. It sounded a little like an answer to Alice’s rambling and a little like some blasphemous prayer. “We walk within the End, cast off this cursed flesh, and our minds will pass over that wall and open their eyes again in the New World…”

“Huh?” Alice listened in total confusion. “What are you mumbling about?”

The Enders no longer answered her and did not respond again after that.

From then until dawn, they only sat there with their heads lowered, muttering to themselves. They mumbled about Subspace, about the End of some long river of time, about a Doomsday that was destined to come and ought to come. On the waves that rose and fell with the wind, aside from the soft slap of water against the hull, there was only the ceaseless muttering of these madmen.

It was the kind of atmosphere that would make an ordinary person's skin crawl. The content of their prayer could make anyone with a weak will fall under the curse, tainted and entangled by Shadows from the deep layers of the world. Yet Alice only felt that it was noisy.

She had the little note the captain wrote, so she no longer feared this drift. Now she was only bored out of her mind.

But that boring time finally ended.

A thread of morning light suddenly appeared over the distant sea. In the pale dawn, World's Wound in the sky quickly faded and thinned, and the Sun, bound by double layers of runes, slowly rose out of the sea and leaped into the sky.

It was dawn.

Alice had not decapitated anyone.

Miss Doll happily watched the sunrise. She stood up from beside the chest, turned her head to the cultists, and said: "Hey! It's dawn! You're still alive! We can go back now!"

However, the three Enders did not answer her. They still hunched in the boat with their heads lowered, whispering softly. In the brief darkness before the sunlight spilled into the boat, they called on Subspace for "attention" one last time.

Only when Alice called out again did one of them finally raise his head. This cultist glanced at the sunlight slowly spreading toward them, looking a little dazed, but slowly a strange smile spread over his face.

"Oh, our day is over again…" the madman sighed softly. Then he slowly turned his head and looked into Alice's perfect, gem-carved eyes. His smile held a twisted mix of madness and calm. "Doll, we will meet again one day."

“Huh?” Alice was stunned. “What do you mean by that? It’s not like you can just run away into thin air…”

The sunlight spread over them.

The three Enders vanished without a sound in the morning glow, like yesterday’s fading phantoms.

“No way you could…” Alice finished half the sentence out of habit, then stared wide-eyed. “You really did run away?!”

Chapter 191: Nonlinear Existence and Preparations to Go to the City-State

The doll once again rode the waves back to the Vanished, and she looked a little shaken. After listening to the embarrassed doll's jumbled account, Duncan also stared in shock.

"They disappeared? Vanished into thin air right in front of you?" Duncan stared, dumbfounded, at Alice, then looked toward the lifeboat that the winch had just hoisted to the ship's side. The ropes they had used to tie up the Enders still lay on the little boat, but the cultists who had been bound by them were long gone.

"Yeah, yeah! They were just gone in an instant! Not even a sound!" Alice waved her hands as she explained her strange experience to Duncan. "The moment the sunlight fell on them, they disappeared, as if they had never existed at all…"

"They disappeared without a sound the moment the sunlight fell on them…" Duncan frowned. He had imagined countless ways those Enders might escape or resist, but he had never thought they would simply vanish like that. It made many of his preparations useless. "If they had just jumped into the sea, I could still understand it—at least that counts as soluble in water. But soluble in sunlight? What kind of principle is that… Could it be related to the Sun? Does the Sun's suppressive power keep them from remaining in the Mortal Realm?"

“I don’t know.” Alice stared wide-eyed, sounding perfectly confident.

“I wasn’t asking you,” Duncan gave the doll a look. “Before they disappeared, did anything seem off? What were they saying? Did they perform some strange ritual?”

“They… just kept muttering, talking about Subspace, some promised land, some destined End and rebirth and cycles,” Alice rubbed her head, then suddenly remembered. “Oh, right! One of the cultists also said, ‘Our day is over again.’…”

“Their ‘day’ is over again?” Duncan’s brow creased at once, and for some reason he thought of what one Ender had told him before—

They hid within history that had fallen under the curse.

Some ridiculous guesses rose in his mind, but when he thought about how absurd this world already was, even the wildest things did not seem all that impossible.

“Captain?” Alice saw that Duncan had been frowning and thinking for a long time without answering her. At last she could not help speaking up: “What did you think of? You…”

“Nothing,” Duncan shook his head. It sounded half like he was talking to himself, half like a soft sigh. “I just suddenly had a crazy thought. Those so-called Enders… I’m afraid they might be a kind of Nonlinear Existence…”

“Nonlinear Existence?” Alice froze. With her limited brain and knowledge, she could not keep up with the captain’s train of thought. “What does that mean?”

“…You’d better not ask. With your level of intelligence, it would be hard to explain it clearly,” Duncan glanced at Alice, hesitated for two seconds, then still shook his head. “But I suddenly understood why the book Morris gave me said that the Enders are the most mysterious and the hardest cultists to find and capture… It's too absurd."

Too absurd—Duncan repeated in his heart.

They hid within an abnormal flow of history, themselves a form of Nonlinear Existence, shuttling through the Mortal Realm with the cycle of day and night. Unless they were killed on the spot, you could never detain today a Ender you had caught yesterday—that was the staggering truth he had deduced from the clues so far.

By comparison, the Suntists—though just as cruel and dark, and mostly made up of rabble—suddenly seemed much more ordinary and almost familiar. They also had the strange trait of constantly transforming out of ordinary people under the influence of the creeping Sun Wheel, but at least they were not twisted to this degree.

Still, that raised another question. If the Enders really were a kind of Nonlinear Existence as he guessed, then how had they ended up like this? How could ordinary humans separate themselves from the normal time stream and become some sort of "slice creature" that existed discontinuously in time?

Was it just because they followed Subspace… and so received Subspace's mad, deranged "divine blessing"?

"Captain, you're staring off again…"

Alice's voice sounded again. The doll was looking at Duncan with a hint of worry.

"I'm fine." Duncan let out a soft breath and packed away those messy thoughts. He felt it was too early to hold a mental storm over this. After all, this was his first real contact with these Subspace believers, and it was no use making the wildest guesses too soon.

He turned his gaze back to Alice.

“You saw the note I gave you, right?” he asked casually.

“I did!” Alice nodded at once, happy. “When I first saw the box I was scared. I thought you were telling me not to come back. Then I saw the note and felt better… I couldn’t read the words on it, but I understood the picture you drew…”

Duncan’s mouth twitched. The sudden impulse he’d had after writing that note had really come in handy. This doll really was illiterate. “…So you really can’t read.”

“I can’t read at all!” Alice said with her usual confidence. “I lay in the box for so many years. It’s already amazing that I picked up some common sense just by listening. How could I have learned to recognize words too…”

Duncan was silent.

“Captain, what are you thinking about?”

“I suddenly wondered… whether it would work to hold a tutoring class on the Vanished or in the antique shop,” Duncan sighed. “Counting you, I already know two illiterates—and if I add the dog, that makes three. That’s enough to form a study group.”

Alice thought for a bit. “What is a tutoring class? And what is a study group?”

“…I’ll explain later,” Duncan waved a hand, and his expression grew a little more serious. “Let’s talk about the ‘test’ first. Those three cultists were all normal before they vanished, right? Even after you sent the chest over, they weren’t affected in any way?”

“Of course they were normal. Their heads were still on their necks. I saw it very clearly.”

Duncan curled his fingers under his chin and looked at Alice, deep in thought.

Though the traits of the Enders were bizarre, they definitely did not have the power or “supernatural resistance” of the Saint. After all, Shirley had smashed three of them to death just by swinging the dog at them. That proved their flesh-and-blood bodies were still “normal material” that could be destroyed. At most, their tolerance for pain was far beyond that of ordinary people.

And now those three Enders had stayed beside Alice for so long without being affected at all. In other words… had the effect of Guillotine really disappeared?

Watching Duncan’s changing expression, even Alice finally began to catch on. She cautiously edged closer, tilted her face up, a faint hope on her features: “Captain… did I pass my ‘test’? Can you take me to the city-state now?”

“The test… should be passed. The strange traits of those Enders still make me uneasy, but judging from the result…” Duncan spoke slowly, still thinking and weighing things, but in the end he nodded. “All right, the test really is passed. It looks like your Guillotine ability is under control now.”

He paused there, and before Alice could start celebrating, he added: “I’ll take you to a city-state, but not right away. You lack a lot of basic knowledge about the human world, and you also have parts that are easy to give away, like your fingers and the joints of your wrists. For the first, you need a lot of extra lessons. For the second, we need some disguises.”

“Mm-hmm, I know, I know!” Alice nodded hard. She did not seem discouraged at all by the problems Duncan mentioned. Instead she looked even more motivated. “Mr. Goathead told me that too. He said the human world is very complicated, that even going out to buy vegetables has a pile of rules. He said if I want to go to a human city-state, I definitely have to ‘catch up on my lessons’, and that if there’s anything I don’t understand I can ask…”

“Don’t ask him!!” Before Alice could finish, Duncan felt a jolt and quickly cut off this doll who spent all day thick as thieves with Goathead and looked about ready to grow crooked for good. “He’s even less human-shaped than you are, and you want to learn human society from him? Where is your brain?”

Alice looked completely innocent. “I don’t have one!”

Duncan almost choked on his own breath. He stared for a long time, then finally squeezed out: “You… I admit you have a point.”

“Hehe…”

“In short, don’t learn anything from that Goathead in the future. He can’t teach you anything good,” Duncan sighed. Every time he talked with this doll, he felt his nerves being tested, as if he were making a sanity check. “Later I’ll set aside time to cram some common knowledge into you and think about your disguise. For now, you’re done here. Go make dinner.”

“Oh, okay,” Alice nodded hard. Just as she was about to leave, she seemed to remember something, turned back, and looked at Duncan curiously. “Then what are you going to do, Captain?”

“I have some things to discuss with Goathead,” Duncan waved his hand, looking tired. “Things that don’t concern you.”

Alice nodded and turned toward the cabin, in a very good mood, walking with light yet proper steps.

Duncan watched Miss Doll’s back as she left and could not help thinking again—

When she neither spoke nor turned her head, she really was elegant.

It was just a pity she had a mouth…

Chapter 192: Promised Ark

The cabin was as it had always been. sunlight drifting in from the Boundless Sea poured through the porthole into the room, making the old items that had soaked up a century of time shine with bright reflections. The black Goathead sculpture sat quietly on one corner of the enchanted sea chart table, steering the Vanished's course.

On the surface of that ancient enchanted sea chart, thin mist rolled and billowed. Within the layered fog, the lines that marked the known sea routes were stretching straight ahead, extending toward a distant point.

At the end of that course lay the city-state of Pland. The flickering point of light that marked it had already appeared in the mist ahead and was slowly, almost imperceptibly, closing the distance with the Vanished.

The door opened, and Duncan's figure appeared in the doorway.

The Goathead sculpture stirred at once. Its wooden neck creaked as it turned its head toward the sound: "Ah, the great Captain has come to his loyal deputy's side! Has everything been going well? You have been busy since yesterday. Are you in a good mood today? The weather today is…"

"Stop, stop. You don't have to repeat the same greeting several times every day." Duncan raised his hand to cut him off before he could finish. Then his gaze stopped on Goathead's face for a moment, as if by accident.

Goathead was as always. No expression showed on its face, and its obsidian-carved eyes were still strangely cold. From the tabletop it fixed its gaze on this side, its look filled with an inhuman quality.

But there was no hint of danger, and nothing different from usual.

This thing seemed to have been obeying Duncan's orders in earnest. Duncan told it to focus on steering the ship, and it really only focused on steering the ship.

"Captain, you look worried?" Goathead's voice sounded, carrying that familiar flunky-like enthusiasm. "You seem to have brought back some prisoners… but they don't seem to be on the ship anymore?"

"They disappeared after the Sun rose," Duncan said calmly as he walked unhurriedly to the chart table and sat down. "They were a few Enders."

"Ah, Enders… such troublesome and dangerous fellows. They really are hard to catch. They always appear out of nowhere and then vanish just as strangely," Goathead immediately started babbling, just as Duncan knew he would. Once a topic opened up, this thing would spit out a whole string of nonsense, though that nonsense often hid useful information, so there was hardly any need to question it carefully. "But how did they provoke you? Those crazy preachers don't usually show themselves. Compared with the Suntists or the Annihilators, they are much more low-key and rare…"

"They attacked a human I was keeping an eye on, so I grabbed them on the way back and used them to test Alice's abilities," Duncan said casually while watching Goathead's reaction. "They also said a lot of mystical nonsense about Subspace… how much do you know about these cultists?"

"I would advise you not to pay too much attention to their mad 'preaching'," Goathead said at once. "Just calling Subspace's name too often can draw a dangerous gaze, let alone dealing with those madmen who follow Subspace. Of course, a Great Presence like you may not be affected by them, but listening to too much of it is never a good thing…"

Then it paused for a moment before speaking again: “Let me tell you, I don’t know that much about those madmen, and there aren’t many in this world who do. The Enders should count as the strangest group among all cultists. They are good at appearing and disappearing, their thoughts are broken and scattered, and unlike normal cults they don’t have large numbers of rabble at the bottom. There are far fewer of them, and there isn’t a single one you can talk to like a normal person…”

Goathead kept chattering, and the farther it went the more nonsense it piled up, but in that long-winded rambling Duncan still picked out some key pieces of information.

According to Goathead, the number of Enders was far lower than that of the other two cult forces that were also deadly threats to civilization, namely the Suntists and the Annihilators. Judging from records in the present world and their known activities, they might only number in the thousands, perhaps even less.

Ordinary cults had large numbers of ordinary people serving as the “believers at the bottom”. These rabble had no real power and lived normal social lives. Aside from their minds already being corrupted, they were basically no different from any other ordinary person. But the Enders had no such base layer. Whenever they appeared, they were all powerful “priests”.

No one knew how a heretic cult could operate and survive for so long without that sort of foundation, just as no one knew the exact process by which Suntists or Annihilators carried out their transformations among ordinary people.

In addition, although the word “preacher” sat right there in their name, they seemed to have almost no successful cases of actually “preaching”. Their sanity had long since evaporated, and their speech and logic were not like those of normal people. Whenever they appeared, they would mutter and chant “truths” about Subspace, but anyone with a sound mind would not fall for their bewitching words. As for people with weak wills… they would already have been corrupted by Subspace into monsters before they could be tempted.

In other words, in theory the Enders could not increase their numbers by preaching at all.

And lastly, the Enders appeared and vanished like ghosts. They were very, very elusive.

Duncan had already experienced that himself.

Goathead claimed that it did not know much about the Enders, but the information it gave was anything but little.

“A bunch of preachers so deranged they can’t even ‘preach’ anymore…” Duncan rubbed his chin and muttered to himself. “Then where did the very first Enders come from?”

“Who knows?” Goathead’s neck creaked as it swayed. “Maybe they just grew straight out of Subspace…”

Duncan did not bother with this obvious piece of nonsense, a “Subspace joke” from Goathead. Likewise, he did not bring up his own “nonlinear guess” about the Enders.

He only thought to himself that if someone like him, who had just had his first contact with the Enders, could already come up with such a guess, then what about the Guardians and Bishops in the human city-states, those who had long fought against heretics? How much did they know about those Subspace believers? Did they have a more complete theory to explain the strangeness of those madmen?

“Captain, you seem very concerned about those Enders?” In the middle of the silence, Goathead’s voice suddenly broke the stillness of the room. “I rarely see you with such a serious look on your face…”

Duncan lifted his head and looked at Goathead in silence.

“Tell me, if the history of a city-state has been corrupted, can it still be saved?”

He suddenly asked.

His tone was calm and casual, as if he was just discussing some ordinary “academic guess” in his spare time.

Goathead froze for a moment, though its stiff face had never really had much expression to begin with. It took two or three seconds before it answered: “History being corrupted? Oh, that’s a high-level topic. It sounds like the kind of thing only Subspace could pull off…”

“Only Subspace could do that?” Duncan raised an eyebrow. “Why do you say that?”

“Besides something as dangerous as Subspace, where time and causality are a tangled mess to begin with, what else could casually Corrupt the history of a city-state?” Goathead said offhandedly. “Nothing in the mortal world has that kind of power… oh, if we are only talking about sheer power, there might be one thing that qualifies, but that thing is hanging up in the sky…”

Listening to Goathead’s muttering, Duncan felt his heart give a jolt.

Time and causality inside Subspace were chaotic?

This was the first time he had heard such a clear and direct piece of information about Subspace.

Along with this information, another memory rose up in his mind, of what the Frostholm Queen had once said to him in that illusory scene—

Do not Corrupt history.

He frowned and forced down the tangle of thoughts in his heart for the time being, letting his gaze fall back on Goathead. The latter at once noticed the Captain's gaze, stopped babbling, and quickly reacted: "Ah, no wonder you suddenly care about those Enders… could it be that they…"

"They probably pulled off something big," Duncan said in a low tone. "And it makes me a bit… uneasy."

He looked quietly into Goathead's eyes, and Goathead stared back at him without expression. It felt as if they were watching each other, yet there seemed to be no other form of exchange.

"City-states have their own Guardians, and those Flamebearers are always watching the flow of history," Goathead finally said. "No matter what trouble those Enders stir up, they can't threaten you. Even if they can Corrupt history, they can't Corrupt you or the Vanished…"

Duncan raised an eyebrow. "They can't Corrupt me or the Vanished?"

"…We returned from Subspace, Captain," Goathead said slowly. "Everything in the world can be corrupted—except Subspace itself. And we… have stayed in Subspace long enough."

Duncan frowned again. For some reason, some of the insane words the Enders had said suddenly surfaced in his mind.

After a short silence, he could not help but murmur under his breath: "Promised Ark…"

Chapter 193: “Captain”

Subspace could Corrupt everything except Subspace itself, even the Mortal Realm and the flow of years. Yet this seemed to be no problem for the Vanished.

Because in a sense, this ship was already a part of Subspace. In fact, even now its keel was still sailing through Subspace.

You could not drive someone with a sanity score of zero into madness, and you could not Corrupt the Vanished again after Subspace had already remade it completely.

Listening to Goathead’s words, Duncan showed a thoughtful look, but he did not stay lost in thought for long, because Goathead’s voice came again from the chart table: “Captain, you have begun to take an interest in matters inside the borders of civilization. Before this, you were always focused on sailing toward the outer frontier. Is there something in the city-states that has special meaning for you?”

Sailing toward the outer frontier?

Duncan’s heart stirred a little, but his face stayed calm. He only answered casually: “I am simply paying attention. I do not need a reason.”

“Ah, very well. You are the Captain, you have the final say,” Goathead replied at once. Then it fell silent for two seconds, as if hesitating or thinking, before speaking again in a low voice: “Then, just in case, I want to ask you a question.”

Duncan raised his eyebrows.

He heard its hoarse, low voice come from inside the wood carving: “Name?”

“Duncan Abnomar,” Duncan said with no expression, his fingers lightly interlaced. But this time, after speaking that name he suddenly smiled and asked in return: “To be honest, I’m curious. What would happen if I gave another name?”

This was the first time he had asked this question, and it was also his boldest boundary crossing so far. His life on this ship, his many contacts with Goathead, and his growing understanding of his own power and nature had finally led him to test this step.

Mutual testing and watching had built the most basic kind of tacit understanding between them. Duncan’s counter-question revealed a fact that both sides already knew deep down. After that question, Goathead fell into a long silence. It was a full minute before its low, hoarse voice sounded again in the captain’s cabin: “Then you should try not to tease me like that, Captain. The Vanished still needs you at the helm.”

Duncan laughed.

Just as he had thought, if Goathead had been “Captain Duncan’s” deputy for the past century, then its understanding of that ghost captain might even surpass the captain’s understanding of himself. And considering how many strange supernatural things existed in this world, how could a first mate who knew the captain so well fail to notice the captain’s changes or fail to think of the possible reasons?

No matter how careful a disguise was, it had flaws, and those flaws would only become more obvious as time went on. Yet no one had brought up this flaw, which meant that this level of disguise was just right and also necessary.

The Vanished needed a captain, and that captain's name was "Duncan Abnomar". What lay behind that name was not important. Whether the captain himself was "real" was not important either. As long as there was someone qualified to hold the wheel, that was enough.

Duncan was only a little curious why it had to be him, and whether his having his own will now was actually an accident. By his general understanding of ghost ships, if a cursed ship had to keep "grabbing" people to be its captain, then the chosen person should in fact be under the curse's control. Yet he clearly was not bound by anything.

But he did not ask these questions, because Goathead's attitude was faintly reminding him:

Some things were fine as long as everyone knew them. There was no need to say them out loud.

Before he understood all the secrets behind the Vanished, this topic could end here.

"You still need your loyal first mate to serve you, and the Vanished still needs its great Captain to steer it personally. What do you think?" Goathead's voice came from the side, sounding a bit expectant, even earnest.

Duncan turned his head, fixing his gaze on those obsidian-carved eyes.

"Of course," he said with a smile.

Then he stood up and walked toward the door of the captain's cabin: "I'm going to leave for a while. Look after this ship."

Goathead had already returned to his usual flunky attitude, his tone cheerful: “Of course. Your loyal—well, you know the rest—will be here waiting for your return. I wish you a smooth…”

Duncan had already pushed the door open and walked out of the room, shutting the rest of Goathead’s words behind the door.

He stood on the aft deck and let out a light breath. A strange sense of ease rose in his heart. The morning sunlight was spilling over the sea, bathing the whole deck in a warm glow. The door that led to the captain’s cabin stood quietly before Duncan, and the letters on the frame—“Door of the Lost Ones”—shone in the sunlight.

He pressed down on the handle and gently pushed forward.

Inside the captain’s cabin, Goathead sensed that the Captain had temporarily left the Vanished.

It stayed silent. Everything in the room was silent. Even the whole ship was silent. But after a few minutes, a low creaking sound suddenly came from beneath the floor. Then some of the furnishings in the room began to sway slightly, making all kinds of faint noises.

Goathead’s voice then broke the silence, muttering to itself: “Oh, man… he isn’t mad, right… he shouldn’t be mad… damn, he really isn’t mad, right…”

The faint sounds in the room grew more obvious.

“I know, I know… It’s not like I’m the one who wants to ask for his name every few days! It’s for the safety of the voyage! If we suddenly fall back into Subspace, we should at least be prepared, right… Stop making noise, stop making noise, I’m still all mixed up here… Next time you can ask, how about that? If you can’t, then stop complaining… You all know I’m the only one on this whole ship with a mouth…

“That doll? Are you out of your minds? How would she know what’s going on… Wait, since when did you get so close to her? Aren’t you fighting all day… You feel guilty because you bullied her too much? Is that even a thing?

“All right, all right, scatter, scatter. Focus on the voyage. The Captain could come back at any time, and he might ask about our progress… Hey, anchor, can you learn how to paddle? Swing yourself a bit to provide some thrust. I’ve seen the propellers on those steamships… Fine, forget I said anything… Then how about those two lifeboats? You two can jump down and churn a bit? All right, forget that too…”

The sounds in the captain’s cabin slowly quieted down.

Goathead let out a silent sigh and went on controlling this huge ghost ship, steering it toward the city-state of Pland.

On the enchanted sea chart shrouded in mist, the flickering point that marked that city-state drew a little closer.

…

Zhou Ming pushed open the door of his studio apartment and stepped into the world he knew.

Outside the window, everything was still wrapped in fog. The world he knew still stretched only this short distance.

Everything in the room remained as it had been when he left. The bedding on the bed was a little messy. The book on the bedside table lay open. In the corner, the computer screen flickered faintly, and the notice “Network disconnected” kept popping up again and again in the lower right corner.

Zhou Ming let out a soft breath and walked at ease to the shelf at the far end of the room.

The miniature model of the Vanished still lay quietly in its cubby, exactly where he had placed it last time.

Zhou Ming picked up the lifelike “model” of the ghost ship and opened the door to the captain’s cabin again to glance inside.

The chart table was still empty. Goathead was nowhere to be seen.

Zhou Ming thought for a while, then put the Vanished back in its place. He turned to the desk, planning to sit down and rest, and to sort through the information he already had in this familiar and quiet setting, to straighten out his thoughts.

But suddenly, something on the desk caught his eye.

Strictly speaking, it was not some “thing”, but some strange… phenomenon.

He saw very, very tiny flames jumping on the empty surface of the desk. The small flames linked together like sparks, and under their weak, ghostly green light, some vague outlines appeared and faded in the air.

It was as if something was condensing on the desk, but the forming was too slow, stuck right at the point before taking shape.

Zhou Ming sat down in front of the desk and quietly watched those leaping flames and the scenes whose outlines were faintly taking shape within them. The ghostly green firelight shone on his face, and his slightly thin features gradually grew serious.

He recognized that some of the outlines drawn by the dancing flames were places he knew—that was certain districts of Pland!

He could even make out some details of the city-state’s coastline.

The fire was still burning, and Zhou Ming remembered that the order he had given that flame was to keep chasing and hunting those “things” that carried black umbrellas.

Now it had almost spread to every corner of the city-state.

The prey… was everywhere!?

Zhou Ming’s brows slowly knitted together. Thoughtfully, he traced and picked out the paths along which the flames spread, looking for the pattern of where they gathered and the place they might converge next, like a hunter tracking the scent of his prey.

Chapter 194: Transmission

Vanna returned to the archives again.

She herself did not even know why she had come back. But a strange sense of wrongness and danger followed her like a shadow at her back. It made her keep going over every detail of how she had searched for information in the archives. The more she thought about it, the more she felt she had forgotten something.

Of course, another reason she came back was that she had nowhere else to go right now anyway.

Because her connection with the Vanished kept growing stronger, she was actually under constant watch. She was still the Inquisitor of the city-state of Pland, but only because no one could replace the important duty she carried right now. So, aside from necessary appearances, she had to stay inside the Cathedral at all times.

Her meeting with “Captain Duncan” in the dream made her anxious. The clues she found in that small cathedral in the Sixth District also would not leave her mind. Here in the quiet and holy archives, at least she could block out some of the stares and devices around her and let herself breathe for a moment.

Her footsteps echoed in the empty archives. Row after row of high shelves rose up to the ceiling like giants, standing silently in her view. Ancient files slept on those shelves, looking down from top to bottom at the young Inquisitor walking through the aisles.

Vanna lifted her head and looked along the shelves stretching into the distance, recalling once again how she had searched here last time. A middle-aged Father who managed the archives walked a short distance behind her, quiet and steady. The consecrated lantern in his hand gave off a warm, gentle light.

She had come into the archives, asked for the records from 1889, and found suspicious traces of a heretic sacrificial rite. Using that as a clue, she had broadened the search and found all the records of heretic sacrificial rites around 1889. In the end, she had noticed that the file for 1885 was missing, an anomaly.

These memories ran through her mind again and again. Vanna could no longer remember how many times she had replayed them. Now they appeared so clear in her head, from beginning to end, perfect, without a single sign of a missing piece or distortion.

Yet Vanna’s eyebrows slowly drew together.

The young Inquisitor suddenly stopped. The middle-aged Father walking behind her also stopped.

“Inquisitor?” the middle-aged man called from behind her.

Something was wrong. Something was very wrong. She definitely had not come alone that day to look up the files. Someone had been with her. She was sure of it. But who was it?

Vanna acted as if she had not heard the voice behind her. She only frowned and tried hard to think. She remembered that small cathedral in the Sixth District, and the nun there who had died in 1885. That cathedral had disappeared from everyone’s sight. Even Bishop Valentine had forgotten it for many years. How similar that was…

She had fallen into the same kind of “forgetting”. Every person had forgotten the same thing. That was why she could not notice the hole in her memory, and there was no one who could remind her. But what exactly had she forgotten, and when had she started to forget it?

“Inquisitor?” the Father’s voice came again from behind her.

Vanna felt the Power of the Storm begin to gather. The middle-aged Father’s hand had quietly moved toward his waist.

“How long have you been the administrator here?” Vanna suddenly asked.

The Power of the Storm scattered at once. The Father lowered his hand and bowed his head slightly. “Seven years, ever since I retired from active duty.”

“There shouldn’t be only you as administrator here, right?” Vanna asked again.

“There are two of us,” the Father replied. “The other is an older lady. She takes the night shift. She also retired from the Guardian unit.”

Vanna spoke as if making small talk. She kept walking slowly between the shelves and said casually, “Only two people… can you really handle all the work?”

“We can still manage. There actually isn’t that much work for archive administrators,” the middle-aged Father explained carefully. “There are guards on duty everywhere, in plain sight and in hidden posts. Servants and novice monks handle moving and sorting things. We only need to do the filing and retrieval ourselves. Most of the materials here never move again once they’re stored, so the workload is small.

“But because the administrator has to stay inside the archives for long periods and be surrounded by books and records, the person must be a priest with a firm will and rich experience. Even if the workload is small, the job is still very important."

He paused for a moment, then added, "Of course, since there are only two of us, things can get troublesome when something special happens. I've always thought we should add one more person. Three people on shifts would be more reasonable."

"Three people on shifts…" Vanna whispered to herself, then asked, "You still haven't found the files for 1885?"

"No, we still haven't found them," the middle-aged Father said, shaking his head. "After you told us about the anomaly here, we organized a full inspection of the archives. We used more than a hundred servants and novice monks, but we found nothing."

Vanna gave a soft sound of acknowledgment and said nothing more. She simply stood quietly in front of one of the shelves and sank into thought. Her silence made the Father behind her even more nervous.

Vanna noticed his tension and smiled, shaking her head. "You don't need to worry so much. I only met that ghost captain once. I'm not so far gone that I've lost my mind. Besides, there are more watching eyes and detection devices on this place than I can count, inside and outside the archives. If I notice anything strange about myself, I'll sound the alarm at once. I am still professional."

"Please forgive me," the middle-aged Father sighed. "I've seen too many comrades disappear from this world forever because of one careless moment."

Vanna did not answer. Her gaze turned toward the far end of the shelves, to the place where the archive administrators usually sat. She had walked all the way around the high shelves and come back to the area near the entrance.

In a brief daze, she seemed to see a slightly hunched figure sitting there.

The young Inquisitor’s eyes suddenly widened.

The figure vanished.

The middle-aged Father noticed the change. “Inquisitor, did you see something?”

“Maybe I saw it wrong… no. Let’s go take a look.”

Vanna threw down the words and moved forward before he could answer. Her steps grew faster and faster until she was almost running. In just a few strides she reached the large curved desk, then carefully examined the desk that hid many complicated mechanisms.

No one sat at the desk. The few items on the surface were all clearly in view.

Vanna walked behind the desk and looked it over from top to bottom.

Out of the corner of her eye, she suddenly saw something, a few scattered little parts, tossed at random behind a panel at the edge of the desk. The parts were already rusted. They looked as if they had been thrown there many years ago. From their shapes, they seemed to be pieces of a Mechanical Puzzle Cube.

For some reason, the moment she saw those parts, Vanna seemed to smell something strange. It was like incense mixed with mechanical oil, along with a sharp scent as if something had been burned.

The middle-aged Father, still holding the consecrated lantern, followed her over. He looked along Vanna’s line of sight and made a puzzled sound. “These parts… who left them here?”

“There are marks on the desk,” Vanna said. She had already noticed other clues near the parts. At first glance they looked like oil stains, but on closer look they seemed like a deliberate drawing.

Her heart pounded hard. It felt as if a harsh noise echoed again and again in her head, and even the edge of her vision began to shake. In the shifting lights and shadows, it looked as if fire was jumping and burning. These unpleasant feelings did not make her panic. Instead, they stirred a faint excitement in her chest.

Her Spiritual Insight was beating. She was observing and touching supernatural traces. The clues she was searching for really were in this archive.

Silently reciting the name of the storm Goddess Gamona in her heart, Vanna reached out her hand. “Let me use the consecrated lantern.”

The middle-aged Father at once handed her the lantern, which was covered in runes and burned Holy Oil as its fuel, the administrator’s consecrated lantern. “Here.”

Vanna took the consecrated lantern and carefully brought its light closer to the stained patch on the desk. Under the lantern light, tiny dust or mist seemed to appear out of nowhere and then quickly fade away. In the play of light and shadow from the flame, she finally saw the stain clearly.

It was dark red blood. It looked as if a dying person had dipped a trembling finger into their own blood and drawn on the desk. It looked like a campfire, and in the center of the fire stood a pillar-like object.

It was not any holy symbol used by the Deep Sea Church. It was not any divine blessing from the storm Goddess Gamona.

Yet Vanna still recognized this symbol. It was the mark of the Flamebearer.

Flamebearer? Why would the Flamebearer's mark appear inside the Cathedral of the Deep Sea Church?

Doubt rose in Vanna's heart. The four True Gods were indeed on the same side, and the churches of the Four Gods often worked together. But their beliefs were different, and their holy symbols were very strong symbols of each church. Under normal conditions, such symbols would never appear in another church's sanctuary. So why was the Flamebearer's mark here?

Flamebearer… the small cathedral in the Sixth District… the forgotten people, the forgotten events, another Pland hidden beneath the Mortal Realm…

Vanna's breathing suddenly grew faster. In that instant, she finally understood.

This symbol was a warning. It was the only message left to the Mortal Realm by a Guardian whom everyone had already forgotten, on his lonely battlefield.

"Someone has corrupted history!"

The young Inquisitor suddenly cried out and snapped her head around to look at the middle-aged Father behind her.

The archives were empty.

As if from the very beginning, she had been alone here.

—

Chapter 195: Disappearance

With a sharp clang, the silver fork in Dante Wayne's hand fell onto his plate.

In the slightly empty dining room, the sound of the fork hitting the plate felt unusually loud. The maid standing by the side was startled. She hurried forward to ask: "Mr. Dante?"

Dante did not answer the maid. The governor of the city-state still sat there in a daze, as if his soul had left his body for a moment. Only after a long while did he suddenly blink. His awareness rose back to the surface like someone breaking free from drowning. Sounds from the Mortal Realm exploded in his ears.

He took a sharp breath and heard the maid's voice again: "Mr. Dante, are you all right?"

Dante Wayne stared blankly at the fork lying in his plate. He slowly reached out and picked it up, and saw that his hand was shaking badly. Countless tangled and chaotic memories were racing through his mind and piling on top of each other. A burning pain spread around his eye socket. His Ruby Prosthetic Eye felt as if it were on fire.

He suddenly turned his head. Before the maid could speak a third time, he broke the silence in a low voice: "Has Vanna sent any message through anyone?"

The maid froze for a moment. She looked at the respected governor in confusion. "…Who is Vanna?"

In the next second, the maid shrank back in fright from the sudden iron-blue color of his face and the heavy pressure that filled the air around him.

Dante Wayne's face changed at once, and the air around him seemed to grow heavier. He kept his dark expression for a few seconds, then still forced himself to stay calm. He waved his hand at the maid and spoke as evenly as he could: "You can go for now. Don't come back in for the moment."

The maid left, confused and a little nervous. The dining room fell completely silent. Dante Wayne sat quietly at the end of the long table, the only person beside the huge table.

It was as if for the past eleven years he had always been like this, eating alone at the table, living alone in this large and empty house.

Layer upon layer of mixed and disordered memories crossed and stacked in his mind. Different Mortal Realms from different levels seemed to be trying to overwrite his memories. But Dante just sat there quietly, letting his memories be overwritten again and again. He muttered like someone talking in his sleep, over and over: "Vanna is still alive… Vanna is still alive…"

He suddenly raised his head.

At the other end of the dining table, a figure had appeared without him noticing.

It was himself, at least, it looked like another version of himself.

It was a gray-white figure, wearing the same clothes as Dante Wayne, with the same face and hair. Even the wrinkles on the backs of its hands were no different. But its features were a little blurry, and its eyes were nothing but two hollow pits filled with endless emptiness and strangeness.

Dante quietly fixed his gaze on the gray-white “himself” at the other end of the table. The other also slowly raised its head and looked at him in silence. After a long time, the gray-white figure suddenly grinned. It showed a soundless smile, and in its deep eye sockets, chaotic light and shadow swirled.

The thing spoke. The skin on its face wriggled with the movement of its lips, constantly cracking open and healing again: “Ah, your heart finally sprang a leak, ‘myself’, mister.”

Dante Wayne stopped his muttering. He stared hard at the figure sitting across from him, this reflection that belonged to him. “What did you do?”

“To be honest, I don’t know,” the thing on the far side of the table said, shaking its head. “It just happened. The surprise came too fast. A loophole chose to destroy itself.

“But don’t you want to see all this? You don’t have to carry the pressure of the truth anymore. You don’t have to worry about duty or the future. Everything is going back on track. Eternal release and peace are waiting for everyone, just like the promise you got many years ago. Everyone’s wish will be fulfilled…”

As it spoke, the gray-white thing slowly stood up from the table. A twisted, broken smile spread across its face. “I know your heart very well. I know it like I know myself…”

Dante Wayne also slowly stood up. There were no weapons in the dining room, but he always carried a short dagger with him. Now he gripped this only blade tightly and stared at the gray-white figure. “You’re nothing but a hollow thing, an empty shadow. And you think you deserve to know the human heart?”

“I am the soul you reflect in Subspace…” The gray-white figure spread its arms, as if it did not care about Dante’s hostility and challenge at all. “Subspace knows everything, including that shallow, laughable human heart… Come on, kill me, and then see me again. It feels like we haven’t played this ga—”

The gray-white shadow’s words cut off.

Dante Wayne stared in shock at the other end of the dining table. He saw an emerald flame that had somehow spread here from somewhere unknown. Like a predator that had smelled prey, it suddenly leaped at that phantom. The phantom tried to dodge, but the fire seemed to ignore the rules of space and burst into a fierce blaze on its body.

A shrill scream and a strange howling sound came at the same time. The sharp sound waves shattered all the glass in the dining room in an instant. But the sound itself was locked inside this space and could not spread outward. So the layers of echoed sound waves kept bouncing around the room, growing stranger and more chilling.

Dante Wayne watched in a daze as his Subspace projection twisted in the fire into a strange, writhing pool of grease. The grease still gave off roars and shrieks. He could only barely pick out a few words. Besides poisonous curses, there was only one word with any clear meaning: “the Vanished!”

That word was almost screamed out by that pool of grease.

Then the grease burned away as well. Only pale ash remained in the flames. Dante Wayne stared blankly at it all. In the next second, burning pain suddenly filled his whole body.

The burning of the Subspace projection was now reflecting back on his true body.

The dagger fell to the floor, and the governor’s fairly strong body dropped after it. Dante Wayne curled up in agony, feeling as if his own body were being burned by the flames. This delayed burning was tearing and destroying his soul and mind. But in the rising illusion of fire, he saw that the spreading green flames were only circling around him slowly, not really hunting him.

Those spirit form flames finally drifted in a circle and flickered twice in front of the governor, then quickly spread away toward somewhere else.

Dante even felt that the flame spat once, as if it were showing its disgust for food that did not suit its taste.

He thought the pain of burning had already driven him insane.

In the next moment, all the pain left as suddenly as it had come. Dante felt his mind jolt like a spring pulled to its limit and then suddenly released. That sudden relaxation became the last blow to his awareness. A strong wave of dizziness swept over him. His vision went black, and his sense of the world rushed away from him.

Just before he completely lost consciousness, he heard the front door open, the maid’s cry of alarm, and the messy footsteps of others rushing in.

…

Vanna calmly looked around the empty archives, trying to find any trace of the middle-aged Father.

For the first two minutes, she did not move from where she stood. She did not try to leave, and she did not touch anything in her field of vision.

This was to avoid touching the source of some corruption while trapped in an illusion, letting her mind be invaded.

Only after she confirmed that everything she could see was solid and normal, and after she placed mental protections on herself again, did she go behind the administrators' curved desk and firmly press a button under the surface.

That button rang the alarm bell.

The bell began to ring, echoing again and again in the empty archives.

Vanna looked down again at the consecrated lantern in her hand.

The middle-aged Father had vanished, but the lantern he had lent her was still in her grasp. It gave off a gentle, warm light. Though the archives were not dark, the holy fire burning the oil still seemed to drive something away. It formed a hazy circle of light several meters around her.

Vanna walked another circuit around the administrators' rest area. She still could not find any sign of the Father.

The alarm bell kept ringing, sharp and piercing, making her heart pound.

Vanna returned to the curved desk. Her eyes fell on the scattered parts and the mark written in blood.

The bell echoed hollowly. No one came in.

The young Inquisitor suddenly understood.

It was not the middle-aged Father who had disappeared.

It was her.

The moment this thought rose from her heart, Vanna felt the atmosphere around her change. It was as if a layer of the Veil had been torn away. Another dimension, laid over the Mortal Realm, revealed its true face to her. Her eyes flew wide. She saw endless flames flaring up all across the archives.

And in that sea of roaring fire, a tall, thin figure holding a Black Umbrella had appeared at some point and now stood not far in front of her.

The figure was very tall and very slim, and a strange aura rose from his whole body. Standing in the flames, he raised one arm toward Vanna. A low, hoarse voice came from deep within him: “You…”

Vanna heard only one syllable. In the next second, she had already swung the huge greatsword off her back, a weapon that ordinary people would need both hands just to lift. One hand held the consecrated lantern, the other raised the greatsword. From three meters away, she leaped into the air and brought the blade down in a heavy chop.

“Heretic!”

Chapter 196: Berserker-Style Fighter

Vanna did not actually recognize right away what the figure that suddenly appeared in front of her was. The figure's whole body was hidden under a long black coat and a big black umbrella, and her own mind had just taken a brief shock from suddenly peering beyond the Veil, so she had lost her usual sharpness for a moment.

But when the monster opened its mouth and let out a hoarse, low noise, when its foul, blasphemous breath spilled out, and when, as it raised its hand, the twisted outline shaped by corruption showed itself, she recognized it.

It was a heretic, a heretic of the Sun.

That made things simple—Vanna liked simple things.

The heavy alloy greatsword howled as it cut through the air, and the holy consecrated lantern drove away the foulness around her. Vanna leaped high, her figure like a huge wave. When she came down, that strike carried the full force of a crashing wave—tons of seawater seemed to gather into that one sword. The umbrella-holding heretic of the Sun clearly had not expected her to be so decisive and lost the chance to dodge. It could only raise the black umbrella in a hurry to block.

Then, like a small boat broken by a huge wave, both it and the umbrella were split cleanly in two.

The spawn remnant, cut in half, flew off into the distance, filthy, blasphemous flesh splashing all along the way. The large umbrella made of tough alloy was also cut into two halves and fell to the ground with a clash of metal. Tiny blue sparks kept jumping from the broken ribs and handle, and shards of crystal burst from its frame, the faint glow inside them quickly fading away.

Vanna stepped forward and crushed the scattered parts under her boot, but her eyes were already on the pieces of flesh she had cut apart not far away. They were writhing and knitting back together at a shocking speed. In no time, that tall, thin figure in the long black coat appeared again in the sea of fire. This time, without the black umbrella to cover it, the ugly true face of that blasphemous thing showed clearly in Vanna’s sight.

Its head was like a flower of flesh opening in bloom, and its body was made of countless twisted, coiled tentacles. Right now that flower of flesh was letting out an angry, shrill scream. The sound was enough to knock an ordinary person out on the spot, but it only made Vanna smile a little.

Regeneration did not mean invincibility. This thing was weakened, and after losing the protection of that strange black umbrella, it looked to be in great pain.

The young Inquisitor casually hooked the consecrated lantern back at her waist and shifted her grip on the sword. Holding it with both hands, she strode toward the monster. But then, suddenly, the corner of her eye caught a brief distortion in the flames beside a bookshelf.

Years of battle experience and sharp danger sense made her stop at once and turn around. The next second, a coiled tentacle shot out of the warped flames. A piece of steel plate, glowing red from the heat, was wrapped up by that tentacle and hurled at her like a cannon shell!

At the same time, the heretic of the Sun that had just finished regenerating suddenly turned into a black blur and rushed in from the side to ambush her. In a flash of light and shadow it crossed the distance to within a few meters of Vanna. Two long whips of flesh snapped out from its hands, lashing toward Vanna's neck and back at the same time.

Vanna clicked her tongue, twisted her body, and swung up the sword. She simply threw the greatsword like a huge spear straight at the ambushing heretic of the Sun. The greatsword was heavy and fast. With a boom it smashed the attacker away and nailed it to the wall more than ten meters away. At the same time, the red-hot steel plate flew up in front of Vanna. She raised a hand to block. The glowing steel stopped as if it had hit a mountain. Where her fingers gripped it, steam hissed up from steel and flesh, and the metal visibly warped and curled under her grip.

"So it really is you lot causing trouble." Vanna seemed not to feel any pain at all. She casually tore the steel plate in half and threw it aside. Then she beckoned behind her. The greatsword that had pinned the enemy to the wall was pulled by an invisible force and flew straight back into its master's hand, dragging along the writhing, howling remnant of the Sunspawn.

Vanna flicked her right hand and tossed the monster impaled on the sword to the ground. Without even looking back, she left the quickly regenerating monster there and walked forward, leaving only one sentence behind: "You go ahead and finish regenerating here. I'll go purify your friends."

The mass of writhing flesh that had been pierced by the greatsword and had lost the shelter of the black umbrella let out a frenzied roar, as if spewing blasphemous, furious Subspace curses. But Vanna had already done the math on this thing's regeneration speed. She knew that, after taking a heavy blow and losing the umbrella's protection, its recovery had slowed a lot. So she paid it no mind and strode toward the burning bookshelf not far away.

Another figure had stepped out of the flames there—the second heretic of the Sun.

This was the one that had thrown the steel plate just now.

Looking at the Inquisitor who was striding toward it, the tall, gaunt shadow let out a chain of low, muffled whispers and roars. As its disgusting, sticky limbs writhed, tentacles stretched out from inside its “coat.”

“Fear, anger, confusion… looks like you have emotional reactions too. You aren’t just a bunch of ‘split-off bodies’ without complete minds, like many people think.” Vanna walked forward, watching for more ambushers as she spoke in a calm voice. She was not someone who liked to talk a lot, but against the mad, blasphemous whispers of monsters like this, the rational words of a cleric were also an effective weapon. “Remnants of the Sunspawn… Since you are here, that means at least one Sunspawn body is also hiding nearby. Where is it? Deep in the sea of fire? Outside the Cathedral? Or…”

At that moment, the monster attacked. A shadowy lash sprang up beside it and whipped hard toward Vanna’s neck.

Vanna turned her body slightly and casually caught the tough, bone-spurred tentacle in one hand. Her wrist gave a sharp, sudden twist.

“…in that great fire in 1889? Or in that little Cathedral back in 1885?”

The tentacle in Vanna’s hand burst into a cloud of blood. That exploding blood mist then rushed back along the tentacle toward the monster not far away. Only when the whole tentacle and a third of the monster’s body suddenly exploded did the shock finally fade. In the next second, Vanna had already charged behind the monster. Her greatsword rose high, then swept sideways like a club and smashed into the monster’s side.

With a loud bang, the monster’s howl stopped at once. It flew off like a lump of filthy meat and landed in the distance, right next to the first Sunspawn remnant.

At that moment, the first remnant was just about done regenerating. In the writhing flesh you could already vaguely see the tall, thin shape, and the “black coat” it had mimicked into being, which was really some kind of protective shell.

Vanna walked up to the two attackers and looked down at the two monsters.

“Even though I don’t know how the Black Sun can meddle in the corruption of history, and I don’t know what surprises the ‘true body’ behind you has prepared for me, there is one thing that must be right.

“I’m going to fight you here to the very end and see if you are really endless or not. Either I kill my way out of here, or… I prove my loyalty and true faith to the Goddess.”

The greatsword rose, and then…

…came a long series of careful cuts.

Vanna’s thinking was very simple. The spawn of the Sun had powerful regeneration, but no matter how strong the healing, it was not invincibility. As long as their recovery cost them something, then dealing with them was not a problem.

Finely chopping them into mince would do. If that still did not work… then chop them twice.

…

Shirley opened her eyes and saw a ceiling she still was not very familiar with, and the sunlight pouring in through the nearby window.

The bed under her body was very soft and comfortable. The blanket over her carried a fresh, dry smell. In the shantytown, it was hard to find that kind of dryness. The oldest pipes and blocked sewers all gathered in those filthy alleys, and the air there was always damp and stinking. Even if you dried a blanket in the air for three days, all you did was let the sewer stench soak deep into the cloth and cotton.

Shirley lay there quietly. The comfort was almost too much, and she did not even want to roll over. But in the end she pushed herself up with her hands and looked around.

Nina was no longer in the room, and judging from the sunlight outside the window… it was probably already close to noon.

“Dog…” Shirley called softly. “How long did I sleep?”

Dog’s voice rang in her mind at once: “It’s at least half past ten now, maybe eleven. Yesterday you finished eating, took a bath, and then fell right onto the bed and passed out. You’ve been out for at least twelve hours… which is normal. You burned a lot of energy.”

Shirley was still a little groggy. The things that had happened yesterday drifted through her mind like a dream. It took her a long time to sort out her memories and decide which parts had really happened and which were strange scenes from her sleep.

Then she lifted her head and looked toward the corner of the room.

A simple little chest was sitting there quietly.

Ah. That was everything from the past ten-plus years… everything she and Dog owned.

“We really… moved here.” Shirley muttered to herself. “Dog, it feels like a dream.”

“Stop saying that. I’m already nervous enough as it is. Mr. Duncan is in the kitchen cooking. I really don’t even dare to imagine what we’re going to see on the table in a while…”

“Dog, why do you have such a big problem with the food here? You’ve gone on about this more than once…”

“Ugh, just don’t ask…”

Listening to Dog’s complaints, Shirley suddenly laughed.

The sunlight today was really nice.

Chapter 197: Bright Sunshine

The sunlight outside the window was bright and warm. The terrible weather from before now felt like a distant illusion. Only the water marks left on the windowsill and the wet ground on the street proved that a heavy rain had really fallen late last night. And this sunny day after the rain seemed just right for sleeping in at home.

But Shirley had already slept enough. She had never slept this long in one go before, and she was a little hungry, which pushed her to get up quickly.

Lying hungry in bed was not a pleasant memory for her. When she was younger, she had used sleep to get through the hungriest nights. If not for Dog waking her up and supporting her, she might have left this world long ago on some cold, hungry winter night.

When hunger passed a certain point, a person brushed shoulders with death in their sleep. That was one of Shirley’s hard-earned life lessons.

She left the soft, comfortable bed and got up to change clothes. At that moment, light, quick footsteps sounded right outside the door.

“Shirley! Are you awake? I heard something!”

It was Nina’s voice.

Shirley froze for a second, then quickly answered: “I’m awake.”

The door opened, and Nina appeared in the doorway in a white blouse, short jacket, and light brown plaid skirt. She saw Shirley, who had just finished changing, and smiled at once. Then she walked quickly over. “You really slept a long time! How do you feel now? Does your back still hurt? How are your wounds… let me see, let me see…”

“I used a lot of energy, so I slept for a long time… I’m fine now, really.” Shirley dodged a little at Nina’s overenthusiastic checking. But the girl who was usually so strong and powerful seemed to have no strength at all when trying to avoid Nina. In the end, she obediently turned around and let Nina check the wounds on her back and arms. “They’re just small injuries. I… heal very fast. And… hey, that tickles, don’t… it tickles, haha…”

“They really all healed!” Nina finally let go of Shirley, who had started hopping and squirming away from her fingers. Nina stared at her friend in surprise, as if she were studying some rare creature. “Last night it was still such a big wound. Now it’s not only gone, it didn’t even leave a scar… How did you do that?”

“I already told you, I have a symbiotic pact with a Abyssal demon. Dog’s traits are a tough body and regeneration,” Shirley said, straightening her clothes. The outfit she had worn yesterday had been ruined in the fight. The one she was wearing now was another old set she had brought from home, one of the few things she had managed to salvage after the attack. “My regeneration could actually be even better, but Dog says I’m malnourished, so my regeneration is kind of weakened…”

“Then you need to eat well here. Uncle’s cooking is really good now,” Nina said at once, then grew curious. “So… are all people like you… I mean, people who have symbiotic pacts with Abyssal demons, are they all this strong?”

“It depends on what kind of demon they have a symbiotic pact with. If it’s a Abyssal Hound, what you get is toughness and regeneration, plus a boost to your senses. With dreadfiends, what you get is willpower and resistance to mental corruption. Besides those, there are all kinds of demons, and I can’t name them all… Anyway, people with symbiotic pacts with Abyssal demons are the messiest kind of supernatural. Those demons are always very generous to their pact partners, just so they can act in the Mortal Realm."

Shirley suddenly paused there, and her expression turned serious. She looked into Nina's eyes. "That's just talk, though. I still think you shouldn't get too close to this side of things. By now you should know that, under normal circumstances, the ones who make symbiotic pacts with Abyssal demons are all madmen from the Cult of Annihilation. They're not like me. Their demons aren't like Dog."

"I know, I know, I'm not a little child," Nina said quickly, waving her hands, but she still could not hide the curiosity on her face. "But have you ever seen other people with symbiotic pacts? I mean those annihilation believers…"

"I haven't, and I don't want to. Just hearing Dog describe them is disgusting enough. If I ever do see them, I'll be sure to beat them up… and then report them to the constables," Shirley said, frowning. "Nina, you're asking a lot of questions today… You didn't ask this much even when you first met Dog. And don't you have school today?"

"I have to learn more about you if you're going to be living in my home from now on. I heard from Uncle that your house was destroyed in a gas explosion and you don't have anywhere else to go…" Nina said seriously as she grabbed Shirley's hand and pulled her toward the door. "And school is on break! We have almost two months of vacation. You didn't know?"

"How would I know? I've never gone to school…" Shirley muttered under her breath as Nina dragged her out of the room toward the kitchen, where the smell of food was already drifting out. She noticed that the whole second floor was very quiet and could not help asking, “Is Mr. Duncan not here?”

“Uncle went down to the first floor. He said he needs to receive someone and told us to eat upstairs first,” Nina explained. She pulled Shirley to the kitchen door, then suddenly seemed to remember something and quickly turned to drag her toward the washroom. “Oh, right, wash your hands. You have to wash your hands before eating, or Uncle will start lecturing again.”

“Oh… okay.” Shirley let Nina pull her back and forth in a daze. She did not know if it was because she was hungry or because she had slept too long, but her head felt a little foggy. Still… it was not a bad feeling.

At the same time, beside the counter on the first floor of the antique shop, Duncan was carefully explaining something to the person sitting across from him. The person across from him was a young lady in an elegant dress and a fine checked veil, with long golden hair and a dignified, beautiful face.

“…That’s pretty much it. There’s an awful lot of common sense you need to know if you want to live in human society, but for now it’s enough if you understand the most basic parts. That’s enough for your current range of activity. You won’t be doing much here in the shop either. Just get used to the simplest things at first, like sweeping the floor and putting things back on the shelves,” Duncan finally finished explaining the things she needed to watch out for here. But he still looked uneasily at the golden-haired maiden sitting up straight in front of him. “And the things I taught you on the ship before… you still remember them?”

“I remember, I remember!” Alice nodded hard at once. After two big nods, though, she suddenly seemed to remember something and quickly made her nods smaller, lowering her head in a very proper, elegant way. “Don’t worry, I remember it all very clearly!”

“Right, small nods. At least you remembered that.” Duncan let out a breath and let his gaze slide over Alice again, checking each detail.

A golden wig covered her original long silver hair. A bit of makeup had softened some details of her face. A veil hid the lower half of her face. She wore long white silk gloves on her hands, and a frilled choker around her neck to hide the special joints there.

Basically, every part that could be disguised had been disguised.

Of course, if someone who knew Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm extremely well stood here, or someone who had once seen Anomaly 099 up close with their own eyes, they would probably still notice something suspicious in the brows and eyes of this “golden-haired maiden.” But the chance of that was almost zero.

Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm had lived half a century ago. And anyone who had ever been close to Anomaly 099 was almost certainly no longer alive.

Ordinary people, even the Guardians of the Church, definitely would not recognize that this Alice was the cursed Doll in a runaway state.

Duncan could not help sighing again in his heart.

At first, he had planned to wait a while longer before letting Alice come to a human city to “see the world,” to give her a few more days of lessons on the ship. But he could not stand the way she leaned on the railings, staring longingly into the distance and muttering to herself when she had nothing to do, so he moved the schedule up a bit.

Still, within what he could manage, he had crammed as much basic knowledge into her as possible, and poured the most basic “normal worldview” into her. He figured… it should be enough.

Probably.

Right now, Nina and Shirley were eating upstairs. Duncan had picked a time and asked AI to bring the doll from the ship to the shop so she could get used to the place. The first thing Alice did when she arrived was poke and prod everything in sight. It had taken him a lot of effort to “pin” her to the chair by the counter. Even so, he could tell that the doll’s attention was almost never actually on what he was saying.

She had started looking all around again. Even though she tried her best to sit up properly, her darting eyes and the neck that kept wanting to turn this way and that were impossible to hide.

Elegant, ladylike posture matched with eyes that just could not sit still—Duncan could only think: this really was Alice. Somehow, elegance and total airheadedness could appear on the same person at the same time.

After a round of looking everywhere, her attention finally returned to Duncan. Her eyes were full of barely hidden focus and… curiosity.

Chapter 198: Alice’s First Day Out in the World

Duncan felt a little creeped out by the doll’s unblinking stare. After forcing himself to stay calm for a few seconds, he finally couldn’t help frowning and asked: “What are you looking at?”

Alice answered honestly: “Looking at you.”

Duncan stared blankly at her and said: “What’s there to look at about me?”

“It’s the first time I’ve seen you talking in… this look,” Alice said, her face full of disbelief. “Even though you said before that you have another body and identity here, actually seeing it still feels so unbelievable! Captain, you look completely different from how you look on the ship. You’re not as tall, you’re not as gloomy, and… you kind of look like a good person now…”

Duncan’s eyes widened at once, but before he could speak, Alice hurried to add: “Ah, I shouldn’t slander you, Captain…”

“I’ve told you so many times, stop learning nonsense from that Goathead!” Duncan glared at the blockhead in front of him, feeling like his brain was trembling. “Calling someone a good person isn’t slander—that’s called a compliment. Even if you’re saying it about me!

“And did you forget what I told you? In the city-state you can’t call me ‘Captain’. You have to call me Mr. Duncan or Shopkeeper. Remember?”

Alice jerked and shrank her neck. “Ah… ah! Got it, Cap… Shopkeeper!”

“…How about you just call me Mr. Duncan,” Duncan sighed, looking tired. “At least you’re a bit more used to that name, so you’re less likely to get it wrong.”

“Oh, oh, okay, Mr. Duncan.” Alice lowered her head in a hurry as she agreed. She had just bent halfway when Duncan reminded her helplessly: “Don’t lower your head, or it will fall off—if you let your head drop off in front of everyone, your trip to the city-state will be over.”

Alice made a little sound of understanding, then frowned as if thinking of something. “I think I heard AI muttering something like what you just said, but it wasn’t like this… She said, ‘Don’t lower your head, your crown will…’”

“Do you have a crown on your head?!” Duncan glared. “All you’ve got on your head is a wig—and it’s fixed on more firmly than your actual head!”

Alice thought for a moment. “Hehe…”

She was quiet for less than two seconds, then suddenly started staring at Duncan again. This time, before he could speak, she blurted out: “Captain… can I touch your face?”

Duncan looked baffled. “I don’t really mind, but why?”

As soon as she heard “I don’t mind”, Alice’s hands were already on him. It seemed that after leaving Captain Duncan’s imposing “real body”, this doll’s courage had swelled to an unprecedented degree. She stepped forward and pinched the cheeks of Duncan’s current body, her eyes full of wonder. “Amazing! It’s real! On the ship, when I looked at your face, it felt like it was carved from stone!”

Duncan felt extremely awkward. He dodged backward while saying helplessly: “Are you done? That’s enough…”

Before he finished, he heard two light footsteps from the stairwell, followed by Nina's crisp, cheerful voice: "Uncle, Shirley and I have finished eating! What are you doing down here…"

Duncan turned his head with a blank face. Alice's hand was still stretched out in midair. Nina stood at the second-floor stairway, staring wide-eyed at the scene by the counter. She stared at the young lady who had somehow appeared in the shop, elegant and beautiful like a noble Miss from the Upper City. Shirley almost ran straight into Nina. "Hey, why did you suddenly stop?"

Alice snapped her hand back at once. She folded both hands on her knees and sat straight and proper in front of the counter.

She was as stiff and upright as a gorgeous doll displayed in the window of the Rose Doll House.

Nina stared for quite a while before she finally reacted. She walked down the stairs, hesitating, and carefully looked at the beautiful lady sitting opposite Duncan. Shirley, following behind her, also saw the situation on the first floor, but what was going on in Shirley's head was something else entirely—

"Dog, Dog, hurry up and look. What's that sitting across from Mr. Duncan… is that a person? Can you beat her?"

Dog's voice came after a long pause, sounding extra cautious: "It's hard to see clearly through your eyes, but the more I look, the less she looks like a person… I don't know if I could beat her, but I'm definitely not going to fight her."

Shirley was stunned. "Why? You can't even tell what she is, so why are you so scared?"

“Nonsense! She dares to pinch Mr. Duncan’s face!” Dog’s voice sounded weak to death. “Just for that alone, if she wanted to stew me, I’d have to go chop the firewood myself…”

“…Dog, you’re getting more and more pathetic.”

“This is called reading the situation—do you know how many humans spent their whole lives of wisdom just to master this essence of survival?”

Shirley ignored Dog.

While they were talking, she and Nina had already reached the first floor. She saw Nina walk over to Duncan and that beautiful young lady, and she heard their voices as they started talking.

“Uncle, who is this lady?”

Nina asked curiously, while unconsciously sneaking glances at Alice, full of surprise and guesses. She had never seen such a beautiful lady, and she had never seen any young lady have such a close gesture with her uncle as just now. Her strong curiosity made her eyes shine.

“Ah, let me introduce you,” Duncan said, clearing his throat twice to ease the awkwardness. He calmly pointed at Alice. “Her name is Alice. Remember I said before I was going to hire another pair of hands for the shop? That’s her.”

Then he pointed at Nina and Shirley. “This is my niece, Nina. And this is Shirley, who is staying here for now.”

“Hello.” Alice greeted them at once. This time she kept Duncan’s instructions firmly in mind. She sat perfectly straight, nodded just the right amount, and held back her usual bounce, greeting them in the most polite way.

But maybe some unique “texture” of a doll could not be erased. In Nina and Shirley’s eyes, Alice’s restrained posture turned into an indescribable elegance and manners, along with a certain mysterious, reserved air.

At their first meeting, two girls and one silly doll reached an epic-level misunderstanding.

“H-hello,” Nina said, swallowing nervously. Afraid of leaving a bad impression, she nodded to Alice. “It’s very nice to meet you.”

Shirley also hurried to greet her. She was nervous too, but her nerves came more from what Dog had just said. “Hello, I’m also… very glad.”

Then the whole scene froze. Both sides kept their faces tense, and no one spoke.

Shirley and Nina simply did not know how to continue. The beautiful, elegant lady in front of them looked like someone who would almost never appear in the Lower City. The two girls felt that no matter what they said, this Miss Alice would probably find it displeasing.

Alice was even simpler—her head was empty most of the time.

And the rest of the time it was stuffed full of mush.

Luckily Duncan had already expected this. When he saw both sides fall silent at the same time, he knew what was going on and quickly cleared his throat to break the silence: “Ahem, Shirley, how are your injuries?”

“Injuries… oh! I’m completely healed!” Shirley froze for a moment before reacting. She straightened up at once, answering his question like she was giving a report. “And I just ate a lot, so I’m not hungry at all now!”

“I didn’t ask that… but I’m glad you liked today’s food,” Duncan said with a smile, nodding. “You should take a couple of days to build yourself back up. I'll make some nutritious things to restore your strength. Nina, what plans do you have today?"

"I was just planning to take Shirley to the shops on the next street," Nina said at once. "I'll buy her two sets of new clothes and new shoes—her clothes are all really old."

As she spoke, she turned to look at Shirley and stressed, before Shirley could speak: "This is a welcome gift for you moving here. It would be rude not to accept it."

"I…" Shirley opened her mouth but didn't know what to say. In the end she could only nod. "All right then. Thank you… and thank you, Mr. Duncan."

Duncan nodded, a slight smile on his face. "Don't go too far then. Be back before evening—and Shirley, you have to protect Nina."

Shirley straightened up at once. Her voice was so loud it startled Nina: "Yes, Mr. Duncan!"

Then the two girls said goodbye to Duncan and Alice and walked together toward the door. As they went, Nina kept muttering: "Why did you suddenly shout like that just now? You scared me… My uncle? My uncle isn't scary."

"I… I was being polite. I've been learning manners lately…"

Hearing the two girls' muttering grow more distant, Duncan couldn't help showing a slight smile. Then he turned back and saw Alice staring at him again with that fixed gaze.

"What are you staring at me for this time?"

"Mr. Duncan… you're really different here than you are on the ship," Alice said seriously, giving him another once-over. "You're a lot friendlier here than on the ship!"

“All right, enough with the meaningless sighing,” Duncan said with a helpless smile. He of course knew why Alice felt that way—even he knew he was always tense on the ship. Even though he had relaxed a little recently, it was still nothing like how at ease he felt in the city-state. But he did not waste more words on that and quickly turned the topic elsewhere. “Let’s talk about you first. You don’t have a legal identity, so you’d better not go to the Upper City and draw attention. For now, you’ll help out here in the antique shop. On one hand, you’ll get used to the environment, and on the other hand you can help me with a few things. Usually, when I go out, you’ll stay here at the counter. When a guest comes in, you just… wait, I suddenly thought of a question!”

He suddenly stopped, staring at the doll in front of him with a strange expression. After several seconds he finally asked, a bit hesitantly: “Do you… know what money is?”

Alice looked completely curious. “What is money?”

Duncan was speechless.

Chapter 199: The Historian’s Vigilance

Duncan felt that he had been careless.

He had only thought about Alice lacking common sense for living in the human world, but he had not thought about how extreme that lack could be. He had assumed that once she came over she could at least help a little in the shop, but he had not expected that she did not even recognize money.

But it was actually quite reasonable.

After all, when she was lying in a coffin, she had never needed to spend any money…

“Sigh… Since Shirley and Nina aren’t here, I’d better keep tutoring you,” Duncan said with a sigh, helplessly giving up his plan to go out for a walk in the afternoon. “First, I have to teach you a few of the most basic things in the human world, like currency…”

He paused, then sighed again. “Looks like I’ll really have to open a literacy class for you and Shirley later.”

“Oh, oh, Shirley, that’s the very short girl from just now, right?” Alice matched the name at once, her face full of joy. Being able to get to know someone new seemed like something worth getting happy about for her. “I heard you say she’s just like me, a… what was it called, an ‘illiterate’, right?”

“That’s nothing to be happy about!” Duncan knocked on the table. “And even Shirley is better than you—at least she knows how to dodge the fare when she rides the tram!”

“What’s fare dodging?” Alice asked.

Once again, Duncan had nothing to say.

…

Heidi let out a solid sneeze.

She stood up to close the window in the sitting room, rubbing her nose and grumbling about the recent swings between cold and warm weather. Then she lifted her head with some worry and looked at her father, who was sitting by the coffee table not far away.

School was already on break. The annual autumn vacation at all the public schools in Pland lasted more than two months. During this time, her father did not need to report to the school, and he normally had few social engagements, so in past years he usually spent this time soaking in the city’s major libraries, or else stayed at home like today, passing his days at leisure.

But for some reason, Morris’s condition today looked quite off.

He held a newspaper in his hands, but his gaze wasn’t focused on it at all. He sat on the sofa, keeping the same stiff posture for almost an hour. He seemed to be lost in thought about something, and he hadn’t even responded to the daytime maid’s question just now.

Heidi frowned.

It seemed that ever since coming back from Mr. Duncan’s antique shop, her father’s state had been like this—spaced out, sometimes showing strange expressions, ignoring other people and lost in his own thoughts.

He didn’t even go to his study—as if he was instinctively resisting books.

“Are you all right?” Heidi finally couldn’t hold back. She got up, walked over to Morris, and bent down beside him to ask with concern: “Are you feeling unwell?”

She asked twice in a row before Morris finally heard his daughter’s voice. He quickly lifted his head, and only when the buzzing in his mind eased a little did he wave his hand. “I’m fine… Oh, you didn’t go to the Cathedral or City Hall today? And you didn’t go to the clinic either?”

“The work at the Cathedral and City Hall was finished long ago. The clinic is closed today too,” Heidi said, her brow not relaxing. “I remember you already asked me that once this morning.”

“Oh, did I? I forgot.”

Morris tapped lightly at his temple, speaking a little hesitantly.

He knew his condition wasn’t very good, but he had no way to explain the problem to his daughter.

He could not casually reveal information about a being from Subspace—not only because it might anger that “Mr. Duncan”, but also because mishandling that information could produce corruption and affect Heidi.

A low buzzing sounded in his mind, interrupting his thoughts, but soon the noise died down again, letting his thinking steady.

Mental noise. That was a side effect left over from returning from the antique shop.

But in fact, compared with yesterday, these aftereffects had already weakened many times over.

Morris knew he should be thankful—after facing the Shadows of Subspace head-on, he had not only kept his life, he had even kept his sanity. It was the combined effect of the protection of the God of Wisdom and “Mr. Duncan’s” goodwill. He had some lingering symptoms caused by his madness threshold, but after a simple self-check he was sure those symptoms would quickly lessen over time and there was nothing to be too worried about.

But before the symptoms completely disappeared, his poor condition would probably keep worrying Heidi for a while.

Morris suddenly frowned. He remembered that his daughter was an outstanding psychiatrist—he could not let her keep noticing that his mental state was abnormal.

Just then Heidi’s voice came again: “Did you talk about something with Mr. Duncan yesterday? I feel like you’ve been absent-minded ever since you came back…”

“Some… topics in the field of knowledge, very profound knowledge,” Morris said. In his mind he couldn’t stop the related information about the “Creeping Sun Wheel” from rising, and he recalled the intelligence about the current state of the Black Sun that Mr. Duncan had revealed to him. With great effort, he held down those pieces of “knowledge” that seemed to have lives of their own, drilling all through the sea of his consciousness, and he smiled at Heidi. “It was pretty hard on the brain. I still haven’t figured it out, so I’m a bit distracted today… Anyway, forget about that. I suddenly remembered, didn’t you make plans with a friend to go to the cinema on your day off?”

Heidi froze. “…A friend? I don’t remember… making plans to go to the cinema with any friend… Did you remember wrong?”

“Did I remember wrong?” Morris rubbed his temple. For some reason, he suddenly felt a throbbing heat there. His memory grew hazy in waves, as if something forgotten was waking up inside his mind. “But I clearly remember that the day before yesterday you said you had a friend… what was the name… someone very tall, and also very familiar to me…”

Morris’s motion of rubbing his temple grew more and more impatient. He started lightly knocking his forehead with his fist, muttering under his breath. This turned Heidi’s slight confusion into sudden nervousness. She hurriedly crouched down to hold the old man’s hand. “Are you okay? Is your head hurting? Do you want me to do some hypnosis for relaxation or some calming mental guidance for you? Or find another doctor…”

“I don’t need a doctor, I don’t,” Morris said, waving his hand hard. The noise rose again in his head, but this time it was different from the earlier “mental noise”. This time, the sound seemed to be desperately trying to convey some message, desperately trying to wake something up. He felt as if another consciousness was waking inside his mind—that consciousness was still him, but had a subtle difference from his current thoughts. “I just need to remember, to remember something very important… Heidi, you have a friend, listen, you have a friend, and it’s very important…”

The worry and tension on Heidi’s face grew worse. She gripped Morris’s other hand tightly, and her words unconsciously carried the calming power of mental guidance. “Of course I have friends, but which one are you talking about…”

But Morris could no longer hear the rest of her words.

He felt a sudden roar inside his head, as if all the noise had been compressed into a single instant and then released at once. Right after that, the mental noise that had troubled him for so long vanished completely, and a flood of strange memories surged up from the depths of his consciousness. In a daze, he seemed to see that scene again—a giant, its whole body filled with starlight, formed from twisted, fused shards of broken mirrors. Then he saw an emerald flame, burning away, and as the fire burned, the mist cleared.

This time, however, he did not lose his sanity from seeing the giant. On the contrary, the images rising in his mind seemed to carry a strange great power, breaking through an invisible Veil.

The old man suddenly lifted his head and stared straight into Heidi's eyes. "Where is Vanna?"

Heidi froze. "…Who is Vanna?"

"The city's Inquisitor, one of your best friends, Governor Dante's niece…" Morris said slowly. His breathing had already calmed, and his gaze had returned to its usual depth and sharpness. The noise disappeared, and the giant's figure faded, leaving only two sets of memories in his mind that existed at the same time yet were completely different. He could clearly tell all the differences between those memories, as if he were reading two ancient scrolls of history unrolled before him—telling histories apart and searching for the truth was one of the things he was best at. "You don't remember, do you?"

Heidi hesitated. "I… don't know who you're talking about, but your condition really worries me…"

"Don't worry about me, I'm in excellent condition right now. We should be worrying about Vanna." Morris suddenly stood up, his expression more serious than ever. "Heidi, there may be a big problem in our city-state. We have to act."

Heidi stood up with him without thinking. She could tell that her father's spirit had somehow become strangely energized, but she had no idea what had happened. "Act? Do what?"

“You go to the Great Cathedral and find Bishop Valentine, and tell him…” Morris spoke quickly, but he stopped halfway and shook his head after a tense, careful moment of weighing it. “No, Vanna may have gotten into trouble because she sensed the truth… When you find Bishop Valentine, just say that you want to seek shelter, a Highest-Grade Sanctuary. Tell him I told you to do this—that the most distinguished history scholar in the city-state of Pland told you to do this. Don’t say anything else…”

Heidi listened in a daze. She had already sensed that something dangerous and urgent might be happening and that those things could not be spoken of directly, so she held back the urge to ask more questions and got ready to follow her father’s instructions first. But then she noticed Morris picking up the coat beside him, and her eyes widened slightly. “What about you? What are you going to do?”

“…Go to the antique shop,” Morris said in a low voice.

Chapter 200: Interception

The sunlight had still been bright in the morning, but now the sky had somehow turned gloomy. Gray clouds and mist sank down over the city-state of Pland from top to bottom. Distant clock towers and chimneys became hazy ink-wash shapes in the blurred backdrop, while cold wind gusted in fits and starts, its direction restless and unsure.

Two cars drove out from the Underwood family mansion. One went straight onto the main avenue and sped toward the city center, while the other turned onto a shortcut leading to the Lower City, heading into the distance under the darkening sky.

Morris sat in the driver’s seat. He handled the car carefully as it moved along the narrow road and craned his neck to glance at the weather outside.

The sky looked even gloomier than before. The chaotic wind almost began to howl, whipping the colorful flags on nearby towers so they slapped about wildly.

The sudden turn for the worse in the weather gave him a faint sense of unease. It also made him recall what it had been like the last time he went to that antique shop.

Back then the weather had been just as bad.

The elderly man lifted his right hand and patted his forehead to wake himself up a bit. At the same time, he glanced from the corner of his eye at the rune bead bracelet on his wrist.

Only four colored stones still hung between the bracelet's finely tied knots. These stones, blessed by divine grace, gave off a faint glow in the dim daylight, bringing a sense of calm to the heart.

Rahm's blessing could keep Scholars alive for a while when they faced knowledge beyond their understanding, but that blessing had only limited effect against truly dangerous Subspace Shadows. Morris did not know what would be waiting for him at the antique shop this time, nor whether these stones could protect him as they had before.

But he still drove on toward the antique shop.

As long as he kept his curiosity in check, as long as he did not open his Eye of Truth again, as long as he did not court death by observing Mr. Duncan and everything around him, he would be safe. That Subspace Shadow had been friendly in attitude, unbelievable as that was. As long as he did not engage in any Boundary Crossing on his side, that being would not harm him.

It might even be able to help.

Morris drew in a slow breath, letting his pounding heart calm down bit by bit.

He knew he had brushed against terrible truths hidden beneath the city's peaceful surface. As a history Scholar, he had already guessed roughly what those truths were. Yet he had not chosen to report them directly to the Church. Instead, he was hurrying toward an indescribable being from Subspace.

This was undoubtedly an act of defiance, even of Heresy.

But he still made this bold decision.

Heidi had already gone to the Cathedral. Her act of seeking shelter there, together with the subtle message she carried, should be enough to alert

Bishop Valentine. Before he set out, he had also offered a brief Prayer. If Rahm still watched over him, then he had at least fulfilled his duty to warn the Church. Now he was heading for the antique shop—walking three paths at once, which would at least raise the chances of success.

Something might have happened to Vanna, and she was an Inquisitor of the Deep Sea Church. If even she could run into trouble, Morris did not dare place all his hopes on the Church.

He could only hope that at the very least the Cathedral itself had not fallen, and hope that sending Heidi to seek refuge there and give the warning had been the right choice.

A sudden peal of thunder crashed. After the booming echo, a clamor rose in the distance.

Morris, who had been driving while lost in thought, jumped at the sudden noise. He instinctively looked toward the source of the commotion and vaguely saw thick smoke rising over a distant building.

It seemed a lightning strike had set the roof on fire—bad weather and bad luck.

That building lay directly in his path. Morris muttered a curse under his breath, then turned onto another narrow road at the side and drove in.

However, he had not gone far before several crazed wolfhounds suddenly burst out of a side alley ahead. A drunk staggered after them, waving a stick. When the drunk saw the car entering the lane, he rushed over, swearing loudly and swinging the stick as if he meant to block the way.

Morris frowned and muttered: “Where did this madman crawl out from…” He pressed the horn hard, hoping to snap the drunk awake and make him move. But when the man heard the horn, he only grew wilder. Still cursing, he rushed right in front of the car and swung his stick down onto the hood.

Morris flinched at the bang. Something seemed to click in his mind. He stared into the drunk's eyes and shouted in a low voice: "Modazoro Geometric Law!"

A mass of tangled, chaotic knowledge and memories suddenly flooded into the drunk's mind, stirring up a brief storm on the surface of his thoughts. The brute probably had trouble even doing addition and subtraction beyond two digits on normal days. He let out a cry of pain and terror and bolted away in panic.

Morris started the car again at once, drove straight past the mad dogs still barking wildly at the roadside, and headed toward the street ahead, which grew darker and darker.

He had shaken off the trouble for now, but Morris's face did not relax at all. A sudden deep ditch appeared in his field of view, and a steam pipe beside the road burst without warning. Hot vapor roared out and blocked the way. His bad feeling was finally confirmed.

It was not that the weather had suddenly turned bad. It was not that trouble had simply popped up. It was not that he was just unlucky today.

Something was stopping him—stopping him, the one who had noticed the truth, from going any farther.

This was not a forceful blockade, nor a direct lethal threat. The string of accidents felt more like some kind of "stress response", like an automatic warning rule at work.

How did this warning rule take effect? How had "they" found him? Was it because of his "awakening", or some specific action he had taken?

He had only vaguely sensed the truth and had never directly confronted the hidden hand behind it, yet he already ran into this string of "obstructions".

Then what about Vanna? What exactly had she discovered, and what had she gone through, that made her vanish from the Mortal Realm entirely?

Morris silently recited Rahm's holy name and checked the colored stones on his wrist from the corner of his eye. He steered around the obstacles ahead and turned onto a main road leading straight to the Fourth District.

On a broad, straight avenue, how were "they" planning to hinder him now?

Morris blinked. Suddenly, he saw another figure in the rearview mirror besides himself.

A "person" in tattered Monk's robes, a body thin and shriveled like a skeleton, face twisted into a grotesque smile, sat in the back seat. In the rearview mirror, that withered, eerie figure fixed a gaze on Morris's eyes.

The withered, eerie figure spoke suddenly, even quite politely: "Good afternoon, Mr. Morris. Where are you headed?"

Morris slammed on the brakes and turned slightly to look at the figure sitting behind him to the side. He said: "I should have realized… When I discussed the 'Will Heim transmission incident' with Mr. Duncan, I should have realized it was you so-called 'Preachers'…" He paused, then asked in a low voice: "When did you slip into this car?"

The gaunt man seemed to smile, making the shriveled flesh on his face bunch up, and said: "Hard to say. Maybe it was yesterday, maybe it was in 1889—when you and your lady first bought this car. You are in such a hurry. Do you have urgent business?"

Morris answered only with silence. The gaunt Ender did not mind. He went on politely: "No matter where you are going, I must ask you not to pass—but I will not take your life. After all, you once offered a Prayer to Subspace in that great fire, so you can be counted as half a compatriot of ours… Ah, don't tell me you still don't know who you were praying to back then?"

Morris’s expression shifted twice, then finally turned into a bitter smile as he said: “So that’s how it is…”

The Ender raised one hand, speaking with devout calm: “As we often say, Subspace is the Promised Land. It answers all wishes of all beings and grants fulfillment in a fair way…” Then his gaze fell on Morris. “What do you plan to do next? Try to drive me out? I have learned about the power the God of Wisdom grants His Believers. They say your words can turn knowledge and memory into strength, and that the words you speak can hit as hard as bullets. I would very much like to see it…”

Before the Ender could finish his words, six deafening shots from a large-caliber revolver tore through him and turned him into a corpse. Two bullets hit his heart, one his forehead.

The shriveled body quickly broke apart into pale fragments, then scattered like dust on the wind.

Morris drew his right hand out from where the side seat had hidden it, a revolver still smoking in his grip.

He muttered: “When I’ve already got bullets, why would I waste my breath on you…”

The old Scholar grumbled a few more words, casually reloaded the revolver, and started the car again.

He knew the road ahead would still not be easy. There was no telling what else might block his way. Killing one dim-witted Ender would not end any of this.

That Ender might even come back to pester him again tomorrow. Since the man had dared to get into this car, it meant he did not care at all about dying at this moment.

Chapter 201: Piercing Through

Fire—fire burning everywhere, or fields of ash left behind after it burned out. The Cathedral was destroyed by fire, the bell tower was destroyed by fire, and the city-state itself seemed to have been destroyed by fire.

Dry, hot wind howled across the Cathedral square, now burned into ruins. Gusts whipped up drifting clouds of ash. Tiny sparks fell from the Great Bell tower above, and charred flags sagged and dropped in the wind.

A tall figure in light armor stepped onto the square. The heavy, broad greatsword in her hand scraped across the scorching ground, throwing up a trail of sparks.

The tips of Vanna's hair had already been singed by the shocking heat in the air. Her armor was damaged in many places. In some of the gaps, bleeding wounds were still visible. The flesh in those wounds writhed and was slowly healing.

She held the sword in her right hand and carried a huge rotary machine gun in her left. A heavy ammo box rested on her back. She had taken this gun not long ago while passing the armory, dismantling it from a half-ruined Steam Walker, and it handled fairly well.

Hot wind blew in, and the smell of ash drilled into her nose. Vanna narrowed her eyes slightly, looking toward the distant streets and the slow-rising smoke and red light behind them.

In this strand of "history", the whole of Pland had already been burned down.

The fire had started spreading in 1889. For eleven years no one noticed it, until it burned through the entire city, and in its slow erosion, fixed the whole city-state in a ruined state.

Even the power of the Storm Goddess had already suffered serious distortion and interference. The longer Vanna stayed here, the harder it became for her to feel the gentle touch of the sea breeze.

It was easy to burn down a city-state, but very hard to burn it down without a God noticing. Those Heretics had taken advantage of a loophole in history and had very likely used the status of the Black Sun to interfere with the God's judgment of the mortal world.

But… where exactly were those Heretics?

A low, hoarse whisper suddenly came from the Shadows between the nearby buildings. That whisper carried a profane, malicious power. In the murmurs, the Shadows gathered from nothing, turning into mind-bewitching illusions. But Vanna did not even glance toward the direction of the condensing Shadows and whispering. Instead, she casually lifted the Six-Barrel Machine Gun in her left hand and pulled the trigger toward another direction that looked empty.

Deafening thunderous roars exploded over the square. Yellow brass shells rained down. As the tongues of flame swept by, a tall, thin shadow suddenly appeared in the air. It had been hiding in the cracks between light and shadow, but was now forced to show itself and, in its haste, could only use a mass of tentacles and the Black Umbrella in its hand to block the hail of bullets rushing at it—and in that very instant of blocking, a roaring wave crashed down on it!

Vanna hurled her greatsword. The greatsword, wrapped in the Power of the Storm, slammed down with a roar, pierced straight through the Monster, and carried it ten meters away before pinning it firmly to the ground. She paid no attention at all to the attacker that had been nailed down. Instead, she turned and sidestepped quickly, grabbed a nearby streetlamp that had already been bent out of shape, wrenched it free, and smashed the heavy steel toward her side.

The second hidden attacker was knocked to the ground by the streetlamp. Its head, ugly like a flower made of flesh and blood, burst into a mess of meat. The remains writhed and struggled violently on the ground until Vanna turned the huge rotary machine gun and swept a storm of scorching bullets across it.

Vanna muttered: “Two-man teams for hidden ambushes… It seems your tactics go no further than that.”

Vanna grumbled this, tossed aside the badly twisted streetlamp, and beckoned to call the Storm greatsword back to her hand. She set the greatsword upright at her side as a support, while still raising the machine gun in her other hand, pointing it like an executioner at the Monster’s minced remains on the ground.

After a few seconds, she frowned.

She murmured: “No regeneration?”

The young Inquisitor bent down and confirmed that the heap of scraps, which had once been part of a Sun Spawn, simply lay there limply. Not only was there no sign of Regeneration at all, it was already starting to lose moisture and vitality at great speed, turning into a pile of shriveled charcoal before her eyes.

Why? Why had these remains lost their Regeneration? Was it because their main body had suddenly grown weak? Or because these scraps had been greatly weakened for some other reason?

Vanna watched this scene with both confusion and caution. Then she suddenly raised her head, as if sensing something, and stared hard at a nearby street.

A mass of flowing green fire appeared in the darkness. It quickly gathered and spread along the edge of the square, then, as if sensing something, suddenly pounced upon the Spawn remains!

It burned, devoured, and grew stronger.

Right before Vanna's eyes, the invading green flames burned away the dead flesh, like a predator enjoying its kill.

The young Inquisitor's eyes narrowed at once. She stared tensely at the spreading green fire, utterly on guard, while all kinds of thoughts and guesses surged through her mind. Yet the flames seemed to ignore her. They flowed on their own around the area, prowling across the square, then finally streamed away into the distance.

Vanna watched the flowing, spreading fire with a thoughtful look, then set off again, walking toward the deeper parts of the city-state.

…

Torrential rain poured down. Sheets of water stretched from sky to earth. The sudden downpour from the thick clouds felt like a plot brewed for many years that had finally revealed itself, washing over everything in the city-state of Pland.

When even the force of the storm could not stop Morris's steps, destined misfortune went to work again—his car finally broke down.

The old Scholar decisively gave up on trying to start the car again. He knew this obstructing power would only grow worse, because that Ender had declared something over him at some unknown moment. That curse would not allow him to fix the car.

But the Ender's "declaration" was not an unbreakable spell. Usually, that kind of thing could only exert different degrees of mental guidance or interference over an "event". The longer it lasted and the wider its range, the more power it needed and the greater the cost it had to pay.

He could not stop in this storm.

Morris opened the car door. Bone-chilling wind and rain struck him at the same time, soaking him through in an instant and even blowing him a step off balance.

But the old man only reached up to press down his hat, gripped his cane with the other hand, and stepped into the hazy wall of rain ahead.

He did not open an umbrella. In weather like this, an umbrella meant nothing.

He was already very close to the antique shop now, only half a block away. If the weather were even a little better, he would have been able to see the shop sign.

But in these harsh conditions, all he could see was a vast curtain of rain and a few nearby shops on both sides of the street with their doors and windows tightly shut.

Morris trudged forward with difficulty in the downpour. He did not know how long he walked before the familiar shop finally appeared in his sight.

The old man subconsciously quickened his pace.

The curse the Ender had laid on him seemed to have finally reached the end of its strength. The headwind that had kept blowing against him weakened bit by bit. The chill it carried stopped being as bone-deep as before. The rain curtain was still thick, but no longer fell onto him like stones.

When there were only a few steps left to the antique shop, Morris suddenly heard a voice beside his ear—

The voice said: “Stop, you will regret this!

“Ahead there is no salvation… Pland will only be swallowed by another disaster!

“History is about to be fully replaced… What you are saving is no longer the true Mortal Realm, but an echo on a wrong path…”

Morris did not slow down at all. He rushed forward two quick steps and almost crashed through the door.

In that instant, the voice at his ear vanished abruptly, as if it had never been there.

The cold wind and sudden rain on the street were also shut out beyond the door.

Morris staggered forward a few steps. Water dripped from his clothes onto the floor. The warm, bright interior made it hard for him to adjust for a moment.

He vaguely heard talking from upstairs. It sounded like two young girls. One of the voices was Nina’s, saying: “The rain is coming down so hard!”

The other girl’s voice answered: “Yeah, it started all of a sudden… Good thing we listened to your uncle and came back early.”

Nina complained: “My hair still got wet though… Shirley, help me dry the back of my hair!”

Morris shook his head, letting the thoughts numbed by cold wind and chill rain slowly return. He lifted his head and looked toward the counter.

In the warm lamplight, a blonde lady in an elaborate dark-purple gown sat quietly behind the counter, casting a curious look in his direction.

She was very beautiful, but Morris did not pay much attention to her appearance.

What he noticed was the air of transcendent elegance around her, and the mysterious, tranquil aura that seemed to linger by her side.

It felt as if she were not sitting in an antique shop in the Lower City at all, but calmly seated in a quiet palace garden, looking at him—the clumsy outsider—with a serene, lofty gaze.

Morris felt he might have sensed some… inhuman traits on this lady, but in the next second he drew back all his perceptions.

There was a new “recruit” in Mr. Duncan’s antique shop, someone he had never seen before. No matter what this new recruit’s identity was, he absolutely must not pry into it at will.

Then he heard a greeting from across the room. The lady said: “It is raining very hard outside, old Mister. Do you need any help?”

Morris froze for a moment, then quickly said: “Mr. Duncan… I’m looking for Mr. Duncan. It is a very important matter! Is he not in the shop?”

The mysterious, elegant woman smiled and said: “He is. He said his blood pressure is a bit high, so he is resting on the second floor.”

Morris looked stunned and repeated: “His blood pressure… is a bit high?”

The blonde behind the counter shook her head and said: “I don’t know why either—after we finished talking about the matter of history and replicas, his mood has not been very good.”

History and replicas?!

Morris’s heart gave a sudden thump. He wanted to ask more, but then he heard footsteps on the stairs, followed by Mr. Duncan’s voice: “Alice, do we have a guest?”

Alice answered: “Yes, Mr. Duncan! An old man I don’t know!”

Morris raised his head and saw Duncan standing on the stairs, half his body lit by the lamp and half hidden in Shadows.

Duncan saw him and looked somewhat surprised and curious.

Chapter 202: Pulling Someone Out

Duncan looked in surprise at old Mr. Morris standing on the first floor. He was surprised by how bedraggled Morris looked and by the strange expression on his face.

He walked down slowly and greeted the old scholar: “Good day – what happened? You look like you ran all the way here straight through the wind and rain.”

“M-Mr. Duncan,” Morris finally came back to himself. He set aside the matter of the mysterious blonde lady for now, took off his already soaked hat as he walked forward, and said: “I need your help… I don’t know how to explain this to you, and I don’t know if you’re willing to act, but… I found Enders moving in the city. They’ve tampered with Pland’s history, I…”

The old man trailed off mid-sentence.

He suddenly realized how rash it was to come here asking for help. He realized how irrational it was to seek help from a Subspace being whose stance was unclear. Would Mr. Duncan even help with this? Why would he help? Did the survival of humans and the fate of the city-state mean anything to him? Did the Enders pose any threat to him at all?

Was he acting on impulse only because this Subspace being had shown a friendly attitude before, or only because the other party had happened to show interest in certain matters last time?

Morris stood there in a daze for a moment, then saw Duncan nod lightly.

“I know.”

The chaotic starlight, the broken mirror, the giant of light and shadow wearing a mortal shell stood on the stairs and spoke to him in a calm voice.

“You… know?” Morris froze, then reacted. His expression turned very strange. “Ah, right… of course you don’t need me to warn you, I…”

The old man tossed his hat aside and slapped his own forehead, as if he felt he had done something stupid. He muttered: “I’m really muddle-headed, to think you wouldn’t notice an Anomaly in the city-state. Then you must also know that Vanna…”

Duncan frowned at once: “Vanna? The city-state Inquisitor who gets along so well with Heidi? What happened to her?”

“Vanna… ‘vanished’,” Morris said blankly. He had not expected that reaction from Duncan, but still spoke on instinct. Then he hurried to add: “I don’t mean she’s missing. I mean that starting today she suddenly disappeared from the Mortal Realm. Heidi forgot Vanna existed. Everyone else forgot too. Even the city-state’s newspapers…”

Duncan came quickly down the stairs. He had realized halfway through Morris’s words that the situation was serious. His face was already grave now. “Sit down and tell me slowly. Alice, go make some hot tea – you still remember how to do that, right?”

“All right, Mr. Duncan.”

Morris saw the blonde woman with the elegant, mysterious air stand up at once when she heard Duncan’s order. He also noticed that every move this “Miss Alice” made looked slightly strange. Many of her motions were very small, full of a peculiar care and restraint. It made people think of those ancient nobles with fine upbringing and long family lines, and it made him even more curious about who she was.

But his curiosity gave way to the crisis at hand.

After he sat down by the counter, he at once told the “antique shopkeeper” in front of him about the Anomaly he had noticed, and also about the difficulties and obstacles he had met on the way here.

Duncan listened with a grave face and did not interrupt Morris once. Only when the old man finished did he murmur, almost like a sigh: “Enders… they really are a troublesome lot.”

“Those madmen who exiled themselves beyond the dimension of the Mortal Realm in ancient times always jump out from the cracks in time,” Morris said in a low voice. “They work to break the continuity of history and pose a great threat to the stability of the Mortal Realm… but they rarely get a chance to stir up something this big. Under normal conditions, the protection of the Gods blocks the Enders from seeping in, and the Flamebearer keeps reinforcing the walls of history. This time those madmen must have borrowed some other power to break the blockade…”

“Old mister, your tea.” Alice came over and set the hot tea on the counter.

“Thank you,” Morris said quickly. After coming through wind and rain all the way here, he really did need a cup of hot tea to warm himself. But after he brought the cup up and took a sip, he couldn’t help it. “Pft -”

Duncan looked calm on the other side: “Just make do. At least she really found where the tea leaves are, though the amount she used is… debatable.”

Morris turned his head in shock to glance at the mysterious lady named Alice, only to see her already leaning against the stairs, lost in a daydream.

[Just who is this mysterious person?]

Duncan calmly chewed the tea leaves and confirmed one thing in his heart.

The supernatural people of this world had indeed already discovered the Enders's "nonlinear" nature, and they had countermeasures aimed at it.

But now it seemed that those countermeasures did not always work.

He closed his eyes slightly. In the darkness of his inner vision, a distant green flame suddenly leaped up at the edge of his senses.

Morris watched in curiosity as Duncan suddenly began to "rest with his eyes closed". "Mr. Duncan, you…"

"Don't worry. Vanna is still alive," Duncan opened his eyes and said calmly. "She just… lives outside Pland's city-state at this moment."

"You can confirm her location and condition?" Morris stared, stunned. He had actually come mainly to pass on news of the historical corruption. He had only mentioned Vanna's situation in passing. In his view, there should be no special connection between Duncan and that city-state Inquisitor. He had not expected the other party to have already set his sight on Vanna.

"I'm keeping an eye on her. She's a very good Inquisitor," Duncan said. He did not explain anything more, only nodded calmly and suddenly rose from behind the counter. "Excuse me for a moment."

Morris jumped up in surprise: "Where are you going?"

Duncan was already walking toward the stairs. He stopped when he heard this and looked back slightly. "To bring Vanna back – and to see what's going on over there."

Then he paused again and glanced at Morris's bedraggled state. "Do you want to go upstairs, take a hot bath, and change your clothes? I'm taller than you, but you should still be able to wear my clothes."

[Take a bath in this Subspace lair, then put on the clothes of an Eldritch God?!]

[Even the ‘Four Great Achievements of a Mad Scholar’ wouldn’t dare list those two!]

Morris felt his scalp prickle and shook his head at once: “No, no, no, that won’t be necessary. I’ll just wait here…”

“As you wish.” Duncan nodded, then walked up the stairs.

As soon as he reached the upper floor, he saw Nina and Shirley standing at the top of the stairs.

Shirley looked uneasy. When she saw Duncan, she came over at once and asked: “Mr. Duncan, did… did something happen?”

“Why do you say that?”

“We just… heard noise from downstairs,” Shirley rubbed her hands and lowered her head like she had done something wrong. “Actually it was Ah Gou who heard it. He said the Enders showed up again, and something about historical corruption, and someone named Vanna going missing? It sounds like she’s very important…”

Nina also looked over with an uneasy face. She was clearly even more confused than Shirley. “Uncle, what’s wrong?”

“…Just some small matters,” Duncan said. He looked at the two young ladies, who had vaguely sensed unrest coming and were nervous because of it. After thinking for a moment, he comforted them: “Just stay in the rooms and rest. If you’re bored, you can go down to the first floor and chat with old Mr. Morris. It’s fine.”

Shirley gave a small “oh”. Nina looked a bit hesitant. She held back for a long time, then couldn’t help stepping forward to grab Duncan’s sleeve. “Uncle, I feel… I feel a bit scared. Is it really okay? And you… what are you going to do?”

Duncan stopped and met Nina’s eyes with a quiet gaze.

Just as he had noticed before, Nina’s senses were actually very sharp. It wasn’t that she couldn’t sense anything. She was simply too sensible.

But the situation now went a bit beyond the limits of being sensible.

“Your uncle is actually a very powerful person,” Duncan suddenly smiled and put his hand on Nina’s head. “I just can’t explain it to you yet… Stay with Shirley for now. When everything is over, I’ll tell you what happened.”

Even such a simple comfort was enough to calm Nina down. She nodded obediently, her voice very soft: “…Okay.”

Nina and Shirley went downstairs.

Duncan let his expression fade, hurried back to his own room, and summoned the pigeon AI, who had been busy eating a pile of fries on the Vanished.

“We have to go find someone,” Duncan said seriously as soon as the pigeon appeared, not giving her a chance to speak. “Official business. Important business. When it’s done, the ketchup will be doubled.”

AI jumped in place at once: “My loyalty is beyond words, beyond words!”

Duncan let out a small breath, calmed his mind again, and sensed that distant, flickering flame.

That was the mark he had left on Vanna.

What had happened to Vanna was an accident for him, but that accident had also brought an unexpected gain.

Through this window that was Vanna, he had just sensed something else – those were the flames he had released earlier in Shirley’s dream!

Those flames had once appeared briefly in the small Cathedral in the Sixth District. After the Veil closed again, they vanished without a trace. He could only confirm that the flames were still spreading, but he could never pinpoint them. Yet now… he could clearly feel those flames. He felt them all around Vanna.

He still did not know how any of this had happened, but one thing was beyond doubt –

Vanna had reached the other side of the Veil.

And now this powerful Inquisitor, bearing Duncan’s mark, had become a path for Duncan to step into that Veil.

“Spirit Realm Walk.”

Chapter 203: The Veil’s Two Sides

Rain poured down in sheets. All of Pland was wrapped in an unprecedented downpour.

It was as if the sea had turned upside down and the endless deep ocean looked down on the land from the sky. It was as if the world had fallen into an abyss. Clouds black as ink hung overhead like blocks of iron. Endless rain washed over Pland’s ancient clocktowers, tall buildings, walls, and jagged coast. At the same time, wave after wave rose from the sea, as if trying to form some kind of siege, sealing the entire city-state layer by layer from all directions.

Even the dullest person could sense something eerie from this unnatural storm. citizens ran home in a panic. Doors and windows shut tight everywhere. The vagrants on the streets rushed into the nearest Sanctuary World or relief center, or at worst squeezed into a sewer entrance or a pipe relay station. At least there were gas lamps and holy steam there, enough to give the barest sense of safety on a day like this.

Heidi forced her way through the gale and rain onto the square of the great Cathedral. Perhaps the Goddess’s protection still lingered, because the rain around the Cathedral was a little lighter than elsewhere. But that lighter rain did not make Heidi relax. It only made her more worried.

The fact that the rain here was weaker than elsewhere proved that this storm really was tied to supernatural power.

The Cathedral's guards opened the main doors. Heidi jumped out of the carriage and rushed into the holy triple-spired gate. In just those few steps, she was soaked through by the icy rain.

But she had no time to care about that. The instant she stepped into the Cathedral, she felt the air around her roiling and restless. Her Spiritual Insight was warning her, telling her that an unseen conflict was spreading out from this place as its center.

A silent Monk received her. At her urgent request, the Monk went to inform Bishop Valentine, who was praying in the main hall of the sanctuary. Heidi waited in anxiety and unease for three minutes before the revered old man finally appeared before her.

She noticed that the Bishop wore the full ceremonial robes. A heavy triple crown sat squarely on his head. He held a long holy staff, and at his waist hung the Storm Canon, bound in silver and gems.

This was not clothing for an ordinary day. These were garments worn only for the most important rituals. The heavy, splendid vestments were a burden that would make even a strong adult feel tired while walking. Yet Valentine moved with steady, solemn steps. Lightning seemed to brew in his eyes, and his presence was lofty and filled with holiness. These holy things let the old man shed his Mortal identity for a moment and become a kind of symbolic vessel. He came to stand before Heidi, looking seriously at the "psychiatrist" who had braved such weather to visit the great Cathedral, and said: "Child, what has happened?"

"I… I need sanctuary. Highest-Grade Sanctuary!" Heidi answered at once. She recalled the extra serious warning her father had given before he left and spoke with great solemnity: "I need the entire Storm Cathedral on alert to protect me – to protect the child of Pland's greatest Historian."

“Pland’s greatest Historian…” Bishop Valentine gazed quietly into Heidi’s eyes. It was as if a bolt of lightning kept jumping in the old man’s pupils. Then he slowly closed his eyes and nodded softly. “I have received your request, child. The great Cathedral will provide sanctuary. You are safe.”

“Thank you, truly,” Heidi took a deep breath. She did not take her eyes off the old man. The moment she saw Valentine’s clothing, she knew that the great Cathedral had already entered a wartime state even before she arrived. “May I ask… what exactly has happened?”

“War,” Valentine said calmly. “Someone has declared war on Pland. A storm that bears no divine blessing from the Goddess has fallen upon Pland. That is the signal of war. But not until you arrived did I finally know who our enemy is.”

“War?!” Heidi stared. “Who is the enemy? Where are they?”

Valentine gazed at Heidi in silence for a long time before he spoke softly: “Pland.

“A Pland that was already wiped out in history.”

A clap of thunder boomed. The whole Cathedral seemed to shake. Heidi jumped in fright and looked up in terror at the glass windows that still rattled in the thunder’s echo and at the heavy chandelier swaying left and right overhead. In the midst of all this shaking, she suddenly felt a faint tremor – one different from the thunder.

It was the roar of many Steam Walkers gathering in the square, and the rumble of the Church Guard’s Steam Tanks driving out of their garages.

Heidi turned her head in fear and looked at Bishop Valentine, who stood before the Goddess’s statue as steady as a reef in the sea. She spoke very fast: “Is the enemy coming?!”

“The enemy is already here,” Valentine said quietly. In the noise of constant thunder, his low voice still fell clearly in Heidi’s ears. “They arrived many years ago…”

…

The greatsword slammed down with a roar. The rubble blocking the way blew aside like dust. Vanna stepped over a collapsed, slanting section of road with her sword in hand and saw the houses ahead toppling like wax figures in a fire. Hot, heavy ash covered the street like snow. Faint embers danced and scattered among the ashes and ruins. Now and then, suspicious human shapes slowly writhed in that hot gray dust. The sight was eerie and tragic, hard to look at.

Vanna forced herself not to focus too much on those writhing Ashen Humanoids.

She knew they were all citizens of Pland. They were people she had known, protected, and loved. They had died in this fire that burned down the whole city-state. Everyone in the city-state had perished, without a single survivor.

They had died in this piece of history, yet the undying flames had molded them into these horrible and pitiful phantoms.

These scenes disturbed her feelings and her judgment.

The young Inquisitor pressed her dry, pale lips together. She felt her airways being burned bit by bit in the ash-filled air and felt her strength slipping away. Once again she reminded herself –

None of this had happened, and it would not happen.

She lifted her head and looked to the end of the street.

Amid the writhing ash and leaping embers, she could sometimes see ghostly streams of green flame flash by. That was the mark left in this false history by a certain dreadful ghost captain. That ghost captain's position in this event was strange and impossible to read. Vanna could not see what the other party wanted at all. She only knew that his power had somehow slipped behind the Veil and spread through this ruined Pland, faintly opposing the power that twisted history.

At the far end of her sight lay the end of this trip, one of the targets she had set for herself in this destroyed Pland.

A small Cathedral whose main structure had remained intact in the great fire stood quietly at the end of the street.

She had already crossed half the city-state on foot to come to this small Cathedral in the Sixth District.

Strictly speaking, she had fought her way through half the city-state.

Vanna walked forward with her sword, passing over every obstacle. The doors of the small Cathedral had already collapsed. A long hall lit by lingering firelight appeared dimly before her.

The long hall no longer had warm, bright lamps. The neat, holy prayer altar was gone, and so was the young Nun who had once prayed there in peace.

Vanna stepped over the ruins and went to the side and rear of the main hall, where she found the slanted stairway leading down.

A dark wooden door stood quietly at the bottom of the stairs.

Vanna let out a light breath, easing the pain and fatigue in all her joints, then walked down the steps.

The rotary machine gun she had taken from the Walker earlier had long since broken down and been thrown away on the road. Now she held only the trusty greatsword that had been with her for many years.

She came to the door with her sword in hand and pushed it gently.

The door was locked, but only with a latch. No one was bracing it from the other side.

Vaguely, she could feel a breath of life on the other side of the door, and faint sounds came through.

Vanna tightened her grip. The flimsy lock did not last even half a second in her hands. With a sharp metallic crack, the door to the underground sanctum swung open.

A young, tense voice cried out from the other side of the door: “You can’t open the door!!”

As the voice rang out, there seemed to be another faint noise mixed within it.

“Your junior,” Vanna said as she pushed the door wider. The greatsword scraped small sparks from the floor as she stepped inside. The stubborn consecrated lantern at her waist still shone, lighting up the underground sanctum that had fallen into darkness. “Your battle-sister.”

The sanctuary was lit by the faint light.

A Nun holding a longsword stood carefully at the feet of the Goddess’s statue, watching Vanna, who had pushed the door open, with full alertness and gaze. She wore the old model of Nun’s dress from 1885, and her face was still very young.

In the year she died in battle, she had been about the same age as Vanna.

Vanna looked at the fully alert Nun opposite her and sighed softly.

As she had imagined, only within this corruption-twisted Veil could she step into this sealed underground sanctum before the Nun died in battle. The short moment before the Nun’s death was part of the historical corruption.

This small Cathedral in the Sixth District was the first point of distortion.

The young Inquisitor had finally uncovered the most critical piece of information. But… how was she supposed to report all this afterward?

“Sister?” The Nun with the longsword had gotten used to the sudden light. It seemed only now that she realized all the flames in the underground sanctum had gone out and that she had somehow ended up standing in total darkness. In the deep dark at her feet, something seemed ready to stir. She lifted her head and looked at the tall woman in the dim glow, and finally saw the marks of the Storm Church on the woman’s armor and greatsword. “Are you sent by the great Cathedral? Leave at once! The corruption here is already in a runaway state. While I still…”

Vanna shook her head and walked forward slowly: “I’m here to help you.”

Chapter 204: teleported Out of the Volume

“I’ll help you.”

“Help me?” The young nun frowned in confusion when she heard Vanna’s words. Only then did she suddenly notice some details on the other woman’s equipment.

That really was the Storm Church’s gear and insignia, but it wasn’t any style she knew. She had never heard of any high-ranking female priest in the Church who fought with such an outrageous greatsword. The greatsword was clearly custom-made and absolutely not something an ordinary Guardian could wield.

The “battle sister” in front of her looked as young as she was, yet was anomalously tall. She came from a time the nun did not know.

The young nun was silent for a few seconds, then suddenly spoke calmly: “…Where did you come from?”

“The year 1900.”

“I died in battle today, didn’t I?”

“Yes.” Vanna stepped forward calmly. “It seems you already know what happened.”

“The Enders. I don’t know how they did it, but they opened a Subspace rift inside the cathedral. I sent an alarm outward and received no response…”

They had opened a Subspace rift in the God’s own sanctuary?!

Vanna’s heart jolted. This unheard-of situation sent a fresh surge of confusion through her. Then she heard the young nun speak softly again: “Did I succeed today?”

“…At least this invasion, you stopped.” Vanna raised her head, her gaze meeting the nun’s eyes. “You sealed your own death and their incursion together in the year 1885.”

“Oh, that’s good.” The nun let out a breath and slowly raised the longsword in her hand. At the same time, a low, rustling sound came from the nearby darkness. It sounded as if some wet, sticky limbs were crawling across the floor, as if something were swimming up out of a pool of thick liquid. The naked eye still could not see its shape, but it had indeed begun to step into this Mortal Realm. “Then the rest is simple.”

Vanna also lifted her greatsword slightly. “This is my specialty.”

“By the way,” the nun suddenly turned her head and asked, “are you all prepared on ‘the other side’?”

“…We never received the alarm you sent, so we haven’t made any extra preparations,” Vanna said calmly, letting her breathing slowly settle into its best rhythm. “But… Guardians are always prepared.”

A roar came from the depths of the darkness. The crawling thing from Subspace finally condensed its malicious projection within this sealed-off span of time.

The consecrated lantern at Vanna’s waist reacted at once, crackling into a sudden blaze. Its bright flame almost leaped out of the glass, as if it meant to burn through all its fuel in mere minutes. The longsword and greatsword hummed and shook, and in the ringing of metal there was even the sound of wind and thunder.

Vanna finally saw the shape of that shadow. It looked like a mass of formless slime. In the middle of the slime, the young nun's figure kept writhing into view, while along its edges deformed, shifting hands and feet grew from the ends of its many tentacles. The blasphemous thing seemed to be clumsily imitating the shape of humans, but because it could not understand the rules of the Mortal Realm, it could only spawn heaps of disgusting, horrifying limbs— and it was crawling this way at great speed!

"This time I'll leave it to you, sister."

The young nun's voice sounded from beside her. The moment the crawling thing appeared, she lowered the longsword in her hand and drew a silver dagger covered in intricate patterns from her side. She glanced at the monster rushing toward them, gave Vanna one last instruction, and then calmly drove the dagger into her own chest.

The instant the nun's heart stopped, the crawling monster also reeled as if heavily wounded. Dozens of mouths of all sizes appeared suddenly across its shifting surface. A chorus of shrill, jarring screams poured out from every single mouth!

Vanna heard the sound of the nun collapsing behind her, but she did not turn her head. She strode straight toward that mass of "slime" projected from Subspace. As she raised her greatsword, she wore an unusually solemn, calm expression and whispered a benediction: "Please bear witness…"

The battle ended.

It ended even faster than wiping out the leftover of a Sunspawn.

At this node in time, what appeared in the underground sanctum was only a projection that had slipped into the Mortal Realm through the hollow in a low-level cleric's soul. Even though it came from Subspace, the "passage" limited it, so it did not have much power. The only problem was that, in this sealed-off span of time, that projection was forever born together with the nun and never left her side.

Now, this hateful cycle seemed at last to have ended.

Vanna watched the “slime” on the floor slowly fade away and let out a soft breath. She turned and went back to the side of the young nun who had already died. She knelt on one knee and lowered her gaze. “Thank you for your noble sacrifice.”

The next second, she saw the nun’s body suddenly start to fade as well, vanishing into thin air like a phantom from yesterday.

Right after that, the door of the underground sanctum slammed shut with a bang. Sword cuts and bullet marks suddenly appeared all over the surrounding walls and floor. Hollow roars echoed out from empty air. Then she saw bloodstains appear on the floor out of nowhere and slowly creep toward the closed door…

The hateful cycle continued. Everything that had once happened in the underground sanctum began to run again as it always had. The interference of this outsider had only made a ripple in fixed history, and that ripple was smoothed out almost at once.

“How can this be…” Vanna got to her feet in shock, staring in disbelief at the marks that had appeared out of nowhere in the underground sanctum. “This is just a piece of history corrupted by—”

Before she could finish, a flicker of ghostly green light flashed in the corner of her eye. A heartbeat later, that tiny flame swelled into a huge vortex, into a standing doorway. A tall, imposing figure emerged from the fire and stepped out.

She heard that tall figure speak to her:

“Because the corruption runs deep, and the culprits have already sensed your awakening and resistance. Simply destroying one Subspace intruder is no longer enough to correct this chain of dislocated histories. Vanna, the source of corruption is no longer this little cathedral, but the entire city-state.”

“…Captain Duncan!” Vanna’s eyes widened at once. When she saw the green flames spreading, she had already known that this ghost captain’s power had pushed into “this side”, but she had not expected him to appear here in person, right inside the underground sanctum. She tightened her grip on her greatsword on instinct and almost leapt in with a jump slash purely by reflex, but at the last moment she forced down the impulse. She only stared at the figure in front of her with sharp vigilance, trying to guess whether this was his real body or just an illusion projected into her sight. “What are you trying to do?!”

“Take you back to the Mortal Realm.” Duncan looked at her calmly. “I even thought you would greet me with a jump slash like last time.”

“…I know that kind of attack is useless against you. Whatever shows up in front of me can’t be your real body.” Vanna’s muscles all settled into their best state. “You said you’ll take me back to the Mortal Realm. What do you mean?”

“Is that so hard to understand? Do you not need help right now?” Duncan raised an eyebrow. “Or do you have your own way to walk out of the Veil? Just charge straight through the whole city-state?”

The corner of Vanna’s eye twitched despite herself. She watched this ghost captain with deep suspicion.

What did this dangerous calamity of the sea really want to do?

But Duncan had no intention of explaining anything to her. He simply lifted his right hand, and a cluster of leaping green fire appeared at his fingertips.

Vanna started in alarm, raising her greatsword and stepping back half a pace. “What are you trying to do?!”

“Send you back to the Mortal Realm, what else?” Duncan said casually. “I’ve never done it this way before, though, so we’ll have to test whether it actually works. If it works, you go back. If it doesn’t… we’ll think of something else.”

“…Test it?” Vanna stared in disbelief at the infamous ghost captain in front of her. For some reason, everything he was doing felt completely unlike the records she had read. But as she watched the fire in his hand spread larger and larger, all her doubts gave way at once to pure wariness and resistance. “Stop, or I’ll—”

“The battle in the Mortal Realm has already begun, Vanna. The storm is ravaging the city-state. Your real enemies are awake.” Duncan suddenly cut off the young Inquisitor. He locked eyes with Vanna, his tone low and solemn. “The battlefield out there needs you more than you being here alone— either come touch this fire yourself, or I’ll move first.”

Vanna stared hard at the fire in Duncan’s hand and did not take a single step.

Honestly, even if she hadn’t known who Duncan was, no normal person would reach out to touch such a sinister-looking thing.

Of course Duncan knew that too. He had only been polite in giving Vanna the choice.

While the young woman was still fully focused, a strand of dimly burning fire spread out from beneath his feet. The next second, a great wall of flame sprang up in front of Vanna and then swept down over her like a crashing wave!

Every hair on Vanna's body stood on end. Her eyes flew wide. The next instant she swung up her greatsword and leaped high with a roar. "Here—"

The wall of fire swept across, and the young Inquisitor's figure vanished into the blaze.

On the deck of the Vanished, a mass of ghostly green flame flared briefly, then vanished at once.

In the rain-lashed streets of the city-state of Pland, a tall figure suddenly appeared out of midair, roaring as she swung her sword down: "—tic!"

A trash bin was cleaved clean in two by Vanna's jump slash, and the strike left a gouged trail of compressed air more than ten meters long across the ground.

Vanna lifted her head in shock, staring blankly at this world of pouring rain and cold wind.

Chapter 205: Acceleration

Morris sat on the first floor of the antique shop, tense as he waited for time to pass.

Outside, the downpour still raged and the cold wind howled. After being blocked and muffled by doors and windows, the sound of wind and rain turned into a strange, unsettling wail, like waves crashing against a lone island in a storm, beating again and again from every direction. Beyond the shop window, he could no longer see the view on the opposite side of the street.

Nina and Shirley had also come downstairs. The two girls ran to the windows, nervously watching the wind and rain outside and whispering to each other from time to time.

The mysterious young woman called “Alice”, however, seemed to feel none of this tension. She too gazed out the window, but her eyes held only curiosity and delight— a kind of delight Morris simply could not understand.

“The scenery in the city-state is really interesting,” Alice suddenly spoke. Her abrupt voice carried a strange charm and cut right through the sounds of wind and rain. “But you all look so nervous… is this very scary?”

“Miss Alice, you’re not scared?” Nina turned her head at the sound and asked curiously.

“Not at all. It’s fun.” Alice smiled and shook her head slightly with a reserved air. “And Mr. Duncan will solve every problem.”

“Miss Alice, do you know what’s actually happening?” Nina bit her lip and asked bravely. She looked into Alice’s eyes, at this beautiful lady who had somehow met her uncle at some point, who seemed to be on very good terms with him, yet whom Nina had never seen before. “You seem… to really trust Uncle Duncan?”

“I trust him very much,” Alice answered as if it were obvious. “I don’t know what exactly is going on, but Mr. Duncan will take care of it in the end anyway.”

Her overly calm and straightforward attitude actually left Nina speechless for a moment, unsure how to keep the conversation going. Just then, an especially loud clap of thunder exploded right outside the window. The sudden boom startled everyone and cut off all talk in the shop.

Shirley and Nina instinctively covered their ears and hunched their shoulders. After a brief daze, however, Morris seemed to sense something. He suddenly lifted his head and looked toward the window.

“Vanna has returned…”

The old man murmured to himself, then repeated it again, this time in a louder voice: “Vanna has returned!”

“You mean that Inquisitor?” Shirley turned her head in surprise when she heard Morris suddenly shouting. “What about that Inquisitor? What’s this about her ‘coming back’?”

Morris didn’t answer her, because he didn’t know how to explain it either. He just let out a long breath. Even though it was only the jumbled, fractured memories in his mind suddenly pulling together on their own, it felt to him as if he had seen a ray of sunlight on this stormy day. His whole body relaxed.

The old man reached out and took the teacup beside him.

In that moment, even the hard-to-swallow tea in the cup seemed to taste… a little better.

……

The wall of ghostly green fire faded away. The dim underground sanctum returned to its earlier state, leaving only one last flicker of flame floating quietly beside Duncan so he could see this place in the dark.

Vanna had already left “this side” and now reached the other side of the Veil.

Like a bright beacon, she clearly traced out the path that pierced through the Veil for Duncan. He could feel how she had left this place— and he could confirm that his guess was correct.

He let out a soft breath and looked up at the spot where Vanna had last stood.

“…To be fair, that jump slash really is frightening.”

He muttered under his breath and then turned to walk toward the entrance of the underground sanctum, stopping near the tightly closed door.

The door had closed again. A battered body was slumped on the floor, leaning against it. She pressed her whole weight against the door, a longsword clenched in her hands, and sword marks and bloodstains covered the floor around her.

Among the crisscrossing sword marks, the numbers “1885”, carved by the nun with her last strength, could still be made out.

The cycle turned as always, over and over.

History here had already solidified. Vanna’s intervention had not stopped the closed loop of time from continuing. She was indeed powerful, but she still lacked the power to interfere with the flow of time itself.

Duncan stood quietly beside the nun for a moment, then slowly reached out his hand. Just then, the nun's body twitched. She slowly lifted her head. Her weak eyes forced themselves open as she looked with curious, confused gaze at the uninvited guest before her.

"…Oh. Just as I thought, you still weren't dead at the moment you braced the door." Duncan met the nun's gaze, his tone calm. "Is there anything you want to say?"

"…I had a brief dream. I dreamed that a battle sister appeared here. She tried to let me rest within this cycle, but she failed," the nun said softly. "… She really came, didn't she?"

"She did everything she could, but this isn't the field she's best at. Now she's gone back to her own battlefield." Duncan bent down and laid his hand gently on the blade of the nun's longsword. A tiny blossom of ghostly green flame danced at his fingertips, flowing along the edge of the sword like water. "I'll take over the rest."

"…Are you also a Guardian of the city-state?" The nun no longer seemed to have the strength to fully open her eyes. Her eyelids drooped as she mumbled softly in a half-dreaming voice. "I've never seen you before…"

"I'm not," Duncan shook his head slightly. "But I can be, for now."

But the nun seemed no longer able to hear his voice. Her eyes closed completely, as if she were slowly stepping into a dream. In the last moment before eternal sleep fell, her lips moved and she whispered: "…Please bear witness…"

"I bear witness."

The ghostly green flame rose into the air. With Duncan's words, it suddenly swept over everything in his sight. The nun, her longsword, and all the blood around them all turned to ash in the fire. Under his conscious control, every trace of extraordinary power in this place was stripped away by this burning.

When the flames burned out, they consumed not only a single body, but the entire closed time loop. In the dim underground sanctum, only a few tiny sparks still danced on the floor, flowing along the sword marks like a trickling stream and, before they faded at last, burning away the numbers “1885”.

Duncan waited quietly for it all to end before he finally shook his head with a soft sigh. Then he stepped forward and pulled open the door that led from the underground sanctum to the small cathedral above.

For the first time since 1885, this door was opened from inside the underground sanctum.

Duncan climbed the steps, walked up the long staircase, and reached the ground-level part of the small cathedral. He passed through the collapsed, ruined main hall, past row after row of abandoned pews and the ashes covering the floor, and made his way toward the street outside.

Ghostly green flames appeared like phantoms, gathering in the air around him and spreading and burning outward with his steps. The Spirit Fire that had already been spreading within the Veil sensed its master drawing near. One by one, those flames resonated with him, converging and beginning to roar to life throughout the small cathedral.

By the time Duncan walked out through the main doors and looked back at the small cathedral, the entire building was already wrapped in a sweeping blaze of Spirit Fire.

Farther out in his sight, in every corner of the surrounding blocks, in nearby districts, and even on the far edge of the city-state, cluster after cluster of Spirit Fire also began to leap, spread, and blaze up. They turned into Sacred beacon Torches of all sizes and slowly linked together into a continuous sea.

All of them were Spirit Fire that had suddenly shifted into “active” state after sensing that Duncan had entered the inner side of the Veil.

Without anyone noticing, they had already spread across such a vast range.

And as these flames rose, Duncan also felt something else waking within the city-state. Roars rose one after another. Ash and dust in the streets and alleys squirmed and heaved. Crimson fire leaped up in many places, looking fierce and violent.

Duncan lifted his head and looked toward somewhere deep within the city-state. “Only getting nervous now? That may be a little late.”

……

On the Vanished, Duncan pushed open the door of the captain’s cabin. He strode to the chart table, braced his hands on it, and looked down at the enchanted sea chart. His voice was low. “How far are we from the city-state?”

“Oh, great captain, less than two days’ sailing remains,” Goathead’s eager voice sounded at once. “In theory, we might now run into merchant ships or navy patrol craft running the route to and from the city-state…”

Duncan listened to Goathead’s rambling without interrupting, calculating something silently. Then he suddenly straightened, left the chart table, and pushed open the cabin door to go outside.

Goathead’s surprised voice came from behind him. “Ah, captain, what are you going to do?”

Duncan was already striding out of the cabin. He crossed the aft deck, went up the stairway, and came to the platform above the captain’s quarters. He answered offhandedly in his mind, “From here on, I’ll take the helm myself.”

“…Yes, captain!”

Goathead’s response rang out clearly. The next second, Duncan felt the whole hull of the Vanished tremble slightly. In his senses, the ship suddenly seemed to come “alive”. Every living part of it seemed to perk up.

And when he gripped the wheel, the ship that had long been ready slipped at once into peak condition. Its translucent spirit form sails billowed even fuller. Taut lines thrummed in the air. The hull murmured in a low voice under the slap of the waves. The sea around the ship seemed to fall under an unseen pull as wave after wave rose, as if to push the ship forward.

The Vanished’s speed rose sharply.

Feeling the distance between himself and the body in the antique shop shrinking bit by bit, Duncan let out a quiet breath.

But suddenly, a strange feeling rose again from the depths of his heart.

It was a subtle sense of being noticed from afar, of being regarded as a “target”.

It felt as if, the instant he took the helm, something suddenly sensed the ship’s existence and was now sailing straight toward them.

Duncan frowned and looked in the direction that subtle feeling came from. Almost at the same moment, he heard Goathead’s voice sound in his mind:

“Captain, the Sea Mist has appeared near us.”

Chapter 206: Encounter

A towering-bowed ironclad warship sailed across the vast gray sea. A thin, drifting, icy fog rolled around her within a range of several hundred meters. The mist looked like the curse that coiled around the Sea Mist in the frozen northern waters. Even though this place lay in the relatively warm Central Seas, the chill inside the fog still did not disperse.

On the ironclad warship's deck, six triple-mounted giant main guns and dozens of secondary guns already stood ready for battle. Undying seamen wreathed in cold air hurried back and forth between the various installations, preparing for the fight that could break out at any moment.

Below the deck, the ammunition shaft lift rattled as it ran, sending propellant charges and shells up into the turrets' transfer chambers. More seamen stood at pipe junctions all over the ship, checking the flow and pressure of Divine Steam and lubricating oils being fed through every part of the hull.

At the stern, a small Cathedral had fired up its independent boiler. Steam pipes on top of the Cathedral spat out thick clouds into the sky. As the Cathedral's whistle blared, incense-laced vapor mixed with the steam and slowly spread, its scent drifting over the entire deck.

An Undying priest in a somber robe stood in the Cathedral's prayer room, solemnly lighting incense and candles before the Goddess's holy statue. His skin looked withered and pale. One side of his skull was sunken, and the corresponding half of his body remained wet and clammy, as if it had just been soaked in seawater. In his eyes, the clouded white pupils seemed to forever brew two dark storm clouds, and within them faintly flickered the candle-flames jumping before the Goddess's effigy.

In front of the priest stood the statue of the storm Goddess Gamona. The Goddess sheltered every ship on the Boundless Sea, even if that ship was crewed by the dead. The statue's base rested atop a huge pipe. Countless thinner pipes spread out from the base like blood vessels, branching into every part of the Cathedral. The lower half of the main pipe plunged deep into the hull, piercing deck after deck all the way down to the ballast tanks —the darkest, coldest compartment, directly connected to the Boundless Sea.

A fully equipped shipboard Cathedral, its own boiler, and a network of Divine Steam pipes running through every deck had, since the naval technological revolution of 1835, become standard equipment for any warship expected to fight and cruise long-term on the Boundless Sea. These systems could effectively prevent a ship from falling into mental corruption under high pressure, harsh conditions, and constant casualties, and keep a crew from suffering collective breakdown and being seized by Subspace.

From a certain point of view, the beginning of that great revolution in 1835 could even be traced back thirty-five years, to the "Vanished Incident" of 1800. The most advanced exploration ship in human history, with the finest explorer at her helm, had sailed for a long voyage and then plunged straight into Subspace. That disaster shook everyone who cared about the art of navigation.

The priest drew back his gaze from the statue, but he could not stop his thoughts from circling around the Vanished, and around this shipborne Cathedral before him.

His cold, numbed brain and the heart that had not beaten for half a century both grew restless at the thought of what was about to happen.

“May you shelter us,” the priest lowered his head and devoutly gave benediction to the Goddess, “we are about to face the Shadows of Subspace head-on. Please bear witness…”

The electric bell beside him suddenly rang, and a small lamp on the communication console began to flash.

The priest walked to the console and opened the brass speaking tube linked to that lamp: “This is the Cathedral… yes, oil and steam are ready, and the divine blessing has arrived.”

On the bridge, Tyrian Abnomar, captain of the Sea Mist, stood quietly at the captain’s station, staring out at the seemingly calm sea.

His eye sockets ached slightly. Low, maddening whispers echoed in his mind. At his side sat a delicately built brass device. The machine was a tangle of interlocking gears, several finely crafted spirit compasses, and multiple curved tracks. At its center, three copper pillars held up a small hemispherical bowl.

The bowl was filled to about one-third with fresh blood. The blood rolled and bubbled as if it were boiling. The brass device quivered as it constantly fine-tuned the positions of its gears and spirit compasses. Several pointers all pointed toward a distant spot on the horizon.

First Mate Aiden walked over and nodded to Tyrian: “Captain, all stations are ready. The Cathedral just sent word—our Goddess has bestowed the divine blessing.”

“…the Vanished is right in front of us,” Tyrian said softly, almost to himself. He glanced at the brass device beside him. “I think ‘he’ must have sensed me too.”

Aiden’s gaze also fell on the device, especially on the boiling blood in the bowl.

The pale, bald man spoke in his deep voice: “The blood-seeking spirit compass leads blood relatives together, but it has never brought good fortune or happy reunions… it only points toward slaughter and misery.”

“Which matches our situation perfectly,” Tyrian replied lightly. At the edge of his vision, a faint black speck already seemed to appear on the horizon. “It really is here—and heading straight for Pland.”

“We can open fire,” the First Mate could not help but remind him. “We actually could have started already.”

“…No. Keep closing in. We must get into point-blank range,” Tyrian shook his head. “We already tried once, fifty years ago. Shells fired from too far away will never land on the Vanished. That ship is under some kind of spacetime distortion. There is a gap and misalignment between it and the Mortal Realm’s dimension.”

Aiden lowered his head: “…Understood. The Sea Mist will keep moving forward.”

…

Duncan lowered the monocular in his hand and hung it back at his waist. Then he tightened his grip on the wheel.

He had seen that ship.

The Sea Mist—her name fit her well. A thin layer of frozen mist coiled around the hull. At a glance, it was clearly not a normal phenomenon.

But what truly surprised him was not that extraordinary-looking mist, but the ship herself—

She was an ironclad warship that looked extremely advanced: thick armor, tall smokestacks, a well-proportioned, imposing bridge structure, and modern multi-gun turrets that reminded him of a battleship’s main guns.

No matter how he looked at it, this ship did not seem like something from a century ago. Even as a refit, he could not imagine how you would turn an old sailing warship into this.

That made him think of the rumors he had heard in various city-states about the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star.

Like how Tyrian's warship devoured metal and wreckage on the seabed, then secretly grew and refitted itself at midnight when no gaze fell upon it.

Looking at the ship now, those rumors did not seem so baseless. It was like trying to explain why a Type-59 tank suddenly made a faster-than-light jump. In the end you could only say that the Machine Spirit was in a very good mood…

Duncan shook his head, tossing those stray thoughts aside for the moment.

The Sea Mist had no intention of backing down, and clearly stood ready for battle. The Vanished also had no time to circle around. A head-on clash seemed impossible to avoid.

He did not really understand naval warfare, but in theory he did not need to worry about the fighting—the Vanished's guns could handle everything on their own.

He just felt… stunned. Stunned, and a little nervous, with a strange hint of expectation mixed in.

Tyrian Abnomar, captain of the Sea Mist, one of Captain Duncan's children.

In theory, Duncan's current identity made him that pirate lord's father.

He had never imagined he would meet the Sea Mist like this… Wasn't that ship supposed to be staying in the Frost Sea? Shouldn't it be busy raiding, pillaging, and collecting protection money in that frozen region? What was it doing here?

Tyrian coming to visit Dad? A loving father and filial son reunion?

That was impossible, just thinking about it.

Captain Duncan's story sounded more and more like the start of a family disaster.

"Captain," Goathead's voice suddenly sounded, and he actually sounded… excited. "The Sea Mist is shifting into firing posture. Should we adjust our heading?"

Adjusting heading meant trying to avoid the enemy's first direct salvo, entering battle with the smallest possible profile while swinging as many of their own guns into firing arcs as they could. Goathead had clearly prepared for a full-scale gun duel.

Duncan raised an eyebrow: "You sound almost eager."

"The Sea Mist is a fine opponent. First, it can't beat us. Second, it actually dares to fight us," Goathead said with obvious delight. "And third, it's very tough—it's packed full of living dead, and even the hull has picked up a bit of that 'deathless and unsinkable' trait. If the Vanished wants to stretch her limbs, there's no better target."

"…So in short, the child can take a beating, right?" Duncan said casually. Just then, out of the corner of his eye, he noticed several clouds forming above the distant sea and slowly spreading around the Sea Mist.

A little while later, he finally heard the sharp whistling from high in the sky, carrying a powerful force straight toward the Vanished's position.

The Sea Mist had fired first. As a technically more advanced ironclad warship, she had the advantage in range. Even delaying until they entered near range, she could still launch her attack before the Vanished.

Duncan tensed. He watched as huge water columns rose one after another around the Vanished. Each blast from those battleship-grade main guns had terrifying power. The towering plumes even made the Vanished’s massive hull shudder slightly.

But not a single shell hit the Vanished. The Sea Mist’s first salvo missed entirely.

Duncan watched the water columns fall back down one by one and thought about it. This was probably normal in naval combat. Without guided weapons and modern fire-control computers, the hit rate of naval guns would be about this level.

Chapter 207: A Loving Father and Filial Son

The encounter had begun.

The battle opened with the Sea Mist's first salvo. Thunderous booms shattered the calm over the whole sea. Shells howled through the air and plunged into the water at the ends of their arcs, throwing up towering columns and chaotic waves.

The first salvo missed completely. The second salvo missed completely. Only with the third barrage did the Sea Mist's shells finally scrape past the Vanished's side.

Spectral spirit form flames blazed between every seam and mast on the Vanished. Duncan gripped the wheel, driving the massive ghost ship forward like a moving mountain of fire. Her towering bow cleaved the waves, sending up rows of white foam and ripples along both sides. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw a black shape streak toward the aft deck.

It was a shell from the Sea Mist. After missing several times in a row, the ironclad warship finally seemed to have corrected her aim. One projectile came screaming in, heading straight for the rear half of the Vanished. This time, there was no way to dodge.

Those dramatic "twist the wheel to dodge the shell" moves did not happen in the Mortal Realm. When the Vanished sailed in the Mortal Realm, her huge hull still had to follow the basic laws of physics… probably.

The ship was about to be hit.

But in the next instant, Duncan suddenly felt his vision sharpen to a painful clarity. He could track the shell's entire path as it tilted slightly and fell toward them. He saw the distorted heat waves around it, the air driven aside by the shock, the red-hot tip of the shell, and even the faint grooves etched into its body—he cast his gaze upon that burning steel, and the steel responded to his call.

The moment before it struck the Vanished, the shell from the Sea Mist suddenly flared with a ghostly fire. It was as if the spirit form flames around the Vanished had instantly infected and assimilated it. The shell quietly turned into a streak of green light and dropped in a slow, uncanny arc into the sea of fire above the Vanished.

The shell, wrapped in eerie green flames, crashed onto the deck with a heavy thud. The whole ship shuddered—yet there was no extra damage at all.

"A beautiful catch!" Goathead's voice suddenly rang in Duncan's mind, snapping him back to himself. "Captain, how did you do that?!"

"…Reflex. I didn't really think," Duncan answered offhandedly. At the same time, more howls came screaming across the sky toward them.

He tensed again, controlling the Vanished's giant hull to make small course adjustments while his gaze tracked the dark shapes dropping from above. A second later, one green "meteor" after another suddenly appeared in the sky above the blazing hull of the Vanished.

But Duncan's ability to "catch" shells was not limitless. As the distance between the Vanished and the Sea Mist shrank, the ironclad's barrage grew more accurate and more ferocious. Her many secondary and close-in guns finally entered effective range as well. When the sky filled with falling shells, some finally slipped past Duncan’s eyes and slammed into the Vanished’s hull.

Amid the constant thunder of explosions, Duncan saw a section of the nearby bulwark suddenly take a hit. A dark shape tore through the planks, ripping them apart before plunging into the sea. The impact blasted that part of the railing into countless fragments—

The shattered pieces flew outward and up, shooting into the air. Then they simply stopped. They hung there, frozen in place, maintaining the same motion as the Vanished herself.

It was an impossibly strange sight. It was as if the sections of hull that had been smashed apart in the Mortal Realm still formed one whole ship in some higher dimension. They only looked shattered to the eye, but the fragments were still tightly bound together.

This instantly made Duncan think of the hull below the waterline, of those broken yet fully functional bulkheads that soaked and sailed in Subspace.

The next second, he saw the fragments slowly fall and drift back. In a rush, they reassembled, the restoration looking like time itself had reversed to an earlier moment.

Duncan finally pulled his gaze away from the bulwark.

It was his first time seeing the Vanished take damage, and also the first time he had seen her repair herself. The ship could heal with incredible speed. The “healing” looked exactly like rewinding the hull to its state before the damage.

Now he understood why a seemingly far more advanced and heavily armed ironclad warship like the Sea Mist still could not win against a ghost ship from a century ago.

Subspace had completely rebuilt the Vanished, placing the whole ship inside a bizarre spacetime structure. In the Mortal Realm, it was simply impossible to destroy her with ordinary firepower.

Goathead's voice echoed in his mind, smug and pleased: "Captain, the Vanished is the best ship in the world, right?"

"…To be fair, she really is."

"So what's your plan next?"

Duncan lifted his head and cast his gaze at the rapidly approaching Sea Mist: "…We beat the child while we're on the way. We've got time to kill anyway, don't we?"

…

"Captain! That ship is charging straight at us!" First Mate Aiden's voice rang out on the bridge, with a trace of tension in it. "Something's wrong… our fire is doing even less than it did in that rushed battle fifty years ago. More than half our shells are just vanishing into the flames around the Vanished!"

"I can see it," Tyrian stood rigid on the bridge, his eyes locked on the ghost ship that was speeding toward them and already edging into a slight turn. His hands gripped the rail in front of him. His face was as dark as a coming storm. "In half a century, 'he' has grown even stronger than before…"

"Then are we still fighting?" Aiden shouted. "At this rate, I don't think we can drive that ship back into Subspace like last time! And I feel like your father must be really angry right now… the speed of that ship is damnably unnatural!"

Tyrian only stared grimly ahead. After a few seconds of silence, he finally spoke in a deep voice: "…We continue the engagement."

As he said those words, his gaze stayed fixed on the burning, gigantic sailing warship—on her stern deck in particular.

He knew that was where the Vanished's wheel stood. In his distant and yellowed memories, his Father had always stood there.

Was he standing there now? Was he casting his gaze at the Sea Mist?

Thick smoke rose from the sea's surface, and a distant rumble drifted faintly over the waves.

"The Vanished has opened fire!"

A sailor shouted in alarm.

Tyrian stood firm at the captain's station, like an iceberg rooted in the Frost Sea. But he frowned.

The Vanished had not turned fully to present the best broadside angle. Instead, she cut into the Sea Mist's path along a slightly oblique arc and opened fire while still maneuvering.

That meant only about a quarter of her broadside guns could fire effectively.

Was she just returning fire symbolically? Did she have no intention of fighting the Sea Mist to the bitter end?

That was not Father's style, and it did not match the battle from fifty years ago. In that encounter, the Vanished had fought the Sea Mist to the very last moment, and both ships had been left in ruins.

That battle ended with the Vanished's healing reaching its limit, forcing her to retreat to Subspace for a time, while the Sea Mist nearly sank and spent three full years before she appeared again on the Boundless Sea.

But Tyrian had no time to keep thinking.

The Vanished’s counterattack arrived. Unlike the Sea Mist’s first and second salvos, which had all missed, every shot from the ghost ship after entering effective range hit with chilling precision.

More than a dozen blazing green fireballs streaked through the air and slammed into the ironclad warship’s hull. In an instant, the world exploded with sound. Spirit flames boiled.

Layers of radiance floated up around the Sea Mist. The shipborne Cathedral and various sacred relics activated on their own, trying to block the spreading corruption. But even so, the ironclad’s hull was riddled with horrific cavities in a heartbeat. The burning cast-iron cannonballs were like clumps of fire landing in snow. Anything that touched those flames, whether wood or steel, melted away and vanished in an instant.

No armor mattered anymore. The Vanished’s attacks did not rely on kinetic force or explosions. They worked through higher-dimensional devouring and transfer. Under the continuing rain of shells, the Sea Mist became like a pencil drawing under an eraser. The falling projectiles “rubbed out” more and more of her. The first volley erased half her main guns. After the second, several gaping holes appeared in her sides—enough to sink any ordinary ship.

The Sea Mist’s attack faltered to a stop. Even her propulsion was more than half crippled at once.

Tyrian’s eyes widened.

Something was wrong… completely wrong. This was nothing like last time.

He did not recognize this ship. This was not the Vanished from his memories.

And in that stunned moment, he noticed that the Vanished had suddenly ceased fire.

The ghost ship swelled with wind. Every sail billowed. She dragged up a wall of waves as her speed surged to the limit, and she charged straight at the Sea Mist.

“…Hard to port! Dodge her! Dodge!”

First Mate Aiden roared. The helmsman was already straining at the wheel, trying to turn the warship aside to avoid the imminent collision—but all their efforts failed.

“The helm isn’t responding!” the helmsman cried in panic. “It’s turning on its own! We’re steering right into them!”

Just as the helmsman said, the Sea Mist was steering herself toward the ghost ship.

Tyrian had already sensed the anomaly. He heard the machinery under his feet screaming in protest. He heard every window around them click and rattle. He saw the remaining turrets on deck droop their barrels one after another. In the great hollows blasted into the hull, emerald flame surged higher and higher.

This was a nightmare that had not appeared even in that brutal battle fifty years ago—

The Sea Mist had recognized her flagship.

Chapter 208: A Single Exchange After a Century Apart

Over the vast Boundless Sea, two warships that each carried the curse sailed straight toward one another. Around the two great ships, the sea had been stirred into restless turmoil by invisible forces, and even the sky within a wide range had changed.

Around the Sea Mist, the cold fog spread outward. Floes of ice of all sizes began to appear out of thin air on the surface, even forming ice fields that covered several nautical miles. They slowly turned like a whirlpool. The sea that had been fairly calm now rose in heavy, surging waves, each one stronger than the last, with chaotic cold winds howling between them.

The Vanished, wrapped layer upon layer in ghostly green flame, cut through all these extreme weather signs like a blazing spear. It drove straight toward the Ironclad Warship at the center of the ice field.

The Sea Mist also sped up. Every engine howled like a dying beast. The rudder turned on its own with no one at the helm. The steam whistle of the Cathedral carried on the ship never stopped. That sacred sound now rang out like a Death Knell.

Undying sailors stood on the deck, at the gun positions, and behind every porthole. They watched, eyes wide open, as the warship under their feet charged straight toward the burning ghost ship.

On the bridge, Tyrian could already faintly see the figure on the high stern of the Vanished.

He saw that tall man gripping the wheel, standing on the ship like a reef in a storm. The man looked at Tyrian with a cold, gaze.

He looked so much like the figure in Tyrian’s memory.

Then, as expected, the two ships “collided”.

The imagined destructive impact and breaking apart did not come.

In the next minute, the crew members of the Sea Mist were lucky enough to witness the same kind of terrifying, strange “spectacle” that the White Oak had once encountered. The burning ghost ship rolled over them like a mountain. Ghostly flames surged higher and higher. In those flames, the boundaries of all things blurred.

The Sea Mist turned into a spirit form. The crew members also turned into spirit forms. It looked as if one phantom had crashed straight into another.

First Mate Aiden stared in horror. He saw the bow and masts of the Vanished rush straight toward him, then pass right through him without leaving a scratch. For a brief moment, he broke into one of the Vanished’s cabins. He saw ancient pillars and burning consecrated lanterns roar past, so close they almost brushed his ears.

At the very end, he saw the high deck at the stern of the Vanished, and the tall figure standing behind the wheel.

Tyrian instinctively stepped back half a pace. But in the next second, he straightened his back again, as if his father’s teachings from childhood still rang in his ears.

“Do not back down. Do not bow to the wind and waves.”

So he lifted his head and faced the storm in front of him—faced the father who had been taken away by Subspace and then returned to the Mortal Realm.

