“…Perhaps it was Father’s doing,” Tyrian said in a low voice, his expression grave. “Don’t dig into it. Keep fighting. Also notify all friendly forces, including the Frostholm Navy, not to block that strange… forget it. At that speed, I doubt they could anyway…”

Before he finished, the seaman monitoring the radio suddenly received a message. The man stood up and reported loudly: “Captain! The Frostholm Navy cruiser Sea Hawk just sent word. A ghost ship of strange shape and incredible speed just shot past their bow, heading straight for Frostholm Island. They’re asking if it is ours.”

Tyrian pressed his fingers hard against his brow, then waved his hand after a moment. “We can’t mention anything about the Vanished to them. Just say it’s a friendly ship and give no further explanation. Once the battle settles a little, I’ll go ask ‘him’ myself.”

“Yes, Captain!”

The cannons kept roaring. The fire and explosions in the fog did not quiet at all because of this brief interlude. Between the towering columns of water rising in the distance, Tyrian’s thoughtful gaze pierced the mist over the battlefield as he silently looked toward the direction where that strange ship had gone.

…

“I think we almost rammed into something just now!”

Lawrence hurried from the porthole back to his desk and spoke loudly to a Pocket Mirror sitting on the tabletop. Then he anxiously glanced outside again. The sea beyond the porthole looked dim and hazy, as if countless shadowy, unreal things were floating on the surface, making it impossible to tell what was real and what was only a phantom.

And the White Oak itself was racing through those phantoms at an astonishing speed.

Black mist rippled across the mirror's surface, and within the fog appeared a female Adventurer wearing a captain's uniform.

"We didn't ram anything," Martha said with a cheerful smile. "We only almost did."

"Almost ramming it was scary enough!" Lawrence grabbed the Pocket Mirror, walked toward the window, and spoke quickly. "I didn't notice when we had no point of reference, but—just how fast are we going?!"

"Very fast. Very, very fast, a formless phantom, crossing the waves like the wind," Martha said with a smile, looking into Lawrence's eyes through the mirror. "Do you remember what you told me many years ago? You said you would rebuild the White Oak and the Black Oak into the finest vanguard exploration ships, and then skim across the sea with me like the wind… My love, right now we're at least at a force seven or eight."

"That was a metaphor! A metaphor!" Lawrence's eyes showed a hint of terror, because as he spoke he watched another massive phantom slide past the porthole so close it nearly scraped the glass. Its bridge towered high, and the turrets along its side pointed toward some faraway target. It was locked in fierce battle with an enemy in another layer of reality, while the White Oak-Black Oak pair seemed to rush straight past the mouths of its main guns.

After a moment, Lawrence tapped his forehead and sighed. "Forget it. As long as you can keep us safe. What exactly is going on out there now?"

“We are passing through a war zone,” Martha answered in a gentle, calm tone.

“A war zone? Who is fighting?”

Martha turned her head in the mirror, as if observing the situation on her side, then looked back. “The Frostholm Navy of the Mortal Realm, and the famous Sea Mist Fleet. Their opponents are the replicas rising from mirror world into the Mortal Realm.”

Lawrence felt his heart sink and his expression grew solemn. “…So the final moment has come?”

“It seems so,” Martha said softly. “mirror world is overlapping with the Mortal Realm now. The final ‘Inversion’ has already begun.”

“Why so soon? You said this wouldn’t happen for a while yet.”

“I could only make rough guesses, Lawrence. After leaving the ranks of the replicas, my connection to this mirror world world has been fading quickly. I don’t know what has happened, but clearly someone is deliberately speeding up mirror world’s Inversion…”

For a while Lawrence did not speak. He only stared out the window at the hazy, chaotic sea and the endless drifting phantoms. After a few seconds he suddenly asked, “Are we still sailing in the mirror world waters?”

“Yes. We are still trapped in this mirror world world,” Martha nodded. “But the barrier between mirror world and the Mortal Realm is blurring. We do not have much time left.”

“If the Inversion really completes, what will happen?” Lawrence asked.

“A city-state will become a cradle for the Elder Gods to descend. What do you think will happen?” Martha replied calmly.

Lawrence pressed his fingers to his temple without thinking.

“…Damn it. How far are we from Frostholm?”

“We are almost there,” Martha said, raising a hand in the mirror to point outside. “I can already see the lights of the Harbor district from here. Countless ships are gathering in the surrounding waters: half a century of wrecks, endless replicas. But they are all ignoring the Black Oak, at least for now.”

Lawrence nodded gravely. He picked up the mirror he used to speak with Martha, opened the door, and left his captain’s cabin. As he walked toward the bridge, he asked in a low voice, “Once we reach Frostholm, what do you need me to do?”

“Find their nest. The power that created and sustains this mirror world world lies deep within Frostholm. I can sense its general location,” Martha said. The smile she always wore faded into seriousness as she looked into Lawrence’s eyes, her tone very earnest. “Once you start searching for it, the replicas surrounding the city-state should react at once. I will find a way to hold them off.”

“…Can we handle that with only the Black Oak and the White Oak? You said yourself there are countless ships gathering…”

“We are part of the Vanished Fleet, Lawrence,” Martha said, a faint smile returning to her lips. “And we are not the only ones taking part in this battle.”

Lawrence reacted at once and glanced thoughtfully out the corridor window.

Those vast, hazy ship shadows were fighting on the distant sea. As time passed, the boundary between mirror world and the Mortal Realm was growing even more blurred. Soon this entire stretch of ocean, including both mirror world Frostholm and Mortal Realm Frostholm, would be aflame.

“I understand,” Lawrence said, nodding. He pulled his gaze back from the window and continued quickly toward the bridge. “But I have one last question. I can lead the team into Frostholm, but how are we supposed to deal with that… thing in the depths of the city-state? If it really is, as you say, an Elder God or a part of one, ordinary weapons may not work.”

The bridge was ahead.

Lawrence steadied himself and stepped forward to push the door open.

His First Mate, his Second Mate, the ship’s priest, and his crew members were all waiting for him there.

There was also that strange Anomaly 077-sailor. The mummified corpse had somehow found a crewman’s cap from the White Oak and put it on its head. It now sat quite properly in a chair, watching the other crew members at work with curious, focused attention.

Lawrence walked toward them, and the crew members all rose to salute him.

Martha’s voice came from the mirror: “You will have help.”

Lawrence returned his crew’s salutes. When he heard that, he looked at Martha in the mirror in surprise. “Help?”

“Yes, help. For many years they have been fighting in the depths of this mirror world world, trying to break through the great gate that leads to the deepest part of the city-state, but they have never succeeded. Go and find them. You won’t need to explain why you came. They will naturally become your allies… probably.”

“Probably?!”

“Because I am not sure what they really are, or whether they can even communicate with people. Lawrence, you know this. I have wandered here for many years, but I have never had much freedom.”

“All right, I understand. Help,” Lawrence sighed, and his tone could not help but hold some curiosity. “I thought we were the only ones fighting the replicas around us. I didn’t expect there to be others. Who are they?”

“They call themselves… the Queen’s Guard Corps.”

Chapter 410: Fog Panic

The clicks of switches being pressed kept sounding in the secret room. Metal springs hummed with a steady rhythm as they connected and disconnected. Invisible signals were sent up to the roof and transmitted by an antenna disguised as a weather vane, while messages from the Sea Mist Fleet were sent back into the room, transforming into the clacking of relays and neat rows of round holes on a strip of paper.

With headphones on, Nemo sat at the desk, listening to the sounds in his ears while he tapped his fingers on the tabletop in slight irritation. A young woman in a waitress uniform stood beside him, picking up the paper strip that had just been spat out by the punch-card machine and reading the pattern of holes.

After a while, Nemo pulled off his headphones and leaned back in his chair. He pinched the bridge of his nose and let out a long breath.

“Captain Tyrian has already started fighting the strange fleet that appeared in the fog. The Frostholm navy’s situation is unclear for now, but it doesn’t look good,” the young woman holding the paper strip lowered her voice and spoke nervously. “Yet there hasn’t been a whisper of news in the city…”

“The thick fog has cut off all civilian news channels. Even if the residents on the coast hear the guns, they won’t know what is happening. The city authorities have to keep order in the inner districts—panic on a large scale won’t help the navy at all,” Nemo said, still pressing his brow. “What’s it like out on the streets? And in the tavern?”

“The Constable units have put the whole city under martial law. The streets are very quiet now, but just now I thought I heard gunshots from far away. Two steam walkers passed the corner of Oak Street and hurried north,” the young woman answered. “The tavern is still fine for now. We have enough fuel for lighting, but…”

“But?”

“There are more than a dozen guests trapped here by the thick fog. The streets are already sealed, and the Sanctuary Worlds are full. They have nowhere to go. If this drags on, fear is going to build up among them.”

“…We still can’t drive them out onto the street. Right now, the tavern is their temporary Sanctuary World. And if we really throw people out, it will definitely draw the Constables and the Church,” Nemo shook his head. “I’ll go up in a while and see what’s happening.”

As soon as the Sea Mist Fleet informant finished speaking, a muffled muttering suddenly came from a corner of the room: “Charge again, charge again… They’ve broken through… Reinforcements are here too…”

Nemo frowned at once and stood, looking toward the source of the sound.

There was a bed there. An old man in ragged clothes lay on it, half-conscious, his back hunched. He clutched a heavy wrench from who knew where to his chest, and he did not seem to be resting peacefully.

“Old Ghost, Old Ghost,” Nemo walked over and patted the old man’s shoulder. “Having a nightmare?”

The old man clutching the heavy wrench opened his eyes in a daze. It took him several seconds to speak: “Who are you?”

“I am Nemo,” Nemo Wilkins said, his expression a bit complicated. “What were you dreaming about?”

“Nemo… Oh, Nemo, I remember now. You’re the new recruit in the Queen’s Guard Corps… Hello, I’m the pipeline engineer of the Second Waterway… A dream? I didn’t dream. I just nodded off, just nodded off… What time is it now? Should I be going to inspect the power conduits?”

“It’s already afternoon,” Nemo shook his head. “Forget about the power conduits. We’ve pulled out of that place for now. Nowhere is safe at the moment. We have to stay at this base and wait for orders—that’s General Tyrian’s command.”

“General Tyrian…” Old Ghost’s eyes went blank for a second, then he suddenly seemed to snap awake. He sprang up from the bed: “Yes! Engineer Wilson has received the order! Standing by at the base!”

Nemo’s expression grew a bit more complicated, but he still slowly straightened and returned the old man’s salute. Then he turned and nodded to the young woman in the shop assistant uniform: “Stay here and look after Old Ghost. I’ll go upstairs to check the situation.”

After giving his instructions, he left the secret room and took a hidden passage back to the tavern on the surface.

Inside the Golden Flute tavern, a heavy, tense mood filled the main hall. The guests trapped there by the thick fog, the shop assistants and the waiters on duty—almost everyone watched the street outside the display windows. But wherever they looked, they saw only dense fog and the hazy outlines of the street within it.

All the gas lamps in the city had already been lit early. The man-made lights barely pushed back the gloom brought by the eerie fog, but not enough to make this muddled world clear again. Those yellowish balls of light floated in the mist like rootless duckweed, looking like rows of eyes hovering above the streets.

Nemo came out from the kitchen door and walked to the counter.

“How is it?” he asked quietly, speaking to the shop assistant behind the counter.

“Everyone is nervous. All traffic and communication with the neighboring streets are cut off. No one knows what is happening anywhere else,” the shop assistant whispered. “But at least no one has cracked and run outside —no one wants to dash into that fog right now.”

Nemo nodded slightly: “If some idiot really does show up, don’t stop them. Let them go—but once they step through this door, even if they spend only a second in the fog, you must never let them back in. From now on, this place allows people out but not in. Anything that comes out of the thick fog is to be treated as something of the Malevolent Spirits by default.”

The young shop assistant swallowed nervously and nodded hard: “Yes, shopkeeper.”

Just then, a strange buzzing suddenly came from the street, cutting off the conversation between Nemo and his subordinate.

It sounded like some device starting up, mixed with the noise of heavy machinery moving along the street.

The people in the tavern grew restless. Some hurried nervously to the windows to see what was happening outside. Someone spotted some moving red lights in the fog and gasped in a low voice: “Steam walkers… more walkers have appeared!”

Nemo also walked toward the windows. When he was halfway there, the strange buzzing suddenly rose in pitch. A distorted loudspeaker voice blared from outside the glass—it was the broadcast device mounted on a steam walker calling out.

“Zzz… A notice to all citizens… The governor and the leaders of the Church are working to restore order in the city-state… Frostholm is currently being affected by unknown manifestations, and we are… A special reminder: residents, please remain at home or in a safe shelter facility. For your safety, stay as far as possible from anything around you that can produce a reflective surface, including but not limited to mirrors, water surfaces, and polished metal…

“We repeat: stay away from anything around you that might produce a mirror-like surface—anything at all.

“In addition, if you notice anyone near you behaving strangely, hide at once in a safe, enclosed space, and if conditions allow, seek help from the person in charge of your shelter or from the nearest Guardian or Constable. Do not rashly attack anyone you find suspicious. First ensure your own safety and isolation.

“If you feel that your own condition is abnormal, also please hide at once in a safe, enclosed space and avoid talking to others as much as possible…

“The above reminder comes from His Excellency Governor Winston and the expert advisors in the field of the supernatural.

“Notice to all citizens…”

The broadcast voice slowly faded away, and the steam walker’s red warning lights sank back into the thick fog.

Nemo lifted his head and saw all the tense eyes around him.

But he reacted quickly.

“Go get some cloth!” he shouted to the shop assistants and waiters. “Cover every glass counter and mirror!”

The others reacted as well. Though they were still anxious, the city's residents clearly had basic knowledge and mental preparation for saving themselves in an supernatural disaster. The shop assistants quickly fetched the dust covers they usually used after closing time, and the guests still in the tavern hurried up to help. They quickly draped cloth over everything in sight that might create a reflective surface.

Similar scenes were playing out in every corner of the Frostholm city-state.

The terror of the fog was spreading over the whole city-state.

In the drifting heavy fog, Agatha had already returned to the Cathedral.

In the lounge beside the great hall, she met Bishop Ivan, who had just finished his work.

The Bishop had climbed out of the spirit coffin he usually rested in and had pulled the robes of an Archbishop over the bandages that wrapped his whole body. In Agatha's memory, it had been many years since she last saw Bishop Ivan dressed like this.

"Even this corpse of mine has been forced to crawl up and work," Bishop Ivan in his robes sat in a chair and spread his hands to Agatha as she entered. "I haven't moved outside my coffin for so long that I feel like I've fallen apart from exhaustion."

"If you still have a body that can 'fall apart'," Agatha said casually, "how are things now?"

"'How are things'—everyone is asking that. They couldn't be worse," Bishop Ivan's hoarse, low voice came from under the bandages. "replicas are attacking the city. Monsters that had been hiding are starting to show themselves. Just now, several graveyards were attacked. Those places where the dead were stored temporarily seem to have been used by the enemy as 'passages' into the Mortal Realm. City Hall has also sent word: gunfire has been heard on several streets in the Lower City. And out at sea, our fleet is already fighting the things that have crawled out of the water.

“The full assault has begun. But worse than the enemy’s full assault is that we still don’t know the full shape of this disaster—or this plot. Those heretics hiding in the dark… How did they do all this? Where are they hiding?”

As he spoke, Bishop Ivan slowly raised his head and looked into Agatha’s eyes.

“What did you find underground? From your eyes, I would guess you saw something.”

“I didn’t find the heretics’ lair,” Agatha said, “but I found… something even more disturbing.”

Agatha drew a slow breath, paused for a moment, then said: “It seems that our Boiling Gold mine dried up decades ago—or even longer ago.”

Chapter 411: Tracking

The room fell silent for a moment.

The silence lasted for more than ten seconds before Agatha finally heard Bishop Ivan's deep, hoarse voice come from beneath the bandages: "Ah-oh."

"…Your reaction is a bit unexpected."

"Because your information is too unexpected," Bishop Ivan seemed to finally recover. He adjusted his sitting posture, and his tone became very serious. "You're saying the Boiling Gold vein of the Frostholm city-state ran dry decades ago? That's the truth you found down there?"

"Yes. In the deepest part of the Second Waterway there is a door, probably sealed by the first City Hall. Behind the door is a mine tunnel that has long since dried up. Judging by its position, it should be in the rich deposit zone at the bottom of the mine—the area that would, in theory, be mined last…"

Agatha did not hold anything back. She recounted everything she had discovered underground, and as she spoke, Bishop Ivan's gaze visibly grew heavier.

After a while, Agatha finished describing what she had seen below, but then added with some hesitation: "…That was only one tunnel. There are countless tunnels in the mine. Even if it's the deepest part of the rich deposit zone, we still can't judge from that alone that the entire mine has dried up. So a large part of my conclusion is guesswork… I know this guess is too wild."

“…Yes, a rather wild guess,” Bishop Ivan said slowly. “After all, if the Boiling Gold mine really ran dry long ago, then what have we been hauling out of the mine over the past half century? What is the Boiling Gold catalyst that Frostholm has been shipping to other cities all these years?”

Agatha said nothing. She knew there was no way to avoid the questions Bishop Ivan raised, and no way to answer them.

The Frostholm city-state had always produced the highest-quality Boiling Gold ore and finished catalyst rods. In the past fifty years, the output of Boiling Gold from Frostholm alone was almost equal to the combined total of all the other city-states around the Frost Sea. Boiling Gold in the mines flowed out endlessly. The mining machines devoured wealth day and night, and the smelting plants sent out catalysts to the whole world. Ships that used those catalysts sailed across the Boundless Sea.

And in that whole half-century, not a single Boiling Gold order had ever gone wrong.

If the vein had truly run dry decades ago, then never mind just the Frostholm mine—what had been burning in the steam cores of all those ships on the Boundless Sea? Phantoms?

After a long time, the Gatekeeper could only sigh softly: “…If that too is a creation of corruption, then our world has truly become absurd to a frightening degree.”

“Our world has always been absurd. But perhaps… this time you really have found a key clue,” Bishop Ivan shook his head. “Let’s not worry about whether the guess itself is crazy. From a rational viewpoint, the contradiction between a vein that ran dry decades ago and a mine that is still producing steadily now is very likely tied to the anomalies currently afflicting the city-state.”

“…But according to the clues we had before, the current anomalies should have been caused by the cultists of Oblivion,” Agatha reminded him. “What do they have to do with the mine?”

“They might not be connected to the mine at all—they may simply have used and triggered this crisis,” Bishop Ivan said, thinking quickly. The experience of decades, especially his experience dealing with cultists, was helping him piece this puzzle together. “Those heretics couldn’t have been laying out a plan in the city-state for decades without being noticed. What’s more, the drying up of the vein might go back to the time of the Queen. In that era, Frostholm’s suppression of heresy was far harsher than today. No cultist could have escaped the Queen of Frostholm’s eyes…”

As he spoke, the old Bishop paused, then suddenly asked: “You said just now that Governor Winston knew nothing about the door deep in the Second Waterway?”

Agatha nodded: “That’s what he said.”

“…I don’t really believe him,” Bishop Ivan said, hesitating as he shook his head. “The situation was indeed somewhat chaotic in the time of the first City Hall, but the handover between the first few governors and their administrations shouldn’t have had such a huge gap—especially not with a secret this crucial and sensitive…”

“You mean Governor Winston is hiding something from me?” Agatha frowned. “Why would he do that?”

“I don’t know. Maybe to maintain City Hall’s authority. Maybe because this secret is tied to something bigger. It could even be that something has already taken control of him. It’s hard to say,” Bishop Ivan said. His gaze suddenly settled on Agatha. “What surprises me more is that you didn’t grow suspicious about this. You never used to overlook things like that.”

Agatha froze.

In that brief moment of shock, she recalled what she had experienced on the way back from the Second Waterway—the reflection in the pool, and the "other self" in that reflection walking in the opposite direction.

"Agatha, what's wrong?" Bishop Ivan's voice pulled her out of her distraction.

Agatha blinked and shook her head lightly.

"Are you sure you're all right?" There was obvious doubt in Bishop Ivan's tone. "You've drifted off more than once these past two days, and…"

"I'm fine. I've been fine all along," Agatha interrupted the old Bishop. For some reason, after that brief daze, her tone now sounded relaxed. She let out a soft breath and rose from her chair. "I just suddenly figured some things out—I should set out."

Bishop Ivan stood up: "…You're heading to the mine?"

"The navy is holding back the enemy. The Constables and Guardians are keeping the situation under control. They've bought us time. I still have a chance to find the source behind all this. It's time to go."

Agatha paused for a moment, as if to stress her point, then added: "Time is limited. I can't rest here for long."

"All right, then go," Bishop Ivan nodded lightly. "I hope you can uncover the truth smoothly and come back safely."

"I will uncover the truth."

…

In the thick fog, distant gunshots rang out from time to time. Now and then they were joined by warning broadcasts from Constable or Guardian units, and the automatic sirens of certain facilities.

The city-state was now a blur in the fog, and unseen terror seeped through the mist.

“All things considered, I’d rather face hundreds or thousands of fully armed cultists, or charge back and forth a few more times in a city that’s burning to the ground.”

Vanna dismissed the greatsword of solid ice in her hand and frowned at the ground in front of her as she spoke.

Within their limited field of view, the ground was crisscrossed with terrifying cracks. Filthy black sludge slowly flowed and writhed in those fissures, then quickly began to harden. Some of the sludge even barely kept the outline of a human form, yet its key limbs were twisted in ways that made one’s skin crawl.

“Too disgusting,” Vanna muttered.

“Honestly now, would you really like to fight another battle in a burning city?”

Morris’s voice came from the side. The old scholar held the Gatekeeper’s cane in one hand, glanced at the shattered “battlefield” before them, and spoke casually to Vanna.

“…All right, no, I don’t,” Vanna shrugged. “Whether it’s a replica city-state shrouded in thick fog or a burning city under the Black Sun, neither is any better.”

As she spoke, the thick fog flowed, and a tall figure suddenly loomed out of the mist behind Vanna. Its head was swollen and misshapen, a giant single eye trembling violently in the fog. The next second, the monster lunged at Vanna.

But Vanna did not even turn around. She simply stomped hard on the ground. An invisible shockwave spread out in an instant, and the deformed twisted entity only managed one step before its lower body shattered. It crashed to the ground and quickly turned to sludge.

Under her conscious control, Morris, who was only a few steps away, was not affected at all by the shockwave. The old scholar merely adjusted his blessed monocle and calmly looked around at the fog-filled streets.

The next second, he suddenly looked toward a certain spot, a gleam of silver rising in his eyes: “McKafini Conjecture and Proof.”

The next second, a series of dull explosions, like watermelons being stomped to pieces, came from the fog. Several vague figures appeared in the mist, their heads bursting like fireworks.

“The good news is that these low-quality replicas imitate thought to some extent, and whoever controls them needs a mind as well,” Morris said, withdrawing his gaze as the silver light faded from his eyes. “At first I worried they were all empty shells of chaos. In that case, the power of knowledge wouldn’t have worked very well on them.”

Vanna watched the monsters with blown-off heads slowly turn to sludge in the distance, her expression a bit strange. She glanced back at Morris: “Back when you taught me, you never said the ‘power of knowledge’ was this useful.”

“At the time I had already decided you weren’t suited for this path,” Morris said offhandedly.

Vanna: “…”

The Inquisitor felt, for a moment, that she was being mocked. But when she recalled her exam scores back then, she decided to keep a humble attitude.

“Any more nearby?”

She stayed alert as she asked quietly.

“None for now,” Morris shook his head.

He kept sensing the surroundings at all times. When those monsters emerged from the fog, their chaotic thoughts appeared in his perception first. The mist could block human sight, but in his eyes the radiance of thought shone like lanterns in the night.

Very few people could actively control their own thoughts. So in the field of “Detect Sentient Minds”, no one could compare to the Saint of the God of Wisdom.

“Good that there are none for now, though new ones will crawl out soon enough,” Vanna exhaled and flexed her arms and legs a little. “Have you noticed… that in this direction, there are a lot of replica freaks, and they attack much more aggressively than elsewhere?”

“You noticed it too?” Morris raised his eyebrows. “Then it seems my judgment was right.”

“You mean…”

“Not all of the ‘replicas’ emerging from the fog are acting blindly. Some of them are being controlled by someone behind them.”

Chapter 412: Academic Exchange

Ever since they left the mountaintop, Vanna and Morris had been fighting the endless replicas in this fog. They no longer remembered how many monsters made of elements they had destroyed on the way, but one thing was clear: no matter how many they killed, the monsters were always quickly replaced by more coming out of the mist.

Simply killing these replicas was useless.

Morris cast his gaze into the thick fog. Faint silver light flowed now and then in his eyes. He tracked the flashes of thought that sometimes appeared in the mist, trying to use them to find where the controller behind those monsters was.

After a while, he suddenly raised his head and looked in a certain direction: “This way.”

Vanna immediately reached out and grabbed at the air. A new greatsword condensed from the omnipresent fog. She strode ahead of Morris.

They moved through the fog, along empty streets where no one was left. They relied on the dim streetlamps around them to barely tell where the nearby buildings were. From time to time, distant sounds reached their ears —sometimes the Guard Corps of the city-state fighting monsters, sometimes eerie howls and roars, and sometimes even cries for help that sounded as if they were right beside them.

But wherever the cries for help came from, there was only surging black sludge.

The fog flowed, and the outlines of buildings inside it seemed to flow with it. The hazy shapes looked as if they had come to life. Towers in the mist turned into flesh-and-blood giants. Huge tentacles and eye stalks spread from the rooftops. Even the streetlamps on both sides began to sway, their dark posts bending like soft plants, while the lights turned into clusters of murky yellow eyes.

Just then, a low, gentle prayer sounded from ahead. It broke Morris's thoughts and made the scene before his eyes snap back to normal.

Vanna was murmuring a benediction. Layers of radiance, like ripples on water, spread outward from her and stirred the dense fog.

After finishing a short prayer, Vanna spoke without looking back: "Be careful. Something in the fog can disturb people's minds. We have stayed in it for too long."

Morris answered casually: "It actually doesn't affect me much. Seeing and hearing things that aren't there is normal for me. I am already used to it."

"…Next time I write to Heidi, I should talk with her about your ideas of health."

Morris's mouth twitched. He was about to say something when a stream of moving fog suddenly drifted in from the side. His vision blurred for a moment, and then Vanna vanished from in front of him.

The Old Scholar stopped at once, watching the surroundings with full alertness as he called out: "Vanna?"

The fog quietly flowed. No one answered his call.

Morris's nerves grew tighter bit by bit as he quickly scanned the area.

He did not know when it had happened, but all around him there was only endless pale fog. The buildings he could barely make out before were gone.

Even the dim streetlamps had disappeared from his sight. In the depths of that pale chaos, he suddenly saw something.

They were vast Shadows, like huge towers. On a closer look they subtly swayed and wriggled. They seemed to be tentacles of some enormous sea monster, stretching from the sky down toward the ground, licking at everything on the earth. Morris was unconsciously drawn to the blurred outline of that huge tentacle. He stared at it and felt as if he could draw Truth and secrets from its huge, terrifying Shadow—

The next second, Morris frowned and shook his head.

There was no Truth in that thing. It was only some kind of mind-twisting illusion.

“Hm?”

Morris heard a voice in the fog. It sounded like someone was surprised. He instantly looked toward the source of the sound. The huge illusion in the distance vanished, and a tall, thin figure walked out of the fog.

The newcomer spoke in surprise: “You actually weren’t affected—that is truly surprising.”

The tall, thin figure grew solid. It was a middle-aged man in a dark blue coat, holding a Black Leather Tome in his hand. Behind the man, a black chain stretched from the bones of his neck up into the air. At the end of the chain floated a jellyfish-shaped creature, swelling and shrinking like smoke.

Morris said nothing. He used his gaze on the cultist who had a symbiotic pact with the Smokewisp Jellyfish, watching every one of the man’s movements.

The middle-aged man smiled instead, his tone oddly calm, and said: “Don’t be so tense, old man. I actually don’t mind chatting with you. The final day of descent has already come anyway, and I have plenty of time now. I’m really curious. After seeing the form of the Lord, why weren't you affected? You can see those visions, which means your Spirit Sight is strong enough. But you… didn't go mad?"

Morris spoke calmly while silently reciting the name of the God of Wisdom Rahm in his heart: "Sorry. My mind has always been healthy. I am not going to fall into chaos because of a few mind-twisting illusions. Where did you take my companion?"

"You should stop worrying about others first, old man. Right now you—"

The cultist had only said half a sentence when Morris's eyes suddenly sharpened. He raised his hand and pointed at the man: "Lomonosov Inequalities!"

Vast knowledge compressed into a single phrase. A flood of information crashed into the target's thinking. The cultist's body shook at once, and he lowered his head as if in great pain.

But just as Morris was about to unleash a second Mental Blast, a strong sense of alarm suddenly sounded in his heart. He snapped his mouth shut and forced his thoughts to a halt. Almost at the same time, he saw the cultist suddenly raise his head, a hint of mockery in his eyes.

The Mental Blast rebounded. Morris felt a wave of dizziness at once—but thanks to his quick reaction, the dizziness was not too serious.

The cultist spread his hands and looked mockingly at the swaying Old Scholar: "What a pity. I don't seem to be very afraid of that…"

"Boom!"

Before the cultist finished speaking, the Smokewisp Jellyfish floating behind him began to contract violently. The next second, as the jellyfish suddenly swelled, a huge black fireball appeared in front of the cultist. The fireball screamed through the air and, a heartbeat later, smashed hard into the spot where Morris had been standing!

Black smoke and dust spread, making even the thick fog around them shudder violently. The Annihilator looked at the still-rolling smoke and shook his head with regret: “So many ‘shells’ were wiped out by your mental shocks. Did you think I would show up without any preparation? Sadly, knowledge is not the same as wisdom.”

“Clang—crack!”

A sudden clatter of something falling to the ground cut off the cultist’s muttering. His eyes widened. He used a spell to call up a violent gust of wind that blew away the black smoke. A shattered Prismatic Lens appeared before his eyes.

On the broken surface of the Prismatic Lens, there was still a faint afterimage of Morris.

“A Prismatic Lens? Optical Deceptions?!”

The cultist suddenly understood and looked toward a spot nearby. Almost at the same moment, Morris’s figure appeared in that empty stretch of ground.

The figure raised his right hand toward him and spoke slowly and clearly, word by word: “McKafini Conjecture and Proof.”

This time, the cultist who had a symbiotic pact with the Smokewisp Jellyfish did not even sway. He dropped all pretense and grabbed the chain floating behind his neck. As he drew on the power of Abyssal Demons, he stared hard at the Old Scholar not far away and said: “Sorry, but I actually graduated from the mathematics department of Morka City-State Central University…”

“Click.”

The crisp sound of a gun's action reached his ears. Another figure of Morris appeared directly behind the cultist. A revolver pressed against the back of the cultist's head.

"Bang!"

With the shot, the head-split corpse fell to the ground, and the Abyssal Demons bound to it by a symbiotic pact let out a howl and quickly dissipated.

"You could have mentioned earlier that you graduated from university."

The Old Scholar blew on the gun barrel, put the gun away, and shook his head. In front of him, the other "Morris" faded like morning dew. At the spot where the illusion vanished, a small crystal Prismatic Lens fell to the ground and shattered.

Morris looked at the broken Prismatic Lens with some heartache. Then he lowered his head and poked the cultist's corpse with his Gatekeeper's cane in disdain.

"You made me waste two prisms—and your university degree."

As he spoke, the fog around them suddenly started to flow again. The scene inside the mist changed quickly. The building outlines and lights that had vanished appeared once more in Morris's sight. Right after that, he saw Vanna running quickly toward him from the side.

Before she even reached him, Vanna called out nervously: "Are you all right? You suddenly disappeared just now…"

Morris waved his hand: "I thought you were the one who disappeared. Looks like it was only some kind of temporary illusion… wait."

Something suddenly came to his mind, and at the same moment, Vanna stopped a few meters away.

The two of them spoke at the same time: “First we need to confirm if it’s really you.”

They looked at each other and, again in unison, said: “the Vanished!”

“Looks like it’s really you,” Morris said with a nod after making sure nothing was wrong with either of them. “There is nothing wrong with being careful.”

Vanna was the first to notice the cultist’s corpse on the ground. Her eyes changed slightly: “You dealt with this?”

Morris nodded: “I ran into someone with a high level of education. We had a round of academic exchange. Luckily, I had a better way to solve the problem.”

Vanna: “…?”

Chapter 413: The Next Record

Although Vanna had known Morris for many years, in her eyes he had always been just a gentle, cultured Scholar. Back in the city-state of Pland, this old mister spent most of his energy in the classroom. The rest of his time was either spent in the library or being invited by various schools to give lectures.

Vanna had not had many chances to see what this elder could really do in the supernatural field.

But ever since she went aboard the Vanished, she finally started to see another side of Morris and realized what those harmless-looking Scholars who followed the God of Wisdom Rahm relied on to carry out their work—

It was one of the most dangerous jobs in this world: the pursuit of knowledge.

But when she thought about it carefully, it made sense. Scholars should have their own unique and powerful strength. After all, there were many beings in this world that chased after knowledge—from Abyssal Demons to Spirit Realm phantoms and more. Yet in the end, most knowledge still fell into the hands of mortals. Why was that? Because mortal Scholars had strong academic power…

Vanna rubbed her forehead and forced herself to stop her wild thoughts. She muttered: “So you were this strong… If I had known, I would have paid more attention in class back then. Maybe I could have…”

Morris shook his head with a straight face: “No. Your grades were far too low. Training your body suits you better.”

Vanna felt a little embarrassed: “I still graduated from the city-state university in the end…”

Morris glanced at her: “One third of your credits came from athletics, and one third came from Church training.”

Vanna fell silent. After a few seconds of quiet, she looked toward the thick fog around them and forced the topic to change: “The cultist you killed should be the controller behind those replica freaks, right?”

Morris shook his head: “At most, he was only one of the controllers. Did you hear the sounds coming from the other districts? The whole city-state is full of those monsters now. Who knows how many cultists have already used the thick fog to enter the Mortal Realm… We will not be able to wipe them all out by ourselves.”

Vanna nodded with a grave expression. She was about to say something else when something caught the corner of her eye. She let out a soft: “Huh?”

She walked over to the dead Annihilator, crouched down to examine the body, grabbed the man’s collar, and tore it open.

The flesh under the clothes was melting and writhing, showing the look of being soaked in the corruption of black sludge. As the body’s true life faded, the movement of that sludge slowed visibly and then began to dry up.

“This is also a replica?!” Vanna’s eyes widened in shock. She could hardly believe what she had found. “These cultists… even turned their own people into replicas?!”

“No, it’s not that simple,” Morris said with a frown. He was also carefully inspecting the cultist’s body while recalling details of the battle. After a moment, he slowly shook his head. “I sensed his thought waves. They were not the same as a replica’s. replicas have clear breaks in their thinking that are different from humans. Even if they can act like normal people, the instability of elements itself keeps them from maintaining a stable mind. This cultist did not have that problem.”

As he spoke, he pointed to the flesh on the cultist’s chest that was covered by black sludge.

“And more importantly, look at this part. He is not completely made of elements. elements and normal flesh exist at the same time. This looks more like a symbiotic pact, or… self-corruption.”

Vanna stared at that place for a long time, and her brows slowly furrowed. “These heretics actively used elements to corrupt themselves? They even replaced part of their own flesh with elements… That is disgusting. Even for Annihilators, this level of perversion is impressive.”

Morris’s tone stayed calm: “I don’t think it’s much different from those Annihilators who turn themselves into Abyssal Demons. These madmen hate the mortal flesh of this world. They never mind using the craziest methods to remake themselves.”

As he spoke, his attention shifted to something else.

He looked at the Black Leather Tome the cultist had been holding in his hand.

After a brief hesitation, the Old Scholar reached out and tugged the book free from the cultist’s tightly clenched fingers.

“Careful,” Vanna warned at once when she saw this. “That book may contain filthy, blasphemous content. The power of the Sun has already weakened. If you touch it rashly…”

Morris shook his head lightly: “Scholars always open new and mysterious books. For us, every act of reading is a challenge and an adventure. Don’t worry. The Rahm sect has special training and techniques for reading in situations like this. You just need to stand guard for me. And if anything is drawn here by this book, help me deal with it.”

Vanna hesitated for a moment, then nodded with a serious face: “…All right.”

Morris gave a soft “mm” and finished a quick prayer in his heart. Then he took a small vial of herbal powder from his coat. He poured half of it on the ground and lit it, and sprinkled the other half over the book before him. After that, he checked the state of the colorful rune bead bracelet on his wrist. Only then did he sit cross-legged on the ground with due solemnity and place the book on his lap.

The book’s cover was pitch black. There were no words or symbols on the surface, only faint, fine net-like patterns pressed into the hard shell. There was no way to tell where it came from.

Morris opened the cover and looked at the contents inside.

Vanna turned her gaze away, trying her best not to be affected by the book.

Some messy lines and symbols came into Morris’s view.

At first, he could not understand what he was seeing at all. The messy symbols and lines did not match any language or ancient script he knew. But when he tried to turn to the next page, the marks on the paper suddenly began to move. The ink strokes turned into living, crawling things that rushed through the prison of the paper. The jumping characters pricked at the Old Scholar’s vision. In just a few seconds, he felt that he had already begun to understand what the pages were recording.

The symbols and lines twisted rapidly. Everything on the pages trembled before his eyes, and the “knowledge” was projected straight into his mind!

Morris’s heart stirred. The defenses and reflex measures he had set up in his sea of consciousness activated at once. In the next instant, his main awareness pulled back and his reason solidified. He seemed to turn into a bystander, standing behind his “self” in the Mortal Realm from a lofty, unreal angle, calmly and clearly reading the contents that were appearing in his own mind.

“…The meetings of the forsaken Elder Kings were held again and again, and the first plan was set…”

“Those who were abandoned—their flesh would melt in the light…”

After reading only two lines, the phantom “self-projection” of Morris frowned.

This was what had been written on the slip of paper that the young informant named Crow brought back when the captain first led a team to explore the Second Waterway. It was that vague, origin-unknown passage that seemed to be some kind of ancient record—the Sacred Script!

Morris’s eyes changed slightly. He at once controlled his body to turn the pages, letting his eyes read those twisted, blasphemous lines and form the matching memories in his mind, then read that content from his bystander’s point of view.

He saw more Sacred Script. And after the section Crow had copied, there were indeed more broken sentences:

“…After the forsaken clan departed, the creation of all things still went on as planned. The forsaken Elder Kings began to design the first and final Blueprint…”

“Yet that first Blueprint was soon cast aside, for the aftershocks of the Great Annihilation kept raging through the mortal world… the Elder Kings gathered dust into stone, and stone into stars, but the stars shattered and broke apart and could not endure…”

“Thus the pale king of the giants, ‘Salmir’, fell in the first Long Night of the Genesis Protocol…”

“…Then the Elder Kings began to design a second Blueprint. They chose one among themselves to be the Creator. The first chosen one was the King of Dreams, also called the King of Knowledge and Memory, for this mighty one had indeed shown sacred miracles of creation…”

“But the second Blueprint also failed. The King of Dreams was torn apart in the second Long Night of the Genesis Protocol, and part of Him drifted along the border of the Mortal Realm…”

“The third Blueprint was entrusted to another king to carry out. His name was the Crawling King, also called the Lord of the Swarm. He was the common master of countless tiny, unseen things. He held the divine authority of creation and also the divine authority of the opposite of creation… And there was a Truth that called Him the ‘Big Brother of Wisdom’.”

“…Then the Crawling King began His work. In the third Long Night, He gave the Blueprint to the swarm and sought a helper from the clans that still remained. To avoid repeating the fate of the King of Dreams and the pale king of the giants, He divided that Blueprint. He made it so that the mortal world would no longer have nations. The nations became one thousand and two hundred cities, and He let that clan rule the first ten cities and gave them the name ‘Critt’.”

“Thus the third Long Night passed in peace. This was good.

“Yet the forsaken Elder Kings were displeased with the Crawling King for changing the Blueprint, and they blocked His way back to the holy throne. But the clan of the Ten Cities was grateful to the Crawling King. They did not dare praise this king before the Elder Kings, so they gave Him another revered name. They called Him holy, and named Him—

“the Abyssal Lord.”

Chapter 414: Connection

Boom!

A thunder-like roar exploded in the depths of his mind. Morris almost lost control of himself in that instant. Even with his main consciousness placed under Consciousness Isolation and the shelter of Mind Solidification, his mind was still swept up by the spreading shock. The storm of information that followed crashed over him like towering waves, and he almost fell into it.

In a flash, the “psychological vantage point” that stood behind and to the side of his own body began to spin. The words inside his head vanished from his view. All he felt was endless mist coiling and rising. The lines he had just read turned into a swarm of bees in a runaway state, ramming around in his memory and gnawing at fragments of his personality. For a moment he even forgot his own name. Only one title remained in his mind, the one he had seen in the last second.

Abyssal Lord.

But in the next moment, that spinning, world-turning feeling was suddenly stopped by something. Morris felt his consciousness dragged back by a force of terrifying strength, pulled hard toward the world of the Mortal Realm. During that pull, he saw arrays of flickering lights appear in the thick mist. In the middle of those many lights, one great red light source burned.

For a second, it felt as if God of Wisdom Rahm had cast a single glance at him. Then those arrayed lights quickly faded and turned into a huge wave that crashed toward him.

Right after that, the huge wave broke apart before his eyes and became a cloud of pale dust. The fine, white ash fell around him like the ashes of the Saint.

Then the pale dust began to burn in midair, turning into a falling Rain of Fire. Countless bright, red streams of flame formed inside it, surging toward him as if they meant to burn him to nothing.

But just before the red flames fell onto his body, Morris saw all of the fire suddenly shine with a layer of ghostly green. The raging, exploding fire became gentle in an instant and fell down around him bit by bit. One tongue of flame brushed his shoulder. He at once felt someone slap him hard. The next second, he snapped his eyes open and realized he was back inside his own body.

The effects of Consciousness Isolation and Mind Solidification had been cut off by force. He had once again returned from the state at the madness threshold to this world.

The moment his awareness came back, Morris fought the urge to “take one more look” and slammed the Black Leather Tome shut with all his strength.

He moved fast, but even so, the book still flipped several pages wildly before it closed. Out of the corner of his eye, some trembling words etched themselves deep into his mind with a powerful impression as they flashed past. It was one sentence, filled with a dying kind of stubborn will:

“We will at last return to that pure and holy origin.”

The Black Leather Tome finally closed. Morris panted hard, his mind still filled with the words he had seen at the last second.

Vanna noticed something was wrong at once. She hurried over in just two steps: “How are you?”

“…Just a Scholar’s daily life, dealing with deadly knowledge and then surviving.” Morris caught his breath, then held out his hand to Vanna. “It’s fine. I’m still me – help me up.”

As soon as he stood, he asked: “How long has passed?”

“A few seconds,” Vanna answered with a nod. “I just saw you open the book and glance at it a few times, then you suddenly snapped it shut. At the same time, your Spiritual Insight was shaking non-stop, and strange Shadows started to appear in the fog around you.”

“A few seconds…” Morris pulled at the corner of his mouth. In his mind, he recalled the strange scenes he had seen when he was dragged back from the edge of the runaway state.

In the next instant, a deep and solemn voice rose in his mind: “Morris, what happened on your side?”

Morris froze for a moment, then quickly straightened his expression and replied in his heart: “I was reading a copy of The Blasphemous Tome we seized from an Annihilator just now and got hit by corruption by accident. Captain, was it you who pulled me back at the end?”

“Yes,” Duncan replied. “I suddenly felt your mind under attack, so I used the mark I left on you to check on the situation. You said you seized The Blasphemous Tome? What exactly happened? Are you still with Vanna? Where are you now?”

“Vanna and I are together. We’re still operating in the Upper City. We found that some Annihilators used the fog as cover to enter the Mortal Realm and control a number of replicas to attack the city-state. We just found and eliminated one of the controllers,” Morris answered at once. Then he took a moment to gather his thoughts before going on. “The situation is strange. After that cultist died, his body fused with elements, like some very extreme kind of ‘modification’. He was carrying a Nameless Black Grimoire. The content of the book…”

Morris suddenly stopped. His tone became extra careful, and he kept a tight hold on his thoughts. “The things written in it are disturbing. They are the original text of those Sacred Script accounts that Crow copied earlier. I only had time to read a small part before I suffered corruption. I’m sorry, I can only report this much right now. I can’t let myself recall the details inside yet.”

Duncan was silent for two seconds, then spoke again: “That is enough. Safety comes first. Do not keep recalling what you saw. Bring the book with you and report to me face to face later.”

Morris let out a small breath of relief: “Yes, Captain.”

Just then, Vanna “spoke” from beside him: “Captain, how are things on your side?”

“Alice and I are at the Second Waterway. It is quiet here.”

Deep underground, near the center of the city, at a junction of the Second Waterway, Duncan raised his head and looked down the empty hall ahead.

A thin layer of mist drifted above the corridor, close against the dark surface of the dome. The mist seemed to appear in this space out of nowhere, and it grew thicker as time passed. But compared with the surface of the city-state, which was already covered in heavy fog, the mist here was not serious.

“I am waiting for the Fire Seed to get into position.”

Using the link of the mark, he said this to Vanna in his heart.

“Fire Seed?” Vanna sounded confused.

“The nests of those Annihilators are not in the Mortal Realm. mirror world Frostholm is their real base,” Duncan said slowly. “Whether it is the city-state’s Sea Fog Fleet or the Frostholm navy, and even the Guard Corps and the Guardians of the Church, all the ‘invasions’ they destroyed in the Mortal Realm only slowed the rise of mirror world. Only by acting from the mirror world side can we truly solve this problem.

“Agatha has already gone ahead with the Fire Seed. She will find the cultists’ nest, and then I will help her burn that place down.”

Vanna was quiet for a few seconds before she answered, clearly a bit hesitant: “Then… is there anything we can do?”

“Just keep hunting in the fog. Destroy every replica you see. Find all the controllers behind them. Kill as many as you can,” Duncan said. “Slowing the invasion still matters. You are buying time for Agatha and easing the pressure she will face.”

Vanna answered at once: “Yes, I understand!”

A few seconds later, her voice sounded again: “Also… there may still be one replica ‘Gatekeeper’ moving inside the city-state, and the Church does not seem to be reacting at all. Do you think…”

Her voice held some doubt.

But Duncan already knew about that replica, more clearly than Vanna did.

After all, he had already made contact with the real Agatha.

“Do not worry about that ‘Agatha’,” he replied after a short pause. “And you do not need to try to take her down. But if you meet her and the situation calls for it, you may offer help.”

Vanna went silent for a few seconds on her side. When she spoke again, she sounded shocked: “Offer help?! Help that replica?”

“Do not forget, not all replicas are under the control of Annihilators. The best of them have their own will,” Duncan said calmly. “A Gatekeeper will not easily become a puppet of Heretics. Of course, you will still have to judge the exact situation for yourselves if you meet her.”

“Yes, I understand, Captain.”

This time, Vanna’s answer carried a special kind of solemn weight.

It was as if her sense of duty as an Inquisitor had, in that moment, formed a subtle bond with that “Gatekeeper”.

His link with his followers came to an end.

Duncan let out a soft breath, then raised his hand. A small flame bloomed at his fingertip.

He stared at the flame for a moment, then asked softly: “Agatha, do you really think ‘she’ will act the way you believe she will?”

A cold, hoarse voice came from within the fire: “She will.”

“Why are you so sure?”

“Because I believe in myself.”

“But she is only your replica,” Duncan said calmly. “There will be small differences between you. Those differences might make her choose a different path from yours.”

“But you did not order your followers to wipe out that ‘risk’,” Agatha said. “You also believe in my judgment.”

Duncan stayed quiet for a few seconds before he let out a soft sigh.

“There was once a human named Brown Scott who proved his humanity to me. That humanity still held true in a replica. So this time, I do not mind believing one more time.”

“If… I mean, if my judgment is wrong too, what then? Your trust will be wasted…”

“It is alright. It is a small matter.”

A small matter…

In the cold, damp sewer corridor, Agatha lowered her head and looked at the little flame still burning quietly in her palm.

The faint warmth that came from that flame seemed to be the only warmth she could still feel in this world. Outside the circle of firelight, the whole world felt as cold as a grave.

The Captain’s voice came again: “Agatha, how is it going on your side?”

“I am still moving forward. I am almost there. I can feel it. It is very close.”

“I meant you. Your voice does not sound the same as before.”

Agatha stopped walking.

She lowered her head. All she saw was her own wounded body, covered in scars, and the injuries that no longer bled.

“It is alright,” she said softly, her voice cold as a tomb. “It is a small matter.”

Chapter 415: Going Down the Shaft

Agatha shielded the small flame in her hand and stepped forward again, heading deeper into the Second Waterway.

In truth, she had already lost her sense of time. Even her sense of everything around her had grown blurry. She could no longer remember how long she had been walking in this cold, damp place. She could not remember how many Monsters she had killed, or how many new wounds she had gained in the process. For a while, she even forgot her own name and why she had come into this sewer.

But whenever the green flame leapt in her palm, she would always find her reason again and hold tight to that single, final mission.

Carry the Fire Seed. Deliver the Fire Seed into the nest of the Heretics.

A cold wind blew from the dark corridor ahead. It seemed to carry layers and layers of whispers and howls. Agatha's body swayed a little. She felt the malice inside the wind, so she carefully hid the flame inside the torn inner layer of her black coat.

She had to hide it. She could not let the Heretics sense it.

She raised her head and looked into the depths of the dark. She saw countless shifting Shadows rolling in the wind. The gas lamps on the corridor walls had dimmed at some point, leaving only tiny glimmers like fireflies. Filthy black sludge began to seep out from the ceiling and pipe grates around her, bit by bit. It squirmed, gathered, and took shape, making sickening, whispering noises.

Agatha lifted her Gatekeeper's cane, which was as scarred as she was. For some reason, she suddenly felt filled with strength again. That annoying sense of exhaustion had quietly faded away.

She slammed the Gatekeeper's cane hard against the ground, staring at the foul, corrupted things surging in the dark. The tip of the cane hit the floor with a boom like a great bell.

"Dong…"

The Shaft Lift creaked. The car swayed as it sank deeper into the mine. A Guardian warrior standing watch by the edge of the car suddenly looked up. He spoke to the Comrade next to him with some doubt: "Did you hear something just now?"

"It sounded like a dong," the other Guardian said, nervous and unsure. Then he turned his head almost by reflex to look at the Gatekeeper standing in the middle of the car. "Like… like…"

Like the sound when the Gatekeeper struck the Death Knell with the Gatekeeper's cane before a purification of Heretics began. He wanted to say that, but he kept it to himself.

Because the Gatekeeper was here. She was resting with her eyes closed.

Maybe she heard her subordinates talking, because Agatha opened her eyes. She glanced around, then walked in silence to the rail at the edge of the car and looked down.

"Gatekeeper," the Guardian who had spoken earlier came over and said, a bit hesitant: "It seemed like some sound came from below just now. Could there be someone else also acting in the mine?"

“We are the only ones here,” Agatha said without turning her head. “Do not worry about that sound.”

Her subordinate stepped back for the moment, but Agatha kept looking down into the endless, hazy dark below.

This was the Boiling Gold mine, the largest vertical shaft leading to the lower digging areas. Even this deep inside the mountain, the fog was still everywhere.

Under normal conditions, fog could never reach a place like this. But this strange mist was clearly the result of supernatural power. It seeped in everywhere as if it had a will of its own. In areas deep underground where the lights were weak, the mist filled every space as if it had appeared out of nowhere.

The mine’s Shaft Lift groaned as it kept descending through the haze. From time to time, they could see faint blobs of light moving upward. Those were gas lamps and electric lights set inside the shaft. They looked so weak that, through the fog, they were no more than tiny glimmers like fireflies.

But no matter what, the equipment in the mine was clearly still working. The ventilation system, power pipes, lighting, and lifting gear all still ran normally.

Using machines at a time like this called for extra care. Agatha had sent priests to check the condition of the lift machinery on purpose before she chose to use this Shaft Lift. The safer choice would have been to go down by the stairs and ramps in the emergency tunnel, but that would have cost too much time and strength.

“I just hope this thing does not break on the way back up,” a young Guardian warrior muttered under his breath. “That cargo car and track that crashed down the slope during the runaway state was pretty unforgettable.”

“Can you not say things like that right now?” an older Guardian frowned at once. “We are all on the Shaft Lift. If you are that nervous, you can jump off instead. Free falling will not break down on you.”

“No, no, I was just saying. This thing looks strong and steady. It will be fine…”

A Nun with ear-length short hair heard the two warriors talking and came over to join in: “But I heard there is a female Inquisitor in the far-off city-state of Pland. She can jump straight off a cliff onto the rocks below to cut down a Spawn. If she jumped from here, she would be fine…”

The two Guardians fell silent for two seconds, then spoke in unison: “…Is that even a human?!”

“I only heard about it…”

The warriors kept chatting. It would not affect what they had to do later, but it helped ease the tension of this slow descent into the dark. Guardians were people too. They needed to relax their nerves.

Agatha stood with her back to them. She did not join the talk, but she did not stop her subordinates either. She only listened quietly. At some point, a faint, almost hidden smile had appeared on her face.

Unlike what many imagined, the usually serious and steady Gatekeeper was in fact always gentle and tolerant with her subordinates.

Just then, the steel cables pulled tight and the sound of the brakes came from around them, cutting off the Guardians’ conversation.

The Shaft Lift car began to slow down and soon stopped in a wide, cold space.

“This is the transit point on the first level,” Agatha said as she looked around. She saw the nearest supports and lights, and the scattered mine equipment on the open ground nearby. The workers had clearly left in a rush and could not take everything with them. Traces of their hurried retreat were everywhere. “Where is the Mine Transit Map?”

“Here,” a priest stepped forward at once and handed the Mine Transit Map they had taken from the mining office to the Gatekeeper. “We are at Shaft No. 2 right now.”

Agatha took the map and walked off the Shaft Lift while comparing the information to her surroundings. At the same time, she recalled the details she had learned from the mine managers before going down: “The underground rail line to the digging zone has stopped running. To reach the digging zone we can only walk. We follow the red line markers. About one hundred and fifty meters from here there is a ramp that leads down to the mining face.”

She raised her head and checked the area again.

“First, check the surroundings and set up a safe point. Then we move deeper.”

The subordinates got to work at once. The Guardians went to check the safety of each passage. The priests and Nuns began simple purification of the ground around the Shaft Lift and set up a temporary altar and sacred relic.

Agatha wandered slowly around the area.

She stopped in front of a transport crate that had been left behind and knocked over.

The crate was made of iron. The inside was lined with tin layers. The lid had not been latched. When it fell, it had broken open, revealing its contents. Inside were chunks of ore broken into small pieces.

The ore had a dull metallic sheen. On the dark outer skin, faint gold lines ran like veins.

“They were probably samples meant to go up with the next shift for testing,” a middle-aged Guardian walked over and said, judging with some experience.

To scout the mine, about half of the subordinates Agatha brought this time were Guardians who had worked long-term in the Boiling Gold mining area. They were not professional Miners, but they still knew quite a bit about the place.

“Boiling Gold raw ore…”

Agatha’s face grew serious. She nudged a few pieces of ore on the ground with her Gatekeeper’s cane, then bent down and picked one up to examine.

A moment later, she handed the ore to the middle-aged Guardian: “Check it.”

“This is good quality ore,” the Guardian said after taking it. “Looks like it only needs simple crushing and first screening before it can go into The Crucible. I cannot say much about the yield… that needs a specialist.”

Agatha frowned: “That is all? No problem at all?”

“I see no problem. It is just ore,” the Guardian answered plainly. Then he looked a bit puzzled. “Do you suspect something?”

Agatha silently picked up another piece of Boiling Gold ore and studied it for a long time before she spoke softly: “What I am about to say is only a guess, but it is also classified. Only those taking part in this operation may hear it, and only after coming down the shaft.”

The Guardian facing her was startled for a second. But in the next moment, the warrior’s face was already solemn and steady.

Surprised, but not panicked. Caught off guard, but not lost.

Every priest who had the right to follow the Gatekeeper on a mission – whether Guardian, Nun, or priest – had already been chosen carefully inside the Church. They had all sworn oaths and signed contracts under Bartok's gaze.

Each of them knew how special their duty was. They knew how strange and difficult the cases that needed the Gatekeeper herself could be. On these deep dives into the dark, anything could become classified. Something ordinary one second could become a taboo that had to be shut out of the civilized world the next. Even the people who took part in the operation might at any time become part of the "secret".

After all, some things left a crack of corruption in the Mortal Realm the moment they were simply "known". Even leaving only an "impression" in the minds of those involved could plant Shadows for a future runaway state.

Agatha looked up and saw that the temporary altar and sacred relic were already in place. The safe point was set.

"Everyone, gather. I have something to announce."

Chapter 416: The Governor’s Whereabouts

Frostholm’s deepest mine tunnels had already run dry decades ago. The “lifeblood” that this city-state lived on was very likely only the result of some twisted power. At the bottom of the Boiling Gold mine, a door left behind by the first City Hall lay buried deep. The current City Hall and the Governor were very likely also part of this secret, and helped maintain it.

Even the well-trained, disciplined Guardians, who often dealt with all kinds of dangerous and uncanny things, could not help falling into shocked silence when they heard this.

After the shock, they also understood why this operation had been classified, and why the Gatekeeper had waited until everyone was already down in the shaft before revealing the exact situation.

News like this, even without considering the threat brought by the supernatural Visions behind it, would be enough to set off a storm in the city-state on the truth of the “exhausted vein” alone.

“We still cannot be sure whether all the tunnels ran dry decades ago, and we are even less sure what has been shipped out of this mine after the vein was exhausted. The only thing we can confirm is this: if all of this is really the product of some ‘corruption’, and if the Anomaly phenomena in the city-state are also tied to this corruption, then we are now standing at the origin and deepest point of that corruption.”

Agatha’s gaze swept over the subordinates around her. Her voice was as calm and steady as always.

“I believe everyone already knows what is happening on the surface. I also know you have had doubts. You wondered why, at such a critical moment, we sent one of our finest squads down here just to investigate a mine. I worry about the comrades fighting those monsters in the fog as much as you do. I worry about the battles in the surrounding seas.

“But we are also standing on a battlefield right now. If we can find out what is really going on in this mine, we will be helping our comrades elsewhere in the best possible way. We will be tracing the crisis back to its root, instead of getting trapped in endless attrition against those monsters in the thick fog.

“That is all. Does anyone have any questions?”

She looked around. What she saw on her subordinates’ faces was the same calm and firm resolve as always. She gave a small nod.

“All right, we move out. Our target is the lowest extraction level. Watch the darkness along the way, and keep checking the ventilation and lighting systems. When you came down, each of you received a Mine Rescue Respirator. Put your masks on now and open the external circulation valve. You all remember how to use them, right? If something happens, turn the valve clockwise to switch to internal circulation, pull out the self-rescue plug, and fall back toward the main drift at once. Keeping yourselves alive is the top priority.”

The Guardians and the priests and nuns moved at once. They put the respirator masks over their mouths and noses, checked the hoses and circulation valves, then clipped the special underground consecrated lanterns to the hooks on their chests so they would not slow their movements.

Agatha did not put on a mask. As the God of Death's Gatekeeper, her body was already very different from that of an ordinary person, especially when it came to "breathing". Normal toxic gases and a lack of air did not affect her actions.

Just as the subordinates were getting ready to set out, a light hissing sound suddenly reached Agatha's ears.

At first, she thought it was only the circulation valves on her people's masks as they breathed. But soon she realized the hissing came from farther away, outside the group, in the shadows beyond the reach of their lamps.

"Attention!" Agatha reacted at once and called out a warning. A second later, several other Guardian warriors also picked up the sound of a leaking valve in the darkness, and several beams of light swung toward that spot at the same time.

In the hazy mix of light and fog, Agatha saw a figure appear in that dark corner. It was someone wearing a thick black coat and a gas mask, and he seemed to be carrying a gun.

The figure lay collapsed in a pile of junk, breathing with great effort. The hissing sound was coming from his gas mask.

Why did someone suddenly appear here? The Guardians had already checked this whole junction. There was no way they could have missed such an obvious person.

A question flashed through Agatha's mind, but she did not hesitate. In a few quick steps she reached the figure, who already looked like he was dying. The Guardians followed right behind her.

"…He is a city-state soldier," one Guardian said at once, recognizing the gear on the fallen man. "From the Governor's own Guard Corps."

Agatha quickly looked the soldier over. Over his thick black coat he wore a metal breastplate. The power conduits that linked the breastplate to his arm guards were broken. His military respirator mask covered almost all of his face. She could only tell from his build that he was a male soldier. His fatal wound was near his chest. It looked as if his internal organs had been badly damaged.

One of his arms was already gone. His remaining hand still clutched his rifle.

The sudden light around him seemed to have stirred something. When Agatha came close, the soldier in the respirator mask suddenly moved a little, as if he was trying to lift his head.

The Guardians around them started in shock and grabbed their weapons on reflex. Agatha only waved a hand, stepped forward, and bent down a little.

“Who are you?” she asked.

“Governor… Guard Corps… Martin… Brad… sergeant…”

“Sergeant Brad, why are you here?”

“Governor… Winston…” The man who called himself Sergeant Brad from the Guard Corps spoke in a hoarse voice. The sound under his mask grew weaker and weaker. He said the Governor’s name and struggled to lift his arm, as if trying to point somewhere. “Mr Winston… went into a secret chamber… we need… backup…”

He did not finish. His arm suddenly went limp. From under the respirator mask came one last hiss that faded very fast.

He died. In the very next second, as his life left him, Agatha saw foul black sludge slowly seeping from his wound and from under his mask. His body collapsed as if it were melting, making a sticky, squirming sound that chilled the blood.

“replica!”

The Guardians reacted at once. They backed away in a hurry, while the priest with them stepped forward. He threw a handful of prepared powder over the collapsing corpse and then hurled a pale fireball at it.

With a bang, pale flame leapt up. The replica’s corpse was swallowed in an instant. After a fast, fierce burn, all that was left was a heap of dried, no-longer-moving black sludge and the heat that still hung in the air.

Agatha watched calmly. When the figure had first appeared, she had already guessed that it might be another replica that had crawled out of the thick fog. Now she turned in thought, looking toward the place that “Sergeant Brad” had tried to point to before he died.

“In that direction…” she murmured.

“Lady Gatekeeper, that was only a replica trying to lure us,” the priest beside her said, unable to hold back a warning when he heard her. “It could be an enemy trap.”

“But it seemed not to know it was a replica,” Agatha said with a small shake of her head. “Do you remember the intel we had before? These replicas seem to come in three kinds. One kind is dull and mindless, attacking any living person. One kind seems to be under control and causes damage in the city in an organized way. And the last kind seems to keep the original’s memories and feelings, and does not even notice it is a fake.”

The priest froze for a moment and spoke in a hesitant tone: “You mean…”

For a second, Agatha’s eyes looked a little complicated, but no one noticed that brief pause. After a moment of quiet thought, she spoke in her usual calm voice: “This replica was copied not long ago. He may still have his memories from a few hours ago, or even more recent. On the other hand, since we came down into the mine, all the messages from City Hall have been relayed by the Confidential Secretary. Governor Winston's whereabouts seem to be unknown."

The priest reacted quickly. He understood what Agatha meant.

"The replica is fake, but its memories are real," he said at once. "Not long ago, Governor Winston may really have come here with a squad of soldiers. One of them, a sergeant named Martin Brad, may have died in the tunnels. The thick fog then copied the newly dead sergeant and his memories."

"Perhaps that is the truth."

Agatha nodded slightly, then turned toward the tunnel that their hazy lamps lit.

No one knew what waited deeper in the extraction level. But Governor Winston clearly held truths that others did not. Now, at the key moment when the whole city was caught in Visions, he had led a squad of soldiers down into the depths of this mine. Without a doubt, the biggest clues were most likely in that direction.

"Thank you for showing the way."

Agatha turned back and gave a solemn nod toward the dried sludge that no longer looked human at all. Then she swung her hand toward her subordinates and said: "Stay with me. We are going to find the Governor's whereabouts."

…

At the same time, on the endless sea under a chaotic, dim sky, the twin ghost ships swept over the waves like the wind, passing through countless ship shadows, half-real and half-illusory.

Lawrence stood at the bow of the White Oak, looking down at the rolling sea beneath him.

Between the rising and falling waves, he could already see the distant city-state’s reflection.

Chapter 417: Running Through the Fog

In the Pocket Mirror he carried, Martha's figure appeared out of a cloud of black mist. Her voice reached Lawrence's ears: "Do you see the lights in the distance?"

"I see them," Lawrence said with a nod. He looked up at the strange scene ahead. A huge ink-black phantom floated on the sea, faintly shaped like the outline of the city-state, but with no details at all. Under the surface of the water, however, he saw the bright lights of The Harbor's docks and the buildings around the edge of the city. The White Oak, with no one steering it, was slowly moving closer to this zone where light and shadow were turned upside down. Countless hazy ship phantoms floated on the distant sea, as if locked in a battle. In this chaotic view of light and dark, real and unreal, he even felt as if he himself was becoming unreal. "It is an unbelievable sight… So this is what the world looks like when you watch it from the mirror world side…"

"Light and shadow are inverted in your sight, but in mine it looks normal. Soon all of this will flip again," Martha said with a small smile. "Go get ready. I will be docking soon. The spot is an abandoned pier at the south corner of the east harbor. I will bring the ship as close as I can to a sewer maintenance hatch. Bring your mirror. I will guide you all the way to the Second Waterway."

“And then… the other replicas will react, right?” Lawrence still could not help feeling worried. “If you really cannot hold them off, take the White Oak and the Black Oak and pull back first. At our speed, those replicas will never catch you.”

Martha rolled her eyes and said: “Of course. I am not stupid. My job is just to bring you here and buy you some time. I never planned to wipe out the whole mirror world Frostholm fleet with only two twin ghost ships. You cannot kill them all off.”

Lawrence nodded and turned to look behind him.

Anomaly 077 was squatting on the deck, playing with a length of rope he had found from who knew where. Now and then he looked up at the White Oak’s funnel and flagpole, and he seemed quite troubled.

“Do people in this age no longer hang sailors who make mistakes from the mast?” the mummified corpse muttered in puzzlement.

“Still thinking about your noose?” Lawrence raised his eyebrows at once, his tone unfriendly. “Put down the rope. Go to the First Mate and draw a saber and gun with ammo. We are going ashore.”

“In the past, as soon as someone put it around my neck, I would fall asleep. Why does it not work anymore…” Anomaly 077 was still muttering in confusion. Then he suddenly reacted. “Huh? Ashore? You are taking me with you this time?”

“A strange Anomaly to deal with a strange city-state. That suits me fine,” Lawrence said, face serious. “We are going through the Second Waterway into the depths of Frostholm. Do not waste time. Go get your weapons.”

The sailor froze for a second, then caught up and jumped to his feet. “Yes, Captain!”

The White Oak drew closer to that dark zone where real and unreal were inverted, closer to the lights reflected on the sea. Behind Lawrence, a tough, elite landing squad had already formed up.

First Mate Gus was not among them. Lawrence had ordered him to stay on the ship.

The old captain's face was grave as he laid out his orders: "There will be a hard fight after this. Every replica warship near The Harbor will react and attack the White Oak and the Black Oak. You will stay on board and command the battle. Hold them as long as you can. If you cannot, retreat with Martha."

"I understand," Gus said with a nod. But he could not help looking worriedly at the "sailor" behind Lawrence, who was still fiddling with his newly issued weapons. "But… is he really reliable?"

Lawrence glanced back. Anomaly 077, the "sailor", happened to lift his head at the same time. The mummified corpse had a saber at his waist, but he had tossed the rifle and ammo pouch onto a barrel nearby. He was muttering to himself: "The saber is enough. I do not know how to use this thing."

"As you like. If you think a single saber is enough to handle the Second Waterway of the mirror world city-state," Lawrence said casually. "For someone who cannot use a gun, having one only makes things worse."

The sailor thought for a moment, then still did not touch the rifle. Instead, he walked to the weapons crate at the side and took out another saber, hanging it on his belt as well.

Lawrence said nothing. He only lowered his head and looked at his own hand.

He slowly tightened his fingers into a fist, then opened them. He adjusted his breathing and awkwardly pictured, in his mind, a warship with sails of spirit form, burning with ghost flame. He recalled the feeling of that fire burning his body, and his flesh transforming in the flames.

After a long while, he saw a faint green glow appear in the lines of his palm. Tiny flames slowly flowed along the creases.

The deck under his feet gave a slight tremor as the White Oak began to slow. The hazy darkness beyond the rail was now very close. From the Pocket Mirror at his chest came Martha's voice.

"Attention. We are about to dock. After that I will use Inversion again and cancel the Twin Projection. Jump to the pier on the left side and go straight. I will guide you."

"I am ready," Lawrence said softly. He took a slow breath and walked to the rail.

"I am ready too!" Anomaly 077 followed close behind the captain. His hoarse, dark voice held a strange hint of excitement and expectation. "Ashore! Battle! The pirate is here!"

"We are not pirates," Lawrence said, giving the mummified corpse a look. "We are honorable seafarers."

"Docking now," Martha's voice came from the mirror almost at the same time. "Three, two, one… Inversion!"

In an instant, light and shadow shifted. Real and unreal swapped places.

Everything around Lawrence seemed to flicker hard. Then the reflection in the sea rose, and the darkness in front of him reversed, as if he had passed through an invisible mirror in a single heartbeat. Frostholm's docks and piers appeared in front of him. The damp, icy chill that had always clung to him here, as if he were soaked in seawater, vanished at once.

A second later, he saw a patch of black suddenly rise on the sea beside the White Oak. Out of that shadow, the Black Oak's silhouette rushed into view.

After the Inversion of light and shadow, the Black Oak also broke free from the state of being the White Oak's reflection. The two ships now appeared side by side on the sea as twin warships, ready to fight together.

In a heartbeat, pillars of light sprang up along the docks. Sirens wailed in the distant streets. The wind howled in The Harbor with a wild, chaotic sound. From far away came the hurried boom of warship guns, like thunder in a storm.

Their response was this fast?!

Lawrence was startled, but his reaction did not slow. He kicked the rope ladder over the side and leapt out first: "Move!"

The landing squad of a dozen hardened sailors rushed onto the pier, following the route Martha gave them toward a distant intersection. Lawrence ran in the lead.

The cold wind howled past his ears. In the distance, the sirens and gunfire sounded broken and distorted. Under the dim, chaotic sky, Lawrence gripped his revolver in one hand and his sword in the other, sprinting through this twisted ghost city of the mirror world. Martha's voice kept coming.

"At the crossroads ahead, turn left and skirt the guard post… Go straight, then take the alley on the right. The entrance is at the end…"

Behind him were the hurried, messy steps of the sailors. In their hands were weapons they trusted. At his ear was the voice of the woman who matched him perfectly.

Lawrence ran faster and faster. For a moment, he felt as if the age and fatigue piled up over decades were falling away from his body. His heart beat like that of a young man. His blood rushed through his veins as it had in his prime. Those wild, high-spirited years returned to his mind.

They were back. All of them were back.

He strode forward, swinging his arms. Faint green fire appeared like a phantom behind him. At his side and behind him, similar emerald flames began to appear on one sailor after another. Their flesh-and-blood bodies took on a ghostly, unreal shimmer in the fire.

Anomaly 077's wailing voice rose beside him: "Captain! I am scared!"

"If you are scared, stay close to the squad!" Lawrence grinned, his voice oddly joyful. "This city cannot stop us!"

Anomaly 077 ran beside him, still wailing: "It is you I am scared of!"

"Then get used to it. I am not retiring anymore, and you can forget it too!"

Lawrence shouted with cheerful force. He did not care at all that his loud voice might expose the squad, or that their wild charge down the streets might draw the city's guards.

From the start, this was never going to be a "stealth" mission. The moment these uninvited guests stepped into the city of the mirror world, this living city had already reacted.

Fog slowly spread along the streets. In the strange, dim mist, shadowy shapes began to appear.

"The street is fogging up!" he shouted. "Martha, is this normal?"

"The fog marks the threshold. In fog, it is hardest to tell mirrors from reality. Keep moving. Do not worry about the fog that is seeping in from the Mortal Realm. The entrance is just ahead."

“Got it!”

Lawrence answered at the top of his voice and led the sailors into the mist. Inside it, one warped, swaying shape after another rose to its feet. Their bodies were twisted. They had the wrong number of eyes. They snarled and whispered in the fog, staggering toward the squad.

Lawrence raised his gun, but before he or the sailors could fire, a burst of dense gunshots came from the far side of the mist.

A spider-like Steam Walker suddenly appeared in the fog. Fully armed city-state Guard Corps soldiers had built a barricade around the walker. The rifles in the soldiers’ hands and the gun turret on top of the Steam Walker spat fire, tearing the monsters in the mist to pieces in an instant.

Lawrence ran past the edge of the battle zone, staring in shock at the Guard Corps that had appeared out of nowhere. A second later, the soldiers and the Steam Walker vanished back into the thick fog. All that remained where they had stood was a pile of broken rubble.

“We are here. The sewer entrance. At the end of the passage below there is a shaft lift that goes straight to the Second Waterway!”

Chapter 418: Nearing Midnight

Gunfire roared. The steam engine drove the heavy mechanical spider as it turned its body. The Six-Barrel Machine Gun spun and spat angry tongues of fire in all directions, sweeping like a reaper through the monsters that kept rising out of the fog. From time to time, bullets also came flying from the thick mist, smashing into the walker's armor and the sandbags that made up the barricade.

Among the monsters there were also "soldiers": some were fully armed soldiers, and there were even walking mechanical spiders with black sludge flowing over them.

As the battle went on, these dangerous enemies only grew in number.

"These sons of bitches are copying us!"

A soldier wearing a breathing mask hid behind the barricade. He squeezed the trigger like mad while shouting in rage. The metal armor on his body was covered in scars. The power tubes at the joints were damaged, hissing steam from broken valves. On the steam backpack on his back, the insignia of Frostholm's elite garrison was clearly visible.

"They're copying more than just us," the squad commander shouted. His voice sounded hoarse and dull behind the breathing mask. The fog in the street was getting worse, and to avoid any possible poison in it, all garrison troops entering the combat zone now wore these fearsome masks. "Anything living that appears in the fog is the enemy, it's all the enemy!"

“I just saw a group of people run past the crossroads up ahead!” another soldier suddenly yelled. “They looked like armed commoners—or sailors from a ship!”

“I saw them too. It was blurry, but they looked like they were burning, and the fire was green!”

The squad commander lifted his head when he heard this. But the next second, a strange whistling suddenly came from the other side of the thick fog, sharp and shrieking, wrapped in death.

A Grenade Shell tore through the fog, slipped through a gap between the barricades, and fell right at the feet of the Steam Walker. There was no time to react. The Grenade Shell exploded, and shrapnel burst out like rain.

The thin metal breastplates could not stop such a deadly blast at such close range. The squad commander and his soldiers were blown away together.

He did not know how much time passed before he slowly regained a bit of clarity. In the corner of his eye, he saw the Steam Walker sway and topple over. Its armor was torn open, every power tube spewed white mist, and the last remaining gun turret scattered one last burst of bullets as it fell.

Countless vague, shifting shapes came out of the fog and surged toward the next crossing.

The squad commander slowly tried to move his body. He found that his hand was clenched tight around a Hand Grenade with its pin already pulled. He could no longer remember when he had picked it up—maybe when he was thrown by the blast, or maybe during the time he was unconscious and his body just reacted on its own.

He felt as if he used up all his strength to throw the Hand Grenade into the fog.

But all he really did was let go.

The gray metal cylinder slipped from his hand, clattered as it rolled across the street, and its fuse spat thin smoke. It rolled to the side of the road and dropped into a dry drainage channel. It passed through the darkness, fell into a crack, slid along a slanted vent shaft, and dropped into Frostholm's time-worn underground world, into the forgotten dark beneath the city, where it exploded.

"Boom!"

A muffled blast came from somewhere far overhead. The ceiling of the tunnel trembled a little, and a bit of dust and grit rained down.

The "sailor" shrank his neck at once. His shriveled face showed a hint of nervousness: "This place really isn't going to collapse, right?!"

"It hasn't collapsed for decades," Lawrence said as he walked forward. The gas lamps set in the corridor walls on both sides gave off a weak glow that lit the way ahead. "And you're a mummified corpse. How can you be so timid? You're an Anomaly. You're the one who's supposed to scare other people."

"I think… digging such a huge space under a city is already scary enough," Anomaly 077 said with a tense voice. "What were you people thinking…"

Lawrence shrugged. "How would I know? I wasn't the one who dug it."

Then he ignored the mummified corpse and lowered his head to speak to the Pocket Mirror on his chest: "Martha, how is it on your side?"

"Very lively," Martha's voice came from the mirror. In the background, there were faint sounds of distant explosions and cannon fire. "After you entered the second waterway, the whole mirror world world went 'crazy'—every ship in and around The Harbor is firing at me."

"Are you all right?"

“I’m not that easy to sink. But the bad part is that the enemy isn’t easy to sink either. They keep getting reinforced from their reflections.”

Lawrence fell silent for a moment and looked into the deep, dark corridor ahead.

“How far is it from here to the deepest point?” he asked.

“Very far. But you can take a ‘shortcut’.”

Lawrence frowned. “Shortcut?”

“Did you notice the pools of water on the floor? Find a signpost, then find the puddle closest to that sign. Look at the scene in the reflection.”

Puzzled, Lawrence followed Martha’s instructions. He walked to a puddle that matched what she said and looked down at the reflection.

In the reflection he saw a crossroads. On the wall beside the crossing, a metal plaque hung. He could faintly read the words “Upper City Main Sewage Conduit” on it.

He opened his eyes wide and looked up at the wall beside him.

On the wall next to him, the worn plaque clearly said “The Harbor District Sewage.”

Martha’s voice came from the mirror: “Do you see? The world inside the mirror world is not continuous.”

“…Unbelievable… it’s like a dream…” Lawrence murmured. He looked down again at the puddle at his feet. Even as one of the most experienced captains on the Boundless Sea, he had to admit that everything in this city of mirror world was far beyond his imagination. But soon he calmed himself. “So how do we use these ‘shortcuts’?”

“You already have,” Martha said with a laugh. “Once you stand in front of this ‘mirror’ long enough, you’re already there.”

Lawrence stared for a moment, then hurriedly looked up.

In front of him was a crossroads. Dim, yellow gas lamps were mounted on the corridor walls at the intersection. On the nearest plaque, faded letters could still be read:

Upper City Main Sewage Conduit.

Anomaly 077 stared in shock at the suddenly changed surroundings. His gaze darted between the plaques on the wall and the reflections in the puddles. After a long moment, he suddenly shouted: “Is this reasonable?!”

All the sailors around them turned their eyes to the mummified corpse at the same time.

Lawrence paid no attention to the “sailor’s” reaction. He just looked thoughtfully at the dark corridor ahead, and after a long while he frowned and spoke to Martha: “We’re already in the second waterway, but where are the ‘helpers’ you mentioned before? Where are the Queenguard Corps who are fighting in the second waterway?”

The sound of distant cannon fire came from the mirror. Martha’s voice took a few seconds to reach Lawrence’s ears: “Take the left fork. Follow the red markers. Walk until there’s no road left, then stop and wait… They’ll appear. When the time comes, they’ll appear.”

Lawrence frowned. “The time?”

“…The Queenguard Corps attack at midnight, at zero o’clock—every night at zero o’clock. Before that time, they can’t be seen.”

…

In the secret room of the underground contact point beneath the “Golden Flute” tavern, the “Old Ghost” lying on the bed suddenly opened his eyes.

“What time is it…”

The old man’s eyes were still a bit blank. He muttered like someone talking in his sleep. But in the dim room, the only answer was the occasional beep from some listening device, and faint, far-off gunfire coming from who knew where.

The next second, the Old Ghost’s eyes widened.

Faint, far-off gunfire?

Gunfire!

The old man woke up at once. The gunshots reached his ears, thin and hazy, as if they passed not only through thick walls and floors, but also through several decades of time. He scrambled up from the bed and grabbed the thing leaning against the bedside.

It was a Heavy Wrench that he kept by his side even when he slept.

It was his tool, and also his weapon.

“It’s started… it’s started… I can’t sleep here… it’s time to assemble…”

The Old Ghost muttered to himself. His hands shook as he put on his shoes, then he threw on the coat that hung on the nearby chair. After that he lifted his head and looked at the room where he had just been sleeping.

This was the secret room used to communicate with the Sea Mist Fleet. Nemo had arranged for him to rest here and keep an eye on the equipment.

But the next second, the Old Ghost seemed to forget everything about this room. His eyes went cloudy again, and he looked in confusion toward the door not far away.

“Oh! The door is here!”

The Old Ghost suddenly understood and looked pleased. He rushed over and pulled open the iron door that led into the underground passage.

On the other side of the door was a narrow, cold corridor. The lights in the corridor flickered on and off, and a hissing sound came from the gas pipes due to low pressure.

“The gas line isn’t working right… not enough pressure… no, no, this isn’t the time to worry about that…” The Old Ghost stared at the lights in the corridor while he muttered quickly. He stepped forward, but then seemed to remember something and turned back to look at the secret room where he had rested.

The room was empty.

Everyone else was probably gathered upstairs in the tavern.

“Crow, I’m heading out. You stay home and behave yourself!”

The Old Ghost shouted into the empty room. Then he turned around, picked up his Heavy Wrench that never left him, and slowly walked into the deep, dark passage.

He walked toward the second waterway.

The time for the Queenguard Corps to counterattack had come.

—

Chapter 419: No Way Through?

The fog had already begun to seep into the second waterway. The hazy, dim mist floated near the ceiling of the sewer corridor like thin gauze. It felt as if the heavy roof above had vanished, and the second waterway was being slowly swallowed by the “sky.”

A short old man wrapped in a worn coat walked quickly through the strange, silent sewer corridor. Decades had worn down his body. For many years he had not been able to move this fast. Yet somehow, today, in this moment, he felt light again. It was as if youth had returned to this old shell. The ache in his joints and the weakness in his muscles were gone.

He walked faster and faster. The Heavy Wrench in his hand no longer felt as heavy as when he started. He rushed through corridors and forks from his memories, running toward a place he could no longer clearly remember, but that felt deeply familiar.

He had to catch up with the main force, because the time to assemble was almost here.

Suddenly, a pile of collapsed rubble blocked his way.

“No road… no road?” The old man stopped. He stared in confusion at the fallen stones in front of him and whispered to himself. His muddled memories scrambled in his mind, trying to explain the collapse. He seemed to recall something—

Oh, it was explosives. The Guard Corps had blown up charges in the corridor after they withdrew through the shaft to block the rebels who broke into the sewers…

But that was not right. Not all of it. This collapsed spot was not just to stop the rebels. Many years ago, when that young soldier lit the fuse… the corridor came down and blocked something else…

The Old Ghost stood blankly before the blocked passage. Then he bent over and tapped the stones with his Heavy Wrench, mumbling under his breath.

This road should be open. It had to be open, or he would never reach the assembly point. But it had collapsed. What should he do? A wrench could not fix a cave-in…

A patch of hazy fog suddenly appeared in his sight. The Old Ghost stopped tapping the stones and slowly lifted his head. He instinctively took half a step back. He saw wisps of mist leaking from the gaps in the rubble and spreading out, filling the whole corridor and covering his view.

He heard distant whispers and roars in the fog. Then it seemed like a hoarse voice shouted: “Is this reasonable?!”

But no one appeared in the mist. As the fog drifted, the Old Ghost only saw that the pile of rubble blocking the passage had vanished.

The corridor that had been sealed off was open again. The gas lamp on the wall opposite glowed dimly. In the murky depths of the corridor, he could faintly see black sludge that looked as if it had dried up decades ago, lying still in an equally dried drainage channel.

“The road is open… good, the road is open…”

The Old Ghost’s mind blurred for a moment. He seemed to want to think about why the collapsed rocks had suddenly vanished, but the question soon drowned in his tangled memories. Without any hesitation, he stepped forward into the corridor wrapped in gloom.

…

Agatha suddenly lifted her head. The guardians, priests, and nuns following at her side all stopped at once. Everyone tensed up, ready for anything that might emerge from the fog.

“Did you hear footsteps?” After two or three seconds, Agatha finally broke the silence. “Footsteps other than ours.”

“Yes,” a nun answered with a small nod. “Just for a moment. Very faint, but very close, as if…”

“As if they overlapped with ours,” Agatha said, her face serious. At the same time, her gaze slowly swept over the nearby mine tunnel.

They were already in the depths of the Boiling Gold mine. Following the direction that “Sergeant Brad” had pointed out, Agatha and the team she led had reached this tunnel through the only passage on this side. Even this deep underground, the fog was still everywhere.

The lighting system still worked. Dim yellow light shone on the supports in the tunnel and on the tracks underfoot. Yet in the shifting shadows, there seemed to be something wrong.

Agatha saw two identical support pillars on the opposite wall. From the grain of the wood to the stain marks, every detail on the pillars was like a mirror world.

In another direction, she saw several overhead beams crisscrossed in a heap. Where they crossed, they seemed to melt into one another.

One of the priests raised a consecrated lantern and stepped up to one of the strange supports. After watching it closely for a moment, he spoke in a low voice: “Gatekeeper…”

“I see it,” Agatha cut him off. Her tone was still calm. “It’s obvious that the space where the replicas exist is overlapping with our Mortal Realm.”

“The space where the replicas exist?” a guardian repeated without thinking.

Agatha fell silent for a moment, and that annoying haze seemed to touch her again. She raised a hand to rub her forehead. “Yes. All the replicas should come from the time and space of one Anomaly. The evidence we have now shows that this Anomaly’s time and space is slowly drawing close to our Mortal Realm. Maybe… maybe we can call it a ‘mirror world’…”

She spoke with a trace of doubt. It felt as if certain pieces of knowledge just rose naturally in her mind. She said these things without thinking, then suddenly felt something odd in her body—

Cold. Boundless cold. It was as if she stood in a bitter, icy corridor, and the blood in her veins had lost all warmth.

The next second, the strange feeling vanished. The illusion of standing in some lonely, freezing passage faded away. She blinked and saw her loyal subordinates still gathered around her. The glow of the consecrated lanterns and gas lamps quickly chased away the chill that lingered in her mind.

“…Is it because there’s not enough time… or because it’s too close…” Agatha muttered under her breath.

The nearby subordinates did not hear her whisper.

One guardian warrior was holding up a consecrated lantern and checking the surroundings. Suddenly, he seemed to notice something: “Gatekeeper, there’s someone lying here!”

Agatha snapped back to herself. Her expression hardened, and she strode to the spot the warrior had found.

A warrior in the elite Guard Corps gear of the city-state lay in the tunnel. He looked like he had been dead for a long time.

He wore a black combat coat with a metal breastplate over it, and power bracers driven by a steam engine on his arms. A steam backpack was strapped to his back, and a thick breathing mask covered his face.

Agatha bent down and wiped the blood from the nameplate on the warrior's chest with her fingers. She stared at the name for a few seconds.

"It's Sergeant Brad," she said softly.

"The blood is red. The body didn't break apart or melt," a priest said beside her. "This is the 'original'."

Agatha did not answer right away.

The situation matched her judgment. The real Sergeant Brad had fallen here in the tunnel, while his replica had appeared to the church troops going down into the mine under the influence of the fog. The replica was false, but the information was true.

"There's another body here!"

Soon, another guardian warrior at the front of the team raised his consecrated lantern high and called out.

More bodies appeared in the tunnels ahead.

Agatha quickly led the group forward. Deeper in the mine, they found more and more of the dead—warriors from the city-state's elite Guard Corps, the trusted warriors of Governor Winston.

They had died in many ways. Some bodies were torn by blades. Some had crushed injuries from heavy blows. Some had gunshot wounds.

Near these bodies, Agatha and her subordinates also found dried black sludge. If that sludge were pieced back into human form, their numbers would likely be far greater than those of the fallen Guard Corps soldiers.

“…A hard battle that lasted a long time. This unit met an enemy far larger than itself in the tunnels. Yet they still fought their way forward for hundreds of meters… Most of the warriors ran out of bullets. In the end, they fought with bayonets and steam gauntlets.”

Agatha studied the nearest bodies, reading the marks left on them and the traces in the tunnel as she spoke. At the same time, a heavy unease grew in her heart.

Many warriors had fallen. Governor Winston’s group was clearly in a bad situation. This battle might have broken out several hours ago—after so much time, was the governor still alive?

As if to answer her worry, a guardian warrior clearing the way ahead suddenly stopped.

“Gatekeeper, there’s no road ahead!”

“No road ahead?” Agatha was shocked and strode forward at once.

It was just as the guardian said.

The team had reached the end of the tunnel, and in front of them was a smooth, solid wall. The path ended here.

But this clearly was not normal.

Agatha quickly turned to look back the way they had come. She saw the fallen Guard Corps soldiers lying still in the dark. Among those bodies, she did not see Governor Winston.

“Maybe the governor realized this way was blocked and took his men in another direction…” the priest guessed aloud.

“There was only one path,” Agatha shook her head at once. “And judging by the signs left here, I don’t think Governor Winston had any chance to lead the remaining guards to another route.”

The priest frowned. “But this way is blocked…”

Agatha did not answer him. Instead, she turned again and slowly walked up to the smooth wall.

After a brief hesitation, she reached out and tried to touch it.

Her fingers sank straight into the wall.

Chapter 420: Return to the Crawling Dark

Agatha pulled her hand back at once and stared at her fingertips in shock and confusion.

But the nearest accompanying Nun had already seen this strange scene. The Nun's eyes widened in surprise as she said: "Gatekeeper, just now your hand…"

Agatha frowned and for a moment did not know what was going on. Just then, a Guardian warrior stepped forward. He carefully lifted his combat Gatekeeper's cane and tapped the solid stone wall that looked no different from the rock around it.

The Gatekeeper's cane struck the wall with a sharp sound, but nothing changed on the stone surface.

The Guardian turned his head and gave Agatha a slight nod. Then he gathered his courage, stepped up, and pressed his palm directly against the wall.

Nothing happened. The wall was still just a wall.

"It is only a wall," the Guardian said with a frown. "But just now…"

Agatha said nothing. She stepped forward in silence and once again reached her fingers toward the wall.

In the next second, she watched as her fingers sank into it again!

There was no resistance at all. She even felt as if she had only touched a layer of the Veil made of phantoms.

“It seems only you can pass through it,” the accompanying priest said. He stared at the scene in shock, then turned his head in disbelief and said: “But… why is it like this? Why would there be a wall like this deep in the Boiling Gold mine? No one has ever reported it before…”

Agatha ignored the priest’s exclamation. She still said nothing and stared hard at the fingers she had thrust into the stone wall. From an angle only she noticed, she finally saw a tiny change where her fingertips touched the wall.

Her fingers and the stone at that spot seemed to melt at the same time. They melted only a little, yet they blended together like heated butter. Their color and texture looked like black sludge.

This was how she had “passed through” that seemingly solid stone wall.

She did not know how long she stayed there before she finally broke the silence in a low voice: “I do not know why this is happening, but clearly… what comes next can only be done by me.”

“Gatekeeper?” The priest was startled and reacted at once. “You want to go in alone?! Wait, it is far too unsafe. There is something very wrong with this wall. If you rush in now, you might…”

“Our city-state is being swallowed by thick fog. The Twisted Beings in the mist have no mercy. The power behind them will not wait for us to finish finding the truth before it moves,” Agatha said as she slowly shook her head. Her voice was as calm and steady as always. “Governor Winston’s team finally reached this place, yet his body is not here. Now it seems that these fallen guards held out to the last more to delay time in the tunnels… If I am not wrong, they were buying time for the Governor to pass through this wall."

The priest did not know how to answer at first. After a few seconds of silence, he spoke on instinct: "But it is still too dangerous for you to go alone. At the very least, we should report this to the Cathedral…"

"There is no time, truly no time," Agatha said as she turned around, slowly but firmly shaking her head. As she spoke, she again felt that cold that wrapped her whole body and sank into her bones. She almost clearly felt her blood slowly stop flowing, and the matter that made up her body lose its life. The discomfort only lasted a short moment, but it still made her tone even firmer: "I must find out the secret of this mine. In the last bit of time that may be left, this might be the only thing I can…"

She suddenly stopped. She forced her thoughts and words to a halt and did her best to smooth her face back to calm. Then she looked seriously at the subordinates in front of her.

"I will pass through this wall. You know the power of a Gatekeeper. You do not need to worry about me. You have your own tasks. After I go through, you are to turn back at once and return along the route to the last junction. Then the first and second teams will continue to the excavation area as planned and find out the real situation in the Boiling Gold tunnels. The third and fourth teams will return to the surface and report what happened here to the Cathedral. Then…"

She paused for a few seconds, as if her thoughts suddenly broke off. Then she waved her hand and said: "That is all. For the rest, follow Bishop Ivan's orders."

The Guardian, the priest, and the Nuns could not help looking at one another. It was the first time they had seen the Gatekeeper act like this, and they could not help feeling uneasy and at a loss. But under Agatha's unusually serious gaze, and with the professional discipline that long training had turned into instinct, obedience to orders became their natural response.

“Yes, we have received the order,” the leading priest said with solemn care as he nodded. He drew the Triangular Sigil of Bartok over his chest, then could not help asking: “When do you need us to come and meet you?”

“…There is no need. But do not worry, I will come back. No matter what happens, ‘I’ will come back.”

The priest stepped back. No one heard the faint, subtle change in her tone when she spoke the word “I.”

Agatha let out a slow breath and walked toward the dark wall.

Just before she touched it, she spoke softly one last time, as if whispering to someone, yet also as if speaking to herself:

“To be honest… I really do like this world…”

She stepped forward without hesitation. Her body slipped into the “stone wall” without the slightest hindrance, like one phantom merging into another.

For an instant, faint ripples appeared on the surface of the wall, but they vanished completely before anyone could see them clearly.

Darkness. Cold. No support, no way to tell up from down or left from right. Then all her senses seemed to vanish at once, only to return to her in a slow and strange way. This was all that Agatha felt after she crossed the wall.

She did not know how much time passed before she opened her “eyes” in the dark, only to find that she still could not see anything around her.

Everywhere she looked was endless chaos. Faint clumps of darkness crawled slowly across an even darker background. They looked like some sticky, disgusting fluid, and also like huge, nameless beasts slowly creeping along.

Why was it so dark? Had she not brought a consecrated lantern when she came?

The question rose in Agatha's mind. Almost as soon as she thought it, a glimmer of light really appeared before her eyes.

The faint light lit up the area around her. She saw that she was floating in boundless black mist. Countless vague shapes crawled and flowed all around her, yet they made no sound.

Agatha watched this scene in silence, then lowered her head.

Her body came into her sight. First her torso, then her hands and feet, and then the combat Gatekeeper's cane that had been with her for many years.

"Ah… you are here too…"

Agatha spoke in a soft murmur. She slowly raised the Gatekeeper's cane in her hand and looked at the familiar patterns on it, and at the name she had carefully carved there when she first received this cane as a Guardian.

"Are you also a shadow, just like me?" she asked the Gatekeeper's cane in a soft voice.

Of course, the Gatekeeper's cane did not answer her. But in the darkness, something else suddenly made a sound.

"Bang!"

It was a gunshot.

Agatha frowned at once, but before she could look toward the source of the sound, a voice that sounded a bit tense reached her ears first: "Who is there?!"

In the darkness, Agatha turned her head. Almost at the same time, she saw a sudden glimmer of light in the direction of the voice.

A small patch of solid ground appeared there, lit by an old-style brass consecrated lantern. On the open ground she could see something like a tree stump. A middle-aged man in a dark blue coat leaned against the stump, looking like a motionless statue.

As Agatha's gaze fell on him, the "statue" suddenly moved. He jerked his head up and looked toward Agatha with surprise and tension: "Who is there?!"

Agatha felt a faint sense that something was off, but she soon put it aside. She walked toward the patch of ground lit by the consecrated lantern and saw the middle-aged man's face clearly.

It was no surprise at all. He was the Governor of the city-state of Frostholm, Mr. Winston.

"It seems you have been here for a long time, Governor," Agatha said calmly. "Now there are only the two of us left here."

"Gatekeeper… Lady Agatha?" Winston lifted his head slowly. He moved like a wind-up Doll that had worn down badly, and even his words came out slow. But as time passed, his speech and expression slowly grew more lively and smooth. "You came as well… Wait, how are you here?"

"I passed through a wall, a wall deep in the Boiling Gold mine," Agatha said in a calm voice. She knew there was no need for any more hiding or circling around. "The Guard Corps you brought has been wiped out in the tunnels, Governor. Do you still remember them?"

"The Guard Corps… oh, the Guard Corps I brought," Winston said, frowning as if he had only just remembered. Then a hint of sorrow entered his voice. “They were all fine people. They did their best so that I could use the key left by the Queen, but I…”

Agatha’s expression changed at once: “The key left by the Queen?”

Chapter 421: Driving Toward the Abyss

“The key left by the Queen?”

Agatha’s expression changed at once. She fixed her eyes on Governor Winston.

But he looked even more surprised than she was. Winston’s eyes were full of shock: “You do not know? Then how did you come into this place?”

Agatha’s face grew serious. She realized the situation was not quite what she had imagined. When she first noticed that she could “enter” the stone wall, she had thought that Governor Winston, who came here before her, was the same kind of being as she was. But now it seemed that the Governor had used some other means.

He held more secrets than she had expected.

“I had my own way,” Agatha said slowly, and her tone carried a pressure she did not intend. “You just mentioned ‘the key left by the Queen.’ What exactly is it?”

Winston looked at the Gatekeeper with doubt, but after a moment of hesitation he let out a sigh of relief and reached into the pocket at his chest.

“Very well. We have already come this far. There is no need to keep secrets anymore.”

He took a small object from his pocket. It was a brass key with rich patterns on it. The handle of the key looked like a sideways “8,” or the infinity symbol in mathematics. Its head did not have the usual teeth of a common key, but was a short round rod with grooves.

Agatha studied the thing in his hand with interest. Suddenly she felt that it did not look like a key for opening doors at all, but rather like the kind of thing used to wind up a Doll or other clockwork device.

“A clockwork key?” she said before she could stop herself. “You mean this was left by Queen Ray Nora? Why is it in your hands as Governor?”

“The Governors passed it down from one to the next. This key is the gift the Queen left to the rebels, and also… the curse,” Winston said, pulling at the corner of his mouth in a bitter smile that even held a trace of fear. “From the moment the first Governor took the key, the Shadows behind Frostholm have hung over our heads, Gatekeeper.”

Agatha did not interrupt the weak-looking middle-aged man as he rambled on like someone muttering in his sleep. She waited patiently until he finished, then spoke in a calm tone: “You actually know the true situation of the Boiling Gold mine, do you not?”

“If you mean that the Boiling Gold mine already showed signs of drying up in the Queen’s time… yes, I knew,” Winston said with a soft sigh, speaking openly. “I am sorry. I knew from the very beginning what was going on with the door you found. But I thought there was still time, that I could set everything back on track before the situation grew worse. If that had worked, what you found would have been just an abandoned tunnel, and Frostholm… would still be the prosperous Frostholm it used to be.”

“I need an explanation, Governor,” Agatha said, her face serious and her tone a little cold. “If the Boiling Gold mine already ran dry in the Queen’s time, then what have we been digging up and shipping out for these past decades? And what is the link between the mine's exhaustion and the Visions in the city-state today, and the actions of those cultists?"

"Boiling Gold is still Boiling Gold, Gatekeeper. What we dug up was Boiling Gold. What we shipped out was also Boiling Gold, true and solid," Winston said, lifting his head with a face that looked half like a smile and half like a grimace. "It is not some corruption. We tested it, and they also tested it in the Queen's time. If something looks like Boiling Gold, is used as Boiling Gold, and its effects and byproducts are no different from normal Boiling Gold, then without a doubt it should be Boiling Gold."

"All of that really was Boiling Gold?!" Agatha opened her eyes wide. This answer was especially hard for her to imagine. "But the mine dried up decades ago. The ore now appearing in the tunnels…"

"That is exactly what is most terrifying and strange, is it not?" Winston said with a bitter smile. "The vein ran dry, yet soon new ore would fill certain corners where no one's gaze ever reached. It was as if there were a false Frostholm, a city-state parallel to the Mortal Realm, pouring ore into our Mortal Realm world without end. Or rather… once the mine reached a certain depth, we were always mining from a mirror world world. Yet once those phantom, unreasonable things were dug out, no matter how we tested them, they all turned out to be real."

Agatha listened with a stern face. These unbelievable truths crashed into her mind, which had already often felt hazy in recent days. But she still kept her calm and spoke in a low voice: "mirror world Frostholm… Governor, you are right. There really is a mirror world Frostholm. The fog now covering the city-state, and the replicas that appear again and again in the mist, all come from that mirror world city. That mirror world city-state is slowly Corrupting and replacing our Mortal Realm world."

Winston's expression changed slightly. Then he stayed silent for more than ten seconds before finally letting out a long sigh: "Ah, so this is the price for all that Boiling Gold."

"Price? You make that word sound too light. It is not only you and me paying the price now, but everyone in the city-state, and most of them do not even know what is happening…"

"But most of them enjoy everything that the Boiling Gold trade brings. In this city of extreme cold, it is Boiling Gold that lets everyone have warm homes and enough food. It is Boiling Gold that lets us keep a fairly rich standard of life even after the sea cliffs collapsed, Gatekeeper," Winston said.

Winston paused for a few seconds at this point, then waved his hand.

"You should know this. I am never extravagant. I own no houses and keep no private wealth. I do not even have an heir. Lady, everything I have done was not for my own desire."

Agatha used her gaze on the Governor's eyes, but deep within them she saw only weariness.

"None of them had any choice…"

She spoke in a low voice, almost as if talking to herself.

"It is that no one has any choice," Winston said, shaking his head. "I know what you mean. The road we walk today, the price we pay today, was not chosen by the citizens of the city-state. But it was not chosen by me either. No one had any other path to take.

"The city-state is only so big. There is no second Frostholm on the Boundless Sea where we can stand. We need food, fuel, houses, and clean fresh water. We need Boiling Gold, even if it comes from a strange world of Shadows. Without Boiling Gold, in only one winter a quarter of the city-state would die. In a few years, the rest would go back step by step to the dark Age of City-States before the boom of industry, and we would go on losing a quarter or even more of our people…”

“Gatekeeper, rest a while. You are as tired as I am. Perhaps now we should accept one fact. The city-state is a steam locomotive driving toward the abyss, and everyone is sitting on it. The only difference between a Guardian of the City-State and an ordinary person is that the ordinary folk live, eat, and drink with their eyes covered, while we… keep our eyes open.”

Agatha paid no attention to Winston’s despairing speech. She simply stood there in the darkness without a word, feeling that unbearable cold spread toward her again from all around, feeling the blood in her veins slowly grow cold.

Then she broke the silence: “There was someone who made another choice.”

“…Yes, there was one. The people of Frostholm once called her ‘the Queen,’ and the history books call her the ‘mad Queen,’” Winston said with a laugh, though it was hard to tell whether he was laughing at the Queen or at himself. “A great Mortal. She even wanted to fight this sea itself, to fight the horror at the very bottom of the sea.”

“The Abyssal Trench Project…” Agatha said softly. All the clues she had gathered in the past finally came together in her mind, forming a clear path. “So the Abyssal Trench Project was not just a simple exploration plan like the records say… The Queen wanted to uncover the secret hidden deep beneath the city-state?!”

“We never knew why she thought the Boiling Gold that kept appearing in the mine was linked to the Deep Sea. But clearly she had found the right direction. The runaway state of the Abyssal Trench Project and the terrible fate she later faced prove that she had touched the true source. That is the most ironic thing about our world," Winston said. He shifted his position beside the stump and raised his head to look at the endless chaos and crawling Shadows above. He spoke slowly: "Truth points to madness. Madness points to failure. Every step you take toward your goal is a step toward the abyss."

Winston let out a sigh.

"She wanted to find out the truth of the Boiling Gold mine. She wanted to solve the hidden danger behind the city-state. She wanted to use her own wisdom and strength to fight the sea itself… all of that was good. But in the end, it only proved that she used up her fate ahead of time."

"So you 'successors' decided not to walk her old path. You pretend to cover your eyes like everyone else and rush toward the abyss with this train, while the Queen who once tried to hit the brakes or change the tracks is written in the history books as a Madman bewitched by Subspace."

"An old rule of Frostholm: the dead must make way for the living," Winston said as he slowly turned his eyes to look at Agatha with his gaze. "If the way she is judged can help Frostholm quickly return to calm after turmoil, then a ruler who was once great would not mind, I think."

Agatha wanted to say something, but in the end no words came out.

After a long time, she could only shake her head gently.

"That key… how did it end up in the hands of the first Governor?"

Chapter 422: What Was Seen in the Dark

How had The key ended up in the hands of the first Governor?

That was the question Agatha cared about most at this moment. In every record of history, whether from the viewpoint of the Queen's supporters or from the viewpoint of The authority that ruled the city-state now, all descriptions of the "uprising" or "rebellion" fifty years ago agreed on one thing: there had been an irreconcilable conflict between the Frostholm Queen and the rebels.

They had been enemies, with no chance for understanding or cooperation, let alone any kind of shared "legacy". So how had The key of Queen Ray Nora ended up in the hands of the city-state's Governor? And why had Winston called it both "The curse" and a "gift"?

As she thought quickly, Agatha lowered her head and fixed Winston with her gaze: "So there was another truth behind the uprising back then—did the Frostholm Queen and the rebels plan it together…?"

"There was no twist that dramatic, Lady Gatekeeper," Winston said. "Although it does sound like a good story. A mad City Lord and a Rebel Commander who understand each other, using a great uprising that ends the old chaos to pass on power and duty. Playwrights and novelists would love it. But sadly, real history held no such warmth.

"The great uprising was bound to happen. The rift between the mad Queen and the people of Frostholm could not be healed. She had once been great, but her failure in the Abyssal Trench Project pushed the city-state to the edge of collapse. The first Governor raised troops against the Queen to let more people live. From the very start, there was no room for peaceful talks between them.

“But you were right about one thing. There really was a kind of ‘tacit understanding’ between the Queen and the rebels. The Queen knew that being overthrown was her unavoidable end. The rebels also knew that her madness was not as simple as ‘losing her mind’. She must have had many secrets.

“So, on the night before the execution, the Rebel Commander, who later became the first Governor, went to see the imprisoned Queen. He wanted to learn what she was hiding.

“So the Queen gave him The key and told him: after the execution, after her life ended, the one holding The key would naturally come to know everything.”

Winston stopped. A mocking yet helpless look came over his face. He lowered his head and stared at the brass key in his hand. After a long time, he gave a bitter smile and said: “Do you know what her last words to the Rebel Commander were? The history books never record them. Only the Governors of each generation know this line.

“‘I did my best. If you think you can do better, fine. Now it’s your turn.’ Those were the words she spoke after the first Governor took The key from her.”

“…Every choice had a price.” After hearing this unknown piece of history, Agatha let out a quiet sigh.

“Lady Gatekeeper,” Winston suddenly raised his head. With a strange smile, he lifted the brass key. “Do you want to try? Take The key, and look at the sights Ray Nora once saw?”

Agatha suddenly hesitated. She stared hard at The key Winston held out to her. Her heart, which had been beating slow and sluggish, began to pound again. A heavy pressure spread from The key, as if half a century of darkness and malice had gathered inside it. Yet after a few seconds of silence and doubt, she still took a soft breath and reached out her hand toward The key.

A faint, icy chill came from her fingertips.

In the next second, countless phantoms surged out of endless darkness. Broken flashes of light and shadow swept in like a storm and flooded Agatha’s mind. In that wild rush of information, scenes began to flash one after another inside her head—

In the endless darkness of The Deep Sea, some huge and terrifying limb of shadow slowly grew and spread.

An ancient, chilling gaze looked toward the city-state from The Deep Sea, sweeping over the living world with the cold indifference of an indescribable Elder God.

Dark and dreadful matter overflowed from The Deep Sea and rose upward. It formed a replica of the Mortal Realm. As illusion and reality shifted, that matter sometimes became Shadows, sometimes turned solid. The boundless Deep Sea was packed full of filthy, chaotic figures, crowding together and lifting their empty eyes toward the city-state.

Farther away, in even deeper and darker waters, the whole world—the entire Boundless Sea, and the seabed beneath hundreds and thousands of city-states—lay in vague, shadowy shapes, as if an ancient world had sunk into that endless darkness. Abominations grew from the old corpses there, rising and rising without end…

And in the depths of these countless visions, Agatha always felt a kind of “gaze”. It was not a single look, not any will with a clear source. She felt as if time itself were staring at her. Something older than history, larger than the city-state, as if it came from the deepest part of this world… was gazing at her.

There was no feeling in that gaze, no malice and no kindness. It simply gazed. It was like a hollow shell, without a soul, looking at an uninvited guest who had stumbled into Truth, and saying calmly—

“Oh. You have come.”

Boom!

Agatha felt a loud crash in the depths of her mind. The last of her reason forced her to struggle upward through the layers of visions. In that process, her senses and thoughts were pressed to the limit. She could feel more information and more fragments of thought swirling around her. Some of them might even have held the will or words left behind by Queen Ray Nora. But she could neither see them clearly nor understand them.

When she finally took back control of her body, all the visions were gone. She opened her eyes in the dark chaos and saw the Governor, Winston, still in front of her, even holding the brass key out to her in the same pose as before—as if only a single second had passed.

She was back in this strange, crawling darkness again… Wait, no. Something had changed!

Agatha suddenly noticed something strange in her field of vision. She lifted her head in alarm and looked around.

The darkness in all directions seemed to have faded compared to before. The shapeless black things that had been slowly squirming and changing now seemed to be gathering and forming real shapes. Between illusion and reality, she saw many things spreading and growing out of the surrounding space from nothing. They looked like dry tree branches, yet they filled the whole space in dense layers. The black “branches” connected and joined in the void. Faint sparks of light ran along them, like…

like express dispatch capsules racing through steam pipes.

Deep inside this complex, bramble-like network of “branches”, through layers and layers of phantoms, Agatha saw a massive… limb.

It was a thick limb like a tentacle. Its huge size was like a pillar holding up the sky and earth. Its surface was covered in dull blue lines. The patterns formed by those lines looked like countless eyes.

[Mental corruption? An illusion? madness threshold?]

Countless thoughts flashed through Agatha’s mind. She shut her eyes at once, but the pillar that seemed to hold up the world still remained in her sight. She tried to offer a Prayer to the God of Death and to steady her will with divine magic, yet she found that her mind was clear. There were no signs of corruption at all.

After several quick emergency measures all failed, she realized one thing—

She was not mad. While fully awake and sane, she had seen a “view” whose place she did not know, and whose reality she could not be sure of.

She stood there inside this vast and terrifying “view”, almost unable to think, until the Governor, Winston, pulled her back with his voice: “Oh. Looks like you saw it.”

The middle-aged Governor slowly lifted his head as he spoke and sighed softly: “Magnificent, isn’t it?”

Agatha hesitated and looked down. Only then did she notice that what Winston was “leaning against” was not a tree stump at all. It was actually part of the huge branch structure around them, a piece that extended out from the branches. Above it were faint black structures that stretched all the way into the deepest part of this strange space.

“These… these branches…”

“This is the Elder Gods’ thoughts, made visible in the eyes of Mortals like us,” Winston said calmly. “You only touched The key for the first time, so you can see very little. But I have lived with this key day and night for more than ten years… What it has told me goes far beyond what you can imagine.”

Agatha felt as if she were falling into a dream. She slowly grasped Winston’s words and repeated without thinking: “The Elder Gods’… thoughts?”

“Hard to believe, isn’t it? These branch-like things are not truly there. What you are seeing is likely just a single thought that passed through the God’s mind for a moment. That thought burned itself into this place and became the huge structure you see. Oh, and don’t try to decipher anything from it. Don’t try to understand the pattern of those lights. You will go mad.”

Agatha turned her head sharply: “Someone went mad because of this?”

“Of course,” Winston said with a laugh. “Did you forget? Her name was Ray Nora…”

Agatha had no words for a moment. After a few seconds, she spoke softly: “Then… what is that thing outside the ‘thicket’?”

“The Abyssal Lord,” Winston said quietly. “A small part of It. The part that has pierced into the city-state.”

Chapter 423: Moving Forward

It was the deep, dark sea floor beneath the city-state. The Elder Gods had stretched Their tendrils into the Mortal Realm, and in that unspeakable darkness They grew stronger day by day—

It was visible. Those foul and terrifying tentacles of flesh were Its body: cold and chilling. Yet It was also formless, because Its will that spread upward had already crossed the dark sea trench and pierced the thick rock and soil beneath the city-state. For the past fifty years, or even longer, Its unimaginable power had been drilling into this city and stabbing deep into the Boiling Gold mine.

“Lady Gatekeeper, we are now inside It,” Winston said. “This was once rock. But the power of the Elder Gods has transformed the rock into part of Its flesh. This dark substance beats together with the source on the seabed, through more than a thousand meters of stone and seawater. With every throb, it pulls that mirror world city-state a little closer to our Mortal Realm… Do you hear it? Thump, thump… Flesh is squirming, tightening, dreaming. This place… is thinking.”

Winston murmured like a Prayer and slowly raised both arms, as if to embrace the endless darkness around them and the branch-like structures that crossed and joined like a thorny thicket. Between those branches, dim points of light darted like fireflies. Little by little, Agatha really seemed to hear that low sound—thump, thump…

This Anomaly, buried deep inside the Boiling Gold mine and spread over who knew how wide an area, was giving off the sound of a heartbeat.

Even her own heart seemed to be affected by that heartbeat, ready to beat in time with it.

But a faint warmth suddenly rose in her chest and snapped Agatha awake. She realized that her human mind had just stepped back from the edge of madness. Her expression changed at once, and she stared hard into Winston's eyes.

"Your mind is already unsound, Governor Winston—you have been affected by this place."

"Ah… is it?" Winston waved his hand as if it did not matter. "Maybe. At first I thought I could, like the Queen, calm this Elder God again. Then I thought I could at least slow it down for a while. After that I thought I could at least stay sane until the end. So in the end… I have already failed without even noticing?"

"Calm this Elder God, like the Queen did?" Agatha caught the key point in the Governor's words. Her eyes changed at once as she faintly realized the real reason he had come here. "You mean that fifty years ago, the Frostholm Queen really did manage to put the power of the Abyssal Lord to sleep?"

Winston smiled: "What do you think caused the sea cliff to collapse back then?"

Agatha froze for a moment before speaking in doubt: "The sea cliff collapse… After the Queen was decapitated, the whole execution ground fell into the sea… That wasn't an accident?!"

"It was a sacrificial rite. The main sacrificial victim was the Queen herself, along with the first group of opportunists who chose to betray her after the uprising began. Of course, the whole execution squad and many rebel officers were buried with her as well," Winston said calmly. "We sealed the detailed records from that time, so few people know what really happened after the sea cliff collapsed. Thousands died in that ‘accident’, but in fact, almost all the commoners survived. Those who were swept into the waves… even if they were only one meter from the shore, had no chance to struggle. They were ‘pulled’ straight down to the seabed.

“After that collapse, the Anomaly inside the Boiling Gold mine stopped expanding for a time. Only then did the first Governor realize that everything had been part of Ray Nora’s plan. The cold truth passed to the Governor through The key left by the Queen. Just as she said, it was now our turn.”

Agatha fell silent. After a moment, her eyes grew complicated: “You came here to recreate that sacrificial rite…”

“It is rising,” Winston said. “The knowledge carried in The key tells me that to slow this process, you must touch Its mind. Fifty years ago, Its power still slept in The Deep Sea, so the Queen could only offer herself to The Deep Sea as a sacrifice. But now Its power has already stabbed deep into the city-state, so this is the best place to reach It. This was the method the Queen left inside The key. Every Governor who took The key became tied to this duty and spent their whole life preparing for it. I prepared everything as well. Only one thing… I failed to account for.”

Winston pulled at the corner of his mouth. It barely counted as a smile.

“Not everyone is Ray Nora.”

Agatha listened in silence. Then she lowered her head and quietly gazed at the brass key lying in her palm.

This was something the Frostholm Queen had created with some kind of supernatural power. She had taken the “knowledge” she had touched and a part of her own “thoughts” and condensed them into The key in physical form.

But for some reason, Agatha kept feeling that The key should have other uses.

It should not exist only to tie all the later rulers of Frostholm to a burden of duty.

But the Governor, Winston, was clearly unable to answer any more of her questions now. And she herself seemed to have no way back.

After learning the truth of this dark space, Agatha understood one thing. She had not passed through a stone wall to reach some location. Instead, she herself had been merged directly into a huge mass of Anomalous matter.

What waited for Winston here was death. What waited for her was return and assimilation.

She looked at her palm. The skin that touched The key had already begun to soften and warp. Thick black substance seeped from her skin and slowly covered The key.

But she still wanted to go farther. She was… curious about this place.

“Is there anything else we can do?” Agatha lowered her head and looked at the silent Governor of the city-state. “Are you going to stay here and wait for death to come?”

“Death has already come, Lady,” Winston said, shaking his head. “We are only looking back on our failed lives before we breathe our last. There is nothing left to do. Sit down and rest, like me.”

“You have already done what you should,” Agatha said calmly. “As Frostholm’s Governor, you at least faced this so-called ‘curse’ bravely. Falling short does not mean you did nothing.”

But Winston only shrugged at himself: “Incompetence is a sin.”

“I will keep going,” Agatha said. “I want to pass through this ‘thicket’ and go to where that tentacle is. Will you come with me?”

“It no longer means anything to me, Lady,” Winston replied softly. “If you wish to go, then go. Leave me here. My road has already ended.”

Agatha stared at him for a few seconds, then held out the brass key: “This is yours.”

Winston did not reach for it. He lifted his head and looked into Agatha’s eyes: “Keep it. You have already taken it. Now it is yours. This is how we have passed it down until now.”

Agatha fell silent for a moment, then put The key away.

“All right. Then I will go on alone.”

She said farewell to Winston, turned around, and propped herself up with her Gatekeeper’s cane as she took a step forward in this dark, empty space.

“Lady Agatha,” Winston’s voice suddenly came from behind her. “Does this really mean anything?”

Agatha turned her head slightly: “Why do you ask?”

“Even if you learn more truth ahead,” Winston said, “even if you really pass through this ‘forest’ and touch that limb of the Elder God—what can you change? You can no longer stop any of this. You cannot even pass what happens here to the outside world. The investigation is over. If you cannot pass on information, no matter how much you know, it is meaningless.”

Agatha stopped walking. After a moment’s thought, she spoke softly: “I am Frostholm’s Gatekeeper. This is my duty. And besides…”

She paused. The hand that held the brass key pressed against her chest without her noticing.

It was still cold all around. The feeling of her blood slowly freezing was stronger than ever. But for some reason, ever since just now she had felt a faint warmth beating in her chest, as if an unseen flame were flickering there, supporting her as she walked forward.

In her mind, thoughts that did not belong to her fluttered softly. The strongest among them was a stubborn will. It pointed straight toward the huge, unreal tentacle beyond this thicket.

“It does have meaning. I am not walking forward alone. I have no proof, but I think… everything I see here will be known by someone, in the end.”

“Oh, is that so? That is good then… Lady Agatha, it is truly enviable that you still hold to your faith even at the last moment.”

Winston’s voice fell silent. Nothing more came from that direction.

Agatha turned back and saw a small consecrated lantern shining in the darkness. It lit up a dry “tree stump”, where a middle-aged man in a dark blue coat was quietly leaning.

A bullet hole had pierced his temple, and in his lowered hand he held a finely crafted revolver.

Chapter 424: The ritual Site

Now, she was the only one left here.

Agatha slowly drew her gaze back from the consecrated lantern. She turned around, leaving Governor Winston in that chilly, quiet darkness, and stepped toward the “branches” that crisscrossed the endless space, toward the gigantic thorny curtain that hung like the vault of the sky.

A dim consecrated lantern hung at her waist. In her right hand she held the Gatekeeper’s cane that had been with her in her memories for many years. Her left hand still gripped the brass key from Winston. The key was no longer icy cold. It now held a warmth like body heat, as if it were slowly fusing with her body.

But Agatha no longer paid attention to what was happening to her body.

She simply walked in the darkness, feeling this body truly moving forward. As long as the surrounding chaos had not completely swallowed and assimilated her, she still had to keep going.

She groped for footing in the void, and every time she stepped, ground like a narrow path appeared in the darkness. She searched for a way out among the thorns. Between the branches that wove across each other, narrow openings sometimes let her squeeze through.

The sharp “thorns” soon tore her clothes. The dense “fabric” was as fragile as loose ash and mist before the stabbing thoughts of the Elder Gods. The falling scraps gathered in the dark into writhing black droplets and sank into the path under her feet. From time to time she also brushed the sparks that leapt and darted between the thorns. Whenever she touched those flashes, she could clearly feel something boring into her mind.

They were the thoughts of the Elder Gods, a murmur from the Abyssal Lord. There was no malice in it, not even a complete intent. But to a weak mortal, even that briefest spark of thought was dazzling and blinding, like a great brilliant candle in the night.

Another dim flash shot over from afar, sliding along the pitch-black thorny branches across her vision. A strand of Agatha's hair brushed that light, and in a hundredth of a second new "knowledge" surfaced in her mind—111010011001101110000110……111001111011111010100100……

Agatha could not understand the message these sparks tried to convey to her. Just as Winston had told her, she must not try to guess at the thoughts of the Elder Gods.

It would drive her mad.

She lifted her head.

The grand structure of dead wood and thorns that bridged the void filled her sight. Countless dim lights fluttered among the thickets like fireflies. A thin mist shrouded the outside of the thorn barrier, and in the depths of that fog the vast limbs of the Abyssal Lord swayed slightly, like an invitation.

The air grew cold again—sharper and more piercing than before. The chill carried dampness and seeped into her body as if it meant to freeze her bones.

Agatha instinctively clutched the front of her clothes, only to realize that at some point they had become tattered. The thorns along the way had left countless wounds of all sizes on her skin.

In those wounds, foul, thick black fluid crawled slowly like blood.

But just when she thought the cold would completely devour her, a faint warm heat rose once more from her chest…

…

A small green flame burned quietly on Agatha’s chest. Its eerie green light lit her face and the cold, damp sewer around her.

All sensation seemed to drift far away, or be separated from her reason by a thick Veil. The warmth in her veins seemed to fade with time, and with it faded the fatigue and pain she had built up along the way.

Agatha slowly shook her head, trying to drive out the numbness filling her mind. As her vision swayed, something strange suddenly appeared at the edge of her sight.

She saw the dim, cramped sewer corridor ahead suddenly seem to widen. A thin mist rose in the hazy space, and shapes like branches or thickets of thorns appeared within the fog and slowly crept toward her.

Yet in the next second, the illusory scene vanished like smoke. All she saw was the same dark corridor.

And the gate at the end of it.

Thump… thump…

The instant her gaze fell on that gate, an unreal heartbeat seemed to sound by Agatha’s ear, as if a huge heart hid behind the door, beating and swelling in the dark.

Agatha’s dulled, numb mind suddenly rallied, and her gaze snapped to that door.

“Ah… I found you…”

She closed her hand around the little flame and stepped into the darkness. The almost-broken combat Gatekeeper's cane supported her one last time. Her pace grew faster and even began to stir the air. She advanced into the darkness and left it behind her, while the low, terrifying heartbeat pounded against her chest like heavy drumbeats and even hammered in her head.

Gradually she heard something else mixed into that heartbeat. It sounded like hundreds and thousands of people in benediction, chanting, calling out to some dark and unnameable being.

She no longer cared how much noise was tangled in those mingled voices. She was about to deliver the Fire Seed. The lair of those heretics lay in the deepest place ahead.

The Gatekeeper's cane and her heels struck the ground in a rapid rhythm.

Just then Agatha heard another sound—not her own steps, nor the heartbeat and massed benediction echoing from the depths.

It was other footsteps, a whole crowd. The dense tread sounded as if it came from another direction—very close to this corridor, but separated by a wall or two.

Gunshots came with the footsteps. They were from large-caliber rifles.

Other people? Living people? Were there still others moving through this city of mirror world with her?!

Questions flashed through Agatha's mind, but they did not slow her at all. In almost an instant she rushed across the last stretch before the gate and came to the great door from which the heartbeat sounded.

The door stood slightly ajar, and within the crack was darkness so thick it almost clotted. The darkness seemed solid as it seeped and flowed out.

But this was exactly what Agatha had been seeking all along.

She braced her shoulder against the heavy door and pushed it open with all her strength.

With a long creak, the door opened.

A vast darkness appeared before Agatha—or rather, some boundless Shadows had shrouded what had once been ordinary space, leaving only darkness in her view.

She could only just make out that the darkness seemed to be an assembly hall. The widest junction of the sewers had been turned into a sacrificial rite and a place to nurture the Elder Gods. Countless vague, formless things writhed in the dark. Their malice rushed at her like a stench.

Before she could react, a sharp whoosh sounded in the nearby darkness. Something was striking at her. At the same time, a familiar, hateful voice rang out from the distant ritual field, full of mockery and scorn:

“Ah, the last sacrificial victim has finally arrived—and how nice, the other you has just reached the appointed place as well.”

“Bang!”

The Gatekeeper’s cane swept out, bursting into a brief, bright spark in the darkness. A twisted, hideous limb was struck off in midair and fell at Agatha’s feet. The impact almost knocked her over. When she barely regained her balance, she lifted her head at once and looked toward the source of the voice.

She could only barely see the tall, thin figure of a young man standing at the far end of the darkness.

He spread his arms toward her.

“Come then, sacrificial victim. Your arrival is a part of the plan—now it is time to build the passage.”

Agatha leaned on the Gatekeeper’s cane and slowly lifted her head through the weakness and dizziness: “You are bringing ruin on yourselves…”

“Yes, we will all die here. But that does not matter. As long as you step in here, the ritual has already succeeded—I admit, it really is a trap.”

…

A gunshot cracked. The muzzle flash and explosion tore through the dim corridor. The powerful round blew the head off a twisted monster with three eyes. Its mutated, hideous body fell to the ground, then quickly melted and collapsed into nauseating black sludge.

Yet more howls from monsters rose all around, and more twisted entities kept pouring out—from the surrounding walls, from the pipes, from the drains, even from the cracks in the dome above.

Mud-like matter seeped and flowed from every gap visible to the naked eye, turning into countless monsters that only vaguely resembled humans.

“I think we did not bring enough bullets!”

A sailor shouted, quickly swapping magazines, lifting his rifle, and firing. His shout mingled with the crackle of ghostly flames burning on him, making his voice sound hoarse and low.

Lawrence had no time to answer the sailor. A sudden rush of wind came from behind his head. He only had time to twist slightly aside to avoid the deadly blow, then, driven by instinct, he reached back and grabbed.

He yanked a humanoid monster over from behind him. It wore a city-state Guard Corps uniform from decades ago and held a saber in its hand. It crashed hard onto the floor.

Lawrence stepped forward and stomped hard on the replica freak’s chest. The ghostly flames on his body flared up at once. The spreading fire burned that not-quite-human monster to ash in almost an instant.

In the next second, Lawrence, wreathed in ghostly flames, lifted his head and looked down the corridor that seemed to stretch on forever.

Everywhere he looked was filled with blasphemous, twisted things.

Chapter 425: The Last Queen’s Guard Corps

The enemies had appeared suddenly after the team entered a corridor that led straight into the depths of the darkness—and there seemed to be no end to their numbers.

A sharp whoosh cut through the air beside him as a curved blade swung at his neck from a vicious angle. At the last possible moment, Lawrence leaned back and grabbed the arm holding the blade. Ghostly green flames surged up from the edge of his palm and burned a monster in a navy uniform whose head was split vertically into ashes. Before he could react, several gunshots rang out from ahead.

The shots came from a crawling monster that had suddenly climbed out of a drain. The monster had an upper body like a human’s, but its lower half was nothing but heaving piles of tissue like warped internal organs. It clutched a “rifle” that looked as if it were pieced together from bone and flesh, yet the muzzle of that obviously wrong creation spat fire.

Lawrence’s gaze sharpened at once. Time around him seemed to slow. In that instant he felt his sight grow sharper than that of ordinary people by countless times. He could even see clearly the bullets’ path as they flew toward him. In the next moment he twisted his body and dodged the bullets coming at him with impossible angles and movements.

He dodged three times and got hit by six rounds.

“You damned monsters!” The intense pain hit, and the old captain cursed. Then he raised his revolver and fired twice at the monster.

He lowered his head and looked at his chest. Several shocking bullet holes had torn the flesh there, yet under the burning of ghostly fire the half-transparent spirit form flesh was healing at a speed visible to the naked eye.

It was not fatal, but it still caused intense pain and fatigue. The Power of Flame also seemed to be slowly draining—right now it was still full, but no one could say whether it would run out.

All around Lawrence, his fully armed subordinates were still fighting. These sailors wrapped in ghostly flames had realized their current temporary undying state, and their fighting style had grown more and more fierce. They used rifles, bayonets, and short swords to hold back the monsters that never seemed to end, while trying with all their strength to push deeper down the corridor.

Yet like Lawrence himself, none of them were used to their current spirit form state, much less able to control those ghostly flames. These sailors who had accidentally gained undying bodies were only squandering their strength and firepower. The battle in the sewer corridor had become so chaotic it was hard to even look at.

So even with bodies that could regenerate, they could only advance at an unbearably slow pace under the endless monsters’ blockade. There was no hope of breaking through.

The only one on the field not affected by the ghostly flames was the mummified corpse. Anomaly077 was also fighting. He swung two curved blades and moved through the battlefield with a speed and agility completely unlike that of a mummified corpse, charging back and forth like the wind. If his vision had not been greatly enhanced, Lawrence would have doubted he could even follow the mummified corpse’s movements.

But now his sight far surpassed that of ordinary people, so Anomaly077's speed no longer looked so outrageous to Lawrence. He could clearly see the mummified corpse slip past every fierce-looking monster, moving along the safe routes on the battlefield. The curved blades in its hands flashed up and down, and after slashing about for half an hour they were still as new as ever—the edges had not touched anything at all.

The "sailor" was only running up and down the corridor waving his two blades. The only thing louder than anyone else was his shouting.

"I will cut the path with my blades!" The mummified corpse's harsh voice echoed in the corridor, mixed with the blades' whistles through the air. "These ugly blasphemous things are no match for me!"

Lawrence strode forward and grabbed the "sailor" by the neck as he tried to charge past. His strength was shocking now; he lifted the charging mummified corpse by the throat and hauled him up to his face. His hoarse voice crackled with the sound of bursting flames: "If you cannot help, then at least be quiet for me!"

Anomaly077's dried-up head was only a few centimeters from Lawrence's face as Lawrence gripped his neck. The mummified corpse trembled all over. "Y-yes… yes… yes, Captain!"

Lawrence raised his hand and hurled the mummified corpse ten meters ahead. "Get out there and clear the way—if we do not break through today, I will stuff you into the steam core's combustion chamber!"

The mummified corpse let out a strange yell as he flew through the air and finally got tangled up with the mud-born monsters that kept pouring out. A crew member with a rifle ran up beside Lawrence and shouted, "Captain! We are almost out of bullets!"

Lawrence jerked his head around and saw that almost all the people he had brought were already fighting the monsters with cold weapons. They were relying entirely on their undying state to hold out in this corridor, but the team's overall advance had clearly stopped.

They could no longer move forward.

And there was no way back.

Chaotic shouts and the chilling sounds of flesh bursting and limbs breaking filled the corridor. Black sludge kept seeping from the walls and ceiling, and his subordinates in their spirit form bodies were almost drowned by endless monsters. The spirit form flames on their bodies still burned, but fatigue was piling up, and that tiredness was slowing and muddling even his thoughts.

In the depths of this chaotic sewer, Lawrence suddenly felt dazed. He even began to feel that the whole world was unreal.

Who was he, where was he, what was he doing… The monsters here were endless, and yet the agreed-upon midnight… how much longer would it be?

Just then, as if to answer his trance, Lawrence suddenly heard Martha's voice coming from the Pocket Mirror at his chest:

"They are here."

The old captain snapped out of his haze at once. He hurriedly raised his hand, drew a short sword from his waist, and ran through a monster lunging at him. Then he stepped back to avoid the black sludge that nearly splashed onto him and quickly looked up.

Footsteps sounded in the corridor—very, very many footsteps. With them came distant, faint shouts and calls of orders. Then these sounds rushed closer and, in almost an instant, reached the area where Lawrence and the sailors were fighting for their lives.

In the blink of an eye, countless figures appeared.

It was as if they had stepped out of days long past. One shadow after another gathered out of the air and took shape as fully armed soldiers. They gripped old-style rifles from half a century ago, and the bayonets on their muzzles gleamed coldly in the dark corridor. They charged out of the darkness toward another stretch of darkness. The forming of their bodies did not slow their charge at all, as if their battle had never stopped and only at this moment could their figures be seen.

The sailors fighting in the corridor were stunned by this sudden sight and stopped without thinking. They watched the unit charge in, watched them fire at the monsters that were everywhere here, watched them roar as they threw themselves into the fight. Several seconds passed before one sailor finally reacted and muttered in shock: “The last Queen’s Guard Corps…”

Lawrence also came back to himself. He stepped forward without thinking and walked toward a young soldier who was loading his rifle. The soldier looked at most twenty. The Old Era city-state Guard Corps uniform on him was ragged, as if he had been crawling and fighting in this sewer for a long, long time.

“Hello, we are here to hel—” Lawrence reached out to pat the young soldier on the shoulder, but his words cut off halfway.

His hand passed straight through the other man’s body.

Was this only an illusion?

Lawrence lifted his head in shock, only to see that those ghost-like soldiers were already locked in fierce battle with the monsters in the corridor. Their guns kept firing, and those inhuman things of filthy mud that only resembled people fell one after another.

A tall soldier charged in from the other side. Lawrence hurried to dodge but was too slow. He watched as the tall soldier ran straight toward him as if he could not see him, then passed through Lawrence's body like a phantom. A stray shot from a monster struck the soldier a heartbeat later, and the tall figure crashed to the floor of the sewer.

The other Queen's Guard Corps soldiers ran around the corpse and continued deeper down the corridor.

A sailor walked up beside him and muttered behind Lawrence, "They are phantoms…"

"But these phantoms can fight those monsters. They can even destroy them…" Lawrence said blankly, still feeling as if he were dreaming.

"The monsters in the corridor are not increasing anymore," another sailor said nearby.

Lawrence reacted at once.

For the first time, the number of monsters in the corridor was truly going down. After that phantom Queen's Guard Corps appeared, the black sludge that had been pouring from the walls and ceiling finally stopped seeping out. The twisted freaks that they had never been able to kill off before were now actually being reduced!

Could the existence of the Queen's Guard Corps restrain those monsters' "regeneration" and "multiplication"?

Countless questions filled Lawrence's mind, but he knew something more important than chasing those answers.

"Follow the Queen's Guard Corps!" He raised his hand high and shouted the order. "Follow the path they open!"

"Yes, Captain!"

Chapter 426: The Final Counterattack

Sounds echoed from the depths of the corridor, but they were mixed and hazy, impossible to make out.

There seemed to be the sound of cold wind, muffled whispers, dense footsteps, and gunfire.

Everything had blended together. Everything had lost its clear borders. The whole world seemed to be kneaded into a single mass. There was no front or back, no yesterday or today—just like the dim corridor ahead, choked with mist, heavy and dull as if it could swallow everything.

A hunched old man shuffled forward slowly down the corridor. The heavy wrench in his hand sometimes bumped into the pipes on the walls, making a low, strange clanging sound.

[Who am I? Where is this place? Where am I going? Why am I going there?]

[The assault had begun… Midnight, zero hour, was when the Queenguard Corps launched their attack. But what exactly were we attacking? Which way were we supposed to advance?]

Old Ghost’s foggy mind now and then produced some scattered, broken thoughts, some long-faded memories. But soon they all melted back into his muddled brain. Sometimes he felt as if he were walking on two split roads at once, his jumbled senses and memories of past experiences tangled inside this body. Yet sometimes he felt he had never moved at all, that he had only stayed where he was, waiting in place for fifty years for orders.

The heavy wrench hit something with a clank. Old Ghost slowly lowered his head and saw that it was a helmet—black, narrow brim, marked with the sign of the Queenguard Corps. It was something from fifty years ago, something no one saw anymore.

He stared blankly at the helmet as it fell to the ground and rolled, rattling, into the drain at the side. It seemed as if something was struggling to crawl out of that drain, but it soon blended into the surrounding darkness and vanished.

He let out a vague mutter and went on walking into the dark, as if he were slowly stepping into a clump of thick black sludge. He did not know how much time passed before he finally stopped at the end of the corridor.

Crisscrossing pipes, collapsed rubble, and smoke and black matter seeping between the stones blocked the old man's way. He stopped there and looked around, confused.

He did not recognize this place. He did not even remember there being such a spot in the Second Waterway. But he still stopped here, because… there was something here waiting for him to finish.

Old Ghost lowered his head and looked at a puddle beside the rubble. His own confused eyes were reflected in the water.

[What was I supposed to do here?]

Just then, a strange scene suddenly appeared in the puddle—soldiers of the Queenguard Corps trampled over the endless monsters swarming through the corridor. The guns and bayonets in their hands turned wave after wave of replica freaks into cold, dried sludge. Wherever they passed, no more muck seeped from the walls, and even the darkness in the corridor seemed to thin.

Everything was just as Lawrence had guessed: the very existence of the Queenguard Corps was suppressing the corruption in this city-state of mirror world.

If everything happening in this city-state was seen as the clash of two forces, then the sludge monsters and the Queenguard Corps were clearly the two sides made flesh. This struggle and entanglement had likely gone on for half a century already.

Lawrence's marine squad ran quickly along the corridor. Following the path the Queenguard Corps had opened, they covered in a dozen minutes ground that had held them back for hours before. All the way, Lawrence kept watching and thinking.

He tried to figure out the true nature of this Queenguard Corps and even tried to communicate with these phantoms. But every attempt failed.

The Queenguard Corps could not see him. They did not even sense the presence of these uninvited guests. These soldiers were like memories projected from a distant past, mechanically repeating a battle from decades ago. They advanced, fired, fought hand to hand, and fell… and all of this had likely happened every day for decades.

The information Martha had given him about the Queenguard Corps was right, but clearly not complete.

He could not build any kind of cooperation with these "helpers".

"Captain! They can't see us. What do we do?" A sailor ran up beside Lawrence and shouted: "With just the dozen of us tagging along, it feels like we can't help at all!"

Lawrence’s expression grew complicated. He glanced down at the pocket mirror on his chest. But Martha’s voice came out of it before he could speak: “Don’t ask me. I have no idea how to handle what you’re seeing. I only knew they existed, I’ve never dealt with them myself…”

As she spoke, faint sounds of artillery came again from the mirror. Martha was clearly very busy on her side; the situation there was no simpler than in these sewers.

“Has the Queenguard Corps just been repeating this battle all these years?” Lawrence called out. “And each time the outcome is the same?!”

“Yes. The result is always the same. They appear at midnight, and fade at the next full hour. Every time, they fail to break through the obstacle at the end!”

Fail to break through the obstacle at the end?

Hearing this, Lawrence instinctively looked up toward the direction where the phantom soldiers were charging.

They were rushing toward the deepest part of the corridor. In that dark, chaotic space, thick malice churned in his senses like sludge made solid.

“I understand!” Lawrence suddenly shouted.

Martha’s voice came from the mirror: “Understand what?!”

But Lawrence no longer had time to answer the woman in the mirror. Once he faintly sensed what he needed to do, he gathered his subordinates and ran ahead faster.

At the same time, the battle in the corridor reached a fever pitch. The Queenguard Corps launched their final charge. Warriors formed from countless phantoms roared and cut down the monsters blocking their way with their weapons. Warriors kept falling, turning into bubbles that vanished in the air, and monsters kept falling, turning into sludge that flowed into the drains on both sides. As the fierce fighting went on, the assault force finally drew close to the end of the corridor.

Lawrence finally saw the end of this brutal fight. He saw the obstacle that had blocked the Queenguard Corps for half a century—

It was a door. A huge door covered with countless clumps of brambles and filthy black mud, so dreadful in appearance it made the heart tremble.

On the surface of the door, the tangled brambles were like dead branches woven into a crown. Dim lights wandered deep in the thorns without pattern, like countless eyes hidden within them. An ordinary person would only need to glance that way to have fear and madness seize their heart.

Even Lawrence, who now served as a vessel for spirit flame, felt his mind shake and his head roar when he saw the door blocked by the thorns.

And that was the target of the Queenguard Corps' assault.

In front of the door, uncountable black sludge gathered, and countless monsters rose from the muck. They crudely mimicked human shapes. Some wore the uniforms of the city Guard Corps and the navy, some were pirates with mismatched gear or armed citizens, and there were even monster-shapes like ancient cannons and demons made from heaps of bone.

These monsters used the crude fortifications in the hall as cover and defended the thorned door like fanatical believers guarding their master.

The final battle began.

The Queenguard Corps poured all their firepower onto the monsters across the hall. The monsters' counterattack shook the entire Second Waterway. In almost the blink of an eye, both sides lost more than half their strength. Lawrence and the dozen sailors he had brought could only try their best to find cover at the edge of this deadly battlefield.

With fire that dense, even Lawrence, protected by the flame of his spirit form, did not dare bet that he truly could not die.

But he was not only hiding. He was watching.

He watched to see just how far the Queenguard Corps could go in this battle.

As the fight went on and both sides kept losing people, the defenses before the door finally weakened. The deadly cannons and demonic creatures there were torn apart, and gaps opened in the line before the thorns.

“Demolition team! Go!”

Crouched beside the Queenguard Corps’ position, Lawrence suddenly heard a shout. It was the voice of some Guard Corps commander.

An instant later, he caught sight of several figures crawling forward at the edge of the battlefield.

A squad had broken off from the main line. Using the monsters’ blind spots, they slipped into the drain along the edge of the hall and inched toward a hidden spot beside the thorned door.

At the same time, the fire from the front line suddenly grew even heavier. A storm of bullets poured out, trying to pin down and draw the attention of the monsters in front of the door.

Lawrence held his breath without thinking. Even though he knew this was likely only a phantom scene that the outside world could not change, he still did it by instinct.

But the thing he feared still happened.

The demolition team creeping along the battlefield edge toward the thorned door was discovered.

A burst of bullets tore into the drain. Several soldiers carrying explosives fell into the channel at once.

But almost at the same time, another demolition group slipped into the dark trench on the hall's other side and kept crawling toward the door covered in thorns.

They were discovered too. The second demolition team fell only a dozen meters from the thorned door.

Just then, a sailor's low cry reached Lawrence's ears: "They're about to disappear!"

Lawrence looked up at once, and the scene in the corridor filled his eyes—

The Queenguard Corps was disappearing.

After the second demolition team failed, all the Guard Corps soldiers froze for a moment. Then each of their figures began to fade and dissolve. In the blink of an eye, a third of them were already half-transparent phantoms.

Something Martha had said suddenly surfaced in Lawrence's mind:

"…Every time, they fail to break through the obstacle at the end…"

Lawrence suddenly understood what those words meant. He understood the outcome of this battle every single time: the Queenguard Corps failed. They kept fighting. They stubbornly repeated it. But the unchangeable fact was that, in this "last counterattack" at midnight, they failed.

This operation had failed fifty years ago.

Every repetition since then had only repeated that failure.

Lawrence felt dazed for a moment. But just then, from the corner of his eye, he saw another figure appear on the battlefield.

It was a figure rushing out from a corner of the hall—a phantom that had not yet begun to fade.

Lawrence and all the sailors fixed their eyes on that figure at once.

He was not a soldier, but a young man who looked like an army engineer. He wore coarse dark blue work clothes and a slanted soft cap that had been in style fifty years ago. On his belt, besides a pistol and ammo pouch, hung a big wrench.

He rushed toward the trench and toward the explosive charge the second demolition team had left behind. Then he grabbed the wooden crate full of explosives and hurriedly crawled toward the thorned door.

For a moment, Lawrence almost thought he would succeed.

But a bullet flew over. It struck the young man’s shoulder like a hammer. Half his body convulsed, and he fell just a few meters short of the thorned door.

The whole hall seemed to fall silent at once.

The last counterattack was over.

All the Queenguard Corps soldiers began to fade faster, and this scene that had repeated for fifty years returned to its starting point.

Perhaps this was also the last time it would repeat.

Lawrence, his gaze blank, stared at the young man who had fallen at the very end.

“The last of the Queenguard Corps,” the last of the fallen. His death seemed to be some kind of “focus” for this endlessly repeating battle.

But suddenly, Lawrence snapped out of his daze.

He leaped out from his hiding spot. Under the sailors' startled cries and wide-eyed gazes, the old captain sprinted like the wind toward the spot where that last man had fallen.

The hall, which had fallen silent, was startled by his sudden intrusion. The monsters that had not yet faded reacted almost at once. Chaotic roars and the thunder of gunfire erupted again!

Shouts from the sailors came from behind: "Cover the captain!"

But Lawrence seemed unable to hear them. He just lowered his head and charged forward. It felt as if several bullets hit him, but to him that no longer mattered. He dashed across half the hall, jumped into the trench, and threw himself at the last explosive charge, reaching out toward it—

Then his fingers passed straight through the crate of explosives.

Lawrence fell awkwardly into the trench and stared blankly at the sight before him.

Just like the Queenguard Corps around him, that crate of explosives was also only a phantom to him.

The explosive charge that had failed to detonate fifty years ago could not be triggered today by someone who came after.

Bullets whistled in and slammed into the ground nearby. Roars drew closer. Some sludge monsters had already rushed into the trench, ready to tear him to pieces.

But Lawrence still stared at the crate of explosives, feeling only a vast sense of absurdity and mockery.

Yet at that moment, something suddenly moved at the edge of his vision.

The old captain looked up in shock and saw that it was the young man who had just fallen who was moving.

The young man with the heavy wrench at his waist trembled and slowly lifted his head. His eyes fixed on the figure before him—a man dressed like a captain, wrapped in strange green flames.

Lawrence froze for a moment, then suddenly realized: “You can see me?!”

But the young man seemed not to hear the question. His lips moved, as if he were quickly repeating some words. He repeated them several times before Lawrence barely caught what he was saying—

“…I’ve seen it. Right, I’ve seen this flame… I’ve seen it…”

“Seen it? Flame? What are you talking about?”

Lawrence stared with wide eyes and could not help asking.

But the young man did not answer. He only kept repeating the same words over and over. And while he muttered, he slowly pushed himself up. Covered in blood, he still managed to climb to his feet, bit by bit!

Under Lawrence’s disbelieving gaze, the blood-soaked young man picked up the last explosive charge again. With a muffled groan, he climbed up the embankment wall beside the slope and staggered toward the thorned door, still muttering something under his breath.

Lawrence heard what he was muttering, but could not understand it. It sounded like a string of names—

“Nemo… General Tyrian… Crow…”

That blood-soaked figure stumbled on, mumbling.

But he barely made it a few steps.

As soon as he reached level ground, gunshots rang out from the other side, and the bloodied figure fell.

But almost in the same instant he fell, a bent old figure suddenly rose from the spot where he had fallen.

Lawrence watched in disbelief. He saw exactly where the old man appeared —from the pool of blood.

He was the reflection in the blood at the moment the young man died.

“Ah, I finally made it…”

The hunched old man bent down and picked up the last crate of explosives. A smile then bloomed on his face, so bright and impossible to understand.

“I made it!”

He shouted, and he laughed out loud. Hugging the crate of explosives, he cheerfully lit the fuse and then almost gleefully ran straight toward the thorned door with it in his arms.

“I made it!

“Engineer Wilson reporting in!

“Engineer Wilson requests to return to the unit!

“I made it!”

Boom!!!

The earth-shaking explosion rocked the entire hall and every corridor connected to it.

Chapter 427: sacrificial rite

Ssshrip—

A vicious spike pierced through flesh, carving yet another meaningless wound into a body already covered in injuries. The whispers and howls at her ears suddenly grew excited. Those blasphemous creations seemed to crow with pride at the blow, letting out sickening noise.

Agatha raised her hand and struck back with her Gatekeeper's cane, knocking away the Annihilator whose body bristled with bone spurs and had almost lost all human shape. A sharp, cracking sound rang beside her ear.

The sound stunned her for less than a second before she realized it was her own battle Gatekeeper's cane breaking.

The weapon that had been with her for many years had snapped. Facing enemies that seemed without end, it had lasted to the very last step.

"You have already done very well, Miss Gatekeeper," that disgusting, affected voice sounded again. "For a sacrificial victim, a bit of warm-up does help the effect of the sacrificial rite. But too much exercise is not good."

Agatha held the broken Gatekeeper's cane and slowly raised her head. Dried blood let her open only one eye. Through a narrow, red-tinged view, she finally saw the scene in the hall clearly.

The eerie shadowy overlay had faded. What now appeared before her was the center of the sewer, already turned completely into a place of sacrifice. On every wall and corridor around her, foul, blasphemous symbols and marks of corruption covered the stone. Things like stone stalagmites or dried branches spread across the ceiling above. On the floor of the hall in front of her lay a huge “pool”—

It had once been solid floor, now corroded into a vast pit. The pit was filled with thick, pitch-black sludge, slowly heaving and making wave after wave of nauseating, squelching sounds.

Countless Annihilators ringed the hall. They and the Abyssal demons that lived with them were like swarms of insects gathered around a stinking cauldron. They whispered blessings and let out crazed growls toward the pool of pitch-black sludge at the center of the hall. Under that noisy prayer, the sludge grew fuller and more active.

This was the site of a sacrificial rite. They were waiting for the final sacrificial victim. And in the eyes of these fanatics, that sacrificial victim was the Gatekeeper of the city-state of Frostholm.

Before this, they had even copied another Gatekeeper. Now that Gatekeeper too was reaching some sacrificial rite site.

“Actions you believe to be free will are in fact just steps toward a stage set long in advance. Don’t you find this arrangement rather… beautiful?”

In the center of the pool of black sludge, a young man with short blond hair spread his arms toward Agatha. His face was still handsome, but his entire lower body had already become a swollen, writhing mass. Now he was clearly some sort of “tip of a tentacle” that the sludge had stretched out and reshaped, mimicking human form in a nauseating way.

“All right, the time is almost here, and you have already adapted to this place. Now step forward. It is time for the sacrificial rite.”

At the edge of the sludge pool, a limb like a tentacle slowly rose. It grew out of the mud, and its tip slowly turned into a hard, dagger-like point.

That life-taking tentacle of the sacrificial rite slowly moved toward Agatha.

But Agatha only watched it quietly, then suddenly murmured: “More or less… this spot…”

She slowly reached toward her chest.

But in the next second, her movement suddenly stopped.

In that instant, she lost control of her own body.

“I know you want to do something—something not in our plan.”

In senses that had suddenly gone dull, she heard the blond young man’s voice coming from the other side. She tried with all her strength to raise her head, but could only see a bit of his figure at the edge of her vision.

“But sadly for you, to prevent the sacrificial victim from entering a runaway state, we prepared ‘safety measures’ from the very start. Did you never notice? All the way here, you wiped out so many replicas. You even destroyed more than ten of my avatar forms. All of that was only to bind you bit by bit to this city of mirror world.

“You felt you could sense the location of this sanctuary more and more clearly? You felt you could ‘smell’ us heretics more and more clearly? Did you ever wonder why that was changing?

“It is very simple. Before you reached this place, you were already one of us, my lady.”

Agatha finally raised her head. Before her, the sharp spike was slowly nearing her heart. Her body still could not move.

Now she finally understood the sense of wrongness she had felt on the way here. She understood why these cultists had wasted so many cannon-fodder lackeys on “war of attrition” tactics against her.

Everything had only been for slow, subtle corruption.

In the next second, the sharp spike went straight into her heart without any pause.

In the mud pool, the blond cultist suddenly raised his hands. The instant the Gatekeeper’s heart was pierced, he cried out in ecstatic prayer: “The sacrificial victim has been offered! The Saint’s life will be the first step in our lord’s kingdom descending! Call out the holy master’s name and welcome the promised day!”

In an instant, all the cultists in the hall shouted. Those misshapen figures who had symbiotic pacts with demons sank into frenzy, crying out the name of the Abyssal Deep lord in their madness. Some swung their own daggers and slashed open their flesh, pouring their blood into the black sludge surging in the center of the hall. Even the demons beside them fell into a fever, howling in all kinds of wild, broken voices!

Yet amid all the mad, twisted howling, the black matter in the sludge pool only churned violently for a few seconds before slowly growing calm again.

Standing in the center of the “pool”, the blond cultist finally sensed that something was wrong. He jerked out of his joy and stared in shock at the pool growing calm again. Then his gaze went to the spike that had pierced the Saint’s heart and to the Gatekeeper standing at the edge of the sacrificial rite grounds.

The Gatekeeper, covered in wounds and pale-faced.

“…You have no life?!” The madman finally lost his arrogance and poise. He pointed at Agatha in utter shock. “You… why are you a corpse?!”

Agatha looked at him calmly. At last, a small smile appeared at the corner of her mouth.

“Even though I hadn’t figured out your final goal before, how could I, as the Gatekeeper, fail to notice something was wrong with my own body…”

As she spoke, she slowly raised her arm. Now that the sacrificial rite had failed, she felt this body slowly coming back under her control.

“When I realized you wanted to lure me to the gathering place, realized this was likely some kind of sacrificial rite that demanded life, I did one thing…”

She slowly grasped the spike piercing her heart. Her fingers tightened bit by bit, and thin threads of emerald flame flowed between them, seeping into the spike.

She lifted her eyes and fixed her gaze on the cultist in the sludge pool.

“Every heretic sacrificial rite is based on fresh blood—I drained my own blood.”

“You… do you know what you’ve done?!” The madman’s eyes bulged with rage, his finger shaking as he pointed at Agatha. “You… you…”

“It doesn’t matter. It’s a small thing,” Agatha only smiled and shook her head. More and more flame leaked from her fingers. “As long as I can send the Fire Seed where it needs to go…”

“You said wh—”

The cultist in the sludge pool spoke without thinking, but before he could finish, another deafening boom suddenly came from the far side of the gathering hall. The earthshaking blast shattered the last strands holding this sacrificial rite together.

A large door deep in the hall, along with a wide stretch of wall beside it, was blown away by a load of high explosive!

Boom!!

Stone and concrete shattered and flew. Fragments of the door and countless bits of strange black matter mixed within swept into the hall like shrapnel. Several cultists closest to the door were blown away on the spot, and the rest cried out in shock—

“They broke through the door!”

“Impossible! They couldn’t break through for decades… How could a bunch of phantoms break their own loop?!”

In the center of the sludge pool, the blond cultist leader turned in shock toward the blast. But before he could see clearly the shapes charging in from beyond the thorned door, a pillar of green fire surged up at the edge of his sight.

He turned his gaze and saw that the sacrificial victim who should have been offered to the Abyssal Deep lord was now wrapped in flames, burning fiercely in a terrifying spirit form blaze!

The moment the door at the far end of the hall was blown open, Agatha finally broke fully free of the sacrificial rite’s control. In that brief instant, she ignited the Fire Seed.

The fuel was herself.

spirit flame surged up!

In a view suddenly filled with eerie green fire, Agatha saw that the wall opposite the “pool” had collapsed into a large hole. A group of people who looked like sailors, their bodies burning with the same green flames as hers, charged into the hall.

The flames on them resonated strongly with the Fire Seed burning on her.

Agatha smiled.

Knowledge flowed into her mind. She understood.

In the flames, she slowly spread her arms and lifted them as if in welcome.

“The fire is lit.”

Chapter 428: Burning a God

Light flowed through the thicket of thorns. The thoughts of the Elder Gods spread in the darkness. A broken body squeezed through the narrow gaps between the thorns. A shaking will crossed the abyss of madness and foolishness.

[How long had she been moving through this space full of chaos? How much corruption from the Elder Gods had she already touched? Was she still a whole person now, or only a shard drifting in the chaos, about to be taken in and absorbed by it?]

Agatha could no longer tell. She could not tell anything apart. She could not even tell where her body ended and the mass of chaos around her began. In her sight, her body looked like a blot of ink slowly spreading in water. The edges of her body were blurry, like liquid soaking into paper. It felt as if she was not walking through this darkness, but flowing forward inside a thick, sticky fluid that had the same nature as her own body.

She knew that everything was almost at its limit. elements. She did not know whether this thing had really created all things in the world. But one point was clear: it had created the body she had now.

Ice melted into water. Mist turned into wind. A replica that had condensed out of elements would return to the “sea” made of elements. The so-called “personal will” inside this body would soon turn into a small, unimportant point of light in that chaotic sea, food for the tiny glimmers that kept moving through the thicket of thorns.

She was only a replica. She was only a shadow. She carried memories of twenty-four years of life. In those memories were her home, her comrades, and everything she loved or hated. But out of those twenty-four years, what truly belonged to her might be only three days, or even less.

For some reason, Governor Winston's voice suddenly seemed to echo in her mind, full of sighs and regret:

"There was no meaning in any of it…"

A living man who had a real life had summed up his own years like this in the endless dark. A replica who had only three days of life was now walking through the darkness, trying to face the Elder Gods head-on.

"So stupid…"

Agatha sighed softly as she spoke. Her voice melted into the darkness and turned into faint ripples. In her mind, endless streams of information kept rising and falling. A mysterious will made of "0" and "1" washed over her thoughts.

She knew she was about to melt into that vast will. Even though this place only stored one flash of thought from the Elder Gods at a single moment in time, its huge size was still far beyond what her weak mind could bear.

But it was fine. She had already arrived.

She had walked through the huge forest of thorns and reached the deepest part of the darkness.

That "tentacle" like a pillar holding up the sky stood quietly before her. The surface of the great pillar was full of strange dark blue lines. Against the dim, chaotic background, it looked like some kind of monument that recorded ancient Truth.

Agatha slowly raised her head, then reached out a hand and tried to touch it.

Black fragments and smoke drifted up in her sight.

The thorns had already cut countless wounds across her skin. A substance like black sludge now poured from inside her like fog. It spread out and melted into the space around her. The rising black fragments and smoke were things drifting out of her own body.

Agatha felt that she must now look like a horrible doll covered in cracks. Even if someone wrapped her whole body in bandages, it would not hide this terrifying shape.

At the same time, the “tentacle” of the Elder Gods did not respond to her touch.

It did not show any mighty power. It did not show any frightening side. It did not even react to the outside world at all. Her fingertips only felt a touch that was a little cold and soft, with a bit of roughness in it.

[Is it because this is only a vision projected here from the Deep Sea? Or because my existence is too small, so small that I cannot even draw the Elder Gods’ notice?]

Agatha frowned. She tried to think about whether there was anything she could still do in these last moments. But after thinking for a long time, she found that there seemed to be nothing left she could do.

She had reached the end. She had learned the truth of this darkness. She had walked through the thicket of thorns that stood for the Elder Gods’ thoughts. At the very end of this darkness, she had seen part of the Abyssal Lord’s true form. She had even touched this tentacle of the Elder Gods with her own hands.

There was no more truth left for her to dig out, and no more mission waiting for her to carry out. This last stretch of road was, in truth, less for the duty of a Gatekeeper and more to satisfy one bit of her own stubborn will.

Now, it was time to rest.

So Agatha let out a light breath and relaxed her body. She slowly turned around and leaned against the huge tentacle beside her, as if leaning against a pillar.

A strange thought suddenly came up in Agatha's mind. She leaned there in the dark and muttered to herself: "I probably don't even have a soul that can set off on the road…" But soon she gave a self-mocking smile and shook her head: "Of course not. If I had a soul, I would have given that other 'Gatekeeper' a lot of trouble when I went through that door… And after I went over, what about her? A person can't walk through that door twice…"

She went on in a low voice: "I wonder how things are at the Cathedral… Did that group who went down the shaft make it back… But it seems they don't really need to worry…"

She kept talking to herself in the dark like this, as if she could not control the drifting of her thoughts. Whatever she thought in her heart, she let it slip out in words.

But just then, a strange burning heat suddenly cut off her mumbling.

Agatha jolted out of her dazed fog.

In that instant, she felt flames baking her whole self. The terrible heat seemed ready to burn through her soul at once. She felt her mind boil in the fire. The thoughts that had almost been fully taken over by this place also cleared up. She struggled to stand in this vision of fire burning her body. She did not know what had happened, but in the next second, a voice drilled into her mind—

"The fire is lit."

It was her own voice.

In the dark, Agatha opened her eyes wide. It was as if she saw a vision. She saw herself standing before a deep pool full of rolling black sludge. The rim of the pool was ringed with disgusting cultists and demons. The mud in the pool churned and spread malice. She stood before that mire, raised both hands high, and they blazed up like the Sacred beacon Torch.

A faint green suddenly rose in her sight, as if the vision had pierced the line between real and unreal.

Agatha looked down. On the surface of her arm, which had already started to break apart and drift away, flames were rising. The ghost-green flame was exactly the same as the one she had seen in the vision.

In the passage that this flame built, she suddenly felt it—she felt another mind, another self.

The other self also felt her.

She understood what she should do now. She still had something to do.

Agatha suddenly turned around and stared at the tentacle that rose like a pillar to the sky. The brightest smile she had worn since she entered this darkness bloomed on her face. A clear light showed in her eyes again.

She took a step forward and reached out both hands toward the tentacle. Flames quickly swallowed her whole body. Yet the pain of being burned now felt like a great reward. Agatha spread her arms wide. It was the same pose she had seen herself take before the deep pool in that vision.

Like an embrace, the Gatekeeper threw herself at the tentacle.

One great power would clash with another. Those mad cultists wanted to use the Gatekeeper to build a bridge for the sacrificial victim. But this roaring fire would cut that bridge off for good.

Boom!

A terrible roar rang out in the dark. Almost in the blink of an eye, the flames swept across this twisted, chaotic space. In the spirit form fire that rolled and rose like a storm, the huge tentacle turned into a burning Sacred beacon Torch and shook hard in the fire.

Agatha felt her flesh and blood quickly melt in the flames. Her body, which had been made of corruption from the start, now became one part of this complete purification by fire. Yet she did not feel any fear. Instead, she struggled to lift her head and looked back in the direction she had come from.

The “thicket of thorns” was also burning. Under the wildly spreading spirit flame, it looked like a strange and grand crown of trees.

“Goodbye… Governor Winston…”

Agatha whispered to herself and hugged the tentacle even tighter in the fire, quietly waiting for the end of her fate.

But just before her mind faded away, she suddenly felt something.

The flames burned through her and burned through the tentacle as well. In the bridge that the spirit form fire built, she felt for the first time this “limb of the Elder Gods” respond to her.

She lifted her head in shock and looked at the patterned surface of the tentacle. She watched the fire run inside and outside it. She felt the stream of information that poured into her mind from the spirit flame. She saw what looked like countless eyes opening at once all over the surface of the tentacle. Every eye was madly sending knowledge and information into her.

In the end, all the knowledge and information turned into a storm inside her head—11101001…11100101 10001000…10010011…

The long strings of “0”s and “1”s filled the last bits of thought Agatha had left.

But this time, she understood what they meant.

“Error… replicant…”

Shocked, she sounded out the message that this limb of the Elder Gods sent to her. She understood its will and at last pieced together the answer.

She stared at the tentacle she had set on fire.

“This is also… a replica?!”

In the next second, the blazing green flame swallowed the last trace of her mind.

Chapter 429: The ritual in the Chaos of Battle

The ritual had been broken.

That Queen's Guard Corps had already been cycling in a loop for half a century. When, for some unknown reason, they suddenly broke out of that loop; when intruders blew up the "Gate of Ascension" in the ritual hall; when a group of people from who knew where rushed into the hall—when the sacrificial victim they had chosen, right in front of the pool of elements, instead gave her own sacrificial rite to the green flames. At that moment, this lofty and final ritual had already reached a point beyond repair.

Now, enemy cultists had rushed in. The destroyers were madly slaughtering the Holy Lord's followers and tearing apart the hard work of these long decades.

"What have you done?!"

In the center of the deep pool, the cultist leader who looked like a blond young man let out a furious roar. His body shot up to a great height. Held up by black sludge, he turned into a swollen and horrible giant. He swung an arm toward Agatha. Countless thorns and bone spurs shot up from the pool, grew at a wild speed, and rushed like a flood toward the Gatekeeper who still stood in the flames.

Yet none of the attacks even reached Agatha's body. They turned at once into ash under the burning of the ghost-green flame. That strange fire instead crawled back along the trail of the ash, slowly burning away the sacrificial rite symbols and filthy offerings around the Sludge Pool, and then spread toward the pool itself.

Agatha was still wrapped in fire. The roaring spirit form fire had already begun to gush out from inside her. Every wound on her body had turned into a path for the flames to pour out. From a distance, it looked as if the fire had become liquid and was now flowing in her veins. At some point, the awful pain of being burned had faded away. She laughed in the fire, lifted her head, and stared freely at that furious yet helpless heretic with a gaze. She whispered, as if to herself: “Ah… I understand now…”

In the next second, the spirit flame burned away her eyeballs in an instant. Fire spewed out from the empty sockets. With these burned-out “eyes”, she looked around her, at the cultists around the deep pool who had fallen into great chaos.

Wherever her gaze passed, every cultist began to burn. The demons bound to them by symbiotic pacts also began to burn. Every unholy item in the hall turned into fuel for the Fire Seeds. Even the hall itself slowly took on the feel of flame soaking through it.

The Flame Usurper had granted her divine authority. With the divine authority of fire, she would end the blasphemy here. This was the Truth she had seen in the moment when her own eyes burned away.

The cultist in the center of the mud was not worth worrying about. He was only a freak who had finished his own sacrificial rite and transformation. What really kept this place running were the ugly, twisted heretics raving and howling around the Sludge Pool.

“Stop! Stop at once! You have no idea what you’re doing! A ritual in a runaway state is bad for everyone! It has already reached—”

The cultist leader, who had turned into a swollen giant, shouted in vain. He kept raising barriers, trying to hold back the flames that were spreading through the hall. But just then, a gunshot suddenly came from the side and cut off his shout.

“Bang!”

A young warrior in a soldier’s uniform from half a century ago rushed in, an old rifle in his hands. He raised the gun and fired at the swollen, twisted giant in the center of the deep pool.

The brave warrior was swallowed in the next moment by rushing black sludge. But more soldiers were charging into the hall behind him.

By the time line, they had already passed the cycle node of the Queen’s Guard Corps’ “counterattack battle”. All these phantom warriors should have faded away. But it was clear that this loop had already changed because the gate of thorns had been destroyed. The Queen’s Guard Corps, who should have vanished at the next full hour, had returned from the cycle to this place and now began to attack this final hall.

The landing squad led by Captain Lawrence was also locked in battle with the nearby cultists and Abyssal demons. They had used up all their bullets, but they still had sharp sabers and long swords, and for a time they had bodies that did not fear death. So even when they faced dark priests and demonic creatures who wielded all kinds of dangerous powers, they fought like mighty supernatural and did not fall behind.

With a loud clang, Captain Lawrence cut down a bone spike flying toward him with his short sword. He then dodged to the side, barely avoiding a fireball that almost exploded on him. He stepped forward through the flames and sliced through the chain on the back of a cultist’s neck. The dark priest’s body turned at once into drifting ash. Then he lifted his head and looked toward the long-haired woman standing before the Sludge Pool, her whole body burning like a Sacred beacon Torch.

The old captain shouted: “Young lady! We’ve come to help! We all work for ‘the captain’, right—what ship are you from?”

He could see it very clearly. The young woman standing in the flames burned with the same ghost-green fire as he did, so she was clearly on their side. At the same time, the fire on that young lady burned deeper in color and higher than the one on his own body. That kind of “ally” was clearly not an ordinary one. The flames on her were bigger and greener—so she had to be a big shot under Captain Duncan.

Using his rich experience as both an adventurer and a captain, Captain Lawrence made a simple, plain judgment. His conclusion was that he should take the lead and greet this future high-ranking coworker.

Agatha stared in shock at the tough old man dressed like a captain who was shouting at her from across the chaos.

After two or three seconds, Agatha could not hold back anymore and shouted: “What did you say?! It’s too loud in here! I can’t hear you!”

Lawrence paused, then turned to the subordinate next to him to make sure: “She answered me, right?”

“How should I know!” Anomaly 077 was closest. The mummified corpse was yelling at the top of his lungs, his voice full of panic and fear. He jumped around between the flames spreading from all sides, trying his best to dodge the flying bullets, fireballs, bone spikes, and even blasted-off arms and legs. Chips already showed on the blades of the twin knives in his hands. “I’m a sailor! Why am I fighting cultists to the death in a sewer right now? This is the work of a landing squad member!”

“You didn’t say that when we came ashore,” Lawrence shouted. “You were as excited as a pirate getting ready to raid a city-state.”

“You were the one who said we aren’t pirates!”

“Then I now appoint you a landing squad member.”

“You fu—”

“Hm?”

“You fu—sir…”

Agatha listened blankly to the wild shouting between those rough, tough sailors and their captain. She watched the scene of pure chaos in front of her.

[Who are these people? Where did they come from? What are they even doing?]

She saw the strangers burning with the same green flames as she was, and the cultists in the hall locked in fierce battle with them. She saw a whole group of soldiers, like ghosts from an ancient age, rush in and start firing in all directions. From time to time, some of the soldiers called out the name of the Queen of Frostholm. Everything here had gone beyond what she could understand. It was as if…

It was as if, after she chose to carry out her own sacrificial rite, the whole world’s style had changed.

But soon a rushing sound of wind in her ears cut off her wild thoughts.

The swollen, twisted giant bent down toward her.

It roared: “Everything… can no longer be stopped…”

Filthy black sludge in a runaway state spewed from all over its body. The handsome face of the blond young man it once had was gone without a trace. In its place now was a horrible monster with only a rough human shape.

Half its body was covered in crisscrossing mouths. The scraping and whispering of sharp teeth made one's skin crawl. Its head slowly split open in front of Agatha. The crack was packed with eyes full of malice. elements had fully corrupted the human body this monster once had and taken its place. It had become one part of that pool of mud, and even… part of some bigger, more twisted will.

The swollen giant stared hard at Agatha with its countless eyes. The mud spreading around it had already caught fire. The flames even crawled back along the mud and burned on its body. Yet the monster seemed to feel no pain at all. It only repeated again and again: "Cannot stop… cannot stop… error, error…"

Agatha lifted her head and met the monster's gaze. The flames pouring from her eye sockets twisted the air around her. She said: "You have already failed. You should be able to feel it. The so-called 'passage' has been cut off. The Inversion between mirror world and the Mortal Realm has stopped."

"Stopped?" For a brief moment, the monster seemed to wake at her last words. In its countless twisted eyes, a human hatred showed again. It snarled: "Fool… You think that just because you sacrificed yourself… we have no other sacrificial victims?!"

Agatha froze.

In the next second, she saw the giant suddenly raise both arms high. Those arms changed at once. Like dried, cracked branches, they grew and split in a rush, turning into huge masses of thorn-like structures. They stabbed into the roof of the hall and into every nearby pipe. Between the sharp tips of the thorns, faint lights began to race by, like fireflies.

From deep inside this “thorn forest”, a cry full of mad joy rang out:

“I see it! I grasp it! I understand it!
“What a mighty creation! What a grand Blueprint! O greatest and holiest Lord… I have grasped Your will. I have grasped it… To remake this world, yes, remake it… All of us, and all things in this world, will be born again from the flesh of God—believers, the time of sacrifice has come!”

“The time of sacrifice has come!”

Under the stunned gaze of Agatha and of the landing squad led by Lawrence, all the remaining Annihilators in the hall began to cheer in wild joy. It was as if they had truly received some revelation from the Truth. In that roaring wave of shouts, they threw themselves one after another into the pool of mud in the center of the hall!

(I have a bold idea!)

Chapter 430:

The mad took madness as their final road – the Annihilation Heretics who followed the Abyssal Lord embraced their deaths in the most chilling way.

In the wake of the ritual being completely destroyed, the Annihilators who survived at the scene chose a collective sacrificial rite to forcefully complete the Inversion of the city of mirror world.

Even with all of Lawrence’s experience from spending half his life at sea, he had never seen a sight so terrifying, so insane –

Hundreds of Annihilators threw themselves in ecstasy toward that churning pool of sludge. They melted and broke apart in the mud, yet were wild with joy. The Abyssal demons that had a symbiotic pact with them roared as they snapped their chains and self-detonated around the “pool”. The filthy smoke and corrupt breath even blocked the advance of the Queen’s Guard Corps. A huge crown of thorns rose from the center of the sludge pool. As the cultists carried out their mad sacrificial rite, it grew fast and in the blink of an eye covered the whole hall.

“I have understood!”

A crazed roar came from within that crown of thorns, as if a thousand voices were stacked inside it.

“We have understood!”

Countless cultists who had thrown themselves into the sludge shouted as well, their voices shaking the Second Waterway.

“I will carry it out!” “We will carry it out!”

“Fulfill the Creator’s Blueprint!” “Fulfill the Creator’s Blueprint!”

Boom!

A blazing fire rose and spread through the hall, almost at once swallowing that crown of thorns. Lawrence only had time to look up before he saw the crown breaking apart and collapsing in ghostly flames, turning into drifting gray-black dust that fell down. The pool of black sludge in the center of the hall also caught fire. As the spirit flame rose, the churning of the mud quickly slowed and soon turned into dry, burnt earth.

The last group of cultists who had flung themselves toward the sludge pool turned straight into ash in that fire.

Yet the shaking of the Second Waterway did not stop. The howling that echoed in the sewers still circled around. The crazed shouts of the cultists during their sacrificial rite now echoed through this underground space like ghosts, sending chills down one’s spine.

Lawrence lifted his head in shock and confusion and looked around. He still did not quite understand what had happened, and spoke without thinking: “Did we make it in time? The ritual did not finish, right…”

“It looks like all the cultists are dead… and that ‘tree’ burned up too…” Anomaly 077 spoke in a nervous voice, eyeing this place uneasily. “But why do I feel like…”

“Not yet.”

A voice mixed with the crackle of flames suddenly came from not far away, cutting off the exchange between Lawrence and the “sailor”.

Lawrence looked up at once toward that side.

Agatha also turned her gaze toward this group of “strangers” who had come to help.

She still stood there, still in the pose of someone burning in flames. Compared with when she had first entered this city of mirror world, she had become something completely different –

Her black clothes had turned into a ragged outer robe that hung on her like the tattered cloth of a poor monk. Her body looked like a broken doll, with shocking wounds and even cracks everywhere. Her blood had long since drained away. Now, only green flame flowed like water from those wounds. Her eyes had been burned out by the fire of the Flame Usurper, leaving only empty hollows.

Yet in those empty sockets, two of the brightest flames danced. She had lost the eyes of her flesh, but gained another kind of sight beyond imagination.

She could see that the energy in the hall still flowed. She could even see the energy of the whole city of mirror world flowing. She saw an enormous structure running through the entire city, still lifting it upward, making the city keep “rising” toward the world of the Mortal Realm.

Agatha took a step forward. The spirit form flames spread under her feet, making the floor sizzle. She reached out, grabbed a thorn vine that stretched out from the sludge pool, and squeezed gently.

That piece of “thorn” had already been dried by the spirit form flames. She crushed it into pieces with ease. Yet among the falling fragments, tiny motes of light still flowed.

“mirror world is still rising…” She sounded as if she was talking to herself, yet also as if she was reporting to someone. “The heretics here are all wiped out, but what they left is still running… This city of mirror world is alive. It is moving toward the Mortal Realm on its own… I am sorry, I do not know how to stop it."

Lawrence walked over, looking at Agatha in curiosity: "Who are you talking to…"

As he spoke, a violent shaking and a roar from above cut him off. He and the sailors looked up in panic, and a sight they would never forget filled everyone's eyes –

The hall shook hard, and the rock, concrete, steel, and earth above it, no one knew how thick, suddenly turned transparent. Through that suddenly transparent ground, he clearly saw layer after layer of structures above their heads!

Drainage tunnels, power pipes, steam delivery systems, the subway, and above that the mountain, the streets, the buildings, the Cathedral… the entire city-state of Frostholm!

He saw Frostholm. Across the thick layers of ground, he saw Frostholm in the world of the Mortal Realm. He saw the city wrapped in heavy fog. Countless monsters still attacked everything inside the city from within the mist. The city-state's Guard Corps and the Guardian units fought the monsters in despair. Darkness spread through the city. Fear brewed in every corner…

Blood, smoke, death.

"Oh… I think we are in big trouble…" Anomaly 077 also raised his head like everyone else and muttered after a long time, "Or maybe the people above our heads are the ones in big trouble…"

Lawrence shuddered awake and realized what was about to happen. Even though the cultists were all dead, their final sacrificial rite, their ritual, had still worked. This city of mirror world had gained the trait of independent existence and was still rising according to some “Blueprint” design. If this continued, Frostholm in the Mortal Realm would never survive!

“It cannot be stopped?!” He stared, eyes wide, and turned to Agatha, shouting, “We are about to overlap with the world of the Mortal Realm!”

But Agatha only turned her head in silence, her gaze full of flame falling on Lawrence.

She did not speak, but a calm and solemn voice sounded directly in Lawrence’s mind: “Do not rush. This is only one part of solving the problem.”

Lawrence froze for a moment, then realized where the voice in his head came from. The muscles all over his body visibly tensed. “C-captain!”

“Relax a little. And – stand steady in a moment.”

Lawrence stared blankly, eyes wide.

At the same time, on the side of the Mortal Realm.

The roar of cannon fire still echoed over the vast endless sea. The remaining City Navy of Frostholm and the Sea Mist fleet still fought hard to hold back the “ghost” ships that kept rising from the dense fog.

As time passed, the number of ghost ships coming out of the fog did not drop. Instead, it kept growing.

“Unknown vessel sighted off the port side! It is a fast gunboat… close-in guns, prepare to fire!”

“A Frostholm Navy frigate has sunk in nearby waters, hull number S-30, strike it from the identification list!”

“Fire on the aft deck! Damage control, damage control!”

Shouts passing orders, the roar of the main guns firing, explosions, the heavy crash of water columns slamming into hulls, all the sounds mixed together and brewed an almost Doomsday-like air.

Tyrian stood on the bridge of the Sea Mist, both hands on the rail in front of him, his single eye fixed on the distant sea, his face dark as if it held a brewing storm.

The battle had gone on for a very long time, yet there was still no hope of victory. Enemy ships like ghosts still poured out from the thick fog around the city-state, and the blockade over the whole sea area had not been broken.

Undying sailors did not feel tired, but this long, intense fight still kept draining the strength of the Sea Mist fleet. The Sea Mist's own repair ability was close to its limit. It could no longer even put out the great fires on its deck and could only rely on damage control teams rushing back and forth. The ship Crow had just pulled out of the battle a dozen minutes ago and was now dragging its broken hull back toward Frostholm's main island.

If even the Sea Mist fleet was in this state, there was no need to think about the Frostholm Navy made of humans.

From the reports over the radio alone, one could tell that the Frostholm Navy was in bad shape. Their exhaustion had reached the limit, and the damage and losses on each warship were close to a critical point.

The ironic part was that for the past half century, almost everyone in the Sea Mist fleet had mocked and cursed that navy almost every day. Yet now, almost every member of the Sea Mist fleet hoped those humans could hold on a bit longer, and that a few more of them could live.

A thunderous boom came from far away, and a huge flash of light appeared in the dense fog. Right after, that huge flash turned into a string of continuous fire bursts and explosions.

Tyrian looked in that direction on instinct and at once ordered the signalman to find out what those explosions were. After a bout of chaos, First Mate Aiden brought bad news.

“The Frostholm Navy main battleship Lord Blücher has had its steam core badly damaged. The reactor boiler has exploded. She is sinking.”

Tyrian did not speak. He only slowly closed his eye.

The Lord Blücher… the Sea Mist had dealt with her a few times in the past two years. The ship’s commander was a very traditional Frostholm man.

He was a good man. It was a good ship.

But now, farewell forever.

“Write it down. Maybe in the future, we will have a chance to mourn,” Tyrian opened his eye and slowly shook his head. “Right now we do not have…”

As he spoke, the scene outside the porthole suddenly changed and cut him off.

He looked out the window in surprise. The first mate and many others on the bridge also looked out on instinct.

The fog over the sea… was thinning.

Chapter 431:

The fog was thinning.

Since the battle began, this was the first time the heavy fog over the Frostholm waters had shown signs of fading. Around the Sea Mist, in the direction of Frostholm, from the sea surface to the sky, all the thick mist was shrinking at a speed visible to the naked eye. The dim gloom that covered everything retreated, and the whole sea area slowly became clear.

And on the sea where the fog faded, one could see burning ships everywhere, the replica fleet with its twisted and frightening shapes, and countless floating wreckage and patches of burning oil.

Thick smoke rolled and spread over the sea where the mist retreated.

First Mate Aiden was the first to run to the window. He stared, eyes wide, at the sea outside where the fog was fading. After a long moment he shouted, “The fog is retreating! Captain! The fog is retreating!”

“I can see it,” Tyrian also walked quickly to the window. Yet the grave look in his one eye did not fade at all just because the fog did. “It is retreating… really retreating?”

“Captain, is this not a good thing?” Aiden at once noticed the wrong note in Tyrian’s tone and turned his head in confusion. “The fog is gone. That means the Anomaly power crouching over Frostholm also…”

“No. Something is wrong.” Tyrian cut the first mate off with a serious look. He stared hard at the distant sea, his gaze growing even sharper. “The fog is gone, but those ghost ships are still there, and the look of the sea…”

“The sea?” Aiden frowned in confusion and turned to look into the distance. A second later, he finally drew in a sharp breath.

Just as the captain said, something was wrong. The replica fleet on all sides did not show any sign of fading. There were even new ghost ships rising from the sea. And in this process, the whole sea area was slowly growing darker!

Large patches of pitch-black were spreading through the water. In the darkness, something was growing. Countless vague shapes were drawing closer to the surface. This scene… was as if something very huge, or some enormous group, was surfacing from the Deep Sea!

“What the…”

Aiden muttered without thinking, but before he could finish, a string of huge booms suddenly shattered the very short calm that had followed the fading of the mist.

The sea nearby split open and countless huge ships floated up. Some looked like wrecks, some twisted like monsters, and some carried a strange, half-familiar look. In the suddenly black sea, it was as if the entire replica fleet had surged out all at once!

“Attention! Enemy ships appearing! Enemy ships… they are everywhere!”

A seaman shouted in terror. The close-in guns along the edge of the deck roared at the same time. The thunder of gunfire rang over the sea almost at once. Shells howled through the air, and huge water columns and balls of fire from the explosions once again covered the sea.

But in this sudden chaos, Tyrian still used his gaze on the sea, watching those enemies that rose one after another from the water.

He recognized some of them – and so did his soldiers.

“It is the Knight! The Knight we sank at the very start!”

“The Black Flag soldier! The Black Flag soldier that sank fifteen minutes ago! It has appeared again!”

“The Courage! And the Prince Jotun!”

“Captain!” First Mate Aiden’s voice reached Tyrian’s ears, carrying a panic he had never shown before. “The whole replica fleet… the ones we destroyed… they have all appeared again!”

Tyrian opened his mouth, about to speak, when a voice suddenly rose in his mind: “… This is normal, because the root of mirror world is still there.”

“Father?!” Tyrian jerked in shock and instinctively looked around for something that could form a mirror. “You are now…?”

“Do not rush, Tyrian. The timing is just right.”

Tyrian quickly calmed down. He motioned for Aiden to take command of the fight and answered fast in his mind: “What do you need me to do?”

…

At the same time that the fog over the sea was fading, the heavy mist covering the city-state of Frostholm also retreated. But just like at sea, the fading of the fog did not mean the end of the crisis.

mirror world was still rising. Another, far more terrifying Frostholm city-state was slowly overlapping with the Mortal Realm.

The city-state’s Guard Corps, still holding out, had built street barricades to block countless monsters that seemed to appear from nowhere. The roar of guns shook the city. The peace and safety of the past had long been torn apart. Smoke and dust filled every street. Filthy mud and slowly cooling blood soaked the city, and more twisted sights kept covering everything.

“Commander, they are everywhere!”

At the crossroads of Fireplace Street, a Guard Corps squad that had once been trapped in the mist was now using the firepower of a Steam Walker to sweep the freaks that appeared on the street. The soldiers had not even had time to cheer when the thick fog faded before more monsters and horror phenomena dragged them into a new fierce fight.

“Then fire everywhere!” the squad commander roared. He shot into the distance as he rushed to the feet of the Steam Walker and to the side of the signaler. “Can you reach the other squads?”

“Squads Seven, Six, and Four are still missing!” the signaler shouted. “Almost a quarter of the squads vanished in the earlier fog, Commander!”

“Keep calling until someone answers, or until reinforcements come,” the commander said, slapping the signaler’s helmet and turning to look into the distance. “The fog is gone. Hold on. The situation is changing – this may be the last attack!”

The machine gun turret of the Steam Walker roared in a long burst and tore another distant Steam Walker into pieces. As that huge machine crashed to the ground, a vast amount of filthy sludge also burst from its machinery bay, splashing onto the street like horrible innards.

The warriors once again forced up their courage – or maybe they just let numbness keep driving their exhausted limbs. The commander spoke words of encouragement he did not even believe himself, then raised his head to look into the distance again.

He saw the two Silent Cathedrals standing high on the mountaintop. On one side of the city-state, the ground seemed to curl and rise in a strange way.

Huge, unfamiliar building clusters were slowly rising out of the city. Layer upon layer of buildings piled over the streets he knew. Twisted, slanted high towers spread out of far-off structures, like hateful bone growths sprouting from giants, stretching and growing in the sky.

Countless streams of sludge were flowing out of those high, lifted buildings, pouring down as if to swallow the whole city.

“O Lord of Death…” At the top of the Silent Cathedral, Bishop Ivan looked down at the city-state that was slowly twisting and being devoured by huge Visions. At last he could not help but speak in a low voice. “Is today the day it all ends…”

He looked into the distance, but could only see vast darkness surging up from all sides. The original City Hall on the opposite hilltop had, at some unknown time, become wrapped in strange thorns. In that thicket of thorns stood another Silent Cathedral in a hazy way. At the foot of the hill, row after row of buildings rocked and piled up, rising in a heap. The houses took on a shape that made one’s skin crawl, like the limbs of soft-bodied creatures.

Outside the city-state, the whole sea was slowly being covered by an ominous black. That darkness was like a huge mirror, and in the mirror another Frostholm slowly appeared. It was like looking at another world through a bent mirror. That “Frostholm” looked twisted and wrong everywhere, full of errors that felt almost right and full of crawling, pitch-black malice.

The huge city of mirror world was rising from the Deep Sea, corrupting everything in the Mortal Realm and in the unreal at the same time.

“Archbishop!” A High Deacon ran out from the terrace door and came to stand behind Bishop Ivan. “The last reserve forces have gathered. The Silent monks and the Guardians will protect the Great Cathedral until the final moment!”

“Agatha still has not come back?”

“We still cannot contact Lady Gatekeeper,” the High Deacon said quickly. “The exploration team that went down the shaft with her reported that the Gatekeeper vanished after entering a strange stone wall. There has been no word since. Now the mine has been swallowed by darkness. I fear…”

“The Gatekeeper will not fall so easily. Agatha will finish her mission… she will finish it for sure,” Bishop Ivan said calmly.

The High Deacon hesitated. “Archbishop, you should take shelter…”

“Take shelter? Hide in some safe prayer room in a chapel? Or take a ship and flee this city?” Bishop Ivan turned around and slowly shook his head. “I do not need to take shelter. I will stay here. You go and command the Guardian units at the foot of the hill. Move every commoner you can up the mountain. Hold on as long as you can.”

The High Deacon hesitated a few more seconds, then finally nodded hard. “Yes, Archbishop!”

The High Deacon withdrew, and the old bishop was alone again on the terrace.

He raised his head and gazed at the other great Cathedral that was wrapped in thorns, the one that looked like a shadow of the Silent Cathedral.

That great Cathedral was dead and still. No clerics could be seen inside.

It was only a mirror world, but its appearance meant that the “Inversion” of that mirror world Frostholm had reached the final step.

“Agatha… you should still be somewhere, carrying out your duty…”

Bishop Ivan spoke softly, as if talking to himself, yet also as if gently reminding a junior with whom he had already lost contact.

He slowly raised his hand and undid the rich robes that stood for the archbishop’s authority. Then he took off his crown and set it on the rail beside him.

“Then you should still remember that the Saints of Bartok never stop before death…”

With the fine robes and the crown of Your Eminence taken off, layers of bandages were revealed. Ivan reached up, felt around, and slowly loosened a knot near his neck.

“We face filth with flesh and blood. When life ends, we guard our faith with bodies that do not rest. And when even the body ends…”

The bandages came loose. It was as if a container that had been sealed and pressed down for decades finally broke free. Under the bandages there was not some broken body – there had long been no body at all.

Under them there was only pale ash and smoke.

“We still have burning ash.”

The bandages fell away. Fluttering bone ash flew out from the edge of the terrace, turning into fine white smoke that slowly spread and covered the sky over Frostholm.

Chapter 432: The Call of Fire

In the Harbor district, Lister, who was commanding the garrison to hold off the attack while trying to keep the Harbor running, suddenly looked up and stared blankly toward the city-state.

Inside the city-state, strange twisted buildings were surging up and appearing above ordinary streets. In the distance, the land was warping and flipping over. Faint thorn-shaped phantoms covered the mountains, and chaotic light and shadow were descending out of nothing. Yet in the middle of this terrifying, eerie scene, some fine, pale “dust” suddenly began to drift down.

That pale dust appeared in the sky out of nowhere. It floated down like the first snow at the start of winter. It passed through overlapping phantoms and twisted, alien streets, and little by little fell onto the streets of Frostholm. It seemed weightless, yet endless.

Where the motes of dust fell, the city-state that had turned vague and chaotic because of overlapping phantoms suddenly looked clear-cut again. It lasted only for a moment, and the change was small, but Lister clearly saw a boundary appear again between the illusions and the real streets.

But he had no time to think about what this meant, or even to think about what would happen to him in the next minute.

The roar of Steam Walkers opening fire and the thunder of distant Coastal Guns pulled him back to the Mortal Realm.

“Hold those freaks outside the docks!” Lister ran along the walkways between buildings and through the defensive line built from Steam Walkers and makeshift barricades. He shouted to the soldiers and officers: “Keep the fuel depots and ammunition routes clear! The Harbor must not fall!”

Smoke spread in all directions. The air carried the smell of blood, machine oil, and the sharp stench that rose when foul sludge dried out. One Steam Walker was destroyed, and at once another spider-like machine rushed out from behind cover to hold the fragile line.

Inside that line lay the battered docks and the many teams running between the Harbor’s buildings.

Lister climbed to a higher spot and looked toward the docks.

When the monsters had first poured out of the thick fog, the Harbor had almost fallen. He and his soldiers had paid a heavy price to clear the corruption inside the Harbor’s area and to build a line on the road leading into the city. They had held that line until now.

According to the last external transmission, this was already the only Harbor in Frostholm still operating. The other Harbors were either still fiercely contested, already lost, or unable to function because their key facilities had been badly damaged.

He had to keep it running at any cost. The sea front was already on the brink. If they lost this last coastal support, the City Navy would truly be finished.

But with another terrifying twisted city slowly invading the Mortal Realm… could they really hold this place?

Lister turned back and took one last look at the deformed land swelling up inside the city like a bloated, festering wound. He forced himself to ignore how it was slowly spreading toward the Harbor, then left the line and returned to the defense command post.

It was just as busy here. Officers and staff officers were worn out and frantic. The reports coming in from all sides were bleak, and the calls and beeps from all the radios never stopped.

A radio operator sat in the corner, his voice hoarse as he repeated into the set: “To all ships in coastal waters, this is East Harbor. We are still here. Repeat, we are still here—this is the only safe resupply port. Do not approach any other Harbor…”

Lister walked straight up to a subordinate. “How is the resupply pier?”

“The Laurel is resupplying ammunition and repairing its feed elevators. Her sister ship has lost power and is being towed back by barges. Our ammunition, fuel, and fresh water are still sufficient, but the crane at Pier Four was destroyed, so that side is paralyzed…”

Lister listened with a dark face. Then hurried footsteps came from the side. Another junior officer rushed to his side, looking tense. “Commander, there is a situation…”

“There are situations everywhere,” Lister said loudly. “Report directly!”

“Yes. A ship is requesting to enter port for repairs. It is… from the Sea Mist Fleet,” the junior officer said, his eyes complicated. “The Undying on board say their transmission system has failed, and the equipment on the ship cannot handle it.”

Lister froze for a moment. Three seconds later, he clenched his teeth. “Let them enter the port. Help them repair it as fast as possible.”

“Yes, Commander.”

The subordinate left. Lister walked quickly to the window and looked out toward the sea.

A warship trailing thick smoke was slowly approaching the repair dock. The Queen of Frostholm's flag flew at its bow. Farther out on the sea, wreckage floated everywhere.

"Half a century… and this flag finally returned to Frostholm like this…"

Lister muttered without thinking.

But the next second, a sudden commotion sounded from the corridor and cut off the Harbor's defense commander's sigh.

"What now?" He turned his head and shouted.

A nervous soldier pushed the door open in a hurry, looking very awkward as he spoke to the commander-in-chief. "Commander! There are two… ordinary citizens, two young ladies. I don't know how they got in, but they insist on talking to you…"

"Ordinary citizens? Send them to the shel—" Lister started to speak on reflex, but before he could finish, the sound of scuffling rushed in from the corridor. Right after that he heard a young girl's noisy voice outside—

"Get the hell out of the way! Move it! Time is precious! What was that word again… window, oh, window interval, it only lasts this damn little while!"

Lister looked up in shock. The next second, he saw two young ladies force their way past the soldiers and barge into this crucial command room.

One was short and thin, dressed in a black cotton dress, yet she pushed two burly soldiers away from the doorway with one shove. The other was a bit taller, wearing a plain brown coat and cotton skirt, and she looked a little nervous.

They both looked only sixteen or seventeen. The thin one even looked younger.

“Leave at once,” Lister said at once, his irritation making his tone harsh. “This is not a place for you to fool around. If you got separated from the evacuees, then—”

“You’re the boss here? We have something important,” the thin young lady cut him off loudly before he could finish. “Is there somewhere nearby you’re not using for now? We need to start a fire…”

“Start a fire?” Lister froze for a moment, then realized this was a terrible joke. He could not understand why two random commoners would come here to cause trouble at a time like this. His professional instincts snapped him awake. He shouted at once, “soldiers, restrain them!”

Several soldiers rushed in at once to seize the two strangers. The short girl started hopping as she shouted, “We really do have something important! The angle from here is perfect, we just need a patch of open ground! You…”

She suddenly stopped. She stared wide-eyed out the window, as if she had just seen something.

“Hey! Over there works! The whole avenue is empty, and it leads straight to the coastline!” The girl jumped high, and even two or three soldiers could not hold her down. Then she turned her head and called to her companion, “Nina, you go there. With that and the two arson points we found to the south just now, the city side will definitely be enough!”

“Ah… okay!” The young lady called Nina answered at once. Then she turned back, bowed slightly to Lister with an awkward, apologetic look, and said, “S-sorry, mister. My friend is not very good at talking to people. We’ll leave now…”

Lister stared, the absurd scene making his mind go blank, but he still stepped forward on instinct. “Stop, you—”

His words never finished.

Because something even more absurd happened.

Heat suddenly surged around the young girl in front of him. In the blink of an eye she turned into a leaping, blinding arc of fire. The flame rose in the room, and its glare felt as if just looking at it could set a person’s soul on fire. The next second, the flame flew toward the open window, like a shooting star flying backward, and shot straight at a high platform near the Harbor district.

Lister stared in shock, but before he could process it, the flame suddenly rushed back into the room.

The flame bent toward him in a bow, outlining the shape of a girl. A polite voice came from within it, crackling with sparks: “Thank you for protecting the city. I’m leaving! Goodbye!”

The arc of flame shot out of the room again.

“Bye-bye!”

In the room, the short girl also shouted again and again. Then a pitch-black rift suddenly opened beside her. Shadows surged inside it and yanked her away, making her vanish into thin air before everyone’s eyes.

“What… what the hell…”

Lister stared at this scene, stunned and dazed, then ran to the open window on reflex. He only caught a glimpse of an arc of blazing fire shooting straight up into the sky in the distance.

And beneath that flame, the coastline bathed in its harsh light… suddenly burst into fire!

“The Frostholm coast is aflame!”

On the Sea Mist’s lookout platform, an Undying sailor raised a speaking trumpet and shouted.

Waves rose and fell, and the cold wind curled back on itself. Tyrian stood at the edge of the bow deck like a lone reef. In his single eye, the Frostholm coast was reflected, with several great fires now burning there.

A bright flame jumped over the city, constantly igniting the empty areas along its edges: tall cliffs, rocks jutting from the water, fallen watchtowers, and shattered gun emplacements. The burning points slowly linked together, like a row of endless candlesticks.

Around the Sea Mist, the vast sea itself was burning in great patches.

Debris left by the replica fleet burned. Ships of the Sea Mist Fleet and the City Navy burned. Leaked fuel burned.

The whole sea was being set on fire by war.

In that burning sea, the twisted, eerie light and shadow of the mirror world world were reflected: the Ghost fleet rising without end, the strange and terrifying mirror world Frostholm in the distance, and the boundless darkness filling the space around those twisted entities.

“Captain!” First Mate Aiden ran over and shouted beside Tyrian, “The last barrel of fuel has been dumped. The flames around us are about to reach the ship!”

“I know,” Tyrian said calmly, and a faint smile slowly appeared on his face. “How is Frostholm’s navy reacting?”

“They also did what we told them and lit their spare whale oil, but they still have no idea what we’re trying to do. They are just following orders in total confusion. They hope we can give them an explanation.”

“An explanation…”

Tyrian muttered softly, then slowly raised his hand and pointed around the Sea Mist, at the sea that was being covered by thicker and thicker darkness and growing more and more eerie.

“Aiden, what does this sea look like to you?”

Aiden paused, then lifted his head and looked around.

In the next second, his expression slowly froze, even showing a hint of fear.

At some point, the waves and wind on the sea had quickly died down. Endless darkness made the whole stretch of water slowly take on a mirror-like sheen.

Flames burned before that mirror, from the Frostholm coast all the way to the zone where the fleets were locked in battle. The chain of war fires looked like ritual candles set before a mirror.

The wind, waves, and gunfire on the sea seemed to fade all at once. Everything grew distant, as if it came from another world. In that eerie, brief silence, Aiden heard his captain speak softly.

“Father said that if we ever wanted to seek him out, we should find a mirror and light flames in front of it.”

Tyrian slowly spread his arms, facing the sea that was turning into a black mirror.

“The fire is lit. Are you there?”

Thus, the sea around Frostholm opened its eyes.

“I am here.”

Chapter 433: Burning Away

In that instant, Frostholm truly became a city floating on a mirror.

The sea itself was that mirror.

Reflected in it was not only the twisted, terrifying mirror world city, but also a pair of eyes burning with fire, and a presence larger than the city-state itself—so large it seemed to match the whole Frostholm sea region.

The divine authority of fire shifted in an instant. Every flame burning on and around that mirror became a medium that spread and magnified that power.

“Commander! Commander! The fire… the fire!”

The horrified shout of a junior officer snapped Lister out of his daze. He jolted fully awake and followed the sound to the window. He saw the whole coastline burning, and even the entire sea set alight. Rolling flames rose up, and then a ghostly green glow flowed out of the fire like water and quickly dyed his whole field of view.

The spirit form flames rising from all directions seemed to carry a power that shook the soul, making Lister step back on reflex. But in the next second he saw that even the flames inside the gas lamps set into the nearby wall were quietly tinged with a layer of ghostly green.

A deep rumble came from far away, as if it shook the whole city. It was mixed with loud creaks like some enormous thing being torn and broken apart. Everyone in the command post heard the booming noise.

Someone turned toward the city in the direction of the sound and saw that the grotesque twisted structures that had almost covered the whole city were cracking open piece by piece. Even greater tongues of fire burst from the cracks. In the midst of that vast spirit form blaze, countless black substances were slowly being burned away.

Near the Harbor defense zone, an exhausted city Guard Corps hid behind a crumbling barricade and watched as the twisted buildings in the distance split apart. Hundreds and thousands of deformed, writhing things fled from the cracks, but flames chased after them and burned them into black ash.

At the foot of the central mountain, the Guardian troops were locked in a life-and-death struggle with invading replica freaks. Suddenly, a phantom army charged out of the chaotic light and shadow. This force wore Guard Corps uniforms from half a century ago, the uniforms of the Queen's Guard. They rushed into the streets, shouting the Queen of Frostholm's name, and fought to the death against the twisted monsters pouring into the Mortal Realm.

At the last line of defense in front of the Silent Cathedral, the High Deacon was organizing the priests to fight the monsters flooding into the square. The tongues of fire spewing from the Steam Walkers and the pale flame released by the Silent monks wove together into a net that barely held back the monsters and the invading sludge.

"Hold them back!" the High Deacon shouted hoarsely. At the edge of his vision, fine pale ash was drifting down from above the Silent Cathedral like falling first snow. "Block the Cathedral doors! Block—"

A thunderous boom and a tremor that felt like it shook the mountains suddenly hit. The High Deacon almost fell in the earth-shattering impact. A thorn of congealed sludge, full of malice, shot at him through a gap in the line.

But just as it was about to pierce him, a streak of ghostly green flame appeared in midair and turned the wicked attack into ash.

The High Deacon looked up in shock and saw a figure floating in front of him.

She wore tattered black robes like those of an ascetic. Her body was covered in cracks large and small, and flames surged through her like boiling, eternal blood.

“Agatha… Gatekeeper?”

The High Deacon stared at the figure before him, feeling that she was both familiar and strange. He said her name, then saw more unfamiliar figures appear beside the Gatekeeper. Each of them was wrapped in ghostly green spirit form flames.

“I’m back,” Agatha said, turning her head. Two points of fire flickered in her empty eye sockets, and her voice crackled with sparks. “Take the rest of your people and fall back, or find a safe place and stand firm.”

“Stand firm?” the High Deacon repeated in confusion, not understanding what she meant for a moment. “And… why have you become like this…”

Agatha did not answer him. As the deep rumbling grew denser and louder, she turned the other way and looked toward the sea outside the city.

Thick smoke rose over the sea. The clouds hung low and black. The ocean was dark as a mirror, and a vast, nameless presence was… rising from that mirror.

Two huge green lights, almost like suns, slowly rose through the smoke and clouds. An outline beyond human imagination took shape in that smoke and cloud, as if the sea and the sky themselves were bulging and gathering into a form. The sight made even Agatha, who had already stopped breathing long ago, feel suffocated again.

It was a suffocation of the soul.

“God of Death…” The High Deacon could hardly endure the crushing pressure. His body, which he had just managed to get upright, shook and collapsed again. “That is… what is that?!”

Agatha only tilted her head slightly, her tone helpless. “I did remind you to find a safe place and stand firm.”

The High Deacon could no longer hear what the Gatekeeper was saying to him. As the outline in the clouds rapidly solidified, he finally understood what it was.

It was a figure rising from the endless sea, a being using the whole Frostholm sea region as a medium to project itself into the Mortal Realm.

The two green fires blazing in the clouds like suns were actually its eyes. The curling, surging clouds were its breath. The huge shadow slowly lifting inside the smoke… was its arm.

Now that hand was reaching toward Frostholm.

“My Lord!”

Someone cried out in the square.

But the hand, though it looked slow, moved faster than any shout or prayer. It had already passed over the sea, over the waters where the Sea Mist Fleet, Frostholm navy, and replica fleet were fighting, and over the city’s coast. It reached into Frostholm’s depths as if reaching into smoke.

In the next second, the arm began to rise slowly, as if lifting a mass of hundreds of millions of tons, inch by inch.

And rising with that arm was a mirror world city that was being peeled away from Mortal Realm Frostholm.

All the twisted buildings, the curled and swollen land, the thorns covering the mountains, and all those blasphemous things that half-mimicked the Mortal Realm yet overwrote it with horror were torn bit by bit out of the Frostholm city-state by that hand.

mirror world Frostholm had risen up into the Mortal Realm. Now it floated far higher than its Creators had ever planned, and it was still rising.

Agatha laughed, more happily than ever before.

With mirror world Frostholm torn free from the city and still rising, the scene looked like an evil spirit being driven out of a body that a malevolent spirit had invaded. That “evil spirit” was slowly lifted up toward the clouds by a gigantic arm.

Deep in the thick clouds, the two green fireballs burning like suns swayed slightly. A vague but stern and awe-inspiring face seemed to be looking down.

Many tiny sounds came from the palm.

Some were real noises, but most sounded like vibrations echoing on the level of thought—the howls echoing in a pile of twisted wreckage, and the stubborn, fanatical fantasies and delusions that clung to the mirror world city.

Duncan looked through the clouds at his own palm. The mirror world city there was like a swollen, misshapen lump of flesh. The streets that had clumsily imitated the Mortal Realm were quickly reverting into their original state as filthy mud. Between the bloated, twisted streets, hills, and buildings, tiny thorns kept pulsing in and out. Faint sparks, almost too small to see, flickered in the center of the mass. The tangled obsessions of hundreds and thousands of mad believers buzzed there, making a noise like a swarm of flies.

Mixed into them were fear, fury, unwillingness, and pure malice.

Were those fanatics still trying to preach their Doomsday theories? Or were they just trying to find a reasonable explanation for the disaster they had brought on themselves?

Duncan listened for a while, then lowered his gaze.

“You fools don’t know the first thing about a large-scale sacrificial rite.”

His gaze focused on the lump of mirror world city, and the whole city began to burn in his sight, in the palm of his hand.

Innumerable ash and green flowing fire fell from the sky like a storm pouring down from the clouds.

The hand, as huge as a city, slowly closed into a fist. mirror world Frostholm, already burned to ash in its palm, turned into powder with a terrifying grinding sound. Countless remaining pieces were flung out over the Frostholm sea region. They fell into the ocean, onto the coast, onto every place Tyrian could see.

But almost all the fallen relics avoided Frostholm’s main island and the sea where the Sea Mist Fleet and Frostholm navy were still active.

Tyrian looked around.

All the replica ships were collapsing quickly.

It was finally over.

He let out a slow breath.

First Mate Aiden stood beside him. The bald giant of a man looked up at the sky, but he could only see a small part of that huge figure’s outline.

Aiden’s body was still trembling.

“Any thoughts?” Tyrian turned his head and looked at his first mate with a half-smile.

Aiden fumbled a pipe out of his coat, but his hands shook so much he could not light it. After a long moment he put the pipe down again, his voice trembling a little. “The old captain… he won’t mind that we fought him before, right?”

Tyrian only smiled and took a rolled cigarette from his own coat.

“Father won’t care about such small things.”

But the Frost Sea Pirate Lord’s hands shook for a long time too, and he never managed to light his cigarette.

Chapter 434:

mirror world turned to ash. The darkness began to fade. The phantom of the Queen Guard Corps vanished. The Profane Constructs that had invaded the city-state broke apart one after another, turning into black sludge that dried up at once. The gunfire and cannon blasts all over the city-state fell silent with them – what took their place was an unspeakable fear and stillness that covered the whole city.

Everyone could see that vast presence, the one standing out in the Boundless Sea, looking down at the city-state from within the clouds.

Just a few minutes ago, mirror world Frostholm had turned to ash in the hand of that giant, and no one could guess what would happen next.

Only the eerie green flame that spread across the whole city and the surface of the sea still burned fiercely. Yet these flames did not hurt anyone. They only brushed over the Mortal Realm like phantoms. When they touched you, all you felt was a harmless warmth.

Agatha lowered her head and casually helped the pale High Deacon to his feet. The flames burning on Agatha’s arm made the High Deacon a little nervous, but compared with the mood hanging over the city, that small fear did not matter.

“The next part…” The High Deacon looked even paler. He looked at Agatha, at the eerie green spirit flame burning on her body, the same flame that filled the whole city. His voice still shook as he asked: “What will happen next?”

Agatha thought for a moment and shook her head: “I do not know.”

The High Deacon stared: “You do not know?!”

“…I did not ask,” Agatha said calmly. “The situation was urgent. I had no other choice.”

The High Deacon was dumbfounded. He had many questions. He wanted to ask where that giant above the sea had come from, what these flames in the city really were, and why Agatha looked like this now. But for the moment, he could not ask even one of them.

Agatha no longer cared about the High Deacon’s reaction. She only tilted her head a little and watched the last fine pale ashes drift down onto her shoulder.

At some point, the ash drifting over the city-state had stopped. What landed on her shoulder seemed to be the very last piece. In a daze, Agatha felt as if someone had patted her on the shoulder.

“I have to go,” she heard someone speak beside her ear. “My journey in this world is over. A longer road is still waiting for me.”

“Safe travels, Bishop Ivan.”

A wind blew in from far away. It passed through the silent main doors of the great cathedral, swept across the square before the doors, and caught that light ash, letting it quietly scatter in the wind.

…

On top of the clock tower behind the Cathedral, Shirley, in a black dress, looked down at the streets. She sat on a section of wall that stuck out from the eaves, her legs dangling outside as she swung them back and forth in boredom and muttered: “It got quiet…”

“Everyone looks scared…” Nina stood on the small platform behind Shirley. As she spoke, she looked up at the sky. “I was scared too…”

“Who would not be scared after seeing that?” Shirley shrank her neck and carefully stared at the huge, hazy figure over the distant sea. “I never thought Mr. Duncan would solve this trouble in this way in the end – it made even more noise than last time in Pland.”

“Uncle Duncan said the root of Frostholm’s crisis was that mirror world, so to solve the problem you had to get rid of mirror world completely. Sealing it or stopping the cultists’ ritual would only keep people safe for a while. The only way to settle it once and for all was to pull mirror world up by the roots, drag it into the Mortal Realm, and burn it,” Nina said very seriously. “But mirror world was too big, so he needed a big enough ‘fire ground’…”

“Alright, alright, I get it. You are very good at setting fires, right? I will be sure to mention this to Mr. Duncan later,” Shirley said as she waved her hands again and again. Then she looked up with some doubt. “But, back to the point… what is Mr. Duncan doing now? Is the matter not already settled? When will he come back?”

When she heard this, Nina looked up at the huge figure above the sea outside the city, thought for a moment, and said: “Then I will go up and ask?”

“Go, go,” Shirley said quickly, waving her hand. “When you get up there, do not forget to tell Mr. Duncan that our homework got eaten by Abyssal Hounds…”

Before she even finished speaking, Nina had already turned into a bright arc of flame in midair, then shot straight toward the shadow that covered the sky outside the city.

…

From a height where he could look over the entire sea around Frostholm, Duncan let his gaze pass through gaps in the clouds and quietly watched the sea and the city below.

The sea had no end and stretched into the far distance. The city-state was like a round disc floating on the water, alone in the daylight. At the place where sea and sky met, he could faintly see a grand wall of mist. The mist stood like a wall, forming a dim arc that ringed the whole border of civilization.

It was a view he had never had before. He had never looked at this world from this place, and he guessed that no one else in this world had ever done anything like it either.

He could feel that the “flame” that held up his current form was slowly going out over the sea and the city. He could not stay standing in the sky like this for long, but before the stored power ran dry, he still wanted to look a little more.

Just then, a little tongue of flame shot out from the clouds and came into Duncan’s sight.

That small flame hopped between the clouds like a light swallow. As it drew near, Duncan heard Nina’s voice in his ear: “Uncle Duncan! What are you doing?”

“I am watching this world,” Duncan said softly with a smile to the little flame. He raised a finger and let her dance on his fingertip. “How did you get up here?”

“Shirley told me to come up. She was curious about what you were doing,” Nina said happily as the flame wavered on Duncan’s fingertip. Even though her current form had swelled into a blaze larger than the clock tower, in Duncan’s eyes she was still very small. “You said you are watching the world? What is so interesting about it?”

Duncan smiled and lifted his chin: “Look, down there.”

The little flame swayed to the side.

“…Wow.”

“It is amazing, is it not?” Duncan said softly. “No one has ever looked down on the Boundless Sea and the cities on it from this height, or seen that distant mist. It is so huge that even with my view right now, I feel short of breath when I look at it.”

Nina thought very hard: “…But if it was a normal-sized human standing at the edge of the Eternal Veil, they would not feel anything. They could not see the whole thing.”

Duncan paused for a moment, then suddenly laughed.

“Yes, you are right. When an ordinary person really stands before that wall of mist, they will not even notice this feeling of pressure and suffocation, because they cannot see all of it. We are up high, and we see too much.”

“Uncle Duncan, why do I feel like… there is some other meaning in what you are saying?”

Duncan did not answer Nina’s question. He just stared into the distance. After a while, he suddenly spoke: “Are you not curious? About what is on the other side of that mist?”

“…The books say the mist has no end. There is no other side. Outside, there is only mist.”

Duncan looked at his fingertip: “That is what the books say. What do you think?”

“…I think the books are just the scholars’ guesses. Mr. Morris said that everything about things outside the civilized world is only scholars’ guesses. Research means following a guess and testing it,” Nina said happily as she shared her thoughts. “The other side of that mist might even be another world!”

Then she stopped, as if she had just realized something: “Ah! Uncle Duncan, are you planning to walk through that thick mist? Are you really going to try it? We are very close to the northern border here, and you are so high up now, so maybe you really could…”

“Sadly, it is not possible,” Duncan said, gently shaking his head and cutting off the excited Nina. “I cannot keep this state for long, and I cannot leave this sea like this at all. A ritual has limits. Right now all we can do is watch from here.”

Nina seemed a little down for a moment. After a while, she spoke again in a careful tone: “Then can I… go over and take a look? I can fly in the sky now~”

“But you can only fly for a short time. You know your own limits very well,” Duncan said, shaking his head again. “And I do not advise you to do it. We know too little about that thick mist. Having a brave spirit is not the same as acting rashly.”

Nina stayed quiet for a moment, then drew out her voice: “Oh – so we really can only stand here and look.”

“The first step of a journey is to look into the distance,” Duncan said, the corners of his mouth curling up. He could feel the flame that held him up begin to fade quickly. This draining form had reached its limit, but before his projected body scattered, he still smiled. “And we should not only look far away, Nina. Did you notice the shape of the city-state? Such a neat circle, so tidy that it does not look natural. And the sea below, deep and wide. Even now we do not know what is down at the bottom…

“The cultists are sure this world will end and that they can build a New World. The Holy See is sure that following the guidance of the Four Gods is the only way to keep the world forever. But there are too many things in this world that we do not know. Whether it is the cultists, the Church of the True Gods, or the scholars in each city-state, everyone’s view of everything on the Boundless Sea is only one side of the truth.”

Between sea and sky, the giant’s huge body quietly faded. The sea, which had been like a mirror, slowly returned to waves.

A streak of fire fell from the clouds back toward the city-state.

But Duncan and Nina kept talking:

“Alright, Nina, go back. We still have a lot to do.”

“Oh… ah, right! Uncle Duncan! I forgot to tell you. Our homework got eaten by Abyssal Hounds, mine and Shirley’s!”

“…It is fine. Mr. Morris and I will prepare new homework for you.”

Chapter 435:

That towering body faded in the clouds.

The wind slowly grew calm again. The smoke of battle still needed time to fade. After the Shadows withdrew, they left behind a city-state full of scars.

“There is a survivor here too! A little young lady!”

The excited shout broke the quiet in the graveyard. A Guardian warrior pushed open the door of the Warden’s hut and found a girl curled up inside.

Cold wind blew in through the open door, carrying the smell of smoke. Annie lifted her head in a daze and looked at the black-clad guard in the doorway. For a moment, she seemed to see another person appear behind the young warrior, a bent figure with always gloomy eyes.

She stood up in confusion and took a step forward without thinking. She stumbled and ran toward the doorway, trying to catch that bent figure.

She grabbed at nothing. Her foot slipped, and then she felt someone catch the collar of her coat from behind. The Guardian warrior had caught the girl who had tried to run past him and almost fallen. He bent down toward her and asked: “Are you alright, young lady? What is your name? Why are you in the graveyard?”

But Annie seemed not to hear his voice at all. She only raised her head and slowly looked around, searching for the old man she had just seen.

The bent old man stood not far away. He had already turned his back to them and waved. Then he slowly walked toward the path deeper in the graveyard. At the far end of that path, an unusual tall figure stood faintly and quietly.

That figure wore a pitch-black robe that made people think of the veil of night. The body under the robe was wrapped in bandages, and the figure held a long staff that looked as if it had been carved from dead wood. The figure looked just like the Warden who stood before the gate of Bartok in the Church's books.

The old man walked up to the Warden. The two of them seemed to speak a few words, then vanished together like phantoms at the end of the path.

Annie stared blankly in that direction. She stood still in the cold wind, without crying or moving.

The black-clad guard beside her grew worried: "What is wrong? Little young lady? What are you looking for?"

"She may be looking for this," another voice suddenly said from the nearby path, along with the sound of boots stepping on snow.

Annie turned her head without thinking.

A nun was walking toward them, holding two things in her hands – a Gatekeeper's cane that already looked badly worn, and a hunting rifle that seemed a little familiar.

"Your protector is gone," the nun said as she stopped in front of Annie. She slowly squatted and set the two things on the ground. "I am sorry. We cannot let you see him again. There was only ash at the site."

Annie stared at the Gatekeeper's cane and the rifle on the ground. After a few seconds, she bent down, picked them up, and held them carefully in her arms.

"I know," she whispered. "Grandpa Caretaker left with the Gatekeeper…"

“Do not touch the gun,” the black-clad Guardian warrior said, reaching out without thinking to stop her. “It is dan…”

“There are no bullets left,” the nun said softly, shaking her head. “Let her hold it for a while. They may have known each other.”

The Guardian warrior hesitated for a moment, then drew his hand back and turned his head to take in the graveyard.

Filthy, dried black sludge covered the path and ringed the Warden’s hut. Dirty snow and that mud mixed together and blanketed the whole graveyard.

How many monsters had tried to attack this place? How much filth had fallen on the snow here? Now that the Shadows had gone, it seemed that no one could ever know.

A cool, light touch fell on him. The Guardian looked up and saw snowflakes slowly falling from the sky. It was not ash this time, but real snow.

With the swirling snow came a glow in the sky. It was the light of the Sun. The heavy clouds still blocked it, but that hazy glow still showed that it was there.

The Sun had returned.

The mechanical roar of a steam engine drew near from outside the graveyard. A steam car stopped at the gate. A nearby Guardian squad heard the noise and moved toward the car, then, in surprise, saluted the person who stepped down.

Footsteps came toward the Warden’s hut. The young black-clad guard saw who it was, turned at once, and saluted. Then he asked in confusion: “Gatekeeper, you are…”

“I am here to check on the graveyards.”

Annie, who was still staring blankly as she held the Gatekeeper’s cane and the rifle, heard the voice beside her. She finally snapped out of her daze, lifted her head without thinking, and looked toward the sound.

A lady in a black priest’s robe stood on the path.

Her skin was pale, and a calm yet icy aura hung around her. Annie did not yet understand what that feeling was, but it made her think of the cold fog on the sea. At the same time, she saw that the skin the lady showed was covered with wounds of all sizes. There was no blood in the wounds. They looked like cracks in a doll.

A strip of black cloth was wrapped over the lady’s eyes.

The lady seemed to be blind, yet Annie felt that the woman’s “gaze” still rested on her. It was a calm and gentle look, passing through the thick black cloth and casting a gaze on her.

Annie took a long time to recognize the lady.

But the lady had clearly recognized her from the start.

“I know you. You are Annie,” Agatha said as she bent down and gently ruffled Annie’s hair. Then her gaze fell to the rifle and Gatekeeper’s cane in the girl’s hands. After two seconds of silence, Agatha stood up and spoke to the priest who had come with her: “The mines were the first places to be invaded. These graveyards around the upper city’s mining area blocked many monsters that were rushing toward the nearby districts.”

“All the Gravekeepers and most of the Guardians stationed around the graveyards died in battle,” the nun beside them said slowly. “The city-state’s Guard Corps in this area also took heavy losses.”

Agatha listened in silence, then gave a quiet benediction.

“Gatekeeper,” the black-clad guard could not help speaking. “There are many dead and wounded in the city-state now. We need to watch for secondary disasters in the domains of death, fear, and obsession. We may need several large-scale soul-soothing rituals, and the Great Cathedral still has not…”

“I am acting as Archbishop for now. Do not worry about the soul-soothing rituals,” Agatha said calmly. “Bishop Ivan has already left. He has a new journey.”

The black-clad guard froze for a moment. Shock and disbelief crossed his eyes. It seemed that only now did he notice that Agatha’s outfit had changed.

The Gatekeeper had taken off the black coat that stood for force. In its place, she wore a robe that belonged more to the clergy.

That change showed that her role and duties had changed.

“Do not worry. I still bear the duties of Gatekeeper, and I will still command the Guardian forces until the Church’s headquarters chooses a new Archbishop or appoints a new Gatekeeper to take my place. At that time, I may become the formal Bishop of this city-state,” Agatha said. Even though she had lost her eyes, she still seemed to have a sharp gaze and had noticed how her subordinate reacted. She explained with patience: “For now, keeping order in the city-state is more important than anything.”

“Yes… Gatekeeper.”

The young black-clad guard lowered his head. After a brief pause, he still chose to use the familiar title “Gatekeeper” for his superior.

Agatha did not care about such small things. She turned her “gaze” toward Annie again.

“Go home,” she said gently. “Your mother is safe. She is waiting for you.”

Annie hesitated for a second at first, but when Agatha mentioned her mother, Annie nodded at once.

But just as she was about to leave with the Guardians, she suddenly stopped.

“Grandpa Caretaker… just went with the Gatekeeper,” she said, raising her head to look at Agatha. “Ah, I mean the Gatekeeper from ‘the other side’ like the books say.”

Agatha frowned a little.

Annie thought Agatha did not believe her, so she quickly raised her hand and pointed toward the path deep in the graveyard: “They left from there…”

Agatha raised her head and looked in the direction Annie pointed, deep in thought.

In the place where her eyes lay hidden under the black cloth, a faint green fire seemed to flash.

A moment later, she lowered her head and faced Annie’s eyes.

“Do you… want to become a Guardian?”

Annie stared, a little lost. She did not seem to fully understand what that meant yet.

But after a few seconds, she seemed to realize it faintly: “Do you mean, like you or Grandpa Caretaker?”

“That may take many years,” Agatha said, and a small smile seemed to appear on her face. Then she shook her head gently. “Do not think too much about it yet. It is a little early for me to tell you this now. Go home first. If you really want to become a Guardian, you must at least get into the Church’s most basic school.”

Annie half understood and half did not. Then, unwilling to part with them, she handed the rifle and the Gatekeeper's cane to the black-clad guard beside her.

"…If I become a Guardian, can I have Grandpa Caretaker's rifle and Gatekeeper's cane?" she asked.

She suddenly turned her head and looked at Agatha very seriously.

After a moment, Agatha nodded slightly: "…If you still feel this way in three years, I agree."

Annie left.

The graveyard grew quiet again.

"…Are you serious? That child is still too young. We cannot see any real talent yet. To inherit a veteran's Gatekeeper's cane, you need more than just finishing the normal Guardian training…" the guard said.

"She can see the guides from the world of the dead," Agatha said slowly as she cast her gaze toward the path at the end of the graveyard. "Just like I did back then."

The young black-clad guard said no more.

The nun on the other side hesitated again and again, but at last she could not help looking at Agatha with worry: "Your body, in the end…"

"It is alright," Agatha said softly, shaking her head. "Something happened. This shell of a body is just damaged."

Chapter 436: After the Disaster Ended

Snow fell in drifting flakes. It was not very heavy, but it looked as if it would last a long time. The Sun’s radiance was blocked by the dark clouds. The daylight that filtered through was not very bright, but it was undeniably there.

Through the street-facing window, they could see people already walking on the road, survivors of the disaster with fear still lingering in their eyes.

These still-shaken citizens emerged from their hiding places. On the streets they checked that the people they knew were still alive, or asked after the missing. Some asked whether there was any new word from the Upper City. Others were still trapped in the terror of the mirror world incursion, shrinking away in fear from every figure that passed in front of them. They hurried out of their homes, then just as quickly locked themselves back inside.

Scarred Steam Walkers and equally battered city Guard Corps, Constable units, and Guardian squads passed the intersection. Their presence let many people finally relax a little. The loudspeakers mounted on the Steam Walkers broadcast a notice that the Visions had ended, that the mirror world incursion had receded. The whole city would now enter forty-eight hours of security control. During this time, the city’s authority would reassert control over the situation and clear hidden dangers throughout the city. Supplies, electricity, steam power, and fresh water would be restored as quickly as possible, and every district was ordered to report casualties without delay…

The loudspeaker broadcast, full of static, grew more distant. Its crude sound quality only made the streets feel colder on this snowy day. Even so, after the Steam Walkers rumbled past, many people's nerves really did start to ease, little by little.

Shirley leaned over the living-room window, watching the scene on the street while she muttered: "I wonder how long the chaos will last… Bread is definitely going to get more expensive."

Nina sat on the sofa beside her, mouth open as she exhaled heat so intense it made the air ripple. She turned her head when she heard Shirley's grumbling: "It'll definitely be messy for a while. Back when Pland was restoring order it took three days… though it won't get too bad this time. The Constable units are still here, after all…"

"Hey, hey! Don't talk while facing me!" Shirley could hardly stay on her feet in the blast of hot air. She stumbled back from the window, dodging as she shouted at Nina: "Your breath is like a leaking steam core right now! Why is it so hot?!"

Nina quickly clapped a hand over her mouth. Hot air still streamed from the corners of her lips as she mumbled an apology: "Sorry, sorry… I stayed in that state for too long earlier…"

Just then, Duncan's voice reached the two girls' ears: "I told you, Nina can only stay in the sky for a short while right now. Her condition is still unstable."

As soon as Shirley heard his voice, she hurried to turn around and stand at attention. Nina also jumped down from the sofa and ran toward Duncan with a smile: "Uncle Duncan!"

Duncan smiled as well and gave Nina, who was still radiating heat all over, a gentle hug. Then he turned his head and nodded in reply to Morris and Vanna, who were rising from the nearby chairs and bowing to him. “Looks like you’re all in good shape.”

“In good condition,” Morris said, adjusting his blessed monocle. “And deeply shaken.”

“I thought that after the great fire in Pland my nerves were already thick enough,” Vanna added, her tone full of emotion and awe. “To be honest, talking with you like this is still more relaxing. I mean, at a normal ‘scale’.”

“Having it happen once in a while is more than enough,” Duncan waved a hand. “Though I have to admit, the view from the sky is impressive.”

As he spoke, his gaze fell on something lying on the dining table not far away.

It was a large book with a black cover. There were no words or symbols on the front. The whole book gave off a strange, dangerous feeling.

“Is this the ‘The Blasphemous Tome’ you took from that small Cult of Annihilation leader?” Duncan’s eyes rested on the book. “It really doesn’t look like anything respectable to read.”

“Yes.” Morris nodded and stepped forward to pick the book up with care. “Later, under safe conditions, I did some basic testing on it. My guess is that this isn’t an ‘original’, but a copy held by a special member of the Cult of Annihilation. If it were the original, it should have far greater power and be much more valuable. It wouldn’t have been carried into the city so casually by a minor leader.”

He paused, a note of uncertainty in his voice. “As for what this book is for… it might be used to spread doctrine, or serve as a medium in spells or rituals. It records some things related to the Abyssal Lord. That part should serve as a source of power for those cultists, but the details are only guesswork."

As he spoke, he held the book out. "Would you like to look at it now?"

"I'll take it back to the ship and read it there," Duncan shook his head. "The city is still chaotic. Who knows what might happen if I open this book now. Better not add to the mess. And besides, we'll have a guest in a while."

"A guest?" Vanna asked curiously from the side. "Who would pay a visit at a time like this?"

Duncan glanced at Vanna, amusement in his tone. "A colleague of yours. She's on her way here."

After he finished, he paid no attention to the odd look that suddenly crossed Vanna's face. He simply walked over to the street-facing window, sat down on the sofa, and settled in as if to wait calmly.

Footsteps sounded beside him. Alice walked over to stand in front of Duncan, the doll's face wearing its usual optimistic, empty expression. "Captain! When are we going home? Are we going back after we see the guest?"

Duncan lifted his eyelids and looked at the doll with the hollow head. "You think… things here are already over?"

"Huh? Aren't they?" Alice looked completely puzzled. "The villains are all dead, the disaster is over, and then the people who are left go off to keep adventuring. At least that's what all the picture books say…"

The corner of Duncan's mouth twitched. He looked up at Alice. "What else do the picture books say?"

"They also say the prince and the knight lived happily ever after…"

Duncan: "…?"

He choked for a long moment before he finally managed to speak. “Usually, in those kinds of picture-book stories, there’s supposed to be a princess or something…”

“The princess ran off with the butler…”

Duncan stayed silent for a few seconds and drew in a slow breath.

“Where did you even get picture books like that?”

Alice thought for a moment, then lifted a hand and pointed at Shirley. “She has a lot of them in her room…”

The next second, before Duncan could say a word, Shirley shot to her feet and bolted for the door. “I just saw a used bookstore going out of business, they were clearing stock and the books were really cheap so I bought a whole pile, you were the one who told me to read more and that picture books were a good place to start, I didn’t know they were all that weird, no wonder the shop went under, none of this is my fault…”

The young lady raced across half the living room wailing like a ghost. Duncan had not even decided how he meant to lecture her when she already reached the door, yanked it open with a bang, and lifted a leg to run out.

The very next second, a thud came from outside the door, followed by Shirley’s startled shout: “What the heck did I just run into…”

Almost everyone in the room was dumbfounded. Alice had not reacted at all to what was happening. Nina had been startled by Shirley’s wailing at such close range. Vanna had never imagined Shirley would be that bold. As for Morris… the venerable old gentleman was still reeling from the story about the princess running off with the butler.

Only Duncan still sat calmly on the sofa. He did not chase after Shirley, and he was not even curious about the noise at the door.

He simply turned his head and looked toward the entrance.

Footsteps sounded, and a young lady walked in hesitantly.

She wore a black priest's robe marked with the sigil of the Church. Her eyes were covered by a thick black cloth. Her long hair hung loose down her back. On the exposed skin of her arms and neck, there were still crack-like scars. Wounds that should have been horrific instead carried a kind of sacred air, like stigmata.

More importantly, she was holding Shirley in one hand, dangling the girl as Shirley flailed and kicked.

"Sorry," Agatha lifted her head, a little nervous as she "looked" at the figures in the room. "I meant to knock, but… she suddenly rushed out."

As she spoke, her gaze swept the room.

In the house that had lost all color and turned into shades of black, white, and gray, one figure after another with a powerful presence entered her sight.

She saw the dim outline of an old man. Streams of colored light flowed around him, and matrix-like points of light flickered inside his body. It was as if Rahm had cast his divine gaze upon the mortal world.

Beside the old man stood a tall figure. Inside its outline, everything was dark and chaotic, filled with ominous lights and shadows that made one think of Subspace. Yet a wisp of ghostly green flame leaped among those shadows, holding the figure together.

A bright arc of flame stood near the window. The fire seemed to have no occult properties, but it released pure light and heat. Just gazing at it made her feel as if her very soul were being scorched.

There was also a hollow shell of a body standing in the room. Countless faint threads spread out from it. It seemed to be turning a curious gaze in this direction. Under that gaze, Agatha even felt a fear that her soul would be caught and turned into one of those thin threads.

And among these figures was the strongest of all.

A field of dazzling starlight rose and walked toward her.

“Welcome. I have been waiting for you for a long time.”

The starlight spoke to her.

Chapter 437: Devastation Everywhere

That field of dazzling starlight was speaking to her and walking toward her. It had been sitting on the sofa a moment ago, yet when it took a step in this direction, Agatha felt as if she were gazing at a giant beyond words. For a brief instant she even lost the ability to judge size and proportion. Her confused senses could no longer grasp how big this house was, and the giant formed by that starlight almost made her soul feel like it was suffocating.

But it was only a fleeting illusion. In the next moment, Agatha snapped out of her shock. She realized that her mind had not been affected by any presence in this room at all. It was as if she had already blended into this place naturally.

“I…” She steadied herself and gazed at the giant of starlight in front of her. She knew she was continuously gazing at the true form of an unspeakable being. Under normal circumstances, that would be no different from suicide. But once she confirmed that she really was not affected anymore, her courage grew. “I didn’t expect you would actually still be here. I only came to try my luck…”

“Where do you think I’d go? Walk off with a swagger while everything here is a mess? Like the heroes in the picture books who leave as soon as they finish their quest?” Duncan laughed as he turned his body a little, gesturing

for Agatha to come in. Then he paused, glanced at Alice from the corner of his eye, and added, “I mean the picture books with normal stories.”

Agatha blanked for a moment. She felt she could not quite keep up with this great being’s train of thought. But she quickly comforted herself with the idea that it was normal for mortals not to understand how Elder Gods thought, and stepped further into the room.

Duncan suddenly stopped and glanced at Agatha’s hand.

“…Could you put Shirley down first?” he said in a slightly odd tone. “And you too, Shirley, why do you look like you’re enjoying this?”

“Ah, sorry!” Agatha finally snapped back to herself and hurried to set the skinny girl she was holding down on the floor. But the instant she did, her expression suddenly changed.

Things had been chaotic at the door just now, and she had not focused on Shirley. Only now did she suddenly notice the anomaly on the girl, limbs warped by a symbiotic pact with Abyssal demons, chains extending out from within her body and hidden away, and the Abyssal Hound crouching in the shadows, sneaking glances at the outside world.

“Abyssal Deep…” Agatha spoke without thinking, every muscle in her body tensing at once.

But before she could do anything, Duncan’s voice came from the side. “Relax. It’s just a harmless hound. I sometimes need a hound to help me find things.”

“A harmless… hound?” Agatha said, her expression strange, as her gaze swept the room again on instinct.

Those figures came into view again, one that looked like a chosen of the gods, another that seemed to carry a divine blessing from Subspace, one that apparently housed the power of the Sun, and even a shell of a soul she could not see through at all…

Her gaze fell once more on the girl called Shirley.

The Abyssal Hound, realizing it had been noticed, was crouching in the shadows with its neck hunched, looking utterly pitiful.

Agatha fell silent.

An Elder God and His followers were gathered here. Indeed, any Abyssal demon in this place could be called harmless to humans and animals.

“Don’t worry, Shirley is not an Annihilator,” Duncan said when he saw her fall silent, explaining patiently. “She met Dog for other reasons, and both of them now act under my orders. They won’t harm the city.”

As he spoke, he pointed to a chair not far away. “Sit. You must have a lot to say.”

Agatha walked over slowly, and Duncan watched how she moved. She found the chair’s position with precision, but when she sat down there was still a hint of hesitation and groping.

“It seems you still need some time to get used to your current state,” Duncan said. “Is that going to be a problem?”

This mysterious being still sounded unfailingly warm and gentle. Agatha shifted a little, feeling uneasy. “…I really am not used to the way I perceive the world now, but there is no need to worry about this body. In fact, the changes that happened to me have quite a few benefits. I can see many things I could not observe before. I just… need to adapt.”

“I’m sorry,” Duncan said, his tone quite serious. “I didn’t expect it to cause this kind of change. In fact, you didn’t have to use such an extreme method as a self-sacrificial rite.”

“But it was the most efficient way,” Agatha shook her head lightly. “Nothing is more suitable than a Gatekeeper as the bearer of your great power.”

Duncan did not press the point. After that, his attention shifted to her current outfit.

“You look very different from the last time we met,” he remarked. “It seems… you look more like a priest now than before.”

“I am temporarily acting as archbishop,” Agatha nodded slightly. “Archbishop Ivan is gone. Now that the fighting in the city is over, what we need more than a fully armed Gatekeeper is someone to lead the Church in comforting the souls of the dead and the minds of the living.”

“Archbishop Ivan…” Duncan’s tone grew more solemn. After a brief silence, he sighed softly. “I never met him, but at that time I sensed the protection that descended over the city-state. It was short, but his efforts did weaken the link between the mirror world and the Mortal Realm for a while. Without him, many more people would have died.”

“May he know peace in Bartok’s realm,” Agatha said softly. “He… held on for many years. Now he can finally rest for a long time.”

“He will,” Duncan said casually. “Though I don’t really understand what Bartok’s domain is like, as one of the True Gods He should treat those noble souls fairly.” He then changed the subject. “Now, tell me how things are in the city.”

Agatha nodded lightly.

She knew that as the Gatekeeper of the Church of Death, and as one of the few people left who could still keep order in the city, she should not casually reveal Frostholm’s current plight to others. She especially should not deepen her dealings with a being whose true nature was unknown and who was suspected to be an Elder God. But after she saw that colossal figure standing in the waters off the city, and after she carried out that self-sacrificial rite, she understood. Whether for Frostholm or for herself, they had already formed a bond with this mysterious being that would be hard to sever.

Now that this being clearly still had an interest in watching over this battered city-state, she had no way to avoid the matter.

If the choice she made today turned out to be a sin, then she would let the Church and her god judge her.

“Frostholm’s current situation… is very bad,” she began in a low voice. “As you know, we just lost Archbishop Ivan. The Church’s priests and Guardians also took heavy losses while defending the city-state. Now fear and tension hang over the city, along with all the negative effects brought by so many deaths and injuries. If these things are not handled in time, secondary disasters are very likely. Horrors will grow out of people’s hearts. With the Church short on manpower, ‘fear’ itself will snowball throughout the city-state.

“In fact, sunset a few hours from now is very likely to be the start of the real test. During the earlier mirror world incursion, Frostholm went a very long time without the light of the Sun. That greatly weakened the city-state’s protection against extraordinary powers. On the first night that follows, no one knows what will happen.

“On the other hand, City Hall is in even worse shape than the Church. Besides the casualties suffered by the city-state’s Guard Corps and Constable units, the most serious problem is…”

Agatha clearly hesitated when she got this far. But after a few seconds of struggle she still laid out the situation. After all, the governor’s disappearance was not something that could be hidden from anyone.

“The most serious problem is that the governor is missing.”

Duncan raised his eyebrows. “Missing?”

“He disappeared in the Boiling Gold mine. And I…” Agatha stumbled over her words, as if she were still trying to arrange them. After a few seconds she went on, her expression complicated. “Another me once led a team to investigate the tunnel where the governor vanished. According to the exploration party that later returned to the Great Cathedral, ‘I’ and Governor Winston both entered an anomalous area sealed off by stone walls, and neither of us came back…”

Her voice was low and hesitant. It was obvious that when she spoke of that other self, her mood was far less calm than she pretended.

Duncan could almost picture how tangled, confused, and conflicted she had been when she returned to the Great Cathedral and asked the other priests about what that other her had been doing in the past few days.

He gazed at Agatha calmly. “You can put it more directly. The governor of Frostholm is already dead. That is your judgment, isn’t it?”

“Yes.” Agatha finally stopped hesitating and spoke plainly. “There is no evidence, but I really ‘know’ that he is dead. He died in some strange, dark space. We probably won’t even be able to recover the body.”

“You ‘know’,” Duncan repeated, putting weight on the word. Then he shifted his posture in the chair. “It seems you’ll be going back to the Boiling Gold mine again.”

“That was… where ‘she’ vanished for the last time,” Agatha nodded gently. “When she disappeared, I sensed something I can’t put into words. It was as if I could feel her thoughts. I think… she had many things she wanted to tell me, but she ran out of time…”

Agatha stopped, then went on. “And… the members of the exploration team who returned from the mine told me about something else. It was something that the other me had told them while she was leading them in the mine. That is what unsettles me even more…”

Chapter 438: Getting to Know Each Other Again

Agatha did not hold anything back. In front of this benevolent being who had already saved Frostholm from the brink of destruction, she laid out all the information she currently had.

One part of the intel came from her own observations and conclusions during the mirror world Frostholm operation. The other part she had pried out bit by bit after she returned to the great Cathedral, from various priests and from her own trusted aide. All of it had happened while she was trapped in that mirror world city.

They were things that the “other her” had experienced.

The Boiling Gold mine that Frostholm relied on for survival hid a huge secret. The so?called Boiling Gold ore had already run dry back in the days of the Frostholm Queen. The governors of each generation might be holding an enormous secret. Governor Winston and the “other Agatha” had vanished together deep in the mine, and before they disappeared, that “other Agatha” seemed to have discovered some shocking truth. The intense surge of her will had even reached the real Agatha on this side…

Duncan listened in silence, only now and then asking about some point of detail. He waited until Agatha finished everything before he finally let out a quiet sigh.

“You just told me Frostholm’s biggest secret—at a time like this, you’re not worried I might be a being with bad intentions?”

“After seeing the methods you used to destroy that mirror world city, I decided there was no point in guessing at your intentions anymore,” Agatha said calmly. “If you really meant this city harm, all of us would be dead before the Sun went down.”

“…Is this how all you protectors of city-states give compliments, so unique?” Duncan muttered, then quietly glanced at Vanna beside him.

Vanna instantly turned her gaze away and pretended she had not heard anything.

The old scholar Morris, sitting across the table, could not help leaning forward. After hearing the shocking fact that the Boiling Gold vein had already dried up long ago, his curiosity had clearly swelled to the point of bursting: “So what is the situation in the Boiling Gold mine now? Can you still find raw ore? The stuff you have been digging out all these years… was it really Boiling Gold?”

“The mine is still sealed,” Agatha answered frankly. “After the mirror world incursion faded, there were loud crashes and tremors from the shafts. For safety, and because we are short of people, we still have not confirmed the situation inside. But according to reports from the transit station and the smelter at the mine… at least the Boiling Gold that was brought out earlier has all stayed the same.”

“The mirror world city has been destroyed… but the Boiling Gold, which in theory counts as an ‘Anomaly product’, did not vanish? Now that is interesting…” Morris rubbed his chin without thinking. “You know, the replicas and monsters in the city all turned into piles of sludge the instant the mirror world city collapsed… so all that Boiling Gold was real? How does that work? Can the Sacred Abyssal Lord really create true Boiling Gold?”

“This is not the time for academic research,” Vanna could not help grumbling, then turned her head to Agatha. “So when are you planning to go down and confirm what is happening in the mine?”

Agatha hesitated, then spoke, not very sure: “I think… at least after order in the city has roughly stabilized, after the tremors and crashes in the shafts have stopped. And… at the very least, we have to get safely through the first night after the disaster.”

As she spoke, she lifted her head and, almost without thinking, glanced out the window.

Snow was still falling. It was still daytime, but behind the clouds the Sun was slowly sinking. That hazy ball of light was about to brush the tip of the far-off Cathedral spire.

“In two hours, the Sun will set. That will be the first test we face after the disaster…”

“Sorry, let me cut in,” Vanna suddenly raised a hand, breaking off Agatha’s worried sigh. “I think… you actually do not have to worry about the veil of night descending. Compared to all the other troubles you are facing, ‘night’ might become the last thing this city-state needs to fear from now on.”

Agatha froze for a moment: “Why do you say that?”

“…Experience,” Vanna said. She then glanced back at Duncan, and only after seeing him give her a small nod did she turn back to Agatha and go on: “Pland’s experience.”

“Pland…” Agatha was confused for a second, but the next moment she suddenly remembered the reports she had received before, the messages that had come from far away—about the large-scale Visions that had struck Pland, the crisis of the Black Sun, the history rebuilt in flame, and…

…a “rumor” that had spread from Pland through all kinds of channels.

About that chilling ghost captain, a moving calamity on the Boundless Sea, the terrifying Subspace Shadows—about Duncan Abnomar, who had already regained his humanity.

The expression on the young Gatekeeper, who was also the acting Archbishop, instantly became very interesting. She stood up so quickly that her chair gave a loud creak.

All the suspicious clues suddenly found their answers. All her uneasy guesses were abruptly confirmed. The scattered, messy pieces of information were strung together.

“I admit, this is a bit awkward,” Duncan said with a shrug, his tone a little helpless.

Agatha still stood there stiffly, staring at Duncan without moving. No one could see her “eyes” just then, but the expression of this Miss Gatekeeper was clearly more than simple embarrassment.

After a long time, she finally broke the silence: “No wonder… your followers call you ‘Captain’… I should have thought of it earlier. On the Boundless Sea, what other ‘captain’ could be as special as you?”

“About the Viseran Thirteen Isles, I am very sorry,” Duncan said. “I have no memory of it at all, but the evidence seems solid.”

As he spoke, Duncan tried his best to make his voice sound warm and reliable. But considering his fearsome “reputation”, and the display of power he had shown in front of Frostholm just a few hours ago, that bit of gentleness in his tone clearly did not help much. Anyone could see that Agatha had stayed tense ever since.

Only after quite a while did Agatha herself break that stiff, awkward state: “I… well, I will be honest. Ever since the day I advanced to Saint, the Church has kept stressing to us that once we found any trace of ‘Subspace Shadows Captain Duncan', we must report to the highest Death Sanctuary at once—its priority was above all natural Calamities, on the same level as a Subspace incursion. I do not know if you can understand what that means."

"Oh, I understand," Duncan was about to answer, but Vanna spoke up first instead, casually chatting with the colleague in front of her: "We get reminders about that every year on our side too, and we even have special disaster-response plans for it, though we never actually used them."

Duncan gave Vanna a strange look: "You are saying this right in front of me?"

Only then did Vanna suddenly realize it and quickly straighten her face: "Ah, sorry, Captain…"

Agatha was a little slow to catch up, or maybe Duncan's presence had simply shocked her too much. Only now did she suddenly focus on the tall lady in front of her: "Wait, so you are…"

"Inquisitor of the city-state of Pland… in a sense, we are colleagues," Vanna said, looking a bit embarrassed. "Sorry, I did not mean to hide it."

One wave of information after another pounded her mind. Agatha felt almost dazed. Only now did she realize that the end of a disaster really was only a beginning—and the complicated situation after the disaster was pressing toward her from a direction she had never imagined.

She hesitated, then sat back down in her chair, and looked at Vanna with a hard-to-read expression: "But why are you with Captain Duncan? You should be one of the highest representatives of the Deep Sea Church in Pland… does Pland not need an Inquisitor anymore?"

"This is exactly the Church's arrangement. The details are not convenient to explain for now. I can only say… this matter cannot be made public yet. If your status did not meet the need-to-know level, I would not be telling you even this," Vanna said seriously, then paused for a moment. "As for Pland… yes, as you said, right now it does not need an Inquisitor, at least not the old kind of Inquisitor-and-Guardian system."

Agatha could not help rubbing her forehead. Other reports that had come from afar recently, reports she had not yet had time to verify, rose in her mind. She spoke hesitantly: "So… just as the intel said, Pland really has peaceful, quiet nights now?"

Vanna looked a bit surprised: "The news has already reached Frostholm?"

"We are only remote, not cut off," Agatha said, and then could not help pressing on. "Please tell me, has Pland truly stopped fearing the dark?"

"…At least so far, the nights in Pland are even safer than the days in many city-states. My uncle is even thinking about opening a kind of evening market to fit the city's recent changes, though that still needs careful discussion and testing," Vanna nodded. "Since you already know about that, I imagine you have heard the other piece of news too—after the Black Sun incident ended, Pland gained a new identity."

"Vision-Pland, the first Vision in history without a number," Agatha said without thinking. Her gaze could not help drifting to Duncan. Now she finally understood what Vanna's earlier words had meant. "So… Frostholm will now undergo the same change?"

Feeling that invisible yet very real "gaze", Duncan only smiled and nodded: "Maybe."

Chapter 439: The Captain’s Suggestion

Duncan shifted into a more comfortable position and leaned back against the sofa. His gaze, peeking through the gaps between the bandages crisscrossing his face, rested on the Goddess official in front of him with a half-smile.

“Now that you know who I am, how do you feel?” He smiled as he spoke. “From the point of view of the Church of Death—you should report this at once.”

Agatha opened her mouth but could not say anything for quite a while. After a full half minute, she finally gave a bitter little smile and spread her hands: “You have put me in a very awkward position…”

“But you really should report everything that happened here to the Church at once,” Duncan put away his smile, and his tone finally turned serious. “Pland was the first, Frostholm is the second. Those cultists have indeed caused a lot of trouble over the years, but never so many big incidents so close together. And do not forget, besides two city-states coming close to total destruction, the Sun above our heads—Vision 001—has also shown some unsettling changes lately.”

Agatha threw off her embarrassment at once. With Duncan’s reminder, her expression slowly grew solemn: “…You mean these events are all connected?”

“I do not know—do not look so surprised, I am not some all-knowing being,” Duncan said casually. “But I have a habit. When all kinds of low-probability events happen one after another, I tend to think of them as ‘omens’ of a larger system starting to go wrong. What the cultists did in the two city-states may not look connected, but have you thought about why they all managed to succeed lately? In all of history there have been so many large-scale heretic sacrificial rites. How many actually stirred up anything on this level?”

Agatha fell into thought, and her expression grew heavier.

“Report it all,” Duncan said softly. “Do not let any clue slip by—let the minds of clever people really think it over.”

“I understand. I will make a full report,” Agatha said with great seriousness, then fixed her gaze on Duncan and added on purpose: “Everything.”

“I look forward to the Church of Death’s reaction,” Duncan breathed out gently, as if putting down a weight. “It is not good to keep dragging this out.”

After that, the sitting room fell quiet for a while. It seemed everyone had sunk into their own thoughts (Alice excepted). No one knew how long had passed before Agatha suddenly spoke and broke the silence: “I should go back.”

“Not stay a bit longer?” Duncan asked. “In the current situation, the moment you go out, you will have countless things to give you a headache. You will not get many chances to hide here for some peace and quiet.”

“That is exactly why I have to go back as soon as possible,” Agatha shook her head. “The city-state has countless problems that need solving. It is not just the Church; City Hall is also a complete mess. If I keep hiding for some quiet, then truly there will be no one left to hold the situation together.”

“A complete mess…” Duncan repeated thoughtfully, then suddenly asked a question. “Do you think, relying only on Frostholm’s remaining organization and manpower, you can really restore order to the whole city in a short time?”

Agatha paused, not understanding why Duncan had suddenly asked this. After a brief silence, she still nodded: “…I will do my best.”

“‘Do your best’—but many times, doing your best does not solve the problem.”

“…What do you mean?”

“I just suddenly had a very bold suggestion,” Duncan said with a smile, his gaze settling on Agatha. “A suggestion from an outsider.”

…

When Agatha left No. 44 Oak Street, the daylight had already grown dim. The power of the Sun was slowly fading from the Mortal Realm, while the fine snow still flew in the sky. The tiny drifting flakes fell out of the dark chaos above, passed through the dim halos cast by gas streetlamps, and slowly covered the cold, empty streets.

A Guardian night patrol unit marched past the distant intersection. Now and then the clanking footsteps of a Steam Walker broke the silence on the road. The chimes that marked the change of day and night floated from far away, and in the evening wind came the organ music of the little Cathedral at the street corner.

The scarred city-state was licking its wounds beneath the veil of night.

The cold wind swept through the alleys, tugging at Agatha’s hair and skirt. Standing on the snowy street, she held out her hand and tilted her head slightly: “It is still snowing.”

Vanna, who had walked her to the door, turned her gaze curiously: “You cannot see the snowflakes?”

“I cannot—but I can feel them,” Agatha said softly. “There are many more things in my field of vision now, but there are also many things gone. It will take a long time to get used to it.”

She slowly drew back her hand, and a small smile suddenly appeared on her face. “But the good news is, I no longer feel how sharp the cold wind is. No matter how many layers of clothing I put on or how many stoves I lit, this world… always felt just as cold.”

“…Sorry, it is hard for me to imagine that feeling.”

“Oh, do not worry about it. It actually does not trouble me much,” Agatha said with a small laugh. She slowly curled her fingers into a fist, and as power gathered, faint ghostly green flame rose along the crisscrossing “scars” all over her body. The flame flowed through her like blood. “Like this, it feels a bit better.”

Vanna was silent for a few seconds: “If the Captain knew you were using the flame he gave you as a hand warmer, his expression would probably be quite something.”

“What kind of person is he?” Agatha let the Power of Flame fade and suddenly asked with great curiosity. “Is he very strict or scary in daily life?”

“What do you think? You have already met him twice,” Vanna said.

“I feel that every report about him is off from the truth. He is far calmer and friendlier than I imagined. But… maybe I should call him ‘He’ instead. I do not know if I should judge a being like Him by mortal standards. I know He used to be human, but Subspace… you know what I mean.”

Vanna thought for a few seconds and gently shook her head: “I have not followed him for very long, so I probably cannot give you a clear answer.

But I can tell you that I once had worries like yours. And in the end, the Storm Cathedral decided to send me, an Inquisitor, aboard the Vanished. Just as Captain Duncan chose to believe that a ‘replica’ could have humanity, we also believe—or rather, choose to believe—in Captain Duncan’s humanity. After all…”

She suddenly stopped, lifted her head, and looked up at the sky where the snowflakes were swirling. After a moment, she spoke softly as if to herself: “After all, this world is too cold. If even we stop believing in hope, then on this Boundless Sea there would really be nothing left but a bitter wind.”

Agatha did not speak for a while.

After a few seconds of quiet, Vanna suddenly asked: “What do you think of the Captain’s suggestion?”

Agatha fell into thought. After a while she answered with a complicated expression: “Letting the Sea Mist Fleet enter the city… To be honest, I do not even know whether that will restore order to the city-state or bring greater chaos. You have been living in this city for a while. You must know very well what the Sea Mist Fleet means to most people in Frostholm…”

“To most people in Pland, the Vanished is just as terrifying,” Vanna said. “But believe me, after a terrible disaster, people’s ‘ability to accept things’ really reaches a shocking level. From the point of view of the crowd, their longing for a stable life will outweigh many worries.”

“A longing for a stable life…”

Agatha spoke softly. Through this body that had already lost its life, she felt the cold of the snowy night, and for some reason, she thought of something else.

Fifty years ago, when that great uprising broke out, it had also been snowing.

“I will discuss this matter carefully with the officials at City Hall,” she said, as if making up her mind. She turned to Vanna. “And from a personal point of view, I will support it.”

“We all hope everything will turn out well,” Vanna said.

“Yes, we all hope everything will turn out well.”

Agatha repeated the words, then waved her hand and walked toward the Steam Car parked at the curb, the one bearing the Church’s crest.

But after only a few steps, she suddenly stopped.

“Is there something else?” Vanna asked curiously.

“Some… private questions. I hope I am not being too rude,” Agatha turned her head back. Her expression looked a little strange as she asked hesitantly: “Did you really once leap off a cliff, slay a spawn, and then come back safe and sound?”

Vanna froze, her eyes going odd: “Why suddenly ask that?”

“I do not know either. The question just suddenly popped into my head,” Agatha said, looking a bit embarrassed. “I feel like I heard that kind of rumor somewhere before… Sorry if it makes you uncomfortable, I…”

“It is nothing. It did happen,” Vanna relaxed and waved her hand with a smile. “But the truth is not like the rumor at all. I actually stepped wrong while taking a walk and fell from the edge of a cliff. When I hit the ground, I happened to crush a Deep Sea corruption body that had somehow washed ashore. It was not a real ‘spawn’, and it was hardly any kind of heroic kill. I have no idea why it spread that way.”

Agatha’s mouth opened slightly—in spite of the cloth over her eyes, her expression still clearly said she was stunned.

“Then… you were all right?” the Miss Gatekeeper asked without thinking.

“I was actually hurt pretty badly,” Vanna said with an embarrassed smile. Then she patted her chest and struck a strong pose. “But luckily I am an athlete. I went home, drank hot water, and lay in bed for two days, and I was fine.”

Agatha: “…?”

The Miss Gatekeeper was deeply shaken.

Vanna looked a bit puzzled: “Why are you looking at me like that?”

“…You Pland athletes are terrifying,” Agatha said.

Chapter 440: Sea Mist and Frostholm

The night was deep. The light, fluttering snow had kept falling into the second half of the night and still had not stopped. The snow was not heavy, yet it still laid a soft, silent cover over the whole city. The not-too-thick layer of snow was like pale bandages, wrapping the many scars the city had earned in the disaster and hiding all the wounds that had not yet had time to heal.

Broken buildings, bloodstains no one had had time to clean, scrapped Steam Walkers, barricades waiting to be torn down, and the dried “mud” that clogged almost every corner of the city and would take who knew how long to clear away.

The mirror world invasion had faded, but the “by-products” brought by this Visions disaster remained in the city as solid matter.

The Church had already, according to procedure, taken over the running of the city after nightfall.

Guardians carrying consecrated lanterns kept their gaze on the streets under the veil of night. They watched every shadowy corner that the gas streetlamps could not fully light, and they stayed wary of any strange sound that reached their ears.

The air held the drifting scent of burning incense. The soft, murmured benedictions of Nightwatch priests carried a calming strength.

“Tonight seems very quiet…” A black-clad Guard stared at the dark patches along the street. After a long time, he suddenly muttered to the comrade beside him: “I thought there would still be fierce fighting tonight.”

“Everyone thought that,” another Guard spoke softly. She was a woman with long hair falling over her shoulders. Several strips of cloth, covered in Prayer text, were sealed with wax onto the consecrated lantern at her waist, marking her as the leader of this squad. “After such a serious supernatural disaster, and with so many priests sacrificed… in theory, the city’s defenses should be at their lowest point tonight.”

“The other Nightwatch squads don’t seem to have reported anything. There hasn’t even been a single whistle in the whole night.”

“In any case, keep your nerves tight. Before the Sun rises, we cannot relax for even a moment.”

“Yes, Captain.”

The woman called captain gave a small nod, then looked toward another squad working not far away.

A delicate Brass Censer hung from a thin chain, sending out curls of faint smoke. A silent Monk used the incense to give divine blessing to the street, murmuring prayers to the God of Death. A few low-ranking priests with him carefully scraped samples of the black sludge from nearby walls, lampposts, and the ground, then sealed them into glass bottles.

Once dried, that “mud” had lost all activity. It no longer twisted into terrifying shapes. When the scraper cut through its surface, its texture was like some half-dry, fine-grained… “paint.”

“How much of this ‘sludge’ do you think there is in the city now?”

She could not help turning her head to mutter to the subordinate beside her.

“Who knows? I heard what we see on the surface is still the small part. The sewers and the subway are the worst, and there are several wastewater treatment plants that are almost packed full of this stuff. City Hall is a mess right now. No one knows how long it will take to clear it all.”

“Cleaning sludge… at least that’s the easiest trouble we have to face,” the female captain sighed lightly and lifted her head to look toward the end of the street. “The trouble Frostholm faces now is not just this strange mud.”

The black-clad Guard next to her also raised his head without thinking and looked in the direction his captain’s gaze had gone.

That was the Harbor district at the edge of the city-state. Lights blazed there, and faint sounds drifted over.

“Yeah, it’s not just the mud…” the black-clad Guard muttered, his tone odd and a bit tense. “A whole Sea Mist Fleet is still surrounding this city.”

…

In the eastern Harbor district, the lights were bright and the noise of people filled the air.

As the only harbor that had held off the Monster invasion through the whole defense and stayed in operation, the East Harbor was still busy even after the battle ended.

All docks and engineering machines were in use. Every worker who still had any strength had to work overtime. Several piers that had taken minor damage in the daytime battle had already received quick temporary repairs so that ships in better shape could dock and rest there.

For many people in the city, the battle was over. Tonight was their time to recover their spirits and heal their wounds. But for the Frostholm navy and the Harbor logistics units, the battle still went on. Many ships were badly damaged and needed repair. Many wounded still needed treatment. And beyond all that, they faced a problem even more tricky and more complex:

The Sea Mist Fleet, their temporary comrades for the day, and their deep nightmare of the last fifty years.

That largest, strongest “ghost ship,” the one people in Frostholm had used for fifty years to scare naughty children, was now moored beside the biggest pier in the East Harbor.

Its towering bow rose into the veil of night. The gun emplacements and bridge on its deck formed ghostly silhouettes in the wind and snow. Light from the shore fell on the armor belt and reflected back a pale glare that brought to mind bare bone. On the steel giant’s side, along the rail facing Frostholm, a wide banner flapped in the wind. Rough letters were painted on it, clearly scribbled in as a last-minute idea:

“Sea Mist Venture Capital Company, temporary survey and visit ship stationed at Frostholm.”

Even the most battle-hardened Frostholm soldiers had never seen anything like this. Anyone walking past the pier at this moment would have to stare at those rough letters for a long time, fighting the wild urge to slap themselves awake a few times.

“Captain,” First Mate Aiden crossed the deck and came up behind Tyrian, who was standing at the rail and looking down. “The banner is up, just like you said. We tried to make it look friendly.”

Tyrian gave a quiet grunt in reply, then raised his hand and pointed at the pier below. soldiers and workers sometimes stopped near the sea mist, standing there uneasily to watch the ship. Tyrian said: “But they still look pretty nervous to me.”

“I don’t know why. Maybe people in Frostholm these days just scare easier,” Aiden said as he rubbed his smooth, bald head. “Should I tell the men to go down and chase off the ones standing around and staring?”

“No need,” Tyrian thought for a moment and shook his head. “Father ordered us not to clash with the city-state again. At a tense time like this, we shouldn’t irritate these easily startled Frostholm folk.”

Aiden shrugged. “All right then, since it’s the old captain’s order.”

“How is everyone doing?” Tyrian suddenly asked after a short silence. “I mean the Second Generation sailors.”

“Well… after half a century, we’ve come back to this familiar place again,” Aiden sighed softly, speaking with feeling. “It’s impossible for the ship to be calm. Right now, almost every compartment is talking about docking here, and about dealing with the Frostholm navy again. Even the first-generation sailors have been affected and are talking with them.

“Some are looking forward to it. Some resist it. More of them are just lost, because no one ever imagined how this day would go. But… everyone will support your decision. They are waiting for your orders.”

For a while, Tyrian did not speak. In his mind, he seemed to see again the scene he had watched earlier from the bridge.

The Queen’s second order after half a century: “Protect Frostholm.”

Was that really true? Was that the power the Queen had left behind, or only a simple illusion?

It no longer seemed to matter.

The Queen had once ordered the Sea Mist Fleet to stay away from the main island of Frostholm. Now he had brought the fleet back here. Maybe… the Queen’s order back then had been for this very day.

“In any case, we came all this way,” Tyrian breathed out lightly. The air from his mouth and nose turned into white mist in the cold night. “The Commander here wants to host his ‘comrades.’ That is fine. I should go and greet them.”

“Want me to go with you?”

“Yes. And bring a few more people who know how to behave. Tell them in advance that this time, we are not here to fight.”

“All right,” Aiden nodded, then could not help asking one more question: “Uh… any other requirements for the people coming along?”

Tyrian thought about it. “Faces mostly in one piece. Limbs still attached to the torso. No ‘parts’ falling off while they walk. Use your own judgment. As long as their clothes can cover most of the holes, it will do.”

“Got it, Captain.”

…

In the Harbor defense office, Chief Commander Lister was checking his uniform and medals one last time.

He had seen big occasions before, but even as a well-trained career soldier, he still felt a bit uneasy about the “occasion” he was about to face.

It was not because it was too grand, but because it was something that had never happened before.

He was going to meet the leader of the Sea Mist Fleet. After fifty years of standoff and hatred, the fleet that had once “defected” from the city-state had come back.

Many parts of the city-state were still in chaos. The Governor’s disappearance had left City Hall in a blind panic. Even so, in the middle of all this disorder, he had still arranged this special reception.

Because he knew that today's Frostholm could not bear any further damage. No matter what the officials and advisers over at City Hall thought, he had to keep that fearsome ghost fleet calm. If there was ever going to be peace with that "Pirate Lord," then this moment was probably the only chance.

He fastened the last button and let out a slow breath.

Then he lowered his head and picked up a new breast badge from the desk. It showed his new rank of General. He calmly let his gaze trace every line carved into it.

"A battlefield promotion, huh… Well, someone has to step up."

He lifted his head and, facing the mirror, carefully fixed the badge to his uniform.

Chapter 441: Another Possibility

Tyrian walked into the meeting room.

There was no soft music for high society and no grand, luxurious ballroom. This was only a reception room under the Harbor Administration. The hosts were a few representatives from the navy. Tyrian even recognized a few faces.

He had dealt with them in recent years.

Lister rose to greet the “Pirate Lord” walking into the room.

“I am sorry. Our conditions are limited right now,” the Chief Commander said as he held out his hand, his tone carrying an apology. “In this rush, this is the best reception we could prepare.”

Tyrian did not take the offered hand at once. He first lifted his head and looked around the room. A few representatives in Frostholm navy uniforms stood behind Lister. Their faces were still fairly calm, but the other attendants were clearly not so relaxed. Some secretly watched the Undying who had come in with Tyrian. Others tried to act composed and turned their eyes away. Yet they all had two things in common: besides tension, there was a tiredness in their eyes that could not be hidden.

Tyrian smiled, then reached out and shook Lister’s hand.

“This is fine. If you had really set up a grand banquet for me at a time like this, and even found a few people to play fiddles in the corner, then there would be no point in us talking at all.”

Feeling the strength in the hand of this “iron Vice Admiral,” Lister’s expression twitched slightly. He pulled his hand back and said in a slightly awkward tone: “You do have some prejudice against us, but you also know the truth. We only stand on different sides. As soldiers, the Frostholm navy today will still defend our city-state as firmly as you once did.”

“Yes, I know. And I have already seen it with my own eyes. Otherwise, I would never have accepted your invitation, General,” Tyrian said with a small smile. His gaze swept across the badge on Lister’s chest, and he paused slightly on the word “General.” Then he shook his head, walked toward the center of the room, and spoke again: “Let’s end the small talk here. You and I both know what time it is. We can talk about this city, talk about the future or, if you have the courage, we can talk about my father.”

“Your father…” Lister sat down on the sofa. When he heard Tyrian’s last words, his body clearly stiffened. In the next second, the scene that all Frostholm people would remember for life rose again in his mind.

From the Boundless Sea came the reflection of giants. Two eyes like twin Suns opened in the clouds. The mirror world city-state, torn and peeled away from this one, burned into ash in the giants’ hands.

A shudder rose from the depths of his soul. Lister forced himself to stop the memory and looked at the Pirate Lord sitting across from him, still shaken.

“So that really was your father? That being who returned from Subspace…” He started speaking with a pause on every word. It felt as if simply talking about it, simply naming it, might draw some nameless gaze down on him. “At the last moment, it was really his hand that saved us… but that form of his has never appeared in any…”

“It will show up in the records from now on,” Tyrian said with a shrug. “Congratulations, General Lister. Frostholm will be the first city-state to witness and record this.”

He paused, then asked with real interest: “I’m curious. What is the mood in the city now, especially among people like you? How do you see what happened?”

“Tension and fear still fill the city. I must admit, this night has been very hard for everyone. The disaster is over, but it ended in a way most people cannot understand and that chills them to the bone. Many are guessing what the being that came down on the sea at the end really was, but I think… if they truly knew, the panic might be even worse,” Lister said, and he let out a sigh. “Even at City Hall, it was only after we sorted a great many records and clues that we dared to guess that it was your father. Don’t blame us for being slow. That scene was too shocking. Anyone would hesitate for a long time.”

“I can understand,” Tyrian sighed, his expression a bit strange. “He did not tell me in advance either. I was just as scared as you when it happened.”

Lister looked at the Pirate Lord in front of him. A strange feeling stirred in his heart. It was an uncontrollable curiosity mixed with the instinctive fear people felt when facing the unknown. He could not help imagining how this “son of Duncan” spoke to that terrifying father of his. How had father and son decided to help Frostholm? How did that shadow from Subspace view the world today?

“I would like to ask,” the General who had risen through a battlefield promotion finally could not hold back. “Your father… has he really, as the rumors say, found his humanity again?”

Tyrian looked genuinely surprised. “In what way does he not seem human?”

At once, Lister thought of the giant figure standing in the sky, and of the city-state burning to ash and being ground to dust in the giants’ hands. He opened his mouth, holding back a stomach full of rude words, but did not dare let even one of them out.

After a long struggle, the Frostholm General only forced out one stiff line: “I believe he does now have the heart of a human.”

Tyrian laughed. “And I believe that came straight from your heart.”

Then the Pirate Lord of the Frost Sea picked up a wine glass from the low table and solemnly raised it toward Lister. “Let us drink to this mutual trust.”

Lister: “…”

The Frostholm General raised his glass, clinked it against Tyrian’s with a stiff smile, took a small sip, and set it down. “Then may I ask what you and your father plan to do next?”

Tyrian looked completely at ease. “I don’t know.”

Lister’s eyes flew wide. “You don’t know?”

“He has not told me yet,” Tyrian spread his hands. There was a joy in his eyes that he could not hide. After matching wits with the Frostholm navy for half a century, it was this “friendly talk” that pleased him most. “I came here only because of Father’s order. When I joined the battle afterward, it was only to protect the city that Her Majesty Queen Ray Nora once protected. I never thought about what comes next. That depends on Father’s mood.”

Lister spoke without thinking: “Then how can we contact your father?”

Tyrian lifted his eyelids with a half-smile. “You really want to contact him? Then I can teach you a ritual…”

“That won’t be necessary,” Lister felt his back go cold at once and quickly waved his hand. “I was only speaking without thinking.”

“When you are talking about ‘him,’ it is better not to speak without thinking. You never know when ‘he’ might actually turn his gaze toward you," Tyrian said. His expression then shifted in a subtle way, as if he had remembered something not very pleasant. He quickly shook his head, looked back at Lister, and changed to a lighter tone. "Relax, young man. I was only making a joke. You are all wound up too tight. This is the first time in fifty years that the Sea Mist Fleet has 'come home.' Shouldn't we have an easy mood, like a family reunion?"

Young man…

The corner of Lister's mouth twitched, but he quickly swallowed his awkwardness. His face grew serious. "General Tyrian, then I will be frank. To put it plainly… Frostholm is in trouble."

"I know. We just solved it."

"No, I am not talking about the Visions invasion. That invasion was not trouble. It was a disaster. Now the disaster is over, but the trouble that follows it will come one after another. Order in Frostholm is on the verge of collapse. Even if we make it through this night in peace, we still have to deal with public security, supplies, sea safety, and a whole pile of other problems…"

"And what does that have to do with me?" Tyrian leaned back on the sofa and calmly fixed his gaze on Lister's eyes. "I am a Rebel. I don't know anything about that."

The rest of what Lister had been about to say was cut off by Tyrian's blunt answer.

After a few seconds of awkward silence, he quickly pulled himself together again and opened his mouth as if to speak.

But a steady knock at the door suddenly cut him off.

The reception room door opened. A refined man walked in, wearing a well-tailored suit, hair combed back without a strand out of place, and a pair of gold-rimmed glasses on his nose.

“I hope I am not intruding,” the man with the gold-rimmed glasses said with a gentle smile. He bowed politely to the host and guest in the room, then walked straight toward the table. “May I join you?”

“Oh, Mr. Confidential Secretary,” Tyrian looked at the young man for a moment, then suddenly remembered him and smiled. “I recognize your glasses… and your hairstyle.”

Lister turned toward the Confidential Secretary and asked quickly: “Is there news from City Hall?”

The Confidential Secretary nodded and answered softly: “From City Hall.”

Tyrian spoke up from the side: “Let me say this first. I am not interested in the resolutions from your City Hall. We are Rebels…”

He did not finish. The well-dressed Confidential Secretary suddenly turned his face toward Tyrian. As he set a document down on the low table, he looked straight into Tyrian’s eyes and said: “Then what if there is another possibility?”

He paused, pushed the document over, and spoke in a quiet voice:

“Governor Tyrian has arrived in his loyal Frostholm.”

Chapter 442: Documents

Tyrian raised his head. His single eye locked on the confidential secretary in front of him, his face full of an expression that clearly said: “Are you kidding me.”

As the greatest Pirate Lord on the Frost Sea, he had only ever worn such utter shock on his face when he was standing in front of his own father.

He did not touch the pages the other man had pushed over. After he forced his mood to steady a little, he turned and glanced at the man across from him, General Lister.

The Frostholm general’s eyes looked just as stunned as Tyrian felt.

“Looks like this really is a ‘surprise message’,” Tyrian let out a slow breath and spoke in a flat tone. “Even the ‘General’ sitting in front of me didn’t know about this arrangement.”

“Because this is not any kind of ‘arrangement’ at all. It is only a proposal, and a very new one at that,” the confidential secretary adjusted the gold-rimmed glasses on his nose and looked seriously at Tyrian as he said: “Right now the situation in Frostholm is complicated. We do not have much time to discuss every single matter to perfection before we act, so I decided to bring this ‘proposal’ straight here. In the presence of General Lister, we can discuss its feasibility together.”

“Feasibility? You actually think this is feasible?” Tyrian almost laughed. He looked at the confidential secretary as if he were looking at a madman. “Me, the leader of the Sea Mist Fleet, the most vicious and dangerous Pirate Lord on the Frost Sea. For the past fifty years almost every scary story you Frostholm folk used to frighten your children has been based on me. And now you tell me you want me to be this city's Governor… Mister, we only fought side by side once. I think you have seriously misunderstood the nature of our relationship."

"We fought side by side, and together we held off a crisis that could have destroyed the city-state. Now many people already know it was the Sea Mist Fleet that stepped forward at the last moment to stand with the navy and defend the city. By this time tomorrow, that news will have spread to every corner of Frostholm. City Hall will tell the people this: fifty years ago, the Sea Mist Fleet left only because of a disagreement over course. The Iron Vice Admiral who stormed off in anger never really gave up his duty to defend the city-state."

The confidential secretary paused here. After he saw that Tyrian had no intention of cutting him off, he went on: "Everything can be given a new explanation. Every change can be dressed in a suitable reason. You may think this kind of change would be impossible for the people of Frostholm to accept, but in truth… most ordinary people are not so good at holding on to their 'original convictions' in the face of long-term, one-sided propaganda. Peace in daily life and a real improvement in order will soon outweigh everything else. People's ideas can be 'shaped'. It only takes some time."

Tyrian listened to all of this without interrupting. His expression stayed calm as he stared straight into the confidential secretary's eyes: "It seems you are very good at this kind of thing."

"Every city-state is good at it, including Frostholm in the days of the Queen," the confidential secretary said with no change in his face. "Creating a set of 'ideas' for the people that fits the current social environment and eases the burden on most minds is not a dirty task. Making fine speeches and then failing to maintain order or keep most people's lives stable is what is shameful.

"Captain Tyrian, City Hall's duty has never been 'justice'. City Hall's duty is to let as many people as possible stay alive."

"…'Let as many people as possible stay alive.' She said that line once too."

"Yes. That sentence is still carved on the door of the domed office," the confidential secretary replied. "What we overthrew back then was only the Queen, not the things that were correct from the start."

Tyrian did not speak for a while. He sat in silence, deep in thought. Only after a long time did he finally speak slowly: "Why do you think I am suited to this position?"

"At first, it was a suggestion brought by Lady Agatha," the confidential secretary said. "But she only mentioned that you and your Sea Mist Fleet might be able to help the city-state restore order. The further decision came from an emergency discussion inside City Hall. As for me, I am actually not sure if you are the right choice. In fact, I still have doubts about this matter. But the others think… before you were a 'pirate', you were first a General of Frostholm, and since the city's written history began, one third of its Sovereigns or Governors have come from the military."

"You are still thinking about things too simply," Tyrian shook his head. "This is not a question of whether the candidate is suitable or not. It is the sum of a whole heap of 'historical leftovers'. Even if, like you said, people's ideas can be shaped, you also said it takes time. Frostholm does not have that time. This city has to restore order as soon as possible, so you had better look for someone el—"

"Captain Tyrian," the confidential secretary suddenly cut him off. "Before you refuse clearly, please look at what I brought. It may give you a new sense of how ‘feasible’ this is.”

Tyrian paused, then, for the first time, he truly looked at the few pages the other man had placed on the table.

There were no grand titles or fine covers on those documents. When he opened the simple folder, all he saw inside were plainly written ‘proposals’ that read like statements of fact.

Tyrian glanced over the first lines. His expression visibly changed.

He quickly flipped to the end, snapped the folder shut with a sharp sound, and raised his head to stare at the confidential secretary.

The latter still kept a calm face. Before Tyrian could speak, the secretary only gave a small nod.

“First, the Vision disaster that struck the city-state of Frostholm was triggered by Annihilators, but its root cause lay in the unsafe mining carried out by the old City Hall in the deep shafts beneath the city over the past decades. Failing to take enough safety measures in the darkness, plus neglecting or even hiding Anomaly warnings, was the main reason the situation grew so bad.

“Second, all former Governors knew about this and chose to hide it for the sake of profit.

“Third, the Sea Mist Fleet chose to leave Frostholm fifty years ago because of a disagreement over course. The split was tied to such ‘illegal mining’ and to different attitudes toward the foreseeable Vision disaster.

“Fourth, all former Governors carried out a planned and ongoing campaign to smear the Sea Mist Fleet and hide the truth. It covered up the real disagreement between the two sides and guided public hatred toward General Tyrian himself, so people would not look too closely at the problems in the mines.

“Fifth, Governor Winston is under strong suspicion of colluding with Annihilators. Before the Vision disaster broke out, he had already received news but failed to take any effective action. Instead, he chose to flee. He will become a public enemy of the city-state. We believe he has already become a member of the Oblivion cult and will be hunted by Frostholm for all eternity.

“Sixth, the new Governor will reshape order in the city-state. A full investigation of the mines will begin at once, and the settling of accounts with those still alive and responsible will also start immediately.”

Tyrian said nothing. He sat there like a statue carved from deepest ice, staring at the confidential secretary. The weight in his gaze made it hard for anyone in the room to breathe.

But the confidential secretary only drew in a slow breath. Then he took another, thicker bundle of papers from the briefcase at his side.

This file was much thicker and held far more content.

“This is the list,” he said, lifting his head and meeting Tyrian’s heavy gaze. “The first half is the evidence needed for the purge. It includes some records of the illegal mining in the shafts, traces of how Anomaly warnings were covered up, and the orders to twist and slander the Sea Mist Fleet. Right now, for this part we only have the catalogue, but in three days all the evidence will be complete.

“The second half is mainly names. It lists the responsible people who can be arrested and tried, along with their ‘crimes’. Rest assured, they are not innocent. They simply have other charges on record. But that does not matter. Their real crimes no longer matter. Right now the city-state needs them to have ‘colluded with Annihilators’. These people are City Hall’s ‘reserve criminals’.

“And last, there are letters and some pages of diary entries, evidence of Governor Winston’s collusion with the Annihilators. Some of these carry his signature.”

Tyrian did not look at the second stack of papers the man was handing over.

Cold mist slowly rose around him. A fine layer of frost crept across the surface of the tea table. The breath of everyone in the room who could still breathe turned to pale white vapor in the air.

“…Who prepared these things?”

“The former Governors,” the confidential secretary answered calmly. “Every administration prepares one copy, and many ‘backup plans’ as well. They are not necessarily prepared for you. They might be for some other successor, such as the next ‘rebellion’. The last set of materials in front of you was left by Governor Winston. As it happens, he also listed the Sea Mist Fleet as one of his ‘backup plans’. That happens to match Lady Agatha’s ‘suggestion’.”

Tyrian slowly put his hand on the file. Fine ice crystals almost froze it into a solid block. He raised his head and stared into the confidential secretary’s eyes: “So this is enough to define Winston’s role.”

“There is a saying in Frostholm: the dead must give way to the living,” the confidential secretary said quietly. “General Tyrian, you were not born and raised in Frostholm, but I am sure you know this line as well. If defining Governor Winston and the former City Halls in this way lets the city-state regain order quickly, I do not think he, or any former Governor, would mind.”

—

Chapter 443: Origin

The chill in the room seemed to ease a little. The living people who had been shivering from the cold finally let out a small sigh of relief.

But Tyrian still did not answer the series of ‘proposals’ the confidential secretary had put forward. He only stared calmly at the things on the table. It felt as if a century had passed in that silence.

Only when everyone was almost crushed by it did he finally raise his head: “This is the wisdom of maintaining order. I imagine fifty years ago, this wisdom played a great role.”

“You should know what state Frostholm was in back then,” the confidential secretary said. His gaze did not dodge. “Great people do many great things, but the mistakes they make can be just as deadly as their achievements. To keep control of the situation, there were things we had to do. General Tyrian, I studied history. In truth… I have always believed Her Majesty Ray Nora was a remarkable ruler. But that cannot hide the mess left behind after the failure of the Abyssal Trench Project.”

“Yes. You studied history,” Tyrian said calmly. “But I lived it. We both know what it was like in those days, so I am not here to blame you. Honestly, you at least kept Frostholm steady for another half century after that.”

The tension in the confidential secretary’s body finally seemed to relax a little. He leaned forward without thinking: “So, you mean you agree…”

Tyrian still did not answer. He only pressed his hand onto the documents and pushed down.

A freezing force soaked through the paper. Fine ice crystals formed, then shattered in an instant. With a rough, rustling sound, the records that could have left heavy marks in history turned into powder.

The confidential secretary's eyes flew open. General Lister, who had hardly spoken a word this whole time, could not hold back a low exclamation: "What are you doing…"

"These are not what I want," Tyrian raised his head and looked at the Frostholm men opposite him. "I want the real records. What was truly wrong in that mine. How the cultists really slipped into the city-state. Who was responsible and who was not. And Governor Winston's real path in office. Put aside the idea of 'restoring order quickly' and give me the truest firsthand information."

He paused, then went on: "That is what is truly needed to keep control of the situation."

The confidential secretary froze for a moment, then quickly understood: "So you are accepting Frostholm's 'invitation'… but, if I may speak frankly, you still need the documents that were on the table. Of course you can hold the real intelligence, but you also have to find a way to divert the people's attention—"

He hesitated for two seconds here, as if he were making up his mind, then continued: "To be honest, things in the city will get bad next. A lot of the basic infrastructure may have to be shut down for a while. With that 'mud' causing corruption, fuel supplies will grow tight. Food distribution will suffer. Public security will get worse. That will stir up anger everywhere. We must find some way to divert the people's attention. Turning it toward the former government and the old Governor is the most effective way…"

“If fuel is tight, we use reserves. If that is not enough, I will find another way. If food distribution is a mess, we enforce strict supervision and punishment, and we put the whole city under rationing, including the Upper City. If public security breaks down, we impose temporary military control. The people need something to vent their anger on? Then we really go out and seize the cultists. We seize the subversives. We seize the ones who are truly responsible,” Tyrian said sternly. “Of course this whole series of actions will be harder. But at least it will actually solve the problem. And it will truly ‘let more people live’.”

The room went quiet again. You could even hear the sound of people breathing. The always-elegant, always-composed confidential secretary seemed to go a little stiff. Faced with Tyrian’s forceful words, he looked as if he did not quite know how to respond.

Tyrian only gave a light laugh and shook his head: “I will not belittle your work or your solution. Within your limits, you had no better path. You chose what best fit the situation back then. But things are different now. I do not want to repeat these fifty years all over again. Mr. Secretary, the Sea Mist Fleet has its own way of doing things. You might as well raise your expectations a bit.”

The confidential secretary finally seemed to catch up. He blinked, straightened his posture, and fixed his bright gaze on Tyrian: “You can really do all the things you just said?”

“As long as what remains of City Hall’s strength can cooperate to the fullest. As for the rest…” Tyrian stopped on purpose here. Then the corners of his mouth curled in a small smile. “Mr. Secretary, do you know who is most orderly on the Boundless Sea?”

“The most orderly?” The confidential secretary was stunned, as if he had not followed. “The City Navy? Or the long-distance trade fleets?”

“Pirates. The Pirate Lords of the Frost Sea,” Tyrian laughed. “The City Navy always has steady supply ports and safe harbors. The long-distance trade fleets always have the Church’s protection and naval escorts. Only pirates… to stand against the Boundless Sea, we can rely on nothing but strict discipline and order.”

The confidential secretary did not answer for a moment. It seemed he had no idea how to discuss this topic. It clearly lay far outside his daily work and his field of study.

Seeing this, Tyrian only smiled again and reached out to pat the man’s shoulder.

“Relax a little, Mr. Secretary. Compared with fifty years ago, Frostholm’s situation is actually not that bad right now. I still know many ‘partners in trade’. I believe if they learn the truth of what happened here, many of them will be willing to help. At least when it comes to worldly order, you do not need to worry too much. As for the part that lies outside ‘worldly order’…”

Tyrian stopped suddenly and looked up at the window.

The deep veil of night covered the city. The glow of gas lamps wound through the Harbor district like a river of light. At some point the snow had stopped. The clouds had scattered. The cold, pale shine of the World’s Wound bathed the world, and under that light, the city lay peaceful tonight.

“The part outside worldly order… I think my Father will handle that.”

The Pirate Lord hesitated for a few seconds, then finally spoke in a slightly strange tone.

Many people in the room clearly shivered.

“Your Father, He…” General Lister could not help speaking. Without thinking, he even used the divine honorific in his wording. “Is He still watching over Frostholm? Where is He now?”

[Of course He is watching over Frostholm. He might even be standing at a second-floor window right now, looking out. He is living at Oak Street No. 44, in a house he rented from your citizen Service Center…]

A string of answers flashed through Tyrian's mind at once, but after a long struggle he did not dare say any of them out loud.

After all, from the looks of it, the Frostholm people in front of him still had no idea that 'He' was currently inside the city. If Tyrian started talking everywhere about his Father's whereabouts without permission, he would probably earn himself another round of heavy "fatherly discipline" later. He was about to become a Governor. He really could not afford that, in pride or in dignity.

"He is still watching this matter, but I cannot reveal the details," after hesitating for half a day, the Pirate Lord could only give this vague answer. "He is very busy. I am not the only one He has to stay in touch with."

Lister froze for a second, then nodded at once: "Ah… that is understandable."

Tyrian had no idea how Lister was "understanding" it.

The confidential secretary, unable to hold back his curiosity, asked: "Your Father… what does He usually do?"

Tyrian fought down the urge to roll his eye. How was he supposed to know? Ever since his Father came back from Subspace, He had been wrapped in mystery. Who could say what His daily life was like? He could hardly imagine Him acting like some retired old man, going fishing, walking dogs, and feeding pigeons when He had nothing better to do…

The confidential secretary noticed the subtle change in Tyrian's expression. Realizing that he had stepped over the line, he hurried to straighten his face: "I am sorry. I should not have asked."

“It is all right. It is just that ordinary people really should not talk too much about ‘Him’. Let us say it is for the sake of everyone’s mental health. Let us end this topic here,” Tyrian waved his hand and quickly changed the subject.

Then he let out a long breath, rose slowly from the sofa, and walked to the floor-to-ceiling window.

The lights outside were still burning. At several intersections leading into the inner city, you could still faintly see the temporary barricades built during the battle earlier.

When the Sun rose tomorrow, those barricades would be taken down. After that… the city’s new Administrator would have to do everything in his power to restore order here.

The countless lights of the city blocks in the distance reflected in Tyrian’s eye.

“It has been many years since I saw this view. Compared to back then, it has not changed that much.”

General Lister walked over and stood behind Tyrian: “But after today, it should change a great deal.”

“…Fifty years ago, the last royalists left this city. The rebels formed a new City Hall, and I became a rebel. Fifty years later, I have come back. The city still looks the way it did when I left…” Tyrian looked at the distant streets, and a sudden emotion rose in him. “round and round, it all seems to have come back to the starting point. General Lister, tell me, these past fifty years of ours… what did they mean?”

Lister did not answer at once. He seemed lost in thought.

The confidential secretary stepped up beside them, raised his hand, and pointed out the window.

“General Tyrian, this is the meaning.”

Chapter 444: Fishing, Petting the Dog, Feeding the Pigeon

In the pale light of dawn, Vision 001, locked in place by a pair of rune rings, slowly rose from the distant sea horizon. In the spreading glow of the morning sky, the huge sailing ghost ship floated on the endless, calm surface of the sea and slowly gained a soft shine in the morning.

At the far edge of the sea, through the thin morning mist, one could faintly see the silhouette of the city-state of Frostholm. From this distance, the city's wounds and the joys and sorrows of countless people all turned into a blurred shape in the fog, as if they had faded away into the sunlight.

Duncan sat quietly at the edge of the foredeck. He had set up a fishing rod by his side and watched the fishing line reflect the sunlight in the morning glow. Now and then, Duncan raised his head to look into the distance, in the direction of Frostholm.

At this hour, most parts of the city were still very quiet. He did not need to spend much attention on the avatar form he had left in the city-state, so he could finally relax a little and enjoy the peace on the ship.

AI the pigeon walked back and forth on the big wooden barrel beside him. A pile of fries lay on the lid of the barrel, brought aboard from the city-state of Frostholm. Unlike the fries from Pland, the people of Frostholm added special spices when they fried potatoes, giving them a salty, rich smell. AI was clearly very pleased with this. Now and then, it looked up at its Master, who was fishing, or glanced at the distant sea. The rest of the time, it just lowered its head and ate with all its might.

On Duncan's other side, Shirley lay sprawled over a shorter wooden barrel, writing hard. Her face looked so bitter it was as if she were facing a life-or-death enemy.

Dog lay quietly beside Shirley, holding a copy of Modern Geometry between his two paws. The deck next to them was piled with scrap paper covered in marks and shapes.

Feeling this brief moment of calm, Duncan could not help curling the corners of his mouth. The gloom that had been building in his heart for many days slowly faded.

But clearly, not everyone here was enjoying this "calm."

"Why does Nina get to sleep in down in the cabin… while I have to get up early to rush my homework out here…" Shirley muttered, unable to hold it in. Her face looked so miserable it could have wrung out water. "If I'd known I would only be doing homework back on the ship, I might as well have stayed in the city. At least I could have gone out for a walk once in a while…"

"There isn't much to stroll around in Frostholm right now, and for the foreseeable future life in that city won't be very comfortable," Duncan said calmly when he heard her. "Besides, stop complaining about your homework. You were the one who said your homework got eaten by a stray dog."

Shirley raised her head in protest: "Then why doesn't Nina have to make hers up?"

"Anyone can tell she has already finished," Duncan glanced at Shirley. "Later, Mr. Morris can just give her a full set of review papers to test how she has been studying on her own. Nina is not like you. She does not need anyone to push her."

Shirley shrank her neck: "Th-then is it possible that I actually already finished…"

Duncan kept a straight face: "How do you spell the plural form of 'pebble'?"

"I haven't memorized that yet…"

"That was on the second page of your previous homework. So you actually didn't even finish either page."

Shirley's face went blank. She fell silent at once, then the young lady let out a long sigh and lowered her head to continue her life-and-death battle with her spelling homework.

Duncan just smiled and shook his head. Then, without meaning to, his gaze fell on the dog beside them. Dog had set the book down for the moment and was holding a pencil between his paws, drawing auxiliary lines on the scrap paper on the deck.

Duncan's gaze made Dog's soul suddenly shiver. Dog's skull gave an involuntary twitch, and the auxiliary line went crooked.

"C-captain?" Dog raised his head nervously. He wanted to avoid Duncan's eyes but did not dare to really turn his head away, so his bony head kept wobbling.

Duncan reached out and rubbed Dog's ugly skull. His expression was a bit strange, and after a few seconds he could not help speaking: "Isn't your study progress a little too fast? I feel like before long you'll be able to keep up with Mr. Morris's lessons directly."

“Huh? I don’t feel that way,” Dog froze for a moment when he heard this. The red light in his hollow eye sockets flickered as if he were dazing out. “I just think all this stuff is pretty interesting… Is there something wrong with learning fast?”

Duncan thought for a moment, then smiled and shook his head: “Forget it, there’s no problem. Learning more is always good. This way, if I average you and Shirley together, at least you two won’t count as illiterate.”

Dog let out a confused “oh.” Duncan let out a small breath and looked back at the fishing rod, which still did not move at all.

He had not caught a single fish all morning.

“After such a great battle, I’m afraid we won’t be able to catch any fish in these waters for a while,” he sighed with regret as he slowly packed up his fishing gear. “The disturbance was so big that even the Deep Sea spawn don’t want to come near this place anymore…”

When Shirley heard this, she could not help raising her head again: “So are we going to leave this place? When will you bring Mr. Morris and Sister Vanna from the city too?”

Duncan stopped packing up the rod and turned his head to look at Shirley: “Did I ever say the matter of Frostholm was completely over?”

“Huh?” Shirley was a little confused. “Isn’t everything already settled? And you even recommended Mr. Tyrian to City Hall. I thought you were going to leave the rest to him to wrap up.”

“It’s true, I do plan to leave all the troublesome affairs in this city to him,” Duncan went on packing as he spoke casually. “But there are still things the Sea Mist Fleet can’t handle. Those things I have to deal with myself. Before they’re taken care of, the Vanished had better not stray too far from here.”

Shirley still did not understand: “Things the Sea Mist Fleet can’t handle? What are they…”

Duncan lowered his eyelids and gave her a calm look: “Where did mirror world Frostholm come from?”

Shirley thought for a moment, then spoke, not very sure: “It was… summoned from the Deep Sea by those cultists?”

“More or less. It was summoned from the Deep Sea. mirror world Frostholm was a ‘product’, something formed by a transformation. Everything we destroyed in that process, including the sacrificial site deep inside mirror world Frostholm, was, in truth, only a ‘summoned thing’. Since there is a summoned thing, there must be a summoning source.”

Shirley finally reacted. Shock slowly appeared in her eyes.

“You mean… the thing under the sea is still there?!”

“If my judgment is right, everything close to the surface, whether those replicas or the mirror world city-state itself, was only the spread and projection of that power,” Duncan said calmly. “It was like a huge plant growing upward from below. In that fierce battle that just ended in Frostholm, we only destroyed the overgrown crown of that runaway plant. Its roots are still there. Don’t forget, back then the Queen of Frostholm had to throw several Deep Dive devices into the sea just to barely touch that thing’s true body. That power has a ‘real form’ in the Deep Sea.”

Shirley finally could not sit still. She almost jumped to her feet: “Huh? Then doesn’t that mean we still have to dive into the Deep Sea and fight that thing? Otherwise won’t it soon make another mirror world?!”

“Soon? It won’t be that quick,” Duncan said with a smile, shaking his head. “Things are not as serious as you think. Even if its true body is still there, it has surely been badly wounded. I have almost completely burned away the spreading part of it. The rest, after losing the support of those cultists' rituals, is most likely in a state of sleep or dormancy. Even if we really ignored it, it might take another half century before it causes trouble again."

As he spoke, he suddenly stopped and reached out toward the air beside him.

"Isn't that right, Agatha?"

A tuft of ghost-green flame burst into life at Duncan's fingertips. It quickly leaped and spread in the air, forming a whirlpool-like Veil. Inside the blazing Veil stood a blind priestess of the Goddess, dressed in a black gown and wearing an eyepatch, her hands clasped before her chest in a pose of prayer.

Shirley and Dog stared, dumbfounded, at the scene.

"Yes. That is exactly what we have been worrying about," Agatha raised her head. Her slightly husky voice carried a faint, airy quality. "Everyone who knows the truth of the Abyssal Trench Project worries about this. We only destroyed the 'product' that appeared on the surface of the sea, and we had no strength left to destroy the 'true body' that may still be lurking in the Deep Sea."

"We can't just leave it there for another fifty years and then repeat the defense of Frostholm during the next crisis," Duncan said. "I don't mind helping every time, but war always brings many needless victims."

"…The Frostholm of today probably no longer has the strength to build Deep Dive devices like that," Agatha said after a short silence. "It's not just the devices themselves. There is also the other equipment needed to dive, the data, the people, the resources… All of that is something a Frostholm that is still trying to rebuild simply cannot provide."

“Then start preparing as soon as possible. Have your City Hall think of a way,” Duncan said lightly. “If it really doesn’t work, then prepare an iron coffin that can explode in the Deep Sea and put a corpse inside it. Through that medium I can go down to the seabed and take a look. Even though a temporary avatar form can only carry limited power, as long as a stable channel is set up, I should be able to spread the flames down to the bottom of the sea.”

In an age of supernatural awakening, the great edifice was about to collapse.

Flesh was bitter and weak—how could one ascend?

The story began with taking up a ruler that carried the Truth.)

Chapter 445: A Fleeting Glimpse

When Agatha listened to Duncan’s instructions, she immediately thought of the “corpse” that had been used as temporary material for his descent before.

She nodded lightly and did not object: “Yes, I will consider this method.”

Duncan grunted in reply. Then he looked with some curiosity at Agatha, who was appearing in the fiery doorway, studying the faint, blurry scene behind her. He asked casually: “How are things on your side now?”

“The great Cathedral has already returned to normal. Today we are contacting the Cathedrals all over the city, confirming what manpower we still have and counting the losses from this last period,” Agatha answered. There was a hint of relief in her tone. “Last night, just as you said, the city-state passed the night in peace. No Shadows were born in the darkness at all. Even the mental hospital and the cemetery district, which were the most likely to have problems, showed no abnormal changes. That let me breathe a sigh of relief. If things can stay this way, then half of what we have to worry about will vanish.”

“I mean your condition,” Duncan raised his eyebrows. “With this body you have now, won’t such intense work cause problems?”

“I don’t feel tired. Perhaps becoming a corpse is actually a good thing for me now,” Agatha said calmly. “A corpse does not feel fatigue and does not need rest in the usual sense. As long as I can still gain calm from prayer and meditation, I won’t have any problems.”

“You seem to be in the Cathedral’s prayer room?”

“Yes, I’m in the great Cathedral. This used to be Bishop Ivan’s room. It’s very quiet,” Agatha turned her head and glanced at the familiar yet special room. There was a trace of sadness in her voice. “Now, it has been left to me.”

But a strange feeling suddenly rose in Duncan’s heart. He hesitated for a few seconds, then could not stop himself from asking: “You are contacting me like this inside the great Cathedral. Doesn’t Bartok mind?”

Agatha froze at once: “…”

Shirley and Dog beside him were also stunned.

“Captain, how do you always manage to think about things from such an unbelievable angle?” Shirley muttered under her breath. “And that question sounds kind of weird…”

Duncan shot the young lady a blank look: “Don’t interrupt when your Lord is speaking, and don’t use this chance to stop writing. You haven’t written a single word since just now, have you?”

Shirley sighed at once and went back to her life-and-death struggle with her homework. In the flames, Agatha’s projected form finally came back to herself. With a strange look on her face, she turned her head to glance at the nearby statue of the God of Death. Only after a long moment did she turn back: “I have never thought about that question at all…”

Then she paused and asked thoughtfully: “Vanna is at your side. Have you ever asked her this question? How did she answer?”

Duncan thought about it and felt she had a point: “I really haven’t asked. I can ask her when I have time.”

Agatha opened her mouth by instinct as if she wanted to say something, but in the end nothing came out.

After an awkward silence of a few seconds, she finally found another topic: “Besides, I am already prepared to go check the situation inside the Boiling Gold mine.”

“Has the mine already returned to calm?” Duncan raised an eyebrow. “I remember you said we would have to wait at least a few more days.”

“It has mostly calmed down. To be honest… exploring the depths now may still carry some risk, but I don’t plan to wait any longer,” Agatha’s expression grew serious. She clearly had made up her mind. “I can feel that something in the depths is calling to me. This feeling has grown stronger and stronger since this morning. If I keep waiting… I’m afraid I will miss something very important.”

Duncan nodded slightly. After a few seconds of silence he suddenly spoke: “Before you set out, come find me at 44 Oak Street.”

Agatha’s eyes widened in surprise at once: “You are coming with me?”

“I’m also very curious about what was left there.”

“I understand. I’ll come to you before I leave.”

Duncan nodded, then waved his hand to disperse the flames in midair. He let out a breath and lowered his head to look at the empty fishing rod in his hand.

“…Forget it, coming up empty is also part of fishing,” he muttered. He turned his head to glance at Shirley and Dog, who were still by the barrel. “I’m going back to my room first. Dog, keep an eye on Shirley. Make sure she at least copies the first five pages of the vocabulary book. Once her homework is done, she can play however she likes.”

Dog hurriedly stood up, nodding eagerly and wagging his bony tail. Only after Duncan's figure vanished at the stairway not far away did the Abyssal Hound finally breathe out in relief and return to the spot where he had first been lying. But before he lay down, he suddenly looked up at Shirley: "Don't get distracted. Hurry up and write."

"Dog, are you really urging me?" Shirley's shoulders drooped at once. "My hand is sore…"

"I don't even have fingers and I can still write a diary. You at least have two hands with ten fingers," Dog shook his head. As he lay down again, he kept muttering, "Read more books and learn more words, Shirley. Don't get impatient. The captain really is doing this for your own good. Haven't you always wanted a life like other children? I truly can't give you that, but the captain wants to. A being like him has many ways to show favor, but he chooses to care about you and Nina like a human would. Do you know how…"

Shirley quickly waved her hands to beg for mercy halfway through: "Hey, stop, stop. I know, I know, I'm not stupid. Dog, why are you nagging like an old mother…"

Dog grumbled twice more but did not keep lecturing her. Instead he lowered his head and once again studied the geometry textbook in front of him with great interest.

On the pages, words and symbols outlined the knowledge and experience of those who came before. Lines and formulas told the story of how this world worked. The eye sockets filled with bloody red light in Dog's skull were fixed on those chapters that held the wisdom of civilization. In his mind, which belonged to a Abyssal demon, one geometric figure after another, one mathematical formula after another, took shape as he followed the content of the textbook.

There was also a source of red light that flickered, and a series of flashing points of light lined up like a matrix. They flashed between those geometric images and formulas and then passed in an instant.

In the next second, Shirley seemed to sense something and suddenly lifted her head to look toward Dog. Almost at the same moment, Dog snapped out of some strange state. His whole body jumped several meters into the air: “Whoa, what the heck!!”

Shirley was yanked up into the air with him by the chain between them, then crashed down onto the deck with a bang. When she finally got up, dizzy and shaken, the first thing she did was pounce on Dog and grab his head, shaking it hard: “What kind of fit are you throwing?! And what was with you just now? I felt like even your aura changed!”

“I… I don’t know!” Dog’s head creaked as Shirley shook it. He finally managed to pull free, but he still clearly looked dazed. “Just now I think I saw something flash past right in front of me. I didn’t even have time to see what it was… but now everything seems fine.”

AI, who had been pecking at fries nearby, suddenly tilted its head and looked at Dog with interest: “Remote server not responding, please check network connection?”

Dog did not react for a moment and answered without thinking: “Huh?”

But AI only flapped its wings and walked off to the side as if nothing had happened, pacing and muttering to itself: “Top up Q coins? Top up the big monthly card? Top up the battle pass?”

“Don’t pay attention to it. That bird’s brain is even more muddled than Alice’s,” Shirley waved her hand and turned Dog’s head back toward herself. Worry clearly showed on her face. “Are you okay? Did you burn out your brain from doing math problems all day?”

“I’ve never heard of Abyssal demons burning out their brains…” Dog began to doubt himself. “I don’t even know if I have that organ.”

“Of course you haven’t. You’re the only Abyssal demon in the whole world who actually uses his brain. Even if your kind really have brains, they don’t get the chance to burn them out… Hey, hold still. Let me check you over.”

Muttering as she worked, Shirley hurriedly examined Dog from head to toe. Then, through the chain of the symbiotic pact between them, she carefully felt for any change in their shared spiritual level. In the end, she still did not find any problem.

Everything was normal.

“I told you there was nothing wrong,” Dog breathed a sigh of relief and said casually. “Maybe I attracted something while I was reading, and when it was just about to come out, it found out I was a ‘colleague’, so it went back…”

As he muttered, he lay down again and pawed at the scrap paper in front of him.

Shirley grew anxious at once: “Hey, you still plan to keep reading?”

While drawing new auxiliary lines on the paper, Dog replied casually: “I’m only one big problem away, just the last step. I finally got an idea.”

Shirley: “…”

She watched Dog, who was writing and calculating there, with great worry, ready to yank on the chain around her arm at any sign that something was wrong. But until he finished solving that big problem that, in her eyes, looked like an indecipherable heavenly script, nothing happened at all.

Dog tossed the pencil onto the deck and looked up at Shirley.

“See? I told you there was no problem—” There was a trace of comfort in his tone, but soon his gaze fell on the wooden barrel beside them.

“Shirley, you still haven’t finished your homework.”

“Aaah—”

Hearing the girl’s drawn-out wail, Dog only shook his head. Then his eyes fell again on the book he had been reading.

It seemed… there really had been no problem.

But Dog was sure he really had seen something. It was not a “colleague” drawn in by the book, but something else, something more mysterious and more strange.

Just what… had he seen?

Chapter 446: Father Was a Joker

Duncan was just about to step into the captain's cabin when he suddenly stopped and turned to look over his shoulder.

There seemed to be some movement from the bow deck. Through the faint sense coming from the Vanished, he could tell that the noise came from Shirley and Dog.

But nothing was actually wrong over there.

"So much fuss over a bit of homework." Duncan muttered this, shook his head, and then walked toward the enchanted sea chart.

Goathead, who had been steering carefully at the edge of the chart table, let out a burst of squeaking wood. He turned his head toward Duncan, and his two black obsidian eyes almost seemed to light up: "Ah! The great Captain Duncan has come to the side of his loyal First Mate—what have you gained today…"

"No fish today." Duncan glanced at Goathead. "After all the commotion before Frostholm, we probably won't be able to catch any fish around here for a while."

The string of flattery Goathead had just brewed up was forced back down at once. His wooden neck creaked as it swayed from side to side twice. After a long moment, he finally choked out: "Ah… then at least you have gained a quiet morning. The sea breeze is pleasant today, and the sunlight is good. It is a fine day to roam the sea. If you are interested, we could sail near Cold Harbor…"

“Not interested. For now, I don’t plan to let the Vanished get close to any city-state.” Duncan cut Goathead off just as he was about to start rambling again. Duncan’s gaze fell casually onto the enchanted sea chart in front of him.

Mist slowly rose and fell on the enchanted sea chart. In the drifting haze, a clear route was marked out. It showed the path the Vanished had taken on its way north. Around the phantom image of the ship that stood for the Vanished, there was the projection that represented Frostholm, and another that glowed with a faint green light: the Sea Mist.

At that moment, the Sea Mist was moored at the edge of the city-state of Frostholm.

“The Sea Mist looks pretty quiet over there…” Duncan’s eyes rested on the projection of the Sea Mist. The corner of his mouth suddenly lifted a little, as if he had thought of something amusing. “Seems like everything is going smoothly.”

“Smoothly? Ah, Captain, I feel you have come up with another great plan?” Goathead perked up at once. He craned his neck toward the enchanted sea chart and started chattering: “What are you planning? To topple a city-state that is still weak and shaken? Or to take this chance to fully reclaim the Sea Mist, which once left the fleet without permission? As expected of you. What you plan is never only…”

Duncan gave Goathead a silent look. “Are robberies and schemes to overthrow things the only ideas in that head of yours? Are there no positive options?”

Goathead thought for a moment and changed his wording: “Do you plan to personally help Frostholm rebuild order so it can get through this crisis? Or will you give Tyrian some mental guidance, so he can shed his shameful rebel status and return to the proper and glorious path?”

Duncan looked at him with a strange expression. “How did you come up with that?”

“Captain, maybe you haven’t noticed, but I do have some powers of observation. And after spending this time together, I have come to understand you better and better.” Goathead slowly turned his neck. His dark eyes could not show any feeling, but his tone clearly carried a bit of pride and ease. “You won’t just ignore Frostholm as it is now. Unlike Pland, Frostholm suffered far more damage in this disaster. If you really left it alone, there would be big trouble. And you…”

He paused here, as if searching for the right words. After a short while, he went on slowly: “And you are full of humanity.”

For a moment, Duncan said nothing. He simply fixed his calm gaze on Goathead’s eyes, which were so black they seemed able to swallow light. After a long time, he finally broke the silence in a low voice: “Your observation is sharp.”

Goathead hesitated. Then there was a crack from inside his neck: “Th-this… this sounds like the kind of thing someone says right before silencing a witness…”

But Duncan laughed and shook his head. “See? You still don’t understand me enough. I don’t mind a sharp-eyed fellow. It saves me a lot of trouble.”

After he spoke, Duncan waved his hand and did not bother with whatever reaction Goathead might have next. He stood up and looked toward the ancient round mirror not far away.

A pale flame rose quietly in his gaze. The mirror’s surface grew deep and black. In the calm spreading light and shadow, the hurried figure of Tyrian running over slowly came into focus.

“Good morning, Tyrian. I hope I did not disturb your rest.” Duncan looked calmly at the “Pirate Lord” who had clearly run all the way to the mirror. A slight smile touched Duncan’s lips. “How did you sleep last night?”

Tyrian in the mirror looked nervous. He took several deep breaths before he calmed down. His stiff smile pulled at the corners of his mouth. “Fa… Father, good morning. I was just about to look for you—oh, I slept well enough last night. Thank you for asking.”

“You sound far too stiff when you talk to me. No need to be so tense.” Duncan adjusted his sitting position and looked at the figure in the mirror with a half-smile. “What is it? Did my other form scare you?”

“N-no!” Tyrian straightened at once, like a student who had suddenly been called on in class. “I just feel a bit more respect and awe for you…”

“That’s enough. I only hope you can relax a little. None of my forms should make you this nervous.” Duncan shook his head. “You said you were just about to look for me. Is something wrong?”

Tyrian hesitated. He seemed to be sorting out his thoughts and weighing how he should start. After a moment, he spoke in a careful tone: “It’s about Frostholm. I don’t know how to explain it to you, but it seems they want to…”

The Pirate Lord got stuck. He did not know if some things should be said or not. But just then, Duncan’s voice suddenly sounded and cut him off: “Let me guess what your next position will be. General of the city-state of Frostholm? A high-ranking official in City Hall? Or… did they simply ask you to be Governor?”

Tyrian, who had been struggling over how to phrase things, froze and looked up in shock.

“How did you…”

“Simple. It was my idea—to let the Sea Mist fleet enter the city.” Duncan looked completely open about it. “Otherwise, what else could have pushed that chaotic City Hall to move so fast and agree so easily? You know how their procedures work.”

The expression on Tyrian’s face changed in a very visible way. In his eyes there was clearly a mood like, [I spent the whole night scratching my head over my life and future, and in the end I find out my own father was just having fun with it.] He opened his mouth several times as he stared at the mirror, but in the end he did not dare voice that disrespectful thought. He only looked at Duncan with a tangled, confused expression. “Why would you do that…”

“It’s simple. Frostholm needs you, and you need Frostholm.” Duncan put away the faint smile at the corner of his mouth that belonged to a man who enjoyed the joke. His expression turned serious as he looked at Tyrian. “Inside the city, the chaotic situation needs a strong enough force to calm it and comfort the people. From the outside, Frostholm’s navy has been badly hurt. The whole city-state urgently needs strong protection. So who else has both a firm hand and experience in ruling, and also commands a powerful fleet?”

Duncan shifted his position a little and leaned forward, looking into Tyrian’s eyes.

“It looks like you have already accepted their invitation. Just as I said, Frostholm needs you—and you need it.”

Tyrian’s gaze seemed to dodge a little. “I’ve been a pirate for fifty years. Changing my way of life doesn’t sound too bad.”

“Tell the truth.”

“…After all, you personally protected that place. I don’t want to see your effort wasted…”

“Tell the truth.”

“I admire the tenacity the people of Frostholm showed. In the face of disaster, they did not back down. Even before you stepped in to help, they never surrendered. I admit it. I don’t want to see those people suffer in the days to come.”

Duncan did not speak. He only looked quietly at Tyrian.

Tyrian shrugged. “On the other hand, I don’t want to see a place Her Majesty Ray Nora once protected fall into a long, hopeless Dark Age.”

Duncan still did not speak.

“All right…” Tyrian finally sighed, looking helpless. “All of the above.”

“Good. Be an honest man, especially in front of me.” Duncan looked away, and his posture relaxed again. “So, what is your position now?”

“They want me to be Governor.” Tyrian tugged at the corner of his mouth in a complicated smile. “They even… took out a whole stack of plans they had prepared long ago.”

For a moment, Duncan said nothing, as if he had fallen into a short thought. After a few seconds, he let out a slow breath. “They are a bit bolder than I expected.”

Tyrian hesitated. There was a hint of inquiry in his eyes. “Do you have any advice for me?”

“Why ask for my advice?” Duncan laughed. “You once served the Queen of Frostholm. You have led the Sea Mist fleet for fifty years. You have dealt with every city-state on the Frost Sea. I don’t think I can give you any tips about being Governor.”

“I just want to hear your thoughts.”

Duncan fell silent in thought. After a brief pause, he spoke softly: “Then do the job well. Do all you can. In this cold world, there are already very few things people can rely on.”

“…I understand.”

“Good.” Duncan answered casually. Then he suddenly turned his head and glanced at the enchanted sea chart beside him. “Also, there is one more thing.”

Hearing this, Tyrian straightened up at once. “Please, tell me.”

Duncan looked at the enchanted sea chart. On it, at a point almost overlapping with the Sea Mist, the phantom image of the White Oak was quickly coming into view.

He turned back, smiling at Tyrian. “In a moment, make sure you hold on to something.”

Tyrian froze. “Huh?”

Duncan waved his hand and casually dispelled the flame in the mirror. At the very instant the fire faded, Tyrian’s muffled shout came from the other side of the glass—

“Hey, wh—what’s going on?!”

Chapter 447: A New Member of the Vanished Fleet

A fast exploration ship with a gleaming white hull suddenly rose out of the sea. Its side almost scraped the Sea Mist's stern, and the violent swell of water threw both ships into heavy rocking.

Even the Undying sailors cried out in this situation.

Tyrian rushed onto the deck. At first glance, he saw his subordinates running toward the stern. Among them, the bare, shiny head of First Mate Aiden stood out at once. At the far end of the deck lay the "uninvited guest" that was almost pressed against the Sea Mist.

"What in the world is going on?"

Tyrian ran the last few steps to Aiden's side, grabbed his shoulder, and shouted the question.

"No idea. It was a ship that suddenly popped out of nowhere. I almost ordered the guns to fire by reflex," Aiden answered quickly. "Everyone is still on edge. Right now, everyone is jumpy about anything that 'comes out of the sea', and that thing just appeared…"

Tyrian let go of his First Mate and ran toward the stern. By the time he arrived, dozens of people had already gathered there. The nervous sailors were pointing rifles and pistols at the other ship. Several seamen had taken their positions beside the close-defense guns at the stern. The tension in the air was so thick it felt like sparks might start flying at any moment.

Tyrian looked across the rail. On the other ship, just a short distance away, a crowd of sailors had also rushed out. From their clothes, they looked like ordinary seafarers from a civilian ship. Someone on their stern platform was waving signal flags. They looked just as panicked as the people on the Sea Mist.

Tyrian frowned. He was just about to try to figure out what ship it was when a harsh squeal from a horn sounded by his ear. A loud, steady voice came from the other vessel's broadcast system right after:

"Our deepest apologies. This is the White Oak of the Vanished Fleet. This is our ship's first time performing a Spirit Realm surfacing operation, and due to an error in handling we nearly rammed your vessel… Repeat, this is the White Oak, of the Vanished Fleet…"

As he listened to the broadcast, Tyrian's face froze at once. Aiden, who had just run up behind him, almost slipped. Shiny beads of sweat seemed to pop out on the bald man's head. His voice even went slightly off pitch: "Captain, wh-what did they say? Who did they say they were?"

Tyrian did not answer. The first thing that popped into his mind was the warning Father had given him just before their link was cut, and that odd smile Duncan had worn before the image in the mirror faded.

His expression shifted in a subtle way. Then, out of the corner of his eye, he saw something. He walked to the edge of the deck and looked down.

The reflection of the "White Oak" showed on the water below. But in that reflection, what appeared was a ghost ship wrapped in shadow and thick smoke.

He finally remembered where he had seen that somewhat familiar ship before.

Back in that battle in the fog, this was the storm of a ship that had raced across the battlefield like the wind. No one could figure out where it came from—now they had met again.

By now, the sailors on the Sea Mist had also noticed the strange reflection of the other ship in the water. Aiden, too, remembered where he had seen it. He looked up at Tyrian in shock and doubt. “Captain, are they the old captain’s…”

“…Father always has his plans.” The muscles at the corner of Tyrian’s eye twitched, but he still tried to keep his tone calm. “Honestly, I never thought there would be people in this age who would openly shout over a loudspeaker that they are members of the ‘Vanished Fleet’… Where in the world did Father find this bunch?”

“Maybe they know where the Sea Mist came from?” Aiden said, not very sure. “What should we do? Say hello? Invite them aboard? We have to figure out what they want…”

Tyrian suddenly felt a dull ache in his teeth.

“Use the wireless and call them openly. Ask them to send a representative over. Also, tell them to stop yelling ‘Vanished Fleet’ over their speakers. Our ship is not the only one in the Harbor district.” The Pirate Lord, who was about to become the city’s Governor, said this helplessly. Then he added: “And let the Harbor know not to panic. They must have seen the White Oak suddenly pop out of the sea too.”

At a time like this, anything that suddenly rose out of the sea was enough to scare people half to death.

“Yes, Captain.”

Aiden accepted the order and hurried off.

After a while, the Sea Mist finally established normal communication with the strange White Oak. After a simple exchange and explanation, the other side agreed to send a representative over for a talk.

Not long after, Tyrian met the representative they sent. A middle-aged man, tall and lean, with slightly wavy brown short hair and a sharp, capable look, came aboard the Sea Mist in a seafarer's uniform, bringing a young priest with him.

"Captain Tyrian—it's an honor. I have long heard of your deeds." The middle-aged man stepped onto the deck with a bright, friendly smile and reached out his hand to Tyrian. "I am Gus, First Mate of the White Oak. And this is our ship's priest, Mr. Jensen."

Tyrian felt a bit dazed. He had never thought that, from that eerie "twin phantom ship" that could sail through mirror world, the Spirit Realm, and other abnormal sea regions, such a person would walk out.

A man with a bright smile, a solid body of flesh and blood, friendly and warm, a perfectly healthy and normal person.

He was not mad or raving. His limbs were whole. There was no sign of mental problems or bodily mutation at all. This was the new member of the Vanished Fleet? Someone under Father's favor?

Even though many questions flashed through his mind in that instant, Tyrian still reached out on reflex and shook First Mate Gus's hand.

"Tyrian Abnomar, captain of the Sea Mist. I don't think I need too much introduction." He looked at the "bright and sunny normal man" in front of him, who claimed to be First Mate of the White Oak. Tyrian's eyes still held some doubt. "You said you are… members of the Vanished Fleet?"

"Yes. New members." First Mate Gus answered with a smile. At the same time, he was also sizing up this famous Pirate Lord, and he could not help feeling puzzled in his heart.

The single eye was a bit frightening, but Tyrian's attitude was on the whole friendly. His gaze was calm and rational. His body did not show the terrible damage that surrounded the Undying sailors nearby. He did not look at all like a madman with mental problems or a lunatic twisted by the Elder Gods' corruption.

This was Captain Duncan's eldest son? How could he not look insane at all?

At this first meeting between two broad-sense "members of the Vanished Fleet", they both, at the same time, quietly questioned the other's mental state. Then, together, they put away that not-so-kind thought and shared a smile.

"I saw you on the battlefield before." Tyrian was the first to break the slightly awkward silence. "You roared through the thick fog back then. It left quite an impression."

"We were under orders at the time to head to Frostholm in the mirror world," First Mate Gus explained. "We couldn't afford to delay such an important task."

"Father's orders?" Tyrian asked without thinking. Then his gaze fell on the young priest named Jensen, and his eyes took on a subtle look. "You even have a ship's priest… Has the Deep Sea Church become this open-minded?"

priest Jensen looked a bit embarrassed. He shrugged with a helpless smile. "At least for now, the Goddess has not sent down any punishment."

"Don't you have a small Cathedral on your ship too?" First Mate Gus looked up at the striking shipborne Cathedral at the Sea Mist's stern.

"…That is true."

Tyrian choked on his words for a second, then gave an awkward little laugh. At the same time, though, something else crossed his mind—

On the Vanished, there was also a “priest” miss from the True Gods’ Church.

If Father could even bring an Inquisitor from Pland onto his ship, then having a few ship priests in the Vanished Fleet did not seem strange at all.

Realizing that it was probably best not to dig too deeply into secrets in the realm of Gods, Tyrian quickly cut off his train of thought. He straightened his expression and asked curiously: “You surfaced in such a hurry here. Do you have another mission?”

“Oh, we are here to pick up our captain,” First Mate Gus explained at once.

“Your captain?”

“Captain Lawrence led a marine squad into the mirror world world to fight earlier. Later, he returned to the city-state in the Mortal Realm together with Frostholm’s Gatekeeper. We just received word that he is coming back to the ship,” First Mate Gus said patiently. “But it seems they ran into a bit of trouble over there, so Lady Martha ordered us to surface and receive them…”

“Ran into trouble?” Tyrian frowned without thinking. He was about to ask for details when his chief sailor walked quickly up to them.

The chief sailor came to his side and gave a quick, quiet report.

The expression on Tyrian’s face slowly turned strange.

First Mate Gus noticed this and could not help asking: “May I ask what has happened…”

“Your captain—is he an older man in a white coat, maybe about fifty or sixty, who looks like a ghost?”

First Mate Gus stared for a moment, then answered a bit uncertainly: “He… doesn’t look like a ghost under normal conditions, but the rest fits.”

“Then that’s him.” Tyrian spread his hands. “Your captain is running all over the Upper City with a dozen heavily armed ghost sailors and a very loud mummified corpse. Now they have been ‘invited’ into the security bureau. If I’m right, they got lost, and it seems they don’t know how to ‘turn off’ the spirit form flames on their bodies, so they caused a panic among the citizens.”

Gus: “Ah…”

“But don’t worry. The security bureau knows they aren’t enemies. Witnesses saw them fighting the monsters in the city and covering the Guard Corps, so they won’t be in real trouble.”

“Uh…”

“Also, Gatekeeper and Archbishop Lady Agatha has already gone to meet them. With the great Cathedral vouching for them, your captain should be back soon.”

“Oh…”

“In the future, try not to publicly announce that you are ‘members of the Vanished Fleet’ whenever you feel like it. Mainly because… that identity is very sensitive.”

“…All right.”

Chapter 448:

The room in the Security Bureau was very warm, and the lights were bright. Even with the city in its current chaos, this place still looked neat and orderly—and they even had tea and coffee.

“Name?”

“Lawrence Creed.”

“Occupation?”

“Captain. Captain of the White Oak.”

“Affiliated guild?”

“The Explorer Association. I have full senior Explorer qualifications, including history, occult studies, and certificates in navigation and related fields. And… uh, that’s it.”

“Reason for coming to Frostholm?”

Lawrence looked up at the bright electric light above, thought for a few seconds, and said: “Honestly, I first came to deliver cargo… the shipment your city’s Cathedral ordered.”

The young clerk sitting across the table scribbled on the paper, then looked up after a few quick strokes. With a friendly yet obviously nervous smile, he said: “All right, I’ve written it down. Please don’t mind, it’s just routine. After all, if you come here, we have to leave some record. Frostholm thanks you for your help—would you like another sugar cube?”

“Ah, no need, thank you.” Lawrence waved his hand a bit awkwardly, picked up the coffee cup and took a sip. But since he was still in the Ghost state, he could taste nothing and feel no warmth or cold. So he set the cup down again and turned to glance behind him.

The sailors wreathed in Ghost flames sat in a row on the chairs in the back half of the room. These rough fellows had almost emptied all the tea and snacks the office had prepared. They did not mind at all that taste was numb in spirit form. They were eating purely on the principle that, since they had come all this way, they could not leave at a loss.

They showed none of the nervousness one should have after being “invited” into the Security Bureau for disturbing the peace. Of course, that was normal. After all, his group had indeed been “invited” in by the constables in a very polite, even slightly tense and reverent way.

Thinking of this, Lawrence could not help feeling another wave of embarrassment. But with his face wrapped in flame, others probably could not see his expression.

“I heard that at first you were in the Cathedral district helping the Gatekeeper. Why were you wandering all over the Upper City afterward? And why did you… cause such a big commotion?”

The young clerk in charge of registration across the table asked, curious and cautious.

“It was just some… small accidents,” Lawrence said, with a hint of shame in his tone as he tried hard to find a way to explain the messy situation. How was he supposed to explain it? Say straight out that after leading a band of sailors in a big brawl, they still had energy to burn, so they decided to stroll around the city and buy some local specialties to take back to Pland? And then, because the Ghost fire was hard to control, the flames they had finally managed to suppress somehow flared up again when the Sun rose?

That really had been literally “flared up”—they were walking at a crossroads, in full view of everyone, when they suddenly caught fire.

Anomaly 077, who had been wrapped in a robe and well hidden in the middle of the group, was so startled that he bolted straight out from among the sailors onto the sidewalk.

The result was that in five minutes they drew constable teams from three streets over. Men, women, and children all through the Upper City were running around reporting them.

Lawrence thought for a long time and decided he really could not say the truth. Mainly, if he just started talking, he might end up “ruining the good name of the Lost Home Fleet”—and though the Lost Home Fleet did not seem to have much of a good name in the mortal world anyway, it should at least not be that kind of reputation.

So he could only give another awkward smile and fob it off: “We were very curious about this city and, for a moment, forgot to hide our tracks…”

The crackling bang of flames suddenly sounded. Lawrence casually slapped the green tongues of fire on his arm, checked whether the armrest of the chair had been scorched by the spirit flame, and, once he was sure it was fine, looked up again. He kept watching the young man across from him with a sincere smile.

“…Could you please put out this awful fire for a moment?”

“I’m trying—though it might not look like I’m trying very hard.”

“…Thank you for your cooperation. You can wait here for a bit. I still have a few questions for your… subordinates.”

The young clerk wiped the cold sweat from his forehead and worked hard to keep his calm, friendly expression. Then he took a deep breath and turned his head toward another figure beside the table—a fellow who was also waiting for “routine procedures” and who looked suspicious no matter how you saw him.

It was a shriveled, terrifying mummified corpse, wearing an Old Era sailor’s smock and a seafarer’s cap that did not quite fit.

Noticing the gaze fall on him, the mummified corpse immediately lifted his head. A ghastly smile spread across his face. “Questioning? I know how that works. Go ahead, go ahead.”

“Uh… all right,” the clerk said, wiping the cold sweat on his forehead again. In his heart he was cursing the supervisor who had scheduled him for duty here today and envying his colleagues who were out on street patrol, while he tried hard to keep his voice steady. “Name?”

“‘Sailor.’ That’s what I’m called,” the mummified corpse answered at once.

“Sai… uh, fine. Occupation?”

“Anomaly.”

The clerk raised his head in a daze. “Huh?”

“Anomaly,” the mummified corpse said honestly, pointing at his own shriveled head. “Or, more precisely, Anomaly 077.”

The clerk seemed to turn into a statue. A few seconds later, the distinct sound of a gulp finally reached Lawrence’s ears.

“Ahem, there’s a very complicated reason for that,” Lawrence coughed twice. His voice finally snapped the clerk out of his near mental blank. “Don’t worry. When the person in charge of your Church gets here, I’ll find a way to explain it all properly and get it recorded.”

Even listening to the old captain, the clerk still seemed lost. His expression shifted quickly several times before he opened his mouth, as if to say something. But before he could speak, a gust of wind wrapped in pale dust suddenly swept through the office—

The Ashen Wind swirled, and from within it stepped a blind Goddess official in a black long dress. A slightly airy, hoarse female voice followed: “I am here.”

The clerk, whose nerves were stretched almost to breaking and whose sanity was starting to waver, suddenly seemed to grab a lifeline. He almost sprang up from his chair. “Ah, Lady Agatha! You’re finally here! The situation here is a bit…”

“I know. The situation is complicated, so I came to handle it myself,” Agatha said, cutting off the unlucky clerk with a wave of her hand. Then she turned to Lawrence. Her pale lips curled slightly, though there was something odd in her tone. “I thought you had already left.”

“We were planning to leave…” Lawrence gave a dry laugh, but the tense strings inside him still loosened a little. No matter what, he and this Gatekeeper before him had fought side by side. The whole process had been full of chaos, weirdness, eldritch things, and countless unexpected twists, but at least one thing was certain: they were “the same kind of people.”

Agatha on the opposite side also seemed to relax a little. She waved to the clerk beside her, signaling that he could go. The young man looked as if he had been granted amnesty and fled from the sparsely populated office as fast as he could.

Then Agatha sighed again, full of helplessness and fatigue. After signaling Captain Lawrence and his people to stay calm, she focused her mind and said inwardly: “I’ve found them. They’re all here at the Security Bureau… The situation? Very good, and their appetites look very good as well… Yes,

I understand. We'll handle the follow-up… Don't worry. They haven't actually caused much trouble, just stirred up a bit of citizen panic. You know, everyone's nerves are pretty tight right now…

"There's one more thing to report. There's a runaway state Anomaly… yes, a runaway state Anomaly, number 077, name 'Sailor'. This mummified corpse has been acting together with them…

"You want them to come to you? Understood—it's Oak Street… ah, all right, I understand."

After a long while, Agatha finally let out a small breath and lifted her head to "look" at Captain Lawrence.

Even with the black cloth over her eyes, it still felt as if a solid gaze pierced the thick bandage, making the old captain feel a bit of pressure.

He gradually realized what was happening. "You were talking to 'Him' just now?"

"Yes. And He has given orders," Agatha nodded, her expression turning serious. "He wants you to go see Him."

"Go see Him?" Lawrence's heart gave a jolt, and a trace of tension slipped into his voice. "You mean…"

"The Vanished is currently waiting in the waters off Frostholm. Captain Tyrian will tell you the general location. The Sea Mist and your White Oak are moored in the same harbor right now; you'll see them as soon as you reach the docks," Agatha said calmly. "Go out to sea to find Him. Don't worry about missing Him. When you get close, your ship will know what to do. Just let it sail on its own."

Lawrence swallowed unconsciously and looked at the sailors he had brought. They all stood up, every gaze showing clear tension.

Then he turned his head and saw Anomaly 077 already sprawled on the floor, inching his way toward the door.

A few sailors rushed over and, ignoring the mummified corpse's violent struggling, dragged him back.

Lawrence slowly pulled his gaze away from that little chaos and looked uneasily at Agatha in front of him.

"Did He… say what He wants us for?"

"No. But He said it's just a friendly invitation and that you shouldn't be too nervous…"

As soon as she finished, before Lawrence could speak, Anomaly 077 burst out howling and thrashing under the sailors' grip: "I! Don't! Believe!! It!!"

"Make him shut up," Lawrence shouted over his shoulder. Then he took several deep breaths, forcing himself to calm down before giving Agatha a slight nod. "I understand. I will go to the meeting."

"Relax. You really don't need to be so tense," Agatha said with a smile. "Honestly… He's far more gentle and friendly than anyone imagines."

"I know," Lawrence said with a wry spread of his hands. "But tension isn't something you can just get rid of. I guess that will only change after we keep the appointment and actually meet 'Him' face to face."

"In any case, I wish you all the best," Agatha nodded slightly, then casually asked, "Is there anything else? Frostholm is in a bad state right now, but as long as it's something I can do, I'll try my best to help."

When Lawrence heard that, he actually looked thoughtful. Then he reached into his coat to feel around.

A moment later, he pulled out a sheet of paper that looked faintly translucent, burned thin by spirit form flames, and handed it to Agatha.

“What is this?”

“It’s the cargo list—the shipment your Cathedral ordered. We’ve already delivered everything to the harbor,” Lawrence said, with a hint of hesitation in his tone. “Can… this bill still be settled?”

Agatha froze on the spot.

The Gatekeeper of the city-state of Frostholm, the temporary Archbishop, the Envoy of the Flame Usurper, the firm and clever Lady Agatha—had truly not seen this coming.

After more than ten seconds of silence, this “Blind Nun” finally nodded, speaking as if through clenched teeth. “…We’ll settle it.”

Chapter 449:

The winch turned and the steel cable pulled taut. The metal “iron cage” rattled and creaked as it descended, while darkness spread outside the cage. Dim gas lamps were set into the sides of the shaft wall, driving back the depths of the mine’s darkness and bringing a limited but necessary sense of safety.

Agatha stood at the edge of the Shaft Lift. Her “gaze” passed through the railing, looking into the shaft that stretched ever downward. The black cloth over her eyes, like a veil of night, hid both her sight and most of her expressions, leaving others almost no way to guess what she was thinking.

“It’s so deep down here…” A voice suddenly broke the calm inside the Shaft Lift. Alice stood nervously behind Duncan, looking up at the gas lamp light sliding past on both sides of the shaft wall as she spoke with a bit of fear. “I feel like we’re about to go straight through the city-state and fall into the sea…”

“Dropping without a break will give you that illusion,” Morris’s voice came from one corner of the cage. The old scholar was curiously examining the inner structure of this large Shaft Lift as he spoke without turning his head. “In fact, we’ve probably only gone down two or three hundred meters.”

“Oooh—” Alice drew out the sound. It was hard to say whether she really understood how deep “two or three hundred meters” was. In any case, the doll girl’s face showed an expression of “that sounds amazing.”

Duncan paid no attention to the exchange between Alice and Morris. He moved over to stand beside Agatha, who was silently standing at the edge of the car, and glanced at this Gatekeeper. “You look troubled.”

“…I just couldn’t help thinking of many things once we went down the shaft,” Agatha said after two seconds of silence, her tone complicated. “They say… ‘the other me’ stood right here back then, leading the members of the exploration unit down this shaft into the depths of the Boiling Gold mine…”

Her voice was hoarse, with a hint of hesitation.

“Back then, ‘she’ seemed to have already sensed the truth about herself. According to the details described by several Guardians who went down with her, she already carried a strange, resolute air at the time. No one knew why…”

“If that ‘replica’ really restored most of your thoughts and memories, it’s not hard to imagine her realizing the truth about herself,” Duncan said quietly. “Even a replicant can have a strong will and a noble heart.”

Agatha did not speak for a while, as if lost in tangled, heavy thoughts. After a long time, she suddenly broke the silence. “I’m just wondering… what she was thinking about then, what she was remembering. Was she ever afraid, or did she regret it? She had my memories, yet only a few days of real life. Faced with all this… would she hold any hatred in her heart?”

Duncan turned his head and fixed his gaze quietly on Agatha.

After a moment of that gaze, he slowly spoke. “If it were you, would you harbor hatred or regret your own decision?”

“No.”

“Then clearly, she wouldn’t either.”

“But…” Agatha went on. “But… I think I would still have some regrets. When I died in the dark, I would think of the city-state under the sunlight, of the familiar people and things in the city. And if I were a replicant, I would also regret that I could not cross Bartok’s great gate, because I wouldn’t know whether I had a soul. I…”

She stopped and took a gentle breath, her tone holding a touch of sadness. “Yes. If it were me, I would feel regret.”

Duncan looked at her for a long time before withdrawing his gaze and turning to the darkness slowly rising around them and the lights within it. “Then she would too.”

Agatha fell silent for a moment, as if talking to herself, yet also quietly asking: “What will we see down there…”

“I don’t know either. That’s why we have to come down and check,” Duncan said, glancing back at the others in the car—Alice, Morris, and Vanna, who stood in the middle of the Shaft Lift with her arms folded and eyes closed, resting. Besides those three, plus Agatha and himself, there was no one else here.

“You didn’t bring any subordinates and only called on us. Was that out of caution?”

“I don’t know what will happen below. It might be corruption left behind by the Elder Gods, or a ‘truth’ that can spread. When the situation is unclear, bringing ordinary Guardians and priests would only add more variables,” Agatha said frankly. “You and your followers are clearly not afraid of those things.”

Duncan listened, just smiled, and said nothing.

Just then, the car began to slow quickly. With the creak of automatic mechanisms and a final clang as the “iron cage” touched bottom, the Shaft

Lift finally reached the mine floor.

“We’re here,” Agatha said, lifting her head to look outside. She opened the gate and stepped out first, reminding the people behind her without thinking: “Be careful. They’ve only done a preliminary cleanup here—the emergency crews pulled out hours ago. Where we’re heading next is the truly ‘unknown deep darkness.’”

As she spoke, she suddenly stopped and turned to Duncan with a hint of awkwardness. “Of course, these warnings might be a bit redundant for you…”

Duncan waved his hand to show he didn’t mind and looked into the depths of the tunnel. Only a few gas lamps shed dim light in the darkness, making the passage ahead even more hazy. Suspicious piles lay everywhere, and an uneasy, eerie air hung over everything. It was hardly a comforting scene.

“I shouldn’t have had Nina go back to the ship so early,” he said casually. “A place this dark would be perfect for her.”

“Or maybe she’d get startled by something in the dark and blow up the whole tunnel with one several-thousand-degree sneeze,” Morris couldn’t help muttering. “I do not recommend you take Nina into any dark, cramped space—she’s still young and startles easily.”

Duncan shrugged. “Kids have to grow up. She’s almost done with high school.”

Morris’s expression went a bit stiff. The corner of his mouth twitched several times before he spoke, choosing his words. “Captain, under normal circumstances, a child graduating from high school chooses a party or a trip to celebrate adulthood, not an expedition in a mine tunnel tainted by Elder Gods’ corruption as a ‘graduation rite’…”

Duncan laughed cheerfully, then as if suddenly thinking of something, turned his head and asked Vanna: “How did you spend your coming-of-age rite at seventeen?”

He was only asking casually, wanting a reference for the day he would celebrate Nina’s or Shirley’s own coming-of-age rite.

Vanna hadn’t expected the topic to suddenly land on her. The beautiful warrior maiden froze for a moment, her face quickly showing a bit of embarrassment. As she walked forward, she muttered under her breath: “… Studying for make-up exams after a delayed school year…”

Duncan: “…”

The mood turned a bit awkward. Duncan could only spread his hands helplessly, while Agatha, walking in front, suddenly looked back, as if casting an incredulous “gaze” at him.

“What is it?” Duncan asked offhandedly.

“No matter how many times I see it, the way you interact with your followers still feels truly strange,” she said. “You, after taking back your humanity, are completely opposite to the you in the legends of the past century. I think I can somewhat understand why Captain Lawrence of the White Oak and his subordinates are such an interesting group.”

Duncan had no reaction to the first part of her words, but his expression turned odd at the end. As soon as Agatha finished speaking, he said: “Let me stress again, while everyone on the White Oak technically counts as my subordinate, I’m really not familiar with them…”

Agatha nodded. “Yes, you’re not familiar with them—you’ve emphasized that before.”

Duncan couldn’t hear any seriousness in her tone and could only sigh. “So how was it resolved in the end? I mean Lawrence’s ‘cargo list.’”

“Frostholm needs supplies now, and we never break a contract. Since the cargo has arrived, of course we have to pay,” Agatha said, then shook her head. “But we could only pay part of it.”

“Oh?”

“The most critical ‘cargo’, Anomaly 077 in runaway state, couldn’t be delivered,” Agatha explained. “The contract called for the White Oak to hand over ‘Sailor’ to Frostholm’s sacred relic Hall in a sealed state, not a lively, bouncing mummified corpse…

“Then again, that mummified corpse himself seemed very eager to be ‘delivered.’ When he heard that the cargo list for Frostholm included him, he almost cried with joy. Sadly, we have no idea how to deal with an Anomaly stuck in a long-term runaway state that can’t be sealed again. It’s better to hand him over to you to handle personally.”

“An Anomaly in a long-term runaway state, huh…”

Duncan muttered without thinking and turned his head to look beside him.

Alice turned her head too and found the captain looking at her. The doll girl’s face immediately lit up with delight. “Hehe…”

Duncan sighed. “All right, I do have some experience.”

Agatha also glanced at Alice without thinking, a somewhat complicated expression on her face.

By now, she had already learned from Duncan the true identity of this “doll girl.” As someone born and raised in Frostholm, she naturally knew how extraordinary it was for “Anomaly 099” to be strolling openly through the city.

She had countless questions she wanted to ask. Strong curiosity and a vague unease stirred in her chest, which had long since grown cold. Yet faced with Captain Duncan, who seemed not to care about anything, she never found a chance to speak.

“I was thinking…”

Agatha seemed to have finally made up her mind and broke the silence. But just as she was about to ask something about Alice, a sudden jolt of dread made her stop short.

At almost the same moment, everyone in the group halted.

Agatha turned her head and looked toward the deepest point of the long, deep tunnel. Under the thick black cloth, her sight, which had already been sublimated in the flames, shook, trembled, and twisted. It was as if invisible winds were blowing straight toward her, and countless chaotic voices were mixed in those unseen gusts, battering her senses.

She felt her mind being disturbed. Some vast presence in the depths of the tunnel—no, strictly speaking, the echo left behind by some vast presence—was resonating with her reason. She could not “see” what was there, but she could feel that within that immense, tangled echo, there was a faint response.

That faint response was softly calling her over.

“What’s… over there?”

The blind Goddess official spoke, reaching out without thinking as if to steady her slightly shaking body.

A hand reached out from the side, a little large but clearly with feminine lines—Vanna took Agatha by the arm and lifted her gaze to the vast darkness at the end of the tunnel.

“It looks like a hollow,” Vanna said softly, her voice carrying a bit of tension. “A huge… hollow.”

Chapter 450: Boiling Gold

A huge void lay at the end of the tunnel.

Vanna reached the edge of the void. The tunnel ended abruptly here. The floor and ceiling seemed to have been swallowed by some invisible thing and vanished ahead. Beyond the neat broken edge, the vast, empty darkness pressed down even on her, an Inquisitor. The instinctive fear Humans felt when facing such an enormous dark space surged over her like a tidal wave.

Morris also came to the “entrance” of the void. He raised his consecrated lantern, but the light from the special underground lantern seemed to be swallowed at once. The light did not really disappear. The space ahead was simply too huge, and there was nothing in any direction for it to reflect off. The lantern’s glow weakened in the dark and finally only lit a steep slope running down along the pit wall. Everything else stayed buried in darkness.

“This… there is no way this was part of the original mine, no matter how you look at it,” Vanna said softly. She took a shallow breath and looked back at the mine passage they had walked along. “The normal tunnel ends here… This should be the ‘stone wall’ mentioned in the report.”

Morris bent down and carefully examined the small section of inner wall that the consecrated lantern could reach. “It feels as if some huge ‘thing’ once filled this place,” he said slowly. “Now that thing has vanished into thin air, and it left a big hole behind.”

“A hollow this big didn’t collapse but actually settled?” Duncan could not help frowning. He looked up into the darkness above with a worried tone.

“If this place gives way, at least a third of the Upper City will be in serious trouble.”

As he said this, he suddenly turned his head and glanced at Agatha. “Are you alright? You haven’t seemed right for a while.”

“I… can’t see the ‘void’ you’re talking about,” Agatha said, her voice a bit uncertain. “I only see huge, twisted echoes coiled here. The wind is full of noise. Is there really nothing in front of us?”

“Nothing at all, at least to the eye. And I can’t sense any corruption left by supernatural power either,” Vanna said with a firm nod. Then she grew thoughtful. “But you can feel something… Maybe what’s left here is resonating with you?”

“I don’t know.” Agatha shook her head, then turned toward Duncan. “What do you think?”

“We should go in and see what it’s like inside.” Duncan had already made up his mind. He raised his hand and beckoned in the air. A clump of ghostly green flame appeared out of thin air beside him. A skeletal bird wrapped in roaring flame burst out of the fire, flapped its wings, and landed on his shoulder as if it knew the way by heart.

Ai tilted her head and looked around. “Your experienced guide is here! Your experienced guide is here!”

“We can’t rule out the risk that this ‘cave’ might collapse, so we’ll bring this pigeon,” Duncan explained. “Once we go in, don’t split up. Watch the surroundings at all times for any sign of instability. Pay attention to the sounds above our heads. At the first sign of a cave-in, everyone teleportation.”

“Yes, Captain.” “Understood.” “Okay.” “Hehe…”

Duncan gave Alice a light tap on the head, then checked the terrain at the edge of the void. He took a quiet breath and was the first to step out into the darkness.

The others followed close behind.

Past the edge of the void there was a steep slope. The slope was not continuous. Sudden drops and twisting side paths appeared at any time, so every step had to be taken with great care. This winding, difficult path stretched into the depths of the darkness, as if it could reach the very bottom of the hollow.

The slope felt like a deep groove left in the rock after some long-term corruption finally faded away.

Duncan moved forward carefully in the dark. ghostly green flame burned and spread around his feet. The steady spirit flame lit a small circle around the path and left a bright “trail of fire” behind them. When they looked back, they could see the line of flowing flame drawing a twisting road in the darkness that led back to the hollow’s entrance.

In such a vast underground dark space, marking the way was extremely important. Even with the Pigeon Spirit as their ultimate escape method, Duncan still left his own flames along the way out of caution. The flames also extended his senses, helping him notice any subtle change in the cave walls.

Vanna had already formed a greatsword of solid ice and storm in her hand. She held the sword in one hand and stayed alert for any Monster that might be hiding in the huge dark. Alice walked the whole way with both hands carefully holding her own head, afraid that if she slipped, she might lose it in the dark. Agatha’s senses were disturbed by some “echo” in this cave, so she could only walk with Vanna’s help, taking careful steps on the rough slope.

Morris, meanwhile, walked along curiously studying the stones by the path.

“Very dense rock… and it seems fused and squeezed together,” he said. He lifted the consecrated lantern, silver light flickering in his eyes as he tried to see as far as he could. “If the whole cave wall is made of this kind of layer, it might explain why the structure could stay stable after its ‘contents’ vanished. These rocks form a dense, thick ‘inner shell’ that supports the whole thing.”

He hesitated, then added in an unsure voice, “But an inner shell alone may still not be enough. For a cavity this large, there should be other supports in the middle.”

Vanna could not help glancing at the Old Gentleman. “Just how many fields do you know?”

“Mathematics, history, chemistry, occult studies, physics, a little geology and mining, and some knowledge about fighting, firearms, machinery, and blasting,” Morris answered offhand. “Is there a problem?”

Vanna stared, stunned. “How… did you manage that?”

“Just read more books in your spare time,” Morris said. “It isn’t strange that I know these things. I am, after all, the Historian.”

Vanna looked at Morris with a strange expression. In her heart she complained that, except for firearms, fighting, and blasting, nothing he had just listed sounded like it had anything to do with the job of “the Historian”. But after thinking about it for a long time, she still did not have the nerve to say it out loud.

Agatha, leaning on Vanna’s arm, looked even stranger. As a Gatekeeper, she was once again deeply shaken by the followers around Captain Duncan. The last time she had felt this way was when she learned that Vanna was the Athlete…

Morris himself clearly did not realize he had amazed everyone. His attention was already back on the “stones” under his feet.

In the overlapping light of the consecrated lantern and the green flame, the surface of the stones showed a faint metallic sheen. And whether it was an illusion or not… there also seemed to be special lines on their surface.

The Old Scholar bent down, picked up a piece of broken stone, and examined it with interest.

He suddenly stopped walking.

Duncan stopped as well and looked curiously at the stone in Morris’s hand. “Is something wrong?”

Several seconds passed before Morris suddenly seemed to come back to himself. He spoke in a strange, shaken tone. “…It’s Boiling Gold.”

Agatha immediately turned her head. “Boiling Gold?”

“Boiling Gold ore, almost pure enough to feed straight into a steam-core reactor boiler…” Morris muttered in shock. Then he quickly bent down and picked up another piece. After checking it, he simply squatted and carefully examined every stone at his feet. The more he checked, the more alarmed he became. “Here too… No wonder, no wonder I thought the texture of these ‘stones’ was strange just now. It was just too dark to see…”

The Old Scholar suddenly stopped, then raised his head to look at Duncan and Agatha.

His face showed stunned disbelief and a faint excitement that came with a great discovery. “It really is Boiling Gold, Captain, Agatha—this entire cave is made of Boiling Gold! At least the pit floor is covered in raw ore!”

Everyone fell silent. In that silence, Duncan clearly felt Agatha’s emotions surging. Vanna even felt Agatha’s body trembling slightly.

No one understood the meaning of Boiling Gold better than someone born in Frostholm.

“This is all Boiling Gold. We already saw remaining Boiling Gold veins in the tunnels,” Vanna whispered, holding Agatha’s hand. “It looks like Frostholm doesn’t need to worry too much, at least for a while.”

“Yes… we don’t need to worry… there is still Boiling Gold here…” Agatha murmured. Her tone was strangely mixed. “But why? Why are these things here…”

“Would the corruption of the Abyssal Lord leave Boiling Gold behind?” Duncan frowned. “If our information is right, this Great Hollow was formed that way…”

Everyone suddenly grew serious. Even Alice, who was always slow to pick up on things, felt the change in the air. The doll girl edged close and tugged on Duncan’s arm, then asked carefully, “Captain… what is Boiling Gold?”

Duncan: “…”

With everyone so serious, it really took some talent for this fool to stay such a steady, unwavering fool.

He sighed. “Boiling Gold is the base of modern industry. It’s the energy source for all steam-powered machines. Just like people need food, machines need Boiling Gold to run.”

Alice listened, half understanding. After a long moment, she finally nodded in sudden realization. “Oh—”

Duncan did not worry about whether this illiterate doll had really understood. His gaze turned again toward the darkness ahead.

The huge underground hollow had stirred his curiosity completely.

If this whole cave was made of extremely pure Boiling Gold… then what would be waiting for him at its deepest point?

Chapter 451: History in the Mist and Mist in the History

The group moved forward in the dark. The ghostly flame became a glowing path, tracing the marks of their way deeper into the cave. The light of the consecrated lantern and the spirit flame shone on the road ahead so they could just barely see what surrounded them.

Along the way, what Duncan's group saw most often was Boiling Gold.

High-purity Boiling Gold made up every part of the cave's terrain. Layer upon layer of dense rock formed a strong shell, and a huge amount of loose ore lay scattered across the pit floor, impossible to count.

These ores were the base of modern industry, the lifeblood of Frostholm. Yet seeing them here only made the atmosphere grow more and more strange.

But Duncan did not care much about that strangeness. He was a practical man. Elder Gods or no Elder Gods came second. If Boiling Gold could be used, then it was good. Even if this Boiling Gold really was a "product" of the Abyssal Lord, he did not mind using it.

In fact, if he were the city-state's Governor, the only thing he would be thinking about right now would be how feasible it was to open a branch mine in the Abyssal Deep, in the Deep Sea, and how to draw up a plan for sustainable mining on the Abyssal Lord.

But he did not say any of this out loud.

For an ordinary person like Agatha, that kind of development idea might be a bit extreme.

Duncan's mind turned with all sorts of thoughts, but then a hazy patch of Shadows at the edge of his sight made him suddenly stop.

The others stopped as well. Morris seemed to see something too. He raised the consecrated lantern to light the area and said: "There seems to be something ahead."

In the limited glow from the consecrated lantern and the spirit flame, a huge mass of Shadows slowly appeared in the endless darkness. It looked like a pillar standing in the distance, or the trunk of a towering tree. Its upper half spread out in a vague way, as if some branching structure reached up into the dark.

Even though she could not see it clearly, the dim outline alone let Agatha feel its enormous size. It was like a giant column that could hold up a whole mountain. Even across a great distance, it gave off a heavy sense of pressure.

Vanna tightened her grip on her greatsword and warned everyone: "Move forward carefully."

The group continued on through the dark. As they drew closer, that vague patch of Shadows slowly became clearer before them.

A huge "pillar", like the tower of the Cathedral, stood in the center of the Great Hollow. In the lantern light, it showed itself in a breathtaking way.

"Eye of Wisdom…"

Morris gasped without thinking, and the consecrated lantern in his hand even shook. He stared at the pillar. Its black surface was uneven and rough, like the tentacle of some Deep Sea creature grown countless times larger. Its lower half was buried deep in the ground, surrounded by wrinkled, broken rock, as if it had grown from the seawater under the city and stabbed straight through the island's base. Its upper half ran up into the endless darkness overhead and split into faint branches there, like a strange giant tree that had twisted and grown in this unknown deep, then quietly died.

It was so massive that the lantern's glow could not possibly light the whole pillar. It was hard even to light a small part of its front. Morris could see only the patch of rough surface where the lantern light reached. The larger, hazier structures were picked out by the dim green flame spreading around them. As for the parts even the green flame could not reach… there he could only rely on his imagination, trying to make sense of the very blurred Shadows.

Even the usually careless doll girl felt deeply shaken by the sight.

Alice tilted her head back, then grabbed her head with both hands and pulled hard. With a soft pop, she pulled her head off. She lifted her own head high and tried her best to look up, but still could not see clearly, so she tossed her head upward a few times. After throwing it several times, she finally felt for it and pressed it back onto her neck, then kept staring up in a daze. "Wow…"

Vanna turned to look at Alice. "…Wow."

"What is this thing?" Morris's full attention was on the pillar, both grand and terrifying. He could not help taking a couple of steps forward and carefully touching its pitted surface. The cold, rough feel under his fingers was like rock. "It feels like stone, but it looks like some kind of…"

"Some huge limb," Duncan said. He tilted his head back to look up at the upper half of the pillar. After a few seconds he spoke softly. "It seems to be what's holding up the whole cave."

“So this is the real reason the cave hasn’t collapsed…” Morris murmured. He leaned close to the pillar and studied its surface by the lantern’s glow. “Judging from the lines, this also looks a bit like Boiling Gold ore, but it’s not quite like any ore the books describe… It seems mixed with impurities.”

“If we guess boldly, maybe this is a piece of the Abyssal Lord’s limb,” Duncan said casually. “It stretched into the city and was burned into stone here.”

The scene fell silent for a moment. Several seconds passed before Vanna finally twitched the corner of her mouth and broke the silence. “That sounds a bit scary…”

“Scary, but very likely. I only added ‘maybe’ for your sake,” Duncan said, shaking his head. “Don’t forget, my flame once spread here. Things were chaotic back then, so I didn’t have time to sense everything in detail, but I remember… whatever was here was very hard to burn.”

As he spoke, he stepped forward and reached out to touch the pillar’s rough, rock-like surface.

On the other side, Agatha also felt her way toward the “pillar”.

In her “vision”, everything was still shaking under the interference of some resonant force. This empty cave became, in her eyes, a strange place full of chaotic ripples. Yet even in that endless interference, she could clearly “see” the “pillar” before her.

A faint pull drove her closer.

Agatha carefully reached out and stroked the pillar. Her fingers moved over the cold surface as if she were flipping through a book carved from stone, reading the memories left inside the rock.

Some depressions caught her attention.

She traced them, drawing their shapes in her mind. She placed her palm in one of the hollows and found that each of her fingers fit into it perfectly.

It was a handprint.

After a brief shock, she reached out with her other hand. Guided by a sudden, baseless instinct in her mind, she groped around and found another handprint.

It felt as if a trace of fine ash still remained inside the print.

Agatha suddenly froze. She instinctively wanted to turn her head and tell Duncan what she had found. But in the next second, countless tangled lights and shadows rose all at once in her dark, chaotic vision.

Memories rose in her heart. Thin but real emotions were mixed among them. Countless pieces of information flooded into her mind. It was as if those messages had been sleeping in Agatha's head from the very start, as if they were her own experiences. At the moment she touched those two handprints, they suddenly woke up inside her!

A search in the dark… A meeting with Governor Winston's echo… The true nature of the Abyssal Trench Project… The preparations made by each generation of Governor… The power of the Elder Gods invading the city, the thoughts of the Elder Gods drifting between illusion and the Mortal Realm, and…

This was a replica.

"Ah—"

Agatha gave a small cry. Her foot slipped, and she almost fell.

A hand reached out from the side and caught her in time. Duncan's voice sounded in the darkness. "What's wrong?"

Agatha blinked in a daze, then finally came back to herself. At once she became aware of the fragments that had appeared in her mind. She quickly stood steady and spoke fast: “I touched some memories… They were left by ‘her’!”

“Left by ‘her’?” Duncan frowned, understanding at once what she meant. “That replicant? Her memories remained here?”

“Yes. Listen, it’s important—she met Governor Winston here and learned the truth about the Abyssal Trench Project…”

Agatha spoke so fast it was as if she was afraid she would forget those fragments of memory in the next second. She almost did not pause as she poured out everything she had just seen and heard. She did not care whether the others had time to react. From the Governor’s last words to the source of Frostholm’s Queen’s obsession back then, and in the end, the strongest thought of all—the most stubborn idea “she” had left behind before vanishing.

The key message “she” wanted to pass on—the “Elder God” invading the city-state of Frostholm was a replica.

It was the replica of the Abyssal Lord.

Everyone fell silent. No matter how strange or terrifying Agatha’s tale sounded, no one interrupted her.

Only when Agatha said the last word did the scene fall quiet for another ten seconds or so. Morris was the first to break the silence.

“…History in the mist, and mist in the history…”

The Old Scholar could not help sighing.

Beside him, Duncan’s gaze had already fallen on the great “pillar”.

His eyes were more serious than they had ever been.

Chapter 452: Everything Is Permitted

Half a century ago, the Frostholm Queen's Abyssal Trench Project had been launched to find and solve the problem of Boiling Gold under the city-state.

Generations of Governors had inherited secrets about the Boiling Gold, the Queen, The curse, the Elder Gods in The Deep Sea, and the power of the Abyssal Lord, which had formed a real projection inside the city-state and bored out this huge hollow region beneath it…

Every one of these pieces of information was shocking.

But for Duncan, even all of that together was not as shocking as one fact: that the Elder Gods who had invaded the city-state were replicas.

Vanna realized the weight of that line too. As an Inquisitor who dealt with heretics and malevolent spirits for a living, her expression was unusually serious. She turned her gaze to the "giant pillar" that held up the cavern. Only after a long moment did she speak:

"First of all, this thing really is a remaining part of the 'Elder Gods' that invaded the city-state… And its source is still down in The Deep Sea beneath the city. So what Agatha just said about this 'replica' actually has two explanations."

"Yes, two explanations," Duncan nodded. "The first is that the 'source' on the sea floor is the real one. In that case, the corrupted mass it projected into the city-state can, in a sense, be seen as a replica, a copy.

“The second explanation…”

He paused, looked up at the giant pillar that supported the whole cave, then let out a breath.

“The second explanation is that the ‘source’ on the sea floor is also a replica. The other Agatha, in her final moment, touched not only the Elder God tendril in this cavern. Through that tendril, she also learned the truth in The Deep Sea. But time was short, and she had no chance to leave more explanation.”

The place went quiet for a while.

Alice lifted her head. Her curious gaze swept over everyone. She had not fully understood what they were talking about, but she was trying very hard to listen and make sense of it. After a long time, she tugged on Duncan’s arm:

“It sounds kind of scary?”

“Yes. And it’s hard to say whether the first possibility is scarier or the second,” Duncan answered. Even as he said “scarier,” there was a faint smile in his eyes. He rubbed Alice’s hair, comforting the doll who clearly did not understand but was already nervous: “You don’t need to worry so much. This won’t be more trouble than mirror world Frostholm.”

“Yes, it won’t be more trouble than mirror world Frostholm—as long as we don’t let that ‘source’ at the bottom of the sea keep growing,” Agatha said. She turned her head to “look” into Duncan’s eyes. “Just like you said last time, we still need to investigate under Frostholm again. We have to see whether the ‘Elder Gods’ that invaded the Mortal Realm are still there…”

Duncan gave a soft “mm.” He knew Agatha had not been idle and had surely already started preparing for this, so he did not press her. But just then, something flickered at the edge of his vision.

Something glowing flashed in Agatha’s right hand. It seemed to be a piece of metal.

“Agatha, what do you have in your hand?”

“In my hand?” Agatha was startled. She lifted her hand without thinking, and only then did she suddenly feel the foreign object in her palm—cold metal, yet already warmed a little by her body heat.

It was a strangely shaped brass key.

“The key…” Vanna stared at it in surprise, then suddenly understood. “Ah, this is the one you mentioned—the key that Governor Winston passed to the other ‘Agatha’ in the end? The key the Frostholm Queen left behind?”

Duncan’s eyes changed a little: “Let me see it.”

“Of course.” Agatha did not hesitate. She at once placed the key into Duncan’s hand.

The key was cast from brass. The handle was a thick “infinity” symbol, and the front end had no teeth. Instead, it was a round bar with grooves, like… the wind-up key used to wind a doll.

Alice leaned in close, hanging off Duncan’s arm: “Let me see, let me see… Huh? This is the key? It doesn’t look like the keys I’ve seen… What is it for?”

No one answered.

Every gaze landed on the doll, on Miss Doll herself.

“Why are you all looking at me?” Alice finally realized, pointed at herself, and asked: “Did I mess something up again?”

“When you look at this key, don’t you feel anything special?” Duncan lowered his head and looked into Alice’s eyes. “Like a sense of familiarity, or a strong urge to touch it?”

“No…” Alice shook her head, completely lost. “I’ve never seen it before.”

Vanna leaned closer and whispered into Duncan’s ear: “Captain, do you think…”

“I remember Nina mentioned,” Duncan said slowly, “that there is a keyhole on Alice’s back.”

At that, Agatha “looked” toward the doll nearby—the doll created by Brother.

In that instant, it felt as if everything connected. Points scattered across time and space linked into crooked lines inside this cavern that had once been corrupted by an Elder God.

The key left by the Frostholm Queen, and the doll “Anomaly 099,” whose face was exactly the same as the Frostholm Queen’s, were the two end points of that line.

Yet under everyone’s gaze, Alice simply looked left and right in confusion. Then she raised her arm and tried hard to feel around her back.

“I can’t reach it,” she said, a little wronged and a little apologetic. “My clothes are in the way.”

“We’ll talk about it when we get back. This… needs caution,” Duncan said in a low voice, breaking the heavy mood in the cavern. Then he raised his head again and looked at Agatha. “I want to take this key with me. Is that all right?”

“Technically… this key is a legacy passed down by the Frostholm Governors. And according to Governor Winston, it also holds the ‘information’ the Frostholm Queen left behind. But…”

Agatha paused, then gently shook her head.

“It’s all in the past now. Of course you can take it.”

“Thank you.” Duncan did not stand on ceremony. He put the key into the beak of the pigeon resting on his shoulder. With a flash of eerie green flame, Ai and the key vanished from his shoulder together. A second later, the pigeon returned, but the key was gone.

It had already been sent to the ship, into the hands of Duncan’s true body.

On the Vanished, Duncan turned the newly delivered key over in his fingers. In the hollow underground space beneath Frostholm, Duncan turned back to look once more at the giant pillar that held up the cavern and knocked lightly on its hard, icy stone surface.

“We should leave,” he said.

The cavern was huge. Even with the flames of spirit form to help, the area the group had explored so far was only a small part of the hollow. But for Duncan, the information gathered here was already enough.

He needed time to slowly sort out and digest what he had gained. Follow-up exploration… could be left to Agatha and Agatha’s subordinates.

After confirming that no Elder God corruption remained in the cavern and that the cavern itself had a stable supporting structure, Agatha could now feel relatively safe bringing her subordinates here.

Following the path marked by spirit flame, the group safely withdrew from the vast hollow. Then they boarded the shaft lift and returned to the mine tunnels above.

On the way out of the Boiling Gold mine, Duncan asked Agatha, curious: “What are your thoughts about that hollow below?”

“My thoughts?” Agatha thought for a moment. “I’ll probably lead a few more expeditions. At least enough to understand the surface of the cavern and the area around that huge pillar. If we find anything valuable in the process, I'll share it with you at once. As for after that…"

She stopped there, as if she were thinking very carefully, and only then said slowly: "After that, I'll suggest that the city-state find a way to mine the Boiling Gold in the cavern. Under the condition that we avoid a collapse of the hollow and avoid damaging that 'pillar', we should try to bring that Boiling Gold out. Of course, how to actually do that is up to the professionals in City Hall."

"You're not worried about the 'hidden danger' in that Boiling Gold?" Duncan asked casually. "After all, it might be something the Elder Gods left behind."

"…The city-state has to stay alive first. Only then can we think about anything else," Agatha said with a small shake of her head. "And after I 'saw' what was inside that cavern, I thought of something."

"Oh?"

"If the Boiling Gold under Frostholm is something left behind after the Elder Gods' power drilled through, then what about the other city-states on The Boundless Sea? Are we really sure that nothing is wrong under any city-state's foundations?"

The group fell silent again.

"After the ore veins from the Queen's era ran dry, Frostholm spent another fifty years mining Boiling Gold from the mirror world world," Agatha went on. "We instinctively believed that Boiling Gold mined from the mirror world world, like everything else from there, was just a replica. But after the mirror world city-state was destroyed, the Boiling Gold did not disappear. It even left behind a new 'rich deposit' in the underground cavern we just found…

“The only possible explanation is that Boiling Gold created by the power of the Elder Gods is not a ‘distortion’.”

“If Boiling Gold created by the Elder Gods isn’t distortion, then it can only be a natural part of the world,” Duncan said, his tone thoughtful. “That already sounds close to the Annihilators’ ‘Holy Lord created the world’ theory.”

“Yes. It already counts as something heretical,” Agatha admitted, calm and open.

“But you don’t look shaken.”

Agatha stopped walking. She slowly raised her head. Her gaze seemed to pass through the black band over her eyes and rest quietly ahead.

At the end of the passage was the mine’s surface exit. Bright sunlight poured in from there, warm and clear.

In Agatha’s perception, the entire world was still very cold, as cold as a tomb.

But she knew that sunlight was warm.

“Just like I said earlier, the city-state has to survive first,” this devout priestess of the Goddess said softly. She folded her hands over her chest as if in prayer. “There is only one kind of heretic in this world: anyone who hinders our survival is a heretic. Besides that, everything is permitted.”

Chapter 453: Pointing to the God

The whirlwind, wrapped around pale dust, slowly faded from Duncan's sight.

Agatha had left.

"I keep feeling… she's changed a lot compared to before," Vanna finally broke the silence only after the last strand of Ashen Wind vanished into the air. "Especially those last words she said. That's nothing like what the old 'Gatekeeper' would have said."

"Experience changes a person, especially everything she has gone through," Duncan said calmly. "And besides, the role she carries now is more than just 'Gatekeeper'. That means she is bound to change."

Vanna sounded a bit curious: "You don't seem worried?"

"Because she hasn't wavered. People who have truly seen through things often end up more firm," Duncan said offhandedly. "She is rational. She won't take some extreme or wrong path just because of the city-state's survival pressure. Her last few sentences might not sound very pious, but at least she is very clear-headed."

Vanna did not answer for a moment. Duncan turned his head and looked at the young Inquisitor with quiet meaning: "The one you're worried about isn't really Agatha, is it?"

"…My faith doesn't allow me to lie," Vanna said at last, after a brief silence and a soft sigh. "Yes, I'm worried about my own state. In Agatha, I see myself—the same shaken faith, the same rebellious words and actions."

Duncan stayed quiet and simply waited for her to go on.

"…I once believed that, as long as I kept firm faith and unwavering courage, I could face and solve any problem," Vanna said. "The deity laid down the order by which the world runs. We were like gears, just turning peacefully in the frame.

"But the truth is… that order was as fragile as bubbles on the sea. Pure faith and courage cannot save our city-state. The understanding of the world that we built up over so many years is being tested…

"'The Sun' is not eternal. The 'Boiling Gold' that supports modern civilization might be a product of the Elder Gods. The gods cannot always shelter the city-states. Beneath The Deep Sea lies an unknown darkness that no religious scripture has ever described or explained—and your appearance has overturned my understanding of Subspace from the last twenty-plus years."

"As for that last point, I suggest you hold back a bit on drawing conclusions—but the other things you said are fine," Duncan said, shaking his head, his tone unhurried. "Human understanding of the world is partial by nature. From the start, we shouldn't assume there's some simple and eternal 'logic' that can roughly explain all things.

"Maybe such a simple and eternal 'Truth' really does exist, but it's not something humans at this stage can understand. On that basis, having your worldview overturned is a necessary step in the progress of civilization."

Listening to Duncan, Vanna slipped into thought. Her expression grew more and more complicated. After a moment, she spoke almost to herself: "Then where do the gods stand?"

“I don’t know, because I haven’t dealt with them directly,” Duncan said openly. “Maybe I’ve seen them from far away, but that isn’t enough for me to judge them.

“But I admit two things. First, the Four Gods really do exist in this world, at least as objective beings. Second… up to now, they have, to some degree, protected and guided the civilized world.”

Vanna looked stunned. In over twenty years of life, this was the first time she had heard someone talk about the Four Gods in such a way—without any trace of good or evil, fear or worship, as if simply judging an object.

That way of describing them held no reverence at all. It was almost arrogance.

Yet when those words came from a being who had returned from Subspace, Vanna only felt…

Those words were cold and accurate, like a ruler used to measure the world.

Just then, Duncan’s voice broke through Vanna’s thoughts: “Vanna, don’t think too much. You still believe in Gamona, don’t you?”

“Yes. My faith is unchanged,” Vanna answered at once.

“That’s right. Your faith is unchanged. Agatha also still believes in Bartok. And neither of your deities has abandoned you because your thoughts have changed. Their divine blessing is still there. That means your thinking right now hasn’t gone against them,” Duncan said seriously. “Thinking doesn’t necessarily lead to heresy, and neither does doubt.

“To think and to doubt, then still choose to believe—that is a true devout believer.

“Keep a proper and healthy faith, and also keep a proper and healthy doubt. Try to understand this world. Accept that it’s not what you imagined.

Accept the narrowness and bias in your own understanding. Accept your own wavering.

“To be honest, if Gamona can accept your prayers to her on the Vanished, what else can’t you accept?”

Vanna started, then unconsciously raised her head. She looked toward the Upper City, toward the silent grand cathedral at the highest point of Frostholm.

By now, Agatha had likely already returned to that temple on the Ashen Wind. Would she go back to her prayer room and, before Bartok’s statue, keep thinking about the cooperation she had reached with the Subspace Shadows?

Would she keep thinking about the city-state’s future and again draw the conclusion that “anyone who hinders survival is a heretic; besides that, everything is permitted”?

After a long time, Vanna withdrew her gaze from the distance and murmured: “…The Lord doesn’t mind?”

“I don’t know. But if it were me, I wouldn’t mind,” Duncan said with a shrug. “And from what we’ve seen so far, the God of Death and the Storm Goddess don’t seem to mind either. They may care about something else.”

Vanna fell back into thought. Beside her, Morris, who had not spoken this whole time, could not help but sigh softly: “I didn’t expect you to have such deep thoughts about faith… I thought you weren’t interested in these things.”

“How could that be? I’ve always been interested in any theory that tries to explain this world,” Duncan said, his expression very serious. “For example, right now, I’m going to study another ‘faith’ that tries to explain the world.”

Seeing the confused looks on Vanna and Morris's faces (Alice was an exception, since she had never understood in the first place), Duncan smiled: "We don't need to worry about the city-state for now. Next, it's about time we went to look at that 'Blasphemous Tome'."

…

Shirley had fallen asleep—while she was working on the fourth math card.

The chains gave a small clink in the cabin. Dog carefully held the black chain with one paw as it raised its upper body. With its mouth, it picked up a blanket and draped it over Shirley. With its other paw, it casually pushed around the math cards on the table so they wouldn't get soaked by Shirley's drool.

As Dog straightened things, its gaze swept over the cards filled with simple addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division. Its movements paused: "…She actually got most of them right?"

Dog muttered in surprise, then turned its head without thinking. It saw Shirley shift her position in her sleep, mumbling some dream-words, a shiny line of drool hanging from the corner of her mouth.

"…I guess she did take them seriously," Dog said to itself.

Dog shook its head and lay down again. Then it steadied itself, as if after a long hesitation and weighing of choices, and stretched out a paw to drag a book from its own pile on the floor.

The cover was plain—just a paperback textbook you could buy in any city-state. On the front were the words "Algebraic Calculations".

Dog lowered its head. The blood-red glow in its eye sockets flickered as it stared quietly at the book in front of its paw. After a long time, it slowly opened the cover.

But right after that, Dog suddenly jerked its head up and quickly scanned the room.

Everything on the bookshelf looked normal. The shaded corners of the room were calm. sunlight streamed through the window into the cabin. From outside came the soft, gentle sound of the waves.

“…All right. The environment is safe. Distractions cleared. The book is still math… Try again… Third test.”

Dog muttered, then finally lowered its head and began to read the book with full focus.

It tried to understand the formulas, remember the symbols, work through the numbers. From the knowledge and wisdom of those who came before, Dog tried to understand how the world worked.

At first it was hard. Stray thoughts and awareness of the room kept disturbing the process of thinking. But soon Dog’s mind grew quiet. As always, math helped it concentrate and sink into thought.

Symbols and numbers combined in its mind. Its understanding of the world slowly filled its head. Dog studied with full attention, and gradually, it felt as if something appeared in its mind…

A study partner.

Someone was reading with it.

Someone was thinking with it.

Some presence was watching this place with curiosity—a gaze that held neither good nor evil.

Dog tilted its head.

Under the white pages of the book, in the gaps between the words, inside the city of knowledge traced out by symbols and lines, a red light was surrounded by countless flickering, matrix-like points of light, like an eye staring at Dog.

Dog froze.

It stared back at the red light.

It could not help staring at that red light.

It even felt itself leaning forward—actively drawing closer to that flickering matrix of light.

But that feeling lasted only an instant.

The next second, a force suddenly surged from the symbiotic pact chain and yanked Dog back, tearing it free from that strange pull.

"…What the heck…"

Dog cried out, snapping awake from the brief vision. The next second, it instinctively looked at the black chain on its neck.

At the last moment, the power from that chain had dragged it back—clearly, Shirley had given it a pull.

But the chain still lay loose on the floor, not tight at all.

On the other end of the chain, Shirley was still sprawled over the desk, dead asleep.

She had not woken up at all.

Chapter 454: Flow of Information

Ghostly green flame rose in the captain's cabin. The skeletal bird wrapped in spirit flame flew out of the fire, and the whirling flames behind it formed a doorway like a vortex. When the door opened, Vanna, Alice, and Morris stepped out into the cabin.

As the dizziness from the shift of light and shadow faded, they turned toward the nearby chart table and bowed to Duncan, who sat behind it studying the enchanted sea chart: "Captain."

"Find a place to sit and rest first. It's easy to fall if you walk right after teleportation," Duncan said without looking up. He checked a few more points on the enchanted sea chart, then let out a small breath and straightened to look at Morris: "You brought the book?"

"Yes," Morris nodded quickly. He reached inside his coat and took out the book with the pitch-black, titleless cover, the Blasphemous Tome, then got up and handed it to Duncan: "Here it is."

Duncan reached out and took the book. Beside him, Vanna could not help speaking: "Now that Morris, Alice, and I have all returned to the ship, only your avatar form is left in the city-state… is that alright?"

"There won't be any big trouble in the city anymore. Tyrian will become Frostholm's new Governor, and with him and Agatha maintaining order, there is nothing to worry about," Duncan said with a smile. "As far as you three are concerned, your work in Frostholm is done. Any follow-up can be handled by my avatar form."

As he spoke, Duncan sat back down behind the chart table with the heavy Black Leather Tome in his hand. He set it beside the enchanted sea chart, and his expression grew solemn.

This was the Blasphemous Tome that Morris and Vanna had taken from the low-ranking leader of the Annihilators. It contained records about the Abyssal Lord and seemed to mention certain secrets from before the Gods created the world and before the time node of the Great Annihilation.

From the outside, the book looked ordinary. Aside from its pitch-black, titleless cover, there was nothing special about it, and no hint of any supernatural aura seeped from it.

Vanna, Morris, and Alice had already crowded over in curiosity. Except for carefree Alice, the other two still kept a cautious distance and did not dare look straight at the book.

The Goathead wood carving at the edge of the chart table creaked as it turned its neck. It twisted its head toward the big book in front of Duncan, stared for a long time, then finally could not help speaking: “What is this thing? A book? Is it really worth such solemn treatment?”

“In theory, it’s a missionary manuscript copied by Annihilators,” Duncan said casually. “It seems to contain things related to the Gods creating the world. Most of it is those cultists’ mad theories, but part of it… concerns me.”

“Records of the Gods creating the world?” Goathead froze for a moment, and his tone changed subtly: “Those madmen’s ‘Genesis Protocol of the Abyssal Lord’? With all due respect, their theories are worthless in my eyes. If someone can invent an entire history of the world’s birth without solid evidence or reasoning, then any drunk playwright could explain the foundations of our world. There is even an absurd play that claims this world was stewed out of a great pot of hotchpotch…”

“But when Morris read this book, his mind suffered corruption, and it even drew the attention of the Four Gods,” Duncan said slowly as he lifted his eyelids. “You should know what that means.”

A sharp crack sounded from the base of Goathead’s neck, and he stayed silent for a long moment.

After who knew how long, he finally squeezed out a sentence: “The closer you get to the Truth, the farther you are from sanity…”

“Yes. The first rule of Anomaly and Visions is: the closer you get to the Truth, the farther you are from sanity,” Morris said gravely, nodding. “The more easily an item causes severe mental corruption, the more likely it is that it records the world’s true form. So sometimes scholars even judge the reliability of old scrolls by how damaged their minds feel after reading them.”

Goathead swayed his head where he stood. After thinking for a long time, he still could not hold back: “But massive distortion and pure higher-order supernatural power can cause mental corruption too. In that case, the truth points the other way—the more damaged a mind is, the more it has been deceived.”

He paused, then added: “I’m serious, Morris. Plenty of unfortunates in your line of work died because of this, and the ones who didn’t die all thought they had grasped the Truth when they hit their madness threshold. Most of them are now wanted as heretics on Church posters all over the place. Of course, now that you’ve boarded this ship, if we really want to be precise, you’re on those wanted lists too…”

Goathead’s style was strange, but after spending so long together it was clear he still had some genuine concern for the crew. His words sounded harsh, but the worry in them was real.

Morris knew this, so he did not mind. He spoke honestly to Goathead: “Thank you for the concern. You’re right. This world was very good at fooling mortals, and curiosity often led us the wrong way. That is why we need the captain to make the final call.”

“The captain will…” Goathead faltered, finally noticing that Duncan’s hand already rested on the cover of the Black Leather Tome and that he looked ready to open it. “Huh? Are you sure you want to read it?”

“What else would I do with it?” Duncan looked up. “Did you think I had Morris bring this thing aboard just to use it as your stand?”

Goathead stared blankly for a moment and wobbled his head from side to side: “Well… that wouldn’t be the worst idea…”

Duncan ignored his antics. He had already prepared himself. He drew in a deep breath, letting his mind slowly focus.

A ghostly green blaze rose from within him, and in an instant his body shifted into spirit form. After confirming that the transformation was complete, Duncan opened the first page of the Black Leather Tome.

At first glance, he saw no writing on the page.

At the second glance, he saw boundless darkness suddenly gather from all directions.

In an instant, the light and shadows shifted before he had time to react. Just like the first time he used the spirit compass of the Spirit Realm, Duncan’s consciousness suddenly plunged into a boundless darkness.

He lifted his head in startled confusion. Everything familiar in the captain’s cabin had disappeared. Goathead, Morris, and the others were gone, and even the Black Leather Tome he had been looking at a second earlier had vanished.

He stood in the darkness, frowning as he thought for a few seconds.

Something was wrong—this was not the process Morris had described.

After he opened the book, something completely different had happened compared to when Morris opened it!

Just then, something appeared at the edge of his vision.

Zhou Ming looked over on instinct. He saw tiny white light-shapes floating in midair not far from him. He focused, and finally realized… they were words.

The words became clear—

“After he opened the book, something completely different happened compared to when Morris opened it.”

Zhou Ming froze.

He stood motionless, his gaze fixed on the line of words hanging in the air. For a moment he even forgot to breathe, forgot to think.

Only after who knew how long did he suddenly remember something.

He remembered. He had seen a place like this before. He had once visited a darkness just like this and seen words within it—that had been in Subspace…

“It was in Subspace, aboard the broken Vanished sailing through Subspace. When I pushed open the door to the captain’s cabin, there was a dark place, and words appeared in the darkness, describing…”

Pale words flashed quickly in midair, then gradually faded.

Zhou Ming stopped suddenly. He forced himself to stop thinking wildly. It was very hard, but he stuffed his mind full of random numbers, words, and meaningless scenery from his memories. At last, the words that had appeared in the darkness before him truly vanished.

Then he worked hard to rein in his thoughts and calm his pounding heart.

What on earth was going on? What was this darkness? What were these words that appeared from within it?

They seemed to be describing “himself”… but were they really describing “himself”? And what did this kind of “description” even mean?

Was this some kind of mind-reading process? Or a “reflection” phenomenon on the level of the soul? The last time he had seen a similar dark space had been on the broken Vanished in Subspace, but this time it had happened after opening the book—why did that book have this kind of “power”?

More thoughts rose uncontrollably in his mind, and almost at the same time, new words appeared in the darkness.

But this time, the words did not describe “himself”. They were a few fragments with no beginning or end—

“Manifest… transformation toward the Mortal Realm… the real…”

Zhou Ming frowned and moved closer to the new line of words without thinking. He reached out a finger to try touching them.

His finger passed straight through the phantoms, and only faint ripples spread through the darkness.

As the ripples trembled, he vaguely saw that there seemed to be more words hidden behind the ones he could see!

He hesitated for only a second before reaching out again, stirring those words that were like reflections on water. He widened the ripples, forcing the overlapping symbols to show their true shapes and drawing the other information hidden deep in the darkness into his sight—

Suddenly, he saw several broken lines of text appear in the darkness. They trembled as they stretched downward and shifted.

“Transmission source – Leviathan Queen: the situation… is not optimistic. The Critical Threshold is accelerating…”

“Transmission source – King of Fire: any new records?”

“Transmission source – Bartok: bad news… Node feedback is blurry… suspect the Cluster Controller has begun to copy itself… or has fully entered runaway state…”

“…Source – LH-02: I have relevant information.”

“…Details?”

“…LH-02: observed an individual with Cluster Controller traits approaching. Suspect a mental mutation. Suspect it can communicate with me.”

“Transmission source – Leviathan Queen: astonishing intel! Follow-up?”

“Transmission source – LH-02: no follow-up.”

“Transmission source – Bartok: ?”

“Transmission source – LH-02: that suspicious individual sent a dog-head icon and left.”

Chapter 455: Thoughts and Tests

The ripples in the darkness slowly calmed. The pale words no longer appeared. No matter how Zhou Ming focused or searched through the darkness, he could no longer see that eerie “conversation”.

Yes, a conversation—without a doubt it had been a conversation. And it seemed… to be a conversation between the Gods.

At the very least, Zhou Ming recognized the name “Bartok”.

In the darkness, Zhou Ming stood quietly in place. He no longer tried to stir up new ripples but instead sank into long contemplation. An astonishing flood of information surged in his mind like a tide. Behind his seemingly calm thoughts hid deep shock and a tangled mess of ideas.

Was this a nasty joke? That was clearly unlikely.

Then had it really happened? If so, when had this conversation taken place? Was it a record of something that had happened long ago, or… was it going on right now, in some mysterious dimension? Were “They” talking at this very moment, and that conversation was being reflected into this dark and uncanny place?

Bartok was the name of the God of Death. That was beyond doubt. So what did the other names stand for? The most reasonable idea was that they all represented Gods. Then the King of Fire was very likely Tarrigan, the “Everburning Ember” worshiped by the Flamebearer faith… and Leviathan Queen? Was that the storm Goddess?

The storm Goddess's other name was "Leviathan Queen"?!

In the darkness, Zhou Ming slowly furrowed his brow. The strange title "Leviathan Queen" stirred all kinds of guesses and associations in his mind, but even more distracting than that was the fourth name—

Among those speaking with the Gods, one had the name "LH-02".

If the speakers he had just seen each stood for one of the Four Gods, then the last one could only be Rahm, who held the divine authority of wisdom and madness among the Four Gods.

Rahm's name… was "LH-02"?! That did not sound like a name at all. It sounded more like a code. A sequence that belonged to a machine!

Countless wild guesses surged up. Zhou Ming felt as if his brain were boiling and tumbling. He had to work hard to rein in his wandering thoughts so those guesses would not spiral into pure nonsense. Even while he tried to sort through that chaotic mess, he did not overlook the shocking information mentioned in the "conversation".

The situation was grim. The Critical Threshold was accelerating… The Cluster Controller had begun to copy itself or had already fully entered runaway state…

Just those two sentences were enough for Zhou Ming to smell the tense, heavy atmosphere. What situation were "They" referring to? The state of the mortal world? Then the Critical Threshold accelerating… did it mean that the collapse of some huge system was fast approaching?

Zhou Ming instantly recalled his last conversation with Agatha. Pland and Frostholm had both run into trouble one after another. Vision 001 had "malfunctioned". This string of events all felt like the "Precursor Phase" of a vast system breaking down again and again.

Then the Cluster Controller had begun to copy itself…

Zhou Ming’s expression suddenly hardened, and a sentence surfaced in his mind—

“This is a replica.”

In the darkness, he could not help taking a quiet breath. He glanced toward the spot where the words had appeared earlier, as if expecting more information to show up there.

Of course, nothing appeared.

Zhou Ming withdrew his gaze with a grave expression.

There were, of course, many more questions worth worrying about. He had seen only a few lines of conversation, but the information behind each one was astonishing. Even each speaker’s name was worth thinking about at length—for example, Rahm, Gamona, and Tarrigan had all used “aliases”, so why had Bartok, the God of Death, used his straightforward true name? In the last message, LH-02, who was likely Rahm the God of Wisdom, also mentioned a suspicious visitor and said that the other party “sent a dog-head and left”… what was that about?

Honestly, if the earlier lines had not held such huge amounts of information, Zhou Ming’s full attention would probably have been caught by that last “dog-head”.

But now, that jarring sentence only seemed a bit strange.

Just then, a faint noise suddenly came from the depths of the darkness, interrupting the storm in Zhou Ming’s mind.

It sounded like something quietly shattering. At first the sound was very faint, almost like an illusion, but in almost no time, the breaking noises grew clear and rapid. Countless broken streaks of light and shadow appeared in the dark space. The growing noise filled Zhou Ming’s mind. The entire dark space began to fall apart and shatter at high speed. Whirling lights rose from all directions. The next second, he heard a booming explosion inside his head!

In the next second, a brief sense of weightlessness and vertigo yanked him back into the Mortal Realm. The feeling of sitting in a chair made Duncan snap his eyes open.

Raging flames filled his vision. The nameless Black Leather Tome in his hands was already burning fiercely!

Alice's startled cry came from the side: "It's on fire! Captain! The book is on fire!"

Duncan jolted in surprise and quickly pressed his hand onto the blazing flames, taking control of the fire in the blink of an eye. However, the book burned at an absurd speed. In just that blink, more than half of it turned to ash, and only a small pile of scattered pages remained on the table.

A dark red liquid like blood seeped from what was left of the book, soaking and rotting the pages. Frowning, Duncan flipped through the remaining sheets and found they had all turned into soft, pulpy clumps. They were clearly unreadable.

He raised his head, his expression a bit odd: "I don't think I did anything."

"Judging from what we saw… this book probably could not withstand your power," Morris said after hesitating for a few seconds. "This is a clear case of supernatural overload."

"Could not withstand my power?" Duncan frowned and muttered without thinking.

Was it really just his power it could not withstand? The book had just borne… probably not only his power.

Perhaps it had just served as a medium—a medium for something far beyond its own limits.

Duncan remembered the golden Sun mask he had obtained in Pland. Through that mask he had glimpsed the form of the true Sun god, and it had destroyed the mask.

Morris did not know what Duncan was thinking, but he noticed the captain's expression did not look good and could not help adding: "This book should only be a 'copy', an supernatural item duplicated from an 'original' using some special ritual. supernatural items like this really are fragile by nature…"

Duncan looked up: "So if we had the 'original', it might be able to withstand me… 'reading' it?"

Morris adjusted his blessed monocle: "…In theory."

Alice glanced left and right, then finally could not help coming closer: "Captain, did you see something just now? Why do you look so serious…?"

Duncan rubbed his brow. Everything he had seen in the darkness rose again in his mind, but just as he opened his mouth, he suddenly stopped himself from telling the truth.

For weaker mortals, much "information" was poisonous in itself.

"I saw some things—different from what Morris saw," he said slowly after weighing his words for a few seconds. "But I can't tell you the details. They might hurt you."

Vanna and Morris exchanged looks at once. The next second, the same tension and gravity appeared in both their eyes.

After a brief thought, Morris spoke: "Different from what I saw… so the book shows different content depending on who is reading it?"

“That may be the case, but it might also be that it only shows different content in front of ‘me’,” Duncan said thoughtfully. Then his tone held a hint of regret: “It’s a shame… I should have left the test for last. Even letting Tyrian take a look at the contents first would have given us more clues. Now the only ‘sample’ is burned.”

Morris’s expression turned a little strange. He opened his mouth, then said nothing. Vanna, more straightforward, spoke instead: “Shouldn’t we think a bit about Mr. Tyrian’s mental and physical health?”

“Reading more books is better than watching burlesque shows,” Duncan said with a wave of his hand. “Besides, with me watching over him, nothing would happen… Enough about that.”

He shook his head, then fixed his gaze on Vanna, deciding to test a few things in a roundabout way.

“Vanna, have you ever heard the title or phrase ‘Leviathan Queen’?”

“Leviathan Queen?” Vanna froze, genuine confusion on her face. “Never heard of it… Is that the ruler of some city-state? But I’ve never heard of any city-state with that name.”

Duncan watched Vanna’s expression while also focusing his senses, checking whether any abnormal aura fluctuations or supernatural phenomena appeared around them.

He was very curious whether mentioning the name “Leviathan Queen” in the Mortal Realm would trigger anything.

But after half a minute, nothing happened.

“Alright, forget that for now,” Duncan said, shaking his head. He turned to Morris: “LH-02. Have you ever heard of it?”

“No,” Morris said, puzzled. But seeing the seriousness in Duncan’s expression, he still thought hard before shaking his head. “It sounds like some kind of machine code.”

The reactions of the two Saints did not look fake.

They truly had never heard those two titles.

But that still did not rule out the possibility that the two titles corresponded to the storm Goddess Gamona and Rahm the God of Wisdom.

After all, above the Saints there was still the Pope, and above the great city Cathedrals there were the “pilgrim Cathedral arks” that cruised the Boundless Sea for long periods. The secrets closest to the Gods were all kept in those places far from the mortal world.

“Forget these two names for now,” Duncan said at last, after confirming that nothing had happened in the cabin. He let out a breath and shook his head. “Don’t mention them to anyone. Especially after we leave the Vanished’s range, do not say those words to anyone.”

Chapter 456: The Divinely Blessed (?)

Noticing the serious tone in Duncan’s words, Vanna instinctively started to make all kinds of guesses in her head. But the next second she forced herself to stop, and nodded solemnly together with Morris.

Controlling one’s curiosity was a basic rule for surviving in this world.

After he was sure Morris and Vanna understood how serious this was, Duncan let out a breath. Then he nodded to Alice beside him and said: “Clean up this pile of things on the table. Don’t throw them into the sea, just burn them.”

“Okay!”

Watching Alice quickly clean up the mess on the table, Duncan sat back down in his chair. His mind was still replaying the scenes he had seen in that strange dark space, and he was thinking about the information revealed in that “conversation”.

At the same time, he was also thinking about how to contact that dark space again.

The handwritten copy could not bear the impact of the “truth”… Then where was the original of this “Blasphemous Tome”? If he got the original, could he build a stable link with that strange dark space? Or… were there other supernatural items that could do something similar?

Duncan remembered the time he had been Dreamwalking on the Vanished and then accidentally entered another Vanished in Subspace. Behind the captain's cabin door on that other Vanished was that same strange dark space.

So he boldly guessed that the "dark space" itself was a real "place" inside Subspace, and that connecting to it needed certain media and techniques. The handwritten copy Morris had brought had helped him build that link, but it did not have to be the only usable "medium". If he could find a way to visit that "other Vanished" again, that might also work.

A way… Subspace?

Duncan frowned and quickly pulled his thoughts back from that direction.

He was not sure if that idea was his own, or something Subspace had "released" into him.

But one thing was clear.

He needed more "samples" – whether it was the Suntist's Golden Mask, the copy of the Blasphemous Tome from that Annihilator, or whatever that Ender had in his hands. All of them would help him understand the truth of this world.

Thinking of this, Duncan raised his head at once and looked at Morris and Vanna opposite him: "Do you know where I can get more items like this? I mean things like this 'Blasphemous Tome', the items cultists use for major rituals and preaching."

"You want more?" Morris was shocked. Then he thought it over carefully, and shook his head: "This… will be very hard. The True Gods' Church and the city-states' authority often seize Cult items, but usually, after the necessary identification and research, these things are destroyed, no matter how special or valuable they are as objects."

Duncan raised his eyebrows: “Destroyed directly? No samples kept?”

“No samples, only records,” Vanna answered. In this field, this Inquisitor was clearly more professional than Morris. “Some things are especially dangerous. For those, not even full records are kept. There are only descriptive texts that have been ‘translated’ and ‘safely edited’, and even those must be stored in special archives, or only kept in the memories of certain ‘Keepers of Secrets’.”

She paused, then went on: “Because any Cult item that really has power also has equal danger and corruption. On top of that, they point directly to a Heretic deity, and this danger and corruption grows with time. We often cannot predict how much harm they may cause, so the safest way is to keep no samples. And also…”

“And also, people’s hearts are hard to guess, and even the strongest guardian has moments when their weakness shows,” Morris took over when he saw Vanna hesitate. “Wardens who guard blasphemous items can be tempted. They can slowly change without noticing it. Sometimes they do not even know they have already fallen. In 1666, a Saint of the city-state of Morka talked with a forbidden book under his care in a hallucination. That made the book turn alive, and in the end it caused an accident that killed dozens of people. After that, the city-states stopped keeping samples of seized Heretic items.”

Vanna sighed: “In some sense, Heretic items are even more dangerous than an Anomaly. No matter how high an Anomaly ranks, as long as you master the sealing rules, you can control it and even use it. But with Heretic things… sometimes even they themselves do not know what will come out of there.”

“All right.” Duncan rubbed his forehead. “Looks like we can’t count on getting samples from the city-states… We’ll have to find wild cultists and take them out on the spot."

Hearing the captain's words, the corner of Vanna's mouth twitched. She hesitated and said: "If… you really are interested, I can try to borrow some records from the Cathedral. The items themselves have all been destroyed, but the safe research documents still exist."

"…If possible, then help me find some records," Duncan said with a nod.

But he felt those materials would not help him much. What he needed was not data. He needed to find a fitting "medium" among those Heretic items.

That Blasphemous Tome just now had already proved one thing. The same supernatural item might appear in a different "form" to him than to an ordinary person. The knowledge that the scholars of the True Gods' Church had written down would most likely be useless to him.

But still, gaining more knowledge about the supernatural field could never hurt.

Right then, a noisy clamor from outside the captain's cabin suddenly cut off Duncan and Vanna's conversation.

It sounded like Shirley and Dog chattering all the way over.

Duncan frowned: "Open the door."

Alice ran over at once and opened the cabin door. She saw Shirley and Dog rushing up to the doorway and said: "Hey, don't make such a racket on the ship…"

"I know, I know, but this is important!" Shirley shouted at the door. Her small body squeezed right past Alice into the room. "Captain, Captain! Dog got possessed! It says it saw something really creepy!"

"Dog… got possessed?" Duncan's face twitched. He looked in confusion at the Abyssal Hound that Shirley was dragging in. "It's a Abyssal demon.

How could it get possessed?”

Morris and Vanna wore the same look that said, “You’re already the weird thing, so what could possibly possess you?” Dog, who had been dragged in, rolled and scrambled up off the floor. It really looked nervous and scared: “Really, I saw that thing twice in a row! It popped up in my head when I was reading, staring right at me on the level of my mind…”

“When you were reading?” Duncan frowned as soon as he heard that. “What’s so shocking about that? It happens on this ship all the time. When Nina rushes her homework, she ‘braises’ several a day…”

“Not my folks from back home!” Dog shook its huge dog head at once, and even sounded a bit anxious. “And not the Shadows of the Spirit Realm or some other malevolent spirit either. It was something I have never seen before. That thing appeared right inside my ‘consciousness’. It was like a bunch of strange lights. There was a big one in the center that gave off red light, and around it was a field of smaller ones. It was just like the ‘Starry Sky’ between the Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep, with dots of light circling around the red light source in the middle…”

Dog was only halfway through its rambling when Morris suddenly took two quick steps forward: “What did you say? What did you see?!”

This was the first time Dog had seen the gentle and calm old scholar react like this. It was scared, and shrank its neck by reflex: “Uh… a big red glowing orb, with lots of flickering lights around it…”

Morris listened, dumbfounded. He asked Dog to confirm several details over and over. Only then did he finally raise his head.

The old scholar’s face was full of shock and confusion. It was as if someone had punched a hole in the worldview he had built over half his life. For a long time, he could not say anything.

Vanna had also reacted by now. The muscles on her face twitched twice. She hesitated, then turned to Morris: “That sounds… a bit like…”

“God of Wisdom Rahm’s gaze…” Morris muttered. He lowered his head and looked at Dog again, as if he was looking at a rare antique just dug out of the ground. “You received the God of Wisdom’s gaze?”

The captain’s cabin fell silent at once.

After who knew how long, Dog finally lifted its head in a daze: “…What did you say?”

Duncan ignored Dog’s reaction and frowned at Morris: “Are you sure?”

“Unless Dog is lying, there is no other explanation,” Morris said at once. “What it described is exactly the image that forms in the mind of one who receives divine blessing when the God of Wisdom sends down His gaze. I have seen it too. Every believer who follows Rahm is familiar with it.”

Duncan fell silent.

After a long while, he looked at the confused Abyssal demon lying on the floor.

“What were you doing when you saw that scene?”

“I was doing practice problems,” Dog said honestly. “One time it was geometry, the other time algebra.”

Duncan: “…”

He did not say anything. He just kept quietly looking at Dog. He stared at that ugly, huge… dog head.

Chapter 457: Wisdom’s Favor (?)

The awkward, delicate silence in the captain’s cabin lasted for a long time.

At last, it was Duncan who spoke first and broke the silence. He turned his gaze from Dog and looked seriously at old Mr. Morris beside him: “Logically, do you think this makes sense?”

Morris blinked slowly. His face was twisted with confusion, like someone dragged out of bed at two thirty in the morning to revise a thesis. He felt that the trials he had faced back when he advanced to become a Saint were much easier than this puzzle. After struggling for a long time, he finally squeezed out one line: “In all recorded history… no one has ever heard of such a thing… This is beyond what I know.”

“Of course it is beyond it. Dog might be the only Abyssal demon in history who can read,” Duncan said, rubbing his brow with a complicated expression. “Does your doctrine say anywhere that the God of Wisdom gives divine blessing to Abyssal demons?”

“How could there be such a line?” Morris looked like he had just seen a ghost. “Abyssal demons are enemies of civilized society. Not just the God of Wisdom. None of the other Three Gods would have such a rule in their doctrine…”

As soon as he finished, Vanna, who had been stunned for a while, suddenly remembered something and quietly added: “But the doctrine of the God of Wisdom also says that Rahm watches equally over every living being that has a mind and spirit. He gives them the wisdom to understand the world, and uses the foolishness of the Veil to shield them from the mad and terrible truth… It does not clearly exclude Abyssal demons from the list of ‘intelligent beings’.”

“What Abyssal demons have a mind and spirit?” Morris blurted out. But in the next second his expression turned strange as he slowly turned his head to look at Dog, who was lying on the floor, behaving itself.

“At Dog’s learning speed, by this time next year we could almost sign it up for the middle school entrance exam,” Duncan said in a dry tone. “Maybe one day it will even sit at the same desk as Nina.”

“…I’m a bit lost. I need to calm down,” Morris finally said, and his body swayed a little. He rubbed his forehead and slowly made his way to a chair. After he sat down, he looked up again. His eyes were complicated as he stared at the dog in the middle of the room. “You… besides those scenes that appeared in your mind, did you feel anything else? Did you hear Him speak to you? Or did you suddenly gain a brand-new understanding of some knowledge?”

“No.” Dog shook its head hard. “I just saw those lights twice in a row, and both times they scared me. Other than that I did not hear or feel anything…”

“So you only saw ‘Him’? You did not receive any revelation?” Morris seemed to have calmed down and started to think seriously. “Then did you feel any increase in your ability to calculate or remember? After gazing at those ‘lights’ for a long time under the gaze, when you returned to the Mortal Realm, did your vision feel different from before?”

Dog kept shaking its head: “No, none of that. And I did not gaze at those ‘lights’ for a long time. I just took one look, then I was pulled back to the Mortal Realm.”

“Just one look? Then you were pulled back to the Mortal Realm?” Morris froze. Clearly this also clashed with what he knew. “That is not right… The God of Wisdom’s gaze comes with a long mental exchange. Even if mortals cannot understand that exchange, the whole process is definitely longer than ‘one look’… How were you pulled back?”

“It felt like Shirley pulled me back,” Dog said after thinking about it. It raised its head and rubbed against Shirley’s arm. “Right when I started to feel like I was going to be ‘taken away’ by those lights, I felt a great force come from the symbiotic pact chain, and then I woke up. But Shirley herself does not seem to remember.”

At once, all the eyes in the room turned to Shirley again.

The girl, now the focus of everyone’s gaze, shrank her neck by instinct. But right after that she showed a proud smile, like a child bragging after doing something impressive.

Only Duncan’s expression grew stranger as it shifted a few times.

Vanna was still puzzled: “I have never heard of a symbiotic pact between Abyssal demons and humans having the power to block a deity’s gaze… Could it be because the symbiotic pact between Shirley and Dog is closer than that of ordinary Annihilators?”

“Ahem, maybe what pulled Dog back was not the power of the symbiotic pact,” Duncan coughed twice. He raised his hand and pointed at Shirley, who was still grinning foolishly. “It might be the power of illiteracy.”

Vanna: “…?”

Shirley: “…?”

Everyone stared, speechless, and Shirley’s expression changed by the second. Morris looked at Duncan in shock. He had always known that the captain’s way of thinking was broader than most people’s, but he had never guessed it would be broad in this direction.

However, after a short moment of shock, Morris could not help following this line of thought. The more he thought about it… the more it somehow seemed reasonable?

“Maybe at that moment there was a struggle over Dog in the supernatural field. On one side was the God of Wisdom’s gaze, on the other was its illiterate partner. And in the end…” Duncan rubbed his temples and sighed. “The despairing illiterate defeated the deity who wanted to recruit a student.”

“Logically… logically…” Morris opened his mouth and muttered the word several times, then gave up and spread his hands. “Forget it. I do not know how to work out the logic either. If I wrote a paper about this, the scholars of Morka would probably fight to the blood in the city center. Let us just assume things really happened this way.”

A strange and hard-to-hold-in mood filled the captain’s cabin. Shirley stood in the middle of the room and looked like she was about to cry. She looked at Duncan, then at Morris, and finally pointed at Dog with a miserable face: “Then… then did I hold Dog back? It was… it clearly was…”

In that moment, and maybe for the only time in her life, the thought that she should study hard really rose up in Shirley’s mind. But the next second, Duncan’s voice cut off her thought: “Do not rush to conclusions yet. Maybe… this matter is not as simple as we think.”

Shirley dropped her sadness at once: “Huh?”

Duncan did not answer her question right away. Instead, he looked at Dog: “Dog, you just said that while you were gazing at those lights you felt like you were going to be ‘taken away’?”

Dog nodded at once.

Duncan turned to Morris again: “Would someone blessed by the God of Wisdom feel like they were about to be ‘taken away’?”

“No.” Morris now also seemed to sense something. He shook his head, and his tone grew more serious. “A normal divine blessing is a friendly exchange and enlightenment of the mind. The one who receives divine blessing stays clear and joyful. They would never feel any tendency toward a runaway state.”

“If a Abyssal demon really had wisdom ‘poured’ into it by God of Wisdom Rahm, or received some kind of… divine favor, what would happen?” Duncan asked at once.

“I… do not know. This has never happened before. But by logic it could be a very dangerous process.” Morris’s mind worked fast, and he understood what Duncan meant at once. “There is a natural conflict between the four True Gods and the ‘Elder Gods’ that fall into mad runaway states. That conflict is not limited to fights in the literal sense. It is a basic ‘mutual exclusion’ between their creations or retainers. Abyssal demons, as the ‘offspring’ of the Abyssal Lord, naturally have the traits of chaos and corruption. Dog is no exception to this. And for the God of Wisdom…”

Morris paused and looked at Shirley with a grave face: “Even if my Lord has no malice, His radiance would still naturally break Dog’s mind. The result would be…”

Morris did not finish. The others in the room all fell into their own thoughts for a moment. Then the AI, which had been resting with eyes closed on the enchanted sea chart table, suddenly jumped up. As if it had gone crazy, it flapped its wings hard and let out a sharp, bizarre cry: “KZZZRT TATATATATATA!”

After that one loud shout, it shot up into the air, then dropped back onto the table with a thump like a rock. It flapped and stood up again, then casually strolled a few steps as if nothing had happened. It came to Goathead's side, tilted its head, and said: "Wanna top up Q-coins?"

Everyone was startled by the pigeon spirit's strange and glitchy behavior, and no one understood what it was yelling about. Duncan's expression, however, changed slightly.

The next second, a sentence suddenly floated up in his mind: [Two incompatible operating systems sharing data would cause a fatal error.]

Along with a brief moment of sudden clarity and a head full of wild ideas, he slowly turned his head and looked at Dog.

"Could there be a data conflict between the Abyssal Lord and LH-02…" he muttered.

"Huh?" Dog did not react at first. "Captain, what did you say?"

"No, nothing." Duncan knew it would be hard to explain how much he had just connected in that instant. He only waved his hand, then looked at Shirley, who was still staring at him in confusion. In his mind, he tore apart and rebuilt his vocabulary several times before finally finding something to say: "Shirley, pulling Dog back might have been good for it. I mean, only 'might'. It may have kept Dog from being corrupted or swallowed by the will of God of Wisdom Rahm."

Shirley's mind turned quickly for a moment, and she seemed to finally understand what Duncan meant. The light returned to her eyes at once: "Ah, so… keeping my distance from that God of Wisdom is actually a good thing?"

What else could Duncan say? He could only nod.

The moment he nodded, Shirley's face lit up with joy: "Then from now on I have a reason not to do homework, right?! I have to pull Dog back!"

Duncan: "…?!"

He had never thought that this would be the first thing this young lady would think of.

But before he could say anything this time, Morris reacted first: "It is not that simple."

Shirley froze: "Huh?"

The old mister looked very serious: "My Lord does not grant divine blessing based only on knowledge level, and the other way around is also true. And from what I have seen these days, even if you did homework every day, it would not change how the God of Wisdom keeps you outside His door."

Shirley: "??"

Chapter 458: The Risk of gaze

According to Morris, the God of Wisdom's standards for granting a divine blessing seemed to be a very subtle thing.

"In most people's minds, a believer of the God of Wisdom has to be a well-learned grand scholar, or some eccentric genius with shocking talent in a certain field. That view is not exactly wrong. After all, most believers of the God of Wisdom do meet the two conditions of being 'learned' and 'brilliant'. But nothing is absolute."

Morris sat on a chair near the captain's cabin door. He ignored the subtle look on Shirley's face beside him as he explained seriously.

"First of all, being favored by the God of Wisdom does not always require a very high level of knowledge. Take Dog right now. Dog learns very fast, but compared to the properly trained believers who passed all three rounds of the Church exams, Dog's academic level is clearly not enough. Yet Dog still received Rahm's gaze. In other city-states, there were also many believers, and even Saints who later became famous, who received revelation long before they mastered any deep knowledge.

"The most notable example was Saint Coleford, a professor more than two hundred years ago. This grand scholar received revelation at the age of sixteen, when he was still a dock laborer who could not even read. Only after that revelation did he get the chance to touch the knowledge in books.

"There was also a case that was the complete opposite. In the city-state of Morka, there was a well-known scholar who spent his whole life trying to gain the favor of the God of Wisdom. He almost passed every exam at the Truth Academy, yet he never saw Rahm's radiance before he died. Later, the Truth Academy posthumously granted this scholar the honorary title of Saint. And cases like this are not unique."

Duncan rubbed his chin thoughtfully: "So it sounds like the God of Wisdom's 'admission standards' are a bit arbitrary?"

"I wouldn't say arbitrary. What I just mentioned counts as 'exceptions'. Otherwise, the Truth Academy would not use the unified exams as an effective first filter for believers," Morris said with a shake of his head. "We can only say that gods are simply impossible to fathom. Even the four True Gods are the same. They have their own standards for measuring the world, and mortals over tens of thousands of years have only managed to summarize a few of those rules by chance."

Duncan listened to Morris's serious explanation but did not speak. He sat there with a thoughtful look, holding his own opinion in his heart.

The old mister's earlier explanations and examples might have been fine, but his final "conclusion" still had room for debate.

Were the Gods' patterns of behavior really impossible to guess? During Rahm's gaze, were all those "exceptions" and even "absurd" cases truly random, or was there some other reason behind them?

Without noticing, that strange dark space surfaced again in his mind, along with the exchanges he had seen in the darkness.

That individual labeled "LH-02", who most likely was Rahm, the God of Wisdom, had said a few words at the end of that exchange that bothered him deeply.

If that information had really happened in real time, if LH-02 really was Rahm, and if everything was as Duncan suspected, then the so-called “Gods” in the mouths of mortal beings truly deserved deep thought.

Lost in thought, he lifted his eyelids without meaning to and looked at Dog.

Just as Morris had said, Dog had shown an amazing gift for learning, but Dog’s current “academic level” was still far from those grand scholars who were long famous in the Truth Academy. Yet this same Dog, who had only shaken off illiteracy not long ago, had received a direct gaze from Rahm, the God of Wisdom. It was an honor that tens of thousands of scholars in the Truth Academy would not even dare to dream of for their entire lives, though for Dog it did not seem to be a good thing.

So what exactly had attracted Rahm? Dog’s “talent”? Dog’s drive to learn? Or…

Was it because Dog was a mutated individual that belonged to a Abyssal Deep “cluster”? Because this Abyssal Hound had gained a “heart” and happened to match LH-02’s identification criteria?

Dog shrank back without meaning to. Duncan’s silent gaze made Dog’s whole body prickle. After holding back for a long time, Dog finally could not help speaking: “Captain, you…”

Duncan did not answer Dog. Instead, he turned and looked at Morris: “In your judgment, is it possible that one day Shirley might suddenly meet the God of Wisdom’s standards and be accepted by Rahm?”

Morris froze for a moment, then immediately shook his head. “That is absolutely impossible!”

“So sure?” Duncan asked with a very serious tone. “You just said Rahm’s standards are not that absolute. Sometimes even someone who cannot read can suddenly be chosen.”

“There are exceptions to the God of Wisdom’s standards, but at least there is one thing that has never gone wrong. Anyone who has been rejected once will not get a second chance. There are very few clear cases of being rejected by the God of Wisdom in history, but at least…"

Morris paused there and glanced at Shirley.

"At least when Dog was about to be 'taken away', Shirley was able to pull Dog back into the Mortal Realm by her own strength. That is already the clearest 'rejection' of a mortal by the God of Wisdom that I can imagine."

Duncan gave Shirley a complicated look. Shirley still seemed a bit confused. The young lady looked left and right, and only after a long pause did she finally ask: "So?"

"So you still have to do your homework," Duncan said without hesitation. "Don't even think about using 'shielding Dog from divine revelation' as an excuse to refuse to study."

"Ah…" Shirley's face fell at once. Her mind worked faster than usual this time. "You just said I am not cut out for studying. Even the God of Wisdom has clearly said he doesn't want this brain of mine…"

"More than ninety percent of the people in this world never even get the chance to enter the Truth Academy. Sixty percent only take the exams to get a diploma. And almost one hundred percent will never become Rahm's Saints or receive his gaze," Duncan said, gazing quietly into Shirley's eyes. His expression and tone were both serious. "Do you think I decided to teach you to read and write just so you could become a grand scholar like Morris?"

Shirley was startled by how serious Duncan looked. She opened her mouth a few times but did not manage to say anything. After a moment, she slowly lowered her eyes: "I…I know… I'm sorry, I was being stubborn…"

"It's fine. You are still a child in my eyes. Children are allowed to be stubborn," Duncan said with a gentle shake of his head. "Relax. I'm not scolding you. I was just thinking… what will happen to Dog in the future."

"Me?" Dog, who had been lying obediently to the side, lifted its head in confusion, as if it had not followed Duncan's train of thought. "What will happen to me in the future?"

Duncan looked into Dog's eyes: "Have you ever thought that you might receive Rahm's gaze a third time, or even a fourth?"

Dog froze, then finally reacted. Its "eyes" – Dog technically had no eyes – but its whole body clearly trembled.

"Th-then I can't read books anymore?" Its voice was tight with nerves.

"The God of Wisdom is not some 'shadow' that gets drawn over by books. As a deity, he has already noticed you," Morris answered from the side. The old scholar shook his head, his eyes heavy. "I cannot guess his will. But since he has taken an interest in you once, there is no guarantee he will not come looking for you again. That will be true even if you stop reading in the future. It might even…"

The old scholar stopped for a moment. His expression turned a bit strange, as if he was not sure whether he should describe his own deity this way. In the end, he still shook his head and went on: "You could even say that as long as you keep 'thinking', your mind will always remain within the God of Wisdom's sight. When he looks your way again depends only on his mood."

The red glow in Dog's eye sockets visibly quivered.

When Duncan heard Morris's words, some strange feelings rose in his heart. From this description, Rahm's "divine blessing" sounded almost like an eldritch god's curse.

But then he thought it over. From the point of view of a Abyssal demon, any divine blessing from a True God probably was not much different from an eldritch god’s curse.

This time, even Alice, who had been silent at the side, reacted. She suddenly spoke up: “Then won’t Dog be living in danger every single day from now on?”

“There is danger, yes. But as long as the link between Dog and Shirley stays, that danger might not be fatal,” Duncan said with a shake of his head. “From Dog’s description and my own… well, my own guesses, Rahm does not seem hostile. He may not even have realized that the ‘mind’ that just appeared in his sight belongs to a Abyssal demon. On that basis, he likely will not use a more ‘violent’ way to ‘take’ Dog.”

Hearing Duncan’s judgment, Dog could only lower its head. There was a hint of sorrow in its tone: “Sigh… I guess that’s the only way to think about it.”

“Take it easy. You and Shirley still carry my mark. Even if the worst happens and Shirley can’t hold on to you, I should still sense something,” Duncan said, comforting the anxious hound. “I have never tried it, but I don’t mind testing what it’s like to snatch a person… or a dog… out of a True God’s hands.”

“And I will definitely hold on to you!” Shirley added at once. She patted her chest and shook the symbiotic pact chain in her hand. “Dog, don’t worry. This brain of mine has been clearly rejected by the God of Wisdom! It will definitely work as your safety anchor!”

Dog had been about to be moved by Duncan’s words, but Shirley’s proud and confident tone caught it off guard. Dog could only raise its head and stare blankly at her: “That… that’s not really something to be proud of, is it?”

Shirley did not answer. She just kept grinning foolishly.

But her fingers gripping the chain clenched tighter and tighter.

Chapter 459: The Person in the Mirror

Shirley left with Dog, who was still a little uneasy. Vanna and Morris left as well. The captain's cabin grew quiet, leaving only Duncan, Alice, and the dozing pigeon.

Alice was wiping the furnishings and windows in the room. Duncan sat behind the desk, lost in long thought.

A creaking sound came from the desk. Goathead's skull slowly turned toward Duncan: "Are you still thinking about Rahm, the God of Wisdom?"

"Not the God of Wisdom – Gods," Duncan said. He leaned back in his chair, a thoughtful look on his face. "The Gods… what kind of connection do they really have with this world?"

"Who knows?" Goathead muttered. "The scriptures of each church paint them as the makers and protectors of mortal order. Many cultists believe the opposite. They say the Gods twisted the world and even stole the credit for the Genesis Protocol. The things Morris saw in that book, The Blasphemous Tome, offered another fresh explanation. The 'lost Elder Kings' it spoke of seem to be the deities we have now. Maybe all these views are wrong, or maybe each of them holds a part of the truth…"

Goathead rambled on, then shook his head again.

"But if you want my opinion, my view is… they don't seem very useful. They don't really make the world any better, and they haven't made it much worse either.”

“But for most ordinary people in this world, the protection of the Gods is real,” Duncan said casually. “That shelter let most mortals survive.”

“Yes. Survive. A way of preserving the status quo,” Goathead said slowly. “It was like Frostholm’s state over the past fifty years. Before the balance broke, no one knew how many shadows of disaster had piled up beneath it. But at least everyone was still alive.”

Duncan neither agreed nor disagreed with Goathead’s judgment. He only thought for a while before speaking again: “When Dog thinks, Dog enters Rahm’s sight. There are also many famous examples in history of people ‘blessed by the gods’. They all suddenly received a gaze in the middle of their daily lives and formed a link with the Four Gods. So can we see it this way? The Four Gods set up a kind of ‘monitoring’ or ‘scanning’ system over the beings in the mortal world. They sense certain special nodes to check the state of the Mortal Realm. Does that actually mean their interference with and sense of the present world are indirect and limited?”

“…Those True God churches won’t like the way you put that. It sounds like you are studying some kind of machine, with no reverence at all for the deities.”

“Reverence is the farthest thing from understanding. I don’t want to revere them. I just want to understand them,” Duncan said calmly. “After all, we have already helped them clean up two messes.”

…

Footsteps sounded in the long corridor of the great cathedral. Their steady echoes seemed to knock on the time piled up inside this ancient building.

Agatha, in a black dress, walked toward the depths of the sanctuary. She brought no attendants with her. Only her own shadow kept company with this body that had lost its life yet still moved. On both sides of the corridor, the light of gas lamps and candles crossed and mingled in the wall niches, making the shadow cast on the ground dim and unsteady.

Only after she returned to her own room and closed the door did this archbishop and gatekeeper, who had seemed calm and steady all the way, finally relax. She leaned back against the door and let out a long sigh.

She no longer needed to breathe, but a “sigh” was a sign of being human. She still used it as a symbol to help herself relax.

After all, she did not want to seem… too much like a corpse.

Order in the great cathedral had been restored. The smaller cathedrals across the city-state were also slowly getting back on track. The whole city was still tense, but after the Sea Mist Fleet stepped in, the chaos in each district, especially criminal cases, had been quickly contained.

On the other hand, the distribution of supplies and the work of handling the dead and survivors were still a tangled mess. Severe staff shortages still troubled every department. But after the Sea Mist Fleet entered the city, they had “miraculously” found a large group of professionals from every corner of the city-state. These people either had administrative skills or knew the city’s grassroots operations well, and they were placed into City Hall.

According to City Hall, the people “recommended” by the Sea Mist Fleet were learning and taking over each department’s work at an astonishing speed. In just a few more days, the problem of staff shortages everywhere would be greatly eased.

At the same time, the public opinion work needed for the fleet’s entry into the city, and the propaganda focused on General Tyrian Abnomar himself, were steadily moving forward. The reorganization and merging of the city-state's remaining navy with the Sea Mist Fleet had also begun.

The new governor had not yet held an official inauguration ritual, but the city had already fallen under his control at an amazing speed.

This was the kind of development the officials of Frostholm's authority had once only imagined in nightmares. But for the Frostholm of today, it was all a good thing.

Agatha could finally relax a little.

A corpse did not get tired, but her mind still needed a break.

After leaning against the door for a few minutes, Agatha shook her head, then slowly walked to her dressing table and sat down to rest.

Her figure appeared in the mirror above the dressing table.

The feeling of being watched made Agatha jerk her head up.

There was no one else in the room, and she did not sense any unfamiliar presence.

Yet the sense of being watched was definitely not an illusion.

The blind priest with her eyes covered lifted her head and carefully felt for any tiny movement around her, sensing the flow of every breath of air. Her "gaze" slowly swept over the room and then over the mirror on the dressing table.

In her sight, the lifeless furnishings in the room showed up as vague, dim outlines, giving off a chill like that of a grave.

But in the next second, the feeling of being watched vanished.

The figure in the mirror shifted its gaze.

Agatha in front of the dressing table suddenly froze. It was as if she had sensed something instead. After a brief hesitation, she slowly raised her arm and reached toward the mirror.

A cold, hard feeling met her fingers. It was a lifeless sheet of glass.

The figure in the mirror hesitated. After hesitating for who knew how long, she also raised her arm and slowly brought her fingers forward.

The feeling of fingertip touching fingertip came all at once, with a faint warmth between them.

In the next instant, new light and shadow appeared in Agatha's murky darkness of sight. In that lifeless mirror surface, a hazy outline that gave off a faint glow suddenly appeared.

The two of them faced each other quietly across the mirror. The room fell into a brief silence.

After a long time, the Agatha in front of the mirror finally broke the silence: "You're there?"

There was a trace of hesitation in her voice.

"Mm," a voice answered, as if it had slipped straight into her mind. "I'm here."

"When… did you appear?"

"The key," the voice in Agatha's mind said calmly. "I have been here since the moment you took that key."

Agatha did not speak for a while.

The feeling was… strange. She could clearly tell that the voice in her mind was her own voice. She could even feel the faint emotions that came with it when it spoke. Yet she also clearly knew that the one talking to her was another being. It was not a hallucination in her own mind, not a personality split off by madness, not some kind of “attachment” of herself.

Unbelievable.

“Unbelievable,” the her in the mirror said. “If I had to compare it to something, it feels a bit like a split personality. But it clearly isn’t…”

“Even the best psychiatrist probably couldn’t solve this one.”

“Let’s not give the psychiatrists in the city-state more trouble. They already have nothing but trouble these days.”

Agatha suddenly raised her hand and rubbed her brow.

Talking with “another self” like this was a feeling she had never had before. While they spoke, she kept having the illusion that she could no longer tell which one was the “real” her. There was no actual confusion in her mind yet, but she still could not help stopping to sort out her thoughts.

After a moment, she lifted her head again and “looked” at herself in the mirror.

“So that key… kept your soul? And then used it as a medium to send you into my…”

She trailed off there. She did not seem to know how to describe her current state.

The shadow in front of her… was it in her mind, in her senses, or… just a projection on some psychological level?

“I don’t know either,” the voice in her head answered. “I don’t know if I even have a soul. I don’t know the details of the process, and I don’t know how that key did all this. My consciousness was in a chaotic state for a long time, and I’ve only been awake for the past two days.”

Then the voice hesitated for a moment. A few seconds later, it went on: “From the looks of it now, that key should be able to store and move memories. But probably only the Queen of Frostholm knows all of its secrets.”

“The Queen of Frostholm…” Agatha muttered, almost to herself. “It seems we should tell the Captain about this…”

“…But in theory, we should first report to the Death Sanctuary headquarters,” the Agatha in the mirror reminded her.

The Agatha in front of the mirror paused at that. Her expression shifted a little before she spoke again, hesitating: “That… does sound right. But the Death Sanctuary is now cruising at the far edge of the civilized world. They may not have time to care about this kind of ‘personal matter’.”

She stopped there and lifted her head to look at the mirror.

“What do you think?”

The Agatha in the mirror thought for a moment.

Thoughts and memories flowed slowly between them. Understanding and emotion echoed on both sides of the mirror.

A faint green flame appeared in the eyes of the Agatha in the mirror.

“I also think we should tell the Captain. He is clearly very experienced when it comes to mirrors.”

Chapter 460: Secret Construction

A presence that was drawing closer suddenly cut off their current conversation.

Agatha pulled back the fingers that were touching the mirror at once: “Someone is coming. It is an Attendant.”

“I understand. I will not scare him,” the voice in the mirror spoke directly in her mind. “I am right beside you. When you look carefully, you will find me.”

Agatha nodded, but just before the “her” in the mirror left, she suddenly thought of something and spoke without thinking: “Are you… cold over there?”

“…Not anymore.”

The voice faded from her mind, and the feeling of being under a gaze also slowly vanished. The other Agatha reflected in the mirror returned to a normal mirror world – her eyes were covered with black cloth, she wore a priestess’s robe, and she stood quietly in front of the mirror.

Agatha hesitated for a moment. She reached toward the mirror again and touched only cold glass. It almost made her wonder if everything that had just happened was only an illusion.

Almost at the same time, she heard footsteps reach the door, followed by a soft knocking sound: “Archbishop, are you inside?”

The old subordinates in the Guardians still habitually called her “Gatekeeper”, while the clerical priests in the Cathedral had already started to address her as “Archbishop”.

Agatha smoothed her expression and turned around calmly: “I am here. Come in.”

The door opened. A high-ranking Attendant of the Cathedral in a gray short robe appeared in the doorway and bowed to Agatha: “Archbishop, an urgent message has come from City Hall. Please go to South Harbor at once – General Tyrian is already waiting for you there.”

“City Hall? Asking me to go to South Harbor?” Agatha frowned without thinking. The news felt unusual. “Did they say what it is about?”

“No. They only said it is an emergency and not fit to spread,” the high-ranking Attendant answered, sounding a little hesitant. “But… General Tyrian sent a word. He said, ‘The Master of Fire might be interested.’”

Agatha’s expression changed slightly at once.

“I understand. Prepare a car. I will leave immediately.”

Before long, Agatha was sitting in a steam car heading for South Harbor. In light of the message Tyrian had sent, she did not bring any attendants. She went alone.

On the way to the Harbor district, her mind was full of one guess after another.

What had happened that could make that “General Tyrian” react like this? In the last great battle, South Harbor had been occupied for a time by replica monsters. The cleanup was still going on even now… Had they found something in all that rubble? Was it a blasphemous sacred relic left behind by the Annihilators, or some suspicious “sample” that remained after the replica monsters faded away?

Either way, it still should not have made General Tyrian react like this.

With these messy thoughts that almost made her irritable, Agatha quickly passed through the streets that now looked empty and cold under martial law. She crossed checkpoint after checkpoint and finally reached the southern Harbor district, which was still under full lockdown.

soldiers of the city-state Guard Corps were holding every intersection. Heavily armed Church Guardians patrolled among the badly damaged buildings, inspecting them and marking areas of corruption that still needed to be dealt with. priests were collecting samples in those corrupted zones. Now and then she even saw Academy students in heavy protective gear moving between the ruins under the lead of their mentors – they were civil engineering students, here today to check the condition of key Harbor facilities and prepare for later repairs.

The car stopped in an open space at the edge of the cordoned-off area. Two soldiers led Agatha on foot through one busy “work site” after another, heading toward a rather remote direction inside the Harbor district.

In the end, they stopped in front of a large building that looked from the outside like a warehouse.

“We can only bring you this far,” one of the soldiers who had led the way turned back and said to Agatha with a hint of apology. “We do not know the details of what is going on below – the General will explain it to you.”

Below?

Agatha sharply caught that choice of word, but she did not ask anything. She only nodded lightly to the two soldiers in thanks and then walked toward the warehouse, which looked as if it had been sealed for a long time and still carried traces of war on its walls.

Guarding the warehouse door was not the city-state Guard Corps, but a squad of Undying sailors.

In Agatha's eyes, living people were warm, clear figures that gave off a faint glow. The Undying were hollow, pale bodies. A smoke that made one think of ashes rose within their blurred outlines. After she realized that this whole warehouse was guarded only by Undying, Agatha became even more certain that something very unusual was going on here.

Compared with the city-state Guard Corps, General Tyrian clearly trusted his Undying legion more.

"Lady," one of the Undying guarding the door came over. His upper body and lower body were already separated. Nearly a quarter of his torso was missing, and only a few ragged strips of cloth drifted between the two halves to hold them together. Over his upper body he wore a new coat that showed he was a Frostholm soldier, and on the sleeve of the coat he had an armband of the Queen's Guard Corps. This Undying sailor stood in front of Agatha and, despite his terrible appearance, gave a perfectly standard military salute: "Once you go in, someone will take you to the shaft lift. The General is already waiting for you in the underground facility."

Agatha nodded. By now she was certain that unless she reached the place herself, no one along the way would tell her what lay underground.

Inside the warehouse, she saw another squad of Undying sailors who had come to meet her. Under their guidance, she found a shaft lift hidden in a corner of the warehouse, as if it had been "dug out" from behind a pile of fake wall panels.

She stepped into the shaft lift, and the iron cage began to descend. It went down for several minutes before finally reaching an underground facility buried deep in the earth, a place that had never appeared in any official record.

She stepped out of the cage. In the dim, hazy sight of her special senses, she “saw” a wide hall. Patches of thick sludge left behind after the replica incursion faded still lay all around. Undying sailors were cleaning those things away, and a tall figure was standing at the far end of the hall, guarding a large door.

It was General Tyrian, the new governor of the city-state of Frostholm.

Agatha walked toward that figure.

“Oh, Lady Agatha, you are finally here,” Tyrian greeted her first. “I thought you would come the way the rumors say, riding a gust of wind straight from the upper central district…”

“I am used to traveling with the Ashen Wind, but I am not going to run here across half the city,” Agatha said casually. Then she raised her head and turned her sight toward the large door behind Tyrian. “What is going on here? Why is there such a facility under South Harbor?”

“You are surprised. Everyone is surprised,” Tyrian said, shaking his head. “This facility does not exist in any official record. If we had not been clearing the ruins here, we would never have found it. Guess what we discovered in this hidden large facility?”

“Do not keep me in suspense, General,” Agatha sighed. At the place where her eyes lay beneath the black cloth, a wisp of ghostly green flame flashed. “There are no outsiders here.”

Tyrian smiled, then his face turned serious at last. He stepped slightly to the side: “See for yourself. It is just behind this door.”

Agatha turned her “gaze” on the door.

She could still make out traces of blood on it, as well as bullet holes and dents left by fighting. Clearly, during the defense of Frostholm, there had also been a battle deep inside this unknown facility.

Now, both the intruders and the guardians had vanished from this battlefield.

She reached out, pressed her hand to the door, and pushed. The locking mechanism had already been broken. The heavy alloy doors slid open with a loud creaking sound. A larger space lit by gas lamps and electric lights appeared in Agatha's senses.

The salty, fishy smell of sea water rushed into her nose.

She stood at the entrance of the hall, staring in shock at the thing in her sight – a huge machine shaped like an oval egg, fixed between sturdy beams overhead.

Below the slanted side of the machine, at the end of a long chute, lay the source of the sea smell. It was clearly a waterway that led straight to the open ocean.

She stood there for a long time in astonished silence before finally breaking it: "This is…"

"It is a Deep Dive device, Lady," Tyrian let out a long breath. His tone carried a strange mix of emotions. "It was built from the blueprint of the last generation of Deep Dive devices and uses a lot of newer technology. It is much more advanced than the one we used back in the day."

Her thoughts were confirmed. Agatha could not help but draw in a breath. Then she suddenly turned her head: "Who built this?"

"Maybe Governor Winston, or maybe you also have to add several former governors," Tyrian said slowly. "We have found no detailed construction and approval records, so we cannot be sure who gave the first order to build it. From the few documents we did find, this facility was still running in secret at least up until two months ago."

Chapter 461: Convergence

Deep underground behind layer after layer of seals, a hidden facility that led straight to the sea, a vast project no one knew about, secrets buried under piles of truth and lies – half a century of concealment, hopes and dreams from the past, and fears and taboos that had stretched until today.

All of it now came together in front of Agatha, cast in cold metal and hanging in silence among beams that crossed like a skeleton, like frozen years that had somehow started to move again.

A Submersible, secretly built by the city-state's authority.

Agatha stood quietly before the huge, silent machine. Through the thick black cloth over her eyes, she used her gaze on this mass of steel. A silent pressure seemed to skip at the edge of her senses. After a long time, she finally spoke in a hoarse voice and broke the silence: "How did you find it?"

"There was a lot of luck involved," Tyrian said. "I believe that even among Governor Winston's trusted aides, only a handful knew about this. Most of them likely died in the final defense. But after I took over the work at City Hall, I noticed some… abnormal movements of money and personnel, and they all pointed toward a 'closed research project' here in the Harbor."

As he spoke, he turned his head and looked at the giant mass hanging between the steel beams.

"What came after is not very special. Since South Harbor had fallen completely, we decided to search the place from top to bottom," he went on.

“We found a suspicious warehouse, a suspicious shaft, a suspicious underground facility, and a suspicious Submersible.”

Tyrian sounded relaxed, almost light, as he told the story. Even as only a listener, Agatha could not help but admire the skill of this “Steel Vice Admiral”. He had taken over Frostholm and gotten a full picture of everything here so quickly. It was nothing like what a man who had stayed away from the city-state for half a century should be able to do.

A facility this secret could not be found by following a few random clues.

It was as if he had never left Frostholm at all.

“Can this machine still be used?” After a short silence, Agatha could not hold back the question.

“It needs to be checked,” Tyrian said with a shake of his head. “This Submersible was built from the blueprints the Queen of Frostholm left, but it also uses many modern and even current technologies. And there are lots of surface systems in this facility that support the Submersible – air pumps, steel cables, communication devices. We have to figure out their condition and how they work.

“The bad news is that the people who knew these technical details are probably all gone. They died in the defense of Frostholm. When we discovered this underground facility, it was locked from the inside. It seems the people down here were trying to lock those monsters in the quarantine chambers, but sadly… they had no idea how large that disaster really was.”

Tyrian shook his head lightly as he spoke.

“But there is also good news,” he raised his hand and pointed around. “The Submersible is intact. Everything in this hall is intact.”

Agatha did not answer. She only raised her head in silence and turned back toward the way she had come.

The heavy, slightly warped door stood there in her hazy sight. Blood on its surface faintly formed the shape of a handprint. The life in that blood had long since faded, but the outline still gave off a weak glow in her sight.

Tyrian's voice came from beside her, pulling her thoughts back: "Next, I will try to find people who knew about this secret project. Maybe not all the technical staff were inside this facility at the time. If we really cannot find a single surviving technician, then we can only let some old hands in the Sea Mist Fleet try their luck."

Agatha frowned in confusion: "Sea Mist Fleet?"

A faint smile appeared on Tyrian's face: "The ones who took part in the Abyssal Trench Project back then. They will be very surprised when they see this Submersible."

Agatha fell silent again.

Countless feelings rose and fell in her heart. She did not know whether she should sigh over history circling back, or be glad that somehow, everything seemed to be returning to where it should be.

Tyrian also became quiet. The Steel Vice Admiral slowly put away his smile, and his gaze, now solemn, swept slowly across the hall. At last, his eyes rested on the door that led back toward the shaft lift.

He nodded lightly, as if paying respect to these unknown acts of folly and bravery.

…

The sea breeze was gentle, and the white waves rolled.

The roaring power from the steam core pushed the ship forward. The cold wind from the sea drove the clutter from his mind. Lawrence stood on the high foredeck of the White Oak, wearing the captain's coat he had used for many years, staring out at the sea ahead.

But the old captain's heart was nothing like as calm as he appeared.

A gentle female voice came from the pocket mirror hanging on his chest: "Getting nervous?"

"This nervous feeling has not faded since we left Frostholm," Lawrence clicked his tongue. "After all, we are going to meet that ship on purpose. For a hundred years, captains on the Boundless Sea have only tried their best to run away from that ship, and here we are, sailing toward it on purpose. If the folks at the Explorers' Association heard about this, they would definitely think I have gone mad."

"There are not many captains on the Boundless Sea who are not mad. And you are about to become the brightest legend among these mad captains," Martha said with a laugh in her voice. "Isn't that a little motivating?"

Lawrence sighed: "You are saying that to a man about to be led to the gallows. You tell him that his noose is the best-looking rope in the world – you might even tie it in a bow for him. Do you think that would be comforting?"

Martha in the mirror opened her mouth, about to answer, when a hoarse, noisy voice suddenly came from the mast nearby: "Of course it would! As long as the noose works, you can tie me into a bow if you like!"

The corner of Lawrence's mouth twitched. He turned his head toward the sound.

At the top of the prow, a noose hung from the tall mast. Anomaly 077 had put its own neck through that noose and now dangled there, swinging back and forth with the motion of the ship. It looked eerie and wrong.

“Are you still not coming down?” Lawrence snapped, looking up at the mummified corpse hanging on the mast. “You have been hanging there all day.”

“What if it suddenly starts working? I think I already felt a little sleepy just now,” the mummified corpse shouted, still hanging from the rope. “Let me hang there a bit longer – you already agreed I could choose where I sleep.”

“…I did agree that you could choose where to rest as long as you did not disturb others. But at the time, you did not say you would hang yourself from the mast,” Lawrence glared. “You should give it up. Your sealing method has clearly failed. Going with me to report to the Vanished is your only choice.”

The corpse hanging from the mast let out an exaggerated wail, but Lawrence had no mood to bother with it anymore. He lowered his head again and spoke to the pocket mirror at his chest: “Do you think it will go smoothly?”

“Why are you asking me?”

“Your instincts are always sharp. Back in the day, you were the one who chose the date of every departure.”

“…You even remember that…” Martha’s voice held a sigh, then she gave a small laugh. “Stop worrying so much. You have already accepted your new identity as a member of the Vanished Fleet, haven’t you? And this is not your first time meeting that ship.”

“That is true, but I am still nervous,” Lawrence sighed and straightened his collar without thinking. “Besides, my last meeting with that ship is not worth remembering at all. That scene would be a nightmare for any captain.”

“Look at it this way: at least this time the Vanished will not sail straight toward you and ram you aga—”

A harsh creaking sound suddenly broke in, making Lawrence’s teeth hurt.

In the next second, Lawrence saw layers of ghostly green flame appear out of thin air around the White Oak. At the same time came the deafening roar of the engines and a violent lurch as the helm suddenly turned.

In the blink of an eye, the once calm sea changed completely. On the blue surface, countless terrifying black shadows rose up like strands of hair. The sunlight in the sky dimmed and turned unreal. Thick clouds and mist fell from above like a collapsing curtain, and the whole sea was stained black by those “hair-like” corruptions.

The mummified corpse hanging from the mast almost started screaming at once.

In the corpse’s shrill screams and the sailors’ shouts, Lawrence realized that the White Oak had been dragged into the Spirit Realm by some powerful force. With a heart-shaking roar and a sudden rise of waves ahead, a towering ship burning with fierce flames burst out of the dense fog!

The Vanished had appeared.

Like a burning cliff, it came crashing down toward them, filling the sky.

Anomaly 077’s screams almost shook the whole sea: “It’s going to hit us, it’s going to hit us! Damn it, it really is going to hit us again! I’m done! I want to go home! Let me down! I want to go home! Aaaah—”

Then, right in the middle of the corpse’s shrill cry and the sailors’ panic, the bow of the Vanished suddenly stopped.

It stopped less than half a meter from the starboard bow of the White Oak, in a way that made no sense at all.

Lawrence stood there at the prow, stunned. After a long moment, his eyes finally moved. He slowly tilted his head back and looked up at the ghost ship towering above him in the blazing flames.

The nightmare scene in his memory overlapped with reality in the Mortal Realm. He had once again come to this position and once again saw this doomsday view.

The Vanished had come.

A tall figure appeared in his sight. Duncan Abnomar, the eternal Master of the Vanished, stood high at the ship’s rail, looking down at them.

This was the second time Lawrence had faced this legendary being.

Then he heard Duncan speak. The deep voice rolled like solemn thunder across the sea:

“Lawrence, what in the world is all that racket on your ship?”

Chapter 462: The First Step to a Good Relationship

A spinning gate of blazing fire suddenly expanded over the deck. Then the Master of the Vanisheds Fleet stepped out from the gate.

He was tall and imposing, wrapped in spirit flame, his eyes blazing. His very existence seemed like fear given form upon the Boundless Sea. Wherever his gaze fell, it felt as if all the fires in the mortal world were stirred.

Behind that tall figure came another person: a graceful woman in a dark purple dress, with silver hair down to her waist and a beautiful face, though her skin looked a little pale. She followed closely behind Captain Duncan, her bearing mysterious and elegant, like an attendant.

Lawrence felt his heart pound and his nerves stretch to the limit. He saw Duncan walk toward him, and with every step the captain took, the stubborn spirit form flames on Lawrence's own body burned a little brighter. Only when Duncan finally stopped on the deck did Lawrence come back to himself and lower his head: "Captain."

"Your ship is nice." Duncan said it offhandedly, then looked up and swept his gaze over the exploration ship he had once met only briefly, and whose fate had been tangled with his ever since. At the same time, a faint sense of novelty rose in his heart. Strictly speaking, this was the first time his true body had ever left the Vanished and boarded another ship.

Before stepping onto the White Oak, he had worried that leaving the Vanished might trigger some unforeseeable change. After all, walking through the city-states in an avatar form and letting his true body leave the ship were two very different things. But now it seemed that, at least while he moved within the Vanisheds Fleet, the Vanished did not have any trouble because of his absence.

Lawrence felt a strange mix of emotions. He could not tell whether Captain Duncan's words counted as praise or not. He could only keep his head down in embarrassment: "Uh, as long as you like it…"

"Don't be so nervous. This isn't our first meeting," Duncan said with a smile. Lawrence's reaction was exactly what he expected. He had seen it many times. "Relax. Pretend you're just meeting an ordinary senior from the Explorer Association."

As he spoke, his gaze moved over Lawrence's uniform. At the man's collar he saw the badge of the Explorer Association.

Duncan nodded slightly and added: "Many years ago, I was an Explorer too. Sadly, my badge was lost in Subspace."

Lawrence froze for a moment and then lifted his head, a little hesitant. His taut nerves eased a bit, and his sluggish thoughts finally started working again. He suddenly realized that this terrifying "Subspace Shadow" was telling the truth. A hundred years ago… Duncan Abnomar had indeed been a member of the Explorer Association, and even one of the most famous Explorers of that era.

Strictly speaking, the Explorer Association had not even removed this ghost captain from their rolls yet—because no one had ever thought to file the paperwork to deregister a Subspace Shadow…

Duncan did not care about Lawrence's reaction or the conflict on his face. Once he saw that Lawrence had relaxed a little, he casually chatted in a tone like small talk: "Was the trip here smooth?"

"Uh… smooth," Lawrence answered honestly, trying his best to act normal. "We set off from Frostholm's East Harbor and passed through the blockade line the Sea Mist Fleet set on the outer sea. They guided us through…"

"Mm. I told Tyrian, so the Sea Mist Fleet wouldn't trouble you," Duncan said with a nod. Then he looked up at the nearby flagpole. "Is that Anomaly 077 hanging up there?"

"Y-yes."

"What did he do wrong? Why is he hanging from the flagpole?"

Lawrence: "…"

He hesitated for several seconds before twitching the corner of his mouth: "He asked to be hung there himself. He wanted to use this to return to a sealed state, but it doesn't seem to be working very well."

"…Why are all the humanoid Anomalies I meet so strange?" Duncan muttered. He turned his head to glance at Alice, who followed behind him looking graceful and proper but in fact was off in her own world. Then he pointed at the mummified corpse hanging in midair: "Come down."

As soon as he finished speaking, the mummified corpse that had been playing dead a moment ago shook once, fell onto the deck with a bang, then tumbled and scrambled to Duncan's feet. He shook all over like Frankenstein touching electricity for the first time: "C-captain, S-Sailor r-reporting to you!"

Duncan frowned: "Are you a stutterer?"

"I-I am Sailor…"

Seeing his reaction, Duncan actually found it funny. He had not expected a sapient Anomaly ranked in the top hundred to fear Captain Duncan this much. Then Duncan turned his head in puzzlement to look back at Alice behind him.

They were both top-hundred Anomalies with minds like humans. So why did this Doll not know fear? Back then, she had only been nervous for a moment on the Vanished, then quickly adapted to the ship. Now she could even bicker with the pots and pans on board.

Alice noticed the captain's gaze and answered at once with a bright, almost solidly stupid smile.

Duncan: "…"

He suddenly felt that Alice might not have adapted quickly at all. She was just slow to react. She had probably been scared at first and then simply forgotten about being afraid…

At the same time, Alice also noticed the mummified corpse standing opposite her and shivering. She thought very hard, as if finally recalling what the captain had told her before they left. Her face lit with a smile and she greeted him first: "Hello, my name is Alice. I heard you're an Anomaly too?"

The mummified corpse froze for a moment and looked her up and down in confusion. The "elegant lady" before him looked no different from an ordinary person, yet every tiny movement felt oddly off. "You are too?"

"Yes!" Alice said happily. "My number is 099."

Sailor scratched his head awkwardly. This was probably also his first time dealing with another runaway state Anomaly like this. "Uh… I'm 077."

Alice thought for a bit and looked proud: "Then my number is bigger than yours!"

Duncan finally could not hold back: “Anomaly numbers go in order from the front. 077 comes before you.”

Alice processed that for a moment and, like a sacred miracle, actually caught up: “Ah… so that means he’s stronger than me?”

“Not necessarily. Anomalies ranked in the top hundred are all extremely bizarre. You usually can’t judge strength by numbers alone. Their dangers show up under different conditions,” Duncan explained patiently. “At sea, he should be stronger than you. On land, you are stronger than him…”

Alice did not know how much of that she understood. She only curiously watched the Sailor in front of her, then suddenly reached out and grabbed at the air.

The mummified corpse froze in place at once, as if even his soul—if he had one—had been instantly locked. Then all his joints and skin started to rapidly shift toward a Puppet-like transformation.

Alice abruptly let go.

Sailor staggered back a few steps and stared at the Doll in horror: “Wh-what the hell?”

“Not strong,” Alice shook her head. “You don’t even know how to protect your own strings.”

“Don’t go grabbing other people’s ‘strings’ without permission. Did you forget?” Duncan said sharply at once. Then he frowned. “Wait, you’re saying Anomaly 077 has strings too?”

“Yes. There are several drifting off him,” Alice said as if it were obvious. “But his strings are a little odd. An ordinary person’s strings float up high into the sky and then slowly fade. His strings float out and then curl back into his body, like they’re forming a loop…”

Duncan frowned and looked Sailor up and down, still shaken there in front of him. Then a faint green flame flashed in Alice's eyes beside him.

The next second, Duncan also saw Anomaly 077's strings—almost transparent white threads extending from the mummified corpse's skull and joints, swaying in the empty air around him and then folding back into his body.

There really were strings.

Did all sapient humanoid Anomalies have strings like this? Or was this unique to Anomaly 077? And what was going on with these strings that looped through themselves instead of rising away like an ordinary person's?

Questions flashed through Duncan's mind, but he quickly put them aside for now. He looked at Sailor and apologized seriously: "Sorry. Alice is not very sensible. She meant no harm. She just wanted to say hello."

"No, no, don't apologize!" The mummified corpse almost jumped on the spot. He hurriedly waved his hands and backed away. "I'm fine, I just got startled… Alice, right? Got it. I'll just keep my distance from her from now on…"

As he spoke, he muttered under his breath, things like "no wonder she works on the flagship" and "of course the boss's people are stronger," loud enough that even Lawrence could hear him.

Lawrence blinked and watched from the side. He had no idea what had just happened. He only felt that the two Anomalies had "communicated" somehow and that Sailor had gotten scared again. Then something occurred to him. His gaze turned odd as it fell on the beautiful lady with the elegant air. "Wait, Anomaly 099… Captain, so this is…"

"The very 'coffin' you were escorting on your ship back then," Duncan said with a smile, lifting his hand to introduce her. "But now the coffin has already been assimilated by the Vanished. The Doll that was inside has been in a long-term runaway state, just like the Sailor next to you.”

When Alice heard that, she stepped forward at once and chattered to Duncan: “Captain, Captain, I’m not in a runaway state. I’m usually very obedient…”

“Right, right, I’m not in a runaway state either,” the mummified corpse added quickly. “I usually follow orders very well. When Captain Lawrence told me to go ashore and fight those cultists to the death, I didn’t even hesitate…”

Lawrence listened in a daze. He looked up at the Sailor trying so hard to show himself off, then at the beautiful and elegant but apparently not quite right?in?the?head “Miss from the coffin” opposite him. At last his gaze landed on Captain Duncan.

Suddenly, the pressure and tension that had been hanging over him for so long faded away. Lawrence strangely felt that he and this ghost captain before him were much closer. He even felt a kind of fellow?sufferer sympathy rise up.

It was the sympathy between two captains on the Boundless Sea who both had to take care of a runaway state Anomaly with a hole in the head…

Chapter 463: The Hybrid

Duncan strolled to the edge of the White Oak's deck and leaned out to look at the sea below.

At this moment, both the White Oak and the Vanished had withdrawn from Spirit Realm state. On the calm, blue normal sea, the water around the White Oak was clear as a mirror. The Black Oak, shrouded in fog and darkness, was reflected there like a shadow. In the dim blur of that ship's silhouette, faint lights seemed to glow.

After a long time, Duncan pulled his gaze back from the sea and spoke softly with a sigh: "An interesting phenomenon. Lawrence, you went through an incredible adventure."

"It really was… incredible," Lawrence answered respectfully and carefully from the side. "I've made a living on this sea for decades and seen many unbelievable things. But what happened at Frostholm still went far beyond all of that. No matter what though, I brought Martha back. That makes every risk worth it."

"Your wife, Martha—what state is she in now? And how exactly are these two ships you each control connected to one another?"

"She and her Black Oak are now like the shadow of the White Oak," Lawrence answered honestly. "As you can see, she is on that reflected ship. But when needed, the Black Oak can also enter the Mortal Realm as a phantom and sail alongside the White Oak, or we can perform a light?and? shadow Inversion between the two ships. In that state, we can sail deep into the Spirit Realm and avoid obstacles in the Mortal Realm. We did that once when we crossed the war zone around Frostholm. It worked very well."

"Your wife told you all this? I mean these… techniques."

"Yes." Lawrence nodded. "Martha wandered in the mirror world spaces under the sea outside Frostholm for more than ten years. She knows many things. During our last operations, she basically served as our guide."

Duncan said nothing for a while and just watched the reflection below. After a long time, he suddenly broke the silence: "May I speak with her alone?"

Lawrence was taken aback. Surprise flickered across his face, followed at once by tension and hesitation: "This… may I ask what you…"

"Relax. I simply need to understand each of my subordinates. The Black Oak is indeed strange, but on this sea no ship is more bizarre than the Vanished. I am very tolerant in this area—as long as the Black Oak has no secrets from me."

Only then did Lawrence breathe a little easier. Though still hesitant, he nodded: "All right. I'll make arrangements and let Martha know."

Duncan gave a slight nod, then turned his head to look a short distance away.

Alice and Sailor were squatting on the deck over there. The two of them were cheerfully poking at a little bug they had caught from who knew where with small sticks. As they poked, they argued heatedly over whether the bug had a soul or not—

Alice thought it did not, because she could not see any strings on the bug. Sailor insisted that it did, because he had heard that Bartok's garden also had bugs. He even believed there were tiny Gatekeepers the size of bugs whose special job every summer was to carry the souls of dead mosquitoes from the mortal world to the place of rest, so they could bite people who were buried in June and July…

The two of them kept bluffing each other into stunned silence.

The scene looked like two complete fools at play.

Just watching them for too long made your brain feel like it was under corruption.

Duncan quietly watched the undisturbed scene on the deck. Lawrence watched in silence beside him as well. After a long time, Duncan shook his head: “Let them play.”

“I think so too. It’s better than him hanging from the flagpole and wailing like a ghost,” Lawrence said.

…

Soon, Lawrence had his crew prepare a quiet room on the White Oak and set up a large mirror inside.

After all unrelated people left, Duncan turned around and fixed his gaze quietly on the man?tall mirror.

“I want to talk to you.” He spoke to the mirror.

The next second, the surface turned pitch black, as if thick inky liquid had suddenly flooded across it. In the depths of that darkness, a mass of swelling and shrinking Shadows slowly took shape.

A lady in a white shirt, brown vest, and long trousers stepped out of the swelling Shadows.

“Lawrence told me. You wish to speak with me alone,” the lady said as she came to the front of the mirror, answering Duncan’s gaze calmly. “It seems… you noticed.”

“Too many impurities. The overlapping shadows hide the details that do not belong to the Black Oak, but that isn’t enough to fool my flames,” Duncan said slowly. He reached out, pulled a chair over, and sat down, looking at the figure in the mirror—and at the vast darkness behind her, tangled and intricate like some illusory Veil. “How much of you is ‘Martha’?”

“…Less than one part in a thousand.”

“One in a thousand. A very small number,” Duncan said, his gaze fixed on her. The vast, chaotic “hybrid” behind her met that gaze without flinching. “Even so, you still call yourself Martha. And it looks like… you truly identify with that name.”

“Because ‘Martha’ is the only complete personality among them,” the “female adventurer” in the mirror answered. “Without a personality to support them, memories are pale pages. Flipping through them is not enough to form a ‘self’. The vast, muddled memories have been reassembled blindly and chaotically countless times. In the end, I judged that ‘Martha’ was the only ‘representative’ that could manage all of this. I need to become Martha. Martha needs to exist.”

“So you are a hybrid. And what you’ve mixed together is far more than you told Lawrence. A considerable part of the minds that fell into that sea in the past fifty years have flowed into your ‘body’. Or to put it another way… you devoured those minds?”

“Devoured… that is a very aggressive word, but I don’t see it that way. I have never devoured anything, and I am not interested in souls. It is the great power deep in that mirror world space that devours everything. The ‘memories’ that make me up are only the scraps left after that power crushed them. Tiny tributaries flow together, like motes of dust gathering into a clump. I did not exist before those fragments. Those fragments gathered to form me—Martha—only a Ghost who woke up from the shards and belatedly took on the role of collector of the dead."

"Scraps left after being crushed…" Duncan frowned. "Why was Martha not crushed?"

"Because Lawrence came to these waters," the female adventurer in the mirror said, a faint smile on her face. "He is under your blessing. So Martha is under your blessing too."

Duncan did not reply. He fell into a long silence. After quite a while, he broke it, thoughtful: "The world in the mirror is discontinuous…"

"Yes. The world in the mirror is discontinuous. Space is not continuous, and time is not continuous either. The ending is born before the beginning. You created Martha, and now Martha is answering your questions."

Duncan let out a slow breath.

"A vast data hybrid… that explains why you know so much," he said, bringing the topic back. "It is not only because you wandered that mirror world space long enough, but because you hold enough 'memories' inside you. So back to the first question. Is less than one thousandth of 'Martha' really enough to support a stable personality and let you keep your current sense of self forever? Will there come a day when this 'collector' personality is drowned in that ocean of memories? Will you forget your own name and become a chaotic, vast, dangerous Restless Soul?"

The adventurer lifted her eyes. Behind her calm expression, she seemed to gather great courage: "Like you once were?"

"No. I went farther than you did. Subspace is far deeper and darker than the mirror world world. So I was also more dangerous back then than you are now," Duncan said. He did not mind her bold words and kept his usual calm tone. "That is why I understand very well how much harm a runaway state Restless Soul can cause—even if this Restless Soul is a bit ‘safer’ than I was.”

The adventurer in the mirror fell silent for a moment.

After a long time, she suddenly spoke: “Do you think I can be counted as ‘Martha’ now?”

Duncan thought for several seconds.

To this vast, tangled hybrid, Martha was only one thousandth of it. But to the personality that called itself “Martha”, everything within the hybrid was her one hundred percent.

Who this huge hybrid really was and what state its future personality would settle into seemed completely “undecided”. There was a chance it would go into a runaway state, but its current personality and sense of self were also clearly real.

Duncan hesitated for a moment. As that hesitation rose, a scene that felt half real and half dreamlike suddenly surfaced in his mind—

The sea breeze was gentle, and the waves were calm.

He stood on the water. Blue waves spread out under his feet.

Fish leaped from the sea. In the bright sunlight, the fish swam through the air around him, circling at ease.

He lowered his head and looked down at his feet.

The rippling surface looked clear and transparent, yet its depths seemed veiled in mist, blurred and impossible to see through.

New things leaped from the water and swam around him.

They were fish.

Duncan woke with a start and looked at the mirror before him.

The Shadows in the mirror swelled and writhed as if waiting for an answer.

“…Lady Martha,” Duncan finally broke the silence after a long time. “Welcome to the Vanisheds Fleet.”

The formless darkness full of confusion and chaos, that mass without any clear outline, suddenly contracted. It once again became the female adventurer in a white shirt, brown vest, and long trousers.

The tangled Shadows behind her had calmed.

At the same time, on the White Oak’s deck, Lawrence, who had been acting like a temporary guardian while he watched Doll Alice and the mummified corpse Sailor poke at the bug, also looked down at his own body in confusion.

Those uncontrolled green flames that kept rising and spreading were rapidly drawing back. The body that had been stuck in Ghost form for three days straight was quickly recovering. In his senses, the Ghost fire that had been flaring up now and then for no reason seemed, for the first time, to truly become calm and turn into a part of his body he could control.

It was as if some “source of stimulus” that kept passively triggering his spirit form flames had suddenly vanished.

“…Under control?”

Lawrence blinked and muttered to himself in puzzlement.

Chapter 464: The Future of the White Oak

In Duncan’s eyes, the tangled, chaotic black shadows had once again “collapsed” into that valiant female adventurer. Deep in the mirror, the layered silhouettes no longer trembled in disorder.

Duncan watched the scene with his gaze and stayed silent for a long time.

Inside the mirror, once Martha had reformed, she stayed frozen for a moment, like a film stuck right before it officially started. After two or three seconds, a lively, human light returned to her face. She lowered her head in confusion to look at herself, then belatedly raised her head: “What… did you do?”

Duncan pulled himself out of his thoughts and shook his head lightly: “Nothing. Just welcoming you.”

He paused, sorted out his thoughts a little, then spoke: “If you are going to stay ‘Martha’ from now on, do you still plan to tell Lawrence the truth?”

“He might… already know,” Martha hesitated, then slowly said: “I once hinted at a few things with him. I told him I was built with Martha as the base and pieced together from his memories. With Lawrence’s sharp mind and his experience in the supernatural field, plus all the information I let slip that went far beyond what was needed, it shouldn’t be hard for him to guess that since ‘Martha’ can hold one set of memories, she can hold countless sets. After all…”

The female adventurer paused, a complicated smile on her face: “After all, back in that city of mirror world, I looked like I knew far too much.”

“What was his reaction?”

“He… didn’t care,” Martha shook her head. “But I don’t know if he will always not care.”

Duncan watched her quietly for a while, then suddenly laughed.

“You worry about these things. That means I really don’t need to,” he said in a relaxed tone. “So let’s set it aside, Lady. Out here on this vast sea, dark and uncanny things are countless, so every bit of warmth is worth treasuring all the more. Lawrence understands that very well.”

In the mirror, the female adventurer looked thoughtful. Outside the mirror, Duncan paused briefly, then went on: “About the Deep Sea beneath Frostholm, what else do you know?”

“The Deep Sea…” Martha frowned. She drew in her drifting thoughts, sorted through her vast store of memories, and spoke slowly: “I do have some… ‘memories’ that point to the Deep Sea, but most of them were dark and blurry, mixed with the fear of sinking without end and absurd hallucinations born in cold suffocation. These things probably can’t be used as solid reference. But…”

Duncan raised an eyebrow: “But?”

In the mirror, Martha thought for a moment, then spread her hands.

Her figure suddenly faded in the mirror, like ink bleeding in water. Black lines spread quickly across the surface. In that spreading darkness, hazy shapes began to appear.

A vast stretch of shadows floated in endless void, like a lonely island, like an irregular, jagged mass. Around that island of shadows drifted countless tiny things, like fragments broken off from its surface, circling and orbiting it like debris.

In the center of that floating “island”, there seemed to be some huge pillar-like thing. In the dark, it extended upward and downward without end, as if it pierced straight through the shadows, then pierced through the whole void.

Martha’s voice came from deep within the mirror:

“I ran through all the memories that point to the Deep Sea. The great terror that countless devoured minds felt as they sank was stacked together into this scene. I don’t know how to interpret it. It looks like a large floating object in the Deep Sea, pierced through by a giant ‘pillar’. But without anything to compare it to, I don’t know how big that thing is, or how big that pillar is.”

Duncan stared for a long time with his gaze at the image in the mirror and did not speak.

In his mind rose all kinds of information about the Abyssal Trench Project —the submersibles that never came back, the Deep Dive vanguard teams that went mad, the insane reports of the trench beneath the sea, and the great Hollow deep inside the Boiling Gold mine, along with that tentacle of the Elder Gods that crossed the boundary between real and unreal and stabbed deep into the city-state of Frostholm.

There really was an entity in the Deep Sea.

The illusion in the mirror faded, and Martha’s figure appeared before Duncan again: “That’s all I know. I keep many memories, but very few of them point toward the Deep Sea while I am still relatively clear-headed. You…”

“It’s all right, Lady,” Duncan said softly, cutting off the female adventurer. “I will go see it for myself.”

…

On the deck, Alice and the mummified corpse “sailor” had already found a second little bug. The two “people” were still poking at it.

But this game clearly was not as fun as fighting with the pots and pans in the kitchen.

“I’m starting to feel bored,” Alice threw away the little stick in her hand and looked up at the deck, which still felt quite unfamiliar to her. “Why isn’t the captain back yet…”

The “sailor” clearly shivered when he heard the doll Miss mention the word “captain”. He lifted his head, opened his mouth, hesitated for a long time, and finally spoke: “When you usually stay with him… you’re not scared?”

“Not scared at all,” Alice turned her head and looked at the ugly mummified corpse with a puzzled face. “I like being with the captain. Why would I be scared of him?”

“That’s Subspace! Do you understand Subspace?” The mummified corpse’s expression was full of horror. “Just looking at him once, I feel like my sanity is going to ‘fall’ off. And you dare cling to him all day. I think you’re the one who should be numbered 077. You’re way more freakish than me.”

Alice scratched her hair, did not bother with the mummified corpse, and instead looked curiously toward Lawrence in the distance.

Lawrence was standing with his first mate, Gus.

“Suddenly, everyone can control the flames on their bodies,” First Mate Gus opened his palm and showed his captain a small, quietly dancing flame. Where the flame touched his skin, his flesh had turned faintly transparent, like a spirit form. Outside the flame's edge, it was still normal flesh and blood. "Do you have any idea why?"

"I'm not sure either," Lawrence frowned a little. He snapped his fingers and watched a spirit flame jump at his fingertip. Then he waved his hand, and the flame went out without a sound. "The change started not long after Captain Duncan boarded… so it might be connected to him."

"Maybe… but either way, it's a good thing," First Mate Gus said. "Before, the flames on us would pop out of nowhere, like something had set them off, and we never found the cause. Honestly, it kept everyone on edge. Some people even worried that we might never be able to act normally on land again. After all, not every city has seen as much as Frostholm and Pland…"

"The future…" Lawrence's voice held a hint of emotion and thought. He unconsciously clenched his fist and opened it again, feeling the Power of Flame flow calmly in his body while he thought about his own future and that of the whole crew of the White Oak. "It really is time to think about the future…"

He lowered his head and rubbed his fingers together. spirit flame flowed like water between his fingertips.

A deep, stern voice came from behind him: "Having fun?"

Lawrence and Gus both shivered on the spot. Flames shot two or three meters high from their bodies…

A second later, Lawrence hurried to press down the flames on himself and turned toward the sound. Duncan was standing there, looking at them with a strange expression.

Duncan let out a quiet sigh.

The moment he came out, he saw Anomaly 077 and Anomaly 099 squatting on the deck poking bugs. Then he saw the captain and first mate of his new subordinate ship playing with fire in the doorway. If you knew this was the Vanished Fleet, fine. If you didn't, you would think this ship was heading for a kindergarten… Just what kind of people had gathered around him?

"C-Captain Duncan!" Gus snapped to attention at once. While slapping away the last sparks on his coat, he spoke in a panic: "We… we were studying how to control the Power of Flame, to stop anything like what happened in Frostholm from happening again…"

"The same kind of thing? You mean a captain leading a whole marine squad and getting arrested by the local constable, and then I had to send my envoy to the security bureau to bail them out?" Duncan pressed his fingers to his temple and waved his hand. "Forget it. As long as you're happy…"

As he spoke, Alice had already run over. She grabbed his arm and shook it hard while shouting: "Captain! You finally came back! You finished your work?"

"It's finished, it's finished—stop shaking, or you'll yank one of your joints off again," Duncan said as he held down the overexcited doll Miss. Then his gaze fell on Lawrence, and he nodded lightly. "Don't worry. Martha is doing very well. I have officially accepted her as a member of the Vanished Fleet."

Lawrence froze for a moment, then sensed the weight and deeper meaning in Duncan's words.

"You… saw that she actually…"

"You don't want to care, and she doesn't need to care. As for me… I don't mind," there was a faint smile in Duncan's eyes as he said calmly: "The Boundless Sea is very wide. The Vanished Fleet has always dealt with all kinds of strange things. One more harmless ghost ship is nothing.”

Lawrence opened his mouth but could not say anything. In the end, he just drew in a slow breath and bowed deeply in front of Duncan.

“In any case, welcome to my fleet,” Duncan laughed and patted Lawrence’s shoulder. “Speaking of that, I think I heard you talking about… the future just now? Do you have any plans?”

“The future…” Lawrence hesitated, a complicated look on his face. “I really have been thinking about it. Do you think… we can still return to a normal harbor like before?”

Hearing the hesitation and struggle in Lawrence’s voice, Duncan sighed softly.

The future of the White Oak… really was a problem.

—

Chapter 465: A Pass?

The future of every crew member of the White Oak.

This problem, which everyone had always avoided, had finally been laid on the table.

There was no wall in the world that never leaked wind, and Frostholm was not a city-state sealed off from the outside world. The anomalous changes of the White Oak itself—especially its reflection on the surface of the sea—could not possibly stay hidden from other captains and from the harbor's eyes.

Even without that most special identity of "member of the Vanished Fleet", the ship was already a "ghost ship" wrapped in supernatural power and stuck in a strange state.

The city-states had always used the strictest safety standards for ships and crews that entered the Boundless Sea. A ship that went missing for just a short time at sea had to go through extremely strict quarantine and inspection when it returned. Even a small anomaly could get it refused at the harbor gate. There was no need to even mention a ship that had already turned into an "supernatural object".

It was likely that, besides Pland and Frostholm, no other city-state would dare accept the White Oak as it was now.

What was more, the Master of the Vanished might not even allow his own "servants" to leave the fleet and continue acting freely in the civilized world. On that basis, what kind of future could the White Oak and her crew have?

To live side by side with anomalies, to survive in Visions, far from the civilized world, wandering in the depths of mists, storms, strange realms, and eerie sea zones. By day, to sweep across the sea like ghosts; by night, to sink into the cracks of Subspace. After all, that was how the books described the Vanished.

Lawrence looked deeply worried. Even after drifting on the Boundless Sea for most of his life, he still did not seem ready for such a change.

After all, he was not “Captain Duncan”, who had long left the civilized world behind, nor was he like Tyrian, a pirate lord who ruled a sea region with a whole fleet. He had a ship full of seafarers, and each of them had their own family and friends. They all had families to support.

If he left the legal routes on the Boundless Sea, he had no idea how he was supposed to feed his sailors, let alone how he would face their loved ones. After all, the Vanished Fleet did not seem to have things like “wages”, much less any proper employee care system…

After a short moment of thought, Duncan broke the silence: “Honestly, even without your ties to the Vanished Fleet, and without the distorted reflection from the Black Oak, your business would not have gone that well in the future anyway…”

Lawrence did not react at first: “Huh? Why do you say that?”

Duncan spread his hands: “Think about Anomaly 099 before, and then think about Anomaly 077 now…”

Lawrence’s face stiffened at once. After holding it in for a long time, he finally managed to squeeze out a sentence with an odd expression: “Occasional cargo loss is an unavoidable risk. The White Oak carries high-premium insurance, enough to cover the employer's losses and any later liquidated damages…"

"Marine insurers now dare to cover even that?" Duncan raised his eyebrows. "Then you really don't need to worry about those two cases of lost cargo…"

He paused, then seemed to think of something: "Wait. How much do they pay if you run into the Vanished? And if you get transformed into part of the Vanished Fleet, how much do they pay then?"

"For that, there is no payment. It counts as 'force majeure'. In fact, that earlier Anomaly 099 runaway state incident was also in the excluded category, because the loss of the doll's spirit coffin was tied to the Vanished. Later I went to…" Lawrence's voice trailed off. His expression turned a bit blank, as if he had not expected Captain Duncan to suddenly bring this up. Then he finally reacted: "Why… are you asking this?"

The moment Duncan heard the words "no payment", disappointment appeared on his face. He waved his hand: "Nothing. I was just asking."

Lawrence thought for a moment. About seventy or eighty classic insurance fraud cases flashed through his mind, and he decided to keep his mouth shut.

Duncan stayed quiet for a few seconds, then changed the topic: "Besides, you might not need to worry that much about the White Oak's future. Even as part of the Vanished Fleet, you might not have to leave legal routes and legal harbors forever."

This time Lawrence was truly surprised. He stared at Duncan in confusion, as if he had no idea what this "Subspace Shadow" was getting at.

Duncan looked at him with a half-smile: "Do you think the Vanished will stay away from the civilized world forever?"

“You mean…”

Duncan smiled: “I have reclaimed my human nature. You should have heard that rumor. Since I have human nature, of course I will grow interested in the civilized world again. These past days, I have been actively in contact with the city-states of the civilized world. First Pland, then Frostholm. Along the way I also met with the Deep Sea Church and the Church of Death. To be fair, I think I’ve done quite well.”

Lawrence instinctively recalled all the events that had unfolded during this “homecoming voyage” of the Vanished, and his expression slowly turned strange.

Duncan saw the change on his face. The corner of his eye twitched, and he worked to keep his expression and tone steady: “Of course, I admit the commotion during those meetings might have been a bit much.”

Lawrence: “…”

“That’s not important,” Duncan waved his hand. “What matters is that the Vanished Fleet will become part of civilization again. You and your crew might be the bridge that lets the Vanished build further ties with the civilized city-states.”

Lawrence understood Duncan’s intent, and surprise flashed in his eyes—this way of doing things did not sound much like the stories in the books.

But he quickly woke up from that brief surprise, and more down-to-earth worries rose up: “I understand. You want to ‘normalize’ relations with the city-states, so the first step is to let us ‘fleet members’ return to normal routes. But… you’ve seen the White Oak as she is now. Most city-states probably won’t accept a ship that has been tainted by supernatural power…”

“But as far as I know, some ‘mutated’ ships are exceptions. The city-states and the legal routes still allow them to dock and pass.”

“…Huh?” Lawrence blurted.

“The Sea Mist and the Radiant Star. The level of supernatural mutation on those two ships is almost second only to the Vanished. Yet the first has already become the new flagship of the Frostholm navy, and the second is an honorary member of the Explorer Association, with unlimited passage rights on the border routes,” Duncan spread his hands. “I’ve also heard of some other famous legendary exploration ships. supernatural power corrupted and remade them, so they carry strange and terrifying traits. But their captains hold certain special papers and have powerful groups backing them, so they can still sail on the Boundless Sea.”

He paused there, then went on in a very serious tone: “Strictly speaking, every ‘Cathedral ark’ of the Four Gods’ Church is also a ship that has been altered by supernatural power. Yet they still sail wherever they like. That proves that when it comes to ‘supernatural mutation’, the standards of the Church and the city-states are very flexible.”

Lawrence was stunned by this string of words and almost got swept along by the logic. Fortunately, when he heard “Four Gods’ Church” at the end, he snapped back to his senses, and his expression grew complicated: “The Cathedral arks really can’t be treated the same. They are under the gods’ protection. That’s different… But in those other cases, things are indeed like you said. There are exceptions.”

The old captain licked his dry lips and tried to find the right words: “But exceptions are called exceptions because they are hard to get. Your two children spent half a century getting the world to slowly accept them. Even now, many city-states still treat the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star with caution, or even hostility. As for the other legendary exploration ships you mentioned…

“Sigh, of course I know them. The Tulip, which was lost in the Spirit Realm for twelve years, and the Dust Song, which once crossed the Sea of Visions and returned with all hands alive… They did return to the civilized world, but the process of being accepted was no easier than what your two children went through.

“Extremely strict inspections, years of surveillance, the Church’s recognition. The Four Gods’ Church uses the highest safety standards to decide whether a ship that went through ‘supernatural mutation’ is safe. The harshness and difficulty of that process are beyond imagination. Even after going through all the tests, those legendary exploration ships stay under Church monitoring forever, and every so often they have to be inspected again. The passes in those legendary captains’ hands… are not easy to get.”

By the time he finished, Lawrence could not help letting out a long sigh. Duncan, however, had already gone thoughtful halfway through. When Lawrence stopped, Duncan asked with interest: “So in short, it’s enough if a Church is willing to act as guarantor? What are the requirements for this pass?”

“In short, the ‘guardian god’ behind the faction that owns the ship has to grant recognition. The White Oak belongs to the Explorer Association, and the Explorer Association is under the protection of the Deep Sea Church. Storm Goddess Gamona is the protector of explorers at sea. So if the White Oak wants to return to legal routes, at least one Saint of the Deep Sea has to be willing to swear an oath before the Goddess to act as guarantor, and, after receiving an oracle, personally carry out the inspection on the ship in question. In the end, an inquisitor from a city-state issues the pass.”

At this point, Lawrence sighed again: “Strictly speaking, that ‘Gatekeeper’ Lady Agatha would actually meet the identity requirements. She is both a Saint and the city’s ‘Gatekeeper’, and because of a series of events, she became your envoy. Sadly… she doesn’t belong to the Deep Sea Church…”

Duncan looked at him: “I have a Saint of the Deep Sea Church too.”

“…Huh?” Lawrence stared.

“A Saint of the Deep Sea Church, right?” Duncan looked very seriously at the worried Lawrence. “The Saint does the inspection, and the inquisitor signs the pass. Can the Saint and the inquisitor be the same person?”

Lawrence suddenly felt his brain jam. He answered on pure reflex: “I don’t think… there’s any rule against that…”

“Oh. Then go take care of your own business. I’ll go ask about the pass for you.”

Lawrence blinked and still did not quite react.

By the time he thought to ask a question, Duncan’s figure had already vanished from the deck in a pillar of flame that shot into the sky.

Chapter 466: Summons

“That’s how things stand, Vanna. What do you think?”

On the deck of the Vanished, Duncan spoke to Vanna, who was carving a charm amulet out of a piece of Sea-Breath Wood.

Vanna listened in a daze as Duncan passed on the problems the White Oak now faced and the captain’s plans for the future. It took her a long moment to react. She tossed the newly carved charm amulet into the wooden bucket, lifted her head, and said: “You mean I should vouch for the White Oak as the Saint, and then, as an Inquisitor, issue a pass that allows an aberrant ship to regain legal status?”

“It seems workable on paper,” Duncan said with a serious face. “After all, you really are the Saint of the Storm Goddess, and you’re still the Inquisitor of Pland.”

“But my Inquisitor post has already been revoked…”

Duncan waved his hand: “Wasn’t that something your Pope arranged in private? Your official status in public hasn’t changed.”

Vanna froze again. This straightforward lady still was not used to Duncan’s way of thinking. The idea of “picking loopholes in the rules” was something she had never even considered in all her years as an Inquisitor. She instinctively felt that something about it was wrong, but she could not say what. She could only speak in hesitation: “The procedure… I don’t even know if the procedure is proper, but…”

Duncan cut off Vanna’s hesitation with a solemn look: “The White Oak needs to regain legal status. The Vanished Fleet needs to reconnect with the civilized world. You don’t want us to remain shadows hanging over the world forever. Turning the Vanished Fleet, which once threatened the world, into something harmless is a good thing. And as the Saint of the Storm Goddess, you should be the one to push this forward. Don’t you think so?”

Vanna froze. Her expression grew calm as she sank into thought. After a long time, she raised her head and looked into Duncan’s eyes: “You sound just like you do when you’re fooling Alice.”

“But you are not Alice—Alice believed me as soon as I said the first sentence.”

Vanna: “…”

“But the reasoning is the same. The White Oak really does need your help now,” Duncan went on calmly. “And from a practical point of view, having one more controllable and powerful extraordinary exploration vessel is not a bad thing for the city-states. It’s better than letting this ship truly become a wandering shadow on the Boundless Sea.”

“I…”

Vanna opened her mouth, as if about to say something, when a faint, distant chime suddenly rang in her mind and cut her off.

She lifted her head and, by instinct, began the Listening Rite, turning toward the direction the bell came from. The bell’s special rhythm seemed to echo inside her soul, while Duncan’s worried voice sounded as if it came from the far side of some heavy Veil: “What happened?”

“The swift bell… the Great Cathedral is summoning Saints from everywhere. It sounds like news about the Nameless King’s tomb…” Vanna muttered in confusion, her tone tinged with disbelief. “Why can I still hear this summons…”

Duncan raised his eyebrows: “Is that strange? You’re still the Saint of the Deep Sea Church.”

“But I thought…” Vanna frowned. “I thought once I boarded the Vanished, they wouldn’t summon me again.”

Duncan’s eye twitched. From her tone he could hear that “getting on this ship” sounded a lot like “boarding a pirate ship.” But he quickly smoothed his expression and said calmly: “Don’t overthink it. Since it’s a summons from the Great Cathedral, go to the prayer room at once. And if you get the chance to meet Pope Helena, ask her about issuing a pass for the White Oak.”

A strange look flashed across Vanna’s face, but this time she managed to hold back her questions. With the bell in her mind tolling again and again like an urgent knock, she gave Duncan a quick nod, then turned and hurried toward the cabin.

There were many empty cabins on the Vanished. With the captain’s permission, she had already turned one of them into a prayer room. She had never tried it before, but in theory she should be able to answer psychic communications there and travel to the “assembly ground.”

Vanna left. Duncan did not look away until her figure vanished behind the cabin door.

He stared a moment longer at the direction Vanna had gone, then turned his head to glance at Alice, who had come back to the Vanished with him and was now dragging a big water bucket not far away, getting ready to scrub the deck. After a long pause, he sighed softly: “Sigh… so much harder to talk her around.”

After he sighed, he bent down and picked up the Sea-Breath Wood charm amulet that Vanna had carved, which lay in the bucket beside him.

The charm amulet was not very exquisite, but it was made with care. Duncan stood at the edge of the deck, idly playing with the small wooden piece as he waited for Vanna to return.

In theory, it should not take long.

As he waited with nothing else to do, he slowly sorted through the information from this period, especially what he had just learned aboard the White Oak.

The vast shadows beneath the Deep Sea, the “hybrid” called Martha, and… the changes that had taken place in that hybrid.

In Duncan’s mind, he saw again the scene of that pulsing, swelling mass of shadow gathering and stabilizing back into “Martha,” and… the vision of the “fish” that had appeared before that moment.

He turned his head and looked toward the gently rolling sea in the distance.

The sea was deep, and the waves rose and fell like a curtain.

The surface of the water seemed like a Veil that hid all secrets, blocking the truth beneath. When a fishing rod was cast, no one knew what would bite the hook.

And what he had pulled up back then was a “fish.”

Duncan’s eyes grew a little more solemn. He lowered his head to look at the little wave charm amulet in his hand. After a brief pause, he tossed the amulet back into the bucket and picked up a plain, uncarved piece of wood lying nearby.

He stared at the wood very seriously. After a long time, he spoke in a slow and solemn tone: “This is a piece of bread.”

The wood was still wood. Nothing changed.

Duncan stared at the piece of wood for quite a while, then tugged at the corner of his mouth. He lifted his head to make sure no one was around, then casually tossed the wood back where it had been.

“Looks like it’s not that simple… so what is the principle behind it, anyway…”

…

At the same time, in a private cabin beneath the deck of the Vanished, Vanna had already finished setting up the space for the ritual.

She locked the cabin door, then turned to look at the ritual field she had prepared.

Under normal conditions, answering the assembly summons required using the special “tide chamber” built inside the Cathedral to construct a psychic channel. On a ship with such limited conditions, that was obviously not realistic. So she had to place her usual prayer books on the floor nearby to serve as anchors for the “holy ground,” light a large candelabrum in the center of the room to act as the ritual brazier, then dig out the holy oil and incense she had bought in the city-states to serve as “sacrificial offerings” that would boost the ritual. It barely added up to the elements needed to open a psychic channel.

To be honest, the setup was very rough, even a little disrespectful to the Goddess—but there was no better option.

The bell in her mind kept ringing, echoing again and again like a constant urge, as if it would keep tolling forever if she did not answer.

“…I hope the Goddess won’t blame me for this… If I’d known, I should at least have prepared some better-quality holy oil.”

Vanna muttered under her breath, then finally made up her mind. She took the holy oil and the incense and let a few drops fall into the candelabrum.

As the flames suddenly leapt higher, she drew in a soft breath and let her mind sink into calm…

It was as if an ancient dark sky hung over a vast assembly ground. Chaotic streams of light flowed and flickered at the tops of countless old and solemn pillars. On the broken plaza between the pillars, one hazy figure after another began to appear.

Only after all the other figures had taken their places did Vanna's spirit projection arrive, a little late.

A slight dizziness and the feeling of her senses being peeled away made her stand in place for a few seconds. Once she had roughly adjusted, she lowered her head to check her own condition and the outlines of the figures around her.

"It actually went fairly smoothly…"

She muttered in some surprise.

She had not used a tide chamber. She had performed the ritual with only a makeshift altar on the Vanished and a candle standing in for the ritual brazier. She had not expected this method to have a high chance of success, yet it had worked on the first try.

A figure came up beside her, cutting off Vanna's thoughts.

She lifted her head. From the familiar outline and presence, she recognized who it was—Bishop Valentine, whom she had not seen for a long time.

"Vanna, you finally made it!" The old Bishop's voice held the joy of a long-awaited reunion. "I didn't think you would really be able to come…"

“I also… didn’t expect it,” Vanna said, a little embarrassed. “Have you all been waiting long? Conditions here are limited. I had to prepare the ritual in a hurry. It took a long time…”

“It’s all right. For some reason, Her Eminence the Pope is also very late today. She still hasn’t arrived,” Valentine said at once. Then he leaned closer and lowered his voice: “Where are you now? Still ‘on the ship’?”

“…Yes, on the ship. I just left Frostholm,” Vanna replied. She glanced around and also lowered her voice. “I was talking with the ‘captain’ only ten minutes ago.”

“…He actually let you set up a prayer room on the ship?” Bishop Valentine sounded deeply amazed. “And you can even open a psychic channel from there? Did you find a powerful sacred relic?”

“It’s just a simple ritual field,” Vanna said, a bit embarrassed. “I didn’t think it would work either…”

“A simple ritual field?” Valentine said in puzzlement. But before he could go on, a rumble rose from the center of the plaza and cut him off.

With a deep booming sound, the ancient and solemn tomb of the Nameless King slowly rose from the center of the plaza. The Saints gathered all over the assembly ground fell silent in turn, and one gaze after another fixed on the gray-white pyramid-shaped structure.

Vanna also looked up at the structure, at the heavy gate before the pyramid.

The gate slowly opened, and the Tomb Guardian stepped out, wrapped in bandages and seeming to exist somewhere between life and death.

Vanna felt a jolt in her heart, then saw the tall guardian walk straight toward her.

A small stir swept through the assembly ground.

This was the third time in a row that the Tomb Guardian had chosen the same Listener.

Yet for some reason, Vanna felt a strange sense of… acceptance, almost as if she had expected this. She turned her head, spread her hands helplessly at Valentine’s shadowy figure, then stepped forward to wait for the guardian to approach.

The giant being, caught between life and death, strode up to Vanna and lowered his gaze from his clouded yellow eyes.

“Good afternoon. Please follow me.”

Chapter 467: The Guard’s Secret

The Tomb Guardian’s manner was even more courteous than last time—almost respectful.

Vanna could clearly feel the change in the air around her and the puzzled looks from her fellow Saints. Yet even she had no idea how to explain this strange change. Even if vague guesses rose in her mind, she had no way to put them into words.

She could only lower her head and look at the parchment sheet the giant guardian held out to her. After hesitating for two seconds, she reached out to take it and drew a quiet breath.

“I’ll be right back.” She turned her head and said this quickly to Bishop Valentine, then followed the giant guardian of the tomb, walking toward the pale building not far away.

The heavy stone gate slowly closed behind them, sealing the ancient and mysterious tomb once more. The giant guardian of the tomb did not vanish. Instead, like a proper guide, he walked beside Vanna and led her toward the deeper layers of the tomb. In the long, shadowy corridor, the steady sound of their footsteps only made the silence around them seem deeper.

Vanna silently recited all the taboos she had to remember after entering Vision 004, while carefully watching the Tomb Guardian’s movements. She recalled how this guardian had acted the last time before she entered the tomb chamber, and thoughts churned restlessly in her mind.

Because of the limits of Vision 004, she could no longer remember what had happened after she entered the tomb last time. But she still remembered that even before she had gone in, the guardian's attitude had already changed in a subtle way. Back then, she had not thought about it too deeply. This time, however, all kinds of connections spread through her mind against her will.

While Vanna's thoughts rose and fell, a low, hoarse voice suddenly reached her ears—the giant guardian had broken the silence.

"Do you have anything you wish to ask?"

Vanna's heart gave a jolt. This silent and terrifying guardian was actively speaking to the Listener entering the tomb?!

In her mind, she quickly ran through all the information about Vision 004 again, checking the various taboos to see how she should deal with this situation. Then she forced herself to calm down and, choosing her words carefully, asked: "You treat me very kindly. Why?"

"Because you are an Envoy," the Tomb Guardian answered at once. "Envoys are those who have transcended and ascended. They deserve courtesy."

"Envoy?" Vanna was stunned, not quite understanding. "What does that mean? Do you mean I'm the Saint of the Storm Goddess Gamona? But everyone out there on the plaza is…"

"The Leviathan Queen has no Envoy. All of her Envoys died before the first Long Night," the Tomb Guardian cut in before Vanna could finish. His voice held almost no trace of emotion. Even when he spoke of a deity, there was neither reverence nor fear. "You are the Envoy of the Flame Usurper."

Her heart tightened all at once. Her head rang with a sudden roar, and even her breath stopped without her noticing. Vanna halted in shock. The answer to her casual question went far beyond anything she had imagined. It felt as if a storm had swept through her mind, and in its wake came crashing waves of guesses, realizations, and shifting understanding.

The Leviathan Queen—she remembered that title. Not long ago, Captain Duncan had mentioned that name in front of her and Morris!

Long Night—she remembered that term too. After reading The Blasphemous Tome, Mr. Morris had said that it used “Long Night” several times to describe the Elder Kings’ attempts to create the world in the Age of Antiquity. She remembered that in those heretical descriptions there were three Long Nights, and three Genesis Protocols as well!

As for the Flame Usurper…

“The Flame Usurper… does that mean Captain Duncan?” A thought flashed through Vanna’s mind, and she spoke without thinking.

Inside Vision 004, one could not casually speak of the master of the tomb or the secrets within it. But the taboos said nothing about talking about the outside world. Vanna gathered her courage and questioned the Tomb Guardian in front of her. Some inner instinct also told her that even if she asked this guardian a few more questions, it would not bring her danger.

Yet this time the guardian did not answer at once. After several seconds of silence, he slowly turned his head and looked into Vanna’s eyes.

“After you leave, you will still forget the secrets you learn here. Asking too much is pointless.”

Vanna froze. It felt as if a bucket of cold water had been poured over the curiosity blazing in her heart.

Of course. Most of the information inside Vision 004 could not be taken outside. No matter how much she learned here, she would still forget it once she left.

Even if she wrote it on the parchment sheet, anything that should not be revealed would still be torn away in the end.

She did not dare ask the guardian what the “forgetting mechanism” of Vision 004 actually was. That already pointed to the tomb itself, and asking it would bring trouble.

She could only sigh, step forward in regret, and keep walking toward the deepest chamber.

But just then, she heard the guardian’s voice again in her ears—

“The Flame Usurper’s name is not Duncan.”

Vanna’s eyes opened wider. She did not have time to wonder why the Tomb Guardian was suddenly willing to answer her earlier question. She blurted out: “Then what about the Leviathan Queen? From what you said, she’s the storm…”

But the Tomb Guardian suddenly stopped walking and cut her off in a low voice: “We are here.”

Vanna lifted her head and saw that the long, deep corridor had somehow already reached its end. The door to the central chamber now stood right in front of her. Pale firelight flickered inside the tomb, as if urging her to hurry in.

A second later, she understood: she could no longer ask more questions.

Even with this strange, inexplicable identity of “Envoy” on her, the Tomb Guardian’s courtesy toward her had its limits—or rather, the questions the guardian himself could answer were limited.

She did not know whether those limits lay in the number of questions or in the scope of what he could answer. Sadly, once she left Vision 004, all her memories would be wiped clean. She would probably never have a chance to test this with repeated experiments.

A few messy thoughts flashed through Vanna’s mind. In the end, she just let out a quiet breath and thanked the guardian softly: “Thank you for your patience.”

“Please go in. Afterward, I will send you back out—though you will not remember.”

Vanna nodded and stepped into the chamber. As she crossed the doorway, the bandage-wrapped guardian, caught between life and death, vanished silently from the corridor.

On the ancient and solemn throne, the headless Nameless King sat in silence as if he had never moved since ancient times. A pale brazier burned steadily in the corner of the tomb, and the air was filled with a quiet, grave presence.

Vanna came to stand before the throne and saw that the place set aside for the Listener now held a very comfortable-looking chair with a back. There was also a table in front of the chair.

On the table sat a fruit plate and pastries, and even a cup of black tea—still steaming.

Vanna: “…”

She forced herself to keep her expression in check and sat down in the chair as calmly as she could.

Though a Listener could not carry memories of the tomb to the outside world, she was sure that under normal circumstances no one who entered this chamber received such treatment!

In the bits of information that sometimes came out with the parchment sheets, there had been descriptions of the Listening Rite. Not one of them mentioned fruit plates and pastries!

After a brief daze and a strong urge to complain, Vanna quickly calmed down, and her eyes grew serious.

She looked around.

Inside Vision 004, there was only pale, cold stone. In theory, there was no place to store food and no way to have a kitchen. The Tomb Guardian might know how to brew tea, but she simply could not imagine that giant baking pastries.

She studied the items on the table.

The fruit was fresh, the tea was steaming, and the pastries sat on a fine silver-inlaid wooden tray. The patterns on it faintly carried the style of the southern city-states, very much like the crafts of Elven city-states such as Lightwind Harbor or Southport.

Vanna picked up a biscuit and felt the warmth still lingering in it.

Perhaps an hour ago, it had still been in the oven of some pastry shop in some city-state.

So… had the Tomb Guardian brought these things directly from some southern city-state? Could he enter the Mortal Realm in person? Or were there secret worshippers in the Mortal Realm who followed the Tomb Guardian’s orders and offered “sacrificial rites” to Vision 004?

The fruit and the tray holding the pastries both looked like southern specialties. That region was Elven territory. The Elves… this mysterious, long-lived race did indeed keep many unique faith practices. Some of those beliefs were completely different from the Four Gods Church of today and had become systems of their own…

Could there be explanations of Vision 004 hidden in the Elves' ancient texts?

Thoughts rose and fell in Vanna's mind. Her professional habits pushed her to dig into every "unusual" thing she saw.

But her thoughts did not last long.

A soft scraping sound suddenly rang out in the tomb and cut off Vanna's train of thought.

She turned toward the sound and saw that the headless king was slowly lifting his arm, as if he were about to rise from the throne—

Vanna opened her eyes.

The ancient, solemn pillars of the assembly ground came into view. Dim, chaotic streams of light swept across the sky above the plaza. The Saints' spirit projections were gathering from afar, and in the corner of her eye she saw the pale, mysterious building slowly sinking back into the earth amid distant rumbling.

Had she already finished her task?

Vanna felt a little dazed. She shook her head. Her memories seemed to stop at the moment she followed the polite Tomb Guardian through the door. This feeling of a broken memory was not unfamiliar. It was not her first time entering Vision 004 as a Listener. But for some reason… this time she felt there was something odd clinging to her memory, as if…

Some discordant impressions had still left shallow traces in her wiped memory.

But soon she had no time to examine that faint sense of wrongness.

Her fellow Saints had already gathered. Bishop Valentine's projection was among them. A little farther away, she could also see the late-arriving Pope

Helena standing at the edge of the plaza, quietly watching this side.

“Vanna,” Valentine spoke first. “How do you feel? This was your third time entering the tomb. Has it affected you?”

“I…” Vanna frowned, as if she wanted to check her own mental state. But before she could sense anything clearly, she could not help letting out a burp. “Hic—”

The Saints who had gathered in concern around her fell silent all at once.

Even Bishop Valentine was stunned. The old priest, who had watched Vanna grow up, stared for a long moment before finally saying: “Did you go in there and chew on rocks?”

Chapter 468: New Visions

Bishop Valentine’s words made Vanna freeze for a moment. Then she did not know how to reply at all.

Noticing that the mood in the room turned a bit strange, Valentine also felt a little awkward. He looked at Vanna with a helpless expression and said: “The main thing is… people who come out of Vision 004 have all kinds of reactions. Some are dizzy, some have short-term mental problems, some even show Cognitive Shift. I can understand all that—but you are the first one to come out while burping.”

Vanna felt the atmosphere around her grow more and more odd. She herself did not know what to do: “I don’t even know how to respon—hic!”

She hurriedly swallowed, forcing down the urge to burp again. At the same time she tried, confused and anxious, to think about what had really happened after she entered Vision 004. Just then, the Saint projections who had gathered around them suddenly stirred. A moment later, they all moved aside.

Pope Helena walked through the crowd and stopped in front of Vanna.

The appearance of Your Eminence made Vanna straighten her back at once. She raised her head, and instinctively wanted to salute—but failed to hold it in and let out another burp.

Helena frowned.

This elegant and dignified Lady stared at Vanna in puzzlement for a while. Then Helena raised her head and looked at the empty ground where the “tomb of the Nameless King” had just sunk back into the earth. She watched that spot for a long time before turning her gaze back to Vanna: “…Did you eat the Tomb Guardian?”

“…?”

Vanna stared in shock for several seconds before she finally spoke in a helpless tone: “It would make more sense if you suspected I was in there gnawing on stones…”

There was not the slightest change on Helena’s face. It was as if, in her eyes, Vanna—this Inquisitor who was shocking even in the full history of the Deep Sea Church—really could pull off something as insane as swallowing a Tomb Guardian whole. But soon Helena shook her head. She calmed her voice and said: “True, even for you, that would be a bit extreme. So… what actually happened?”

“I don’t remember, I…” Vanna shook her head. Yet the moment she spoke, it felt as if a vague image rose in her mind—like a blocked-off memory trying to float to the surface. But that image vanished in the blink of an eye. Vanna frowned in confusion for a while and in the end could only keep shaking her head. “I’m sorry. I really don’t remember.”

“Is that so… It seems that even entering Vision 004 three times in a row still cannot resist this kind of Memory Erasure,” Helena said, her expression unchanged. Her gaze fell on Vanna’s hand. “Then let us confirm the parchment sheet. See what message you brought out this time.”

The Pope’s reminder made Vanna suddenly remember the important matter. She quickly pushed aside the messy thoughts and the embarrassment in her head and took out the parchment sheet she had been gripping so tightly.

As always, more than half of the parchment sheet had already been torn away. The information that should not leave the tomb was once again left behind inside Vision 004. On the remaining small part of the sheet, several lines of messy text were written.

Vanna's eyes fell on those words, and her gaze suddenly tightened.

"…Vision-Frostholm…

"Vision-the Vanished…

"Vision-Lost Fleet…"

Three rough lines of text listed three Visions by name—without numbers.

Helena's eyes grew more and more serious.

Bishop Valentine also saw the records on the parchment sheet, and he fell into deep shock.

Once again, Vanna had brought out strange information from the tomb of the Nameless King—odd Vision codenames that were completely different from the normal "Anomaly and Visions list" format!

"Again…" Vanna herself felt shocked. She stared fixedly at the words on the parchment sheet. Only after a long time did she raise her head, looking at the Pope in front of her with confusion. "Visions without numbers."

"The appearance of Vision-Frostholm does not surprise me. After Pland turned into a Vision, I already had this feeling," Helena said in a grave tone, her eyes deep and unreadable. "But the Vanished…"

"The Vanished was already on the Visions list," Helena went on. "Now even its number has been stripped away."

"Not only that. Now the Lost Fleet has appeared too," Valentine said from the side. "It is also a numberless Vision—and it stands separate from the Vanished, occupying its own entry!”

Helena did not speak. Instead, she lifted her head and slowly swept her gaze over the spirit projections around her.

The Saints understood at once. They were well trained in the “secrecy rules” and the risks of corruption. They did not need any extra order. One by one, they bowed to the Pope, then left the gathering place.

Soon, the vast and ancient square was empty. Only Vanna, Valentine, and Helena remained.

“What has changed on the Vanished recently?” After all the other Saints were gone, Helena finally asked, “Why did the name of the Lost Fleet suddenly appear on the list? Is Captain Duncan calling his fleet back together?”

The Lost Fleet had truly existed, but that was more than a century ago. And that fleet had never been treated as a dangerous “Vision.”

With the most advanced exploration ship of its time, the Vanished, as the flagship; the two powerful warships the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star as escorts; and more than ten different support ships of all sizes, the Lost Fleet had once been the strongest and greatest exploration fleet on the Boundless Sea. Before that terrible upheaval occurred, this glorious fleet had discovered countless islands, opened more than ten vital trade routes, and had even drawn part of the borders of the civilized world.

In that era, Captain Duncan and the Lost Fleet were not frightening symbols. Instead, they stood for honor and greatness. They were the symbol of the courage of civilization pushing toward the edges of the world.

All of that ended suddenly when the Vanished fell into Subspace.

After that, the Lost Fleet broke apart. The flagship returned to the Mortal Realm with the label “Vision 005.” Its fleet members then dissolved and scattered during the following century. The only two remaining warships, the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star, no longer acted under the name of the Lost Fleet.

So through all this history, the “Lost Fleet” had never been listed as a Vision.

But now, a new Vision had appeared, and it was called “Lost Fleet.”

“…There is a ship named the White Oak,” Vanna said, sorting out her thoughts. She began to tell Helena about the recent incident in the Frost Sea. She knew the Pope must have her own intelligence channels and should already know the general situation in Frostholm, but only someone in the center of the incident—like Vanna—could know the details. “That ship is now a member of the Lost Fleet…”

Helena’s face stayed serious as she listened carefully to Vanna’s report on the “mirror world Frostholm incident,” and on how the White Oak was Transformed and absorbed into the Lost Fleet.

Only when Vanna finished did the female Pope break the silence: “So, a new Lost Fleet is forming. The moment that new exploration ship was Transformed into a member of the fleet, a new ‘Vision’ appeared on the tomb’s list.”

“It seems so.” Vanna nodded lightly. “Born as a Vision… and a numberless Vision at that. Something like this…”

“This kind of thing is not unheard of in history,” Helena said, shaking her head. “But every time a new Vision is born, it is usually accompanied by a huge disaster, or by huge changes in the environment of an entire region, even an entire sea. What did the birth of this Lost Fleet bring?”

Vanna opened her mouth, but her mind suddenly went blank.

“It seems… nothing happened?” she said after hesitating for a long time, almost like she was talking to herself. “At least for now, no one was hurt because of it. No place turned into a forbidden zone. In fact… the transformation of the White Oak came together with Frostholm returning to stability. The whole event seemed to develop in a good direction…”

Helena stared quietly into Vanna’s eyes. “Not only that. This new ‘Vision’ also has no ‘rules’ or ‘taboos’ we can sum up.”

A look of thought appeared on Vanna’s face.

“Normal Visions all have their rules and taboos. Just like normal Anomalies all have their dangers, and their containment and sealing conditions,” Bishop Valentine could not help speaking up. “But from what you just described, the Lost Fleet does not show any taboo-like behavior at all—not yet. Even though the White Oak has its own strange traits, these ‘strange’ things are limited to that ship itself, not to the entire ‘fleet.’”

“Maybe it is because this Vision has only just been born, so we cannot sum up its patterns yet,” Helena said, thinking. “But a greater possibility is… that it is like Pland now.”

“Pland now?” Vanna repeated the words without thinking and looked at Bishop Valentine. “Right now, Pland…”

“Just as I told you the last time we spoke: safe, calm. The veil of night is no longer frightening. The darkness no longer mutates,” Valentine said seriously. “It has been a long time since I received any report of supernatural corruption in the city. I believe Frostholm will soon become the same.”

Helena nodded slightly. “A calm veil of night and darkness, a place where life is stable and safe—this is the strangest thing in the world. The strangest thing is a place with no strangeness. Pland is such a place now.”

Vanna stayed silent and fell into quiet thought.

After a brief silence, Bishop Valentine spoke again: “Maybe all these numberless Visions will be the same. They reject all supernatural corruption except for themselves. The only strange thing they display is… that there is nothing strange within their range.”

“We still cannot jump to conclusions. At the very least, we must observe the newly appeared ‘Vision-Frostholm’ for a while,” Helena said in a deep voice. Then she frowned slightly and looked at Vanna. “So, as the one who controls all this, did Captain Duncan do anything… special? Does he have any plan? Will he keep expanding his fleet, or will he reclaim the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star into the Lost Fleet? Did he tell you anything?”

Vanna thought for a moment, and a hint of hesitation flashed across her face: “Well… he did give me a task.”

“A task for you?” Helena’s expression turned serious at once. “What task?”

“…He asked me to find a way to get a pass issued for the White Oak. To… slip it through the Church’s approval process somehow.”

“…?”

Chapter 469: Signature

Helena asked Vanna to confirm it several times, just to make sure she was not hearing things.

“So, you mean that Captain Duncan Abnomar, the Shadow of Subspace, the master of the Vanished, started to rebuild the ‘Lost Fleet’ after the Frostholm incident. And his very first step… was to have you bend the rules and get his new ship a travel pass?”

Vanna’s face showed clear embarrassment. Her voice also carried some hesitation, but she still had to nod stiffly: “Yes… that is what he told me.”

“And he wants this pass so that the new member of the Lost Fleet can keep running cargo on the Boundless Sea?”

“…Yes. That is also what he told me.”

Helena lifted her head and looked toward the spot where Vision 004 had sunk into the ground. Then she looked back at Vanna standing before her. Then she looked up again. Her gaze went back and forth several times before she finally could not hold herself back: “The tomb of the Nameless King updated the Visions list again today! Because of Duncan Abnomar’s actions, the world now has three new numberless Visions! The Churches of the Four Gods will all be busy. We may need a lot of people and a lot of time to figure out what these numberless Visions really mean—including that ‘Lost Fleet’!”

“Yes,” Vanna said with her head lowered. “But… he really hopes the Deep Sea Church can issue a special pass for the White Oak.”

Helena tilted her head back and quietly lifted her gaze to Vanna’s eyes.

Vanna kept her head bowed and tried her best to show all her embarrassment and guilt through her posture.

But her effort almost had no effect.

After all, the Pope was about one meter seventy, while Vanna was close to one meter ninety.

Helena took two careful steps back without changing her expression.

“Two things,” the Pope seemed to take a quiet breath. Her face calmed, and she once more showed her usual elegant and dignified bearing as she spoke to Vanna. “First, you are not allowed to sign this pass. Even though you still officially hold the titles of Inquisitor and Saint, you are also a member of the Vanished. That does not meet the rules about avoiding conflicts of interest, Vanna. You should understand this.”

Vanna’s face instantly showed regret and awkwardness, and she spoke without thinking: “Then the second thing…”

Helena closed her eyes slightly, as if steadying herself: “Second, I will sign the pass.”

For a moment, Vanna did not react. She stared at the female Pope with wide eyes.

Helena did not seem to care about Vanna’s sudden shock and doubt. She simply let out a slow breath and said: “So, what style of pass do you think Duncan Abnomar would like?”

Vanna kept staring, still dumbfounded.

She heard the Pope’s voice continue: “The pass will be ready soon. I will hold a Prayer in the great Storm Cathedral and perform a Listening rite for the Goddess’s revelation. If there truly is no problem, the pass will be sent to you through an Esoteric Rite. Maintain your ritual setup over there and wait for the message."

As Helena finished speaking, her figure began to fade. In a short while, she disappeared completely from the square.

Deep in the Boundless Sea, along a secret route twisted and hidden by supernatural power, the majestic Cathedral ark sailed slowly along the borders of civilization.

The steam core pushed out powerful force. Holy steam rose above the Cathedral ark and gathered into a cloud that did not disperse. Gentle bells rang, announcing the end of a successful psychic conclave.

In the deepest part of the Cathedral ark, in the "lower hold" that was sunk into the Boundless Sea, braziers burned with bright fire. The flames drove away the darkness and shadows. Standing between two braziers, the female Pope slowly opened her eyes.

The dignified Lady took a deep breath. A complicated and tangled look crossed her face. Almost at the same time, an old and hoarse voice reached her ears: "Oh, you look troubled, young Lady."

Helena raised her head and glanced into the distance. The shaking firelight lit up that spot. There, a "pillar" made from twisted, root-like blood vessels and nerves stood in the dimness. All kinds of artificial pipes and electrodes were attached to those thick nerve bundles. Tiny lights flashed between them, flickering on and off.

"You were awake the whole time?" Helena steadied herself and politely spoke with the mythic beast.

"I did not want to be awake, but it was too noisy," said the great beast carrying the Cathedral ark on its back. "Every time you people use that psychic channel thing to meet, it is noisy. Today was especially noisy."

“…I am sorry. Some things happened, and my mind was not very calm this time,” Helena said. “Next, I need to pray and seek revelation from the Goddess.”

“You have something to discuss with the Queen?” The old, hoarse voice sounded again. “All right, I will not bother you. I hope you get a clearer answer this time. And say hello to the Queen for me.”

Helena gave a small “mm” in reply, then turned around. She faced the brazier closest to her, closed her eyes, and began to focus on her Prayer.

In the vast, dim space, silence covered everything. Time seemed to stop flowing. Only the flames in the brazier leaped and danced, as if weaving an unseen exchange that crossed the Veil.

No one knew how long passed before Helena finally finished her Prayer and slowly opened her eyes.

She frowned. This time, her Prayer felt different from usual.

The revelation sent by the Goddess… was as vague as always. But amid that hazy “guidance,” there seemed to be something mixed in that felt like… emotions.

Helena could not tell what that vague and unfamiliar feeling was. But after she lowered her head and thought for a long time, she still confirmed the main part of the revelation: it was permission and approval.

So Helena let out a breath, then turned her head and looked at that bundle of nerves covered with pipes, cables, and electrodes. “The Goddess has given Her revelation. And I passed along your greeting.”

No answer came. The Leviathan that carried the ark seemed to have fallen asleep again.

Helena was not surprised. After giving that greeting, she simply reached out and grabbed at the darkness beside her. A blank travel document appeared in her hand out of thin air.

She quickly checked to make sure she had the right form. Then the female Pope picked up a pen and signed her name and some required details with a few strokes. After that, she walked to the brazier closest to her and, lowering her head, silently recited the words of the Prayer. She placed the document into the fire.

In the blink of an eye, the document and both copies of the pass, all bearing her name, were swallowed by the flames. They turned into specks of light and scattered from the Mortal Realm.

…

Vanna opened her eyes in the ship's cabin. The moment she woke up, she started to gasp for breath.

The ritual field they had set up in a hurry was rough and simple. It was nothing like the "Tidal Chamber" inside the Cathedral. When her mind came back, the feeling of being soaked in seawater was especially strong. Even Vanna, a Saint of Storms, felt a bit uncomfortable.

Still, the psychic conclave this time was completed smoothly.

Vanna took a few deep breaths and calmed herself. She sorted through the events of the conclave in her mind, then got ready to patiently wait for Pope Helena's reply, and for the pass that was very likely to be sent to her through an Esoteric Rite.

In theory, the Pope still needed to carry out a series of Prayer rituals before the pass was ready—even if, for various reasons, they left out the step of "inspecting the ship receiving the document," they still could not skip the Goddess's benediction.

But in the next second, as Vanna’s gaze swept toward the temporary altar they had set up in a rush, her expression suddenly froze.

The thick candles serving as the ritual brazier had somehow already burned down. The candle-stand that should have burned for a full day now held only a pile of ash and wax. In the last faint wisp of smoke, a “pass document” still glowing with a soft light lay quietly on the floor.

So fast?

Vanna frowned and stepped forward in confusion. She picked up the pages and carefully looked through their contents.

It was a standard permit. It recorded the basic information about the White Oak and the supernatural factors involved. It carried the Church’s stamp. There was the main pass and a copy meant to be shown during normal inspections at customs.

All of them were signed with the name of Pope Helena.

There was nothing wrong with the documents—and there could not be anything wrong.

It was just that they had arrived too fast. Vanna had only just returned from the conclave, and the papers were already here.

She held the forms and pass and checked them over and over. After a while, she suddenly heard a voice enter her mind. It was Pope Helena.

“What Captain Duncan wanted has been sent out through an Esoteric Rite.”

Vanna lowered her head and glanced at what she was holding, and her small doubt faded: “Yes, I have received it.”

Then she let out a breath, thanked the Pope, and said goodbye. After that, she put the documents away and hurried out of the cabin.

Duncan was still waiting on the deck. When Vanna, walking quickly, stepped onto the deck, he smiled: “You were gone for quite a while. Did the conclave go well?”

“The conclave went… very well,” Vanna said after a brief pause. What first came to her mind was the three “numberless Visions” from the parchment sheet she had brought out of Vision 004. With a very complicated feeling, she looked at the “person responsible” standing in front of her. Then she handed over the travel papers that had just been sent from the great Storm Cathedral. “But you should look at this first. The pass you wanted.”

“Pass?” Duncan was stunned. He had indeed mentioned the matter to Vanna, but he had not expected her to walk out from a conclave and instantly hand him a pass. The impossible speed left him dazed.

Still, he reached out and took the documents. As he looked them over, he said casually: “Your efficiency is really something… You carry all this stuff on you?”

“Well… it’s a bit complicated,” Vanna said, embarrassed. “I wasn’t the one who signed them. It was Your Eminence Helena. When she heard about…”

She had only said half her sentence when Duncan suddenly cut her off. He snapped his head up: “Wait. Who did you say signed these?”

Vanna froze. She did not know why the captain was reacting so strongly: “It was… Your Eminence Helena. Is something wrong?”

Duncan did not answer. He only stared into Vanna’s eyes for a long time. Then he lowered his head again and stared hard at the handwriting on the travel papers.

His gaze rested on the signature at the bottom of the certificate.

Signer—Gamona.

On the document. On the original certificate. On the copy.

All three signatures were the same.

Chapter 470: Gamona’s “Hint”

The name of the Storm Goddess Gamona appeared on the pass, and Duncan found the handwriting familiar.

He had seen it before. Back in Pland, a being suspected to be the Storm Goddess had left him a message of thanks. He still remembered that God’s handwriting.

Yet Vanna said the pass had been signed by Pope Helena.

Vanna would not make a mistake about something so obvious, and she had no reason to tell such a pointless lie. That left only one explanation – in her eyes, the name on the pass really was Helena.

Who was seeing what was real? What did it mean that the same thing appeared so differently to the two of them? What message was the Storm Goddess trying to send him by doing this? Or rather… what was her purpose?

Duncan controlled his expression and pushed down his shock. He did not feel any obvious wrongness from those few sheets of paper, so he could only try to get more information from Vanna.

He raised his head and looked at the inquisitor opposite him: “What did Helena say when she handed the pass to you?”

“The Pope did not say much, only that what you asked for was ready,” Vanna answered at once, still bothered by Duncan’s strange attitude. Then she carefully recounted everything she and the Pope had discussed about the pass at the assembly, explaining why the document was signed by Helena. When she finished, she watched Duncan's reaction and finally asked: "These things… is there something wrong with them?"

Duncan was silent for two seconds, then suddenly said: "No. There is no problem. These are very good."

Vanna did not seem to be pretending. She clearly knew nothing. What bothered him more was that, if the details Vanna described were correct, then Pope Helena herself also seemed unaware that the signature on the pass had changed.

Unless the Pope was putting on an act – but why would she do that?

Vanna kept watching Duncan's reaction. She had many doubts, but in the end she did not press him. Instead, she moved on to another important matter:

"Also, this time I again entered that tomb as the Listener. The parchment sheet I brought back has information about new Visions…"

"New Visions?" Duncan raised his eyebrows, a little surprised. "Isn't that something secret to your internal assemblies? Is it really fine to tell me directly?"

"Changes to the Visions list will be made public to the whole world sooner or later. Telling you now only means you know a little earlier. Besides… the new Visions are related to you."

"Oh?"

Vanna steadied herself and said: "Vision-Frostholm, Vision-the Vanished, Vision-the Vanished Fleet. Like the situation with Pland, none of them have a number."

The open deck fell briefly silent. Only the wind brushed past their ears and the waves slapped against the hull. After a long time, Duncan finally spoke, breaking the silence: “Oh. That is quite a lot.”

“Yes, indeed… quite a lot,” Vanna said, a little hesitant. “Under normal circumstances, even a single new Vision is enough to draw the attention of every Church of the Four Gods. This time three Visions were added at once, and one of them is the Vanished that used to be numbered 005…”

“So all the Churches and research organizations will be rather busy next?”

“There will probably be countless scholars losing countless hairs, and the Popes will likely sleep poorly for some time… Even if the new Visions show no obvious danger, the follow-up divination rituals and data work are a huge project.”

Duncan thought for a moment: “Oh. They can work hard on that.”

Even the always calm and steady Vanna almost lost control of her expression at this. A strange feeling spread in her chest. After holding it in for a long time, she finally managed to say: “As the ‘person involved’… you really have no thoughts about it?”

Duncan thought about it seriously, then looked at Vanna with a solemn face: “Next time I will try to make less of a commotion? Or you can go back and persuade your Pope, tell them to take it easy…”

Vanna: “…”

The inquisitor seemed to fall into confusion for a moment. Duncan did not care about her reaction. He lifted his head and looked thoughtfully at the familiar deck and masts before him, and at the translucent spirit form sails billowing in midair.

The Vanished, as always, sailed silently and reliably across the Boundless Sea. As the ship’s master, Duncan did not feel that it had changed in any way. Yet in the list of Vision 004, the Nameless King's Tomb, this vessel was no longer recorded as Vision 005.

It had lost its number.

What exactly did that change mean?

Duncan lowered his head and looked thoughtfully at his own palm, then his gaze dropped to the pass. The name "Gamona" seemed to carry a strong presence that drew his eyes.

He thought of the brief connection between Dog and the God of Wisdom, and then of that strange dark space and the record he had seen there of what seemed to be a conversation between Gods.

"Vanna," he suddenly turned his head and looked straight into Vanna's eyes. "How can someone establish communication with the Gods?"

Vanna snapped out of her daze at once, then was startled by Duncan's question and looked a little at a loss: "Ah?! You mean… establish communication with the Gods?!"

"That is right," Duncan nodded. "Establish communication with the Gods."

He had just thought of something. If that strange dark space really hid some kind of "communication platform" between the Gods, and if the Blasphemous Tome that had been burned was only a key used to open that dark space, then such a key was likely not only in the hands of a few cults. In other words –

Since even the "blasphemous sacred relics" held by cultists could open that "communication platform" of the Gods, then what about the orthodox churches that were closely linked to the Four Gods? Would the items or techniques in their hands not work even better? It was a very logical thought.

Duncan had not considered this direction before. Part of it was habit of thought. The Golden Sun Mask from before and the Blasphemous Tome this time had both come from cultists, so he had instinctively formed a simple plan of “finding cultists and dealing with them on the spot.” The other part was that he had been avoiding this direction without realizing it.

He had truly seen the role the Churches of the Four Gods played in the city-states, and so he had a natural goodwill toward the power behind Vanna and Morris. Probing that dark space carried risk. The destroyed Golden Sun Mask and Blasphemous Tome proved this. The power of Truth was not something common objects could bear. If handled poorly, at best the sacred relic serving as a medium would be destroyed, and at worst those assisting from the side would risk their lives. It seemed more suitable to let cultists shoulder that kind of danger.

But now, Duncan suddenly had a new idea.

This idea came from the Storm Goddess’s signature on the pass.

It might be a sign of goodwill, or some kind of reminder.

Of course, he could not explain this to Vanna in too much detail. After all, she was still a devout Saint. If he said straight out, “I think cultists’ sacred relics are too hard to find, so I want to try using your Deep Sea Church’s sacred relics instead,” it would obviously be quite improper. She might very well leap at him with an overhead strike…

Vanna did not think about the reason behind Duncan’s casual question. She was only surprised that the captain had suddenly taken an interest in the Gods. But she soon remembered that he did seem to have unique insight and study in theology, so she thought carefully and answered: “That depends on what kind of communication you mean. In general, we call all acts of worship ‘communication with the gods’. Even a simple evening prayer by an ordinary member of the congregation is a conversation with the god.

“Above that are the ordained priests. Through years of training and practice, and with the help of special rituals and items, they come to understand the god’s ‘knowledge’ and draw power from that knowledge and Truth, or use Listening Rites to receive the god’s revelations. That is a further level of ‘communication’.

“A higher level still is a Saint like me. A Saint does not need very complex ritual preparations. We only need our own spiritual insight to resonate, and we can communicate with the god’s will more directly, because our spiritual insight is connected to the god’s spiritual insight…”

There was a hint of pride in Vanna’s voice at the end, but she noticed Duncan slightly frowning. Clearly, these were not the answers the captain wanted.

“Not that kind of communication,” Duncan shook his head. He slowly searched for the right words, wanting Vanna to understand what he meant. “I mean… something more direct, closer, more efficient… a link, do you understand? Not vaguely receiving a revelation during prayer, but being able to talk directly with the Four Gods.”

Vanna slowly opened her mouth and did not come back to her senses for a long while.

So Duncan knew he probably could not get an answer from her. It was about what he had expected.

“Forget it. This is a bit beyond the mortal realm,” he waved his hand and let out a light breath. “The ritual techniques you use are not useful for me. Maybe it would be more effective if I just found a few Sacred Tomes from the Four Gods’ churches and read them myself.”

Vanna blinked. As usual, she felt she could not quite keep up with the captain’s train of thought.

But thankfully, the captain did not linger on this strange topic.

“Later, go to the White Oak and hand the pass to Lawrence. I will not go over,” Duncan instructed. “If he asks about what comes next, tell him to act with the Vanished for now. When matters here in Frostholm are completely settled, we will plan further.”

Vanna lowered her head: “Yes, Captain.”

Duncan nodded, but then he seemed to hear something. His brows knitted slightly: “Hm?”

Vanna asked curiously: “What is it?”

“Agatha is looking for me,” Duncan said slowly, his expression growing serious. “She says she has found a way to enter the Deep Sea.”

Chapter 471: The Possibilities Behind the key

In Frostholm, in a secret facility deep beneath the southern Harbor, all unrelated personnel had already been cleared from the site. Agatha and Tyrian were waiting together for Duncan to arrive.

Behind them stood the huge machine secretly built by the former City Hall. An egg-shaped pressure-resistant capsule was fixed firmly among the beams by steel cables. Light from the ceiling shone down onto the metal hull of the submersible, making it gleam with a cold, mute sheen.

Silence filled the hall. After a slightly tense wait, Agatha suddenly lifted her head. Her voice, ethereal and hoarse like a Restless Soul, broke the silence: “He is here.”

As soon as she spoke, she spread her hands in midair. Green flames roared up from the scars and cracks all over her body, as if she were embracing a blazing sun. In front of Agatha, a dim green flame suddenly burst upward and gathered into a rotating gate of fire. The skeletal form of Ai was the first to fly out of the gate, followed by a tall figure wrapped in bandages and wearing a black coat.

Tyrian bowed to that figure and stepped half a pace to the side: “Father.”

Agatha lowered her hands and drew back the flames on her body. She clasped her hands before her chest in a prayer-like pose and bowed her head slightly: “I am sorry to trouble you to come in person again.”

“It is fine. This avatar has nothing else to do anyway. Seeing the site in person is more efficient than listening to reports,” Duncan waved his hand and walked past Tyrian and Agatha. His gaze had already fallen on the huge machine behind them. “So… this is it?”

“Yes,” Agatha nodded gently. “This is the legacy left by Governor Winston – and perhaps by other former governors as well. According to our current inspections, the submersible is close to completion and in good condition.”

Duncan gave a quiet “Mm” but did not speak further. He simply stood there in silence, as if gazing upon a fragment of frozen history.

That sealed history seemed to gaze back at him. Time had trapped ambitions and lonely searching that no one could fully know today. Under the crisscrossing lights, in this hall that had almost been buried and forgotten, all the fears and courage of mortals had been cast into this cold steel.

Duncan could almost hear the obsession and the roars cast into the steel.

He took a few steps forward, came to the edge of the railing, and reached out to touch the submersible’s cold, hard shell. Deep within his own body, this shell that had already lost its life, there seemed to be a faint tremor. The feeling disappeared in an instant.

But even that fleeting feeling gave Duncan a sense of familiarity. He searched his memories and found where it came from:

It was when he first set foot on the surface of Pland, standing before Nina as “Uncle Duncan”, and Nina ran toward him with a bright smile, arms wide open. It was when he found that silver brooch on the Vanished and heard someone speak the name “Lucretia”. At those times, faint traces of attachment and memory had surged up from the depths of his heart, like scraps of humanity left in a shell that could never quite be wiped away.

Duncan drew back his arm and lowered his head, looking thoughtfully at his own palm, as if he were gazing at the former master of this body. After a long time, he spoke softly: “Ah. So you know about this…”

Tyrian’s voice came from the side: “Father? What did you say?”

“Nothing,” Duncan turned around. “Can this submersible be used now?”

“Well…” Tyrian sounded a little troubled. “We carefully checked the facility here and the condition of the submersible. The main structure of the submersible is intact, but there are two problems. First, it seems all the original technicians in this facility have been lost, and the documents and equipment left in the outer hall are badly damaged. That problem is still manageable. Some of the ‘old hands’ in the Sea Mist Fleet should be able to handle this thing, since it was built based on the blueprints left by the Queen of Frostholm. The second problem is more troublesome…”

Tyrian paused for a moment, then went on after choosing his words: “From our preliminary checks, we found that this submersible is very different from the ones used back then. It does not rely on air pumps on the surface. Instead, it uses built-in oxygen cylinders. But we have only found where the cylinders should be installed. We have not found any cylinders themselves. Perhaps that part was never finished. That is why Lady Agatha said it is ‘almost complete’. If we want to quickly build an oxygen supply system that fits this submersible now, it may take quite some time.”

Duncan turned his head and looked at Tyrian quietly.

Tyrian grew a little nervous: “Father?”

“I do not need to breathe,” Duncan looked into Tyrian’s eyes. “Is there still a problem now?”

Tyrian: “…”

The new governor of Frostholm froze for a moment, then suddenly realized. An awkward look flashed across his face, and he hurriedly nodded: “Ah. Then there is no problem at all…”

“You can hardly find anyone in the entire Sea Mist Fleet who even needs to breathe, yet you are getting stuck on this,” Duncan shook his head. “It seems everything lately really has worn you out. All right. Since there is no problem, go get ready. I want this submersible made ready in the shortest possible time. That is what I care about most in Frostholm right now.”

Tyrian straightened at once. Though he had not heard an order from his father for a century, his muscles still tensed by reflex: “Yes, Father!”

Then Tyrian left, going to carry out his father’s order as quickly as possible.

Duncan turned around and looked again at the strange diving apparatus for a while. Then he noticed that Agatha was still standing where she had been and looked as if she had something to say.

Duncan turned his head, his gaze sweeping over Agatha and the shadow on the ground beside her. Then he nodded: “You can speak now. It is just us here. Go on, what is happening? Which of you will speak first?”

Agatha was stunned for a moment, then reacted sharply: “You… already noticed?”

“There are two shadows in the firelight. One of them tried very hard to hide, but the flames on your bodies come from me. From my point of view, that kind of hiding is… clumsy,” Duncan turned back, his eyes a little gentle. “I noticed as soon as I arrived, but since you did not want to mention it just now, I did not ask.”

“I only thought this matter should not be made known to General Tyrian for the moment.”

As Agatha spoke, she slowly stepped aside.

Her shadow stayed where it was.

The next second, the shadow left on the ground suddenly rippled. A vague, ghostly figure rose from it, wearing what seemed to be the old attire of a Gatekeeper. The figure bent slightly toward Duncan, and a hoarse voice almost identical to Agatha's sounded: "It is good to see you, Duncan… Captain."

"This should be my first time seeing you," Duncan looked at the wavering shadow with a hint of surprise. After studying it curiously for a few seconds, he suddenly raised his head to look at Agatha not far away. "Is she always this blurry?"

"She is very clear when she is in a mirror, but there is no mirror here," Agatha explained at once. "Also, from our tests, she becomes blurry when she feels nervous. The more nervous she is, the blurrier she gets. Right now… she is a little nervous in front of you."

"How remarkable," Duncan found it more and more incredible. He looked at the phantom. Even though he had already sensed her presence earlier, he still could not help his amazement now. "I thought you had already scattered into the darkness. Agatha read the memories you left behind when you faded."

"I did fade for a time, but in the end I returned to this world," the hazy shadow said. "I am sorry. I do not know how to explain the process either. When I became aware of my own existence again, I was already a reflection in a mirror…"

Agatha spoke again: "We suspect it has to do with that 'key', but we have no proof."

"The key?"

“The brass key,” Agatha nodded. “From her hazy impression, she reappeared in this world when I took hold of that brass key. Perhaps that key does more than store information. It might also preserve memories, personality, or even a soul to some extent. When the right conditions are met, the stored memories and soul can be ‘reshaped’ in some form…”

Duncan listened quietly and did not speak right away.

The key left behind by Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm was now aboard the Vanished, in the hand of his true body. Out of caution, he had not yet tried using that key on Alice, and now it seemed… that caution might have been right!

Agatha touched the key, and the “replica Agatha” who had once also held the key had returned to this world. So if he used the key on Alice, what would happen?

Could that key be storing Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm’s memories, or even her soul?

For generations, every governor of Frostholm had been affected over and over whenever they came into contact with the brass key. They had been forced to learn the truth of the Abyssal Trench Project, forced to inherit the Queen of Frostholm’s “legacy”, and even had their own wills disturbed by the Queen’s will. All this influence had always been crudely explained as “the Queen of Frostholm’s curse”. But what had happened to Agatha now made Duncan aware of the possibilities behind that key.

When he thought again of how Alice had the exact same face as the Queen of Frostholm, those possibilities pointed toward an even more unsettling direction: the doll was the vessel, and the key held the soul. Put together, they would be the Queen of Frostholm.

Duncan kept silent, though he sighed softly in his heart.

He understood now why Agatha had not brought this up in front of Tyrian earlier.

But then he suddenly felt that something about this was not right.

Alice as a doll, and the brass key that could “store a soul”… were those really enough to bring about the Queen of Frostholm’s return? Could things truly be that simple?

Chapter 472: Doubts about The key

Out on the distant Boundless Sea, Duncan sat at the desk in the captain’s cabin and frowned slightly.

He reached out and opened the hidden compartment beneath the desk. From the concealed space, he felt out the brass key that Agatha had discovered earlier and handed to him, and set it in front of himself to examine it closely.

The winding key had an old-fashioned design and a cold metallic sheen. It reflected the sunlight pouring in from the window. Tiny decorative patterns caught his eye on the handle, which was shaped like an infinity symbol.

This was not the first time Duncan had studied the key, but this time, as he used his gaze on this “Queen’s relic”, his feelings were completely different from before.

This might be Ray Nora’s “soul vessel”. That possibility made his gaze grow complicated.

Ray Nora, the Queen of Frostholm, was a great person. The secrets hidden in her drew Duncan’s attention even more. If there was a chance for him to establish communication with Ray Nora, that would of course be a good thing—but the premise could not be gambling with Alice.

In the city of Frostholm, Duncan, wearing a black coat, narrowed his eyes slightly. He seemed to rein in the thoughts that had scattered for a moment.

His gaze fell again on Agatha, and on the hazy shadowy “Agatha” beside her.

He suddenly asked: “Do you still remember your experiences moving through the city-state as a ‘replica’?”

“Yes, I remember everything,” the shadowy figure seemed to nod as she spoke. “I also remember going deep into the mine and melding into that strange region of After the Darkness…”

Duncan said: “I already know that part. Agatha… I mean, the ‘original’ Agatha, has already reported this to me.” A thoughtful look came over his face. “To be honest, your appearance reminds me of someone.”

“Someone?” the two Agathas said almost in unison.

“A soul shadow named Martha,” Duncan said slowly. “She is Lawrence’s wife and a new member of my fleet. For the last ten-odd years, her identity has been that of a ‘replica’ wandering in mirror world Frostholm.”

The hazy phantom Agatha shifted slightly.

“In the past ten-odd years, that ‘replica’ wandered in the space of the mirror world,” Duncan went on, his gaze resting on the blurry figure. “She drew in and gathered a huge number of fragments of thoughts and memories. That made her grow into a vast ‘composite’, and ‘Martha’ is the core personality of that composite.

“From how things look now, your situation is very similar to Martha’s. The difference is that you have not yet become a composite like hers. You are still in an early, pure stage. Of course, since mirror world Frostholm has been destroyed, you will probably stay in this stage from now on.”

“It turns out there is… something like this,” said the genuine Agatha. Her tone carried disbelief. “I thought what happened to me was an exception…”

“It is not an exception. That is why it interests me even more,” Duncan said calmly, though his gaze still rested on the hazy figure. “When mirror world Frostholm faded, all the ‘replicas’ vanished with it. But now two ‘personalities’ remain.

“Does that mean the power that supports replica Martha and replica Agatha is not that mirror world city itself, but something else? The personalities and memories copied from that sea region can keep existing stably in the Mortal Realm, and Martha is even now outside the Frostholm sea. Does that at the same time mean… the power that maintains replica Agatha and replica Martha is something as vast and stable as the Mortal Realm itself?”

Silence fell over the hall where the submersible was parked.

After who knew how long, Agatha finally lifted her head and quietly met her own “shadow’s” gaze.

Duncan suddenly broke the silence: “Have you two thought about the future?”

“The future?” Agatha was stunned, as if she had never thought along that line. “You mean…”

“A person cannot live forever as someone else’s shadow—literally a shadow,” Duncan said, his gaze resting on the hazy phantom. “You should think about the days ahead.”

The blurry phantom fell silent. After a long time, she spoke with a hint of hesitation: “But I really am her shadow.”

“I will say it again: a ‘person’ cannot live forever as another person’s shadow,” Duncan still said calmly as he looked at her with his gaze. “You have your own personality and your own memories. Maybe more than twenty of those years belong to someone else, but at least the last few days belong to you.

“So what about from now on, Agatha?”

When Duncan spoke the name “Agatha”, both figures looked up at the same time without thinking.

His gaze swept over the two of them. Then he let out a light breath and said: “Think it over. It’s all right. We still have plenty of time.”

…

A knock on the door outside the captain’s cabin broke Duncan’s train of thought.

He drew most of his attention back from his “avatar form” in the Frostholm city-state, lifted his head, and looked toward the door of his bedroom: “Come in.”

The door opened. Alice poked her head in first to take a look, then slipped into the room like a thief, holding a plate of still-steaming pastries in her hands: “I learned how to bake cookies!”

With a proud tone, she set the pastries on the table in front of Duncan, then glanced around the room as if looking for Ai.

“Ai is in Frostholm,” Duncan said casually, his eyes resting on the Brother Doll in front of him.

This was the “inner room” of the captain’s cabin, his bedroom. On the whole ship, besides Nina, only Alice could walk into this room so casually.

She was the first person—the first humanoid being—he had met after coming to this world.

He trusted her. Although she was not very reliable, Duncan knew that this doll young lady’s honesty and trust in him outweighed everything. Even though this almost extreme trust mostly came from her simple, solid brain, in this cold and unfamiliar world, that first and deepest trust still felt very precious.

Alice finally noticed Duncan's gaze. She turned her head in confusion, checked her clothes, then touched her neck and asked: "Why are you staring at me?"

"It's nothing," Duncan withdrew his gaze and casually picked up a cookie from the plate, popping it into his mouth. "…It tastes okay."

Alice laughed happily.

Then she noticed the brass key lying on the table.

"Ah, you're studying this key," Alice said. She picked it up without thinking and played with it curiously. Then she felt around her back. "Are you going to wind me up?"

"Don't mess with it." Duncan reached out and snatched the key back, his tone turning very serious. "From now on, you cannot touch this key without my permission."

Maybe she had not seen Duncan this serious for a long time. Alice was even a little frightened. She quickly pulled her hands back. A tense, almost scared look came over her face: "S-sorry…"

"Sorry, I scared you," Duncan said at once, realizing it and softening his tone. "You did nothing wrong, and I'm not scolding you—it's just that this key may be dangerous for you."

"Dangerous?" Alice blinked, as if she could not understand. She reached back in confusion and felt the keyhole through her clothes. "But I heard Shirley and Nina say… this key should be used to wind me up… Ah, Nina even bought a wind-up toy soldier in the city. I played with it for a long time. The toy soldier's winding key was just like this…"

Duncan rubbed his brow. Even though he knew Alice might find it hard to understand, he still explained patiently: “This key is not something that simple. It is an extraordinary item, do you understand? Queen Ray Nora left it behind, and I now suspect this is some kind of method she prepared to revive herself.”

Alice stared straight into Duncan’s eyes. After a long while, she drew out her voice: “Ah… ah?”

“Ray Nora’s memories and soul might be stored in this key,” Duncan said. He was not surprised by Alice’s reaction. He only sighed softly, pressed the key down on the table, and looked at the doll in front of him. “And you look exactly the same as Ray Nora.”

After staring blankly for a while, Alice finally began to understand. She lowered her head to look at her own body, then looked at the key pinned to the table by the captain. After a long time she asked: “So, if you wind me up, that Frostholm Queen might be able to control my body?”

“That is what I’m worried about,” Duncan nodded. In front of this simple-minded doll, he did not hide his thoughts. “Of course, this worry is not very… reasonable. There are still many doubtful points.”

“Doubtful points?”

“The biggest one is how uncontrollable the whole process is,” Duncan said. “You should know how you were found. Your doll’s spirit coffin drifted in the sea near Frostholm and was salvaged by a passing ship by chance.

“And the key? The key was in the hands of the city-state’s successive governors. They passed it down for half a century, yet no one knew about the link between the key and you, this doll. If this is the Frostholm Queen’s method of reviving herself, then it depends far too much on luck.

“The doll might not end up together with the key. The person who gets the key might not know of its connection to the doll. Even if they know, they might not choose to turn the key. Even Tyrian does not know any of this. Who would wind you up then? And besides… under the terrifying label of Anomaly 099, how many people would even dare approach the doll’s spirit coffin?”

Alice half understood as she listened to the captain. After she finally grasped most of it, she asked curiously: “Then… what about the other doubtful points?”

“The other doubts…”

Duncan thought for a moment. In his mind, he suddenly recalled the Frostholm Queen he had seen in the “vision” when he had probed Alice’s “coffin” earlier, and the sentence the Frostholm Queen had left—

Please do not corrupt history.

Would the Frostholm Queen, who had calmly gone to her death in the face of fate, really arrange a backup plan to revive herself decades later?

Chapter 473: The Blasphemous Archetype and the Fall

Alice left.

Duncan did not know how much this silly doll had actually understood, but at least she now realized that the key was dangerous. Before they figured out its true nature, she probably would not think about winding herself up again.

Outside the window, the evening sun was slowly sinking. The two brilliant rune rings were drawing closer and closer to the distant horizon. Their spreading red-gold light dyed the whole sea, then passed through the window and spilled into the room.

Duncan sat at the desk by the window, quietly turning his gaze on the brass key. sunlight covered the handle, which was shaped like an infinity symbol. The fine patterns on it seemed to come to life in the light, flowing as the shadows shifted.

After a short moment of thought and hesitation, Duncan took a quiet breath and reached out to grip the key.

A trace of fine, ghostly green flame appeared at his fingertips and slowly seeped into the key.

He had not planned to use the fire of spirit form to study the key, because the Power of Flame could very easily damage the key’s extraordinary nature. Even if it did not destroy it, it might change what it was. But now he could no longer worry about that.

He had to find out what Ray Nora had left inside the key. Under that premise, he could only be extremely careful. He tried his best to keep the fire of spirit form from burning the thing too fiercely, while he felt for every tiny bit of information that the flames brought back. He was ready to snuff them out at once if anything felt wrong.

The flame flowed like water between his fingers and the key. The ghostly green light seeped bit by bit into the brass surface. In Duncan's senses, his fire seemed to be sinking into a vast and boundless place full of strange chaos.

He slowly closed his eyes and used the spreading flames as his eyes, beginning to observe the "world" behind the key.

Mist. Endless mist. It flowed like dust and smoke, rising and sinking in his field of view, sometimes condensing, sometimes scattering. Everywhere the flame could see, there was only chaotic emptiness.

Duncan watched the dense mist in confusion, but in every direction he saw only the same, even chaos.

He knew this was the "reality" inside the key. He was doing the same thing he had done when he probed the doll's spirit coffin back then. However, what he found here was completely different from the inside of that spirit coffin.

He stayed still in the endless fog for a while. He could sense the flames still spreading steadily, and the key itself showed no sign of being harmed or damaged. Only then did he breathe a little easier and tentatively try to move his view in one direction.

But as soon as he moved forward, he felt the texture of something foreign in his palm.

“The key?”

Duncan first thought of the brass key he held in the Mortal Realm. Then he realized something else—he actually had a “body” in this thick mist.

He clearly remembered that last time, when he had examined the doll’s spirit coffin, he had only had a “field of view”.

Why had this changed? Was it because the two extraordinary items had different natures, or because his own power had gone through some unknown change?

Questions rose sharply in Duncan’s heart. At the same time he lifted his hand without thinking and looked at the “foreign object” in his palm.

A rectangular object with a black shell lay quietly there. From the feel, he could not tell if it was metal or plastic.

Duncan froze.

It was only about half a palm in length and two fingers wide. Its smooth, flat surface was clearly the product of some kind of crafting. Under the black shell he could vaguely see fine lines that might have been decorative or part of the internal structure. At one end he saw a complex metallic port, with a row of evenly spaced raised contacts inside.

It looked as if it was some kind of “readable device” that could be plugged into a machine to store data or act as a starter.

Duncan held the black rectangle up before his eyes, studying every detail of it with a feeling of nameless shock.

He thought of USB drives from “the other world”, or portable hard drives, but the specifications of this device’s port were clearly unlike any he knew.

After he stared at it for a long time, another thing suddenly came to mind—

In Pland, in the History Branch that had been consumed by a great fire, he had seen the Sunspawn who invaded the city-state all holding a black parasol. Inside that black parasol he had glimpsed complex, advanced, and precise mechanical, even electronic, structures…

Duncan remembered the black parasol he had seen in Pland, and then examined the rectangular device in his hand again. In the end he confirmed that the Sunspawn's black parasol and this strange "device" did not seem to have the same style. They looked like products of two different technological routes or design styles, yet they shared something in common —

Precision, advancement, complexity. Just from their appearance, they seemed far beyond the level of technology in this world.

At the very least, they did not look like anything the city-states of the Boundless Sea could make, or had ever made.

And in this world, things like this seemed to have a special name:

Blasphemous Archetype.

Dog had once described them like this:

"In the long river of this world's years, some parts of history are 'locked'. The things that were born in those forbidden histories are Blasphemous Archetypes. In most cases, their very existence is harmful to living beings in the Mortal Realm…"

This "black box" that looked like some kind of data device… was it a Blasphemous Archetype?

Duncan frowned slightly, turning the little device over and over in his hand while he thought about what connection it had with the brass key he was holding in the Mortal Realm. Just then, a strange, low rumbling sound suddenly came from somewhere extremely high and far away, cutting off his thoughts.

Duncan lifted his head in shock and looked toward the source of the sound.

The next second, he saw a sudden bright light appear in the endless chaotic mist that filled the space. The light came from far away like a meteor falling hard, then formed a blazing fireball in the fog.

It roared over Duncan's head, lowering in altitude as it flew. The mist was blown aside. Within the dazzling ball of fire, some huge thing took shape. Duncan saw a solid object driven by flame—

It looked like three spindle-shaped bodies bound together. At the end of each spindle he could see a huge stream of light bursting from some kind of thruster. Thick smoke billowed along the outer hulls. Fire flared everywhere, and shocking explosions and tears kept ripping through them. Chunks of debris kept breaking off from the blast points and fell like rain into the thick mist, turning into shooting stars as they fell and burned out in the sky…

With no point of reference, Duncan could not judge how big the "three-bodied ship" streaking across the sky really was. But he could feel the overpowering shock and pressure of that huge form wrapped in flame and smoke. It might have been bigger than a city-state, even bigger than many city-states put together. It might have crossed a long journey, gliding past the stars on some astronomical scale.

Now it slid and fell through this vision wrapped in mist, and in Duncan's stunned gaze, the fall ended in a world-shaking explosion—

With an explosion that seemed enough to shake all of space and time, the "ark-ship" made of three spindles broke apart.

It split into three pieces that became three burning fireballs. Three blinding trails laden with thick smoke scattered into the depths of the fog.

They were very far away, at a distance one could never reach on foot.

Moreover, Duncan doubted that even if he could teleport thousands of miles, he still would not be able to reach the place where those three pieces of wreckage had fallen.

Because this fog only recorded something that had happened in the distant past.

A faint warmth came from his palm. Duncan lowered his head and saw a brass key lying quietly in his hand. The handle at the end of the brass key, shaped like an infinity symbol, was giving off a soft glow. The fine lines on it slowly moved in the light and formed symbols he could recognize:

“The New Hope”

“Boom!”

A phantom roar suddenly exploded in his mind. The fog around him vanished into darkness. Then light and shadow shifted, and the familiar scene of his bedroom returned to his sight.

Duncan steadied himself and felt his senses quickly return. He lowered his head again and saw the brass key still lying quietly in his hand.

The key was no longer warm or glowing. The fine lines on its handle no longer flowed. The characters that had floated before his eyes just now felt like bubbles that had vanished with the end of a dream.

But Duncan still clearly remembered everything he had seen. He remembered that name—

The New Hope.

He frowned, quickly stood up, and took the notebook from the desk. He wrote down the words “The New Hope”, then hurriedly jotted a rough record of the scene he had seen in the “vision”. Only after he had written everything down did he breathe a little easier and sit back the way he had at the start.

In this world, it was unlikely that anything could affect his memory and thoughts, but he still had to keep the necessary caution.

After finishing the record, Duncan fell into deep thought.

He did not know the causes and consequences of what he had seen. He did not know what kind of link or “transformation” process existed between the black data device in the vision and the brass key. He did not know where the fallen ark-ship was now. But he believed that everything he had seen was not some confused hallucination.

It was something that had really happened once. It was real history that had taken place in this world in the distant past, in years before even the Age of City-States had begun.

A huge ship had crashed into this world. It exploded as it fell, and its wreckage scattered across the mortal world.

Duncan let out a soft breath.

He put the key away close to his body, raised his head, and looked out the window at Vision 001, which had almost completely sunk down to the sea’s surface.

“This time… things just got a lot more interesting.”

Chapter 474: Morris’s Knowledge Blind Spot

When the veil of night descended, Morris was called to the captain’s cabin.

Duncan sat behind the enchanted sea chart table with a serious face. On the tabletop beside his hand, a messy pile of books had already formed. Some were books they had brought from Pland and Frostholm, and some had been acquired from the Sea Mist Fleet.

After they confirmed that reading at sea was harmless, the number of books on the ship kept growing.

Morris glanced at the table and saw that the books covered all kinds of topics. There were strange tales from various city-states, authoritative works on history, and some dangerous reading that dealt with Doomsday theories and Records of revelation and other fringe doctrines.

The old scholar felt curiosity stir in his heart, along with a thin thread of unease.

The captain seemed to have suddenly decided to look for some specific information. Judging from the books he had taken out, what he wanted to find was probably not simple at all. If he had called Morris here, it was most likely to ask about such things.

Becoming a little more cautious, Morris quickly recited the name of the God of Wisdom Rahm in his mind, praying in silent Prayer for a blessing over his thoughts. He also lowered his head to check the charm amulet on his wrist, a string of colored stones, before sitting down opposite the captain and asking: “What did you call me here for?”

“…I ran into some problems and need to ask a learned man like you for advice,” Duncan nodded. Then he seemed to notice the tension on Morris’s face. He smiled and tried to reassure him as he added, “Don’t be so nervous. I just want to ask a few things. It might have something to do with history.”

Just a few questions? History? Secrets of Truth so obscure that even the Master of the Vanished could not be sure of them?

Hearing the captain’s comforting words, Morris hurriedly flipped Rahm’s name back and forth in his heart a dozen more times, piling that foolish divine blessing on layer after layer. Only then did he tense his nerves and raise his head: “I am ready. Please ask.”

Duncan: “…”

Feeling a bit helpless, Duncan knew this reaction from the old mister was only natural. He sighed, then began to speak while choosing his words: “In the history you know, has there ever been a description of something like this – some gigantic man-made object falling from the sky, accompanied by great flames and flashes of light? This fallen relic might also have exploded, breaking into several smaller pieces that then fell onto the world.”

When he finished, Duncan looked straight into Morris’s eyes.

Morris stared back, stunned.

“…Is that all?” the old scholar asked hesitantly.

“That’s it, that’s all,” Duncan nodded. Of course he had many more details, but for such a vague question about history, too many details might actually affect Morris’s judgment. So he chose the simplest way to put it. “If history recorded something like this, the words might be different, but the main event should still be built around the scene of a huge object falling in flames. Do you know of any similar event?”

The question the captain had suddenly thrown out was puzzling, but Morris noticed how serious Duncan was and still tried hard to recall and think. After several minutes, he slowly shook his head: “I have never seen a record like that.”

“In all official histories and unofficial histories?” Duncan was not surprised by Morris’s answer, but he still asked, unwilling to give up. “This event may have been turned into myth, or even become part of some Heretic doctrines, because it might have happened in a very distant past.”

“I am very sure,” Morris answered again. “In all official histories, unofficial histories, and Heretic doctrines I have ever come across, there is no record that matches or even resembles the scene you described. Of course, that does not rule out the chance that this event is written down in some obscure legend that spread only in a tiny circle, or some part of history that has already been lost. There is always something unknown beyond what we know, but…”

Morris paused for a moment, then continued: “If it is a hidden piece of history so secret that even I do not know it, then it will be very hard for you to find any material about it from other sources. Maybe you can try your luck at the Truth Academy’s grand library, and look for clues in the oldest books in Morka and Lightwind Harbor.”

For a while Duncan did not speak. His calm gaze sank into thought. After a long time, he gave a slight nod: “You can write to the scholars you know and ask about this. If we really need to contact the headquarters of the Truth Academy, that is also fine.”

Hearing the captain’s serious tone, Morris straightened at once and nodded solemnly.

It seemed this matter was truly very important.

As an old scholar who had studied knowledge all his life, he could not help feeling his own curiosity stir. He could not hold back from asking: “May I ask something? The thing you spoke of… what exactly is it?”

Duncan hesitated for a moment, then slowly answered: “I am not sure. I touched on certain visions by chance. But even if I cannot be sure what it really is… I feel that scene is probably closely tied to why our world looks the way it does today, and to much of the history that has been lost.”

“I understand,” Morris bowed his head deeply. “I will find a way to investigate.”

He did not keep asking for details, and he did not ask what kind of “visions” the captain had mentioned, because he knew that curiosity and the desire to explore must be just right, not too little and not too much.

After a short pause, Duncan added: “‘The New Hope’. When you search through the material, pay special attention to these words.”

“That sounds like the name of a ship?” Morris asked, thinking it over.

Duncan thought for a moment, then nodded with a strange expression: “Yes… a ship.”

It was indeed a ship. A spaceship whose engine exploded, which fell from the starry sea down to the earth.

…

In Frostholm’s south port, inside a hidden underground facility, Undying engineers were hard at work.

Knowledge from half a century ago was once again useful. Ancient Blueprints had been taken out from the fleet's stores. Engineers as old as those Blueprints gathered with excitement among heaps of machines, pipes, and cables, talking about knowledge and ideas that to ordinary people would sound like some secret script from heaven.

Tyrian sat in a corner of the hall, watching his subordinates rushing around.

"I really did not think that, in my lifetime, I would see these Blueprints put to use again," an Undying engineer said excitedly beside him. His head was shriveled, his chest had a hole in it, and half his body was driven by a steam engine. He held the drawings in his hands as he spoke. "Look at these drainage devices and balance mechanisms. They made many modern changes to the Submersible, but the basic principles are still the same as back then. Flood the tanks, sink, pump the water out, float back up, and use ballast weights in the bilge to help…"

"I understand why you are excited," Tyrian glanced at his subordinate. "But I must remind you of one thing. You are no longer in your lifetime."

"Close enough. My 'time-until-death' works too," the shriveled-headed Undying engineer laughed, his broken teeth making his grin look quite scary. He raised his hand and gave the steam engine that made up half his body a heavy knock. The gears, which had been running a bit roughly, clacked a few times and started turning smoothly again. Then he looked up at the Submersible in the distance, surrounded by his comrades. After a long silence, he spoke with a bit of feeling: "Ah… if only we could meet its builders. It was designed very well. They really put their hearts into it… They must have truly wanted this thing to be used."

Tyrian said nothing. He only watched the Submersible in the middle of the hall with quiet gaze. After a long time, he sighed softly: "Go and get back to work. This time it really will be used. Do not let anything go wrong."

“Yes, Captain.”

His subordinate left. Tyrian let out a slow breath. At that moment, a faint humming suddenly came from the scrying crystal lens by his hand. Right after that came Lucretia’s teasing voice: “You look worried, Brother. It seems being Governor is not very easy?”

Tyrian turned his face toward the sound without changing his expression and looked at the scrying crystal on the table as it slowly lit up. Lucretia’s image appeared in the crystal sphere.

“I went to all the trouble of moving this thing here from the ship, not so I could listen to you make jokes about your Big Brother,” he said.

“Relax a little, Brother. You are not a Pirate Lord anymore. A Governor has to be both dignified and approachable,” Lucretia smiled, as if she did not care at all about the displeasure in Tyrian’s tone. Then her voice shifted as she asked curiously, “But I really do want to know. Was this… truly Father’s arrangement?”

“What else?” Tyrian sighed. “He did something big here. Something you cannot even imagine. Now the whole of Frostholm is under his influence. I should feel lucky that he really has regained his humanity, so even though this arrangement is surprising, it is at least not bad. Frostholm and my Sea Mist Fleet both have an answer now.”

Lucretia finally put away her faintly teasing smile. After thinking for a moment, she hesitated and asked: “How is Father… now?”

“He is doing very well. His true body is on the Vanished. He spends his days either fishing or feeding pigeons. His avatar form is in Frostholm. Every morning he goes for a walk in the park, and every afternoon he comes here to supervise the progress of the project. You care that much?

Next time he comes, I can switch on the scrying crystal and let you talk to him directly?”

“Ah, better not!” Lucretia almost raised her voice by reflex, then hurried to return to the posture of a lady. “I… I still need to prepare myself. Let’s not talk about that. I still have a lot of things to handle over here…”

“Things over there?” Tyrian raised his eyebrows without thinking. “Speaking of that, how is your research going? What is the situation now with that ‘fragment’ that fell from the sky?”

Lucretia hesitated. She had only picked a random excuse to change the subject, but now she could not help letting out a sigh.

“There is no progress. Even Taran Ael in Lightwind Harbor has no way forward.”

Chapter 475: Taking the First Step in Exploration

Taran Ael was an outstanding elf scholar, an expert in mathematics, machinery, and general studies, and a recipient of four Lifetime Honors granted by the Truth Academy.

He was a man devoted to learning, a careful and diligent worker, someone who could stay in the lab without sleep or rest, and someone who made Lucretia worry all the time that he might suddenly drop dead at his research site.

Now, this well-read Grand Scholar openly announced in front of everyone that he had no way to deal with the geometric glowing orb that had fallen from the sky.

Lucretia raised her head. Her gaze went past the scrying crystal in front of her and landed on the window across from her. From that direction, a magnificent glow was spreading. Even though it was already midnight, the whole sea still seemed to be bathed in “sunlight”. In the middle of that glow, the huge luminous geometric body that was like a small mountain floated quietly on the sea. Its smooth, glowing walls were like steep cliffs, blocking the horizon between sky and sea.

Another small boat crossed the shining waters, heading toward the inside of that luminous geometric body. It was going to pick up the research team that had finished its shift near the “stone sphere”.

Lucretia sighed, pulling back her gaze from the window and looking down at the table by her hand. A strange, grayish ball sat on the stand on the tabletop.

Its surface was rough, with the texture of rock. Odd, uneven ridges with no clear pattern covered it. It looked plain, yet it gave off a mysterious feeling that was hard to put into words.

At the center of the huge geometric glowing orb floating on the sea, there was a bizarre stone sphere ten meters in diameter. The ball in front of Lucretia… was a small but precise replica of that stone sphere.

It was almost the only "result" that a large group of expert scholars had managed to produce after all this time.

"Taran Ael has gone back to Lightwind Harbor to rest. To be exact, his students 'dragged' him back to Lightwind Harbor," Lucretia shook her head and said to her Big Brother on the other side of the scrying crystal. "If he did not rest, I was afraid he might just drop dead outside. For an elf, dying suddenly at five hundred years old would be far too early."

"When he left, he was very discouraged, because this 'object from heaven' is completely beyond our understanding. Whether it is the glowing area around it or the nature of the core sphere itself, it is all a mystery to us.

"The researchers scraped some samples from the stone sphere, but analysis showed that they were just very fine stone dust. Probing the inside of the stone sphere had no progress at all. Every method failed, even extraordinary power. It is as if the thing is wrapped in a dense shell that hides all its secrets. At least for now, we have not yet made up our minds to carry out any destructive… 'tests' on it.

"After all this effort, we only reached one agreement, and that is… this huge geometric glowing orb really does seem to have fallen from the rune rings around Vision 001. This is the conclusion given by the ‘tower’ in Lightwind Harbor. They carefully examined the gap at the edge of Vision 001 and found that the missing part matches the ‘geometric glowing orb’.”

Lucretia spoke in one breath. Clearly, she had been holding in a lot of frustration these days. Tyrian proved to be a good listener. He did not interrupt once while his Younger Sister talked. Only after she finished did he slowly say: “So it has been confirmed that it is a part that broke off from Vision 001… Lucy, before this, Father already warned the Church of the Four Gods about this. He said the Sun may be heading toward decline.”

“I heard about that,” Lucretia nodded lightly. “A warning from ‘Captain Duncan’. No one dared treat it lightly, even if most people’s first reaction after hearing it was to feel tense and afraid of the Vanished…”

Tyrian pulled at the corner of his mouth. As someone who had been seeing “Duncan Abnomar” often lately, and who had seen Father’s new means with his own eyes, he really did not know what to say. He could only change the topic: “So do you have any follow-up plans? For the problem of the Sun…”

“What plans could we have? Throw this big stone ball back into the sky? Set it back into the Sun’s rune rings?” Lucretia shrugged. “I am afraid only the ancient kingdom of Critt would know how to repair the Sun in the sky.”

Tyrian fell silent.

After a moment of silence, Lucretia suddenly asked: “Does Father know about my ‘research’ here?”

“I have not told him,” Tyrian shook his head. “Without your permission, I would not say a word. Why? Do you want to ask him for help?”

Lucretia clearly hesitated, as if she really was tempted. But soon she shook her head: “I will think about it. He might not be able to help with something like this anyway, and… fine, I admit it, I am a little afraid of him."

"He is actually quite easy to talk to now," Tyrian laughed. "But since you do not want that, I will not interfere. Still, let me say this first. Even if I do not tell him, the news might reach his ears someday. He is in contact with the Church and the city-states now. If he becomes interested at some point, I will not dare stand in his way."

Lucretia waved her hand in annoyance. In front of her family, this "Sea Witch" who seemed shrouded in mystery to outsiders rarely bothered to hide her emotions: "I know, I know. Let's drop it. When are you going to give me that Spirit Realm lens you promised?"

Tyrian: "…"

Two seconds later, Lucretia's sharp, unhappy shout rang from the scrying crystal: "You forgot again?!?!"

…

"Tyrian, you don't look very well."

Early in the morning, Duncan came to the south port. Seeing the faint tiredness on Tyrian's face, he could not help saying that.

Tyrian rubbed his forehead and sighed helplessly: "There has just been too much to worry about lately."

This was not an excuse. There really was a lot to worry about these days. Managing a city-state clearly took far more effort than leading a fleet. But to be honest… being nagged at high intensity by his Younger Sister for two hours straight also had a real impact on his "complexion".

Soon, Tyrian went around this slightly awkward topic. He did not mention Lucretia. Instead he straightened his expression: "The reason I called you here so early is to tell you that the Submersible is ready."

Duncan raised his eyebrows: “So soon?”

“Once we considered that the passengers do not need to breathe, many of the preparations could be sped up,” Tyrian nodded. “And this secret Submersible built by the former Frostholm government was constructed based on Blueprints from the Queen’s era. Although there are many improvements, the basic principles have not changed much. If we only want to understand how to operate it, that is actually quite simple.”

Duncan looked at Tyrian for a moment, then withdrew his gaze and nodded with satisfaction: “Good. Take me to it.”

“You want to start right away?” Tyrian was a little surprised. “We can run a few more tests. I asked you here today only so you could see it with your own eyes…”

Duncan cut him off: “You have already done some tests, haven’t you?”

“…A little,” Tyrian hesitated. “After we finished the system checks, I sent two Undying sailors on a short dive last night, only a few dozen meters. It was mainly to confirm the operating procedures and working state of the Submersible. Nothing went wrong…”

“That is enough,” Duncan nodded and turned toward the warehouse that led down into the underground facility. “I will personally complete the rest of the testing. In any case, I am the one who has to carry out the actual Deep Dive mission.”

Tyrian froze for a moment, then quickly followed after Duncan. On the hurried way to the facility, he could not help feeling a hint of doubt.

He did not know if it was just his imagination, but he felt that today Father seemed a bit weighed down, and this sense of urgency was not normal for him.

It was as if Duncan had suddenly noticed some clue or touched upon some great secret, and now the urge to uncover the riddle and seek the truth was pushing him forward.

And this hurried manner… gave Tyrian a faint sense of familiarity.

The tall figure in the black coat walked quickly in front, and Tyrian hurried to keep up from behind.

As he watched Duncan's back and followed step by step, Tyrian suddenly realized where this familiar feeling came from.

It felt just like many years ago.

Whenever they found clues to some ancient ruins, whenever a new route appeared on the enchanted sea chart, whenever news came from the borderlands about mysterious Visions, Father would be like this.

This was how he looked right before he set off on a voyage.

Long-faded memories rose uncontrollably from the depths of Tyrian's mind. The scenes of sailing with Father in the past appeared before his eyes. In those overlapping images, Tyrian's steps slowed without him noticing.

Duncan stopped and turned, looking at him with some confusion.

"Tyrian, what are you daydreaming about? Hurry up and keep up."

Tyrian jolted, then quickly stepped forward and answered in a rush: "Ah… oh, yes, Father!"

Duncan turned back and kept walking, not paying much attention to Tyrian's reaction.

Because that urgent desire to explore the world had risen in him once more, pushing at him again and again.

It came from what he had gained yesterday while probing that brass key. It came from that sudden glimpse beneath a corner of this world's mysterious veil.

A vast ship that had crashed on this world in some lost age, a creation of an ancient civilization from hidden history called the "Blasphemous Archetype", secrets in the deep layers that even a Grand Scholar like Morris had never touched.

There were too many unknown things. A clue appearing by chance only made him more aware of how tangled and layered the world's secrets were, like veil upon veil.

So every chance to take a step toward the truth of the world became extremely precious.

An Explorer should be this way.

Chapter 476: Descent

Beneath South Port, the submersible control hall was brightly lit.

Light from gas lamps and electric bulbs poured down, making the entire hall as bright as day. A huge egg-shaped diving apparatus hung from steel cables at the top of the rail that led out to the sea. Undying engineers hurried everywhere, busy with the final checks and adjustments before the submersible entered the water.

At the steel-frame platform that held the submersible in place, Duncan sat on a chair, calmly watching all of this, waiting for Tyrian's subordinates to finish their preparations.

Those Undying, whose faces were strange and ugly, even almost frightening, seemed very excited, with a faint joy and thrill about them.

A burly bald man with a nervous, uneasy look on his face walked over from not far away. He bent down awkwardly in front of Duncan and said: "Uh… old captain, it's good to see you…"

Duncan looked up at the burly man in a seafarer shirt, his scalp shining, his skin as pale as a corpse. He compared him with the information he had learned before and nodded lightly: "You are Aiden, the one who followed Tyrian back in the days of the Vanished Fleet."

"That's me," Aiden broke into a grin. "You still remember me?"

"I don't," Duncan shook his head. "Sorry, I have forgotten most things. Subspace damaged my memories. I only heard about you and the other first-generation Seafarers of the Sea Mist Fleet from other people."

"Please don't apologize, don't apologize," Aiden looked even more flustered. He shook his head and said: "It's… it's enough that you could come back. Everyone really missed you."

"They should be quite afraid, I think?" Duncan glanced around the hall with a smile. Many eyes dodged in fear as his gaze passed. "It's fine. Right now I'm only using an avatar form. If my true body came here, most sailors probably wouldn't be able to work in peace."

"More than half the people here are 'second-generation', and they really are scared of you," Aiden said, scratching at his shirt buttons in embarrassment. "After all, their first contact with you…"

"I know. The encounter at Frostholm fifty years ago." Duncan let out a slow breath and said it casually. As his words fell, Tyrian walked over quickly.

"The submersible is ready, Father."

"Oh, looks like it's time to go."

A smile appeared on Duncan's face. He rose from the chair and walked with Tyrian toward the platform that held the submersible in place. The diving apparatus, which carried the wisdom and hard work of countless people, was already waiting in silence—

The round hatch on its side was already open. Lights shone through the thick watertight chamber, lighting up the inside of the sphere. It did not look spacious. Aside from the many confusing pipes, valves, and control panels, the space left for people to move looked like it could hold at most three or four people.

Duncan gave the submersible a once-over, then stepped forward.

But in the next second he suddenly stopped, as if sensing something, and looked toward one side.

A spinning Ashen Wind suddenly rushed into the hall. It whirled rapidly over to the submersible's platform and condensed into shape in front of Duncan, Tyrian, and the others.

Agatha stepped out of the Ashen Wind. She still wore that black long dress, with her hair hanging loose, dressed like a Blind Nun.

"I want to go with you."

She did not waste words. She walked up to Duncan and spoke directly.

"You want to dive as well?" Duncan looked at Agatha in some surprise. "Why?"

"Because I want to 'see' with my own eyes what is really under Frostholm," Agatha said calmly and firmly. "As the protector of this city, I cannot stay in the safe great Cathedral and just wait for your results, and besides…"

She suddenly stopped. After a few seconds of silence, she lifted her head. Through the thick black cloth, her "gaze" fell on Duncan's eyes.

"Besides, this is a city of the people of Frostholm, and a matter for the people of Frostholm. In the submersible we built, there should be at least one person from Frostholm. Just think of it as… letting me go down in place of Governor Winston and all the past governors of Frostholm to take a look."

"Those are good reasons, and you should already know the risks of doing this. Since you are prepared, I won't try to talk you out of it," Duncan said with a nod. Then he turned his head and looked at Tyrian.

Tyrian reacted at once and said: "By design the submersible can hold up to four people, so two inside is certainly fine, but…"

“It’s all right. I don’t need to breathe either,” Agatha said softly, cutting him off.

Tyrian froze for a moment, then stepped back. “All right, then there is no problem.”

Duncan smiled. He walked to the hatch of the submersible, turned, and reached out a hand to Agatha: “Good. Let’s go.”

He and Agatha climbed into the submersible. The heavy round hatch then slowly closed.

Two strong Undying sailors stepped onto the platform and tightened the hatch locks from the outside.

Thick steel sealed the inside of the submersible off from the outside world. The narrow crew compartment grew quiet. Only a few machines and pipes still gave off a faint humming now and then.

There were no seats in the crew compartment, so Duncan and Agatha stood in front of the control panel, holding the iron pipes on either side that served as railings. Through the thick, sturdy glass portholes set into the nearby bulkhead, they could see the Undying sailors around the platform loosening the steel cables that held the submersible and releasing the safety pins on the sides of the steel frame.

Tyrian’s voice came from a small device in the corner of the submersible’s control panel: “Father, Lady Agatha, can you hear me?”

Duncan stepped up to the controls. “Yes. Very clearly.”

“All right. I won’t say much about how to handle the submersible. Its functions are actually very simple, so you shouldn’t have trouble. I’ll talk about what happens after you enter the water.

“The submersible is powered by a small steam core and a generator linked to that core. In theory this is enough to run until all Deep Dive tasks are done. But if the steam core or the generator fails, there are also two batteries in the bottom of the hull. They can keep the submersible running for about two more hours…

“There are three sets of high-powered searchlights outside the hull, but in the Deep Sea their effect is limited, so please be careful when you steer. The resistance on the sea floor is also very strong. The drive system can only move the submersible slowly, so you need to keep that in mind too…

“The communicator on the submersible has an effective range of only three hundred meters. Once you go deeper than three hundred meters, we won’t be able to talk like this anymore. But your power, or Lady Agatha’s Psychic Resonance, should not be affected.

“And also… maybe I’m worrying too much, but even for you, please be careful of the dangers in the Deep Sea—once you notice anything wrong, rise to the surface at once. The lever at the top left of the control panel is for an emergency ascent. Pull it and it will drop the ballast structure at the bottom of the submersible and open the buoyancy spheres on both sides of the hull… In the worst case, just abandon the submersible. With your power, you can take Lady Agatha and simply Teleport back. We can always build another machine…”

Duncan listened carefully to Tyrian’s reminders.

To be honest, this former Frost Sea pirate lord really was a bit long-winded. Many of his warnings did not seem necessary to Duncan.

But Duncan still listened patiently to every word Tyrian said. Only after the other man’s voice finally trailed off did he speak in a low voice: “I understand. Let’s begin.”

Outside the submersible, at the command seat at the far end of the hall, Tyrian took a slow breath, then nodded to the subordinates beside him.

“Open the sea valves!”

“Flood the channel!”

“Disconnect the external cables to the submersible. Prepare to release the hooks!”

A deep rumble passed through the submersible’s steel shell, echoing faintly in the spherical cabin. A slight vibration rose from under their feet, mixed with the creaking and scraping sounds from the hull outside.

The sea valves opened. Seawater surged quickly up the tunnel beneath the facility that led straight to the open sea, slowly rising to the set level. The last two steel cables above the submersible began to groan and slowly paid out.

Duncan and Agatha first felt a sway, then a drop. After a brief moment of weightlessness, the submersible entered the water. They began to slide down the slanted tunnel and, under the guidance of a series of mental guidance rails, moved quickly toward a sea outlet near the outer edge of South Port.

Outside the porthole, seawater rose up, then slowly sank into darkness. In that darkness they could only sometimes see flashes of light. Those flashes came faster and faster, and the shaking of the submersible grew stronger as well—until at last all the vibrations faded away.

Outside the porthole, only an endless deep blue remained, slowly growing dim.

There was still sunlight shining down through the water above, casting bands of light outside the window that moved and shifted between bright and dark. In the water that was slowly dimming, bubbles rose from the hull.

In the glow of the remaining sunlight, they looked like some kind of sea creatures wrapped in a dreamy light.

Agatha seemed drawn to the “view” outside the porthole.

She slowly left the helm, holding onto the handrail as she moved to the porthole. She leaned in with curiosity. Through the thick black cloth, her now empty eyes “stared” in a daze at that deep blue that was quickly sinking into darkness.

“What can you see?”

As Duncan got used to the levers and buttons on the control panel, which were not very complicated, he turned his head and asked casually.

“Light. All kinds of tiny lights,” Agatha said softly, as if talking to herself and as if lost in a trance. “They flow like rivers and form huge, complex currents that are still full of order… But outside has already fallen into darkness now, hasn’t it?”

“There’s still a bit of sunlight left, but it will be completely dark soon,” Duncan said as he slowly turned the submersible. “How about now?”

“An incredibly huge ‘curtain of light’, faint but filling my whole sight,” Agatha said. There was a hint of shock in her voice. “What is that?”

“It’s Frostholm,” Duncan said calmly. Through the porthole, in the weakening sunlight and the beam of the submersible’s powerful searchlights, he saw an extremely wide, rough, and mottled “cliff” standing quietly in the seawater. “It’s the city’s ‘base’.”

Chapter 477: Underwater Voyage

Under Duncan's somewhat clumsy but careful control, the submersible slowly adjusted its heading.

The "base" beneath the city-state of Frostholm was like a wide, endless, rough, and strange sea cliff, slowly moving past in the dim water outside the porthole.

The sunlight falling from the sea surface above had already faded. In the water, only the beams from the three large searchlights in front of the submersible remained. Those beams cast huge patches of light on the "cliff" surface. Beyond those bright spots was nothing but unknown darkness.

A low humming and the hiss of valves that adjusted the pressure by themselves sounded in their ears from time to time. These dull, lifeless noises instead made them feel all the more… alone.

That was the loneliness that came when one person left the group, when the mind left the borders of civilization. It was the unease of sinking little by little into endless darkness, wrapped on all sides by boundless seawater.

Agatha grew quiet. She stood by the porthole and "stared" in one direction outside for a long time. After who knew how long, she finally broke the silence and said softly: "All the light is fading… but I can still 'see' the base of the city. It is still giving off a very, very faint light. It is the only thing I can see in this darkness."

The world she observed was clearly not the same as that of an ordinary person.

“Do you know what I’m thinking about?” Duncan’s voice suddenly came from behind her.

“What are you thinking about?”

“I’m thinking that this might be how we look at the world,” Duncan said in a low voice, as if his words were blending into the humming of the machines around them. “The mortal world is like the sea. If we see all of civilization as one whole, then we are like this, sailing through a boundless sea abyss.

“Unknown darkness covers the whole world. From the lights of civilization, we carefully peek at the scenes that sometimes rise out of that darkness. We try to guess and piece together the shape of the whole world from those images that flash by. Yet we almost never have the chance to really know the full truth behind those lights and shadows—

“Behind one small fallen leaf there may be a whole forest. Behind one hard stone there may stand an entire mountain. A single vine slipping past in the lamplight may be only one outstretched tentacle of some mythical giant beast. Outside the faint light is the unknown. Even inside the faint light, what we see is only the shallow impression that the truth shows us at a certain place and a certain time.

“And as we make this careful voyage, there are some people who, by accident, look past the lights. They go mad. Some people try to widen the light. We call them pioneers. Many times there is not even a clear line between these pioneers and a Madman. As for the rest, they gather inside the ark of ‘civilization’, gather within the limited lights that are just enough to shine on the ground under their feet. They lower their heads and carefully draw back their gaze.

“They are called ‘ordinary people’.

“The part of the world that can be known and measured gives them a precious sense of safety, so they can no longer look toward the darkness outside the ark. But it is exactly these ordinary people, who make up most of the whole and are weak and powerless, who keep the whole ark running and even support those pioneers and Madmen.”

The sound of seawater being pumped into the ballast tank came from under their feet. The submersible slowly changed its angle and began to dive faster. In the window ahead, within the area lit by the searchlights, the uneven cliff kept rising upward. In the next second, the scene in that patch of light might turn into a stretch of empty dark water… or it might not.

Duncan drew back his gaze and looked around him.

Lights from the cabin ceiling shone down, bathing everything inside the submersible. After gazing at the darkness outside for too long, turning back to look at this cozy cabin really gave a deep, heartfelt sense of relief.

But the occasional creaks that came from somewhere on the hull never stopped reminding the people in the crew compartment that between this bright, comfortable cabin and hundreds of millions of tons of seawater outside, there was only one thin spherical shell of steel.

This fragile spherical steel shell had been hammered out piece by piece by countless ordinary people. Those artificers, who might never step even half a pace beyond the city-state in their whole lives, used their skill and wisdom to send this simple submersible down into the endless sea abyss beneath the city.

Agatha stayed silent for a long time before she spoke softly: “Actually… sometimes I feel lucky that my eyes can now see more than those of an ordinary person. Just like you said, we are all sailing in a boundless darkness. My eyes can now see a little farther into places where the light does not reach. But I also often feel frustrated, because compared to this endless darkness, that little bit of extra sight seems meaningless…”

“Yes. For this boundless sea, seeing a little farther is indeed hardly anything,” Duncan said softly. Then he changed his tone. “But for us, who are sailing in the darkness, even being able to see one meter farther is of great importance.”

He casually switched off the main lights in the cabin, leaving only the necessary lights on the control panel.

The inside of the submersible dimmed. Yet, with the contrast in lighting, the beams from the powerful searchlights outside seemed even brighter in the darkness beyond the porthole. Within those patches of light, the details on the surface of the “cliff” also grew clearer.

“The world you describe is almost hopeless, yet your attitude always seems optimistic,” Agatha said. “That… surprises me a little.”

“I describe a hopeless world to you because the world is indeed that bad,” Duncan said casually. “My attitude is optimistic because I am an optimistic person. We can’t change this world, but our ‘attitude’ belongs to us.”

“I didn’t expect you to have this kind of personality, and I didn’t expect you to be so sensitive,” Agatha said, and a faint smile seemed to appear on her face. “Yes, I keep forgetting by accident that you were once the greatest explorer in this world.”

Duncan only smiled and did not answer. His gaze fell on the scene outside the porthole. Using the beams from the searchlights, he carefully watched the “cliff” that was slowly rising.

It looked like stone in texture, with parasitic growths on its surface that were like seaweed and coral.

But such a vertical structure, such a neat “base”, did not seem like something that formed naturally no matter how he thought about it.

He steered the submersible forward with care and stopped at a very close distance. Then, a little clumsily, he found a certain control lever on the panel and released the mechanical arm mounted at the very front of the submersible.

In the light, the mechanical arm slowly unfolded. The sharp tool at its end touched the “cliff” ahead and tapped and scraped it lightly.

Some fragments slowly fell through the water.

But inside those fragments there seemed to be an even harder structure.

“I have always been curious about one thing,” Duncan suddenly said, breaking the silence. “For so many years, in so many city-states, people have always dug deep underground—whether for mining, building underground facilities, or just for research. Has no one ever dug through this ‘base’?”

Agatha paused. The question seemed a bit out of place to her, but after a short moment of thought she shook her head. “As far as I know… there has never been such a case of ‘digging through’. The underground is dangerous. The lower you go below sea level, the higher the chance that strange changes appear in the darkness. Even with the protection of steam and fire, spiritual corruption and bizarre accidents in the mines happen every year. Not to mention anyone who would dig downward with the crazy idea of ‘boring through the city-state’ itself. And besides…”

She paused again to sort through her memories, then went on: “And even for those who really did dig down with such a crazy idea, it seems no one has ever succeeded. I once heard that the Academy of Truth tried this. Their conclusion was that, once you reach a certain depth, the drill can no longer go any farther. The deeper you go, the harder it becomes, until even the toughest, most advanced drill bits all break."

"The deeper you go, the harder it gets?" Duncan frowned and turned to look at the mechanical arm that was tapping on the "cliff" outside the porthole. It had already knocked off some of the growths on it. After those loose fragments fell away, the inner layer of the cliff showed a darker, denser structure.

He could not tell whether it was rock or metal.

But its surface seemed to have faint, regular patterns on it, like… the ridges and grooves on the skin of some living creature.

Duncan worked the mechanical arm, trying hard to scrape some samples from that dense black layer, but it was all in vain.

The arm did not have enough power, and that black material was even harder than he had thought… was it some kind of "shell"?

All sorts of guesses rose in Duncan's mind. He even came up with some bold plans for probing it. But in the end he forced down his curiosity and began steering the submersible onward into the Deep Sea.

After all, his main goal on this trip was to explore the "Colossal Unknown Entity" directly beneath Frostholm. When he did not even know if there would be a second chance to make a Deep Dive, he could not waste the submersible's precious operating time halfway there.

With more noise coming from the ballast tanks, the submersible kept diving.

After an unknown length of time, they finally passed the "fault" beneath the city's base.

Very suddenly, the “cliff” inside the range of the searchlights came to an abrupt end. That huge patch of light seemed to be swallowed by darkness all at once, and an endless mass of dark water rushed in to take its place.

Even the strongest searchlights could not find anything to shine on in such empty, boundless water. Duncan could only see a vague edge where the light faded, stretching away outside the porthole. Inside the light and outside it, there was not a single point of reference.

This feeling of being buried in a huge darkness and sinking ever deeper was far more oppressive than facing that strange Great Hollow deep in the Boiling Gold mine.

Agatha also gripped the handrail in front of her a little more tightly in nervousness.

The last faint light in her “field of vision” had vanished.

Chapter 478: It Looked Down on the Abyss

The submersible had already passed beyond the “bottom” of the city-state. The boundless dark water replaced the rough vertical “cliff” from before. The beam from the high?power searchlight stretched endlessly through the sea, and nothing could be seen within its range.

Only from time to time did tiny flashes appear in the beam. They were drifting bubbles or bits of “debris” falling from above, catching and reflecting the light in the water.

Duncan turned a crank on the control console. The sound of water flooding into the ballast tank turned into a low rumble. He slowed the submersible’s descent and carefully raised its nose at a slight angle.

After crossing that boundary, he wanted to “look back” and gaze upward, to see what the city-state’s foundation really looked like.

The beam swept slowly through the darkness. Something so huge it took his breath away emerged from the endless water. An indescribable weight pressed in with that upside?down “rock layer” hanging above. Even without any supernatural forces causing mental corruption, this sight alone was enough to make most ordinary people feel crushed, even hurt in spirit.

The “foundation” of the city-state of Frostholm appeared outside the porthole. It was as if the land itself was hanging upside down. Under that crushing, sky?filling view, he saw countless jagged structures. They looked like clusters of stalagmites, or a forest of spires. Among the many uneven protrusions, tens or even hundreds of meters tall, there were also things like sticky strands stretched between the “stalagmites”.

Yet in the middle of that shock and pressure crashing over him, what rose stronger in Duncan’s heart was a restless curiosity. He steered the crude little diving machine with care and actually headed toward that jagged, twisted upside?down “forest”.

At the same time, on the Vanished, Duncan had already reached the captain’s cabin and pushed open that door of the Lost Ones.

Zhou Ming walked into his studio apartment and, without surprise, saw a new piece in his collection glowing faintly on the table—the delicate “model” of the city-state of Frostholm.

He walked up to the table, picked up the lifelike city model with both hands, and studied every detail. Then he flipped it over to look at the structure on its underside.

The dense, complicated bumps there looked like some kind of tentacles that had degenerated and been laid out in messy rows. Or, to put it more boldly, like some sort of limbs.

Compared to only using the flames to sense the city’s underlying structure, this Deep Dive had given Zhou Ming far more detail.

He slowly closed his eyes, feeling the information coming from another world. He felt the trembling of the submersible, and the grand, shocking “scenery” slowly moving past its portholes.

This unremarkable steel contraption was passing between two “stalagmites” that were probably one to two hundred meters long. The searchlight’s beam swept over the jagged clusters of protrusions farther away, helping Duncan find a relatively safe path through.

This was a scene never mentioned in the records of the Abyssal Trench Project. Neither in the information Tyrian had provided, nor in the dossiers left in City Hall, was there any note of a submersible sailing through an “upside?down forest” at the city’s foundation.

Perhaps the pioneers back then had focused all their attention on the Deep Sea and never did such “extra” things. Perhaps this grotesque, upside?down mass had seemed too dangerous in the dark, so none of the early submersibles chose to venture into it. Or perhaps…

Perhaps someone had done so before, but no one had ever brought the truth they saw back to the surface.

The searchlight’s beam swept across another patch of darkness.

Something appeared in Duncan’s field of view.

In the next second, he yanked a lever on the console. The sudden reversal of the propeller produced a jolt that made the inside of the submersible creak and groan. The fragile steel sphere shuddered in the deep water. With the terrible sound of its mechanisms taking the strain, it finally came to a stop, almost crashing into a nearby “stalagmite”.

Agatha asked in a panic: “What happened?”

She looked up toward the porthole, but saw only many upside?down, scattered points of light outside. Among them was a larger luminous core. It gave off a hazy glow, and she could not make out any detail inside it.

Duncan did not answer at once. He only stared fixedly out the porthole, at what had just emerged from the darkness…

A huge, pale eye.

An eye. An eye wide open, set between those black protrusions that clustered like tentacles. Its diameter might have reached a hundred meters, making the little submersible in front of it look like a single grain of gravel.

The eye had no life in it. It looked as if it had died hundreds or even thousands of years ago, in some far older age. Pale and hollow, it was set into the bottom of the city and hung upside down outside the porthole. It seemed to still calmly gaze down on the endless, deep dark seabed below, even in its last moments of dying. And now the submersible hovered before its dead pupil, as if receiving this ancient, decayed divine gaze.

Duncan finally broke the silence and said softly: “It is an eye.”

He turned his head and looked out through the porthole on the other side, checking other directions.

The spill of light from the searchlamp lit up the surroundings. He saw those black “stalagmites” hanging upside down in the water. Now he could finally be sure: these things really were limbs.

They were tentacles that had mutated, degenerated, and then lost all life.

These tentacles drooped in the seawater like withered vines hanging from a cave ceiling.

Agatha gripped the handrail hard. Even though her heart had long stopped beating, she still felt as if something in her chest was about to burst out. When she realized what she had just heard, when she understood what those faint lights in front of her really were, she felt a suffocating pressure she had not felt in a long time. She stammered: “You… you mean…”

“The city-state was built on some kind of massive creature,” Duncan said slowly. He was also shaken by what he saw, but he forced himself to calm down and sort out his thoughts. “At least… there are still some traces of it being a living thing.”

Agatha could not speak for a long time. After a long while, she finally managed to put words together amid her shock and confusion: “Is it…

dead?”

She lowered her voice without thinking, as if she was afraid that speaking too loudly would wake that unimaginable, unknowable “creature”.

“It should be dead,” Duncan said. At the same time, he carefully steered the submersible, slowly moving away from the huge pale eye. His movements were very cautious. Even though he was almost sure this giant creature was dead, he could not help but imagine something horrible, as if the moment the submersible made any sudden move, that eye would suddenly turn. “And in theory, it should not look like this. This does not fit any biological rule… it looks more like a twisted corpse, or something built out of a corpse as raw material…”

Agatha did not answer. She did not know whether she should marvel that Captain Duncan could still analyze things calmly in such a situation, or marvel at whether a creature large enough to carry a city even needed to “follow biological rules” at all. The sheer chaos and shock filled her heart so much that she could not think about these questions the way she usually did.

The worldview she had built up over so many years was being put to the test.

The true form beneath the cities was so twisted and terrifying. The only safe shelter Mortals had in the Boundless Sea was built on top of an unnameable creature. Under everyone’s feet, under rock and soil thousands of meters deep, withered tentacles hung down into the Deep Sea, and a pale eye looked down at the sea trench. And no one knew anything about it.

After staring blankly for who knew how long, Agatha finally came back to herself. She turned to Duncan and asked hesitantly: “Is only Frostholm like this?”

She did not know why she had to ask Captain Duncan this question. She had not even thought she would get any answer. It was just that the chaos in her heart pushed her to speak, even though the question was doomed to have no clear conclusion.

But the captain answered.

“Maybe all the city-states are like this,” Duncan said slowly. He remembered that time he had ‘sensed’ what lay under Pland. At the same time, from another point of view, he was studying the “collectible” on the shelf in his studio apartment. “Under Pland there are structures similar to these too—but there is no eye. In the place that should match it, there is only a swollen, deformed mass.”

In her shock, Agatha blurted out: “You have dived under Pland before?”

Duncan shook his head: “No. This is my first time diving into the Deep Sea in person. But I have other methods that let me roughly sense what lies under a city-state.”

As he spoke, he raised his head and looked at the upside?down “forest” that hung in the darkness outside the porthole.

Rough sensing always had its limits. If he had not come down to see it with his own eyes, he might never have guessed that the jagged, strange structures under the cities were actually unnameable remains.

The huge pale eyeball was slowly receding from view. The beam from the searchlight slid over the tentacles around it. Yet even as the eye sank back into the dark, the feeling of being under its long divine gaze clung to Duncan’s mind, like countless invisible feelers coiling around the submersible’s hull from all directions.

Even the running of the steam core seemed to grow heavy and sluggish.

But it was all an illusion. The submersible kept moving steadily away from that “forest” and that eye. Nothing was really stopping it.

“We still have to keep diving,” Duncan said, turning to Agatha. “The truth about the city’s ‘foundation’ is only the beginning. We are stepping into a blind spot outside the civilized world’s sight. Anything could appear next. Do you still have the courage for it?”

Agatha also turned her head. Through the black curtain, she met Duncan’s gaze calmly.

“I am ready,” the city-state’s Guardian said in a steady voice. “Let’s keep going down.”

Chapter 479: “People”

With the low rumble coming from the ballast tank, the submersible passed beneath that upside?down, dead world and kept diving toward an even more unknown and more dreadful abyss.

The forest of tentacles hanging from the bottom of the city and that huge pale eyeball vanished completely from the searchlight’s beam. Endless open dark water once more filled the view outside the porthole. Only the small points of light that sometimes floated up from the depths of the dark—bubbles or drifting motes catching the light—reminded Duncan that he was inside a submersible sailing through the sea, and not floating in empty, lonely outer space.

But he could not help making a strange comparison. If he only thought about them as “unknown and secretly terrifying”, what real difference was there between empty outer space and the dark Deep Sea filled with billions of tons of water?

The steam core drove the propellers. A low noise came from the machinery compartment. The row of pressure gauges in front of the control console hissed now and then, showing the submersible’s current state. Duncan slowed the descent to keep sudden pressure changes from damaging the hull, then turned his head and looked at the silent Gatekeeper standing beside him.

“Agatha, what are you thinking about?”

“I am thinking… when the pioneers carried out the Abyssal Trench Project, did they also see what we saw?” Agatha said slowly. “The truth under the city, the unnameable remains, the tentacles and the eyeball hanging down into the Deep Sea… Before the whole project went into a runaway state, in all those dives, was there really no one who, out of curiosity—or even just recklessness—looked back once at what was ‘above’?”

Duncan did not speak for a moment. In his mind, he recalled the secrets about the Abyssal Trench Project that he had once heard from Tyrian.

Even Frostholm’s General, who had once been deeply trusted by the Queen, seemed not to know the full shape of the Abyssal Trench Project. Had no one really discovered the truth under the city? Or had this truth, too terrible to face, been buried away, just like the secret in the Boiling Gold mine?

After a few seconds of silence, Duncan said softly: “Maybe someone really did look back. But what they saw was fated never to be written down. You are the Guardian of the City-State. You understand better than I do what this truth would mean.”

“…Many people would go mad,” Agatha said slowly. “Even without the forces of the Deep Sea acting on them, a single terrifying truth would be enough to trigger widespread nightmares and panic. Then those nightmares and that panic would take form and could link with the ‘truth’ under the city in ways no one could predict. In the worst case… ‘it’ might come back to life.”

“Mortals live in a dark sea full of horrors. Even the footing under their feet is built on twisted, grotesque remains. Dullness and blindness are the only grace all beings receive. They let most ordinary people stay far from truths that would drive them insane. And in most cases, so long as a truth is not noticed, it will never enter our Mortal Realm at all. But the key problem is that there are always ‘some cases’.”

“…Are you going to make our discovery public?”

“At least for now, I will not tell any ordinary person news this shocking. Most people’s calm, simple lives do not need to be disturbed by it. But there is a saying you must have heard—‘Once you know it exists, it has already become part of the fate of the mortal world.’”

Agatha nodded and said: “The second law of Anomalies and Visions: anything that has been known can never be erased. The truth under the city has already appeared before us. The link in fate has already been formed. We will have to deal with it again sooner or later.”

Duncan nodded lightly and said nothing more.

Just then, a strange, abrupt, low “thump?thump” sound suddenly echoed through the submersible, cutting off his and Agatha’s thoughts.

The sound… was like something knocking on the outside of the submersible’s hull.

Agatha was startled at once by the sound. She jerked her head up in shock and said: “Did you hear that? It sounded like someone knocking outside…”

Duncan also jumped at the sudden sound. But he quickly glanced at the gauges on the console, frowned a little, and said in a low voice: “It should be water pressure. The huge pressure of the sea is making the submersible’s hull deform slightly. Don’t worry. This is normal and still within the design limits.”

Agatha seemed a little calmer, but she still looked tense.

Diving in the dark Deep Sea was an experience she had never had before. Even as a Gatekeeper with great power, she could not help feeling weak and nervous inside. It was a feeling she could hardly imagine while standing on the safe surface.

Here, far from the civilized world, the Gods' divine blessing had already faded, and personal power meant very little. Between cold physical laws and unknown fate, there was only a narrow "gap". Inside that gap was survival. Outside it was nothing but bones. And what they could rely on in that gap… was only a single steel sphere.

And the "thump?thump" that kept coming from the submersible's hull kept reminding Agatha that, under the weight of billions of tons of water, it was as fragile as paper. What kept this shell from collapsing, besides the toughness of the steel itself, was only the delicate balance of its structure.

This was a kind of fear completely different from facing a heretic Eldritch God or a calamity born from a Vision. This kind of horror… was called "natural law".

Maybe it was because she was nervous. Maybe it was because the silence inside the submersible and the sounds outside made the air feel too heavy. After a few seconds of quiet, Agatha started looking for something to say. She watched Duncan working the levers and cranks and said: "You have quite a talent for handling machines. I thought you would ask Governor Tyrian to send an engineer who knew how to pilot this thing. I did not expect you to be so skilled with it."

"Skilled?" Duncan tilted his head a little. "But in fact I did not know how to operate it at all—at least, not before today."

Agatha said: "…Ah?"

"But none of Tyrian's people can pilot it either, not even the engineers who can read the blueprints," Duncan shrugged and went on. "They could only tell me, from the drawings, what each lever is supposed to do. Once you know what each lever does, their 'piloting skill' is the same as mine. No one knows how to run it. No one has ever run it. This thing was built by the governors of Frostholm. Its controls are completely different from those of the submersibles from fifty years ago. And the people who truly understood it are all dead. That is the truth."

Agatha stared, her mouth half open, suddenly not knowing what to say.

Duncan noticed her reaction and smiled as he shook his head: "But I still have at least two advantages over them. First, I do not need to worry about safety. No matter how bad things get, I can return safely. Second…"

He paused and looked down at the control stick in his hand and the console in front of him.

Fine ghostly green flame moved between the gears and rods. Holy steam and oil soaked this huge, complex machine, and the glow of the spirit flame filled that steam and oil.

The steam core was like a powerful heart, obeying Duncan's every command.

Of course, it was not as "obedient and handy" as the Vanished. This soulless machine could only feed back some rigid, faint sensory signals at best. But that was already enough.

"Second, these machines are fairly obedient in my hands."

Agatha felt the flames flowing.

The flames filled the steel and oil around her. They flowed through the hissing steam and gears, running inside this soulless machine like blood, just like the flames that flowed in her own body. The two seemed to echo each other in a faint resonance.

That thin stream of spirit flame even made her feel a bit safer here at the dark, icy seabed.

She lowered her head slightly, as if saluting Duncan.

But Duncan did not pay attention to Agatha’s reaction. His focus had already returned to the work of piloting.

After all, even though the fire of his spirit form let him sense this machine’s state better, he still had to do the actual operation himself.

He had no choice. The first time he had been pushed onto the helm of the Vanished, he had never captained a ship either. He had already grown used to this rhythm of life where, even if he did not know how some thing worked, he could only grit his teeth and charge ahead…

Just then, another knocking sound suddenly came from outside the hull—

“Thud.”

It was short and clear, like bumping into something, faintly different from the earlier “knocking” on the hull.

Agatha noticed the strange sound at once and said: “There it is again… is the hull deforming too?”

But Duncan suddenly frowned and put his hand on another lever.

“It does not sound like that… it is something else.”

He clearly felt that something really had hit the submersible’s hull. It had bumped it from below.

A hum of machinery came from inside the submersible. Outside the porthole, the searchlight swung slowly through the pitch?dark water. The propellers spun, adjusting the submersible’s heading.

At last, something appeared in the light outside the porthole.

A person.

Something that looked like a human… shape.

Agatha “saw” it at once. That human-shaped outline suddenly appeared in her sight, giving off a living faint glow, just like other people she saw on the surface.

Only this glow was a bit dimmer and much paler.

She let out a low cry: “Ah!”

Even Duncan’s eyes widened at once, and an “oh damn” almost slipped out of his mouth.

In the Deep Sea nearly a thousand meters down in the Boundless Sea, directly under the city-state of Frostholm, a person suddenly floated into the submersible’s porthole. The impact of that sight was almost no less than the forest of tentacles at the city’s base and the pale, giant eyeball between them!

And right after that, as the submersible shifted position and the light swept around, an even stranger, more terrifying, even hair?raising scene appeared before Duncan and Agatha—

People. Crowds of “people”, packed thickly together, floating in this deep, dark, icy water!

Chapter 480: Blueprint

As the submersible’s lights swept around, all the shapes drifting in the dark water came into Duncan’s view—people, countless people, floating in the sea.

However, as Duncan looked more closely, he noticed something strange about these bodies.

They had no facial features, not even clearly defined hands and feet, and no clothes at all—just one shape after another with a rough human outline. Their surfaces had a coarse texture and a pitch?black color.

They looked like dolls crudely pinched out of black mud, like Rough Husks.

Duncan described the details he saw to Agatha.

“Only an outline?” Agatha sounded both shocked and unsure. “But in my eyes… they shine with the same Spiritual Insight glow as living people in the city?states…”

Duncan said nothing. He only frowned slightly and carefully guided the submersible toward one of the “human shapes” floating not far outside the porthole.

As the submersible’s movement stirred the water, it disturbed the calm of the Deep Sea. The pitch?black Humanoid Husk slowly rolled in the water, turning at an angle. Its smooth, spherical “head” faced the porthole first, followed by its short, bare arms, which looked as if they had never been finished.

The mechanical arm slowly reached out. The hook at its tip caught onto the figure’s torso and gently prodded it.

It gave no reaction at all, showing no sign of being “alive”.

Duncan lifted his head again and looked out through the porthole at the distant, silently floating Humanoid Husks. In the beam of light they stretched farther and farther away until they finally vanished into the darkness of the Deep Sea.

How many were there here? Thousands? Tens of thousands? Or even tens of millions?

Suddenly a memory surfaced. Duncan recalled one detail he had heard when he once discussed the Abyssal Trench Project with Tyrian—the No. 3 submersible had shot crazily upward during its final Deep Dive, and the explorer who had gone mad kept screaming one sentence after they returned to the sunlight above:

“We all died down there!”

Duncan furrowed his brow little by little and looked gravely at the countless bodies drifting silently outside the porthole—was this what that explorer had seen before he lost his mind?

Beside him, Agatha suddenly broke the silence. Her tone turned serious: “This makes me think of those replicas that infiltrated the city?states before.”

“I thought of that too,” Duncan nodded slightly, “but they are not quite the same. Those replicas might show all kinds of inhuman traits, but at least they have faces, hands, feet, and other details. They also try to imitate humans, wearing normal clothes. These Humanoid Husks, though, only have the most basic outline. If anything… they look more like Rough Husks, even cruder than the replicas."

"Some kind of unfinished product?" Agatha suddenly thought of something. "Were those replicas 'manufactured' out of these Rough Husks as a base?"

"Hard to say," Duncan replied, his tone uncertain. "These things might have been drifting in the Deep Sea for many, many years. At the very least, they were already here when the Abyssal Trench Project began. Also, the power that invaded the city?states used the properties of the mirror world to intrude into the Mortal Realm, while these here are 'physical' bodies in the Deep Sea. The two are connected, but they shouldn't be in a simple unfinished?versus?finished relationship."

Agatha listened, deep in thought. For some reason, she suddenly recalled something a cultist had said when she confronted them before—

"There were never any replicas to begin with. Or rather… we are all replicas…"

Almost at the same time, Duncan seemed to think of something as well. His gaze passed over the floating bodies and turned toward the unknown Deep Sea below. Then he reached for the control lever.

Deep in the machinery bay, some device let out a dying growl and wail. The hull creaked under the unbearable strain. As the sound of water flooding in rose, the submersible began to descend again.

As those almost terrifying noises echoed around them, Agatha could not help looking at Duncan: "Captain, can this thing still hold together?"

Duncan's gaze swept over the instruments on the control panel. At the same time he sensed the faint feedback from the fire of his spirit form. His hand, pulling the dive lever, did not relax.

"It can still hold," he said in a low voice. "We should be almost there."

“Almost there?” Agatha froze. “You know what’s down below?”

Duncan did not answer. He just kept carefully guiding the submersible downward, making tiny adjustments to the thrusters. The hull, pushed to its limits, let out bone?chilling creaks almost every second. Even the edges where the portholes joined the hull began to groan and crack, as if the fragile balance might break at any moment and the entire submersible would crumple into a wad of metal under the pressure of the sea.

Yet it kept diving, moving along that narrow knife?edge between collapse and balance, sinking toward the deepest darkness.

But the hull and machinery were not the only sources of dreadful sound. There was another noise even more chilling—the steady, real thuds striking the outside of the hull:

“Bang.” “Bang.” “Bang”…

The Humanoid Husks, those Rough Husks of black mud, bumped against the hull from time to time. The dull thuds sounded especially horrifying, like stones knocking against a skull.

Even Agatha could not help tightening her grip on the handrail in front of her.

She could feel the entire submersible tilting forward. The angle had reached the point where it was hard to stand without holding on.

Then she suddenly “saw” something appear outside the porthole.

A stretch of rolling, chaotic outline that seemed endless appeared at the edge of the searchlight beam, near the lower rim of the porthole.

It looked… almost like a stretch of ground.

“The seabed?” Agatha cried out in shock. “I see something… is that the seabed?”

Duncan stared silently out of the porthole with his gaze. He looked at the uneven “ground” that had suddenly appeared in the black Deep Sea, at its jagged, twisting “coastline” and the hazy structures farther away that he could not see clearly. Only after a long time did he shake his head slightly: “Not the seabed. We are still far from what you would call the ‘seabed’—that is a piece of land floating in the water.”

Agatha sounded puzzled: “A piece of land floating in the water?”

“…Another Frostholm Island,” Duncan answered softly. “We can only see a short stretch of coastline, but I know this terrain very well. That is the main island of Frostholm—Frostholm in its original form, without the city?state, without the harbor, without any buildings.”

Agatha’s body clearly trembled a little.

Duncan lifted his head and looked at the water around and above that “Frostholm Island”.

Countless Humanoid Husks floated around that “Deep Sea floating island”, like a swarm of bees around a hive.

And the scene was sealed in the dark, icy depths of the Deep Sea like amber, time frozen as if someone had pressed pause, quietly holding an ancient moment in place.

Agatha’s voice sounded beside him: “This place… what exactly is it…”

“…The original Blueprint,” Duncan said quietly.

In the third Long Night, the Crawling King bestowed the Blueprint upon the Collective and began the Genesis Protocol. To avoid repeating the fate of the King of Dreams and the pale giants, He divided that Blueprint, removed the kingdoms from the mortal world, and turned those kingdoms into twelve hundred cities…

After the third Long Night, civilization survived, and the Deep Sea era began. Everything in the Deep Sea era was built upon this “twelve? hundred?city” Blueprint of the Crawling King.

A portion of what was recorded in that Blasphemous Tome had just been confirmed.

But could there be another possibility?

Duncan’s thoughts churned, and he fell silent for a moment. Beside him, Agatha finally reacted. Once she understood what “original Blueprint” meant, she spoke in disbelief: “You mean… Frostholm as it is now, and the people of Frostholm, and even all the city?states and mortals in this world… were all manufactured based on these ‘things’ in the Deep Sea…”

“It’s one possibility,” Duncan said, shaking his head slightly, his voice low. “In the Annihilators’ heretical teachings, there is a record of the Abyssal Lord’s Work of Creation. Of course that is heresy. But we cannot deny that the ancient texts in their hands might still reveal part of the true history.”

Agatha opened her mouth but could not say a word.

From the moment she dove into the Deep Sea, the world as she knew it seemed to be undergoing an earth?shaking reshaping. Too many doubts, too many shaken beliefs made even a Gatekeeper with a steadfast mind struggle to sort out her thoughts.

The original island “templates” floating in the Deep Sea, the countless human?shaped Rough Husks… if what the Annihilators said about the Abyssal Lord creating the world was true, then… would that not mean all living beings in the mortal world were essentially creations of the Abyssal Lord?

Even after surviving the mirror world crisis in Frostholm and reaffirming her faith and conviction through that great trial, Agatha still found it hard to accept such a reality?shattering “possibility”.

But she did not blindly deny everything she saw in the face of such huge contradictions and doubts.

From the moment she decided to undertake this Deep Dive, she had prepared herself mentally—

In the Deep Sea, anything was possible.

“Are we… going to get closer?” She turned her head and spoke to Duncan in as steady a tone as she could manage.

But Duncan did not touch the controls again.

His gaze swept over the many instruments on the console.

His senses spread throughout the submersible.

“…We’ve already reached the limit,” he said. “The submersible’s hull can’t hold.”

“…We were just a little short,” Agatha said, obviously full of regret. “We were about to reach that floating island…”

“It doesn’t matter. It’s only the submersible that can’t hold,” Duncan shook his head slightly and looked out the porthole. “There is something here that can.”

Agatha turned her head in confusion.

But Duncan kept quietly using his gaze to look outside, staring at those shapes drifting in the light… the Humanoid Husks.

“I remember you said just now that in your eyes, these Humanoid Husks, like Rough Husks, shine with a Spiritual Insight glow like living people.”

Outside the porthole, one of the roughly shaped Humanoid Husks slowly turned its head toward Agatha.

Chapter 481: Deeper in the Deep Sea

In that instant, strange and chaotic sensations suddenly flooded into Duncan’s mind. Just like during his past “Spirit Realm walks”, he felt his “viewpoint” split in two, and a brand?new shell became a new “end” through which he sensed the world. But… it still felt a bit different from before.

In his new “viewpoint”, restless streams of light filled everything like interference. Bands of light and shadow, bright and dark, spread through the water like scanning lines. He saw the distant “original landmass” shrouded in darkness, the countless Humanoid Husks floating around it, and at the same time he also saw the inconspicuous submersible—it was hovering above the Deep Sea floating island at a slant, maintaining a forward?tilted angle, pale light extending out from its front and slowly fading into the water.

All of this was wrapped in flickering, half?real light and shadow. Even in places beyond the submersible’s searchlights, he could still “see” outlines and faint glimmers. It was a completely new way of seeing.

Outside the porthole, in the Deep Sea, the shell that had suddenly begun to move slowly raised an arm and touched its own featureless head.

Of course, Duncan did not find his eyes—this body he had just taken over had no such organs. In fact, it did not even have fully formed hands and feet. The bare ends of its limbs touched the smooth, flat face, and a rough, dull, oddly numb sensation came back to him.

Then, all of a sudden, Duncan had a feeling… Following that feeling, he controlled his new shell, stretched out both arms, and pressed hard on the body's "face".

The pitch?black, mud?like face with its smooth surface squirmed. Within a few seconds, the front of the face split and formed two eyes.

His vision became much clearer at once.

Somewhat clumsily, Duncan controlled this Rough Husk body and slowly swam to the front of the submersible, using his newly formed eyes to look inside.

He and himself stared at each other. The feeling was both novel and eerie.

Inside the submersible, Agatha could not help letting out a delayed cry: "Ah!"

Only then did she realize what had happened. She jerked her head toward Duncan, who was standing at the console: "You… really startled me."

"You should learn to get used to it," Duncan said inside the submersible without looking back, still watching the state of the machinery. "People around me are always a bit too easily spooked."

Agatha still had not recovered. Her whole body stayed tense, her "gaze" darting quickly back and forth between Duncan and the "human shape" outside the hull. Only one thought filled her mind—

[People in this world really did have good reason to fear Captain Duncan. Even in this endless Deep Sea, what he had just done so offhandedly was far too uncanny and terrifying.]

But after hesitating for a long time, she still did not dare say what was in her head aloud. She could only forcefully change the subject: “…What are you going to do next?”

“This temporary shell can see in the dark. I am going to keep checking what’s ahead,” Duncan said casually. At the same time, he had already begun to pull a series of levers and cranks on the console, and with his movements, the machinery bay of the submersible once again filled with strained noises on the verge of failure. “As for us… we need to rise a bit. This machine is about to give out. It can’t stay at its maximum depth for long.”

Amid the low roar of the ballast tanks struggling to pump out water, the submersible began to slowly rise. Yet Agatha still could not help staring out the porthole at that “human shape” slowly receding in the light.

A faint wisp of fire suddenly appeared in the water. The shell carrying Captain Duncan’s will waved toward them, then turned around and, wrapped in drifting spirit form flame, slowly sank into the depths of the darkness.

Cold. Dark. Lonely. Silent.

Duncan’s consciousness slowly adapted inside this temporary shell in its uncanny state. He turned the body, swam, moved forward through the darkness, and kept approaching the main island of Frostholm floating in the Deep Sea.

The submersible’s light had already receded, and darkness once more ruled this part of the Deep Sea. Yet the ghostly green fire of his spirit form spread slowly through the water. That faint glow, together with this body’s strange sensing abilities, let Duncan always make out his surroundings and the direction he was heading.

All around him, countless Humanoid Husks floated in the icy water.

It was like an extremely grotesque gathering. Rough Husks in the shape of “people” clustered on all sides, near and far, frozen and blind, rising and falling slightly with the currents. Only the one shell with eyes was moving through this silent, eerie “crowd”.

Duncan did his best not to touch the “human shapes” drifting near him, yet he still inevitably brushed past them at very close range.

Every time he passed them, he could not help imagining strange and terrifying things—as if there were countless pairs of eyes here, countless souls waiting to wake, curiously watching him, this uninvited guest, ready to reach out to him at any time.

But in the end, nothing happened.

Those silent human shapes just stayed silent. They had no mind and no soul, like hollow dolls piled together out of mud.

Duncan passed through these empty shells and reached a cliff on the edge of the “Deep Sea floating island”.

He stopped and studied the terrain in front of him.

This should be the southeastern coast of Frostholm. In the world above the surface, there was the harbor, warehouses, and the customs office near this stretch of shore. A pretty little Cathedral stood on the sea cliff, and hardy trees, evergreen in winter, lined the path leading up to the Cathedral.

But here, on the rugged coast, there were only bare rocks with a strange, pitch?black sheen, like rough models that had not yet been painted.

Duncan raised his head and looked toward the center of the Deep Sea floating island.

Between darkness and faint light, he could just make out some huge structure there, like a mountain peak or a giant pillar running through the island.

He thought of the scene Martha had shown him when they spoke before—

Countless minds, falling into the sea, had cast one last glance toward that dark abyss before they faded. The shared impression they had formed in their terror was a giant pillar running through a vast entity floating in the Deep Sea.

Now it seemed that the huge entity shown in that vision was this “original Blueprint” of Frostholm before his eyes. Then what about the giant pillar that pierced the island? Was it the Abyssal Lord who had “intruded” into the Mortal Realm? Or… the so?called replica?

Duncan thought for a moment, then set off swimming toward that “pillar”. But after only a short distance, he stopped again, feeling a bit troubled.

It was too far. It would be like crossing half a city?state.

A horse could die of exhaustion just trying to reach that distant mountain—let alone here in the Deep Sea, where movement was so hard.

Even if this body was unaffected by the crushing pressure of the Deep Sea, swimming all the way there would still be a slow and exhausting job.

As Duncan pondered, a thought slowly emerged.

After hesitating for a few seconds, he raised one arm in the water and gave it a light wave, deciding to try and see.

Ghost?green flame spread out with his motion and, in the blink of an eye, gathered into a spinning doorway. When the doorway opened, a skeletal bird wrapped in blazing fire burst out of it and circled Duncan, squawking loudly:

“Who is calling the fleet! teleportation successful! teleportation successful! Open up, delivery service!”

Duncan stared in stunned surprise, eyes wide.

AI flapped its wings beside him. In this Deep Sea, under the weight of hundreds of millions of tons of seawater, it still moved as lightly and freely as if it were flying in the sky. Its sharp female voice, unique and sounding like some kind of pitch?shifted synthetic tone, was just as noisy as ever, clear enough to drill straight into a person’s head.

The Deep Sea environment might as well not exist for AI!

Duncan had only intended to try, summoning AI to see if she could be of any use. After all, this pigeon’s “teleportation” ability had already shown unbelievable usefulness many times. But this was the Deep Sea, completely different from the surface. He had been ready to teleport AI back to the ship at once if she could not adapt to the environment. Yet what he saw now… was completely beyond his expectations.

He just stared, dumbfounded, as the pigeon flew around him as if it were in open air, squawking noisily. It moved through the water like a projection untouched by the environment. After staring for quite a while, he finally reached out a hand to stop the bird.

AI obediently landed on Duncan’s arm and tilted her head curiously: “Whatcha doing, whatcha doing, whatcha doing?”

Duncan was about to speak when he suddenly realized this body did not seem to have a mouth. Even if it had one, he did not know how to speak directly in the Deep Sea. So he focused his mind instead, trying to pass his thoughts to this pigeon spirit—

“This is the Deep Sea. Do you feel any discomfort?”

He fixed his gaze on AI’s eyes, wondering if she could understand him and waiting for her answer.

AI tilted her head again.

“GG, you came surfing too!” the bird suddenly flapped her wings in excitement. Sparks of ghostly green light scattered from between her bone wings. “Skywing 3G, so fast! Skywing 3G, so fast!”

Duncan’s expression shifted a little. He listened to the pigeon spirit’s noise, deep in thought, and did not speak for a long time.

Only when AI gradually quieted down and pecked his arm curiously did she speak again: “Application not responding?”

That finally jolted Duncan out of his thoughts, and his mind quickly returned to the matter at hand.

There was serious work to do.

He raised his head and looked at the distant, chaotic darkness ahead. Focusing his mind again, he tried to pass his command to the pigeon spirit beside him—

“Take me to that place.”

“Order received! Order received!” AI reacted at once. As always, she flapped her wings in excitement, making roaring flames surge around them. “Mission will be accomplished!”

Chapter 482: The Room

In the dark Deep Sea, a ball of ghost-green flame suddenly shot past like a meteor. The crushing weight and stillness of hundreds of millions of tons of seawater seemed not to exist at all. They did not slow that “meteor” in the slightest.

Ai streaked across the black floating island of the Deep Sea at lightning speed. She finally stopped over the island’s central area and drew her body together again out of the flames.

Duncan stepped out of the fire and floated in the water. He turned his head to look at the Pigeon Spirit flapping back and forth beside him.

Ai flew over and landed on her Master’s shoulder. She tilted her head in curiosity and asked: “What are you staring at?”

Duncan did not answer. He only lifted his arm and gently rubbed the pigeon’s head. Then he turned around and looked toward the huge “pillar” at the center of the island.

Now he stood before it. The shocking giant column rose in his view, stretching up from the mountaintop at the center of the Deep Sea floating island. It pointed almost straight toward the sky. It seemed not only to pierce the whole island, but to pierce the endless dark Deep Sea itself, reaching all the way up toward Frostholm, up into the world above the sea that bathed in sunlight.

But it did not truly extend without end. When he got close enough, Duncan finally saw more details, and he noticed that the upper half of this “pillar” came to an abrupt stop in the water.

The break was very, very high above. There seemed to be a sudden, ugly fracture there.

But before he examined that break, Duncan first moved carefully toward the middle part of the pillar and studied the shape of its “outer skin”.

It was neat and dense. Faint complex, regular patterns could be seen on it, along with evenly spaced raised structures. This pillar, which looked like an enormous tentacle, showed an orderly, “tidy” feeling in its details. It even looked… like some kind of industrial product.

Duncan hesitated for a moment, then carefully reached his hand toward the pillar. This shell of a body had no formed hands or feet, but as he made the motion to touch the “pillar”, the end of his arm suddenly swelled and writhed. In almost the blink of an eye, it split and shaped itself into the structure of a hand.

Was this a second shaping based on some “original template”, triggered on its own by a special stimulus?

Duncan remembered the feeling from before, when the face of this body had split to form eyes. He guessed at it in his mind. At the same time, he felt his newly formed fingers touch the pillar’s pitch-black surface.

A rough, cold feeling came from his fingertips, like rubbing crude cast iron, yet it also seemed to have a certain softness.

Duncan leaned closer and examined the pillar’s surface more carefully.

Deep under that dull gray-black skin, he could faintly see pale blue lines, like veins buried deep under flesh.

Duncan’s heart stirred. He at once thought of that piece of “flesh” sample he had taken from Captain Cristo Barbelli’s mouth deep inside the Obsidian.

The textures of the two looked very similar. Was this pillar standing in the Deep Sea really a limb of the Abyssal Lord stretching down into the Mortal Realm?

With a strange feeling inside, Duncan backed away a little and slowly swept his gaze over the giant pillar.

To find the wound Captain Cristo had left on a structure this huge was of course impossible for any mortal, but that did not stop a fresh wave of respect for the captain from rising in Duncan's heart.

A few minutes later, Duncan started to swim upward along the pillar. His target was that "break".

After a long time, he finally reached the place where the break lay, and what he saw there was almost what he had imagined.

The pillar did end abruptly here, as if some jagged sharp teeth had bitten it off. The edge of the break was uneven and ridged.

Inside the break, the gray-black inner wall sank in on itself, like a strange, eerie volcanic crater.

Duncan floated near the "break" and roughly estimated the pillar's scale from what he saw. He soon confirmed one thing—

If the "Great Hollow" in the Boiling Gold mine really was the result of a similar "pillar" or "tentacle" corruption, then the tentacle that had pierced into the city-state was far smaller than the pillar before his eyes. Its size might have been only one fifth of this one, or even less.

Was it because the tentacle that pierced the city-state was only a "projection of power" from this main body in the Deep Sea? Or was the tentacle in the Great Hollow still in its early growth and meant to keep growing?

If the defense of Frostholm had failed, if he had not managed to destroy Frostholm's mirror world in the end, and if the "pillar" in the Great Hollow deep under the Boiling Gold mine had kept growing out of control… would it have grown until it tore through the mine, burst through the mountain above, and become a "giant pillar" just like the one before his eyes now, as if it ran through a whole floating island?

Was this what those mad Annihilators claimed and longed for—to "recreate in the Mortal Realm the grand Blueprint of the Lord's creation"?

These frightening guesses flashed through Duncan's mind for a moment. Then a tiny glimmer of light suddenly shot past the edge of his vision and cut off his thoughts.

He snapped his head toward the place where that glimmer had appeared.

It was at the center of the "break", at the deepest point of that sunken "crater".

He hardly hesitated. He swam toward that spot at once.

He passed over the jagged broken "cliffs" at the pillar's edge and over the dark matter that sank toward the center. In this silent Deep Sea, far from the civilized world, that sudden flash of light became the only target in Duncan's eyes. He swam as fast as he could and reached the area near the center of the pillar's break.

Yet when he arrived, the flash had already vanished.

Only empty darkness remained here. The "ground" inside the pillar's break lay as cold and still as rock.

Duncan floated in the water, frowning as he looked across that darkness. The empty place felt like a solid, regretful ellipsis, hiding its secrets once more deep behind the Veil.

But soon, he noticed something wrong in what he saw.

Below him, at the center of the pillar's break, the "ground" had a faintly strange texture. It looked somewhat… "blurred".

Yes, blurred, as if it was not solid matter at all, but truly a layer of Veil between real and unreal.

Duncan hesitated for a few seconds, then carefully moved closer to that strangely textured "ground". But before he reached out to touch it, he first gathered a tiny flame at his fingertip and cast it into that blurred "Veil".

When in doubt, let the spirit flame clear the way. Being extra careful never hurt.

The eerie green spirit form fire dropped onto the black "ground" in almost an instant. At first it sank in and vanished, like water seeping into sand. Right after, faint threads of green flame started to spread through the darkness. In almost the blink of an eye, the entire "ground" was burning fiercely!

As the flames burned, Duncan suddenly felt that some subtle "connection" was forming.

But the link did not point to the huge pillar beneath him, the one that seemed to be an Elder God's tentacle. It pointed instead toward a presence that felt… vaguely familiar.

In the next second, he saw the ground below change quickly as the flames spread. It slowly turned into something like a mirror surface, and that mirror-like layer rippled faintly in the firelight, like a smooth, thick liquid!

Duncan's heart stirred. He followed the feeling that came from the flames and moved closer to the rippling, mirror-like "liquid surface", then reached out and touched it with a finger.

Boom!

In the unreal space, it felt as if a huge crash exploded inside his mind. Frozen time suddenly roared into motion. A heavy Veil tore open all at once. A wall at the edge of the Mortal Realm collapsed with a thunderous rumble. Duncan felt himself cross some boundary in an instant. Then the “world” before his eyes began to fill with warm light.

The feeling of being wrapped in cold, heavy seawater vanished at once. Solid ground under his feet replaced the empty, anchorless floating from a second earlier. The warm light before his eyes also grew softer. As his vision slowly adjusted, Duncan finally saw his surroundings, and he stared in stunned shock.

He was standing in a splendid, bright room.

Light poured from the chandelier on the ceiling, shining over many fine and tasteful furnishings. Shelves and metal statues in a courtly style glowed softly in the light. A magnificent large bed stood in the center of the room, wrapped in semi-transparent curtains, and it seemed that someone was sleeping in their depths.

Duncan stared at the scene before him in disbelief. Then he suddenly turned his head and looked behind him.

That seemed to be the direction he had come from.

He saw a mass of twisted, chaotic darkness.

The room seemed to vanish into thin air before that boundary. Beyond the broken, jagged walls and floor was a chaotic realm like a void. Twisted shadows and dim streams of light rose and flowed in that nothingness. It seemed full of Truth and mysteries enough to drive any mortal mad, yet it also seemed like a hollow with no meaning at all.

A word suddenly flowed into his mind—

Subspace.

Duncan felt his heart—if this body even had a heart—skip a beat. He had never imagined a scene like this. He stood in a shattered room, and just one step away lay Subspace with its chaotic lights and shadows. Those hazy, chaotic lights and shadows seemed to give a silent roar, using wild, wordless speech to pour into him incomprehensible knowledge and “Truth”.

Duncan raised his hand and carefully reached toward the darkness beyond the room’s edge.

His fingers met a hard, cold surface.

An invisible barrier stood between him and Subspace.

A voice suddenly spoke from behind him: “You cannot go through. You have not truly opened that door yet.”

Duncan’s heart lurched, and he whipped around.

The curtains around the splendid bed had already been drawn aside. The person who had been asleep on the bed had woken at some unknown time and was quietly watching him.

Silver-white long hair fell over her shoulders, and violet eyes shone like gems.

“Alice?”

Chapter 483: Frostholm Queen

At the center of that magnificent bed, the “master of the room” who had just woken up leaned against the pillows and studied Duncan, the uninvited guest, with curious eyes. That silver-white hair and those violet eyes were so familiar.

Duncan had blurted out the name “Alice” without thinking. The deep, hoarse “voice” that sounded like a dull echo came straight from the chest of this shell of a body.

But then he frowned a little. He woke from that instant of surprise and shock and looked thoughtfully at the lady.

She was not Alice. Though her face was exactly the same, her bearing was totally different. More importantly, Alice would not appear in a place like this. So the greater chance was that…

“Ray Nora,” Duncan guessed the woman’s identity. He looked into her eyes with a questioning gaze and spoke slowly: “Frostholm Queen?”

“It feels like a long time since I last heard that title,” the lady who had just awakened said with a smile. She adjusted how she leaned on the bed and looked at him with curiosity: “Who are you? How did you come straight into this room without opening that door?”

“Door?” Duncan frowned. Hearing her mention that word again stirred his curiosity, and he asked: “What door?”

The lady did not answer. She only raised a hand and pointed to a spot not far away.

Duncan looked in the direction of her finger and saw a closed door carved with complex patterns. It was clearly the bedroom's main door.

"Anyone who can come here is either a servant of this house or a guest who holds the key," she said calmly. "You are clearly not a servant of this house, and you do not have the key in your hand."

Duncan's heart gave a jolt—the key! She had just mentioned the key!

"The key you are talking about, is it a brass key used to wind up a doll?" He turned back, keeping his voice calm to hide every ripple in his feelings, and asked: "Are you really Ray Nora, Queen of Frostholm?"

"I am," Ray Nora said with a smile, and she shook her head slightly. "But you still have not answered my question—who are you?"

Duncan drew back the emotion in his eyes. As he quickly sorted his thoughts, he spoke at an unhurried pace: "You may call me Duncan."

He gave only his first name and did not mention the more famous family name. Yet when Ray Nora heard it, her eyes widened a little at once. Then an even brighter smile appeared on her face as she said: "Ah, so it is you—Captain Duncan, the legend. It makes much more sense that you could come into this room. But… I truly did not expect you to look like this."

Duncan paused at her words, then lowered his head and looked at his body.

It was still that extremely strange pitch-black human shape, like a rough husk the Creator had not yet had time to refine when making humans. This abstract form could not be called "friendly-looking" at all.

"This is only a temporary avatar form," Duncan said offhand, with a bit of awkwardness. Then he noticed something strange in her manner and asked:

“You do not seem very surprised. Did you already know I would come?”

“I did not know, but I lost the ability to feel ‘surprise’ many years ago,” Ray Nora said calmly. “If you always see too many things you should not see, if you learn all kinds of strange forms this world can take, always experience death before it comes, and fall into dreams before you truly sleep, then you will lose that ability sooner or later too…”

She smiled. Her light tone sounded as if she was only talking about the weather as she said: “Even if this world still holds things no one can foresee, numbness will let you face every surprise calmly.”

Duncan looked into Ray Nora’s eyes. Behind her calm attitude, he recalled all kinds of information about this Frostholm Queen—

It was said that Ray Nora was a born psionic. Her gift of Spiritual Insight let her speak with many unseen beings. People said she could even have Foresight of the future and know Truth out of thin air…

As he sorted this information in his mind, Duncan’s expression did not change. He walked over to one corner of the room, dragged a chair to the big bed, sat down, and looked seriously into the Frostholm Queen’s eyes: “I have many questions. I hope you can answer them.”

“I also have many questions,” Ray Nora said with a smile. “It has been far too long since I last talked with anyone. A Visitor is very precious to me—so if you are willing to answer my questions, I am willing to answer yours.”

“Very well, then I will not be polite,” Duncan said, getting straight to the point. “What exactly is this place? Why are you here?”

“Ah, such a hard question right at the start…” Ray Nora frowned, as if she truly struggled over how to put it into words. After a moment, she spoke slowly: “To explain it in a way that is easier to understand, this is a ‘drifting place’. It is not one fixed location. It is a ‘link’ between many places. Do you see the darkness at the edge of the room? The view outside can sometimes change into other shapes—the right conditions can link it to the right ‘place’. But for me, it has only one use. It lets my dreams link to the Deep Sea under Frostholm.”

“Do you need me to explain what the Deep Sea under Frostholm is?” she asked.

“No need,” Duncan said with a shake of his head. “Keep going. Why are you here?”

“All right. It seems you already know what lies in the Deep Sea,” Ray Nora said with a soft breath. “I stay here to hold a dream and make sure the being in that Deep Sea keeps sleeping.”

Duncan’s eyes grew serious as he asked: “The Abyssal Lord?”

“…It seems you know more than I thought,” Ray Nora said, giving Duncan a quiet look. “But you are wrong. Though it indeed comes from that ‘Crawling King’, the being in the Deep Sea is not the true Abyssal Lord. Strictly speaking, it is only a replica.”

In a flash, Duncan remembered a line he had seen earlier in that strange “dark space”: “Cluster Controller has begun copying itself.”

So the giant “pillar” in the Deep Sea really was not the true body of the Abyssal Lord. It was only a replicant that had somehow appeared in the Mortal Realm!

So the exact situation was this: a replicant of an Elder God had pierced the “original city-state Blueprint” in the Deep Sea. The power that leaked out from it had caused all the later events. And the root of it all… was the Abyssal Lord’s complete runaway state?

Could he take it this way: before this replicant appeared in the Mortal Realm, the Abyssal Lord had not been in a runaway state at all? Had its condition worsened bit by bit over long ages until it reached this point?

Then if he followed this line of thought further… what about the other deities? If the “terrible Eldritch Gods” in people’s eyes had also gone from stable to a runaway state, then what of the “Four Gods” in the mortal world? Would they also go into a runaway state? Or… had they already started to slip into that runaway state?

Duncan thought of Pland and Frostholm, both under the protection of the Storm Goddess and the God of Death, running into trouble one after another. He thought of Vision 001, which had already started to fail. This clear sign of large systems breaking down bit by bit—was it proof that the whole world was falling into a runaway state?

When that unresolved guess found confirmation, a flood of tangled thoughts rushed into his mind. In a heartbeat, Duncan linked them to the many events that had happened on the Boundless Sea during this time.

Right then, Ray Nora’s voice came again from the other side and cut off his storm of thoughts: “Now it is my turn to ask questions.”

Duncan quickly gathered his thoughts and put them in order: “Ask.”

“How did you come here?” Ray Nora asked. Curiosity filled her eyes.

“In the Deep Sea under Frostholm, I found that ‘replica’, and at its break point I found an ‘entrance’ that could lead here,” Duncan said without hiding anything. “As for how I came down this deep… I rode the city-state of Frostholm’s submersible.”

“A submersible?” Ray Nora frowned, but soon she seemed to guess something and said: “Ah, so they did build a new one in secret after all…”

“You knew the rebel government would build a new submersible after your… death?” Duncan asked with some surprise. “From what I know, the Abyssal Trench Project was the root of that rebellion. They also used it as the reason to ‘execute’ you.”

“They would,” Ray Nora said with a small smile. “Because they are Frostholm people.”

For a moment, Duncan said nothing. He only watched this former Queen in silence.

She went on calmly: “Frostholm people never die quiet and meek. When the darkest hour comes, we will burn everything to live on. So when my Abyssal Trench Project went into a runaway state and the city-state fell into a crisis of survival, there had to be rebels who rose up, overthrew me, and made sure more people could live. And when they found the secret in the Deep Sea, they would surely build submersibles just as I did and try to solve this problem.

“They will improve the machines, slow down the plan, and learn from my extreme mistakes. They will try to do all of this in a gentler, less harmful way. And if they still fail, then new rebels will appear. The ones who come after will cut off the heads of those who could not do the job and then try yet another way… They will keep challenging the cold darkness in the Deep Sea.”

“It will go on until the last Frostholm person dies, or until this darkness clears.”

She lifted her head and looked into Duncan’s eyes with a calm, almost divine gaze. On his strange, frightening rough husk of a body, only those eyes still held a trace of human light.

“I only did not expect that the one who came down in a submersible would be… the legendary Captain Duncan, and clearly a Captain Duncan who has gained his reason," she said softly. "It seems my successors are even more extreme than I was back then?"

"…They failed," Duncan said after a few seconds of silence, shaking his head slightly. "A disaster destroyed the city-state government. They did not restart the Abyssal Trench Project before things went into a runaway state. The only good news is that the disaster finally calmed, and we found that submersible as 'spoils of war' after everything settled."

Chapter 484: Spawn

The queen of Frostholm stayed silent for more than ten seconds. Her purple eyes were as clear and calm as gemstones, revealing nothing of her mood. The silence almost froze into suffocation before she finally nodded lightly and said: “Oh.”

Then she thought for a moment and asked: “So how is Frostholm now?”

Duncan looked into her eyes and spoke in a calm tone: “Tyrian is the new governor. The Sea Mist Fleet is fully taking over the city-state. The remaining Frostholm navy will be reorganized and rebuilt.”

Ray Nora showed a slight smile: “Ah, Tyrian. One of the possibilities… Fate is really hard to pin down. This result is not bad. What do you think?”

Duncan did not answer. He only went on calmly: “There is one more thing. The current head of the city-state Church follows my orders.”

Ray Nora finally showed a slightly surprised look. She tilted her head a little: “Hm? It sounds like… you are now the real master of Frostholm?”

“I have no interest in ruling a city-state—but you can think of it that way.”

“Now I am even more curious about what actually happened to make Frostholm’s situation turn out like this,” Ray Nora said, her expression growing serious. “I arranged many things, but your appearance was outside all my plans. You mentioned a disaster, but in my estimates, even if It entered a certain degree of runaway state, the situation should not have become as bad as you said…”

“A vast army of replicas from The Deep Sea invaded Frostholm. A mirror world city-state almost rose up into the Mortal Realm,” Duncan said in a low voice. “While you were trying to calm that tentacle in The Deep Sea, a group of cultists sensed the power leaking from It—and Frostholm’s ongoing mining of the Boiling Gold shaft, in a way, ‘helped’ those heretics.”

Duncan did not hide anything after that. He told the former queen of Frostholm everything that had happened there, including the changes brought by his own interference.

Ray Nora did not interrupt from start to finish. She listened quietly until Duncan’s words ended. Only then did she let out a long breath, a complicated smile appearing on her face: “Compared to the Elder Gods in The Deep Sea, it really is the mad humans who are more frightening.”

Then she paused and sighed in relief: “Still, in the worst path, we got an ending that is not too terrible—most people lived. That is enough.”

“Even if, in the end, the city-state became the property of a ‘Subspace shadow’ like me?” Duncan asked on purpose.

Ray Nora only smiled. Then she looked very seriously into Duncan’s eyes and said: “Then you must be the strongest guardian Frostholm has ever had.”

“Your attitude toward me is different from others,” Duncan said with some feeling. “Since I regained my humanity, I have met many people. Most of them were startled and jumpy. Few could stay calm when meeting me for the first time, let alone show such an optimistic attitude like you.”

Ray Nora shook her head: “This is not optimism. It is fact. You regained your humanity and helped Frostholm. That naturally makes you the strongest guardian of this city-state. I know most people feel instinctive fear about this, but I have embraced fear for too long. I am used to looking through fear to see the true face of things."

"…Now it is my turn to ask questions." After hearing the queen of Frostholm's words, Duncan stayed silent for two or three seconds. Then he chose his words and spoke: "The replicant of the Abyssal Lord… when exactly did it invade the Mortal Realm? And will a similar 'invasion' happen again?"

"I am sorry. I cannot give a clear answer to the first question," Ray Nora said, a hint of apology on her face. "When I first noticed Its existence, It was already in The Deep Sea. And in the first few contacts, I only heard one voice… It said It was a faulty replicant. It said It needed to terminate its operation."

"Contact?" Duncan caught that word at once. "How did you 'contact' It at the beginning? And from what you are saying… this replicant told you about itself on Its own, and even asked you for help?"

Ray Nora nodded lightly: "I do not know if you have heard this, but I am a natural Psionic?"

"…I have indeed heard such rumors. They say you can know all things, past and present."

"Rumors exaggerate many things. I can neither foresee the future nor see through all things. But there is one thing they did not get wrong. A natural Psionic really can perform a Listening rite to hear 'voices' beyond the reach of ordinary people," Ray Nora said, as if lost in memories, thinking as she spoke slowly. "When I was very, very young, I often heard whispers from unknown sources, or saw strange and bizarre scenes in my sleep. Like most born Psionics, these terrible 'illnesses' were very dangerous. They even threatened the people taking care of me several times—

“Can you imagine it? You are caring for a two-or three-year-old child, and while the child is only dreaming in sleep, deadly shrieks suddenly fill the room, and swelling, writhing shadows appear… After my parents realized that the frequent horrors at home all came from the youngest child, they had no choice but to send me into the Cathedral. Like other born Psionics, I was put under the care of… ‘professionals.’

“I grew up in the deepest cellar of the great Cathedral until I was twelve. Fully armed Silent Monks and ascetics were my babysitters. Special shackles and a collar were my toys. A divinely blessed iron cage was my bed. The Gatekeeper came to check on me three times a week to make sure my mind still stayed on the side of humans. Only on my twelfth birthday, when my spirit and will had grown stronger and my awareness had become clear, did the Archbishop decide that I had stabilized on the ‘human’ side. Then they gave me divine blessing and Baptism, and announced to the outside world that I was a human.

“After that, I went through strict training to adapt to and control my gift, and to learn how to live in peace with my ‘nightmares.’ In four years, I gradually understood that my ‘dreams’ were actually a kind of resonance with the world. The whispers and shapes in my dreams came from beings that drifted outside the borders of the Mortal Realm and tried to make contact with our world. Once they were sure my mind could bear it, my Mentors taught me special methods to perform the Listening rite on those voices while keeping myself intact…

“And in that process, my ‘senses’ started to be drawn again and again toward The Deep Sea. I began to notice… Its existence.

“Or rather, It began to notice my existence.

“Every born Psionic has their own resonance tendency. Some tend to hear voices from history. Most of them become outstanding archaeologists and hidden scholars. Some tend to hear the voices of the Four Gods. As long as they live to adulthood, they are almost destined to become the Saint. Others are less fortunate. They resonate with Subspace. Ninety-nine out of a hundred of them never leave the Cathedral cellar alive. The few who do become extremely rare Keepers of Secrets or hidden Saints, kept by the Church.

“And I formed a resonance with an Elder God that had awakened in The Deep Sea.”

Ray Nora stopped. Her gaze turned toward the far end of the room, toward that dark, chaotic, broken space. Under her gaze, the darkness stirred. The chaotic lights and shadows of Subspace faded away. Endless floating islands in The Deep Sea, and that silent “pillar,” showed themselves in the depths of the darkness.

That was her resonance. It was her nightmare, her fear, and her duty. It was both the beginning and the end.

“In fact, most of the time, I could not hear clearly what ‘It’ was saying at all. At first I thought it was because my own power was too weak, and I did not control Psychic Resonance well enough. But as time passed, I found that the reason was actually within this ‘Elder God’ itself.

“It was not whole. It was only a ‘replica’ copied by mistake from a greater being. It woke up in this dark Deep Sea knowing nothing. In Its broken and chaotic thoughts, only one idea filled everything—error. Immediate termination.

“It repeated that thought in my mind thousands, tens of thousands of times.”

Duncan finally spoke softly: “So you started the Abyssal Trench Project?”

“No. I first became the queen of Frostholm,” Ray Nora said calmly. “That took some work. Only by controlling the whole city-state could I have more ways to investigate and confirm what I ‘heard.’ In that process, I discovered the anomaly deep in the Boiling Gold mine, and the link between all this and ‘The Deep Sea.’ The Abyssal Trench Project was the final result. I did a lot of preparation for that final result.”

Duncan did not speak for a moment. He rose slowly from his chair and walked to the far end of the room. He stared thoughtfully at the “view” of The Deep Sea that had appeared in the darkness, and at the tentacle, like a sky-piercing pillar, that ran through Frostholm’s “blueprint.”

After a long time, he turned his head slightly: “So It had no malice?”

“No malice and no kindness,” Ray Nora said. “In fact, It did not even have anything that could be called ‘intellect’—only a small fragment of broken, chaotic thought that ran through a simple judgment. It could not even understand Its own existence. So of course there was no such thing as an ‘attitude’ toward those tiny, fragile beings on the sea surface…

“It simply existed, in pain and in confusion, in this cold darkness. Yet such a simple ‘existence’ was enough to overturn our delicate and fragile so-called ‘civilized world.’”

Duncan muttered softly: “Existence itself is a threat…”

Ray Nora’s voice came from behind him a moment later: “Now I can answer your second question.

“Whether a similar ‘invasion’ will happen again—I think… it is possible. It is even certain.”

Duncan turned back at once: “Why?”

“Because it was not an ‘invasion’ at all. The Abyssal Lord did not ‘enter’ our Mortal Realm from Its own domain—It does not need to do that.

“Its ‘components’ naturally exist in the Mortal Realm. They are in every stretch of The Deep Sea, in every city-state, even in every human body. What happened in Frostholm’s Deep Sea was not an ‘invasion,’ but a… ‘awakening.’”

Ray Nora slowly spread her hands. A strange calm lay on her face. She fixed her gaze on Duncan’s eyes and spoke the greatest truth she had learned in her half century of nightmare sleep—

“Captain Duncan, in a certain sense, all of us, even the city-state under our feet, are the Elder Gods’ spawn.”

Chapter 485: Alice’s Secret

The room fell into silence.

This heavy silence lasted for an unknown length of time before Duncan suddenly broke it: “All beings in the world are Elder Gods’ spawn—even the most fanatical Annihilators have probably never spoken such a blasphemous conclusion.”

“Hearing the word ‘blasphemous’ from your mouth is truly unbelievable,” Ray Nora said, half smiling as her gaze met Duncan’s eyes. “Yet this really is the ultimate Truth I learned in that long nightmare. Just as in that scene you saw in The Deep Sea, the ‘Creation Doctrine’ preached by Annihilators is not entirely false. Perhaps they misunderstood it, but at least one thing is fact… Our world was created by the Elder Gods according to some grand ‘blueprint,’ and in that act of creation, Their flesh became the foundation of all things.”

Duncan stayed silent for a few seconds before speaking slowly, almost to himself: “The Abyssal Lord used Its own being as raw material and, following the ‘blueprint’ in The Deep Sea, shaped all things above the sea. Its ‘flesh’ naturally exists inside all things. Because of some ‘error,’ the ‘flesh’ that had already been shaped into worldly things became active. So the Elder Gods awoke from mortal flesh and from the ‘blueprints’ of city-states—that is the truth behind the Frostholm crisis?”

Ray Nora nodded slowly, her voice soft: “Copying and creating are the Abyssal Lord’s divine authority. It can evolve all things out of Its own being, so It took on the work of the Genesis Protocol. But clearly, after such a long time, the original blueprint has started to fail. Or perhaps the ‘Creator’ that serves as the source went wrong. It began to wake from Its creations—waking again and again in the form of ‘faulty replicas.’ Frostholm was the first, but it will not be the last…”

Even with Duncan’s self-control, hearing these shocking and dreadful words made it hard to hold back the storm in his heart. The Elder Gods would gradually awaken from all living beings and even from all things in the world. In terms of sheer eerie horror, this was even more terrifying than that Black Sun hanging over the city-state of Pland!

“You learned all this in your nightmares, in communication with… ‘It’?” Duncan asked. He had to put in real effort to steady the wild surge in his thoughts. Forcing himself to keep calm, he turned his head toward that dark Deep Sea at the end of the room, looking at the huge “pillar” that stood quietly in the darkness.

“As an incomplete replica, It cannot tell me anything directly, but I can learn many things from It,” Ray Nora said. “I know what you want to say—human minds are weak. Even when we face the Truth, our limited senses and thoughts cannot fully and accurately grasp what we see. So I do not dare claim that what I say is one hundred percent ‘real.’ It is only what I grasped through my own senses and understanding, from an Elder God’s broken ‘thoughts’… for your reference only.”

Duncan did not answer at once. He fell into long thought. After an unknown time, he suddenly turned back: “‘Alice’—what exactly is she? Is she the body you planned to use for your resurrection?”

“‘Alice’?” Ray Nora frowned slightly when she heard the name. The confusion in her eyes did not look fake. “Who is Alice?”

“…So you do not know that name. I thought her awareness came from you,” Duncan said. He carefully checked the small changes in Ray Nora’s expression before drawing back his searching gaze. “She is a doll who looks exactly like you. Many years ago, after you were… ‘executed,’ the people of Frostholm salvaged a container from the Frost Sea. Alice was sleeping inside it. She was once called Anomaly 099, but now she is a member of my crew.”

Ray Nora listened quietly to Duncan’s description. Her expression grew more and more thoughtful. After a long time, she suddenly showed a small smile: “Ah, so that is how it is…”

“So that is how it is?” Duncan caught that word at once. “What do you mean?”

“I have always been dreaming, all kinds of dreams. It is like drifting up and down on a sea shrouded in thick fog. Most of the time, I am wrapped in cold and darkness, falling asleep with those broken whispers. I can hardly tell whether the ‘me’ in the dream is the soul of a human or a dazed Elder God replicant in The Deep Sea. But sometimes… dry land appears in my dreams, and a swaying cabin, and some nervous strangers whispering to each other…”

As she spoke, she slowly lifted her head and looked at Duncan with a smile.

“In recent times, the second kind of dream has clearly appeared more often. The whispering strangers in the dream turned into many… strange but amusing items. They played and bickered with me. And there was always a trustworthy gaze watching from the edge of the dream… You care a great deal about that doll who calls herself ‘Alice,’ do you not?”

“There are not many people she can trust in this world. There are not many people I trust in this world either,” Duncan said. He looked very seriously at the ‘queen of Frostholm’ in front of him and did not relax just because of her gentle smile. “This runaway state sea has ‘copied’ many things—sunken ships, drowned sailors. But the ‘executed queen’ is the most special. She is a doll with a self… Yet from your attitude, you did not know about this?”

Ray Nora seemed not to notice the stern seriousness in Duncan’s eyes. She only frowned a little, as if thinking hard. Slowly, a look of realization appeared. She closed her eyes as if feeling for something, then opened them again and looked at Duncan with a slightly odd expression: “That doll calls herself ‘Alice,’ does she?”

Duncan frowned: “Yes. Is there a problem?”

“Then… what if I say that doll is not actually my ‘replica’?” Ray Nora said seriously. “Or rather, not entirely my replica?”

“…What do you mean by that?”

“Is it possible…” Ray Nora paused, trying to keep serious, though her expression stayed awkward. “The Alice guillotine—the point is not ‘Alice.’ It is ‘guillotine’…”

“…?” Duncan stared.

“I do not really want to recall this,” Ray Nora said as she reached up and rubbed the back of her neck with a strange look on her face. “Do you know that when the rebels executed me, they used a device called the ‘Alice guillotine’…”

A light finally flashed through Duncan’s mind. He understood what the ‘queen of Frostholm’ meant.

But he almost wished he did not.

“You mean you suspect ‘Alice’ was actually copied by this runaway state sea from that ‘guillotine,’ not from your body…”

Duncan spoke without thinking, but stopped halfway, muttering to himself in confusion: “But that cannot be right. She looks exactly like you…”

“Faulty copying, Captain,” Ray Nora said. She clearly already had an answer. She shook her head and looked toward the dark Deep Sea at the end of the room. “A damaged, faulty Elder God replicant caused this runaway state sea. In such a runaway state sea, faulty copying is the norm. When a decapitated queen and a guillotine sank into The Deep Sea together, and because of my earlier arrangements fell exactly into the ‘perception’ range of the Elder God’s tentacle, it may have triggered some… strange changes. Mixing and recombining, copying and making whole, and a little… processing from the mystic field.”

She stopped there and looked at the Elder God’s tentacle standing in the darkness, her gaze complicated.

“Clearly, It could not tell the difference…”

The room fell into silence again.

But this silence was completely different from before.

After this suffocating quiet lasted for several minutes, Duncan finally broke it with a sigh: “So in a sense, It was raising a placenta…”

Ray Nora opened her mouth. After a few seconds of stunned silence, she managed: “An unprecedented but perfectly fitting metaphor. As expected of you…”

Duncan let out a helpless sigh. What else could he say? In this dark, boundless Deep Sea, the way things developed had already gone beyond everyone’s expectations. The Elder Gods’ madness and unspeakable nature showed themselves in every detail. To use a less fitting metaphor—in choosing between saving the mother or the child, the Elder Gods chose to save the placenta…

But at least he had understood one thing—

Why did that silly doll think her name was “Alice”?

Because she really was the Alice guillotine.

Since coming to this world, Duncan had seen more strange and twisted things than he could count. Yet even among all those, this was definitely the most twisted of all.

“Look on the bright side. At least there is one thing you do not need to worry about,” Ray Nora said, noticing Duncan’s dark mood and trying to comfort him. “Alice is not a body I prepared for my resurrection. In fact, from the very beginning, I never planned any so-called ‘resurrection.’”

Listening to the queen of Frostholm’s words, Duncan turned to look at her again. He had to work hard to adjust his mood, forcing away the lingering sense of wrongness in his heart and pulling the topic back on track: “Then… what about that key you mentioned at the start? What about the keyhole on Alice’s back? Were none of those your arrangements?”

“I do not know what ‘keyhole’ you are talking about. But if the key you mean is a brass winding key, then yes, I did leave it to the city’s governor. It is also the item I just mentioned that is needed to enter this room in the normal way,” Ray Nora said openly. Then she changed the subject: “But I am not the key’s creator, nor its first owner.”

Duncan froze for a moment. His eyes changed: “…You were not the key’s first owner? Then where did you get it?”

“It was a gift from a friend,” Ray Nora said calmly. “An elderly man who was knowledgeable and kind.”

Chapter 486: Ray Nora’s “Friend”

The brass key that Ray Nora had left behind was actually a gift from a friend. This completely took Duncan by surprise.

It also stirred his curiosity even more.

Who exactly had made that key, and for what purpose? What was the true nature of that key? And what was the vision he had seen after touching it—the vessel crashing to the ground and breaking apart in an explosion?

He was desperate to know the answers. Luckily, the Frostholm Queen did not hide what she knew and spoke frankly:

“I met that friend not long after I left the great Cathedral. At the time I was planning how to take power, often meeting all kinds of people and taking part in public affairs. That old man showed up at a fundraising gathering…

“He was not on the guest list, yet he slipped past all the guards and all the eyes watching the place with ease. I thought he was a professor from the university, because he wore a scholar’s robe and had a refined, proper manner. I did not know he had snuck in, so I chatted with him. His vast knowledge was astonishing… until the bodyguards at the gathering finally realized what was going on and threw him out.

“But after that, the old man began to appear in my sight again and again. Sometimes it was at upper-class parties, sometimes at private dinners hosted by friends. He would appear whenever everyone’s eyes were elsewhere, then calmly come up to talk with me. He discussed history, mathematics, and occult studies with me, and always slipped away before anyone else could notice. Aside from that first time, when the bodyguards found him, he always managed to hide himself from everyone's eyes.

"Isn't it unbelievable? A friend only I knew about, a learned adviser… an 'air friend'.

"I never told anyone about him. At first, I was afraid of worrying the Church. The bishops would suspect my Psionic gift had entered a runaway state and would lock me back in the cellar. I knew my power had not gone out of control and I did not fear being chained up again, but I felt my time was precious. I could not waste it in a cage. Later, when I began to gain control of the city-state's power, I had even more reason to hide the existence of this 'secret adviser'.

"This went on for about three years. I became close friends with this mysterious old man despite our age difference. Just when I thought he would continue to serve as my 'special staff member' until my coronation, he suddenly appeared before dawn one day and said goodbye.

"This was what he said: 'The Window Interval is over. This is the last time we will meet.'

"Then he handed me a brass key and told me that the key was a twisted aggregate, a key that could create links in time and space. It could also carry knowledge and memories. One day in the future, it would surely play its part…

"After he told me many things about the key, my 'air friend' simply turned around and walked toward the first beam of light from the rising dawn. The moment the Sun rose over the horizon, he vanished. That was the last time I saw him."

Duncan listened to Ray Nora's story in astonishment. Countless thoughts rose in his mind, and they all quickly pointed to one word. As soon as the Frostholm Queen finished speaking, he spoke at once: “Wait. From your description, that person sounds exactly like a…”

“Yes, a Ender, Captain Duncan,” Ray Nora said with a smile. “I guessed it after our first few meetings. In all those years of training in the Cathedral I read more books than I can count. Of course I knew what a Ender was.”

“You became friends with a Ender, and he even…” Duncan spoke with a frown, but halfway through he sensed something wrong. “Wait, no. He doesn’t sound like a normal Ender…”

“That’s right, just as you said,” Ray Nora answered. “In ‘nature’ he was very similar, but his state was nothing like those mad cultists. His mind was keen, his reason was clear, and his manner was gentle and friendly. The only thing he had in common with the other Enders was his ‘nonlinear way of appearing and disappearing’.”

“Normal Enders cannot think or speak calmly. The tearing of the timelines has already shattered their perception, and their worship of Subspace has destroyed their reason,” Duncan said quickly. “But the one you knew was the opposite…”

He suddenly stopped.

Because in that instant, he remembered something else. It was something related to “himself”.

Tyrian had once mentioned, while talking with Vanna and Valentine, that a century ago, just before “Duncan Abnomar” set sail on his final voyage, several mysterious Visitors had come aboard the Vanished. They wore robes like those of ascetic monks, appeared on the ship without warning, and talked all night with the Duncan of that time. Then, when the Sun rose the next day, they vanished as mysteriously as they had come…

Tyrian had always believed that the visit of those mysterious Visitors was the direct reason the Vanished sailed toward the “border” on that last voyage.

And those mysterious Visitors, from the description, had been a group of clear-minded, gentle, and friendly “Enders”!

The body Duncan was using now could not show complex expressions, but his brief silence and the change in his eyes did not escape the sharp gaze of the Frostholm Queen. Ray Nora reacted at once: “Did something come to mind?”

Duncan lifted his head. He did not speak for a moment. He simply gazed quietly into her eyes with his gaze.

The “friend” Ray Nora knew was not the only one. Among the Enders, a group most people saw as cruel and insane cultists, there really were some individuals who still had reason. Their goals were unknown. They moved along the timelines, using a kind of contact period called the “Window Interval” to keep meddling in the affairs of the mortal world.

Countless thoughts rose and flashed through his mind. At last Duncan broke the silence: “They once visited the Vanished as well.”

For the first time, Ray Nora’s eyes opened wide at once.

It seemed she had not completely lost the ability to feel surprise, as she had claimed at the start.

“You have met clear-minded Enders too?” Ray Nora said quickly. “What did they tell you? They were…”

“Sadly, I no longer remember,” Duncan cut off her hurried questions. “That part of my memory vanished with Subspace’s corruption. I only learned from other sources that I once had dealings with them.”

An undisguised look of regret appeared on Ray Nora's face.

Duncan quickly gathered his thoughts and pulled the topic back on track: "After you realized he was a special kind of Ender, did you ever talk with him about his real identity? Did you ask about his purpose?"

"Of course I asked. But do you think he would give me an answer?" Ray Nora sighed helplessly. "We got along very well. He was both a teacher and a friend to me, and he was happy to answer most of my questions. But whenever I tried to steer the topic toward his 'identity', he always brushed it aside with one line:

"'It is not time yet. Do not reach for what lies beyond the boundary too early.'"

"'Do not reach for what lies beyond the boundary too early…'" Duncan repeated the words in a low voice. He frowned slightly. "You still managed to become friends with such a suspicious person under those conditions. One could say you have a… very generous heart."

"I needed help. Most things in this world that can be called 'power' are dangerous," Ray Nora said calmly. "Compared to the 'dreams' I have dealt with since childhood, a Ender was actually far too gentle and harmless."

Duncan said nothing more. He stood up again and slowly walked to the darkness at the far end of the room.

"One last thing. What plans do you have… for your own future?"

Ray Nora frowned slightly: "My future?"

"Do you have to stay in this room called the 'Drifting Place' forever?" Duncan asked. He lifted his chin and pointed at the huge "tentacle" in the darkness of the Deep Sea. "Do you have to stay here forever, using dreams to hold down this 'flawed replicant'?"

“Do you have another way?”

“Maybe, but I am not sure,” Duncan said. “If I completely destroy this flawed replicant, what will happen?”

“Freedom…” Ray Nora fell silent for a few seconds, then nodded slowly and solemnly. “Both I and It will be freed.”

“And after that?”

“I do not know,” Ray Nora said, shaking her head. “That is already beyond my understanding. I have never even imagined what it would be like if this long nightmare finally ended. Maybe this ‘Drifting Place’ will lose this connection point and link to some other place. Maybe I will lose my connection with the Mortal Realm, no longer be troubled by nightmares, and become an idle wandering spirit, waiting for the day someone opens this room again.”

“That does not sound like a very good ending,” Duncan said, his tone growing heavier. “Eternal exile is not much better than sinking into a nightmare.”

“In fact, it is even worse, because I do not control this room,” Ray Nora replied. “Compared with reconnecting to some ‘connection point’ in the Mortal Realm, it is more likely that, while drifting in a runaway state, it will sink to the Subspace side.”

Duncan fell silent again and did not speak for a long time.

After a moment, Ray Nora broke the silence on her own: “Even so, I still advise you to do it. If you really can, then end all this while I still have time.”

Duncan gazed into the Frostholm Queen’s eyes with his gaze: “Are you sure? Even if it means you will suffer eternal exile?”

“Being trapped in a nightmare forever is also a kind of eternal exile,” Ray Nora said with a smile. “If I can be freed like this, it will at least solve the long-term threat Frostholm faces. At least for quite a long time, my city-state and my people will be safe.”

Chapter 487: Setting Fire to the Deep Sea

Ray Nora's tone was calm and detached, as if many years ago she had already planned every scene of her own End. Whether it was being trapped in a nightmare forever or suffering eternal exile, it was just one of the steps that had always been part of her planned future.

Just as Duncan had thought, the Frostholm Queen had never prepared for her own "resurrection". Returning to the Mortal Realm had never been part of her plan from the very beginning.

Yet this ready, fearless attitude made Duncan feel strange.

"Are you really willing to give everything for Frostholm? Even more than your life?" He turned his head and looked into Ray Nora's eyes with curiosity. "You spent more than ten years living in a cage beneath the Cathedral. You were not treated as a human being until you were twelve. You were watched, chained, and tested. Every thought you had, every sentence you muttered in your sleep, was taken as a possible sign of betraying humans and was analyzed again and again. You did everything you could, yet in the end you were still sent to the guillotine as the 'mad Queen'… I do not want to judge anyone from a dark point of view, but at least from a logical angle, I am very surprised by your choice."

Ray Nora fell silent. She leaned against her bed and looked up at the gauze hanging above. Her thoughts seemed to drift very far away. After a long time, she suddenly smiled and shook her head: “Yes… why am I doing this…”

She turned her head and gazed quietly into Duncan’s eyes with her gaze.

“Do you know, they could have burned me to death,” she said. “A long, long time ago, on the day I first woke from a nightmare, before I learned to say ‘Dad’ and ‘Mother’, before I knew I was a human… Captain, maybe the way I told my story made you misunderstand something. You think I should hate that cold city, but in fact it was that city that did everything it could to keep me alive.

“On a wider scale, it is our delicate yet fragile civilized world that is doing its best to let everyone live. That includes natural-born Psionics like me. Even if they had to use chains, iron cages, and a dungeon to hold me there for ten years, they never expected me to die in that cold place. They hoped I would come back as a human.

“I have never hated anyone, Captain. They did not treat me cruelly, because this world is cruel to everyone. Everyone is only doing the best they can.”

The former Frostholm Queen let out a soft sigh, then slowly rose and stepped down from her bed that was like a cage. Compared with the ten years she had spent in the Cathedral’s cellar, perhaps the only difference was that this bed did not have a ring of bars around it.

She walked slowly to the far end of the room and stood beside Duncan, looking out at the chaotic darkness of the Deep Sea.

“My parents and the people in the Cathedral did their best to keep me alive,” she said. “My supporters and I did our best to keep the city-state safe. Governor Winston and all his predecessors did their best to finish the work I could not. But very often, doing our best does not mean we will succeed. Failure naturally has its price.”

She slowly raised her arm and pointed at the huge tentacle in the darkness.

“Even the Elder Gods have to face failure, do they not?”

“If your theory is correct, new flawed replicants will appear sooner or later, waking from the creations of the mortal world,” Duncan said after thinking for a moment. “Destroying the flawed replicant here cannot fix the root of the whole world.”

“Other people will ‘do their best’,” Ray Nora said calmly, turning to look at Duncan. “What about you? Will you act?”

Duncan stayed silent for a while. Then he spoke softly: “I will do my best.”

“That is enough,” Ray Nora said with a smile. “Then do it. I have slept for too long. It is time to wake from this nightmare… and it is time to free It as well.”

There was a hint of urgency in her voice, as if she could hardly wait.

Duncan hesitated for a long time, then finally nodded in silence.

In the next second, a cluster of ghostly green flame suddenly appeared beside him. The fire spun and swelled, slowly turning into a swirling doorway.

He walked toward the great door, and at that moment Ray Nora’s expression suddenly changed a little.

She stared at the rising green flames, as if looking at a distant, hazy memory. Then she suddenly turned her head and looked at Duncan, who was about to step through the door: “It was you?!”

Duncan stopped. After a brief moment of confusion, he finally realized why the Frostholm Queen was reacting like this.

“I suppose this does not count as corruption of history,” he said, keeping his posture as if he were about to step through the door and turning his head slightly. “What do you think?”

“So that is how it is… so that is how it is…” Ray Nora murmured. Expressions flashed quickly across her face, as if many worries from years ago had suddenly become clear. Then a faint light seemed to rise in her eyes. For the first time, she showed a bright, heartfelt smile. She raised her head to look at Duncan and waved, just as she had once waved goodbye to an old friend many years ago. “Go on. Do what you must. I think… we are making the right choice.”

Duncan gave the Frostholm Queen one last, deep look. He did not say anything more. He stepped forward and walked into the spinning door of flame.

Ray Nora stood there quietly, watching his figure disappear from the room.

It was just like many years ago, when that gentle, learned old man had vanished into the morning light.

She slowly drew back her gaze and turned around. She stood at the broken edge of the room, looking at the Elder Gods’ tentacle that was now in a state of stillness. She looked at her nightmare of the past half century, and at all the fate and duty bound to it.

Thin strands of eerie green flame rose from the dark abyss of the sea beyond. At first they were as small as fireflies, but in an instant they spread quickly, growing larger and stronger, and began to spread and burn along the whole “pillar”.

A slight tremor appeared under her feet and grew stronger with each passing moment.

The mansion began to shake. The power that supported this dream was fading. The “connection point” between the Drifting Place and the outside world was breaking apart and vanishing. The darkness outside the room suddenly seemed to surge. Countless ripples and shifting lights spread wildly and then drew back into the dark again. In that unstable glow, the Elder Gods’ tentacle began to change. It seemed to bend. Vague structures grew from its tip, stretching and crossing the shifting border between real and unreal, bending down toward this shattered room.

Ray Nora only stood quietly before this terrifying sight. She watched the phantom, newborn smaller tendril bend and stretch toward her. She watched it finally reach the invisible boundary, where its black “flesh” pressed against the unseen barrier and spread out.

Ray Nora slowly stretched out her hand and placed her palm on that shifting surface of flesh. Through the dream’s barrier, she felt everything It was sending to her—confusion, tension, unease, and a hint of regret.

“Yes… I know. You never wanted to appear in this world… It will be over soon. Treat it as a dream. You will go back to where you should be…

“I will leave too, soon. When the anchor cable breaks, that will be the moment of departure… I might go very far away, or I might never have another destination. Even if my calculations are right, it will probably be a journey so long it is hard to imagine… So if there is any scenery to see, I will enjoy it.”

The soundless exchange went on in the dream. In these last moments before waking, Ray Nora suddenly felt a bit sentimental.

“We have been together for so long, and I have never asked your name,” she said, gazing with her gaze at the tentacle beyond the dream’s border and feeling the confused, broken messages It sent. Most of those messages could not even be called complete ‘thoughts’. They were more like scraps of inspiration from a damaged soul struggling to think. But in half a century together, she had grown used to ‘talking’ with this broken will. “Of course, I know the title Abyssal Lord, and I know you have other titles as well… but those are not your name…

“Do you have a name? Whether it is yours or your ‘true body’s’… It is nothing. I just suddenly felt curious.”

In the sea of chaotic noise and murmurs, one thought suddenly came through very clearly.

Ray Nora listened in silence, performing the Listening rite just as she had as a child, when she had crouched among cold bars and chains, listening to the vague whispers from the depths of the tide. A name seemed to rise in her mind as if she were half awake and half asleep.

A faint smile slowly appeared on her lips: “LH-01… what a strange name… Navigator One? Was that your original name?

“All right, I will remember it. It was a pleasure to meet you, Navigator One. Then… farewell, and good morning.”

A roaring wave of flame surged from the depths of the darkness like a tsunami and reached this place. In the blink of an eye it swallowed the tentacle that was touching the Drifting Place. In the burning flames, the Elder Gods’ flawed replicant returned to dust and ashes.

The blazing flames even burned through the dream’s barrier for a brief moment. At Ray Nora’s feet, in the air around her, and at the edges of the room, strange yet brilliant sparks bloomed like flowers.

Ray Nora watched the leaping spirit form flames with curiosity and reached out to touch their edges.

The warm fire faded at her fingertips.

In the dark, icy Deep Sea, the suddenly rising ghostly flames lit up the whole sea like a coronal eruption. They lit the dark floating island drifting in the Deep Sea and shone on the human-shaped empty shells that floated in the black water like a swarm of bees.

Duncan floated quietly at the edge of the dark floating island, watching the spirit form blaze he had lit burn fiercely. Its power was so great that even he, the one who had started the fire, felt a deep sense of shock.

Chapter 488: Homeward Voyage

The fire spread faster and fiercer than Duncan had imagined.

He had only lit a small flame at the edge of that gigantic “pillar” and had been ready to wait for it to spread slowly. He had not expected that tiny spark to instantly swell into a towering blaze that lit up The Deep Sea. Beneath the weight of hundreds of millions of tons of seawater, the roaring fire looked even more uncanny than usual.

supernatural things were the best fuel for spirit form flames, and the Elder Gods’ tentacles naturally counted as “supernatural”. Even so, the fire still burned far too fiercely and too fast.

It was as if some power was acting as a catalyst, strengthening the spirit flame.

Was it the special environment of The Deep Sea itself? Or was that Elder God tentacle actively “cooperating”?

Duncan frowned a little and felt the enormous stream of information the flames were sending to him. The information was broken and scattered, mixed with masses of twisted noise and fragments of light and shadow. It seemed to be the uncontrolled spillover from the tentacle’s collapse.

To an ordinary person, even a single whisper from those things could have been enough to bring madness. Duncan only found them trivial and chaotic. He tried hard to pick useful information out of the jumbled noise, and right before all the noise faded, he finally “heard” a few “voices” he could understand.

In the water, he suddenly opened his eyes wide, a little stunned, and stared at the Elder God tentacle that was rapidly collapsing and disintegrating in the spirit flame.

“LH-01? Navigator One?!”

In the void, it was as if a roar came from The Deep Sea. The flawed replicant of the Elder God finally broke apart completely. All the noise vanished, and no voice answered Duncan’s sudden question. In the silence that followed, a silence that felt filled with endless emptiness, only one vague thought drifted quietly through his mind like a phantom in the mist—

“Thank you, bearer of the Flame Usurper.”

Duncan blinked. His mind surged with tangled thoughts and countless startling guesses and associations. He did not know how long passed. Just as he began to consider whether to keep exploring this place, whether to keep diving deeper, a flicker of fire suddenly appeared at the edge of his vision.

He snapped his head around and saw that the AI, which had been flitting around him, suddenly began to flicker violently, like a projection with a bad connection. The fiery glow over the whole pigeon turned dim and bright by turns. It beat its wings rapidly and let out a sharp, broken cry: “Your… signal quality is poor, please check… your hardware connec… remote server… wait…”

Duncan’s eyes tightened at once. He waved his hand and teleported the AI back. In the next second, as the AI returned to the Vanished, he noticed that the “temporary body” he was using was rapidly falling apart.

In the blink of an eye, cracks of all sizes spread over the whole of this rough-husk-like body. The eerie green flame that leaped within the cracks was rapidly dissipating.

In the surrounding seawater, the “human shapes” drifting everywhere also began to show the same signs of collapse. Countless human husks quickly turned into black fragments and sank toward that pitch-black floating island of Frostholm in The Deep Sea.

The flawed replicant of the Elder God had been burned away by the blaze, and the human Rough Husks that surrounded the floating island in The Deep Sea collapsed with it. Aside from the island itself, which might be the original Blueprint, everything in this part of The Deep Sea was quickly breaking down and dispersing, returning to… the “normal state of the original design”.

Duncan quickly worked out the chain of cause and effect behind these changes. In the next second, he felt his consciousness forcibly pop out of this body that could no longer be sustained.

Right before his senses cut off, only one thought remained in his mind—

What a pity about this body that suited The Deep Sea. He had thought he could use it for a long time, but it turned out to be another one?time shell…

The low rumble of the ballast tank pumping water out echoed inside the submersible. With a slight tremor, the whole machine began to rise faster.

At the controls, Duncan let out a regretful sigh, mourning the loss of yet another “temporary body” while he checked the machine’s status.

The Deep Sea turbulence caused by the collapse of that giant “pillar” had slammed into the slowly ascending submersible, but luckily it had not caused any damage.

Agatha’s voice, full of shock, came from beside him: “Just now… what was that?!”

She lifted a hand and pointed out the porthole, toward the stretch of dark Deep Sea that was quickly returning to gloom. Yet in the boundless darkness, traces of green radiance still flared now and then. Vast streams of ghostly green light looked as if they were burning furiously along some enormous wreck, or as if a chain of explosions were going off in that darkness.

Outside the submersible, chaotic currents churned everywhere. The noise of the machinery and the dull bangs that thudded from the hull from time to time were enough to rattle the nerves.

There was no doubt that something huge had just happened below.

"…I found the source of Frostholm's crisis. At the center of that floating island in The Deep Sea that seems to be a 'Creation Blueprint', there was a gigantic Elder God tentacle. It was a flawed replicant of the Abyssal Lord, and its presence affected this entire sea area," Duncan said as he turned his head slightly and glanced at Agatha, who was clearly waiting for an explanation. "For the past fifty years, the soul of the Frostholm Queen has been soothing that flawed replicant. She has held on for far too long."

Agatha slowly opened her mouth wide.

She had not expected that Captain Duncan could simply go down in an avatar form to take a look and come back with news this shocking!

She stared in stunned silence for a long time before she finally snapped out of it and spoke without thinking: "Then… what then? What happened after that?"

"I burned it," Duncan said, keeping it short.

Agatha did not react at first: "…You burned it?"

"I burned it," Duncan repeated, and raised his hand to point out of the porthole. "Didn't you see? I set it on fire."

“No, it’s not that I didn’t understand you. I understand… no, I don’t understand, I really don’t understand,” Agatha actually became a little incoherent. Even when she had faced hundreds of cultists in that eerie and evil sacrificial ground, she had never felt this at a loss, but in front of Captain Duncan, who never seemed to follow any normal rules, her sanity always felt a bit lacking. “You just… burned it? An Elder God… even if it was only a flawed replicant of an Elder God… you just burned it?”

Of course Duncan had known Agatha would react like this, but he truly had no idea how to explain the endless details. After wrestling with it for a long while, he could only shrug helplessly: “Honestly, I was surprised too. It was more flammable than I expected.”

Agatha: “…”

After a brief silence, this Miss Gatekeeper finally managed to get her thoughts back on track: “Then… what about the Frostholm Queen’s soul? Did you ‘burn’ it along with everything else?”

“She gained her freedom, but I don’t know where she will go—maybe we will meet again,” Duncan said, each word completely honest. “I talked with her about many things, including her experiences while she was alive, the secrets in The Deep Sea, and some… truths about our world. Most of it is very subversive.”

“Very subversive?” Agatha still seemed not quite recovered from the earlier shock of ‘I burned it’. Her thoughts were clearly a step slow. She listened to Duncan and only spoke on reflex: “What kind of subversive?”

“The kind where, before you listen, you need to burn incense, receive a benediction, and write a will. And after you listen, you need Quarantine Observation and a Sanity Check,” Duncan turned his head and glanced at her. “I will tell you, once we are back on safe land and I am sure you are ready.”

Even as a Gatekeeper who had passed through many trials and had an extremely tough mind, Agatha still felt her nerves tighten at his words without thinking.

For this “captain” who could even return from Subspace to speak in such a solemn and serious tone… just what secrets had he learned in that cold, boundless darkness?

At the same time, back on the Vanished, Duncan had already returned from that “studio apartment” sealed in thick fog and come back to his captain’s cabin.

On the edge of the enchanted sea chart table, the dark Goathead creaked as it turned its neck. Its obsidian inlaid eyes fell on the captain.

“Name?” it asked in a stiff, formal tone.

“Duncan Abnomar.” Duncan waved a hand, sat down at the table, then looked up at Goathead again: “Was I gone for too long?”

“You were too far away,” Goathead seemed to breathe a sigh of relief, and its tone immediately relaxed. “I felt a strand of your will go to a very, very distant place, so far that even the Vanished could barely sense it. Please don’t be angry, I was only worried about your safety. After all, such a big ship is still counting on our wise captain to lead it…”

“That’s enough. I know all about your loyalty, reliability, diligence, and thoughtfulness. Don’t worry, it was only a distant but brief trip. It didn’t have any real effect—what is Alice doing?”

“Miss Alice?” Goathead paused for a moment, then spoke again: “She was resting in her cabin just now… ah, she is coming toward the captain’s cabin. She seems to be in a hurry.”

No sooner had Goathead finished speaking than hurried footsteps sounded from the deck outside the door, and Alice’s familiar presence appeared outside.

Just as a knock was about to sound, Duncan spoke first: “Come in.”

The next second, two knocks still came, and then the doll belatedly let out an “oh” outside, opened the door, and walked into the room.

“Captain! Captain, Captain!” As soon as she came in, Alice hurried over to Duncan. Before he could say anything, she rattled off: “Something happened! I just had a dream! I just had a dream!”

Duncan had originally had many things he wanted to say to Alice, but he had not expected her to be even more flustered than he was. He frowned: “You had a dream? What did you dream of?”

“I don’t really remember the details!” Alice said with full confidence. “I just felt like, in the dream, I was kind of… impressive? Like that feeling you talked about before… like I’d grown a brain?”

Chapter 489: Turning the key

Duncan quietly looked at Alice, and Alice looked back at Duncan with the same confident expression.

After a moment, Duncan rubbed his brow first and felt a strange emotion rise in his heart, a sense of wrongness that would not go away.

It was clearly the same face. How could it show such a completely different air…

“Captain,” Alice blinked curiously when she saw Duncan’s reaction and leaned closer to ask: “Why aren’t you saying anything? Did I say something wrong?”

“…No, it’s not your fault.” Duncan shook his head, pulling himself out of his messy thoughts. Then he suddenly lifted his gaze and looked at the doll in front of him with a solemn, serious expression: “Alice, have you ever been curious about the connection between you and the Frostholm Queen?”

Alice froze for a moment, raised a hand to scratch her head, and seemed to think quite seriously before she answered, not very sure: “I… have been curious, but then I thought about it, and it didn’t seem like something very important, so I stopped thinking about it.”

Duncan was a little surprised: “Not very important?”

“The Frostholm Queen is the Frostholm Queen, and I am me. No matter how great that queen is, that’s her business, and I don’t understand it anyway,” Alice said with a very serious face. “I have things I’m good at, and I really like my days now. That’s good enough. And I heard Mr. Morris say that in this world everyone might find another person who looks almost exactly like them, so I’ll just think of the Frostholm Queen as the person who looks exactly like me—though I’m actually a doll…”

Duncan quietly listened to the doll’s words and watched the natural, content light in her eyes when she talked about her days now. Something was suddenly moved in his heart.

Maybe… she really was only a special, flawed replica made by an Elder God in The Deep Sea. Maybe she really was only the result of Ray Nora falling into The Deep Sea and fusing strangely with that Guillotine. Or maybe even more secrets were hidden in her, secrets that even Ray Nora could not have imagined… But just as Alice herself had said, that was not very important.

She was not clever, yet she was very happy. There were many things she could not understand, but she had never felt nervous or afraid because of these overly complicated matters. She had been born and lived in a world full of strangeness, yet this strange world was, to her, the most ordinary kind of “normal”. In this world, full of novelty and unknowns in her eyes, she explored, she felt curious, she looked forward to everything, including tomorrow, just like…

a child who opened their eyes under the sunlight.

The living beings of the mortal world were beyond counting, yet even the bravest warrior, the most learned sage, and the most devout believer could not look at this world from a viewpoint like Alice’s.

Duncan suddenly had a feeling. In this eerie world where everyone carried fear in their hearts and all things were twisting out of shape, Alice, this “doll”, seemed more like a “human” than anyone.

Just like the ordinary humans he had seen in that other world, in that world without Anomalies and Visions, without Gods and weirdness, who walked calmly under the sunlight.

“Captain?” Alice’s curious voice sounded again: “Why are you spacing out again?”

“It’s nothing,” Duncan shook his head. “I just suddenly felt that… you actually have a lot of wisdom.”

When Alice heard the captain praise her, she froze for a moment, and then a happy look slowly spread over her face: “Hehe…”

She did not know why the captain suddenly said she had “wisdom”, and she had never even thought that she might have any wisdom, but if the captain praised her like this, then it was certainly something to be happy about.

After praising her, Duncan fell silent for a brief moment, thinking. Then he slowly reached his hand to his side. A cold touch came to his fingertips. It was the brass key.

In The Deep Sea, the submersible was still slowly rising, and there was still some time before “recovery”.

Ray Nora, the Frostholm Queen, had given him a great deal of information, but much of it was still incomplete or vague and needed him to verify it himself.

The brass key… A rational Ender had placed it in Ray Nora’s hands, yet even with her abilities, she had never managed to understand the true “essence” of this key. At the same time, on Alice, this flawed replicant who seemed to have been born purely by “coincidence”, a matching Keyhole had appeared… Was it still coincidence at this point?

Had that Ender foreseen all of this today? Or, when that Elder God tentacle sleeping in The Deep Sea created “Alice”, had it searched through Ray Nora’s memories and left the “Keyhole” in Alice’s body?

Maybe… it was time to try.

“Alice,” Duncan suddenly raised his head and looked at the doll in front of him with a solemn face: “Come with me.”

“Ah?” Alice was startled for a moment, but she quickly reacted, stood up, and followed: “Oh, okay!”

“Hold the helm.” Duncan rose from behind the enchanted sea chart table, gave Goathead a brief instruction, then took a light breath and turned toward the captain’s quarters.

Not knowing what was going on, Alice followed behind Duncan and walked through the bedroom door with him. At his instruction, she turned back to close the door, then turned again and looked at Duncan curiously.

“Captain? What are we doing next?”

Duncan silently held the key in his hand and looked at the doll: “I want to test this key.”

When Alice heard this, she was a little surprised: “Ah? Didn’t you say this key might be dangerous? That the Frostholm Queen’s soul might be living inside it or something…”

“The hidden danger has been cleared,” Duncan said calmly. “I just dealt with it myself.”

“Oh!” Alice answered at once. Then she turned around and felt for the zipper on the back of her clothes without a bit of hesitation: “Then I’ll open my clothes first…”

“You only need to expose the Keyhole,” Duncan said. Even after spending so long with this solid?headed doll, he still felt a bit embarrassed by her complete lack of hesitation. He reminded her without thinking, then added with some surprise: “You’re not afraid?”

“You said there’s no hidden danger anymore, Captain,” Alice said, turning her head. “And you’re the one who will wind me up yourself. If something goes wrong, you’ll definitely protect me, right?”

“…Yes, I will protect you.” After a brief two or three seconds of silence, Duncan slowly nodded. Then he raised his hand and pointed to a round stool beside the bed: “Sit here—I’m not sure what will happen after I wind you, so you’d better not stand.”

“Oh!” Alice agreed and obediently came over to sit on the round stool, turning her back to Duncan.

The doll’s clothes were already open at the back.

Duncan finally saw what the “Keyhole” looked like. It was set right in the center of Alice’s back, which was as smooth as white porcelain. The Keyhole was embedded there abruptly, surrounded by a ring of fine, ornate patterns with a texture like gilding.

Duncan lowered his head and glanced at the brass key in his hand.

…The size and shape really did match perfectly.

A strange feeling rose in his heart, mixed with a bit of tension. Duncan took a light breath, controlled that odd emotion, and slowly brought the key close to the round hole.

“Alice.”

“Mm?”

“Don’t be afraid.”

“Okay!”

The winding key slid into the Keyhole without the slightest resistance. Right after that, a clear “click” sounded beside Duncan’s ear, as if it rang directly in his mind.

Some mechanism had been triggered—but it was not an ordinary clockwork.

A faint force came from his fingertips, and Duncan instantly realized that the winding key was turning by itself. It slowly turned to a horizontal position, and then another “click” came.

In the next second, everything before his eyes began to change sharply.

Light and shadow collapsed and reformed. His senses went through a shift and reset. There was that familiar slight dizziness again, that feeling of “transfer” like walking in the Spirit Realm—

Before he had time to sigh in his heart: [Here we go again], everything around Duncan had already settled down.

He now stood inside a grand mansion that was old and splendid, yet also gloomy and eerie.

The classical and solemn hall was wide and empty. Tall pillars lined both sides of the hall, holding up the gloomy roof above that was like a mass of gathered dark clouds. Long, narrow windows were set into the walls, which were covered with patterns and reliefs. Outside the windows, black thorns seemed to crawl across the surface, and muddled lights and shadows swirled beyond the thorny tangle.

And in this grim, uncanny mansion, human voices sounded now and then—whispering, broken bits of talk and laughter, footsteps on the floor, and even… strange, blurred music, as if a ball were being held somewhere.

Duncan frowned slightly and let his gaze sweep over the gloomy old house.

Something flashed at the edge of his vision.

Duncan quickly looked in that direction but saw only an empty corner.

But he was sure he really had seen something just now. There had been a figure… who looked like a maid in a black and white dress.

That figure had no head. At the collar of her blouse there was only a bare neck.

Duncan stood in the empty hall for a moment, carefully observing the surroundings and sensing the faint, uneasy aura drifting in the air. Then he began to walk toward the spiral staircase that wound upward at the end of the hall.

He had to figure out what this place was—why had winding up Alice brought him here?

He went up the spiral stairs. The steps, which felt as if they had been abandoned for countless years, creaked strangely under his feet. As he walked, a sense of familiarity suddenly rose in his heart.

He stopped abruptly and widened his eyes at the furnishings and style of the mansion.

He knew where that familiar feeling came from.

The room where Ray Nora, the Frostholm Queen, had slept!

Chapter 490: Strange Manor

Duncan stood at the top of the tall spiral staircase, looking down over the old yet splendid mansion. He once again confirmed his judgment: this mysterious house was almost exactly the same in style as the room where Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm had been sleeping before.

A thought flashed through his mind. He turned around at once and looked toward the other side at the top of the spiral stairs.

Over there was a deep corridor on the second floor. Strange paintings whose details could not be made out hung on both walls. Between the canvases stood iron candleholders as black as thorns. Pale flames burned on the candles, filling the corridor with dim, muddled light. At the very end of the passage, in the hazy darkness of the shadows, there seemed to be a faint suggestion of a door.

Was that the room of the manor’s Master?

Duncan moved at once, striding toward the depths of the dim corridor. The old wooden floorboards creaked in a dull rhythm under his feet. The pale candles on both sides of the hall seemed to sway in an unfelt breeze stirred up by his passing, rocking erratically. The already gloomy corridor filled with shifting light and shadow, and it looked even darker and more indistinct.

At the end of the corridor, Duncan stopped. His brows knit tightly as he stared into the darkness before him.

There was no door here. The big door he had seen in the shadows moments ago seemed to have been nothing but a fleeting illusion. In front of him was only a corridor that ended abruptly. The floor, walls, and ceiling all ended in a jagged break, as if torn apart. Beyond that break lay only a hollow, terrifying expanse of darkness.

Duncan stepped carefully to the edge of the broken floor, leaned forward to look out, then turned his head to study the area around the fracture.

Outside was a boundless void. The corridor under his feet floated alone in empty air with nothing to support it. There was no sign of any other part of the mansion around it, and no trace of the room and door that should have stood at the end of the hallway.

Duncan stepped back and quietly watched this empty gap.

There should have been something here: a room, a door. Now it was gone, as if it had been torn out of the manor and vanished into that void.

Suddenly, a faint rustling noise sounded nearby and broke Duncan’s thoughts.

He snapped his head toward the source of the sound.

A headless figure in a black coat stood by the wall not far away, bent over and carefully wiping a marble side table.

Duncan hesitated for only a moment, then walked toward the headless figure.

The headless figure did not flee like the fleeting shadows he had seen before. Instead, it slowly straightened up. When Duncan drew near, it even gave a slight bow, adopting the proper posture of a well-trained Butler.

But the smooth nothingness above its shoulders only made that polite posture even more eerie and frightening.

“Guest, who are you looking for?” A hollow, muffled voice came from the chest of the headless body. It sounded very courteous.

A strange feeling rose in his chest, but Duncan had dealt with plenty of uncanny things in this world. He soon pushed the weirdness aside and spoke calmly to the headless body before him: “Why is the room at the end of the corridor gone?”

“It left,” the headless body replied. “It left a very, very long time ago.”

Duncan frowned and asked at once: “What about the person in that room? There was supposed to be someone there, right?”

“The room’s Mistress left as well. She left together with the room, a very, very long time ago,” the headless body said.

“A very, very long time ago?” Duncan could not shake the sense of wrongness. “Not just now?”

“Yes, guest. Just now is the same as a very, very long time ago,” the headless body answered politely. “Here, anything that has already happened took place a very, very long time ago. The next thing will happen a very, very long time from now.”

The headless body’s words were strange and hard to understand, yet they stirred many guesses in Duncan’s mind. A break in time? A fault? Was this mansion caught inside some kind of Time Fracture?

Duncan suddenly thought of the brass key. He had come to this bizarre manor only after turning the key, and that brass key had come from a clear-minded Ender, a member of a group whose time did not flow normally.

The brass key?

Duncan’s heart stirred. He suddenly sensed something and looked down at his own hand. The cold touch seemed to arrive late, then suddenly flooded his palm. A brass key lay there quietly.

As he saw the brass key, the headless body opposite him seemed to notice it as well. The figure gave a small shake, and that dull voice came again from its chest: “Ah, so you are an honored guest who carries the key. Forgive my poor service. May I ask if you have come to see the Mistress?”

“‘Mistress?’” Duncan was puzzled. “Didn’t you just say the Mistress left together with the room? And that it happened a very, very long time ago…”

“There are two Mistresses,” the headless body said slowly, like a patient Butler answering a guest’s questions. “One is the Mistress of the room. She never left her room, and now she has gone with it. The other is the Mistress of the manor. She never enters the manor.”

The headless body’s words grew stranger and stranger, leaving Duncan even more confused. Still, he quickly guessed that the “Mistress who never left her room” had to be Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm. A vague idea about the other “Mistress” began to form in his mind as well.

“What is the other Mistress called?” he asked, staring at the headless figure in front of him.

“This is the Alice Manor,” the headless body answered at once. “The Mistress’s name is, of course, Alice.”

Duncan lowered his eyelids without a change in expression, hiding the tiny shift in his gaze.

Everything was just as he had expected. He had entered this mansion only after turning the key in the keyhole on Alice’s back, so how could this strange house have nothing to do with Alice?

The mansion was called the Alice Manor. Alice was the true Mistress of this house, while Ray Nora was only the Mistress of that one room. Since Ray Nora never set foot outside her room, she sounded less like a “Mistress” and more like a special prisoner. That fit what Ray Nora herself had revealed:

she had been bound to the “Drifting Land” in order to keep the “Elder Gods replicant” in The Deep Sea under control.

Now, with the “help” of some Subspace shadows, this special prisoner had escaped together with her cage.

And the “warden” of this prison was wandering outside the jail?

Duncan could not help picturing Alice’s simple, cheerful smile. No matter how he tried, he could not link that silly doll with roles like “Mistress of the Alice Manor” or “warden of the Drifting Land.”

So he forced down his wandering thoughts, arranged his expression, and lifted his eyes to the headless body in front of him: “Why does the manor’s Mistress never enter the manor?”

“She is resting in the garden,” the headless body replied. “She has been resting for a long time, but it is not yet time for her to return to the manor.”

“Resting in the garden?”

Duncan’s thoughts turned, though his face stayed calm. “May I go see that ‘Mistress’?”

“Of course,” the headless body said at once. Though it had no head, Duncan still felt as if a “gaze” fell on the brass key in his hand. “You are a guest who holds the key. You can open any door in this manor, including the one that leads to the garden. Please follow me. I will take you there.”

Duncan gave a soft “mm” of agreement, then followed behind the headless body toward the spiral stairs that connected the first and second floors.

On the way to the garden, he tried to gather as much information as he could by making small talk: “What is your position here?”

“I am the Butler here, guest,” said the headless body that called itself the Butler. “Ordinary attendants and maids do not dare approach you, so I came instead.”

“There are many attendants and maids here?” Duncan remembered the whispers he had heard earlier in the hall and the glimpsed phantoms. “It sounds quite lively in this place most of the time.”

“The Drifting Land accepts Drifters, and all souls who stumble into this place. Here, none of them have any home to go back to. So at the very least, it is a decent Sanctuary World.”

“What is your name?” Duncan asked again.

“I have no name, guest. You may simply call me the Butler,” the headless Butler said. “Most attendants and maids here have no names. Those who do will lose them in time. The Displaced will all lose their names in the end. That is our fate. I was one of the first to arrive here. My name was lost long ago.”

“The Displaced…” Duncan stopped walking without thinking, repeating the word under his breath.

“Guest?” The headless Butler also stopped and turned, as if looking at Duncan in curiosity.

“It’s nothing. I just drifted off for a moment,” Duncan said quickly, shaking his head.

But just as he was about to move again, a painting on the nearby wall suddenly caught his eye.

Chapter 491: Deep in the Garden

It was a large oil painting dominated by black and red tones, hanging on the wall closest to the spiral stairs.

Like most of the paintings in this manor, it looked blurred and chaotic. Rough, eerie lines and blocks of color covered the surface, making anyone who laid a gaze upon it feel dizzy and unable to make out anything meaningful, like graffiti scribbled by a madman in a hallucinatory runaway state.

Yet when Duncan’s gaze lingered on the painting and he stared at it for a long time, he suddenly noticed that something in the dark, muddled colors seemed to be slowly changing. Lines emerged from the shadows, and amid the chaotic colors, shapes slowly became recognizable.

It was as if a mass of burning fire appeared there. In the flames, something like the hull of a ship was wrapped up, slicing through the sky from heavy clouds as it fell toward the sea. The fire split the sky in two. The sea under it boiled and surged under the impact of the flames. Behind that fire, a dark red chaos pressed closer, gloomy and oppressive, like Doomsday itself chasing after it.

The entire image was still blurry. Everything remained extremely abstract and jumbled, yet that hazy scene still made Duncan’s eyes shift at once.

He instinctively recalled the scene he had seen earlier in a vision: a burning Three-Spindle Starship falling from the sky and breaking apart in explosions as it plunged into the sea.

Duncan came to a full stop and turned to study the scene on the oil painting in detail.

Soon he realized that the scene in the painting was not exactly the same as what he had seen in his vision. The ship in his vision had a clear style. At a glance you could see its transcendent technology and imposing size. But the “thing wrapped in flames” on the painting only had a vague ship-like shape. That hull even seemed to be made of wood. The fire around it also looked like simple burning, not the exhaust plume behind a starship.

It gave him the feeling that a painter from the Middle Ages, half a madman, had accidentally seen a spaceship from the future in a dream, yet could not understand what it really was. When he woke the next day, he could only rely on the faint memory of that dream, and on his limited knowledge and imagination, to recreate a rough, distorted version of it on the canvas.

The headless Butler’s voice came from behind him: “Guest, are you interested in this painting?”

“…Where did all the paintings here come from?”

“They have been here from the very beginning, guest,” the headless Butler said.

“The beginning?” Duncan echoed, puzzled. “When was that? When this ‘Alice Manor’ came into being? When ‘Alice’ became the Mistress here?”

“From the Dawn of Time,” the headless Butler said patiently. “Earlier than everything else.”

What kind of answer was that supposed to be?

Duncan frowned without thinking. The headless Butler’s reply sounded no different from saying nothing at all. Yet as he stared at that polite figure, he could not read any feeling from its posture. A person without a head had no expression and no eyes, only courteous, well-mannered words filled with hollow eagerness.

After thinking for a while, Duncan asked two more questions: “Does this painting have a title? Do you know what it is depicting?”

“It has no name. None of the paintings here have names. They exist naturally. They do not need names or explanations. As for what the scene describes… I am sorry. That is beyond my knowledge.”

“Aren’t you the Butler here? You don’t understand the situation of this manor?”

“I am only a servant. This manor has countless secrets of its own, and it keeps them. Those are not matters a servant should know.”

Duncan’s mouth twitched.

He had the sudden urge to set a little fire on this Butler, but he forced that dangerous thought down in the next second.

It was because this was the Alice Manor, and this Butler was part of the manor itself. He had to be very careful with anything he did here, and avoid causing any harm to Alice.

Duncan drew in a slow breath to calm himself, and let his gaze sweep over the other paintings hanging in the corridor. There were countless canvases here, covered in colors that were hard to understand.

But none of the other paintings changed under his gaze.

“…Let’s go,” Duncan said at last, pulling his gaze away with a hint of regret. He spoke to the headless Butler: “Take me to this ‘garden’ you mentioned.”

The headless Butler gave a small bow and turned to lead the way again. He guided Duncan across the second-floor landing and down the spiral stairs, then turned toward the depths of the first-floor hall. There a short passage led to the manor's back garden.

But Duncan stopped in front of the passage and turned his head to look curiously toward the other side of the hall. At the end of a long red carpet stood a very tall, grand dark wooden door. Narrow windows flanked it, and outside them seemed to be a tangle of thorns.

It looked like the "main entrance" of the entire building.

"What lies beyond that door?" Duncan suddenly asked.

At his words, the headless Butler's body visibly shuddered. In the next second, the calm and gentle tone he had kept all along turned anxious for the first time. "You must not show any interest in what lies beyond that door, guest! Beyond it is a place of no return. Anyone who goes there will never come back!"

"A place of no return?" Duncan's expression grew serious. "Why do you say that? Is it Subspace out there?"

"Subspace? I do not understand what that means… but you must never try to open that door!" The headless Butler waved its hands in panic. "It is the greatest taboo of the manor. No member may open that door under any circumstances…"

"But I am not a member here," Duncan said. Seeing the reaction, he even let some eager curiosity show on purpose. It was the first time he had seen the headless Butler so flustered, and it felt like a breakthrough for gathering information. "And you said yourself at the start that I hold the key, so I can open any door here."

"The key in your hand certainly can… but you must not do that!" the headless Butler cried. It seemed to want to block him more firmly, but perhaps some restriction held it back. It could only wave its arms about a meter away from Duncan and try to stop him with words. “Do not open that door, for the sake of all the crew…”

“What is really beyond that door?” Duncan stared at the headless Butler, his voice extremely serious.

“Beyond that door… beyond that door…” The headless Butler hesitated, as if struggling to find the right words. “Guest, the world outside that door has already been wiped out. The end of all things is drawing near. The door holds back Doomsday itself. Do not open it. Do not let Doomsday come in…”

Duncan frowned as he listened to the headless Butler’s tense, panicked words, trying hard to fit them together with what he already knew about this world.

The world outside the door has already been wiped out… the end of all things is drawing near…

He pondered with furrowed brows for a long time, then let out a quiet breath.

“Relax. I do not plan to open that door.”

After pressing down the tangle of thoughts in his heart, he gave the headless Butler a small nod as he spoke.

The other relaxed at once. Even without a head, without any “expression,” Duncan could see the release in its whole body.

“You really frightened me, guest,” the Butler said, turning to lead the way again. “Please never joke like that again. We must keep Doomsday from crossing that door. It has already destroyed everything in the world. This place is the last barrier left…”

Duncan listened in silence to the Butler’s nervous muttering, full of lingering fear, and followed without a word. They passed through the short corridor and finally arrived at a rather narrow door. It was made of large panes of translucent glass reinforced with steel. Black steel frames divided the door into many geometric shapes of different sizes. In each shape, someone had drawn flowers and plants in a doodle-like style. The overall look… carried a bizarre mix of fairy tale and horror.

“The Mistress is in the garden. Please go in as you like.”

The headless Butler stepped forward, turned the handle of the garden door, then turned back to speak to Duncan.

“You are not coming with me?” Duncan asked, a little surprised.

“The garden is open only to the Mistress and to the Visitor who holds the key. The gardener enters only when necessary,” the headless Butler said. “Please go in without worry. If you need anything, just pull the cord by the door. I will be waiting here for you.”

“…Understood. Thank you for leading the way.”

Duncan gave the strange Butler a nod, then paid no more attention to its reaction. He stepped forward and gently pushed open the garden door.

A faint creak broke the silence between the manor and the garden.

Duncan stepped through the doorway, and incredible sunlight flooded his vision.

sunlight!

Deep inside this gloomy manor filled with eerie shadows, there was actually a garden bathed in sunlight?!

Still a little stunned, Duncan stepped forward. Lush plants came into view. Neatly arranged flowerbeds, well-trimmed shrubs, and paths framed by green grass all looked pleasant to the eye. Above this vibrant garden, warm light shone down…

Duncan lifted his head. His surprised expression slowly turned into a frown.

He saw an extremely bizarre “sky.” Against a pale background, many childlike strokes floated overhead, depicting blue sky, white clouds, and a crude Sun. Around the Sun, someone had drawn many golden lines to stand for scattered sunlight.

The warm “sunlight” shining over the whole garden was being emitted by that ridiculous doodle of a Sun.

A thread of wariness rose in Duncan’s heart. The sky above the “garden” no longer felt warm to him. It only held endless strangeness.

He lowered his gaze from the sky and, with great caution, began to examine the garden itself.

A patch of odd color at the end of a path drew his attention.

He walked quickly toward it, went around a shrub and a low flower wall, and finally saw the source of that different color.

Where several paths met, at the center of a clearing deep in the garden, a figure sat quietly. The figure leaned back against a marble column wrapped in flowering vines, as if in a deep sleep.

And many black thorns spread out from the vines and wound around her whole body.

“…Alice?”

Chapter 492: Doll’s Drawing Board

When Duncan saw the quietly sleeping figure in the garden, he instinctively called out that familiar name.

But he stopped at once and remembered the scene from not long ago, when he had seen Queen Ray Nora in that lavish bedchamber—he could not have mistaken someone again, could he?

A strange feeling rose in Duncan’s heart. He walked carefully to the sleeping figure, bent down, and examined her closely.

He noticed the ball joints at her hands and feet, and the clear lack of any blood color. Her “skin” was pure white, with a texture like porcelain.

It really was Alice.

Duncan finally confirmed that the one sleeping here was indeed the Brother Doll he knew so well. He let out a long breath of relief. Then his attention shifted to the black brambles wrapped around her body.

Thorny vines stretched out from the flowerbeds and spread across the open ground around the Doll, like the train of a gorgeous yet eerie dress. The thorns had wrapped around the Doll’s hands, feet, and torso, binding her among the flowering vines.

Alice slept in the middle of this “bed” woven from flowers and thorns. She did not respond at all to Duncan’s approach and calls.

Duncan carefully avoided the thorny vines and the crisscrossing brambles. He reached out and lightly touched the Doll’s cheek, calling her name again: “Alice, can you hear me?”

A faint coolness came from the skin under his fingertips, but Alice still gave no response. She simply slept in silence, like… a real, lifeless doll.

Duncan frowned slightly, and then he noticed something else.

The sleeping “Alice” was holding something in her arms. It looked like a drawing board. Brambles wrapped around her arm, but the drawing board seemed as if it could be pulled out through a gap.

Duncan hesitated for a moment. Then he reached out, grabbed the edge of the drawing board, and carefully pulled it, inch by inch, from her arms.

During the whole process, he kept watching Alice, checking what effect taking the drawing board away would have on her—the Doll went on sleeping.

Duncan let out a small sigh of relief and looked down at the drawing board he had pulled free.

A “painting” of bright colors and messy lines came into view. Like the strange “sky” above the garden, the childish strokes on the drawing board formed an abstract picture.

There was a vortex, a swirl made of many colors patched together. It took up almost two-thirds of the whole board. Around the vortex were many tiny dots of light. The “artist” had drawn many crossed lines to show that these dots were shining stars.

At the center of the colorful vortex, he could see a deep patch of red light. Even though the doodle was simple, Duncan still felt a strong… danger coming from that red patch.

He frowned. For some reason, the red glow in the vortex felt familiar.

He searched his mind for a long time before he found the source of that familiarity. It was on the second-floor platform of “Alice Mansion”, on the wall near the spiral staircase. There hung an oil painting that showed a burning giant ship falling from the sky. In the sky behind the huge ship, the same dark red glow spread, filling the scene with unease.

Duncan’s expression grew more and more serious.

This was already the second time… In this strange “Alice Mansion”, that dark red light full of bad omens had appeared again. What did this dark red glow actually represent?

Was it a sign of some disaster that kept chasing them, drawing closer and closer? Or was it a true picture of some phenomenon that would appear when Doomsday came?

The headless Butler had warned him many times not to open the mansion’s front door… What was outside that door? Was it the true body of this “dark red glow”?

Dangerous thoughts rose in his heart for a moment, but Duncan pushed them down at once.

He was indeed very curious about what lay beyond the front door of Alice Mansion. But curiosity was not the same as recklessness. Before he had more clues and had confirmed Alice’s safety, he would try his best not to disturb the “order” inside this “mansion”.

His thoughts slowly calmed. Duncan let out a breath, looked up at the doodle-like sky above the garden, then lowered his head to the doodle-like drawing board in his hands.

The Doll still slept quietly among the flowers beside him, as if she were holding all the secrets and keeping all the answers sealed.

Who had “created” the sky here and the doodles on the drawing board? Was it this sleeping Doll? Was it Alice?

Duncan recalled the information he had heard from Ray Nora and suddenly felt that Alice was not like the Frostholm Queen imagined, not just a mistaken replica mixed from “Ray Nora” and the “Guillotine”.

Or rather… the body of Miss Doll might indeed have come from such a process, but inside, she clearly hid secrets far greater than that outer shell.

This grand, eerie “Alice Mansion”, and the Doll sleeping quietly in this garden, were her “inner self”. And these secrets clearly went far beyond what Ray Nora knew.

It was a simple truth: if a copied file carried more information than the original, then there was only one possibility—during the “copy” process, someone had written something else into that “file”.

Thoughts flowed through Duncan’s mind. After he had sat in silence for a long time, he sighed and prepared to put the drawing board back into the Doll’s hands.

Putting things back where they belonged and avoiding changes—that was necessary caution.

But just as he turned the drawing board around to push it back, some uneven marks on the back suddenly caught his eye.

Duncan’s gaze tightened. He quickly lifted the drawing board up again and studied the back, which he had ignored at first.

The uneven marks were a line of words carved deep into the frame on the back of the drawing board—

“…The Messenger brought news from afar, and the chosen clan picked up the lost Ancient Star and forged it into the crown of divine blessing—the Third Long Night came to an end.”

Duncan’s eyes stayed on that ancient, graceful line of text for a long time. His expression did not change for a while.

He did not know how long had passed before he gently let out a breath, bent down, avoided the thorns and vines, and slowly put the drawing board back into the Doll’s hands.

Yet in his mind, the sentence on the back of the drawing board kept circling, replaying again and again.

The chosen clan… the Ancient Star… the end of the Third Long Night…

Duncan stood up, his face thoughtful. In his mind, the pieces of known information began to rearrange and link together.

The “Third Long Night” was the most important clue. In that copy of The Blasphemous Tome held by the Annihilators, which very likely hid the true history, it was written that the age of the Deep Sea began only after the Third Long Night was safely passed. The whole world had survived from that time until now.

And the only “chosen clan” that could match the “Third Long Night” was the group who founded the ancient kingdom of Critt, those mysterious ancient Sages.

Picking up the lost Ancient Star…

Could these words be describing the historical event of the ancient kingdom of Critt forging Vision 001 – the Sun?

Sadly… there was too little information. Just one unclear “message” could not do more than spark a few vague guesses. It was useless beyond that.

Duncan shook his head and pushed this regret aside for now. Then he carefully searched the garden again, a place full of life yet thick with a strange mood.

He did not find anything else worth noting. In this large garden, besides the sleeping Doll, there were only lush plants and neat, well-kept paths.

At last, he returned to the side of the “sleeping Doll”.

After he walked a full circle around this dormant “Alice”, he suddenly stopped behind her.

A Keyhole.

It was not on her back under her clothes, but at the exposed nape of her neck. On the back of the sleeping Doll’s neck, a familiar Keyhole caught Duncan’s eye.

He moved closer without thinking and studied the small Keyhole.

So the Doll in the garden also had a Keyhole… But why was it in a different place from Alice’s? Did this difference in location have some symbolic meaning?

After seeing so many strange and uncanny things in this world, Duncan now often thought first of “symbolic meaning” and such. But he quickly put away these questions that clearly had no answer for now and hesitated as he took out the brass key he carried.

Ever since he had entered Alice Mansion, this key had appeared in his hand for no clear reason… Was it meant to be used here?

This thought flashed through Duncan’s mind. Then he made up his mind and slowly brought the key to the Keyhole at the back of the sleeping Doll’s neck. He carefully slid it in.

With a light click, the key bit into something inside. At once, it began to turn on its own, just as it had before.

That familiar feeling rushed at him from all directions. Light and shadow swapped places. His senses reshaped themselves. After a moment of weightlessness came the feeling of solid ground under his feet.

In almost the blink of an eye, the world around Duncan turned back into the captain's cabin on the Vanished that he knew so well.

A smooth, white back appeared before his eyes. Alice still sat obediently on the round stool, waiting for her captain to wind her up.

Duncan stared, stunned. He looked at the scene in front of him in a daze for several seconds before his thoughts caught up. Then a strange idea popped into his head— "Such a nice back… It would be a shame not to put a few cupping jars on it…"

Alice heard the quiet muttering behind her. She clutched her clothes and carefully turned her head. "Eh? Captain, what did you say?"

"Nothing," Duncan snapped back to himself at once. He hurriedly cleared his throat twice to cover that flash of embarrassment, then pulled the key out of the Keyhole. "It's done. You don't feel uncomfortable, do you?"

"Huh?" Alice clearly froze for a second. She reached for the zipper on her back, then looked over at him in surprise. "Didn't we just start?"

Duncan's hand paused as he put the key away.

He had stayed in "Alice Mansion" for so long… but in the Mortal Realm, only an instant had passed?

Chapter 493: The Stolen Room

With countless questions and guesses in his heart, Duncan tucked the brass key safely close to his body. Alice stood obediently beside him, her eyes darting back and forth like a child waiting to hear a secret.

“Do you feel anything different now?” Duncan asked, looking into Alice’s eyes.

“Something different?” Alice tilted her head. She reached back and touched her spine. After a moment she shook her head. “Just now the Keyhole felt a bit itchy, but it doesn’t itch anymore.”

Duncan frowned. “Nothing else? That’s it?”

“That’s it,” Alice answered honestly. Then she looked a little curious. “Was there supposed to be something? Your face looks so serious… Did you figure out the key?”

Duncan’s brow stayed tightly furrowed. After hesitating for a short while, he finally sorted out his thoughts and words. He sat down on the bed opposite the Doll and spoke with a very serious face: “You may have felt only an instant pass, but I stayed in a strange place for a long time. It was an old, huge manor. Its name… was ‘Alice Mansion’.”

The Brother Doll widened her eyes bit by bit. She listened to the captain’s story in surprise and confusion.

Duncan did not hide his experiences in Alice Mansion. He told Miss Doll in front of him everything he had seen and heard there. Then he spoke of what he had seen and heard in the Deep Sea as well, including his meeting with Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm.

Of course, he knew Alice might only understand part of it, and even the part she understood would be muddled. She would not remember much afterward. But he still chose to tell her everything.

Because these were things she should know. He could not think, “She won’t understand anyway,” and hide it all from her. That would have been the bare minimum of respect lost.

Alice listened in a daze all the way to the end. Even after Duncan finished speaking, it took another ten seconds before the Brother Doll finally came back to herself. “…Wow.”

Then she scratched her hair, looking puzzled and a little apologetic. “I… don’t really get it. My head feels all blurry… Sorry, Captain. You worked so hard to help me understand all this, but I think I’m a bit dumb…”

“No, you’re not dumb. These things are just too complicated,” Duncan said, already expecting this reaction from her. He smiled and shook his head. “Even I feel that everything about this is full of riddles. There are too many clues and they’re too scattered. We’re still a long way from tearing open the final fog.”

Alice nodded, half understanding and half not. She thought seriously for a while, then suddenly asked with some curiosity: “Were there a lot of people in that ‘mansion’? And none of them had heads?”

“I only saw one person who called himself the Butler. But from what the Butler said, there really were many people in the mansion. They were all just hiding,” Duncan said, thinking back. “From what I saw, they should all have been headless Attendants.”

Alice frowned. She tried hard to think as she muttered, “Could it have something to do with my ‘Decapitation’ ability…?”

“That’s possible. I can’t rule out that some of the Attendants are the souls of people you once decapitated,” Duncan said. As someone who knew about “Alice’s Guillotine”, he had naturally thought along that line. But then he changed direction. “However, from some of the information the Butler gave me, the mansion has also gathered many souls that ‘drifted’ and came together. They’re like some kind of wandering dead who receive the mansion’s shelter. Those Attendants don’t seem like they were decapitated…”

He paused and thought for a moment before going on: “Maybe your Guillotine ability makes all the souls gathered in the mansion appear headless, no matter what their original ‘source’ is.”

“Oh…” Alice seemed to understand. Then something else seemed to occur to her. “What about that ‘Frostholm Queen’? Did she really just disappear?”

“The room really did vanish,” Duncan nodded. “It looked just like she said. Once the Elder Gods’ tentacles that acted as ‘connection points’ were destroyed, the ‘drifting land’ would lose its anchor, like a ship whose mooring lines have been cut, and…”

He suddenly fell silent. His expression turned thoughtful.

“Captain?” Alice looked at Duncan, puzzled. “Why did you stop talking?”

She asked twice in a row before Duncan lifted his head from his thoughts. His tone held a trace of weight. “I’m wondering whether the ‘drifting land’ Ray Nora spoke of refers to her room or to the entire Alice Mansion.”

“Eh?” Alice froze. “Is there a difference?”

“If the drifting land means the entire Alice Mansion, then when the ‘connection point’ was burned by me, the thing that should have disappeared was the whole manor, not just one room on the second floor," Duncan said slowly. "But if the drifting land refers only to the room where she slept, then what exactly is the relationship between that room and the rest of the manor? Or to put it another way… doesn't the 'connection' between her room and the whole mansion also count as a 'connection point'?"

He paused here and lifted his hand to point at Alice.

"More importantly, after I turned the winding key in you, I entered that 'Alice Mansion'. It's obvious that the bond between that manor and you is the strongest. You and it should even be some kind of 'one mind, one body'. If the 'drifting land' needs a connection point to exist in a stable way… then you are clearly the most stable connection point."

Alice blinked hard and listened carefully, trying her best to understand—but she failed.

Still, her strength had always been honesty. "What are you talking about?"

"The room where the Frostholm Queen slept had been 'torn' away from the main body of the mansion. The edges showed clear damage. At first I didn't pay much attention to that, but just now I suddenly realized… Ray Nora may have hidden some things from me.

"In theory, the so-called 'drifting land' should be the entire Alice Mansion. That manor is closely linked to you, and from what I saw, it did not show any tendency to 'drift'. So it's very likely that Ray Nora took advantage of the moment when I burned the Elder Gods' tentacles—when some of the 'connections' weakened—to forcefully separate her room from the main body of the mansion."

Alice continued trying to understand.

This time, she finally managed most of it.

“So you mean the Frostholm Queen used your fire as a chance to ‘sail’ her room away? Like taking the lifeboat off a ship in thick fog?”

Duncan froze for a moment and looked at the Doll in mild surprise. “That’s actually a pretty fitting metaphor… How did you come up with it?”

“Mr. Goathead told me lots of stories like that,” Alice said earnestly. “Like mutinous sailors stealing the lifeboat in the fog, or stealing the wine barrels, or stealing the cheese, or stealing the salted fish. Then the wise and mighty captain would cross the whole Boundless Sea to take back the stolen salted fish… Are you going to catch that Frostholm Queen who stole the room?”

Duncan listened in a daze. When Alice finished, he finally smirked and twitched the corner of his mouth. “Let’s not even ask why the mutinous crew would steal salted fish, or why I would cross the whole Boundless Sea just to grab back a piece of salted fish—where would I even find that Frostholm Queen? Besides, if anyone is going to catch her, it should be you. She stole your room. You’re the Mistress of Alice Mansion.”

“…Right,” Alice said after thinking about it for a bit. She accepted the logic very simply, then shook her head. “Then I won’t chase her. That room was hers in the first place. But… why would she do that? You just said, once the drifting land loses its anchor, it’ll fly all over the place. It might even fall into Subspace, like exile—that’s really scary, isn’t it?”

Duncan could not help falling into thought. He spoke slowly as he pondered: “Yes… why indeed…”

He thought of the Ray Nora he had seen. He remembered that Frostholm Queen who seemed to have worn shackles since birth, who was crowned in chains and overthrown in chains. Even after falling into the Deep Sea, she was still locked in a nightmare.

She had said she slept in a cage all her life, even after the bars were taken away.

Now she had broken out of prison—with her cage in tow.

“Probably for ‘freedom’,” Duncan said softly.

But was it really only for “freedom”?

…

On the control console, the needles on the gauges shook rapidly. The shaking that came when they neared the surface grew more and more obvious. Through the thick glass porthole, the dark, boundless seawater around them already showed faint rays of light spilling down from above.

sunlight appeared in the water—this meant the submersible was quickly nearing the surface.

Yet the growing brightness could not fully drive away the oppressive mark left by the Deep Sea. It was as if something in the vast darkness below the submersible was still rising and spreading, still stretching out invisible tentacles, still reaching upward with unseen hands, trying to keep the uninvited guests who had once intruded into the Deep Sea.

The things Duncan had told her during the ascent still circled in her mind—horrifying, strange, unbelievable, shaking the very foundations of her beliefs.

Whether it was the soul of the Frostholm Queen, who had spent fifty years in a symbiotic pact with the Elder Gods in the Deep Sea, or the terrifying possibility hidden in all things of the mortal world, either alone was enough to make a person with firm will and devout faith feel an icy chill under the sunlight.

All things in the mortal world were Spawn of the Elder Gods. The Elder Gods' flesh and blood lived in all beings, and it was slowly waking.

Not even the most filthy, blasphemous, heretical tomes dared to record words like these. Even the craziest Annihilators had stopped at ideas like "the Abyssal Lord created the world".

The sunlight from the surface grew brighter and brighter.

Yet the already-dead body felt no warmth at all.

Agatha clasped her hands over her chest and silently called Bartok's name, wanting to offer a Prayer to her God.

But no matter what she did, she could not calm her heart.

Chapter 494: Gathering of the Followers

With a burst of spray and rippling seawater, the submersible broke through the surface.

Afternoon sunlight shone over the wide sea. The submersible's thick hull gleamed with a cold light under the sun. Then the disposable smoke device on top of the hull fired; with a flash and a soft bang, a column of orange smoke shot straight up into the blue sky.

After some time adjusting her trim and power, the submersible's floating state steadied. With creaks and groans, the locking mechanism on the side of the hull released. As the handle turned, Duncan pushed the hatch open from inside.

A rush of fresh air hit them in the face – even for two "corpses" who no longer needed to breathe, the cool, clean wind above the sea felt especially pleasant.

The illusion of being hunted, entangled, and held back by unspeakable things in the Deep Sea finally began to fade from their minds. Agatha gripped the handrail, climbed out of the hatch with Duncan, and csheepered onto the top of the submersible's hull, gazing out at the endless sea.

Duncan turned his head a little and looked at the Gatekeeper: "How does it feel to be back under the sunlight?"

“It feels as if I once again came back from the gate of the realm of death,” Agatha said softly. “I never thought sunlight and air could shake me like this, almost like being reborn – and yet I can no longer feel the warmth of the sunlight, nor enjoy smooth breathing.”

“And ‘her’?” Duncan asked again. “During the dive, the other Agatha never showed herself, but she must have been watching the whole time, right?”

“We feel much the same, but she said she needs some time to think about a few things, so she is staying quiet now – do you want to talk to her? I can call her out…”

“No need. Let her think,” Duncan waved his hand lightly. “This Deep Dive will reshape everyone’s views and be a kind of baptism. We all have a lot to think about.” He looked up at the distant horizon. “Oh, the recovery ship Tyrian sent has spotted us. Looks like we don’t need to make our own way back to the city-state.”

The silhouette of a steam launch appeared on the sea, heading quickly toward the trail of signal smoke rising from the submersible…

The submersible had returned safely, his Father and that Gatekeeper lady were unharmed and on their way back – when this “express dispatch” arrived on his desk through the pneumatic tube line, Tyrian, who had been waiting for news in South Harbor, could not help letting out a breath.

But right after that, a strange feeling rose from the bottom of his heart.

He stood up from behind his desk and slowly paced to the window, staring absentmindedly at the sunlight sinking outside. In the silence, Lucretia’s voice suddenly came from the scrying crystal not far away: “Is there news from Father?”

Tyrian glanced back at the glowing scrying crystal on his desk and spoke in a slightly odd tone: “You can tell… am I that obvious?”

Inside the scrying crystal, Lucretia had a piece of bread in her mouth. One hand was busy scribbling and calculating on a sheet of draft paper floating in the air beside her, while the other adjusted the instruments on her table. She still found time to glance up at her elder brother and mumble casually: “Thirty percent nervous, thirty percent hesitant, thirty percent relieved, and ten percent scared and lost – that has to mean Father is back.”

“…Do all you scholars talk to people like that? You make me sound like a pie chart.” Tyrian frowned, then could not help sighing. “I’m just a bit emotional. Not long ago, I would never have imagined feeling relieved because Father returned safe. The first time I heard he had ‘come back’, I was not in this frame of mind at all.”

“Right. Back then your legs almost cramped from fear. After you commanded the Sea Mist to fight Dad, you did not sleep for three days. In the middle of the night you dragged me out of bed to describe your nightmares and insisted I shiver along with you…”

“Stop! Don’t make up details that never happened!” Tyrian hurriedly cut off his younger sister in the scrying crystal. “And that is not even what I wanted to talk to you about!”

Lucretia quieted down. She finally set aside her never-ending research and the half-eaten bread, and looked up, staring seriously into Tyrian’s eyes.

When that divine gaze almost made Tyrian’s skin crawl, she finally broke the silence: “When we were little, Father often left home for very long trips. Whenever bells rang from the direction of the docks, we would climb up onto the roof to see if it was the flag of the Vanished. You always told me to act like a lady and be more steady, then took the chance to grab the highest spot.”

“…It has been many years,” Tyrian said after a few seconds of silence, almost like talking to himself. “I still remember the roof was blue. When the sea wind blew, the weather vane on the eaves would whistle. You tied a pinwheel next to it and said you wanted to show it off to Father, and that was how our secret rooftop climbing got exposed."

"Now we have both risen to places higher than that old roof. We have seen the sights Father once saw," Lucretia said gently. "But we still have not caught up to his steps. He went into the Deep Sea, to depths even the Abyssal Trench Project in those days never reached… What do you think he will find on this expedition?"

Tyrian did not answer at once. In the next second, a crackling sound suddenly came from the mirror behind him, and Duncan's voice followed from within it: "I found an astonishing secret – and I am just about to tell you."

Tyrian almost jumped out of his skin, every muscle tensing. The Sea Witch on the other side of the scrying crystal reacted even more strongly – he heard a sharp cry from Lucretia's side and a loud clatter, then smoke and flashes flared inside the scrying crystal and the image cut off.

Still tense all over, Tyrian turned his head and saw ghost-green flame burning in the mirror behind him. In the dark mirror, Duncan leaned out and looked over Tyrian's shoulder: "Is your younger sister all right over there? Did I scare her?"

"Could you maybe stop using such frightening methods every time you show up…" Tyrian muttered without thinking. As soon as the words left his mouth, he felt they were improper, and quickly checked Duncan's reaction – his Father's face did not change.

"I did think about appearing in a friendlier way, like knocking first or sending a notice in advance," Duncan said calmly as he looked at Tyrian. "But Vanna told me it isn't the way I appear that's frightening; it's the fact that I appear at all. I think she is right, so I decided not to change it – at least this way, watching everyone's startled reactions is a bit entertaining."

Tyrian's eye twitched. His Father's open attitude toward "enjoying the show" left him speechless, but he soon forced his emotions back into order. As he straightened his expression, he looked curiously at his Father in the mirror: "Have you already returned to the city-state? I will come to you now…"

"The avatar form I was using has returned, but you do not need to go there," Duncan interrupted him. "Pack a few things and go straight to the Vanished."

Tyrian froze. "Huh?"

"I made an important discovery in the Deep Sea," Duncan said, his expression especially serious. "The information must not be made public, and it may point toward the Elder Gods, so everyone must be summoned to the Vanished to discuss it. I have already sent Agatha over. My followers have gathered. You are the master of the Sea Mist and the new governor of Frostholm. You have to be there as well."

From his Father's look and tone, Tyrian at once understood how unusual and grave the matter was, and quickly put away his moment of relief: "All right. I will leave a note for Aiden to explain the situation first."

"Good." Duncan nodded, then let his gaze sweep over the room and settle on the complex crystal sphere and its lens array device.

"Bring your scrying crystal when you come aboard," he said to Tyrian. "It would be best if Lucy heard this as well – she will be interested in the secrets of the Deep Sea."

Tyrian, who was writing the note, immediately looked up when he heard this, first giving Duncan a surprised glance, then nodding at once: "All right, I will definitely bring the scrying crystal. Where is the Vanished now? I will have a fast boat made ready…”

Before he could finish, Duncan waved a hand in the mirror: “No need. AI will take you.”

There was a knock-knock-knock at the window.

Tyrian turned toward the sound and saw the plump white dove that always followed his Father.

Outside, the dove pecked at the harbor office’s window with its beak, then tilted its head: “Coming aboard? Big seat! Veteran driver, nice and steady!”

Tyrian: “…”

…

The dining room of the Vanished was the gathering place for the crew.

The wide long table had been polished until it shone. Bright oil lamps hung from the pillars near the table, and the captain’s followers gathered on both sides. Vanna and Morris sat upright and proper. Shirley and Alice were off in their own worlds. Nina and Dog were each bent over a book. And besides them, there were two new figures here today.

Agatha, dressed like a blind nun, sat quietly at the long table in silent prayer, and beside her sat Lawrence, wrapped in a white coat and gripping his pipe, looking cramped and nervous.

The latter was nervously taking in every detail of the cabin.

Lawrence’s own ship was now anchored on the nearby sea. His first mate was handling things on board, while the captain himself had been ordered over to the “flagship”. No one had told him exactly what this was about on the way here, which left the old captain deeply uneasy.

This was the first time he had truly set foot on the Vanished, the legendary ghost ship that had returned from subspace. Duncan Abnomar’s followers gathered in this ancient, solemn cabin, waiting in the lamplight for Captain Duncan’s orders.

He already knew who these people were and where they came from – a living doll, the shattered Sun, a demon with a soul, an Inquisitor who had broken her oath and gone into exile, a legendary scholar on the brink of madness…

Now he was among them.

Even in his wildest dreams and visions, Lawrence had never imagined he would live through a scene like this.

He was just an exploration-ship captain who had been ready to retire… so how had he ended up mixed into this?

Chapter 495: the Vanished's Eerie Yet Playful Mood

On one side of the long table, Lawrence carefully watched every move everyone made, while also cautiously controlling each of his own expressions and every muscle. He wondered how he should blend naturally into this special gathering without looking like… an outsider.

Stories about legendary investigators and legendary adventurers flooded into his mind, then rolled back like sea water over sand. They left behind a mess of stray thoughts, but nothing that was actually useful.

After letting his thoughts run wild for quite a while, he finally gathered a bit of courage and quietly asked Agatha, who sat closest to him: "When will Captain Duncan probably get here?"

"I do not know either. He said we have to wait for everyone to arrive," Agatha answered in a low voice. "Let's be patient."

"Are there any rules for later?" Lawrence asked softly again. "This is my first time at one of these meetings…"

"It is my first time too." Agatha folded her hands over her chest. She looked as if she were praying silently, but like Lawrence she was carefully watching everything in the cabin. Although she knew the faces around the long table, this was indeed her first visit to the ship. "But I do not think you need to be nervous. We have worked with each other in the city-state. Everyone is very friendly."

Lawrence made a small sound of understanding, but still could not sit still. He could not help glancing past her to Vanna, who sat one seat farther away – the Pland Inquisitor counted as something of an “acquaintance” of his: “Lady Inquisitor, this is my first time at a meeting. If I do anything rude later, please help me out…”

Before Vanna could answer, Shirley across the table suddenly cut in: “Huh? You want her to watch out for you being rude? Old man, let me tell you, when she loses her manners the noise she makes is way bigger than you. Back then she did a jumping chop and…”

“Ahem.” Vanna started coughing loudly at once, cutting off Shirley’s story. While Lawrence was still stunned, Nina across the table put down her book, looked around, and muttered: “I’m hungry. When are we eating?”

Shirley shook her head: “Dinner is still a long way off.”

Nina blinked. “Huh? Then why are we in the dining room?”

“The captain said there was something important to discuss. You did not hear?”

“I did not… I was busy reading. Uncle Duncan said to gather in the dining room, so I just brought my book over,” Nina said, her head swaying back and forth. “Who has food?”

“I have biscuits! And salted dried fish!” Alice jumped to her feet at once, happily pulling snacks from the pockets of her dress. “Who else wants some?”

Nina and Shirley pounced on her at once in excitement. Dragged by his chain, Dog tilted to the side, scratching at his chart paper with his paws while he shouted: “Hey, Shirley, at least say something before you get up! You made me skew my plotted course…”

Lawrence stared, dumbfounded, as the atmosphere in this gloomy, solemn meeting hall suddenly turned lively. He hesitated, then turned to glance at Morris, the only one still sitting upright. Morris took the pipe from his mouth, gave Lawrence a friendly nod, and said: “You will get used to it. The ship is like this every day. If you get hungry, just tell Alice – she is in charge of everyone’s meals.”

Lawrence felt his thoughts creak and turn halfway around. He spoke with some effort: “Uh, I… am not hungry.”

No sooner had the words left his mouth than he caught, from the corner of his eye, a flash of eerie green light near the dining-room doors. He tensed up at once, nerves jolted. But just as he was about to warn everyone, the doors opened, and the one who walked in was not the master of the Vanished.

Tyrian appeared in the doorway with a suitcase in hand, his steps a little unsteady, staring blankly at the scene in the dining room.

Shirley had climbed onto the table. Dog hung in midair. Nina was hanging off Alice. And Alice – the living doll who wore the face of Frostholm’s Queen – now held both hands high, one stuffed full of biscuits, the other crammed with dried fish.

The Gatekeeper of Frostholm and the Inquisitor of Pland sat expressionless on the far side of the table, quietly covering their foreheads with their hands.

Tyrian’s arrival drew everyone’s attention. Even Shirley, about to stuff more dried fish into her mouth, paused. Several gazes along the long table fell on Frostholm’s newly appointed governor all at once. The neat, unified stare made even the “Steel Vice Admiral”, who had weathered countless storms, step back half a pace without thinking.

But this was not Tyrian's first time seeing the Vanished's current atmosphere. He recovered quickly, adjusted his expression, and walked toward the long table while greeting everyone warmly. He was polite and well-mannered; no one looking at him now would have guessed that for the last half century he had roamed this Frost Sea as a pirate lord.

"Sorry, it took a bit of time to get my things together and kept everyone waiting," Tyrian said as he came to an empty seat at the long table. He set the rather heavy suitcase on the table, then looked around. "Has Father not arrived yet?"

Almost the instant the words left Tyrian's mouth, Duncan's voice suddenly sounded at the head of the long table: "I am here."

The next second, a mass of ghost-green flame flared out of thin air at the far end of the table. It surged upward and exploded, then fell toward the table. Within the fire, Duncan's figure took shape, solidified, and sat down in the chair that belonged to him at the head of the long table.

A moment later, with a few faint whooshing sounds, every light in the cabin took on a layer of eerie green radiance.

A low, unsettling creaking rose up from the depths of the ship.

Morris's expression changed slightly. He could feel it: the very "mood" of the ship was shifting.

The captain was adjusting the Vanished into some kind of… defensive posture!

Right after that, he heard the captain's voice speak from within the flames: "What I am going to say today is extremely special and dangerous, so we need the highest level of protection. From this moment on, the Vanished will sink into the Spirit Realm. During the meeting, those of you with firm faith, keep a close watch on your own mental state. When you hear secrets that point toward a God, if you hear or see any ‘revelation’, report it to me at once.”

Vanna, Morris, and Agatha glanced at one another without thinking. They hesitated only for a heartbeat, then nodded slightly.

Duncan’s gaze fell on Tyrian: “Did you bring the scrying crystal?”

“Yes.” Tyrian spoke at once, then lifted his hand to open the heavy case he had brought. Inside lay the scrying crystal that held extraordinary power and the complex lens array device. He began to work the intricate mechanisms on the lens base, setting each lens into its proper place.

In the next moment, the scrying crystal slowly began to glow.

After a short wait, a blurry human shape appeared in the faint light, then quickly came into focus.

Lucretia’s figure appeared inside the scrying crystal – for one brief instant, then the picture flickered and vanished.

Nina, who was leaning over beside it, watching curiously, was instantly baffled. She turned to Tyrian: “Did it break?”

Tyrian rubbed his chin in some embarrassment: “…She fell off her chair.”

No sooner had he spoken than rustling and the sound of clutter being pushed aside came from inside the scrying crystal. Lucretia finally appeared again in the center of the image. The Sea Witch stared at the scene on this side of the crystal with a look of shocked tension, then glared at Tyrian: “Brother! What are you doing?!”

“It was I who told him to bring the crystal to the Vanished, Lucy,” Duncan’s voice came from the side before Tyrian could speak. “But I did not expect him to forget to warn you in advance. Do not be afraid. Talking with your own Father for a few minutes is not enough for the curse to cling to you.”

Lucretia’s expression in the scrying crystal looked strange. She clearly had not been ready for this sudden meeting and conversation, and seemed a little ill at ease. But she quickly sensed the unusually serious mood on this side. Her small unease was pressed down at once and replaced by an effort to regain her composure: “Father, it has been a long time. I am sorry, I did not mean to…”

“It has not actually been that long – do not worry about it. I understand your reaction.” Duncan gave a small smile, then lifted his head and gestured to the others around the long table. “Let us start with a brief introduction, Lucy. These are the Vanished’s new crew members, and the new captain of the Vanished Fleet…”

He introduced the people around the long table one by one. Those he called by name stood up and nodded in greeting. At last he pointed at the figure in the scrying crystal: “This is my daughter, Lucretia – many of you should already know of her, so there is no need to say much more.”

“The famous Frontier Adventurer, the Sea Witch who has made great contributions in the field of occult studies,” Morris said with an immediate nod. “It is an honor to meet you, my lady.”

Lucretia gave a reserved little nod: “I have heard your name as well. Even in Lightwind Harbor and Morka, the senior professors of Truth Academy often quote many of your results and views when they are discussing problems.”

Once she calmed down, the Sea Witch looked dignified and steady. She sat straight within the scrying crystal, every small movement showing confidence and grace.

She did not look at all like someone who had just fallen out of her chair.

“All right, that is enough introductions and small talk,” Duncan cut in at the right moment. “Now for the real business.”

His gaze swept over everyone present.

Everyone had arrived.

Even Goathead, who could not leave the captain’s cabin, was listening in with Duncan’s permission.

Duncan let out a light breath and broke the silence:

“To put it simply, Agatha and I successfully carried out a Deep Dive beneath Frostholm. Our exact depth surpassed that of the Abyssal Trench Project half a century ago. During the Deep Dive, we saw many horrifying scenes and learned truths enough to overturn many people’s understanding.

“First, we confirmed the structure at the bottom of the city-state – there is some kind of enormous biological mass down there…”

Chapter 496: Duncan’s Bold Idea

As the eerie green flame lit the cabin, the distant sound of waves outside the hull slowly seemed to come from a hazy, dreamlike place, and the secrets from the endless Deep Sea, from that dark and frozen region, seeped into everyone’s mind like terrifying shadows.

The only shelters mortals had on the Boundless Sea were all built on the corpses of unspeakable giant beasts—their withered tentacles hung from the undersides of the city-states, and their pale, horrible eyes cast a gaze into the bottomless ocean trench.

All living beings in the mortal world were Spawn of the Abyssal Lord, and the flesh of the Elder Gods formed everything in existence. What had happened in Frostholm had not been a simple invasion, but the Elder Gods “waking” from their own creations.

The Four Gods were not necessarily a stable embodiment of order. They too might fall into a corrupted runaway state, and a similar “runaway state” might already have happened more than once in this world. The reason the mortal world was now under the protection of the Four Gods might simply be that, among all the Gods, only they still remained awake.

The catastrophe in Frostholm would not be the last. As the condition of the Abyssal Lord worsened, and as the flaws in the “creation Blueprint” grew over time, similar “awakenings” were very likely to break out across the world. Wrong “replicants” of the Elder Gods would crawl out of the Deep Sea, out from the depths beneath the city-states, and even… out from inside every mortal.

With a calm, steady tone, Duncan told his followers everything he had learned in the Deep Sea, and everything he had worked out from the information they already had.

After that, the cabin fell into a long, deathly silence.

Even thick-skulled Alice and carefree Shirley sat quietly for once, and they realized how serious the problem was… probably.

After a long time, Vanna finally broke the silence. She took a deep breath, a gloomy look gathering on her face like a dark cloud: “If I hadn’t heard this from you personally, I would have taken every line of this information as the mad ravings of a Ender…”

“Even the most deranged Ender probably couldn’t make up something on this level,” Morris said slowly. He lifted his pipe to his mouth, noticed that the tobacco inside had gone out at some point, and set it down again with a bitter smile. “Ah, right, the Enders… and the ones who dealt with the Queen of Frostholm. One of the craziest things in this world is that among those Subspace believers, there are actually some who can stay clear-headed…”

Tyrian frowned, stayed silent for a long time, then finally could not help looking up: “Father, is all this information real?”

As soon as he said it, he felt he had asked a stupid question, but right now this stupid question felt necessary—everyone at the long table probably had the same thought in mind.

“At the very least, this is indeed what I saw and heard,” Duncan said calmly. “Of course, limited information can be misleading. Even the clearest clues can be interpreted in several ways.

“Besides, the Queen of Frostholm might not have told us the whole truth. Even if she did, she could still be wrong herself—we can only use the information we have right now to work out the possibility that is closest to the truth."

"The possibility that is closest to the truth right now…" Tyrian repeated in a low voice, then asked, "Did the Queen mention what signs there would be if another city-state went through an 'Elder Gods awakening' like Frostholm?"

"No," Duncan shook his head. "She couldn't confirm the mechanism of this 'awakening' either. Maybe the only way is to enter the Abyssal Deep Sea itself, and check the true state of the Abyssal Lord directly."

As soon as he finished, several pairs of eyes in the room turned at once toward Dog, who was hunched in a corner.

"Don't look at me!" Dog almost jumped up on the spot, its huge skull shaking back and forth. "It's not possible. I can't get anywhere near the Lord, and I definitely can't take people in there…"

"But you can open a 'passage' to the Abyssal Deep Sea, and you can even take Shirley through that passage to run," Duncan said, looking seriously at the only Abyssal demon present. "You also said Abyssal Hounds are a kind of demon born near the Lord. Your 'hometown' is right next to the Lord."

"That's a shallow passage. It only skims past the outermost edge of the Abyssal Deep Sea. It's meant for running away," Dog said. With everyone staring at it, it hesitated for two seconds, then had no choice but to spill these secrets—secrets that had been its and Shirley's trump card for staying alive for many years. "The Abyssal Deep Sea is far more complicated and strange than you think. It isn't one whole. The different 'zones' are not connected in a continuous way…

"From the shallow layer you can see the deep-layer zones, but without the right method, you wouldn't 'walk' to your destination even in ten thousand years. There, ‘distance’ is an illusion, and ‘movement’ is only a false appearance…

“I have already been ‘banished’ from the Abyssal Deep Sea. I can’t explain the exact principle—maybe because I grew a ‘heart’. Many years ago, I already lost the ability to open a passage that leads to the Lord’s side. And besides that, I am now very unwelcome among the ‘locals’ over there. Even if I only skim past through the safe part of the shallow layer, I will draw countless demons to attack me…

“And even putting all that aside, I can’t just take any ‘person’ through. Abyssal demons can only take the person linked to them by a symbiotic pact through a passage—I can only take Shirley, not anyone else.”

Dog rattled off this long string of words, then carefully looked around at everyone—especially at Duncan’s reaction. It shrank its neck and added: “I’m not making excuses, Captain. You heard it yourself, there really are a lot of problems.”

Duncan was not angered by this long list of difficulties. He only thought seriously for a while, then asked, deep in thought: “So you mean the space of the Abyssal Deep Sea is discontinuous?”

“…You can probably think of it that way,” Dog said after thinking for a moment and nodding. “I can’t explain the details clearly—lately I’ve been studying Professor Brandall’s book, ‘Three Conjectures on Asymmetric Space-Time’. Maybe once I finish it, I can explain it to you better.”

Duncan did not pay much attention to Dog’s last sentence. He went on thinking, then asked another question: “But I remember you once mentioned that in the years when the Vanished was in full runaway state, it smashed through the entire Abyssal Deep Sea.”

Dog’s expression—though its expression was always rather abstract—changed at once. Its whole skeletal frame froze with a creak.

Duncan thought Dog simply did not remember, so he added a few details: “You said it fell from the Mortal Realm toward Subspace, then rose back from Subspace, oscillating between the realms and passing through them again and again. Each time, it smashed through the whole Spirit Realm and the Abyssal Deep Sea. In that process, didn’t it basically break through the ‘spatial fault lines’ inside the Abyssal Deep Sea?”

This time it was not only Dog whose expression turned abstract. Everyone in the cabin now wore a striking look—an eerie feeling of horror hung over them all, even over Lucretia on the other side of the scrying crystal.

“C-Captain!” Dog’s raspy voice finally came out, and every bone in its body was trembling. “Please don’t say something that scary… You’re not really planning to… to smash it again, are you…?”

“Father, please be careful,” even Lucretia, who had hardly spoken and still seemed rather distant, could not help breaking the silence. She stared at Duncan’s side of the scrying crystal with a tense face, as if afraid that her father would turn back into that cold, merciless terror of a “God” at any moment. “Letting the Vanished return to a runaway state to smash open the gate to the Abyssal Deep Sea is absolutely not a good idea. Even as a ‘research project’… that would be a bit too extreme.”

Duncan had not expected such a strong reaction from everyone after he voiced just one bold idea, so he shook his head: “Relax. I’m not about to run such an extreme ‘test’—I’ve always been a cautious man.”

Everyone clearly let out a breath of relief.

But then Duncan changed the subject and added: “Still, even from a cautious point of view, this ‘old event’ gives me an idea. Certain properties of the Vanished can ignore the spatial fault lines inside the Abyssal Deep Sea. I will do some research based on that and see if I can open a door to that place while keeping things safe…”

Everyone’s hearts leaped back into their throats…

But at least this time no one raised as strong an objection as before. Only Morris and Lucretia, speaking as scholars, once again stressed the need for ‘safety’ and ‘caution’—judging from their attitude, they were clearly still worried that one day, on a whim, the captain might really steer the Vanished straight down into the Abyssal Deep Sea…

Luckily, Duncan moved on to the next topic soon after.

“Aside from the state of the Abyssal Lord, there is something else that concerns me more right now,” he said, rubbing his chin as he thought. “Those Enders—in strict terms, those ones who still have reason and act in a way completely opposite to ordinary cultists.”

He turned his head and looked at Tyrian.

“You once told Vanna that three Enders came to visit the Vanished and spoke with me through the whole night?”

Tyrian straightened at once, looking a bit awkward: “Yes, Father. Back then, I still could not confirm your… ‘state’, so I talked with Miss Vanna about some of your ‘old stories’.”

“It’s fine,” Duncan waved his hand. “I don’t remember much about those years, so it’s a good thing that you do.”

He calmly emphasized again that his “amnesia” came from the influence of Subspace, while also watching Tyrian’s and Lucretia’s expressions. Only then did he go on: “What I mean is, I have a feeling we will have to deal with those ‘sane Enders’ again sooner or later.”

Morris spoke up without thinking: “Why do you think so?”

“Because they seem dedicated to taking part in ‘historical events’ with far-reaching impact,” Duncan said slowly as he shifted in his seat. “And the disturbance caused by the Vanished… has been getting bigger and bigger.”

Chapter 497: Brewing Storm

Among all the cultists Duncan had met so far, the ones called Enders were the most mysterious and strange group of all.

Their numbers were far fewer than the believers of the Sun and the cultists of the Cult of Annihilation, but their ability to stir up trouble was unmatched. Their actions were bizarre, their goals a mystery. To this day, no one knew what kind of “organization” they had, how many of them there roughly were, or where they were hiding.

What concerned Duncan even more than their twisted way of acting were their own “traits”—they seemed to exist nonlinearly along the timeline, and every one of them was like that.

In this world, the Churches of the Four Gods and the Authorities of the various city-states grouped the Enders, the cult of the Sun, and the Cult of Annihilation together as the three major cults. But in Duncan’s view, the Preachers were so twisted and so out of step with the others that they ought to be taken out and put in a category of their own.

“From the information we have now, the Enders can be divided into two types. One type is the completely insane, extreme cultists. The other still has reason and even seems polite, like ‘sane scholars’,” Morris said from one side of the long table as he slowly cleaned his pipe and thought aloud. “The latter will actively approach people and try to give ‘mental guidance’ to the ones they choose. Judging by how often they show up, there seem to be far fewer of these ‘rational ones’ than of the mad ones.”

“In the heretic contact reports I know of, every recorded Ender was insane,” Vanna nodded. “That shows that those madmen make up the vast majority of these ‘preachers’. The rational ones are just rare exceptions.”

“They are, after all, a bunch of people tangled up with Subspace all day long—being mentally unstable is basically normal for them,” Dog said offhand, then quickly glanced up at Duncan. “Ah, Captain, I didn’t mean you…”

Duncan ignored Dog’s muttering. He only thought quietly, then suddenly said after a moment: “Whether mad or sane, these two kinds of Enders actually have one thing in common—they are all trying to meddle with ‘history’.”

On both sides of the long table, everyone fell into brief thought. Agatha, who had hardly spoken until now, looked up: “You mean the Ender who first approached the Queen of Frostholm was also acting for some specific ‘future’…?”

“Maybe we should try to look at history from the Enders’s ‘point of view’,” Duncan said, not in a hurry. “If we assume they really are a group of Nonlinear Existences, ‘time smugglers’ of a sort, then what does the ‘history’ we see look like to them?”

The cabin went quiet. After a short silence, Morris’s voice suddenly sounded: “…Everything has already happened, but everything can also not happen. The way the world goes can be adjusted. You only need to find the right ‘correction points’…”

“Exactly. The three Preachers who came to the Vanished a hundred years ago, the ‘mysterious scholar’ who contacted the Queen of Frostholm more than fifty years ago—their actions all greatly changed the later course of history. If we look only at how they ‘intervened in history’, the mad and the sane Enders actually behaved in the same way,” Duncan nodded. “Their difference is that the mad Preachers seem to want to wipe out history completely, while the sane ones seem to want to ‘correct’ history toward some direction they’re hoping for…”

“Correcting history…” Vanna frowned deeply. “That is a dangerous phrase. The Flamebearers devote themselves to protecting our history from outside interference. They are the Church of the True Gods that deals with the Enders the most. And according to the teachings of ‘Everburning Ember Tarrigan’, history has its own strictness and purity. It must not be touched, must not be reshaped—for ‘history’, any kind of ‘correction’ is also a form of damage…”

“Then what if it is restoring history that has already been damaged back to its original state?” Duncan asked, then added, “Of course, I don’t mean the actions of the Enders. I’m just curious about the question itself.”

“…I’m sorry. That already involves the deeper, more complex parts of the Flamebearer Church’s doctrine,” Vanna said after thinking for a moment. She lowered her head with a hint of apology. “Among the Churches of the Four Gods, they act in the most secretive way, and their teachings are the hardest to understand. I know very little about them.”

“Is that so…” Duncan nodded slowly, still thinking, and his gaze moved along the edge of the long table—Agatha, Vanna, and Morris all came into view.

“…We’re still missing an expert on the Flamebearers,” he could not help sighing quietly.

Vanna’s and Morris’s expressions instantly became a bit odd.

Agatha did not change much—she was new here and did not react right away.

Duncan himself did not realize there was anything strange about what he had said—he had only spoken his thoughts out loud. The next second, he changed the subject: “Vanna, do you think the Flamebearers know about the existence of ‘sane Enders’?”

Vanna quickly pushed aside the slightly irreverent thought in her mind. After thinking a little, she answered honestly: “I’m not sure, but logically… I think they do know, or at least they should have noticed something.”

“The followers of ‘Tarrigan’ have spent centuries dealing with heretics and malevolent spirits that try to damage history,” Morris nodded as well. “The Flamebearers are skilled and sharp in this field. And based on what we know, those rational Enders have been active for at least a hundred years. Unless they really only appeared those two times in all that time, and every time they somehow completely slipped past the Flamebearers’ eyes, the Flamebearer Church must have noticed them. We just don’t know why… but the Flamebearers don’t seem to have taken any major action.”

“I’ll try to contact the Storm Cathedral and see if the Pope, Your Eminence, can find out anything from the Flamebearers,” Vanna said at once. “In many cases, cultists with reason are more destructive than simple madmen. Even though, for now, they seem friendly and even look like they have good intentions, I really can’t believe that a group of people who deal with Subspace all day long could have true reason and goodwill…”

Right after she spoke, Vanna suddenly felt that something was wrong. She froze for a second, then quickly turned to Duncan and added: “Ah, Captain, I didn’t mean you…”

Duncan’s face stayed expressionless.

He felt he had heard that line somewhere just now.

Then he waved his hand to show he did not mind. After thinking for a moment more, he finally spoke slowly: “We’re not only going to contact the Storm Cathedral, and the message we send will not only be about those Enders.”

Everyone present exchanged looks. Vanna was the first to react: “You want to send out a warning—like before?”

Duncan nodded with a serious expression.

“This might be even more dangerous than before. The ‘Elder Gods awakening’ incident in Frostholm could very well happen again in the short term. It might be that right now, beneath some city-state, a wrong Elder God replicant has already awakened. There is only one Queen of Frostholm, but there are many city-states on the Boundless Sea. To keep everyone from being caught unprepared, we at least have to let the upper levels of the Churches and the city-states know this crisis exists.”

As he spoke, he looked up at the people on both sides of the long table.

“Vanna, you contact the Storm Cathedral. Morris, you find a way to reach the Academy of Truth. Agatha, you should also have a channel to speak directly with the upper ranks of the Church of Death. You three pass on everything we discussed here today to your Churches as completely as you can: the true structure under the city-states, the situation related to the Abyssal Lord, and the information on the Enders.

“Then there is the Explorer Association. Lawrence, and Lucy as well, think about some reliable way to warn the Explorer Association—about the awakening of the Elder Gods—without causing panic.

“The captains on the Boundless Sea are a sharp, experienced group, and well informed. They are best at noticing if something strange shows up in some corner of this world.

“Tyrian, sort out the matters in Frostholm as soon as you can, then find a way, as governor, to contact the other city-states. Again, without causing panic, think of a way to make the other cities set up an early warning system for ‘Elder Gods awakening’ incidents.”

He said all this in one breath, then gathered his thoughts and went on, explaining and stressing his point: “Remember, tell the Churches as much of the full information as you can. In the supernatural field, they are at least somewhat ‘professional’ and have plenty of people.

“As for the city-states and the Explorer Association, you must weigh things very carefully, because that involves too many ordinary people. When you go back, think hard about how to pass on this ‘warning’ without revealing too much hidden knowledge. Remember, the goal is not to make them uncover the secrets of the Deep Sea, but to make them pay careful attention to any strange signs that might appear under the city-states and along the route.

“I’m done. Do you have anything to add?”

Duncan raised his eyes and quietly looked along both sides of the long table.

At that moment, everyone in the cabin—even Shirley and Alice—suddenly felt that something like a huge wave was building.

A storm strong enough to shake the whole world was taking shape along with the captain’s string of decisions and orders. In this eerie cabin lit by the ghostly green flame, in this hidden meeting with only a dozen people present, the course of the world already seemed faintly decided.

A feeling that he was taking part in history, even shaping history, slowly rose in Lawrence’s heart. He unconsciously felt his breathing quicken and his heart pound.

“This really is going to stir up a storm…”

The old captain, who had only just become a member of the Lost Home Fleet, could not help murmuring to himself.

“It’s not that we’re going to stir up a storm. The storm has already drawn near,” Agatha said softly, shaking her head beside him. “It’s just that no one ever noticed it—and now, we’re going to open the window.”

Chapter 498: Necessary Procedure

Duncan knew that the arrangements he made today were destined to throw the Boundless Sea into turmoil. This “warning” would shake everyone, not only because of what it warned about, but also because of where it came from.

The civilized world was about to feel a small “Vanished shock”.

“This is a big matter,” Tyrian broke the silence. “We don’t have to worry about the Church. When it comes to supernatural crises, they have always been sharp and professional. They will definitely treat this with enough seriousness. But the city-states are complicated. I really doubt that all of them can build an effective warning system.”

“Before that, think first about how many people will treat this ‘warning’ properly,” Lucretia’s voice came from the scrying crystal. “In this world, there are more ‘Doomsday’ warnings than anyone can count, and most of them come from mad cultists. Now the Vanished suddenly starts warning the entire world. To be honest… many people’s first reaction will probably be the same as when they run into those doomsday cultists, maybe even worse…”

On the other side of the table, Shirley muttered quietly: “Well, the reputation is what it is…”

“That’s their problem,” Duncan glanced at Shirley with a blank face and shook his head. “The Vanished’s ‘reputation’ is a good thing. Even if some people don’t believe the content of the warning, they will at least take the ‘warning’ itself seriously. Even if it’s only because they fear the Vanished, they will be cautious. That’s enough.”

“I will contact the Church as soon as possible,” Agatha nodded. Her hoarse yet gentle voice sounded. “I believe the Death Sanctuary will absolutely treat this warning from the Vanished with the highest priority.”

“Once Death, the Deep Sea, and Truth Academy receive the news, Flamebearer will definitely hear of it as well,” Vanna also nodded and added: “I will confirm this directly with His Holiness.”

“I haven’t written to Academy Ark in a long time. This is a good chance to catch up with some old friends,” Morris took off his blessed monocle and wiped it. “But I need to prepare some extra ointments and herbal powders for the ritual. It’s not easy to contact Academy Ark from the Boundless Sea.”

Hearing Morris’s words, Duncan suddenly thought of something.

“How is the matter I asked you to investigate last time?” He looked at the Grand Scholar. “That mark carried by the Ender, those Shattered Cross marks. Have you found where they came from?”

“I’m very sorry, there is no progress yet,” Morris looked a bit ashamed. “I’ve already written many letters to scholars I know well and contacted several universities we have good ties with, but none of them have any record related to those Shattered Cross marks. At the moment, we can only say they ‘might’ have appeared on some ruins from the ancient kingdom of Critt…”

“I see…” Duncan sounded a little disappointed, but he knew that, with so little information, investigating a mysterious symbol was like looking for a needle in the sea. He did not cling to it. He simply said: “Then keep an eye on it. If there is any progress, tell me right away.”

Morris lowered his head at once: “Yes, Captain.”

Duncan grunted in response, then paused to think, making sure he had not missed anything. After that, he let out a quiet breath and stood up from the long table, letting his gaze sweep over everyone present.

“Then that’s it for today’s gathering. We’ve settled the general course of action. If you have any questions later, you can ask me at any time.”

At the far end of the long table, Lawrence subconsciously let out a breath of relief.

The gathering was not as dark and frightening as he had imagined. It was not full of strange rituals or strict, bloody rules. Even so, just the fact that he was here “under Captain Duncan’s constant attention” made him feel a lot of pressure. As the “new recruit” here, he had been tense from head to toe. Now he could finally relax.

But he had only relaxed halfway when he noticed that the others around the table had no intention of getting up to leave. Instead, including the respected Grand Scholar Morris, most of them looked as if they were expecting the next part.

The gathering still had a process?

The thought had just crossed Lawrence’s mind when he heard Nina’s voice from across the table: “Ah, finally done talking. Time to eat, time to eat, I’m starving.”

“Big dinner today! Big dinner!” Shirley shouted happily. “It’s gathering day. We get good food!”

“The soup is still simmering in the pot. The timing is perfect,” Alice said as she stood up. “I’ll go push the serving cart over~”

Lawrence watched this scene in a daze, unable to figure out what was about to happen. He turned to look at Agatha, who sat closest to him, but saw the same puzzled look on her face.

Just then, Duncan's voice came from the head of the long table, clearing up Lawrence and Agatha's confusion: "We're done with business, so we share a meal. That's the rule on this ship."

Done with business… share a meal?

Lawrence listened in shock, wondering if he had heard wrong. But then he saw the living Doll actually pushing a large serving cart back into the cabin. The slightly worn cart creaked as it moved. Many containers on it were filled with steaming… food.

Lawrence stared, wide-eyed, as Alice carried the dishes to the table. He watched Shirley and Nina run back and forth, helping to set out plates and knives and forks. He smelled the aroma of food—fresh bread, vegetables and fruits, and meat.

It all seemed normal. These were foods he knew. Food Humans could eat.

But among all the aromas, the richest came from a pot of soup at the end of the long table.

It was a delicious fish soup. Inside, tender pieces of meat curled slightly, no longer recognizable as any particular species. Steam rose from the surface. On that gently trembling broth, those curled pieces of meat seemed to retain a trace of life. In the drifting steam, they trembled and twitched.

But when he looked closely, that trembling and twitching seemed like an illusion that had never happened.

Without realizing it, Lawrence stood up. His gaze fixed on the pot of fish soup. He could not tell what kind of fish it was, nor could he sense anything strange about this "food". Yet a strong instinct still pounded in his chest. It was something built up over decades of roaming the Boundless Sea, something that let even an “ordinary person” without the gift of Spiritual Insight sense certain supernatural things—

This had once been extremely dangerous. The kind of horror that could kill people and send an ocean-going ship to its grave in the Deep Sea. It was…

“It’s fresh fish,” Duncan said with a smile, speaking to Lawrence and Agatha, who were attending the gathering for the first time. “I caught it today. I had to sail quite a way out from Frostholm’s main island to find it.”

Fish? “Fish” caught far from safe routes, far from the shelter of islands?

Lawrence’s mind went blank for a moment. A chilling guess flashed through his head. Not far away, Morris gave him a friendly nod and said: “It’s just what you’re thinking, Captain Lawrence. But relax. This is a necessary step in joining us. And you don’t have to worry. It’s harmless now. On this ship, it truly is food.”

Lawrence listened in a daze. By the time he came back to his senses, Alice had already set a bowl of steaming fish soup on the table in front of him.

But when she reached Agatha, Alice stopped, looking a bit confused.

“I can’t eat,” Agatha said, looking a little embarrassed. “This body is already a dead shell. I can’t enjoy food anymore.”

“It’s fine,” Duncan said generously, waving his hand. “We call it a ship rule, but really it’s no different from an ordinary get-together. If you can eat, eat a bit. If you can’t, just chat. That still helps people grow closer.”

As he spoke, he turned his head and glanced at the scrying crystal placed in front of Tyrian: “Lucy, don’t forget your dinner either.”

“I’m eating, I’m eating,” Lucretia answered at once. “Lunie brought me roasted apple pie and bacon pie!”

Duncan nodded, then smiled as he looked down both sides of the long table. He picked up the wineglass by his hand and, as the Master, raised it high:

“Then, to the days when we can gather like this—”

…

The faint dizziness slowly faded. The ghostly green flame at the edge of his vision dispersed into the air. Cool, fresh sea wind swept across the deck and brought a moment of sharp clarity to his mind.

The experience of attending the gathering aboard the Vanished still felt like a dream, a little unreal, lingering in his thoughts.

Lawrence shook his head to clear it further, then walked to the edge of the deck and looked out at the sea, already sinking into the veil of night.

The shadow of the Vanished, faintly glowing, still floated on the sea not far from the White Oak.

“…It really was like a dream.”

He had gathered on a mysterious ghost ship, spoken with all kinds of “people”, including a living Doll, a shard of the Sun, and demons from the Abyssal Deep. He had discussed secrets of Elder Gods and Doomsday in the depths of the Spirit Realm. Then, under the gaze and witness of Subspace Shadows, they had shared the flesh of a Spawn from the Deep Sea.

When the gathering ended, when wind from the Mortal Realm world once again brushed his face, when the tension and numbness in his mind slowly faded and his thoughts could work again with Human reason, when those light and strange impressions from the gathering scattered, Lawrence finally began to understand the true “nature” of what had just happened.

A realization came to him late, yet all at once. He could not even say what he felt in his heart.

A normal person should be frightened afterwards. He should feel afraid. At the very least, when he remembered the “fish” he had eaten, he should feel horror.

But he felt nothing.

Only a strange calm and sense of belonging soothed his restless heart.

[The fish… was really good…]

Chapter 499: Calm and Quiet Days

In Frostholm, in the domed office of the city-state's Governor, Tyrian stood in front of a mirror, carefully straightening the medals and sash on his chest.

His one-eyed face still looked cold and stern, even a little frightening. But the brand-new Governor's uniform and those shining medals turned that sternness, at least in part, into a trustworthy authority. At this moment, the city needed a Governor with that kind of authority.

Tyrian let out a quiet breath and turned his head to look at the other side of the domed office.

Two Undying sailors were hanging the new city-state flag on the wall. Beside the flag, a line of strong words was carved deep into the wall by the door, just as it had been half a century ago:

"Let as many people as possible survive"

Tyrian looked quietly at those words. After a long time, he gave a small nod and walked toward the large desk not far away. There was still a little time before the official event began. He could use it to go over the steps he would soon have to follow, or to calm his emotions.

The Complex Lens Array on the desk started to move on its own. Light shimmered on the surface of the scrying crystal at the center of the lenses. Lucretia's figure appeared in the glow, looking Tyrian up and down.

"This outfit suits you very well," the "Sea Witch" in a black dress said. "It goes nicely with the eyepatch."

Tyrian tugged at the button near his collar and gave his younger sister in the scrying crystal a sideways look: “You came just to make fun of me?”

“I’m seriously complimenting you,” Lucretia said with a straight face. “You haven’t taken such good care of your appearance in many years. That rough and scary Pirate look really didn’t suit you at all.”

“I might have to keep this image for a very long time, until there is a more suitable Governor, or Father has other plans,” Tyrian said, then paused. “One day, I’ll miss those free and easy days.”

“At least that day isn’t today,” Lucretia said with a faint smile. “So, how do you feel, about to swear the oath and become the Governor of a city-state? I heard you also have to ride in a carriage afterward, touring the streets to show yourself to the citizens?”

“The parade is to calm people’s hearts,” Tyrian said. “It lets them believe that order has been restored and that someone in the city’s upper ranks is still taking responsibility. I don’t like this part very much, but it is necessary. As for how it feels to become Governor…”

He stopped for a moment, then shook his head and went on: “I don’t feel much. The handover in the government hall and the building of the team have already been done. I’ve been working as Governor up to now. Today’s so-called ‘inauguration’ ritual is just a public ‘procedure’.”

“Is that so? Then I wish you a smooth procedure, big brother,” Lucretia laughed, using the old way she had called him many years ago when they were children. After a brief pause, her expression turned serious. “How are you doing with what Father told you to do?”

“I’ve drafted a few secret letters to send to other city-states, but the details still need work,” Tyrian said. “I have to deliver the warning and make them realize how serious the situation is, but I also need to avoid misunderstandings and keep other city-states from overreacting. Honestly, this kind of paperwork is harder than taking a fleet to fight Deep Sea Spawn or other Pirates."

"If you ask me, you should just state things clearly and make them sound serious," Lucretia said lightly. "Anyone who can become a Governor is smart, and at least their staff should be. They know what to do. You're just giving them a reminder, not teaching them like a nanny how to build a 'warning system'. I'm already getting ready to contact the Explorer Association—ha, I wonder how they'll react."

"A warning from the Vanished Fleet to the entire civilized world," Tyrian said with a sigh. "The last time something like this happened was a century ago."

"…Yes. When Father first discovered that the Border Collapse phenomenon had appeared in the 'inner regions'," Lucretia said softly. "I still remember how the Cathedral's bells rang then. Every city-state's newspapers were discussing the warning from Great Adventurer Duncan Abnomar."

"So many years have passed, and once again he casts his gaze on the 'border' of this world," Tyrian said quietly. "History seems to have returned to its starting point. Maybe, in some sense, the Vanished never went astray at all. Its century in Subspace was just a voyage in some wider dimension we can't yet understand. Now it has returned, bringing the light of a new route, just like the lines the mad poet Pullman left behind: 'They once could sail straight in one direction, until they rounded the world's far side and, at an astounding angle, returned to the Mortal Realm'…"

Tyrian recited that famous absurd poem from history in a low voice, then slowly stood up from behind the desk. From outside the domed office, the faint sound of a band could already be heard. Footsteps were coming from the corridor. The time had come. It was time for the city to meet its new Governor.

“Good luck, big brother—and don’t forget my Spirit Realm lens.”

“Don’t worry. I remembered it this time.”

…

A sharp, chilly wind blew through the sparse trees along the path, over the dark carved fence, past the silent gravestones and the empty corpse platforms on both sides of the path, and finally faded away in the depths of the cemetery.

Two figures were walking slowly along the cemetery path.

One of them was especially tall and broad-shouldered, wrapped in a pure black coat and a matching wide-brimmed hat. Every bit of visible skin outside his clothes was wrapped in layer upon layer of bandages. He looked frightening at a glance.

The other wore a simple Nun’s black dress. Her eyes were covered, and her long brown hair hung loose over her shoulders.

“I thought you would attend Governor Tyrian’s inauguration ritual, even in this avatar form,” Agatha walked at Duncan’s side and spoke in a low voice. “It wouldn’t be hard to arrange a proper seat for you.”

“I’m not showing my face. He’s in a good state right now. If I really showed up, he might get nervous instead,” Duncan said. “Later, when the motorcade passes by here, I’ll just greet him from afar.”

As he spoke, he lifted his head and looked along the rather empty cemetery path and at the bare corpse platforms on both sides.

“…I really do miss this place a bit. In my memory, this path used to be full of spirit coffins.”

“During this special period, we had to change the process of sending off the dead,” Agatha said quietly. “For now, bodies must be sent to the furnaces as soon as possible. The Silent Monks comfort them and bid them farewell right beside the fire. The cemetery has become quieter instead.”

Duncan grunted in reply. Just before they reached the end of the path, he suddenly stopped walking.

The simple warden’s hut appeared before them—and in front of the hut stood a special guest.

A twelve-year-old girl, wrapped in a thick white winter coat and wearing a furry hat, bustled around in front of the warden’s hut like a tightly wrapped snowball. She hugged a broom almost as tall as she was and worked hard to sweep the snow from the doorstep.

“Is that Annie?” Duncan tilted his head slightly and asked in a low voice.

“It’s her,” Agatha replied softly. “Except for the first few days of the lockdown, she’s come here every day at noon during her school break. The old warden is gone, and we haven’t assigned a new one yet. The cemetery is temporarily managed by the nearest Cathedral. There’s no harm in her being here, so the Cathedral has allowed her to come and go as she likes.”

“Do they also have your permission?”

“…Yes.”

The girl in front of the hut finally noticed movement on the path.

She turned her head and stared in surprise at the two figures who had appeared not far away. After a few seconds of staring, she tossed the broom aside and ran over happily.

“Gatekeeper Sister! And Uncle Duncan!”

Annie greeted the two familiar faces with joy. But as soon as she shouted, she suddenly remembered something. She quickly straightened up, looked at Agatha, and said: “Mother said I should call you ‘Your Excellency the Gatekeeper’ or ‘Archbishop’…”

“It’s fine. Just call me whatever you like,” Agatha laughed and reached out to press down Annie’s hat. “Are you cold?”

“I’m not cold,” Annie shook her head. Then she grabbed Agatha’s hand and pointed with her other hand at the little hut not far away. “Your hand is too cold. Come inside and warm up by the fire—I even made herbal tea!”

Agatha instinctively wanted to refuse, but she saw that Duncan had already stepped toward the hut. She froze for a moment in surprise, then could only follow helplessly.

Inside the tidy, simple warden’s hut, the fire in the stove burned hot. Wood cracked and popped in the flames. Steam rose from the samovar beside the stove, carrying the bitter fragrance of herbs.

Annie poured two cups of hot tea and pushed the warm cups into Duncan and Agatha’s hands: “These are for the Guardians from the Cathedral who come to inspect the grounds. They’ll be here later. Even if you don’t drink, you can at least warm your hands.”

Only now did the girl seem to realize that the “Gatekeeper Sister” in front of her was already a corpse.

Agatha did not mind. She thanked her softly and held the cup in both hands as it slowly grew hot.

“Is it warmer?” Annie asked again.

Cold. The whole world was cold. The teacup was cold, and so was the fire.

Agatha smiled gently and said: “Much warmer.”

Then she noticed that Duncan beside her kept glancing around the room from time to time.

“What are you looking at?” she asked in confusion.

“I think this is a good place to ‘settle down’,” Duncan pulled his gaze back and said to Agatha. “If it’s just for ‘settling’ one avatar form, that house on Oak Street is a bit of a waste.”

Agatha blinked, then slowly understood. Surprise appeared on her face: “You… you mean…”

“The Vanished will continue its voyage. The Avatar I leave here in the city also needs a place to stay,” Duncan said calmly. “You don’t need to worry about finding a new warden. This will save you a lot of work.”

Chapter 500: The One Who Set Sail

Annie looked a little dazed as she stared at the two “guests” in the small house. Her gaze shifted back and forth between Agatha and Duncan. After a long time, Annie finally reacted a little and said: “Ah, Uncle Duncan, are you going to be the warden of the cemetery here?”

“Maybe,” Duncan said, looking at Agatha, who was still in shock. “Is that not allowed? Does the cemetery warden have to be a retired Guardian?”

Agatha finally came back to her senses and spoke in a hurry: “No… Normally the cemetery wardens are retired Guardian veterans, but if I step in, I can of course arrange a position for you. That’s not the problem. The key is… do you really want to stay in this cemetery as its warden?”

“In Pland, I am still an antiques merchant,” Duncan said, his eyes full of amusement. “The Vanished will never stay in one place, but my avatar form will remain in the city-state. I need something to do. I can’t spend every day doing nothing, just drinking tea and reading the newspaper in that big house on Oak Street, can I?”

“I… never actually thought about that,” Agatha admitted, feeling a little embarrassed. “I never even considered what your ‘avatar form’ would need to do in daily life…”

“It’s normal. Most novels and films never mention what the protagonists do for work after the events end. In the Mortal Realm, you are now doing the work of two people by yourself, and Tyrian is buried in paperwork all day,”

Duncan laughed. “For me, steering a ghost ship that never docks, drifting on the Boundless Sea day after day, is also rather boring. Living a normal life in a city-state is my way of making sure I still feel like a ‘human’. You can think of it as…”

Agatha cut him off at once: “I’ll arrange it for you right away. You can ‘take office’ at the cemetery tomorrow.”

Duncan said: “…I hadn’t finished speaking yet.”

“I already heard the most important part,” Agatha said solemnly. “Don’t worry. Even if the Cathedral asks questions, I will make sure you can be the warden of this cemetery in peace.”

“…I feel like you may have read a bit too much into what I just said, but it’s not a big problem,” Duncan said, a little awkward. Then he really did start asking about the “job”: “What does a cemetery warden usually have to do?”

“There really isn’t much work,” Agatha explained. “A warden’s job is just to make sure the cemetery is not ‘disturbed’, to keep supernatural powers calm, and to register the living and the dead who go in and out. As for maintaining the cemetery facilities, the Cathedral nearby sends people to handle that. Given that Frostholm is now extremely safe even at night, I think… not only you, but all the cemetery wardens probably won’t have much to do anymore.”

When she said this, Agatha’s tone grew a little strange. Her eyes kept drifting toward Duncan from time to time. It was clear she was thinking about the link between Frostholm’s recent peaceful nights and the being standing before her.

And there were some words she did not say out loud—even if the city-state’s nights were still as dangerous as before, what would it matter? Now that the cemetery had welcomed a “warden” like this, there would probably never again be incidents of restless supernatural powers. She guessed that even if something from Subspace crawled out of a coffin, this new warden would just slap it back in with one hand…

Either way, it was a good thing.

Duncan had no idea what was going through Agatha's mind, and he himself did not think too deeply about it. He really did just want to find something for this body to do. Thinking of the last will lingering in this body, and of the "bond" between himself and this cemetery, he had finally chosen to stay here and become the cemetery's new warden.

He would continue to cast his gaze over Frostholm from here, tending and watching over this city-state, just as he did in Pland.

The hot tea in his hand had already cooled.

Duncan set the teacup on the low table beside him, then stood up and quietly looked around the small room. The simple, plain furnishings came into view, as if they still held traces of the former owner.

On the wall by the door, an old hunting rifle hung quietly from an iron hook. It looked very worn, yet the bolt still shone, reflecting the firelight from the nearby stove.

Duncan looked at the old rifle for a moment, nodded slightly, and pushed the door open to step out of the house.

Lively, cheerful music came from some street outside the cemetery, mixed with the sound of fireworks being set off.

Annie slipped out of the door behind him. Listening to the commotion on the distant streets, she happily tugged at Duncan's coat: "The new governor's motorcade is about to pass through the cemetery ring!"

“Many people are still afraid of the new governor,” Duncan lowered his head, a smile at the corner of his eyes. “You don’t look scared at all.”

“I’m not afraid. Mother said the new governor is a hero who protects the city-state,” Annie lifted her face and squinted in the sunlight. “He’s very amazing, just like Dad.”

Duncan thought for a moment, then reached out and gently pressed down on the girl’s furry hat.

“Yes. He will be an excellent governor.”

…

Out on the Boundless Sea, Duncan crossed the aft deck and returned to the captain’s cabin.

Goathead was carefully holding the wheel. On the chart table, the thick mist floating across the surface of the large enchanted sea chart was slowly shifting and fading.

Duncan stood before the enchanted sea chart for a while, his gaze sweeping over the route near Frostholm that was gradually becoming clear. Then he stepped over to a corner of the room.

The Oval Scrying Mirror with its old, elegant frame still hung quietly on the wall of the captain’s cabin. It reflected the scene in the room, but for some reason, under the crossing sunlight and shadows, that reflection looked faint and hazy.

Duncan stepped forward, curled his finger, and lightly tapped the edge of the mirror.

In the next second, the surface of the seemingly ordinary mirror rippled with layer upon layer of hazy light, as if countless mists and motes of dust were rising from the world inside the glass. Then, within that blur of light, a figure appeared.

Agatha—the Gatekeeper in the mirror—appeared before Duncan.

“Good day, Captain,” Agatha’s slightly magnetic voice came from the mirror. “I’m glad to see you.”

Duncan nodded and asked casually: “How do you feel? Are you getting used to it?”

“I feel… pretty good,” Agatha said slowly. “When I first ‘transferred’ onto the ship, the vast, empty world inside the mirrors made me a little nervous. But as I’ve grown used to it, that empty darkness has slowly faded… I also tried talking with Lady Martha. She taught me many skills and bits of knowledge about being a mirror world. They were all very useful.”

Hearing this, Duncan raised his eyebrows: “Oh? You can contact Martha directly from here?”

“The Black Oak is drifting in the reflections of the nearby sea. In the world of the mirror worlds, she and I are ‘neighbors’,” Agatha said with a smile. “It’s a very strange experience—the world inside the mirrors is not continuous, yet everything is connected. I can jump from one mirror to another, appear in many mirrors at the same time, or hide in the vast emptiness behind the glass… It may take many, many years before I fully understand it all.”

Duncan listened with great interest as this mirror world described those mirror laws that lay far beyond ordinary understanding. When she finished, he nodded lightly: “It sounds like you’re enjoying it. That’s good.”

Agatha paused, then sighed softly: “…Yes. It’s better than I imagined.”

The captain’s cabin fell silent for a while. After an unknown time, Duncan suddenly broke the silence: “I want to know what made you decide to leave Frostholm and set out on a journey with the Vanished. This will be the longest voyage of your life. This ship may go to many places—distant city-states, sealed secret realms, the Spirit Realm, the Abyssal Deep, even Subspace…"

Agatha in the mirror fell into thought. She considered the question very seriously. After several minutes, she spoke slowly: "I think it was when 'we' descended together into that dark Deep Sea."

Duncan did not speak. He just watched the person in the mirror, waiting for her to go on.

Her voice came again from the mirror—

"I have all of Agatha's memories and feelings. In those memories, I was born in Frostholm. I grew up with my family and friends. I studied and trained and faced the Church's trials. There were those streets, those old clock towers, all those things that were worn and run-down yet still so familiar. All of it is in my mind, clear and deep, as if… I had lived it myself.

"But we both know that up until the day the mirror world invaded, the part of that life that truly belonged to 'me' was only three days long.

"So when my mind returned, when I came back to this world again in the form of a mirror world, I kept asking myself one question—am I Gatekeeper Agatha, or am I just a 'person' who inherited someone else's memories and was born into this world again?"

She stopped. As a mirror world, her eyes were bright, and right now those eyes were fixed on the captain outside the mirror with a serious gaze.

"You were right. A 'person' cannot live forever as someone else's shadow.

"Almost all the memories of my life came from another person. But even so, there are three days in those memories that belong to me alone.

“But if I stayed in Frostholm, those three days of ‘life’ would sooner or later be buried under the larger, deeper memories. I can’t cut off my connection to that city, and I cannot avoid my human weaknesses as a Mortal. I would be doomed to be a shadow—a shadow full of regret, trapped in memories. And as time went on… that regret would sooner or later turn into resentment and hatred.

“I can’t accept that possibility.

“But during that ‘Deep Dive’ I took with you, something you said to me… showed me a new possibility.”

Chapter 501: Before Leaving, One Last… What the Hell?

For Agatha, the “replica” born from the mirror world, her life was split into two clearly divided parts—

One part was warm, bright, and full, filled with all her love, hate, and attachment to this world, yet in essence it was just a lie that had been fabricated and fed into her mind.

The other part lasted only three short days, filled with pressure, exhaustion, pain, and finally a death that felt like release—yet that was the only memory that truly belonged to her.

And now, after going to the dead and then returning to the living world, the replica had a chance to keep moving forward. The problem before her was this: the first life was something she longed for, but she could never truly have it. After long years, all its regrets would turn into anger. The second life was real but thin, and such a pale, brief existence was not enough for her to live as a complete “person”.

Before this hard choice arrived, Captain Duncan had given her a warning. After thinking for a long time, she reached one conclusion: she had to leave Frostholm.

The dark, icy Deep Sea was terrifying. Yet the act of “diving down” itself let her discover for the first time that “life” could have another path, just as the captain had described to her inside the Submersible—

“We grope our way forward in endless darkness. Civilization itself is only a small, delicate, fragile skiff. Its lights shine on the water around it, and with our shallow Mortal wisdom we try to understand the shapes that appear in the dark and guess what the world looks like…

“Most people spend their whole lives curled up in the safe corner of the skiff. But someone has to stand at the bow and hold the lamp, someone has to look toward the distance. It is a road that must always move forward, because ‘the unknown’ is a one-way idea. So… maybe I can try it.”

Agatha in the mirror spoke calmly. At some point, the black clothes that marked her as a Gatekeeper had quietly changed into an outfit more like that of an adventurer at sea—a little like Martha’s style, but still bearing a few traces of the Church of Death. She raised a hand and took off the hat that marked her as clergy, letting her long hair fall freely, and the bandages wrapped around her body slowly faded away.

She lifted her head and gave Duncan a slight smile.

“A replica has no real past, but I can have a real future. Let those precious memories lie quietly in the past. That way, when I look back on them in the years to come, they will still be bright and warm, instead of stained by human weakness.

“Lady Martha helped me design these clothes. What do you think?”

Duncan looked at Agatha in the mirror for a long time, then nodded seriously: “They suit you very well.”

“Do you think I should change my name?” Agatha asked again. “If I plan to walk a completely new path from now on, should I start by changing my name too?”

This time Duncan stayed silent for a long while. After thinking for a long time, he still shook his head: “No need. I think it’s good for you to remain

Agatha.”

“Why?”

“Because I’m used to calling you that. Changing it would be inconvenient,” Duncan answered offhand. “I can tell you ‘two’ apart anyway, and you can tell each other apart too.”

Agatha in the mirror gave Duncan a long look. “…That doesn’t sound like your real answer, but it’s enough to convince me. I happen to like this name too—let’s treat it as the last bit of remembrance I leave for my ‘past’.”

Duncan nodded: “Mm. I’m glad you think that way.”

“Have you already settled everything in the city-state?” Agatha asked again. “Do you really plan to be a ‘cemetery warden’ in Frostholm from now on?”

Duncan raised his eyebrows: “What’s wrong with that position?”

“There’s nothing bad about it… It’s just that when I think about ‘Captain Duncan’, who in many people’s eyes is like the shadows of Subspace, acting as the warden of a cemetery inside the city-state, it feels very strange,” Agatha said frankly. “But as long as you’re willing, it’s of course a good thing—there probably won’t be any place safer than that cemetery from now on.”

“I think it’s great. I still run an antique shop in Pland. Keeping some activity in civilized society is good for my state of mind,” Duncan said with a smile. “Besides, keeping an avatar form living in a city-state costs money. Working as a warden in the cemetery at least gives me an inco—”

Duncan suddenly stopped.

He slowly lifted his head and looked at the “Gatekeeper” in the mirror. In a very serious tone, he asked: “Will the Cathedral pay this ‘new warden’ a salary?”

Only then did Agatha react: “You still need a salary?!”

“You don’t pay salaries?!”

“Ah, under normal circumstances of course we do. The cemetery warden’s pay is sent directly by the Cathedral…” Agatha said, her expression growing strange. “But a shadow from Subspace running off to be a warden in a cemetery is not a normal circumstance. I strongly suggest you go to the Cathedral and talk seriously about this with the other Agatha. Based on what I know about ‘myself’, if you don’t bring it up, she absolutely won’t think of it—or rather, she wouldn’t dare to.”

Duncan said: “…Is it really that absurd?”

“The string of numbers you wrote at the end of your denunciation letter almost drove a room full of cryptographers and mathematicians mad. Later, when the Cathedral transferred money to your bank account, they even set up a special covert team just to monitor changes in the Spirit Realm. When you deal with ordinary people as a ‘shadow from Subspace’, please think about the worldview of most normal humans.”

Duncan’s mouth twitched. He rubbed his forehead. “…All right. I understand.”

Agatha seemed to breathe a little easier, then asked curiously: “Now that the situation in Frostholm is settled, what are your plans next?”

“I plan to return to the Central Seas. Using some archaeological notes Morris gave me, I’ll follow the routes and visit those ancient ruins and strange sea regions that interest me. If possible, I want to approach, or even enter, some areas that are listed as ‘Visions’, to explore and learn as much about this world as I can,” Duncan clearly had long since made his plans, and he spoke of his journey with great enthusiasm. “Along the way I’ll keep in touch with the civilized world, and see how the major Churches react to my ‘warning’. If they’re interested, I don’t mind dealing with those mysterious Cathedral ark-ships again…”

“It sounds like an adventure worth longing for,” Agatha said, her tone full of joy and expectation. “It will be full of danger, but worth the trip. It seems my decision was right… Are we setting sail now, or do we need more preparation?”

“No hurry. We have to settle matters with the White Oak first, and I also need to let Tyrian know,” Duncan said with a laugh. “By now he should be back in his domed office. I’ll just go and ‘say hello’ to him.”

“Understood. Then I won’t disturb you.” Agatha lowered her head, and her figure slowly faded from the mirror.

At the same time, in the domed office of Frostholm’s Government Hall, Tyrian had already sent off the last department representative. He had taken off the gorgeous but uncomfortable coat he wore for ritual occasions, changed back into his everyday clothes, and sat behind his desk, letting out a small sigh of relief.

Next, he would have a short break—to prepare for the rest of the day’s work.

Running a city was far harder than commanding a fleet, especially a city that was a mess in every corner. Even on his swearing-in day, he had no chance to stop working. This morning’s ceremony had been “forced” into his normal schedule, and he would have to catch up with everything he missed in the afternoon and evening.

Besides, Frostholm’s affairs were far from the only thing he had to handle.

The vast “enterprises” that the Sea Mist Fleet had built over the past fifty years, his own complex and delicate ties with other city-states, the balance of power in the Frost Sea, and his relationship with the “Family”… put together, these tasks were no easier than the job of governor.

Tyrian let out a long sigh, opened a locked drawer beside his desk, and took out a stack of files and documents—archives related to the Sea Mist Fleet, shared information from the Radiant Star, and private letters from other city-states.

In other words, his “break” meant he could put aside his duties as governor for a while, so he could work on another pile of tasks just as hard as being governor.

Tyrian glanced over the pile and couldn’t help raising a hand to scratch his hair.

For some reason, First Mate Aiden’s smooth bald head suddenly appeared in his mind.

The dreadful thought that came with that image sent a chill through the new governor, and he quickly stopped scratching his hair.

“Aiden shaved his head himself back then. Aiden shaved it himself… He’s regretted it for a whole century already…”

Tyrian muttered under his breath, as if trying to shift the pressure he felt facing the pile before him. Just then, a faint crackling sound suddenly came from nearby, cutting off his muttering.

His heart jolted without thinking, but he quickly calmed down again and looked up calmly at the mirror on the nearby wall.

He was used to this…

Duncan’s figure appeared in the glass.

“Son, I came to say hello—did everything go smoothly?”

“Everything went smoothly, Father,” Tyrian stood up, carefully meeting his father’s gaze, though he already felt much more relaxed than usual. “Do you have any instructions for me?”

“Nothing much. I’m just getting ready to lea—”

Duncan suddenly stopped.

Tyrian looked at his father in the mirror in confusion, only to see that Duncan was staring fixedly at… the desk beside him, with an especially strange expression.

There was even a hint of shock on his face.

The shock in that expression made Tyrian’s heart tighten. He hurriedly followed his father’s gaze, only to see a single sheet of paper that had slipped from the pile of documents. It was something Lucretia had sent him from the Radiant Star.

It was a piece of “shared academic material”.

Duncan’s unusually serious voice came from the mirror: “Tyrian, what is that? Bring it closer and let me see!”

“Ah… all right,” Tyrian answered in a rush. He quickly picked up the paper and walked to the mirror, holding the image on it up for his father. “Is there something wrong with it?”

“…Where did this pattern come from?”

“Lucretia sent it,” Tyrian answered at once, sounding a little nervous and guilty. “I didn’t mention it before, but she’s been studying something that fell from the sky lately…”

But Duncan did not speak. He just stared hard at the sheet of paper. After a long time, he finally broke the silence in a voice that sounded like talking in a dream: “…the Moon?”

Chapter 502: Heading South

A strange word he had never heard before reached his ears. Its mysterious, harsh sound did not even seem to belong to any language Tyrian knew.

He lowered his head in shock and glanced at the file, at the precise drawing of the stone sphere on it. After a long moment he finally looked up and asked: “Father, what did you just say? ‘The Moon’… is that the name of this thing? Do you know this mysterious sphere?!”

Duncan, however, seemed not to hear him. He still stared at the image on the paper, the image of the Moon that looked so familiar to him. Only after Tyrian repeated his question twice did Duncan suddenly come back to himself. He looked at Tyrian and quickly asked: “You just mentioned Lucretia. What exactly happened?”

“Um… this is information she sent from the Radiant Star,” Tyrian said after a pause. Father’s strange reaction made him uneasy, but under that oppressive, almost gaze he still poured out everything he knew: “Some time ago, a mysterious glowing object fell from the border region and happened to be found by Lucretia. She has been studying it all this time. This strange sphere is the ‘core’ of that fallen relic…”

Tyrian slowly told the whole story from beginning to end. He spoke of how the scholars in Lightwind Harbor had judged that the fallen relic came from Visions 001, and of all the progress they had made so far in their study of the stone sphere, as well as all the problems they had run into.

While he spoke, Duncan did not interrupt even once. Duncan only listened in a strange, heavy silence that made Tyrian feel even more pressure, as if he meant to carve every sentence deep into his mind and take every word apart, grind it down, and dissect it a thousand times over.

After more than ten minutes, the domed office fell quiet again.

Duncan stayed silent for a long time. At last, before the air itself seemed to grow solid, he let out a quiet breath and asked: “Why did you not tell me about this before?”

“…Lucretia wanted to wait until her research had made some progress before contacting you. And more importantly… at that time we were in the middle of the Frostholm crisis.”

After a while, Duncan felt his pounding heart slowly calm down. As he listened to Tyrian, he finally gave a small nod and asked: “This thing is in Lightwind Harbor now, is it not?”

“Uh… yes,” Tyrian said at once, nodding. His lips felt dry, and he watched Father’s expression with growing tension. After hesitating several times, he could not help asking again: “Do you know this mysterious sphere?”

“…It is called the Moon. At least, that is what it looks like. But the Moon I know does not have a diameter of ten meters, and it could never float on the sea and be dragged back to a city-state with steel cables by a ship,” Duncan said slowly. “Perhaps it is only some man-made object that copied its shape. Perhaps it is only something the ancient kingdom of Critt…”

He broke off halfway. The sense of deep contradiction and the tangled thoughts in his mind clashed so hard that none of his guesses could explain this matter. No matter what, one thing was beyond doubt: in the picture on the document in Tyrian’s hand, that was indeed the Moon. And no matter whether the stone sphere Lucretia had picked up at sea was the true Moon, or only an “artificial flying object” made by the ancient Critt kingdom to imitate the Moon, one question still remained:

Why would the image of the Moon he knew so well appear here? Why would it appear in this eerie, twisted “other world”?

Lost in his thoughts, he frowned and looked at Tyrian: “You said just now that the scholars in Lightwind Harbor have already confirmed that the mysterious glowing glowing orb fell off the rune ring of Visions 001?”

“Yes. They have already confirmed with their own eyes the shape of the gap on the Sun’s rune ring,” Tyrian said. Then another question came to him, and he added: “You said it is called ‘the Moon’… then what exactly is the Moon?”

“The Moon…” Duncan hesitated. He suddenly found that he did not have the right words to explain such a simple name to Tyrian. After thinking for a long time, he could only say: “…It is a planet.”

When Tyrian heard this, the confusion on his face only grew. He asked: “What is a planet?”

Duncan fell silent.

After a very long time, he finally heard Tyrian’s voice again: “Is this a forbidden question? Am I asking too much?”

“No, it is not forbidden. It… should be the simplest question of all, yet I have no way to explain it to you,” Duncan said with a slight shake of his head. He looked at the opposite side of the mirror with a complicated expression and said: “I am sorry, Tyrian. The answer to this question is simple, but helping you understand it is the hardest part.”

Tyrian froze a little.

He looked at Father in the mirror, his expression complicated and apologetic. For a moment, Tyrian suddenly felt that this scene had happened once, long, long ago, somewhere deep in a distant, hazy memory, on some faded afternoon…

On that day, he and Lucretia had stood for the last time on the deck of the Vanished and had asked their father, who had decided to cross the border, what exactly lay beyond the border.

Back then, Father's reaction had been exactly the same as now.

It was the look of someone who knew an extremely simple truth, yet did not know how to explain it to others.

Just then, Duncan's voice came suddenly from the mirror and cut off Tyrian's sinking memories: "I have changed my plan. Next, the Vanished will head for Lightwind Harbor."

It was within his expectations. The moment Father had reacted like that to the sphere called the Moon, Tyrian had known things would develop this way.

"I understand. I will explain the situation to Lucretia."

…

Nina looked worriedly at Duncan, who was standing at the far edge of the deck and gazing out at the sea. Alice walked past her, and Nina pulled her to a stop.

"Uncle Duncan, what is going on?" Nina asked in a low voice. "He has been staring into the distance this whole time. He looks like he has a lot on his mind…"

"I do not know," Alice said, glancing up at him and shaking her head in confusion. "He has been like that since he came out of the captain's cabin.

He said he had to think about some things…”

“Think about some things?” Nina blinked, puzzled. “Did something happen?”

Alice thought carefully for a moment, then nodded and said: “He contacted Tyrian, but I do not know what they talked about.”

“Mr. Tyrian?” Nina was stunned. Then her imagination began to run wild, and her expression slowly turned odd. She asked: “Is it because Mr. Tyrian still has not gotten married?”

Alice looked utterly lost and asked: “Huh? What do you mean?”

Nina thought for a moment, then began to explain very seriously: “I heard it from Mr. Morris. He often worries about Miss Heidi’s marriage. But Mr. Tyrian is even older than Miss Heidi. So by the same logic, the captain must be even more worried about this…”

Alice was completely taken in. She nodded in a daze and said: “So that is how it is!”

Just as she finished speaking, Duncan’s voice suddenly came from beside them: “That is enough, you two. Nina, you must not tease Alice like that. She will take it seriously.”

“Wah!” Nina jumped in fright. Only then did she notice that Uncle Duncan had somehow come up beside her. She quickly drew back her neck and stood up straight like a good girl.

Alice scratched her hair in confusion and looked at Nina with a puzzled face, asking: “Were you teasing me just now?”

“…In any case, do not take what she just said seriously,” Duncan said helplessly. Then his gaze fell on Nina. “Do not worry. Nothing bad has happened.”

Nina stuck out her tongue, but soon her face turned worried again. She asked: “Uncle Duncan, what exactly happened? You rarely look so troubled…”

For a moment Duncan did not know how to answer this young lady’s question. What appeared in his mind was still that drawing he had seen in Tyrian’s office and the strange thing Lucretia had “picked up” at sea.

The Moon…

He raised his hand and rubbed his aching brow. But in the next second, his movement stopped, and he turned instead to stare fixedly at the girl in front of him.

Nina stood there obediently, a slightly worried look on her face.

Duncan looked at her, at this quiet, gentle, well-behaved little solar prominence. Beneath that shell of a human maiden, he seemed to see directly the bright arc left behind after a star shattered, and the blazing plasma flow that had once erupted in the void of space…

The little solar prominence tilted her head, reached out, and gently touched Duncan’s tightly furrowed brow, as if she wanted to smooth out those deep lines. She asked: “Uncle Duncan, are you really all right?”

Duncan did not speak. He only took Nina’s hand and pressed it to his forehead, then slowly let out a breath.

Once again he understood a few more things. Behind the heavy Veil, this world had once more shown him a corner of the “truth”. Yet this small piece of truth was something he could not share with anyone.

“Do not worry, Nina. Everything is fine,” he said slowly, gradually returning to his usual self. “I have run into some hard questions, but right now it is hard to explain them to you. When I solve them, I will explain everything to you properly.”

Nina listened in a daze, then nodded hard and said: “Mm.”

“Good. Then go back to the cabin first. It is time for us to set out. But before we depart, we need to detour to the Sea Mist Fleet’s base. We have to take something along for Tyrian…”

…

In the domed office of the governor of the Frostholm city-state.

With a faint humming sound, the scrying crystal slowly lit up. In its dim light, the figure of the Sea Witch gradually became clear.

“Brother?” Lucretia looked over with curiosity. “Are you done with everything over there? Did it all go well?”

“If you mean the appointment ritual, it ended this morning. Everything went well,” Tyrian said. His expression gradually turned complicated. “But I am contacting you for something else.”

Lucretia frowned and asked: “Something else?”

“Two things,” Tyrian said after a short hesitation, choosing his words carefully. “First, I have prepared the Spirit Realm lens you wanted. I used legal city channels to get you the best and most precise lens array device available at the moment.”

In the scrying crystal, Lucretia’s face lit up with joy at once. She said: “Ah, that is wonderful! Brother, you really are reliable! And what is the second thing?”

“…The second thing. Guess who is going to deliver the lens to you?”

“One of your transport ships?”

Tyrian did not answer.

Lucretia’s expression slowly changed. She said: “…It is one of your transport ships, right?”

Tyrian still did not answer.

Lucretia finally reacted.

“…Dad?”

“Yes.”

Chapter 503: The Day We Go Home

Lawrence stepped onto the bridge. First Mate Gus came up at once to meet him. Many crew members stood behind the first mate, looking at their captain with a hint of expectation.

Lawrence's gaze swept over these subordinates and friends who had followed him for so many years. After a long moment, he took a gentle breath and smiled: "We can go home. We set out now."

The First Mate's expression visibly relaxed, but he still could not help asking: "Then… what about the Vanished?"

"The Vanished will be taking another journey," Lawrence said with a slight nod, speaking to everyone. "Captain Duncan will head south to do something more important. He has ordered the White Oak to return to the normal routes of the civilized world according to our original sailing plan. According to that plan, we will first go to Cold Harbor for supplies and to fill our purchase orders, and then we will return to Pland."

"And after that?" First Mate Gus listened to the captain's words, but he still wore an uneasy expression. Clearly, just like everyone else on the ship, this Frostholm journey had been too unexpected and too long for him. Now that news of going home had come, he still could not believe that everything would simply go back to the way it used to be. "We…"

"We will still make our living on this sea. The White Oak has already gained passage rights, and the routes of the civilized world will stay open to us. The only change is that, from now on, Captain Duncan will forever keep his gaze upon all of us," Lawrence said calmly. "When the Vanished sends an order, as a part of that fleet we will answer. But at least not now. Sailors, for now we can go home."

The bridge stayed quiet for more than ten seconds. Then someone finally began to clap. Gradually, more people joined in, and after that came a cheer that had been delayed for a very long time.

The news that they could go home spread across the whole ship in an instant and reached the ears of every sailor.

This long, unexpected journey had finally come to an end. This frightening and bizarre adventure would be carved deep into the memory of every person. The joy of going home washed away many worries about the future. A new Boiling Gold catalyst was fed into the steam core. The machinery bay began to roar. The whistle echoed over the boundless sea, as if the whole ship itself was cheering for the homeward voyage to come.

Lawrence walked to the edge of the foredeck and quietly gazed at the distant, rolling sea. The endless water had no clear point of reference and could almost give a person the illusion that the ship was still standing still. But the way the waves rose and fell and the sea wind blowing against his face told him that the White Oak had already set out.

He lowered his head and looked down past the side of the ship. Under the rolling surface of the sea, he saw the shadow of the Black Oak reflected like a dark cloud. At the bow of that ship, shrouded in darkness, the few sparse lights looked faint and hazy.

Martha's voice came from the pocket mirror at his chest: "Everyone is very happy. It seems that once the day of going home comes, their familiar life will return as well. But you should remind them that not everything will go back to the way it was. We have established a link with the Vanished. No matter how much freedom that Captain Duncan has given us, this link with Subspace is bound to change many things… We should prepare for this curse and blessing.”

Lawrence was silent for a moment, then spoke softly: “You mean changes like those on the Radiant Star or the Sea Mist?”

“They will no longer grow old and die, but they will slowly drift away from the realm of the living. This ship will slowly undergo a transformation into a living thing. Some of its parts will suddenly seem to learn to think and will begin to move on their own. The very existence of the Black Oak, that ‘strange reflection’, will cause the White Oak to gradually gather all kinds of frightening and horrifying rumors and tales. Very soon, people will fear this newly born ‘ship of the curse’. And the passes issued by the Church will not solve that kind of problem…”

Martha spoke slowly and calmly. It sounded less like she was predicting Lawrence’s future and more like she was describing a past that had already happened. In her vast and tangled cluster of memories, she was tracing out the fate that the White Oak would surely face next.

But Lawrence only listened quietly. Only when Martha fell silent did he speak in a low voice: “Perhaps your prediction is right, and all those changes will slowly come. But at least not today. Today is the youngsters’ day to go home.

“They will return to the warm city of Pland before the year ends. They will embrace their family and friends and tell them about this incredible adventure as humans. And I will do everything I can to keep the White Oak active on all the busy routes, to make contact with the Church, with the Explorer Association, and with the city-state trade fleets. It is not only to carry out Captain Duncan’s orders, but also to make this ship a respected symbol before it becomes a thing of fear, a ship of the curse.”

The pocket mirror gave no reply.

But Lawrence felt a small gust of wind rise at his side. In a sudden patch of thin mist, a hazy shadow stepped out of the fog and gently embraced him from behind.

The touch was so faint and light it felt like a dream.

“Old man…”

“What is it?”

“So handsome I could die!”

…

Heavy, lead-like clouds of chaos covered the sky. Murky, dim light took the place of the bright, warm sunlight from before. A hazy mist spread over all the sea that the eye could see. On the surface of the water under that mist, black strands of shadow, as fine as hair, were quickly gathering, until at last they turned the whole sea into a field of pitch black.

The world became a strange illusion without color. On this black sea, the Vanished raised her spirit form sails. An invisible “wind” filled the canvas and drove the ship forward, letting it cut across the sea at a speed far beyond anything in the Mortal Realm.

On the platform at the stern of the Vanished, Duncan held the wheel himself. Goathead’s voice sounded in his mind: “We have safely sunk into the Spirit Realm. The Vanished is now sailing steadily in the Shallow Layer.”

Duncan grunted in reply, then turned his head and nodded to Nina, who was standing not far away and watching him steer with curiosity: “We have already sunk safely into the Spirit Realm.”

Nina nodded half in understanding and half in confusion. To her, steering a ship, and especially a sailing ship from a century ago, was something completely beyond her.

On the other side, Vanna could not help covering her forehead when she heard Duncan's words: "Uh, no matter how many times I hear it, it still feels wrong to put the words 'safe' and 'Spirit Realm' together. I still cannot believe that 'safely sinking into the Spirit Realm' is a phrase that can really exist in this world…"

Duncan only laughed when he heard this: "It takes some skill. But in Spirit Realm mode, we can sail at very high speed and do not need to worry about hitting most of the obstacles that exist in the Mortal Realm. After all, it is a very long journey from Frostholm to Lightwind Harbor."

"Lightwind Harbor… I have only seen that place in books," Nina said, her eyes shining with a little longing. "The books say it is a city-state built by elves and also one of the most important 'parishes' of the Truth Academy, second only to Morka. I heard they have the most advanced Sorting Engines and steam cores in the world there. Their mechanical craft and mathematics are very developed…"

"What the books say is true. But books often leave out one point: Lightwind Harbor is ahead not only in technology. It is also one of the important bases of the Explorer Association," Morris said to Nina with a smile. "Because the whole city-state lies close to the edge of civilization, countless pioneering fleets and explorers use Lightwind Harbor as a supply point and a hub for exchanging information. And those explorers, coming and going from all over the civilized world, bring all kinds of food with them. So Lightwind Harbor has also earned the name of a city of gourmet food…"

Nina listened with full curiosity and a thirst for knowledge to all this information that she could not find in books. At the end, her eyes suddenly lit up and she asked: “Do they have sweet pancakes there too?”

“They should,” Morris said after thinking for a moment and nodding. “Commerce in Pland is very developed. Many merchants have opened routes from the Central Seas to the south. The foods of Pland will naturally spread there as well.”

Nina brightened up. She climbed onto a large wooden barrel next to Duncan, sat on it, and began to swing her legs over the edge: “That is great… Good food and the most cutting-edge machines. I am starting to look forward to it…”

Duncan glanced at Nina, who was rocking on the barrel, then at the deck around it. A few ropes on the open deck between the wheel and the barrel were trembling slightly, looking both troubled and humble.

Clearly, these ropes thought that this “crew member” Nina was far too close to the wheel at the moment. But they also feared the light of the Sun.

After all, that was a six-thousand-degree giant fireball.

“Stop rocking on that barrel, or you will fall,” Duncan said to Nina with a shake of his head. “Also, do not stay so close to the wheel. It is not safe.”

Nina reacted at once, let out a quick “Oh”, jumped down to the deck, and backed away to a safe distance.

The ropes near the wheel relaxed. They were safe now.

Nina was quiet for only a short while before another thought suddenly came to her.

“When we get there, we are going to meet that Lady Lucretia, right?” She leaned against the rail at the edge of the helm platform and blinked at Duncan, her tone a little nervous. “Is she easy to get along with?”

“…She should be fine,” Duncan said, his expression a bit hard to describe. When he tried to look at this question from Nina’s point of view, that feeling only grew stronger. “Lucretia is a scholar who is obsessed with research. Other than that, she does not seem hard to talk to. She has always been like that in front of me. But I truly do not know what she is like in her daily life.”

“To be honest, I am a little nervous,” Nina said, sticking out her tongue. “I heard people call her the ‘Sea Witch’. Captain Lawrence said she is a cold and bad-tempered witch and that she will curse people who disturb her research. Many famous adventurers are very afraid of her…”

Duncan held the wheel with one hand and turned his head to glance at Nina.

“Tyrian is also a Pirate Lord who makes people tremble at the sound of his name. Do you not think he is quite polite when he is in front of you?”

“…That is true.”

Chapter 504: Unstable Tendency

Most of the time, Nina did not really understand how powerful she was, or how much her power scared ordinary supernatural people. This did help her keep the mindset that she still belonged to humans, but it also definitely had bad effects.

After all, no matter where you slapped down a six-thousand-degree “pancake”, it would always be an earth-shattering event.

Fortunately, Duncan had paid attention to this problem from the very beginning. He often gave Nina mental guidance and reminders. He helped this young lady understand the danger of her own power, and he found ways to help her take hold of the might of the Sun step by step. At the very least, Nina had now slowly grown used to and accepted one fact:

For the Nina of today, this world was a delicate yet fragile paper house. If she was not careful, it would burst into raging flames. She had to control her breathing and her gaze with great care, so that everything would not turn to ash.

Now, it seemed that Nina’s understanding and control of her power had been successful. Except for a few extremely rare and not very harmful runaway state incidents, she had never burned anything by mistake. On the other hand, she still kept her “understanding” of herself as an ordinary person. Even after realizing how strong she was, her mindset had not turned arrogant or dangerous.

In Duncan’s view, this was very good.

The pitch-black sea slowly rose and fell in his sight. There was no clear line between the chaotic sky and the water. The ghost fire that surrounded the Vanished lit up the nearby waves. In the shifting light and shadow, strange and suspicious shapes sometimes flashed through the air or the sea and vanished again—

They were the “natives” of the Spirit Realm. These dim, chaotic beings were drawn to the intruder that was the Vanished. But whenever they gathered even a little, the spirit form flames burned them, and they scattered and fled in all directions.

Nina ran to the edge of the aft deck. She sat directly on the deck, letting her legs dangle and swing outside the railing, and watched this “sea” that looked strange and interesting in her eyes with great curiosity.

Duncan reminded Nina to be careful and not fall off the deck. Then he turned his attention back to the helm. After a while, a question suddenly came to his mind.

He turned his head and called: “Vanna.”

He glanced at Vanna, the Inquisitor, who was standing at the edge of the raised platform, looking out over the sea. “I suddenly have a question,” he said, “about the storm Goddess.”

Vanna turned at once, her face serious: “Please, ask.”

“The storm Goddess Gamona is the guardian of the sea, right?” Duncan said. “The entire Boundless Sea is under her protection. Then what about the sea of the Spirit Realm?”

The serious look on Vanna’s face instantly turned into shock. Then came more than ten seconds of awkwardness and deep thought. After a long time, she hesitated and shook her head, and spoke with some guilt: “I am sorry. I have never thought about that question…”

After she spoke, she began to reflect on herself: “It seems my study of the path of faith is still too shallow. I spend all day in prayer, yet I never really think about the details behind the scriptures…”

“It is normal that the scriptures do not mention such details,” Morris said casually from the side. “From the founding of the Deep Sea Church until now, there has simply never been a case of mortals moving freely deep inside the Spirit Realm. Doctrine is a tool used to explain the gods’ Truth to mortals. It only represents the known parts of that Truth, not all of it…”

“Then where did the very first ‘doctrines’ come from?” Duncan asked again. “In the early days when the city-states were first built and the faith in the Four Gods had just appeared, who wrote the first doctrine and used it to explain how the world worked? Was it the first mortal preachers, or those four deities themselves?”

This time, Morris fell into thought.

Duncan went on: “According to how the Four Gods Church now explains the scriptures, doctrine can only come from the gods, right?”

“Yes…” Morris nodded. He seemed to have quickly ordered his thoughts and answered Duncan’s question. “Doctrine is a partial expression of the Truth. Its source lies with the gods. According to the more accepted view, the earliest prophets of the Critt dynasty received ‘enlightenment’ from the gods. The gods’ thoughts entered their minds, and they naturally wrote down the first teachings during their awakening.

“After that came several hundred years of the ‘Age of Truth’s Self-revelation’ and the ‘Age of Recorded revelations’. Generation after generation of prophets received enlightenment and wrote down what they learned. In the end, this formed the current doctrines and scriptures of the Four Gods…”

Duncan did not speak for a while. He only thought very seriously. After a long time, he broke the silence again: “Do such enlightened prophets, who can now write new doctrine and Truth, still appear?”

Morris and Vanna looked at each other.

“As far as I know, no,” Morris said, shaking his head. “Saints can use the Listening rite to hear the gods’ voices, but it is usually only vague hints or warnings. As for those ‘prophets’ in the histories who could talk with God at length… there has not been one since the end of the Dark Age.

“As for the cultists who follow the Black Sun or the Abyssal Lord, they often claim prophets appear among them. But as you know, the ‘prophets’ in their mouths are usually just madmen whose minds have been corrupted…”

“So that means that at least in the period from the Critt dynasty to the Dark Age, the gods could often contact the mortal world,” Duncan said thoughtfully. “They could even hold long conversations with certain mortals who met the conditions. But starting from the Age of City-States, their contact with the mortal world has sunk down to nothing more than vague hints?”

Hearing the captain’s words, which sounded full of hidden meaning, Vanna’s expression grew a bit strange. She could not help asking: “I… have never thought about it from that angle. Why are you suddenly asking about this?”

[Why am I suddenly asking about this…]

Duncan stayed silent for a moment, and in that silence, what rose in his mind was the picture he had seen not long ago in Tyrian’s office—

The Moon.

In the world he knew that had a Moon, there were no Four Gods. There was no Boundless Sea under the protection of the storm Goddess. There was no World's Wound hanging high in the sky, and no Starry Sky and demons hidden in the Deep Sea beneath the Abyssal Deep.

Ever since he saw that picture of the Moon, his heart had not been at peace. Countless guesses about this world almost filled his entire mind.

"I just suddenly became interested in the oldest secrets of this world," he said slowly. Then he let out a soft breath and nodded to Vanna and Morris. "I have already seen the warning you prepared for the Deep Sea Church and the Truth Academy. There is no problem with it. Go and contact your Church headquarters at sea."

Although they still had doubts in their hearts, and still felt some worry over the captain's heavy mood during these past two days, Morris and Vanna did not ask more. They lowered their heads at the same time: "Yes, Captain."

…

Lucretia woke from a series of chaotic, strange, and terrifying nightmares.

She looked toward the window.

The thick curtains blocked the light from outside. Only a little golden glow slipped through the gaps in the fabric, falling into the room and making everything look shadowy. The familiar furniture took on a faintly eerie air in the dim corners, as if the remains of the nightmare had seeped into the Mortal Realm and now crouched and hid between the light and shadow.

A soft rustling sound came from beside her.

"Mistress?"

The oddly shaped and creepy stuffed rabbit sat up next to her. It tilted its head and looked at Lucretia with the button eyes sewn onto its face. A young girl’s voice came from its cotton-filled body.

Lucretia reached out and grabbed the stuffed rabbit doll, pulled it into her arms, and rubbed it hard. Then she raised her head and looked toward the window: “What time is it now?”

“There is still an hour before your usual waking time,” the stuffed rabbit doll answered honestly, letting its Mistress knead and squeeze it while it seemed to study Lucretia’s face. “You do not look very well. You were sleeping very restlessly just now… Did you have a nightmare again?”

“I dreamed about some strange things…” Lucretia rubbed her forehead and let go of the stuffed rabbit doll. “Pour me a drink.”

“All right.” The doll answered obediently. It hopped off the bed, jumped down to the floor, and took a wineglass from the small cabinet nearby. It poured half a glass for its Mistress. At the same time, it asked curiously: “What did you dream about? Is it because… the Old Master is coming, so you feel uneasy?”

The young girl’s voice carried a hint of nervousness. It was clear that just saying the words “Old Master” put it under great pressure.

Lucretia took the glass from the doll and drained it in one go. Then she let out a long breath: “I dreamed of the time when the Radiant Star almost ‘fell’ because it sailed too close to the border fog. But it was different from my real memory. In the dream, our ship fell out of the fog and then kept flying upward, ‘falling’ straight toward the World’s Wound.

“And there were many, many other ships, twisted into all sorts of shapes, falling from the whole world up into the sky… It was absurd and strange.”

As she spoke, she tossed the glass back to the stuffed rabbit doll beside her: “He is about to arrive. Of course that makes me a little nervous. But I am not so nervous that I will start having nightmares because of it—Rabby, he is still my Father."

"Yes, Mistress." The stuffed rabbit doll bowed its head at once, very obedient. Then it could not help but remind her: "But you still should be careful. Having nightmares on a ship is not a good sign. The Old Master… is linked to Subspace, after all. And right now, he is drawing closer to you."

"I understand." Lucretia spoke casually. Then she got out of bed, walked barefoot to the window, and yanked open the heavy curtains.

Warm and bright "sunlight" instantly flooded the room.

The Sun had not fully risen yet. However, over the nearby sea, that huge floating glowing geometric body had already kept the entire waters in "eternal day" for a long time.

Lucretia narrowed her eyes and bathed in that endless "sunlight".

The voice of the stuffed rabbit doll sounded from behind her: "Mistress, are you still going to the 'stone sphere' today?"

"No." Lucretia shook her head and turned to walk toward the dressing table. "Today I am going into the city to say hello to some old friends in the Explorer Association."

Chapter 505: Doomsday Echo

Lightwind Harbor was one of the city-states closest to the edge of civilization. From the day it was built, it had always been one of the most important bases of the Truth Academy and the Explorer Association.

A thousand years ago, an expedition fleet led by an elven scholar lost its way in a storm near the border. While searching for a route, they discovered this large island that did not appear in any record.

According to the accounts, the fleet had been chased by the storm for a full seven days. On the morning of the eighth day, when everyone was exhausted, land suddenly appeared in the sunlight shining through a gap in the storm. The explorers were overjoyed. They used the last of their strength to steer their ships toward the shore.

Just as they neared this unknown island, the storm’s power suddenly weakened. By the time the crew could clearly see the lush vegetation on the island, the storm had completely vanished. Only a light breeze remained over the nearby sea.

So the explorers named the island “Lightwind”. Later, they turned that into the name of their new colony.

Many city-states were discovered when explorers wandered the seas. Their discoveries always came with some amount of dangers or legends. The stories were full of truth and lies, hard to tell apart. But the discovery and building of Lightwind Harbor had always been seen as “detailed and reliable”.

The reason was simple: it was a city-state founded by elves.

The explorer captain who first found this island was still the governor of the city-state today. At the same time, he also served as the guildmaster of the Explorer Association.

Sara Mell stood on the balcony of the governor’s residence and looked at the streets below, which were bathed in “sunlight”. He looked at the city-state that he and his companions had built up bit by bit and watched it grow prosperous.

Patrolling Steam Walkers marched in neat lines down the streets. Bicycle bells rang with a clear sound. citizens were getting ready to start their workday.

On the “tower” not far away, the round dome in elven style slowly opened under the push of machinery. A heavy filter lens array rose from the top of the tower and slowly adjusted its angle as it tracked the Sun climbing into the sky.

The elven governor narrowed his eyes a little. Wrinkles gathered at the corners of his eyes.

Even for the long-lived elves, Sara Mell was no longer young. Wrinkles had started creeping across his forehead three hundred years ago. The golden hair that elves were known for was now frosted with white. He had gone from a lively, energetic captain to a calm but frail old man.

But one thing had never changed—he was still full of curiosity about the world.

“Your Father was already a respectable explorer back in his day. Even by the strict standards of the elves, he could be called ‘extraordinary’. A warning from such an explorer to the civilized world is worth taking seriously. But I hope you understand—our doubts are also quite normal.”

Sara Mell turned and spoke to the black-haired lady sitting properly at the tea table on the balcony.

“I do understand. But my job is only to pass on the message. What you do with it is your business,” Lucretia said calmly. “Father also expected your reaction. His stance is the same—issue the warning, and leave the rest alone.”

“As for the Explorer Association, I will handle it,” Governor Sara said after a short pause. “In any case, the news from Captain Duncan is information that must be taken seriously. We should have the captains on the route raise their guard.”

Then he frowned. “But I am truly curious… Can you really dive into the Deep Sea with a spherical submersible and see the ‘original blueprint’ of our world?”

“The risk is very high, but people in Frostholm did succeed,” Lucretia nodded. “Of course, the pioneers half a century ago paid a heavy price for it. Mortal minds are too fragile in the end. They cannot fully avoid the influence of those ‘truths’ in the Deep Sea.

“My Father is… more or less special. I do not suggest you try to copy him.”

“If I were seven or eight hundred years younger, I would probably be planning my own dive right now,” Sara said after a few seconds of silence, shaking his head with some regret. “If I could witness those sights with my own eyes, I would have much more confidence when I tried to convince others in the Association.”

Lucretia smiled: “It does not matter. Very soon, more people will receive the warning. Father has already arranged to send alerts to the Churches of the Four Gods and to the various city-states. That should be enough to show how serious this is.”

Sara Mell nodded. Then he hesitated for a moment but could not stop himself from asking: “I am still very curious… Lady Lucretia, has your Father really recovered his humanity completely? I have lived for more than two thousand years, and I have never heard of anyone returning from Subspace. I have never heard of anyone who could even restore their humanity after coming back. How did he do it?”

“Who knows?” Lucretia shook her head. “If you are truly that curious, you can ask him yourself when the time comes—he is coming in person very soon, after all.”

Sara Mell’s calm face twitched in a way that could be seen with the naked eye.

“Lady, there is no need to stress that point again…” The elven governor spoke in a strange tone. “It is not good for the heart. Please be kind to old people.”

Lucretia laughed, clearly quite amused. She felt she had tasted the same pleasure Tyrian often enjoyed, and she rose from her chair, satisfied, and waved to the governor.

In the next second, the “Sea Witch” turned into a flurry of colorful paper slips. They spun in the air, caught by a gust of wind, and were swept away into the sky, vanishing from the balcony.

“This ‘witch’ truly comes and goes as she pleases…” Sara Mell could not help grumbling under his breath. He turned to go back inside. Next, he had to think about how to contact the Explorer Associations of other city-states and how to pass on that dreadful “warning”.

But just as he turned around, the governor’s movements suddenly stopped.

It was as if a wind full of terror had swept across the edge of his mind. A feeling of indescribable horror and despair surged up in his heart. Sara Mell felt that this “emotion” had been poured directly into his head. In an instant, it seized his thoughts, turned his blood to ice, and made every muscle tense.

He struggled to lift his head and looked in a direction that felt carved deep into his mind, a direction that pulled at him with a powerful force. He looked toward the center of the city-state, toward those tall buildings—

Yet he did not see the city he knew, nor any other familiar scene.

He saw only a blinding sea of fire, and a single giant tree.

The tree was so huge that words could not describe it. He could no longer see its borders. It stood like a mountain range made of wood, burning fiercely at the edge of his vision.

The giant tree looked like the World Tree “Atlantis” spoken of in ancient elven legends, yet it was far more grand and awe-inspiring than anything poets or scholars had ever imagined. It seemed to cover whole mountains and plains and to shelter an entire kingdom under its shade.

It was bigger than any city-state or island Sara Mell had ever seen. The land under the tree was wider than anything he could picture—

And all of it was wrapped in Doomsday-like flames.

Red fire devoured everything, burning the huge tree and the forests around it to ash. From the edges of the fire, immense flashes of light burst forth over and over, like the release of horrible energy. They lit the air and tore open the sky.

Following those strange, immense flashes, Sara Mell slowly raised his gaze.

He finally found the source of the flames that were consuming all things.

It was the sky. The whole sky glowed with a terrifying, blistering light, like the swollen core of a steam reactor boiler about to enter a runaway state and melt through its shell. In the center of that swelling glow, a dark red, ominous color began to seep out bit by bit.

Then the dark red color spread quickly, swallowing the bright light of the sky until nothing was left. The entire world fell into a dreadful, dark red dusk. The heat in the sky faded away, but everything on the ground had already burned to nothing.

The forest had become charred earth. The miracle-like giant tree collapsed in the embers, crashing down with a roar like heaven and earth breaking apart.

The dark-red sky grew darker and began to fill, little by little, with black streaks. Time seemed to pass for a very long while, or maybe only for a moment. Sara Mell saw the veil of night descend.

The strange night sky, black mixed with dark red, covered the world that had become a burned wasteland. In that extremely short “calm”, he seemed to hear people speaking right by his ear.

They were several unfamiliar voices—

“…I still remember them, remember what they looked like…”

“Memory can still be useful… We have a plan…”

“A Sanctuary World, or a prison where life can only struggle on—there is little hope for the future.”

“But at least there is still a future…”

Sara Mell looked around in fright, trying to find the source of the voices, but he saw only a world burned away and all things destroyed. Then the dark red sky of ill omen began to crack apart.

Chaotic bands of light poured in through the rifts in the sky. The ashes and ruins on the ground were absorbed and broken down by those lights in an instant. All things were disappearing at great speed.

A powerful thought with no clear source roared in his head, like the voices of tens of millions of minds speaking together in harmony:

A torn Doomsday.

Sara Mell's body swayed.

Something retreated like the tide. The fierce emotions and frightening images left in his mind melted away like snow under sunlight. One second ago, he had felt that he had seen something, and he had even remembered it strongly. The next second, he felt he had only been staring off into space for a moment.

Those things were gone, like dreams fading in the morning.

Sara Mell stood there and frowned without thinking. He glanced back in the direction where the "Sea Witch" had disappeared just now.

"This 'witch' truly comes and goes as she pleases…"

Sara Mell could not help grumbling once more, and then he turned and went back into the room.

Chapter 506: Morris’s Teacher

Vanna went down to the lower deck, to the Prayer Room deep in the crew area. After she closed the door, she quickly set up the ritual field needed for Psychic Communication.

On the Boundless Sea, where conditions were limited, the ritual still used materials she could find on the ship. She used a large candlestick instead of a brazier and her own prayer book instead of the required sacred relic. On the floor she spread a mixture of salt and grease to draw storm runes and build the sacred space. Since this was already her second time, she was not as clumsy as before.

The feeling of a gaze suddenly came from the side, making Vanna, the inquisitor who was busy arranging the ritual field, stop in place.

She turned her head toward the source of that gaze and saw a round mirror hanging on the wall in the corner. Light and shadow rippled in the glass. A black-haired lady with hair falling over her shoulders was looking this way with curiosity.

From the mirror came Agatha’s voice: “Sorry, I did not mean to spy on someone else’s ritual. I was just drawn here by the noise.”

“It is fine. This is not a secret ritual,” Vanna said with a generous smile as she greeted this very special new “crew member” who had recently joined the Vanished. “I am about to contact the Cathedral ark.”

“Mm, I know. The ritual process of the Church of Death is a bit different, but I can more or less tell what you are doing. However…”

As Agatha in the mirror spoke, she suddenly stopped, hesitating.

“However what?” Vanna asked in confusion.

“…Is it really okay to set up a ritual site like this?” Agatha stared curiously at the scene in the cabin. “Using a candlestick instead of a brazier is still acceptable. Using an ordinary prayer book instead of a sacred relic… that barely makes sense too. But using coarse salt from the kitchen instead of the ‘purified salt’ blessed by divine blessing, and cooking oil instead of holy oil… Are the rituals of the Deep Sea Church really this free?”

Vanna suddenly felt a bit embarrassed. She said: “This… is mainly because the supplies on the ship are limited. We used up the holy oil earlier, and I forgot to replenish it when we were in port. But in my experience, it works fine.”

“…Then it seems you truly are a Saint deeply favored by the Goddess,” Agatha could not help sighing. “Most priests would never dare to borrow a deity’s power in such a casual way.”

The muscles in Vanna’s face twitched twice. She could only keep a straight face and reply: “Uh, thank you…”

“I will not disturb you then.” Agatha in the mirror waved her hand, and her figure slowly faded. “I will go see what Shirley is doing. The captain asked me to watch her do her homework…”

The mirror turned into a patch of darkness, then slowly returned to its normal reflection.

Vanna watched the lady in the mirror leave and stared blankly for a moment. Then she turned to look at the ritual field she had just arranged so carefully and slowly frowned.

“Is it really that makeshift?”

She muttered to herself with some doubt, then curled her finger and flicked in the direction of the candlestick. An invisible force ignited the candles at once. In the next second, the flames swelled and leapt, far brighter than normal candlelight. The runes drawn around the ritual field began to crackle, and the sound slowly mixed with the rising roar of waves.

“It works pretty well…”

Vanna thought this to herself, and in the next moment she let her spirit sink. Her mind and senses slowly immersed themselves in the surging sound of the waves around her.

The ritual drew down a deity’s gaze. The runes borrowed that deity’s power. Vanna let this power pull on her spirit and used it as a medium to call the distant Cathedral ark, waiting for Pope Helena’s response.

Psychic Resonance used a ritual to borrow the power of the Four Gods. That power strengthened the weak mental abilities mortals were born with, so they could communicate with priests far away who shared the same faith. This ancient divine magic was a skill every ordained priest had to learn. Even in these days of constant technological progress, even now that humans had created modern tools like telegraphs and telephones, this long-distance link between priests was still an important way for distant city-states to share information.

Vanna felt as if she entered a long, dark tunnel. Her soul raced through it. The walls looked like layers of black rock, but as she sped past, faint ripples seemed to move over that “rock”. They looked… as if they were about to come alive.

She put away stray thoughts, focused her mind, and held back any needless curiosity or urge to reach out. Vanna silently recited the rules she had long since memorized and tried her best not to get close to any solid-looking edge of this “tunnel”. Then she “saw” a glow slowly appear ahead.

Unlike the time she went to the Nameless King's tomb to attend a "gathering", today's Psychic Communication only pointed toward the great Storm Cathedral on the Boundless Sea. At the end of the "dark tunnel", a hazy, unreal space quickly took shape, and an elegant, dignified figure appeared in her sight.

Vanna stopped in front of that figure. Her own shadowy form quickly steadied.

"I salute you, Your Eminence."

"No need to stand on ceremony, Vanna. This hardly counted as a public setting." Helena's phantom returned the salute, then asked curiously: "Why did you call me so suddenly? Did something happen on that ship?"

"Everything on the ship is normal—but something else has happened." Vanna took a light breath, steadied her feelings, and then spoke slowly: "I am here to deliver a warning from Captain Duncan. The Vanished is warning the entire civilized world…"

Warm yellow light lit up the old shelves and ancient scrolls. On the wide walnut desk, delicate alchemy tools kept a complex chemical reaction going. In the large, old-fashioned study, an elderly elf with a plump figure and kindly face sat calmly by the desk. He was the leader of the Truth Academy and the Pope of Rahm, the God of Wisdom: Rune.

The old elf was gazing at the alchemy apparatus on the desk, but in his eyes the scene reflected there came from far away—

"The Vanished is warning the entire civilized world. We have confirmed a sign of awakening from the Elder God 'Abyssal Lord' in the Deep Sea beneath Frostholm. This process of awakening may appear again under any city-state. There is evidence that the Abyssal Lord's flesh exists in all things…"

The short, plump, kindly elf silently listened to the voice from far away. His expression slowly grew serious. When the other side finally finished speaking, he rose from the desk and walked toward a bookshelf at the far end of the room. “Morris, if we made the most extreme parts of this message public, the whole world would see them as the most horrifying heresy in history. Even the Annihilators would think it was a bit too extreme.”

“There is no such thing as heresy on the road to Truth, teacher. In the ‘classics’ created by mortals, there are only two kinds: those that have already been overturned and those waiting to be overturned. You are the one who told me that.”

Morris’s voice sounded calm and powerful, with a hidden edge of stubbornness and courage. It made the elf elder think back to many years ago, when this gifted young human was still studying at the Truth Academy. Back then, he carried the same drive, digging for every answer and boldly questioning every problem.

Such curiosity and drive were blazing and dangerous in a scholar. Countless gifted youths used that force to climb the peaks of Truth at great speed. Many of them were struck down by the dangers of knowledge itself during the climb. Others managed to calm down and, under a mentor’s protection and mental guidance, learned to rein in their talent and sip the trickling stream of Truth with care.

A much smaller group, outstanding students like Morris, chose a third path —

In two years they mastered shooting with all kinds of light and heavy weapons, the use of blades and other cold weapons, demolitions, occult studies, self-defense arts, and mixed fighting techniques.

They were the pride of the Truth Academy and its affiliated combat school.

Rune stopped in front of the tall bookshelf and reached out to pull out a record book.

He opened it and slowly flipped through. On each page, the faces and figures of past students looked back at him. Their youngest days were preserved in the magic-filled pages. Some stood shyly. Some waved at the viewer. Some made funny faces. Some laughed out loud.

A young human stood in a classroom doorway with his arms crossed, looking this way with full confidence. Under the black-and-white image were the words “Morris Underwood” and his student record.

“Yes, I did teach you that. Mortals’ classics come in only two kinds: those that have been overturned and those still waiting to be overturned… There is no heresy on the road to Truth, because real Truth does not need anyone’s approval. It simply exists, forever…”

Rune murmured to himself. One of his eyes looked at the student on the page, while in the other eye the same student’s present face was still reflected—white hair already touched his temples, completely unlike the energetic youth in the record.

The lives of humans were very short. For elves, forming deep bonds with humans was actually hard and painful. These friends and students always grew old quickly, and before the elves could react, they turned into a handful of dust. Memories and partings came very suddenly. Every bit of sorrow arrived late, and always with regret that could not be undone.

Yet Rune still gladly accepted and taught apprentices from human society.

Because even in their short lives, these apprentices could show learning abilities that amazed the elves. The desire to explore and the many possibilities born from that short span of life were, in Rune’s eyes, precious traits in the pursuit of Truth.

Morris’s voice sounded in his mind again: “Captain Duncan thinks we must share every piece of information we have with the Four Gods Church and only keep some things back when we talk with the city-states and the Explorer Association. The Four Gods Church has both the power and the understanding to know how to handle this warning.”

“…That sounds quite reasonable, but has he considered another possibility?” Rune said slowly. “The contents of this warning are too shocking. They sound even more extreme than the heresies preached by the Annihilators. The Church might see it as a kind of… hostility, even as a new heretical doctrine. For some more conservative priests, their first reaction will not be to accept it as a ‘warning’. They will be more likely to treat it as an attack on their faith.”

“He does not care.”

“Oh?”

“The storm is coming, and thunder sounds first as a warning—but the thunder itself does not care whether mortals hide or not. That is the captain’s attitude.”

“…Reasonable.”

Chapter 507: The Popes of the Four Gods

When a storm came, mortals scattered in all directions at the roar of thunder. Yet the thunder itself did not care how mortals reacted. Its roar came only from its own existence. In the same way, the very existence of the Vanished was enough to interfere with the order of the entire Boundless Sea.

Under this premise, wondering whether “Captain Duncan” would care about being treated as a heretic by mortal churches became meaningless. That would be overestimating how much the people of this world could affect that being from the Subspace Shadows. And if one thought about it from another angle, the image of the Vanished in the eyes of the civilized world was never much better than that of a “heretic” anyway…

“I will discuss this with Popes Helena, Banster, and Frem,” Rune said to Morris. “There will certainly be voices of doubt and fear among the bishops, but the four of us should be able to reach a common stance quickly. Whatever the source of the news, the warning itself must be taken seriously.”

“I knew you would look at this calmly,” Morris’s voice carried a hint of relief. “You are still the same as back then.”

“You, however, are very different from back then, Morris,” Rune said with a sigh. “When I first heard you had fallen into a deep slump, many people were sorry about it. I did not expect you to pull yourself together again so quickly. I even less expected that your ‘recovery’… would come in the form of joining the Vanished. To be honest, after these long centuries, very few things can still shock me. This is one of the most shocking.”

“Life on the ship is actually not bad—one could even say it is better than living in a city-state. Life at sea brings some trouble, but here I see new things almost every day and deal with all kinds of things I had never even heard of before…”

“You already sound exactly like a crew member who is proud of his own ship,” Rune could not help saying. “I really am a bit curious. What exactly are you doing on that ship?”

Morris was silent for half a minute.

Many scenes flashed through his mind—giving lessons to Abyssal demons, to a cursed doll, and to demon contractors; racing in the Spirit Realm; eating Deep Sea spawn; keeping a fragment of the Sun company while it read; then watching as that fragment braised various heretic abominations that crawled out of books every day…

“…Active and wholesome academic research,” Morris said seriously.

“Oh, that does sound quite good.” Rune nodded, but could not help adding a warning. “Still, I must say that you should stay alert. Maybe, as you said, ‘Captain Duncan’ really has regained his humanity. But as a mortal, living on the Vanished and chatting easily with a Subspace Eldritch God is dangerous in itself. You must deal carefully with all unknown things and avoid letting your mind and understanding be affected…”

“Thank you for the warning, teacher, but please do not worry. You know I have always been a cautious student. Even back in the Academy, when I carried out the most dangerous research, I always made full preparations and never had an accident.”

Rune, who had returned to his seat behind the desk, fell silent at those words.

In his mind, the old elf could not help remembering the days many years ago when Morris studied at the Truth Academy.

Cautious… There were indeed many cautious students in the Academy, but not everyone understood that word the same way.

Some students, when they saw a dangerous tome, first tried to seal it away and stay as far from it as possible. That was called being cautious.

There was another kind of student. When they came into contact with forbidden knowledge, the first thing they did was gulp down half a bottle of mixed magic potions, hang themselves all over with charm amulets, and then prepare three largest-caliber pistols. They also called that being cautious.

The second kind of student had a high chance of dying suddenly. But the ones who survived often achieved great things. The most legendary scholars of the Truth Academy were often like that.

Yet even among the most legendary of them, none had ever reached the point of running off to the Vanished to chat and laugh with a Subspace Eldritch God.

After a long quiet, the elf behind the desk finally broke the silence in a low voice: “Morris…”

“Yes, teacher?”

“…You are someone who is meant to do big things.”

“Thank you for your expectations.”

“No, what I mean is, if one day the trouble you cause is really too big, you must tell me in advance. If I can help, I will help. If I cannot, at least I can run away early.”

“…”

The link created by the Psychic Communication broke. The resonance of thought and perception ebbed away like the tide. Rune narrowed his eyes slightly, feeling his former apprentice’s presence leave. Only after he confirmed that Morris’s mind had safely withdrawn from the psychic channel did he fully relax.

Yet a faint, strange noise, like countless people whispering under their breath, still lingered in his mind. It took a long time to fade.

Feeling how that noise affected his own mind, Rune could not help letting out a quiet sigh.

“…A permanent madness threshold, yet he can still stay clear and rational… This really is unbelievable. Is this also an effect from that ‘captain’?”

Muttering softly to himself, this elf—perhaps the most learned among all mortals—shook his head. Then he sat quietly by the desk, as if waiting for someone to come calling.

He did not wait long.

A hazy sound of waves suddenly rose in his mind and slowly grew into clear, rolling surf. Right after came calls of flame and death. Rune sighed at these calls, glanced at the alchemical vessel still reacting on the side table, and, after making sure there was enough material left inside, let his mind sink once more.

This study was his ritual ground for holding Psychic Communication. Every old shelf and solemn book here, along with the alchemy apparatus on the desk, served as part of the ritual.

Darkness surged up and then scattered like mist. At the end of a deep, dim passage, the figures of three Popes appeared: the Popes of the Deep Sea, of Death, and of Flamebearer.

Rune passed through the passage and came before his three old friends. He nodded slightly in greeting, and before they could speak, he said on his own: “It seems you have also received the news.”

“Banster and I each received messages from our own Saints,” said Helena, Pope of the Deep Sea. At the same time she pointed at the tall, silent figure across from her. “Frem just arrived. We only had time to tell him the general situation.”

The tall figure called Frem gave a small nod.

He was the leader of Flamebearer, the representative in the mortal world of Everburning Ember Tarrigan. In appearance, he was perhaps the most striking of the four Popes. His unusually tall body, rock-like gray, tough skin, and the metallic lines on that skin all showed his race.

He was a strong Senkin, dressed in a dark-gold robe that marked his role as Pope of Flamebearer. His short hair was gray-white, his features sharp, and he looked silent and extremely serious.

In recent times, this Pope of Flamebearer had been leading his patrol fleet along the borders of the civilized world and rarely took part in gatherings of the four Mortal Realms. This was his first appearance in some time.

“I still have not fully understood the situation,” Frem said. His voice was so deep it sounded like it came out of stone. “None of my Saints have been lured onto that ship yet.”

At his words, Helena’s expression turned strange. She frowned and said in a low voice: “Our Saints were not lured onto it either…”

“They met Captain Duncan. They were wary of Captain Duncan. They agreed with Captain Duncan. They joined Captain Duncan.” Frem glanced at Helena. His expression still looked like a stone. “I think that counts as being lured.”

Helena could only say: “…”

The tall, thin, and aged Pope of Death, Banster, coughed lightly when he saw this. “It is not your first day knowing Frem. He has always been like this.”

“…All right.” Helena was speechless for a moment, then nodded slowly. “We are not here today to talk about ‘Saints being lured onto the ship’. We are here to talk about the warning from the Vanished.”

Rune raised his head. “Do you have anything you want to ask?”

“Yes.” Helena spoke at once. Her eyes fell on Rune. “I want to know what those huge biological masses under the city-states really are. From the description, they sound very much like the Leviathan beasts that carry the Cathedral arks. Are they the same thing or not?”

“All four Cathedral arks were built by the Truth Academy. The technology to ‘revive’ and control Leviathans also came from you,” Banster added, turning to look at Rune as well. “But you have never told us where you found those ‘corpses’ of Leviathans, nor have you said anything about the link between those Leviathan beasts and the structures at the bottom of the city-states. We have reason to think the Truth Academy holds some special ‘truth’.”

Frem did not speak. He only kept his statue-like expression and calmly gazed into Rune’s eyes.

Faced with these three pressing gazes, Rune only spread his hands calmly.

“I also do not know what is under the city-states.”

“You do not know?” Helena’s eyes widened a little. “The Truth Academy ‘revived’ four Leviathans, and you say you do not know what the ‘Leviathan’ under the city-states is about?”

Rune only answered with a calm question of his own: “The storm Goddess Gamona is the Queen of the Leviathans. As her chosen, do you know more than I do?”

Helena frowned and did not speak.

“I believe you must have already tried asking the Leviathan that carries the great Storm Cathedral. I am sure it could not give you any answers—because even they themselves do not understand their own kind.”

Rune sighed and shook his head gently.

“The history of our world has been shattered. Even ancient giant beasts cannot clearly remember what happened before the Great Annihilation. Do you know, that ‘Captain Duncan’ even gave this phenomenon a name…”

“He calls it the ‘Horizon Limit’ on the time dimension.”

Chapter 508: The Cathedral Ark’s Secret

All known history of this world started with the Great Annihilation of the Age of Antiquity.

If one treated the Great Annihilation as a wall, then that invisible wall was clearly not a simple event node. In truth, it cut the entire historical Time-Stream.

Everything before the Great Annihilation was unknown. Archaeological scholars exhausted all their wisdom and effort, yet could not restore even a shred of information from the node of time before that moment. In the whole world, people could not find a single relic that pointed to the era before the Great Annihilation—not even a stone carved with words.

In the eyes of scholars, this hopeless black wall had already stood for ten thousand years. Now, Captain Duncan, who had returned from Subspace, had given this barrier a fitting name.

As leader of the Truth Institute and Pope of the God of Wisdom, Rune felt the presence of that black wall more deeply than anyone, and he understood how precise the term “Horizon Limit” was.

“Our world feels as if it was ‘created out of thin air’ at some moment after the Great Annihilation. Our broken and self?contradictory history is ironclad proof that this Horizon Limit exists,” Rune said, his tone full of emotion as he faced his three old friends. “Since the rise of the city?states, even since the Dark Age, countless scholars have tried to trace the past and search for the ‘source’ before the Great Annihilation. They dug ever deeper into the dark earth, but in the end they were all blocked by that invisible barrier.”

“Not even a single second— not even the one second before the Great Annihilation began—can be confirmed. It is blank. Even the ‘Three Long Nights’ mentioned in the Blasphemous Tome that Captain Duncan took from the Annihilators only describes the span of history between the Great Annihilation and the founding of the ancient kingdom of Critt. As for any information from before the Horizon Limit, it is still a complete blank.”

“It is very dangerous to treat a cultist’s heretical ravings as reference material,” Banster, Pope of Death, could not help but remind him from the side.

Rune lightly shook his head. “The danger of heretical doctrines lies in their power to tempt and to incite evil. If we strip away those influences, the ‘Three Long Nights’ themselves are still a topic worth studying. Many of our results on the Dark Age after the collapse of the ancient kingdom of Critt are built on research into the Church of the Sun and the Cult of Annihilation.”

“…So in the end, what you are saying is that you cannot explain the ‘Leviathan’ beneath the city?states, and those Leviathan beasts that carry the Cathedral arks cannot give us an answer either,” Frem broke the silence. “Because this was something that happened before the Great Annihilation, all information that points to it is unknowable, unmeasurable, and unprovable.”

Rune did not speak, which was as good as agreeing with Frem.

Helena thought for a moment, then suddenly spoke. “But you can at least tell us where the Truth Institute found those four Leviathans. At the very least, the beasts that carry the four Cathedral arks really were discovered and ‘revived’ by your people, weren’t they?”

“…They came from the frontier, after a large?scale ‘Border Collapse,’” Rune finally gave a clear answer this time. “The exact location… was near the Eternal Veil in the eastern sea.”

“The eastern sea?” Banster frowned without thinking.

“Yes, right by the former site of the Viseran Thirteen Isles,” Rune nodded. “Ever since that terrible Subspace disaster a century ago, the eastern stretch of the Eternal Veil has always been a fragile node. The dense fog there often collapses inward, or temporary Vision zones appear over the sea. You should know this as well.”

Helena and Frem nodded in silence, while a thoughtful look appeared on Banster’s face. None of them interrupted Rune; they signaled for him to go on.

“When the Truth Institute was in charge of patrolling the frontier, one of our ships encountered an anomaly there,” Rune went on, sorting through his memories as he spoke. “The exact situation can no longer be verified, because during the event the crew suffered severe cognitive confusion and memory gaps. Afterwards, they could not accurately describe what they had experienced. But there was a hastily written log on the ship that recorded part of what happened—

“‘The sea suddenly sank inward, like a strange bowl. The edge of the “bowl” was smooth and calm, and the water seemed to have frozen in place. But the ship did not fall down with the sunken sea. Instead, it floated above that sunken region… The ship lost all power. It could not move forward or back, and hung in the air hundreds of meters above the water in a terrifying way… Colossal shapes surfaced from that sunken sea, as if some kind of living creatures…’

“That was what one crew member managed to write down in a hurry before his cognition broke down and his memories were damaged.

“Later, another of our fleets found that missing patrol ship. It was slowly drifting out of a patch of thin fog, completely without power, its steam core cold. Everyone aboard was asleep. And behind that ship, deep in the slowly thinning fog, four massive shapes appeared in the rescuers’ field of view.

“Those were the Leviathans we discovered at sea—the colossal beasts recorded in the Storm Canon, long vanished from the river of history, apostles of the Storm Goddess.

“What happened after that, you already know. The Truth Institute found a way to ‘revive’ those legendary beasts and built vast Cathedral arks upon their backs, then handed them over for the Church of the Four Gods to use.”

Rune finished his account. Frem and Banster were still lost in thought, while Helena slowly furrowed her brow. “So those Leviathans were actually one of the Frontier Relics… No wonder you always avoided talking about these details before. So it was related to a Border Collapse.”

“Awareness of Border Collapse increases the chance of a Border Collapse occurring inside the civilized world. The closer in time, the higher the probability. This was a rule that Captain Duncan Abnomar summarized a century ago, back when he was still a great explorer,” Rune nodded. “But now, decades have passed since the Border Collapse in which the Truth Institute discovered the Leviathans. Bringing it up again is not quite so dangerous.”

“…I have a question,” Frem suddenly said. “The Cathedral arks may be large, but compared to the city?states they clearly are not on the same scale. If the biological structure under the cities really is also a Leviathan, then its size is several times that of the Leviathans under the Cathedral arks… Are they really from the same species?”

“Who knows?” Rune spread his hands. “Perhaps the four Leviathans we found on the frontier were just some kind of ‘small individuals.’ Or ‘juveniles.’”

“…In theory it should not be like that,” Helena shook her head. “I often communicate with the Leviathan of the Cathedral ark. It does not know what happened before the Great Annihilation or the truth beneath the city? states, but it has clearly said that it is an adult Leviathan.”

“Then the problem lies in the biological structures beneath the cities. Perhaps they are unusually huge ‘mutant individuals,’ or perhaps… they are connected to the influence of those ‘Blueprints’ in the Deep Sea,” Rune said, guessing as he went. “After all, if the information sent by the Vanished is true, then all the city?states now on the Boundless Sea can actually be counted as the ‘creations’ of the Elder Gods. Even the biological structures beneath the cities are likely the result of a ‘second round of processing’ by the Abyssal Lord…”

At this point Rune suddenly stopped. He shook his head with a touch of self?mockery, then passed his hand over his eyes and made a gesture of prayer to God of Wisdom Rahm. “May the Lord forgive me. It feels truly strange to be talking about such heretical claims.”

“May the Lord forgive us.”

Helena and Frem also made gestures of benediction, confessing to the Storm Goddess and the Everburning Ember behind them.

As leaders of the Church, they could look at these borderline?taboo, even outright heretical topics from a higher vantage. They could analyze information from heretic fanatics with cooler heads and a more practical attitude. But as Heralds of the Four Gods, they also held to their sects’ teachings and were bound by their faith. When they spoke of certain dangerous subjects, that inner sense of unease and resistance was hard to avoid.

Only Banster, the Herald of the God of Death, tall, gaunt, and aged in appearance, had kept silent, as if he had been lost in thought from the very beginning.

“Banster,” Rune finally turned his attention to this silent spokesman of the Death God. “You have seemed distracted from the start.”

“I am thinking about a question, Rune,” Banster finally lifted his head. His sunken eye sockets were deep as night. “The Viseran Thirteen Isles—the place where the Leviathans were found was near the sea where the Viseran Thirteen Isles incident happened. Do you not find that worth paying attention to?”

Rune nodded calmly. Clearly, he had already expected Banster to focus on this detail.

“I know what you want to say—the Vanished,” the elven elder said slowly. “A hundred years ago, the Vanished opened a gate to Subspace at the Viseran Thirteen Isles and dragged all those islands and their residents into the terrifying depths of that world. That event also left the entire sea region with a fragile space?time Anomaly, with Visions occurring again and again… In that sense, the incident that patrol ship from the Truth Institute encountered decades ago is causally linked to the Viseran Thirteen Isles incident.”

At this point he paused, then looked up and gazed seriously at Banster. “But we cannot simply conclude that ‘it was the Vanished that sent the Leviathan beasts into the Mortal Realm.’ We lack evidence, and there is not enough theoretical support.”

“But those four Leviathans could indeed have entered our Mortal Realm because of some later effect of the Viseran Thirteen Isles incident, Rune. This matter was risky from the very beginning.”

“…So you don’t want your Cathedral ark anymore?”

“I want it.”

Chapter 509: Banster’s Thoughts

Banster’s reply was simple, direct, and honest.

For a moment, Rune did not even react.

“Then why say so much?” the short, plump Rune could not help but mutter. “With all that doubt, I almost thought you were going to go back today and seal up your Cathedral ark…”

“I am only stressing the risks behind this matter.” Banster’s expression did not change at all. His thin, bloodless face looked extremely solemn. “We all know what happened back then at the Viseran Thirteen Isles. ‘The Sinking of the Isles’ is only a mild, compromise term. In essence, the whole thing was a large?scale connection between our Mortal Realm and Subspace. That sea region is still not stable even now, and those Leviathans…”

“They are safe, Banster,” Rune calmly cut in. His blue eyes seemed soaked with a cool, wise light. “I am not some mad scholar who would, on a whim, drag a Frontier Relic into the civilized world. The ‘corpses’ of those Leviathans first went through ten full years of study and testing in the test waters of the Truth Institute. Only after we ruled out all unstable factors did I decide to turn them into Cathedral arks.”

Banster fell silent for a moment. After more than ten seconds, Frem finally broke the quiet in a deep voice: “No matter what, under the conditions at the time we had to build the Pilgrimage arks. Rune did take some risks, but without those arks, we would probably have already lost contact with the Four Gods.”

In the chaotic darkness, the four figures fell silent together.

“…Sometimes I really cannot help but think that the four ‘Leviathans’ that appeared at the eastern frontier were some kind of gift from fate,” Rune shook his head and muttered softly. “Without them, the Truth Institute would never have been able to build Pilgrimage arks large enough to serve as a ‘worldly Divine Realm,’ and the other plans we had at the time all had a slim chance of success. My friends, I admit I did hide many details about those Leviathans, but I hope you understand. It was a Border Collapse, after all. When I delivered the arks back then, I told you not to be curious about their origin. Just treat them as sacred miracles.”

“A gift from fate…” Banster spoke slowly. “If I had a choice, I would rather not hear that phrase. To me, it feels like a bloody sacrificial rite, offering the countless living beings of the Viseran Thirteen Isles to that ship in exchange for the four Pilgrimage arks we have today.”

“You cannot put it like that. There is no evidence that the appearance of the Leviathans was the work of the Vanished. It is just that all things in the world are connected, and some events happen to become linked with others,” Rune said, trying to soothe him. “Besides, that ship now sails on the Boundless Sea. Whether you want to admit it or not, its master has already regained his humanity. The warnings from the Vanished are like the warnings Captain Duncan gave a century ago, when he first discovered the phenomenon of Border Collapse. They are something we must face and take seriously. As I always say…”

“Truth does not change with people’s attitudes, for it exists on its own forever.” Banster waved a hand. “I know. I have heard you repeat that so often that my ears have grown calluses.”

Helena looked up at Rune, then at Banster, and spoke after a moment’s hesitation: “Banster, if you still feel uneasy, why not try speaking directly with this ‘Captain Duncan’? See what his attitude is now, and maybe… confirm the truth of what happened at the Viseran Thirteen Isles back then. Even though he has publicly said that his memories are damaged, if you meet him in person…”

Before she could finish, Banster had already waved his hand sharply.

“Helena, among all your outrageous ideas, this one is especially over the top.”

“All right, I was only making a suggestion.”

“At this stage, we really must still be cautious in how we communicate with the Vanished,” Rune added at the right moment. “Our current level of contact is already quite bold. Any further… and we must consider the influence of Subspace. We cannot allow even the slightest chance of the Pilgrimage arks being corrupted.”

Frem, as steady as a stone giant, slowly shifted his gaze at those words, letting his eyes pass over the three Popes who were talking.

“Yet the three of you still let your Saints get lured onto that ship…”

Helena and Rune spoke at the same time: “They were not lured onto the ship!”

After the other two finished, Banster added unhurriedly, “My Saint is still in the Cathedral. It is only a shadow that boarded the ship.”

In the next second, the chaotic darkness fell silent once more, as if an awkward, subtle mood was now hanging between the four.

In the end, Rune was the first to break the silence. “In any case, none of you have told your Saints the truth about the ‘Leviathans’ under the Cathedral arks, have you?”

“No,” Helena was the first to shake her head. “When I heard Vanna mention the shocking structure beneath the city, I did immediately think of the Leviathans, but I did not reveal anything to her.”

Banster also shook his head. “Rather than adding to the confusion of the priests under me, I prefer to first come to you, old man, and figure out what is really going on—though it seems now that you only know so much yourself.”

Frem was the third to shake his head. “My Saint was not lured onto the ship…”

The other three finally shouted in unison: “Will you ever let that go?!”

“…I will keep quiet now.”

“Keeping it from them for now is the right choice,” Rune said, giving Frem, solid as a stone giant, a rather helpless look before turning back to nod at Helena and Banster. “We have too little information right now. First we need to find a way to confirm what is actually beneath the cities and whether the intelligence from the Vanished is accurate before we decide on the next steps.”

He paused, then added, “When conditions are right, we can contact ‘that ship’ again through our Saints. For now… let us first discuss the rest of the warning from the Vanished.”

All their expressions grew grave at his words.

“I will share my view first,” Banster spoke up. “I think we need to build a ‘monitoring’ system in response to the warning from the Vanished, one that stretches across the Church, the city?states, and the ocean?going fleets. Its coverage must be wide and its reach complete, because if the warning is true and the Elder Gods really dwell in all things, then any blind spot left outside this net could become the Primordial Blast Point that leads to the next ‘Frostholm Crisis.’

“On top of that, the patrol fleets of the major Churches must also make matching changes, just as… we once did when we kept watch for ‘Border Collapse.’”

Helena gave Banster a slightly surprised look.

“It seems Rune’s worries just now were unnecessary. You are taking the warning from the Vanished seriously enough. I thought you would question every piece of intelligence from that ship because of the Viseran Thirteen Isles incident.”

“It is precisely because of the Viseran Thirteen Isles and the recent ‘Frostholm Crisis,’” Banster said with special gravity, his tone low and serious, “that I am sure of one thing: anything related to that ship cannot be a small matter. So I will keep a close watch on everything connected to that ship—closer than anyone else.”

…

The pitch?black sea surface quickly returned to normal. The chaotic shadows that had filled the sky were slowly replaced by sunlight. The sky and the sea once more showed bright colors, warm and calm. The pale green flames that had spread over the whole ship also died down and drew back as the vessel left the Spirit Realm.

The spirit form flames on Duncan’s body gradually faded as well. He let go of the wheel and felt the surging power slowly calm.

The wheel began to adjust itself, and creaks came from deep within the hull—Goathead had taken over the control of the ship. The Vanished’s speed dropped again and slowly returned to its usual cruising pace.

Just as Duncan left the helm, Alice ran over in high spirits: “Captain! Captain! Have we reached the south?”

“How could we?” Duncan gave the Doll a helpless look. “Do you know how far it is from Frostholm to Lightwind Harbor?”

Alice scratched her hair. “Oh. I saw you slow down, and the Vanished left its Spirit Realm state, so I thought we had arrived…”

“We only surfaced into the Mortal Realm to ‘get some fresh air,’” Duncan said casually. “Staying in deep Spirit Realm cruise for too long is bad for body and mind, and there are quite a few normal humans on this ship…”

He suddenly stopped halfway through his words, then shook his head.

“Coming back to the Mortal Realm, feeling the sea breeze and basking in the Sun eases the pressure of long voyages. And the Vanished itself needs a rest as well.”

“That makes sense,” Alice nodded slightly, a happy smile on her face. “They really were all tense. Once we came back under the sunlight, they relaxed a lot.”

Duncan knew that the “they” in this Doll’s mouth actually referred to the buckets, ropes, and pots and pans on the ship. He had no idea when she had grown so close with the living things aboard this vessel that she could even see the “moods” of those noisy little objects…

But all of this was a good thing.

“Goathead will handle the helm for a while. I will go rest,” Duncan said to Alice. “For dinner today, we’ll have baked flatbread, fish fillets, and vegetable soup.”

“Aye!” Alice answered at once, delighted.

Then the Doll girl lifted her head and glanced at the sky.

The Sun was already sinking toward the horizon. The outer ring of the double rune rings had begun to slip below the sea’s surface.

“Then I’ll go cook!”

With a shout, Alice turned and ran toward the galley.

Duncan watched her with a smile until her figure vanished through the cabin door at the end of the deck.

Then he let out a soft breath and turned toward the door of the captain’s cabin at the stern.

The Door of the Lost Ones.

Duncan’s gaze swept over the line of letters on the door. He placed his hand on the handle and pushed the door open.

Chapter 510: Answer

Zhou Ming returned to his studio apartment. Everything was still exactly the same as when he had left.

As he stepped onto the familiar, slightly worn floor and looked at the things in the room that had never changed, he listened to the steady hum of the computer tower that was always on. His thoughts finally began to settle.

A subtle, hard-to-describe feeling rose in his chest. Zhou Ming stepped over the bits of clutter on the floor, walked to the tightly closed window, and looked at the rolling white fog outside.

He stared at the fog for a long time, then reached out and pushed the window. As expected, it did not move at all.

The flour scattered on the windowsill and the stack of empty cans he had arranged on purpose were still exactly as before. They seemed to wordlessly send him a lonely, silent message.

For a long time, he just stood quietly at the window, as if he were looking into the thick fog, though his mind was completely blank. He did not know how much time passed before he suddenly blinked and turned his head to the side, like a stone statue that had just awakened.

Beside the unmade bed, the computer monitor on the desk glowed faintly. The “Network not connected” message still popped up from time to time in the lower right corner. The notebook he had used for notes before leaving was still tossed in a corner of the desk. He had not opened it for a long time.

Zhou Ming walked over and sat down at the desk. He stared blankly at the empty screen for a while, then pulled the keyboard and mouse out from the corner where he had shoved them. He opened the browser and casually typed a line of text into the search box:

“Does the world beyond the fog still exist?”

Of course, the browser did not show any useful search results. After he hit Enter, the cursor blinked a few times. Then an error page popped up. The network connection was interrupted, and the remote server did not respond.

The result was within his expectations. Zhou Ming already knew this would happen. Long ago, when the fog had first sealed off the room, he had used this computer in its strange state to try every way he could think of to contact the outside world.

He did not expect anything different to appear on the screen this time.

He had only wanted to type that sentence out, not to ask anyone, and not expecting any answer.

Listening to the monotonous hum of the fan, Zhou Ming let out a breath, tossed the keyboard and mouse back into the corner, then picked up the notebook. He flipped to a blank page and bent over it to write carefully:

“To the world beyond the thick fog, greetings from the man in the room.

“Soon, I will arrive at a place on the ‘other side’ of the door. It is a city-state on the frontier, and I am going there to confirm a few things.

“But even if I do not confirm them, I think I already know the answer. On the strange world beyond the door, countless unimaginable things are really happening, and my ‘intuition’ over there has always been very accurate.

“Because of this, I no longer expect any reply from beyond the fog. I no longer expect anyone to pass through the fog and knock on my door or my window. I still cannot be sure what has happened to this world, but perhaps… it is not I who changed, but you.

“In my quiet, narrow little room, everything is still the way it used to be. Here I have a bed, a sofa, a coffee table, a desk, and a chair. My wardrobe stands beside the bed, and there is a large shelf as well. Most of the space on that shelf is still empty now…

“I have not cleaned this room for a long time.

“There is almost no dust here. I know that in human homes, more than half of the dust comes from flakes of skin that humans shed and from the wear and tear of daily life. Since I spend most of my time away from here, most parts of this room are still quite clean.

“But even without much dust, the room still looked a bit messy. The last few times I came back, I was always in a hurry, and I never tidied things up before I left.

“Leaving it messy all the time is not good. If everything really is as I think, then I feel… I should make this room completely clean and neat.

“Also, perhaps I should not say this. Perhaps these words are already meaningless, but… I hope all of you beyond the fog are safe and well.

“Goodbye. I am going to clean this room now.”

Zhou Ming let out a soft breath, tossed the pen back into the pen holder, carefully read over what he had just written, then closed the notebook and set it in the corner of the desk.

Then he stood up in silence and began to carry out what he had planned in the notebook, to clean and tidy the room.

He started with the slightly messy bed, folding the blanket and straightening the pillows and sheets. Then he moved on to the things on the desk, the things on the coffee table, then the wardrobe, the bookshelf, and the clutter on the sofa and floor.

There was not much dust, and he did not need to mop the floor. With a single sheet of paper, he wiped away the thin layer of dust on the surfaces of the furniture, then tossed it into the wastebasket.

At the very end, Zhou Ming stood in front of the window.

He silently looked at the things on the windowsill. After standing there for a long time, he reached out and put away the tools he had used in the past to try to force the window open, including a hammer and a wrench, back into the toolbox nearby. Then he put the stacked cans and other odds and ends back where they belonged.

Then he wet a tissue, held it in his left hand, and pressed it against the windowsill. He held that pose for a full ten seconds, finally took a deep breath, and slowly wiped across the sill.

The flour he had used to check whether anyone had opened the window and entered the room was wiped away completely by the damp tissue.

Now the room was completely clean and tidy.

Zhou Ming let out a breath and calmly looked around the room, checking the results of his work. Then he picked up the bag of trash he had just gathered. The black plastic bag was not very heavy, since it mostly held wastepaper and empty cans, but when he lifted it, he still felt that it had some weight to it.

Carrying the bag of things he needed to throw away, he walked to the door of the studio apartment and opened it.

As always, pitch black, churning fog surged at the doorway. It seemed to hide all the secrets of this world, yet it was so chaotic that reason could not see through it.

Standing before the rolling black fog, Zhou Ming hesitated for a moment. Then he lifted his hand and threw the bag of trash into the mist.

The moment the plastic bag left his hand, a strong urge rose in him to grab it back. It was as if those scraps of paper and empty cans were the last treasures in this world, and he was the last gambler, forced to guard every gram of matter in the room. But he forced that urge down. He opened his hand and calmly watched the plastic bag fall to the other side of the door and vanish at once into the seething fog.

He knew that those things would not really reach the other side of the door. Only he himself could arrive in that world as “Duncan”. All other matter would disappear into the surging fog as it passed through the doorway.

Now those things that should be thrown away had completely vanished into the “world outside the room”.

Zhou Ming wiped his hands, stepped forward, and got ready to leave this place. On the other side of the door, Alice was still waiting for him to come to dinner.

But at the very moment he was about to step through the doorway, a faint sound caught his attention. It was the sudden rise in speed of the computer fan.

Zhou Ming stopped at once, pulled his foot back, and looked toward the sound.

On the faintly glowing computer screen, the error page that had shown “Network connection interrupted” and “Remote server not responding” was flickering. Then the error text suddenly vanished. Right after that, the loading bar at the bottom of the page turned from red to green and slowly began to move forward.

Zhou Ming felt his heart pound as if it were about to explode. A suffocating feeling spread through his lungs. The next second, he slammed the door shut and rushed back to his desk.

The loading bar at the bottom of the browser window was still moving. Its dim green looked like a slow, steady line of fire spreading forward. And on the blank page above, something was really appearing as it loaded.

It was an image.

Zhou Ming stared fixedly at the picture as it slowly came into view.

The Moon.

It looked like a direct photograph taken from somewhere in space. The image showed the Moon floating in the dark void. Its gray white surface was covered with craters and ravines, shaped like strange, light and dark markings. Even though he was no astronomy expert, Zhou Ming was deeply familiar with this classic image.

And once again he confirmed that the drawing he had seen in Tyrian’s office truly showed the Moon. The details were exactly the same. It was clearly the kind of picture only someone who had seen the Moon with their own eyes, up close, could have copied so precisely.

Zhou Ming slowly sank back into his chair and leaned against the backrest. His expression froze as he stared at the image of the Moon that almost filled the screen. After a long time, his gaze finally shifted upward to the line he had entered in the search box earlier:

“Does the world beyond the fog still exist?”

He stayed silent. After a long time, he suddenly woke up from his stone like state, grabbed the keyboard, and quickly typed new words into the search box:

“Is this the answer?”

“Who gave this answer?”

After quickly typing these two questions, Zhou Ming stared at the computer screen.

But no “one” replied. No new image or loading bar appeared on the screen. Only the cursor turned in place, stiff and mechanical, like a silent, dull eye. As the fan slowly dropped back to its low, soft whir, all he could hear by his ears once more were his own breathing and heartbeat.

A moment later, the image of the Moon vanished as the page refreshed after a failed load. The screen went pale again, leaving only one line of text:

“Network connection interrupted or remote server not responding.”

Chapter 511: Elven Food Culture

The door of the captain's cabin opened, and Duncan stepped inside. Goathead, who was in charge of the Vanished's course, reacted at once and turned his creaking wooden head toward him.

"Duncan Abnomar, I am answering in advance," Duncan said before the creature could speak. Then he walked straight to the liquor cabinet in the corner, poured himself a small glass of strong spirits, and downed it in one gulp.

The sharp, burning taste seared his nerves. The strong drink really did seem to have a calming effect. Duncan let out a light breath and felt his mood steady a little. Only then did he turn and walk to the enchanted sea chart, watching the plotted route stretch steadily toward the south.

Goathead's head slowly turned as Duncan moved, as if carefully watching the captain's every step. After a long while, it finally broke the silence, hesitantly: "Captain, you do not look to be in a very good mood… Do you need me to tell you a few cold jokes? I am especially good at elf style cold jokes. Many people think that race never smiles, but they actually have a special sense of humor. For example…"

"It has nothing to do with my mood, and I do not want to hear any cold jokes," Duncan said, waving his hand. He knew Goathead really wanted to help him relax, so he did not say anything more. He simply sat down quietly, as if fully focused on studying the lines and markers spreading across the enchanted sea chart.

But his thoughts could not help drifting.

In the end, he still did not get more answers in his small studio apartment. The computer in its strange state did not respond to any of the questions he entered afterward. It stayed as silent as ever, as if the sudden image of the Moon that had appeared earlier had been nothing more than his own illusion.

Yet even without more answers, Duncan had realized that he had truly touched that very important part.

The Moon from his home world had appeared in this eerie, twisted world. Even if it was only a “model”, a drawing, or even just a concept, it was enough to prove one thing.

The two worlds he had once thought were completely separate were not as clearly divided as he had believed.

But there was no one he could share these secrets with, no one who could analyze this with him. That included Alice, who trusted him without question, and Goathead, who looked so loyal on the desk.

Duncan let out a quiet breath and lifted his gaze. He saw Goathead still watching him, the onyx eyes in its wooden skull seeming to hold bottomless shadows.

“Captain, you can always trust your First Mate,” it said very seriously.

“I know, but not every problem is something you can help with,” Duncan said, shaking his head slightly. This time, though, his expression softened a little. “I appreciate it. But let us talk about this voyage instead. We are heading to an elven city-state in the south. How much do you know about the race called elves?”

“I still remember them…” Goathead spoke at once, as if the words had been waiting in its mind for some time, but it stalled right after it started. It paused for quite a while before going on. “Ah, well, I did not have that much contact with them, but I know the elves have an excellent talent for mathematics and machinery. They also have a very unique historical legacy and some odd beliefs and customs. But more than that, they are best known for their strange understanding of ‘food’…”

“Their understanding of ‘food’?” Duncan frowned. “That sounds rather loaded.”

“Elven taste buds are different from those of other races, so they always make bold, local changes to any foreign food that reaches their city-state,” Goathead said in a very tactful tone. “So I wanted to remind Miss Nina before, and tell her not to have too high an expectation for the sweet pancakes of Lightwind Harbor. People do say that Lightwind Harbor brings together the signature dishes of many city-states in the civilized world, but no one ever explains how the elves mix those foods together.”

Duncan: “…?”

“In short, elves will stuff chili peppers and old fermented cheese that has started to bubble into the sweet pancakes,” Goathead went on. “In the end they create a flavor that shakes the soul. Personally, I think it is quite creative, and at least more normal than honeyed pig intestines and sour and spicy sheep eye pie.”

Duncan listened with a blank face. After a long moment he slowly said, “It seems Nina is going to be disappointed in the southern trip…”

…

Lucretia sat in Taran Ael’s laboratory, watching the famous elven scholar on the other side of the desk as he flipped rapidly through a pile of papers stacked like a small mountain, all while stuffing an egg wrap into his mouth with a blank face and wolfing it down.

The shocking smell of the egg wrap kept assaulting the Sea Witch's nerves.

It was a traditional elven convenience food, made mainly from flatbread, eggs, fermented cheese, and a kind of fungus called "black finger mushroom". It smelled a bit like badly rotted wood, and tasted like it too. After pickling, the black finger mushrooms had the awful texture and odor of an old rag. To Lucretia, it hardly counted as food at all.

But it was Master Taran Ael's favorite, not only because it suited elven tastes, but because it was quick and easy to eat. A Grand Scholar who was not afraid of dropping dead could finish a meal with it in three minutes. Eating three of them a day covered the basics of nutrition, and all the time saved could be poured into endless research and into matching wits with the doctors.

"Oh, found it. I knew it had to be here…"

Taran Ael finally shoved the last bite of egg wrap into his mouth. As he struggled to swallow, he spoke around the food and carefully pulled a bound stack of papers out from the swaying "mountain". The pile wobbled under his hands and looked ready to collapse, but in the end it settled again in a position that seemed even more dangerous than before.

"Here you are, Lady Lucretia, the material you asked for about the ancient kingdom of Critt and its link to Vision 001. If you had come to me yesterday, I would have found it at once. Back then I had not stuffed it into this 'mountain' yet…"

Lucretia took the stack of notes and could not help glancing again at the elven scholar across from her. By age, Taran Ael was in the "golden period" for an elf. He had just entered middle age, and with a little care he would no doubt have been a refined scholar who could charm countless maidens. But his habit of working to the point of forgetting sleep and food had completely ruined all that.

Most of the time, for example right now, this elven Master's image was all huge eye bags and dark circles, hair that was a mess and shedding every day. It had once been golden, but now its color and texture were closer to yellowed dry straw. His complexion was terrible.

Lucretia had worried more than once that this Grand Scholar would drop dead right in front of her, but luckily, or unbelievably, Master Taran Ael was still stubbornly alive today.

"I very, very strongly suggest you pay attention to your health and try to build at least a slightly normal routine," the Sea Witch sighed, flipping through the pages in her hands as she could not help speaking. "Even if it is only so you can live longer and keep doing research, you should take care of your body."

"I do pay attention," Taran Ael said casually, then carefully corrected himself. "I mean, at least more than before. But special times call for special standards, Lady Lucretia. You know what the fragments that fell from Vision 001 mean for the civilized world. We have to uncover its secrets, and the sooner the better…"

"But it is obvious we have hit a bottleneck now. Until a new breakthrough appears, your 'forgetting to eat and sleep' looks more like wasted effort," Lucretia said, lifting her eyelids. "Unless we can find someone from the ancient kingdom of Critt, or a manual that explains exactly how Vision 001 came into being, I still suggest you take a few days off."

Taran Ael waved his hand irritably, as if he wanted to argue but could not find any good reason to refute her. After a few seconds of sullen silence, something suddenly occurred to him. He looked up with a trace of hesitation and said: "Lady Lucretia, as far as I know… your father is on his way here, and he is coming for that 'fallen relic', is he not?"

“Yes. As soon as he heard about the ‘Visitor from Beyond the Sky’, he set off at once. He seems to take this matter extremely seriously,” Lucretia said, her expression a bit awkward. “I was completely unprepared for that. In fact, I still am not ready for it. But why are you bringing this up now?”

“Your father hurried here as soon as he learned of the ‘fallen relic’, so he clearly knows something, Lady Lucretia. Do you think… he might be the breakthrough we need? Maybe he knows what the stone sphere at the center of that luminous geometric body really is. Maybe he knows the exact connection between the ancient kingdom of Critt and Vision 001, or even…”

“Master Taran Ael,” Lucretia cut him off, “you may be misunderstanding something. My father is an outstanding explorer. What interests him might only be the ‘strange object’ itself. And please do not forget, he spent a century in Subspace. Even my elder brother and I have to be extremely cautious when we deal with Father. Your attitude right now is a bit too… optimistic and bold.”

Taran Ael laughed. “Ah, then which do you think has a higher chance of killing me: an unhealthy lifestyle, or boldly getting close to your father?”

The corner of Lucretia’s eye twitched. She opened her mouth, about to say something, but before she could, a sudden burst of shouting and exclamations from outside the window cut her off.

“The Sun! The Sun has gone out!”

Chapter 512

The shouts coming from the street outside made Lucretia and Taran Ael pause at the same time. A moment later, they both snapped their gazes toward the window.

Warm, bright sunlight was still pouring in from outside, so in the first few seconds neither Lucretia nor Taran Ael noticed anything wrong with the environment. But very soon, they realized that the sunlight spilling through the window felt off compared to before, and the overall brightness of the sky outside had already dimmed.

Lucretia’s eyes narrowed. In the next second she burst apart with a soft bang into countless fluttering scraps of colored paper that whirled out through the window. The paper fragments spun like a whirlwind up to the roof, where they gathered again on a small platform and reshaped into the figure of the sea witch.

Lucretia raised her head and looked toward the place where the Sun should have been hanging high in the sky.

A gigantic Dark Sphere was floating silently up there. Two rune rings ran along its edge, shedding blinding golden radiance. Between those two circles of light, dim gaps kept flickering like a lamp with a loose connection, as if everything might go completely dark at any moment.

With the main luminous body plunged into darkness, the only brightness left from the Sun now came from those two rune rings. In theory, the whole city-state should already have been as dim as late evening.

Yet sunlight still bathed Lightwind Harbor. That light came from the sea not far away. The mountain-like glowing geometric body was still quietly floating on the ocean. Pale golden sunlight drifted out from that direction, keeping the city from falling into darkness. It was this light that Lucretia and Taran Ael had seen earlier in their room.

The sound of fabric scraping against stone and ragged breathing reached Lucretia's ears. She lowered her head and saw a middle?aged elf with messy short blond hair struggling up along a drainpipe.

Master Taran Ael, dragging a century's worth of shoulder and neck problems with him, had finally climbed up onto the platform.

The talent of elves was truly awe?inspiring.

"Huff… huff… Lady Lucretia, you were right… huff… I might really need a bit of exercise. Just paying attention to nutrition isn't… huff… enough to stay strong…"

"I don't believe you've been paying attention to nutrition at all. The Vital-Signs Ration only keeps your vital signs going," Lucretia said calmly. Her face stayed expressionless, but her eyes were still fixed on the Dark Sphere hanging high in the distant sky. "For now, you should look at the sky first. That problem is bigger."

Taran Ael finally caught his breath and lifted his head to look in that direction.

Under the slanting pale golden glow spreading from the sea, the Dark Sphere hanging up there looked even more eerie. Visions 001 – the Sun, which had protected this world for ten thousand years, looked terrifying after it went dark.

It was like a dreadful void that led to the End of all things, or like a dying eyeball full of rot, quietly gazing down at the entire world from the sky.

“…Oh. This looks serious…” A few words finally squeezed out of Taran Ael’s throat. His eyes, bloodshot from years of working late into the night, slowly narrowed as if he wanted to focus and see more detail on the surface of the Dark Sphere. “The worst kind of thing…”

“The city-state Guard Corps has already started maintaining order. It seems all that mechanical training day after day was good for something.” Lucretia lowered her head and looked at the streets below. Steam Walkers and tactical squads bearing the emblems of the Guard Corps and Truth Academy had already appeared at the intersections. Panicked citizens were slowly regaining control under mental guidance. Even so, the overall chaos in the district continued, and no one knew how far it would go.

Everyone in this world was always preparing for “eerie disasters”. But no matter what, the extinguishing of the Sun clearly shook ordinary people far beyond anything their drills and plans had imagined.

“I’m going back to the Radiant Star to confirm the situation,” Lucretia suddenly pulled her gaze away from the streets and quickly turned to Taran Ael. “That ship is near the falling glowing orb. It might be able to collect useful data.”

Taran Ael opened his mouth when he heard this, but before he could say anything, the sea witch in front of him had once again burst into a cloud of colorful paper scraps. In the blink of an eye they whirled off the rooftop platform and flew toward the distant harbor.

The elven Grand Scholar was simply left standing on the roof. He stared blankly for a moment, then lowered his head to look back at the direction he had just climbed up from.

“You could at least have carried me back down…”

He grumbled in frustration, slowly straightened up, and prepared to climb back down the drainpipe to the second?floor balcony. But just then, something at the edge of his vision caught his eye.

It was a nearby building: the Tower of Flowing Clouds at the city-state university. It was property of the Truth Academy, and most elves simply called it “the high tower”.

Various observation devices were mounted on top of that tower to monitor the weather and watch the sky. With its special filters and telescopes, it could even observe the Sun and other faraway objects.

“…Observing the Sun at a time like this doesn’t sound very wise…”

The elven Grand Scholar muttered this under his breath. Then he casually took a charm amulet of Rahm, God of Wisdom, from inside his coat. He pressed it to his forehead in a brief benediction, praying for the blessing of foolishness.

“All right, now I’m a fool.”

Taran Ael put the charm amulet away, took a deep breath, then quickly judged the distances and positions of the nearby rooftops. He sprinted toward the one he thought he had the best chance of reaching and leaped.

In the two seconds when he briefly broke free from gravity, felt the wind on his cheeks, and flew over the rooftop, a very valuable question suddenly rose in the mind of this elven Grand Scholar:

[Why didn’t I call my own student to help?]

…

The whole world fell into dimness. A strange daylight like dusk, but heavier and more oppressive than dusk, covered the Boundless Sea.

The extinguished giant sphere hung in the sky like a terrible void. Ever since it went dark, it had not moved again. Two rune structures circled it and shed the last “afterglow”. With the Sun extinguished, those two rings of light were almost harsh to look at.

Yet when that “blinding” light shone down on the mortal world, it could only barely drive back the darkness.

Duncan stepped onto the deck and looked up with a particularly grave expression, turning his gaze on that pitch?black sphere. He said nothing.

Everyone else had rushed out of their cabins and gathered on the deck to stare at the strange sky. Vanna was whispering a prayer. Morris frowned deeply. Shirley clutched Dog tight and hid behind Duncan. Nina held onto Duncan’s arm, her face full of panic and nervousness.

Pale golden light was already faintly rising and falling in Nina’s eyes.

Only Alice showed an unbelievable kind of “calm”. One hand on her head, she tilted her face back and stared curiously at the extinguished Sun, as if she had just discovered something new and strange. She did not look scared at all.

Lacking common sense, she seemed unable to fully understand what was happening.

A trembling mass of shadows suddenly appeared in the air near Duncan. The Shadows rapidly swelled, shrank, and gathered, forming the outline of Agatha.

“The Spirit Realm is normal, Captain,” she said quickly to Duncan. “There’s nothing wrong with the rest of the ship either.”

Duncan gave a slight nod.

As a mirror world, Agatha could move freely through the world of mirrors. She could check every cabin on the Vanished in an instant. She also had “eyes” that could see into the Spirit Realm and could constantly confirm the state of the deep layers around the Vanished. Many times, the information she observed was even more complete than what Duncan could sense.

“Captain…” Shirley hugged Dog’s head and looked up at Duncan. The face that was usually full of silly grins was now filled with fear and panic. “What’s going on… Is this what you warned us about before?”

Duncan did not answer her immediately. Instead, he frowned and studied the sky carefully. After a long while, he finally spoke in a low voice, almost to himself: “The World’s Wound hasn’t appeared.”

“The World’s Wound?” Morris, standing nearby, froze when he heard this. Then he reacted and raised his head to look at the sky. “You’re right. The World’s Wound is still hidden. That means…”

“The Sun is still working,” Duncan said with a slight nod. “Only its ‘light? emitting’ function has shut down for some reason. Its suppression of the World’s Wound is still in place.”

“Then… will the Sun light up again?” Alice suddenly turned her head and asked curiously.

Duncan had no answer.

Even so, he still nodded a little. “It should. This vast Visions system has run steadily for ten thousand years. Even if something went wrong, it shouldn’t suddenly collapse completely. At least… it shouldn’t be today.”

Alice relaxed and smiled happily. “Oh, that’s good. My quilt hasn’t finished drying yet.”

Hearing this thoughtless doll say that, Duncan couldn’t help but let out a small laugh. Then he lowered his head and ruffled Nina’s hair.

Nina looked up. Pale golden flames burned in her pupils, and the radiance of a star brewed within that fire.

She gave a small nod, then let go of Duncan’s arm.

A moment later, dazzling light suddenly surged up from the deck. In an instant, Nina turned into an arcing blaze. This shrunken solar prominence circled Duncan twice, leaping and dancing, then lightly hopped onto the mast, flew into the sky, and finally came to rest above the tallest mast of the Vanished, hovering steadily tens of meters above the top.

The arc of flame coiled there. Its fire gathered into a tiny blazing sun. sunlight once more poured down on the Vanished and on a small stretch of sea around it.

Far away in the sky, Visions 001 remained extinguished. But at least within the range illuminated by this “fragment of the Sun”, comforting warmth and light once again bathed everyone.

Duncan let out a quiet breath. He knew that, in a situation like this, light steadied people’s hearts more than anything.

“All right. Now I should go check what’s happening elsewhere.”

Chapter 513

In Pland, the extinguishing of the Sun naturally threw the entire city into chaos. But before the chaos grew truly dangerous, the city-state Guard Corps and the Guardian troops arrived in time and brought the situation under control.

The deep, mellow chimes of the small cathedral’s bells echoed over the streets. It was as if the bell?tones carried a power that calmed hearts and restored courage. Steam Walkers clanked through alleys and along main roads. Loudspeakers on their hulls broadcast the latest orders from City Hall. Gas lamps on both sides of the streets were lit in a rush. Panicked pedestrians did everything they could to hurry back to the safety of their own homes, or to dive into the nearest veil of night shelter.

Heavily armed Guardians moved swiftly through the crowds. They checked on the veil of night shelters one by one and searched the sudden darkness for any “filth” that should not appear in the Mortal Realm.

Heidi switched on every light in her home the instant she could. From gas lamps and oil lamps with holy power to bright electric lamps, she used every bit of light she had to drive away the darkness left by the Sun’s extinction—and to drive away the tension in her heart.

Her mother’s voice came from the sofa: “Relax a little, Heidi. You’ll trip if you keep running around. The world’s Doomsday hasn’t arrived yet.”

Heidi turned and saw her mother sitting on the sofa just as always. The old woman had already picked up the letters she had set aside for a moment when the darkness suddenly fell. Her expression was still gentle and calm, as if nothing that happened in this world could really affect her.

“The Sun has gone out! That’s not a small thing!” Heidi was shocked by how calm her mother was. She herself could not settle down at all. “You can still read letters right now?”

“If I put the letters down, will the Sun light up again?” Mother finally turned her head. A helpless look crossed her face. “Right now all we can do is trust City Hall and the Great Cathedral. There will be mighty beings watching over this city.”

Heidi pressed her lips together and unconsciously tightened her grip on the pendant hanging at her chest. “Damn it… If only Vanna were here. I could ask her what’s really going on… and Father isn’t home either…”

She did not notice the subtle expression that flashed across her mother’s face when she heard these muttered complaints.

The next second, the old woman shook her head.

“If the Sun really has gone out, then it’s something the whole world can see. Vanna and your father must have seen it too. They’re surely doing everything they can within their own duties. And you… you should calm down and think about your own duty now.”

Heidi finally began to settle. She frowned slightly and turned her gaze toward the nearby table.

A fine, sturdy medical case sat quietly in one corner of it.

It was filled with all the tools and medicines she used while practicing medicine. Because the city-state had been unusually calm at night for quite some time, she hadn’t needed to use the most potent things in the case for a long while.

“Many people will need mental counseling,” her mother’s soothing voice came from behind her. “I expect it won’t be long before City Hall sends someone to pick you up. The Sun has only dimmed for now. Our city hasn’t sunk.”

Heidi let out a soft breath and walked slowly toward her medical case. “All right, you’re right. The world’s Doomsday hasn’t come yet—so my overtime isn’t over either.”

“When you go out on calls, don’t forget to take your gun,” Mother reminded her gently. “Pland these days is much safer than it used to be, but the mentally broken are always dangerous. When you have to, you must use drastic means on the ‘lesion’.”

“Of course.” Heidi answered without thinking. She opened a hidden compartment at the bottom of the case. A finely crafted revolver and several spare cylinders lay quietly inside. After a quick check of the weapon, she couldn’t help sighing a little. “After all… gunpowder is also medicine.”

…

“I’ve already sent out the city-state Guard Corps. For now, we don’t need to worry about order inside Frostholm,” Tyrian said. He stood by the large floor?to?ceiling mirror in the corner of his domed office, speaking to the glass with a serious face. “The tension from the recent mirror world crisis hasn’t faded yet. The good news is that under this tension, all the emergency plans can be carried out more quickly.”

ghostly green flame burned softly on the surface of the mirror like a sheer veil. Duncan’s figure stood in the darkness behind the glass. When Tyrian finished speaking, Duncan gave a slight nod.

“Good. Have there been any signs of something supernatural in the city?”

“Nothing so far,” Tyrian replied at once. “But I’ve already assigned more people to watch places like mental hospitals in particular. The Great Cathedral is also sending people to patrol the veil of night Sanctuary Worlds, the cemeteries, and the districts where there isn’t much light…”

“In theory, within the Visions-altered Frostholm, darkness itself is no longer a dangerous factor. The only things we need to watch closely are mental collapse and widespread panic,” Duncan reminded him. “Also, you don’t need to send anyone to the cemeteries. I’ll watch that area myself.”

“Yes,” Tyrian said quickly. Then he hesitated, choosing his words with care. “How are things on your side? Nothing has gone wrong on the Vanished, has it?”

“There’s nothing here that can threaten the Vanished,” Duncan said calmly. “Nina has already lit a temporary Sun in the sky. We’re still sailing south as planned. The surrounding sea… is calmer than I expected.”

Tyrian quietly let out a breath. “Then it seems I was worrying too much.”

“Can you still reach Lightwind Harbor?” Duncan’s voice came again from the mirror. “What’s the situation with Lucretia?”

“I just contacted her. She’s just returned to the Radiant Star. There are no safety problems at the moment,” Tyrian said at once. “She said they also saw the Sun go out over Lightwind Harbor, but the chaos in that city-state is much milder than here in Frostholm. Because of that mysterious fallen relic, most of Lightwind Harbor is still covered in sunlight. The sky’s Visions are unsettling, but they don’t look as terrifying there as they do here.”

“That’s good. Stay in contact and keep a close eye on changes inside the city-state.”

“Yes,” Tyrian nodded again. After another moment’s hesitation, he slowly went on, “There’s one more situation…”

“Speak,” Duncan said with a frown in the mirror. “At a time like this, you should speak of anything.”

“…We’ve lost contact with the other city-states. All of them,” Tyrian said carefully. “Both the ones far away and those close by, like Cold Harbor. The telegraph has gone silent. The signal towers at sea aren’t responding. Even the Cathedral’s Psychic Communication can’t reach them. At present, only two city-states are barely still in touch with us: Pland and Lightwind Harbor.”

“Lost contact with the other city-states?” Duncan’s expression grew even more serious. “How long has this been going on?”

“We noticed the breakdown in communication with Cold Harbor as soon as the Sun went out. After that, we confirmed that it was the same with the other city-states,” Tyrian answered quickly. “I’ve urgently recalled every ship in the waters near Frostholm and banned all vessels from sailing out.”

As he spoke, there were still some words he did not say aloud. Ever since communications with the other city-states had broken down, a strange, heavy worry had pressed on his heart. He feared that beyond the city-states, in those parts of the Boundless Sea where sunlight no longer shone, the ocean had already turned into something people could no longer understand…

“Keep trying to reach the other city-states,” Duncan’s voice from the mirror cut off Tyrian’s thoughts. “And if there’s any new information from Lucy, contact me immediately.”

“Yes, Father.”

The communication with the Vanished ended, and the vast domed office fell quiet again.

Tyrian raised a hand and rubbed his aching brow hard.

Then he pressed the bell on his desk.

The office door opened and Aiden walked in.

Tyrian looked up and gave an order to his most loyal subordinate:

“Keep a close eye on any ships returning from the dark. Until the Sun lights up again, don’t let them approach the city-state rashly. mark out a ‘buffer zone’ in the Nearshore Waters. Have the returning ships wait there for inspection and clearance.”

…

The mirror in front of Duncan slowly grew calm again. The ghostly green flame retreated for now to a corner along the frame. Duncan let out a quiet breath and turned his head to look out the window.

Brilliant sunlight still shone on the deck of the Vanished and over a broad stretch of sea around it. But beyond the reach of that sunlight, the Boundless Sea remained drowned in an eerie, absolute darkness.

It was a deeply unsettling time. Even Goathead, usually the noisiest presence on board, lay silent on the enchanted sea chart table.

Only Alice was still happily spreading quilts out to dry on the deck…

Duncan rubbed his forehead, trying hard not to pay attention to the figure busy with the quilts. He focused his mind instead and silently called to the flame hovering in the sky.

“Nina, how are things up there? Are you tired?”

“Not tired at all.” Thanks to the resonance of the Power of Flame, Nina’s voice rang in Duncan’s mind almost at once. “I’m not very high up. I can stay here for a very, very long time!”

“Can you see anything on the sea around us?”

“Mm… no. There’s nothing at all on the sea around us. Not even a little wind or waves. Uncle Duncan, did you think of something?”

“Nothing for now. But keep watching the sea at all times—especially the waters at the boundary between light and dark,” Duncan said slowly. “If any ships or anything like that appear nearby, tell me immediately.”

Nina answered at once: “Okay!”

Duncan made a soft sound in his throat and ended the link with Nina. Then he looked at the mirror in front of him, steadied himself a little, and reached out to brush the surface.

“Lawrence, how are things on your side?”

Chapter 514: Lighting Up

After the Sun went out, its remaining faint glow hung high in the sky. That weak light could not brighten the sea. It only made the whole world look even darker and more frightening.

The White Oak sailed through the depths of this darkness.

Lights on the ship were already on. The glow of oil lamps and electric fixtures mingled and spread out, lighting up a small patch of sea nearby. The small waves rose and fell in that weak light and somehow looked thick and ominous.

Lawrence held the wheel and answered the voice in his mind: "…The White Oak is still in good shape here. Aside from the sailors being a little nervous, nothing has gone wrong on board. But the area around us has fallen into darkness, and we have lost contact with the other ships on the route. Navigation has also failed, and the Stargazing Room can only see pitch black."

Duncan's voice echoed directly in his mind: "Can you reach Cold Harbor, the closest city-state to you? You should have left that city-state not long ago."

"No," Lawrence said. He glanced back at the communications console not far away and saw that all the lights on the machine were red. "All communications are down. The priest tried to use Psychic Resonance to reach Cold Harbor's Cathedral, but there was no response—only the Psychic Resonance with Pland is barely holding."

“Pland is fine, and Frostholm is also all right. Right now, aside from Frostholm, Pland, and Lightwind Harbor, we have lost contact with every other city-state. It feels… as if they all vanished after the Sun went out.”

Hearing Captain Duncan’s description, Lawrence’s expression slowly tightened. He swallowed hard, as if afraid to keep imagining what it might mean.

Then he lowered his head and glanced at the instrument panel beside the wheel, quickly checking each reading.

“We are sailing at full speed toward Pland. This is a very busy route. In theory, we should soon see a relay port—that is an island under the city-state of Lunsa. We will check the situation there and report to you at once…”

Lawrence spoke quickly in his mind, but before he finished, a sudden rush of footsteps cut off what he was about to say.

A crew member ran into the bridge in a panic: “Captain! Captain! You need to come see this! That ‘Sailor’ found something big!”

“Anomaly077?” Lawrence’s expression tightened at once. He turned to the First Mate beside him: “Gus, take the wheel. I’ll go take a look!”

Gus stepped forward at once: “Yes, Captain!”

Lawrence left the bridge in a hurry. Led by the crew member, he rushed down the stairs and through the corridors to the aft deck of the White Oak. As soon as he arrived, he saw a thin, shriveled figure busily moving along the edge of the stern deck.

Anomaly077, that bizarre living mummified corpse, was fiddling with something beside a huge iron barrel. He worked while muttering nonstop. Lawrence walked closer before he finally heard what the corpse kept muttering: “We’re done, we’re done, we’re finished this time. No one is getting away, no one is going back. The whole world is doomed. I might as well just sleep myself to death…”

This guy was overflowing with negative energy as always.

Lawrence did not want to hear Anomaly077 mutter any longer. He strode forward in two quick steps and cut him off loudly: “What are you doing?”

The mummified corpse jolted, as if waking from a dream, and quickly bowed and nodded: “Captain! Captain, you’re here… Oh, good, now that the Captain is here, everything feels safer…”

“Enough, enough,” Lawrence waved his hand and asked again, “What exactly are you doing?”

“You have to see this, you have to look at this…” the mummified corpse said in a panic. He hurried over to the iron barrel and stirred inside with a big pair of tongs. A thick, oily sound came from within.

Only now did Lawrence see that the barrel was full of fuel. Anomaly077 was using the tongs to stir a rag in the grease. Then the mummified corpse lifted out the oil-soaked wad of cloth, pulled out a lighter he had somehow gotten from a crew member, and lit the cloth.

Under Lawrence’s frowning gaze, Anomaly077 hurled the burning rag out toward the sea. The fireball hit the surface and, carried by the waves, quickly drifted toward the rear of the White Oak.

Anomaly077 muttered: “This is how sailors used to roughly measure speed —back before you people invented all those fancy instruments. It isn’t very accurate, but it’s useful…”

“I know. I’ve read about this,” Lawrence cut him off. “But what exactly do you want me to see?”

Sailor waved his hands hard and pointed into the distance: “Just keep watching. It’s almost there. Keep your eyes on that flame drifting away…”

Lawrence frowned and turned his head, staring at the flame floating on the sea. It was rapidly drifting toward the stern of the White Oak, which was only natural. The White Oak was moving at full speed, so there was nothing strange about it.

Until the flame suddenly stopped in the distance.

Lawrence’s gaze sharpened at once.

That fireball, which should have kept drifting away until the waves swallowed it or it passed beyond the limit of sight, stopped out there.

By a rough estimate, that spot was only a few hundred meters from the White Oak.

Lawrence stared hard in that direction, watching the flame that had stopped a few hundred meters behind the White Oak. It looked as if the fire was sailing at the same speed as the White Oak, following right behind it. Only after a long time did the flame slowly dim and finally go out at the edge of the dark water.

Sailor picked up another rag with the tongs, soaked it in oil, lit it, and threw it into the water.

The second ball of fire hit the water, quickly drifted backward, and then stopped at the same distance.

Anomaly077 finally tossed the tongs aside. He turned to look at Lawrence, his thin, ghastly face twisting into a miserable expression: “Captain, look… How are we supposed to explain this with science?”

This time, Lawrence did not tease this “Anomaly” for being obsessed with explaining everything with science like he usually did. He simply stood quietly at the edge of the deck. After a long while, he seemed to murmur to himself: “Did you see that?”

Anomaly077 beside him froze for a second: “Huh? Who are you talking to?”

Lawrence did not answer. Instead, Duncan’s deep, solemn voice sounded in his mind: “I saw it. I saw it very clearly through your shared sight.”

“How… do you see this phenomenon?” Lawrence asked carefully.

“The laws of physics are becoming strange. It is very likely some kind of ‘distortion’ in the field of space, or perhaps something deeper in the deep layers. In any case, after sunlight went out, the Boundless Sea began changing rapidly—and only the White Oak and the small area around it are still normal for now.”

Lawrence thought for a moment, then spoke hesitantly: “Is this your power at work…?”

“Perhaps. But I also need time to figure out the cause.”

Listening to the voice in his mind and staring at the dark, chaotic sea in the distance, Lawrence fell into deep thought.

Right then, a strange, low sound broke his thoughts. It seemed to come from the sky, yet also echoed through the whole world.

It was a weird, sluggish hum, like a giant beast struggling to breathe, or some unimaginably huge device slowly starting up. It sounded faint and far away, yet also seemed to fill the whole world, echoing in everyone’s ears.

Lawrence looked up in shock at the extinguished Sun.

The double rune rings around the Sun were flickering, their light rising and falling. As the rune rings flickered, faint threads of radiance slowly appeared on the Dark Sphere at the center of Visions001.

Those thin strands of light were at first weak and reddish, like veins of blood. Then they began to spread over the whole sphere and quickly grew bright…

…

The huge glowing geometric body floated above the sea. The even sunlight it released shone over Lightwind Harbor not far away, and over the Radiant Star moored by the floating docks.

On the highest research platform of the Radiant Star, Lucretia stared intently at the large circular crystal lens before her.

A faint blue glow floated around the crystal lens, while the center of the lens showed bands of shifting color, bright and dark.

The clockwork doll Lunie stood near Lucretia. As she adjusted the dizzying array of observation instruments with her precise, nimble hands, she reported to her Mistress: “Starting just now, there have been these strange ‘signals’ mixed into the sunlight released by the glowing geometric body. They can’t be seen with the naked eye, but the ship’s observation lenses can catch them. What we see is this pattern of bright and dark ripples that keep rising and falling…”

Lucretia raised her head and looked toward the front of the room. This research platform was enclosed, but there was a special window at the far end. sunlight from the glowing geometric body passed through that window into the room, then went through a complex lens array device. In the end it was split into Spectral Charts and projected onto special observation equipment. She had designed and built this entire system herself.

It was a large apparatus she had built specifically to study the glowing geometric body—and now it was doing its job.

Lucretia looked back and glanced at the Recording Engine on the table beside her. The machine was steadily feeding out a long strip of paper. On that paper, the changes in the spectrum captured by the lens system were recorded as jumping black lines with a clear, regular pattern.

“These ‘Light-Signals’ are patterned…” she said softly.

“Yes,” Lunie the doll nodded. “Each group of signals has a sending period of twelve seconds. They repeat three times, then pause for thirty seconds, and then appear again.”

“Are they being sent from that ‘stone sphere’?”

“It’s hard to say. People from the Truth Academy are monitoring the area around the stone sphere, but they haven’t seen any changes in the sphere itself. These Light-Signals seem more like they are appearing out of thin air in the bright region around the sphere…”

Lunie the doll stopped halfway through her sentence.

“Mistress, the Light-Signals have stopped.”

Lucretia stared in surprise at the crystal lens in front of her.

Those bright and dark, shifting colors had vanished.

She was dazed for a moment. Then she seemed to think of something. Her figure suddenly broke apart and turned into a storm of colorful paper slips that whirled out through the window.

The colored paper slips fluttered above the deck and quickly gathered together again. Lucretia stood on the upper deck of the Radiant Star, narrowed her eyes, and looked up at the sky.

Through the pale golden sunlight spread over the sea, she saw an especially bright glowing orb hanging high in the sky.

The Sun had lit up again.

Chapter 515: After the Sun Rekindled

The Sun had lit up again.

After being extinguished for a full twelve hours, the Dark Sphere hanging motionless in the sky once again became “the Sun” that brought warmth and light to this world, and it began to move again.

In Pland, in Frostholm, in Lightwind Harbor, everyone who had seen the Sun go out now saw Visions001 restored again.

However, the terror caused by the Sun’s extinction did not fade so easily. Residents in the city-states were still uneasy. Scholars and priests looked at the relit Sun with the same confusion and tension they had felt when they watched it go out. The cities’ administrators were still trying to confirm the situation in other cities. Everyone was desperate to know—what had happened?

The swirling colored paper swept across the deck like a gust of wind, passed through a window, and fell into the captain’s cabin. Lucretia’s figure gathered from the paper slips. She stepped up to her scrying crystal, activated it, and waited a little anxiously for the reply from the other side.

As soon as Tyrian’s image appeared, she spoke quickly: “I can see that the Sun has lit up again from here. What is it like on your side?”

“Of course it has here too. At least for now, it looks like we are still looking at the same Sun,” Tyrian said. There was a hint of fatigue in his eyes, but he still seemed in good shape. “I may need some time before I can calm the mood in the city. Right now everyone is afraid the sky above their heads will fall into darkness again…”

“…The Sun is a symbol of safety. It has sheltered our days for ten thousand years without change. In other words, once it goes out even once, the most basic, solid sense of ‘safety’ in everyone’s hearts is badly damaged,” Lucretia sighed and voiced what she was thinking. “No one can help worrying about it. Not even me.”

“Did you gather any useful information while the Sun was out?” Tyrian asked. “You have all kinds of instruments over there…”

Lucretia nodded at once: “Yes. After the Sun went out, a set of observation devices I set up on the Radiant Star received strange signals coming from inside that ‘glowing geometric body’. Once I sort out the data, I’ll send you a copy. See if the scholars in Frostholm can make anything of it. Later, I also need to go to Lightwind Harbor again and check whether the monitoring devices the Truth Academy placed around the city found anything…”

“All right. I’ll wait for your news.”

Lucretia made a small sound of assent. Then she hesitated for a few seconds before speaking: “How is Father? He was still at sea when the Sun went out…”

“I’ve been in touch with him the whole time. Everything on the Vanished is normal, maybe even… better than in the city,” Tyrian let out a breath. “I’ll contact him again later. Don’t worry. If I sense anything wrong… I’ll tell you at once.”

Lucretia nodded lightly. After saying goodbye to her Big Brother, she casually extinguished the scrying crystal in front of her.

…

On the Vanished, in the captain’s cabin, the image of Lawrence, captain of the White Oak, appeared in the Oval Scrying Mirror before Duncan. Lawrence was reporting the latest situation:

“The sea around the White Oak has returned to normal. That strange phenomenon hasn’t appeared again. It seems that as the Sun lit up again, everything started going back on track…”

“How is navigation?”

“The Stargazing Room can see the ‘Starry Sky’ again,” Lawrence said with a quick nod. “But the Spirit Realm lenses still need some time to recalibrate. For now, we can roughly tell that the White Oak has not drifted too far off course.”

“Good. Report to me at once if anything else happens.”

The illusory spirit form flames around the edge of the mirror rose and fell, and Lawrence’s image in the mirror slowly faded. Duncan still stood before the now-normal mirror, frowning in thought.

The Sun had recovered. The situation was more or less what he had first expected. Visions001 was indeed having problems, but this huge, ancient “device” would not fully collapse in a short time. It might keep going for a long while yet, through repeated failures and repairs. Today’s extinction was only temporary—and, in the same way, its rekindling was also temporary.

More than the Sun’s brief extinction, what Duncan cared about now were the other things: the strange phenomena that had happened after the Sun went out.

The first strange phenomenon was the loss of contact with every city-state except Pland, Lightwind Harbor, and Frostholm.

If all communication across the Boundless Sea had gone down, it would have been less troubling. But three city-states had stayed normal. If Pland and Frostholm were special because they had become “Visions”, then what about Lightwind Harbor?

The second strange phenomenon was even more puzzling than the “lost communication”: what exactly was that “boundary” the White Oak had observed?

A burning bundle of cloth thrown from the ship into the sea should, in theory, keep drifting away in the direction opposite the ship’s course. Yet while the Sun was out, those bundles all “stopped” near some “boundary” after drifting only a few hundred meters…

And according to Lawrence’s report just now, once the Sun lit up again, this strange phenomenon vanished as well. The mummified corpse “Sailor” had run several more tests to confirm it.

Duncan furrowed his brows tightly.

The phenomenon the White Oak had observed was actually tiny in scale. Compared to the “loss of contact” across all the city-states on the Boundless Sea, that “boundary” was limited to the space around a single ship. But what lay behind that phenomenon seemed far beyond imagination.

Vaguely, Duncan felt he had brushed against some crucial “secret” of the Boundless Sea. The “true face” of this whole world seemed to be hidden in those twelve hours after the Sun went out.

Just then, a call from far away suddenly broke his train of thought.

Duncan came back to himself at once and glanced over the mirror before him.

In the next second, the translucent spirit form flames once again wrapped around the mirror. The depths of the mirror turned pitch-black, and Tyrian’s figure appeared within.

“Father, over there you…”

“Everything is fine here. The Sun has recovered, hasn’t it?” Duncan cut him off before he could finish. “How is Frostholm?”

“Everything is fine here in Frostholm,” Tyrian answered at once. “With you ‘watching over’ the cemetery, the pressure on the Church and City Hall has dropped a lot. Order across the city is under control now, but the citizens’ fear will need time to calm. I’ll call a meeting later to discuss how to explain the Sun’s extinction to ordinary people…”

Duncan noticed that while Tyrian spoke, he kept sneaking glances this way, as if… carefully watching for changes in Duncan’s expression.

He quickly understood why.

“Relax. I’m still me. I have not been swapped out for something from Subspace just because the Sun went out for a short while,” Duncan said with a calm smile, speaking the blunt truth. “If you don’t believe me, go to the cemetery and confirm it face-to-face with my ‘avatar form’?”

“Ah, no, I didn’t mean anything like that!” Tyrian explained in a rush. “It’s just… Lucy was a bit worried about you…”

“I know,” Duncan cut him off and waved casually. “But you can relax. My mental health is perfectly fine. Instead of worrying about me, tell me about the city. Has communication with the other city-states been restored?”

“We can receive signals from Cold Harbor now, and Psychic Communication with other distant city-states has also been restored,” Tyrian said with a nod. “I’ve already sent people to ask about the situation in each city-state. We should soon…”

He stopped suddenly at that point, and his gaze shifted to the side.

It seemed someone had entered the domed office and was reporting something to him.

Duncan did not speak. He immediately withdrew his gaze and hid the link between the mirrors. This was to avoid frightening the “ordinary person” on that side.

After a few minutes, the flames around the edge of the mirror burned up again. Duncan heard Tyrian calling him and turned his gaze back to the mirror.

Tyrian’s image appeared in the mirror again, and this time he clearly still looked stunned.

Duncan noticed the change in his expression and frowned slightly: “What happened?”

“We… just got in touch with Cold Harbor and asked about what happened in their city-state while the Sun was out,” Tyrian said slowly, as if weighing every word. “They were very surprised. They have no idea that the Sun ever went out!”

Duncan’s expression hardened at once.

After more than ten seconds, he seemed to think of something and broke the silence in a grave tone: “Be clear. Is it that the people in Cold Harbor never saw the Sun go out? Or is it that they never experienced those twelve hours at all?”

Tyrian froze for a moment, then quickly grasped what Duncan meant.

“You mean…”

“Confirm it again. See whether Cold Harbor has any record of a break in communication with Frostholm. If, in their view, the whole world was always normal and their link with Frostholm was never cut… then this is much more complicated than we thought.”

“Yes, I’ll check at once,” Tyrian said quickly. “And I’ll confirm with the other city-states one by one!”

Duncan nodded and waved away the flickering flames around the mirror. Just as he was about to think this through, Goathead’s startled shout suddenly came from not far away: “Captain! Something’s not right! Come take a look at the enchanted sea chart!”

“enchanted sea chart?”

Puzzled, Duncan turned and quickly walked over to the chart table. His eyes swept over the eerie enchanted sea chart, wreathed in mist.

In the next second, he saw the projection of the Vanished on the enchanted sea chart and… a city-state marker slowly appearing beside that projection.

“We’re… near Lightwind Harbor?”

Chapter 516: Approaching

“At our current speed, we will reach the waters around Lightwind Harbor in a day. But that is only what the enchanted sea chart shows. As for whether the Vanished is actually in these waters right now, we still have to confirm it. After all… this is far too unbelievable.”

Goathead’s tone carried both gravity and hesitation, and ever since Duncan had met this thing, he had rarely heard it react like this.

There was no doubt that what was happening to the Vanished now had already gone far beyond this “First Mate’s” experience.

Duncan braced both hands on the edge of the chart table, his expression grave as he stared at the patch of slowly rippling mist on the enchanted sea chart. Between the pale outline of the Vanished and the route to the north, swaths of mist now floated—this was the route the Vanished should have sailed along, yet it was still shrouded in fog.

“…During the twelve hours when the Sun went out, we directly ‘skipped’ the entire stretch of voyage from the northern route to the southern seas, and not even you know how it happened,” Duncan raised his eyes and looked at Goathead on the edge of the table. “But during that same period, the White Oak on the Boundless Sea did not experience this. They still more or less kept to the proper sailing path.”

“…I don’t know how to explain this, Captain,” Goathead’s head swayed slightly, looking embarrassed and uneasy. “The Vanished and the White Oak have both gone through your flame’s Baptism, but the two ships are far too different. Any tiny difference in detail could be the reason this happened…”

Duncan did not speak for a moment. His face remained solemn as he sank into thought for more than ten seconds. Then he suddenly seemed to think of something and broke the silence: “When did the enchanted sea chart change?”

This time Goathead answered unusually fast: “Just now, when the Sun lit up again.”

“Are you sure?” Duncan knew the other would not lie to him, but he still asked out of habit.

“Positive,” Goathead nodded up and down. “I have been watching everything related to ‘navigation’, including any movement on the enchanted sea chart. While the Sun was out, the enchanted sea chart did not change at all, as if we were standing still. Only after the Sun lit up again did the enchanted sea chart start showing some… confusion. It was like the chaos we see every time we rise from the Spirit Realm back into the Mortal Realm. I thought it was just recalibrating itself, but when it finally stabilized, it showed that the Vanished was already near Lightwind Harbor…”

Duncan listened carefully to Goathead’s explanation. Suddenly he frowned: “So this ‘jump’ most likely happened at the very moment the Sun rekindled…”

Goathead slowly nodded.

The captain’s cabin fell into a heavy silence.

Duncan did not know what Goathead was thinking. He only knew that his own mind was full of chaotic guesses and countless questions, and all of them seemed to circle one single core: during the Sun's extinction and rekindling, what exactly had changed in the Boundless Sea?

At first, he had only thought it was a temporary darkness, just like when the Sun had risen more than ten minutes late before. During that delayed sunrise, aside from the people who sensed it and felt nervous and afraid, the entire world had seemed completely unaffected.

But very soon, he realized that this time the Sun's extinction had caused many things to go wrong—communications between city-states had been cut off, and the White Oak had witnessed that strange "boundary" out at sea.

And now, after the Sun lit up again, he discovered that the eerie impact of this event went far beyond those things—the entire Vanished had "teleported" over two-thirds of its route and appeared directly near Lightwind Harbor, while Tyrian reported that the other city-states had no idea the Sun had ever gone out at all…

It was as if, in the brief switch between the Sun's "extinction" and "rekindling", the whole world had briefly taken on a bizarre "form", sprouting rifts and dissonances everywhere. And the Vanished, this "ghost ship" that sailed at the edge of the Mortal Realm, had crossed that torn "chasm" for a short, lucid moment.

A terrifying idea burst into Duncan's mind before he could suppress it—

What was the Sun's true role?

Was it only there to provide light and heat, and to suppress the world's "supernatural corruption"? What was it actually suppressing—the supernatural corruption in this world… or the world itself?

"…Captain," Goathead's voice suddenly came from beside him, breaking Duncan's thoughts. "What do we do next? If the Vanished really is already near Lightwind Harbor… should we contact Miss Lucretia?”

“…First we confirm our surroundings. Don’t approach the city-state rashly,” Duncan thought for a moment. He could not help remembering his earlier experiences in Pland and Frostholm, and he shook his head on instinct. “Have the Vanished hide in the Shadows and the fog. We’ll contact Lucretia when the time is right.”

Goathead’s head immediately drooped. “Yes, Captain.”

Duncan grunted in acknowledgement, then walked to the Oval Scrying Mirror in the corner of the room and tapped lightly on its surface.

Shadowy light rippled across the mirror. In the blink of an eye, Agatha appeared before him, dressed like a female adventurer.

“I really didn’t expect my first long voyage with you to be this incredible,” Agatha sighed. “Just as you said: by setting out with the Vanished, I would witness every unbelievable thing in this world. I really was too conservative in my imagination before we left.”

“Too much excitement for you?”

“It’s not so bad. Luckily I no longer have a heart that starts pounding at the slightest scare,” Agatha smiled faintly. “Next, you want me to watch for changes in the Spirit Realm, right?”

“The Spirit Realm, and those ‘reflections’ moving between the Spirit Realm and the Mortal Realm. If you can, keep an eye on what’s happening below the surface of the sea as well,” Duncan said bluntly. “I can’t shake the feeling that even though the Sun has lit up again, the aftereffects of this event are far from over. A little extra caution won’t hurt.”

“Understood,” Agatha put away her smile and nodded solemnly, then quickly added, “Ah, according to the ship’s rules, I should say it like this—yes, Captain!”

The figure in the mirror slowly faded.

Duncan's expression remained grave as he stood before the mirror in quiet thought.

…

Colorful paper scraps whirled over the streets, spiraled past the uneven rooftops and the gaps between buildings, and finally flew into a structure near the city-state's university—into the research room of the elven Grand Scholar Taran Ael.

Lucretia's form gathered out of the swirling paper.

A second later, the "Sea Witch" frowned in puzzlement.

She did not see the elven Grand Scholar anywhere in the room.

"…Don't tell me he's still stuck on the roof," Lucretia muttered, glancing at the nearby window that still stood open.

She was just about to fly up to the roof to check whether the elven Grand Scholar was stranded up there when hurried footsteps suddenly sounded from the corridor outside, breaking her movement.

Listening to the noise in the hallway, Lucretia casually flicked a hand toward the door.

With a bang, the door flew open. A stream of Shadows shot out along the line of her pointing finger into the corridor. Screams and the thud of someone falling followed. Moments later, an apprentice who was flailing and desperately trying to get back on his feet was "invited" into the room.

The apprentice came in lying down. It looked as if he were gliding ten centimeters above the floor into the room. Only when he finally stopped did the things "carrying" him swarm out from under his body—countless toy soldiers scrambled out from beneath the apprentice, quickly formed up in ranks on the floor, then marched in step to the beat of drums and horns and darted back into the Shadows at Lucretia's side.

The apprentice who had been "invited" in stared in terror at the toy soldiers running across the floor. Only then did his gaze move to the master of those soldiers and Shadows. He lifted his head and saw Lucretia standing by the window, and at last realized who this faintly familiar lady was.

"Witch… ah, Lady Lucretia!" The apprentice scrambled upright and hurried to greet this big shot wreathed in legends and reputation. "Goo… good afternoon…"

As he spoke, he suddenly twitched. A tiny toy soldier crawled out of his pocket, fell to the floor, and smashed apart into several pieces. But in the next instant, the toy soldier reassembled, flipped to its feet, and sprinted back to its mistress, diving into the Shadows.

Lucretia ignored both the young apprentice's panicked awkwardness and the toy soldier that had fallen behind. She went straight to the point: "I'm here for your teacher. Where did he go?"

"I was just on my way to find him too," the apprentice swallowed hard and quickly answered this "witch" who was rumored to be cold and withdrawn, skilled in curses, and as fickle as the sea itself. "Someone saw him go to the Tower of Flowing Clouds when the Sun went out. He went… from the university roof…"

Lucretia raised an eyebrow. "From the university roof?"

"Y-yes, someone saw him. He seemed to be in a big hurry… and he still hasn't come back. I'm worried something happened to him…"

"Something would have to happen. With a hundred years of shoulder and neck problems, he's still scrambling over rooftops at the university— even as an elf, he shouldn't be trying extreme sports like that," Lucretia said offhandedly, then waved at the young apprentice. “I’ll go check on him. By the way, what’s your name?”

The apprentice snapped to attention. “Jo… Joshua Dino.”

“Good. I’ll tell your teacher to dock three points from your conduct assessment.”

Joshua froze. “Why?”

Lucretia’s figure had already burst apart into a cloud of colorful paper, spiraling out through the window. Only one vague sentence drifted back to the young apprentice’s ears—

“…No running in the research building.”

Chapter 517: Slumber

The whirling paper scraps spun over the academy's roofs, followed the outer wall of the "high tower" all the way up, and reached the observation deck at the very top. There, at the edge of the platform, they gathered again into Lucretia's form.

The wide observation platform was very quiet. There was no sign of anyone.

Lucretia frowned and carefully examined the situation at the top of the tower.

The instruments for recording astronomical data were still running automatically. The massive lens array, held up by a forest of complicated mechanical arms, pointed its focus toward the sky. Three sets of lenses with filtering structures had been removed for the moment. From the looks of it, that part had been adjusted by hand.

The platform was empty—its original staff had probably evacuated in a hurry when the Sun went out. But the operating state of the lens array showed that someone had indeed come up here during the Sun's extinction and used this equipment to observe the Sun.

"…It was not a wise idea to observe the Sun under those conditions," Lucretia could not help murmuring.

She began to search near the lens array for any sign of Master Taran Ael. Just then, a pencil lying on the floor entered her field of view.

She ran over at once and finally found the elven scholar buried among a cluster of steaming pneumatic tube lines—Taran Ael lay quietly on the ground, eyes closed, as if he were in a deep coma.

Lucretia immediately knelt to check the elven scholar's condition. She found that his breathing was still steady and there was no sign his life was in danger. He had simply lost consciousness for some unknown reason. Then she waved a hand in the air—a crowd of toy soldiers rushed out from the Shadows at her feet, formed neat ranks, and charged toward the unconscious Grand Scholar.

The toy soldiers surrounded Taran Ael in an instant. They scrambled up and down his body, inspecting him as if checking a battlefield, their movements accompanied by rapid exchanges and reports. As they moved, Lucretia's expression gradually changed.

There were no external wounds. It was not a physical attack. There were no traces of poison or any curse.

The Sea Witch bent down and lifted the Grand Scholar's eyelids, then slapped his face without the slightest politeness, trying to rouse Taran Ael. It had no effect.

"He just seems to have fallen into some unknown sleep… hm?"

Lucretia let out a puzzled hum as she muttered to herself. Two toy soldiers had just pried open one of Taran Ael's hands, which had been clamped tightly to his chest. A sheet of rough sketch paper, nearly torn by his grip, came into view.

"What is this…"

Curious, Lucretia picked up the paper and smoothed it out. She saw only a roughly drawn circular shape, filled with many complex, chaotic lines. She stared at it for a long time and still could not find any pattern in those strokes. They only felt like crisscrossing branches, or some tightly packed structure.

Clearly, whoever had drawn these patterns had done so in a rush and under intense confusion. Many of the lines on the paper showed hesitant smears. That meant the artist had not been sure what he was seeing—or had been unable to accurately reproduce the “truth” he had witnessed.

Lucretia stared at the sketch with a grave expression, then narrowed her eyes and looked up at the Sun that had already lit the sky again. She lowered her gaze to the fallen pencil, then to the pneumatic tube lines by Taran Ael’s side that led back toward the academy. In short order, she pieced together what had happened to the elven scholar.

When the Sun went out, the Grand Scholar had rushed up to the tower. He had wanted to use these “conditions”—something no number of filters or lenses could normally achieve—to observe the surface details of Vision 001. He had managed to draw a rough sketch and had then tried to send it to the academy at once through the “express dispatch” system. But at that very moment, some mysterious force had “struck” him, plunging him into instant slumber. He must have retained a few final shreds of awareness in the instant he fell—the way he clutched the sketch to his chest proved that…

But what had “struck” him? A saboteur who had infiltrated the tower? Or a mental corruption triggered by observing the Sun in its extinguished state?

Lucretia shook her head. It probably was not a saboteur.

The reason was simple. After Taran Ael had lost the ability to resist, he had suffered no further harm. The sketch he had guarded so tightly had not been stolen. None of the tower’s devices showed any signs of damage. No “intruder” would take such a huge risk to break into the tower only to make an elven scholar take a nap.

Just then, the grinding noise of the shaft lift cut off the Sea Witch's thoughts.

She turned toward the sound and saw the door of the shaft lift at the side of the platform slide open. Several scholars from the Truth Academy rushed out, their faces full of panic.

They froze when they noticed the Sea Witch standing on the tower top.

"Taran Ael observed the Sun while it was extinguished, and now he has fallen into an unexplained sleep," Lucretia said casually to the scholars, then raised the sketch in her hand. "I suggest you purify all the equipment here, in case some of the lenses that showed Vision 001's 'true form' were also tainted by corruption."

"This is what he drew before he lost consciousness. I'm taking it with me to confirm that it doesn't carry any corruption. If it's clean, I'll hand it back to you."

Without waiting for their response, she turned and walked toward the edge of the platform. Her body burst into colorful scraps of paper once more and rode the wind into the distance.

The scholars who had rushed here in a hurry after hearing the students' report only came back to themselves now. Watching the fading trail of paper, one of them could not help murmuring: "That witch really is…"

"Free to come and go. She's always been like that," another waved a hand and strode over to where Taran Ael still lay. "Let's get Master to a safe place first."

"She took the notes Master Taran Ael left behind… there won't be any problem, will there?" a younger human scholar asked worriedly. He clearly did not feel entirely at ease about the Sea Witch.

“Relax. Lady Lucretia may be eccentric and do as she pleases, but she has worked with the Truth Academy and the Explorer Association many times. She’s… a friend,” a middle-aged scholar said as he spoke, bending over to lift Taran Ael’s arm. “She’s the best border scholar and anti-corruption expert in the world. She has helped the academy handle many dangerous things. She will keep her promi—good grief, why is he so heavy?”

“You eat junk food every day, stay up all night, and never exercise. You’re just as heavy.”

“But I heard elves have a different constitution from other races. You have long lifespans and powerful metabolisms. Before you reach old age, it’s hard for you to put on fat, and you rarely get sick…”

“His talent did its best. It just couldn’t hold out…”

…

In the city-state of Pland, in a medical facility run by the council.

Heidi stood in the corridor, looking through the glass at the patient lying quietly in the ward. Then she turned to the council clerk who had brought her here and asked: “What’s the patient’s condition?”

“Deep sleep. We can’t wake her. There are no signs of external injury or poisoning,” the staff member in a dark blue uniform answered at once. “The patient had no prior chronic illnesses and has never been exposed to any potion or heretical faith that could cause this kind of sleep.”

“You’ve investigated pretty thoroughly,” Heidi said without thinking, then shook her head. “But I still have to say this: I’m a psychiatrist, not an internal medicine doctor. What I’m good at is dealing with problems of the mind and spirit, not sleep disorders. Someone who won’t wake up can’t exactly undergo counseling—you really should be calling a proper doctor, shouldn’t you?”

“We did, Heidi. The doctors concluded that the patient’s sleep has nothing to do with any physical illness,” the staffer said with a shake of his head. “After a full round of tests, we began to suspect…”

“…I understand,” Heidi cut him off gently. “You suspect it’s related to mental corruption or a mind-level Anomaly, right? But you just said the patient hasn’t been in contact with any sources of corruption.”

“That’s only the result of our preliminary investigation. There are many ways for mental corruption to spread. It doesn’t always require someone to actively touch something. They might simply ‘learn’ a certain piece of knowledge by chance, or maybe…”

He trailed off. Then he raised a hand and pointed upward, his face turning serious.

“Maybe it’s connected to the Sun’s extinction earlier. Right now we have no evidence that those twelve hours when the Sun went out can affect an ordinary person—but the patient in front of you might be the first ‘proof’.”

“I see. Then this is my field,” Heidi drew a slow breath, picked up her medical case, and walked toward the ward door. Just before she went in, she turned back to remind him: “Don’t let anyone approach during the treatment. If any supernatural phenomena occur near this room, inform the priests and guardians here at once.”

“Understood, Heidi.”

Heidi nodded and pushed the door open.

The smell of disinfectant mixed with holy oil and incense filled her nose. In the bright, spacious ward, a single patient lay on the only bed.

Heidi silently recited the name of the God of Wisdom, Rahm, in her heart, then checked the charm amulet of colored stones on her wrist and carefully approached the bed.

A young maiden lay there with her eyes closed, as if trapped deep in an uneasy dream, so still it looked as though… the link between her body and soul had already been severed.

Before opening her case, Heidi first did what she always did—she studied the patient's face.

"An elf?"

Chapter 518: Treatment, ritual, and Gunpowder

When Heidi saw that her new patient was an Elf, she felt a bit surprised.

She rarely treated Elf patients. It was not just psychiatrists like her. Most other kinds of doctors also usually did not deal with Elves.

The Elven race had a body that made other races envious. Besides their long lifespans, they almost never became sick. Most of the time they were unbelievably healthy and could live well even in harsh conditions. Along with their strong bodies, their minds were usually very tough. Maybe to adapt to their long lives, Elves had very stable mental states. They were not as strong as the Senkin, who were known as having “stone hearts”, but they were much stronger than Humans.

Because of these gifts, many great pioneers and adventurers in history had Elven blood. They were good at, and dared to, move through the “border” seas. They could survive the dangerous fog and illusions there and still return home. Now, among the many city-states on the Boundless Sea, almost two-thirds of the “border” city-states near the eternal Veil had been founded by Elven pioneers. The most famous of them was Lightwind Harbor, the city of adventure.

In all Heidi’s years working as a psychiatrist, she had almost never heard of an Elf with psychological problems.

Of course, mortals always had weaknesses. Even Elves with such great “talent” were no exception. Compared with Humans, they grew slowly and learned more slowly. Their minds were so tough that holy powers could hardly bless them at all. Only the power of the God of Wisdom worked on them in a normal way. The blessings of the other orthodox Three Gods had very little effect on Elves. Strangely, the Senkin, who also had very stable minds, did not have this problem and were much better off in this regard.

Many people had guessed what caused Elves to be “hard to bless”. After all, the mental toughness of the Senkin was also high, yet they did not have this “weakened blessing” flaw. Among the many guesses, one theory spread quite widely: the old and stubborn heretic worship in traditional Elven culture had made them hated by the Gods. Only the God of Wisdom, as the Protector of all rational beings, was willing to show them mercy.

In history, before the new Age of City-States began, during the Dark Age and the old Age of City-States, this “god-abandoned” nature of the Elves, plus the natural prejudice between different races, had even caused many bloody conflicts. But in the end, Elves used the steam rifles and high explosives they invented to reach mutual “understanding” with the other races of the mortal world.

After that, this long-lived and broad-minded race graciously accepted the signals of reconciliation from Humans and Senkin. They had lived in peace with the descendants of those short-lived races up to this very day.

Heidi walked up to the bed. She tested the Elven maiden’s breath and checked her heartbeat. Then she opened her medical case and calmly laid out different potions and devices on the small table beside the bed.

Those days of conflict and darkness had already become history. Short-lived Humans and Senkin could only learn their ancestors’ stories from books. Even the long-lived Elves now treated those distant days as small, unimportant events that had happened when they were young, or during their parents’ time.

Today, the Elves' "god-abandoned" nature still existed. Many of their old families, while accepting the teachings of the God of Wisdom Rahm, still kept many mysterious and traditional heretic beliefs. But this did not stop them from being a very important part of the civilized world.

In fact, because of their great skill in mathematics and machinery, and because their faith in the God of Wisdom Rahm grew deeper and deeper, the Elves held a key position in this age of steam and electricity. If not for their clear disadvantage in numbers, their influence on the Boundless Sea might already have surpassed that of Humans.

In any case, in this age, no one kept nagging about the Elves' folk heretic beliefs that had survived until now. No one talked about their bodies that could not be blessed by the Three Gods.

Heidi lit a delicate censer. A calming scent slowly spread beside the bed. In the drifting aroma, the Elf maiden on the bed seemed to relax her brow a little.

Heidi bent down and lifted the maiden's eyelid. She held a faintly glowing purple crystal before the maiden's eyes and slowly moved it left and right.

"You are still trapped in a dream," Heidi said softly. "Your tense and uneasy feelings have woven themselves into a cage that protects you. But now you need help, so you will leave a 'key' to someone you choose to trust. This person you trust deeply will appear in your dream. They will help you fight the things that frighten you, or help you find the way out of the dream…"

Heidi slowly swung the crystal. With the incense smoke rising beside them, she spoke in a low, gentle tone that sounded almost magical next to the maiden's ear.

As a psychiatrist, she had many ways to help her patients. In normal treatment, she was very good at using questionnaires and psychological hints to check a patient's mental state and give targeted guidance. But when things were not so normal… she also had many other methods that worked very well.

These very effective methods included blackjacks, golden needles, and gunpowder. They also included Focusing Incense, potions, and ritual crystals.

After all, psychiatry was a line of work full of danger. On normal days she did not only deal with sleepless, nervous students and office workers. She also dealt with the filth that jumped out from her patients' dreams and imaginations.

"Now you are starting to feel a little calmer," Heidi continued. "Because the person who will help you will soon appear in your dream…"

As Heidi kept speaking gently, she noticed a faint silver light appear deep inside the Elf maiden's pupils. This was the sign that the blessing of the God of Wisdom Rahm was starting to work. Luckily, even though this race had a "god-abandoned" nature, they could still accept Rahm's blessing in a normal way. This eased Heidi's heart a lot, as a believer of the God of Wisdom.

"You have left a door for them," Heidi said. "That door is very close to you. You have already given the key to the person who will help you. Now you are hiding in a safe place, quietly waiting for that door to open…

"You feel safe, because you know that the one who will walk through that door is the person you trust the most…"

Heidi spoke softly. As her last words fell, the Elf maiden's breathing clearly became long and calm.

This was only temporary.

But Heidi had already prepared for the next step of "treatment".

She quickly left the Elf maiden’s side. Holding the purple crystal pendant she had just used for hypnosis, she lay down on an empty bed beside it.

She gripped the purple crystal that she had received from her father and quietly recited a prayer to the God of Wisdom Rahm, then slowly closed her eyes.

After a while, she opened her eyes and sat up with a puzzled look.

She had not fallen into any dream at all. Had the hypnosis failed?

Heidi got up from the bed. She carefully checked the surroundings, then walked back to the bed where the Elf maiden lay.

Her patient still lay there quietly, with no sign of waking.

After checking again and again for quite a long time, and trying hypnosis twice more to no effect, Heidi found that she simply could not connect to this Elf maiden’s dream.

A wave of frustration rose in her chest.

She stood by the bed and stayed frustrated for a while, quietly thinking about other treatment plans. After who knew how long, she sighed, rolled her sore shoulders and neck, and stood up to walk toward the ward door.

But before she touched the door, footsteps sounded from outside. Then she heard a key turning. As the handle turned, the council clerk in a dark blue uniform opened the ward door.

“Miss Heidi, how is the situation?”

The staff member seemed to have been waiting in the “safe zone” outside for a long time. Now he asked about the progress of the treatment, looking rather nervous.

“There is still no effect,” Heidi said, shaking her head with regret. “The usual hypnosis methods failed. I may need to prepare some stronger rituals or potions.” As she spoke, she lifted the purple crystal pendant and hung it back on her chest. Then she picked up her heavy case. “I need to go back and think carefully about the next treatment plan.”

“…All right, I am sure you did your best this time,” the staff member sighed with understanding. “Other psychiatrists have tried before, but none of them could break into this patient’s dream. Because the situation is too strange, the priest sent by the Cathedral is very worried that this is some kind of bizarre mental corruption caused by the Sun going out. They take it very seriously… But there is nothing we can do. If even an expert like you finds it so tricky, then we really cannot rush it.”

Heidi nodded lightly.

Vaguely, she felt the purple crystal pendant on her chest give off a faint warmth.

“Do you need us to arrange a vehicle to send you back?” the staff member asked politely.

“No need. My car is parked outside,” Heidi said, shaking her head.

“All right, then I will not see you off. Just go back the way you came. I will go and check on the patient again.”

Heidi gave a small sound in reply and showed the staff member a friendly smile. Then she turned and walked toward the long, deep corridor outside.

Behind her, the staff member in the blue uniform also turned and walked toward the Elf maiden who was still asleep.

Footsteps sounded behind her, now about five meters away.

Heidi silently lifted her case. Her other hand reached for the hidden compartment at the bottom of the case. Then she turned around with a blank face and pulled the trigger.

“Bang!”

The bullet pierced the back of the figure in the blue uniform and burst into a hazy cloud of blood.

Chapter 519: Field of Expertise

With a loud bang, the figure in the blue uniform fell to the floor. Blood slowly spread out from under his body. His heart had been torn apart. The body twitched hard a few times, then slowly stopped moving.

The scene looked like a clear, simple murder. Even the twitching of the body after it fell seemed to keep stressing the “murder” in front of her, and kept telling Heidi that she had just killed an ordinary person.

But Heidi only watched it all with no expression. While the corpse twitched on the ground, she tilted her head and listened for the slightest sound around her.

Under normal circumstances, that loud gunshot would be enough to echo through the whole floor. The security guards and the Church guardians stationed in this facility should have been alarmed by now. But in fact, after the gunshot, the corridor stayed completely silent. No one appeared at all, as if… this whole facility had already been empty for a long time.

The purple crystal pendant hanging at her chest still gave off a faint warmth. Some blessing that did not belong to the Four Gods, but was still very effective, kept Heidi’s thoughts clear.

This pendant was not the first one. The pendant that Father had brought back from that antique shop the first time had already run dry and shattered during the earlier Black Sun incident. The one she wore now was the “gift” that the boss of that antique shop had given Father the second time.

It turned out that this pendant still had the same astonishing power as the first one.

After a brief silence, Heidi let out a soft breath. One hand held the revolver she had just taken from the hidden compartment in her case. With her other hand she set the case on the floor and took out a long golden spike from inside it. It was one of her medical tools. Her eyes never left the body on the ground as she said: “Your acting is good, but can you stop now?”

The “corpse” had long since stopped twitching. After Heidi finished speaking, it finally moved. Then, as if nothing had happened, the man got up from the floor. With the horrible bullet wound still in his chest, he turned to look at the psychiatrist who had just “killed” him and said: “I am very curious. When did you notice?”

Heidi held the gun in one hand and gripped the golden spike tightly in the other. She looked at the Dream Invader in front of her with caution and calmness and said: “There is only one bed in this ward. So when I lay down on the ‘empty bed’ beside it, this fight had already begun.”

“How interesting… Very few people can still notice such a mistake after they have already fallen into Dreamwalking, at least not this fast,” the intruder said at an easy pace. In the air beside him, a dark, hazy shadow or smoke began to appear. It slowly gathered into a solid form. “That includes those so-called ‘psychiatrists’ who have had professional training.”

Heidi frowned at the cloud of smoky shadow beside him. At last she made out its shape, and her eyes changed at once: “Smokewisp Jellyfish… an Annihilator?”

The moment she recognized the shadow, its vague outline became clear. A “jellyfish” made of smoke and dust floated in midair. A pitch-black chain linked it to the intruder’s skull. This dangerous demon creature pulsed and writhed. Countless tentacle-like structures spread over its surface, and at some point they had already reached very close around Heidi!

A huge sense of danger exploded in her heart. Heidi felt the corruption and destruction taking place in her own mental world. The enemy's attack was secret and sly, and it had already begun. If not for her sudden flash of intuition that let her recognize the shape of the Smokewisp Jellyfish in this dream, by the time she reacted she would already have fallen to the Smokewisp Jellyfish's Mental Parasitism!

In the next instant, she did not hesitate at all. She raised the sharp golden spike in her hand and drove it hard into her own temple.

The next second, a thunder-like boom exploded inside her head. Everything in her sight began to shake and tremble. The ward that had looked normal a moment ago twisted and warped at once. The walls melted like wax, revealing a disgusting inside like withered flesh. The floor turned into dry, scorched earth, full of ugly cracks and filthy, writhing things. The Smokewisp Jellyfish, with its many stretching tendrils, seemed to be badly wounded. It let out a shrill scream, and all its tentacles shrank wildly.

Right after that, the Annihilator disguised as a council clerk, and the Smokewisp Jellyfish in a symbiotic pact with him, both vanished from Heidi's sight like mist.

But Heidi did not relax at all. She still gripped her gun and the golden spike, watching for any wrongness in the twisted surroundings while quickly checking her own mental state. She knew that the Dream Invader had not been defeated and had not even left.

This dream showed no sign of breaking apart or fading.

The knowledge she had studied while taking advanced courses at Truth Academy slowly rose up in her mind.

Smokewisp Jellyfish… a branch of Abyssal demons. They had formless bodies like smoke and many strange and dangerous supernatural powers. They were especially good at attacking a victim's mind and senses. Summoners who formed a symbiotic pact with such demons could use mind-damaging spells, or draw the energy of Abyssal demons and fire it as corrosive projectiles.

Compared with most Abyssal demons, the body of a Smokewisp Jellyfish was not very tough. But their eerie supernatural powers made them one of the most dangerous Abyssal demons. In many cases, you would have no chance to strike their fragile bodies before the wounds on your mind took away your chance to resist. The cunning cultists who formed symbiotic pacts with Smokewisp Jellyfish would even work on purpose to amplify these "traits" of the Abyssal demons, making them even harder to handle.

The heat from the purple crystal pendant on her chest grew stronger. Heidi could feel that some malicious "components" in this dream were still trying to Corrupt and damage her mind. But the power released by the pendant protected her, kept breaking down those intrusions, and held her mind clear.

In this stalemate between corruption and protection, a new sense of danger suddenly rose in her heart.

Heidi followed this feeling at once and raised her gun. But the figure that appeared out of the air at the very moment she aimed made her stop.

Morris appeared there, staring at her in shock.

"Heidi?" that familiar figure said, confused and worried. "What is going on… have you been trapped in a nightmare?!"

"Yes," Heidi said, nodding as she pulled the trigger without a second thought. She fired while she spoke: "I do not know what is going on either. An Annihilator interfered with my hypnosis treatment. But as far as I remember, even a Smokewisp Jellyfish does not have the power to control the realm of dreams."

The muzzle flash lit up. The gun roared. Father's figure took the bullet. An expression of disbelief froze on his face. He swayed twice, then fell backward.

In the next second, another figure appeared where Father had fallen. It was an old woman with a gentle face and a look of concern. Mother.

"Heidi, what are you doing? Why are you—"

"I am treating my patient," Heidi said casually as she pulled the trigger.

Mother's figure fell as well. But right after that, a very tall figure appeared in her sight. This time, the figure had only formed a rough outline of Vanna before Heidi fired first.

Another phantom fell.

"You really are not putting your heart into this, Mr. Intruder," Heidi said, shaking her head. "How could such simple tricks work? Especially with Vanna. If it were really her, when I fired she would just pinch the bullet between her fingers, roll it into a ball, and throw it back…"

Those constantly appearing figures finally stopped.

But an angry, low voice suddenly came from some unknown place: "Why are you not affected?"

"I already know this is a twisted dream, so of course I will not believe the phantoms you make," Heidi said calmly. "Of course, I do not think that is what surprises you. You are surprised that my mind has not wavered at all. After all, even if they know it is all an illusion, if an ordinary person keeps seeing familiar faces die in front of them by their own hand, that process will build up huge mental pressure and finally break through their line of reason. That has nothing to do with being ‘awake’ or not… But sadly for you, I have had some training.”

As she spoke, this Miss Psychiatrist slowly raised the muzzle of the gun and pressed it against her own temple.

“Do you know how much weight a combined master’s and doctorate with a full scholarship from Truth Academy carries, Mr. Intruder—”

“Bang!”

The trigger snapped. The gun roared. Heidi shot through her own head without the slightest hesitation. As her body swayed, another Heidi stepped out from beside her in an instant!

Bang, bang, bang. Gunshots rang out again and again. The revolver, which should only have held six bullets, kept firing as if it had endless rounds. Heidi kept pulling the trigger against her own temple. One Personality Split after another walked out from beside her. Each one held a golden spike as they moved toward every corner of the ward that had twisted into a nightmare, toward the door, and toward the corridor outside.

“You should not have provoked me in my own field of expertise, Mr. Intruder,” Heidi said. She slowly raised her head and pulled the trigger at her own skull one last time. “And you really should not have made trouble while I was treating a patient. I really, really, really hate working overtime!”

Dozens of Personality Splits quickly spread out, scattering through every part of this already warped “medical facility”. They began to search this invaded dream for any suspicious clues, and to seek out the “cognitive voids” at the edges of the dream that might be Invasion Paths or hiding places.

However, as the Personality Splits moved, Heidi suddenly frowned.

“…Gone?” she murmured.

Chapter 520

The Intruder’s mental presence vanished, but it was not because she had destroyed it. Somehow, it had broken away from this “building” shaped by a twisted dream.

Heidi frowned as she sensed the steady flow of information coming back from the Personality Splits she had sent out. At the same time, she let her gaze sweep across the “ward” in front of her.

As the Intruder’s mental presence faded, the ward quickly returned to how it had first looked. The horrible deformed scenes caused by the corruption slowly peeled away. Walls that had looked like withered flesh turned back into the clean white walls of a medical facility. The cracked, rot-blackened ground became an ordinary floor again. Outside the ward, the gloomy, frightening air that had filled the whole facility also began to scatter.

But Heidi did not relax her brow at all. Instead, she grew even more alert at these strange changes.

Because this was not normal. A dream twisted by corruption was a closed structure. Inside it, the Intruder’s mind was the attacking side of the dream, but also a part of the dream itself. If that mind tried to force its way out of the dream, it would definitely cause a huge disturbance. A powerful dream Expert could press that disturbance down until it was very small, of course. But that Intruder… was not that strong.

Heidi knew her own ability. She had been an outstanding student at the Truth Academy and had received careful instruction from Father since she was a child. She had always been confident in the field of dreams. She did not believe that this Intruder could leave this twisted nightmare without her noticing at all. The other party must have found some way to hide, or slipped into some Cognitive Void.

She hesitated for a moment, then slowly walked toward the bed in the middle of the room.

The unfamiliar elven maiden still lay quietly on the bed, her brows tightly knit, showing no sign of waking.

In theory, this maiden was the core of the dream. Her being trapped had caused this twisted “medical facility” to appear in her dream. Under normal conditions, she should have woken up by now.

Because the Intruder’s power had already left. Whether that cultist had only hidden himself or had really run away, the corruption he had left here had clearly faded. Once the corruption faded, the one trapped in the dream should wake up at once. That was what made sense.

Because in most cases, a person could do countless strange things in their own dream, but there was one thing they could not do: keep sleeping inside the dream.

Even in dreams nested inside dreams, at the deepest layer the person’s mind was always active.

Heidi stepped forward to check the elven maiden’s condition. Then she hesitated, helped the girl sit up, and then pushed her hard back onto the bed.

It had no effect. Her patient still slept on.

“The Falling Reflex isn’t working…” Heidi muttered to herself, her serious face full of thought. “So this still isn’t her final layer of dream? Just a ‘middle layer’ of a dream within a dream? That doesn’t make sense… Even in a middle layer, the Falling Reflex should be able to wake her…”

She kept muttering, then suddenly stopped, as if something had just come to her mind. She turned around and ran out of the ward.

Her hurried footsteps echoed through the medical facility. Heidi ran quickly down the deep, long corridor. Along the way, she saw the Personality Splits she had released earlier. Those other “Heidis” holding golden awls were still roaming all over the facility, searching the place. Some checked the corridors, some checked the stairwells, and some checked those half-open doors of eerie, empty rooms. They all looked very busy.

Heidi ran past these Personality Splits. Each time she passed one, that split turned and rushed back into her body. The splits scattered in other parts of the facility also received the order. They appeared one after another from nearby junctions and each returned to the main body.

The medical facility no longer kept the layout she knew. The dream’s misaligned projection had caused a mess of corridors, dead ends, and side passages to appear inside the building. Some stairways were even flipped and twisted, linking rooms and halls that made no sense at all in real space, like something out of an absurd abstract painting. The sight was deeply strange.

Yet such a chaotic space was nothing special for Heidi, who often dealt with dreams. She easily picked out the right paths, avoided the dead ends that would lead into endless loops, and at last reached the end of the way—

A great door stood quietly before her eyes, and the word “Exit” was written upon it.

Heidi stopped. The last Personality Split ran up from behind and quickly merged back into her body. She took a light breath and walked slowly toward the door.

That was the exit of the “medical facility” and, in theory, also the “edge” of this twisted dream.

She placed her hand on the door handle and slowly calmed her heartbeat.

The edge of a dream was dangerous. It marked the Dreamer’s limit of understanding. As a Visitor, stepping over the Dreamer’s limit at random meant letting her own mind fall into a huge “undefined” region. In this chaotic zone, no longer under the Dreamer’s control and ruled by the subconscious, unwelcome intruders could meet all kinds of dangers. They might even face those terrifying things that wandered along the border of Mortal reason and lay hidden in the Spirit Realm.

Heidi hesitated. Going any farther would not fit any medical guideline.

The purple crystal pendant hanging at her chest no longer felt hot. This “shoddy product”, which was in truth only a piece of cheap glass, had gone completely cold.

Feeling the chill from the pendant, Heidi made up her mind.

This strange little pendant had not gone wrong even once so far. She decided to trust its reaction.

“If this were on a professional exam, they would knock at least fifteen points off for this step…”

Miss Psychiatrist muttered this under her breath and pushed the door open with force.

The vast darkness and chaotic Shadows she had expected did not appear. She saw no terrifying abyssal rifts and no Spirit Realm monsters.

Heidi stood at the edge of the dream, staring, dumbfounded, at the scene before her.

A lush… forest spread out before her eyes.

Everywhere she looked, there were towering trees she had never seen before. Their thick, leafy crowns overlapped and crossed high above, blocking out the sky and sun. Countless flowers, grasses, and bushes covered the ground. Between them she could see clumps of trees of all sizes and lively creeper vines. Now and then, the cries of unknown birds echoed between the giant trunks. The sound felt new and yet… strange.

sunlight poured over the dense woods, and the life it brought was something Heidi, who had lived in a city-state since childhood, had never seen before.

She could not even understand what she was seeing.

She could not imagine why so many huge trees would grow together like this. Why such precious land would be covered with strange plants instead of houses and roads. Why she could not hear the sound of the sea in her ears and could only smell plants and soil through her nose.

She fell into confusion, a confusion of both senses and mind. Even as a top student in the Truth Academy with a full scholarship and a combined master’s and doctorate track, she grew dazed for a moment. She almost forgot where she was and what she was supposed to do.

Luckily, years of professional training and her strong mental self-control pulled her back. After only a few seconds of blankness, she snapped herself awake, took a deep breath, and forced herself back into a calm, thinking state.

Then she looked back in the direction she had come from.

The “medical facility” stood right behind her, wrapped in huge trees and countless interwoven vines. Unknown plants crawled over its walls. The man-made building stood in the forest as something sudden and out of place.

But Heidi quickly drew a few conclusions from this jarring sight—

“The dream’s range really should be limited to the inside of this medical facility. This strange place outside the door is not part of the normal dream structure… Some kind of mutated ‘edge-awareness zone’?

“I can’t see any element tied to the city-state of Pland. It’s all plants I don’t know… Is this a scene inside this elf’s subconscious? But even elven city-states like Lightwind Harbor or Morka don’t have vegetation on this scale…

“Or… is this outside space the real ‘final layer of dream’? But the scale is far too big, and there are so many details… Her brain should have burned out long ago if that were the case…”

Heidi muttered to herself in confusion. Then she felt around beside her and pulled out a brightly colored ball of yarn.

She hooked the end of the yarn around her finger and threw the ball hard into the distance.

The bright ball of yarn rolled across the ground, bouncing and spreading over damp stones, soil, and vines.

Heidi watched every moment of the yarn’s rolling path, making sure none of the lines that landed on the ground turned blurry or strange.

If they did, it would prove that this place, which looked so “rich in detail”, hid a Cognitive Void. She would have to avoid those gaps with care, so that she did not fall into a nightmare.

The ball of yarn rolled smoothly into the distance without any abnormal sign.

Heidi let out a small breath of relief. Following roughly along the path the yarn had taken, she finally took her first step into this plant-covered “strange place”.

She had already put away her revolver for the moment and only gripped the protective golden awl tightly in her left hand.

In this unclear “border zone”, it was best not to use anything that caused too much noise. The lush plants here looked pleasant enough, but in the silence of the surroundings, who knew what might be hiding?

She had to be careful not to awaken those “beings” that slept at the edge of Mortal awareness.

As she moved forward with care, a question slowly rose in Heidi’s heart:

Had that cultist escaped the dream in a similar way? Had he not “woken up”, but instead run straight out here, to this strange place beyond the dream?

Could there be some trap waiting ahead?

All kinds of ideas spun through Heidi’s mind, but suddenly her heart gave a jolt.

In the next second, she snapped her head up and looked in the direction her intuition pointed.

Between several unknown trees, on a small open patch in the woods, a figure stood quietly with its back to her.

It was a stranger in a light-colored coat of southern style. The figure had messy blond hair and a slightly hunched back. Even though the stranger faced away from her, the two long, sharp ears poking out from the hair were the first thing to catch Heidi’s eye.

An elf?

Chapter 521

Outside the edge of the elven maiden’s dream, another elf had appeared.

Heidi’s heart tensed at once.

Under normal conditions, no other “mind entity” should appear outside the edge of a dream. That region was, in essence, a chaotic projection formed where the Dreamer’s subconscious border met the Mortal Realm. There, the Dreamer’s own reason no longer worked. The broken, chaotic subconscious was disturbed by the world’s deep layers and gave rise to all kinds of strange or dangerously eerie Shadows. Those Shadows were so dangerous that a human’s mental barrier had to work at full strength on that level just to stop the border’s information from seeping inward.

Heidi still clearly remembered what her teacher had said when she studied at the Truth Academy: every person was actually “blindfolded” in their own dreams. If they ever truly saw what the edge of their dreams looked like, everyone in this world would go mad.

So, as long as the mental barrier worked as it should, the Dreamer would never “perceive” the region beyond their dream’s edge and would never form any mind entity there.

Heidi tightened her grip on the golden awl again and silently recited Rahm’s name in her heart, so that the awl in her hand would carry the suggestive power to kill dream Intruders. She knew very well that the figure here could only be one of two things: a “doctor” like herself, or… another Intruder.

The figure with its back to her seemed not to notice Miss Psychiatrist drawing closer behind him. He still stood there in a daze, head slightly raised, as if watching the tree crowns that hid the sky with full attention.

Under those crowns, sunlight bathed the forest. If that figure standing there had not felt so out of place, it would have been a very pleasant view.

Heidi came up behind the mind entity. She suddenly raised her hand and pressed the golden awl against the back of his head. Yet, just as she was about to drive it in, she forced herself to stop.

Not an Intruder!

The golden awl, blessed by Rahm's divine blessing, was a surgical tool used to treat nerve disorders in the Mortal Realm. In the mental field, it served as a suggestive vessel with various supernatural powers. It could be used to destroy Shadows in the mind or to build temporary mental contact. Now, as the awl touched him, a clear and steady mind response flowed into Heidi's senses, along with the tight link between this mind entity and the surrounding environment. The well-trained Miss Psychiatrist grasped at once what this meant—

She had touched another Dreamer.

This was not the "outside region" of the elven maiden's dream. This was another elf's dream!

A wave of shock and confusion rose in an instant. Since she had graduated, Heidi had never met such a strange case in her field. Inside one patient's dream, she had found another Dreamer. Two dreams had merged into one, and she could not even sense a "border" between them!

A thought she could not hold back flashed through Heidi's mind—she already had a topic for her next journal paper. But if she really wrote this into a paper, even the most wild-minded psychology scholars at the Truth

Academy would probably sail day and night to Pland just to challenge her in person…

Her thoughts flashed by like lightning. Heidi quickly pulled back the golden awl and hid it behind her. Only then did the slightly hunched, blond figure in front of her finally react and slowly turn his head.

A face filled with tiredness and confusion came into Heidi's view.

At once, she thought of some of the frightening last-minute exam students she had seen back in the Academy.

They did not eat, did not sleep, did not rest—and still failed.

"Hello," the face said. It was so tired it looked as if he had barely slept in his whole life. His tone was slow, as if he were still half-asleep. "Are you also here to kill me in my dream?"

Heidi's confused thoughts cleared at once. She reacted instantly: "Also? Someone already attacked you in your dream?"

"A few," the middle-aged elf with messy blond hair nodded. He lifted his hand and pointed to the ground not far away. "Look, over there."

"A f-few?" Heidi was a little stunned. She followed the direction of his finger and saw only a few small blackened lumps on the open ground. "They are…"

"I don't know where they came from. I just asked them a few questions, and then they became like that," the middle-aged elf said slowly. He looked so drained it seemed he might fall asleep at any moment. Then he shook his head again. "They were all key points I had marked earlier…"

Heidi frowned slightly.

Something was wrong with this elf's mental state. He seemed to be mixing things up in the dream. In his haze, he had spoken of "marked key points”… Was this coming from his role and work in the Mortal Realm? Was he a teacher? Or a scholar?

This elf knew he was in a dream and knew he had been attacked there, yet his understanding still showed clear confusion. Had it been damaged in one of the earlier attacks? Or had something “affected” him during his Dreamwalking?

“You still haven’t answered my question, lady,” the middle-aged elf’s voice came again while Heidi was thinking fast. “Are you also here to attack me?”

“No,” Heidi shook her head at once. His slow, calm questioning in such a strange and tense situation made her feel very uneasy, but she still chose to state her identity. “I am a psychiatrist.”

He frowned at this: “A psychiatrist?”

“Yes, a psychiatrist,” Heidi nodded at once. She calmly drew the golden awl that stood for her profession from behind her, then passed her hand over her forehead and eyes. “And also a believer of Rahm.”

“Oh, a professional,” the middle-aged elf slowly nodded and spoke in a dull way. “It seems my students sent you here, then. They finally noticed their teacher was trapped in a dream? I thought they would use this chance to take two days off…”

The elf in front of her seemed to have misunderstood something.

But Heidi had no wish to correct him. A “reason to intervene” that the Dreamer himself accepted was clearly a good thing. It would help her stay in this dream in a more stable way.

“My name is Heidi. I am glad I was able to find you,” Heidi said politely. “May I ask how you fell into this dream?”

“How I fell into this dream? I’m not very sure,” the middle-aged elf said, frowning. “But I still remember what I was doing before… I was on a tower, observing the Sun, the Sun… Right! The Sun! Miss Heidi, the Sun went out, and I was using that chance to study its surface structure. What is the situation outside now? When you came here, was the Sun still out?”

“The Sun has already lit up again,” Heidi answered, quickly taking in the clues he had given while she spoke. At the same time she tried to guess where this elf was in the Mortal Realm.

He had mentioned a “tower”, but Pland had no tower built just to observe the Sun. If this elf, who seemed to be a teacher or scholar, meant a kind of professional research when he said “observe”, then he must be in a tall tower with full equipment.

Where could that be? Morka? Asudi? Or Lightwind Harbor?

And to study the Sun’s surface while it was out… Such bold action already went beyond what a normal scholar would dare. Even her own Father would likely hesitate before doing something like that. What background did this elf have? What city-state would have such an elven scholar who neither valued his own life nor bothered to sleep?

Just as a few guesses began to form in her mind, the middle-aged elf spoke again.

His gaze passed over the golden awl in Heidi’s hand. He thought for a moment, as if he had only just remembered something.

“Miss Heidi,” he asked politely, “were you poking the back of my neck with that thing just now?”

Heidi: “…”

[How is he only just remembering to ask that now?!]

…

“Master Taran Ael is still not waking up?”

Lucretia frowned. She looked at the elven master lying quietly on the bed, eyes closed with no sign at all of waking. Her expression grew slightly stern.

Earlier, she had taken the “manuscript” Taran Ael had left and returned to the Radiant Star. But after a first check, she had found no clues at all, so she had come to Lightwind Harbor to ask about his condition. She had not expected that this elven Grand Scholar would still be trapped in deep sleep.

This city-state had many skilled doctors and outstanding scholars from the Truth Academy, yet none of them could wake Taran Ael from his coma?

“Y-yes, Lady Lucretia,” said a young man in the ward who had come to care for the Grand Scholar. He spoke with a slight stammer. Faced with the “sea witch” who carried so many strange tales, the young apprentice was clearly very nervous. “The doctors say Teacher is neither hurt nor poisoned. It looks more like he is trapped in a nightmare. This might be an ‘effect’ caused by the Sun going out…”

Lucretia frowned and let her gaze sweep over the other people in the room. Among the apprentices, she caught sight of a face that looked faintly familiar.

“Joshua, your Teacher should know protective skills in the field of spirit and psychology, right?”

“Yes, Lady Lucretia,” answered the young apprentice who had once been caught by the “sea witch” while running in the corridor. “Teacher often has to deal with strange objects found in the border regions, so he has trained in mind protection before…”

“So that means Taran Ael has the skills to stay clear-headed and protect himself in a nightmare. Under normal conditions he should be able to break free of the dream on his own—but the situation now has gone beyond his ability.”

“We have already gone to call a psychiatrist!” Joshua said in a rush. “They will be here soon!”

“An ordinary psychiatrist probably won’t be able to help much. This is no longer a simple nightmare,” Lucretia shook her head. “I am going to take him to the Radiant Star. My laboratory there should be useful.”

Chapter 522: Morris’s Hypothesis

In a certain laboratory deep inside the Radiant Star, Lucretia finished a rough examination of Taran Ael.

With the help of Truth Academy, moving this Grand Scholar onto the ship was not hard. But finding out what had happened to him was clearly not so simple. Even Lucretia, the “Sea Witch” who was well?traveled and famous in occult studies and the field of the curse, was seeing a case like this for the first time.

Taran Ael was clearly trapped deep inside some kind of dream. But his condition showed no reaction from the curse at all, and there was no sign of mental corruption.

Lucretia lit three candelabra in the corner of the lab and sprinkled her own herbal powder into the Censer in front of them. Then she went to Taran Ael’s side and set crystals, bone shards, and other items around him.

The clockwork doll Lunie, with a ceramic shell, and the stuffed rabbit doll Rabby were helping in the lab. When Lunie noticed the serious look on her Mistress’s face, Lunie could not hold back and asked: “Is it very bad? Is this elf in danger?”

“Situation unclear—that is worse than just bad,” Lucretia said seriously. “Taran Ael fell asleep after he tried to observe the Sun. If these two things are linked, it means this kind of sleep may not be a one?time case. While the Sun was out, how many people looked up? How closely did someone have to ‘observe’ for this sleep to start? How many people did something as bold as this elf scholar?”

She slowly shook her head.

“Taran Ael acted very boldly, but on the vast Boundless Sea, there is more than one scholar with courage like his.”

“Do you need us to do anything else?” The stuffed rabbit doll Rabby hopped over, raised her head, and asked in a soft voice.

“Next, I will try to link into Taran Ael’s dream and help him open a path back to the Mortal Realm from the other side,” Lucretia said. “But this dream may be very complicated. I need you two to guard the candelabra in this room. If I am still not awake after three hours, you must snuff out all the candles from the tallest to the shortest. That will forcefully wake me up.”

“Yes,” Lunie lowered her head. “Three hours, snuff them out from tall to short. I remember.”

“Rabby can dream with Mistress!” The stuffed rabbit hopped over, hugged Lucretia’s leg, and said with some excitement: “Rabby is a rabbit that can dream!”

“One nightmare is enough,” Lucretia refused the stuffed rabbit doll without hesitation. “I don’t want a Grand Scholar like this dropping dead on my ship.”

“Fine, fine, Rabby knows~” The stuffed rabbit doll lowered her head and let out a sad sound. She muttered to herself as she walked to the corner of the room, then sat down on the floor with a soft “plop.”

Lucretia glanced at the doll once and did not answer. After she checked that all the ritual elements were ready, she sat in a high?backed chair facing Taran Ael and snapped her fingers.

The three quietly burning candelabra in the corner were at once veiled in a gauzy, unreal curtain. Every object in the lab seemed covered by a hazy glow. The Sea Witch slowly lowered her head, and in the next second she entered Dreamwalking.

…

On the Vanished, in the captain's cabin, Morris and Duncan sat beside the chart table. Not far behind them, on the wall, the old Oval Scrying Mirror showed Agatha's blurry, ghostly figure.

"Ai already flew over and confirmed it. The big island ahead really is Lightwind Harbor," Duncan said. "Right now the Vanished is hiding deep in the Spirit Realm. Before we land, we will contact Lucretia and confirm the current situation inside the city?state. As for now… the problem in front of us is still how the Vanished moved for no clear reason."

"To be honest, I have no idea," Morris said around his pipe, his brows furrowed like several cracks in a cliff. "I have heard of many 'teleportation' events. Some come from certain Visions. Some are curse anomalies like 'Sailor' at work. But what happened to the Vanished is clearly different from all of that… For now, 'the Sun going out' is the most likely cause of the Vanished's jump. Yet none of us on the ship ever noticed how it happened, or when it happened…"

"So I keep thinking that the one with a problem is not the Vanished, but the 'whole world' outside the Vanished," Duncan said in a low voice. "The news from Captain Lawrence points to the same thing—after the Sun went out, the sea changed in ways no one can understand, in places beyond our 'line of sight'. Tyrian's reports say the same."

"Has there been any new news from Mr. Tyrian?" Agatha's voice suddenly came from the mirror. "Did Cold Harbor reply?"

“…Yes. Things are developing in the strangest possible way,” Duncan nodded. “Tyrian has already checked again with the city?states that lost contact before. From their replies… the other city?states, including Cold Harbor, not only don’t know that the Sun went out, they don’t even know that their communication with Frostholm was ever cut off.”

Agatha’s expression changed slightly.

She opened her mouth and said: “So that means…”

“It means they never went through the twelve hours when the Sun was out,” Duncan said slowly. “In their eyes, the world kept running as normal. Frostholm, Pland, and Lightwind Harbor were all fine. Then, all of a sudden, Frostholm sent them a pile of strange, anxious messages about ‘the Sun going out’ and ‘communication interruptions’. Now the tension is spreading among those city?states. In Tyrian’s words, ‘they urgently need to figure out which side is actually abnormal’.”

Morris listened and thought. Then he slowly lowered his pipe. “Then we can also understand it like this. After the Sun went out, time for the whole world stopped for twelve hours. The Vanished and those three city?states were actually ‘wrongly staying normal’ during those twelve hours. It was as if, in a nightmare that everyone slept through, we… accidentally opened our eyes and saw the truth stuck in the cracks of time.”

Duncan looked thoughtful.

He had to admit that a Grand Scholar was still a Grand Scholar. Morris could not explain the rules behind all this, but he had still put forward a very enlightening guess.

Could this guess be pushed even further? In that world after the Sun went out, were there even more strange changes that no one had ever noticed? If he pushed the idea to an even more extreme point…

Was this really the first time the Sun had gone out?

These guesses floated in all their hearts, and the captain's cabin fell silent. Just then, Duncan seemed to sense something. He frowned in mild confusion: "Hm?"

"Captain?" Agatha asked at once. "Did you think of something?"

"…No, it's something else." Duncan kept his sensing posture, his state for the Listening Rite, and waved his hand. His eyes did not seem to focus. It was as if he was looking at something that was not in the room. "There is a presence…"

He suddenly looked up and stared at Morris across from him.

"What is Heidi doing right now?"

"Heidi?" Morris froze, not knowing why the captain brought this up so suddenly. "Heidi stayed in Pland. Right now they should still be in chaos over the Sun going out. City Hall will probably call her in… Is something wrong with Heidi?!"

The Grand Scholar finally reacted, and his face suddenly grew tense.

"She should not be in great danger, but the charm amulet I left her is acting a bit strange," Duncan said, frowning. Then he waved his hand at the air. A ghostly green flame flared up, and Ai's figure appeared in the air beside him. "I need a path into the dream."

…

"So what you're saying is that you were actually 'treating' someone else, and then, somehow, you ended up in my dream. Then you thought I was one of the intruders and stabbed my neck with that awl?"

The elf scholar who called himself "Taran Ael" looked very serious as he spoke slowly, watching the "golden awl" in Heidi's hand.

“Why do I feel like there are many things wrong with that story?”

“Actually…” Heidi looked very embarrassed. If anything was worse than accidentally hurting a patient with the golden awl and being caught on the spot, it was not being caught right away, only for the patient to suddenly piece it together after a while and then analyze the whole thing so seriously. This elf scholar’s reaction was far from normal. Heidi had seen many strange patients over the years, but this type was a first. “I also think it sounds wrong… but everything I said is true.”

“Everything you said is true, hmm,” Taran Ael nodded. Then he asked: “Then what about that ‘other patient’ you mentioned?”

Heidi turned at once and pointed back the way she had come. “That building is her drea…m…”

Her words trailed off, and her face went stiff.

In the direction she pointed, between the tall, lush trees and vines, the huge medical facility that had been there before… was gone without a trace.

“It’s gone…” Heidi whispered, slowly turning her head back. “But it really was there before, a very large…”

“Miss Psychiatrist,” Taran Ael cut off Heidi’s muttering. The elf scholar spread his hands, his face helpless. “You are making it very hard for me to believe you.”

—

Chapter 523: An Unexpected Meeting

Heidi admitted that, in her many years as a doctor, she had run into more tricky situations than she could count—but none had ever been as awkward as this.

However, just when she was so embarrassed that she almost pressed fingerprints into the golden awl in her hand, Taran Ael suddenly laughed.

“Even so, I still think you are telling the truth.”

Heidi looked surprised at once.

“The golden awl you use carries a very special emblem,” Taran Ael said with a smile, pointing at the “weapon” that was also a medical tool in Heidi’s hand. “Even in this dream, you still reproduced that emblem exactly. That shows you care about it a lot—Miss Heidi, you are an outstanding graduate of Truth Academy. This emblem has only ten spots each year. It is given only to the most excellent young apprentices, and it is engraved, as they wish, on one of their belongings.”

Heidi froze for a moment. Her gaze followed his finger to the end of the awl’s handle. There, an Eye of Wisdom emblem surrounded by tiny light points was carved.

An ordinary person would easily mix this emblem up with the common symbol of the God of Wisdom. Only people who truly understood the various marks of Truth Academy could tell the difference between this emblem and a regular Eye of Wisdom.

Only then did a sudden idea flash through Heidi's mind. She stared at the elf scholar in front of her who called himself "Taran Ael." Some rough impressions in her mind finally began to piece together.

A member of Truth Academy. An elf. The old family name "Ael." Someone who would, when Visions 001 went out, do something as shocking as observe the Sun's surface…

"Taran Ael… Wait, are you that 'Mr. Taran Ael' of Lightwind Harbor?!" Heidi's eyes went wide. "The master who studies borders and hidden knowledge…"

"I don't really deserve to be called a master. I am just a researcher who stays busy all day," Taran Ael said with a wave of his hand and a smile. He was humble in words, but clearly pleased at being recognized. Then he looked a little puzzled. "You have heard of me? That is rare… I don't show my face much. I do have some fame, but only in Lightwind Harbor and among elves. How did a human from far away like you hear about me?"

"I heard about you from my father," Heidi answered at once. "I have heard about you since I was small!"

"Your father?" Taran Ael frowned.

"His name is Morris," Heidi said with a hint of pride. "Morris Underwood. When he was young, he studied at the main campus of Truth Academy, and he also studied abroad in Lightwind Harbor…"

The name felt a bit familiar to Taran Ael. After he heard Heidi's words, he remembered at once. "Ah! That young man! I remember him. He was a very gifted young man… and you are his daughter?!"

The elf Grand Scholar stared in surprise. He looked Heidi up and down several times, clicking his tongue in wonder. “Then he married and had a daughter very early…”

Heidi’s expression grew strange. She hesitated and said: “…Father was almost forty when he had me. That was already very, very late…”

“For…” Taran Ael opened his mouth, then slapped his own forehead. “Oh, sorry. I forgot I should use human standards. Sorry, I can be careless like this sometimes.”

Heidi could only give an awkward smile. She could see now that this elf scholar, whom her father praised so much, could be frighteningly thick at times…

After a brief, quiet pause, Taran Ael could not help asking with some expectation: “How did your father talk about me?”

Heidi answered without thinking: “He said that, as an elf, it was truly awe? inspiring that you managed to give yourself neck pain and frozen shoulder purely through the power of your work schedule…”

Taran Ael: “…”

Heidi: “…”

“No need to apologize,” the elf Grand Scholar said, waving his hand and cutting off the now?flustered Miss Psychiatrist. It was clear he had long grown used to similar comments. “We have chatted enough, Miss Heidi. Now it is time for you to use your professional skills and find a way to get me out of this dream.”

This perfectly timed change of topic cleared Heidi’s awkwardness at once. She quickly fixed her expression and mood and began to think about how to undo this dream.

But just as she started to recall the “professional knowledge” she had learned, Taran Ael spoke beside her: “I need to remind you first, Miss Heidi. I have already tried the Falling Method, the Suffocation Method, the Interrogation Method, and reverse hypnosis. None of them worked. All these ways could not wake me up from here. They only made me more and more awake inside the dream.”

Heidi froze for a moment and her expression changed. “More awake inside the dream?!”

“Yes. It is the most dangerous of all the dangers that follow a ‘trapped in a dream’ accident,” Taran Ael said, spreading his hands. “To grow more and more awake inside the dream and realize clearly that you are in a dream, yet still fail to wake up, means that my reason is being slowly merged into the base logic of the dream. Deep in my subconscious, I no longer believe I need to wake up. I even… subconsciously believe I already have.”

“Have you tried praying to Rahm?”

“What do you think?” Taran Ael replied with a bitter smile.

“…You are already so awake in this dream that you can even receive Rahm’s protection…” Heidi’s tone grew heavy. “So you have in fact already woken up. The terrible thing is that you ‘woke up inside the dream’… Regular mental guidance methods probably will not work.”

“How about… you try poking me with that awl again?” Taran Ael pointed at the golden awl in Heidi’s hand. “Give my subconscious a near?death hint. I can see if I can rely on the ‘Sudden?Death Method’ to go back to the Mortal Realm.”

Heidi stared for a moment, then quickly shook her head. “I don’t think that is a good idea…”

As soon as she finished speaking, a strange, slightly lazy female voice suddenly came from the side: “I also don’t think that’s a good idea, little young lady.”

Heidi jumped at the voice. She gripped the golden awl at once and looked toward the sound. A second later, a flurry of colored paper suddenly filled her vision. The falling colors swirled like snowflakes from the sky, and a graceful lady wrapped in an air of mystery stepped out from within them.

When Heidi instantly raised her guard and took a defensive stance, the mysterious lady did not even glance her way. She walked straight up to Taran Ael. “I mean it, Master Ael. Stop longing for your ‘Sudden?Death Method’. With your current health, if this Miss Psychiatrist stabs you once, you really will drop dead in the Mortal Realm.”

“Ah, Lady Lucretia!” Taran Ael’s face lit up with joy when he saw who it was. “You came to help. Well then, it seems my apprentices did not find a psychiatrist, but they did find a stronger helper. They brought the Sea Witch…”

Lucretia waved her hand. “I was the one who turned away the psychiatrist your apprentices went to find. They could not help you—right now you are in my laboratory.”

Heidi stared blankly at the scene before her. She first noticed that Taran Ael actually knew this mysterious lady. That surprised her. Then she heard the lady’s name.

Lucretia.

There might have been more than one person in the world called Lucretia, but there was only one who people called the “Sea Witch”!

Shocked, Heidi first felt a wave of tension and caution. She realized she had to say something, but when she opened her mouth, she only stammered:

“You… you are…”

“Don’t be nervous, Miss. Witches don’t eat people,” Lucretia said with a laugh, as if she found the young human lady’s reaction very amusing. “How interesting. I did not expect Master Taran Ael’s dream to have another ‘guest’. For a ‘predicament’, this place is a bit too lively.”

She spoke with a gentle smile, but bit by bit the warmth faded from it. Her eyes still seemed to smile, yet deep inside they turned cold as ice and judging.

“What is your name, strange guest?”

Heidi did not even notice the change in the warmth of Lucretia’s smile.

But her mind suddenly rang with warning. A kind of “intuition” rooted in her Spiritual Insight gift made her tense up at once!

The “witch” in front of her was analyzing her soul and mind. Lucretia was treating her as the “corruption factor” inside this dream!

The instant Heidi realized this terrible fact, she tried to put mental protection on herself. But she found that she was cut off from all supernatural powers. Even the golden awl in her hand, which was usually the closest to her, suddenly felt like something that had nothing to do with her. Under the weight of her fear and tension, she could only fight to keep her mind steady. She forced herself to think and forced out her words: “My name is Heidi. I am a psychiatrist—I entered Mr. Taran Ael’s dream by mistake. The intruders are someone else, and some of them have already been dealt with by Mr. Taran Ael himse—”

The pressure that had made her Spiritual Insight gift scream warnings vanished at once.

Heidi let out a breath of relief, but at the same time felt very confused—

She had not even finished speaking.

She lifted her head in confusion. At some point, the purple crystal pendant hanging on her chest had started to grow warm again. She pressed one hand over the crystal pendant and looked in puzzlement at the “witch” across from her.

Lucretia only frowned tightly.

“Are you a follower of my father?”

Chapter 524: The Real Intruders

Heidi first looked blank, then her face twisted in horror.

She knew who this “Sea Witch’s Father” was. That kind of chilling joke was not funny at all.

“I am a believer of the God of Wisdom Rahm, my lady,” she said in a rush, as if afraid that if she spoke a second later, the misunderstanding would deepen and she would really form some secret link with that terrifying shadow in the subspace. “I’m just an ordinary psychiatrist. You must be mistaken!”

Lucretia only frowned a little. Her calm gaze fell on the “psychiatrist’s” chest. The plain-looking purple crystal pendant there still gave off a faint, familiar aura. She might mistake other things, but Father’s aura…

Lucretia even felt that Father’s gaze was quietly resting on her through that pendant.

“This pendant of yours, where did it come from?” Lucretia suddenly asked.

“This… it was a gift from my father. He bought it from an antique shop,” Heidi explained at once, without thinking too much. “It’s nothing special, it just happens to give a bit of protection in the mental field…”

“Antique shop?” Lucretia sounded a little puzzled. “And your father is…”

“Oh, this young lady is the daughter of Morris Underwood,” said Taran Ael at last. He had been quiet at the side the whole time, but now he felt that the mood was going in a strange direction. “Relax, Lady Lucretia. This miss really is a psychiatrist. She’s helping me get out of here.”

Lucretia froze for a second when she heard Taran Ael’s words. Then she turned to Heidi, and a strange look appeared on her face: “Morris Underwood?”

“Y-yes.” Heidi nodded. “That’s my father’s name…”

Lucretia kept her face still, but in her mind she recalled the scene from last time, when she met the new crew members of the Vanished through the scrying crystal. She remembered that respected grand scholar—her father’s current “knowledge adviser.”

The world was really small.

The coldness in her eyes faded. Her smile became sincere again, and her gaze on Heidi grew gentle: “Hello, Miss Heidi.”

“Hello…” Heidi was completely lost. In just a short moment, she felt as if her life had gone through several sharp ups and downs, yet she had no idea what was happening. She could only answer the “witch” in front of her with nervous politeness: “You… know my father? And you know Master Taran Ael too?”

“This world is smaller than you think.” Lucretia did not answer her directly. She just brushed it off, then turned to the elven scholar opposite her. “From your own sense of time, how long do you think you’ve been trapped in this dream?”

“I’m not sure. My sense of time is off now. It might be a few days… or longer.”

Lucretia frowned: “From the amount of cognitive shift, it’s already a bit dangerous… I’m guessing you already tried all sorts of waking methods yourself, including the falling method?”

Taran Ael spread his hands: “Yeah. The only thing I haven’t tried yet is the ‘sudden-death method’.”

“If the usual subconscious awakening methods don’t work, then nothing else will help. This is not a normal dream, and it’s not an external curse or a mental attack either,” Lucretia said, waving her hand. “I already checked your condition in the Mortal Realm and set up a field in the lab to control mental corruption. We can rule those out… Miss Heidi, can you tell me the information you have so far?”

Heidi blinked for a second. Two seconds later she finally reacted, and quickly told the “witch” in front of her everything she knew. She even started from the moment she accepted City Hall’s invitation in Pland, not daring to leave out a single detail.

Lucretia listened patiently to this long chain of information, her expression changing several times.

“From a dream far away in Pland, you entered Taran Ael’s dream… The distance between those two city-states is not small, and now that dream’s entrance has disappeared…” The “witch” grew solemn as she spoke slowly. “It seems that if the mental guidance isn’t smooth, even you, a psychiatrist, will end up trapped here.”

“So do you two experts have a conclusion now?” As the only “patient” present, Taran Ael was quite calm. He only sounded a bit curious. “What is this dream, really?”

“Before I draw a conclusion, I have to confirm one thing,” Lucretia said instead, her face serious. “How did you fall asleep? I found the draft you left in the tower. You seemed to be about to send it to the Academy by ‘express dispatch’. Were you attacked in the tower, or did you ‘see’ something while observing the Sun?”

Taran Ael fell into his memories.

After a long time, he spoke again, not very sure: “I wasn’t attacked… I only remember that I saw many vague shadows and lines inside the Sun, through the instruments on the tower. I wanted to record them all, but they were too messy and blurry. No matter what I did, I couldn’t see them clearly, so I could only sketch a rough outline, and then…”

His voice suddenly grew strangely hesitant. Confusion and doubt filled his eyes. The more he tried to recall what he had seen in that last moment before he fell asleep, the less sure he became of his own memory.

At last, Taran Ael stopped. He could no longer remember what happened in the final second before he blacked out. With a lost look, he slowly raised his head. His gaze passed over Heidi and Lucretia in front of him, then turned to the surroundings, to the lush and impossibly dense forest around them.

He gradually fell still. He stopped making any movement or sound at all. Even his breathing and the tiny motions of his eyes came to a complete halt. The wind that blew through the woods could no longer move his hair or the edges of his robes.

Taran Ael became a “statue” frozen in the dream.

As he fell still, the whole dream finally began to change. A strange, low rumbling spread through this world, echoing as if some vast, endless thing was slowly collapsing. The towering trees began to lose their color and break apart from the crowns downward. The lush plants all across the ground slowly weathered and crumbled, turning into drifting smoke.

Heidi stared in shock at all this, then suddenly turned to Lucretia: “This is a layer of ‘Veil’? Not the real dream?!”

“It seems you learned well at school, Miss Heidi,” Lucretia said, lifting an eyebrow. “Yes, just as I guessed. This is not a true layer of dream, but a protective Veil woven over the dream. What we see is not really Taran Ael, but a mental construct he made for himself as a shield. No matter what we do, we can't wake him up from here—the real dream is hidden deeper down."

"Why would it be like this?" Heidi was stunned. "I… I've never seen such a real protective Veil. It covers the lower dream so completely…"

"I haven't seen anything like it either. And Taran Ael is not an expert in the mental field. He has had some special training, but in theory he shouldn't be able to weave such a perfect 'defense'," Lucretia said, shaking her head. "But one thing is sure: whoever wove this Veil is trying to hide what's in the deep layers of the dream… If Taran Ael really did this, then he must have sensed great danger after Dreamwalking…"

She suddenly stopped.

Because the "collapse" of the forest was slowing down.

It did not only stop. After a few seconds, the entire collapse began to reverse. The towering trees started to rebuild themselves one after another. Color came flooding back into the ground. The Veil that had seemed on the verge of breaking apart now started to regenerate at an amazing speed.

"The Veil is regenerating!" Heidi cried out.

Lucretia, shocked as well, at once looked toward Taran Ael's mental construct. He still stood there like a statue, showing no sign of "reactivating."

The protective Veil over this dream had regenerated, but its "weaver" was not Taran Ael. Some other power was protecting the truth in the deep layers of this dream.

The moment Lucretia realized this, two facts hit her.

First, besides the “elven maiden” Heidi had mentioned and Master Taran Ael, there was at least a third Dreamer in this dream. That Dreamer was the true controller of this “disguised dream” layer.

Second, the intruders were still nearby. The source of the corruption was right here.

The dream’s protective Veil had rebuilt itself on its own. It had sensed a great danger. That was why, even after it had already begun to fade, it suddenly reversed. From the size of this whole forest and the scale of its rebuilding, the source of that danger was far beyond what they had imagined.

Neither the Annihilator that Heidi had driven out before, nor the intruders that Taran Ael had already dealt with, were the real cause of this dream being sealed.

As Lucretia grasped this, Heidi also suddenly understood why the Veil had regenerated: “Something is hiding in this dream. The intruders are still here!”

“Look for anything strange around us!”

Lucretia called out at once, then quickly searched everything in her sight, feeling the currents in the air. She wanted to find where the “source of corruption” was hiding—the thing that this Veil was trying so hard to block out.

The air, the fragrance of flowers, the rustling of wind through the forest, the distant sound of running water, and the sunlight pouring through the canopy…

Everything felt so real. Everything felt so natural. Everything seemed perfectly normal.

Which thing, exactly, was wrong in this dream?

Wait… the sunlight?!

Lucretia’s heart jolted hard.

This forest had countless towering trees, countless thick crowns. The purpose of those crowns was to block the sunlight.

But even with so many layers of leaves, the “sunlight” still filled the whole forest. Every corner was bright.

“The sunlight is the intruder!”

She realized it at once and shouted a warning to Heidi. Heidi reflexively raised her head and, through the gaps in the canopy, looked up at the sky of this dream.

Between the overlapping crowns, many large and small openings had appeared at some point. Between those gaps lay the sky, the sunlight, and the Sun that shone on this dream.

Huge, dark, twisted tentacles coiled and wrapped together into a ball. Between them were countless enormous, pale eyes. The mass hung in the sky like some horrible freak, floating over the forest.

Bright sunlight formed a shell of living light, clear as glass, wrapped tightly around that twisted thing. From within that shell, it calmly shone on the entire dream.

Chapter 525: Attack Under the sunlight

That deformed, terrifying freak hung high over the forest, sprawling across the sky. Countless coiled and knotted tentacles held up its glowing “shell.” The “sunlight” that pierced the entire forest came from this nightmare-like intruder.

How long had it been hanging above this dream? Had it been there from the very start? Why had no one noticed how wrong the sunlight was? With what dreadful purpose was it watching this forest, patched together from several different layers of dream?

Heidi tilted her head back, as if drawn by some great force. She could not stop herself from gazing at the small “Sun” held up by those horrible limbs.

She stared at the pale giant eyes, surrounded and guarded by the tentacles.

In that instant, she felt her mind link to some vast and distant existence. Through those pale, sky-gazing eyes, something pushed straight into her thoughts. She heard a thunderous roar deep in her spirit and sensed an ancient will looking down at this dream through that blazing Sun in the sky —and at the uninvited guests inside it.

Hundreds and thousands of voices whispered or screamed in her head. Among them, she heard one voice clearly. It slipped into her awareness like a murmur from a dream:

“…hidden in the deepest part of their memories… before our sunlight goes out…”

Under that whisper boring into her mind, Heidi felt a sudden urge to submit and worship.

But in the very next second, a burning heat suddenly rose from her chest. In that heat, Heidi snapped awake. It was as if ten thousand claps of thunder exploded in her ears. She felt the link between her and those voices tear apart in an instant.

Her heart pounded like a drum. Sharp ringing filled her ears like noise. Her mind heaved wildly, and the feeling of having just escaped disaster only rose from the bottom of her heart after a few long seconds. As soon as she woke, she forced herself to tear her gaze away from the sky. At the same time, she grabbed the purple crystal pendant at her chest by reflex.

The pendant was still giving off burning heat, but it did not hurt her. Shaken, Heidi turned her head and looked at the “witch miss” standing beside her.

Lucretia was reaching her hand toward Heidi with a blank face. At Lucretia’s fingertips, three colored gems floated in the air, slowly spinning. Light leapt between the gems and her fingers, weaving a beautiful, deadly glow.

Heidi felt a jolt of fear in her heart.

“I’m awake! I’m awake!” she shouted at once, afraid that this witch really was about to act. “I’m not corrupted—”

Lucretia nodded and glanced at the crystal pendant on Heidi’s chest. The three colored gems flew back up and returned to the little ornament in her hair.

Then Lucretia paused, as if she felt she owed an explanation: “I wasn’t planning to kill you.”

“Uh…” Heidi had not expected her to say that. Her expression twitched. “I just thought you were about to do something to me.”

“It would only be a violent shock. If you had only suffered shallow mental corruption, the shock would bring up your subconscious fear of death and force the uncorrupted part of your mind to leave this dream. Afterwards, you’d at most lose some recent memories,” Lucretia explained. “That was a Dream Exit Technique Master Taran Ael invented—the ‘sudden-death method’.”

Heidi stared wide-eyed: “Didn’t you say that ‘sudden-death method’ was unreliable?!”

“It’s unreliable when used on Taran Ael himself,” Lucretia said, glancing at the grand scholar, who still stood in place like a mental statue. “He might drop dead even without nightmares.”

“Then what about me…”

“You’re sturdier.”

Heidi was speechless for a moment. She stayed awkwardly quiet for several seconds, then finally pointed up at the sky with lingering fear. During all this, she did not dare look directly at that strange, horrifying thing again. “Lady Lucretia, that thing…”

“So that’s the real intruder,” Lucretia said lightly. She swept her hand across the air in front of her. A round, illusory mirror, ringed with elegant patterns in a courtly style, appeared out of thin air before her. Using the reflection in this magic mirror, she carefully observed the scene in the sky. “The Veil in this dream exists to block that thing’s ‘gaze’.”

She paused, a thoughtful look on her face.

“It looks like the work of those cultists who worship the Black Sun. The thing in the sky looks exactly like the ‘Sunspawn’ they follow…”

“Sunspawn…” Heidi’s heart skipped. As someone from Pland and a survivor of the Black Sun incident back then, she knew better than anyone how terrible that name was. But right after that shock came a deeper confusion. “But the ‘intruder’ I first saw in the dream was clearly an Annihilator…”

“Annihilator?” Lucretia frowned. “Then… this is even worse.”

Heidi opened her mouth, about to ask what the “Sea Witch” meant. But before she could speak, a faint rustling sound suddenly came from nearby, making her fall silent at once.

“Did you hear something?” Heidi asked quickly, tense.

“Looks like the ‘protector’ of that freak in the sky has arrived,” Lucretia said calmly. “We discovered ‘it’, so ‘it’ feels fear and will try every way to wipe out any thinking beings who have seen ‘it’. The spawn of the Black Sun always behave like this—”

The rustling sound cut off.

But in the instant it vanished, a huge wave of alarm and danger surged in like a tide.

The next second, Heidi caught a flicker of shadow at the edge of her vision. Under the nearby bushes, in a spot that had seemed completely normal a heartbeat ago, a shapeless darkness began to writhe and swell. It split out cruel limbs like spearheads and blades, and lunged at her and Lucretia.

Heidi did not have time to think. Her body dropped hard to the side. At the same time, she swept the golden awl in her hand through the air in front of her. A faint afterimage stayed where she had just been. A second later, the attacker pierced that afterimage without mercy.

The dark mass snapped back, while the “figure” it had stabbed still stood where it was. The figure swayed twice. Its blurred outline quickly sharpened and turned into another “Heidi.”

At the same time, a sharp cracking blast came from Lucretia’s direction.

A shadow slithered along the ground like a vicious snake, creeping to the Sea Witch’s feet. It suddenly burst into countless thorns, spikes, blades, and tentacles. These twitching horrors surged at Lucretia from all sides, swallowing her figure in an instant.

But as those shadows crossed and tangled, Lucretia’s body suddenly transformed. She flattened into a paper-thin “image.” Her body spun once in the air and “floated” out from between those deadly attacks. Then her figure rebuilt itself on the open ground nearby. At some point, a short baton had appeared in her hand, like the baton a conductor would use when leading an orchestra on stage.

She raised the little baton and gently tapped it against a black tentacle that had formed in midair, giving a calm command:

“Minor key.”

The tentacle gave a small crack. Then more cracks followed, stringing together like notes in a song. In that stream of explosions, the tentacle broke apart into countless unreal, multicolored notes that fluttered away and vanished in the air.

All the shadows linked to that black tentacle broke into constant bursts as well. Under that terrible curse, they became a cloud of shining notes, drifting and scattering in a storm of color.

It was beautiful like a dream, and so eerie it made one’s heart race.

Lucretia flicked the conductor’s baton with grace, then turned to look at Heidi, who had already split off a third personality. There was a hint of surprise in Lucretia's eyes.

"Your self-defense skills are pretty good. From the way you move, you've trained in the Mortal Realm too?"

"I have to know how to protect myself. In our line of work, we deal not only with mental patients, but also with their mental illness," Heidi said, panting a little, with a touch of pride. "Father always told me that a girl must learn how to protect herself." Then the look she gave Lucretia held even more awe and respect. "Your power… really is as strong as the rumors say."

"My father taught me something similar," Lucretia said with a small smile. She then turned away and calmly watched the figures that were now appearing in the air one after another.

The loss of a few tentacles and shadows did not mean things were over. For the followers of the Black Sun, their vile limbs could always stand more damage.

The true attackers finally showed themselves.

Several tall figures appeared. They wore long black coats of some unknown material, like heavy trench coats. Under the coats, something like twisted, deformed flesh kept writhing and heaving, making wet, disgusting sounds. Their faces were hidden in the shadows cast by their wide-brimmed hats. No real features could be seen, only endless emptiness and a cold hatred toward all living things.

"…Lesser spawn of the Sunspawn," Heidi said at once, recognizing what these not-quite-human beings were. She and her personality splits all shifted into guarded stances, though she could not keep from frowning. "…But I never heard that these things could invade dreams…"

Lucretia noticed something else.

“They’re not carrying umbrellas,” the Sea Witch said with a slight frown.

As an explorer who ran the border regions all year round and often dealt with all kinds of strange and dangerous powers, she was very familiar with the followers of the Black Sun and had crossed paths with them several times.

These scraps of Sunspawn that had appeared in the dream were not holding those strange, iconic black umbrellas.

They all stood openly in the light, calmly bathing in the “sunlight” that pierced the forest.

As if… exiles had returned to their home.

Chapter 526: What Was More Terrifying Than the Sunspawn…

As more Intruders appeared one after another, far more than expected, Heidi actually grew more and more nervous inside.

She knew that these not-quite-human “things” before her were far stronger than the cultist she had dealt with earlier. That cultist had only been a human who had made a contract with demons from the Abyssal Deep. Even if he had some skills, in essence he was still just a fragile mortal. Inside her own “professional field”, he had not been too hard to handle.

But these black?clad “people” were different – they were not human at all.

They were the Sunspawn’s “residue”, envoys and blood?kin split off from that misshapen terror hanging in the sky. In essence, these things were even part of the creeping Sun Wheel itself, an extension of an Elder God’s power.

These creatures had no normal mental activity and no personality structure a mortal could understand. The knowledge and techniques Heidi had as a “psychiatrist” were very limited when it came to enemies like this.

But Miss Psychiatrist still took a deep breath, calmed herself, and tightened her grip on the golden awl in her hand.

The Sunspawn did not accept negotiations with mortals. Their hatred of sentient beings was unconditional and without distinction. There was nothing to do but meet them head?on.

Besides… there was a powerful witch here. Lady Lucretia seemed to know her father. Lucretia was a bit frightening, but in a situation like this, she probably would not just watch Heidi die here… right?

That wild thought flashed through her mind and vanished. In the next second, Heidi noticed one of the black?clad “people” blur in her field of view – a sharp sense of danger crashed over her.

That blurry black shape vanished into the air. Almost at the same time, Heidi felt a stabbing pain in her abdomen. She slowly lowered her head and saw a tentacle thrust through her torso, tearing open a wound large enough to be fatal.

Only then did the attacker’s hazy figure faintly appear at the other end of that tentacle.

A golden awl stabbed over from the side. One of her personality’s avatar forms pounced toward the tentacle, driving the awl down through the air in a vicious thrust that hit that dim, hazy figure. The attacker took some damage and let out a strange shriek as it staggered back.

Heidi’s body slowly toppled to the side, but before it hit the ground, her primary consciousness had already shifted into another personality avatar form nearby. At the instant the shift finished, she swung the golden awl in that avatar’s hand, stabbing at another shadow lunging straight toward her.

At the same time, she quickly raised the revolver in her other hand, pressed the muzzle to her temple, and pulled the trigger without hesitation.

A new Personality Split appeared behind her, quickly filling the gap left by the mind entity she had just lost.

At the same time, more of the black?clad figures charged at the clearly more threatening person on the field, Lucretia. Shadows streaked through the forest as if slipping through cracks between light and dark. All kinds of visible and invisible forces swarmed toward the spot where Lucretia stood, tearing the air, shattering the ground, and leaving behind corruption.

Lucretia’s figure, however, was like an illusion. She drifted lightly through all the attacks and quickly closed in behind one of the assailants. Before that black?clad freak could react, she had already laid a fingertip near its shoulder.

The freak let out a sharp screech. With that unbearable, piercing noise that almost no human could endure, a string of muddled words seemed to echo directly in their minds and entered the minds of both Heidi and Lucretia at the same time: “You have seen Him. You must die here!”

“ No one wants to look at your twisted, disgusting ‘kin’,” Lucretia only shook her head coldly. “Now, it is time to bloom.”

The black?clad freak suddenly raised its arm. Invisible shadows gathered inside its coat, taking on the shape of some kind of weapon, but Lucretia had already drifted back several meters.

At the spot her fingertip had tapped, a strange patch of color suddenly appeared on the “person’s” shoulder. In the next moment, that color, like spilled paint, quickly spread and came alive, turning in the blink of an eye into countless bright flowers and wildly growing vines. Thick, tangled plants grew out from inside that not?quite?human body. With the sickening sounds of flesh being torn and ground apart, they devoured this piece of Sunspawn residue in an instant.

Yet as this attacker fell, more rustling noises and the gathered breath of shadows came from all directions.

Under the sunlight, between the dense trees, several more tall figures in black coats appeared out of thin air. They gave off a weird, ominous aura as they stepped toward Lucretia and Heidi, closing in and forming a ring around them.

And behind those figures, where the sunlight fell, even more shadows were gathering. More attackers were entering this dream.

Lucretia frowned without thinking, but before she could figure out how these attackers were flooding into this “dream” in such numbers, new attacks had already arrived.

Several black?clad freaks slipped through the seams between light and shadow and appeared beside her in an instant.

Lucretia had already been prepared. The moment the enemies appeared, the “conductor’s baton” was once again in her hand, and she pointed it at the nearest one. But just as she was about to unleash the curse, a wave of light dizziness suddenly struck and slowed her movements.

A sharp wind roared past her ear. At the instant she was about to be struck, Lucretia tore herself free of that dizziness and burst apart into countless fluttering colored paper scraps that flew to the side. Her figure then emerged from the colors, and she immediately looked toward a certain direction.

A patch of blurred, twisting smoke became visible under her gaze. The smoke swelled and writhed in the air like a strangely shaped jellyfish. From inside that jellyfish extended a pitch?black chain that reached out to a young man who was appearing out of thin air.

Almost at the same time, one of Heidi’s personality avatar forms suffered a heavy blow. An invisible force hurled her away, ripping almost half of that body apart. But before that avatar form could disperse, she still forced herself to lift her hand and fired three shots in a row at the Smokewisp Jellyfish that had appeared out of nowhere.

“ Lady Lucretia! This is the Intruder I told you about!”

“ You do not have to talk to me in such a tragic way.” Lucretia watched, expressionless, as that personality avatar form fell to the ground not far in front of her and slowly faded with eyes that could not close in peace. She could not help muttering under her breath, then suddenly raised the “conductor’s baton” in her hand to block a sharp, stabbing tentacle aimed at her. At the same time, she looked up at the Annihilator who had only now chosen to reveal himself: “So the madman who follows the Abyssal Lord has joined hands with the madman who follows the Black Sun?”

“ I originally had no intention of showing myself, but it seems our ‘temporary ally’ really does need a little help now…”

The Annihilator stood on a high spot, still wearing the blue uniform of a “medical facility staffer”, though his face had completely changed. He smiled with easy leisure as he spoke. The three shots Heidi’s personality avatar form had fired before its death had not harmed the Smokewisp Jellyfish at all. His gaze swept over the psychiatrist and the Sea Witch, who were beginning to show signs of strain under the Sunspawn residue’s siege. Then he raised his head and looked at the terrifying Sunspawn hanging in the sky, giving a small nod.

“ I hope you keep your promise. We will keep ‘digging deeper’.”

The “Sun” hanging high and still in the sky gave no response, but the “sunlight” that covered the whole forest clearly grew a few degrees hotter.

Keep your promise? Dig deeper?

Lucretia instantly latched onto those two phrases the Annihilator had mentioned, but before she could think them through, another black “residue” had already teleported to her side.

Using a sneaky blind spot, the freak lifted its arm. Several “limbs” lined with sharp blades and spikes swept sideways toward Lucretia.

Lucretia’s figure suddenly dissolved into colors and reformed a few meters away. At the same time she raised the conductor’s baton and pointed it at the enemy from afar.

Yet in the next second, the “enemy” in her eyes blurred and shifted, turning into a different figure.

Tyrian now stood there, looking toward her with a stunned expression.

“ Lucy, you are in trouble…”

But the conductor’s baton in Lucretia’s hand suddenly turned into an oversized scythe. She raised the terrible weapon high and, without the slightest hesitation, brought it down toward “Tyrian’s” head.

“ This is the best you can do?” As the enemy was sliced cleanly in two by the scythe, a few drops of blood spattered onto Lucretia’s face. She smiled, turned her head, and looked toward the Annihilator standing in the distance. “Are you so used to bullying ordinary people with weak minds that you think this will work on me?”

The Annihilator did not answer. Instead, the Smokewisp Jellyfish floating beside him suddenly contracted and swelled. At the same time, wind hissed by Lucretia’s ear. She turned her head and saw her clockwork doll Lunie, who had served her for many years, standing not far away with a dazed, frightened look.

The giant scythe rose and fell without a pause, chopping Lunie’s figure into a scattering of gears and ceramic shards. Before those disturbing fragments hit the ground, they turned into foul, filthy flesh.

In the next second, Taran Ael’s figure replaced that of a “black?clad residue” and appeared in front of Lucretia.

She again raised her hand and swung the scythe without hesitation, and as she kept swinging, she took step after step toward the Annihilator who was disrupting the battlefield.

The rabbit Rabby appeared and was cut cleanly in half without a second thought.

Lightwind Harbor’s governor, Sara Mell, appeared in front of her, and once more the scythe came down in a single stroke.

Looking at the Annihilator, who was gradually showing real panic on his face, the Sea Witch had only a trace of contempt in her eyes.

Another light crackling sound came from nearby. Lucretia looked up and saw her father appear in front of her.

She finally hesitated. The deep?rooted tension and fear almost carved into her soul made her stop for the first time.

But in the next second, she still shook her head hard, throwing off all hesitation, and raised the scythe high.

“ Your psychological attacks are improving, but they are still far from enough!”

The scythe swung down.

Lucretia did not notice the brief flash of dazed confusion on the Annihilator’s face in the distance.

She saw ghostly green flame suddenly and spontaneously ignite along the blade and haft of her scythe.

The “phantom of Father” in front of her raised his hand, caught the edge of the scythe, and looked at her in surprise.

“ Lucy, are you half?asleep?”

Lucretia froze in place.

This one… was real.

To be honest, saving up these five chapters of drafts cost me a ridiculous amount of effort…

In this past half year, things in my Mortal Realm life have kept piling up. I really had no way to keep a stable two?chapters?a?day pace, and I did not even know how much time I would have to write each day. So I thought I would try my best, and even if I could only erupt once, that would be something. I worked hard to save up some drafts, so at least it could be a bigger surprise.

Also, don’t worry, I am not taking a day off tomorrow.

And last of all, please give me a monthly ticket~~)

—

Chapter 527: corruption and Dissipation

To be honest, Lucretia's mind went blank in that instant – it stayed blank for nearly two or three seconds before she slowly regained the ability to think and understood what was happening in front of her.

More terrifying than falling into a nightmare corrupted by the Sunspawn was suddenly seeing, deep in that nightmare, her father who had returned from Subspace. And even more terrifying than that was that the scythe in her own hands was chopping down toward her father's neck.

Right now, the scythe had already slipped out of her control. Dim green flame spread along its black blade and long haft. It was as if the weapon had entered another dimension and could no longer be controlled by her. Lucretia stiffly and uselessly kept her hands in the position of gripping the scythe. After holding it in for a long moment, she finally squeezed out one sentence: "Your… your scythe is really something…"

" Do you always say whatever pops into your head whenever you get nervous?" Duncan finally let go. The ghost?green flame faded as he did. "What exactly is going on here?"

As the fire died away, Lucretia finally felt that the scythe, formed from the power of the dream and the curse, had come back under her control. She hurriedly gripped it, took half a step back, and was about to answer her father's question when, in the very next second, a wave of danger suddenly surged at her from close by.

The Sunspawn’s “lesser offspring” had finally reacted, and they clearly were not going to give their enemies time to stand around and chat. In the flickering dance of light and shadow within the sunlight, several shadows lunged toward Lucretia’s back.

Lucretia had almost no time to think. She spun around, and the scythe in her hand turned into a long whip entwined with thorns. Yet just as she was about to crack the whip with all her strength, the shadows that had been pouncing at her suddenly froze in midair, revealed their true forms, and dropped to the ground as if they had lost their source of power, thrashing and struggling violently.

At the same time, Heidi, who was barely holding on by controlling several Personality Splits, suddenly felt the pressure around her ease.

She shifted her “self” from one dying personality avatar form into another that was still in decent shape. Then she stared in shock as the black?clad figures around her all collapsed one by one, flopping weakly on the ground like fish being seared by a blazing sun and struggling through their last moments.

The depths of their black coats, made of some unknown material, kept swelling and writhing. Their horrible limbs began to rot and fall apart at high speed. With sickening noises, a foul stench and filthy pus slowly spread out from under their bodies.

Even as a professionally trained psychiatrist, Heidi could not help backing up two steps in the face of this scene. Then she seemed to sense something and instinctively raised her head, wanting to look at the sky – but the instant she started to look up, she forced herself to stop.

The horror she had felt the last time she looked up and saw the Sunspawn was still carved deep into her mind, keeping her from checking her guess.

Just then, she heard the stranger who had suddenly appeared in front of Lucretia say to her: “It is all right. The sky is safe now.”

For some reason, that sentence seemed to carry a powerful force. Even though she had no reason at all to believe it, a strong impression still rose in Heidi’s heart at once: the sky was safe now.

She slowly lifted her head and looked at the “Sun” hanging high above the forest, shining and burning.

That “thing” was still quietly floating above the trees. Countless twisted tentacles and pale eyes piled together like a clump of flesh that had grown however it pleased. Its light was like blazing flame, rising and burning across the surface of that grotesque mass. Yet in the depths of that fire, a faint green slowly spread and quickly covered the surface of the whole entity.

At the moment she saw those twisted tentacles and pale eyes, fear surged uncontrollably in Heidi’s heart. But very soon she realized that her mind had not suffered any corruption from seeing it this time.

The Sunspawn’s corruption seemed to be blocked by the spreading ghostly green light – or rather, that light was corrupting and assimilating the corruption, making it harmless.

The dying struggles and screams of the “lesser offspring” clawed at Lucretia’s eardrums. Those black, almost?human inhuman things were dying quickly under the altered sunlight, dissolving as if they were soaking in strong acid. Confused, she watched this scene and turned to Duncan: “What is happening?”

“ I corrupted their temporary Sun,” Duncan said calmly. “Now, this sunlight is ‘poisonous’ to them. This is something I learned from the ‘Black Sun incident’ in Pland – this kind of residue can only survive under a specific kind of sunlight.”

Duncan spoke with a calm expression, then lifted his head and turned his gaze on the twisted being still floating above the forest.

He thought of the Black Sun he had once glimpsed through the Golden Sun Mask, and of that pale Elder God dying under the burning of the corona. Compared to the Black Sun he had seen back then, the thing now hanging over this dreamscape was clearly much smaller and far weaker.

So… this must be the “Sunspawn” those mad cultists kept talking about.

Now, this Sunspawn was being quickly devoured by the flames of corruption. The light and heat it gave off were being transformed into something that could burn it away. Yet this eerie, terrifying “creature” showed not the slightest reaction of pain. It only hung high in the sky, quiet and silent, as if it did not have emotions like pain or fear at all.

It simply shone and gave off heat, just like… a real Sun.

Yet when Duncan gazed at its pale eyes with his gaze, he still felt that the thing had thoughts. It was thinking. It was watching. It had a purpose and a will. It was not like the dying Black Sun, which had only wanted to extinguish itself, nor like the mad cultists, who only wanted to destroy the entire world.

What was this “creature” thinking right now?

“ What are you thinking?” Duncan could not help asking in his heart.

“ May I go back now?” In the blurred message that came back along the ghostly flames, he heard a voice, calm and gentle. “There is nothing here that I want.”

Duncan’s eyes widened slightly for a moment.

In the next instant, just as he tried to establish more contact with the Sunspawn, a hollow boom suddenly came from the sky. The burning mass of fire seemed to collapse inward, shrinking at once into a small point. A heartbeat later, the ghostly flames that had lost their target burst apart and scattered.

The “false Sun” that had been overlooking the forest vanished.

A dim, faintly reddish light took the place of the bright “sunlight” that had filled the sky a moment before, and the whole forest sank into a dusk?like gloom.

Lucretia’s surprised voice came from the side: “Did you destroy it?”

“ No.” Duncan shook his head slightly and shared the information he had sensed just now. “It left. That was not its true body, only a projection formed by a Sunspawn inside the dream, like a tendril used for sensing. Now it has pulled that tendril back out of the dream.”

Lucretia nodded thoughtfully, but soon she suddenly realized something else: “Wait, what about that Annihilator just now?!”

“ He ran,” Duncan said casually. “While those ‘lesser offspring’ were dying, he was constantly lowering his own presence. Then, when that false Sun in the sky collapsed and faded, he slipped away in the chaos.”

At this, Lucretia immediately frowned and instinctively scanned the forest, now dim as dusk. “Damn… I actually let my attention get dragged away. I should have left a curse on him…”

“ It is fine,” Duncan just waved his hand. “Let him run for a while.”

Lucretia was stunned for a moment when she heard this and lifted her head to look at Duncan: “You… let him go on purpose?”

Duncan did not answer her directly. He narrowed his eyes slightly as if sensing something, then smiled and shook his head. “Either way, he has already seen me.”

He did not pay any mind to the brief change on Lucretia’s face. Instead, he turned toward Heidi, who was standing tens of meters away, nervous and trying her best to make herself less noticeable.

He walked up to Miss Psychiatrist – or rather, to the whole crowd of Heidis – and first checked her condition.

About seven or eight Heidis were covered in wounds of all sizes. Three of them were horribly injured, lying on the ground and flopping like dying fish. Their personality parts had clearly withdrawn, leaving only a few last reflexive spasms. Two Heidis still looked to be in decent shape. One of those stood there with a blank expression, while the other nervously avoided Duncan’s gaze.

Duncan swept his eyes over the “large crowd of Heidis” without changing his expression, and silently sighed to himself. The psychiatrists of this world had truly taken a wild path. When they split their minds, it was even more “split” than actual schizophrenia. Then he walked right past the “Heidi” whose face was tense and whose eyes were dodging, and stopped in front of the blank?faced Miss Psychiatrist.

“ Are you all right?”

The blank “personality avatar form” jolted, and vivid expression suddenly came back to her face: “How did you know…”

By now she had, of course, guessed who this tall, imposing figure was, the one who made people feel endless pressure. She had been nervous to the point of breaking, planning to hide behind a personality avatar form to avoid having to face this terrifying Subspace Shadow directly. She had not expected her trick to fool him for even a second.

“ You use Personality Splits to protect yourself when you are nervous,” Duncan said with a friendly smile. “Although I really did not expect your Personality Splits to be this… impressive. Now I am very impressed.”

“ Sometimes… patients with schizophrenia can be hard to deal with. If you do not split enough, you cannot beat them…” Heidi explained without thinking, then suddenly realized something. “Wait, how did you kno…”

Duncan smiled and raised a hand, pointing at the purple crystal pendant on Heidi’s chest.

“ Strictly speaking, I am the one who gave you that pendant.”

Chapter 528:

“The pendant?”

When she heard the words of the Subspace shadow in front of her, Heidi was stunned at first. Then she lowered her head and looked at the “amethyst” pendant on her chest, the one that had come from some glass workshop. In the next second, everything about that pendant rose up in her mind—

The strange antique shopkeeper.

The pendant her father had brought back from the antique shop.

The impossible protection it gave during the Black Sun incident.

The second pendant.

Vanna’s unfinished investigation of that antique shop.

And now… the appearance and words of Duncan Abnomar…

Miss Psychiatrist slowly widened her eyes. Her wild guesses slowly turned into solid fact. She suddenly felt… that she might need some psychological help herself.

“Relax a little, and also control where you look. Don’t stare at things you shouldn’t,” Duncan said to Heidi with a slow smile. “Your father asked me to remind you of that.”

Heidi felt her head buzzing. She could not tell if it was noise from mild mental corruption, or just hallucinations born from nervous tension. She held her forehead and finally forced her reason and impulses under control, but her thoughts still felt slow and broken: “My father… where is he now…”

“He is serving as an adviser on the Vanished. He was afraid you would worry, so he never told you. None of us thought you would get dragged into this mess so muddle-headedly.”

“Is he all right?! He is on your ship…” Heidi blurted out. But when she looked at the stern-faced “captain” in front of her, her voice suddenly faltered. No matter how she asked, it all felt rude and reckless right now.

Duncan did not mind at all. He answered casually: “He is fine. He keeps the healthiest schedule on the crew, and he plays a huge role on the ship. Anything else you want to know?”

Heidi opened her mouth. Words shuffled in her mind for a long time before another matter suddenly came to her. It had happened almost at the same time her father walked out of the house, and now it seemed full of holes. Her guess felt insane, but she still could not hold back from asking: “Then… is Vanna also on your…”

Duncan did not answer directly, but he confirmed her guess from the side: “Do you want to see them?”

Heidi froze for a moment and suddenly did not know how to answer this simple question. Only after two or three seconds did she jolt back to herself. Her first reaction was to put away that whole crowd of terrifying Personality Splits, then she spoke in a panic: “Is that allowed? You really permit it? Ah, sorry, I don’t mean anything else, but I heard a lot about you… I should…”

Her flustered words suddenly stopped.

Because, along with a rotating doorway of ghostly green flame, two very familiar figures had already appeared in front of her—

Morris wore a smile, while Vanna's face looked a bit awkward.

"So, uh… long time no see," Vanna walked up to Heidi, rubbed the tip of her nose, and greeted her. "Sorry I kept it from you for so long. The new post is kind of sensitive, and there are secrecy rules. I only got to come this time because the captain said yes… Are you mad?"

Heidi did not answer. She only stared wide-eyed at this friend of many years, then stared wide-eyed at Morris beside her. She held it in for a long time before finally blurting out: "Can one of you please explain in detail what on earth is going on?!"

"I'll let you talk," Duncan saw that they had started to talk and sensibly waved his hand, then turned and left. "I'll go talk with Lucy."

He left the two crew members and Heidi standing there, staring at each other with wide eyes, the awkwardness almost spilling over.

Duncan paid no attention to the faintly resentful air that flashed between Vanna and Morris behind him. He walked straight over to Lucretia, only to see the "Sea Witch" avoiding his eyes, looking rather embarrassed.

Lucretia had been thinking hard for a long time. Ever since Father suddenly entered this dream, she had been in a state of confusion and helplessness. While Father went to talk with that "psychiatrist" just now, she had been trying to decide how to talk to this "relative" she had not seen in so many years, how to adjust her mindset like Tyrian had, and…

How to explain that swing of her scythe just now.

Yet when Father really walked over, she realized she had not prepared anything at all. The "Witch" who made so many people fear her on the Boundless Sea was actually not good at dealing with sudden emotional scenes like this. Because of all the wild thoughts she had just had, she felt even more at a loss now.

Lucretia opened her mouth: “I…”

“No rush,” Duncan suddenly waved his hand, cutting off whatever Lucretia was about to say. Then he turned to look at Heidi and the other two not far away. “Let’s watch for a while.”

Lucretia: “…?”

She was a bit lost for a moment. She did not know what Father meant by “watch for a while”. She even started to think of words like “plan” and “scheme”, which were not what he meant at all. But the next second, she saw that the familiar yet long-absent figure beside her was simply looking into the distance with a very human, watching-the-show kind of expression.

The Sea Witch hesitated, then also looked that way. A strange feeling rose in her heart. She did not know how to describe this odd and awkward turn of events—this was nothing like the scene she had imagined for many years about meeting Father again.

She had imagined that one day in the future, her undying self might, like Tyrian, also meet the Vanished returning from Subspace. She had imagined a brutal clash between the shining stars and the Vanished, that evil spirit from Subspace destroying all the traitors, just like he had once destroyed the Viseran Thirteen Isles on the border…

And in some gentler dreams, in fantasies that had nothing to do with reason, she had also imagined another scene—

Father would really come back. It might be on a quiet afternoon, or in the last light before dusk. They might stand on a sea cliff, like that place they had gone to in her childhood. She no longer remembered which city-state it was, only the mild sea breeze and white flowers everywhere. She and her family would stand on the highest rock. Father would tell her about the things that had happened in distant places, and she would proudly show off her Radiant Star, all her laboratories, and all her books…

But those broken dreams had all melted away in the sunlight, like sighs fading into the wind.

She had never thought that when the day of reunion really came, it would look like this—she and Father standing in this dream that seemed endless, together…

Watching other people's drama.

But little by little, Lucretia seemed to understand Father's intent.

She also looked that way, at Miss Psychiatrist with her family and friend. Over there was another daughter full of worries, a father trying to explain everything through his embarrassment, and even a friend who did not know what to do.

Maybe this was what Father meant by letting her "watch for a while".

Lucretia felt that she understood.

Then she heard Duncan break the silence beside her: "Actually, I tried to talk Morris into telling Heidi earlier, but we never found the right chance. Still, this works too. If he had explained everything before, I wouldn't have anything to watch now."

Lucretia felt she had understood too early.

In her brief confusion, she suddenly remembered something Tyrian had said in one of their earlier talks—

Father had found his humanity again.

But it seemed he had found a bit too much.

Back then she could not understand what her brother meant. Now she vaguely got it. The being that had returned from Subspace might be her father, but he was no longer only that.

“Lucy, what do you think?”

Duncan’s voice suddenly came from beside her, cutting off Lucretia’s wild thoughts. She jolted awake and looked at Father, who was now giving her a questioning look.

The messy thoughts in her mind quickly calmed down. The clash between old memories and what she saw now was thrown aside. The Sea Witch suddenly felt that all those tangled questions were not really problems. The person in front of her… was fine just like this.

After all, life was not academic research. Not every question had to have an answer.

“Miss Heidi will handle everything. I haven’t worked with her much, but I know she is rational. And there is even less need to worry about Mr. Morris. He is an adviser you trust…”

“Oh, I didn’t mean them. I meant this ‘place’,” Duncan waved his hand and pointed at the forest around them, which had fallen into dusk yet showed no sign of breaking apart. “This should be a dream, right? But it looks strange. It’s not like any dream I’ve seen…”

Lucretia felt a little off for a moment. Father’s thoughts now seemed to jump around, very different from the man in her memory. But she quickly adjusted, hurriedly sorting out her thoughts and pulling her attention away from the distant drama. She spoke while she thought: “The ‘entrance’ to this dream is Scholar Taran Ael, the mind entity over there that’s still frozen. His ‘self’ has not woken up yet. The story began like this…”

Lucretia laid out all the information she had as briefly as she could. Duncan listened carefully, then showed a thoughtful look.

“So, this forest is only a barrier that covers the ‘surface’ of the dream. The dream’s real form is hidden much deeper. And the one behind all this isn’t that elf named Taran Ael, but the ‘third Dreamer’.”

“The third, but there could also be a fourth or a fifth,” Lucretia said seriously. “Heidi’s experience shows that this dream is ‘connected’ to somewhere else. That means it could be connected to even more Dreamers. But all of that has been hidden. This forest’s ability to ‘heal itself’ and to ‘hide’… is far beyond what we imagined.”

Duncan said nothing. He frowned and sank into thought.

Just then, out of the corner of his eye, he saw the “Grand Scholar Taran Ael” not far away suddenly blink.

Chapter 529:

In the middle of the forest clearing, the mind entity of Taran Ael, which had been frozen because of “Protective Descent”, suddenly blinked. It seemed that as the corruption from the creeping Sun Wheel faded, his self-awareness finally returned to this shallower layer of the dream.

Duncan and Lucretia noticed at once and both walked toward the elven scholar. In just two or three seconds, he fully woke and stared in shock at the scene before him.

Nothing was quite the same as in his memory. The forest that had been lit by sunlight had somehow fallen into a strange dusk. Shadowy darkness blurred the sky, and many new figures had appeared in his view. He did not know any of them (including Morris, whom he had not seen for decades).

After looking around in confusion, Taran Ael finally gave a little start. He hesitated, then broke the silence: “Is my condition really this serious?”

Lucretia, who had just walked up, froze when she heard him: “What are you talking about?”

Taran Ael pointed at himself, then at Heidi, Vanna, and Morris, who had noticed the commotion and were walking over. His face was full of disbelief. “I was only out for a little while. How did it turn into this many people doing a consultation?”

Lucretia’s expression twitched. She almost lost her composure.

But Taran Ael kept talking: “If you really can’t wake me up, let me try my own method. The ‘Sudden-Death Method’ is actually quite effective…”

As soon as Lucretia heard that, she quickly cut off the Grand Scholar: “Stop thinking about your ‘Sudden-Death Method’. Do you know what just happened?”

“Just now?” Taran Ael looked blank. “What happened just now? I just zoned out…”

“The Black Sun’s minions invaded your dream and even brought in a projection of a Sunspawn,” Lucretia said with a serious face, watching Taran Ael’s expression as she spoke. “You didn’t sense any of it? If my father hadn’t appeared in time, the mind entity you left here might already have been destroyed by the battle’s aftershocks.”

Taran Ael’s face had already grown serious as he listened to the first half of Lucretia’s words. But when he heard the last sentence, he suddenly froze. Then he slowly started to react, turning his head toward Duncan with a hesitant and horrified look as he spoke: “Your… father?”

Lucretia nodded in silence. Duncan tried his best to show a friendly smile and reached out his hand to this respected Grand Scholar: “You can just call me Captain Duncan.”

But Taran Ael did not take his hand. His whole body seemed to go rigid as he stared wide-eyed at the tall figure before him. Then he suddenly drew in a deep breath, his whole form giving a violent “shudder”, and his figure vanished from the forest.

Duncan stared, completely baffled, then turned and asked: “What just happened?”

Lucretia looked almost as stunned. It took her two or three seconds after Duncan spoke to realize what had happened. Then she said, with a strange look: “…The ‘Sudden-Death Method’ worked.”

Duncan: “…?”

Just then, Heidi, Vanna, and Morris also walked over. They had planned to greet their awakened Master Taran Ael, but only saw him vanish into thin air and heard Lucretia’s last mutter. Their faces all changed in different ways.

Heidi’s face was full of amazed wonder, as if saying, “That actually worked.” Morris’s eyes held a trace of regret. Only Vanna just looked blank—she was the Athlete and did not really understand what these psychology experts were doing.

Whenever she ran into a nightmare, she just cut her way through it and ran out.

“I wanted to say hello to Master Taran Ael,” Morris said with regret. “We haven’t seen each other for many years.”

“He wouldn’t have recognized you,” Heidi shook her head. “In his memory, you’re still a young man studying abroad. He can’t even imagine that you now have a daughter.”

Morris thought for a moment and sighed softly: “That’s what it’s like dealing with elves.”

“Looks like you cleared things up?” Duncan glanced at the mood among the three and asked curiously.

“We did,” Vanna nodded and spread her hands helplessly. “We got scolded for a long time.”

Heidi kept quiet. She could not help carefully studying the “famous” captain in front of her. Her gaze moved back and forth between the people present, and who knew how many wild thoughts rushed through her mind in those few seconds.

Lucretia was not paying attention to them. She had been carefully watching the changes in this “forest” since just now. At this moment she finally broke the silence in a low voice: “Just as I guessed, Taran Ael has woken up, but the ‘dream’ itself still exists… There is another ‘Dreamer’ keeping this place going.”

Hearing her, Duncan only nodded lightly.

Because he still could not tell what kind of “Dreamer” lay behind this dream, and because this place seemed to link to many ordinary people, he had not “set it on fire” here. But ever since then, he had been carefully sensing this place.

This forest, which looked utterly real, was in essence a dream. Behind it should be the Dreamer’s subconscious. By entering here through “Spirit Realm walking”, he should in theory be able to touch and even sense that “subconscious”, just like when he had touched those “starlights” while walking in the Spirit Realm before and felt emotions and rough scraps of thought.

But here, no matter how far he extended his senses, no matter how carefully he used the “Listening Rite”, he could only feel a vast… emptiness.

There was nothing. No fear, no thoughts. Beyond the forest was still forest. Deep under the ground was still ground. The Dreamer’s personality was nowhere to be found. Rather than a “barrier” made by a subconscious to protect the deep layers of the dream, this forest felt to Duncan more like a mass of chaotic mist.

A barrier had a purpose. But mist just gathered here on its own in chaos. It had no purpose and no awareness. It only followed some ancient rule.

Duncan kept wondering what lay behind this empty, vast dream. Just then, a gust of disorderly wind suddenly blew out from deep in the forest. The cold that came with it cut off his thoughts.

“…This forest is starting to reject us,” Heidi said at once, frowning, though her tone held some doubt. “But why didn’t it react before?”

“Maybe because Taran Ael woke up,” Lucretia said thoughtfully. “His waking did not make the dream break apart, but it did close one ‘entrance’. So of course we uninvited guests will be pushed out.”

“Looks like it’s time to leave,” Duncan sighed with regret. His instincts told him this dream still hid many secrets. But he also knew that if he forced himself to stay after the dream had started to push them out, the damage he caused might not be any less than that ‘twisted Sun’ in the sky from before.

“That’s fine. I need to get back to the Mortal Realm soon and check on Taran Ael’s condition,” Lucretia said. She actually looked a bit relieved. “I really don’t want him dying on my ship.”

“All right, go,” Duncan nodded to her. “We can talk about the rest when we meet in the Mortal Realm. I’ll come find you soon.”

Lucretia’s face seemed to tighten for a moment, but she quickly eased and showed a small smile. “All right, but there’s no rush. It’s fine if you take your time. It’s a long voyage from Frost Sea to the southern seas, so be sure to travel sa—”

“I mean I’ll be there very soon—probably this afternoon,” Duncan waved his hand. “The Vanished is already near Lightwind Harbor.”

Lucretia’s smile froze at once. “…Huh?”

Duncan stayed calm. “Maybe it’s some effect from the Sun going out. The Vanished crossed a huge distance in an instant. I’m already there now.”

Lucretia stared for a beat. Then her figure “flickered” twice and vanished into thin air in front of everyone.

Duncan, Heidi, and the others were left staring at one another.

The awkward silence lasted for a moment. At last Vanna spoke first: “Did she scare herself awake?”

No one answered her.

“Time to go,” Duncan shook his head, easing the sudden awkwardness. “If you have anything else to say, we can talk later.”

Their short reunion had already reached the moment of parting again. A hint of sadness rose in Heidi’s heart. She looked at her father and friend standing beside Captain Duncan, her feelings mixed, and suddenly thought of something: “Wait, how am I supposed to contact you?! You’re on the Vanished…”

“Just write letters,” Morris said with a smile. “Send them straight to that antique shop in the Lower City. The captain will hand them over himself.”

“Huh? Just write letters?”

Heidi froze for a moment. Before she could react, she heard Vanna speak beside her: “If it’s just a short message, you can also go to the Cathedral. Bishop Valentine can help pass it on.”

Heidi still looked dazed. “You mean the Cathedral?!”

“Or you can wait until the ship has a holiday,” Duncan added next. “We’ve been busy lately, but there should be a break later. I can send them back to Pland then.”

“The Vanished even has holidays?!”

However, none of Heidi’s questions got a reply.

The wind from the forest was growing clearly cold and hostile. The dream's rejection was reaching its peak. In Heidi's eyes, Captain Duncan, her father, and Vanna were all starting to blur.

At last, even her own consciousness turned dim and hazy, and she sank into darkness in a sudden wave of weightlessness.

A second later, the darkness faded, and she jolted awake from the dream.

Heidi opened her eyes and saw that she was lying on a bed in a ward of some medical facility. Her original "patient" was nowhere to be seen.

It seemed that after she fell into Dreamwalking, someone had noticed the Anomaly and brought her here.

Miss Psychiatrist let out a deep breath.

This long and winding dream had finally come to an end.

Chapter 530: The Uninvited Guest

For the first few minutes, Heidi did not rush to get up from the hospital bed. She carefully watched her surroundings and listened to the sounds outside the room. Then she lifted her wrist and checked the number and color order of the little stones on her bracelet.

After that, she unconsciously reached to touch the amethyst pendant on her chest. A faint chill came from the gem to her fingertips, carrying a quiet, reassuring strength.

As she thought of the pendant's true origin and the source of this Protective Ward, Miss Psychiatrist's expression turned a little strange. But she quickly pushed that odd feeling down, leaving only a helpless sigh in her heart.

She could not help murmuring softly: "Fate really is unbelievable…"

"Yes, in your eyes, fate truly is unbelievable."

A strange, low voice suddenly came from her side. Heidi snapped awake at once, and all her muscles tightened.

She jerked her head toward the sound. By the ward's window, a figure in an old dark-brown robe was sitting there, though she had no idea when he had appeared. The worn robe hid almost all the lines of his body. A thick, wide hood covered his face completely in shadow. From his hunched posture, his deep voice, and the faint wrinkles at the edge of the hood's shadows, one could only guess that he was an old man.

sunlight slanted in through the window. Tiny specks of dust floated slowly in the evening light. The rays fell across the folds of the stranger's robe, leaving broken, mottled shadows. For a moment, his figure seemed almost like a half-transparent phantom.

Who was this? When had he appeared here? Had he been here all along?

A string of unnerving questions flashed through Heidi's mind. At the same time, her hand moved on its own toward the trunk beside the bed.

But before her fingers touched the trunk, that low, hoarse voice came again from the window: "There is no need for so much hostility, Miss Heidi. Today I am not your enemy—and your golden spike and pistol cannot kill a temporary traveler. Sit down. I only came to talk with you, to help ease your boredom."

Heidi's face stayed expressionless. She still drew the pistol from the hidden compartment in the trunk, quietly lifted it, and pointed the muzzle at him. Her voice was low and cold: "…What are you?"

The robed figure did not answer Heidi. Instead, he slowly raised his arms and examined his hands carefully in the sunlight falling through the window, as if he had just found something very interesting. He moved his arms back and forth in the sunlight, observing them again and again.

The sleeve of the old robe slipped down. The arm beneath was dry like a dead branch, the skin wrinkled and cracked.

Heidi watched this strange behavior, her face tense with alertness. Then she suddenly noticed the eerie state of that arm in the sunlight—it really did become transparent from time to time. For a few brief instants she could even see the sunlight pass through his arm and shine directly onto her side.

"How unbelievable… I had almost forgotten what sunlight looked like…"

The robed man sounded full of wonder, his tone carrying a hard-to-name emotion. Then he suddenly turned his head. It sounded as if he was speaking to Heidi, yet also as if he was simply talking to himself: "… Before the Fourth Long Night begins, things will change. sunlight will grow gentle. The sharp 'boundary' that sunlight once drew will blur. What was exiled, what was forgotten, what was erased, what was changed will, for a short time, be allowed to return to this world. We will bathe together in this dusk and wait for the moment when the Sun sets…"

His low voice flowed on. Rather than speaking to any living person, it sounded more like he was facing a finished book, slowly reading out the ancient words already written there.

Like a preacher, proclaiming fate to the world.

As Heidi listened to his chant, which seemed to hold some strange charm, a thought stirred faintly in her mind. Her gaze sharpened at once: "Ender?!"

The robed figure finally raised his head. In the dim shadows beneath the hood, a pair of eyes glowed with an eerie golden light. They rested on her calmly, like a gaze: "Miss Heidi, you have established a connection with that Promised Ark. Did you see the End of that journey?"

"I have no interest in a cultist's temptation." Heidi's voice was hard and cold. Her finger pressed a little tighter on the trigger, while her other hand unconsciously clutched the amethyst pendant at her chest. A nervous tension slowly spread from her heart.

She had no real confidence. She had dealt with psychiatric patients and their illnesses. She had fought monsters and shadows from nightmares. But she had never faced a "rare enemy" like a Ender. The mortal world had very few records on these Subspace madmen. The self-defense courses at Truth Academy's attached martial school had no special training against this kind of cultist. She did not know how much use her pistol would be, nor whether the supernatural power she commanded would work at all.

Yet the uninvited guest showed no reaction at all to her obvious hostility.

He seemed very different from the Enders described in the textbooks Heidi had studied.

“We smelled something unusual, Miss Heidi, right after the Promised Ark arrived,” he said slowly, even politely. “A huge, boundless void. It appeared after the End. There was nothing there… We have been seeking a way to avoid Doomsday. But now it seems that beyond Doomsday lies an emptiness far more terrifying than Doomsday itself… You have come into contact with It. Now you have become a part of that void as well. This makes us very curious… What exactly happened?”

His words sounded rambling and obscure, like one mute riddle after another. It was as if he still possessed reason, yet after a long and chaotic stretch of time had completely lost the ability to speak normally with an ordinary person. Even so, Heidi still caught some vague bits of information from his scattered phrases, and her feelings could not help but stir.

She frowned slightly.

“You mean… Duncan Abnomar? You’re saying he brought some kind of ‘void’?”

The old preacher slowly rose from the chair. In the sunlight, he proved taller than Heidi had imagined. Even with his hunched back, he stood like a giant. “I don’t know. We only know that the void has appeared, and that it is growing. Perhaps one day, it will cover the whole night sky of the Fourth Long Night…”

Heidi tensed at his sudden movement and raised her pistol a little higher. “Heretic, what do you want from me?”

“…We desperately want to know the nature of this void,” he actually answered her question seriously. But soon he shook his head. “Sadly, it seems I did not come at the right time.”

Heidi paused in surprise and blurted out: “What do you mean?”

The other man did not answer. He only turned slowly and looked at the sunlight outside the window.

“You just mentioned the Fourth Long Night. What does that mean?” Heidi asked quickly.

The uninvited guest only waved his hand.

“In this Window Interval, we can only exchange a little,” the Ender said softly, stepping toward the sunlight. “The time to leave has come. We may meet in the next Window Interval, or we may not. That depends on how fast the void expands… But no matter whether another window appears or not, we will meet again sooner or later… dusk is near.”

His figure finally became completely transparent and, in the next instant, melted into the sunlight.

Heidi froze.

If her memory had not been so clear and firm, if the solid feel of the pistol and the amethyst pendant in her hands had not been so definite, she would almost have thought she had fallen into yet another dream.

Then, as the Ender’s presence vanished completely, she suddenly felt that the “atmosphere” in the room had changed in a subtle way.

It was as if some sealing power had faded from the room.

Hurried footsteps sounded in the corridor outside the ward.

…

On the Vanished, in the captain’s cabin, Duncan sat quietly at the chart table. He was still thinking over the information he had seen and sensed in that strange dream earlier.

He did not know how much time had passed before Morris’s voice suddenly came from the side, breaking his thoughts: “I thought you would consider letting Heidi join this ship.”

Duncan looked up and smiled at the old gentleman: “Didn’t you say before that you didn’t want her getting too close to the Vanished?”

“At the time… I was still a bit nervous about this ship,” Morris answered with an embarrassed little smile. Then he shook his head. “And back then, Heidi knew nothing about us. Now that she already knows, there’s no need to keep her at such a distance.”

Duncan thought for a moment and spoke quite seriously: “True. But when I thought it over, it seemed this ship doesn’t really need a psychiatrist.”

He turned his head and glanced out the window, then said casually: “Who here needs counseling? You don’t. Agatha doesn’t. I certainly don’t. Vanna’s will is so strong it even shocks me. Shirley’s sanity is bound to Dog, and Dog is a Abyssal demon. Nina is a fragment of the Sun. Alice… Alice doesn’t have a scheming bone in her body. Anyone else? Goathead?”

Goathead, lying on the chart table, snapped his neck around the moment he heard his name: “Ah, great Captain, your First Mate is forever steadfast and reliable, and will never be beaten by so?called psychological problems. I even self?studied many courses in psychology, so I can fully—”

“Shut up.”

“Oh.”

“So, you see,” Duncan turned to Morris and spread his hands, “if Heidi did come aboard, the one most likely to need a psychiatrist on this ship would probably be Heidi herself.”

Morris considered it for a while. He quietly picked up his pipe and muttered before putting it to his lips: “That does seem true…”

Chapter 531: The Grand Scholar Awakens

Lucretia tore herself out of the dream in a sudden jolt. Even so, she spent several seconds calming her thoughts before opening her eyes. Only then did she let out a long breath, open her eyes on the chair, and slowly look around the room to check the “hint items” she had set up in advance in the laboratory.

The first thing to do after waking from a strange dream was never to jump up at once. One had to calm the mind first and confirm the details of the Mortal Realm, to avoid being trapped inside a double dream.

After a short while, she confirmed the details of the Mortal Realm and that she had completely left that dream. At the same time, she confirmed that Master Taran Ael had woken up as well.

The elven Grand Scholar was in a sorry state. Several ropes tied him to a nearby pillar, and a lump had risen on his head. The clockwork doll Lunie stood next to him with a sharp kitchen knife in hand, watching him with full attention.

“Lady Lucretia, you’re finally awake!” The Grand Scholar cried out for help the moment he saw the Sea Witch open her eyes. “Your servant tied me up! I don’t know what I did wrong…”

Lucretia frowned at once: “Lunie, what is this about?”

“He suddenly started yelling in his sleep,” Lunie reported, still gripping the kitchen knife and looking very serious. “After he woke up, he jumped off the bed and hit his head on your workbench. I judged that he had been corrupted by a nightmare, so I tied him up to prevent secondary injuries.”

The Grand Scholar protested loudly: “How many times have I told you, you wooden head! I was only scared in a dream! I saw Duncan Abnomar! As a normal, sane ordinary person, am I not allowed to wake up in fright when I see him in a dream?”

Listening to the “two people” in front of her, Lucretia’s expression twisted a little. She had also just been frightened awake. She pressed her lips together and rose from the chair: “Lunie, put down the knife and untie the scholar. He is telling the truth.”

“Yes, Mistress.” The clockwork doll bowed her head at once. With a clean downward swing of the knife, she cut through the ropes on Taran Ael’s body. Then she flipped her wrist, and the cold, gleaming blade disappeared into some hidden compartment inside her.

Free again, Taran Ael stumbled forward two steps before he finally found his balance. He could not help turning to glare at the stiff doll: “You wooden head!”

The clockwork doll paid no attention at all to the Grand Scholar’s anger. She simply stepped to her Mistress’s side and asked curiously: “Has the old Master arrived?”

“He… ‘arrived’, in every sense of the word,” Lucretia said, the corner of her mouth twitching slightly, her tone a bit hesitant. Then she waved one hand. A chair floated out from the corner of the room and landed in front of her. “Mr. Taran Ael, sit down. I have some things I need to ask.”

Taran Ael stretched his sore arms, grumbling as he walked over to sit in front of the Sea Witch. He muttered to himself: “If he’s coming, then he’s coming. It’s not as if he could get here in an instant anyway…”

Lucretia listened to his muttering in silence and said nothing. She only reached toward a low cabinet at her side, felt around deep inside, and took out a bottle of potion, which she set on top of the cabinet.

Taran Ael watched her movement with curiosity: “What is that?”

“This is a ‘witch’s potion’ we’ll use in a bit,” Lucretia said casually, clearly not intending to answer him directly. She moved on at once: “About the time when the Sun went out, and about the dream just now, there are things I want to ask. I know we already spoke briefly in the dreamscape, but dreams block parts of the subconscious. There may be things you didn’t notice then. Now I need you to recall everything again while fully awake.”

Hearing the seriousness in the Lady’s voice, Taran Ael’s expression quickly turned serious as well. The bearing of a scholar returned to him. “All right, ask whatever you wish. My head already feels much clearer now.”

“You observed the surface of Vision 001 while the Sun was out. This is the sketch you left,” Lucretia said without ceremony. She pulled out a crumpled sheet of paper and handed it to him. “Is this it?”

“Yes, I drew that.”

“I’ve already checked. The drawing itself doesn’t carry any mental corruption. But the content is disturbing. On the surface of that ‘sphere’, you drew these messy, branch?like lines. From my analysis, many of these lines seem to have been added near the end, in a rush, to cover the original, clearer pattern. Do you remember that?”

Taran Ael’s brows furrowed at once.

He took the paper from Lucretia and stared at the spherical image covered in chaotic lines. The more he looked, the more tightly his brows knitted, and his mind sank into thought and memory.

Lucretia's voice came again from across from him: "A very important question is this—do you truly remember all the details from the moment you finished observing the Sun's surface to the moment you fell asleep? From the looks of it, you're as puzzled by these tangled lines as I am…"

"I… am indeed a little confused," Taran Ael said slowly. "This really does look like obvious smearing, but I don't remember why I covered the earlier details… It seems…"

He suddenly stopped. After chewing over his words, he went on hesitantly: "Perhaps I saw something extremely terrible. Or a truth that should not be made public. I drew it without control. But just before I operated the express dispatch, I suddenly woke up to myself, so I hurried to cover it… Yet for some reason, I still wanted to send it out…"

Even though things were still somewhat muddled and there were clear breaks in his memory, Taran Ael's reason and logic as a seasoned scholar still took the lead. He analyzed what had happened to him, then his expression grew grave. "How many people have seen this paper so far?"

"A small number of senior scholars at Truth Academy," Lucretia said with a nod. "The original is still with me. They only saw the smeared version. I've already warned them. And the fact that you fell into deep sleep is a warning in itself, so you don't have to worry about anyone secretly studying this sketch and trying to restore what you saw. But the Boundless Sea is very large. We can't rule out the chance that some other 'brave soul' did something just as bold as you."

Taran Ael nodded thoughtfully. Then he heard the Witch continue: "About that dream—what else do you remember? How did you do the dreamwalking? Did your mind ever sink down to its true ‘last layer’?”

“I only remember that when I woke up, I was already standing in that ‘forest’,” Taran Ael said, thinking back as he spoke. “Just like in some old books—an endless, dense forest, the place where the elves came from… My thoughts in that dream felt very slow. The voices I heard, the information I sensed, and my reactions to the outside world all seemed to pass through a thick barrier…”

He spoke while recalling, then suddenly frowned.

“But there was one very strange part. Not long after you appeared, my thoughts did sink for a moment, but not to the last layer of the dream. Instead, it was like a place between one ‘layer’ and another. Many chaotic lights and shadows tangled together there, as if several very different dreams were overlapping and projecting into each other. And in that chaotic region, there were many hazy figures gathered around me…”

“Many hazy figures?” Lucretia interrupted him at once. “Explain clearly. Were they illusions inside the dream, or ‘dreamers’ like you?”

“I don’t know. At that time my thoughts were almost frozen. I could only feel that they were there and could not clearly describe what they were. But one thing is certain… They were not illusions,” Taran Ael said, his face serious. “They truly existed. Even if they weren’t other dreamers, they were other ‘mental entities’ contained in that dream.”

“I see.” Lucretia nodded, her expression calm. She let out a small breath. “That really is… vital information.”

“I hope it can be of use,” Taran Ael said earnestly. Then he glanced down at the sketch in his hand. “Then about this drawing…”

“I now think it’s best not to let ordinary scholars come into contact with it. Whatever you ‘smeared out’ is clearly harmful to normal minds,” Lucretia said, pulling the sketch out of his hand. “I’ll let Father take a look later. Maybe he’ll think of something.”

Taran Ael blinked, took a second to react, then nodded: “Oh, right. Captain Duncan certainly won’t be afraid of whatever’s hidden in this drawing. Then we’ll wait until he arrives. I’m in no hurry…”

“Ah, that’s the other thing I wanted to tell you,” Lucretia said, leisurely shifting her posture as she looked into Taran Ael’s eyes. “My Father has already arrived at Lightwind Harbor.”

Taran Ael’s eyes went wide, and his expression froze at once.

“Maybe because of the special influence of the Sun going out, the Vanished reached its destination in an instant,” Lucretia said with a small nod. “He should be very interested in speaking with you face to face, or inviting you to his ship. He cares a great deal about the Sun’s extinction.”

Taran Ael stayed dazed for a few more seconds. Then his eyes suddenly focused, as if he had sobered in an instant. He drew in a sharp breath and leaned backward—

Lucretia watched him without any change in her expression. She calmly picked up the potion bottle she had set on the low cabinet and handed it to Lunie: “Pour this into Mr. Taran Ael.”

Lunie gave a soft “oh” and took the potion to carry out her Mistress’s order. Lucretia watched the Grand Scholar being dosed and nodded in satisfaction.

“See? It came in handy.”

Today, the Sea Witch once again successfully stopped Master Taran Ael from dropping dead on her ship.

Chapter 532:

Heidi followed the staff member in a dark blue uniform toward another ward deeper inside the medical facility while listening to the explanation along the way:

“That patient woke up first and found you collapsed beside her bed. She ran into the corridor to call for help, and only then did we realize something had happened in the ward…

“Because of your earlier instructions, we first asked the Church guardians and the resident priest to inspect the area around the ward, but they did not find any sign of extraordinary power or corruption. Only you would not wake from your sleep… So we moved you to a ward a bit closer to the small cathedral…

“That elven young lady is still in the facility. Her mental state is good, but she does not seem to remember what happened in the dream, and she cannot explain how she suddenly fell into that sleep. We asked her to stay a little longer for now, in case you want to ask her something.

“Her family is here as well. If you need anything, you can ask…”

The staff member suddenly stopped. A trace of hesitation appeared on the face, and the staff member turned to look at Heidi: “I am sorry. I forgot that you also just woke from a long sleep. You should be resting now…”

“I do not need rest. I have slept long enough this time.” Heidi waved a hand. Her gaze kept drifting over the staff member’s face despite herself, but she quickly forced her expression and eyes back under control. Then she asked, as if casually: “Before you came in, did anything strange happen in my room?”

“Something strange?” The staff member frowned and thought for a moment, then shook the head. “No. Did something happen?”

An uninvited guest had crossed a fissure in the timeline and intruded into the ward—then dropped a heap of cryptic, ominous words before leaving.

Heidi replayed what had just happened in her mind, but soon shook her head and said calmly, “No, I was just asking. I wanted to confirm whether anything unusual happened in my room while I was asleep.”

This “staff member” was only an ordinary person responsible for reception. The rambling, unsettling Ender, on the other hand, felt far too strange to Heidi. Out of caution, it was better not to let news of that “preacher” reach an ordinary person’s ears.

When she went back, she should report directly to the Cathedral, or to the central great Cathedral of the city-state.

Maybe she should also tell her father. And that… Captain Duncan?

All kinds of thoughts turned in Heidi’s mind. Some of them even made her feel a little chill. While her thoughts rose and fell like waves, she had already been led to the end of the corridor.

The staff member who had guided her finished a brief handover with the nurse at the door, then left quietly. Heidi took a deep breath in front of the ward, quickly straightened out her state and expression, then reached out and pushed the door open.

In the bright, tidy ward, the elven maiden who had been trapped in sleep earlier was now calmly half-reclining on the bed. She leaned against a pile of pillows and blankets, holding a book and reading intently. A plump, kindly looking elven old lady sat on the edge of the bed, carefully peeling an apple.

When Heidi stepped into the room, the elven maiden immediately looked up. A bright smile bloomed on her face: “Ah! Miss Doctor! You are awake?”

“I came to see how you are doing.” Heidi smiled back as she walked over to the bed. She nodded politely to the kindly looking elven old lady. “Hello. May I ask, you are…?”

“She is my grandmother!” the elven maiden on the bed hurried to answer.

The old lady gave her granddaughter a helpless look, then turned to Heidi with a smile. “This child is a bit too familiar with everyone… Thank you very much for what you did for Flora, Miss Heidi.”

A faint trace of awkwardness appeared on Heidi’s face. “I feel like I did not help much. Even this ‘doctor’ fell into sleep.”

“But I heard from the staff here that you fell asleep because you tried to wake Flora from her nightmare,” the old lady said. She passed the freshly peeled apple to Heidi, and her warm, sincere attitude did not sound like empty politeness at all. “And Flora also said she felt someone protecting her in her sleep—when danger came close, a series of gunshots drove away her fear.”

A series of gunshots? Danger approaching?

Was that the Annihilator who tried to get close to the bed through the “suggestion gateway” she had opened, during the backlash of the dream?

A guess flashed through Heidi’s mind. She thanked the old lady for the apple, then sat down on the chair beside the bed. She looked seriously at the elven girl named Flora. “Your name is Flora, right? Do you remember how you fell asleep?”

“I remember… I was reading at home.” Flora frowned as she thought. “Before that, the Sun went out. Grandmother said the streets were dangerous and told me to stay in my room. Later the Sun lit up again, and I got really bored, so I picked up a book to read—after all, the Sun was shining again. But I don’t know why. After reading for only a little while, I suddenly felt very sleepy and then fell asleep…”

“Reading a book?”

Heidi muttered under her breath. Her eyes swept over the book that Flora had been holding a moment ago. On the pale violet cover, an ornate string of letters caught her eye—The Crystal Garden of the Dreamless Prince.

“In my opinion, it is all because she keeps reading this kind of nonsense,” the plump elven madam grumbled at the side. “Her head is full of unreliable fantasies. If she keeps reading this stuff, she will be corrupted sooner or later. The gods will never bless a romance between two men…”

Flora immediately protested from the side. “Not two—several!”

Heidi shook her head to the old lady. “Do not worry. It was not the content of this book that caused this.”

As soon as she finished speaking, Flora looked pleasantly surprised. “Doctor Sis, you read this too?!”

Heidi: “…”

Drawing on many years of finely honed professional skill, Miss Psychiatrist ignored the very different expressions that flashed across Flora’s and her grandmother’s faces. She instead turned a serious gaze on the elven maiden. “Putting that aside, during the time when the Sun went out, you did not try to look at its surface or glance up at the sky, did you?”

“Of course not. Who would dare?” Flora stuck out her tongue. “What sane person would go staring around when the Sun is extinguished?”

Heidi kept a straight face and asked another question: “Do you remember what happened while you were asleep? Even a little impression is fine—aside from the ‘gunshots’. I know about that part.”

“…Aside from those gunshots, there really is only a little bit I remember,” Flora said. She thought hard and spoke with some uncertainty. “I just remember lying in the dark. I felt groggy and could not see anything around me, and I could not really hear anything either. In that darkness, there were many, many shadows, like other people, all standing around me…”

Heidi’s expression immediately grew solemn. “Many, many shadows?”

…

In the depths of the Boundless Sea, in a city-state far from Pland and Lightwind Harbor, a figure wrapped in a thick black coat slipped in a hurry into a narrow alley.

The figure moved quickly, but the steps were slightly unsteady, as if shaken by panic. He avoided any possible prying eyes at the mouth of the alley and slipped through one side path after another. After wandering through the maze-like back lanes long enough to make anyone lose their way, he finally darted into a small house.

dusk was drawing near. The last glow of the Sun was quietly fading from the city. The gas lamps on the streets had not yet been lit. The dimness arrived early, sinking slowly over one house after another.

The soft hiss of a match being struck sounded. An oil lamp in the house was lit.

The man tossed his thick black coat over the arm of the sofa, then walked to the cabinet, took out a bottle of spirits, and poured himself a full glass. He carried it back to the sofa, sat down, and drained half the glass in one gulp.

Only then, wrapped in the faint sense of safety brought by the oil lamp's light, did he let out a long breath.

The strong liquor burned his tongue and his nerves, easing that horror that clung to him like bone-deep frost. He felt courage and life slowly returning to his body, and his cold hands and feet grew warm again.

A faint clinking of chains sounded behind him. A black chain slowly emerged out of thin air. One end of the chain was fastened to his body. The other end bound a jellyfish-like thing that floated in midair, as if made of gathered smoke and dust.

The dull-witted demon revealed its form, pulsing and squirming mindlessly in the air as it sent waves of restless unease toward the man.

"I know, I know. We almost got into big trouble," the man muttered irritably. He knew the Abyssal demons had no hearts and could not understand human language, but after many years living under a symbiotic pact with the demon, he had unconsciously gotten used to talking to it, as if this dangerous cloud of smoke were truly a family member or a friend he could trust. "Who could have guessed that captain cursed by the curse would suddenly appear… damn it, what does any of this have to do with him…"

He put down his glass, leaned back on the sofa, and lifted his head, staring at the ceiling with unfocused eyes. His tone was full of resentment.

"Those Sun remnants who are as stupid as bricks were useless. They could not even handle that 'witch'… Tch. The believers at the bottom are all idiots. Even those called 'envoys' are just brainless scraps. The so-called Sun spawn are nothing but puppets that cannot think… Among those Sun believers, from top to bottom you can hardly find a single one whose mind is whole. I was almost killed because of them…"

He grumbled as he spoke, then picked up his glass again and gulped twice more. Feeling his heartbeat slowly easing, he turned his head to glance at his demon bound by the symbiotic pact.

“Calm down. We are safe now. We will find another chance. If those chattering preachers were right, more and more elves will soon be affected by the ‘Primordial Defect’. We will have other chances to slip into that dream…”

He suddenly fell silent.

The Smokewisp Jellyfish was pulsing and twisting more and more violently in the air, sending increasingly frantic signals to its symbiotic pact-bearer. The man seemed to sense something at last—his dull spiritual intuition finally began to raise an alarm. As rising waves of fear washed over him, his perception finally broke through the self-protection of his subconscious and began to notice… that gaze, so close at hand.

He swallowed hard and slowly lowered his eyes.

He looked at the glass in his hand.

The remaining liquor rippled slightly in the cup, reflecting the wavering light of the oil lamp. In that faintly eerie greenish firelight, a gloomy and austere face appeared in the reflection, calmly fixing him with a divine gaze.

“Go on,” he heard a hazy voice echo in his mind, as if it were his own thoughts speaking. “I like people who are used to talking to themselves.”

Chapter 533:

Faced with this incomprehensible and terrifying sight, the man froze for one or two seconds. Then he suddenly let out a shout, flung the glass away in panic, and dove to the side.

The glass hit the floor and shattered at once. The remaining liquor splashed across the floor like blood. On the surface of every droplet, tiny sparks and that same gloomy, austere face seemed to flicker for an instant. The man staggered back, almost tripping over the sofa beside him. He only managed to stay on his feet by grabbing the wall for support.

Panting hard, he stared wide-eyed at the broken glass and spilled liquor on the floor. His heart pounded as if it would explode. The Smokewisp Jellyfish bound to him under the symbiotic pact drifted blindly nearby, then gradually shrank into a strange, tight ball.

The shattered glass and spilled liquor no longer held that terrifying reflection. What had just happened seemed like nothing but a horrific hallucination. The man tried to steady his breathing, hoping that taking in more fresh air would calm him down. A faint, shaky thought began to rise from his heart. Maybe it really was an illusion. Maybe he really was just too nervous…

“It is all illusions, all illusions… It is mental instability after exposure to Subspace…” he muttered quickly, talking to himself as he laid down layer after layer of mental suggestion. At the same time he drew power from the Abyssal demon of his symbiotic pact to build spiritual defenses. “Stop associating, stop remembering, avoid connections, avoid connections…

Holy Master, grant me Your shelter. Let me live forever in the Abyssal Deep. Holy Master, grant…”

“I appreciate your optimistic spirit,” a voice sounded in his ear, “but blind optimism does not solve anything. Relax. I only want to learn a few things from you.”

The man broke off his prayer at once. The voice that reached his ears was like a dreadful whisper from Subspace itself, clutching his mind with an almost physical grip. In stiff, jerky movements, he turned his neck toward the source of the sound—and saw it on the glass of the cabinet. In the glass, ghost-green flame burned quietly. Within the flames was reflected that ghost from Subspace.

“Get out!”

A surge of courage came from nowhere. The Annihilator suddenly grew vicious. He flung out his hand, drawing on the strength of the Smokewisp Jellyfish, and hurled a murky, corrosive ball of energy at the cabinet. With a thunderous bang, the entire cabinet exploded into splinters. Glass shards flew through the room.

But before the shards even hit the ground, that terrifying figure appeared again—this time on a mirror in the corner of the room. “Have you vented enough? If you have, let us talk calmly.”

At last, the cultist found the pattern—mirrors.

That Subspace ghost could invade this place through mirrors!

The next second, the man smashed the mirror in the corner without hesitation. Then he went berserk, destroying every glass ornament on the nearby shelves and every object within sight that could reflect an image!

Sharp crashes rang out over and over as glass shattered across the room. Whatever he could smash, he smashed. Whatever he could not smash, he covered with newspapers, clothes, or anything else he could grab. Fear turned into anger, and anger turned into a false courage. Fueled by that "courage," the cultist moved at frantic speed, sealing off and destroying every medium in the room that might let the Subspace ghost "descend." All the while, ghost-green flames flickered from one reflective surface to another, and that grim figure in the mirrors almost never stopped harassing him.

New mirrors kept appearing. New voices kept speaking. New faces kept surfacing within his field of view, gazing at him with gloomy divine eyes.

He did not know how long this ghastly torment continued, but at last it began to fade.

The man had almost destroyed or covered every object in the room that could reflect anything. He had drawn thick curtains over all the windows. As he hurled the last glass vase into the trash, the building fell silent again.

Darkness had settled outside. Inside the room, only the glow of the oil lamp flickered faintly. At some point, the terrifying ghost-green tint had faded from the flame. Standing amid the wreckage, the cultist gulped for air as he watched the dimness and quiet pressing in around him.

It really seemed that the ghost would not appear again.

Even the Smokewisp Jellyfish bound to him under the symbiotic pact had quieted. It now looked withered. The smoke curling from its body was thin and dim, as if the recent struggle had consumed so much of its power that it could hardly maintain a form in the Mortal Realm.

The man stood in the darkness for a long time, as if weighing something with great care. Only after a long while did he slowly let out a breath, reach for the black coat on the sofa, and quickly pull it on.

The noise in the room just now had been loud. It might already have attracted the neighbors' attention. In a remote neighborhood like this, the constables were always slow to respond, but as long as someone filed a report, trouble might still come knocking.

What was more, this room had already been marked by that Subspace ghost. It was no longer safe. Smashing and covering the mirrors only blocked the channels through which the ghost could descend, but could never truly remove its influence.

Right now, the ghost was only temporarily kept out of the Mortal Realm. Before the constables reacted and before the ghost found a new way to intrude, the only right choice was to leave as fast as possible.

The man quickly laid out his next steps in his mind. He buttoned his coat, hid away the demon of his symbiotic pact, and strode toward the door.

But just before leaving the room, he stopped again. His eyes fell on the pile of junk in the center of the room, covered with newspapers and torn rags.

He thought for a moment, then flung out a hand and hurled a dark ball of energy—the papers and cloth flew away, revealing a heap of shattered mirrors and glass scattered over the floor, glinting with cold, ominous light in the gloom.

"It will be better if someone reports this."

The man smiled in satisfaction, then did not dare look at those shards any longer. He turned, opened the door, and slipped out into the veil of night.

He moved cautiously through the streets and alleys, using the shadows of the buildings as cover and sometimes hiding his form with spells. He quickly left the area that was no longer safe and, following the familiar routes in his memory, ran toward the Lower City.

Curfew had already begun. Guardians were on the streets. Anyone wandering outside might be stopped and questioned. But for a cultist who had been active in this city-state for many years and was long used to life under the veil of night, this was not much of a problem.

As long as he did not cause too much noise, the “blind spots” right under the noses of the Church’s guardians were everywhere.

Hidden in the darkness, the figure slipped through the checkpoint between districts, then entered the more tangled, ancient alleys of the Lower City. After winding through countless turns and side streets, he finally stopped in front of an old, ordinary-looking house.

The man carefully checked his surroundings, making sure there was no sign of that eerie ghost-green fire in his vision and no suspicious noise in his mind. Only then did he let out a small breath and step forward to knock on the door in a set pattern.

He waited patiently until footsteps approached on the other side. A lowered voice sounded from behind the door:

“It is late. Whatever it is, talk about it tomorrow.”

“The night is very deep. My traveling companion and I just want to come in and rest our feet—we have brought some interesting stories from afar.”

Silence fell behind the door. After roughly ten seconds, a soft click sounded as the lock turned. The door opened quietly in the dark, and a thin, small figure appeared in the doorway under the dim light.

“Come in. Do not make too much noise.”

The man nodded, slipped quickly inside, and closed the door behind him. Only when he heard the soft click of the lock settling back into place did he finally relax a little, a look of relief crossing his face like someone who had barely escaped with his life.

“Why did you come at this hour?” the thin figure asked, still watching the “brother” who had just entered with caution. Although his identity had already been confirmed, his behavior did not fit “protocol,” which put the thin man on edge. “We did not receive any advance word from you.”

“Something sudden happened,” the man in the black coat said, shaking his head and lowering his voice. “My operation failed. An unexpected Higher Being intervened, and now He has His eyes on me—but do not worry, I have temporarily blocked His channels into the Mortal Realm. Right now the urgent thing is to report this upward…”

The small-bodied cultist’s expression turned solemn at once. He quickly cut him off and stopped him from saying more. Then he picked up an oil lamp from the nearby table and walked toward the corner as he spoke softly: “Come with me. We will go underground. Do not speak of our actions under the Four Gods’ gaze.”

“All right.”

The small cultist opened a hidden door in the corner. The two figures, one after the other, slipped into a sloping passage that led down.

Soon, they reached the gathering place beneath the building.

Calling it a gathering place was generous. It was really just a secret basement that had been dug out in secret. In the not-so-large room, several chairs stood around a round table. A few oil lamps burned upon it, alongside a messy spread of tools and materials used for rituals and heretical worship.

At the far end of the room stood a dark statue. It looked like an eerie, twisted “tree.” Its black trunk branched into dizzying, thorn-like limbs that radiated a faint, unsettling presence.

The man in the black coat walked down the steps and saw that several figures were already gathered here. They were the “brothers” who had followed procedure and hurried underground the moment he knocked on the door.

His gaze swept over these “brothers,” and they raised their heads in turn, examining this Visitor who had come after nightfall.

After a few heartbeats, the tight air in the room eased a little. The man in the black coat let out a breath, walked up to the round table, and sat down on an empty chair.

Closest to him sat a man with dry, yellowish hair and a sickly, gloomy face. He looked up at the newcomer, stared for a moment in silence, then suddenly asked, “You ran into trouble?”

“I could not break through that ‘dream’. The Enders must have given us bad information—damn it, I should have known. No one is worth trusting except the Holy Master’s followers…”

“Slow down. Calm yourself first,” the sickly-faced man said, forcing out a small smile as he picked up a glass of water from nearby and slid it over. “Drink some water.”

The man in the black coat took the glass and exhaled. “Thanks, Duncan.”

…

“Reynard! Please, be a decent person!”

“Eh? A person? But I am a fox spirit.”

“And also, please call me Adoptive Father.”)

Chapter 534: The Time for Prayer

The man finally began to calm down.

He had escaped that building corrupted by the Subspace Shadows, escaped those terrible mirrors and burning flames, and come to the gathering hall watched over by the Holy Lord's gaze and divine blessing. Now trusted comrades were all around him. The flickering lights gave off a soothing strength. The concern and encouragement of like-minded believers slowly washed away his panic and tension.

It seemed that nothing terrible was going to happen.

So the man in the thick black coat let out a long breath. Then he picked up the cup of water Duncan had handed him, ready to wet the throat that had gone dry from running all the way here.

But as soon as he lifted the cup and saw the rippling surface of the water inside, he felt a stab of discomfort. A faint unease rose up from his heart, and he set the cup back down.

Clearly this was a "side effect" of the awful incident earlier. He felt that for at least the next few hours he had better not touch any drink in a cup again. If it really could not be helped, he would just find a straw later.

"So what exactly happened?" the cultist with straw-yellow hair and a grim face, the one who had just handed him the cup, asked with concern. "What kind of trouble did you run into?"

Around the round table, the other Annihilators also turned their eyes this way. Curiosity and seriousness showed on every face.

“That dream… the Nameless One’s dream the Ender mentioned. Inside it there was a maze of structures, and a barrier protected it,” the man in the black coat said with a sigh, still shaken. “The entrance did not ‘appear on its own.’ I do not know how it went for the other comrades who tried to enter. On my side, I was blocked out. Even the remnants of the Sun were kept outside. But that was not the worst part. The worst was…”

The man suddenly stopped. He glanced in confusion at the “comrade” beside him, and his brows drew together: “Duncan, are you alright? You look terrible…”

“Me? I feel fine,” the “Annihilator” with the dry yellow hair said with a laugh. His laugh sounded a little hoarse. “You are too nervous.”

“You really are too nervous. Duncan’s face has always looked this sickly,” another person at the table said, shaking his head. “Go on. What was the worst part? Ordinary trouble would not make you react like this.”

“…Duncan Abnomar, the ghost of the curse who returned from the Subspace,” the man in black said, still full of fear. “He stepped into that Nameless One’s dream.”

The hall fell silent at once. It was as if an unseen freezing wind blew through, making the air in the basement suddenly thick and still.

In that sudden, suffocating silence, the man in black felt a heavy pressure. But he forced himself to calm down and went on: “First I ran into a very troublesome psychiatrist. That psychiatrist broke through the ‘psychology chamber’ I set up. Then, in the open area of the Nameless One’s dream, I met the even more troublesome sea witch. Things were not too bad yet at that point. The remnants of the Sun held back the witch's movements. But then, Duncan Abnomar suddenly appeared…

"That ghost ruined everything. Those remnants of the Sun and their 'blood kin' were no match for him at all. The information from outside was wrong. Duncan Abnomar and the sea witch were not enemies at all. They talked right in front of me, and their relationship was much friendlier than people guessed.

"Do you remember the reports from Frostholm? I even suspect the Vanished fleet never really disbanded. The Radiant Star and the Sea Mist have been carrying out that ghost's orders in secret the whole time. And this time… I just happened to uncover their secret. That ghost and his two children must also be paying attention to the matter of the Nameless One's dream…"

He spoke quickly. His mind had never felt so active. The terrifying experience he had just gone through began to reorder itself in his head, linking up with all kinds of secret information that had been spreading through different channels lately. In the end it formed a very convincing chain of logic, at least convincing to himself. As he laid it out, he felt he had finally sorted his messy thoughts and understood everything.

But then a gaze from across the round table, heavy as something solid, suddenly fell on him and cut him off.

"Wait," the owner of that gaze said. He was an old man with graying hair and an air of authority. His eyes were sharp, and his deep voice carried the sternness of a leader. "Are you saying you ran into those Subspace Shadows in the Nameless One's dream, and that it has already set its eyes on you?"

"Y-yes," the man in black said, suddenly tense. Under the Envoy's gaze he felt fear by instinct, but he still forced himself to answer. "It tracked me into the Mortal Realm and tried to invade my hiding place through mirrors. But I found the pattern of how it entered the Mortal Realm and blocked those ‘passages’…”

He spoke quickly, and finally, under the Envoy’s gaze, he began to feel that coldness. His dull, numb mind reacted at last. He noticed it at last—the constant noise that had been buzzing in his head, and the formless things squirming and twitching at the edge of his vision.

He slowly stood up. The muscles all over his body trembled. He accidentally brushed against the “comrade” sitting closest to him. That person raised his head and gave him a friendly smile, yet deep inside that smile there was a strange taste he could not name.

The man in black felt a sudden tightness in his chest. He spoke, hesitant and nervous: “Duncan, you… why does your face look even worse than before…”

The “Annihilator” with the dry yellow hair and sickly, sinister face sighed and shook his head with a hint of regret.

“Annihilators… In a way, your strange symbiotic pact ecosystem gives you a natural resistance to me,” he said calmly. “The Abyssal demons you rely on have sharp senses but not enough mind to weigh gains and losses. So in a very short time, these demons collapse. Right after that, the ‘vessels’ transformed out of your bodies break down as well. Even in the best case, they only last a little more than ten minutes…”

The “Annihilator” called “Duncan” spoke slowly. As he talked, a faint crackling sound came from all over his body. Behind him, a dim dark Shadow bound in chains seemed to struggle as it faded away. His body quickly filled with black cracks and began to crumble and fall apart bit by bit.

Duncan slowly spread his hands. The Abyssal demons that had formed a symbiotic pact with this body were already dead. The body itself slowly turned to ash as well.

“But the good news is, even in such a short time, I still heard quite a lot of useful things.”

That body crumbled away completely. Under the flickering yellow light, countless black ashes fell in silence.

The man in black stared in horror. In those few short seconds, he could not even tell whether fear, regret, or anger came first in his heart. Then he suddenly came to his senses. He looked up at the Envoy sitting across the table and cried: “I am guilty—”

“You are guilty.”

The gray-haired Envoy spoke without any expression. He raised his hand and pointed forward. In the darkness, a silent, shapeless shadow suddenly appeared and then vanished again in the hall. In that brief instant, the “guilty” man in black lowered his head, and his body slumped in the chair.

A few seconds later, the body burst into flame. Black fire swallowed his flesh in an instant, filling the air with a sickening smell.

The cultists in the hall watched in silence. No one made a sound. Only when the heap of burning black ash finally collapsed did a tall figure hesitantly break the silence: “Envoy, we…”

The man known as the Envoy did not answer. The pale-haired cult leader only swept a calm look over everyone in the room. Then he rose without expression, went to close the main entrance of the hall, and locked the hidden door used for emergency escape. After that, he murmured a benediction in front of both doors. Black thorns grew quickly under his prayer and sealed the doors in an instant.

The small cultist who had led the Visitor here earlier leaped to his feet when he saw this: “Envoy! What are you…?”

“Duncan was one of our earliest members,” the cult leader said calmly. His eyes moved over the two piles of black ash by the round table. “When do you think he was transformed?”

The Annihilators in the room looked at one another. One by one, they finally understood, and horror spread over their faces.

“He is among us,” the Envoy said as he came back to the round table. He looked at the believers gathered there and spoke slowly. “Any moment, any person, any face… He has already come in.”

“What should we do?” someone at the table asked.

“From now on, do not discuss our Lord’s secrets, and do not share information about the Cult. In our mortal bodies, we have no way to fight the Subspace Shadows. But the Lord will still witness our courage and toughness. We will no longer reveal any information to that ghost, no matter what terror or temptation He uses here…”

The Envoy spoke slowly. Then he spread his hands and went on in a solemn preaching tone:

“I will find a way to send out what we know about that Subspace ghost, including His way of invasion and His power to tempt. At the same time, I will stay here with you. As you can see, I have already sealed every passage out of this place.

“Believers, the time has come to prove your loyalty to the Lord. Let us pray. In the realm deep within the Abyssal Deep, the Lord’s divine blessing will make our souls live forever. All the suffering of today will be repaid in that eternal realm.

“Now, begin the prayer.”

Chapter 535: Enthusiastically Maintaining Public Order

So the Annihilators began their prayer.

They prayed under the dim light of the oil lamps, in the deathly still air, in that deep, cold hall, under the gaze of the Abyssal Lord.

A member who had acted rashly under Mental Derangement had brought that unshakable Shadow into this hall. From now on, anyone who left the hall might carry that Shadow to other comrades, just like what had already happened. So they would not leave here again. Under the Envoy's witness and encouragement, these devout and fanatical cultists chose a quiet and loyal sacrifice.

They had made up their minds to carry the secrets they knew to the Lord's realm and never again leak a single bit to that ghost.

At least, that was the decision they made now. A moment of courage was always easy.

The cultists prayed in silence, calling again and again for the divine blessing of the Abyssal Lord in the secret room. The Envoy sat quietly at the round table. His calm gaze rested on every face in the room, taking in their firmness, nerves, bravery, fear, and wavering.

Time passed, and no one knew how long. The flame on the oil lamp on the table flickered, dimming and brightening. During one sudden flare of the light, someone seemed to hear a faint voice:

“…I will give you one chance.”

Someone lifted his head in fear, searching for the source of the voice. Someone else squeezed his eyes shut, afraid he would really see something. But the voice had already faded into the air, as if it had never been there.

“Keep praying,” the Envoy said softly. His words seemed to carry a strange persuasive power. “That ghost can do nothing. Aside from death, He has no way left to threaten us. And death itself is the quickest road to the Lord’s realm.”

In the past, the Envoy’s words always gave people courage and quickly steadied even the most uneasy followers. Yet this time, for some reason, every word he spoke only made people feel a colder chill of coming horror.

Growing unease spread through the hall. Fear crept toward the edge of reason. Doubt slowly grew in the silence. Not everyone here was one of the most devout Saints. And for those who were less devout, this was the time for their reason to break.

At last, one believer screamed. It was the smallest one. He seemed to have suddenly seen something terrible. He leaped from his chair and shouted: “I will talk! I will talk! I know what is going on!”

The Envoy shot to his feet and shouted in anger and alarm: “Hold him down!”

Several figures around the round table rushed over at once. They grabbed the small figure roughly and angrily, pinned him hard onto the table, and tried to cover his mouth to keep him from spilling the Lord’s secrets. But the small cultist burst out with shocking strength. He struggled wildly. Black chains appeared around him. Terrible bone spurs and hardened growths formed on his limbs, almost letting him break free from his comrades’ hold, as he kept shouting:

“The Enders gave us the information! They said the Nameless One’s dream hides the Truth from the creation of the world and holds the Lord’s first Blueprint…

“The dreams of the elves can lead to the Nameless One’s dream! That race itself is the vessel and passage for dreams, because they already had flaws at the Blueprint stage…

“The followers of the Black Sun are also moving, but they are looking for something else. I do not even know what they are searching for!

“The Enders said the time is near, but this is all I know… This is all I know, Mr. Duncan. Only the Prophets and the Saints know more, and those Enders, they know… I really only know these things!”

The small cultist struggled and shouted as fast as he could. In his huge fear, he found another kind of courage, the courage to betray his faith. But right after that, he forced his head up again, tears and snot running down his face, and looked toward the Envoy not far away. After that brief courage came new fear: “I am sorry, I just want to live, I want to live…”

Then he screamed again: “Mr. Duncan! Please protect me! Do not let the Envoy kill me! I kept my promise, you said you would give me a chance! You said… you would…”

The heavy weight pressing on his shoulders eased. The small cultist screamed in terror halfway through his words, then finally, belatedly, sensed the change in the air and slowly fell silent.

All along, only his own screams echoed in the hall. His “comrades” held him down, but not one of them truly tried to stop him from shouting. The Envoy watched him with a steady gaze and never lifted a hand.

He stared, eyes wide, as the Envoy slowly placed both hands on the table and gave him a gentle smile: “See? Saying it was not that hard.”

Around the round table, the cultists who had been holding him down stepped back one after another.

His “comrades” stood around him, watching him. Their faces showed stiff but gentle smiles. Then they began to clap for him, one after another.

The small cultist stared, eyes wide. He looked in terror at everyone in the hall. At last his lips trembled as he spoke: “Envoy… Lord Duncan, and Duncan, Duncan, you all are…”

A series of chilling howls and roars rang out. One after another, Abyssal demons appeared in the hall. Some were already breaking apart. Some were pulling at chains and struggling to flee the Mortal Realm. As these symbiotic pact demons broke down or escaped, every figure in the small cultist’s eyes, including the Envoy, suddenly burst into flame.

Before the last burning figure collapsed, it walked up to the small cultist, smiled, and patted him on the shoulder: “You too.”

The hall fell silent.

The small figure stood quietly among the countless piles of black ash. After a few seconds, he suddenly blinked. Then he hurried back to the round table, grabbed pen and paper from the top, and quickly wrote a full page.

Then he snatched up the sheet of paper and walked to the basement’s exit. The “thorns” the Envoy had summoned still sealed the door tight. Dark, wicked power flowed through the tangled thorns.

But in a single instant, the thorny growth burst into flame. Pale green spirit form fire turned it to ash, and the door behind the thorns swung open with a push.

Duncan strode through the basement door while the embers had not yet died, passed through the run-down buildings on the surface, and then his figure rose into the air amid the flames…

A patrolling Guardian stared in shock as a ball of eerie green flame fell onto the street in front of him. He had just raised his weapon on instinct when a staggering figure, seemingly falling apart bit by bit, stepped out of the green fire.

The small, unstable, and very suspicious figure walked toward him quickly, a bright smile on his face: “Hello, I would like to report heretic activity.”

The Guardian, who had been about to blow his whistle and attack with his sword at the same time, froze.

He had served the Church for many years, but this was the first time he had met this kind of… informant. In his confusion he blurted out: “Report?”

“Yes. It is in the basement of the house at the very end of that alley ahead, the one with the blue sloped roof. This is a denunciation letter. It has the basic details of their gatherings. At the end there is an anonymous bank account. Please transfer the Whistleblower Bounty straight into that account. Thank you.”

The Guardian stared blankly at this suspicious and strange fellow and listened to his stream of words. His mind was a mess. At last he could not help lifting a hand to point at the other’s face, which was constantly crumbling into ash: “Mister, you do not look very well…”

“I know. I am keeping it together as best I can, but it looks like I am still not doing it quite right. It is only fifteen minutes more stable than usual. Do not worry. Just do not forget to send the money…”

The young Guardian took the denunciation letter almost without thinking. Before the other man completely fell apart, he finally remembered to ask a question: “Mister, what is your name?”

“Just a helpful heretic…”

…

Aboard the Vanished, in the captain's cabin, Duncan came back to himself and let out a long breath.

His main consciousness had returned to the ship.

The Goathead at the edge of the chart table reacted at once and turned his head this way: "Ah, great Captain, it looks like you gained quite a lot?"

"I got useful information out of a group of cultists at a secret gathering," Duncan said with a sigh. He raised his hand and rubbed his brow hard. "Sadly, the time was too short. I did not have time to find out which city-state that was or whether there are other gathering points nearby. But it is not a big problem. I think we will be dealing with them again soon…"

On the wall not far away, the surface of an ancient-style Oval Scrying Mirror rippled with layers of shadows. Agatha's figure appeared in the mirror and looked at Duncan with curiosity: "Are you alright? You look a bit tired?"

"I was just trying a newer way to control an avatar form. I am not quite used to it yet," Duncan said, waving his hand. "Looks like splitting your mind is not something you can just try for fun. Maybe I should ask Heidi for advice when I get the chance… How can she split into dozens at once without getting confused?"

Agatha: "…?"

But Duncan did not stay on that topic. He soon frowned slightly and began to recall and sort out the information he had just gotten from "far away."

He had first thought it was only a normal Dream Invasion, just a strange nightmare. He had thought the appearance of those cultists was only an accident. He had not expected that behind it, shadows far beyond anyone's imagination would suddenly show themselves.

“The Nameless One’s dream…” Duncan lifted his head in thought and looked at Agatha in the mirror and at Goathead on the table. “Have you heard this term before?”

Chapter 536:

“Nameless One’s Dream?”

When they heard the unfamiliar term the captain suddenly tossed out, Agatha and Goathead looked at each other in surprise.

“Where did you hear that term?” After thinking for a moment, Agatha asked, “Is it part of the ‘intel’ you just got?”

“The Annihilators used it to refer to the ‘dream’ Heidi and Lucretia were trapped in before,” Duncan nodded slowly. “The first source of the intel was probably the Enders. After that, the Annihilators and the Sun Church cultists answered some kind of ‘call’ from those Preachers.

“If the intel is correct, this so?called ‘Nameless One’s Dream’ is something like a Vision. It spreads on a huge scale over many different dreams. And elves… under certain conditions, they seem to become a ‘passage’ into the Nameless One’s Dream.”

He paused for a moment, then went on: “Those cultists all seemed to have their own goals in the depths of the Nameless One’s Dream. The purpose of the Sun Church is still unclear, but the target of the Cult of Annihilation seems to be a so?called ‘original blueprint’.”

Agatha’s expression grew visibly more serious. “I truly have never heard of anything like this ‘Nameless One’s Dream’. But in theory, a Vision on that scale… shouldn’t have stayed unknown for so many years. You just said elves would become a ‘passage’ under certain conditions?”

Duncan nodded slightly. “According to those Annihilators, elves have some kind of ‘defect at the blueprint stage’. Because of this, their minds form a link with the Nameless One’s Dream. It should tie back again to that whole creation theory of the Abyssal Lord, but we don’t have enough intel.”

“…I’m sorry, Captain. It seems we can’t give you any useful answers,” Agatha thought seriously for a while, then finally shook her head with a hint of apology. “But since this points straight at the race of ‘elves’, we can at least start investigating here in Lightwind Harbor. This is a city?state of the elves—and an elf here just recently fell into that dream.”

Duncan gave a soft grunt of agreement. He shifted his posture, leaned back in his chair, and tapped lightly on the armrest with his fingers. His gaze fell on the enchanted sea chart, where the fog was slowly clearing. “It is necessary to have a good talk with Master Taran Ael… Let’s go see the Radiant Star. And I should pay Lucretia a visit too.”

…

Outside Lightwind Harbor, in a stretch of open sea near the glowing fallen relic, the Radiant Star was slowly circling. sunlight spread over the surface of the water, making the ship look as if it were gliding over broken gold sand.

A gentle sea breeze blew against them. It carried the southern seas’ unique warmth—yet Master Taran Ael kept feeling a bit cold as he stood on the deck. He pulled his coat tighter against the wind, turned to look at the “sea witch” standing on a mast behind him, and shouted: “Are we just going to wait here?”

Lucretia lowered her head and glanced at the Grand Scholar on the deck. Her voice was not loud, but it carried clearly and directly into Taran Ael’s ears: “We are going to wait here.”

“Can I go back?” Taran Ael shouted again. “For the touching reunion of father and daughter, it feels a bit wrong to have an outsider standing around!”

Lucretia’s expression stayed blank. “Father said he wants to talk to you.”

Taran Ael raised both hands with a troubled face. “Then could you come down and stay with me? I… I’m a little nervous!”

Lucretia looked down at him from on high and gave him a quick once?over. “You are an adult, and a Grand Scholar with great prestige. You should learn to handle your own stress.”

“…Lady Lucretia, don’t tell me you’re nervous too?!”

“Why would I be nervous over something like this? That’s my…”

The voice from the mast suddenly stopped. Taran Ael froze for a second. He was about to ask what happened when a strong sense of dread struck him and cut off his words.

It was a warning from his Spiritual Insight, a sudden jolt of intuition. It was the instinctive tension of a “scholar” who had spent years dealing with dangerous items and hidden knowledge, the reaction he had when Truth drew near. In that instant, a layer of cold sweat broke out on Taran Ael’s skin. Right after that, he heard a low, deep sound, like the breathing of a giant beast, rumbling in his ears.

In the next second, thick fog and terrible light filled his vision.

Right beside the Radiant Star, at arm’s length, fog rose on the sea, appearing in an instant like a towering wall. The twisted light and shadow caused by the Spirit Realm flipping into place seemed about to pour out of that fog. Huge shadows rose up from the Spirit Realm and descended from the fog—

Just as in many dreadful legends of the sea, it came wrapped in darkness and chaos, burning with flames like Doomsday. It was as if a nightmare had suddenly grown a body in the Mortal Realm, like an unavoidable fate crashing straight down on them. Within just a few breaths, the towering bow of the Vanished crashed into the Mortal Realm.

Taran Ael stood frozen on the deck like a carved statue. He heard a “thump” from somewhere nearby, but he didn’t even have the courage to turn his head and look. Several more seconds passed before he finally remembered to breathe again, and he became aware of his heart pounding in his chest. The potion Lady Lucretia had forced him to drink earlier was still working, protecting his weak organs and letting them survive the shock.

Only then did the Grand Scholar slowly come back to himself. He got his voice back, and he quickly turned to look at where the “witch” had been standing before. “Lady Lucretia! Your father…”

There was no trace of the witch on the mast.

Taran Ael blinked, then instinctively looked around and shouted loudly: “Lady Lucretia! Lu—”

“Stop shouting. I’m right here.”

A cold voice with a hint of warning came from very close by, cutting off the scholar’s yelling. Taran Ael turned his head at once and saw Lucretia already standing on the deck. No one knew when she had come down. She stood beside him with a calm face, one hand raised in an elegant gesture to her forehead as her divine gaze rested on the bow of the Vanished.

“Ah, where did you go just now? I turned around and you…”

“Be quiet,” Lucretia snapped, her attitude unfriendly as she cut off the Grand Scholar. “Father doesn’t like people yelling during a meeting.”

Taran Ael shut his mouth at once. His whole body went tense as he stared at the huge ship burning with ghostly flames. Almost at the same time, he saw a flame appear out of thin air on the deck of the Radiant Star.

The flame rose quickly, swirling upward into a spinning doorway. In the next moment, a tall figure stepped out from within it.

Considering that this was his first visit to the Radiant Star, and in order to avoid unnecessary confusion on deck, Duncan had chosen to come alone.

Now, he finally set foot on this ship—one of the last two surviving escorts of the lost Hometown Fleet, the Radiant Star.

He also finally met Lucretia in the Mortal Realm—the “daughter” of Duncan Abnomar.

The “sea witch” wore a black dress with an adventurer’s style. She hesitated and walked a few steps toward him, but stopped again a few meters away. She kept her eyes on him, but her expression was complicated and stiff. She did her best to hide it, yet her nervousness and uncertainty could not be hidden at all.

Duncan could not help but recall what Tyrian had told him before they left Frostholm:

“Lucy gives outsiders the impression of being cold, withdrawn, and moody. But deep down, that’s because she’s bad at socializing and doesn’t know how to express her feelings…

“She slips up when she’s nervous, so she always avoids letting herself get into nervous situations. That’s why the ‘sea witch’ always comes and goes quickly and looks so carefree…

“When she gets too flustered, she has no idea how to start a conversation. It makes her seem rude, arrogant, and strange. But if someone is willing to speak up first and break the silence at that time, she’ll be very happy…”

Back in Frostholm, Duncan had always kept up his image in front of Tyrian as someone “who lost his memories because of Subspace”. Thanks to that, he could openly ask a lot of things about Lucretia. Now, that intel was finally paying off.

“Long time no see,” after giving himself a few moments to adjust, Duncan showed a faint smile and walked toward the “sea witch”. “Lucy, I’m back.”

He followed his rehearsed lines and his own understanding as he tried to play the role of “Duncan Abnomar”.

Yet even as he greeted her, a faint emotion rose quietly from deep in his heart. In that soft, blurry feeling, he once again sensed that trace of distant longing and… regret.

He was no stranger to this feeling anymore. Every body he took over would react in a similar way when it met someone or something that had mattered greatly “in life”.

This time, Duncan did not try to control or ignore the feeling. He let it flow slowly through his heart, and let it fade just as slowly.

Lucretia’s expression changed several times. No one knew what this “witch” thought about in those few short seconds. She stared at him in a daze for a moment. In the end, all her memories and all the intense emotions she had once felt settled into a single, very soft sentence:

“Dad… you were gone far too long this time…”

Duncan was quiet for a moment, then reached into his coat. “I brought you a gift.”

“Gift?” Lucretia raised her head with a slightly confused look.

Duncan stretched out his hand and slowly opened his palm.

A small silver?white hair clip with a design of waves and feathers lay quietly in the center of his hand.

Lucretia stared, stunned. She looked blankly at the little hair clip. After a while, she blinked, as if suddenly waking up, then reached out her hand with a bit of hesitation.

The hair clip was real. It felt hard to the touch and carried a faint warmth—the warmth of a living person.

The “witch” held the gift. After a very long time, she seemed to show the tiniest hint of a smile and said in a very soft voice: “You delivered this so late. It’s out of fashion now. It went out of fashion a whole century ago…”

She stood there for a moment more, then seemed to take a tiny breath.

“Thank you.”

Chapter 537:

The moment Lucretia took the small hair clip, Duncan felt something deep in his “heart” relax all of a sudden.

It was a place so hidden it was almost impossible to notice, a feeling that could not be put into words. It was like a mission that had been delayed for far too long was finally completed at last. Even if this body had forgotten what that mission actually was, the thought carved into his soul still let out a quiet sigh.

“I hope you like it,” Duncan said softly after a pause. “I’ve forgotten many things, but I remember this hair clip was for you.”

“I heard Tyrian say that,” Lucretia nodded. At some point, she realized that the hesitation and anxiety that had tangled around her for many days had all faded away. Even though she had spoken with her father through a scrying crystal before, it was clear that only facing him with her own eyes in the Mortal Realm could truly calm those worries. “Anyway, it’s good that you’ve come back to ‘this side’.”

Duncan nodded as well, then turned his gaze toward the elven scholar standing not far away, who had been trying his best to lower his presence ever since.

“Master Taran Ael,” he said with a faint, friendly smile, trying to sound as approachable as he could, “we are meeting again in the Mortal Realm. I’m glad to see you safe and sound. There are many things I want to discuss with you.”

“D?don’t call me ‘Master’. That’s far too polite,” Taran Ael quickly waved his hands. “Just call me by my name. I’ve admired you for a long time, Captain Duncan, great explorer. Uh, I mean, back when you were still alive… when you were still human… I already…”

Duncan looked at the elven scholar in silence, while Lucretia quietly pulled out a short wand that looked like a magician’s rod and pointed it at Taran Ael’s nose.

“Frog or snake?” she asked in a calm tone, saying something very dangerous.

Taran Ael raised both hands at once and gave Duncan a miserable look. “What I meant was, a century ago I already admired your fame, but sadly I never had the chance to meet you…”

Duncan hadn’t expected this elven scholar to have such an amusing personality. He couldn’t help but laugh. “Is that the truth?”

“Of course,” Taran Ael said very seriously. “As a scholar who is very interested in the borderlands, I’ve always wanted to befriend true explorers and hear from them about what lies beyond the borders of civilization. I even dreamed of sailing off myself one day, to explore the grand wall of fog. But I am destined never to complete such a great journey…”

“It’s fine. Now you have a chance to ‘befriend’ me properly,” Duncan nodded. Then he suddenly remembered something and turned to Lucretia. “Right, there’s another thing for you.”

For a moment, Lucretia did not react. Then she saw Duncan raise his hand in a small gesture.

The flaming doorway that had appeared on the deck earlier had never fully gone out. At Duncan’s motion, it suddenly swelled. A hollow opened inside the swirling flames, and after a quick burst of fire and smoke, a giant wooden crate appeared on the deck.

A fat, snow?white pigeon with fluffy feathers stood on top of the crate.

Ai tilted its head. One eye focused on Lucretia, while the other wandered off who knew where. “Dear customer, please sign for your delivery. Don’t forget to leave a five?star review.”

Lucretia stared blankly at the scene, wondering what was going on with this pigeon. Then her gaze shifted and landed on a metal nameplate fixed to the side of the crate.

“Tyrian prepared a Spirit Realm lens for you—the highest grade,” Duncan said, pointing at the crate. “You didn’t forget, did you?”

“Ah, I… didn’t forget,” Lucretia said, her eyes sliding to the side with a guilty look. She quickly changed the subject and pointed at the pigeon strutting proudly on the crate. “This is the ‘Ai’ my brother mentioned? What did it mean by ‘five?star review’?”

“Don’t mind it. Most people can’t understand the way this pigeon talks,” Duncan waved his hand and called Ai onto his shoulder. Then he gestured for Lucretia to lead the way. “Leave the lens here on the deck for now. You can decide what to do with it later. Let’s find a place where we can talk.”

“Alright.”

Led by Lucretia, Duncan and Taran Ael entered a “parlor” in the middle deck.

It was an upper cabin with large windows, set along the ship’s side. Through the glass, a visitor could see the power systems along the flank of the Radiant Star and the ship’s stern, which looked half?spiritual and half? real, as if it were always shrouded in mist.

Duncan walked to the window, curiosity clear on his face, and looked out at the “view”. He studied this ship that looked different from the Vanished, yet carried the same eerie atmosphere—a ship of the curse, with a stern like a ghostly kingdom. After a long moment, he sighed. “This ship is nothing like the Sea Mist at all.”

Even though Duncan’s words were just a casual comment, Lucretia still looked a little uneasy. “It has been a long time. Both the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star are very different from your original designs now. To survive at the ‘border’, I made many bold changes to this ship. I hope you won’t be angry.”

“There should be changes. Change is good,” Duncan laughed. “The Vanished has changed a lot too. If you go aboard and see its interior, you’ll be shocked.”

Board the Vanished?

For a moment, Lucretia felt a bit dazed. Maybe she remembered something from long ago. Or maybe she thought of how she had already boarded the Vanished several times now, and how her elder brother contacted her from there every so often just to scare her.

But she soon came back to herself and nodded to Duncan. “I… will go.”

Then she lifted her head and raised her voice toward the door: “Lunie, you can come in.”

The door opened. Under Duncan’s curious gaze, a clockwork doll entered, pushing a small cart with drinks and snacks.

The doll’s face looked six or seven parts like Lucretia’s, but her whole body was made of metal, ceramic, and leather. With a soft ticking and faint clicking of gears, the clockwork doll walked to the table in the middle of the parlor and gave Duncan a small bow. “It is a pleasure to see you, Old Master.”

“You’re Lunie?” Duncan couldn’t help taking a few extra glances at the strange doll. “I found your ‘sister’ Nilu in a doll shop in Pland. To be honest, you two are very different.”

“When you first saw me, I was only a one?third doll,” Lunie said, very polite, keeping her head slightly bowed. Soft ticking and clacking sounds came from inside her body. “Of course, at that time I could not think or speak. It was Mistress who gave me life.”

“…Incredible craftsmanship,” Duncan said, looking over at Lucretia. “But I also have a talking, thinking ‘doll’ on my ship now. Maybe Lunie and she can be friends.”

“I know. Brother told me about Anomaly 099,” Lucretia nodded. “Lunie is very curious about that ‘Miss Alice’ as well, but… is she really safe?”

“Perfectly safe,” Duncan waved it off. “On the Vanished, she’s the safest one there. Even a bucket could beat her in a fight…”

Lucretia: “…?”

The witch finally began to get a faint idea of what Father meant earlier when he said, “the Vanished has changed a lot too.”

At this point, Duncan finally turned his full attention to Taran Ael.

Under the elven scholar’s nervous gaze, Duncan adjusted his posture and asked seriously: “In the legends or traditional belief system of the elves, is there any term like ‘Nameless One’s Dream’?”

Taran Ael blinked. “Nameless One’s Dream?”

Then he suddenly reacted. “You mean the dream I fell into before? Are you saying… that dream has a name, ‘Nameless One’s Dream’?”

“If the intel is right, yes.”

Duncan gave a clear answer. Then he told the two of them all the intel he had forced out of the cultists with “a few tricks”. He included the possible role of the Enders working in the dark, his own rough guesses, and his earlier discussion with Agatha. He held nothing back.

As Duncan spoke, Taran Ael gradually forgot about his earlier nervousness and discomfort. He became fully focused. Even Lucretia leaned forward a little, a thoughtful look flickering across her face from time to time.

To a scholar devoted to research, this information taken from heretics sounded dangerous yet very tempting. It might be closely tied to their evil doctrines, but behind it all… there seemed to be hints of knowledge and mystery.

When Duncan finally fell silent, the room grew very quiet. The two scholars both sank into thought. After who knew how long, Lucretia was the first to break the silence: “Can we trust this intel? Ah, I’m not doubting you, but those cultists are usually very cunning. Even church inquisitors who are experts at dealing with heretics usually have to go to great lengths to pry anything out of them…”

“It’s reliable,” Duncan said, full of confidence. “I used some very effective investigation methods—ah, would you like to hear exactly what I did?”

Lucretia and Taran Ael both froze and, without even thinking, shook their heads at the same time.

“…Alright then,” Duncan said, sounding a bit disappointed. “So what are your thoughts now? Mr. Taran Ael, what guesses do you have about this ‘Nameless One’s Dream’?”

Taran Ael thought carefully, then after a few seconds he spoke, choosing his words. “There is no such term in any elven legend or traditional belief, as far as I know. I can at least be sure the term doesn’t come from any elven language. But if we only talk about the idea of ‘dreams’… our race does have many stories related to it.”

Duncan’s interest rose at once. “Oh?”

“Have you ever heard of the Great Demon God Saslokar?”

Chapter 538: The Legends of the Elves

Great Demon God Saslokar.

A faint sense of familiarity rose in Duncan’s mind. Soon he remembered that he had indeed heard this name before—it had come up long ago, during a casual chat with Morris.

“I remember… this is the name of the ‘main god’ described in the ancient faith system unique to the Elves,” he said slowly. “This demon god has the power to control dreams and wandering souls. In your legends, this Great Demon God is even linked to the beginning of the current ‘Deep Sea era’—”

“Yes, Captain Duncan,” Taran Ael nodded. “According to those old legends, the world was originally a dream. It was created while the Great Demon God Saslokar was in a half-sleeping state. The Elves were residents born inside that dream. Our inborn mission is to serve Saslokar within the dream and prolong His sleep as much as possible, to keep the whole world from facing doomsday when the Great Demon God wakes.”

Lucretia listened carefully at the side. As a learned person, she clearly also knew something about these ancient, strange Elven legends, so different from today’s mainstream faith and branded as ‘heretical’. She could not help cutting in: “But Saslokar is destined to wake up—that is also part of the legend.”

“That’s right. The Great Demon God is destined to awaken, and His awakening means the end of the world,” Taran Ael nodded again and went on. “Most of the less mainstream belief systems have similar ‘end-of-the-world prophecies’. In most cases, they are only warnings, used to threaten believers, to strengthen their own persuasiveness and their control over the congregation.

“But the Elves’ legends are not like that. In Elven stories, this ‘world doomsday’ has already happened.

“In the legends, the end of the world began with a nightmare. Because of that nightmare, the Great Demon God saw the coming of a Great Flood. The Elves’ long-standing efforts to soothe Him lost their effect. He woke in terror, and the flood leaked out of His dream into the Mortal Realm, turning into the boundless ocean…

“After that, because of His awakening, the Great Demon God Saslokar vanished. The Elves could never return to that peaceful dreamscape. They could only survive in the endless sea left behind after the flood. That is how Elven myth explains the coming of the Deep Sea era.”

Taran Ael’s account was not very different from what Morris had once told Duncan. He simply added a few more details. After the Elven scholar finished speaking, Duncan showed a thoughtful expression.

After a few seconds, he broke the silence in a low voice: “Both your creation myths and your doomsday prophecies revolve around the element of ‘dreams’.”

“Yes. In Elven culture, ‘dreams’ always take up a very large part,” Taran Ael nodded. “We believe that inside and outside the dream are two worlds. Both worlds truly exist and can affect one another. Falling asleep and waking up is the process of traveling between these two worlds—or, in more traditional words, it is the ‘Journey of Nowhere’.”

He paused to organize his thoughts, then continued: “Since we are talking about this, I will mention one more side topic—among the Elves there is also a special congenital illness called ‘the Dreamless’.”

Duncan frowned: “The Dreamless?”

“Just like the literal meaning—people who are born unable to dream,” Taran Ael explained. “Dreaming is a mortal instinct. In our view, dreaming is as uncontrollable and unavoidable as death. Of course, some people dream more, some less. Some even think they do not dream at all—but research has shown that those people only have dreams that are too short or too shallow. When they wake up, they simply cannot remember their dreams. They still dream.

“The Dreamless are completely different from that—they truly do not dream.

“The sleep of the Dreamless is pale. After they fall asleep, there is only empty chaos. Their consciousness seems to ‘jump’ straight over the entire sleeping process. No skilled psychiatrist or priest can find the slightest trace of dreams in them.

“This completely dreamless condition only appears among the Elves. It has about a one-in-ten-thousand chance of occurring. It is inborn and cannot be cured.”

Duncan could not help sighing: “…In a race that puts such extreme importance on ‘dreams’, the Dreamless must be treated in a very special way.”

“Yes. To most Elves, the pale, empty sleep of the Dreamless is dangerous and strange, even terrifying. In history there really were many unfair treatments aimed at the Dreamless. But most of that happened before the Age of City-States,” Taran Ael said, waving his hand. “Now we no longer target or discriminate against the Dreamless on purpose. But as you said, the influence of traditional culture is still there. They are more or less… regarded in a special way."

Duncan listened to these parts of Elven culture and legend that Nonhuman Folk found hard to learn about. When the Grand Scholar finished, Duncan thought for a moment and slowly said: "Yet among the many legends and records about dreams, there is one thing missing—the 'dream of the Nameless One'."

"One possible explanation is that the 'dream of the Nameless One' is only what those cultists call it. The thing it refers to has another name inside Elven culture," Taran Ael said. "This kind of thing is very common. Elven culture is ancient and difficult. Parts that spread outside are often misunderstood and altered by Nonhuman Folk. We cannot expect a race with an average lifespan of less than a hundred years to all understand whether a vessel with seven thousand years of history was used to hold wine or draw water."

Lucretia had been silently thinking at the side. When she heard the Grand Scholar's words, she suddenly looked up and said: "If it does 'have another name', could that so-called dream of the Nameless One actually be the same as the dream that Great Demon God Saslokar created in Elven legends?"

"The Old World?" Taran Ael frowned, then quickly shook his head. "The dream created by Saslokar is only a legend. There is no evidence it really existed. Even if it did, in this Deep Sea era it must have already broken and scattered…"

"But you and another Elf far away in Pland did both fall into a huge, strange 'dream' at the same time," Duncan reminded him. "Have you forgotten that endless forest?"

“…I did think of it,” Taran Ael said after a moment of hesitation, still very cautious with his words. “We can make such a bold assumption… but we must confirm it with enough evidence. If that dream really is the legendary ‘dream of Saslokar’, if it is the ‘Origin World’…”

“Then it won’t only be Elven society that is shaken,” Lucretia said calmly. “The entire scholarly world will be shaken.”

“Yes, the whole world,” Taran Ael said, his expression especially serious. “It would mean that among the countless guesses and mutually conflicting records, we finally have one ‘record’ about the history before the Great Annihilation that has been verified. Even if we still cannot break through the black wall that stands ten thousand years behind us, that wall would at least have a crack. Through it we could glimpse faint reflections from before the Deep Sea era.”

Duncan had, of course, thought of this as well. But he did not speak. He kept thinking in silence. Only after a long time did he ask with a trace of curiosity: “Are there any more detailed legends about the ‘Great Demon God Saslokar’?”

“Most ‘legends’ are vague and full of contradictions. Even a race like the Elves, with stable and complete inheritance, cannot avoid this,” Taran Ael said slowly. “In most legends, Saslokar is described as a giant dressed like a shepherd, holding a Gatekeeper’s cane that can measure the entire world. But some stories describe Him as a huge billy goat. The Epic of Bran Marr, kept in the city-state of Morka, says He has no form at all. He changes into any appearance in line with the imagination of those who come before Him. He is a ‘reflection’ of the most grand and awe-inspiring image in a mortal’s heart…

“But no matter which legend it is, there is one common part: Saslokar dwells at the roots of the world tree ‘Atlantis’. The giant tree Atlantis is the first plant ever born into the world. Saslokar created it in His dream as His home. Loneliness then drove Him to shake the branches of Atlantis hard. Dust, fruit, and leaves all fell from the tree, and what fell turned into all the things in the world.

“The dust that fell from the World Tree turned into mountains and minerals. The branches and leaves of Atlantis became all kinds of birds and beasts, flowers, fish, and insects. The fruits of Atlantis turned into the first Elves. Dust does not rot, so mountains and minerals do not decay. Branches and fruit began to rot as soon as they touched the ground, so living beings in the mortal world gained the cycle of life and death.”

Taran Ael paused here, picked up the teacup that the doll Lunie had left on the table, took a sip, then went on: “That is how the Great Demon God created all things in His dream. After this first ‘creation’ was complete, Saslokar began to walk through His world.

“He strolled around Atlantis and set the rules of the mortal world with His gaze. He could circle the World Tree once every year, so Atlantis withered and flourished on a yearly cycle. Because of this, the mortal world gained clear seasons. He returned to the foot of Atlantis on the last day of every year. On that day, the Elves had to dress in their finest and go out in a grand procession to show Saslokar the skills and creations they were most proud of. If the Great Demon God felt those things were good, they would continue to exist in the dreamscape He had created, and the world would go on.”

After saying this, Taran Ael finally let out a long breath.

“That is all, Captain Duncan.”

Chapter 539: Sailing Toward sunlight

After listening to Taran Ael’s long explanation, Duncan thought for a long time.

There was no doubt that these ancient Elven legends were special in this world, even unique—simply because they were complete.

After the Great Annihilation, in the Deep Sea era, the Old World collapsed and overturned. The New Civilization broke and was rebuilt. Contact between city-states was cut off for a long time. On top of that came the many shocks of the Age of Darkness. All this caused the historical records of almost every city-state on the Boundless Sea to become fragmented. Almost no race kept any complete inheritance.

The faith in the Four Gods, which only appeared after the beginning of the Deep Sea era, developed rapidly under these conditions of broken traditions and a blank space in myths.

Yet among the Elves, the old myths were preserved and passed down. Even today, when the faith of the Four Gods covered the whole world and the old system of belief was condemned as heresy, these things still remained.

Because of their small population, the city-states occupied by the Elves made up only a small part of the Boundless Sea and were very scattered. Even so, in these few scattered Elven city-states, their culture, customs, and mythical system still showed a high degree of consistency.

And had they managed this only by relying on “long life”?

“Such a complete myth system… maybe it really reveals some of the truth about the time before the Great Annihilation,” Duncan murmured to himself.

“Many scholars have always believed so,” Taran Ael said. “The Elves are the only race that still keeps a complete ancient system of faith. Many of our old books have suffered from corruption, but the myths that we pass down by word of mouth… largely keep their original form.” He spread his hands helplessly. “Even so, we can only study them as ‘stories’. We cannot directly treat them as historical records from before the Great Annihilation.”

Duncan frowned. Some words that Morris had told him long ago rose in his mind without warning: “…because of the huge contradictions between history and the Mortal Realm.”

“Yes. Every scholar who tries to trace the Great Annihilation will face the cruel blow of ‘contradiction’,” Taran Ael sighed. “We feel this most deeply. The more complete the Elves’ myth system is, the less it can explain the world as it is now. The largest contradiction lies in this… in the process of Saslokar’s creation of the world, there is no place for humans or Senkin.”

Duncan said nothing. He only thought with a grave expression.

Taran Ael went on: “Not only in the creation myths of Saslokar. In some of our other, less complete legends, whenever they describe the world, they never mention the species ‘humans’ or ‘Senkin’ at all. You should understand—this is very abnormal.”

Duncan slowly nodded. But for some reason, the image that rose in his mind was not Elven myths.

It was the Moon.

He lifted his head and looked out the window. Pale golden sunlight spread across the sea. In the distant rising and falling waves, he could faintly see a glowing border like a cliff stretching across the water.

That was the fallen relic that Lucretia had brought back from the “border”. That was where the mysterious stone sphere lay.

“Are you going to take a look at that thing?” Lucretia was the first to notice Duncan’s gaze, and she spoke at once. “There is a temporary research facility built by Lightwind Harbor over there. I have already spoken with the people there. They can clear out all unrelated personnel from the core area.”

Duncan hesitated for a moment, then nodded lightly: “Go make the arrangements. That is why I came.”

“Alright, I will contact the research facility and have them pull the people back.”

Lucretia answered and then left the room.

Soon after she left, Duncan noticed the Radiant Star slowly turning its bow and beginning to sail toward the huge glowing orb in the distance.

For a time, only Duncan and the Elven Grand Scholar remained in the room. After a brief quiet, Taran Ael visibly grew nervous and uneasy again.

Thankfully, this time his uneasiness did not last long—before the awkward air could thicken, Duncan took the initiative to break the silence: “I heard that when the Sun went out, you tried to observe the surface of Vision 001?”

“Yes,” Taran Ael said. He laid his hands on the table in some nervousness and toyed with his thumbs. “And Lady Lucretia has always believed that my sleep is related to observing the Sun, though I do not quite agree…”

“What did you see?” Duncan asked.

“…I recorded what I saw at the time. The sheet is now with Lady Lucretia, but many key details on it have been smeared out—I did the smearing myself, but I don’t remember doing it. If you are interested, later…”

Before Taran Ael could finish, the door to the reception room opened. Lucretia, who had left not long ago, returned. “That sheet is with me.”

As she spoke, she walked back to the table. While taking a crumpled sheet of drafting paper from inside her coat, she said to Duncan: “I have left the ship in Rabby’s hands for now—it is another of my crew members. This is the sketch Master Ael drew at the time. You can take a look.”

Duncan’s expression grew serious at once as he took the paper from her. He spread it flat on the table and let his eyes move over the rough drawing.

At first glance, it was just a mass of meaningless, messy lines. Aside from the circular outline at the edge, which showed that this was indeed a drawing of Vision 001, the heavy smearing inside the circle had almost completely destroyed its original structure.

But after he studied it carefully for a while, he began to faintly feel a trace of familiarity behind those tangled strokes.

It was as if something he had once seen before—something that had left a deep impression—was hidden under those smears.

Duncan frowned, staring at it for a long time. Then he raised his head and looked at Taran Ael: “You really cannot remember anything?”

“Not at all,” Taran Ael said awkwardly. “My mind erased that part of my memory on its own. I think… it must have been very dangerous information.”

“This sheet itself does not carry any corruption, but rushing to restore its ‘true version’ could still bring danger,” Lucretia added at the side. “I originally planned to give it to the scholars at Lightwind Harbor. But after realizing the risk, I felt it would be better to hand it to you.”

“Good,” Duncan let out a small breath, and a slight smile appeared on his face. “You have started to rebuild your trust in me?”

Lucretia suddenly looked a bit nervous: “…I only felt… you were more suitable… Of course I trust you. My brother said that you now…”

“No need to say any more, Lucy,” Duncan said, shaking his head with a smile. Then he carefully put the sheet away. “I will take it back first. Later I will find a way to uncover its secret. If there is any progress, I will let you know at once.”

Lucretia seemed to let out a sigh of relief and even looked a little happy.

Duncan did not say anything else. After putting away the sketch, he went to the window and quietly watched the rolling sea outside, and the patch of “sunlight” that was slowly drawing closer at the edge of the porthole.

…

After a voyage that was not very long, the Radiant Star gradually approached the glowing fallen relic floating on the sea near Lightwind Harbor.

Now, the ship was sailing past the temporary harbor beside it.

Duncan stood on the foredeck and watched as the vast golden radiance loomed ahead like a sky-high cliff, growing larger and larger in his field of view.

This was his first time seeing with his own eyes this “fallen relic” that had only existed in Tyrian’s description—and he was seeing it at such close range. The pressure from the approaching giant and the strange feeling from the unreal curtain of light mixed together, and even he felt a brief moment of breathlessness.

He could easily imagine just how much of a shock Lucretia had brought to the Elves here when she first dragged this thing back near Lightwind Harbor.

But by now, the Elves had clearly grown used to this “neighbor”.

“This harbor is the ‘research facility’ you mentioned before?” Duncan raised his arm, pointed at the temporary floating harbor on the nearby sea, and asked Lucretia, who stood beside him.

“Yes,” Lucretia nodded. “Because we were worried that some things inside the fallen relic might be dangerous, we put all the research work out on the sea. Master Taran Ael is one of the main people in charge of this harbor. Also, there is a small permanent station set up in the central area of the fallen relic, but everyone there has already been called back now.”

“That is understandable—after all, not everyone can handle being so close to a ‘subspace shadow’,” Duncan said with a laugh. “Mr. Taran Ael has already done very well.”

Lucretia hurried to explain: “It was not all because of that. The way you look now… I mean, after you have drawn back your flames, you really do not look much different from an ordinary person. Most people would not recognize this face of yours… I was mainly worried that unrelated people would disturb you…”

“It’s alright. Don’t be so nervous all the time,” Duncan said, waving his hand with a smile. “It is normal for some people to be afraid. I am used to it.”

Lucretia quickly nodded, then lifted her gaze to look at the huge wall of light that was now very close. “We are about to enter the glowing orb. We will have to sail carefully from here. I have to go steer the ship myself.”

“Mm, go ahead.”

Lucretia nodded. Then, with a bang, she turned into countless fluttering, colorful pieces of paper that spiraled toward the bridge.

Duncan stared in surprise. It was his first time seeing this strange power of Lucretia’s. As the paper pieces flew in front of him, he reached out on impulse and caught one, then held it up to his eyes to examine it curiously.

The next second, he heard a startled cry from the air. All the flying paper pieces suddenly rushed back together with a bang and reformed into Lucretia’s shape.

The witch landed on the deck in a sorry state.

And she slid quite a distance.

Chapter 540: To the Moon

Lucretia slid several meters across the deck. It happened so suddenly that Duncan did not even have time to react, much less understand what had just happened.

Only when the Sea Witch scrambled back to her feet did he hurriedly let go of the scrap of paper in his hand.

The colorful scrap shot away with a soft whoosh and quickly sank into Lucretia's hair. She still stood there in place, a little dazed, with no clear expression on her face.

She had probably been stunned by the fall.

"Lucy…" With embarrassment deep enough to scrape a hole in the deck, and a faint sense of guilt, Duncan walked carefully up to the still?dazed Sea Witch and asked: "Are you alright?"

Lucretia gave a little jolt, as if she finally woke from the daze caused by the fall. She slowly turned her head. Her expression shifted from blank to shocked. She stared at Duncan in disbelief for a long time before finally breaking the silence: "How did you do that?"

"Ah?" Duncan did not follow. "Do what?"

"You grabbed… the 'shadow'…" Lucretia spoke slowly, as if struggling to find words for something too abstract. Then she raised her arm. Starting from her fingertips, part of her arm quickly broke apart into drifting, colored scraps of paper that whirled around her. “Could you try it again so I can watch?”

Still puzzled, Duncan reached out and casually snatched one of the colorful scraps.

In the next second, the fluttering paper suddenly collapsed and came back together as Lucretia’s arm. Her face changed again in surprise.

“This is unbelievable!” The Sea Witch stared wide?eyed at Duncan. “Nothing like this has ever happened before. Can you tell me how you did it?”

Watching this daughter he had more or less picked up for free suddenly light up with a Researcher’s excitement, Duncan himself still had no idea what was going on. He frowned at the colorful scrap in his hand, looking completely confused: “Is that really so hard? They’re just bits of paper flying in the air…”

“They can’t be caught, Dad,” Lucretia said, spreading her hands. “If Phantom Wind could be broken just because someone grabbed one piece of paper, how could I use it as my main way of moving around? They’re all phantoms. In theory they pass through every barrier…”

“I didn’t know that,” Duncan shrugged. “I just saw the paper and got curious, so I grabbed one to take a look. Sorry… did it hurt when you fell? Did you hit anything?”

Lucretia froze for a moment.

It seemed that no one had spoken to her with that kind of concern for a very, very long time.

Ever since she had become the powerful Sea Witch, a bearer of the curse who made many people afraid, and the captain of a ghost ship, she had no longer heard words like this.

It made her feel a little awkward.

“I… I’m fine,” she said, shaking her head with a strange look on her face. She tried to push down the awkward feeling and turn her mind toward thinking. “You can grab phantoms… is that one of your powers now? What is its essence? Is it about understanding the deep layers of the world? Or is it because of Subspace?”

Lucretia really sank into thought. Her instinct to explore the unknown made her forget her embarrassment at once. She muttered as she thought: “… Could it be that, on the layer of Subspace, there is no real difference between matter and phantoms from the Mortal Realm? That everything in the mortal world is just the same kind of ‘concept’ in front of Subspace… Was Claude Divens’s theory right? That all things are ‘concepts’ and form unified projections in Subspace…”

Duncan listened to the Sea Witch muttering beside him. At last he could not help interrupting her: “Lucy… you can study this some other time.”

The Sea Witch snapped back to herself at once, but she still stared at Duncan with wide, unblinking eyes.

Duncan lowered his head and looked at the colored scrap in his hand. His own thoughts began to churn as well.

He had not thought that these bright scraps of paper were such special “things”. From Lucretia’s reaction, his casual move just now seemed enough to be called “world?shaking”.

He had caught a phantom—yet Duncan knew he had no power to catch phantoms.

He simply had not known that these scraps were phantoms.

His thoughts rose and fell. Old events and guesses floated up from his memories. Certain “things” appeared in his mind—it was the fish.

After who knew how long, he spoke at last in a low voice, almost to himself: “Its essence… might be ‘I don’t know’…”

Lucretia heard her Father mutter, but she was completely lost: “What do you mean? Are you saying you don’t know what this power really is?”

Duncan came back to himself. He opened his mouth as if he wanted to explain something to his daughter, but after hesitating several times, he still shook his head.

“It means something else, but I don’t know how to explain it to you—Lucy, I’ll tell you another time when we have the chance. For now we still have other matters.”

He turned his head and looked at the great “wall of light” that had already come before the bow of the Radiant Star, pressing down on them with its vast, heavy presence.

“Take me to see that stone sphere first.”

Lucretia nodded, but did not leave. She still stood there, looking at her Father with a tangled, complicated gaze.

Duncan frowned in confusion: “Is there something else?”

Lucretia hesitated, then carefully raised a hand and pointed: “Could you… give that back to me first?”

Duncan looked down and saw that he was still holding the colored scrap she had split off for their little “experiment” earlier.

His face stiffened at once. He let go as he coughed and apologized: “Ah—sorry.”

The scrap floated up, then shot into Lucretia’s arm, filling in a patch that had been dull and colorless.

The Sea Witch watched this with a strange look. Then she nodded to Duncan, turned, and dissolved into a cloud of swirling colored paper, ready to fly toward the bridge. But she had barely gone half a meter before she stopped, her figure re?forming. She turned back to him uneasily: “Please don’t grab me this time…”

Duncan’s face grew awkward: “…Of course.”

Lucretia nodded again and turned away, then turned back once more, still uneasy: “If you’re curious, we can talk first and do the experiment together next time. Really, don’t just grab me.”

Duncan spread his hands, half amused and half helpless: “I won’t grab you. I’m not a little child.”

Lucretia let out a soft “oh”, then hesitated for a good while as she turned. At last she sighed: “I’ll just walk there instead…”

And so the Sea Witch walked all the way to the distant bridge.

Duncan watched her back with a strange expression as she walked away, and could not help thinking:

Luckily, Master Taran Ael had been too nervous to come out on deck with him and was still resting in his cabin. Otherwise, this scene would not be just a warm father?daughter moment plus a little embarrassment.

The Sea Witch might well have chosen to silence him on the spot—and then Taran Ael really would have died on this ship.

His messy thoughts circled once in his mind. Duncan let out a slow breath, and his mood finally calmed. At the same time, under its captain’s own hand, the Radiant Star made a slight adjustment to its heading and then sailed straight into the vast “curtain of light”.

Pale golden sunlight, like some kind of solid crystal yet without the least resistance, filled his view and slowly swallowed the Radiant Star.

Duncan stood at the very end of the foredeck. He watched calmly as the sunlight swept toward him and then drowned him completely.

He tried to guess what this sunlight really was. He raised his hands a little, as if to feel its “touch”.

On the way here, he had already heard Lucretia share much information about this glowing fallen relic. He also learned that, during the time when the Sun went out, this glowing geometric body had kept sending out regular light?signals. There was a lot of information—yet not one piece could explain the “moon” at the center of the glowing geometric body.

Duncan narrowed his eyes slightly.

Small shadows appeared in his field of vision.

They were the things Lucretia had mentioned before: the research station the Elves had built at the center of the glowing geometric body, and the mysterious stone sphere that sat beside it.

The station was a two?storey building put up on a floating platform. The stone sphere floated less than a few meters away from that platform. Temporary walkways and many steel cables linked the two, holding the platform steady.

As the distance shrank, more and more details on the stone sphere came into Duncan’s view.

Now, at last, he confirmed it here in the Mortal Realm.

Those familiar markings. Those plains, lowlands, and ring?shaped mountains in light and shadow. The image that had appeared again and again in his recent memories, that he had seen more than once in books and on the internet—the Moon.

“It really is it…”

A vague, nameless mix of feelings spread through his heart. It was not surprise; Duncan had already been surprised before. It was not confusion either; he had already been puzzling over this for a long time before today.

In this moment, he was only confirming and witnessing something that had entangled him for a long time. A strange fact he could not understand and could hardly accept now stood before him in a way that left no doubt.

The Radiant Star slowed. Under Lucretia’s control, this living ghost ship—just like the Vanished—came to a stop with unbelievable precision only a few meters away from the stone sphere.

Duncan walked to the edge of the deck. From here he could see every tiny pattern on the surface of the stone sphere.

He became more and more sure. This sphere, only about ten meters across, had an astonishing level of “accuracy”. It was so fine and matched the surface details of the Moon so well that… it did not look at all like the “scale model” he had first imagined.

It felt as if it was the real Moon itself, compressed down to this size.

Chapter 541: The Chasm

Duncan knew his idea was bold and strange, so strange that even in this uncanny age of the Deep Sea it would sound far?fetched. The thought that a real heavenly body had been transformed into the ten?meter?wide stone sphere before him and made to float on the sea went beyond mere wild fantasy.

But once the thought appeared, he found it hard to drive it out of his mind. No matter how impossible it seemed, he could not stop thinking about it.

Because… it really was too similar. Not only in its looks, but also in a strong sense of intuition. There was even a strange feeling of familiarity, as if it crossed time itself and the very layers of the world, all surging in his mind.

Duncan stared at the pale sphere before him. For a moment he even felt that he had gone back to that familiar world and was using his gaze to look down on the moon over his homeland.

He stood there, staring fixedly at the Moon that floated beside the hull of the Radiant Star. His expression stayed frozen for a long time, until he heard footsteps at his side and Lucretia’s voice reached his ears: “Father, this is it.”

Duncan turned his head. He himself did not realize how strange his face looked in that moment: “Ah… yes. This is it…”

Of course Lucretia noticed the oddness in his expression and tone. She seemed to tense up a little, then spoke with concern: “Are you alright? Your face doesn’t look very good… is there something wrong with this stone sphere?”

“It’s… fine. Thank you for asking, Lucy,” Duncan waved his hand and tried hard to steady his expression. Then he turned again and pointed at the stone sphere. “It…”

He stopped.

He had no idea how to explain this to Lucretia. He did not know how to describe the idea of “the Moon”, how to speak of another world, or how to explain his reaction now, just like when he had stood before Tyrian. He did not even know how to start explaining what a “planet” was.

So he only opened his mouth, then forced himself to change the subject: “After it fell, did anything change about it? Was it like this from the start?”

“Yes. It has been like this from the beginning,” Lucretia said at once. She briefly described how she had first found this fallen relic, then added some details about moving it to Lightwind Harbor: “…It floats in the air at a fixed height above the sea by some unknown mechanism. If left alone, it stays perfectly still, but a ship can drag it with outside force. The inside is solid and dense. Several careful samples showed that its inner texture is similar to stone, but so far we have only managed to take material from the outer layers—the deeper we go, the harder it gets. The drill simply will not go any further…”

Duncan listened quietly, then asked: “What else? What have you found?”

“We have also tried to solve the mystery of the light around it,” Lucretia went on. “The huge geometric glowing orb wrapped around the stone sphere keeps releasing sunlight, enough to light an entire city?state. Yet this light does not come from the stone sphere itself, or at least not in any way we understand. The radiance is generated directly in the nearby space and then spreads outward evenly.

“To test this, we built a very large screen and covered the stone sphere completely. It proved that this had no effect at all on the glowing geometric body or the sunlight over the surrounding sea…

“And we also confirmed that the surface of the stone sphere is covered by a very, very fine dust. It is attached to the sphere by some unknown force. We can scrape it off for samples, but without outside interference it never falls away from the sphere, not even the dust at the bottom. It is as if some invisible force holds it there…”

Lucretia did her best to explain to Duncan the various tests the Scholars had run on this stone sphere and all the information she knew so far.

All the while, she watched the changes in Duncan’s face, trying to guess what feelings were hidden under his overly serious, heavy expression.

But she could not see through it. All of her Father’s thoughts seemed wrapped in a thick fog, hidden behind that familiar yet distant, stern face. The only thing she was sure of was that her Father cared very, very much about this stone sphere—far more than she and Tyrian had thought.

After a long silence, Duncan finally spoke: “You have taken many samples?”

“Yes. We scraped surface samples from many parts of the stone sphere, and this sampling is still going on,” Lucretia nodded. “The deeper parts are extremely hard and almost impossible to sample, but the outer layer is a bit more loose. We can scrape off grayish?white fragments that behave just like common stone dust…”

Here she paused for a moment and looked at Duncan with some hesitation. Then she raised a hand and pointed to the floating platform not far away that held the research station for the stone sphere: “Would you like to come over there and take a look with me?”

“…Alright.”

Duncan and Lucretia went to the research station the Elves had built. From the upper level of the station they crossed a connecting bridge to a small platform fixed directly to the surface of the stone sphere.

A ten?meter diameter was nothing for a heavenly body. But as an object hanging right in front of them, it was still a giant. Even without counting the height it floated above the sea, the sphere’s own size was taller than a three?storey house.

The Elves had fixed a platform to the “waist” of this huge thing, bracing it with a ring around the sphere and a series of bolts and slanting supports. The platform was small, only a few square meters, but enough to stand on.

Duncan stood on the platform, reached out his hand, and gently touched that… Moon.

A rough, cold feeling came from his fingertips, as if he were stroking a stone.

He drew his hand back and looked at the little bit of gray?white dust on his fingertips. He rubbed his fingers together, letting the dust slowly fall.

Some of the dust drifted toward the sphere and settled back on its surface.

“This phenomenon puzzles us too,” Lucretia said beside him. “The dust scraped from the sphere seems to be attracted back to it. When it gets close enough, the fragments return to the surface on their own. But this pull exists only between the stone sphere and its own material. We tested other light powders…”

Duncan made a quiet sound in reply but said nothing more.

“I heard my brother say that you called this strange stone sphere ‘the Moon’,” Lucretia said, watching Duncan’s reaction with care. “And you seemed very excited when you first saw it… Do you know something about this stone sphere?”

“It…” Duncan hesitated for a moment, then finally spoke slowly. “It does not look the way I know it. It should be very big. Much bigger than it is now…”

“Very big?” Lucretia blinked. “Bigger than the Vanished?”

“Much bigger than that.”

“Bigger than the Four Gods Church’s Pilgrimage Ark? Or bigger than a city?state?”

Duncan shook his head: “Bigger. Bigger than you can even imagine.”

“…Could it even be bigger than the Boundless Sea?”

“I have never measured the Boundless Sea, but… perhaps,” Duncan said softly, almost to himself. “Perhaps it is even larger than the Boundless Sea. Because this ‘boundless’ sea is, in truth, only a cage ringed round by mist.”

Lucretia’s eyes widened.

She did not know why, but in that instant she suddenly thought of her childhood. The questions they had just asked and answered seemed to rush back a whole century of time and stir memories long asleep in the depths of her mind. She dimly remembered that, many, many years ago, she had asked her Father similar questions.

Back then she had asked her Father how big the Boundless Sea really was.

Her Father had told her that the sea was very large, larger than the Vanished, larger than any city?state. As its name said, it was wide without end and could hold a person’s whole life of curiosity and urge to explore.

She had held that answer deep in her heart, and later followed in her Father's footsteps to become an Explorer, a "border Scholar". As one of the Homeless Fleet, she had followed her Father to many places, including the strange and distant border. She felt that the Father of her childhood had not lied to her—this sea really was very large.

Yet now her Father was telling her that the "Boundless Sea" was only a cage surrounded by fog.

The stone sphere before her, only ten meters wide, was supposed to be larger than the Boundless Sea.

Lucretia narrowed her eyes and raised her head to look up at the Moon before her. She tried her best to imagine it being larger than the Boundless Sea, and for the first time she felt how limited her imagination was. She could not understand what her Father said, and she could not even picture it.

"A Moon that big… how great a space would you need to hold it?" she could not help asking. "Like you said, it would be even bigger than this world…"

The Boundless Sea was not the whole world.

This thought rose in Duncan's mind by instinct, but he forced himself not to say it aloud.

Because he had never truly measured this world, and had never passed through the mist called the border.

He did not dare say for certain whether the Boundless Sea really was the whole of this world.

And Lucretia was destined to never understand what a universe big enough to hold countless stars would look like.

Even though she had a ship, and that ship's name was the Radiant Star.

“…I’m sorry, Lucy,” Duncan finally let out a soft breath. He turned his head and fixed his gaze on the Sea Witch’s eyes. “I have no way to explain this to you.”

Chapter 542: Alice’s Simple Theory

Since their “reunion”, this was the first time Lucretia saw such a complex, heavy, yet warm expression on her Father’s face.

Before this, Father had smiled at her, and he had shown many human-like gestures. But for some reason, she always felt a faint wrongness behind those smiles and actions. It always felt like a “kind face” he tried to put on after losing his memories in Subspace, a careful act that kept her faintly uneasy.

Yet in this moment, she finally saw something truly from the heart on his face – a touch of guilt, and a regret no outsider could easily understand.

She did not know whether that guilt was really meant for her.

“I still don’t understand enough,” the witch said with a soft sigh. “I thought I had more or less caught up with you.”

“…the Vanished finally fell into Subspace. It’s a good thing you didn’t catch up,” Duncan shook his head. He gave the quietly floating “Moon” one last look, then turned toward the gangway leading off the platform. “Let’s go back, Lucy.”

Lucretia was a little surprised: “You’re not going to study it a bit longer?”

“I’m not a scholar, and I don’t have proper methods or equipment for research,” Duncan waved a hand. “I only came because I wanted to see it with my own eyes. As for how to uncover its secrets, that’s for the professional scholars.”

He paused, then added: “I’ll be staying in Lightwind Harbor for a while. I’ll keep an eye on your progress on the ‘Moon’ at all times. Also, if any other elves show the same situation as Taran Ael, tell me at once.”

“I understand,” Lucretia nodded at once. Then she hesitated and asked: “About your arrival… can I tell Governor Sara Mell? Of course, I won’t tell anyone else casually…”

“As you like,” Duncan nodded. “Tell whoever you want – however they react has nothing to do with me.”

Lucretia lowered her head slightly: “Yes.”

A short while later, on the Vanished, which was lying on the sea outside the glowing geometric body, a whirling door of flame suddenly opened on the foredeck.

The door opened with sharp popping from the flames, and Duncan stepped out from within. Alice, who was nearby hugging a big mop and scrubbing the deck together with several other mops, instantly dropped what she was doing and ran over happily: “Captain, you’re back!”

Duncan flicked his hand and scattered the flames behind him. He looked at the doll in front of him, clutching a mop and grinning from ear to ear, and gave a simple nod: “Mm. I’m back.”

“Did it go well?” Alice tossed the mop aside without thinking and looked at the captain, excited. “You were gone for so, so long. Did you talk a lot with Miss Lucretia? Did you go to that ‘ball’ thing? What does it look li—ah!”

The mop Alice had thrown aside suddenly jumped up. It smacked the excited doll on the head with its wooden handle, then hopped and clattered away across the deck to rinse itself in a bucket.

Alice clutched her head, staring at Duncan in confusion and hurt: “Why did it hit me?! It almost knocked my head off…”

Duncan looked at this simple, straightforward doll – her bright smile just now, her baffled grievance now – and without even noticing, the stuffy gloom and sense of loss in his chest eased a little.

Alice still felt wronged.

"…You'd better check if that mop is for scrubbing the deck, or if it 'works' in the dining room," Duncan laughed and reached out to press her head. Then he asked, curious: "There's something I've always wanted to ask you – the mops and buckets on this ship can clean the deck on their own. Why do you insist on doing it yourself?"

"I'm helping!" Alice straightened her back proudly. "It's so tiring for them to scrub all by themselves!"

Duncan's eyelid twitched. He silently turned his gaze away and looked at the mops and buckets in the distance, racing over the deck as if terrified that if they slowed down by even a step, some doll would grab them to 'help'. After a moment of silence, he shook his head: "If you're happy… if you're all happy, that's fine."

Alice nodded in a muddled way. Then she saw Duncan turn as if to head back to the captain's cabin and couldn't help asking: "Captain, are you going back to rest?"

"…Yes. I'm a bit tired."

"Captain…" Alice still looked uneasy. She walked over and tugged on Duncan's sleeve. "Are you alright?"

"Why do you ask?" Duncan stopped in puzzlement and turned his head to look at the not-so-bright doll.

"Because you've been sighing a lot these past two days. And you've been spending more time in the captain's cabin than outside – even Miss Nina thinks you have something on your mind, but she's too shy to ask you,"

Alice answered honestly. “And just now, when you came back, your face looked bad, like… you had a lot of things bottled up inside. But you look better now than you did a moment ago.”

Duncan looked at the doll in front of him in surprise.

He had not expected Alice, who usually seemed carefree and scatterbrained, to notice all this, much less to grab him and say all of it straight out.

Maybe it was exactly because she never thought about many things that she did not know how to hesitate or hold back?

Some half-serious thoughts flickered through Duncan’s mind, but when he looked at the doll still full of worry and confusion, he didn’t know what to say.

After all, even when he faced the well-read Lucretia, there were too many things he could not explain clearly.

“You wouldn’t understand,” Duncan said at last after a brief silence, shaking his head. “It’s very complicated, so complex that it can’t really be explained to anyone. Not just you – even Morris probably couldn’t understand.”

Alice only blinked, then spoke without hesitation: “You can still tell me.”

Duncan didn’t know whether to laugh or cry: “Didn’t I just say you wouldn’t understand…”

“But there are lots of things you say that I don’t understand anyway,” Alice said as if it was the most natural thing in the world. “There’s a lot I don’t understand, but you still tell me. I’m really good at listening to people talk about things. I’ll listen whether I get it or not…”

Duncan’s expression suddenly turned a little strange. Hearing this silly doll speak so bluntly, even with a hint of “pride” in her odd logic, he could not find any way to refute her for a moment.

Alice kept staring straight at the “captain” in front of her. She did not think it was embarrassing that she usually could not understand many things, and she did not feel there was anything wrong with what she was saying now. She thought of it, she was curious, so she said it.

If there was something in your heart, you just said it out loud – in Alice’s simple view of the world, that was how everything worked.

She suddenly ran off, hurried to fetch a big wooden barrel about half her own height, and set it down on the deck near the rail. Then she brought another barrel and set it beside the first.

She nimbly climbed onto one of the barrels, sat down, and waved at Duncan with a smile: “Captain, you should sit too. Miss Vanna said if you let the wind blow on you and look at the sea, you’ll feel much better.”

Duncan hesitated for a moment, then suddenly smiled.

This doll was trying – using her limited knowledge and experience – to find a way to lift the captain’s spirits, even just a little.

Duncan walked over and sat on the barrel beside Alice.

His mood did not change just because the sea breeze blew over him – but it did get a little better.

“Alice.”

“Mm?”

“I want to ask you something,” Duncan said. At first, he had been trying to figure out how to explain the ideas of the “Moon” and the “starry sky” in a way Alice could understand. Now he suddenly realized he did not need to explain those complicated things to her at all. “Let’s say you live in a certain place, and there is something that belongs only to that place. It absolutely can’t come from anywhere else or belong anywhere else. As soon as you see it, you know it comes from there…”

Alice thought for a moment, then asked curiously: “Like how I live on the Vanished now, and you’re the only captain of the Vanished?”

Duncan froze for a second, then said, a bit unsure: “Your example isn’t quite right… but you can understand it that way.”

“Oh. So then what?”

“…Then you leave that place, and you can’t go back,” Duncan’s voice sank slightly. “You go to a very far and strange place. Everything there is different from home. You live there for a while and try to find a way back. But all of a sudden, you see that ‘thing’ – the thing that should only exist in your homeland, that should never appear in this foreign place no matter what…”

When Duncan finished speaking, Alice was still sitting there, blankly thinking. But she hadn’t thought for long before she suddenly broke into a smile.

“Then I must have gone back to the Vanished!”

“Gone back to the Vanished?”

“You said I could understand it that way,” Alice said. “You’re the only captain of the Vanished. One day, I get sent somewhere very far from the Vanished, and I can’t find my way back to the ship. Then you suddenly appear in front of me again. That means I’ve gone home! As long as you’re there, that’s the Vanished.”

The doll beamed, looking at Duncan with full confidence.

“You said that thing can only appear in ‘your homeland’. If it’s in front of you now, that means you’re at home right now!”

Alice finished her theory, then shuffled around on the barrel, turning so she faced the sea. She propped her chin in both hands, leaned forward, and smiled brightly:

“Captain, was that a trick question?”

Duncan was a little stunned.

He stared blankly at the doll on the barrel opposite him. When the sea breeze swept by, Alice’s silver hair lifted and fluttered, like her forever bright and lively mood.

Then he laughed.

“Yes, it was a trick question – and we both figured it out,” he said with a smile as he jumped down from the barrel. “Also, there’s one more thing.”

“Mm?”

“That pose isn’t very stable.”

Still leaning forward with her chin in her hands, Alice blinked in confusion: “Huh?”

The next second, she heard a small click at her neck.

“Pop -”

With two dull thumps, Alice hit the deck in two pieces. Right after that, the deck rang with her trademark stuttering cry:

“Captain, he-help, help… help…”

Chapter 543: True Form

In the crew quarters below the deck, Shirley sat in her room, frowning at the spread-out workbooks on her desk and sighing over and over.

“So many… how am I ever going to finish…”

“If you keep sighing, you’ll never finish,” Dog muttered beside her. “And it’s not that much. You only have this pile because you drag it out and don’t do it every day. Even Miss Alice manages to finish these exercises on time every day, you know?”

“Does the way she just writes whatever pops into her head on the page count as ‘finishing’?” Shirley rolled her eyes, then dropped her head onto the desk. Her voice came out muffled as she mumbled: “I want to go ashore and play. I want to go into the city-state and buy things. I want to eat something good… Nina said Lightwind Harbor has a ton of great food, food from all over the world…”

Dog had gotten used to this sort of muttering many years ago. It shook its head, completely unmoved: “Captain said you can go ashore to play when you finish all the homework you’ve been putting off.”

Shirley pouted, glanced at the workbooks on the table, and thought for a bit. Then her eyes lit up with a mischievous glint. She bent down carefully toward Dog, who was sprawled on the floor: “Hey, how about you help me? These questions must be really easy for you…”

But before Shirley could finish, before Dog could even respond, a voice suddenly came from the mirror on the desk: “I’m watching.”

Shirley let out an exaggerated, miserable “Ah—”, looked up at Agatha’s figure appearing in the mirror, and almost seemed about to cry: “Can’t you watch someone else for once? Why do you pop out of the mirror no matter what I’m doing?”

Agatha in the mirror looked very serious: “Because the captain told me to watch you while you work.”

Shirley gave a long, hopeless sigh and buried her head back into the workbooks. After rubbing her face over the pages a few times, she suddenly looked up again: “Then can’t you help me a little…”

“No,” Agatha replied without hesitation.

Shirley began to argue: “That’s not how it goes in the stories! In the stories, the magic mirror knows everything. As long as you ask it something, it tells you the answer…”

Agatha frowned: “What strange story is that?”

“Captain told it to Nina, and Nina told it to me.”

Agatha had been about to dismiss it as nonsense, but her expression suddenly turned solemn. After thinking for a few seconds, she looked straight into Shirley’s eyes and asked: “The captain really told Nina a story about a ‘magic mirror’?”

“Y-yeah,” Shirley answered, now a bit nervous, not sure why Agatha had become so serious. “He told it just a couple of days ago…”

Agatha fell into deep thought, muttering under her breath: “He set me to dwell in the mirrors on the ship… so there was another meaning behind it…”

Shirley did not follow at all: “Uh… huh?”

Agatha didn’t answer. After thinking hard for a while, the “Gatekeeper in the mirror” finally raised her head and glanced at Shirley: “Which problem can’t you do?”

Shirley thought for a second, then pushed the workbooks forward: “…This whole book.”

“This book?!”

“Yeah. If that’s too much, I can do the quick mental arithmetic part at the front…”

“Do it yourself!”

Back in the captain’s cabin, Duncan suddenly looked up with a puzzled expression, as if listening to distant sounds.

On the chart table, Goathead turned his gaze toward him at once: “Is something wrong?”

“I think I ‘heard’ Agatha’s voice,” Duncan said casually. Of course, he hadn’t really “heard” anything. The ship was simply passing him information from every corner of the Vanished. “She seems to be in Shirley’s room, and she’s pretty worked up.”

“Do we need to go check? Or should I call her over?”

“No,” Duncan shook his head. “Everyone who’s ever been put in charge of watching Shirley do her homework ends up worked up. You could even see it as a kind of mental training…”

Goathead gave a small “oh”, and it was hard to tell whether he actually understood the joke. Duncan silently felt out the state of every part of the Vanished again, then walked to the desk and sat down, letting out a quiet breath: “It’s about time Shirley and Nina went ashore to relax. Lucretia is heading back to Lightwind Harbor anyway. We'll have her take them along."

Goathead watched the captain's movements and expression closely. At last, it couldn't help speaking: "You seem to be in a good mood?"

"Maybe it's because I've figured some things out. Or maybe it's just that I've put them down for now." Duncan raised his eyebrows. In his mind, Alice's bright, sunny face appeared all on its own, and the corners of his mouth curved in a faint smile. Then he shook his head and reached into his coat, taking out the "sketch" he had received from Lucretia.

Now that the gloom in his heart had cleared, it was time to study what exactly Taran Ael had drawn in the notes he left after observing Vision 001.

"What is that?" Seeing Duncan's action, Goathead immediately turned its head curiously. The obsidian-black eyes seemed to glimmer faintly.

"This is a sketch Taran Ael drew after observing the surface of Vision 001," Duncan said. He unfolded the paper and held it up near the oil lamp to see it more clearly. "It might hide the true appearance of the Sun's surface – but Taran Ael smeared out the most important details himself."

Goathead froze for a moment and let out a vague sound: "…Oh."

"I thought you'd warn me right away about how dangerous this is, like you always used to," Duncan said, a bit surprised by Goathead's reaction. He lifted his eyelids to look at the thing. "Why aren't you nagging this time?"

"In the past I worried about your safety. Now I only worry about the safety of those foolish enough to oppose you," Goathead said at once, flattering him with great skill. "A mere sketch could never threaten the great Captain Duncan, even if it showed the true form of the Elder Gods. Besides, the one who drew it was only a mortal. How much truth could that Taran Ael really glimpse?"

Duncan ignored this string of obvious flattery and focused on the drawing instead. But no matter how long he studied it, flipping it back and forth, he still could not make anything out behind all the wild smudges.

He even felt that those seemingly random strokes were like some kind of powerful “seal”. On the level of occult studies, they “covered” the original image on the paper, rather than simply being a layer of ink that blocked the eye.

In the middle of his thoughts, an idea suddenly stirred in Duncan’s mind.

A “seal” that actually carried power?

He lowered his head again and carefully studied the crisscrossing lines and thick patches of ink on the draft.

Taran Ael was a seasoned and experienced scholar, and a devout believer of the God of Wisdom Rahm. He suffered from a body full of ailments thanks to his awful habits, but his skill in occult studies was undeniably deep.

If a grand scholar like that had truly noticed something extremely dangerous while observing Vision 001, he would have tried at once to use more “professional” methods to contain that danger, even if his sanity had already started to slip…

The ink on this sheet probably wasn’t just random smearing. That meant there was no way to see what lay beneath it by ordinary means.

This was actually a “secret letter” that had been treated with extraordinary power.

Duncan frowned slightly as a vague idea rose in his heart. Then he turned his head and fixed his gaze on the oil lamp beside him.

Under his gaze, the flame in the oil lamp suddenly jumped, then quickly turned a ghostly green.

The fire of his spirit form swelled and burned, rising even out of the opening at the top of the lamp.

After a brief hesitation, Duncan picked up the sketch and held it over the lamp, in the heart of the spirit form fire.

In an instant, the roaring green flames swallowed the entire sheet.

There really was some kind of extraordinary “disguise” clinging to it.

Goathead cried out in alarm at the sight: “Why did you burn it?!”

“The fire of my spirit form only burns away the ‘distorted’ parts,” Duncan said calmly, giving a glance to the panicking Goathead. With a small flick of his wrist, he quenched the flames leaping on the paper. Beneath them, the fragile draft was indeed still whole. “This is what it really looks like.”

As he spoke, he lifted the fire-treated sheet to his eyes and looked at the pattern that had reappeared.

The next second, his expression froze.

Goathead immediately noticed the change on the captain’s face. Worried and curious, it twisted its neck, trying to see. But from its angle, it couldn’t make out the front of the page, so it could only shout: “What’s on it? Are you alright? Is it…”

Duncan finally snapped out of his daze. He drew his gaze away from the paper, looked at Goathead with a strange expression, and said: “…It’s the true form of the Elder Gods.”

Goathead: “?!”

Duncan did not say anything more. He slowly lowered his head again and studied the drawing on the sheet with full attention – that sphere locked inside two rings of runes, that shape shrouded in dark shadows, its surface veined with hideous threads like blood and cracks, as if it were glaring in rage…

An eye.

The true body of Vision 001 was a gigantic eyeball, sealed inside a shell of darkness.

Chapter 544: dusk

The captain’s cabin fell into silence.

Duncan still stared hard at the huge, eerie eyeball on the draft paper.

It was drawn with almost insane, messy strokes, yet it was unbelievably accurate and vivid. Anyone only needed one glance to understand what every line on that page meant. It was as if the truth of that thing was already woven into every element that formed the picture.

In those wild, tangled strokes, the huge eyeball had a deep, dark pupil, and the outlines of blood vessels and nerve clusters could just be made out. Outside the eyeball there was clearly a layer of dim material. Taran Ael had used many thin, careful lines to??that covering layer, as if he had tried his best to restore what it really was. The only message Duncan got from the drawing was that it was a “shell with a complex structure”.

It was an eye sealed inside a shell that looked like a gemstone.

Creaking sounds came from the side. Goathead, fixed at the edge of the enchanted sea chart table, twisted his neck in great unease. He seemed to want to take a look at the paper, yet he kept hesitating.

After a long moment, he finally spoke in a hesitant tone: “Captain… what does it look like, exactly?”

“It is an eye.” Duncan stayed silent for a few seconds, then began to explain the contents of the draft to Goathead, choosing his words as he went: “From the structure, it looks very much like a human eye. You can see the blood vessels and nerve clusters. It is sealed inside a spherical shell, and the shell looks like something man-made…”

Listening to Duncan’s description, Goathead became quieter than he had ever been in his entire existence.

Only after a long time did he crackle uneasily and make a nervous sound: “That really is… a terrifying sight… Vision 001’s true form is such a huge eyeball?! Then… then when the Sun went out, wouldn’t there have been a lot of people who…”

“Not many people could have really seen that scene,” Duncan slowly shook his head. “When the Sun went out, we also looked up at the sky. All we saw was a sphere that had fallen completely into darkness. You could not see any details with the naked eye. This drawing shows the same thing. That eyeball is ‘sealed’ inside a huge container.

“At the time, Taran Ael used a special observation device from the Truth Academy to see what the inside of that sphere really looked like. You don’t have to worry that ordinary people elsewhere might casually glimpse this madness-inducing ‘truth’.”

Hearing this, Goathead seemed to breathe a sigh of relief. But right after that, he started worrying again: “Not many, but there still could be some… Not everyone reacts like Taran Ael. Not everyone can seal and alter their own notes by instinct while in a mental runaway state. And judging by what Taran Ael did afterward, anyone who sees this eyeball seems unable to stop themselves from wanting to spread its image…”

Duncan listened to Goathead’s anxious muttering without saying anything. His face stayed calm and dark as water. He seemed to be deep in thought.

Goathead nagged for quite a while. When he saw that the captain did not react at all, he finally could not help but remind him: “Captain, do you think we should maybe warn…”

“Pland and Frostholm don’t have anything like that observation device. That lens array belongs to the Truth Academy. It is precise and rare,” Duncan finally raised his head. “Outside of Lightwind Harbor, even if someone tried to observe the surface of Vision 001 while the Sun was out, they would still not see these ‘truths’.”

“Pland and Frostholm don’t, but other city-states might!” Goathead shouted at once. “Who knows what those reckless fools might do! Mortals are not a reliable race!”

“…Other city-states never saw that extinguished Sun,” Duncan suddenly said.

Goathead, who had been working himself up, went quiet in an instant.

“Have you forgotten?” Duncan reminded him calmly. “Only three city-states and the ‘Vanished Fleet’ saw the world where the Sun went out. The rest of the whole Boundless Sea did not go through those twelve hours of darkness at all.”

Goathead’s head swayed left and right a little, then he finally let out a confused little sigh: “Oh… er…”

Duncan did not say anything more. He simply lowered his head again to look at the sketch that showed the core structure of Vision 001. As he did, another scene slowly rose up in his mind.

A blazing, splendid corona. Below the corona, twisted, coiled limbs of flesh. And a dying giant eyeball, held up by countless pale, fleshy limbs.

The Crawling Sun Wheel – the Black Sun.

Duncan’s brows tightened bit by bit. Once that faint sense of familiarity appeared, it could no longer be ignored. The memory in his mind quickly overlapped with the sketch on the paper. Bold ideas started to rise one after another in his heart.

“…It looks a lot like the true Sun god’s eye.” He suddenly whispered to himself.

“Ah?” Goathead jumped at once. “What terrible thing are you talking about?!”

“This eyeball looks very much like part of the ‘Crawling Sun Wheel’s’ structure,” Duncan said slowly, his expression thoughtful. As the details in his memory filled in, his judgment became more and more certain. “Yes. Very much so. If you take this ‘eyeball’ out and look at it alone, it is almost exactly the same.”

With a sharp little crack, Goathead’s neck seemed to jam at a certain angle. He went completely stiff on the enchanted sea chart table and fell silent.

Even a chatterbox like him had, for the first time, nothing at all to say.

Duncan let out a slow breath. Then he folded the draft carefully and tucked it away close to his body.

Luckily, Lucretia had been cautious enough not to leave this sheet with the ordinary scholars of the Truth Academy. He truly had no idea what kind of disaster that might have caused. Even though the Truth Academy did not have his convenient “spirit form flame” to remove the seal on the page, they still had all kinds of strange research methods. It was very possible that they could have restored the true image on that draft in the end.

Just then, hurried footsteps sounded outside the captain’s cabin and broke Duncan’s thoughts. A knock followed, and Morris’s voice came from outside: “Captain, I have something to report to you!”

Duncan quickly adjusted his expression and looked toward the door: “Come in.”

The door of the captain’s cabin opened. Morris walked in quickly and, as he walked, took a letter from inside his coat: “Captain, Heidi suddenly sent a letter. She mentioned… something unusual in it, and I need to report it to you.”

A letter from Heidi?

Duncan paused for a moment, then reached out to take the letter. He had not expected that, so soon after they had built their link and he had told her the truth, that Miss Psychiatrist would contact them again. At the same time, he felt puzzled: “Why didn’t she just come to the antique shop to find me? Why did she send the letter to you instead?”

Ai traveled between the Vanished and Pland every day. Besides carrying necessary supplies, she also did routine mail pickup and delivery at places like the Cathedral, Morris’s house, and the Governor’s residence. So it was normal for Heidi to send a letter through those channels. But if she wanted to contact the captain of the Vanished, then going straight to the antique shop would clearly have been the easier option.

“…She is still a bit nervous and afraid,” Morris explained with a slightly awkward tone. “After learning the truth, she probably doesn’t dare meet your avatar form directly.”

“…That nervousness is unnecessary. Just last week she came to my shop and bought a vase,” Duncan muttered. He casually opened the letter, ran his eyes over the lines of words written in obvious haste, and his gaze suddenly changed a little.

In the next moment, Duncan put away his relaxed expression. His face turned serious, then gradually grew heavy. He quickly read through the rest of the letter, then stayed silent for a few seconds before raising his head to look at Morris: “She ran into a Ender…”

“Yes. And according to her description, it seems to have been one of the rational ones,” Morris nodded. “Though that uninvited guest’s ‘rationality’ is suspicious. He muttered nonsense from start to finish and never explained anything clearly…”

Clearly, this old mister, who had spent his life teaching many students and always believed that “knowledge should be explained simply, directly, and clearly”, was very unhappy with this riddle-speaking cultist mentioned in the letter. There was a lot of resentment in his tone.

“Not speaking clearly might be because of some kind of restriction. What matters is that he was willing to talk. That is the main difference between the two kinds of Ender,” Duncan said quickly. Then he lowered his head again to glance at the letter. The various bits of information described there flowed into his eyes.

The fourth Long Night… the Promised Ark… the Sun becoming ‘gentle’, the coming of dusk, and… “holes” that appeared with some kind of “variable” and kept growing…

Heidi had tried her best to record in the letter exactly what she had heard from that Ender, all his strange, rambling claims. She had not added any “extra work” based on her own guesses.

These messages alone were enough to fill Duncan’s mind with countless guesses and connections.

“That Ender did not seem very clear-headed. And he appeared in the daytime instead of at night like other ‘normal’ preachers,” Morris said from the side. “He talked about the fourth Long Night and also about many ‘signs’ that would appear before it began. It seems that the very fact he could appear in the daytime was itself a ‘harbinger’ that this so-called fourth Long Night is about to begin…”

The fourth Long Night…

In Duncan’s mind, the description he had read in “The Blasphemous Tome” surfaced on its own:

There had been three Genesis Protocols, and they were the “three Long Nights”. The king of the pale giants had died in the first Long Night. The King of Dreams had died in the second. During the third Long Night, the Crawling King had finally succeeded in shaping all things. Together with the Critt clan, He lit the Sun that now shone over the world, ending the veil of night. Yet He Himself, because He had changed the Blueprint without permission, had been exiled by the other ancient Elder Kings and could never return to the throne…

Duncan slowly rose from behind the chart table and walked to the window.

The Sun was about to sink below the sea’s horizon.

Bound by magnificent double rune rings, the bright and warm orb slowly sank into the sea. Its afterglow washed the waves in gold.

Duncan gazed at it with his gaze and imagined that he was actually looking at a giant eyeball, larger than any city-state, that had been watching this world for ten thousand years.

This “eye”, which had risen into the sky in the age of the ancient Critt kingdom, had now grown old and weak.

The Veil of warm, peaceful light that it had woven seemed about to fall with the Sun’s death. After this Veil vanished, after the “fourth Long Night” that the Ender had described really arrived… what would this world’s “dusk” look like?

Chapter 545: Alice’s New Friend

On the foredeck of the Radiant Star, Shirley clung to the rail at the ship’s side. Her face shone with excitement as she watched the coastline grow clearer on the distant horizon. She shouted happily: “Oh, oh, oh! I see the harbor! I can already see the harbor!”

“Don’t get so excited you fall overboard,” Dog’s voice came from beside her. “And don’t just stand there laughing like a fool. Don’t forget what you promised the captain before we left. Even if you’re going out to play, you still…”

Shirley started waving her hands before he even finished: “Yeah, yeah, I know, I know. Dog, you’re so naggy. Why do you sound like some old auntie…”

The Abyssal Hound lying on the deck beside her grew unhappy at once and began a new round of nagging. Not far away, Lucretia watched the scene on the deck with a subtle, complicated look. Her eyes flickered, and no one could tell what she was thinking.

Nina stood beside Lucretia. She watched this “sea witch”, who had an elegant, mysterious air and a beautiful face that still carried a cold, unsettling distance, and spoke in a small, nervous voice: “You don’t think Shirley is too noisy, do you? She’s always like this…”

“No.” Lucretia turned her head a little and answered softly. “This ship is always noisy. My dolls can make a much bigger ruckus than this.”

“Oh…” Nina let out a small “oh”, then smiled a bit shyly. “Um… thank you for letting us ride on this ship.”

“Father asked me to take you all to Lightwind Harbor, so of course I will do it,” Lucretia said. She glanced at Nina. She seemed not very used to dealing with strangers. To others, that unease and awkwardness often looked like coldness and pride, so she worked to adjust her expression and make herself look a bit warmer. “I remember your name is Nina, right?”

“Yes.” Nina nodded at once. A bright smile spread over her face.

“…You call my Father ‘Uncle Duncan’,” Lucretia said, with a hint of curiosity in her eyes. “You… aren’t you afraid?”

“I’m not. Uncle Duncan is very kind,” Nina said with a smile. Then she paused. Her bright smile faded into a gentle one, and she looked into the eyes of this “witch” miss in front of her. “I know what happened. You don’t need to worry… and I think things are very good as they are now.”

“…That’s good, then.” Lucretia quietly looked at Nina for a while and gave a small nod.

But right after that, she heard this girl named Nina ask another curious question: “Lucretia… um… are you and Uncle Duncan not on very good terms?”

“Why do you ask that?”

“I heard someone say so. They said the Radiant Star broke with the Vanished a century ago. And just now, when Uncle Duncan was bringing us over here, I saw you always seemed to avoid his eyes on purpose,” Nina said. Her voice grew softer and softer. “Sorry… Did I say something wrong? That sounded kind of rude…”

“We did walk down different paths in the past,” Lucretia said. She did not seem bothered. She only shook her head. “But that is all old history. As for now, I don’t know if my relationship with Father can be called good or bad. I think… we have just gone too long without seeing each other.”

Nina blinked as she listened. She seemed to hear the faint regret and sadness in the “witch” miss’s voice. After a small hesitation, Nina said: “You’re not like what I imagined at first… Before I met you in person, I was actually very nervous.”

“People always make wild guesses about things they don’t understand, and they never feel responsible for those guesses,” Lucretia said with a small smile. “Also, Nina, you don’t have to use honorifics when you call me. You can just use my name.”

Nina froze for a moment: “But you…”

“My Father is your ‘Uncle Duncan’,” Lucretia said, looking at Nina. At last, there was some real warmth in her smile. “If you keep using honorifics in that situation, I’m going to feel really awkward.”

Nina thought about it and nodded: “Oh, that does make sense…”

The corners of Lucretia’s mouth lifted. She looked at this young lady who was, in essence, a fragment of the Sun, yet in words and actions was just an ordinary girl. Then she turned her head to glance at the “demon summoner” lying over the rail not far away, who could not wait to go exploring in the city.

At the same time, that Grand Scholar Morris was in the cabin, catching up with Taran Ael, whom he had not seen in decades. The two of them seemed to be planning a visit to Lightwind Harbor’s city-state university. The “exiled Inquisitor” named Vanna was midway down the deck, following the rabbit Rabby and curiously touring the ship’s unique “spirit form structure”.

As for the living doll named “Alice”, she was surely still with Father right now. As soon as Father had come aboard, he had said he wanted to introduce her to Lunie and then had left with her.

They were Father's new "followers". While countless clever people in the world were exhausting themselves trying to guess the goal behind the Vanished Fleet's reformation, these people looked as if they were here on vacation.

In one sense, they were indeed very strong. Each of them had their own special skills and was more than worthy of a place in the Vanished Fleet. But in another sense…

They were completely different from what Lucretia had first imagined.

They were not a terrifying, suffocating group of "Subspace retainers". On the contrary, they were interesting, and it was easy and pleasant to be around them. Father had gathered these people together… and it did not feel like some deep, far-reaching plan. It felt more like he had just happened to gather some traveling companions.

"After we dock, I'll arrange a place for you to stay," Lucretia said, drawing in her drifting thoughts. "I have a few bases in Lightwind Harbor, and they are kept fairly clean. Do you have any plans once you go into the city? I can give you some suggestions."

"Suggestions?" Nina's eyes lit up at once. "Then do you… I mean, do you know where in Lightwind Harbor there is the most good food? I heard this city-state has the largest variety of food in the whole Boundless Sea, and I came here for that!"

Lucretia's expression turned odd for a moment: "…The 'food' in Lightwind Harbor?"

Nina nodded hard: "Yes!"

"…Father never explained elven food culture to you in detail?"

“No,” Nina said blankly. She seemed to faintly sense something strange in Lucretia’s tone. “Um, did I get something wrong?”

“…You’re not exactly wrong. It’s just something you have to experience for yourself,” Lucretia said after thinking a bit, her face serious. “I’ll take you to the Crown District later.”

Nina looked full of hope: “Is there a lot of good food there?”

“…It’s near the hospital.”

Nina: “…?”

At the same time, in the crew rest area of the Radiant Star, Duncan had found himself a seat. He leaned back to rest while watching an interesting scene not far away.

Two dolls stood there, both looking a bit blank.

Alice studied the stranger in front of her, who looked even more “doll-like” than she did. After thinking for a long time, she suddenly turned her head: “Captain! How do you make friends with strangers?”

“Start by introducing yourself,” Duncan said. No one knew where he had gotten a few fries, but he tossed them toward Ai, who was strolling lazily across a small table nearby. “Begin with your name.”

“Oh.” Alice nodded, then turned back to the doll standing across from her. “Hello, my name is Alice. I’m also called Anomaly 099.”

“Hello, I’m Lunie,” the clockwork doll facing Alice bent at the waist as well and introduced herself with great politeness. “I am Mistress Lucretia’s servant. Are you Old Master’s servant?”

“I’m not. I’m the captain’s doll! On the ship I’m in charge of cooking and cleaning!”

Lunie tilted her head. Somewhere in her body, gears gave a soft scraping sound.

Alice kept looking curiously at her new friend: “You don’t have any strings on your head!”

“Strings? What are those?”

“They’re things everyone has. They float out of their bodies. The captain says only I can see them,” Alice said, waving her hands as she talked. “He says they might be ‘Soul Threads’. I don’t really understand what that means, but whenever I grab one, the person stops moving…”

“It’s hard to understand what you’re saying,” Lunie answered in a slightly stiff tone. “I am a doll. I don’t have a soul… but I do have a spring.”

As she spoke, the clockwork doll turned around and showed Alice the winding handle at her lower back, shaped like a big bow.

“Oh, a spring. I have one too!” Alice said at once, delighted. She turned around as well to show her new friend. “See this spot? There’s also a keyhole under my clothes, but I can’t reach it myself, so the key is in the captain’s hands…”

“Interesting. We have something in common,” Lunie said. A lively series of gear sounds came from inside her, as if she was happy. “This is the first time I’ve seen someone similar to myself. Mistress and Old Master both said you could become my friend. It seems they were right.”

“Right? The captain is amazing!” Alice said joyfully. “And look, our joints are very similar too, even though your arms are a bit stiffer than mine…”

Lunie lowered her head and looked at her own arm. “Yes. We have similar joint structures.”

Alice became even happier. She suddenly cupped her own head in her hands. “Oh, right. Can your head come off? Mine can! Look—”

With a little “pop”, Alice pulled off her own head right in front of Lunie. She held it up in both hands and showed it off: “See, see, see, I can take it off…”

Lunie stared in wonder at this amazing move from her new friend. Then she lifted her own hands, cupped her head, and gave a pull.

Clack.

Chapter 546:

Lucretia stared in silence at the clockwork doll lying on the lab table. Alice stood on the other side of the table, looking tense and uneasy, while Duncan stood beside Alice, his face blank.

After the awkward mood had dragged on for a long time, Lucretia finally broke the silence: “…So Lunie took her own head off?”

“…The process was complicated,” Duncan said stiffly. “I was surprised too.”

Lucretia could not help glancing at Duncan.

She did not know if it was just her imagination, but she felt that on the always grim, always gloomy face of her Father, there had been a trace of… embarrassment just now.

“I’m sorry…” Alice finally spoke. She lowered her head and carefully pinched the hem of Duncan’s coat, clearly aware she had caused trouble again. “I saw Lunie is also a doll, so I thought dolls are all the same, and… I was surprised her head isn’t actually removable?”

“…It seems Lunie also thought she was the same as you,” Lucretia said, giving a complicated look at this “Anomaly 099” who had once made countless people tremble in fear. “But I never designed that ‘feature’ for her.”

Just then, Lunie’s separated head on the lab table suddenly moved. Her head blinked, and her voice sounded a little off-key: “Mistress, could you connect my head first? I’m sorry for causing you trouble…”

Lucretia looked down at the clockwork doll’s head with a blank face, sighed, picked up a tool from the side, and began removing the cover plates and decorative pieces around Lunie’s neck. As she worked, she could not help asking: “Why did you follow Alice without even thinking?”

“Alice… is a new friend,” Lunie’s head said from the side. Her mouth opened and closed with a faint crackling noise. “A new friend brought by Old Master.”

Lucretia’s hands paused for a moment. Then she said nothing more and kept working.

Alice watched Lunie’s head a little nervously: “Then are we still friends from now on?”

“We can be,” Lunie blinked. “But we have to wait until Mistress fixes me…”

Alice brightened at once, then suddenly seemed to notice something shocking: “Ah, when your head is off, you don’t stutter anymore when you talk!”

“Yes. Because my head can operate on its own. Mistress installed a complete vocal system in my skull, and my thoughts are not affected by the loss of my body,” Lunie explained in a serious tone. “The difference between you and me is that once my neck breaks, I cannot recover on my own.”

Alice thought about it. She did not really understand, but she still nodded: “Oh—so amazing.”

Duncan watched from the side, feeling that this scene had already become as bizarre as it could possibly get.

More uncanny than a cursed Doll whose head could fall off was, indeed, giving that doll another doll as a friend. He had not even introduced Alice to the other strange “servants” on this ship yet.

If this big goof wandered all over the Radiant Star, how chaotic would the ship become?

As Lucretia bent over Lunie’s joints, busy with disassembly and repair, she suddenly felt a jolt in her heart. She lifted her head in confusion and looked around but could not find the source of that sudden chill.

Soon, though, her attention moved on to other matters.

“About that ‘eyeball’ recorded by Captain Taran Ael—what do you think of it?” The “Sea Witch” turned and looked at Duncan. “We definitely can’t make this public to ordinary people, but as for the Four Gods Church…”

“I do plan to tell them, but I still haven’t decided which channel to use, or whether I need to make more direct contact with their high ranks,” Duncan said, quickly gathering his scattered thoughts. His expression grew serious. “Right now the key isn’t that ‘the true body of Vision 001 is an eyeball sealed inside an artificial sphere’. Since history began, Vision 001 has been unknown to mortals anyway, so its real form could be as strange and terrifying as you like. What really matters is what that eyeball looks like.”

“The way that eyeball looks…” Lucretia’s hands slowed, and her brows drew together a little. “You said it looks very similar to… some structure of the Creeping Sun Wheel?”

“The true body of the Creeping Sun Wheel is an Elder God wrapped and scorched by a corona. Among the layers and layers of its tentacles, a huge eyeball structure is its main feature,” Duncan said with a nod. “That eye left a deep impression on me—it stared at me for a very long time.”

Listening to Father, Lucretia suddenly looked around uneasily, then glanced back at Duncan with some hesitation: “Talking about the Elder Gods so directly while we’re at sea…”

“It’s not a big problem. Even if that thing’s ‘gaze’ really gets drawn here, it will only fall on me,” Duncan waved his hand. “And I’ve been wanting to find it anyway.”

Lucretia opened her mouth, but for a moment she did not know how to answer.

In this past century, she had roamed the Boundless Sea and seen many things. She had dealt with many Madmen and had taken part in more than a few forbidden and dangerous events. But even those taboo topics were not usually discussed in such a blunt, casual way.

She felt she might really need a long time to relearn how to get along with the Father of today.

Duncan did not notice Lucretia’s brief, complicated expression. After a short silence, he thought of something else: “Do you still remember the ‘intruder’ that appeared in Captain Taran Ael’s dream? That projection of the Sun Spawn.”

“I remember. You said it looked like a smaller version of the Creeping Sun Wheel,” Lucretia said with a nod. “You also said that Sun Spawn had a short conversation with you, and that it and its minions were searching for something in that dream.”

Duncan nodded slightly, then spoke slowly: “The core of Vision 001 is an eyeball that is extremely similar to the core of the Creeping Sun Wheel. Twelve hours after Vision 001 went out, the Sun Spawn used Captain Taran Ael’s Dream Invasion to enter the Nameless One’s dream and searched that dream with its minions. Those two events are clearly linked.

“On the other hand, for thousands of years the Black Sun believers have claimed that the god they worship is the ‘true Sun’ and have called the Sun in the sky the ‘false sun’. People always thought this was only their mad delusion, caused by the Black Sun’s spiritual corruption twisting those believers’ view of the world. Yet when the Sun went out, Captain Taran Ael found that there really is an eyeball sealed inside Vision 001, one that is extremely similar to the core structure of the Creeping Sun Wheel.

“Lastly, there is that cultist of Annihilation who invaded the Nameless One’s dream. According to the information I’ve gathered, the goal of the Cult of Annihilation is not the same as the Suntists’. In that dream, they were searching for ‘the first blueprint from before the Holy Lord created the world’. But according to The Blasphemous Tome, during the Genesis Protocol of the Abyssal Lord, that Lord once guided the Critt clan, and may even have personally helped them build Vision 001. So strictly speaking, the current Vision 001—the ‘false sun’ in the mouths of the Suntists—can also be seen as the Abyssal Lord’s ‘masterpiece’, a part of the original blueprint.

“This last point may also explain the ‘cooperative state’ I observed between the Cult of Annihilation and the Sun cult. They are indeed cooperating, but it’s obvious their relationship is not a friendly one.”

Duncan slowly laid out the thoughts he had been turning over in his mind these days. Then he lifted his eyes and looked into Lucretia’s.

“From all this information, what comes to your mind?”

Without noticing it, Lucretia had already stopped moving. Her expression shifted several times, heavy and uneasy at once. After a long pause, she finally broke the silence in a low voice: “…Even if a cultist who worships the Black Sun were standing here, I think they would say this is a bit extreme…”

“…I heard something similar not long ago,” Duncan shook his head. “Now I only hope that the truth in the deep layers of our world isn’t more insane than this. Otherwise, compared to real history, even the most extreme cultists will seem conservative.”

Lucretia said nothing. She only lowered her gaze slowly, sinking into thought.

Lunie’s head still lay on the lab table, her eyes meeting the Mistress’s thoughtful stare.

After a while, Lunie finally could not hold back: “Mistress… are you still fixing me? Maybe you should go next door to rest for a bit? You could let Rabby come help…”

Lucretia let out a breath and pushed aside the stray thoughts in her mind. She picked up her tools and got back to work: “Rabby would only stuff your head into its own belly to ease its endless hunger for ‘cotton’. Don’t move. I’m putting your head back on.”

“Oh.”

…

At the same time, in the governor’s office of Lightwind Harbor, Governor Sara Mell unfolded a document that had just been delivered to her desk. As she read its contents, this Elf who had already lived for a very long time slowly furrowed her brows.

The document came from the Four Gods Church. It was not issued by any single Church, but carried the seals of all four Popes, witnessed by the Four Gods, and had been sent to every city-state on the Boundless Sea.

It ordered the creation of an early warning system jointly built by the city-states, the Church, and the Explorer associations, to monitor any anomalies that might appear in the city-states, on the sea, or under the sea, to guard against a repeat of the Frostholm crisis and to guard against the Elder Gods waking.

The Four Gods Church would also pull part of its patrol fleets back from the borders into the inner regions of the civilized world, so they could respond at any time to emergencies across the world.

These two points were worrying, but still normal enough. At least for the rulers of the city-states, they could still be understood as “work duties”.

What really made Governor Sara Mell frown was the final line of the document. It seemed to be mentioned casually, yet it stood out as especially important—

“All city-states must take seriously any warning signals from the Vanished or from the Vanished Fleet. If the main vessel of the Vanished is found operating in the waters near a city-state… you must not take any hostile action, and should… cooperate as needed.”

Chapter 547:

On Crown Street, in a neighborhood at the edge of Lightwind Harbor’s Upper City, there was a mansion wrapped in mystery, standing at the very end of the street—No. 99 Crown Street.

It was a three?story, steep?roofed building with a clear northern city-state style, completely different from the Elf-style houses common in Lightwind Harbor. It had a dark roof that sharply contrasted with its white outer walls, and tall windows with intricate carvings and solemn lines. Wide gardens spread out in front of and behind the house—quite rare in the city-state—filled with all sorts of strange flowers and bushes that almost no one could name.

Many people knew this mansion existed, but almost no one knew anything about it. Its master almost never showed herself. On normal days only a few quiet, tight?lipped servants tended the garden and the house. After nightfall, when lights came on inside, eerie and frightening shadows would appear in those lit windows—

Some people firmly claimed they had seen those servants, who tended the house in the day, take off their human skins at night and turn into creaking puppets and tin men that walked back and forth through the rooms. Some said that when they passed near the mansion, strange whispers lured them away, and when they snapped out of it, they had somehow appeared somewhere else. Some even swore they had seen the flowers and plants in the front yard turn into pitch?black thorns at the very moment the Sun set, wrapping the entire first floor of the house like a cage.

Strange rumors spread from all this, too many to count. In the wildest stories, busybodies claimed that a Lady's vengeful spirit was imprisoned inside the house, that the power of a curse seeped up from the basement and transformed the original servants—when night came, it turned them into tin men and puppets with no mind or memory.

In the end, though, these tales all proved to be nothing more than the nervous fantasies of passersby. In city-states on the Boundless Sea, there were always plenty of such rumors and wild guesses.

The changes and corruption brought by the veil of night kept everyone on edge. Many people, in their excessive vigilance, treated every whistling cave and every empty house with strange noises as a nest of filth growing in the dark. The Guardians of the city-states dealt with many reports involving the supernatural every day, and there were bound to be some such nervous "false alarms" among them. In general, as long as this tension did not cross the line into "spiritual corruption", it was not a real problem.

After all, simple nervousness was not enough to actually "create" something in the dark. It was better for citizens to have enough caution than to stay numb when real supernatural contamination began.

As for the mansion's true master…

The Sea Witch had long grown used to the fearful looks and horrible rumors that followed her. In fact, to some extent, part of the rumors around No. 99 Crown Street had been spread by her on purpose.

"I needed a place in the city-state to rest. Always staying at sea would strain anyone's nerves. I'm no exception," Lucretia said. After returning to her 'home' in Lightwind Harbor, she walked to the window and looked at the quiet door outside. "But I don't like dealing with people. It's hard to find a place in a city-state where no one bothers you. Even the most remote streets are crowded. So I might as well make a bit of scary noise, so people won't stand at my door staring out of curiosity."

"Why not try learning from Tyrian?" Duncan was curiously studying the furnishings in the big house. When he heard Lucretia, he spoke casually: "He picked an uninhabited island in the Frost Sea to serve as a base for the Sea Mist Fleet. He hasn't had to worry about being disturbed for a whole century…"

Lucretia turned her head: "And then get caught by you, Dad, while secretly watching strip shows at home?"

Duncan coughed twice at once: "Ahem, don't talk about your brother like that—say it to his face next time."

Lucretia: "…"

The Witch's eye twitched. She herself did not even know whether she liked Father's current personality, but she knew she clearly needed some time to get used to it.

Soon she smoothed her expression and said: "I can't copy him. Taking an island means building and managing countless facilities, commanding a whole fleet, and maintaining an entire system from logistics to external dealings. I don't have the mind for that—it would eat up a huge amount of the time I use for research. Just keeping the Radiant Star running already uses up all my energy."

Footsteps came from the side. A servant in a black?and?white uniform walked over with a tray. On the tray lay warmed towels and cool drinks to ease the weariness of travel. The servant bowed slightly to Lucretia and Duncan. A stiff, corpse?like smile was frozen on its face, and the ticking of clockwork gears came faintly from inside its body.

“You and Tyrian each have your own field of talent,” Duncan said. He took a glass from the tray and, still curious, looked over this “footman” that was almost no different from a real person, yet, if you stared a bit longer, clearly felt wrong enough to stir fear. “Before I met you again, I heard many rumors about you. Those rumors said you siblings were cold to each other, almost hostile. Now that I see it, those tales were wildly off.”

“After all… the split of the Vanished Fleet was a major event a century ago, and what happened after that isn’t something ordinary people can find out,” Lucretia said, shaking her head with a complicated look. “They only know that the Radiant Star and the Sea Mist went their separate ways, almost to opposite ends of the civilized world. So of course they imagine… a whole big drama.”

As she spoke, Lucretia gave a small, helpless shake of her head.

“After you… left, my brother and I met a few times for short visits. By then the Vanished had completely disappeared from the Mortal Realm, but we could still feel that you were… ‘alive’.”

She looked out the window, speaking softly, as if to herself, about things no outsider could ever know.

“Near the borders, at nightfall, on the routes you once explored, as soon as our minds relaxed a little, we would ‘hear’ your voice. Mindless roars, full of malice and a desire to destroy, came again and again from the depths of the world, as if struggling to rise and tear open the barrier between the Mortal Realm and the Subspace…

“Several times we even saw you and the Vanished in the dim light between day and night. That ship rose from the darkness and closed in on us like Doomsday itself. Wherever it passed, there was only death.

“Later we found that only we could see that scene. It existed only in our sight and in our thoughts.

“After that, my brother summed up some patterns. He discovered that it was exactly because of ‘us’ that your ‘gaze’ was drawn here. The closer Tyrian and I were to each other, the stronger that pull became… Do you know? It was like lamps. Two lamps together shine brighter, and Tyrian and I were the ‘lighthouse’ for you to return from the Subspace to the Mortal Realm…

“So we split up, farther and farther. Tyrian went to the northern border, and I kept sailing south. When we were half a world apart, we finally stopped seeing your phantom. When we went even farther… we finally stopped hearing your roar.”

Lucretia let out a soft breath, as if a heavy weight had dropped from her shoulders. Those words had been held in for a century and had finally come out in one long rush.

Duncan listened quietly at her side, not knowing what to say. He knew that the “Witch” was really mourning and speaking about another person. He did not have to feel any burden from her story, did not have to feel regret or guilt. Yet for some reason, he found it hard to remain unmoved. Feelings rose in his heart that he was not sure even belonged to him. After a long silence, he could only give a quiet sigh: “You two have had a hard time.”

“Honestly… it wasn’t that bad,” Lucretia said with a small smile, shaking her head. “In the first ten years, we missed you very much. Hearing those voices and seeing those visions even made us think unrealistic thoughts. We wondered if, when you followed the ‘light’ back to the Mortal Realm, maybe everything could still be fixed.

“In the next ten years, the terrible disasters caused by the Vanished drawing near the Mortal Realm again and again grew more and more common. We began to feel afraid. Along with a feeling that may or may not count as ‘responsibility’, my brother and I started looking for a way to truly and completely banish you.

“A few years later, our ‘banishment’ seemed to start working. As fear faded, longing kept rising again. My brother would sometimes bring up the old days. We were very careful not to mention your name or the Vanished, yet we could not stop ourselves from talking about those great routes and those unforgettable voyages…

“By the most recent thirty or forty years, we had already gone through everything we could talk about. We slowly stopped bringing up the Vanished at all. It felt as if everything had finally passed. In most city-states’ official documents and in the captains’ sailing records, the Vanished had become just a ‘historical term’, a legend. Along with that, people’s fear of the Sea Mist and the Radiant Star seemed to fade a lot.

“And then you appeared. The White Oak fled from the storm and brought terrible news to the city-state of Pland… Did you know? Tyrian didn’t sleep well for three whole days after he got that news.”

She suddenly laughed. It seemed she had not laughed this freely in a hundred years.

At the ends of her hair, the silver?white ornament shaped like waves and feathers swayed with her smile, shining with warm light.

Duncan let out a soft sigh.

But just as he was about to speak, a scream suddenly rang out from the direction of the living room, cutting off his conversation with Lucretia.

It sounded like Nina’s voice.

Duncan and Lucretia quickly exchanged a look, then turned and ran toward the living room.

Halfway there, they heard Nina’s voice, full of shock and anger—

“Why! Would they! Put stinky beans! On pancakes-”

Chapter 548: Food Customs

Nina had looked forward to the trip to Lightwind Harbor for a long time, and she had looked forward to the food of the Elven city-state for just as long.

Now she finally faced the cruel reality of the Mortal Realm.

She sat blank-eyed at the table, staring at the dark heap in front of her.

It was a stack of overbaked pancakes, piled high with some kind of fermented beans that stretched into strings and bubbled.

Even without tasting it, she could imagine how shocking the flavor must be.

This had already gone beyond Nina's idea of "food". It looked more like some kind of abstract artwork.

Shirley, sitting across from her, was clearly not doing much better.

In front of Shirley lay the "locally improved Elven version" of sweet crepes. The smell from the fermented cheese on top was so strong that her face had gone a little green.

After a long time, Shirley finally lifted her head, looked at Nina across the table, then raised a hand to point at the food: "They said this thing is sweet crepes…"

"How can they insult sweet crepes like this…" Nina looked as if she was about to cry. "This has been my favorite food since I was little…"

“But this really is Lightwind Harbor’s sweet crepes,” said Taran Ael, who sat at the other end of the table.

This Grand Scholar, who was quite famous even in Truth Academy, actually looked a little nervous and uneasy.

No one knew if it was because he felt he was neglecting Captain Duncan’s Retainer, or because he simply could not face the almost resentful gazes of the two girls.

“As far as I know, many outsiders really can’t get used to it at first… but some people like it very much once they do.”

Nina stared at him in horror: “But these beans are rotten! Not just rotten, they even stretch into strings! The slime is bubbling!”

“But they taste very good, truly,” Taran Ael tried his best to explain sincerely. “And there is absolutely no problem with health—on the contrary, they are very good for the digestive system…”

Nina and Shirley listened to the Grand Scholar’s explanation with expressions like their souls had left their bodies.

It seemed their minds could no longer keep up with the logic of the Mortal Realm.

When Duncan arrived, this was exactly the scene he saw—just as he had expected.

He could not help laughing. He walked forward and rubbed Nina’s hair: “I told you before. You might not be able to get used to the food in Lightwind Harbor. The Elves changed many local specialties to fit their own tastes.”

Nina muttered under her breath: “I just couldn’t imagine what they would change them into…”

“I did not think this through,” Taran Ael said at once.

The moment he saw Duncan appear he had tensed up on reflex, but after traveling with them this far he had at least learned how to adjust himself.

He quickly calmed down and spoke apologetically to the two very disappointed girls: “I should have recommended some foods that are not quite so ‘local’ first.

“The bread and smoked meat rolls in Lightwind Harbor are the same as anywhere else.

“We can just put these things aside.”

But to everyone’s surprise, as soon as Taran Ael said that, Shirley suddenly pressed her lips together and picked up the strange-smelling “crepe” in front of her.

Lucretia, who had been watching the fun from the side, blinked in surprise: “Shirley?”

“It’s food,” Shirley muttered.

Then, as if making a huge decision, she shut her eyes and shoved the crepe into her mouth.

She chewed hard, speaking in a muffled voice:

“It’s… not that bad…”

Nina stared at her friend across the table in shock.

After a moment, she seemed to think of something.

Then, without a word, she picked up the things on her own plate.

The two girls almost wolfed down all the food that Taran Ael had bought.

Then they wiped their mouths at almost the same time, lifted their heads, looked at each other, and broke into matching grins.

The living room suddenly went a bit quiet.

Duncan smiled, patted Nina on the shoulder, then walked over and wiped the “sauce” off Shirley’s face.

Taran Ael, after staring blankly for a few seconds, finally reacted.

With a trace of awkwardness, he broke the silence:

“Very few outsiders can adapt to these dishes so quickly…

“Oh, by the way, if you are not used to the fermented foods here in Lightwind Harbor, we do have many dishes that keep the flavor of their place of origin.

“Besides the bread and smoked meat rolls I just mentioned, there are Central Seas–style cream stews, lanjing-grass braised meat, northern mushroom stew, and red-vegetable egg custard…”

As Nina listened, her eyes went wide, and a bit of hopeful light returned to them: “So you do have food that tastes normal?! Why didn’t you say so earlier!”

Taran Ael spread his hands:

“Because it is not time for dessert yet.”

Nina’s face, which had just brightened, went dull again:

“…Dessert?”

“Yes,” Taran Ael nodded. “What I just listed are all desserts.

“We usually mash them into a paste and use them as a dip for honey cakes.”

This time, not only Nina, but even Duncan was deeply shocked.

Across the table, Shirley instantly grabbed her head and groaned weakly: “Damn it, I want to go back to the ship… What kind of Subspace execution ground is this…”

Duncan thought for a moment.

[Even in Subspace, no one eats things like this.]

But with Taran Ael, a native Elf of this city-state, standing right there, he did not say it aloud.

Just then, a burst of electric bell chimes rang from the direction of the front door, suddenly cutting off the talk in the living room.

Lucretia frowned, almost too slightly to notice.

A “footman” in a servant’s uniform stepped out of the living room with stiff, mechanical strides.

A moment later, the male servant returned from the entrance hall, walked up to his Mistress, and bowed slightly: “A Visitor from City Hall. Governor Sara Mell invites you to come discuss affairs.”

Lucretia frowned, impatience showing in her face:

“Tell him I am not going. I am entertaining more important guests and have no time.”

“But the messenger said that what Governor Sara Mell wishes to discuss is directly related to your ‘honored guests’,” the footman said in the same mechanical, wooden tone. “And there is also the witness of the Four Gods in this matter.”

Lucretia’s expression finally changed a little.

She lifted her head on reflex and glanced at Duncan.

Duncan had of course heard the exchange between her and the footman, but he looked quite unconcerned.

He simply waved a hand:

“It is normal. I walked into the city right beside you, in full view.

“Other city-states might not care, but in an Elven city-state, someone like me—a ‘Adventurer’ who was still active a hundred years ago—is hardly a stranger’s face.”

“Then he should come in person,” Lucretia said, her tone holding some displeasure. “Sending someone over so casually is not proper courtesy.”

“Think about Tyrian’s schedule right now. A city-state’s Governor is not that free,” Duncan said with a small laugh.

He gave a glance at the “Sea Witch” who looked cold and arrogant on the surface, but who in truth only refused to go out because she hated trouble and was lazy.

“Go out this once. Hear what the Governor has to say.

“I am quite curious too, about how he managed to drag in the ‘witness of the Four Gods’.

“Or I could go with you?”

“Ah, I can go by myself!” Lucretia said quickly.

Then she sighed, nodded a farewell to the others in the living room, and turned to leave.

Two or three pieces of colored paper fluttered out from beside her, but in the next second, they all flew back into her body.

Lucretia suddenly stopped, turned her head with a strange look to glance at Duncan, forced out a stiff smile, and then stepped out of the living room.

Duncan’s face stayed completely calm the whole time.

After Lucretia left, Taran Ael scratched his head in confusion and looked around at the others in the room: “When she goes out alone, doesn’t she usually just use spells to travel straight there?

“Why did she suddenly agree to walk today…”

Duncan crossed his arms and said, as if it had nothing to do with him: “How would I know.”

…

Sara Mell looked in mild surprise at the “Sea Witch” who had walked into his office.

He was not surprised that she came on time.

He was surprised that this Witch had come in through the front door of City Hall like a normal person, had ridden the elevator up like a normal person, and had walked along the corridor to his door and pushed it open like a normal person.

“I have already opened the window for you,” said the elderly Elven Governor, lifting a hand to point at the open window beside them. “I thought you would fly in as usual.”

“Glass cannot block phantoms. I could come in even without a window,” Lucretia said, giving him a stern look. Her tone sounded a little unnatural. “But today… I just felt like walking a bit.”

“Oh, yes, light exercise is good for the body, especially for a Scholar like you who throws herself into research,” Sara Mell said.

For some reason, he kept feeling that the Witch’s attitude and way of speaking were a little strange today, even the aura she gave off was different from before.

But he soon set that sense of wrongness aside.

“Please sit, and take a look at the letter on the desk.”

Lucretia had noticed that letter from the start.

It was already opened and bore the striking seal of the Church of the Four Gods.

She nodded, sat down opposite Sara Mell, picked up the paper, and let her eyes sweep quickly over the lines.

Soon, the Witch lifted her eyebrows.

The content clearly surprised her—and in that surprise, there was also a hint of subtle “interest”.

She raised the sheet of paper:

“This letter was sent to all the city-states on the Boundless Sea?”

“Yes. The Governors of each city-state should all be receiving it around this time,” Sara Mell nodded.

“I am quite interested in what their reactions will be when they do.

“But before that, I want to hear your view first.

“As Captain Duncan’s Spawn—and as the Spawn who has just reestablished contact with him—what do you think of the Church of the Four Gods’ attitude in this matter?”

Lucretia thought for a moment:

“…The Church. They are more devoted than I expected, and more ‘open-minded’ too.”

“Strictly speaking, it is the four great Pilgrimage Arks whose attitude is open-minded,” Sara Mell said.

“Many people have a set impression of them. They think the popes, and the ‘pilgrim bishop corps’ around them, are the most rigid, rule-bound people in the world.

“But in fact, things are often the other way around.”

“You do not seem to be bound by these ‘common views’,” Lucretia said.

“If you live long enough, you learn more,” Sara Mell shrugged.

“I was surprised for a moment when I first received the letter.

“But after I thought back over what has happened recently, and the Church of the Four Gods’ activities in this period, I was no longer surprised by what it said.”

Lucretia frowned:

“The Church’s recent activities?”

Sara Mell did not answer her directly.

Instead, he suddenly asked another question:

“…When was the last time you ran into a patrol fleet of the Church near the border?”

—

Chapter 549: Witness of the Four Gods

“Ran into a patrol fleet of the Church at the border?”

Lucretia froze for a second when she heard the question.

Then she frowned and began to think.

“It should have been last month.

“I met a Flamebearer’s ship in the border sea…

“After that, I have not seen a Church patrol fleet again.

“But that might just be because I have not gone near the border as often lately.”

“It is not that, Lady Lucretia,” Sara Mell shook his head.

“It is not because you have not gone to the border.

“The Church of the Four Gods truly did pull a large number of people off border patrol to do other things—about half of them.”

“They reduced border patrols?” Lucretia said in surprise. “What are they doing?”

“I do not know. The Pilgrimage Arks have their own secrets, just as all the city-states do,” Sara Mell said.

“They will not report the movements of those ships and crews to me.

“But from the intelligence I have, that withdrawn strength was not moved into the ‘internal routes’.

“They are still staying in certain places on the border.

“You see what I mean?

“They are no longer carrying out patrols. Instead, they have gathered at some special locations near the eternal Veil, as if they are waiting for further orders—or preparing to deal with some much greater trouble.”

The Governor paused, then looked straight into Lucretia’s eyes, his tone especially grave: “This kind of thing has never happened before.”

“…When an Elf says something ‘has never happened before’, that usually means it is very serious,” Lucretia could not help quoting the old saying that was well known among Explorers. “I think I understand what you mean.”

“Yes, my lady. Our world is going wrong,” Sara Mell said softly.

“The Vanished has already sent a warning to the whole world.

“Even someone like me, an ‘ordinary person’, can sense this feeling that a crisis is approaching and things are slowly becoming wrong.

“So the Church of the Four Gods, which has watched and protected this world for thousands of years, cannot possibly have missed it.

“Of course they have already started to act.”

As he spoke, he lifted a hand and pointed at the letter bearing the Church of the Four Gods’ seal.

“This letter links that unusual ‘deployment’ to the warning from the Vanished.

“I think the leaders of the Pilgrimage Arks have already found, or confirmed, the ‘root’ of something your father mentioned in his warning.

“And they have found that this problem is huge—far bigger than anyone imagined.

“In the face of this ‘huge problem’, keeping up their guard against the Vanished is no longer important.

“Even though that ship is still connected to Subspace, and might even fall into Subspace again, they can no longer worry about that—so long as your father now stands on the side of Mortals.”

When he finished, Lucretia stayed silent for a long time.

She lowered her head again and read over the letter, as if still caught in deep thought.

After who knew how long, it was Sara Mell who broke the silence: “May I ask now, Lady Lucretia?

“Your father—the legendary Captain Duncan… what is he doing at this moment?

“And what does he plan to do next?”

He is looking after a child. Next he plans to take those two young ladies into the city to find some food that normal humans can eat…

Those unreliable thoughts flashed through Lucretia’s mind, but she quickly pushed them away.

She let her expression grow serious again.

“He is very interested in the fallen relic I found.

“I do not know why, but he seems to know where the stone sphere at the center of that fallen relic comes from.

“That is mainly what he came for this time.”

“He knows the origin of that ‘stone sphere’?” Sara Mell said, shocked.

“Yes. He called that sphere ‘The Moon’.

“And according to him, in its original—or you could say, ‘normal’—state, its size should be extremely large,” Lucretia nodded.

“He also asked with great interest about the physical properties it shows and the composition of the samples taken from its surface.”

“The Moon…” Sara Mell’s brow furrowed tighter and tighter.

But even after thinking it over for a long time, he still shook his head.

“I have never heard that name before.”

“Nor have I. Father said no one in this world should know that name,” Lucretia said.

“When he said that, his mood… was not very good.”

Sara Mell did not speak for a while.

After some thought, he finally broke the silence:

“The outpost research group has recently taken some more samples from the surface of that ‘stone sphere’. They are doing analysis right now.

“Since your father is so interested in it, I will have them share their findings with you at once.

“And I will warn the heads of the facilities in advance.

“If your father wishes to ‘see some of the research results with his own eyes’, they can be ready.”

Lucretia raised an eyebrow:

“You are not worried about causing panic?”

“You already brought him swaggering into the city,” Sara Mell said helplessly, spreading his hands.

“Do you know how many people in this city recognize his face?”

“But as long as you do not make any public announcement, I expect many people would rather believe he is just a man whose face happens to look very much like his,” Lucretia replied calmly.

“Compared to Subspace Shadows coming into the city for sightseeing, a man who looks exactly like Captain Duncan is easier to accept.”

“Looking exactly like him is frightening enough, my lady,” Sara Mell said with a bitter smile.

“Do you know that ever since your father… since that time, the captains on the Boundless Sea hardly ever grow full beards anymore?”

“That has nothing to do with me,” Lucretia said. “It is not my father shaving them.”

Sara Mell was choked speechless for a moment.

He stared for a while, then finally waved his hand:

“Very well, let us not talk about that.

“My lady, I want to know the truest situation.

“Your father… what state is he in now?”

It was clear that the Governor was trying his best not to sound rude, but he also knew that asking such a question in front of the “Sea Witch” was bound to be a bit offensive no matter what.

He could only grit his teeth and ask.

Thankfully, Lucretia did not seem displeased.

“Just as I learned earlier, he really has lost many memories. Subspace once destroyed his reason and his personality,” the Witch said. Her expression was a little complicated, but she did not hide what she knew.

“The present Duncan Abnomar is, strictly speaking, already a completely ‘reassembled’ person.

“I can still find some shadows of the past in him, and the familiar air and authority I remember.

“And he still has a vague impression of me.

“But that is all.”

She paused, choosing her words with care, then went on:

“If you ask how I feel, I feel that something else is hidden inside him—do not tense up, Sara Mell, I am not talking about Subspace.

“I mean something that is not dangerous, but that I have never seen before.

“It is like another personality, or like many, many personalities and pieces of information layered together…”

“I do not understand what that means,” Sara Mell said, frowning. “Can you put it in plainer words?”

Lucretia thought for a moment, then showed unusual patience as she explained: “This time, when I first saw him, I briefly heard countless noises and saw swelling, writhing light.

“That should count as a mild mental corruption.

“But this corruption faded very fast and did not leave any mark on me.

“And in that corruption, I caught a glimpse of countless points of radiance drifting out behind him.

“It looked… very much like the Starry Sky that floats between the Abyssal Deep Sea, and the Spirit Realm.

“At the very beginning, before I saw that ‘starlight’, my sense of Father was a great ‘nothing’.

“I saw his shell standing there, yet I could not feel that he truly existed.

“Only when those noises and lights appeared did my sense of him become steady, and only then could I talk with him—or, to be strict, talk with that shell—normally.”

Sara Mell’s expression grew even more serious.

“How long did that process last?”

“For an instant,” Lucretia said gravely.

“And it happened on the edge of reason and perception.

“I suspect almost no one else could notice it.

“Those few whose Spirit Sight is high enough to sense it would be completely drawn to that starlight, so they would not even realize that his shell felt ‘empty’ for a moment.”

Sara Mell stayed silent for half a minute, then said thoughtfully: “It sounds as if you noticed that brief ‘process’ only because your attention was fixed on your ‘father’ the whole time…

“Lady Lucretia, what you describe makes me uneasy. To me, it feels as if…”

“I know what you want to say,” Lucretia cut in softly.

“You may think that brief ‘starlight’ is the true Duncan Abnomar now, and that the ‘captain who returned from Subspace’ is only the part it uses to copy a shape—like a sea monster lifting one tentacle above the surface to lure sailors.”

“Is that not the case?” Sara Mell asked, brow deeply furrowed.

Lucretia only shook her head.

“I have my own judgment, Mr. Governor,” she said firmly.

“I know that is him.

“Even though he now shows some unsettling ‘qualities’, even though his way of existing has become hard to understand and beyond words, that starlight is him.

“At least, a part of it is him.”

Sara Mell listened in silence.

After a long time, he finally spoke again, his face very grave: “That sounds like you are being driven by emotion, my lady.

“But I know you are not someone who lets her feelings lead her.

“So I can only hope your judgment is correct—or at least that it comes from your usual, very accurate ‘intuition’, and not from missing him.”

“You can trust my judgment,” Lucretia said solemnly.

Then she pointed at the letter on the desk.

“Or, at the very least, trust the ‘witness of the Four Gods’.”

Chapter 550: Afternoon

Under the weight of the words “witnessed by the Four Gods,” Sara Mell finally and reluctantly accepted Lucretia’s judgment.

No matter what those starlights the sea witch spoke of really were, and no matter what form Duncan Abnomar truly existed in now, at least the leaders of the Pilgrimage Ark, who could speak directly with the Four Gods, had all decided to cooperate with the Vanished. That decision itself was a powerful piece of “evidence.”

Or, to put it in a more extreme way: if even the judgment and orders given by the Four Gods were wrong, then it would not matter whether there was a disaster or not. The very fact that “all Four Gods were wrong” would be the greatest disaster.

“We knew very little about Subspace. All the rules of the Mortal Realm might be overturned in that domain,” Lucretia said. She turned her head and looked out through the floor-to-ceiling windows of the office, as if gazing at the distant sea. Her voice was calm and unhurried as she went on: “When the Vanished ‘returned’ from Subspace to our Mortal Realm, a series of changes had to happen. Remember, back then, just a slight influence was enough to turn the Radiant Star and the Sea Mist into what they are today. So what about the Vanished, after being soaked in Subspace for a century? What about my Father?

“There were many things we should have expected long ago.”

She drew back her gaze from the window and turned her head. She quietly fixed her gaze on Sara Mell's eyes.

"To be honest, I do not even care how much of his 'essence' is still the original Duncan Abnomar," Lucretia said softly. "Even if only a single grain of light in that starlight still belongs to him, I am willing to welcome him back for that one grain. As long as, as a whole, he still stands on the mortal side, that is enough."

Listening to the witch's calm words, Sara Mell's expression shifted several times, then finally settled into a sigh: "Yes. At least he is a friendly existence. That is much better than a true Subspace ghost."

Lucretia did not speak again. She only nodded lightly.

"How is Scholar Taran's condition?" Sara Mell asked after a brief silence. "I heard he fell into a 'dream crisis,' and that you and your Father solved it together?"

"Yes. That was what I was about to tell you," Lucretia said, straightening her expression at once. She spoke very seriously: "The so-called 'dream' that Master Taran Ael fell into may be more complicated than you think. My Father confirmed some information. It is connected to those heretic cultists…"

Over the next ten minutes or so, she told the governor everything she knew, including the goals of the Annihilators and what she had seen of the Sunspawn inside the dream.

After that, she also mentioned the information sent from the city-state of Pland—about the Ender, the Fourth Long Night he had spoken of, and those strange, rambling "sermons."

Sara Mell listened with a serious face from start to finish, not interrupting even once.

Only after Lucretia finished did the office fall quiet for more than ten seconds. Then this governor, who had lived a long and rich life, slowly nodded.

“Nameless One’s Dream…” Sara Mell said thoughtfully. “There is no such term in the elves’ cultural system, but it really does make one think of the demon god Saslokar’s Dream of Creation. However, if such a vast ‘dream’ truly exists, why has no one discovered it for thousands of years? Those heretic cultists say the elves are the ‘passage’ to this dream, but as far as I know, nothing like what happened to Taran Ael ever happened before.”

“We have discussed this too. The most likely explanation is this: the appearance of Nameless One’s Dream is itself one of the signs and proofs that the Fourth Long Night is approaching.”

Sara Mell reacted at once: “You mean…”

“Nameless One’s Dream may have only appeared, or ‘shown itself,’ recently,” Lucretia said gravely. “It might have always been in a dormant state, or in a ‘suppressed’ state, so no one noticed its existence. But as the Fourth Long Night draws near, it is slowly becoming active…”

Sara Mell did not answer. She furrowed her brows, then slowly lifted her head and looked out the window at the bright sunlight. Under the lock of the double rune rings, the Sun was crossing its highest point in the sky. It would soon be afternoon.

She did not know how long she stared before she finally broke the silence in a low voice, almost like she was repeating the Ender’s sermon to herself:

“…dusk is drawing near. The Sun is starting to become ‘gentle,’ and so those who were once banished and erased are beginning to return to this world again…”

…

At the main door, Nina checked her clothes and the things she needed to bring one last time.

The temperature in this southern city-state was much higher than in Pland. Even though it was the cooler end of autumn, she still had to wear light clothes to go out. She put on her favorite dress and matched it with her new light sandals. Her mood became bright at once.

She put the key, some small change, and a map into her little bag. Following Lady Lucretia's advice, she also packed incense strips and medicine to drive away mosquitoes. It all seemed ready.

Last of all, there was the friend she was taking out with her.

Nina turned her head and looked toward Shirley.

Shirley was still wearing her favorite dress. She was squatting down, fastening the straps on her sandals. When she felt Nina's gaze, she looked up at once and asked: "What is it, Nina?"

Nina smiled and asked: "Have you decided where to go?"

Earlier, when they tried the "local specialty food," the shock had been so great that the two girls almost ran back to the ship on the spot. For a moment, they had even felt a real urge to give up and go home.

But in the end, Nina and Shirley did not act on that impulse.

This rare stop at port during a long sea voyage could not be wasted.

"I do not know where to go either," Shirley said as she stood up and patted the dust from her skirt. "That elf uncle said there is a market two blocks away. Let us just go there. Anyway, I really do not want to go to any so-called 'food street' again."

Nina nodded, then glanced at the small pouch at Shirley's waist: "Did you bring the mosquito repellent? This city has many more mosquitoes than Pland.”

“Yeah.” Shirley patted the pouch at her waist. “Dog reminded me.”

Nina broke into a bright smile: “Good. Then let’s go~”

The two girls walked down the steps in front of the door. Just then, the lock behind them clicked and the door hinges turned.

Shirley jolted and turned around at once. She saw a tall, imposing figure in the doorway and went tense on the spot.

“We… we just want to walk around…” Shirley blurted out before Duncan could speak. She was flustered and rushed: “We already told Mr. Morris…”

“We will not go far,” Nina said with a bright smile. “Just to the nearby market.”

“I know.” Duncan only gave a light nod. Then he walked up to the two young ladies and let his gaze fall on Shirley.

Shirley shrank her neck almost by reflex. She held it in for several seconds before she spoke in a small, careful voice: “Maybe… I should not go…”

“Here,” Duncan said, cutting her off. He held out a few banknotes.

Shirley stared blankly at the money in front of her, unable to react for a moment.

“You are going to the market, right?” Duncan’s voice snapped her out of it. “This is your pocket money for today. Do not spend it all at once. I already gave Nina hers.”

Shirley still seemed dazed. Only when Dog’s reminder sounded in her head did she suddenly come back to herself. She hesitated, then took the notes, which were actually not of very large value, and turned her face away. To cover her embarrassment, she muttered: “I thought you were going to drag me back to do homework…”

Duncan paid no mind to her reaction. He looked at the two young ladies in front of him and reminded them casually: “Do not come back too late. Try not to go to other districts. If you get lost, call me. I will send AI to pick you up…”

“Yeah, yeah, we know,” Nina said, waving her hand again and again. Her tone sounded impatient, but the smile on her face was as bright as always. Then she grabbed Shirley’s arm and tugged her toward the end of the street. “We are heading out then! We will be back before evening!”

Shirley let herself be pulled along, still a bit muddled. She looked back halfway, her lips moving as if she wanted to say something. In the end, she did not say anything. She only smiled suddenly and, in the brief gap while Nina was dragging her forward, she waved back at Duncan.

Duncan watched the two girls disappear around the corner. A moment later, he withdrew his gaze and looked at the empty space not far away: “Back from City Hall?”

As his voice fell, Lucretia appeared on the empty ground as if out of nowhere. Like a mirage turning solid, she stepped out of the fading illusion, a hint of surprise on her face: “So you already noticed me?”

Duncan nodded: “I saw you from the start.”

Lucretia turned her head and looked toward the direction where Nina and Shirley had gone.

For a moment, the expression on her face shifted in a subtle and complicated way. Many thoughts seemed to rise and fall in the depths of her eyes. There might have been old memories mixed in, and some faint, nameless feelings. But in the end, she gathered up every trace of change in her gaze. When she turned back to Duncan, there was only a light smile on her face.

For some reason, Duncan suddenly felt that this witch's mood had become very good—very, very good.

"Has Taran Ael already left?" Lucretia asked suddenly.

"He left half an hour ago. He said he was worried about his laboratory," Duncan replied with a nod, then asked: "What did you talk about with the governor at City Hall?"

"The Church has sent a notice to every city-state. The warning you sent to this world is starting to take effect…"

Chapter 551: Twin Realms

(The whole world seemed to be covered by a thick Veil, and its own senses felt as if they had been shattered and rebuilt a thousand times by an invisible force. The mind could not understand those wild, chaotic signals. The buzzing noise and dim, terrifying lights seemed to carve themselves straight into its nerves, stirring its awareness and stabbing at its thoughts.

It tried to take a step forward. It tried to tell what was around it. It tried to remember itself. It tried to understand its situation now.

Countless hazy shapes crowded around it. Those things had shifting outlines. Hollow spaces with strange, dreamy colors floated on their upright shells. Weird currents flowed in those hollows, making nameless howls and hissing sounds that filled everything with fear.

Then, a warm light appeared in its sense of the world. Following that warmth, the being that had woken from darkness and forgotten itself began to walk forward, slowly….)

Nina suddenly put down the cheap trinket she had been picking up and frowned in confusion. She turned and glanced behind her.

Shirley noticed at once and turned too, puzzled: “Huh? Nina, what is wrong?”

“I do not know…” Nina still looked confused. She frowned and swept her gaze over the crowd behind them. “I suddenly felt something move back there, like someone was staring at us. But it feels like… just a mistake?”

“It is probably your imagination…” Shirley also frowned a little after hearing Nina’s words and looked around the market without thinking. “There are people everywhere here. Maybe someone just happened to look this way?”

Even as she spoke, she carefully checked with Dog in her mind.

“Nothing there,” Dog’s reply sounded quickly in her head. “Just a lot of people.”

“Dog says there is nothing,” Shirley said quietly to Nina. “Its senses will not be wrong.”

Nina blinked, glanced back again, then shook her head: “…I guess it was just my imagination.”

The market was crowded. The stream of people made this originally wide place feel a bit cramped. She saw not only locals all around, but also many tourists in foreign clothes wandering through the stalls. Shouts from the vendors rose and fell in the crowd. It sounded noisy, yet full of life.

In a place with so many people, feeling one or two stray gazes on you was not strange at all.

“Young ladies, are you still buying anything?”

The stall owner’s voice came from across the table, breaking Nina’s train of thought.

“Oh, sorry,” Nina said at once. She gave the owner an apologetic smile, then held up the hair clip and brooch she had just picked out. “These two. Please wrap them up for me. What about you, Shirley? Did you find anything you like?”

“I did not find anything,” Shirley said, shaking her head. “I will look at the next stall.”

The stall owner packed the items, Nina paid, and the two girls went on wandering through the busy market. It was still a long time until sunset. The Sun still hung high above the city-state. They still had plenty of time to play.

(What was skin? What were eyes? What were eardrums? How did it walk? How had it come here?

Starting from the most basic questions, it became confused about everything.

Something annoying kept disturbing its thoughts and memories. It brought it more pain and confusion.

It tried to lift its head and searched for the source of that annoying interference. The thing was hanging high above—a giant… noise.

It felt puzzled, because in its weak and blurry memory, “noise” was supposed to be something invisible. But it felt that what it saw up there really was noise.

A mass of twisted, tangled ripples pulsed and writhed endlessly above. The ripples covered the whole chaotic sky, stirring the dim, drifting lights there. They blended with the countless howls and hisses rising from the ground, making one sick, making one afraid.

It forced itself to take another step, moving in the sea of noise. It carefully avoided those shapeless forms with dreamy hollows on their bodies, the ones that kept hissing and whispering. It moved forward slowly, and kept moving….)

Nina stopped again. This time, she stood in the middle of the road, staring wide-eyed at an empty patch of ground.

In her eyes, a faint golden glimmer quietly rose and floated.

Shirley stopped with her at once and frowned at the empty place too. After several seconds, she finally spoke in a hesitant voice: “I think I felt it too. It was like something was watching us, and it even followed us here…”

“Did Dog feel it?” Nina asked in a low voice, her nerves tensing without her noticing.

“Dog still says it did not feel anything,” Shirley replied in a whisper as she watched the area around them. “But it says that having the same ‘illusion’ several times is worrying by itself. Maybe something that should not be in the Mortal Realm is affecting us…”

Nina nodded lightly and checked the market with the corner of her eye.

Among the people coming and going, she could see the Church Guardians standing by the street.

The “Knowledge Guards” of the Truth Institute were watching over this crowded place. They wore institute-style robes and carried large-caliber revolvers at their waists. Their sharp but calm gazes watched for every small movement in the streets and on the square. The eyes blessed by the God of Wisdom Rahm could sense evil that invaded the Mortal Realm at the first moment.

Yet these Knowledge Guards looked relaxed. They seemed to have noticed nothing wrong in the market.

“That feeling is gone… The Guardians do not seem to notice anything either, but I do not think I was imagining it,” Nina muttered quietly to Shirley.

Shirley answered in the same low voice: “So what do you want to do?”

“…Maybe we should tell those Guardians by the road?” Nina thought for a moment and then said: “Uncle said that if we meet dangerous things like heretic cultists, we should report to the Guardians right away.”

Shirley froze for a second when she heard that. As a violent, rude, uneducated bad child, she really did not have much room in her head for the words “report to the authorities,” and she had not thought in that direction at all.

But when she remembered how Captain Duncan had done “righteous reporting” several times before, a strange feeling rose in her heart again—

As a rough, violent troublemaker, was she really the one whose moral sense was too low, so that her way of thinking did not match this whole family of Eldritch Gods?

After a brief sense of mismatch, she could not help but shake her head: “How would we report it? Are we supposed to go over and say we just keep feeling like someone is following us? The Guardians will think we are just making trouble…”

(It forced itself to think and walked unsteadily forward. It remembered a dark red color, like a thick pile of blood. That dark red glow had floated in the sky in its memory. It had chased it without rest, and chased its… companions.

Companions? What were companions?

New memories suddenly appeared in the depths of its mind. It felt confused, and then finally remembered more.

Ah, it did have companions. It had set out with its companions on a long journey. But what were they going to do?

It seemed… they were going to save the world.

They followed the Prophet’s guidance and headed toward the place where the red light fell, to look for a way to save the world. Many of them had set out together, but the hunter brother and sister fell first. Then that gloomy, quiet mage. After that, several knights….)

Nina still decided they should report to the Guardians first.

Even if it would be hard to explain why they were reporting, professional work should be left to professional people. And just like Uncle Duncan had said—if your attitude was honest, no one would blame you if the report led to nothing. If it worked, you might even earn a reward.

She pulled the unwilling Shirley with her and walked toward the Guardians by the side of the street.

(It stopped trying to think. It moved forward on instinct.

The thick “curtains” of the world drew in around it, as if they were trying to block its path. The buzzing noise gathered in tighter rings. Those strange forms that hissed and whispered paced around with shapeless malice on them, giving off a fear that could not be put into words.

But it only walked faster, moving closer to that light. It was like…

It was leaping toward the only thing in its memory that still felt even a little familiar, the only thing it could still somewhat understand.)

Nina reached the roadside.

A Knowledge Guard in institute robes turned his head, curious about the two girls who looked like they were still in middle school and had suddenly walked up to him.

“Young misses, do you need any help?” the Guardian asked. He smiled and spoke gently.

“We think something is wrong…” Nina began, telling the Guardian the line she had been working out in her head all the way over. “Just now…”

(In that instant, all the Veils and mists became invisible borders. The “real touch” of pushing through the border was the first sharp pain felt by the lost and forgotten one in this New World. It leaped forward.)

A scream suddenly rang out from behind them, echoing through the whole market.

Chapter 552

The passersby screamed in panic and scattered. The academy guard in front of them suddenly jerked his head up and, at the same time, drew the revolver at his waist.

Nina had only managed to say half a sentence when this sudden change cut her off. She grabbed Shirley beside her on reflex, then quickly turned her head to look toward the source of the screams.

The roar and the noise suddenly grew to an unbearable level. Sharp pain shook through her senses. Blinding light filled her ears. Her eyes were stabbed by the noise. Her skin felt as if it boiled and steamed in the wind. An indescribable giant sphere hung high in an equally indescribable sky, swelling and writhing madly.

Malicious things began to stir. Those shapes that swelled and shrank rushed about all around, shaking the whole world with their awful howls.

But… where was their weapon? Where was their armor? Where were their companions? Where… were they?

A horrible, pitch-black “mass” of indescribable shape burst out of the air and slammed to the ground.

The mass looked like some kind of flesh, yet it kept reflecting a cold, metallic shine. Its ever-reshaping surface sometimes threw off colorful phantom light, and in that light something seemed to roar and twitch.

This terrifying thing threw the crowd into panic. Everyone scattered and ran.

Only the two “knowledge guards” on the scene did not hesitate. They drew their pistols and took out their spellcasting tools, then rushed toward that horrifying Mortal Realm Intruder.

Their shouts reached Nina and Shirley’s ears: “Child, run!”

The Guardian’s shout snapped Nina awake. In the chaos that had suddenly erupted, Nina stared wide-eyed at the center of the disturbance.

She did not know if she was just seeing things.

Because in that brief instant, in those first one or two seconds, maybe even less, she felt she had seen something far more unbelievable than that terrifying mass. Yes, in that very first second, that thing had looked… like a person.

She wondered if she had seen wrong, because the moment was far too short. And judging from how everyone around her reacted… no one else seemed to have noticed that scene.

The guards had already rushed forward. Because they still could not tell what strange traits this suddenly appearing Intruder had, they did not fire rashly. Instead, they first smashed several test tubes on the ground nearby. The volatile reagents inside quickly spread into the air, forming a thin mist that gathered into a “wall of air” that did not disperse. sunlight shone on it and refracted into a dizzying glow.

It was as if some rainbow-like crystal barrier had formed in the surrounding cloud of gas.

The two Guardians stepped into the “wall of air” first. One aimed his gun at the swelling, writhing thing rolling on the ground. The other quickly scattered potions and powders over the ground nearby, lit a portable candlestick, then used crystals and metal blocks to build a temporary protective barrier, suppressing the thing's movements.

A sharp whistle then sounded from the other end of the street. The Guardians patrolling other parts of the market hurried over to help. As they drove off the remaining pedestrians on the road, they stepped into the "wall of air" and skillfully began a series of sealing, suppression, and purification procedures.

Nina and Shirley stood not far away, watching all this in a daze. They did not feel nervous. They just thought it was very new and strange.

Because even though they had already run into quite a few supernatural incidents by now, they had hardly ever seen how professional Guardians "handled an incident by the book."

Trained ordinary persons followed strict operating rules and worked together smoothly to control the Intruders that suddenly appeared in the Mortal Realm. This scene was very different from how Uncle Duncan (the captain) usually solved problems.

Right then, the "mass" in the center of the "wall of air," which shone with a metallic luster like some kind of living steel, suddenly thrashed violently. The temporary seal that the Guardians had hastily built with a ritual was hit at once. The transparent shell that covered the Intruder's surface cracked inch by inch, giving off a harsh, shrill tearing sound. The two knowledge guards who were maintaining the ritual's suppression staggered back a few steps, and the crystal prism in one man's hand shattered in an instant.

But that seemed to be the Intruder's last struggle.

The Guardians recovered from their panic and were already ready to reinforce the seal again, but then they saw that the "living steel" in the center of the site was quickly slowing its writhing, as if its life was draining away. The strange hissing and scraping sounds coming from inside it grew lower and lower. Its heaving surface also seemed to freeze, as if it were solidifying. A dull gray color spread across its metallic “skin,” like stone weathering at high speed.

In the end, the whole thing almost stopped moving. Only a few faint twitches, like the muscle spasms of a dead animal, still ran across its surface from time to time.

“Target activity has dropped. It has stopped reacting to Catalyst No. 17.”

One Guardian, holding a revolver in one hand and several test tubes in the other, spoke quickly.

Another Guardian held a very thick book with both hands. While he stared hard at the “living steel” in the center of the site, he sensed something. A moment later he said: “The target has no mental activity.”

“There are still signs of movement in the central area, but they are fading… No tendency to communicate outward has been detected.”

“Insensitive to the Class III catalyst group. It does not belong to any known type of Intruder… When will the team from the academy get here?”

“The message has been sent. The fastest is fifteen minutes.”

“Got it. Everyone stay alert. Watch your own mental state. Do not leave the barrier zone. Report at once if you see or hear anything unusual.”

The Guardians handled the emergency here professionally and quickly. Even though the thing that had entered the Mortal Realm this time was a completely new entity not found in any records, they still did not look at a loss—until a sudden voice came from the side.

“Um… mister Guardian, what is this thing?”

Nina pulled Shirley over to the “living steel” mass that had almost stopped moving. The two unusually bold young ladies carefully examined the “substance” on the ground, which was nearly two meters across. Nina could not help asking curiously.

The knowledge guard closest to them almost jumped on the spot.

This middle-aged man in a robe, whose air made him look more like a middle school teacher than a warrior, turned his head in horror. He saw that the ones standing behind him were the same two young ladies who had first walked toward him, as if they had wanted to report something. He had thought these two young ladies would be evacuated at once. How were they still here?!

And in the next second, this Guardian realized an even more unbelievable fact.

“How did you get in?!”

He stared, dumbfounded, at Nina and Shirley. From the corner of his eye he quickly glanced behind them. The “wall of air” that blocked off the scene still floated a few meters away, perfectly intact. The barrier with its rainbow, crystal-like mist showed no sign of being broken by anyone, and he himself had not sensed any physical body touch that barrier at all…

So how had these two girls, who looked like middle-school students, just strolled right in?!

“I just walked in,” Nina said. When Nina saw the mister Guardian’s stunned reaction and saw the other Guardians around them instantly go on high alert, she finally felt a bit nervous. “I just… walked in, like that.”

Shirley hurriedly nodded. She tried her best to use the acting skills she had practiced since she was little, skills she had not used much lately, and put on a meek, innocent look: “We were just curious, so we came over to take a look, mister…”

“Walked in?!” The Guardian stared, and his years of training made him silently recite a prayer to Rahm at once. One hand pressed on the grip of his gun, and his eyes locked on the two young ladies in front of him.

A faint layer of silver light appeared in his eyes.

However, Nina and Shirley just stood there, harmless, like two completely ordinary children out shopping.

And Nina really did not know what was going on.

She had seen the ring of mist, but she had only thought of it as some symbolic “boundary,” like a frame drawn on the ground with white paint. She naturally walked in and did not feel any resistance at all—just like how sunlight could naturally pass through glass.

As for Shirley… Shirley also did not feel that barrier.

Because Shirley walked together with sunlight.

The tense and strange standoff lasted for several seconds. The Guardians on the scene were all on edge. A faint silvery glow rose in the eyes of half of them. Rahm’s divine blessing temporarily strengthened their ability to see the truth, so they could observe these two girls who looked ordinary but whose words and actions faintly felt suspicious.

However, they did not find any anomaly.

Only the older middle-aged knowledge guard still felt a faint sense of wrongness in his heart. He kept feeling that something was hidden right before his eyes, hidden deep in the smile of one of the girls. So he could not help looking at Nina a few more times, the light in his eyes flickering.

But all of a sudden, he felt it was not necessary to keep looking. This baseless thought made him unconsciously withdraw the light from his eyes.

The Guardian rubbed his eyes and, in a daze, forgot the feeling of wrongness that had just risen in his heart.

“We’re not disturbing your work, are we?” Nina asked with a hint of apology.

The Guardians looked at one another. Several of them quickly exchanged glances and spoke in low voices for a moment.

The middle-aged Guardian who looked the most senior took a step forward. His expression was serious, and he still kept a slight wariness.

“Sorry, ladies, but could you… come with us for a bit?”

Chapter 553

Go with them?

Nina froze for a moment, then understood what was going on.

Thinking back over the whole event, thinking about what she and Shirley had done before and after that strange thing like “living steel” appeared, she felt it was normal for these knowledge guards to be on their guard. Any incident involving an supernatural intrusion had to bring every person and object that might have suffered corruption into the inspection range as much as possible. This was an iron rule for the Guardians.

Back on the ship, Vanna often talked about her daily work as an Inquisitor, which also included many of the Guardians’ rules. And as Uncle Duncan often said, it was exactly these rules, strict to the point of being harsh, that ensured the city-states could survive in this era of the Deep Sea and let most ordinary persons still live relatively stable lives in this dangerous world.

So she nodded and quietly tugged on Shirley’s arm, to keep Shirley from suddenly blurting out some crude words. Then she looked at the knowledge guard in front of her and said: “All right… but if we don’t go back for a long time, our families will worry.”

“We just need to confirm whether you have suffered mental corruption or subconscious suggestion,” that knowledge guard seemed to relax and patiently explained. “This is a necessary procedure for screening and protection. If there is no corruption, you will be allowed to leave very soon.”

He paused, then added: “After you come to the academy with us, we will first register your basic information. There will be someone specially assigned to contact your family, so you do not need to worry about that.”

“Oh, then let’s go,” Nina said with a smile, then turned to look at Shirley. “No problem, right?”

“What problem could there be?” Shirley muttered. “I’m even a little looking forward to it…”

From Shirley’s tone, Nina heard a kind of waiting-for-a-show mood, even a bit of gloating. Nina knew what this fellow was looking forward to, but she did not say anything more. Instead, she looked again at the “mass” that had almost stopped moving and could not help asking: “Do you know what this thing is?”

“A kind of anomalous entity that has invaded the Mortal Realm, but we cannot tell you the details,” the knowledge guard said in an official tone. “If, after evaluation, it is confirmed as an incident that can be made public, the academy will release the information.”

“Oh…” Nina drew out the sound, then turned to leave with the Guardians. But before going, she still could not help stopping and looking back at the strangely shaped “mass” once more.

It had already grown still. Even the final spasms and tremors had stopped. On its completely solidified, iron-gray outer shell, a rock-like texture was slowly spreading.

…

Inside the “mysterious mansion” at No. 99 Crown Street, with its tall spires and lush gardens, Duncan and Lucretia were chatting about many of the things that had happened in Frostholm some time ago. Not far away, Morris was curiously talking with the clockwork doll Lunie, seemingly interested in how Lunie was driven. Vanna was not in the sitting room. It was time for her daytime prayer, and Lucretia had set aside a special “prayer room” for this devout Saint of the Storm.

“…When I left, order in Frostholm had already been restored, but it will still take a lot of work to clean away all the corruption left by those ‘elementses’,” Duncan said to Lucretia as he talked about the situation in the north. “I heard Tyrian’s overtime schedule has been lined up all the way into next quarter…”

“He spent half a century living free as a pirate in the Frost Sea. Now he finally has to pay back the debts he owes from that lazy time,” Lucretia said with feeling. “By the way, have you ever gone to the frozen seas even farther north of Frostholm?”

“No, I have not,” Duncan shook his head. “I only heard that there are endless ice fields there, and the solid ice stretches all the way into the deep part of the fog at the border. I am indeed a bit curious about that place, but what happened in Lightwind Harbor concerns me more.”

“It is said that in the frozen seas north of Frostholm, some ice layers even hold relics left by explorers from the Dark Age and the old Age of City-States. Some people once tried to walk across those ice layers to explore the fog, but in the end they were swallowed up by sudden extreme cold… Compared to that, I think the warmer southern seas are more suitable as a breakthrough point to challenge the ‘border’…”

“If I have the chance, I really do want to see that border… Don’t worry, I know how dangerous that fog is. I’m just very curious…”

“As long as you do not rush into that fog again, it’s fine.”

The two “father and daughter,” reunited after a long time, chatted on and off. They talked about the things that had happened lately, the many incredible phenomena on the Boundless Sea, the fog at the border, and those dangerous regions far from the civilized world.

Their topics did not always flow smoothly, and Lucretia was not someone good at chatting, but somehow they had still talked like this for a long time.

But suddenly, Duncan stopped.

He seemed to “hear” something. His brows furrowed slightly. After a brief moment of focused sensing, he turned his gaze to a certain direction outside the window.

Lucretia noticed her father’s change at once: “What happened?”

“Nina is calling me,” Duncan turned his head with a strange look on his face and glanced at Lucretia. “…How do you get to the district academy?”

“The district academy?” Lucretia froze for a moment. “What are you going to the district academy for?”

“To fish someone out.”

Lucretia: “…?”

…

“Name?”

“Nina.” Nina hesitated for a moment and did not say the “surname” she used now.

The registrar across the table did not think much of it, and simply kept taking down notes as a routine: “Age?”

“Seventeen.”

“Occupation?”

“I’m still in high school…”

“Are you a local of Lightwind Harbor?”

“I’m from Pland. I came to Lightwind Harbor to travel and I’m staying for now at… a relative’s house.”

The registrar recorded each piece of basic information. Hearing the girl’s honest answers, he looked up with a smile and spoke in a gentle, soothing tone: “Don’t be nervous, young lady. These are just routine forms. You didn’t do anything wrong, you were only accidentally caught up in an supernatural incident. These records are for your protection—don’t be afraid.”

“I’m not afraid,” Nina said very obediently. Then she glanced at the registrar mister with a bit of embarrassment. “Just try not to be scared later.”

“Me? Why would I be afraid?” The registrar was startled for a moment, then waved his hand with a helpless smile. He just thought this was a young lady with little experience of the world talking nonsense because she was nervous, and did not take it to heart. “Ah, if only your companion were as well-mannered as you.”

Nina froze for a second and pricked up her ears to listen to the sounds from the next room. As expected, she heard some very Shirley-style crude language.

But it did not sound like she was screaming curses at anyone. It was just some swear words for venting, like when someone talks and casually adds in many phrases with a high “your mom” content. In Shirley’s own words, those were all “intonation particles.”

So Nina relaxed a little and smiled awkwardly: “This is already her being pretty restrained.”

“It’s fine. In our position we have seen all kinds of people, especially people who have come into contact with supernatural powers. Unstable minds, even people who start hitting and smashing things, are normal. We are used to it,” the registrar said casually, waving his hand. “It’s just a little surprising is all. She clearly looks like such a well-behaved young lady…”

Nina thought back to how Shirley behaved in front of Uncle Duncan and secretly thought that, from a certain angle, the registrar’s first impression was not wrong…

After a little while longer, she asked curiously: “When can we go back?”

The registrar, who wore the robe of a cleric from the Truth Academy, turned his head to look at the incense and the quietly burning candle on the table beside him.

“We have to wait until the incense burns out and the candle flame goes out on its own. If none of the catalysts react, then you can leave.”

“Oh,” Nina nodded. After staying quiet for only a few minutes, she asked again: “What about that ‘thing’ that appeared at the market earlier? Has it been caught?”

“Sorry, I can’t say,” the registrar shook his head, then added a reminder. “I suggest you stop paying attention to it and try to avoid recalling it. Some ‘foreign things’ that invade the Mortal Realm can produce a parasitic effect in the minds of witnesses. Although we have not yet found signs that you or your companion have suffered this kind of corruption, frequent recall and too much curiosity could still bring bad effects.”

“Oh.” Nina nodded again, then finally quieted down, as if she were patiently waiting for the incense to burn out and the “inspection” to end.

The young registrar sitting opposite her quietly let out a small breath. As he tidied up the forms he had just filled out and shifted his sitting position, his hand slid out from a hidden compartment under the table.

A small device shaped like a pocket watch had appeared in his hand.

Hidden by the tabletop, he pressed the cover of the device. The “watch cover” opened with a soft sound, but beneath it there was no dial and no hands. Instead there was a surface like mercury. The “mercury” rose and sank slightly, as if it were some kind of living thing.

He carefully tilted the “mercury” toward the girl across the table and closely watched the changes on the silvery surface.

This girl named Nina looked sane, spoke clearly, and was even very well-mannered. But that could not ease the worries of a professional clergy member. Many times, people who had already suffered mental corruption could still keep this kind of “clear mind” for a short time. If they were not checked carefully, corruption could easily slip out unnoticed.

According to the report from the field team, this girl and her companion had taken the initiative to approach the patrolling knowledge guards in the few seconds before the “invading thing” appeared. During the incident they had also shown many actions that did not follow common sense. These abnormal points all clearly needed to be checked with care.

Yet the surface of the mercury did not show even a trace of an anomaly.

The “registrar” frowned and brought the device closer to his eyes, carefully examining the slight changes as the surface rose and fell.

Suddenly, he seemed to truly see something in the faintly rippling mercury surface—

It was strands of golden light.

It was fire gathering together.

It was some mysterious, vast power, ancient lost knowledge, the mighty light and heat that had existed since the beginning of time, the source of all things in the world…

A roaring sound echoed in his mind. Knowledge like a storm crashed against the edge of his reason. A thirst for Truth seemed to grip his thoughts. The Mortal soul longed for the pull of the Sun. He suddenly opened his eyes wide, fixing a divine gaze on what was about to surge toward him—

A hand suddenly reached in from the side and blocked his view.

“Don’t stare at things for no reason,” a deep, commanding voice sounded in his ear. “You already felt something was wrong and still kept looking. Why do you people from the Truth Academy all have this problem?”

Chapter 554: Truth Keeper

A roar that could almost tear his soul apart kept echoing in his mind. The chaotic perception of the runaway state churned his reason and then slowly faded with time. After this “storm” had lasted for who knew how long, the registrar suddenly became aware of his own self again.

He heard his own heart pounding wildly. His reason struggled back from the edge of the runaway state to the side of Humans. Only then did he realize what had just happened. He looked up without thinking and turned toward the strange voice.

Duncan stood in front of him, with spirit form flames still floating behind him, not yet fully gone. His tall figure was like a dark cloud falling from the sky, giving off an indescribable pressure.

The registrar thought for a moment and suddenly remembered what the girl named Nina had said to him earlier: “…Just don’t be scared later.”

He now recognized the tall figure before him. For an elf, something that had happened a hundred years ago was not that far in the past.

But before he could cry out, a gentle power suddenly flowed into his mind. At the same time, a familiar voice came from not far away: “I will take over here.”

The registrar turned his head toward the voice.

A middle-aged man walked into the room. He wore a dark blue academy robe. His hair was already touched with gray, and he carried a thick, heavy book under his arm. He looked this way with calm eyes filled with fatigue.

“Your Excellency, Truth Keeper!” The registrar looked as if he had just been saved. He jumped up from the table and at once moved away from Nina and Duncan.

He opened his mouth, as if to report something, but before he could speak, the middle-aged man called the Truth Keeper raised his hand and stopped him: “I already know what happened here. From now on, the City-State University will take over this matter. Do not ask about anything else. Your work for today is over. After you leave, go straight to the counseling room and have a mental evaluation. Go.”

The registrar left full of guesses and confusion. Duncan’s gaze fell on the middle-aged elf whose face carried that tired look. After studying him for a moment, Duncan asked curiously: “And who are you?”

“You don’t remember me?” The middle-aged elf frowned in confusion, then soon nodded as if he understood. “Oh, right. I heard your memory was affected by Subspace…”

His voice sounded weak, with a deep tiredness in it, so much that even his surprise did not change his tone. At last he sighed, raised his hand, and pointed at himself: “Ted Riel, the Truth Keeperof Lightwind Harbor. I am in charge of this city’s safety in the supernatural field. We met a hundred years ago. Back then, you often bought me drinks, and we discussed many things about the border.”

Ted Riel? Truth Keeper ?

Duncan frowned. He of course had no memory of this name, but meeting an “old acquaintance” like this did not surprise him. Before coming to Lightwind Harbor, he had already known that many people in this city would be able to recognize his face. After all, a hundred years was not a long time for elves, and back then the Vanished had often stayed at the edge of the civilized world, dealing most with border cities like Lightwind Harbor.

So after a brief thought, he gave the answer he had prepared long ago: “Sorry, I don’t remember. Subspace took away more than half of my memories. Please forgive me.”

Ted Riel waved his hand. “It’s fine. Forgetting is forgetting. ‘Forgetting’ is Rahm’s greatest divine blessing. I am already used to dealing with ‘forgetting’ anyway.”

Used to dealing with “forgetting”?

Duncan paused for a second when he heard this. He felt there was a faint grudge and hidden meaning in the man’s words, though it did not seem aimed at him. But before he could ask, the Truth Keeperon the other side went on: “I heard Lady Lucretia and the head of the field team give a rough account of what happened. The young lady behind you must be Miss Nina?”

By now Nina had stood up from her chair. She hid behind Duncan and curiously studied the stranger on the other side. When she heard him call her name, she stepped out boldly and greeted him politely: “Hello, I’m Nina.”

Then she lifted her face and looked at Duncan with some guilt: “I’m sorry, Uncle Duncan… Did I cause trouble for you?”

Duncan laughed and reached out to ruffle Nina’s hair: “It’s nothing. Don’t worry about it.”

As he spoke, he was thinking about something else. Getting pulled into an supernatural incident by accident while trying to report an Anomaly to the Guardians was still better than rushing through the city center with a bunch of ghost sailors and getting thrown into the station by the constables…

Compared to the commotion Lawrence had caused back then, the trouble Shirley and Nina stirred up was already very harmless.

Thinking this, he could not help asking: “Where is Shirley?”

As soon as he finished speaking, he heard footsteps at the door. Lucretia came in with Shirley and said: “Dad, Shirley is here.”

Shirley looked tense and uneasy. After she entered the room, she carefully checked Duncan’s expression. Then she hurried over in small guilty steps while speaking fast: “I didn’t do anything bad! Nina and I were going to report the situation to the Guardians, but then some weird thing suddenly showed up out of nowhere, and those Guardians got all jumpy and had to drag us off…”

“Oh, I apologize to you both on their behalf,” Ted Riel said as he turned to look at Shirley. “But this is a necessary safety procedure.”

Halfway across the room, Shirley jumped at the unfamiliar voice coming from the side. She turned and glanced at the plain-faced middle-aged man who had felt almost invisible until now: “What, there’s someone else here… Uncle, who are you?”

“He is Ted Riel, the Truth Keeperof Lightwind Harbor,” Lucretia answered from the side. The sea witch nodded to Ted Riel in greeting, then added, “He’s about the same as this city-state’s Gatekeeper or Inquisitor.”

As soon as Shirley heard that, she rushed to Duncan’s side.

Ted Riel stared at her exaggerated reaction, stunned for a moment. Then he turned to Lucretia: “…Am I that scary?”

Lucretia spread her hands: “I guess it has nothing to do with you.”

Duncan turned to look at Shirley, who had rushed to his side: “I see you getting along just fine with Vanna most of the time. How come you’re scared of Inquisitor types now?”

“How is that the same?” Shirley shrank her neck and peeked at the Truth Keeper , muttering under her breath: “Vanna has already joined the gang. This one isn’t one of us…”

Duncan glared at her at once: “Team. I’ve told you many times, it’s a team!”

“Oh…”

Duncan sighed helplessly and shook his head. Then he looked up at Ted Riel and at Lucretia, who was walking over: “I’ve already heard the general situation from Nina, so let’s skip the explanations and polite talk. I want to see that ‘weird thing’ Shirley mentioned. Is it in this facility?”

“Sample containment room 24, in the underground archive of the central sector,” Ted nodded. “I’ll take you there.”

After he spoke, the tired-looking Truth Keeper took out the thick heavy book from under his arm, casually flipped to a page, and tapped it with his finger.

In the next instant, that page flew out of the book and into the air. Duncan saw a door drawn on it, its surface covered with countless deep and complex symbols. As a series of dazzling changes and reshaping took place, the door drawn on the paper quickly transformed into a phantom doorway hanging in the air.

The half-transparent ghostly door opened. Behind it, a hazy view of a corridor deep under some facility appeared.

Duncan watched this with surprise on his face. His first thought was that it really was worthy of the most educated faction in the world. This Truth

Keeper from the Truth Academy did look a bit more impressive than Vanna’s jumping slash.

His second reaction was curiosity. He wondered what would happen if he grabbed that page out of the air while it was unfolding. This bold idea hovered in his mind for a moment, and in the next second he noticed the subtle look Lucretia was giving him from the side.

“Dad, don’t touch anything.”

The witch silently mouthed the reminder.

Duncan calmly turned his head away and put away his bold idea.

Then, under Ted Riel’s lead, Duncan, Lucretia, and the wide-eyed, curious Shirley and Nina passed through the floating phantom door one by one.

A brief wave of dizziness and disorientation soon ended. When the light and shadow in front of their eyes came together again, they had already arrived in what Ted had called the underground archive of the central sector.

A deep, long corridor appeared in Duncan’s sight. Bright gas lamps lit both sides. Near each patch of light, he saw carved stone slabs set into the walls, marked with the holy symbols, emblems, and verses of the God of Wisdom Rahm. The corridor had a heavy, solemn air. At set intervals there were emergency isolation gates, and between these gates stood small rooms with doors tightly shut.

“This is the containment sector,” Ted Riel said. He glanced at the two young ladies beside him, who both looked very curious, and explained: “Suspicious samples discovered for a short time, Anomaly objects of medium danger or lower, and various items that have suffered corruption and cannot be destroyed quickly will all be locked in these rooms according to their danger level and containment method. Do not walk up to those doors without thinking. The things inside are not very well-behaved.”

As if to prove the Truth Keeper’s warning, faint sounds came from some of the small rooms along the corridor as he spoke. There was the rasp of chains scraping, whispers like someone talking in their sleep, the sickly slosh of thick liquid, and footsteps that kept sounding behind a door as if something might walk out the next second.

Shirley and Nina pulled back their curious gazes at once. Their faces finally showed some serious tension.

Duncan’s eyes swept over the small rooms with their many security measures.

In the next second, the whole corridor fell silent.

“Now they’re behaving.” Duncan nodded in satisfaction.

Chapter 555: It Lives

The corridor in the underground archive became quiet.

This place lay under the highest-level City-State University of Lightwind Harbor. Compared to city-states managed by the Deep Sea or the Church of Death, this place was like the central Cathedral of the whole city. Any sealed object held in a place like this was of course far from ordinary. It had to be at least an Anomaly in the top hundred, like Alice, or a vessel of corruption with a similar level of threat.

Anomalies and corruption vessels of this level shared one trait: the features of a living thing.

They might have incredible thinking abilities. They might have ways to speak with people. They might be able to move and try to escape. No matter how strong or weak these “living traits” were, they at least reached the instinct to seek benefit and avoid harm, just like Alice back then, who had instinctively behaved herself even when she had not known Duncan at all.

In short, they had a bit of a brain. Not much, but they were afraid of dying.

Duncan liked things that had a bit of a brain. They made many things easier.

Lucretia looked over with a touch of awe. Nina and Shirley first widened their eyes in shock, then lifted their chins in pride. Duncan had no idea what they had to be so proud about.

Ted Riel was stunned for a moment. His gaze at Duncan turned complicated. It did not hold the fear of an ordinary person, but it also held no wariness or hostility. He seemed to be thinking about something. After a few seconds, he suddenly said: “While you’re staying in Lightwind Harbor, you can come walk around here more often.”

“Oh?” Duncan was a bit surprised. “Other city-states, when dealing with me for the first time, have all wished I would stay far away. A place like their central Cathedral would be heavily guarded right away. Why are you inviting me here instead?”

Ted raised his hand and pointed at the now quiet corridor: “If you’re here, I can take a vacation.”

Duncan: “…?”

Yet the Truth Keeperdid not care about anyone’s subtle reaction to his words. He just said it, then walked on toward the deeper part of the corridor.

The others followed. This time Duncan fell back a few steps on purpose and walked beside Lucretia. He lowered his voice and asked: “I don’t remember anything about this Truth Keeper. Has he always been like this? I mean… this feeling like he has worked overtime his whole life.”

Lucretia also lowered her voice: “Lord Ted is in charge of the graduating class right now.”

Duncan froze at once: “…The leader of the Guardians in a city-state has to do that too? I remember Vanna, back when she was an Inquisitor, didn’t have extra work like this.”

“divine gifts are closely tied to the words and actions of believers. Studying and spreading knowledge are part of how Rahm’s believers ‘carry out holy work’. Because of this, the whole priest system of the Truth Academy is built in the form of an academy. High-ranked priests must serve as mentors and teach students. The higher the rank, the heavier and harder the teaching duties are. So the Truth Keeperhas to take on a graduating class, and it’s the hardest class to handle.”

Duncan: “…”

As he listened to Lucretia talk about this strange new knowledge, Duncan felt something odd rise in his heart. He could not help lifting his head to look at the Truth Keeper walking ahead.

Ted Riel, walking in front, sensed the gaze at once. He turned and glanced back, a hint of doubt rising in the Truth Keeper’s mind.

This Captain Duncan, whose memories had been damaged by Subspace and who had acted like a stranger to him just now, was suddenly looking this way with a gaze full of inexplicable understanding, nostalgia, and sympathy. Why?

After a brief moment of doubt, Ted Riel shook his head and stopped in front of a door near the end of the corridor.

“Here we are. containment room 24.” He raised his hand and pointed at the door in front of them.

Many Sacred Sigils were drawn on this door. It seemed to be made of black steel, with tiny silver-white metal grains inlaid in its surface. Shirley looked at the door a few times in curiosity, then felt as if her gaze was being pulled into that deep black and those silver specks. A feeling like her senses were drifting out of her body rose in her. She got scared and quickly pulled her eyes away.

Nina raised her head and looked back at the corridor they had come from, then looked around containment room 24. She frowned in curiosity: “There isn’t even one guard here? In a place this important and dangerous, don’t you assign anyone to stand watch?”

“There are wardens at the necessary Nodes, but near the containment rooms themselves, the fewer people the better,” Ted Riel said. He gave the curious girl a glance as he explained: “Some Anomalies have the ability to parasitize minds and jump between them. If there are too many wardens near a containment room, it actually gives those things a chance to break out.”

“For most Anomalies and corruption-tainted items, the right sealing method is far more important than the number of guards,” Lucretia added from the side. “A stone placed in the right spot or some metal powder scattered on the ground can keep some Anomalies quiet for years. But one extra person might let a formless power break out of containment. So in many sealing facilities, the core area actually has the fewest people. Most of the sealing measures take effect on their own with no one around.”

“The guards posted outside the core area are there less to deal with the monsters inside and more to deal with intruders from outside, to keep anyone from coming in and breaking the containment conditions,” Ted Riel said with a nod. He put his hand on the door of the sample containment room. With a light click from somewhere, the door opened. “But… this sample we brought in this time is the most unusual one I have ever seen. I’m not even sure if we should keep it in a sample containment room or in some other place.”

The door opened. A bright but not very large room appeared before them. Complex and precise holy symbols were drawn all over the floor and walls. Oil lamps treated with special oils and gas lamps on the walls were so many that it was surprising. Other than that, the room held no extra furnishings or furniture. Only in the center stood a square platform, and on it lay that strange “sample”.

A member of the clergy stood by the platform. He wore an academy robe and a strange black mask on his face. Heavy shackles bound his hands together. He seemed to be the warden of this containment room. When Ted Riel led the group into the room, this “warden” with the odd shackles on his hands looked up, let his gaze rest on Ted, and gave a small nod.

“Has the sample shown any signs of becoming active?” Ted asked.

The warden silently shook his head.

“Any sign of the shackles opening?” Ted asked again.

The warden lifted his hands to show the shackles on his wrists to the Truth Keeper, then shook his head again.

“Good. Thank you. Go take a rest,” Ted said, looking relieved. He nodded slightly. “I’ll take over here. Remember, you must personally put the ‘shackles’ back on the ‘statue’s’ hands. Do not try to switch places with the statue. Do not respond to its ‘calls for help’ in any way.”

The warden nodded without a word and turned to leave the room.

“Those shackles are part of Anomaly-087, the ‘Statue’,” Ted Riel explained to Duncan and the others after the warden left. “Through a special ‘contract’ ritual, we can borrow the shackles from the Statue for a limited time. Anyone who wears the shackles cannot speak, and while wearing them can bind and restrain one chosen entity in front of them. We usually use it to help control newly discovered dangerous items whose nature is still unclear.”

“For example… an intruder from the mortal realm with a mysterious origin who suddenly appeared in the marketplace.”

Lucretia muttered softly, then looked up at the strange mass on the platform in the center of the room. It seemed quiet and still and had a dull iron-gray metallic sheen.

That thing looked like a lump of steel that had cooled and hardened. Yet the lines and contours on its surface still held a strange feeling of softness and smoothness, as if it had once writhed like some kind of soft-bodied creature and then rapidly solidified into this shape. On its smooth “skin” there were, here and there, some angular bulges. Those bulges gave the feeling that…

it was as if something inside the mass was trying to break out.

“These bulges appeared after the sample was brought into the containment room,” Ted Riel explained. “In the few minutes after it arrived, it suddenly became very active again, and its surface changed a lot. We thought it might try to break out of the seals here and even considered sending it to a higher-level containment sector. But after those few minutes, its activity dropped sharply again and kept falling to what you see now. It’s almost just a solid piece of metal.”

“Almost?” Duncan caught the key word at once.

“Yes, almost, because it is actually still ‘alive’,” Ted Riel said with a nod. “In the very core of this mass there is always a faint active ‘signal’. Even though the whole thing has solidified like this, that core is still moving. You can even hear it -”

As he spoke, the Truth Keeper opened his strange book again. He turned to a page and tapped it lightly with his finger.

A device like a stethoscope appeared out of thin air in the air above the page.

Ted Riel tucked the book back under his arm, picked up the “stethoscope”, and hung it around his neck. Then he carefully pressed the other end to the surface of the “solid metal” mass.

In the next second, a rhythmic sound echoed through the whole room –

Thump, thump, thump…

“It has a heartbeat,” Ted Riel said as he raised his head. “Inside this mass of metal, there is a heart that is still alive.”

Chapter 556: Contact

“Before we know more, we cannot rush into destructive tests on this substance—especially after confirming that there is a living heart inside it.”

Ted Riel spoke as he opened his heavy tome again and slid the “stethoscope” back between its pages. His face always looked tired, but now a trace of a complicated emotion appeared there.

“To be honest, this was the strangest ‘thing’ I had ever seen in my life. I had seen plenty of unspeakable creatures invading the Mortal Realm, but a lump of metal with a heartbeat was not so common—and it was so… quiet.”

“Quiet?” Lucretia frowned without thinking when she heard that.

“Yes. Quiet, almost harmless,” Ted Riel nodded. “As you can see, its ‘shell’ had almost solidified. According to the field team, it was violently active for a short time right after it entered the Mortal Realm, but it soon shifted toward this ‘solidified’ state. It also showed none of the ‘active traits’ we usually see, such as trying to escape containment, corrupting Wardens, or resisting outside probing…”

The Truth Keeper slowly shook his head as he spoke: “Among ‘living anomalies’, this was very unusual. Trying to break out of containment is the most obvious trait of all ‘living anomalies’.”

Lucretia stayed quiet for a moment. Nina, beside her, slowly showed a thoughtful look. No one knew what she was connecting in her mind, when she suddenly said: “It kind of felt like… it had nothing left to live for?”

“That is an interesting… idea, though I do not think this living metal would have such a human reaction,” Ted Riel lifted his eyelids and glanced at Nina, but it was clear he did not really take that wild thought to heart. “I am more inclined to think it simply could not adapt to the environment of our Mortal Realm, but as time passes, it might slowly adapt. When that happens, its activity could rise again.”

“Tell me what happened at the market,” Duncan suddenly broke the silence. His gaze fell on Nina and Shirley. “Nina, when you contacted me, you said that you and Shirley had felt strange watching eyes on you and were about to report it to a Guardian by the road, and then this ‘thing’ suddenly appeared?”

“Mm-hmm.” Nina nodded at once. As she spoke, she tried to recall the scene. “Shirley and I felt it several times. It was like some gaze kept falling on us now and then, and there was also a presence that kept getting closer. I think it must have been this thing. Later, when Shirley and I were about to find someone to report it, it finally could not hold back and jumped out, and then…”

She suddenly stopped there. A very hesitant look crossed her face. She hesitated for several seconds before speaking again, frowning slightly and sounding unsure: “And there was a very wrong detail. I don’t know if I saw it wrong. When this thing first appeared, in the instant I caught it in the corner of my eye, I thought… I thought it was a person.”

Nina’s tone was full of doubt, but what she said made the room fall silent at once. Even Ted Riel, who always looked tired and lazy, suddenly opened his eyes wide. But before he could speak, Shirley, who was closest to Nina, was the first to shout: “Huh? What did you say? You’re telling me this thing looked like a person at the start? And you didn’t tell me?!”

“The field team’s report did not mention this,” Ted Riel said. His expression turned unusually serious. “Miss Nina, are you sure?”

“That’s why I said I don’t know if I saw it wrong,” Nina answered nervously. “The market was in chaos at the time. People were running everywhere. Maybe I got it wrong… or maybe the Guardians on site missed it? It was only the very first instant, after all…”

“Not likely. The Guardians have strict ‘contact record standards’ for first contact. Many anomalies can change themselves very fast or evade cognition, so we require the people handling ‘first contact’ to carefully record the exact ‘start time of contact’ and to state whether their gaze shifted at any point, so we can confirm whether the team had any ‘observation gaps’ when watching the target…”

Ted Riel briefly explained the work rules of the Knowledge Guards, then shook his head: “According to the field team’s report, they made contact the very moment the target entered the Mortal Realm. At least two Guardians were already watching the place where it would appear before it actually showed up. Through the entire process, at least one person was looking right at it. There was no chance for a gap.”

As soon as he finished speaking, Duncan suddenly broke the silence: “But I believe Nina.”

Ted Riel froze for a second, then seemed to realize something: “…You mean?”

“At least from Nina’s point of view, this ‘Intruder’ looked like a person for a moment at the start,” Duncan said calmly. Then he glanced at Shirley. “You were with Nina the whole time. You did not see that, right?”

“No,” Shirley shook her head at once. “I didn’t see it looking like a person.”

“Different observers, different ‘forms’ of the same target?” A strange light flashed in Ted Riel’s eyes. He looked at Nina with surprise and thoughtfulness. “And only Miss Nina saw something different from everyone else… why?”

Curiosity clearly took hold of him. His gaze soon fell back on Duncan: “Does Miss Nina have something special about her?”

The Truth Keeper seemed truly puzzled. He did not know Nina’s background. Without actively using Spirit Sight to examine her, Nina looked, to outsiders, like an ordinary seventeen-year-old young lady—but there was no doubt that this ‘ordinary young lady’ had to be special.

Just the fact that she could stay on Duncan Abnomar’s ship proved that.

“Have you heard of the ‘Black Sun Descent’ in Pland? If you have, you should know that when the Vanished left that city, they took a fragment of the ancient Sun with them,” Duncan said, lifting his hand to point at Nina. “She is that fragment.”

He ignored the wonderful change that flashed across Ted Riel’s face and focused again on Nina: “Do you still remember what that ‘person’ you first saw looked like?”

Nina tried hard to recall. After a while, she finally spoke: “It looked like someone wearing strange ancient armor, the kind you see in history books, all wrapped up like an iron can… oh, and there was a ragged scarf or a short cloak? I only saw it for an instant, so I’m not sure about many details…”

She paused for a moment, then added: “Because of the helmet, and the armor looked so heavy, I couldn’t tell what the person inside looked like. I didn’t even know if it was a man or a woman. But I could feel that the armor was tattered, like it had gone through many battles.”

“A Warrior in ancient armor…” Lucretia muttered. She thought quickly, then asked: “So how did that ‘person’ turn into a lump of living metal? Did you see that process?”

“No.” Nina shook her head. “It changed in an instant. It just became like this, as if there was no gradual change at all… Maybe I blinked? I’m sorry, I really can’t remember clearly…”

“Remembering this much is already very good. You gave us very important information,” Duncan said. He comforted Nina, who seemed a bit down, then turned and walked to the platform where the ‘sample’ was placed.

He stared solemnly at the solidified ‘living metal’, sorting through the information they had so far.

In some first moment, ‘it’ seemed to be a Warrior in heavy ancient armor. The armor was old and worn, scarred by many battles.

Nina had felt gazes fall on her several times and sensed she was being followed. That meant this thing was very likely coming for her—or rather… coming for the ancient Sun.

The market had been crowded, but when Nina first felt the gaze and that tracking presence, no one saw anything strange. That meant ‘it’ either had some ability to disrupt cognition, or it had ‘slipped across’ from a deep layers world like the Spirit Realm into the Mortal Realm…

Duncan slowly reached out and pressed his hand against the surface of the ‘metal’.

Cold, hard sensation spread from his fingertips.

He seemed to feel the heart buried deep inside the metal, to feel its slow beating and the low thud of its pulse.

It was alive, living in a way Humans could not understand.

It seemed to have held some purpose, but then something went wrong at the last step. It had revealed itself from hiding and pounced at Nina and Shirley. It clearly had not meant to end up as this lump of solid metal in its final move.

Ted Riel watched Duncan's action with some tension, then almost without thinking glanced toward the Witch standing nearby.

Lucretia only shook her head, signaling him not to interfere.

Tiny ghostly green sparks appeared at Duncan's fingertips.

He carefully controlled that small flame, making sure it did not ignite this metal that was clearly in the supernatural category. He guided the flame to seep into the metal, feeling its flow of life, its heartbeat, and the thoughts that might exist within it.

Yet what answered him was only a vast emptiness and a hazy, chaotic 'touch'.

There seemed to be no information inside this metal that could be 'read'.

But for some reason, Duncan still felt that something was hidden in that empty, hazy, chaotic touch. It was not that he could not find it. He simply could not 'understand' it yet.

"…Who are you?" he could not help asking softly in his heart. "Where did you come from?"

After an unknown time, that great emptiness was still there. But in the faint feedback from the flame, a tiny ripple suddenly seemed to appear.

Duncan seemed to hear a voice—or rather, an 'idea'—rise in his mind:

"We are marching toward Doomsday."

Chapter 557: Marching Toward Doomsday

The Ranger who had been born in the Evergreen Mountains often said this. Every day, when they made camp before sunset, he would look up at the band of Deep Crimson that crossed the sky and sigh those words. In his own phrasing, it was “a rather romantic way to put it”—the greatest courage and the ultimate romance in the world, when Doomsday was drawing near.

But courage and romance could not stop death’s footsteps. The Ranger fell on the last kilometer before a crossroads, an evil arrow driven straight through his chest. It was the most ironic way for him to die—a master of the bow killed by an arrow.

The Spirit Medium took care of the attackers. They were two already-rotten corpses that had lain in ambush on the road, launching their vile attack when the group drew near. Their Undead nature—no breath, no heartbeat—let them slip past the Ranger’s scouting, and the wind carried away the stench from their bodies. Together, it all created yet another unlucky accident, just like every farewell along this road.

The armored Warrior walked to the edge of the camp and sat down on a dry, dead stump. He lifted his head and quietly gazed toward the dusk.

That unsettling band of Deep Crimson stretched across the sky like a blood cut that would soon tear the world apart, sinking toward where the Sun went down. Inside the Deep Crimson, it was as if blood was flowing. It was also as if countless phantoms beyond Mortal minds hid and brewed there, casting their cold gaze upon this world that was rushing toward ruin.

Footsteps came from the side. The Spirit Medium sat down on the ground next to him and watched that blood-red scar in the dusk together with the Warrior.

Silence lasted for a while. Then a low voice came from inside the Warrior's helmet: "Those two attackers from earlier today…"

"They were that Hunter brother and sister… the first ones to die," the Spirit Medium answered. His voice came from under his black hood, so gloomy it sounded almost like a dead man talking. "They caught up. The dead don't need to rest, so they are faster than we are."

"We buried them ourselves in the forest outside the kingdom's gate, and you even performed the Requiem ritual. Why would the dead you soothed get back up?"

"Many things have been getting back up along the way," the Spirit Medium said quietly. As always, he showed no emotional ups and downs. His words were only the cold, sorrowful 'statement of facts'. "Do you see that Deep Crimson at the edge of the sky? The direction where the red light first fell… It has already grown to twice the size it was when the Prophet first made his prediction. It is a wound that has cut open our world. The earth under our feet and the sky over our heads are both rotting from that wound—and the rot is getting faster.

"The process of going from life to death is starting to become different from what I once understood."

Not everyone could accept his way of speaking. If the Shield Knight were still here, he would already be lecturing them at length, trying to console and encourage everyone.

But when the Warrior looked back, he saw only the lonely figure of the Templar Knight sitting by the campfire. In the Shadows cast by the flames, the small, thin figure of the Pyromancer was curled up. Aside from them, there was no one else left in the camp. The Shield Knight, who had always argued with the Spirit Medium and loved to lecture his teammates, was gone—he had fallen in the wilderness outside Sandstone Fort, his cause of death still unknown.

“Later on, others may ‘catch up’ too,” the Spirit Medium went on. He seemed unused to the quiet of this moment. After a few seconds of silence, he forced the topic to change. “Most likely people who used to be in our group.”

“Why? Just because the Hunter siblings caught up today?”

“Because they still remember their mission to march toward Doomsday—but no longer remember us,” the Spirit Medium said softly. “Before the influence of that red light grew, we did not handle their bodies properly.”

The Warrior was silent for a moment: “…What counts as proper handling?”

“Burning them. Use Wraithfire to burn them completely. Then smash all the larger bones. If possible, soak the skull in acid and bury it deep.”

“All right. I understand.”

The next day, the Spirit Medium died.

They found him lying at the edge of the camp, his heart stolen by some power in the darkness, a gaping hole left in his chest. Strangely, he had a faint, odd smile on his face in death, as if… he was relieved to have escaped this heavy mission ahead of time.

The Warrior, the Templar Knight, and the Pyromancer held a “funeral” for the Spirit Medium. They used Wraithfire to burn his body to ash, crushed all the bones they could find, then soaked the fragments of his skull in a clay jar filled with acid and buried it at the campsite.

Now, only three people remained.

As the black smoke of burning bones rose into the sky, the Warrior again gazed into the distance at the Deep Crimson that looked as if it was cutting the entire world apart. The Pyromancer came to stand beside him. After a long silence, this small woman finally asked the question no one had dared to speak.

“Are we still going forward?”

The Warrior turned his head and looked at this red-haired Groska woman.

He still remembered what she had looked like when they first set out. Back then, she had been full of confidence. Her eyes had shone with energy, and her words had been full of pride. Chosen by the kingdom and named by the Prophet as the “chosen of fate”, she had believed in her own power and her destined glory more than anyone.

Yet now, she was the one asking this question.

“Of course we are going forward,” the Warrior said in his muffled voice. His heavy visor hid his face, but his tone stayed firm. “We have to save our kingdom and stop the spreading Doomsday.”

“Marching toward Doomsday—can that really stop Doomsday itself?” The Pyromancer looked at him and asked quietly. “At the end of that Deep Crimson, is there really an enemy waiting for us to defeat it? Will everything really be solved once we defeat it, like the Prophet said?”

“The Prophet has never been wrong,” the Warrior said stubbornly.

After a short stare-down, the Pyromancer nodded: “I understand.”

Three days later, as the group passed through a nameless forest, the Groska woman fell on an open patch of ground by a river.

There was no enemy and no trap. She was burned by her own flames. Magic in a runaway state suddenly surged out of her body, like countless living Evil Spirits tearing her apart and burning her to ash in an instant. Her scream was short. Perhaps her pain only lasted for a heartbeat.

The good news was that the runaway state flames burned very cleanly. There was no need for further handling of her remains. In those ashes, they could not find a single bone fragment larger than a fingernail.

Now, only two people were left in the group.

There was the Templar Knight, even more taciturn than the dead mage had been and growing quieter with every day of the journey, and the Warrior himself, forever wrapped in heavy armor.

After they entered the true wilderness, they still marched in a straight line. They did not need to worry about getting lost. The Deep Crimson of Doomsday always pointed their way.

How long would this march last? Where would it end? What would be waiting there… for those who marched toward Doomsday to face their own fate?

In the eyes of the Warrior who walked on and on, the world under the red light became a little stranger every day.

The time when the Sun rose and set had changed a lot and was shifting further each day. Sunset was no longer in the west, but now lay a clearly visible angle to the north.

The sky was slowly being dyed a strange purple-red. From time to time, eerie lights appeared deep in the clouds. Sometimes, it even seemed as if living shapes moved within those lights.

The distant mountains looked as though they had begun to twist. Cliffs that had once been straight now bent and curled like wet wooden boards. Farther away, the horizon itself seemed to rise, as if the whole land… was undergoing a slight change of shape.

Or perhaps there was something wrong with the eyes of the observer.

And along with these many visible oddities, invisible changes were happening as well.

The Magic in the world was changing in strange ways. Power that had once been hard to sense was now as active as a rushing stream. The mage had once complained that, outside the civilized world, it was hard to gather arcane energy from the air. But now even the morning wind seemed thick with Magic. These energies would build up on the surface of metal armor, causing tiny flashes and sparks, and when enough power gathered, they would release with a sharp little pop.

The Warrior felt that these changes might be a sign that the journey was nearing its end. They were close enough to the place where the red light had fallen. It still looked very far away, but hope… seemed almost in front of them.

Yet at a nameless river, the Templar Knight stopped.

This tall, silent woman took off her helmet and suddenly said: “This is as far as I go.”

The Warrior looked calmly at his last companion: “Why?”

“You aren’t surprised?”

“I only want to know why,” the Warrior said in his usual stubborn tone.

The Templar Knight fell silent for a moment, then took a Cracked Ruby from her tunic and set it on the grass beside her.

“The kingdom is destroyed,” she said. “Fire and lava surged up from the depths of the earth and covered the whole kingdom within one hour. The Prophet’s soul held on until the last moment to witness the final outcome.”

Even as he heard this terrible news, the Warrior still stood quietly where he was, looking straight into the Templar Knight’s eyes.

“This journey has no meaning,” the Templar Knight went on. “From the start, it never had any meaning.”

“The Prophet lied to us,” the Warrior said slowly.

“No. The Prophet lied to the people who stayed in the kingdom,” the Templar Knight said softly. “They needed to believe that the kingdom had sent out its finest to end this catastrophe, just like a hundred years ago when we sealed the Eribus that woke from beneath the ground, and seven hundred years ago when we ended the rule of the Frost giants. The world would be saved by heroes. If one hero was not enough, then you sent an army of heroes.”

“…The Prophet does not make mistakes.”

“Yes,” she said, “just as you said, the Prophet does not make mistakes. So he was the first to know how Doomsday would come.”

The Templar Knight spoke and pointed to the ground beside her.

“Sit. We’ve been walking for a very long time.”

The Warrior did not move.

The Templar Knight did not mind. Her silence along the road finally ended. In this last peaceful dusk, she smiled gently for the first time: “You, and many of us, already understood all of this halfway through the journey.”

“Perhaps only that red-haired Groska woman truly believed in that great destiny—she understood a little only when death finally caught up with her.”

“It might have been better if she never had,” the Templar Knight said with a light shake of her head. Then she stared, surprised, as the Warrior took another step forward. “Where are you going?”

“I am going to keep walking.”

“Why?”

“Aren’t you curious?” The Warrior looked back at her. “After realizing this expedition is meaningless, why do I still keep going? Don’t you want to know the reason?”

The Templar Knight only watched him in silence.

“I want… at least to understand what that truly is,” the Warrior said, looking toward the Deep Crimson in the dusk. “The kingdom is gone. Maybe the whole civilized world is gone. But I still want to walk on… I want to know what is slowly killing the sky and the earth.”

The Templar Knight quietly watched her last companion. She stayed silent for a long time, then finally let out a long sigh.

“You’ll never reach it.”

The Warrior turned his head: “What?”

“That red light did not fall on the earth.”

Under his visor, surprise finally crossed the Warrior’s face.

“When the Prophet’s soul left the earth, he held on for a full hour. In that hour, he stood in a very high place and saw a wider scene. Our world is a sphere floating in endless void. And that light… is larger than the land beneath our feet and farther away than the distant sky.”

The Templar Knight spoke as she bent down and picked up the Cracked Ruby from the grass.

“In the end, he told me that the star scholars’ theories were correct. The relationship between the stars and the land is just as the scholars described: all are stars floating in a vast space. My friend, the Deep Crimson you want to chase is not splitting the land. It is splitting ‘everything’.

“The only thing he could not explain is why we, standing on the earth, always see that light in the same place in the sky. Even though the land beneath us turns and moves like the other stars, the light seems printed right before our eyes, crossing the sky from east to west. So we always thought it had fallen upon the earth…

“That was the Prophet’s last puzzle. Perhaps it will become the last puzzle left to this world.”

The Warrior’s body went still. For some reason, a nameless dread… slowly spread through him.

And so, a very long time ago, in a very distant place, in the last peaceful dusk, one person finally understood the shape of the world beneath his feet —just in time, before Doomsday.

“Take a rest,” the Templar Knight said softly. Before the ever-spreading Deep Crimson covered the sky, this woman who had always seemed so hard and cold spoke gently to someone for the first time. “It’s all over.”

It was all over.

When everything ended, what should one do?

The Warrior stayed silent for a moment, then wordlessly drew the long sword at his waist.

He had once planned to use this sword to defeat the powerful enemy at the place where the red light fell, like the great heroes of legend.

But now, he knew this sword was far too short. It could never reach the stars, much less reach fate.

He and his civilization had not even had time to prepare for fate. A suddenly snuffed-out lamp never knows where the wind comes from.

He raised the blade high, then used all his strength to hurl it into the sky.

In the last instant before the sword left his hand, he seemed to hear a voice in the wind:

“Who are you? Where did you come from?”

The Warrior did not know where the voice came from, or whether it had ever truly existed. In that brief and eternal moment, what rose in his mind was a sentence one of his companions had often whispered in his ear:

“We are marching toward Doomsday.”

Chapter 558: All That They Left Behind

In that final moment, a sharp, icy gleam appeared deep in the boundless void and chaos. The tide of shattered information surged in like a flood and almost drowned the tiny flame that had seeped into the “sample”.

In his brief daze, Duncan heard Shirley beside him cry out: “Careful!”

His drifting awareness overlapped once more with the Mortal Realm. Duncan instinctively stepped half a pace back. The next second, he saw the tip of a sword, flashing with silver light, appear before his eyes.

The tip stopped only ten centimeters from his nose, and it was still slowly extending forward.

“Hostile action!” Ted Riel, who had been staring fixedly at the containment sample, reacted at once. He gave a low shout and quickly slapped the heavy book in his hands. A hazy radiance spilled out from the pages, spread over the surface of the sample, and in an instant condensed and thickened into layer after layer of barriers.

At the same time, Duncan drew back the flame that had seeped into the sample. His mind cleared quickly, and his gaze returned to the “sample” in front of him.

On the containment platform, the lump of iron-gray metal that had been frozen solid suddenly changed shape. Part of its “shell” bulged up in an instant and condensed into something like a sharp sword.

But that suddenly formed “sword” did not pierce anyone. It had only come out halfway when some immense force seemed to yank it back. Even now it was still stretching outward a little at a time. Rather than say it had “stabbed” out, it looked more as if a sword was being slowly “pushed” out of the sample.

At some point, a small conductor’s baton had appeared in Lucretia’s hand. She strode forward two quick steps. While Ted Riel held the sample in check with divine magic, she tapped the baton against the middle of that “long sword”. But just as she was about to destroy that structure further, Duncan suddenly stopped her: “Wait.”

Lucretia forcibly halted the spell she was about to unleash and turned, puzzled, to look at her Father. Ted Riel, who had been about to take the next step, and Nina, who was already almost igniting, also hurriedly stopped and looked over in confusion.

Duncan waved a hand at them. Then he carefully skirted around the still-slowly extending blade and came to the side of the iron-gray “living metal”. He stared fixedly at its “shell”.

It had not truly “come alive”. Only the portion forming the sword blade was changing and stretching outward. The rest of the sample remained as still and frozen as before.

The chaotic, broken information was still swirling in his mind, as if someone had torn a person’s memories into pieces, mixed them together at random, and then dumped them all in front of him at once. Duncan kept sorting through those shattered memories again and again, trying to reassemble them into useful knowledge.

He saw many things—an ominous Deep Crimson, scars that cut across the sky, warriors setting out, companions falling one by one, a world that slowly twisted and rotted, a journey that had no real meaning, vast confusion, anger, fear, the death and calm that followed, and the strange, shifting scenes that kept surfacing amid Mental Derangement.

Duncan suspected that if any other ordinary person saw these things—even only a small part of them—they would be completely consumed by the dangerous knowledge hidden in that information and fall into utter corruption.

But to him, that corrupting “knowledge” was only a pile of chaotic fragments. As he sorted and recalled them again and again, he had already begun to piece them into a continuous memory.

Then he raised his head and looked at the long sword that had already extended more than halfway out. After a slight hesitation, he reached out and touched its surface with a fingertip.

The chill, solid feel of metal came through his fingertip.

Duncan slowly closed his eyes. When he touched the sword, he could feel those shattered memories in his mind become a little clearer and more continuous. They were still incomplete, but they were enough for him to understand what had happened.

He opened his eyes and looked at the last fragment left behind by that distant, ancient world, at the final strike that nameless warrior had launched against Doomsday. He pinched the fragment gently between his fingers, feeling the link it passed to him, and slowly drew it out.

The flame had given this long sword, which had never managed to fly into the sky, a touch of extra strength. At last it came free from the living metal completely.

It was finely made, with a long, slender blade. The hilt was wrapped in fine linen, and bright crystals of unknown use and material were set into the guard. Now, after crossing a span of ages, it had arrived in this Deep Sea era in its original and “correct” form.

Everyone in the room, Ted Riel included, stared wide-eyed at the scene before them. Lucretia finally could not hold back and asked: “Dad, what is this?”

Duncan lowered his head and looked at the Nameless Sword in his hand. After thinking for a long time, he slowly said: “This was a weapon once meant to fight the world’s Doomsday.”

“To fight the world’s Doomsday?” Shirley’s eyes widened at once. “With a sword? Is this one of those artifacts from legends that can split the sea? The kind blessed by the Four Gods?”

Duncan shook his head: “It’s only a sword—the best sword they had. It’s very sharp, but even pushed to its limit, it could only kill larger beasts or armed humans… That was already the best they could do.”

Lucretia and Ted Riel looked at each other, unable to understand. Nina, however, vaguely understood and quickly asked: “What did you see?”

Duncan was still sorting through the messy, broken memories in his mind, but after a brief pause he still broke the silence: “Just some fragments, things that happened a very, very long time ago…”

He described what he had seen, using words as simple as he could.

He did not speak quickly, because there were too many missing pieces and too much information that even he did not fully understand. He had to find a way to fill in the parts that did not connect at all, or to explain concepts that were hard for Nina and the others to grasp.

For the first time, he tried to explain to people of this world what a “planet” was. After his last talk with Alice, he had finally decided to give it a try.

But to explain one strange idea, he needed ten more basic points of knowledge. Every strange point needed even more knowledge to support it. On top of that, there were countless things that were totally against common sense and instinct for people of this world. Even if he explained all of it clearly, no one could truly picture it and piece it together in their mind.

Ted Riel and Lucretia struggled to understand, and the questions they kept throwing out made the explanation take longer and longer. In the end, Duncan realized that if he wanted to explain all the basic concepts clearly, he would need at least half a year of full-time lessons to manage it.

So he could only skim over many things, or use metaphors to patch the gaps in knowledge and ideas for now.

In the end, despite all his effort, Nina and the others clearly could only grasp part of it. But at least this time, they more or less understood what had happened.

Shirley was still lost in the shock of that long “story”. Nina was still thinking about the strange words Duncan had just mentioned. The two scholars present—Lucretia and Ted Riel—had dark, heavy expressions. It was clear they had already thought of many things.

“The world’s Doomsday…” Ted Riel murmured under his breath. “If what you saw really points to a world’s Doomsday, then when did it happen…”

“Before the Great Annihilation,” Duncan confirmed the question the other man had not spoken aloud. Then he raised the sword in his hand. “The black wall that has stood before historians for so long now has a crack in it. This sword… might be the first thing we can confirm that was passed from before the time node of the Great Annihilation into this Deep Sea era.”

“A historic moment… just like that.” Ted Riel let out a long, complicated sigh. Faced with news that could shake the whole academic world, his mind only felt like chaos. A flood of sudden information was battering at the system of knowledge he had built over many years and even at his understanding of this world. In spite of himself, he called in his heart for Rahm's benediction and laid mental wards and suggestions on himself to keep his reason from being damaged.

After a long, silent period of thought, Lucretia suddenly raised her head and met Duncan's eyes: "You mentioned many strange ideas just now. Are those… the things you said before would be hard to explain to me?"

"They're only a small part. A very, very small part," Duncan said quietly. "I should have told you some of this earlier."

Lucretia only shook her head lightly. She did not complain, and she did not ask why her Father was willing to explain these things now. If Father did this, he must have his reasons. When he was ready to speak, he would speak.

She was only a little curious about how her Father knew such unbelievable things.

Did that knowledge… come from Subspace?

On the other side, after a long stretch of thought, Ted Riel suddenly realized something.

"According to what you 'saw', under the influence of that 'red light', the world was swallowed by lava, the land was torn apart, and everyone died… Then how did the Deep Sea era begin?"

He raised his hand and chopped downward with his palm, as if marking a fault in the ground.

"There's a gap here, Captain Duncan. After that world was destroyed and before the Deep Sea era began, there should have been some process of change. The world you saw does not match any race, any place, or any legend in the Deep Sea era…”

“Indeed, it doesn’t match,” Duncan said with a light nod. His gaze fell on the “sample” sitting on the platform. After a long silence, he finally spoke out a guess he had held in his heart for a long time. “So… that world did not pass down much, unlike the worlds of humans, elves, and Senkin. What we see before us is already all that remains of that world.”

“‘That world’…” Ted Riel and Lucretia traded a quick look. In that moment, they finally grasped what Duncan meant.

And in Duncan’s mind, the “Moon” of his homeland rose once more before his inner eye.

Along with it came the words Alice had once said to him with a laugh—

“Captain, is this a riddle?”

The expression on Duncan’s face shifted slightly. The muscles at the corner of his mouth trembled a few times, then finally settled into a smile that Nina and Lucretia could not understand.

“Yes, this really is a riddle…”

He spoke softly, in a voice only he could hear.

Chapter 559: The Lost Ones

All along, the scholars of this world had made many guesses about the origin of the current Deep Sea era and the world before the Great Annihilation. They had also tried to explain the broken histories, gaps in relics, and contradictions in lineages among the city-states of the Boundless Sea—just as any people who form a civilization will do when they face their history.

Where there is history, there will be people who study history. Where there are people who study history, there will be people who try to explain its contradictions. There is never a shortage of guesses. Anything an outsider could think of, professional scholars have most likely already considered and may even have built into a complete theoretical model.

In fact, scholars had many different models that could explain how the Deep Sea era came to be—including the one Duncan had just guessed. Every one of them made sense.

The only problem was that none of those models had any solid “evidence” to stand on. The Great Annihilation was like a towering wall blocking off everything before that time node. No information or relics could pass down from before that node.

Now, Duncan believed he had found a key piece of “physical proof” and had extracted from it enough vital information to support one of those guesses:

Fragments left after a distant, unfamiliar world was destroyed—and a “memory” that accurately described the scene of Doomsday.

Of course, in front of a truly rigorous scholar, this lone piece of proof might still not be enough. It might not yet fully and beyond all doubt explain the state of the Deep Sea era.

“World Aggregation Theory…” Ted Riel murmured to himself. “I know. My mentor has always been a supporter of that theory. He believes that the present Deep Sea era was formed by layers and rearrangements of many worlds that were originally separate from one another. What caused that stacking and rearranging might have been a great disaster that fell on several worlds at the same time. In that view, the so-called ‘Great Annihilation’ was not one disaster, but a series of disasters that happened all at once. That is why the records of history kept by the races of the Boundless Sea contradict each other so much, and why some ancient legends are torn apart…

“This theory also explains why we can’t find the ‘original form of the world’ from before the Great Annihilation, and can’t find ancient relics that clearly support any single record of history—because those original forms have already been reshaped. From the point of view of the timeline, the ‘world’ we live in now simply did not exist before the Great Annihilation.”

He stopped and let out a slow breath, then went on talking.

“The entire Boundless Sea was born in the moment of the Great Annihilation. Before that moment, there was no ‘Old World’ that could be fully and accurately described and understood. There were only countless fragments of old worlds piled up at the time node of the Great Annihilation as raw material. World Aggregation Theory, among all the origin theories, has the strongest power to explain what we face. It almost explains every problem.

“But at the same time, it is seen as the most fanciful and hardest to prove, because it basically denies that ‘history can be traced back’ at all and throws everything into the box of ‘it has already vanished anyway’. So even though the theory is good, it has very few supporters. My mentor… is one of the few.”

After Ted Riel finished, speaking with a sigh, Duncan finally broke the silence: “Now, we have evidence.”

Ted Riel’s gaze fell on the long sword. After thinking it over with a grave expression for a long time, he still shook his head: “One piece of proof alone is not enough. This evidence does seem very likely to support World Aggregation Theory, but a single piece of proof always has flaws. Unless we can find a second clear ‘world fragment’, and one that comes from a different world than the one your ‘physical proof’ belongs to…”

As he spoke, the Truth Keeper’s tone grew tangled and strained. From an emotional point of view, he wanted more than anyone for a long-standing guess to be confirmed and for them to finally find that “answer”. But as a scholar, he had to be strict. Even when he saw the first “evidence”, he had to act with seemingly cold “harshness”.

When he finished speaking, Duncan only gave a calm one-word reply: “We do.”

For a moment, Ted Riel did not react. Even Lucretia did not react. A heartbeat later, they spoke in unison: “You have other evidence?!”

Duncan was silent for two or three seconds. Then he turned and looked into Lucretia’s eyes with a deep gaze: “The Moon.”

“That ‘stone sphere’…” Lucretia understood at once. “You mean, it is…”

“It is another fragment,” Duncan said with a slight nod. “It comes from another world—a world completely different from the homeland of this sword. I don’t know what happened to it to make it what it is now, but I am certain it is…”

He suddenly stopped. It was as if some force was holding him back, not letting him speak that conclusion aloud. That blocking force surged through his mind like a roaring storm, a strong emotion pitted against his rational side.

Instinctively, he rejected that conclusion.

Lucretia sensed something. She looked at her Father with worry and confusion.

At last, Duncan spoke and finished the second half of the sentence: “…it is what remains of that world.”

In the end, reason beat emotion.

When he voiced that conclusion, he even felt a strange sense of “relief”.

In fact, when he first saw “the Moon” and later returned to the Vanished and spoke with Alice, he had already had this guess.

Since “the Moon” had appeared in this world, it was very likely that this world was his “homeland” after it had been twisted and warped beyond recognition.

But his homeland had no elves or Senkin. In the elves’ own legends, there were no humans. In the records of the city-states of the Boundless Sea, there was not even a word like “Earth”. The “torn history” that troubled so many scholars stood out all the more clearly in Duncan’s eyes.

So… how did this Boundless Sea really form?

The most likely answer was this: this place did contain his homeland, but only part of it.

To prove that guess, he only needed to find a second fragment from another world, something like “the Moon”.

He had not expected the second piece of evidence to appear so quickly and so directly.

Ted Riel and Lucretia exchanged a long look. After a brief hesitation, they understood that Duncan had no reason to deceive them in this matter.

So there had already been two pieces of evidence. No wonder this once greatest explorer could speak with such certainty and without doubt when he declared that the world today was a heap of ruins.

Lucretia did not ask where Duncan’s knowledge about “the Moon” came from.

Because she knew all the answers to such questions would in the end point toward Subspace. In one form or another, her Father had remade and transformed himself in that “deepest and darkest place”. Every piece of knowledge and every power he now held that she could not understand was part of those brands.

She should not keep tearing them open.

Ted Riel had been silent and deep in thought this whole time. Suddenly, he jerked his head up, as if he had sensed something.

The Truth Keeper quickly opened the heavy book in his hands and summoned the “stethoscope” from its pages. In one stride, he rushed to the side of the “living metal” on the central platform.

He pressed the stethoscope to the surface of the “living metal”. His face suddenly grew very grave.

A very weak, very slow heartbeat sounded in the room. With each beat, the sound became slower and fainter than before.

“They are dying.”

Ted Riel looked up, his gaze full of mixed feelings, as he spoke.

For the first time in his life, this Truth Keeper—whose duty was to protect the city-states—felt such complex emotions when facing an “alien thing” that had invaded the Mortal Realm.

Because he suddenly realized that this nameless lump, this “terrifying thing” that had frightened so many people in the market… was very likely a being just like humans, elves, and Senkin—a homeless one who had reached the Deep Sea era from the Great Annihilation.

And sadly, their world had been destroyed even more completely. That tiny fragment… was far from enough to keep them and their kind alive.

The Deep Sea era had left no place for homeless ones like them. Under some still-unknown mechanism, they had become what they were now, and they were about to die.

Nina and Shirley grabbed each other’s hands without thinking, not knowing what they could do. Lucretia could only watch with a complex gaze, because she knew this was already beyond what human power could change.

As the heartbeat grew slower and weaker, Duncan finally walked forward. He looked at the “living metal”, which no longer showed any hint of a human form, and another scene rose in his mind—

The stubborn warrior. The silent mage. The hunter and ranger who were always full of energy. The knights brimming with confidence. The pessimistic spirit medium. And that confident, proud, red-haired Groska woman…

They had set out on a bright, sunny afternoon, carrying the best swords and armor their kingdom had forged, the finest scrolls and sigils, and the king’s blessing and trust. Together they had gone toward the distant wilds—just like in the ancient songs, where a band of heroes goes to save their world.

Duncan reached out and gently pressed his hand against the cold, hard “steel”.

“We are all the Lost Ones… Now, you are home.”

The deep, slow “thump” finally faded away. After one last, especially weak and sluggish beat, there was no more heartbeat in the room.

The final heartbeat sounded like a sigh.

Ted Riel turned around, as if announcing to the entire Deep Sea era:

“They are dead.”

Chapter 560: Two Questions

Now that mass of once-living “matter” had completely turned into a solid lump of metal.

To render harmless an anomaly that had already been registered for containment required a very complicated process. But for Ted Riel, a Truth Keeper of the Truth Academy, it was just routine work. He quickly brought in the person in charge of the underground archive and made proper arrangements.

Even though he felt a lot of emotion, and even though the past of that “living metal” had deeply moved him, as the Guardian of the City-State he had to handle this matter strictly according to the safety rules. Even if it really had once been a brave soul who tried to save the world, in this Deep Sea era that being had already become an “extraordinary intrusion” that might spread rot and corruption. What waited for this mass of matter was the high temperature of the steam core reactor boiler, followed by a strict series of purification, cutting, grinding, and sealing.

But from another angle, this was also a kind of burial. Ordinary people in this world went through the same thing. “Bodies” always had to be handled properly. The dead always had to make way for the living.

As for the longsword, it was the only material thing left from “that world” in the end. It had somehow returned to the state it was in when it was first forged. It was clearly a research sample of very high value.

Through it, scholars could build a deeper understanding of that world. Everything there had already vanished, but that understanding and memory still had meaning.

Duncan said: “I have no use for it.” He gladly agreed to Ted Riel’s request, handed the longsword to him, and spoke with some emotion: “Let the clever people uncover more of the secrets behind it. If you discover anything, I hope you can share it with me.”

“Of course,” Ted Riel said as he took the sword from Duncan with great solemnity. After a brief hesitation, he went on: “About what happened today and the information we now hold, I will gather the scholars of the Truth Academy to discuss it. If we run into new questions, we may still need your… help.”

“No problem,” Duncan said at once. He had no objection. He nodded, then pointed at Lucretia beside him: “You can contact me through Lucy. If I think of anything or discover something new, I will have her pass it on.”

There were still many things that needed to be explained and discussed. When the “Horizon Limit” of the Great Annihilation suddenly showed a crack before mortals, it would surely bring a huge shock to the academic world. The Four Gods Church would also pay attention and debate this matter. Whether they wanted to accept it or not, the Vanished and the master of the Vanished had already become an inescapable part of it.

As for Duncan, he did not care much about that. From his point of view, among the many pieces of information they had just obtained, there were still some key and unusual issues that Lucretia and Ted Riel had not noticed and, for now, could not even understand.

For example, the position of that “Deep Crimson” and how it behaved against all common sense.

If the information he had seen in the fragments of memory was real, and if that Templar Knight had not been wrong in his explanation of the Warrior, then the “red radiance” that destroyed the world should have been in outer space. It might have been a huge astronomical phenomenon crossing the galaxy, a band of light set against the background of the Starry Sky.

That raised a problem. A planet rotated. At least from the scenes in those memory fragments, the Warrior’s homeland also had normal sunrises and sunsets, with stars turning in the sky.

So in theory, that red band of light in outer space should have moved across the sky and risen and set with the other stars.

But why did that Deep Crimson always stay in one fixed place in the sky?

The Warrior and his companions had always searched for where the Deep Crimson fell, because in their eyes that red light stayed fixed in a certain spot in the sky. This kept them from noticing that the light had not fallen to the ground at all, but was actually set against the background of the Starry Sky.

That Templar Knight had raised this question at the end too. In a way, it was also the last and greatest “astronomical discovery” their civilization made before it perished.

Duncan guessed that that “light” was no longer just some visible physical object. The Deep Crimson was only the form it showed. Its true nature might already involve “destruction” and “distortion” at the level of the universe’s basic order, even its “rules”.

It might be a tear on a dimensional level, or some deeper and more complex phenomenon.

Yet Ted Riel and Lucretia were still unable to even notice this issue, let alone understand it in the short term. They did not even understand the concept of a planet.

This could only be taken slowly. Even if Duncan wanted to explain it now, it would take a very, very long time.

The second question was: what exactly did the “worlds” in the World Aggregation Theory mean?

Was each “world” a different planet within the same universe, or was each a different universe when seen from a broader view?

Duncan raised his head and glanced at Ted Riel, who was still deep in thought, and at the longsword in Ted’s hand.

The two pieces of evidence, The Moon and the longsword, might support most of the descriptions in the World Aggregation Theory. But they were not enough to determine what “level” those “world fragments” that made up the Boundless Sea actually belonged to. In a broad sense, every planet could be called a world, and every universe could also be called a world.

For Duncan, the difference mattered.

But it was also a problem that the Truth Keeperand the Sea Witch could not understand or even sense right now. Duncan had no idea how he could explain these concepts to them in a short time.

Besides that, the secret of the Deep Crimson glow itself was even more worth attention. This was not the first time Duncan had “seen” that ominous radiance.

It had appeared in the vision of the New Hope’s crash, and in the oil painting in Alice’s mansion.

What on earth was that thing?

Lucretia noticed Duncan’s long silence and the change in his expression as he thought.

She grew a bit worried and asked: “Father, is there still something wrong?”

“…I have many questions and I need to sort them out when we get back,” Duncan said as he pulled himself from his thoughts and gently shook his head. “Let’s go back first. When I have some ideas, I will come to discuss them with you.”

Lucretia still looked worried, but from Duncan’s attitude she realized that these were probably more “problems that were hard to explain to others”.

In these few short days together, this was the first tacit understanding she had rebuilt with her Father.

So she only nodded and did not ask further.

“We should go,” Duncan said as he let out a soft breath. He glanced at Nina and Shirley, who still looked a bit uneasy, then looked at Ted Riel: “Send us back.”

The Truth Keeper nodded and once again summoned that “door” from his book. Then he walked through it together with Duncan and the others, returning to the academy near the Crown District.

“I will make some arrangements when I go back,” Ted Riel said before they parted. He glanced at Nina and Shirley, who stood beside Duncan. “No one will disturb you or your followers as you move around the city, but in return…”

“Don’t worry, we won’t cause any trouble,” Duncan cut him off with a friendly smile. “We are all law-abiding people who care about the city’s public order.”

The Truth Keeperstanding before him clearly froze for a moment.

Even Lucretia, standing to the side, was stunned.

Clearly, neither of them believed it.

But Ted Riel quickly controlled his expression again. He gave a stiff yet polite smile and said: “That would be… for the best.”

Then he paused and added very sincerely: “We should meet again when there is time. You may not remember me, but I still look forward to talking with you, about that… incredible ‘knowledge’.”

Duncan laughed and said: “Not many people dare talk about ‘knowledge’ with me. There are not many as brave as you. All right, then I’ll look forward to it.”

Lucretia looked at her Father, then at the Truth Keeperopposite them.

The witch suddenly felt a bit emotional.

It seemed that teaching was indeed very hard. This Truth Keeper would rather talk with her Father about Subspace than face a graduating class of students…

After a brief farewell, Duncan left the academy facility with Nina and Shirley, together with Lucretia.

They returned to the Witch’s mansion at 99 Crown Street.

“You can arrange things on your own. I’m going upstairs to rest. Unless it’s something special, don’t disturb me.”

After this simple order, Duncan ruffled Nina and Shirley’s hair, then went up the stairs to the second floor.

After a while, Shirley, who had been staring blankly, turned and whispered to Nina: “The Captain is not in a very good mood…”

“I don’t think you can describe it as just good or bad mood…” Nina hesitated, then whispered back with her own thoughts: “Uncle Duncan just has a lot on his mind. But actually, he’s already much better today than in the past few days. He’s not so gloomy, he just seems to have a lot to think about.”

Shirley thought hard for a moment. She carefully glanced at Lucretia, who seemed lost in her own thoughts, then leaned closer to Nina and whispered: “I don’t think I understood the things the Captain talked about.”

“Honestly, I didn’t understand much either,” Nina said, sounding a bit embarrassed. “Maybe only people at Grand Scholar level can figure those things out…”

As soon as she finished, Lucretia suddenly broke her silence beside them: “Don’t worry about it. Even a Grand Scholar cannot fully understand them.”

Nina and Shirley both jumped in fright and stared blankly at the witch.

Lucretia shook her head at them, her expression very serious and stern.

“All of that ‘knowledge’ comes from Subspace,” she said. “My Father just ‘processed’ it so it is not as harmful. But it still is not something an ordinary person can easily understand.”

Chapter 561: Those Who Walk in the Wilderness

Because of the delay that afternoon, it was already close to dusk and time for dinner when Shirley and Nina returned to 99 Crown Street.

In this Elven city, there really were not many things that could be called normal food. But at least normal ingredients were always available. Lucretia's servants prepared a rich dinner for their guests, and Nina and Shirley finally ate food that "humans ought to eat".

But they did not eat this meal with easy hearts.

Everything they had seen and heard in that underground containment facility still left them dizzy even now. There were too many things they did not understand, too many that broke their view of the world: the Great Annihilation, the "black wall" at the start of history, those Doomsdays, those destroyed Old Worlds, and this "New World" born in the Deep Sea era…

For two young ladies who, strictly speaking, were still just "big children", all of this was a bit too complex and far ahead of them.

After they hurried through dinner, Shirley went back to her room. She sat in front of the table, dazing for a while, when she heard the soft clink of chains beside her. Dog poked his head out from the Shadows.

Shirley lowered her head and looked at this "friend" who had almost eaten her once but then raised her from childhood. She asked very seriously: "Did you understand what the Captain said today? About all those pieces of different worlds piled together and turning into the Deep Sea era and so on…”

“I understood part of it,” Dog said. He lay down and gently rubbed his huge skull against Shirley’s knee. “But I didn’t understand the parts that went too far beyond common sense either.”

“I barely understood any of it,” Shirley said honestly. “Of course, I understood the sentences, but asking me to picture how those things actually happened is a bit too hard for my brain. In the end, why do we have to care how this world was born anyway?”

She spoke in confusion. She knew she sounded very shallow, but she never had anything to hide in front of Dog.

“You can live just fine without knowing anything,” she went on. “Anyway, the two of us lived like that for more than ten years…”

Dog suddenly lifted his head. His hollow eye sockets, full of blood-red light, stared straight into Shirley’s eyes. A low, hoarse voice came from his skeletal body: “You can live without knowing anything. But we still have to know that this living is not something we can take for granted. It is like this for an ordinary person, and it is also like this for the world itself.”

Dog’s sudden serious tone startled Shirley. She froze for a moment, then seemed to faintly grasp something and showed a thoughtful look.

“The world will not ‘live’ like this forever,” Dog said. He watched Shirley’s reaction, then laid his head down again and spoke in a muffled tone. “The Great Annihilation could destroy those Old Worlds, so the Deep Sea era we live in now can also be ended by another power. Ordinary people may stay ignorant of this until the day the end arrives. They will greet The End in a long dream of peace, like the people back in that Warrior’s homeland, those citizens waiting in their kingdom for the heroes to return. Their ‘ignorance’ was their greatest divine blessing. For them, not knowing anything is enough to live, because they do not know how close death is.

“But Shirley, we are not the people who stayed in the kingdom—we are on the Vanished.

“You have seen those prophetic visions too. The Black Sun that descended on Pland. The Creator’s Blueprint that fell into a runaway state deep under Frostholm. The Boundless Sea when Vision 001 went dark. And those mumbling cultists… If you were someone ‘living in the kingdom’, you would never come into contact with these things.”

Dog rambled on. He shook his head, carefully hid away his fangs, and nudged Shirley’s knee with the tip of his nose.

“Shirley, you really can live without knowing anything. But now you already know. The Captain is worried about those ominous prophetic visions, and in fact, you are too. You just haven’t noticed it yourself.”

Shirley fell quiet. She sat still in the chair for a long time before reaching out to rest her hand on Dog’s skull. Her voice held a little unease: “Dog, are we people walking in the wilderness… like that Warrior? Are we also trudging toward Doomsday?”

“We walk toward Doomsday, and Doomsday walks toward us. ‘Awareness’ goes both ways,” Dog said. “When we know it exists, there is no difference between the two. The only question is… in what way and at what time it will catch up with us. I think this is also what the Captain is worried about.”

“…Dog, how do you understand this so well? This… feeling?”

The blood-red light in Dog’s eye sockets slowly dimmed and brightened: “Because I once felt something similar. When you were very, very small.”

He lifted his head and looked into Shirley’s eyes.

His voice was very soft, just like many years ago, when he tried to calm a frightened little girl to sleep on a stormy night—

“At the very beginning, you were a little creature I could not understand at all. You were so small, so weak. Your arms looked like thin sticks that could be broken with ease. Even though you had a symbiotic pact with a demon, you seemed so fragile that you could die at any moment…

“Every day, every second, I worried that this ‘death’ would come. I did not understand your breathing. I did not understand your heartbeat. I did not know how humans stayed alive. I only learned that you needed to look for food after you went hungry for several days. As a Abyssal demon, I was not yet used to ‘thinking’ about things back then, and you also… did not talk to me much at that time.

“So I always felt that you might die at any time, anywhere, because of something I still could not understand. Your breathing, your heartbeat, the flow of your blood—these strange ‘phenomena’ were, in my eyes, very fragile ‘temporary balances’. If any link stopped, you would leave me. That is why, when you woke up as a child, you always saw me feeling around and watching by your side. I had to check your breathing and heartbeat, to see whether you had already died.

“That worry is very similar to what the Captain feels now.”

Dog paused for a moment. He raised his head to look toward the second floor, then quickly drew his gaze back.

“I cannot compare myself with the Captain, and I should not guess at his thoughts. But today, in his eyes, I felt that same familiar… worry. This Boundless Sea that looks so vast is, to him, probably like you were to me many years ago—a small and weak ‘strange thing’. He does not know how it survives. He only knows it could die at any time.”

Dog had rambled for a long time and finally grew quiet. But Shirley still stared at him blankly for a long time without making a sound.

“Why aren’t you saying anything?” Dog asked in confusion.

“You never… told me any of this before,” Shirley said, a little dazed. “So when I was little…”

“It’s all in the past,” Dog said softly. “You survived. So all those worries and hardships back then are all ‘past’ now.”

Shirley pressed her lips together. She suddenly lifted her head in some worry and looked toward the second floor: “Dog, do you think… we’ll become like the Warrior and his companions in the story?”

“If I can choose, I don’t want us to be like them,” Dog said, shaking his head. “The Warrior could not stop the world’s Doomsday with just a steel sword. His hard march toward Doomsday was doomed to fail. But since it is the Captain leading us, we clearly have more than just a steel sword. So I am willing to be a bit more hopeful.”

“The Captain…” Shirley sighed. “I don’t even know what the Captain is doing right now… He didn’t even come down for dinner.”

“Are you going to bring him some food later and take a look at him?”

“Uh, better not—Alice will definitely go anyway.”

“That’s true.”

…

Looking out at the strange sky where daylight faded and the light dimmed, yet a faint layer of golden “sunlight” always filled the gaps between the tall buildings, Duncan let out a quiet breath and turned to switch on the room’s electric light.

Although that “sunlight” spreading through the streets gave Lightwind Harbor eternal “illumination”, after Vision 001 fell, the sunlight that spread over from the nearby sea and was blocked layer after layer by buildings could not light up the whole city. Deep inside the city-state, in places where the “sunlight” was blocked by rows of buildings, night could still be seen. There, people still needed the comfort of lamps.

The bright light drove back the gloom seeping in from all sides and seemed to add a bit of warmth to the room.

Outside the window, as Vision 001’s power faded, the pale crack of World’s Wound slowly appeared in the starless, moonless sky.

Its cold, pale glow spread through the night, yet was sliced into pieces by the “sunlight” lingering between the tall buildings. It formed a strange scene that no other city-state could see: World’s Wound and the sunlight appearing at the same time and crossing over each other.

Duncan stared at that gash-like “wound” in the sky, but in his mind he was still recalling the “memory visions” he had seen today.

He thought of that Deep Crimson that stretched across the sky like a huge scar.

What was that red light that spanned outer space and seemed to break the normal rules of physics?

That red light showed up no matter where he looked: in the vision of the New Hope’s crash, in the oil painting in Alice’s mansion, and in the Warrior’s homeland as it neared destruction.

There was no doubt that this red light was what scholars had been desperately searching for—the prime culprit that caused the Great Annihilation events, or at least the first sign of the Great Annihilation.

Letting his gaze rest on World's Wound, which also stretched across the sky, Duncan could not help but form a string of baseless "connections" in his heart—

Every Old World's destruction was accompanied by that huge red light. In the New World's Deep Sea era, the pale World's Wound hung high in the sky… Could there be some link between the two?

Was the World's Wound that shone over the night sky of the Boundless Sea an echo from an Old World's Doomsday? Or the remnant of that destructive power from the time of the Great Annihilation?

Duncan even had a more disturbing guess—

Had that destructive power never faded at all? Had it only gone into some kind of sleep, hanging over the world every night, and the so-called World's Wound was… only the form that "red light" took while it slept?

Could Vision 001's role be to periodically "hypnotize" that Doomsday Deep Crimson?

As this chain of guesses ran through his mind, Duncan's gaze grew more and more grave. Another question he had never thought of before suddenly surfaced in his heart.

In his own homeland, at least in the homeland of his memories… he had never seen that "red light".

Chapter 562: Another Fragment

Now, about that red light, Duncan already had two pieces of information:

First, before the Great Annihilation happened, before Doomsday fell upon those Old Worlds, a Deep Crimson like darkened blood would first appear in the sky. Its true body was projected somewhere deep in space, but the way it spread did not follow normal optical laws. No matter where you stood on the planet, you could see it at a fixed spot in the sky, and that spot did not change with the planet's rotation, as if it was drawn directly into the observer's vision or mind.

Second, that red light did not seem to show any direct destructive power. It was more like a phenomenon or feature that the universe itself produced during the Doomsday stage. It was a sign of collapse, not the collapse itself.

Third, Doomsday did not happen and end in an instant. The whole destruction process lasted for a period of time. As a world moved toward Doomsday, more and more strange phenomena appeared, and the rules kept twisting and mutating, until the underlying laws of the world could no longer bear that distortion. Because of this, the warrior and his companions had a last bit of time to start their journey, and the ship named the New Hope had enough time to lift off and depart.

For Duncan, this third point was especially important.

Doomsday did not happen in an instant. That meant people before Doomsday came had enough time to see that red light appear. Yet in his memory, he had never seen that streak of Deep Crimson.

He had been trapped in that “studio apartment” overnight. Before that, he had not seen any eerie red glow or any supernatural phenomenon, and after that he had not seen anything like it outside the window either…

Studio apartment?

Duncan’s memory suddenly stalled. After a moment, his brows slowly furrowed.

What exactly was that “studio apartment” of his?

All this time, he had thought that beyond the door of The Lost Ones lay his homeland. Outside his studio apartment, somewhere past that thick fog, there were still Earth’s busy crowds and calm, ordinary days. He had only been trapped in one room, separated from home by a single wall. But as the Moon appeared and the World Aggregation Theory kept being proven, that possibility had already dropped close to zero.

If he had had a faint feeling about this before, then now that feeling was clearly confirmed. He knew he could not go back.

But only now did he suddenly think of another question: if the other side of The Lost Ones’ door was not his homeland, then what, in essence, was that “studio apartment” that had been left behind?

Every time he “went back”… where exactly had he been going back to?

Duncan frowned hard. In the pale sunlight spreading outside the window, a long sword suddenly flashed in his mind, as well as that lump of living metal that had once been a “human”…

“Another piece of a world fragment…” He seemed to understand something, but his expression grew even more complicated. “What is the true nature of a world fragment, anyway?”

His thoughts became a mess. Memories and guesses rose and fell in his heart like small overlapping waves. Duncan paced slowly around the room to calm himself and sort his thoughts. Then he went back to the desk, pulled out a sheet of paper at random, and began to doodle on it. He had not meant to write or draw anything. He only traced lines over and over and smeared out shapes.

Then he suddenly stopped.

He looked at what he had drawn on the paper without thinking… a rough sketch of the Moon, outlined by messy strokes.

It was as if he were looking at a homeland that was right in front of him, yet one he could never return to.

Alice had said that if the symbol of home appeared in a place, then that place was home. She was not very clever, yet sometimes she could hit the heart of the problem with the simplest, purest thought. In a way, she had actually been right.

Home was right here, yet it was neither complete nor in the form Duncan knew. It was just a small fragment, and like that “warrior” who had turned into living metal, it had long since become something people could hardly understand.

Duncan unconsciously reached out a finger and touched the “Moon” on the paper, as if asking someone a question. He murmured softly: “Yes, what else could be left…”

The flapping of wings suddenly came from the side and broke Duncan’s daze. The chubby white dove dropped down from the top of a nearby wardrobe. It waddled over in front of Duncan, tilted its head, then lowered it and pecked hard at the Moon drawn on the paper with its beak.

It pecked a hole in the “Moon”, then lifted its head and squawked: “Raising my head, I gaze at the bright moon, raising my head, I gaze at the bright moon, raising my head…”

It suddenly stopped and kept tilting its head to look at Duncan.

Duncan also stared blankly at it. He looked at this dove that for some reason had suddenly “mutated” out of the spirit compass, this silly bird that had inexplicably followed him and was especially obedient and affectionate.

“AI-F, Ai-ee, Ai…” The dove flapped its wings, making loud and strange sounds. “AI-F…”

Duncan’s eyes suddenly widened. He reached out and grabbed AI-F’s body, but then quickly loosened his grip, as if afraid he might crush this small “creature” by accident. His breathing grew fast and his heart pounded. The dove in his palm tilted its head and looked at him with a dull expression.

Duncan finally opened his mouth: “…AI-F?”

The dove nodded. “Coo.”

Duncan hesitated for a moment and changed to a more accurate pronunciation: “…IE?”

The dove nodded quickly. “Coo.”

Duncan drew in a slow breath: “Internet Explorer…?”

The dove yanked out its wings with force and flapped even harder. At that moment it seemed more excited than ever, as if it had countless more excited words it wanted to say.

Yet after beating its wings hard for a long time, all it managed to make was loud, meaningless cooing.

Duncan gently let go and watched the fat dove happily walk back and forth on the desk. From time to time it stopped, tilted its head, and curiously watched its Master. In its little bean-like eyes there always seemed to flicker the light of a broken network connection and a frozen process. After a long time, he finally sighed softly, and a complicated smile appeared on his face.

The answer had been right in front of him from the beginning.

This silly bird was another tiny leftover fragment from his homeland that had suddenly gone dark.

He could not go back. He really could not go back.

Duncan sat quietly in the chair like a stone statue for a long time. He did not move, his face did not change, and he did not make a sound.

After who knew how long, he suddenly seemed to “come back to life”. He blinked, then began to think, or rather, forced himself to keep thinking:

If AI-F really was Internet Explorer, then what exactly was its “source” supposed to be? Those lines of code? The huge mass of data that had built up? The countless pieces of hardware that had once kept Internet Explorer running? Or the abstract idea behind that name?

Or… did it stand for a brief spark in the development of some civilization?

Maybe a world fragment did not have to match some physical object. It might even be a huge concept, a concept drawn out of the existence of the Mortal Realm.

Then did this guess also work the other way around?

Would the real, solid things that had once existed in those Old Worlds stay behind after the Great Annihilation and the coming of the Deep Sea age, only in the form of abstract concepts? Today, on this Boundless Sea, there were countless Anomaly Visions, and countless formless things and forbidden knowledge born around those Anomaly Visions. What… had they once been?

And most crucial of all—what lay behind these changes? What were the true rules at work? What were the true nature of the Great Annihilation, and of that red light?

The new answers brought new questions. One question followed another, and it seemed they would never reach the end of the truth. Duncan felt that his thoughts had already reached a dead end. Until more clues appeared, he could not find any way to keep digging deeper.

Just then, a light knock sounded behind him, cutting off his deeper, heavier thoughts.

Duncan quickly came back to his senses. He felt the presence outside the door, so he let out a slow breath and calmed himself bit by bit: “Come in, Alice.”

The door opened and the doll-like young lady walked in. She held a large tray in her hands. On it was the dinner Duncan had missed.

“Captain,” Alice’s voice carried a hint of worry. “You did not eat dinner.”

For some reason, just seeing Alice’s face, which always seemed so free of any shadow, calmed Duncan’s tangled thoughts a lot.

He showed a small smile: “Thank you. Put it on the table.”

“Oh.” Alice set the tray down, then quickly added, “Do not worry, all of this is very normal food. It is made to suit an ordinary person’s taste. Nina said the ‘traditional dishes’ in this place are not for people to eat at all…”

As she spoke, she looked up again to study Duncan’s expression: “Are you all right?”

“I am fine now.” Duncan let out a long breath. He sorted out the questions he had just figured out, and a smile slowly appeared on his face. “It is true. With so much we have gained, I should be happy.”

“Oh.” Alice half understood and half did not, but she did feel that the captain’s mood had really improved a lot, so she was relieved. “They were a bit worried about you, so they asked me to come up and take a look. As long as you are fine.”

Duncan nodded lightly, but he suddenly felt a bit moved inside.

In this large house, there were indeed many people who were always worried about his “state”, and those worries all came with their own reasons. Perhaps only this doll, who usually looked so simple and silly, worried about him without a single trace of anything mixed in.

If he had to name another, Nina might be one too.

With that feeling in his heart, Duncan smiled and shook his head, then suddenly thought of something else.

“Alice.” He turned his gaze and looked into the doll’s eyes. “I need your help with something.”

Alice did not even think: “Ah? Sure!”

Duncan nodded. He reached into his pocket and took out the brass key he always carried with him.

“Alice, I want to use this key one more time.”

“All right!”

Chapter 563: Another Visit to the Garden

As always, Alice trusted the captain's words without question. She did not even get curious about why Duncan suddenly wanted to use that key again, and happily agreed.

But Duncan still explained it carefully to this doll: "I am going to enter that 'Alice Manor' again to confirm some guesses about the Old World."

Alice nodded hard. She did not really understand what the "Old World" in the captain's mouth was, but she knew it was something very serious.

Because they had already done this once, she quickly found a comfortable, steady place to sit this time. Then she turned around and exposed the Keyhole on her back.

"I actually talked it over with Nina before and asked her to change the back of my clothes to see if she could make a hole around the Keyhole," the doll said happily as she waited for the captain to wind her up. "But she was worried that sand and dust and other things would get into my Keyhole… I think she worries too much. It is not like I roll around on the ground. How would sand get into my Keyhole?"

"Better keep it covered most of the time," Duncan said casually. "No one knows if this delicate structure is fragile. If something gets in and jams it, I would have no idea how to fix it."

“Miss Lucretia might be able to fix it. She was the one who fixed Lunie… But you are right, it is still better to be careful. It took a long time to fix Lunie’s head…”

The silver-haired doll muttered on, talking about these things that would sound far too eerie and strange to other people as if she were chatting about everyday life. Duncan could not help but show a faint smile as he listened. Then he smiled and shook his head, picked up that strange brass key, and, just like last time, carefully inserted it into Alice’s Keyhole.

The familiar click sounded. The key began to turn on its own. Duncan steadied himself a little. In the next second, he felt the light and shadows before his eyes change. His senses quickly shifted and reshaped.

A moment later, he opened his eyes in the dark and let his five senses get used to the change in environment. When the scene before him settled, that strange “garden” under the cartoon sky, lush and green, appeared in front of him once more.

The silver-haired doll who looked exactly like Alice still leaned quietly against the pillar in the center of the garden, sleeping among the vines and thorns. The drawing board in the doll’s hands was also just as before. Its position and shape had not changed at all.

Duncan blinked. He did not rush to move at once. Instead, he carefully checked the surroundings and compared them with the scene in his memory.

Half a minute later, he was sure there was no Anomaly around. Everything stayed the same as when he left. He even had a feeling that while he had been away, time in this “manor” had stopped, and only when he returned did time here start moving again.

…This was likely not an illusion.

Duncan remembered what that strange “headless Butler” had once told him about the special rules of time in Alice Manor, and fell into thought.

After thinking for a moment, he raised his head and looked up at the “sky” above the garden.

The last time he came here, most of his attention had been drawn by the many strange scenes in the manor. His head had been full of questions. His limited focus had been scattered in all directions. So even though the sky over this garden had caught his eye, he had not looked very closely at those eerie cartoon drawings.

This time, he looked very carefully.

Clouds that looked as if they had been drawn with a child’s crayon floated against a pale blue sky. Exaggerated lines of sunlight cut through the clouds. The “Sun” painted in yellow paint was just as he had seen last time, giving off light and warmth and keeping the garden full of life.

It still brimmed with childlike fun, and yet that childlike fun overflowed with weirdness.

Duncan suddenly narrowed his eyes a little.

He studied that yellow Sun closely. This time, he finally noticed a detail he had missed before.

Around that scribbled Sun, there were no rune rings at all!

“No wonder… no wonder I felt something was off last time but could not tell what…”

Duncan muttered, and his expression changed slightly. He finally knew what had made the sky in this strange drawing feel so wrong. It was a normal Sun. The brushstrokes were abstract and simple, but it was without a doubt the Sun he was familiar with.

But it was exactly because he was too used to it that he had failed to notice this obvious Anomaly at a quick glance last time. If natives like Morris or Vanna came here, they would probably feel something was wrong at first sight.

Duncan's brows slowly drew together. Now that he had confirmed that the sky had a normal Sun, it felt as if one corner of the secrets hidden in this "Alice Manor" was being quietly lifted.

On the Boundless Sea, the Sun was an artificial heavenly body with twin rune rings. This was common knowledge. From the start of the Deep Sea era to now, across ten thousand years, this fact had never changed. No one in the world knew what the real Sun looked like. Even those Suntists who claimed to worship the true Sun god only drew a twisted, terrifying Elder God when they preached.

Then who had left this normal Sun, or rather this original Sun, inside Alice Manor?

This doll called "Alice" had only come into being after Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm fell into the Deep Sea. So why did the depths of Alice Manor, which was linked to her, record the image of the Sun from before the Great Annihilation?

And if he also thought about what the World Aggregation Theory guessed about the Great Annihilation, that the Deep Sea age had been piled up and reshaped from the remains of countless Old Worlds, then this original Sun recorded in Alice Manor… should belong to which Old World?

Did it stand for some star in some Old World? Or was it only an abstract symbol?

For some reason, what came to Duncan's mind at that moment was that plump dove.

He frowned deeply and shook his head, over and over trying to rearrange the tangled information in his mind. Suddenly another clue rose to the surface of his thoughts.

Alice’s birth.

Her appearance had indeed been copied from Queen Ray Nora of Frostholm. But her original body, the spirit coffin, had also been a flawed replica of the “Alice Guillotine”. Facts had proven that for the maker of Anomaly 099, the source and process of the copy itself did not matter. Whether it was a great human being or a hard block of wood, it was only the first raw material. The one that truly mattered was the maker itself.

It was the faulty replica of the Abyssal Lord that had created Anomaly 099.

Then could he think of it this way: this so-called “Alice Manor” was also a creation of the faulty replica of the Abyssal Lord. And if he took it further, even a faulty replica of the Abyssal Lord should still hold a great amount of information from the original body. Then some things in this Alice Manor might trace their source all the way back to that Elder God who remained in the Abyssal Deep seas.

Duncan lifted his head and once more carefully studied that abstract, simple Sun, along with the clouds and sunlight around it.

…Were these doodle-like images part of the memories the Abyssal Lord had let slip by accident, or some kind of message it was consciously sending out?

The more Duncan thought about it, the more he felt this was very likely. There was one point that was beyond doubt:

The real form of the original Sun had only existed at time nodes before the Great Annihilation. The secrets of this Alice Manor should also go back to before that time. From all he knew so far, only the Four Gods and those strange, mysterious Elder Gods in the deep layers of the world might know something about the world before the Great Annihilation.

Duncan's heart stirred. He lowered his head and saw the drawing board in the doll's hands.

After a brief pause, he bent down and carefully moved around the thorns, then slowly drew the drawing board out of the doll's hands.

On the front of the drawing board, the eerie whirlpool, twisted stars, and ominous dark red light were still painted there. On the back, along the frame, the familiar words were still carved:

"…The messenger brought news from afar. The chosen clan picked up the lost Ancient Star and forged it into a crown of divine blessing—the third Long Night came to an end."

The chosen clan picked up the lost Ancient Star and forged it into a crown of divine blessing.

Duncan's gaze stayed on this line for a long time.

It was describing how the ancient Critt clan, under the guidance of the Crawling King, had built Vision 001 and raised it into the sky.

When he had first entered this garden and seen these words, he had not been able to understand what the line meant.

But now he suddenly understood.

He thought of that ten meter wide Moon, a "piece" that had fallen off the rune rings of Vision 001.

The rune rings that bound the Sun could be seen as a shining crown.

And that Moon, twisted and compressed by some unknown force… naturally fit the description of a lost Ancient Star.

Some faint sounds suddenly came from the depths of the garden and startled Duncan out of his thoughts.

He jerked his head up and looked toward the source of the sound.

There were only lush plants over there. Between the thick bushes and the shade of the short trees lay dim shadows.

But Duncan was sure he really had heard something.

This was the deepest part of Alice Manor. According to the headless Butler, even the high-ranking servants of the manor did not have the right to step in here as they pleased. Only Mistress Alice and the one called the “Gardener” could come here, but that Gardener seemed to have stopped appearing a long time ago.

Intruders? Or had that Gardener come back?

Duncan slowly furrowed his brow. He slipped the drawing board back into the doll’s arms and carefully walked toward that patch of thick bushes.

“Rustle… rustle…”

The faint sounds came again from some shadow.

Suddenly, something flickered at the edge of his vision.

A streak of shadow, like a slick and eerie tentacle, was sliding and wriggling through the darkness at the edge of the garden!

Chapter 564: A Quick and Hasty Exchange

In the deepest part of Alice’s Mansion, at the edge of this eerie garden, in the shadows between the lush bushes and low trees, twisted tendrils crawled and wandered, as if covered in fine metallic scales.

The faint rustling sound came again from another direction. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw another dark tendril, a limb like some kind of soft-bodied creature, slide through the gaps in the shrubs. It shook the branches, rubbed against the rough soil, and made a soft, scratching sound.

That faint rustling almost sounded like a call.

Duncan instantly spread out his senses, carefully watching for any movement in the garden. At the same time he locked onto the direction where one of the tendrils had just vanished and walked that way.

Behind him, under his feet, pale green spirit form flames spread with his steps, leaving a faint path of fire. The flames quietly seeped along the cracks in the ground, bit by bit reaching deeper into the garden.

This was “Alice’s Mansion”, very likely a crucial part of Alice’s “soul”. Duncan would not casually set such a place on fire. But now something strange had appeared deep in the garden, and he had to prepare some countermeasures. If some dangerous thing had really invaded this garden, he needed a way to deal with the intruders without damaging the mansion itself.

With wary thoughts turning in his mind, Duncan followed the rustling and slowly reached a place far from the “sleeping doll”, at the edge of the mansion’s garden. After he passed several shrubs and a few small unknown trees, he noticed the light around him had dimmed. The glow from the “scribbled Sun” in the sky seemed unable to reach this far. Under the cover of the plants, the gloom was like dusk.

In this dusk-like light, he saw a clump of plants in front of him suddenly shake. Then a tendril slowly lifted from within and swayed gently before his eyes.

There was no hiding, no tricks. This tendril seemed to have invited Duncan here on purpose, and now it showed itself openly.

Duncan stared in surprise at this bizarre “limb”-

The tendril was dark in color. Its surface had fine patterns that looked like tiny metal scales. Between the rough, complicated ridges he could faintly see pale blue lines. Those lines felt very familiar to him, as if…

As if they were the markings on the surface of that Elder Gods tendril under Frostholm, in the depths of the Deep Sea.

A limb of the Abyssal Lord?!

Duncan’s heart gave a sudden jolt as he realized where that sense of familiarity came from. At the very moment he thought of the “Abyssal Lord”, the blindly swaying tendril in midair suddenly shivered, as if some vast and distant will had finally connected to this piece of flesh.

It bent toward Duncan. With a strange, low hum, the end of the tendril slowly opened. From within, an “eyeball” like an irregular crystal appeared, shining with a cold blue light, and it fixed a gaze on Duncan’s eyes.

A deep, murky voice suddenly sounded, without any trace of emotion or gender. It was as if it rang directly inside his mind.

The voice said: “Hello, Flame Usurper. I have something to say to you.”

Duncan jumped in shock. He frowned tightly and stared at the tendril in front of him: “Abyssal Lord? The Crawling King? LH-01?”

“All of them. But now listen to me,” the tendril trembled, as if already bearing a load far beyond its limit. The voice it carried grew quickly deeper and distorted. It sped up its speech: “My chance to communicate with you is extremely limited. I will only pass on the necessary information now. Whether you can understand it or not, remember this:

“The designed lifespan of ?#%?# is only eight thousand years. Now it is running in overload. We have not received the signal from outside &*%? within the time limit…

“This is the final Cycle Reset. After this cycle, ?*??# will not regenerate.

“Preserve the fallen ?#& fragments. If nothing can be undone, use them to extend the lifespan of each Node city as much as possible. Stay alive. Survival is the First Directive.

“We do not know what you can do, but you woke at the Cycle’s End. That must mean something.

“We firmly believe that you, and we, are not alone.

“The necessary information has been delivered. If there is a chance, I hope to… speak with you face to face… under more stable conditions…”

The trembling of the tendril quickly weakened. A pale, dying color began to spread over its fine, metallic scales. Duncan could clearly feel the voice in his mind pulling away and fading. He did not understand the exact principle or process, but it was obvious that the Elder God called the “Abyssal Lord” had slipped through some loophole, or used some outside power, to force a link with him – and now this very limited connection was about to break.

Duncan had no time to be curious or to think deeply about the flood of information. By sheer reason, he chose to quickly force himself to remember everything first. Only after the other side finished talking would he have time to turn his mind and think about what he had just heard.

The first thing he noticed was those few “noises”. When this Elder God spoke to him, several key pieces of information – clearly important nouns – had turned into sharp, chaotic sounds in his ears.

It was as if the “meaning” in those syllables had been filtered out by something, or as if the sense those syllables carried lay beyond what this communication could hold, so it could not be delivered to his ears at all.

But this was clearly not the time to dig into those “noises”.

The Elder God’s whisper was about to fade. Only the last thin thread of its connection with him remained. Duncan looked up and saw cracks spreading all over the tendril’s surface. It might only last a few more seconds.

He made up his mind in an instant and used the last of the time to ask: “If I want to find you, how do I go to the Abyssal Deep in the Deep Sea?”

Going to the Abyssal Deep in the Deep Sea and speaking with the being face to face was without doubt the simplest and most effective way to solve all his questions.

The Elder God’s tendril was already growing stiff. Faded fragments fell from it like dust. The powerful, unspeakable will was slowly withdrawing from this fragile vessel. Yet before its link with the Mortal Realm fully broke, it still did its best to hold on to that last bit of connection and sent one final low murmur into Duncan’s mind –

“I do not know.”

Duncan: “…?”

He finally understood how the people around him felt when a single sentence from him crashed their brains.

He really had not expected the Abyssal Lord to give him such an answer!

But he only froze for a moment before another faint, low whisper sounded in his mind –

“Try catching a few Annihilators…”

“Huh?” Duncan did not react at once. “Aren’t they your believers?”

But no voice answered his question. The Elder God’s murmurs to him finally broke off completely. With a series of cracking sounds, the tendril that had borne too much power collapsed at last. It turned into dust and fragments that fell to the ground, then rose as thin blue smoke and faded away.

The rustling sounds around the edge of the mansion garden also stopped at the same time. The unnatural gloom under the trees faded with them.

Duncan stood quietly before the bushes for a while longer. Only after several minutes passed did he frown, shake his head, and pull himself out of his thoughts.

Everything that had just happened still felt like a dream. An Elder God called the “Abyssal Lord” had simply appeared right in front of him, rattled off a pile of things at high speed, and then left just as fast. Forget Lightwind Harbor – something like that would shake the entire Boundless Sea.

Yet when it happened to him… it somehow did not feel that shocking?

Duncan turned and looked back at the lush “mansion garden” not far away under the daylight, and at the silver-haired doll sleeping quietly in the sunlight clearing at its center.

Anomaly 099, born from the Abyssal Lord's "copy" ability, and "Alice's Mansion", which was tightly bound to Alice – when it came down to it, this whole "mansion" already had countless ties to that Elder God in the Abyssal Deep of the Deep Sea. It was even very likely that the Elder God had shaped it on purpose as a vessel to send information outward.

So it was not unimaginable to see a projection of the Abyssal Lord's power in the deepest part of this garden.

Duncan was thinking about something else –

The Abyssal Lord's attitude, or rather its "state", did not seem quite like he had expected. It still kept its reason, though it seemed to be under some extreme restriction. Its attitude was friendly, not the pure urge to destroy that people imagined.

But these "differences" did not mean much to Duncan. After all, very few people in this world had truly come into contact with the so-called "Elder Gods". Information built on imagination was never reliable. On top of that, different people might see very different faces of an Elder God. The friendly, harmless good Neighbor in his own eyes would still look a bit unspeakable to an ordinary person. After living in this world for so long, Duncan at least had that much self-awareness.

What mattered most was still the "information" that Elder God had given him.

Duncan replayed those words over and over in his mind. They seemed to carry an enormous amount of meaning.

Some thing had been designed to last only eight thousand years, and now it was running in overload.

The "we" the Abyssal Lord spoke of seemed to have been waiting all this time for a signal to return from somewhere, but it had still not received that reply.

It had also mentioned a Cycle Reset… what did that mean?

He, this “Flame Usurper”, had awakened at the Cycle’s End – what did that mean?

And then there was preserving the fallen fragments, using them to extend the life of the Node cities…

As he pondered, Duncan’s expression grew more and more serious.

Chapter 565: The Foreign Object

For Duncan, the easiest part to guess in the rush of information from the Abyssal Lord was actually the very first line – that something designed to last only eight thousand years was now running in overload.

The first thing that came to his mind was the Sun, now hanging high above the Boundless Sea yet already showing constant faults, even starting to drop parts. That was the first Vision, built in the Ancient Kingdom Era of Critt by the Critt clan under the lead of the Abyssal Lord.

The Sun had been running for ten thousand years. If its original designed lifespan had really been only eight thousand… then its current unsettling state now had an explanation.

From there, the thought spread further. The Abyssal Lord had also mentioned that “they” had been waiting, within this limit, for a signal sent back from “somewhere”, but it had still not arrived. Who did this “they” refer to? And this “somewhere” – that short burst of noise – what place did it name?

“We did not receive the signal from outside &*%? within the time limit…”

Duncan recalled the exact words he had heard from that Elder God and, together with the description in The Blasphemous Tome, he could boldly guess that the “we” it spoke of meant the ancient Elder Kings – that is, the old ones that included today’s four True Gods, as well as the other Elder Gods and lost deities. This single piece of information alone was enough to overturn the world.

The four True Gods and the “evil Elder Gods” recognized by the world were all waiting together for something, even sharing a common goal. If the Vanna of back then heard this, she would probably leap out swinging on the spot.

But what Duncan cared more about was the second half of that sentence: “the signal from outside &*%?”… what exactly was that short burst of noise?

If he connected it to the earlier fact that Vision 001 – the Sun – had also turned into a short burst of noise in the Abyssal Lord’s mouth, could he take it that this short noise here also stood for something similar in nature and rank to Vision 001? Or that there was some important similarity between them?

What were the traits of Vision 001? Its age? That it was a creation of an Elder God of extremely high mystery? Its vast scale that could affect the entire world? Its suspected link to the “Black Sun”? Or…

That some of its “parts” contained key structures from the Old World, such as those “Lost Stars”…

Then could the short noise inside “the signal from outside &*%?” also be related to the Old World?

Duncan raised a hand and gently rubbed his slightly aching forehead. Then he stopped and looked thoughtfully at his own hands.

Flame Usurper… this was not the first time he had heard “someone” call him that.

That “Black Sun” had called him this, and now the “Abyssal Lord” did the same. Their biggest common point was their rank as Elder Gods – that is, both were members of the ancient Elder Kings.

But from the Abyssal Lord's attitude, it seemed it only knew the name or concept of "Flame Usurper" and not its exact abilities or nature. The only useful detail it had revealed was that the Flame Usurper had awakened at the "Cycle's End"…

Then what about the other ancient Elder Kings? The Storm Goddess, the Everburning Ember, the God of Wisdom… these deities that still kept close ties with the mortal world – would they know more?

Duncan shook his head and sighed softly with a helpless look.

It was one thing for this world to be full of mysteries, but he himself was just as wrapped in them. What was worse, those "Elder Gods" and "True Gods" knew even more about it than he did, which was naturally frustrating. Even more frustrating was that their "network" was bad – getting in touch with them was purely a matter of luck…

As for what this so-called "Cycle's End" was supposed to be, Duncan had no clue at all and no energy left to think about it.

He strolled along the path at the edge of the garden and returned to the abrupt stone pillar. There he stood quietly, casting his gaze at the silver-haired doll sleeping in the brambles.

Whether the Abyssal Lord had built this Alice's Mansion, or whether the mansion had come first and the Lord later used it to form a link with the Mortal Realm, one thing was beyond doubt: the doll sleeping here and the "Alice" in the Mortal Realm were inseparable.

Duncan walked to the side of the sleeping doll and took out the clockwork key he carried with him. As long as he wound this key on the doll, he could return to the Mortal Realm.

But at that moment, a new idea rose in his mind.

Duncan quietly put the key away and turned to walk toward the gate at the garden's exit.

Following the route in his memory, he passed through the dense, gloomy trees and flowerbeds and came again to the garden gate with its gorgeous stained glass and intricate wrought-iron patterns.

The gate was half open. From the direction of the mansion hall he could faintly hear voices, footsteps, and the soft, broken music of a ball that seemed to never end.

He pushed the door open. The long, shadowy corridor beyond was empty.

But as soon as Duncan stepped into the corridor, the ghostly, headless Butler suddenly came into view – as if the headless Butler had been standing there in the shadows a few meters away from the start.

"Ah, the Guest holding the key," the Butler came up warmly, a muffled, deep voice sounding from his chest. "Have you greeted the Mistress?"

Duncan glanced at this frightening headless corpse and asked: "Have you been watching me?"

"I am only always waiting for the Guest's call – and you were only gone for a short while, so I have been waiting here," the headless Butler bent slightly, his tone as polite and proper as ever. "May I ask what you require next?"

Only gone for a short while?

Duncan frowned a little and remembered the strange idea of "time" in the mansion that the Butler had mentioned last time.

So that meant… just as no matter how long he spent in this mansion, only a moment passed when he returned to the Mortal Realm, no matter how long he moved around in the Mortal Realm after leaving here, it was also only a moment for the servants in the mansion?

This mansion did not simply have time frozen. Its timeline ran independently of the Mortal Realm?

What kind of process lay behind that?

A flood of questions rose again in his heart, but Duncan's face did not change. He only nodded slightly to the Butler in front of him and casually asked: "During this 'short while' I was gone, has anything changed in the mansion?"

"Everything is as always, Guest," the Butler answered at once. "The mansion rarely changes. From the time I first had memory, it has always looked like this."

Duncan gave a quiet "mm" and then asked, as if in passing: "Before me, did any other Guest ever enter that garden?"

"Other Guests?" The Butler seemed puzzled for a moment, then quickly replied: "Of course not. You know this: only the Mistress and the Gardener may enter the garden area. Aside from them, it is open only to a Guest holding the key. Why do you suddenly ask?"

Duncan did not answer him. Instead, he asked at once: "That 'Gardener' you mentioned – what does he look like?"

"The Gardener… no one knows what the Gardener looks like," the Butler grew more and more hesitant. It seemed he had never answered such "detailed questions" for anyone before, so each step of his thinking became slower and harder. "The Gardener stopped appearing a long time ago. When the garden no longer needed pruning, he returned to the place where he should be… The Gardener is different from the ordinary servants. His task is to make sure the environment is comfortable when the Mistress rests and that she is not disturbed. Beyond that, he does not need to be responsible for anything in the mansion, and he does not need… to speak with me…”

“It seems that even you, ‘the Butler’, do not know much about this mansion,” Duncan said calmly, casting his gaze on the “headless corpse” before him. “Then have you heard this name?”

“A name? Please speak.”

“The Abyssal Lord, the Crawling King, LH-01 – he may go by any of these three names. Have you heard of him?”

The Butler fell silent for a few seconds, as if thinking carefully.

Then an apologetic answer came from his chest: “I am sorry, Guest. I have no impression.”

The Butler’s tone was very sincere.

Duncan could not read any expression from a body without a head. The posture of this headless corpse was as precise as a machine and revealed no emotional change at all, so he could only choose to believe the answer for now.

“All right. Thank you for your answer.”

The headless Butler bent slightly: “I hope that was of help to you…”

He suddenly stopped. As if hearing some urgent sound, he straightened up at once and turned in another direction.

Almost at the same time, Duncan felt a change in the mood of the mansion. A sense of tension and panic seemed to suddenly spread through the air, and in the empty corridor countless hurried footsteps and whispers rang out at once!

He turned at once to the headless Butler: “What has happened?”

“A foreign object has invaded, Guest. Please excuse me,” the Butler said quickly, then turned and walked toward the other end of the corridor, looking unusually rushed.

A foreign object had invaded?

Duncan froze for a second at the phrase. Before he could react, the Butler had already walked off on his own. Seeing this, Duncan hesitated for a moment, then hurried to follow.

The Butler walked quickly ahead, turning slightly as if to glance at the Guest following behind, but making no move to stop him.

Seeing this, Duncan relaxed and hurried after the Butler, passing through the corridor, up the stairs from the first floor, and into the second-floor hallway that led to the “bedrooms”.

Countless hazy servants emerged from the air. Headless footmen and maids had already gathered in the hallway. These “lost souls” who lived in Alice’s Mansion whispered to each other, their voices a low buzz with no clear words, while a very real sense of unease filled the air.

Duncan already knew this route. He remembered that the end of this passage had once been the bedroom where the soul of Ray Nora, Queen of Frostholm, had slept. But now that the Queen’s soul had escaped, that room had been “torn” away from the main body of the mansion. At the end of the corridor there should be only a Great Hollow leading into an endless, dim space.

“Make way, make way! Do not touch the invading foreign object!” The Butler’s voice came from ahead as he walked forward, driving back the gathered footmen and maids. At this moment he showed some of the authority of the mansion’s administrator. “Where is the foreign object?”

The gathered servants all drew back, leaving an open space in the front part of the corridor.

Duncan looked over the headless Butler’s shoulder and finally saw the “foreign object” that had made the entire mansion so tense.

His expression froze at once.

It was a small bag of trash.

It looked very familiar.

Chapter 566: Foreign Object and Cleaner

It was a small bag of trash—a black trash bag, its mouth tied in a tight knot. On the side of the bag there was a tiny scuffed tear, and through that tear he could see a crushed paper cup.

Duncan stared blankly at that small, familiar bag of trash. For a moment his mind held nothing but confusion and endless questions. He had indeed guessed that the Great Hollow that had appeared inside Alice's mansion might change one day. When he heard the headless Butler mention a "foreign object intrusion" just now, he had also wondered what kind of strange and unspeakable thing might have entered the mansion. But this scene before his eyes… he had really never imagined it.

That bag of trash was the one he had thrown away—not long ago, after he vaguely realized that the barrier between him and his homeland might already be an uncrossable gulf. After he had carefully cleaned his little studio apartment, he had gathered up that bag of trash and thrown it into the black fog outside the door.

Now it appeared on the inner side of the Great Hollow inside Alice's mansion, in the form of an "intruding foreign object."

With a complicated and subtle feeling, Duncan took a step forward and walked toward that "intruding object."

At the end of the corridor, the huge Great Hollow left behind by the vanished room looked like a strange and terrifying abyss. The floor and walls around the rim of the void were shattered, like twisted, jagged teeth. That black bag sat at the very edge of the broken floor. To be honest… Duncan even found the whole scene a little absurd.

Yet the servants in the mansion were extremely tense. The terrifying headless Butler even lost his composure a little when he saw Duncan walk forward and cried out: “Guest! Please do not go near there! It is very dangerous!”

“Dangerous?” Duncan did not even know what kind of expression he should make. He looked back at the Butler, the corner of his mouth twitching. “It is just a quiet pile of… discarded waste.”

Even so, the Butler and the servants still stood at least ten meters away as if facing a great enemy. Their buzzing, rumbling whispers were full of panic and fear. Although none of them had heads, Duncan still felt as if he could sense their confused, chaotic gaze—wanting to peek, yet shrinking away again and again because of fear.

It was as if… what they saw was not a harmless black bag, but some far more terrifying, far more unspeakable thing.

“Gue… Guest…” The headless Butler suddenly spoke, his voice low and trembling. “Do not be fooled by appearances. Please slowly keep your distance from it and move this way toward me. Be careful. Do not awaken these growing shadows…”

[Growing shadows?]

Duncan slightly frowned at once, as if confirming the guess that had just flashed through his mind for a moment—these servants were seeing something else?

He turned back and looked at that black bag at the edge of the broken floor.

In a certain instant, he saw the black plastic bag suddenly… “flicker.”

It was like the image on a monitor with a bad connection, or like a thin veil suddenly covered its surface. Duncan saw it flicker for a moment, and in that very brief change of light and shadow, it seemed… to turn into something else.

Duncan watched it with a calm gaze, as if waiting for it to change again. Then, the second flicker appeared.

This time, he caught the image that flashed by.

He saw a mass of swelling and shrinking shadows covering the floor not far away. The edges of the shadows trembled and shook, spreading out like countless sharp thorns. Some black substance was surging and seeping out from the center of the shadows. Countless eyes hid there, and countless mouths and tongues as well.

Yet as soon as he focused and looked carefully, that thing would immediately turn back into an ordinary pile of “discarded waste.” The eerie scene he glimpsed in that moment felt like nothing more than an illusion clinging to the shallow layers of his mind.

Duncan silently kept his gaze on the scene. Many guesses slowly settled in his heart. After an unknown time, he suddenly turned his head and asked the Butler: “Has there been a ‘foreign object intrusion’ here before?”

His voice sounded hoarse for no reason.

“Occasionally,” the Butler answered at once. “The mansion is closed off, but for some reason there are always things from ‘outside’ that connect to here. They… often bring great trouble.”

“‘Great trouble’?” Duncan frowned.

“Yes… Foreign objects do not belong to the mansion. To this place, they are like a disease. The invading matter causes some parts of the mansion to decay or twist, and it often takes a long time to recover…”

Duncan listened in silence, thought for a moment, then asked: “Then how do you deal with these foreign objects?”

“The mansion will ‘digest’ them on its own,” the Butler answered. “You only need to wait patiently nearby. The Cleaner should appear soon and should be able to properly handle the intruding foreign object.”

“The Cleaner?” Duncan’s tone held doubt.

“It is a part of the mansion, the oldest part. It is responsible for removing destructive ‘entities’ from the mansion. After that, the mansion will slowly return to the state it had before the intrusion… Ah, it has appeared, Guest, look—”

The Butler suddenly raised his arm and pointed at the floor not far away.

A mass of sludge-like stuff had appeared there at some unknown time and was slowly wriggling and spreading.

That “sludge” was dark in color, yet it had a metallic sheen. Its surface seemed mixed with countless crystal grains that, with each slow wriggle, endlessly refracted tiny points of light like starlight. It wriggled and spread, and as if it had a mind of its own, it slowly drew closer to the intruding “foreign object.”

Part of its edge deformed, stretching out into a tentacle-like extension. It used that structure to reach forward and probe, then slowly “covered” itself over that mass of growing shadows.

Duncan did not interrupt the process. He only stared hard at the scene, not letting a single detail slip.

The “waste” itself had no value to him. The key was why the waste had appeared here, the strange phenomena he had just observed, and the secrets hidden inside the mansion.

For him, the crucial piece of information had already appeared the moment he saw that small bag of trash inside the mansion.

The devouring was silent. The soft-bodied creature called the “Cleaner” soon completely covered the small bag of trash. In Duncan’s senses, he faintly felt that… something had vanished into that soft-bodied creature with its metallic sheen and tiny points of light.

The servants around them finally seemed to breathe out in relief.

But in the next second, Duncan saw the soft-bodied creature that had finished its devouring slowly turn its “body.” The edge of it rose and fell, and a bulging part that looked like a head was now firmly pointing this way.

The corridor instantly fell into tense silence. All the servants went rigid and quiet.

The Cleaner wriggled over. Under Duncan’s gaze, it approached like a mass of living sludge, seeming slow yet somehow fast.

He felt neither goodwill nor hostility from it.

Duncan slowly tensed up. ghostly green flame was already faintly flowing between his fingers. He stayed wary of this thing called the “Cleaner” and quickly thought about how he should deal with this mass of sludge and get out of here if it attacked, while damaging Alice’s mansion as little as possible.

However, the Cleaner stopped about two meters in front of him.

The mass of sludge stopped in front of Duncan. The soft structures that had spread around it slowly drew back bit by bit. It seemed to be carefully observing something. Duncan did not know if it was just his imagination…

He even felt as if he saw a confused emotion on a lump of “soft mud” that looked like a slime.

It had reason. It was trying to observe and understand the uninvited guest before it—but it could not.

It was as if the stranger's existence had already gone beyond some "built-in logic" of the mansion.

After a moment, the Cleaner seemed to break out of some kind of "dead loop." It suddenly shifted its attention away from Duncan, then turned as if nothing had happened and slowly wriggled toward a dark corner not far away.

Duncan blinked and stared at this scene in confusion. After a long moment, he turned his head to look at the Butler. "What does that mean? This 'Cleaner' does not welcome me?"

"This… I have not seen this either," the Butler said, sounding rather confused himself. "It is the first time I have seen the Cleaner have any extra activity after finishing its cleaning. Under normal conditions, it never lingers after it completes its work…"

Duncan frowned but did not ask further. Instead he turned and walked to the broken edge of the corridor, to the place where the Cleaner had just carried out its 'cleaning task.'

That small bag of "trash" had completely vanished. After undergoing strange and mysterious changes, it had been broken down and devoured by an equally strange and mysterious power, leaving not a single trace behind.

However, how had it come here?

Duncan stood on a broken floor tile at the edge of the corridor and leaned forward, looking out into the boundless darkness beyond.

For a moment, he even felt as if he were about to see his own "little room" out in that darkness—that it might be floating not far away, wrapped in a mass of fog, just like… all those countless other Old World fragments in this world.

But he saw nothing. At the end of the corridor there was only endless darkness. The Great Hollow inside Alice's mansion did not seem to lead anywhere.

The pull of emotion almost made him step out into the void to search that darkness for so-called answers, but at the last moment, reason pulled him back.

He instinctively felt danger in that endless darkness. His intuition told him that it was not yet time—that he still could not return safely from that darkness.

"Guest?"

The voice of the headless Butler came from behind, cutting off Duncan's wild thoughts.

Duncan let out a soft breath and stepped back, returning to the relatively safe corridor.

"I should leave," he said softly. "Take me back to the garden."

In the Mortal Realm, Duncan suddenly blinked. His senses rushed back, and he fully woke up within two seconds.

Alice was still sitting properly in front of him.

In the Mortal Realm, only an instant had passed.

Chapter 567: veil of night Visions

Duncan rubbed his slightly sore forehead. As he put away The key, he recalled his experiences in the “mansion,” the message that the tentacle of that Elder God in the garden had passed to him, and the “intruding foreign object” that had appeared beside the hollow inside the mansion.

Alice soon noticed the captain’s “return.” As she pulled her clothes back down over her back, she turned her head curiously: “Captain, you’re back! Did you find the answers you wanted?”

“I got more information, but only more questions,” Duncan sighed softly. Looking at Alice’s always carefree, bright expression, he put away the chaos in his mind for now and let a small smile appear on his face. “But I have made a lot of progress—at least I have a new goal for the near future.”

Alice tilted her head a little: “A new goal?”

Duncan thought for a moment, then spoke in a calm tone: “First, we will catch a few Annihilators and see.”

Why had the “trash” he threw out of his studio apartment drifted to Alice’s mansion? Why had those things turned into growing shadows in the eyes of the mansion’s servants? What had really happened to the missing gardener in the mansion? What was the true nature of the Cleaner? For now, there were no answers to this chain of questions, and there was no good way to break through in the short term. But in another direction, the suggestion that the Abyssal Lord had given him was worth a try.

As for the state of Vision 001, the meaning behind those brief bursts of noise, the ancient Elder Kings, the truth of the Great Annihilation and the several Long Nights, and the meaning of the so?called cycle and the End… The Elder God that lurked in the Abyssal Deep Sea, clearly knew many secrets about all of this, and It was willing to reveal them to him, the one who carried the Flame Usurper.

So finding a way to build a connection with the Abyssal Deep Sea, had become the only clear path for now, just as the Abyssal Lord had personally suggested—to try catching a few Annihilators.

Still, whenever he thought of this "suggestion," Duncan could not help but feel a bit strange inside…

Alice did not think that much. She was simply happy that the captain had a new plan again. Even though she did not understand why, her face still showed eager expectation: "Okay, okay! Then when are we going to catch them? And where are we going to catch them?"

"…cultists are not jellyfish in the sea that you can just grab," Duncan rubbed his forehead. "Rest for today. Tomorrow I will talk this over properly with Vanna and Morris."

"…Oh," Alice nodded, but then another question popped up: "What is a jellyfish?"

"It is something that lives in… probably lives in the sea," the muscles in Duncan's face twitched as he gave this very odd explanation. "It looks half transparent. Some are poisonous, and some can be eaten."

"They can be eaten?" Duncan had only explained it offhand, but Alice's eyes lit up at once. "Then do they taste good?"

Duncan's face looked strange: "…You do not even have a digestive system. Why do you care about that?"

“I can cook them for you!” Alice said happily. “Captain, when we have time in the future, let’s go catch jellyfish together!”

He could feel the topic sliding into something strange, and he almost could not keep his expression under control. He hurriedly waved his hand to brush it off: “Alright, alright, I promise you. If we get the chance, we will catch some to eat…”

And so Alice left, happy and satisfied.

Duncan let out a gentle breath, shook his head with a touch of helplessness, and strolled to the window.

Judging by the time, veil of night had already descended now—Vision 001 had sunk below the sea’s surface several hours ago, and its power had faded from the world. The “rift” of the World’s Wound had appeared again in the sky, looking down coldly over the whole city.

But at the same time, there was still “sunlight” in the sky—that sunlight came from the “glowing geometric body” on the sea near the city-state. After its radiance spread out and was blocked again and again by the city’s buildings, only scattered beams that swept across the sky remained by the time they reached this area near the city center. Like light and shadow cast by blinds, those uneven beams swept over the high sky above the city, forming an eerie “view” that looked like some twisted form of dusk.

Under the “cutting” of that sunlight, the World’s Wound in the sky also appeared broken by light and shadow. It no longer stretched across the sky in one unbroken line, because wherever the sunlight swept, the World’s Wound became invisible. Only in the places that the sunlight could not reach could one see those pale, cold cracks, split into separate segments in the sky.

Duncan suddenly furrowed his brow. He realized a detail he had overlooked before and began to watch that thought?provoking “spectacle” in the sky with growing curiosity.

The glowing geometric body that had fallen onto the sea could not possibly project its light all the way up to where the World’s Wound lay—that high in the sky. Lucretia and the Scholars of Lightwind Harbor had already measured its range of light. It could more or less cover one city-state and part of the surrounding sea, but it could not reach the sky.

Yet what he saw now was that wherever the “beams of sunlight” swept across the sky above the city, the World’s Wound became invisible.

So… sunlight was actually not acting directly on the World’s Wound, but on the eyes of the “observers”?

The true role of Vision 001, the Sun, was not to suppress the World’s Wound, but to use some kind of covering or filtering method so that the world’s intelligent beings “could not perceive the World’s Wound” at all?!

Faintly, Duncan suddenly felt as if he had brushed against a key mechanism of Vision 001.

However, just as Duncan was about to follow this line of thought further, a strange sight that suddenly appeared at the edge of his vision broke his train of thought.

He immediately stepped forward, pushed open the window, leaned out, and looked toward a certain direction outside.

That was another street right next to the Crown Street district—he still clearly remembered that there were rows of rooftops and tall buildings there, and a distinctive spire that stood at the deepest part of the district.

Yet now, a lush forest shrouded in dusk appeared in his view.

Towering giant trees had suddenly risen from the city. The district's original buildings and spire had, at some unknown time, turned into the shapes of a forest. There were also high, arching structures that looked like huge vines spreading out from the forest, and some of them had even extended into the area of Crown Street!

Under the crisscrossing light of the "sunlight" and the World's Wound, those dark-colored vines crept and grew along the streets. They twined around the buildings by the road, climbed up the walls and high façades bit by bit, and wrapped around the streetlamps by the sidewalk, like tentacles stretching out from a nightmare, slowly stabbing into the Mortal Realm…

Duncan blinked and found that the "abnormality" in his field of view was still there. Under the crossing light of the sunlight and the World's Wound, it even seemed a bit more real than before.

Yet the city was still silent. Neither the distant districts nor the buildings right before his eyes that had already been wrapped in vines made a sound.

It seemed that no one had noticed this vast abnormality, even though a few nearby houses still had their lights on, showing that until just a moment ago there had clearly been people awake and moving about inside.

Duncan pulled his gaze back from the window, turned, and walked quickly toward the door. Before he could open it, hurried footsteps already sounded in the corridor outside, and the door was pushed open with a bang.

Alice, who had left just a short while ago, rushed back in. Panic was written clearly on her face: "Cap… Captain! Outside! Did you see outside…"

"I saw it," Duncan cut off the doll, who was so nervous she was stuttering. "It may be some kind of otherworld or illusion that covers a huge area, but it has not affected our house yet. Do not panic. Go call everyone together. We need to figure out what is happening."

Hearing this, Alice finally calmed down a little and nodded quickly. As she turned to leave the room, she spoke in a rush: “Oh… oh, right! Wait here. I will go look for the others!”

The doll left at a trot and soon vanished down the corridor outside. Duncan turned his head and looked again at the “strange scene” on the street outside.

The “forest” that covered a large part of the district was still there, lush under veil of night and as thick as shadows rising up. But the vines that had spread from the forest seemed to have stopped growing—many vines of different thicknesses had halted at the edge of Crown Street, with no sign of stretching further this way.

But that was only what he could see from here. He had no way of knowing what things looked like on the other side of that “forest.”

Just as Duncan began to worry whether other parts of the city had also changed, Alice’s hurried footsteps sounded again in the corridor, and her panicked voice reached his ears at the same time: “Captain, captain, captain! The… the others are all gone!”

This time Duncan finally froze: “All the others are gone?”

“Not a trace,” Alice ran over quickly, nodding in a hurry. She even clutched her head as if afraid it might fall off. “I just went to Nina and Shirley’s rooms. They were both gone. Miss Lucretia was gone too. No one answered when I knocked on the other doors. In the living room there were only those clockwork-driven servants—they were all standing still and not moving at all. It was so scary!”

Duncan’s gaze turned serious at once, but he still took a moment to calm the nervous Alice first. Only then did he narrow his eyes slightly and slowly spread out his senses.

He searched for the Marks on Vanna, Morris, and the others, trying to confirm their condition.

The Marks still existed, but their state… was very strange.

“Let us go downstairs and take a look,” Duncan opened his eyes, then beckoned to the cabinet beside him. The AI, who had been dozing on top of the cabinet, fluttered down onto his shoulder. Only then did he nod to Alice: “Stay close to me. Do not run around.”

Alice nodded at once: “O… okay, Captain!”

Chapter 568: A Large-Scale Otherworld?

The living room on the first floor was utterly silent, as quiet as the whole street outside. Everything still looked the way it had at nightfall, and the puppets and tin-man servants powered by clockwork and magic mechanisms stood quietly in every corner. It seemed that right up to the second before the “abnormality” appeared, they had still been carrying out their programmed cleaning orders.

Duncan led a very nervous Alice down the stairs. His gaze swept over the silent living room in the dim light. Their footsteps echoed in the dead stillness, making everything feel even more eerie.

Alice carefully clutched the captain’s clothes with one hand while turning her head to look to the side. A puppet shaped like a maid stood not far away, one hand resting on the stair rail. A moment ago this puppet had seemed to be polishing the banister. She still kept her upper body slightly bent forward, with a bucket at her feet. But like the other servants, she had gone still, and the ticking and gear-grinding sounds inside her no longer came.

Alice kept feeling that the puppet would suddenly turn its eyes toward her, just like in so many horror stories. The thought made her heart jump into her throat.

“So scary…” she muttered behind the captain. “There are dolls everywhere… They were fine in the daytime, but now they suddenly all stopped moving, it’s really scary… But if they suddenly started moving again, that would be even scarier…”

Duncan silently turned his head and gave this silly doll a very strange look.

However, Alice did not notice at all, and did not feel she had said anything wrong.

Duncan shook his head and turned his attention back to the marks he had left on Morris, Vanna, and the others.

Those marks still shone in his senses, but their state was extremely strange. Sometimes he felt that the marks were clearly inside this house, even right beside him. The next second, they would suddenly appear very far away, like on the other side of the city-state. It was as if they were randomly teleporting.

This was the first time Duncan had seen anything like this.

He tried again to call to those distant marks directly in the spiritual world, to contact Nina and the others through them. But since he could never pin down the marks’ exact position and state, each attempt failed. At best he got a faint and meaningless “response” for a moment. That too was something he had never encountered before.

The good news was that he seemed to be slowly grasping the pattern of the marks’ strange state. Even if he could not locate them exactly, after some time to adjust he should still be able to link to them accurately. And on the other hand, as long as the marks were still there, he could be sure that the people carrying them were at least not in mortal danger, so there was no need to panic yet.

Duncan walked forward slowly while sensing and getting used to the distant marks’ condition. Just then, a faint clicking sound suddenly rang out in the living room, cutting off his and Alice’s movements at once.

Duncan snapped his head around toward the source of the sound.

The puppet maid that had been standing by the stair rail began to move bit by bit in the dark. Like a long-rusted machine, she stiffly turned her head. Her lifeless eyes slowly searched the living room for something.

For a moment Alice felt as if her head was going to pop off from fright: “Waaah! It really started moving!”

Duncan finally could not hold back: “You are a living doll yourself, so why are you scared of this?”

Alice froze for a second before she finally reacted: “Ah… right?”

Duncan ignored the embarrassing simpleton and turned his gaze to the puppet maid that was moving so stiffly. He looked especially calm, because from that puppet he already sensed a suddenly descended, familiar aura.

“Lucy? Is that you?” he asked, testing.

“Ah, you really are nearby…” The puppet finally focused her gaze accurately on Duncan. She worked her jaw, and a stiff, distorted voice came out: “But I still can’t see you. The quality of this temporary ‘medium’ is just awful. I really shouldn’t have skimped when I bought the housework doll. Long story short, how are things on your side? I sensed your call several times just now, but it always cut off instantly before I could answer…”

“Everything is fine here. It’s just that the house is completely empty and all of you are gone,” Duncan said at once. He briefly described the current situation on the street. “…That’s it. In short, from where I stand it looks like something went wrong on your side, while Alice and I were not affected.”

“It does seem that way,” after a few seconds’ delay, Lucretia’s voice came again from the puppet maid’s mouth. “The ones in trouble are probably us. You are still in the Mortal Realm, only seeing the Anomaly that has appeared in the Mortal Realm. We… seem to have been dragged into the ‘inside’ of this Anomaly.”

“Are the others with you?” Duncan asked at once.

“No, it’s just me here. It looks like we have been scattered all over the place.”

“What’s around you?” Duncan asked again.

“Around me? Trees, vines, green that stretches out of sight. A forest,” Lucretia answered. “It looks very much like the forest we saw before in Taran Ael’s dream, but the atmosphere feels… not quite the same.”

…

The forest was shrouded in a dusk-like light. A strange, slightly gloomy sense of chaos seemed to wrap the whole world. The sunlight that filtered down through the layers of leaves between the crowns was dim and heavy, unable to dispel the gloom among the dense trees.

From far away there came now and then the cries of birds and beasts, or the sound of branches snapping. Other than that there were no obvious oddities, yet Lucretia, standing there, felt as if she could smell a strange… tension in the forest air.

It felt as if something was about to happen here.

She gripped a short wand in one hand, a wand that looked like a conductor’s baton. At the same time she maintained her link with a certain puppet she had made herself, and through it she reported to her distant Father what was happening here: “…There is a tense feeling all through the forest. It is oppressive and even carries an invisible fear. Yes, it is an emotion. As a witch, I can sense the ‘emotions’ drifting in the air. This place looks very similar to that dream of Taran Ael’s, but the sky has no invading

Sun spawn, and it seems there is something else deep in the forest… I am heading in that direction.

“The street blocks? I can’t see them from here. Everywhere within my sight is trees. The view is limited in this dense forest, but I’m sure it covers far more than one or two blocks. The range of this ‘otherworld’ is very large. What you see ‘over there’ should only be a small portion of it leaking into the Mortal Realm.”

Lucretia suddenly stopped. She listened carefully to the voice from far away, then nodded lightly a moment later: “Yes, I also suspect this is still that ‘dream’ – the one those Annihilators called the ‘Nameless One’s Dream’. But things are different from last time. Last time we entered the Nameless One’s Dream by using Taran Ael as a stepping stone. The information you got from those cultists said the same: to enter this dream, you must use an elf’s mind as a bridge. But this time everything happened so suddenly and strangely…”

She paused, then raised her wand and lightly tapped a vine in front of her. The vine immediately came to life, squirming as it grew forward and stretched out like a bridge across a deep gully ahead.

Lucretia walked forward along this vine bridge and went on: “…I still haven’t found that ‘bridge’, haven’t found who the Dreamer is. But according to the rules of dreams, I should already be very close to the Dreamer right now.”

She suddenly stopped.

Rustling footsteps appeared nearby. The sound came very abruptly, as if there had been no one there a second before, and then a person had just appeared out of thin air, stepping on dead branches and fallen leaves as they walked this way.

Lucretia focused at once. Before she even turned around she cast several protective spells on herself. Then she gripped her wand with one hand and looked toward the source of the sound.

But what appeared before her was neither a cultist invading the dream nor a twisted entity born from the dream.

A strange elf woman stood in the shade of a tree not far away, staring over with surprise and caution.

Lucretia's first thought was of the Dreamer who served as the "bridge" in this dream. But soon she realized what felt off about the strange elf in the distance. The woman wore a suit of light armor whose style did not match any city-state or era Lucretia knew. Pale-gold hair fell over her shoulders, braided with strange strands that glowed faint blue. In her hands she held a peculiar weapon like a mix of a spear and a poleaxe. Lucretia had never seen such gear in Lightwind Harbor, or anywhere else in the world.

While Lucretia was still in a daze, the elf woman with the long-handled weapon had already spoken in a stern, wary voice:

"Did you not receive the order to evacuate? Why are you still outside the Wall of Silence?"

Lucretia narrowed her eyes a little.

The situation… seemed to have become delicate.

…

Between the buildings, the "sunlight" and the cold glow from the World's Wound crossed and mingled. In this eerie night that belonged only to Lightwind Harbor, Duncan and Alice hurried across the street.

Alice was holding a puppet's head in her arms. Its mouth kept opening and closing.

Lucretia’s voice came from the puppet head’s mouth, reporting the latest progress “over there”:

“I’m moving together with this strange elf who suddenly appeared. She seems completely unaware that I’m not the same race as she is, and she lowered her guard very quickly… We’re heading for a place called the ‘Wall of Silence’…”

This scene was as strange as it could possibly be. A living doll was running in the veil of night, clutching another doll’s head in her arms. That head kept talking, its voice hoarse and distorted by its material. If any normal, sane person saw this, their sanity would probably drop on the spot.

However, Alice felt nothing odd about it at all.

She jogged along behind Duncan, and her expression even looked a little happy.

She was probably used to running around with a head in her arms… used to holding her own, so holding someone else’s was no different.

Chapter 569: Another Place in the Forest

In the forest shrouded in dusk-like light, Lucretia followed behind the elf woman with the strange long-handled weapon, trekking deeper and deeper into the dense woods.

The woman moved very fast. Even in a forest that was rugged and uneven, with vines everywhere and no paths at all, her footsteps were like she was running along a wide, smooth road. This extreme adaptation to the forest and her special way of moving made one think of some “classical arts” mentioned in ancient elf legends. In those stories, elves also lived in vast realms filled with forests. They could leap and move through the trees like a light wind, instead of being like modern elves, who had already forgotten many skills of living with nature in their high-rise city-states.

Lucretia of course could not keep up with such a pace. She knew that even without trying.

The young witch always refused outdoor activities. Even when she had to go out, she traveled using all kinds of spells. So the first time the elf woman left her behind, she decisively activated Phantom Wind, now and then turning herself into scattering scraps of paper to slip through the trees and keep up with the other’s speed. Father was not here anyway.

Her only worry was how the strange elf who had appeared in this “dream” would react after seeing all this. But in fact the other woman had no reaction at all when she saw Lucretia’s odd spells. Just like at the very beginning, this elf had not realized that the “uninvited guest” before her was human. She simply invited Lucretia along as if she were one of her own kind, and wanted to take her to that place called the “Wall of Silence”.

Seeing this, vague guesses formed in Lucretia’s heart. So she intentionally did some even more obvious and out-of-place things to test her idea. She would simply stop now and then and use magic to cause quite a commotion, such as suddenly summoning huge flowering vines or making small explosions in the air.

The elf still showed no anomalous reaction. At most, when Lucretia deliberately slowed things down, she would stop and wait patiently for her to catch up.

Lucretia stopped her “tests” for the moment and focused on following the other woman. At the same time she controlled the distant puppet medium in her mind and described her situation to Duncan:

“Based on my tests, this elf is definitely not the Dreamer of this dream. She should be a ‘product’ of the dream, or one of its components. Her perception and behavior patterns are clearly limited. It looks like a kind of ‘Normalization Filter’. The anomalies of outsiders are being ‘normalized’ in her eyes. This normalization is probably meant to keep the dream stable.

“I haven’t done any more intense ‘tests’, so I don’t know the upper limit of this ‘normalization’. In theory, if my actions go too far, it might reset this elf’s perception, or it might cause a stronger ‘rejection’ from the dreamscape itself… I need to keep investigating right now, so I can’t take that risk…

“Ah, you’ve already entered the block where the ‘mutation’ happened? That’s great. Then I hope you can find the Dreamer from the Mortal Realm side. Once you lock onto the source of the dream, you should be able to intervene here directly as usual…”

“By the way, what’s your name?”

A voice suddenly came from ahead, cutting off Lucretia’s mental conversation with the distant side. The witch stopped at once and looked up.

The elf young lady with the poleaxe and the strange blue-glowing strands woven through her blond hair had turned her head and was looking over curiously.

“You can call me Lucretia,” Lucretia answered calmly. “Why did you suddenly decide to ask my name?”

“If one more person knows your name, that might be one more person who remembers you,” the elf said seriously from not far away. “My name is Celine. You need to remember it.”

Lucretia noticed the worry and tension in the other’s eyes.

Along the way, she had sensed this same worry in the strange elf more than once. The tense atmosphere had also filled the whole forest from the very start, like the “base color” of this dream itself.

After a slight hesitation, Lucretia asked: “What happened?”

Celine opened her mouth but could not get any words out, as if she did not know where to start, or felt that some things should not be told casually to an ordinary person. In the end she only shook her head lightly: “Don’t worry. Atlantis will protect us. Everything will be all right… Hurry up. It’s no longer safe outside the Wall of Silence. corruption could appear outside the wall at any time. Meeting a ranger like me is your good luck.”

corruption. Lucretia immediately noticed this special word and silently wrote it down in her mind. Then she followed Celine’s wind-like steps again, trekking toward the depths of the seemingly endless forest.

…

“Dog, do you hear anything?”

In the dark, endless, overgrown forest, Shirley suddenly frowned. She bent over to hide behind a clump of bushes while she watched her surroundings with care, and quietly asked Dog, who was hiding in the shadows.

Dog’s voice went straight into her mind: “The wind, the trees, the calls of birds I don’t know. On the surface, it’s all normal sound. But the mood is very strange, and it’s only been getting stranger. I don’t know how to describe it. It’s like… the environment itself is changing. The trees around us are no longer trees, but something that is slowly starting to show malice…”

Goosebumps rose all over Shirley. Her eyes showed her nerves as she looked around at the towering trees whose species she did not know. One of her arms was already slowly transforming, taking on traits of a Abyssal demon: “Dog, you’re kind of scaring me here. This place is nothing but trees everywhere, damn it…”

“You’re the one who asked me to say it. I’m just telling you what I ‘feel’,” Dog replied in a muffled tone. “I suggest you take it seriously. A Abyssal Hound’s senses are always sharp. This forest is slowly becoming wrong.”

“Even an idiot can tell this place is messed up…”

Shirley muttered under her breath and carefully left the bushes where she had just been hiding. She did not know what was changing here, but her instincts told her it was best not to stay in one place for too long.

As far as her eyes could see, there were plants everywhere. The dense, gloomy jungle was something a young lady who had been born and raised in the cramped, crowded Slum Quarter could never have imagined. Only recently had she heard about such places from the captain and the others in their conversations. She had not expected that just taking a little nap would bring her here as well. If she was not mistaken, this should be the “Nameless One’s Dream” that the captain and Lucretia had both mentioned.

Feeling the creepy atmosphere around her, a hint of regret suddenly showed on Shirley’s face: “Maybe I shouldn’t have taken a nap while I was doing homework…”

“I don’t think your entering this weird ‘otherworld’ has anything to do with whether you took a nap while doing homework,” Dog’s shape slowly emerged from the shadows, condensing out of drifting smoke and dust. He paced beside Shirley, watching all around them, and kept grumbling: “But you’re not wrong about the rest. You really shouldn’t nap while doing homework.”

“It’s just that my head hurts every time I do math,” Shirley muttered, as if she wanted to talk about something ordinary to distract herself from the eerie mood here. “And I already know a lot of basic words. Why do I still have to learn math…”

Dog listened quietly beside her. He seemed to want to stay silent, but after a few seconds he still started nagging like always: “You still need to learn some math, even if it’s just for your own sake…”

Shirley pressed her lips together and could not help muttering: “Dog, why do you want me to learn these things so much… You seem more motivated than the captain…”

Dog did not speak for a while. When Shirley was almost ready to forget the topic, he suddenly said: “Do you still remember those seventy-two pesos?”

Shirley froze for a moment. After a while she slowly widened her eyes, as if she finally remembered something from a faded childhood memory.

A slightly complicated look came over her face. She spoke in a low, embarrassed voice: “You… still remember that. It was so long ago…”

“I’ll never forget. Some bastard, worth a thousand cuts, used a few pieces of paper scribbled with nonsense to cheat a child out of several days of pay from crawling through chimneys at the factory. If I had known how to read back then, you wouldn’t have gone hungry those days. If you had known how to read, you wouldn’t have had to crawl into those dark, dangerous chimneys at all. Being an apprentice in the pump room, copying down numbers, would have been better than that.”

Shirley fell silent.

After a long time she spoke again in a small voice: “But you can read now. You don’t just read. You can even keep up with Nina’s study pace…”

“What if I can’t stay with you forever?” Dog muttered.

Shirley was taken aback, at a loss for words for a moment. Then she spoke without thinking: “Then the captain…”

“The captain can’t protect you forever either. He’s a good man and he takes good care of you now, but Subspace is always unfathomable,” Dog said, shaking his head. “Shirley, you have to rely on yourself.”

Shirley lowered her head. After a few seconds she gently shook the chain linked to her arm: “Dog, what did you mean just now, when you said you might not be able to stay with me?”

“…Don’t think too much. I was just giving an example,” Dog sighed from deep in his throat. “I have no plans to leave you. It’s just that even I can’t be sure about the future. After all… I have a ‘heart’, and there has never been a Abyssal demon with a heart in this world before. No one knows what changes will happen to me. Maybe this ‘humanity’ will give me a lifespan limit like you humans. Maybe my reason will slowly wear away as the years go by. Maybe one day my ‘heart’ will just vanish again…”

“Dog,” Shirley suddenly cut him off. She stared wide-eyed and yanked hard on the chain in her hand. “You… stop talking.”

“All right, I’ll stop.”

Chapter 570: corruption and the Uninvited Guest

Shirley did not know if it was just her imagination, but ever since they entered this twisted, bizarre “forest”, Dog had seemed a bit sentimental. It sighed over many things and kept recalling old stories it had not mentioned in a long time. There were things even Shirley herself no longer remembered, yet Dog still remembered them clearly.

After hesitating for a moment, Shirley decided to say what she felt.

“Sentimental? Me?” Dog froze for a moment when it heard her, then grew puzzled. “Really? I’ve been sighing and reminiscing the whole time?”

“Yeah,” Shirley nodded again and again. “Normally you only bring up old stories once in a while, like some nagging old aunt, or lecture me with a string of reasons. But you’ve never been this… sentimental. It makes me feel weird and uncomfortable when I hear it.”

Dog slowly came to a stop. It finally faintly sensed the weak influence it was under. After thinking for a moment, it tilted its head. Its hollow, frightening eye sockets swept across the gloomy woods, the bloody glow within them slowly flickering.

“The forest is affecting us… it’s some kind of emotion,” it said in a deep voice. “A heavy, oppressive ‘mood’ lingers over the whole forest. It makes me brood and drift into wild thoughts, as if… as if I were submerged in a vast mind and being constantly disturbed by it…”

Shirley widened her eyes in alarm. “Huh… huh? You mean this forest is… thinking?! You’ve already been affected by it? Is it serious?”

Dog shook its head from side to side. “No, it isn’t really the forest. It’s this dream… Don’t forget its name, the Nameless One’s Dream. A dream is something made by a mind in the first place… But don’t worry, it’s not serious. The influence doesn’t seem targeted. It’s just passive interference from the environment. Shirley, are you all right?”

“I’m fine,” Shirley said, pointing at herself, though her face looked a little confused. “Yeah, if even you got affected, how come nothing happened to me… Maybe it’s because I don’t think too much about things?”

“If only it were that simple,” Dog muttered under its breath. “Don’t let your guard down. The subtle changes are the most dangerous. The more you feel fine, the easier it is for something to go wrong. If you suddenly feel low, or nervous and panicky, you must tell me at once.”

“Mm,” Shirley nodded quickly. Then she frowned, looking uneasily at the forest that seemed to stretch on forever. She spoke in a low voice. “Say… when do you think the Captain will find us? We can’t be unlucky enough to stay trapped here forever, right?”

“No, that won’t happen. Don’t overthink it,” Dog said at once. “Didn’t you already feel that faint call in your heart just now? That means the Captain already knows what’s going on. He must be trying to find a way. We just have to keep ourselves safe for now.”

“Oh.”

Shirley answered honestly, but just then, a strange sound came from not far away. It was a thick, sticky noise, like something was slowly melting and oozing down, and it cut off her talk with Dog.

The chilling sound made Shirley's hair stand on end at once. She yanked hard on the black chain beside her. "Dog! This time you heard—"

"I heard it. It's close. Something is—"

Dog spoke quickly and had already turned its head toward the direction of the strange noise. Almost at the same time, a scene beyond understanding appeared in its and Shirley's sight—

A patch of shrubs suddenly began to grow wildly. Large masses of pitch-black matter gushed out from between the thick leaves, and in the blink of an eye they formed countless limbs that flailed and writhed in the air. At the ends of those limbs, fine cracks opened up, like dense rows of eyes.

The towering giant tree beside them, on the other hand, seemed to "melt" as it toppled with a string of strange noises. Its thick trunk flowed down like sludge. The canopy that had once blocked out the sky lost its support, yet instead of falling, it slowly grew toward the heavens. In a twisted shimmer like unreal flames, it was stretched and warped into countless pale, drifting flakes.

The ground heaved, as if it had suddenly turned into a layer of soft, sticky skin, as if something terrible was crawling through the soil and about to break out…

The next second, all kinds of terrifying sounds burst out. Illusory crackling, the wet squelch of things writhing, and hissing full of noise filled every direction in an instant. The mutated trees spread in the blink of an eye to every place they could see. Everything before their eyes seemed to suddenly come alive, and in its mad, twisted growth it took on the shape of the deep layers of a nightmare!

Everything was mutating. Everything was warping. Everything was pushing against the edge of sense and reason. Right before Shirley and Dog, the dream surged. Dark, malicious things finally crawled out of the earth.

They were flowing shadows, and in those shadows lay shapes and things that could not be described in words. It was as if countless eyes and rows of fangs were piled up in that writhing, surging sludge. Shirley only took one look at them, and at once realized there was only one thing she should do.

“Run!”

She only had time to shout this once. Before the words even fell, she had already turned and darted off, running toward a direction that still looked relatively “stable”. The rough forest ground rolled and bucked under her feet. Every step she took felt as if she were stepping on cotton, or on the skin of some soft-bodied creature. The touch that came back was disgusting and terrifying.

The body strengthened by her symbiotic pact with the Abyssal demons burst out its full power at that moment. She felt she had never run this fast in her life!

The fierce black chain went taut in an instant. Shirley yanked Dog straight up into the air, and it bobbed up and down above the ground as she ran.

Shirley kept dragging Dog as she sprinted through the forest, trying to escape. But after she had run for a while, she found the time to look back and saw that the surging nightmare was still chasing them. So she raised her voice and shouted again: “Switch!”

Before the word even finished, she swung the chain in her hand forward with all her strength and flung Dog straight ahead—

Before it landed, Dog had already adjusted its posture. It hit the ground on all four paws, steady and firm, and without any pause it used the force of that throw to keep on sprinting forward.

Now it was Shirley’s turn to fly through the air.

Even after several relays like this, the ever-mutating, twisted, nightmare "forest" still chased behind them, like a nightmare shadow they could never shake off.

It even gave Shirley a terrifying illusion, as if the whole forest had come alive with raging malice and had decided to swallow her and Dog whole, hunting them from every direction.

But luckily, just when she felt she really could not escape, the "nightmare" that had been chasing and spreading behind them suddenly slowed down.

Just as suddenly as it had begun, the forest's twisted corruption stopped without any warning—

Still dragging Dog, Shirley ran on for dozens more meters before she finally realized it. She skidded to a stop in a mess beside a fallen giant tree, then turned her head. She stared wide-eyed at the distant dark corruption that had stopped spreading, panting hard as she said: "Dog… huh… it stopped over there…"

Dog's huge body, driven by inertia, whistled past her and crashed headfirst into a nearby pile of boulders.

After a thunderous boom, Dog struggled out of the rocks, shaking its head as it shouted: "What?!"

"Ah…" Shirley glanced at Dog in embarrassment, then pointed at the dark, twisted area in the distance that had stopped spreading. "It suddenly stopped over there."

"Hold on a second…" Dog muttered. It ran to the side of the rocks, opened its mouth, and retched: "Bleh—"

With the sound of foul, corrosive stuff eating into dirt and stone, the dizzy Abyssal Hound finally finished throwing up. Then it shook its head, slowly walked back to Shirley's side, and looked up at the place where the horrible corruption had stopped.

A sharp "boundary" now lay across the forest. On this side of the line, the plants were still lush and full of life. On the other side, however, everything had become a chilling, unspeakable place filled with strange, twisted shadows and writhing matter.

Countless living vines and flowing shadows that had crawled out of the soil still writhed slowly within that dark region. Even though they no longer spread this way, just looking at them filled one with a deep, gut-level dread.

Shirley did not even dare look that way for long. She barely managed to steady her breathing, and her voice still trembled. "What… what the hell is that?"

"I don't know… I'm no expert on dreams," Dog said, coming to stand beside her and staring at the distance with extreme caution. "But this might be what the Nameless One's Dream truly looks like. Some deadly thing is spreading in the depths of this dream. It's just that the dream is so large that last time the Captain and the others never ran into it—but we did."

"Why am I always the unlucky one…" Shirley muttered, frowning. But she soon shut her mouth and turned a wary gaze toward a certain direction.

Dog also drew back its gaze from the corrupted area at once. A low growl came from its throat as it stared hard at a patch of open ground a few meters away.

A strange presence was approaching.

They did not know how that unfamiliar presence had appeared, but clearly… someone was entering this dream.

Was it a friend or an enemy?

From that presence, Shirley and Dog both felt a certain… familiar yet troubling sense that made them wary and annoyed.

The next second, under their gaze, a hazy image suddenly appeared on that empty patch of ground. It was like a dream bubble slowly coming into focus, and within the illusion a human shape gradually took form.

A young man in a dark blue coat appeared on the open ground. He was tall and lean, with a harsh, gloomy face.

The instant the young man's figure appeared, both Shirley and Dog noticed a phantom of a black chain flash into view near his shoulder blades. At the end of the chain, the vague outline of some ominous bird-like shape showed for a moment.

Shirley's eyes changed slightly. She tightened her grip on the chain linking her to Dog without thinking.

The "uninvited guest" not far away reacted at once as well. Sensing the unfamiliar presence on the scene, he suddenly turned his gaze.

A girl in a black dress, standing beside a Abyssal Hound, came into his view.

He was startled for a moment, then frowned:

"…This area already has people in it?"

Chapter 571: The Spreading Depths

The tall, gloomy man opposite muttered to himself under his breath, and his one sentence made Shirley instantly hold back her urge to swing Dog at him.

She reacted at once. All the skills in reading faces and putting on an act that she had learned since she was little made her expression flawless in an instant. Looking at the man opposite her, she loosened Dog's chain a little and put on a puzzled and slightly nervous look. "Is something wrong?"

The gloomy man smoothed his brows when he heard her and waved a hand at Shirley. "Don't be nervous, fellow believer. We still don't fully understand all the rules of the Nameless One's Dream. It's normal for some deviations to appear when we enter the dreamwalking state. It's just that…"

He paused here, and a trace of doubt slowly appeared in his gaze toward Shirley. "I didn't expect such a young fellow believer to show up here. Are you really fine entering the Nameless One's Dream like this?"

"The connection with the Abyssal Deep has nothing to do with age," Shirley said at once. She shook the sturdy black chain in her hand, and Dog beside her cooperated by letting out a tame low growl. "I'm a veteran summoner. Don't be fooled by how I look."

"…All right, I was being rude," the Annihilator opposite her seemed to let go of his doubts. A stiff smile appeared on his harsh face. Then he raised his head to look around. His gaze quickly fell on the "border line" not far away, and he grew thoughtful. “The corruption boundary… We are in luck. It looks like we are not far from that ‘wall’.”

Seeing his attention shift elsewhere, Shirley quietly let out a breath of relief. She also noted the strange terms he had let slip, like “corruption boundary” and “wall”. She kept her expression under control and memorized those words, then went on using the acting skills she had not used in a long time but still handled with ease. Casually, she said: “Just now that boundary was spreading like crazy. To be honest, it was pretty scary.”

“You ran into the corruption zone expanding?” The gloomy man raised an eyebrow. “Ah, that really does sound unlucky—but as the Nameless One’s Dream keeps developing, this will only happen more and more often. According to those ‘Preachers’, the corruption and collapse of this dream are bound to happen. That’s why we must find that Wall of Silence as soon as possible… We shouldn’t waste time.”

As he spoke, the Annihilator raised his right hand slightly. A black chain appeared in the air beside him, and the smoke and dust at its end gathered into a “Death-Omen Bird”, as if something had half rotted away. It was pieced together from bones and shadows.

This Abyssal demon let out a sharp, grating cry as soon as it appeared. Then it beat its tattered bone wings and flew up into the air, as if sensing some flow of breath within the dream. After a moment, it landed on its master’s shoulder. No one knew how this muddled, dim-witted demon communicated with its “master”, but the latter soon settled on a general direction and looked toward the depths of the forest. “Let’s head this way first.”

Shirley stayed quiet and, with Dog, simply followed the tall, gloomy cultist, walking with him toward the depths of the forest.

But beneath her calm surface, her mind was already racing. She thought about this man’s goal, thought about how to ask questions without arousing suspicion, thought about how to make herself act more like a normal Annihilator. At the same time, she also thought about how she should move to take this guy out at once if her disguise failed.

She felt her mind grow sharp again, as if, now that she finally did not have to think about all those sleep-inducing letters and numbers, all kinds of ideas had come back into her head.

She carefully controlled the distance between herself and the cultist—

She could not be too close. Too close would make him wary and suspicious.

She also could not be too far away. If she was too far, she would not be able to hit him with one swing of Dog. She had to keep him within one-dog throwing range.

“My name is Sarah. What’s yours?” After a few seconds of silence, Shirley made up a name for herself and asked.

She had grown up cheating and swindling in the Slum Quarter, so such little lies came easy to her.

“Richard,” the cultist walking ahead said without looking back. “The Holy Lord gave us a shortcut to the ‘essence’. Names aren’t that important, young fellow believer.”

“Oh… you’re right. I was just asking,” Shirley hurried to nod. Then, as if without thinking, she asked: “Are there many people who ‘came in’ this time?”

“There are more than a dozen other Church brothers and sisters acting with us. They come from different city-states—but I don’t know the details. The Saint above arranges everything. I’m the same as you, only carrying out the orders passed down by the envoy.”

“…Sigh, they think I’m young, so they never tell me anything. They just send me in to scout,” Shirley grumbled casually, her complaining tone sounding very real. “And right after I came in, I ran into the corruption zone expanding. I’m so unlucky today—thank goodness for the Holy Lord’s protection.”

The cultist who called himself Richard glanced back at her. He did not seem suspicious at all.

After all, the Abyssal Hound walking beside this girl was the strongest “proof of identity”. In this world, only Annihilators could form a symbiotic pact with Abyssal demons. As long as that identity was clear, she was definitely a “fellow believer”.

At most, she was just a fellow believer who lacked experience and asked too many questions.

Once Shirley realized this, she herself grew a bit bolder.

She began to make use of her image as “young and inexperienced”, dropping one roundabout question after another from time to time.

Dog’s slightly puzzled voice sounded in her mind. “Shirley, why do I feel like you’re actually pretty excited?”

“Of course I’m excited. I’m about to do something big!” Shirley kept chatting idly with the cultist ahead, her face calm, while she muttered to Dog in her heart. “If I can trick him into saying a few useful things, the Captain will definitely reward me later—maybe I won’t have to memorize vocabulary for a couple of days… Dog, Dog, do you think if I catch one alive and bring him back, he can cover my math homework?”

“How are you going to drag someone back out of a dream?”

“Ah… right. I forgot about that part.”

…

Deeper in the district, vines and giant trees that seemed to have grown and spread out from the dreamscape wrapped around and covered every building in sight. The whole block became a silent, shadowy, eerie forest.

Dark-colored vines climbed the high walls nearby. Fine thorns coiled around the lamp posts. Tall trees blocked the mouths of alleys, and their crowns covered the rooftops of the buildings. Some branches crisscrossed between the trunks and went straight through those dead-silent houses, as if fused with the solid cement walls. It created a strange scene where the forest and the city's buildings merged and twisted together in a warped symbiosis.

In this eerie, deathly still scene, the footsteps of Duncan and Alice sounded especially out of place. They even seemed like a ripping, discordant noise inside this "spreading dream", echoing along the empty street.

Duncan frowned, his gaze sweeping over the lifeless street before him.

The towering crowns of the trees blocked out the sky. Both the sunlight that usually spread in from the sea outside the city-state and the cold glow of the World's Wound that faintly appeared in the night were blocked by the thick plants over the district. The street lay in an unsettling gloom, and in that darkness, he and Alice had not seen a single person as they walked.

That was, of course, not normal.

The district was under curfew after nightfall, but even on a curfewed street they should still have seen patrolling Church guardians.

Yet there was no one at all—not only was the street empty, but when they passed some houses along the road, Duncan and Alice did not see any figures inside them either.

Some of those houses even still had their lights on. From the way things were set up, it looked as if someone had been moving around in the living room just a moment ago.

“We haven’t seen anyone in the part of the district covered by this ‘forest’, not on the streets and not inside the buildings,” Duncan said, turning his head toward the puppet head Alice was holding in her arms. “It’s like everyone has vanished, just like you did.”

“Like us?” Lucretia’s voice came from the puppet’s mouth, sounding a bit distorted. “Do you mean… everyone in the whole city has been shifted into this ‘dream’?”

“Hard to say, but at least in the places Alice and I have passed, the people are all gone,” Duncan shook his head. “Over there, have you run into anyone else who entered the dreamwalking state from the Mortal Realm?”

“No,” Lucretia answered at once. “I’m still moving together with this elf who calls herself ‘Celine’. We haven’t met anyone else along the way.”

Duncan listened quietly, then turned to look at Alice. “Can you see any ‘lines’ around here?”

“No,” Alice shook her head. “We haven’t seen any at all.”

Duncan nodded, his face dark.

The lines of spirit form could not hide from Alice’s eyes. No matter how clever the masking trick, as long as a “person” was still in the Mortal Realm, Alice would see the “lines” drifting in the air. But now even this doll said she saw nothing at all… That could only mean that, at least within the streets that had changed like this, the “people” really were gone.

This was not like what had happened before with Taran Ael, or with that elf maiden from Pland.

Although it still seemed that this incident was related to the Nameless One’s Dream, clearly… this time the dream’s scale and power had grown to an unimaginable level.

Duncan lifted his head and looked into the center of the altered district through the gloom.

Suddenly, a patch of shadows in that darkness caught his eye.

It was a structure that wound between the buildings, like a huge vine or some exposed root system stretching outward.

It lay there quietly in the dark, as silent as everything around it. Yet for some reason…

Duncan kept feeling that this huge “vine” was different from the rest.

Chapter 572: Unstable

With a strange sense of unease, Duncan led Alice at a quick pace to the side of the huge “vine” that lay quietly coiled between the shadows of the buildings.

It was even bigger than Duncan had imagined.

Even at its farthest, thinnest end, the vine’s diameter was greater than a person was tall. Its thicker “source” stretched down from a slope deep in the street, then seemed to melt straight into the night, vanishing into the dim distance. He could only see huge shapes rising and twisting between the buildings’ shadows, as if some much larger, more complete “body” still lay hidden there.

Yet that massive “body” was shrouded in a hazy blur. No matter how he looked, he could not see it clearly. Even the sunlight that fell through gaps in the high canopy seemed unable to pierce that misty layer.

Alice had never seen anything like this. She stared, stunned, clutching the puppet maid’s head in her arms. She widened her eyes, trying hard to see the vine’s “source” where it spread across the street. After a long time she finally spoke in a daze: “Captain… is this also a ‘plant’?”

Duncan did not answer. He kept watching the giant vine that almost blocked the street ahead. After a long time, he walked to its tip, bent down at its “tail”, and carefully reached out to touch its rough, hard surface with his fingertip.

Lucretia’s voice came from the puppet head in Alice’s arms: “Dad, did you find anything? Did you find the Dreamer?”

“We did not find the Dreamer, but we found a huge… vine,” Duncan said without looking up. “It looks very different from the other plants in the street. It is enormous, but it seems to be only a part of an even larger ‘plant’. I don’t know why, but I keep feeling this vine is… alive, or rather, active.”

He raised his head and let his gaze sweep over the towering tree shadows around the street.

Thick vegetation filled the whole block, yet all those plants felt dead to him, like empty illusions with no life. Only the huge vine in the middle of the street gave him a faint sense of a living thing.

After hesitating for a few seconds, Duncan took a slow breath and decided to try to make contact with this unusual vine.

A strand of ghostly green flame flowed around his fingertip like water, then quietly seeped into the vine. The firelight flashed once in the dimness and vanished.

He skillfully guided this thread of flame to spread through the “foreign object”. At the same time he told Alice to watch their surroundings. Then Duncan slowly closed his eyes. He began to feel the information the flame sent back to him, and tried to communicate with and understand this vine that seemed to spread out from some vast dream…

In the darkness, something seemed to rise and fall, gather and then fade away.

Duncan “opened” his eyes in the dark. Through this faint and blurry link, he tried his best to see the shapes that were forming and dissolving there.

Mist rose out of the darkness. Deep inside the fog, something was coming into view.

There really was something here!

Duncan's heart leaped. He moved at once toward that vague shape. He felt as if he had turned into a swift wind or a shadow, darting through the dark mist. As he drew closer, the hazy shape quickly grew larger in his view and slowly began to show more details.

He could not help picking up speed. The blurred details also sharpened in his eyes. Little by little, he began to make things out.

A tall, imposing bow. A dark-colored hull. Gunport covers lined up along the side. Complex masts and rigging. High above, sails that looked half transparent.

Duncan stopped in shock.

He raised his head in the dark and stared, dumbfounded, at the familiar sight at the end of the mist. He was looking at his… the Vanished.

…

Nina, who was moving carefully along a rough, hard forest path, suddenly stopped. She frowned and tilted her head, listening to the sounds coming from deep in the woods.

A moment later, she turned her head and said: "Mr. Morris, did you hear something?"

"It's the wind. It picked up all of a sudden, and the directions are all mixed… it doesn't sound normal," Morris said, his face growing more serious. He glanced at Nina beside him. "Go 'up' and take a look at what's happening in the distance. Don't stay in the sky too long. Be careful."

"Alright!"

Nina agreed at once. Then she suddenly turned into a leaping arc of flame and shot straight into the sky. The bright arc whirled quickly over the forest. Almost at the same time, the forest that had been formed by a dream reacted. The trees touched by the arc's light began to grow madly, creaking as they stretched toward the sky. The clouds high above also started to gather toward Nina and slowly formed a ring that closed in around her…

But Nina only circled in the sky for a few seconds. Before the forest's reaction grew more intense and dangerous, she quickly flew back down to Morris's side.

"That was scary… this place really doesn't welcome me…" she said, patting her chest with some lingering fear.

"Maybe your radiance is too strong for this 'other realm'," Morris said. "Most such realms will instinctively reject any invading power that can threaten them. What did you see in the distance?"

"Deep in the forest there's an area where something happened. It looked pitch-black. The trees and the ground there seemed rotten. But it's very far from us. In another direction I could see very tall, long shadows lined up together. They looked half transparent, like a curtain of light. Other than that, I didn't see anything…"

Nina spoke quickly about what she had seen in those few seconds she circled high above. She raised her hand and pointed out the rough directions as she talked. But halfway through her words, another gust of howling wind suddenly rose from deep in the forest. The chaotic wind tore through the trees, and the sudden creaking and snapping of the trunks around them cut her off.

The howling, chaotic wind seemed filled with countless vague roars. A strange tension and a feeling of rejection rushed over Nina and Morris at once.

It was as if this forest shaped by a dream was being hit by some great force from outside, as if everything here had suddenly become unstable.

The two of them glanced at each other without thinking. Right after that, they saw the giant trees in the distance start to sway and collapse like phantoms. Fine cracks quickly covered the sky. Light and shadow from the Mortal Realm seemed to shine in through those gaps. A feeling of about to wake sharply from a dream rose in their hearts.

At the same time, in another part of the deep forest, Shirley also heard the howling noise rushing in from far away. Right after that, the Annihilator walking ahead of her suddenly stopped.

Shirley's heart jumped at once, but she quickly kept her face calm and said: "Huh? What's going on?"

"The dream is losing stability. The operation is over. Everyone is to leave the Nameless One's dream," Richard said as he turned back. At last doubt showed on his face. "You didn't get the message?"

Shirley froze for a second, then quickly adjusted her expression. She put on an innocent, confused look. "I don't know, maybe I missed it by accident…"

"By accident?" The Annihilator who called himself Richard stared straight into Shirley's eyes. He seemed to finally notice the sense of wrongness this "young comrade" had given him along the way. A trace of wariness and doubt appeared in his eyes. "Comrade, I think I forgot to ask… which city-state in the Mortal Realm do you operate in?"

Shirley noticed the subtle change in his gaze at once. She was very sensitive to even the smallest hint of malice from strangers. Still, she kept her harmless look on her face. "I'm in the city-state of Morka. There are lots of elves there…"

“‘Comrade’,” Richard suddenly cut her off. His voice changed, as if some hidden syllables had slipped into his speech. He stared into Shirley’s eyes. With each movement of his mouth, some kind of tempting power seemed to spread. “We are forbidden to reveal our true locations in the Mortal Realm during an operation, even when we meet ‘our own’. What a pity…”

Malicious magic had quietly gathered in his mouth. The power of the Death-Omen Bird flowed along the symbiotic pact chain into the cultist’s body. He felt the spell lock onto the mind of the girl in front of him. She still did not seem to react at all and only stood there in a daze.

Seeing this, he became even more sure of his guess.

Someone who knew nothing about the spell’s power could not be a true child of the Abyssal Lord.

He did not know where she came from or how she had made such a convincing disguise. He did not know what was going on with that seemingly flawless “Abyssal Hound”. But there was no doubt this “comrade” was fake. Luckily, he had noticed in time, and the other side did not seem to have any combat experience.

It was time to say goodbye. No one could survive under the curse of the Death-Omen Bird…

It all happened in an instant. Richard’s flash of judgment and emotion, and the bright, happy smile that suddenly appeared on Shirley’s face, came almost at the same time.

Richard stared in shock as the girl across from him suddenly beamed at him. He had time for only that single moment of shock. He had no time to react or see clearly what was happening before the girl who called herself “Sarah” suddenly swung her arm up toward him, and a fierce black shape came crashing at his face.

With one sharp move, Shirley lifted Dog and brought him down. The chain howled as the dog smashed into the cultist’s head.

“See you the hell later!”

Chapter 573: Sailing in Darkness and Fog

With a loud bang, the Annihilator spat blood and flew more than ten meters away. He only stopped when he slammed into the trunk of a towering tree, then slid down like a torn sack.

The last look in his eyes was one of huge shock and confusion. Maybe in his life he had imagined all kinds of strong enemies and traps, but he probably never thought he would one day be sent flying by someone hitting him with a dog.

Shirley held Dog's chain and walked step by step to the cultist who could no longer move even a finger. She stopped at a relatively safe distance.

The cultist was still alive, or rather, in this "dream", a wound that would be fatal in the Mortal Realm did not seem enough to kill him. His head was almost smashed into his neck. Most of his joints bent at strange, terrible angles. Yet he was still alive, only too weak to move and able to stare this way with eyes full of hate and a little fear.

Shirley ignored his frightening stare. She lifted the chain in her hand a little, and Dog stepped forward, sticking close to the cultist's face.

"What are you…" The Annihilator forced the words out of his throat with difficulty. He looked at the fierce, terrifying Abyssal Hound drawing up beside him. A trace of fear finally broke through into his eyes. Not far away, the Death-Omen Bird that shared a symbiotic pact with him also struggled a few times, as if trying to resist, but soon fell quiet again because its partner was so weak. That made his voice sound even more hollow and forced. “What are you going to do?!”

“This place is a dream. Once you’re back in the Mortal Realm, I won’t be able to catch you,” Shirley said as a slow smile spread across her face. She raised the arm that shared the symbiotic pact with the chain and gently rubbed the black links against her cheek. Her expression still looked harmless. “And if we meet when I’m not ready, it would be dangerous if I don’t notice you in time. So I need to leave a little mark…”

“A mark…?”

The Annihilator lying on the ground froze for a moment. The next second, he saw the Abyssal Hound beside him suddenly open its jaws. Its horrible bony fangs bit down without mercy. He had time for only one scream of terror before the pain almost tore his mind apart. One of his arms had already turned into bloody chunks in the hound’s mouth.

“I’ve memorized your scent. We’ll catch you in the Mortal Realm…” Dog lifted his head. His eye sockets glowed with blood-red light as he stared at the wailing Annihilator. A hoarse, low voice came from his ribcage. “We’ll bring you in alive. He will reward us…”

His cries cut off at once. The cultist’s eyes flew wide open. He stared fixedly at the savage Abyssal Hound in front of him, mouth gaping. He did not know whether he was more shocked that this Abyssal demon could speak, or at the huge fear and danger he felt in those last words. “He” will reward us… What were this strange girl and this strange demon? Who was the “He” they spoke of?

The next second, the Annihilator’s form began to blur and twist. In just a breath or two, his figure vanished into thin air before Shirley and Dog.

“He ran off after all,” Dog said, turning his head and shaking it from side to side. There was a hint of helplessness in his tone. “His allies in the Mortal Realm must have sensed something and yanked him away by force… we can’t stop this kind of transfer on the level of the mind.”

“It’s fine. Didn’t you memorize his scent?” Shirley waved her hand and then asked again with a serious look on her face. “Once we’re in the Mortal Realm, can you really find him?”

“As long as he isn’t too far away. If he happens to show up within my sensing range, I can definitely track him down,” Dog muttered. “Abyssal Hounds are the demons best at tracking. He can’t erase the mark I left.”

“Good,” Shirley breathed out in relief. “If we can really catch him alive, that would be great. Even if he’s only worth two test papers…”

Dog ignored the rest of Shirley’s muttering. He lifted his head. Chaotic wind and noise rushed through the forest from every direction. The trees in the distance were turning transparent and dim in large swaths. The signs that the dream was about to break apart were growing clearer.

Clearly, something was pushing on this dream. It was about to wake up.

…

In the darkness, some sounds seemed to drift over. They sounded like chaotic winds howling, snapping branches as they rushed through the woods. But when he listened more closely, they seemed almost like illusions.

Duncan had no attention left for the faint sounds from the dark. All of his focus was on the unbelievable scene before him.

It really was the Vanished. After he had spread his senses deep into the vine, he saw, at the center of this darkness and fog, that familiar ghost ship.

But… why? Why would the Vanished appear in this place?

Duncan moved closer and saw that the Vanished seemed to be floating on a pitch-black surface of water. Thick, inky darkness swallowed the lower half of the ship. On the tall deck above, the whole ship lay silent. No sound came from it.

After a brief pause, he “flew” up onto the Vanished’s deck.

In this darkness, he was moving only as a viewpoint, and that gave him plenty of freedom.

There was no one on the deck. Everywhere he looked he saw old, familiar sights.

Following the paths in his memory, Duncan slowly checked every feature on the deck and the nearby cabins.

Everything matched, down to the last detail.

But he knew this was not the real Vanished, nor some kind of projection of it. He did not feel the close bond that existed between himself and his ship. He did not feel any feedback from the flame.

This ship had been made by some other power.

Once more, faint wind and noise came from the dark, a little clearer than before.

Duncan paid some attention to the sounds coming from deep in the darkness. Then he went to the aft deck and stopped in front of the captain’s cabin door.

His gaze lifted and then froze.

There was a line of strange words carved on the doorframe: “May He wander in the dream.”

It was not “Door of the Lost Ones”?!

Duncan felt a jolt of shock. He clearly remembered that the words above the captain’s door should have been “Door of the Lost Ones”, and that this door was the only way to his little “bachelor apartment”… This Vanished that had appeared deep in the dark fog matched his memory in every way. Why was the writing above this door the only thing that was different?

He drew his eyes away from the frame and looked at the door itself. The next second, the door swung open without a sound, almost as if it were inviting him in.

The familiar captain’s cabin appeared before him. A dim yellow light shone inside. Every piece of furniture was in place, and Goathead stood at the edge of the chart table in the lamplight.

“Goathead?”

Duncan’s heart gave a sudden thump.

He remembered that when he had first stumbled into Subspace, the damaged Vanished on the Subspace side had not had Goathead. In his own bachelor apartment, the model of the Vanished had not had Goathead either.

Whether Goathead was present or not seemed to be a subtle but key point that set the different “versions” of the Vanished apart.

A stream of guesses and memories flashed through his mind as he stepped through the captain’s door. He walked carefully up to the chart table and looked at the black “wood carving” on its edge.

Goathead sat quietly on its base, motionless like a real wooden carving. It did not react at all to the captain’s approach.

Of course, that might also be because Duncan’s presence here was only that of a viewpoint, not a visible body.

Duncan did not try to disturb Goathead on the table. He kept watching carefully instead.

Soon, he noticed another wrong detail.

On the table lay the enchanted sea chart. It was supposed to be the chart that recorded the routes the Vanished had sailed, the known city-states and sea lanes on the Boundless Sea. But now it showed a scene Duncan had never seen before, a completely unfamiliar map.

It looked like a forest viewed from the air. In the tiny, almost three-dimensional image he could see rolling ridges, huge plant structures, and strange sites scattered through the dense woods like clusters of buildings. A translucent icon that stood for the Vanished floated over this miniature scene and was moving through the forest at an extremely slow speed.

Filled with shock, Duncan stared at the strange enchanted sea chart for a long time.

Of course he could not pull any useful information from such an unfamiliar map. But he remembered another strange enchanted sea chart he had seen on the damaged Vanished in Subspace.

On that Vanished sailing through Subspace, the enchanted sea chart had also shown an eerie scene. In some chaotic, shifted unknown sea, strange, jumbled sailing records lay everywhere.

Now he was looking at yet another unexplainable enchanted sea chart on this Vanished that had appeared in the dark fog. This time it even showed the ship sailing through a forest.

He could not stop a bizarre idea from rising in his heart.

Just how many different “versions” of the Vanished were sailing through different dimensions at the same time, recording different routes?

As this strange thought popped into Duncan’s mind, a faint creaking sound suddenly came from beside him and cut off his wild guess.

He instantly turned his gaze toward the source of the sound.

The black Goathead at the edge of the chart table was slowly turning its neck, bringing its gaze around to face him.

In its eyes, carved of black obsidian, a faint hint of awareness seemed to be forming.

The next second, Duncan heard a hoarse, low voice reach his ears.

“Who is there…”

Chapter 574: Waking from the Dream

The sudden voice from the Black Wooden Idol left Duncan stunned. He had not expected that, on this wrong and uncanny Vanished that felt like a mysterious vision, the strange Goathead in front of him would suddenly “come alive”. His gaze locked on the slowly moving “wood carving”, and a hint of wariness rose in his heart. Then he realized something:

The other side seemed unable to “see” him.

Right now he was only using the flames of his spirit form to build a link and “peek” into the depths of that huge vine. Only his thoughts were being sent here. He had not truly projected his power here, and of course he had not condensed a body in this place.

So the Goathead on the table must have only sensed a presence—and now it was starting to search for the source of that presence.

The unsettling Black Wooden Idol turned slowly. Faint creaks came from its wooden base. In the dead silence of the Vanished, in the dead silence of the captain’s cabin, those creaks sounded even more eerie. Its obsidian-carved black eyes swept several times across the spot where Duncan’s point of view hung. At last it stopped and let out a puzzled sound: “Is… someone there…”

Its voice was slow and low, like someone talking in their sleep.

From its reaction, Duncan at once noticed something odd. This Goathead did seem to have sensed something, but it had not recognized the presence as the “captain’s” aura?!

After a brief, heavy pause to think, Duncan made up his mind.

The link built through the flame strengthened at once. Power flowed here along the fire, and Duncan began to “lean” his will toward this strange space filled with darkness and thick fog, quickly condensing his form here.

He had to figure out what was going on with this Vanished sailing in the mist, and with this strange Goathead in front of him.

On the Vanished that sailed through darkness and fog, strands of ghostly green flame appeared here and there on the deck. In the dimly lit captain’s cabin, a wisp of spirit flame suddenly appeared in midair. It crackled as it spread, then quickly outlined a tall figure.

In almost an instant, Duncan’s link with this eerie dark space grew stronger. But in that same instant, he felt that this fog-filled space, and the Vanished under his feet, seemed to be… triggered. Everything around him suddenly turned vague and unreal. A delayed sense of rejection surged in from all directions. It was as if the dark fog was pushing back against his flame—or as if this strange place itself was quickly falling apart.

The sudden rejection caught Duncan off guard. This was the first time he had felt such an active pushback while using the spirit flame to probe an unknown thing.

He had used the spirit flame to probe many things in the past. He had used it on Alice’s spirit coffin, on that brass clockwork key, and on all kinds of extraordinary items seized from cultists. None of those things had ever reacted like this.

Could this strange space, and that huge “vine” that had appeared in the city, still be alive? Was there a powerful “mind” behind it?

The shocking guess surged through his thoughts, but this was clearly not the time to dig to the bottom. Duncan did not know how long he could keep this “link” to this place. He could only try to keep himself stable while striding toward the Goathead by the chart table.

The black wooden carving seemed to wake from a dream as well. It suddenly raised its head. Its gaze fell on Duncan—both the ghostly green flame and the tall figure had appeared in its eyes out of nowhere, like a bright light suddenly bursting into a peaceful and dark dream. In its startled, broken dream, it stared at the uninvited guest and said in a dazed voice: “Who are you?”

“Looks like you don’t know me.” Duncan was not surprised, since he had already noticed a few clues just now. While he did his best to keep his link to this place, he quickly sensed information about this Vanished and about the Goathead before him. He said: “I am Duncan Abnomar—what is your name?”

“Duncan… ah, that sounds a bit familiar…” The Goathead did not seem fully awake. Its voice drifted in and out, like someone slipping into Dreamwalking, and it did not answer Duncan’s question directly. “But I don’t remember… why are you here… why are we here…”

Duncan frowned.

He could already feel that this dark, fog-filled space was starting to crack and fall apart. The strong rejection was trying to push his flame out. The Goathead in front of him seemed stuck in a half-dreaming state and could not answer his questions at all.

After a brief thought, he stepped closer and pointed at the enchanted sea chart next to Goathead.

“Where is the Vanished sailing?”

It took a second or two before Goathead reacted. It slowly turned its neck, and its gaze landed on the “sea chart” that was currently showing a forest. After a long time, it murmured: “…Oh, good… so they’re still there…”

“They?” Duncan asked at once. “Who are they…”

But a sudden violent lurch and a low roar that seemed to sweep through the whole space cut off his words.

The rejection he faced here reached its peak. Every inch of space and time seemed to resist the spread of the spirit form’s fire. Soft crackling pops sounded in the air, like the flames were burning against an invisible barrier. Senses carried through the fire became suddenly blurred and slow.

Duncan lowered his head and saw that the projection he had condensed, his avatar form, was growing more and more indistinct. His link to this place seemed about to be severed.

He knew he could force more power together and use the fire of his spirit form to keep the link by brute force—but after realizing that the giant vine was very likely “alive”, and that there might even be a consciousness behind it, he no longer knew if he should.

Just then, the Goathead on the chart table finally seemed to notice something strange about him as well.

Its gaze fell on the flickering flames around him. After a brief delay, it muttered in a muffled voice: “Ah… you scared her…”

Duncan froze for a moment, then snapped his head up: “Scared who?”

“Atlantis…” Goathead seemed ready to sink back into its dreamy state. Its voice grew slower and slower. “Atlantis doesn’t know you. Your existence… scared her.”

Atlantis… the “World Tree” from the ancient legends of the elves?!

The information and a flood of guesses flashed through Duncan’s mind. But before he could ask more, a dizzy feeling struck him, like his senses were being peeled away and the whole world was rushing off into the distance. The scene before his eyes dimmed fast. The captain’s cabin, the chart table, the enchanted sea chart all faded into the dark. Only Goathead’s hazy, self-muttering voice echoed faintly in the darkness:

“Ah, time’s up—she’s waking up.”

In the next second, the feeling of solid ground under his feet snapped Duncan awake. He drew a reflexive breath and opened his eyes.

Alice’s face was only ten centimeters from his.

The silly doll startled him so badly that he jumped back. Alice at once broke into a beaming smile. She bounced after him and shouted: “Captain! Captain! It’s almost dawn! Everything outside looks normal again!”

Duncan had been about to scold Alice a few times, but her words stopped him short. Then he noticed how the world around them had changed.

The dense forest that had filled the whole block was gone. The huge growth that had merged into the tall buildings around them had vanished without a trace. The street fixtures that had twisted and mutated into part of the forest had really returned to their original forms.

On both sides of the road, the soft light from the gas lamps lit up the surroundings. Over the block, sunlight from the far-off sea coast spread across the city like a curtain. In the gaps in that light, the outline of the World’s Wound in the sky had already turned dim. At the far end of the sky, a hint of dawn, just before Vision 001 rose, seemed to spread through the clouds.

Duncan blinked and looked, by habit, toward the sloping street deeper inside the district.

He still remembered the huge vine that had spread down from that slope, and how his flame had sunk into the depths of that vine.

There was nothing there now.

Just like the rest of the block—everything had gone back to normal.

With the rising morning sun, with the end of the veil of night and the coming of day, that massive, eerie phenomenon… dissolved into the light of morning like a dream being shaken away.

Duncan felt as if he stood at the edge of a bizarre dream. The displaced Mortal Realm and the memories still left in his head made everything before his eyes feel unreal.

But the dazed feeling only lasted a moment. He soon came fully back to himself and at once turned to look toward Crown Street.

His senses spread in that direction. The familiar Marks appeared in his “sight”.

Nina, Shirley, Morris…

Their presences had returned to the Mortal Realm.

The puppet head in Alice’s arms suddenly twitched. The mouth of the maid puppet opened and closed, and Lucretia’s voice came out: “Dad, we seem to…”

“I know. You’ve all come back, and the district is already back to normal.”

Duncan cut in quickly. Out of the corner of his eye, he could already see a few scattered figures on the street—that was the local residents coming out now that it was day.

They swept the streets. They chatted at their doors. They hurried off to work. They talked about yesterday's news and today's weather.

No one seemed to know what had happened last night—even though only a few hours ago, every one of these people in the district had truly vanished into the veil of night.

Now, they had come back too.

As the street scene slowly woke up and grew busy again, a faint, hard-to-name sense of strangeness and eeriness seemed to rise over it.

Chapter 575: Each Different

Duncan and Alice hurried back at top speed to the Witch manor at 99 Crown Street.

Along the way, what they saw were city streets that had fully returned to their everyday look. The blocks that had once been completely covered by “forest”, the nearby lanes once overrun by spreading vines, and the buildings that had fallen silent and empty in the forest’s Shadows had all regained their old, lively face in the early morning light.

There were more and more people on the streets. The first bus of the morning had already driven down the avenue. At the intersection, a Knowledge Guard was handing over the shift to a city Constable. The strange state that had filled the whole district a few hours ago… now felt like a grand illusion that only Duncan and the others had noticed.

When Duncan and Alice returned, everyone was already waiting in the living room. Lucretia was the first to come up. She walked quickly to Duncan and asked: “Are you all right?”

Duncan waved his hand as he headed into the living room and said quickly: “What I went through was different from you. We need to put all the information together now.”

Alice followed him in. As she passed Lucretia, she casually handed over the puppet head she had been carrying the whole way: “Here, this. I didn’t break it!”

Lucretia took the puppet head with a slightly odd look on her face. She glanced at the maid puppet leaning in standby against the stair rail not far away, then raised a hand to call over an iron footman. She passed the puppet head to it and said: “Put this in the workshop first. I’ll deal with it later.”

Soon, everyone gathered together. Duncan sat on the sofa in the middle of the living room and let his gaze sweep over each familiar face.

Even though he had known earlier that everyone was safe, he still could not help letting out a silent sigh of relief now that he saw them all back in the Mortal Realm.

“Let’s start with what we know so far.” After a brief silence, Duncan was the first to speak. “First, we can now say that the large-scale Visions in the city last night were very similar to the dream Taran Ael fell into before. The details were different, and there were many new changes, but they should all come from the influence of the so-called ‘dream of the Nameless One’. That ‘dream’ is growing, and now it seems to be in a runaway state and spreading toward the Mortal Realm.”

He paused for a moment and glanced at Alice beside him, then went on: “Second, after the anomaly began, all of us had different experiences. Alice and I stayed in the Mortal Realm. We saw streets warped and twisted by the power spilling out of the dream. I even made contact with a large entity that had ‘crawled out’ of the dream. You were dragged into the ‘other side’ of the dream. In that time, all contact was cut off, and only Lucretia kept a weak link with the Mortal Realm through the puppet servant she had made.”

“Let’s start with Lucretia, then. Each of you go over what you went through on the ‘inside’ of the dream.”

Duncan’s gaze fell on the Sea Witch. She nodded at once and shifted her sitting position a little: “Then I’ll start with mine. The place where I began my Dreamwalking was an uninhabited zone in the forest. There, I met an elven woman who called herself ‘Celine’…”

Nina, sitting to the side, let out a soft cry as soon as she heard this: “Huh? You met a person? Was she the Dreamer?”

Then she realized she had interrupted. She stuck out her tongue in embarrassment and said: “Sorry, I couldn’t help it… go on, I won’t cut in again.”

Lucretia did not mind. She only nodded to Nina and kept talking: “From what I could tell, the elven woman who called herself ‘Celine’ was not the Dreamer, but a… ‘resident’ of that huge dream. I know that sounds strange…

“She talked about a place called the ‘Wall of Silence’. It seemed to be a defensive line. She called herself a ranger, and she mentioned a retreat order. She told me that everyone had already pulled back inside the Wall of Silence. Until the dream ended, I was traveling with that elf, heading toward the place she called the ‘Wall of Silence’, but we never reached it…”

Lucretia described her experience in the dreamscape in as much detail as she could. Except for Duncan, who already knew some of it, everyone else listened with serious and amazed looks—because Lucretia was the only one among them who had met a “native resident” of the dream world.

No one had expected that there would be homegrown mind-born beings like “Celine” inside the “dream of the Nameless One”!

And if what the elf named “Celine” said was true, then beyond the depths of that forest, behind the defensive line called the “Wall of Silence”, there were even more mind-born beings living inside the “dream of the Nameless One”?!

When Lucretia finished, the living room fell quiet for a moment. Then Morris spoke up: “Nina and I were together.”

Duncan was a little surprised: “The two of you were together?”

“Yes. It looks like there is some randomness to how we fell into the dreamscape. Not everyone was separated,” Morris said with a nod. “We also landed in a kind of ‘no man’s land’. All we could see around us was endless, nameless vegetation. At one point, Nina flew up to look into the distance. We found that there were some dark areas in the forest that looked like they were under corruption…

“And from our tests, whenever Nina released her power, the whole dreamscape would have a very strong ‘reaction’…”

Morris laid out their time in the “dream of the Nameless One” in a clear order. This was information Duncan had not had before. He frowned slightly and listened carefully to every detail the old Mr. described, especially how the “dream of the Nameless One” reacted violently whenever Nina used the power of the original Sun.

It sounded… like a strong rejection.

That made Duncan think back to his own experience in that dark, fog-filled space. According to that “suspicious Goathead”, the space had pushed him away because Atlantis was afraid. Then what about the rejection Nina had felt?

Could it be that Nina’s “sunlight” also made the dream of the Nameless One feel threatened?

Lost in thought, Duncan raised his head, and his gaze fell on Shirley.

“I met a cultist. An Annihilator,” Shirley said at once. She looked very pleased with herself, with a hint of pride in her voice. “I dug a lot of information out of that guy! And I beat him up in the end and had Dog leave a mark on him… Oh, and I ran into the whole forest suddenly going weird. It almost scared me to death. I think that was the ‘corruption zone’ Lucretia mentioned? The ‘corruption area’ that Old Gentleman and Nina saw—was that my side?”

Duncan’s eyes widened a little.

Everyone’s experience in the dream of the Nameless One had been different, but Shirley’s side sounded especially explosive.

His expression grew serious at once. He leaned forward without thinking and stared into Shirley’s eyes: “Slow down. Don’t jump all over the place—what exactly happened?”

“Okay, okay, let me sort it out first…” Seeing how serious the captain looked, Shirley straightened up at once and started digging through her memories. But even after she tried her best to put her words in order, she still scratched her cheek and said: “Um… Dog, you explain it. I’m afraid I’ll mess it up.”

In the next second, every gaze in the room turned to Dog.

Dog shook his head and let out a helpless sigh. Under Duncan’s gaze, he began: “We first ran into a rapid decay of the forest—which, based on the information we got later, should have been the ‘corruption’ phenomenon…”

Dog calmly laid out what he and Shirley had gone through in that forest. He described the way the forest had suddenly started to rot and twist, then the cultist they had met afterward, and the many bits of information Shirley had coaxed out of that cultist.

Duncan’s thoughts spread out as Dog spoke, matching each new piece of detail with the clues he already had and linking them together.

The corruption phenomenon. The defensive line called the “Wall of Silence”. The elf named Celine. The Annihilator. And… the sudden end of that uncanny dream.

“It seems… the corruption that elf named ‘Celine’ talked about was the same horrible phenomenon Shirley and Dog ran into,” Lucretia said thoughtfully. “The forest twisting into unnamable shapes, the ground turning corrosive and alive, everything becoming hostile… and those Annihilators seem to know even more.”

“It’s a pity that cultist still got away in the end,” Morris said, frowning. He shook his head. “If he is hiding in some other city in the Mortal Realm now, finding him again will not be easy.”

“More important is how those cultists are getting in and out of the dream of the Nameless One in the first place,” Vanna, who had been silent until now, suddenly said, breaking the quiet. “They seem to have some special method that lets them enter and leave that ‘dream’ under control, and even carry out organized operations inside it. That ‘method’ is key.”

Duncan nodded slowly at that. Then his gaze moved to Vanna.

“What did you see ‘over there’? Were you in the forest too?” he asked, curious.

Vanna looked around at the others. After a brief pause to think, she said: “That’s exactly what I wanted to talk about. What I went through was nothing like yours. Very, very different. When I hear you describe that forest, I feel really confused, because… I was in a desert.”

The living room fell silent at once.

Everyone stared at one another.

After several seconds, Duncan finally spoke in disbelief: “You were in a desert?! You didn’t see a forest at all?”

“Yes. No forest. Only sand, a few sparse, withered plants, and huge rocks,” Vanna said with a firm nod. “I climbed to the highest rocky hill and looked into the distance. There was no forest anywhere in sight.”

Chapter 576: Acting Separately

Vanna’s words left everyone present stunned.

They even shattered many of the guesses Duncan had just formed about the Dream of the Nameless One.

Vanna had not entered that “forest” at all—she had not even seen any forest. She had been trapped the whole time in a desert… What was that desert?!

After a brief, shocked silence, Duncan suddenly spoke: “Did you see any signs of humans moving about in the desert? Any strange terrain worth noting, or anything that left a deep impression on you?”

“There were many strange-looking boulders, tall and twisted, as if something moving had suddenly frozen and turned into stone. In the far distance I could see stretches of shadows, but I couldn’t tell if they were rocky ground or clusters of buildings—it was too far,” Vanna recalled her experience on the other side of the dream and described what she had seen: “Also, the most striking thing was a faint red rift in the sky. It was extremely, extremely large.”

“A red rift?” Duncan’s eyes changed at once and he straightened, suddenly alert: “What exactly did it look like? Besides that red rift, what else did you see in the sky?”

“I still remember how it looked…” Vanna said as she got up, took pen and paper from the low table, and quickly began to sketch: “Its color was dark red. Its edges were blurry, as if they were wrapped in clouds and mist. Deep inside it glowed faintly, and there were vague shapes within…”

Everyone’s gaze focused on the tip of Vanna’s pen. Duncan also leaned forward, watching the “crack” she drew on the paper with those messy lines. As the lines slowly matched the red glow in his memory, his expression grew more and more grim.

A moment later, Vanna stopped and pushed the paper forward: “This is more or less it. My drawing skills are limited, but I did my best. Other than this rift, I didn’t see anything else in the sky.”

“Nothing else?” Duncan was startled when he heard this. He asked without thinking: “What about the Sun? What did the Sun look like?”

To him, this was a question he had to ask—if Vanna had seen the Sun in that desert, then the form of that Sun would be crucial.

However, Vanna still shook her head: “There was no Sun—though it looked like daytime there, and the sky was filled with light besides the red glow, I didn’t see the Sun.”

Everyone looked at one another. Even Duncan was dazed for a moment, until Vanna’s voice sounded again and pulled them back: “That’s all the information I have.”

At last, everyone’s gaze settled on Duncan.

Nina blinked curiously: “Uncle Duncan, what did you see over there?”

“…Alice and I saw a distorted, mutated district in the Mortal Realm,” Duncan thought for a moment, then spoke slowly: “Tall trees and countless vines covered the streets, as if the forest from the Dream of the Nameless One had spread into the Mortal Realm. But we didn’t see any scenes related to a desert. And at the deepest part of that mutated district, we found an especially huge vine…”

With one more person came another line of thought, so Duncan did not hide what he had seen when he tried to probe that vine—the eerie Vanished sailing through dark mist, the familiar yet strange Goathead on the Vanished, the enchanted sea chart that had changed, and the many pieces of information Goathead had revealed in something like a sleep-talking state.

When he finished speaking, the room became even quieter than after Vanna had finished.

“What you saw… was even more unbelievable than that desert I saw…” Vanna muttered.

Dog, beside her, also mumbled in a low voice: “Well… that is the captain, after all…”

Duncan glanced at the Abyssal Hound and ignored its comment. Instead, he added: “That ‘Goathead’ mentioned Atlantis at the end. That really caught my attention.”

“If I remember right… that’s the name of the ‘World Tree’ from ancient elven legends,” Vanna said with a slight nod. “It was also called the tree of life and the primordial giant tree. It was the first life created in this world by the Great Demon God Saslokar, whom the elves worship…”

Everyone present fell into their own thoughts. Even Alice, who usually could not keep up, now wore a look of serious thinking. After a short silence, Lucretia finally raised her head. She looked at Duncan with a hint of hesitation: “Dad, about the current ‘First Mate’ of the Vanished… you never really told me where it came from. That Goathead is actually…”

“It came from Subspace. That’s all I can tell you,” Duncan said. Then he shifted the topic: “But this time… I may have to go find it and confirm a few things.”

Now all the clues were finally laid out on the table. Everyone who had been scattered last night across the Mortal Realm and the different parts of the dream had gathered all the information they held and placed it before Duncan.

After sorting his thoughts, Duncan let out a quiet breath, set aside the tangled questions in his mind for now, and let his gaze sweep over everyone in the living room.

“Now, we can be sure of a few things—

“First, the Dream of the Nameless One is growing larger. Its influence is getting stronger, and it has already reached the point where it can interfere with the Mortal Realm. For now we can’t tell what caused this change, but it is most likely linked to the coming so-called fourth Long Night and the changes of the Sun.

“Second, the ordinary people in the city-state seem completely unaware of the Dream of the Nameless One. When the anomaly happens, everyone within the dream’s affected area disappears. When the dream ends, they return to the Mortal Realm and go on with their daily lives. We still don’t know where they go while the dream is happening, and we don’t know if this phenomenon is limited to elves. There are also many merchants and adventurers of other races in Lightwind Harbor. Next we have to find a way to confirm what happened to those people last night.

“Third, when the anomaly happens, we are scattered to different places—some stay in the Mortal Realm, some enter the great forest in the Dreamwalking state, and some end up in that mysterious desert. We still don’t know if this ‘scattering’ is random or follows some rule.

“Fourth, the Annihilators and the Suntists, and the Ender who feeds them information behind the scenes—these cultists clearly know much more…”

He summed up all the known information point by point, then finally looked up at the others: “Is there anything to add?”

“I can’t think of anything else for now,” Lucretia said with a shake of her head. “What I care about now is whether that kind of anomaly from last night will happen again, and how we should respond if it does.”

“Most likely it will,” Morris sighed. “The influence of the Dream of the Nameless One is clearly still growing stronger. The anomalies it causes will only increase. But looking at the bright side—the more it appears, the more chances we have to figure out its patterns. Right now we have many guesses we can’t confirm, but many of those questions can be answered as soon as there’s a second large-scale anomaly.”

Listening to the old scholar’s analysis, Duncan nodded in agreement: “That’s not blind optimism. We really do need more anomalies to work out the rules of the Dream of the Nameless One.”

“But the Dream of the Nameless One will scatter us and cut off our connection to the captain,” Vanna added from the side. “That’s a big problem.”

“I already have a rough idea about that,” Duncan said thoughtfully, recalling last night—especially the vague information he had sensed after linking with that huge vine and stepping onto that eerie version of the Vanished. “If the Dream of the Nameless One expands again, I should have a chance to test this idea.”

Shirley lifted her head and looked at Duncan, then at the others: “Then… what about this period? What are we going to do next?”

“We don’t know when the Dream of the Nameless One will change again,” Duncan said, turning his gaze to Lucretia. “Right now we have to find out whether other parts of the city-state were also affected last night. The fastest way is to contact the Governor of Lightwind Harbor.”

“Leave that to me,” Lucretia said at once. “I’ll go find Sara Mell in a bit and see if he noticed what happened last night.”

Duncan made a sound of agreement, then looked at Morris and Vanna: “We also need to investigate the nearby districts. We have to see whether, besides the elves, the other nonhuman folk living around Crown Street were affected by the dream, and whether they had any unusual experiences last night.”

“Understood,” Vanna nodded right away. “This is something I’m good at.”

Morris also nodded: “I know some old friends at Truth Academy. When we investigate, I can ask them to help make things easier.”

Duncan’s gaze finally turned to Nina and Shirley.

“You two stay home for now,” Duncan said after a short pause. “We don’t need you to do anything yet. But if we find any clues about Suntists or Annihilators, we might need your help.”

Nina looked a little disappointed, but still answered obediently: “Oh…”

Shirley, beside her, asked curiously: “What about you?”

“I’m going back to the ship,” Duncan said as he rose from the sofa. “I’ll leave now.”

Alice stood up without thinking: “Then I’ll go too!”

Duncan stopped and gave the doll a puzzled look: “Why are you coming along?”

Alice thought for a moment, glanced at the others in the living room, then scratched her hair and said, perfectly justified: “I don’t know either!”

Duncan was speechless.

After a brief silence, he suddenly laughed and sighed.

“Fine. If you want to come, then come along. I don’t feel at ease leaving you in the city anyway.”

Alice brightened at once: “Hehe…”

A short while later, everyone set out according to the plan.

Chapter 577: Goathead’s Memory

Out at sea off Lightwind Harbor, near the edge of the area lit by the glowing geometric body, fog gathered over the water. A huge ghost ship hid within the mist and slowly patrolled the ocean.

A streak of ghost-green flame flashed through the thick fog.

A doorway of fire burst open on the deck of the Vanished, and Duncan and Alice stepped out through it.

The familiar deck, the familiar masts, the familiar spirit form sails. Even though he had been away only a short time, Duncan still felt a wave of relief when he returned to the Vanished. As he looked at these familiar sights on the ship and felt the salty sea breeze over the deck, he slowly let out a breath and felt his mood calm down bit by bit.

At the same time, he instinctively remembered the “vision” he had seen last night while probing that huge vine. He remembered that eerie Vanished sailing through dark, thick mist—

The scene in his memory overlapped naturally with what was before his eyes now, as if there was no difference between them.

“…They really were exactly the same…” he muttered under his breath.

“Huh?” Alice’s voice sounded from beside him at once: “What’s exactly the same?”

Duncan shook his head and glanced at the silly doll who had followed him even though she did not know what she was going to do. A smile appeared on his face.

“I’m going to the captain’s cabin to talk with the First Mate. You go do your own things first.”

“Oh, okay!” Alice nodded at once: “Then I’ll go to the kitchen and take care of the fish and dried meat we salted earlier. Shirley and Nina said they wanted to eat them~~”

As she spoke, the doll waved to Duncan and walked happily toward the kitchen. It was clear that as soon as she returned to the Vanished, her mood improved right away.

Then again, she usually seemed cheerful anyway. She was happy on the ship and happy in the city as well—inside Alice’s head, it seemed there were only two moods: “happy” and “even happier.”

Watching the doll’s light steps as she left, Duncan’s lips also curled up a little. Then he shook his head, straightened his expression, and turned to walk toward the aft deck.

The door of the captain’s cabin appeared before him. Duncan stopped in front of it and looked up at the doorframe.

The words “Door of the Lost Ones” came into view. The carved letters looked old and powerful, their grooves sunken as if they carried the weight of countless ages.

Duncan quietly cast his gaze over the words on the doorframe. The only difference between the eerie Vanished that sailed in dark mist and the ship now under his feet seemed to be this line of words on the captain’s cabin door.

Of course, there might be other differences between the two ships, and those differences might hold more clues. But their last contact had been too rushed for him to find them. For now, the only thing he was sure of was that the Door of the Lost Ones showed different details on the two ships.

The Door of the Lost Ones was extremely special—even on the Vanished, which was full of anomalies and strange powers, this door was still extraordinary.

It was the only "path" Duncan had to return to his small apartment. It was also a checkpoint this ship used to verify the captain's authority. The words on its doorframe did not belong to any known language, but anyone who looked at them could still read their meaning, even someone like Alice, who had been illiterate at first, or a native from some remote city-state who only knew obscure local characters.

On different "versions" of the Vanished, this door also showed different states. In the Mortal Realm, it led to that apartment. In Subspace, behind it lay a strange dark space. In the mist, the words on the door changed to "May He Wander in the Dream"—and a familiar yet strange Goathead slept within that door.

…Just what was this so-called Door of the Lost Ones?

With that question and many thoughts in his heart, Duncan reached out and opened the captain's cabin door.

In the swaying lamplight, the familiar chart table and shelves came into view. Goathead, perched on the edge of the table, creaked and turned its head this way. When it saw Duncan, its obsidian-carved eyes seemed to light up, and its cheerful, noisy voice rang in Duncan's ears: "Oh! The great captain has returned to his loyal Vanished! Your loyal—well, you know the rest—salutes you! I didn't expect you back so soon. Was life in the city pleasant? Were you worried about the ship, or did you come back because…"

“I have something I want to talk to you about.” Duncan walked to the chart table and spoke in a very serious tone.

The captain’s solemn words instantly cut off Goathead’s chatter. The eerie black wooden idol gave a creak and straightened its neck like someone snapping to attention, as if trying hard to look serious. Its voice could not help but carry a hint of tension: “Captain, what happened? Did something happen in Lightwind Harbor too?”

Duncan sat down at the chart table. His eyes first fell on the enchanted sea chart on the table, on the familiar fog and the route. Then he heard Goathead’s words and frowned: “Why did you say ‘too’?”

“Because Pland and Frostholm both had incidents before…”

Duncan stared into Goathead’s eyes: “The way you put it makes me sound like a walking calamity.”

Goathead seemed a little stunned: “…Aren’t you?”

“I’ve been working hard to improve the Vanished’s official image on the Boundless Sea, and I’ve had great success in Pland and Frostholm. The leaders of both city-states are very friendly to me now, and I haven’t received any complaints from any city-state so far. As my First Mate, I hope you can look at our work with a more forward-looking eye,” Duncan said, waving his hand. “Of course, that’s not what I came to talk about today. I want to know what you were doing last night.”

“Last night?” Goathead paused, not understanding why the topic suddenly shifted this way, but still answered quickly: “Last night I was watching over the ship, just as you ordered. We stayed in waters far from the official route and kept ourselves hidden in the fog, so we wouldn’t scare those easily spooked fellows…”

Duncan was not surprised by this answer.

From the conversation he had last night with that “eerie Goathead,” it was clear the other one did not know him. The two Goatheads were obviously not the same.

But there had to be some other connection between them.

After thinking for a moment, he broke the silence again: “I want to learn more about you—your origin, your past, and your… nature.”

His tone was extremely serious. His expression was unusually solemn, and his slightly leaning body seemed to give off a silent pressure.

He chose to address this with his First Mate in the most direct way, rather than hiding his intentions or probing with roundabout questions.

He did not need those methods—at least not on this ship. He already knew the rules by which the Vanished operated, and he had worked out his own “code of conduct” here. He already understood that as long as he did not take that overly dangerous step, both Goathead and the Vanished itself would remain in a kind of “stable” state. It was something like… a form of containment.

Visions could not be “contained” the way anomalies could. But in this world there were always anomalies and manifestations that went beyond the usual rules. Vision 005 – the Vanished was actually already in a kind of contained state now—Duncan himself was the containment condition for this ship.

Goathead seemed frightened.

It was used to the captain’s usual mild and friendly manner. It knew that although the captain had a very terrifying side, he was always reliable and kind when dealing with his own people on the ship. The way Duncan was acting now, and the questions he was asking, filled it with a kind of… unease.

“…Why are you asking this all of a sudden?” it asked without thinking.

“I never asked before because there was no need,” Duncan said slowly. “But now some things have happened. In Lightwind Harbor, a strange phenomenon appeared that is connected to you. So I have to ask you about it.”

Goathead’s neck swayed slightly from side to side, as if it were trying to ease its nervousness.

Duncan kept staring into its eyes and slowly pressed his hand onto the chart table.

Threads of ghostly green flame spread from his palm, seeping into the floor and walls of the captain’s cabin, and into every seam of the ship. A low creaking sound came from deep within the hull, and it seemed as if the very “mood” of the ship was quietly changing.

“I am Duncan Abnomar, the captain of this ship,” Duncan said. His voice was deep, as if he had gone back to the day he first took the helm, declaring his identity to the whole ship. “I command this ship and make it sail on the Boundless Sea. As the captain, I am asking my First Mate some questions. This is only a conversation—because of it, this ship will not sink back into Subspace, and nothing else will change. Because—I am Duncan Abnomar, the captain of this ship.”

Blazing ghostly green flames rose from every part of Duncan’s body. In the fire, his figure turned into a terrifying, hazy spirit form. His voice seemed to echo through the whole ship—

“My First Mate, where exactly did you come from?”

Goathead lifted its head and calmly met Duncan’s gaze: “I came from Subspace.”

“Details,” Duncan said. “Subspace is too vague a concept. You know that’s not what I’m really asking.”

“Subspace is a vague concept, and also the only concept. There are no ‘places’ in Subspace, Captain, and the beings in Subspace have no past or future,” Goathead replied. It suddenly seemed to lose all hesitation, and there was no more doubt or fear in its words. “I don’t know my origin. I don’t know what happened in the past. You want to know my ‘nature’—but even I don’t know my ‘nature’. I… don’t remember.”

“Then what do you still remember?”

Goathead suddenly fell silent. Under Duncan’s gaze, it became as still as a real wooden carving. After who knew how long, it suddenly moved again, and a hoarse, deep voice came from its throat: “‘Remember them.’”

“Remember them?” Duncan was startled, and his brows drew together: “What does that mean?”

Goathead shook its head slightly: “I don’t know, but this is the only sentence I remember. I have to remember them. I must remember them. But… I don’t know who they are. I really… don’t remember.”

Chapter 578: Agatha’s Information

Duncan knew Goathead had no reason to lie to him. Or rather, even if it wanted to, it would not use such clumsy acting.

That one stray sentence was the only memory the First Mate had brought back from Subspace. It really seemed not to know what had happened, or what came before and after that line.

Duncan braced both hands on the table and sat back down in the chair behind the chart table. He looked closely into Goathead’s eyes, as if he wanted to dig more secrets out of those obsidian-carved pupils: “So, a very long time ago, there were people who were very important to you. You tried desperately to remember them. Back then, you already knew you would one day forget many things, so ‘remember them’ became a strong thought in your mind… It was so strong, yet it still could not stop what happened. Now, all you remember is this one sentence.”

“Maybe… that was it,” Goathead said, a bit unsure. “But I do not feel regret. I just feel confused sometimes…”

It muttered as it spoke, then suddenly stopped and looked up at Duncan: “Captain, what exactly happened? What kind of thing could still be related to me?”

Duncan sat in the chair, lost in thought. He curled his fingers and tapped lightly on the table. The flame of his spirit form turned into ripples like water and spread out with each tap.

“…The Nameless One’s dream grew in influence and last night spread into the Mortal Realm. I touched one of the ‘roots’ that extended from that dream into the Mortal Realm. If my guess is right… what I reached was one of the world’s foundations in the original faith of the Elves, Atlantis.”

A sharp crack came from beneath Goathead’s neck. Its whole head froze on the pedestal.

Duncan glanced at it and said calmly: “You snapped too early.”

“Ah… huh?”

“After I touched Atlantis, I entered a dimension that was neither dream nor the Mortal Realm. Another Vanished was sailing in that dimension. And on that Vanished… there was another you.”

Goathead’s neck gave another loud crack at once.

Duncan ignored the eerie noises coming from his eerie First Mate. He calmly told Goathead about his experience last night, especially the changes in the Gate of the Lost Ones on that strange ghost ship, and the odd reactions of that other Goathead who felt both familiar and strange.

As he spoke, he kept watching the Goathead in front of him, studying its expression and movements.

Its reaction did not seem suspicious. It was shock, and nothing but shock. Even with that stiff wooden face, the stunned look was clear at a glance.

“You look very surprised,” Duncan finally finished telling the whole story and nodded to the First Mate on the table. “Now you know why I am taking this so seriously.”

“I… yes, now I fully understand your reaction,” Goathead said hesitantly. “But I do not know… I do not remember…”

“I should have mentioned this to you. In Subspace, I also saw a Vanished. That ship was badly damaged, like a shadow of the Vanished after even longer ages of decay and rot. But the only strange thing about that ship was the ship itself. You were not on it,” Duncan said slowly. “And now I have seen a third Vanished. It sails in darkness and fog, and there is another you on board. What about the future? Will there be a fourth ship, a fifth? In the end, what state is this ship in right now? Do you have no clue at all?”

Goathead hesitated. This time it stayed silent for a long while, as if it was trying to find a “safe” way to face this topic. After who knew how long, it finally spoke: “I do not know if you will run into a fourth or fifth Vanished. I do not know into how many strange ‘states’ this ship can split or appear. But there is one thing that may help your thinking… this ship has not always looked like this.”

“Not always like this?” Duncan frowned. “I guess… you are not talking about the change that happened when the Vanished fell into Subspace?”

“No. The change was much greater than that, much more complete,” Goathead slowly shook its head. “In my broken and messy memories, it once took many forms: huge blocks of iron, swelling and writhing flesh, dark and icy rock, abstract and terrifying Shadows. In the deepest part of Subspace, it could look different at any moment. This state lasted for…”

Goathead suddenly stopped.

Duncan heard a low creak and a disturbing, muffled echo coming from deep in the ship. The floor under his feet trembled slightly. A tense, uneasy feeling slowly spread through the whole ship, as if the entire vessel was shivering and losing its stability.

“Let us stop here. I can picture the state you are describing,” Duncan said softly.

Goathead nodded carefully.

The tension and trembling that filled the ship slowly faded. In the Mortal Realm, the ship returned to a stable state again.

Duncan kept his brows knitted, deep in thought.

Just now, the ship had almost collapsed into some other form because of Goathead's description. But under his own gaze as captain, it finally returned to a stable containment state.

So, had the brief change in the Vanished just now been showing him some kind of "essence" of the ship? Or… something even more?

After thinking in silence for a while, Duncan shook his head and let his gaze fall back on Goathead: "What do you think about the 'other you' on that ship?"

"I am sorry, Captain. I do not know."

Goathead muttered in frustration. In this short time, these seemed to be the words it said the most, along with "I do not remember."

Duncan was not surprised by this answer. He went on and asked another question: "Do you dream?"

"Dream?" Goathead was stunned for a moment, then quickly shook its head. This time it answered very smoothly: "I do not dream. Your loyal First Mate is always awake. After all, this ship still depends on me to keep an eye on everything at all times…"

Duncan ignored the boasting in the second half. After hearing Goathead's answer, he only murmured thoughtfully: "You do not dream…"

Goathead spoke again, a bit uneasy: "Captain…"

Duncan looked at it: "Speak."

Goathead looked a bit awkward and hesitated for a long time before speaking: “You just mentioned that on that eerie Vanished, the door to the captain’s cabin had the words ‘May He wander in the dream’ written on it. And the ‘me’ in that captain’s cabin also mentioned the name Atlantis to you. Are you suspecting…”

“Yes.” Duncan nodded calmly before it could finish.

Goathead suddenly did not know how to continue.

“But all I can do is suspect,” Duncan went on. “Unless one day you suddenly recover your memory and tell me with your own mouth that you have a name… and that name is ‘Saslokar’.”

Silence fell over the captain’s cabin.

After who knew how long, Goathead finally broke the silence, muttering: “Most of the Elves’ ancient tales are bizarre and full of contradictions. You cannot really take them as truth…”

“But the more bizarre and self-contradictory an ancient tale is, the more it is worth digging into once it suddenly links up with clues in the Mortal Realm,” Duncan said, calm and serious. “In the end, you do not know your own past either, do you?”

“Even so, this is still too strange,” Goathead grumbled. “I do not want to be tied to an ancient story of that level. And honestly, look at me now. I am just a piece of sculpture on the ship…”

Duncan neither agreed nor argued. He only shook his head and sighed, then rose from beside the chart table and walked slowly to the window. He looked out at the rail bathed in sunlight and mist, and at the rolling sea in the distance.

A light, glass-tapping sound suddenly reached his ears.

Duncan immediately looked toward the sound.

Agatha's ghostly figure quietly appeared on the windowpane and raised a hand to point in a certain direction.

Duncan frowned slightly, then turned back to glance at Goathead, who was still muttering by the edge of the chart table.

After a brief pause, he walked over and said: "Do not think too much about it for now. No matter what, your first duty now is to be the Vanished's First Mate. Help me watch over this ship. Leave the other matters to me."

Goathead gave a little jolt, as if it suddenly woke up. It looked at its captain, who was lowering his head to look at it, seemed stunned for a moment, then hurriedly answered: "Ah, ah, yes, Captain, I… I understand."

"Good," Duncan nodded slightly, then walked toward the door in the back of the captain's cabin. "I will go back to my room to rest for a while and sort out my thoughts."

Goathead's voice came from behind him at once: "Yes, Captain!"

Duncan did not look back. He waved a hand and walked into his own captain's quarters. After closing the door behind him, he did not really go to rest. Instead he went to the mirror in the corner of the room.

After listening for a moment to make sure it was quiet outside, Duncan stepped forward and tapped on the mirror with a curled finger.

Shadows and smoke rose within the glass. Agatha's figure appeared in the mirror. The former Gatekeeper, who now lived in the Vanished's mirrors, nodded to Duncan in greeting.

"You have something to tell me, and you chose to say it here. Is it to avoid the First Mate?" Duncan's face was serious. "What is going on?"

“I heard your talk with the First Mate, Captain. I have a situation to report,” Agatha nodded and said solemnly. “Last night, nothing was normal on the Vanished. Its ‘shadow’ disappeared for a time.”

Chapter 579: The Spreading Influence

When Duncan heard Agatha's report, his first reaction was to glance at the bedroom door from the corner of his eye.

Then he drew back his gaze and looked at the former Gatekeeper in the mirror, his expression unusually serious: "You mean its reflection on the sea?"

"Not just its reflection on the sea, but also its projection in the Spirit Realm. Under normal conditions these two 'shadows' are deeply linked and affect each other," Agatha said seriously. "Late last night, I was moving through the mirrors on the ship as usual, checking the whole vessel, when I suddenly found this problem. At the time I thought it was just some 'special feature' of the Vanished itself. After all, I know very little about it…"

"The Vanished does not have that kind of feature. At least as far as I know, its 'shadow' would not suddenly vanish for no reason," Duncan shook his head. "When did this happen? How long did it roughly last?"

Agatha nodded at once: "Judging by the time, it happened during the period you mentioned, when the Nameless One's dream was spreading. It lasted until the first gleam of dawn appeared on the sea horizon."

Duncan did not speak. He only frowned hard, and a look of deep thought came over his face.

After a brief silence, Agatha went on: “When the Vanished’s shadow disappeared, I happened to be moving through mirrors in the Mortal Realm. Normally, I can use those mirrors to ‘jump’ straight into the Spirit Realm, or step into the Vanished’s reflection on the sea. But last night, those ‘jumping paths’ vanished along with the Vanished’s shadow…”

“But from what I felt… the realm on the ‘other side’ of the mirrors did not truly stop existing. Instead there was some barrier I could not understand, blocking me. It kept me from seeing the path in the mirror or sensing what lay beyond…”

Listening to Agatha’s account, Duncan seemed to think of something: “You mean… you believe the Vanished’s ‘shadow’ did not really vanish, but shifted into a state you could not understand or observe at the time. Or in other words, there was a wall of ‘perception’ that kept you locked on the Mortal Realm side?”

“That is a good way to put it,” Agatha said, looking a bit relieved. “I thought my description would be too abstract, and that it would take a lot of effort to explain it to you…”

“In Pland and Frostholm, I have dealt with all sorts of ‘Veils’,” Duncan said casually. Then he thought for a moment and glanced toward the door. “So, after hearing my talk with Goathead, you became suspicious, because my First Mate did not mention last night’s anomaly at all.”

“I do not know why this happened. In theory… it should be able to sense changes in the Spirit Realm. Its senses in that area might not be as sharp as mine, but it should not be completely unaware,” Agatha said, her tone slightly hesitant. “Especially with what you just mentioned: the existence of another ‘Goathead’, and that one’s strange and suspicious behavior…”

Duncan let out a slow breath and said: “You think Goathead is no longer reliable, because it may be hiding something from me.”

“…I know that as a new crew member, I should not question the ship’s First Mate. That is a serious taboo. But as a former Gatekeeper, I have an instinctive… ‘alertness’ toward things like this,” Agatha chose her words with care and spoke sincerely. “Many irreversible disasters all start from a small feeling that something is ‘not quite right’.”

Duncan listened in silence, neither agreeing nor denying.

After a long time, he finally spoke, still thinking it through: “There may be two explanations. Either Goathead knows what happened but chose not to tell me and is hiding things on purpose, or even it does not know what changed on the Vanished last night.”

Agatha froze for a moment, then quickly reacted: “The second explanation would mean…”

“That some force is affecting this ship. Goathead is also within the range of that influence,” Duncan said sternly. “You were not affected, so you could see the changes that happened to the Vanished during the night.”

…

Humming a cheerful tune whose name she could not even remember, Alice bustled back and forth in the kitchen.

For her, the busy days on the Vanished were always the happiest.

Here she had everything she knew: the familiar deck, the familiar kitchen, the familiar pots and pans, and the familiar barrels, knives, and spatulas.

They were all her Friends. Everything on this ship was her Friend. And most of the time, she felt that dealing with the Friends on the ship was much easier than dealing with people in the city-states.

Going into the cities and dealing with people meant she had to learn too much, remember too much knowledge, and pay attention to a pile of dull “rules” that made her sleepy. Those beings called Humans were always far too fragile. They let countless “threads” float off them with no protection, and if she casually grabbed one, they would break in strange, unfixable ways. They were even more precious and fragile than the ship’s porcelain and glassware.

But the captain cared a lot about those “people”. He did not want her to tug at the “threads” on others at will, and he especially did not want her to break people who were not supposed to be broken.

For Alice, that was a little hard.

It was as hard as putting a cat in a room full of yarn balls and then not letting it touch a single loose end.

So after the novelty of a few trips into the cities wore off, Alice found that she still liked living on the ship best. Because here, she could hardly beat anyone at all.

She just had to be careful not to “touch” the Friends who lived on the ship with her.

She liked it this way. She liked the world around her feeling solid and stable.

She lifted the lid of a barrel of salted fish and leaned in carefully to sniff the smell inside. A satisfied look appeared on Alice’s face.

The captain never quite understood this, and neither did the others on the ship. Why would a doll have a sense of smell?

Alice herself did not know, but she never thought too much about it.

She only felt satisfied with her craft. She picked up a wooden basin from the side, ready to take some salted fish out of the barrel. She reached her hand toward the barrel, but before she could grab anything, a long-handled ladle on the counter suddenly jumped up and smacked her arm with a loud slap.

Alice cried out, quickly pulled her hand back, and protested: “I washed my hands! I just washed them!”

The long-handled ladle wobbled by the rim of the barrel and still refused to move aside.

Alice pouted, a bit unhappy: “You are no fun!”

The ladle slowly floated up. The bowl of the spoon made little gestures in front of the doll.

“…Fine,” Alice finally gave in with a sigh, muttering as she grabbed the handle. “It was just that last time my head fell into the barrel when I bent over to get something. Do you really have to make such a fuss over it…”

She scooped fish out of the barrel and chatted idly with the Friends in the kitchen. Sometimes she talked about what she had seen in the city-states. Sometimes she talked about things related to the captain.

Then she began to check the other containers that held stored food. Since AI could supply the Vanished with fresh ingredients at any time, most of the food stored here was processed things that could be kept for many years. Salted fish was the most popular among them.

There were twelve big barrels used to store salted fish.

Starting from the door, Alice counted along the wall: one, two, three, four… twelve, thirteen.

She suddenly stopped.

The doll girl blinked in confusion, went back to the start, and counted again.

There were still thirteen.

One more barrel had appeared.

Alice stood dazed in front of the row of barrels, her mind working hard. At first she suspected that she had messed up the numbers again. Her math had never been very good. Sometimes she was even worse than Shirley. But soon she felt she could not be that stupid. After all, it was only counting twelve barrels.

She already knew how to add and subtract numbers with more than two digits.

So Alice rubbed her eyes, calmed herself, and counted again.

Twelve.

The extra number from before was gone. Everything was back to normal.

Alice counted the barrels again and again. At last she was sure she had not miscounted anymore, yet her puzzlement did not ease at all. She turned her head and looked at the other things in the kitchen, then could not help asking curiously: “Did you notice? Just now it felt like there was one more barrel!”

But the Friends in the kitchen had no way to answer her for real. Even if they could speak, these things were at most Restless Objects that showed some traits of living beings only because of the Vanished’s special environment. They did not have full minds that could help solve a doll’s confusion.

Alice got no answer, so she turned back again and patted the big barrels lined up along the wall: “Was there one more among you just now?”

The barrels did not answer her either.

…

Sara Mell stared in shock as the “witch of the sea” spoke to her. She did not even notice the food slipping from her hand onto the table.

She no longer cared to complain that this freecoming witch had barged into her home early in the morning and interrupted her breakfast.

“All these unbelievable things… they all happened last night?”

The Elven governor spoke in disbelief. At first she wanted to say, “Are you making fun of me?” but when she thought about this witch’s temper, she decided not to make such a pointless provocation.

“Judging from your reaction, things are just as I expected,” Lucretia sighed. She sat on the chair opposite Sara Mell. The servants, who had been shaking in fear in the dining room, had already been driven out before she started talking “business”. Now only she and the governor were left. “The reach of that ‘dream’… was wider than we thought.”

Chapter 580: Touching the Edge

Sara Mell no longer cared about his breakfast.

This former legendary explorer, who had seen countless strange and eerie sights on the Boundless Sea, faced many layers of corruption and death, and built a city-state at the end of the storm, now rarely showed an uneasy expression. He sat in his chair with his brows tightly drawn together, while a long-lost shadow of unease spread through his heart.

He knew this feeling well. It was the warning his instincts gave when a huge, bizarre danger, beyond human understanding and resistance, slowly drew near.

He did not doubt Lucretia's account.

This was not his first time dealing with the "Sea Witch". Countless Deep-Sea Captains and frontier explorers saw this Witch as one of the Shadows on the Boundless Sea and were deeply wary of her strange temper and dangerous power. But Sara Mell knew very clearly that, in the end, the Sea Witch still stood on the side of Mortals.

The dining room stayed quiet for a long time before Sara Mell finally came out of his thoughts. He raised his head and said: "So far, no one has reported anything strange last night. Neither the local elven residents nor the nonhuman folk living here noticed the dream you mentioned."

"From what my Father saw, the anomaly in the district was very obvious and on a large scale. If some parts of the city had really stayed normal, then the residents of those 'normal' districts could not have failed to notice the anomalies in the neighboring streets. So the only explanation is that last night… the whole of Lightwind Harbor was Dreamwalking."

Lucretia's last sentence sent an indescribable chill through Sara Mell, but his reason still pushed him to think about what did not fit in the logic. He asked: "You said the buildings in the Mortal Realm were covered or even parasitized by 'corruption entities' spreading from the dream, with huge plants piercing through walls and streets? None of that left any trace?"

"No trace was left. Before the Sun rose, the Mortal Realm had already returned to normal."

Sara Mell listened, frowning in silence, and seemed to fall into thought once more.

"What are you thinking of?" Lucretia asked curiously from the side.

"…Maybe I should send people to check all the gas meters and electricity meters across the city, and the night-time operation of the factories," Sara Mell said as he thought. "The city-state is not still at night. Many functions run day and night to keep it working, like the three pillars of gas, electricity, and steam. Each has its own night monitoring and patrol staff…

"So that raises a question: when that dream came, where did these people go? What state were the machines they should have been running in? And there are the night watch scholars at the colleges. Many of them need to record their work status at set times…"

Sara Mell paused to think, then went on: "We also have to find a way to figure out how far this anomaly spread. Was it limited to the main island of Lightwind Harbor, or did it reach the patrol fleet off the coast, or even the fallen relic over there…"

As this governor spoke, he stood up from behind the table and began to pace beside the dining table, stopping now and then to think with a grave look.

He seemed to have completely forgotten that there was still a “Sea Witch” sitting here.

Lucretia did not find it strange. She knew that before this governor became City Lord, he had first been an outstanding adventurer (though still not as good as Father). And a good adventurer knew how to deal with all kinds of extraordinary manifestations.

Lightwind Harbor had managed to thrive so close to the border sea all these years, and this governor’s ability was beyond doubt.

She had finished what Father had told her to do. Lucretia stood up without disturbing the governor, who was deep in thought. Her gaze swept over the table; she casually picked up a bottle of unopened spiced wine, and then her figure burst apart into a swirl of colorful paper scraps that spun up through the roof and vanished from the room.

After a while, Sara Mell suddenly came back to himself. He turned around in a hurry and said: “Ah, I’m sorry, I drifted off for a moment, Lady Lucretia, would you like to stay and have some—”

He stared blankly at the empty chair opposite the table, and at the spot where his treasured wine had been. That place was empty too.

“…Again?!”

…

“The number of barrels changed?”

In the captain’s cabin, after hearing Alice rush in to report, Duncan could not help but ask again in surprise.

“Yes, yes!” Alice nodded again and again. “I counted several times! I definitely didn’t count wrong! And I’m sure I remember it right. I moved all those barrels there myself.”

Alice would of course never lie. As for making a mistake with the number… she should not mess up something this simple either.

After a short pause, Duncan stood up from behind the chart table and said: “Take me to see it.”

“Okay!” Alice answered without any hesitation.

The Goathead at the edge of the chart table stirred. It turned its head toward Duncan, speaking with a hint of hesitation: “Captain, then I…”

“You keep steering,” Duncan said at once. He paused, then added: “Don’t worry about anything else. Like I said, leave it to me.”

“Yes, Captain.”

Led by Alice, Duncan soon reached the place where the salted fish were stored.

Of course, the place had already returned to normal. Twelve wooden barrels stood neatly in a row against the wall, no more and no less.

Duncan still kept a serious expression as his gaze swept the whole cabin.

Wherever he looked, faint strands of ghostly green flame flickered in the air like illusions and slipped quietly through the cracks in the floor and walls. The whole room seemed wrapped in a mist woven from spirit form fire, shifting back and forth between the Spirit Realm and the Mortal Realm.

He was checking whether any “traces” were left here, whether something that did not belong to the Vanished had entered this place.

Alice’s report did not sound like a big deal. On this ghost ship full of strange things, a single barrel not on the “list” hardly seemed worth such a fuss. But Duncan did not relax at all.

Because on the Boundless Sea, even the smallest oddity had to be treated with care—especially on the Vanished, and especially at a time like this.

Duncan had already sensed something was wrong from last night's events. His talk with Goathead today, and Agatha's report, made him feel more and more that something was off.

This ship seemed to be in a slightly strange state.

It had not slipped out of his control, but Duncan kept feeling that some "details" were appearing on this ship that he did not know or understand.

Either some hidden secrets of the Vanished were slowly lifting their veil to him, or some parts of the ship really were slowly slipping out of the captain's control.

As the spreading spirit form flames soaked through everything, Duncan felt his link with the Vanished grow stronger. Every detail of the ship began to appear in his mind—the deck, the masts, the sails, the complex winches and lines, the cabins below the deck, and the vague, shadowy parts that lay soaked in the Boundless Sea.

He had done this more than once, so the feeling was not new. After his senses quickly adjusted, he let his perception merge with the ship and continued to spread into the depths of the Vanished.

The cabin where the kitchen sat showed no anomalies. The nearby cabins and the deeper layers were also all normal.

Thin streams of light soaked into the depths of the Vanished, flowing through the ship like some kind of signal. They finally gathered in the captain's cabin, converging on a single bright "focus".

That was where Goathead sat, the control center of the ship at this moment.

Duncan's "gaze" lingered on that focus for a long time.

Everything there also looked normal.

Duncan slowly drew back his “gaze”—but he left a small flame in the deepest darkness.

At the same time, as he withdrew his gaze from the whole ship, he kept leaving Fire Seeds behind, letting them stay in different parts of the Vanished.

Alice watched the captain without blinking, a little worried. Only after a long time did she see Duncan’s eyes move. She hurried closer and asked: “Captain, Captain, how is it? Did you find anything?”

“There is no anomaly on the ship—don’t worry,” Duncan slowly showed a small smile and reached out to ruffle Alice’s hair. “It might just be some minor issue, like a bit of spatial misalignment or a trick of light and shadow. I’ll take care of it.”

Alice did not really understand, but she still nodded half in confusion: “Ah… oh.”

After briefly comforting the Doll, Duncan turned his gaze to a spot not far away.

On a pillar two meters away hung an oil lamp with a glass shade. Now shadows and mist slowly formed on the surface of that shade, and Agatha’s figure appeared in the glass.

“Keep an eye on the reflections in the Spirit Realm,” Duncan nodded to her. “If anything tries to cross the boundary, don’t handle it on your own. Tell me at once, and I’ll come back immediately.”

Agatha lowered her head and said: “I understand, Captain.”

Alice’s gaze went back and forth between Duncan and Agatha a few times. At last she could not help breaking the silence: “So are we still going into the city?”

“The Nameless One’s dream is spreading through Lightwind Harbor. To solve this, we still need to look for clues in the city-state first,” Duncan nodded. “I also have many questions I want to test in the city… Do you want to stay on the ship or come with me?”

Alice thought for a moment, then looked back toward the familiar ‘friends’ in the kitchen. After a short pause, she turned back with a bright smile.

“Let’s go to the city together!”

Chapter 581: Before the Dreamwalking

After leaving Sara Mell's residence, Lucretia did not return at once to her own place in the city. Instead, she went back to the Radiant Star, which was moored in the harbor.

A swirl of colorful paper scraps spun over the deck, along the corridor, and across the bridge, then flew into the captain's cabin. Lucretia's figure stepped out of the Phantom Wind. She casually set the bottle of spiced wine on a low cabinet beside her, then walked toward the dressing table where the scrying crystal sat.

In one corner of the room, the large stuffed rabbit doll lying on the bed suddenly moved. It jumped off the bed and hopped this way, calling out: "Mistress! You finally came back, Rabby was so bored on the ship…"

"I just came back for a bit. I still have to return to the city later," Lucretia glanced at the rather creepy stuffed rabbit doll and asked casually: "Any anomaly on the ship?"

"There's no anomaly on the ship, everything is~ just~ fine!" a playful girl's voice came from inside the rabbit, full of pride. "Rabby took good care of everything here, just like when Mistress is on board!"

"What about last night?" Lucretia asked again. "While we were docked in the harbor, did you see anything strange on shore?"

“On shore?” Rabby froze for a moment. It finally seemed to notice the serious look on its mistress’s face, and its playful pride quickly faded. “On shore… nothing seemed wrong, but Rabby didn’t pay much attention to what was happening there…”

Lucretia slowly frowned. After asking the stuffed rabbit doll a few more simple questions, she waved her hand and said: “That’s all for now. Go wait to the side first—later you and Lunie will come into the city with me.”

“Into the city?!” Rabby let out a short gasp, full of both surprise and joy. “You’re taking Rabby into the city? Are we going to play?”

Lucretia reached toward the scrying crystal in front of her. After hearing the stuffed rabbit doll’s words, she stayed silent for a second or two. Then, as her fingers touched the crystal, she said calmly: “For you, it might be fun.”

Rabby instantly jumped up in place with joy, then hopped back onto the bed. With a soft thump, it lay down exactly where it had been and began to wait patiently.

The scrying crystal slowly gave off light and a faint hum. After a while, a response finally came from within that glow. Tyrian’s figure hurriedly appeared in the light and grew clear.

“Lucy?” A voice came from the crystal. “Ah, I was just meeting several merchant delegates and didn’t notice the crystal—how are things on your side?”

“I’m fine.” Lucretia looked at her elder brother in the crystal. When she noticed the weariness on his face, she quietly put away the impatience she had felt from waiting so long. “It looks busy over there. You haven’t been resting much lately?”

“Honestly, things are already much better than before. At least I have a chance to finish my lunch at the table now,” Tyrian shrugged. Then he could not help glancing at the scene behind Lucretia, as if checking whether a certain person was in the picture. After a brief pause, he hesitated and asked: “Is Father… there with you?”

“Not right now. He’s busy with something else,” Lucretia answered, then added: “Stop being so nervous, Dad is very busy these days.”

“Oh.” Tyrian answered, then hesitated again and asked carefully: “These two days… how have you been getting along with him? Nothing happened, right? Do you need my help with anything?”

“Everything is fine,” Lucretia said casually. Then she thought for a moment and subtly turned her head so that the silver-white sea waves and feathered hair clip came into view. “He finally gave me this hair clip that’s a hundred years late. Somehow, it still looks brand new.”

Tyrian in the crystal froze. The worried look on his face stiffened. He stared blankly for a long moment before the corner of his mouth finally twitched: “…Huh?”

“He didn’t bring you a gift?” Lucretia turned her face back and asked very seriously.

Tyrian thought for a moment, pressed one hand to his forehead, and spoke in a tone of utter despair: “Sixteen shots of twenty?four pounders, three shots of thirty?two pounders, and I didn’t count the twelve pounders…”

Lucretia looked at him in silence for a long time before speaking softly: “You fired first.”

“…You called me just to say that?”

“Of course not.” Lucretia shook her head and finally spoke in a more serious tone: “I want you to pay attention to a few things in the near future. If anything happens, contact me at once.”

Tyrian became serious at once: “Pay attention to what?”

“Elves,” Lucretia said calmly. “If I remember correctly, Frostholm also has many elves who live there long term. The collaborative monitoring system between the Church, the Adventurers’ Association, and the city-state was just set up, and it hasn’t reacted yet, so I’m contacting you directly…”

…

At 99 Crown Street, in the back garden wrapped in trees, greenery, and walls that gave it a rather gloomy air, a burst of fire suddenly spread into a blazing doorway. Duncan and Alice stepped out of the gate.

Shirley, who had been spacing out while basking in the Sun in the backyard, jumped up at once and turned to run into the house—but after only two steps Duncan called her back: “What are you running for?”

Shirley stopped at once and froze in place. She turned her head and scratched her hair: “Right, what am I running for… Sorry, Captain, it was just reflex…”

“Always jumping at shadows,” Duncan frowned at the young lady. “Has Lucretia come back yet?”

“Not yet,” Shirley shook her head. “But Vanna and the old gentleman are back. They’re in the sitting room.”

Duncan nodded: “Good. Come in with me and let’s see what they found.”

“I’ll put these in the kitchen first,” Alice said as she walked off, holding a big wooden basin full of ingredients she had brought from the Vanished. “We can have fish soup tonight!”

Duncan gave the Doll a strange look. It seemed that inside Alice’s head there was a steady little logic tree of her own. No matter how big things became around her, as long as the Vanished didn’t blow up on the spot, she could calmly follow her own rhythm—going back to the Vanished to fetch fish, heading to the kitchen to cook…

Duncan even suddenly suspected that even if the Vanished really did explode right there, as long as he was still standing in front of this Doll, she would, after reacting, still stare blankly and ask what he wanted for dinner that night.

But that was not a bad thing. In this restless world, Duncan felt it was actually nice to have a Doll at his side who always only cared about what kind of soup they would simmer that night.

A short while later, Duncan arrived in the sitting room. Vanna and Morris, who had just finished a day of work in the city, were reporting what they had learned.

"…As things look now, the whole city-state seems to have been affected last night. That includes the local elven residents and the other races living in the city—no one noticed the change. As for the people who work at night, there seems to be a certain degree of 'cognitive confusion'…"

Vanna sat on the sofa and gave her report from the point of view of a professional inquisitor.

"In the morning I spoke with several artificers who had just come home from their shift at the steam pump house," she continued. "During our talks, I found they didn't remember the details of their night watch work last night, yet they still felt that everything had been normal and nothing had happened all night. Their minds were clear, but they had no awareness of the contradictions in their own words, as if…"

Vanna hesitated, as if searching for the right words, then went on: "As if they were still steeped in a 'waking dream'."

“So you’re saying that the people who were asleep at night all went through a dreamless night, while the people who worked at night ‘lost’ a piece of time out of nowhere and yet still felt everything was normal?” Duncan could not help asking as he listened to Vanna’s report. “Did you try to check the deeper layers of their mental state? Any signs of spiritual corruption?”

“I used some divine magic from the Deep Sea Church, but didn’t push it too far,” Vanna nodded. “After a first check, there are no signs of corruption on them. They just… ‘naturally formed wrong perceptions and memories’.”

Duncan rubbed his chin, thought for a moment, then raised his head and looked at Morris, who sat on the other sofa.

“I went to see a few old friends and told them about last night’s change. The academy has already begun its own investigation and is working on countermeasures. If Miss Lucretia’s side goes smoothly, the whole official response system of Lightwind Harbor will start moving,” Morris nodded. “But from what we know now, once the influence of the Nameless One’s dream grows stronger, everyone in the city-state will be affected. The only ones who can stay clear-headed and act inside or outside the dream will be you and those of us who follow you—and the academy and the city authorities won’t find it easy to move.

“Besides that, I also found several scholars who know elven traditional culture and legends well. I asked them for more details about the Great Demon God Saslokar, the world tree Atlantis, and the ‘Dream of Creation’. During that, I discovered something… rather interesting.”

Duncan grew curious at once: “Something interesting?”

“Yes,” Morris nodded. “In some narrative poems that few people know, there is a passage that goes like this—

‘Saslokar created the world’s first dream, yet He did not know what a dream was;

Mortals named it a dream, and so He became confused;

And then the Dreamless were born from His confusion…’”

Chapter 582: Gradually Gathering Intelligence

As he listened to the lines Morris had recorded from a passage of an ancient elven narrative poem, Duncan's expression grew thoughtful.

"Because of how long ago it was, crossing from the Age of Darkness to the time before the Age of City-States, these lines went through translation from ancient tongues and later repair and additions by scholars. They probably don't restore the original record one hundred percent, but I believe they still have a great deal of meaning," Morris went on. "They should be very helpful for our understanding of the Dream of Creation, and of the current phenomenon of the 'Nameless One's Dream'."

Duncan rubbed his chin, thinking as he said: "Saslokar created all things within dreams, yet did not know what a dream was… How do you think we should understand this line?"

Morris thought for a moment: "In my view, it may refer to the difference between a deity's perspective on the world and that of mortals, or perhaps to some special quality of Saslokar, the 'first Dreamwalking one' in the elven creation myth. For a deity who wandered in dreams, the boundary between dreams and the Mortal Realm might not have had any meaning at all. To Him, the Mortal Realm might have been nothing more than a dream that could be altered at any time, while dreams could at any moment be used to replace the Mortal Realm. That is why He 'did not know what a dream was'…"

“That is… a fairly reasonable explanation,” Duncan nodded slowly. “What about the later lines?”

“As for the last two lines, elven scholars actually have their own interpretations,” Morris answered. “They believe they refer to the day the Great Demon God Saslokar came to understand that the ‘elves’ He had created held a different understanding of the dreamscape. For the first time, He began to doubt the boundary between the Mortal Realm and dreams. That may have been a kind of ‘crisis’. In the midst of it, Saslokar almost ‘woke up’, and in that unstable state He created the group among the elves known as ‘the Dreamless’.”

“The Dreamless…” Duncan nodded slightly. “I remember the elves regard that as an inborn defect.”

“Yes. That fits the legends exactly. The Dreamless were born at a time when Saslokar was in an unstable state. They were the result of the Creator’s ‘daze’, and so they were flawed, doomed never to enter the ‘paradise of dreams’. However…”

Morris paused there, thought for a moment, then went on: “But precisely because of this, in a very small number of legends there is also a claim that Saslokar is in fact the patron god of the Dreamless. That reading has very little acceptance in elven society. It is somewhat better in modern times; in the ancient era it was basically considered heresy.”

“Saslokar as the patron of the Dreamless…” Vanna muttered nearby. “If I am not wrong, that must have been put forward when the Dreamless were suffering social discrimination and oppression and huddling together for warmth. Maybe at first it was only meant to give their own group some spiritual support.”

“Exactly so,” Morris nodded. “That idea first appeared in the Dark Age, and spread on certain ‘exile islands’ under the control of the elven city-states. At that time the elves believed the Dreamless were people afflicted by the curse. Their innate defect would cause ‘Great Hollows’ to appear in the dreamscape, which in turn drew nightmares and Shadows that devoured the heart. So they exiled their flawed kin to isolated islands on the edge of the civilized world…

“In those settlements far from the core of civilization, the first claims that ‘Saslokar is the patron of the Dreamless’ appeared. The exiles used that belief as a support to help them endure the hard and endless Long Night.

“Later, as the times changed and the influence of the faith in the Four Gods grew, and as the exile lands themselves gradually rose in power, this practice of exile was slowly abolished. The ‘special cultures’ that had arisen in those exile lands also flowed back into mainstream elven society. But clearly, although the mainstream could accept the kin who had once been exiled, it could not accept those ‘heretical’ cultures of theirs…”

Duncan listened in silence. In his mind he could not help linking this information with the recent Anomaly incident in Lightwind Harbor and the scattered clues. The pieces of information rearranged themselves in his head, and faintly he felt as if he was about to touch that most crucial chain of logic.

But he still lacked some more effective points of reference, some more useful intelligence…

While he was thinking, a familiar presence suddenly appeared within his senses.

From the direction of the entrance hall came the sound of a servant opening the door and offering a greeting, followed by approaching footsteps. A moment later, Lucretia’s figure appeared in the sitting room.

The clockwork doll Lunie followed behind Lucretia. The doll, dressed as a maid, held in her arms an especially large cloth stuffed rabbit doll with a bizarre and unsettling look.

In the next second, that bizarre, creepy stuffed rabbit doll suddenly twitched. Then it quickly jumped down from Lunie's arms to the floor, bouncing as it let out a shrill voice: "Finally here, finally here! Rabby has finally come into the city! Today Rabby is going to make a big—"

Duncan silently watched the stuffed rabbit doll, and the other gazes in the room also fell one after another on that eerie rabbit.

The strange toy that had been hopping around the sitting room a heartbeat earlier, loudly declaring it was going to cause a commotion, instantly froze. It slowly lifted its head, the button-sewn eyes checking the situation in the room. After two or three seconds it finally shivered, then slowly walked over to the corner farthest from Duncan. With a soft plop it sat down and began pretending to be a real little doll.

It all happened very quickly. Nina and Shirley, sitting across from Duncan, did not even understand what had just happened.

Two seconds later, Lucretia's voice finally broke the silence in the sitting room: "Don't mind it. It is sometimes not very well-behaved, so I rarely bring it into the city."

Then she turned to Duncan and nodded with a slight smile: "But with you here, Rabby should be better behaved than ever before."

The doll Lunie also stepped forward and bowed to Duncan: "Good day, Old Master."

After greeting him, the clockwork doll lifted her head, as if searching for something nearby.

“Alice is in the kitchen,” Duncan could not help but laugh. “If you want to find her, go ahead.”

Lunie turned her head to confirm once more with her mistress. After receiving permission, she happily left the sitting room.

Duncan’s gaze then fell on Lucretia: “Did everything go smoothly?”

“Everything went smoothly. I have already met with Sara Mell, then went back to the Radiant Star once more and mentioned to Tyrian what happened here…”

Listening to Lucretia recount her actions for the day, Duncan nodded slightly, then let out a long breath.

“Good. I understand the general situation. Since everyone is here now… it is time I told you what I have found on my side.”

Everyone in the sitting room instinctively adjusted their posture at once. Even Shirley, who had been nodding off a little just now, instantly perked up.

They had heard something different in the captain’s tone.

Duncan did not keep them in suspense. He quickly told them what he knew so far, especially his guesses concerning “Goathead”.

However, he did not speak much about the odd “details” aboard the Vanished. That part would only heighten everyone else’s unease and would be of no real help at this stage in dealing with the anomaly in Lightwind Harbor.

The mere conjecture that there might be a connection between Goathead and Saslokar was already enough to plunge the entire room into dead silence.

For a long time after Duncan finished outlining the situation, no one spoke.

Everyone stared at one another in bewilderment, until Nina broke the silence: “That Goathead who nags all day long… could be connected to the ‘Great Demon God Saslokar’ from elven legends? Isn’t that a bit…”

“It is an outlandish conjecture, but at present several clues seem to point in that direction,” Duncan said seriously. “Goathead himself does not know his own origin. That eerie ship, the Vanished, which sails through the mist, just happened to appear at midnight, when the influence of the Nameless One’s Dream is at its strongest. On the door of the captain’s cabin of that ship are written the words ‘May He wander in dreams’—a phrase that clearly connects to ancient elven legends. Add to that the suspicious Goathead aboard that ship, his strange condition, and his odd reaction when Atlantis was mentioned… All of this cannot be a coincidence.”

Lucretia’s expression shifted rapidly, an unusual, heavy unease appearing in her eyes. She could not help glancing at her father several times before she finally spoke, hesitant: “Goathead… I remember you said it was a being from Subspace. Leaving aside why the ‘god of creation’ from ancient elven legends would have become like that, even if Goathead really is connected to ‘Saslokar’, then how would the Vanished…”

She stopped, as if unable to find suitable words to go on. After several seconds she finally continued: “How did the Vanished end up entangled with all of this?”

Duncan noticed the source of Lucretia’s unease.

She was speaking about the Vanished—yet all of her tension seemed to fall upon herself.

“Don’t be afraid, Lucy. Nothing has entered a runaway state,” Duncan said slowly. His voice was steady, carrying a reassuring strength. “Subspace holds too many secrets. Even I cannot say clearly how much it has affected the Vanished. But one thing is certain: as long as I still possess my humanity, that ship will not enter a runaway state again. And right now, I am very clear?headed."

"Right, right, right," Shirley hurried to speak. The shocking news she had just heard had made her whole body tense. Hearing Duncan's words now, she seemed to be bolstering her own courage as she blurted out: "With the captain around, that ship can't go wrong. The captain, he even has human nature…"

Duncan was speechless: "…?"

Several gazes around them instantly focused on Shirley, but she still had not realized it and kept talking: "the Vanished does have some odd places about it normally, but…"

Dog finally emerged from the Shadows beside the sofa and slapped a paw down on Shirley's head: "Shut up!"

Chapter 583: The Need for a Capture Operation

In any case, Shirley’s thoughtless interruption did succeed in easing the tense, heavy atmosphere in the sitting room—though the mood had nearly been dragged off in another direction.

Duncan had a hard time forcing his expression back under control. Then he ignored Shirley, who had realized what she said and almost curled herself into a ball to squeeze into the gap in the sofa, and cleared his throat twice as he said: “Anyway, for now this is all the intelligence we have. The fog is still thick, but it is very clear that the Vanished has already become part of this vortex. That is different from what happened before in Pland and Frostholm.

“No matter how things develop next, I have to figure out what exactly this so?called Nameless One’s Dream is, and what those cultists’ goals really are—especially the second point.

“Annihilators, Suntists, and the Enders hiding behind them—no matter which kind, if we can take them alive, we take them alive. If we cannot, we still have to find ways to gather as much intelligence as possible when we engage them… The Nameless One’s Dream will not simply fade away. It will definitely appear again, and as long as this vortex continues, we cannot avoid further dealings with those cultists.”

At this point Duncan suddenly stopped. He glanced thoughtfully at Shirley, who sat on the sofa with her head lowered, trying her best to reduce her presence, and at Dog, lying beside her.

Shirley instantly felt the gaze fall on her. She jolted and jerked her head up: “I’m sorry, Captain, I shouldn’t have said you have human nature just now…”

“Did you and Dog sense the aura of that fleeing Annihilator today?” Duncan waved his hand, cutting off her reflexive rambling. “I remember you said that when you encountered him before in the Nameless One’s Dream, Dog left a ‘mark’ on that cultist.”

“No.” Before Shirley could answer, Dog was already shaking his head. “I’ve been paying attention to that all day, but as far as I can tell, that cultist does not seem to be in Lightwind Harbor.”

“This time these aberrant cultists are hiding in lairs scattered across the city?states, relying only on entering the Nameless One’s Dream to ‘coordinate their actions’. That indeed makes it very hard for us to catch them in the Mortal Realm,” Vanna added. “Even worse, they clearly have already grasped some of the ‘rules’ of the Nameless One’s Dream. That allows them to move in and out of that ‘dream’ freely, which makes them even harder to deal with.”

Vanna’s words made Duncan frown as well. It was indeed vexing to know that the cultists were moving everywhere, yet, because of a lack of intelligence and an overly cunning enemy, have no easy way to act. And for Duncan, his troubles at this moment did not stop there—

He had once actually managed to “capture” an Annihilator who had entered a Dreamwalking state, and had even used that cultist’s eyes to locate a hideout where a cult gathering was taking place. But he had been unable to expand on that success. The keen senses of the Abyssal demons and the fragile ecology of the symbiotic pacts of the Annihilators meant those cultists simply could not withstand his power. Before he could extract much information, those people died, clean and swift.

Every time he recalled it, he felt regret.

He let himself feel that regret for a moment, then his gaze finally fell on Dog.

“Is my power very conspicuous to you?” he asked.

Dog was startled by the captain’s sudden question, and his head drooped at once: “When you put it like that… is it supposed to be conspicuous… or not conspicuous…”

“I want to know how to keep other Abyssal demons from sensing my power,” Duncan ignored Dog’s hopelessly cowardly reaction and went on seriously. “Sometimes I can successfully leave my mark on an Annihilator, but the Abyssal demons bound to them in symbiotic pacts quickly detect my power. That has already caused me more than one problem.”

“Well…” Dog’s tone instantly turned a bit odd. “That’s rather hard. The senses of Abyssal demons are extremely keen by nature, and except for me, Abyssal demons lack reason and act only on instinct. Seeking benefit and avoiding harm, that’s their greatest instinct. Faced with tremendous danger, abandoning their symbiotic pact partners and fleeing back to the Abyssal Deep Sea, is the choice they will inevitably make, unless…”

Duncan raised his eyebrows: “Unless?”

“Unless their symbiotic pact is cut off completely, or the demons are brought under control ahead of time, before they can react,” Dog said, thinking as he spoke. “The first method is almost impossible, because this kind of symbiotic pact is irreversible. It gradually reshapes the symbiotic pact partner’s physiology. Once the initial phase is over, breaking that chain is enough in itself to kill the symbiotic pact partner.

“As for the second method… it is somewhat feasible, but not easy to carry out. It mainly requires prior preparation, yet different Abyssal demons have different traits, so it is very hard to prepare in advance a truly thorough, ‘targeted’ plan for seizing control in an instant…”

Dog rambled on for quite a while, then paused as if something had occurred to him. He raised his head to look at Duncan: “But we don’t necessarily have to catch Annihilators. Aren’t there other cultists active as well? The Enders are hard to catch. The Suntists are much easier…”

Without realizing it, Dog had already started subconsciously treating those elusive cultists as prey that could be “ordered and caught on demand”, as if, so long as the captain wanted to take them, no matter how well the cultists hid, they would sooner or later fall into his hands.

However, Duncan shook his head: “It would be best if we can still capture some Annihilators.”

“Huh?” Shirley froze for a moment beside him. “Why?”

Duncan thought for a moment, his face serious: “I have a use for them.”

Everyone looked blank.

Seeing this, Duncan hesitated slightly, then raised his hand and lightly drew it through the air.

Water?like spirit form flames rippled out at his side and, in the blink of an eye, spread through the entire sitting room. As the flame burned, an invisible power seeped into the Mortal Realm, blurring the boundary between the Mortal Realm and the Spirit Realm. Duncan’s body rapidly shifted toward a spirit form state.

“Praise be to the name of Rahm—” As soon as he saw this, Morris said a quick benediction, then layered a whole stack of miscellaneous mental protections onto himself.

Vanna, beside him, also moved with practiced ease, taking a storm amulet and a pocket rosary from her bosom. As she recited Gamona's name, she blessed herself.

A faint radiance of the Sun appeared in Nina's eyes as she looked at her Uncle Duncan with an eager expression. Dog let out an "Oh crap!" and his figure vanished in an instant into the depths of the Shadows. Shirley reacted half a beat slower and only had time to raise her hands to cover her ears: "In a moment, can I maybe not listen to this…"

"I intend to establish a connection with the Abyssal Lord—by using the power of those Annihilators."

Duncan's voice came with the crackling of the flame as he spoke calmly. Then he glanced at the people around him with a bit of helplessness: "Do you really have to go this far?"

Shirley lowered the hands covering her ears: "…My head is buzzing."

"You're just nervous," Duncan glanced at her. "I've already put proper protections in place. There is no need for you to be so tense."

"Caution never hurts," Morris said calmly from the opposite sofa. "Of course we trust your power, but we are all fragile mortals in the end. Please understand…"

Vanna nodded as well to show she agreed with Morris. But then a trace of puzzlement appeared as she looked at Duncan: "But if it's just that, you could have just told us. That reason itself isn't dangerous. For us, mentioning the words 'Abyssal Lord' from time to time isn't such a big deal…"

"Because this suggestion was given to me personally by the Abyssal Lord," Duncan said casually. "He established contact with me deep inside Alice's manor, and the suggestion itself is the power He is sending to the Mortal Realm…”

He had barely gotten the first part out when Shirley quickly clapped her hands over her ears. After a sharp smack, she lowered her arms with a mournful look: “I let my guard down… My head really is buzzing.”

Duncan gave her a blank look and did not bother to reply.

Meanwhile, Lucretia, sitting not far away, had not caught up at all since just now. The young witch stared, dumbfounded, at the rapidly unfolding scene before her. Her eyes had followed every step, but her mind had not kept up with a single one.

After a few seconds she finally reacted belatedly, staring dumbly at Vanna and Morris: “You two… look very practiced at this…”

“The captain often discusses profound Truths with us,” Morris said with a dignified nod. “We have our own standard procedure for talking about such matters.”

Lucretia’s expression was a little blank. Her gaze swept over the sitting room, which looked eerie and shadowy under the reflection of the spirit flame. Then she finally realized what her father had just said. She immediately looked to Duncan, her eyes opening slightly wider: “Wait, you just said… the Abyssal Lord made contact with you, and He suggested… suggested that you go and capture His believers?”

Duncan nodded: “I was very surprised as well, but that’s how it is.”

Lucretia thought it over and still could not make sense of it.

The “Sea Witch” was well?traveled and knowledgeable—but she truly had never seen anything like this.

Still, there was someone present who was calmly thinking the matter through. After his initial shock, Morris quickly realized the astonishing amount of information hidden behind this “suggestion”.

He quickly checked the divine blessings and wards on himself, then asked Duncan to confirm more details behind this “suggestion”, verifying all kinds of particulars the Abyssal Lord had revealed while communicating with the captain.

Duncan, for his part, finally had a chance to share this incredible event with his followers. He had long wanted to speak of it, but the sudden coming of the Nameless One’s Dream had delayed his plan.

After a long time, Duncan finally finished recounting his experiences deep within Alice’s manor. Morris, sitting opposite him, had fallen into deep thought.

“…Unbelievable. One of the most dangerous Elder Gods in this world actually still retains sanity, and even made such an astonishing ‘suggestion’ to you…” the old mister muttered in his thoughts. “If we really can establish a stable and safe connection with this Elder God, then we might truly be able to understand several of the greatest mysteries in this world, even… truly understand the birth of the Age of the Deep Sea…”

Shirley scratched her hair: “So?”

Morris suddenly turned his head and looked into Shirley’s eyes. The old scholar, who usually appeared so refined and gentle, now had a blazing intensity in his gaze that inspired awe—

“We follow the captain’s words and capture a few Annihilators to try it,” he said, his eyes shining with the scholar’s eagerness to peer into the Truth. “At this point, this matter has risen to the level of academic research!”

Chapter 584

Clearly, Morris was now burning with a fierce passion to search for truth. In this old gentleman's eyes, those cultists who scared ordinary people had probably already turned into stacks of walking papers and research materials.

"So the only question is how we drag those Annihilators who enter the Nameless One's dream out of the Mortal Realm," Vanna said. She looked at the energetic old gentleman beside her and quietly shifted a little to the side. "Tomorrow I'll contact the Church and see if we can tighten surveillance and manhunts for Annihilators in every city-state. If they have to keep entering the Nameless One's dream and they share command and information, they will be much more active than usual."

Morris also nodded: "I'll remind the Academy as well… though they probably don't need the reminder."

They discussed ways to flush those cultists out in the Mortal Realm. At that moment, Lucretia, who had been quietly thinking, suddenly raised her head and looked at Shirley and Dog: "If it's inside the Nameless One's dream, can you still find that cultist from last time?"

"That depends on whether he's nearby, and whether he even dares to enter the Nameless One's dream again." Dog shook his head. "Last time, Shirley and I badly hurt that Annihilator. It didn't damage his body in the Mortal Realm, but his mind won't recover in a short time."

Lucretia listened and nodded thoughtfully. No one knew what was going through her mind.

Outside the window, the Sun had slowly sunk behind the buildings at the edge of the block. The last crimson glow spread along the rows of rooftops. Golden sunlight spread from the distant sea and mixed into the fading evening clouds.

Nina suddenly lifted her head and looked at the sky growing dim outside the window. She muttered softly: “It’s getting dark again…”

Her soft words broke Duncan’s thoughts. He rose from the sofa, walked to the window, and quietly gazed at the street outside.

The “knowledge guards” of Truth Academy were already preparing for the shift change at dusk. In front of the security post on the corner, a squad of guardians was talking with the constables.

There were twice as many guardians today as on normal days. Among them were upper-ranked clerics with much better gear. They were probably elite forces transferred from the central university of the city-state.

A loudspeaker truck drove past on the road, urging citizens to finish outdoor activities and go home before the gas lamps lit up. Tonight’s curfew would start an hour earlier. The broadcast repeated the warning: if any citizens could not make it home in time, they should go to the nearest guardian post at once. The Academy would send people and vehicles to escort them back as fast as possible.

Farther away, the tall spire of the clock tower bathed in crossed sunlight and sunset glow. The golden-red light seemed to coat the tower in a crystal shell. Huge steam pipes stretched from both sides of the tower and puffed out thin white mist, warming up to ring the dusk Bell.

The city-state’s authority and the Academy had not announced any emergency. But in the eyes of those who knew what was really going on, the change in the air showed in many small details.

“They’re preparing for tonight,” Vanna also walked over and said softly beside Duncan. “Even though there is still no proof that the Nameless One’s dream will appear again tonight…”

“We don’t know what preparations they’ve made, or whether those preparations will actually work.” Duncan shook his head. “So far we still know nothing about how that ‘dream’ works. We only know it may be tied to some trait of the entire race of Elves. In that area, we can’t help them.”

“We have many problems of our own to solve.” Vanna’s tone grew more serious. “If the Nameless One’s dream appears again, we still don’t know what will happen. We might be scattered and swept into Dreamwalking again. We might arrive in different places than before. We might meet enemies, or step straight into those dangerous areas they call ‘corruption zones’.”

Duncan said nothing. He slowly turned around and let his gaze sweep across the living room.

The others had already gathered. Many eyes rested on him.

After a short pause, Duncan stretched out his hand with his palm facing up.

ghostly green flame surged and rolled beside him, turning his body into a phantom spirit form as if cast from fire. His eyes focused on his palm. The fire of his spirit form gathered there and slowly became the brightest, most lively little flame.

Duncan held up the weightless flame. Amid the faint crackle and pop, his voice reached everyone: “Come here and touch this fire.”

Everyone in the living room reacted in different ways, but most of all with unavoidable shock and hesitation.

Of course they were not strangers to the captain's fire. In fact, they had already come into contact with this spirit form flame more than once and to different degrees. But instinct was hard to fight and oddly stubborn. This little flame was far more active and bright than the "gentle" fire they usually saw on the Vanished. That tiny difference made them tense without even realizing it.

But Nina was the first to walk over. There was even a bit of expectation on her face. She looked up at her "Uncle Duncan", and her usual bright smile appeared.

Then she reached out and lightly touched the flame in Duncan's palm with her index finger.

Thin strands of fire wrapped around her fingertip like water and then quietly faded.

"It's nice and warm." Nina laughed and waved at Shirley. "Your turn!"

"Yeah, yeah…" Shirley grumbled. She dragged her feet as she took two steps forward. She reached out her hand while muttering: "The captain wouldn't hurt me anyway…"

Duncan nodded to Shirley with a gentle look, then added: "Dog needs it too."

Dog, who had just been about to turn away, jolted. He raised his head to stare at the flame, and his blood-red eye sockets seemed filled with solid fear: "I… I don't really need it, right…"

"You do." Duncan looked seriously at this Abyssal demon. "Don't worry. It's just a harmless temporary mark. Without my command, this fire won't harm you at all."

Dog still hesitated: “I…”

Before he could finish, Duncan flipped his hand over and pressed it down on Dog’s head, rubbing hard at that rough, solid skull.

Pale green flame poured down over him from above and flickered through the bony body of the Abyssal Hound.

Dog’s whole body shuddered at once, and he only had time to yelp: “Oh crap—”

Duncan ignored him and looked up at the others.

Vanna and Morris also stepped forward. Each recited a prayer to their own deity, then touched the flame in the captain’s hand with solemn faces.

Now there was only one person left.

“Lucy.” Duncan looked calmly at the “sea witch” standing not far away. “Don’t worry. This is just a special mark. If the Nameless One’s dream appears again, the power inside the mark may help you.”

“I know.” Lucretia spoke softly, with a faint, complicated look in her eyes. She looked up at her Father standing there as a hazy spirit form in the flames and at the bright, dancing flame in his palm. After a few seconds, she finally stepped forward and slowly reached her hand toward Duncan: “…Is this the power of Subspace?”

Duncan looked at her calmly: “This is my power.”

Lucretia took a slow breath, then stepped up and touched the fire.

There was no pain, no burning, none of the corruption or mental disturbance she had expected. She only felt a calm warmth, gentle and soothing.

A ghostly green light flashed in Lucretia’s eyes.

Then the “sea witch” turned around, hurried to the corner of the room, grabbed the huge stuffed rabbit doll, and brought it back to Duncan.

The stuffed rabbit doll, which had been playing dead for most of the day, finally moved. It twisted hard in Lucretia’s hand, and a little girl’s terrified voice came from its cotton-filled body: “Mistress, what are you doing! Rabby is just a rabbit! Rabby is just—”

“Quiet.” Lucretia pinched the stuffed rabbit’s back hard, making the creepy little doll fall silent at once. Then she held it out. “Dad, give Rabby a mark.”

At first Duncan did not react. When he saw Lucretia bring the stuffed rabbit over, he had already wondered why. Only now did he faintly guess: “Is this… because you want to take this doll into the Nameless One’s dream?”

“Rabby can move around in dreams—it does dream,” Lucretia said. “I want to see if, when the Nameless One’s dream expands, it will also get pulled into the dream. Before, when the Radiant Star stayed in the Harbor, Rabby said it did not sense anything strange in the city at all. That might be because the Harbor was too far from the center of the dream’s outbreak, or because Rabby was affected too little by your power.”

The stuffed rabbit doll struggled again and let out a tiny voice: “If Rabby had known, Rabby wouldn’t have come…”

Lucretia raised her hand and pressed the rabbit’s face against Duncan’s palm.

Duncan said nothing.

He suddenly felt like a training dummy that did nothing but hand out buffs… This was not quite how he had planned it, was it?

But anyway, he had finished all the preparations before Dreamwalking. Next… he only had to wait and see whether the Nameless One’s dream would really appear again tonight, and test his many guesses and plans inside that dream.

Just then, footsteps came from the doorway of the living room. Alice and Lunie appeared in Duncan’s sight, pushing a serving cart.

“Dinner time!” Alice said happily. She seemed completely unaware of the mood in the living room. “Are we eating in the dining room, or right here in the living room?”

Chapter 585

In the end, the doll Lunie also let Alice pull her over to receive the flame mark granted by the captain.

By then, everyone in this “witch’s mansion” had received the brand of the spirit form flame before Dreamwalking, except for the simpler tin men and puppets that did not have complete minds.

Dinner time came. Bright electric lights and the gas lamps on the walls lit the wide dining room. The members of the Lost Home Fleet gathered around the long table, sharing fish, bread, and wine as they prepared to face the coming, deeper, and more unpredictable veil of night.

Faint, ghostly green flames jumped in the depths of their eyes. Their gazes seemed to look at both the Mortal Realm and a second, unreal layer at the same time. A trace of the captain’s power mixed into their voices as they talked, making a low buzzing vibration in the air. The ghost-green flame also seeped into the gas lamps on the walls, so every flame carried a hint of green light. Under that glow, the walls and floor of the dining room took on a strange texture, as if they were part of a spirit form.

If some ordinary person who knew nothing walked into the dining room at this moment by accident, the eerie atmosphere and power here would soak into them at once. It would be very hard for them to keep their reason and sense of self.

The clockwork doll Lunie lit the decorative candelabras. Candlelight flickered over the table. The pale yellow flames reflected on the silver and ceramic cups and plates, giving off a warm, enchanting glow.

Morris and Lucretia spoke in low voices about ancient legends tied to elven society. Their talk was full of technical terms that would be hard for any ordinary person to follow. Shirley was gulping down her food. She was always the first one at the table to fill her stomach. Vanna was saying the blessing before the meal. She was still the most devout one and always carried out the Goddess's rite carefully, no matter the situation. Nina, after eating a few bites, quietly lifted her head. Her eyes shifted toward the wine set not far in front of her.

"I want to drink some fermented grape juice…"

A fragment of the ancient Sun made a request to the Flame Usurper.jpg.

Duncan glanced at the young lady and raised his eyebrows: "Why aren't you saying you want some wheat juice this time?"

Nina's eyes lit up at once. She reached toward the beer on the other side: "Really?"

Duncan looked at her without expression: "What do you think?"

"Oh…" Nina muttered. She obediently picked up the lemonade on the other side instead, looking very disappointed.

The mechanical clock in the corner ticked and whirred. Its hands slowly moved forward.

Near the end of dinner, Duncan suddenly broke the silence: "I've actually been thinking about a question."

"What question?" Vanna set down her knife and fork on the other side of the table and asked with curiosity.

"How does the Abyssal Lord really see His believers?" Duncan spoke very seriously. "He suggested I catch some Annihilators to build a link between me and the Abyssal Deep Sea. He didn’t sound the least bit sorry for them. But He still stayed rational and seemed to care a lot about this world. Don’t you find that strange?”

“I actually think it makes sense.” Morris wiped his mouth and said slowly. “It makes even more sense if we start from the idea that the Abyssal Lord is sane.”

Duncan raised his eyebrows at that: “Oh?”

“Before you managed to make contact with that Elder God, the Abyssal Lord had never spoken with the Mortal Realm at all. In other words, those so-called Annihilators were only worshipping their ‘lord’ on their own.” Morris shrugged. “They used that one-sided faith to draw power and kept summoning demons from the Abyssal Deep Sea, for their own use.

“Think of it from another angle. If you were the Abyssal Lord, and a noisy crowd of mortals suddenly showed up from who-knows-where… they claim to be your descendants, then run into your yard, steal your fruit, dig up your fruit trees, trick away your servants, and in the end, they even want to pry open your front door and move into your rooms…”

Duncan thought about it and felt his blood pressure rise.

“All right, I think I understand…” He sighed. “That does make sense.”

The mechanical clock in the corner of the dining room suddenly rang out the hour. The loud clang-clang-clang cut off the talk at the table and echoed hollowly through the great house.

Duncan listened to the chimes and silently counted each strike. Then he spoke softly: “Nine o’clock.”

No one answered him.

Only a few empty chairs remained on both sides of the table, as if no one had been sitting there from the very start.

Duncan slowly frowned as he looked at the dining room that had suddenly become empty. Even though this change had happened right under his nose, he still had not caught the exact “process” of it.

Everything had happened all at once, as if the whole world had “switched” in a single very short moment. It was like a playing card flipping over. The numbers on the face became the pattern on the back in an instant. Nina, Morris, and the others had gone with the flipping cards into another dimension, while Duncan was still left at the table.

Alice was still “at the table” with Duncan.

The doll miss widened her eyes at once, looking badly startled: “Wow!”

“The Nameless One’s dream really has appeared again…” Duncan slowly rose from his chair. “Even that stuffed rabbit doll is gone.”

As soon as he finished speaking, a slightly nervous voice came from the side: “Old Master, I… I’m still here.”

Duncan and Alice turned their heads at the same time toward the voice.

The clockwork doll Lunie was standing not far behind them. She had been standing there during dinner as well.

Now this clockwork doll had been left on this side of the Mortal Realm.

Alice stared at her in surprise: “Lunie! Why are you left on this side too?!”

“I don’t know.” The clockwork doll spread her hands and shook her head. Then she looked at the empty seats on the other side of the table with worry in her voice: “Mistress… is she all right?”

“They’ve already reached the other side of the dream,” Duncan said. At the same time he could not help but look Lunie over from head to toe, his brow slowly furrowing.

Lunie had been left on “this side”… why?

When the Nameless One’s dream appeared, he and Alice were left on the Mortal Realm side. Now Lunie had also been left here, and she was still awake… What mechanism was working behind this?

Was it because they were… “dolls”?

“Lunie, do you dream?” Duncan asked suddenly as he thought.

“I… don’t know.” Lunie froze for a moment and then answered honestly. “Sometimes, when Mistress maintains my body, I fall into a daze and remember some things from before. But Mistress says that isn’t dreaming. It’s just memories spilling out of the soul container. So maybe I don’t dream? I don’t really know what it is like when humans dream.”

“What about Rabby then? Does that rabbit named Rabby really dream?” Duncan asked again.

“Rabby does dream. In fact, it’s very strong inside dreams,” Lunie said. “Many years ago, Mistress went through a time when nightmares often bothered her. It even started to disturb her research. So Mistress made some preparations and let herself fall into Dreamwalking on purpose, to face the shadows invading her mind. She won, and caught one of those shadows from the deepest part of her nightmare. That shadow came from the Spirit Realm. Mistress said it was a creature of fear. She beat it up again and again, then sewed it into a little doll. That is Rabby…”

Duncan listened as the clockwork doll in front of him calmly told this story. After a moment, the corner of his mouth twitched: “It seems Lucretia has had quite a few strange experiences over the years… All right, I think I more or less understand."

Alice scratched her head: "Huh?"

"The Nameless One's dream seems to only affect beings that can Dreamwalk." Duncan looked at the two dolls in front of him. "As dolls, you don't really dream. Or even if you 'dream', your dreams are not 'compatible' with those of ordinary people."

Duncan added that careful note at the end because he suddenly remembered how Alice had once told him about some "dream-like" experiences she had while she slept. In a sense, Alice also dreamed. But just like Lunie, her dreams were not the same as those of ordinary people. If he had to describe it… it was more like a doll's daze.

That kind of "daze" clearly did not meet the "standard" for entering the Nameless One's dream.

Alice listened with a half-dazed look. Then, in her not-so-bright head, a sudden idea flashed. She seemed to think of something and stared wide-eyed at Duncan: "Then why are you, Captain, left on this side like us? You don't dream either?"

"Of course I…" Duncan started to answer without thinking. Then he froze, staring with a strange look on his face.

Had he… really dreamed at all after coming to this world?

He meant dreams in the normal sense. Dreams that belonged to a mortal, woven between the Mortal Realm and memory.

It was as if someone had suddenly flipped a switch that had been ignored for a long time. A chaotic corner in his subconscious that he had never noticed before showed itself. For the first time, Duncan paid attention to this question. He quickly thought back on every time he had fallen asleep since crossing that door into this world, and on… his “dreams”.

He remembered. He had dreamed. In dreams he had entered Subspace. In dreams he had seen coming disasters. He had seen the Sun go out, a dying hollow disk hanging in the sky, and bizarre luminous cores falling from above…

But other than those, he could not remember dreaming of anything else. His current body barely needed sleep at all. The habit of lying in bed every day was, most of the time, only a way for him to keep some sense of “being human”…

Yes, he did dream, though not often, though…

Duncan suddenly raised his hand and pressed hard on his brow.

No. Dreams shouldn’t be like this. They shouldn’t only be like this. Where were the ordinary dreams? The scenes from the day that should appear in sleep afterward? The things that could be called good dreams, the plain dreams, the funny dreams, the dreams full of memories, the dreams that… belonged to ordinary people?

Duncan tried hard to remember. But he suddenly found that all his dreams either led to Subspace or to some “visions” that seemed to cross time and space like prophecies. Aside from those two kinds, every time he slept… there was only nothingness.

It was not only in this world, either.

He thought back.

Zhou Ming thought back.

He remembered the days before he opened the door of that single apartment, the days before he was trapped in that fog, the days long, long ago—so long ago they seemed like another life—when everything was still normal and the world had not yet fallen into the mist.

Zhou Ming lifted his head in confusion.

Had he… ever dreamed like an ordinary person?

Chapter 586: Desert

The clockwork doll Lunie looked worriedly at Duncan, who had suddenly gone blank. After a few seconds, she could not help turning to Alice beside her and asked: “Old Master, what’s wrong with him?”

Alice only looked as if this was perfectly normal and tried to comfort her new friend: “It’s fine, he’s just spacing out. The Captain zones out all the time…”

Lunie froze for a moment: “Is that so?”

The two dolls’ voices reached Duncan’s ears. He finally blinked and slowly returned from his memories to the Mortal Realm.

After a brief silence, Duncan raised his hand and slowly pinched the spot between his brows, letting his lowered eyelids hide the turmoil in his eyes. Chaotic thoughts still swirled in his mind. He was still recalling the past. He even wished he could dig out every day he could remember, all the way back to the earliest moments of his childhood, and lay them all out before him.

He had finally noticed his dreamless past, noticed that corner of his subconscious he had always ignored. But he had to break free from these tangled memories and thoughts and force his attention back onto the Mortal Realm before him.

He raised his head and looked at Alice, who was staring straight at him, and at the clockwork doll beside her, who still looked a little nervous.

“I’m fine,” Duncan said softly. “I just suddenly remembered some things…”

He paused, looked into Alice’s eyes, and asked: “Where were we just now?”

“We were saying that Lunie and I were probably left on the ‘outside’ of the Nameless One’s dream because dolls don’t dream,” Alice answered at once. “Then we were talking about why you were left out here too…”

“Not dreaming may only be one factor. The mechanism of the Nameless One’s dream won’t be that simple, and it is very likely changing…”

Duncan spoke slowly. At the same time, he recalled the dream that had once trapped Taran Ael, the scholar—

There was no doubt that the dream Taran Ael had fallen into back then had also been the Nameless One’s dream. But that had only been the “shallow layer” of the dream, and the dream itself had still been in its early state. At that time, Duncan had still been able to use the mark he had left on Heidi to enter that dream quite easily, instead of being blocked on the Mortal Realm side as he was now.

This showed that the “rules” of the Nameless One’s dream were changing. As time went on, its range and influence were expanding, and at the same time a Dreamwalking mechanism for “filtering” had formed, like a kind of self?protection.

What would come next? Would this vast “dream” keep growing? Would its reach expand again? How would its self?protection change?

As Duncan pondered, Alice’s voice suddenly sounded beside him and reached his ears: “Captain, how are the others doing? Can you feel anything from here?”

Duncan pushed his messy thoughts down for now. He let out a quiet breath and focused his mind, feeling for the marks he had left on the others—

The leaping flames crossed the border between real and unreal and passed through the ancient, hidden curtain of the dream. In a distant other dimension, at a crossing of time and space that reason could hardly describe, Duncan “saw” those flickering sparks.

The flame marks he had planted in advance had taken effect. They only strengthened the connection a little, but Duncan could now sense Vanna and the others more clearly and should even be able to talk with them.

“They’re not in danger.” Duncan nodded to Alice and Lunie as he spoke.

Alice let out a breath of relief at once: “Ah, that’s good… Then what are we doing next?”

Duncan lifted his head. His gaze passed through the nearby window to the street outside, now shrouded in the chaotic veil of night.

That strange sight had appeared outside the window again. As the Nameless One’s dream pushed into the Mortal Realm, lush forest plants once more covered the city?state. Endless towering canopies blocked out the sky. The districts under the giant trees were dim and hazy, a blend of real and unreal.

Lightwind Harbor had already fallen silent. The world after Dreamwalking had replaced the Mortal Realm, just as Duncan had expected. The rushed preparations of the city?state’s authority and the academy’s Guardians had not done much. Now, once again, only he and Alice were awake in this city.

Oh, and this time there was also a clockwork doll.

“We’re going to where that vine appeared last time,” Duncan said calmly as he turned and walked toward the front door of the house. “We’ll see if it shows up in the same place.”

“All right!” Alice agreed at once. She reached out and grabbed Lunie, who was still a little dazed. “Come on, come on, we’re going exploring with the Captain!”

“Exploring?” Lunie followed Alice and Duncan on instinct, but her mind was clearly still a bit behind the pace. “What are we going to do?”

“We’re going to look for the other Vanished,” Duncan slowed his steps and said, glancing back.

The Nameless One’s dream had once again appeared in the Mortal Realm, and this time Duncan meant to test many of his ideas. The “enhanced temporary marks” he had left on Vanna, Morris, and the others were only one of those plans, meant simply to strengthen the link between him and his followers. What he cared about more was whether the Vanished that sailed in darkness and fog would appear again.

No matter how the Nameless One’s dream grew next, Duncan had to find a way around its “self?protection mechanism” so he could intervene further in this vast dream. His instincts told him that the eerie Vanished sailing in the mist was his best chance to break through that self?protection.

Because the enchanted sea chart on that ship showed that it was very likely sailing right above the forest of the Nameless One’s dream.

Under the chaotic night sky woven together by sunlight and the World’s Wound, the streets of the city?state were as eerily silent as last time. Duncan and the two dolls left the witch’s now?silent mansion and stepped into the veil of night, where city and forest intertwined.

As he stepped into the veil of night, Duncan also began to carefully reach out to the temporary marks that were now on the “other side” of the dream, trying to call his followers.

This time, he had to be very careful and learn from what had happened last time in that dark, fog?filled space. He had to use the Power of Flame with caution, so he would not… wake Atlantis in the depths of the dream.

…

Strange dark?red rifts covered the sky. Twisted, hazy clouds spread along the edge of the ominous red glow. Under that light, everywhere the eye could see was endless yellow sand and huge rocks.

Rolling dunes filled the view. Jagged rocks stood under the sky like the twisted, struggling bones of countless giant beasts. Yellow sand buried their bases. Their sharp edges rose like blades. In this vast, hopeless sea of sand, a “person” looked smaller than ever.

Vanna lifted her head. The wind lifted her long silver?white hair. The dry wind, filled with sand, swept over the land without rest and made her narrow her eyes.

She had come again to this desert, this boundless, dead and withered land.

Looking at the hazy silhouettes of huge rocks in the distance, Vanna let out a small breath and reached into the wind. Misty water vapor gathered out of the dry sandstorm in a way that defied common sense and condensed in her hand into a greatsword that radiated cold.

Feeling the heavy weight of the greatsword in her hand, Vanna nodded in satisfaction.

This boundless desert in the dream was dry and scorching, not a pleasant place at all for a believer of the storm Goddess. Luckily, her power as the Saint of the Deep Sea Church still worked here. The dream could not block power granted by a god. That would at least make her trek here a little easier.

Drawing coolness from the greatsword, Vanna stepped into the sandstorm and walked in a chosen direction.

She was not walking aimlessly, of course. Her goal was that rugged band of shadows in the distance, those shapes that looked like jagged rocks but also like the ruins of a city.

As she walked, Vanna suddenly felt a stir in her heart.

She stopped without thinking and focused, performing the Listening rite toward a voice that had suddenly appeared deep in her mind. A moment later, the voice grew clear—it was the Captain.

The Captain's calm, steady voice echoed in her mind: "Vanna, can you hear me?"

"I can," Vanna answered at once in her heart, and without noticing it she let out a breath of relief inside. "Great. It looks like your plan worked."

"Yes, just as expected," Duncan's voice continued. "I have to be careful when I contact you now. I can't pass too much power at once. From what we learned last time, Atlantis, sleeping deep in the Nameless One's dream, doesn't seem to like my flames."

"I understand," Vanna said, starting forward again as she answered. "How are the others?"

"The others are scattered in the depths of that forest. Their groups are basically the same as last time. Shirley is with Dog, Nina is with Morris," Duncan told Vanna about the others. "Also, after entering Dreamwalking, Lucretia managed to find the rabbit Rabby—they almost 'landed' in the same place."

"Miss Lucretia found that strange rabbit? They landed in the same place? And the others' 'groups' are the same as last time?" Vanna's steps slowed for a moment, and she grew thoughtful. “It seems… the way we enter this dream really does follow a pattern…”

“Mm. So far it also looks like their positions in the forest are about the same as last time,” Duncan said. Then he asked about Vanna’s side: “What is it like where you are?”

Vanna stopped and lifted her head to look at the endless sand before her.

After a few seconds, this Saint of the storm Goddess let out a sigh.

“Sand, rocks, dry hot weather—the ‘place’ where each of us enters the Nameless One’s dream doesn’t seem to have changed much. I’m still in this desert. Honestly, I don’t like this place…”

Chapter 587: Sand and Forest

According to the original plan, Vanna continued toward the hazy silhouettes in the distance, trekking through the seemingly endless wind and sand.

“…I still don’t know why only I was ‘sent’ to this strange desert. It clearly doesn’t match the ‘forest’ that Nina or Miss Lucretia described. I’m trying to reach that ‘stone circle’ in the distance that looks like a ruined city, and so far I haven’t found any sign of civilization here…”

Duncan’s voice sounded in the depths of Vanna’s mind: “…Pay attention to any phenomenon around you that breaks common sense or to sudden changes in the environment. The kind of ‘corruption’ Shirley mentioned may also appear near you. Be very careful.”

“Understood, Captain,” Vanna nodded slightly, raised her head in the wind to look toward the far horizon, and stepped toward the deeper sands. “I’m going to keep moving.”

…

“Rabby doesn’t like this place… Rabby likes lively places with lots of people… This isn’t the kind of ‘dream’ Rabby is used to. Rabby can’t even see a single person…”

Rabby’s chattering voice came from the side. The huge stuffed rabbit doll stumbled clumsily through bushes and piles of dead leaves and branches, and had been complaining nonstop since just now.

But Lucretia did not pay any attention to the rabbit's grumbling. She simply walked ahead on her own and stopped at the edge of a clearing, carefully observing the surroundings.

Since entering this "dream" for the second time, she had not seen the elf maiden who called herself "Celine," nor had she found any trace of the marks she had left in the forest before.

Everywhere were towering trees that all looked more or less the same. There were no landmarks or paths she could use as a guide. Although she did not want to admit it… Lucretia knew that she was already lost in this vast jungle.

"…Rabby," Lucretia suddenly turned her head and looked at the stuffed rabbit doll that was struggling out of a bush not far away. "Can you sense any other mental entities?"

Rabby stopped its endless complaining at once and hurried over to its Mistress with a few quick steps, posing as if it were listening carefully to the surroundings. The two long ears sewn from cloth strips drooped on either side of its head, and the edges of the cloth quietly took on a hazy look.

A moment later, the rabbit shook its head: "No. Rabby didn't hear any other thinking."

"Mm." Lucretia nodded, then looked around again, trying to decide which way to go next.

Just then, a flash of reflected light in her field of view caught this "witch's" eye.

Lucretia immediately looked toward where the glint had appeared. It was at the foot of a towering tree a dozen meters away. Something seemed to lie among the fallen branches and leaves under the tree.

Her figure suddenly turned into a swirl of colorful paper scraps that flew to the base of the tree in the blink of an eye and then gathered back into her form.

Looking at the slightly familiar thing before her, Lucretia widened her eyes a little: “This is…”

A long?handled weapon, strangely shaped like a mix of spear and battle? axe, was lying quietly among the fallen leaves like a silent, frozen symbol.

Unlike what she remembered, the weapon’s long haft was now broken, as if it had been completely destroyed by a powerful impact. Jagged scars covered the axe blade, as if it had gone through a long and brutal battle. Many dark stains still clung to the chipped edge.

It seemed to have broken a very long time ago, after a fierce fight that people had already forgotten.

Lucretia quietly turned her gaze on the broken poleaxe lying on the ground. No one knew how many thoughts were hidden in her steady stare. Rabby’s footsteps came from behind. After peeking around and looking her Mistress up and down, the stuffed rabbit finally could not hold back its curiosity and asked: “Mistress, what is this thing?”

Lucretia did not answer Rabby. She only bent down cautiously and, after a brief hesitation, reached out toward the broken poleaxe.

When her fingers touched the cold metal, a sensation that seemed to cross illusion and the Mortal Realm rushed along her fingertips. Before she could examine that fleeting feeling, a sharp, howling noise suddenly cut her motion short!

In the next second, the shrill howl came from all directions. A thunderous roar rushed in as if the whole forest were burning and collapsing in explosions. The ground shook. Heat waves surged up. The sky was covered by chaotic phantom light. Countless shouts, screams, roars, and cries of rage that seemed to come from the forest itself all poured into Lucretia's senses at once— The "sea witch" snapped her head up and saw that the entire forest around her had already begun to burn. The towering trees melted and toppled in the flames. In the distance, the land rose as if some vast invisible force were rolling it upward. With terrifying cracks and surging magma, the whole ground was slowly curling toward the sky. At the same time, huge shadows and chaotic lights beyond human understanding pressed down from above again and again, as if the entire sky were burning with light and falling on the world.

In this mind?shaking "falling sky," a dark?red light appeared. It looked like a wound soaked in blood. Ominous red radiance spread through the clouds and almost instantly replaced all other light. Terrifying cracks began to touch the ground bit by bit, touching the towering trees, touching the curling, upturned horizon in the distance. With each deadly "touch," the world slowly split apart. Countless dark and horrifying things swarmed out — They poured out of the forest, out of the red light in the sky, out of the cracks in the world. One second they still seemed to be animals fleeing in terror from the forest fire. The next second they turned into clawing, nameless shadows. Rocks came alive. The forest writhed. Everything was turning into shapes beyond human understanding. Horrible, twisted things charged in from every side. Someone roared nearby as if fighting desperately against the swarming monsters. But when she followed the sound, all she could see were monsters tearing at monsters and shadows devouring shadows.

Lucretia sprang to her feet. Even though the incomprehensible cataclysm before her left her at a loss for a moment, she still slipped instinctively into a fighting stance—yet in the very next second, all those horrible distortions vanished from her sight.

She had let go of the broken poleaxe. As the contact broke, all the terrifying visions of change disappeared like phantoms.

The forest returned to its original state. Everything that had just happened felt like a short, strange nightmare.

Lucretia stood there stunned for a long moment. After several seconds, she suddenly snapped back to herself and looked down at the foot of the giant tree on instinct.

The broken poleaxe was gone. Only a pile of fallen branches and leaves remained, with no trace of anything else.

Lucretia slowly furrowed her brow, still replaying what she had just seen in her mind. At that moment, the sound of footsteps suddenly appeared nearby and instantly broke her thoughts.

She immediately lifted her head and looked toward the source of the footsteps.

The elf maiden called “Celine” was standing there before she knew it. She still wore that light armor of some unknown city?state’s style and held that oddly shaped long?handled battle?axe in her hand.

Lucretia turned her head sharply toward the rabbit Rabby, only to see Rabby also turning to look at her. Even with only button eyes and a roughly painted mouth, its movements still showed clear apology and surprise—Rabby had not sensed Celine approaching at all. That meant this mental entity had appeared nearby all at once.

“Celine?” Lucretia steadied herself. She signaled for Rabby not to move around and turned to the elf maiden, testing a greeting.

Celine, the elf maiden, showed a slight smile. She looked at Lucretia with an expression that made it seem as if they had never been apart.

She nodded and said: “We’ve been resting for a long time. It’s time to get back on the road—the Wall of Silence is still very far from here.”

As she spoke, she glanced at the rabbit Rabby, who was standing very obediently where it was.

Not a hint of anything strange showed on Celine’s face. She said to Lucretia in a very natural tone: “Is she your friend? Bring her along. We’ll go together.”

…

Vanna did not know how long she had been trekking through this endless desert. The monotonous, boundless landscape and the never?ending wind and sand around her seemed to disturb her sense of time. She even felt as if she had been walking here for a century, as if she had been trudging through this desert since the day the world was born.

Of course, she knew very well that this was only an illusion born of her irritation, a test of her mind set by this harsh place.

Fortunately, her prayers to the Goddess still worked. They kept her faith firm. Her link with the Captain eased the unease in her heart and gave her a chance to steady her mood.

The icy greatsword in her hand gave off thin threads of chill. It brought a sense of safety and also eased the desert’s burning heat.

Another wave of wind and sand struck. Vanna sensed the change in the wind’s direction. She raised the greatsword in front of her and turned her head to shield herself from the blowing grit.

But just then, a strange aura suddenly appeared in her senses and made Vanna freeze in mid?motion.

In the next second, this battle?hardened inquisitor tensed every muscle. She swung the greatsword out to her side in a guarding stance and looked toward a certain point in the blowing sand.

The chaotic wind had stopped at some point. As the dust slowly settled, an unusually tall figure emerged from the haze and grew clearer and clearer.

It was… a giant.

Chapter 588: giants

Vanna tensed her muscles and nerves at once, watching the tall figure that slowly emerged from the dusty haze with full alert. If anything looked even a little wrong, she was ready to leap forward and chop down at him.

But from within the wind and dust came only a calm and reasonable voice: “Ah… a traveler. I don’t think I’ve seen a stranger appear here for many years.”

Vanna froze for a moment. Then she saw that giant-like figure walk out of the dust.

He stood at least four or five meters tall, so tall that Vanna had to tilt her head back as far as she could just to see the giant’s face. A dark, ragged robe wrapped around his body. It seemed that the robe had once been a fine, splendid garment, but now it was nothing but worn, tattered cloth that had endured countless years. The giant’s body was thin and gaunt, as if a long journey had worn him down to almost bare bones—yet that skinny hand still gripped a staff so huge it almost looked ridiculous.

Even in the giant’s hand, the long staff looked far too heavy and massive. Its shaft was like a straight tree trunk with jointed segments, and the top of the staff swelled like a bloated stone, its outline rough and barely carved. On the surface of the staff, Vanna could see countless dense, complicated, mysterious markings, covering the entire Gatekeeper’s cane.

Vanna’s gaze was drawn to the Gatekeeper’s cane against her will. It did not look like a tool meant to help with travel. It looked more like an astonishing weapon, or some ritual object with a heavy symbolic meaning. This made her feel, instinctively… a pressure that was almost reverence.

But soon, her attention left the Gatekeeper's cane and returned to the giant.

The giant bent down slightly toward her, and that weathered face turned a gentle divine gaze in her direction. The giant's face did not look like that of humans. He also had clear features, but the lines of those features were too hard and sharp, like stone that had been carved. His eyes shone with a murky brownish yellow, and it seemed as if flames flickered deep inside his eyeballs. Every glance seemed to bring crushing pressure.

"Traveler, where did you come from?" the giant asked.

When he spoke, even the wind and sand around them seemed stirred by an invisible force. Turbulent air currents swirled around Vanna, yet not a single grain of sand or dust landed on her.

Vanna forced herself to control her heartbeat and her expression. In the depths of her mind, she quickly reported this shocking situation to the captain, while she also chose her words and thought carefully before she answered the giant: "I come from outside this desert, very far from here. I don't even know why I ended up in this place. May I ask… who are you?"

"Oh, outside the desert… Now this place has become a desert," the giant said slowly, nodding his head. He did not answer Vanna's question. Instead, his tone carried a sigh. "You are… very interesting, traveler. You're not quite the same as the humans in my memory, but I'm not sure if I remember wrongly—after all, it has been a very, very long time since I last saw a stranger."

Not quite the same as the humans in his memory?

Vanna's heart gave a sudden jolt when she heard this. Right after that, she thought of the way she was "different" compared with an ordinary person.

Had this mysterious giant seen that she had once received a Subspace divine blessing and been “brought back to life”?

But before she could think it through, the giant spoke again: “Traveler, you said you came from far away. How far? Did you cross space, or time?”

Vanna was stunned for a moment.

What did that question… even mean?!

She stared up at the giant’s murky, burning eyes in shock. “I… don’t really understand what you mean.”

“…Then just pretend you didn’t hear it, traveler. Maybe the starting point of a journey no longer matters. The end doesn’t matter either,” the giant said, shaking his head. But then he suddenly seemed to notice something, and looked at Vanna with curiosity. “Are you talking with someone else?”

Vanna, who had been reporting to the captain in the depths of her mind, stopped at once. Although she controlled the expression on her face right away, she knew that the change in her eyes might not have escaped the giant’s notice.

Yet the giant sounded as if he had only asked casually, and did not seem to truly care. He shook his head. “It’s fine if you don’t want to say. Everyone has their own secrets.”

Vanna steadied herself, kept control of every change in her expression, and watched the mysterious giant’s every move. At the same time, she carefully asked again: “Who are you?”

“You’re asking for my name? Let me think…” This time, the giant finally answered her question. But after a brief moment of thought, the giant shook his head. “It’s been too long. I don’t remember… It really has been too long.”

He lowered his gaze to look at Vanna. Wrinkles, like carved lines, slowly gathered on his thin face. “You know, traveler, when there are no other voices left in the whole world, a ‘name’ becomes a meaningless idea. No one else needs to remember you, and you don’t need to introduce yourself to anyone. You slowly forget it, just like you are slowly forgotten by the world…”

He paused, as if he had suddenly fallen into some old memory. Only after a long time did he snap out of it, his voice low: “But besides my name, I do remember a few other things, if you think they matter… Long, long ago, they said I was this world’s deity. Back then, this place was not like this.”

The chaotic wind slowly faded. The drifting dust in the air also settled at some unknown moment. In this boundless sea of sand, the giant and the lost traveler stared at each other.

He had said he once was a deity.

Vanna’s eyes widened. Among all her guesses about the identity of this mysterious giant, none had included this “answer.” For a moment, she did not know how to react. Then she felt a kind of absurd contradiction.

As a follower of the storm goddess Gamona, as the Saint of the Deep Sea Church, one of the four churches of the True Gods, she had run into a giant who claimed to be a deity, deep inside the layered dream of the Nameless One. In theory… she should rise up to fight at once and destroy this self-proclaimed god, fulfilling her duty as an Inquisitor.

But Vanna was no longer the reckless person who had once dared to leap and chop at Captain Duncan the first time she saw him. On the Vanished, she had learned to face unbelievable things with a more rational attitude.

“You are a deity?” Vanna stayed tense as she asked carefully, “Who are the ‘they’ you mentioned? And what exactly is this place?”

“They once lived here,” the giant said, seemingly unaware of Vanna’s sudden wariness. He simply lifted a hand and pointed with his staff toward the endless sea of sand. “But that seems to have been a very, very long time ago… Or maybe it hasn’t been that long?”

The giant stopped, looking a bit puzzled. He stared at the staff in his hand and only after a while did he slowly shake his head. “Time… turned into something I didn’t recognize. In one instant it was stretched out to nearly infinite, and then it was squeezed back again. I can no longer tell when it all happened. I only remember that this used to be the most prosperous heart of the kingdom. The yellow sand under your feet used to be forests and rich soil stretching for thousands of miles. Huge canals crossed the fields, bringing rivers from the plateau over the hills. I watched them build pure white cities here. High walls linked the mountains, and tall towers rose straight out of the jungle. Bright fire lit up the night sky… I remember it was very beautiful.”

The giant spoke slowly. It seemed that he had not talked with anyone for too long and was no longer used to organizing his words as he spoke, so his sentences sounded a bit jumbled, like muttering in a dream. Vanna could only do her best to keep up with his story, to understand and guess at the information hidden in his words, and to imagine how this desert had once looked in some distant past.

Then the giant suddenly stopped again. He lowered his head to look at Vanna and asked curiously: “And what about you? Traveler, who are you? Do you have a name?”

Vanna pressed her lips together without thinking. She held back her first impulse to answer.

She could not recklessly reveal her name to an unknown being—especially when that being called himself a “deity” and was very likely a powerful higher extraordinary.

Maybe the giant had no ill will, but an extraordinary being strong enough could affect a mortal's fate without any deliberate malice at all. Since becoming the captain's follower, Vanna understood this more deeply than ever.

After a brief moment of hesitation, she answered carefully: "My name is Vanessa. I don't have any special status. I'm just someone who accidentally lost her way and ended up here."

"Vanessa…" the giant murmured softly, then shook his head. "That's not your name."

Vanna felt her heart suddenly race.

But the giant waved his hand right after: "But it doesn't matter. Like I said, everyone has secrets. If you're not willing to reveal your name, then I'll just keep calling you 'traveler'—there is no one else here anyway, so we won't mistake each other."

Vanna was silent for a moment. After that brief awkwardness, she nodded.

"Traveler," the giant went on, "where are you going?"

Vanna hesitated, then looked up at the distant silhouettes that looked like the ruins of a city.

"Let's go together," the giant said, noticing where she was looking. He made a friendly offer. "I don't remember those distant things very well anymore, but we can walk together for a while. I still have some impression of this world."

Vanna did not answer at once, as if she were waiting for something.

A moment later, the captain's order came from the depths of her mind—

“Accept his invitation.”

“All right,” Vanna nodded and looked up at the giant who claimed to be a deity. “It’s an honor to travel with you.”

Chapter 589: Meeting in the Shadows

In the chaotic veil of night woven together from sunlight and the World's Wound, Duncan and his group moved quickly through the silent, empty streets. At last, they stopped at a junction where huge, lush plants had completely covered and blocked the road.

Towering trees blocked out the sky. Thick, twisted vines wrapped around the tall buildings lining the street. Roots rose from the pavement, crawling along the ground like swollen veins. The whole district was deathly still, yet from the dark forested depths there sometimes came faint bird calls or the sound of wind, so vague they felt half real, half illusion. Those airy voices seemed to cross the border between dreams and the Mortal Realm.

"…It really is still here."

Standing at the end of the street, Duncan looked with a serious expression at the massive vine that stretched out of the darkness. He spoke almost to himself.

Alice craned her neck, staring at the long ramp where the vine had grown and spread. She watched it for a long time before she spoke, sounding a bit unsure: "Captain, does this thing look… bigger than last time? I remember it hadn't stretched this far before…"

"You remember right," Duncan exhaled and said in a grave tone, "it's larger than it was. This vine… is growing."

Alice blinked for a while, then let out a soft sigh: “Wow…”

Duncan did not say anything more. Before taking any further action, he checked on the state of Morris and the others in the depths of his mind—especially Vanna’s situation.

Aside from himself and the two dolls, everyone had reached the other side of the Nameless One’s dream, just like last time, and each person’s landing point in the dream had not changed much either. In this, the Nameless One’s dream showed a strange sort of… “continuity” that caught his attention.

Of all of them, Vanna’s situation was the most puzzling.

The Inquisitor miss had once again arrived in that barren desert. And this time, she had run into a giant there who claimed to be a “deity.”

Now Vanna was crossing the endless sea of sand together with that giant. From the information Duncan had received so far, the giant seemed very friendly and had told Vanna many things about the desert.

But what the giant said did not match any of the old legends Duncan knew, or any ancient stories known in this world!

What exactly was that desert? What was the origin of that giant who called himself a deity? How did those lost years he spoke of connect to the ancient heritage of the elves? And why had such a strange place appeared in the depths of the Nameless One’s dream?

Duncan only felt more and more confused.

Right now, all he could do was hope that Vanna could get more information from that boundless sea of sand and from the mysterious giant—or that the others might find some clue in the endless forest that connected to the “desert.”

Keeping the link between his mind and the others, Duncan took a deep breath and brought his attention back to what was in front of him.

The massive vine had once again appeared in the world of the Mortal Realm. For him, this was actually good news—he had worried that the "fright" he gave the Nameless One's dream last time might cause some unpredictable change and make the vine disappear or move somewhere else. If that had happened, it would have been hard for him to keep investigating. But now… at least this thread had not broken.

Of course, the current situation also forced him to worry about something else:

The vine had not disappeared—but it had grown larger instead.

Would this thing keep growing until it wrapped around the whole city?

With that sudden, baseless worry in his mind, Duncan steadied himself, then stepped forward and slowly placed his hand on the end of the vine.

"Watch the surroundings. If anything big changes, wake me up at once," he said over his shoulder to the two dolls behind him.

"Got it!" Alice nodded right away.

Lunie also bent slightly at the waist and answered respectfully: "Yes, Old Master."

Duncan gave a small nod. Then he calmed his thoughts and carefully guided the power of flame, letting his senses spread and seep along thin streams of spirit-form fire, once again building a connection with the vine.

Because of his experience last time, he was even more cautious now, so he would not startle "Atlantis" again like before.

A moment later, Duncan opened his eyes in the darkness.

Endless mist once again filled his sight.

Following his intuition, Duncan looked toward the deepest part of the fog.

A huge, hazy shadow gradually appeared under his divine gaze. Boundless mist drifted and shifted, and the light and shadow within it outlined a familiar silhouette—the Vanished. That awe-inspiring ship floated in the void like a silent ghost, as if… it were wordlessly inviting Duncan aboard.

Duncan gladly accepted the invitation.

In the darkness, he condensed his spirit form into an avatar form. Then, while carefully controlling the flow of the flames around him, he flew toward the Vanished in the depths of the mist and landed silently on its deck.

Just like the last time he saw it, the ship was still empty. Wisps of mist floated over the silent deck. Familiar fittings of the vessel loomed in and out of sight in the fog.

This time, Duncan did not go straight to the captain’s cabin at the stern. After looking around, he stepped in another direction.

He walked through the mist curling over the deck, his footsteps echoing in the empty, deathly still place. He passed piles of coiled ropes and clutter on the planks, heading toward the entrance to the cabins.

The ropes and various items piled on the deck showed no reaction to Duncan’s approach—they simply lay there quietly like ordinary dead objects.

So Duncan noticed another difference between this eerie Vanished and the Vanished he was familiar with.

On the “real” Vanished, all these things on the deck would start moving when he came close. They would greet their captain eagerly or make all kinds of strange noises, trying to get his attention. But here… though the two ships were almost the same in every detail, everything on this ship was “dead.”

Frowning slightly, Duncan let his eyes sweep over the silent ropes, buckets, and iron hooks. He walked between them, then suddenly stopped.

His gaze had fallen on a mop leaning against the wall.

A moment later, he realized why that sudden feeling of “familiarity” had appeared. Alice had left that mop here when she came back to the ship earlier!

This eerie version of the Vanished not only looked exactly like the “real one” in the Mortal Realm, but it also matched the changes on the Vanished in the Mortal Realm in real time?

Many guesses suddenly rose in his mind. Duncan felt as though he had vaguely grasped some “essence” of this strange Vanished. At that moment, a faint sound from some corner caught his attention at once.

On this ghost ship where everything was so quiet, that tiny sound, like a whisper, stood out sharply.

Duncan instantly locked onto the direction it came from and walked toward it.

He stopped in front of a window.

On the glass, there was a blurry mass that looked like shadows or thick fog mixed with black smoke, slowly forming on the surface as if it were trying to take shape.

Duncan stared at that clump of gathering and scattering shadows for a few seconds, then suddenly realized what it was and spoke softly: “Agatha?”

As soon as he spoke, the shifting shadow on the glass quickly gathered and, within a few seconds, turned into a clear image—Agatha's figure appeared in the window.

"Ah, you finally noticed me," Agatha let out a long breath as soon as she formed on the glass. "I've been calling from the seams between the shadows, trying to get your attention, but it was really hard to find a proper mirror nearby…"

"How are you here?" Duncan looked at the figure in the glass in surprise. Then something occurred to him. "Wait, did you come through the Vanished's…"

"Yes. After nightfall, I stayed in the Vanished's reflection. It might sound risky, but I did it," Agatha said with a nod. "As the reflection shifted, I came here and met up with you. It seems my guess was right: when the veil of night descends, the Vanished's missing 'shadow' turns into this 'other Vanished' you see here. We still don't know the principle behind it, but we finally found a link between the two Vanisheds."

Duncan's brows drew tighter as he listened. He stayed silent, which made Agatha a bit uneasy. "…Did I act on my own when I shouldn't have?"

"You really should have talked with me first, but that's not what I'm thinking about now," Duncan said, waving a hand. "You stayed on the 'reflection' side, so did you see how this transformation happened? Did the Vanished show any clear… 'signs' at the time?"

Agatha shook her head. "There was no process."

"No process?"

"Everything changed in an instant, with no process at all," Agatha repeated. "One second, I was still in the Vanished's reflection, watching and waiting for any possible change in the mirror world world. In the next instant, the ‘atmosphere’ in the mirror world world changed. I could feel it… the Vanished’s shadow turned into something I didn’t recognize. My mirror-leaping was suppressed. I could no longer sense the boundary between the Spirit Realm and the Mortal Realm, and I couldn’t return to the normal mirrors in the Mortal Realm. It was like… the whole world had become strangely thick and sticky, and it was slowly solidifying…”

Duncan listened closely to Agatha’s description, then slowly turned his head and looked toward the stern deck.

That was where the captain’s cabin stood, and where the “other Goathead” stayed.

“Can you move freely now?” Duncan asked suddenly.

“It seems that I’m no longer affected,” Agatha said at once, with a hint of disbelief in her tone. “After you noticed me, that strange pressure vanished all of a sudden.”

“Good,” Duncan nodded. “Then come along—we’re going to visit that ‘First Mate’ whose state is not quite right.”

Chapter 590: Long Since dead

When Duncan opened the captain's cabin door, the Goathead placed at the edge of the chart table reacted at once. It seemed to raise its head in a half-asleep daze, slowly turning toward the doorway, then it recognized the figure standing there.

"Ah, we meet again," the pitch-black wooden carving spoke. Its voice carried a strange slowness, completely different from the usually noisy Goathead who would rattle on at high speed once it started. "You left in such a hurry before…"

"You still remember me?" Duncan asked as he closed the cabin door behind him and walked toward the chart table.

He walked past the old oval mirror near the door. Dim, hazy light stirred on the mirror's surface, and Agatha's faint, translucent figure flashed across the glass.

The Goathead on the table seemed not to notice Agatha at all. Its gaze stayed fixed on Duncan, the head slowly turning with his steps. As it turned, it spoke in that slow voice: "I still remember you. Ah, it really is a little incredible. I have forgotten many things, after all. The feeling of clearly remembering one person… how strange."

Duncan came up to the chart table and glanced down at the enchanted sea chart lying there.

The enchanted sea chart still showed that lush forest projection. The ghostly silhouette that represented the Vanished floated above the treetops, drifting slowly through the clouds as if it was patrolling the whole forest.

He quickly compared it with the picture in his memory and made sure the sea of trees had not changed much since last time. Only the Vanished had shifted its position by a large distance.

“I did leave in a hurry last time,” Duncan nodded and said as he sat down beside the chart table. His gaze slid over the Oval Scrying Mirror not far away, then fell on Goathead. “How is Atlantis?”

“She is sleeping very soundly now,” Goathead said slowly. “Last time… she was only startled. I hope that did not cause you any trouble.”

“It’s fine. I don’t mind,” Duncan said. He set his hand on the table again and quietly, carefully stirred the Power of Flame.

At the edge of his vision, wisps of eerie green flame appeared in the captain’s cabin.

Duncan quickly held back the spread of the flames, suppressing them in their current state so they would not again disturb the “Atlantis” Goathead had mentioned. At the same time, he finally confirmed something in his heart.

These flames were not ones he had just summoned. They were Fire Seeds he had deliberately left on the Vanished in the Mortal Realm during the day.

The situation was just as he had expected. The Fire Seeds he had left on the Vanished in the Mortal Realm could “burn through” the border between dream and Mortal Realm and appear at the same time on this eerie Vanished. Flames sent over in this way were like stowaways on the dream level. As long as he kept their spread under control, they would not overstimulate Atlantis.

In a sense, the flames projected here like this became part of the “inherent structure” of this eerie Vanished, instead of being treated as foreign objects that disturbed the dream, like the flames he had summoned here last time.

Duncan let out a soft breath and gave the flames an order. He told them to fade and lie dormant. They withdrew again into the cracks between the deck, the walls, and the ceiling.

He had found a safe way to send fire into this place. If he repeated it once or twice more, he might be able to use these “stowaway” flames to burn through this eerie Vanished and completely seize control of this ship that had formed from the warped shadow of the Vanished.

Goathead showed no reaction at all to Duncan’s actions. To it, the flames that had quietly appeared in the room might as well not exist. It only stayed there quietly, and as long as Duncan did not talk to it, it seemed to be just a lifeless wooden carving.

“Has Atlantis been dreaming all this time?” Duncan asked. As he spoke, he sensed the slow wandering of the Fire Seeds on the ship, and he started to chat with Goathead as if they were making small talk. “That whole forest outside—does it all belong to Atlantis’s dream?”

“Outside?” Goathead shook its head slowly. “I do not know what you mean by ‘outside’, but Atlantis has indeed been dreaming all this time. She… has been dreaming for a very, very long time. In that dream there is a lush forest, and there are… them.”

Duncan’s heart moved at once: “Who are they?”

Goathead lowered its head a little, as if it was about to sink back into a half-asleep state again. But after a moment, it still gave an answer: “They are living beings born in the forest. A very, very long time ago, they gave their race a name. They called themselves elves…”

Duncan’s eyes narrowed at once.

The answer itself did not surprise him much. But in that moment, what came to his mind was the sentence Goathead had said when they spoke on the Vanished in the Mortal Realm—“Remember them”!

The “they” mentioned by the two Goatheads should mean the same group!

Remember them… Why did it have to stress “remember” so much? And in the end, Goathead still forgot “them”… What caused this “forgetting”?

Duncan’s expression shifted several times. As the clues quickly connected in his mind, he felt he was almost certain of his bold guess about Goathead’s true identity. His face grew serious. With special care, he fixed his gaze on Goathead’s eyes.

“What is your name?” he asked.

Goathead did not answer. It only gave a string of vague, groaning sounds, like someone talking in their sleep.

“Are you Saslokar?” Duncan did not mind the lack of answer and kept asking. Without noticing it, he leaned forward a little. “The creator in elf legends, the maker of the first dream, Atlantis’s Creator and guardian god—your name, is it Saslokar?”

Goathead’s unclear muttering stopped at once.

Its head swayed from side to side, as if it had reacted to the name Duncan mentioned. After a few seconds of hesitation and thought, it finally lifted its head slowly.

“Saslokar died. He died a very, very long time ago.”

…

“They died a very, very long time ago. When the world died, no living being could live past that day.”

Never-ending wind and sand rolled over the entire sea of dunes again and again, like the turning of fate. The giant in a tattered robe sat down cross-legged among a heap of twisted, grim rocks. His huge body seemed to intimidate the sand, making the wild wind stop several meters away from the stones so that no dust fell on the traveler.

He was still talking about the things of the past.

Vanna sat across from the giant, resting for a short while as a very good listener.

The stretch of rolling “shadows” that looked like the ruins of a city was already close to them now. They only had to lift their heads to see it.

The journey had been shortened. Vanna could clearly feel that.

At a normal walking speed, she and the giant could not possibly have reached these ruins in such a short time.

This strange thing was clearly tied to traveling with the giant. It seemed that as long as she journeyed together with him, the “distance” on the road would shrink.

After thinking of this, Vanna did not hide her guess. She spoke her thoughts out loud.

The giant answered very calmly: “I can reach any corner of this ‘world’ in a single day. This is my ability. Only in this way can I keep watching and recording all the changes that happen in this world. To observe and record —that is my duty.”

As he said this, he shook his head again with a hint of emotion. “But… now there is almost nothing left in this world worth watching or recording.”

Vanna lifted her head and stared at the ruins in the distance, a little lost in thought.

They were indeed ruins of a city, just as she had first guessed. But when she first saw them, she had almost failed to connect that ruin to the idea of a “city”.

It was a stretch of piled gray-black boulders. The jagged, strange blocks of stone spread across the sand-covered ground like a forest of rocks. They no longer showed any trace of once being buildings. You could hardly see any mark of having been shaped by civilization.

Vanna could not imagine what kind of disaster could turn a grand city into this. It looked as if the entire city had melted in an instant. More than half of the material in the city had turned to gas in the blink of an eye. The remaining structures had melted and flowed, then solidified again under a sudden, violent drop in temperature, becoming these jagged blocks of stone.

But if it really had been some moment of extreme heat… why was the wide land outside the city just a sea of sand?

That kind of heat should have melted the sand as well, turning it into glass-like material. There should not be any desert around the city at all. It should have become one huge sheet of fused obsidian.

Vanna’s grades in her cultural classes had not been very good, but she still had this basic knowledge.

“What exactly happened to turn the city into this?” she could not help asking the giant. “You just said the world died… What killed this world?”

The giant lowered his head. His furrowed face looked like something carved from stone, and his eyes, which looked as if murky flames burned in them, locked his gaze onto Vanna’s eyes.

“Do not try to understand that Doomsday,” he said. “It is already beyond mortal minds, and even beyond the wisdom of deities. When it came, the people who worshiped me begged me for help. I took one look at Doomsday, and it burned through my sanity and my soul, traveler… That is not something that can be described with words.”

The giant spoke and slowly raised his hand, pointing at the blood-red crack in the sky.

“The only thing I can tell you is this: when Doomsday came, a corruption that did not belong to this world poured out of that rift. In an instant, it shattered the ground under our feet and forced it to re-form in pain. All our splendor turned to dust in the corruption.”

Chapter 591: Toward the deep layers

“Did you hear something?”

On a natural path deep in the forest, Shirley suddenly stopped walking and muttered, a little suspicious.

“I did not hear anything, but I smelled… that clear ‘stench’,” Dog stopped beside Shirley, a low, disgusted sound rumbling in his throat. “More than one. It is mixed with the foul sense of chaotic, dull minds, and a pure, blind urge to destroy…”

“Looks like those ‘old acquaintances’ really came back,” Shirley grumbled. “They never get tired, do they? What does this ‘Nameless One’s dream’ have that makes them care so much? Is that so-called ‘original Blueprint’ really that attractive?”

Dog did not answer. He only crouched low and carefully felt out the lingering traces in the air—the scent left by Annihilators and Abyssal demons.

In those traces, he found something familiar.

“The Annihilator named ‘Richard’ is among them,” he said suddenly, lifting his head.

“That guy dared to come back?” Shirley stared in surprise. “After I smashed him like that last time, I thought he would have to lie in bed in the Mortal Realm for a while…”

Dog shook his head. “It seems they all made full preparations before dreamwalking. They have strong enough protection on the mental level. The damage they take in the dream will not affect the Mortal Realm too much. That makes sense. After all, if they gathered so many people to enter the Nameless One’s dream, they must already understand how this place works very well.”

Shirley frowned. “Are they still nearby?”

“They left a while ago,” Dog judged carefully. “The scent of the Abyssal demons is fading fast, but it is hard to say how far they are now. Shirley, we have to be careful. That ‘Richard’ is here too. He knows you. Last time’s trick will not work a second time.”

The look on Shirley’s face grew tense at once. She quickly checked the surroundings, then turned and said seriously to Dog: “Then how about we just find a place to hide here? We wait until it is dawn in the Mortal Realm. This forest is huge. Those cultists probably will not double back.”

“I do not suggest that. Do not forget that strange and dangerous ‘corruption’ phenomenon. It happens suddenly and spreads fast,” Dog said, shaking his head. “There is no corner here that is truly safe. The only place that might be safe is inside that so-called Wall of Silence. We need to find that ‘wall’.”

As he spoke, he lifted his head and looked toward a certain direction deeper in the forest. “Those Annihilators are also searching for the Wall of Silence. We can follow behind them from far away. As long as we stay hidden, the initiative will be in our hands.”

“Tch, fine, I was just talking,” Shirley clicked her tongue and said helplessly. “Let’s go then. Just make sure we don’t get too close to those cultists.”

Dog nodded. He checked the lingering scent in the air again and the direction it pointed to, then stepped forward—but he had only taken one step when he suddenly stopped and spoke quickly in a low voice: “Careful, someone is coming!”

Almost as soon as Dog finished speaking, Shirley heard sudden footsteps nearby. There had been no warning at all, as if a person had appeared out of thin air. Shirley’s whole body went rigid. She gripped her chain hard and snapped her head toward the source of the sound.

A tall elf maiden appeared in Shirley’s sight.

She wore a strange style of light armor that looked like hunter’s gear suited for moving through a forest, with extra reinforcement at key points. She had long, pale-gold hair like sunlight, with faintly glowing blue threads woven through it. In her hand was a weapon of odd design, like a mix of a long spear and a long-handled battle-axe.

Seeing this elf maiden who seemed to appear from nowhere, Shirley froze for a second. In that brief moment, the elf maiden had already taken a step toward her.

“You did not receive the evacuation order? Why are you still moving around outside the wall?”

Hearing the woman’s voice, Shirley opened her mouth. The sudden change left her a little lost. But she reacted quickly. All the acting and ability to read people that she had practiced since childhood came to life. “Ah, I… got lost. I was just about to head toward the Wall of Silence.”

The unfamiliar elf maiden did not seem to notice Shirley’s brief panic. She did not show any odd reaction to Dog either, even though Dog, with his fierce and twisted appearance, had not had time to hide. She simply nodded to Shirley and Dog and said: “You and your partner are in an area where corruption events are active. This place is not safe. Luckily for you, you met me, the ranger."

As she spoke, she pointed with her long-handled axe toward a direction in the forest. "Come with me. I will take you to the Wall of Silence."

"Ah… okay." Shirley froze for a moment, then quickly reacted. At the same time, she called for the captain in the depths of her mind and tugged Dog along to follow.

They set off toward the direction of the Wall of Silence, walking along a natural path covered in fallen branches and leaves, crossing uneven clearings between the trees as they went deeper and deeper into the forest.

The elf maiden with the strange weapon walked in front. She spoke very little along the way.

That was not good for gathering information, so Shirley had to break the silence herself. After thinking for a moment, she asked: "By the way, what is your name?"

The elf maiden suddenly stopped and turned. She looked straight into Shirley's eyes with a very serious expression. Only after two or three seconds did she answer softly: "My name is Celine—I hope you can remember my name."

Shirley's eyes widened.

…

In the vast darkness and fog, on the eerie, silent Vanished, Duncan, who was sitting beside the chart table talking with Goathead, suddenly froze and stopped his conversation with it.

He frowned slightly, as if he was using some kind of Listening rite to catch a sound from far away. His expression shifted quickly, from confusion to thoughtful focus.

Goathead on the table showed no reaction to Duncan's sudden silence. Once Duncan stopped talking, it simply grew quiet with him. It asked no questions and showed no wish to speak on its own.

The Goathead that appeared on this eerie Vanished was like an "answering machine" stuck in a half-asleep state. Aside from speaking first to greet him, it rarely reacted to anything if Duncan did not speak to it.

Duncan glanced at Goathead.

In the end, this Goathead still had not explained what it meant by "Saslokar died long ago". It only repeated that sentence over and over, as if its thoughts had jammed on that one piece of information.

After a short hesitation, Duncan rose from his chair and walked toward the old oval mirror not far away.

On the chart table, the black Goathead carving creaked as it moved again. Its dark, deep, cloudy eyes followed Duncan's movements without a sound. The silent gaze only made it seem more unnerving.

But Duncan had, more or less, learned to ignore the eerie side of this suspicious Goathead. He walked straight up to the mirror and knocked on the glass.

Agatha's figure appeared on the mirror's surface almost at once.

Duncan paid close attention to the gaze on his back and the changes in the cabin's atmosphere. But the strange Goathead showed no reaction at all to Agatha's appearance, as if it could not see her.

"Captain." In the mirror, Agatha also gave a cautious glance toward Goathead. Only after she was sure it truly did not react did she let out a quiet breath and nod to Duncan.

“Shirley and Dog met another ‘Celine’ in the forest,” Duncan answered Agatha’s greeting, then spoke directly.

Agatha’s lips parted. Her expression looked stunned for a moment, then she reacted at once: “Then Miss Lucretia…”

Duncan nodded. “She is still with ‘Celine’.”

The two of them fell silent on either side of the mirror. It was clear that neither of them had any good ideas.

After a while, Agatha drew a slow breath and broke the silence: “Captain, I have made some discoveries here too.”

Duncan lowered his voice without thinking: “What did you find?”

In the mirror, Agatha lifted her hand and silently pointed at the door at the very back of the captain’s cabin—the wooden door that led to the captain’s bedroom.

“While you were talking with Goathead just now, I passed through all the mirrors on this Vanished,” she said. “Every mirror’s position and the scenes they showed were almost no different from those on the Vanished in the Mortal Realm. Only inside there… I was blocked by a strange ‘barrier’.”

Duncan looked toward the captain’s bedroom at once. As he listened to Agatha’s account, his eyes grew more and more serious.

After thinking for a moment, he walked toward the door.

On the chart table, the black Goathead carving creaked and shifted again. Its dark eyes tracked Duncan’s movements.

Duncan wrapped his hand around the doorknob, but he did not push it open right away. Instead, he turned and stared at Goathead on the table. After a short stare-down, he spoke in a low voice: “What is in there?”

“I do not know,” Goathead said slowly.

“Can I go in?”

“I do not know,” Goathead repeated, as if it were echoing itself.

“…If I go in, what will happen?”

“I do not know.” The suspicious Goathead seemed as if it would only ever repeat that one line.

But at least, it did not seem like it meant to stop him.

Duncan gave Goathead one last, long look. Then he turned back to the familiar cabin door in front of him, took a deep breath, and twisted the handle.

An empty space of tangled, overlapping chaos appeared beyond the door, as if countless abstract lines had been drawn and layered there again and again.

Duncan stood in the doorway and stared at the “room” inside. Among those chaotic, overlapping lines, he could still just make out a few things: a bed, a table, a window, a wall.

But all of them had lost their true form. It was as if they had been torn apart and crudely reassembled inside the mind of someone whose thoughts were broken, then replayed in a twisted dream. There was no way to see what they had originally looked like.

Chapter 592: Stone

After standing for a long time in front of this “room” made entirely of chaotic lines and blocks of color, Duncan turned his head a little and watched Goathead on the table from the corner of his eye.

From Goathead’s point of view, it should now also be able to see the scene inside the room. He wondered how Goathead would react after seeing this bizarre, disordered space.

But it had no reaction. It only kept using those emotionless, pitch-black eyes to calmly gaze in Duncan’s direction. When it made no sound, it was like a real block of wood.

Duncan turned back again. After a brief hesitation, he finally stepped toward the strange room built from tangled lines.

At the same time, he was ready. If anything went wrong, he would force his flames to rise, wake Atlantis, and break out of this “dream”.

But the worst he had imagined did not happen.

He stepped through the door. Faint ripples, clear and thin like water, spread across the entire chaotic room, then faded. Nothing else happened. The room did not collapse, and he himself did not seem affected by the twisted colors and lines.

Duncan walked deeper into the room and, as he passed, closed the door behind him. The unsettling, silent gaze of that strange Goathead on the table was finally blocked outside.

The tangled colored lines stretched out under his feet. Vaguely furniture-like shapes, sketched by those lines, surrounded him on every side. Duncan carefully watched everything in the room, feeling an extremely eerie atmosphere pressing in from all around. After a moment, his gaze finally settled on one corner of the “room”.

Several translucent colored lines trembled there. They linked together into a geometric outline. At the center of that shaking outline lay what looked like a flat, calm water surface that faintly reflected the surroundings.

Duncan walked up to that geometric frame and reached out, gently brushing the calm “water”. Strands of ghostly green flame spread across the surface. A moment later, the scene reflected there became clear—it turned into a mirror.

In the next second, shadows stirred at the center of the mirror, and Agatha’s figure quietly appeared within.

The lady in the mirror stared in shock at the chaotic, eerie place outside the glass.

“This… this is what was behind that door?!”

Duncan nodded slightly: “Yes. This is what is inside the door—the deepest part.”

“This place looks… so strange,” Agatha said, frowning hard. “How can it be like this?”

But Duncan seemed to have already understood a few things. He spoke calmly: “Because on the Vanished in the Mortal Realm, Goathead never dared look into the captain’s cabin. It doesn’t know what this room looks like.”

At least, it didn’t know what the cabin looked like after the “captain” moved in. Duncan did not say that part out loud.

Agatha instantly understood the deeper meaning in his words.

“You mean… this ‘Vanished’ really was ‘created’ by Goathead from the Mortal Realm?” she said quickly. “It turned the Vanished’s shadow into this ship sailing in darkness and fog, but it can’t restore the parts of the ship it doesn’t understand…”

As she spoke, Agatha suddenly frowned and shook her head. “But in the Mortal Realm, Goathead acts like it knows nothing about any of this. And how did it even do all this…”

“Maybe it really does know nothing,” Duncan said quietly, his gaze slowly sweeping the room. “Right now I have a bold guess: this ship might be one of its dreams.”

“Its dream?!” Agatha froze for a second, then seemed to think of something. Confusion appeared on her face. “But it clearly said it never dreams, it never even rests. And I saw it myself—the First Mate is always awake. Even last time, when the Nameless One’s dream appeared, it was still at the helm, just like always.”

“Because it doesn’t know it’s dreaming at all. It doesn’t even know it can dream. It might even…” Duncan stopped for a moment. An even bolder thought rose in his mind. He hesitated a few seconds, then spoke softly, almost to himself: “Maybe our First Mate has never woken up.”

When she realized what the captain’s words meant, Agatha’s eyes slowly widened.

After a brief silence, Duncan spoke again: “Then now there is only one last question left.”

Agatha repeated without thinking: “The last question?”

Duncan lifted his head and looked at the door standing amid the twisted lines. His gaze seemed to pass through the door toward the Goathead sitting on the table outside. After a long time, he murmured: “Saslokar is dead. Saslokar died a very, very long time ago…”

…

veil of night fell over the desert. It came so suddenly that everything around them dimmed at once. The sourceless glow that had filled the sky vanished in an instant, as if something had swallowed it. Quiet night spread over the sea of sand and the wide ruins buried in it.

Now, only a huge, unsettling dark red “crack” remained in the sky. The crack was like blood, its edges like fog. It covered the heavens and gave off a crushing pressure.

Even someone as strong-willed as Vanna, an Inquisitor, subconsciously avoided looking up at that “wound in the world”.

But the giant traveling with her seemed long used to all of this.

At the edge of the ruined city, they found a spot sheltered from wind and sand. It had once been part of a solemn building, but now only a few melted, twisted dark walls remained. The giant picked up many gray-white stones from the nearby ruins and piled them in a corner out of the wind. Then he took two stones in his hands and patiently struck them together.

The dark, silent desert and the oppressive red wound in the sky seemed to no longer exist for him. In his eyes there were only the stones he was striking. The tap-tap-tap of stone on stone echoed dully through the veil of night and carried very, very far.

Vanna sat under the sheltering wall, watching the giant with curiosity. After a long time, she finally could not help asking: “What are you doing?”

“Drawing fire,” the giant said calmly. “Here, the nights are very cold.”

“But those are just stones…” Vanna looked at the gray-white rocks the giant had gathered, her voice full of doubt. “Are they stones that can burn?”

“They are ordinary stones,” the giant said without turning. “There is nothing else left here. Aside from sand, there are only stones.”

Vanna opened her mouth: “Then…”

She did not finish. A sudden burst of sparks cut her off. Tiny sparks leaped from between the stones in the giant’s hands and fell into the pile of pale rocks on the ground. Then the sparks turned into small flames. Bright fire rose from the stones and slowly grew stronger.

Vanna stared at this scene, unable to understand.

“Fire, and stone. They are the most important things,” the giant said quietly, gazing at the flames burning among the rocks. It sounded as if he were speaking to Vanna, and also to himself. “Flames that are lit are eyes opened in the veil of night. Stones broken by blows are far better than fangs and claws. When they lit branches, when they struck stones against each other, something unimaginable happened…”

The giant turned his head and lowered his eyes: “Traveler, do you know? The history of civilization started with fire and stone.”

Vanna listened, half understanding, and slowly nodded.

She had never done well in her culture classes, but she could still understand what the giant meant. She just did not know why the giant suddenly wanted to tell her this.

What did this have to do with “stones that could catch fire”?

But the giant clearly did not plan to explain further. He soon went back to his “work”. He reached into the pile of stones, not seeming to care about the heat of the flames, and took out a stone that had already been blackened by fire. He knocked off one corner of it, leaving a sharp point. Then he picked up the huge staff he had set aside earlier and, using the stone's sharp edge, began patiently carving something on the surface.

The staff was very hard, and the stone points were fragile and easy to break. So the giant's carving went very, very slowly. It often took many strokes to leave even a shallow mark on the staff. He also had to stop often and chip the stone again to make new "chisels".

The surface of the huge staff was covered in countless markings… Had all those marks been carved this way?!

Even after watching only a short while, Vanna realized that this was a task so hard and slow it bordered on hopeless. She could not imagine how long the giant had worked, or how much patience he had spent, to leave all those countless marks on that huge Gatekeeper's cane. She felt that even if she had an endless lifespan, she still would not be able to do such a thing!

Yet the giant just carved in silence and patience, using the only tool he could find in this dead world—stones baked by fire.

At last, Vanna could not help breaking the silence: "What are you doing?"

"Recording," the giant said slowly. "Recording the things I still remember. Recording what once happened in this world."

He stopped and put the staff in front of Vanna, then raised a hand and pointed at its lower end. There was a row of tiny symbols there.

"Here, they learned how to use fire."

The giant spoke softly. There was a hint of pride in his tone.

Vanna followed the direction of his finger and finally saw the tiny symbols clearly. Only now did she see their details.

Simple lines formed the outlines of two small human figures. They stood in front of an abstract campfire, arms raised high, as if they were cheering and jumping, or as if they were worshiping the flames.

For some reason, Vanna suddenly felt a heavy weight pressing on her heart. She instinctively let her gaze climb up along the Gatekeeper’s cane, looking at the dense symbols there. She quickly saw that they were not all pictographs. Higher up the cane, the pictographs slowly turned into abstract, unfamiliar writing. The writing slowly changed again into many forms. Some split into letters. Others still kept a picture-like structure…

Her eyes finally rested on a small blank patch at the very top of the Gatekeeper’s cane. The campfire crackled beside her, and its light flickered over that empty space.

Vanna slowly lifted her head. Her gaze traced along the rough chipped stone and the thin arm holding it, and finally landed on the giant’s face.

The face, covered in wrinkles, was quietly watching the fire pit beside them, motionless, like another stone.

Chapter 593: Remnants Gather

On a patch of forest clearing lit by sunlight, Nina and Morris stopped and looked together at the tall figure who seemed to have suddenly appeared out of the air and now stood at the fork in the path with a surprised expression.

“Did you not receive the order to retreat?” After that brief moment of surprise, the elven maiden, dressed in light hunting gear and holding a strange long-handled weapon, spoke. Her voice was as pleasant as a stream in the woods. “Why are you still wandering outside the Wall of Silence?”

Nina and Morris quietly met each other’s eyes, then both gave a tiny nod.

“Uncle Duncan,” Nina said in the back of her mind, “we’ve run into a third ‘Celine’ here… Yes, she also mentioned the Wall of Silence.”

Morris quickly adjusted his expression and nodded to the elven maiden who had suddenly appeared at the edge of the clearing. He asked calmly: “We didn’t receive any message… May I ask what is happening now?”

The elven maiden frowned, seeming a little surprised at Morris’s “ignorance”, but that feeling soon faded from her face. “The situation is very bad. The corruption is spreading outside the Wall of Silence. Right now, only inside the Wall of Silence is safe in the whole realm—we still haven’t found the Creator. All elves must return to the inside of the Wall of Silence at once, to receive Atlantis’s protection.”

They still hadn’t found the Creator?!

Morris instantly caught that line, which held so much information. But he quickly controlled his expression, nodding seriously. “Then can you take us to the ‘Wall of Silence’?”

“Of course. Meeting a ‘ranger’ like me is your luck,” the elven maiden replied at once, nodding. “I may be among the last rangers still patrolling outside the wall—follow me, while the signs of corruption haven’t shown here yet.”

She turned and walked toward the depths of the forest, but after only a few steps she suddenly stopped and glanced back. “By the way, my name is Celine… Please remember this name.”

Morris and Nina quickly traded a look, then nodded in unison.

The elven maiden called Celine turned back around and kept leading her two uninvited guests into the depths of the forest, toward the Wall of Silence she kept mentioning.

…

After trekking through the forest for who knew how long, Shirley even started to doubt one thing: did this place called the Wall of Silence really exist?

She could no longer remember how long she had been following the elf ahead, or how far she had moved through this sea of trees. In her eyes, the forest looked the same everywhere—nothing but trees and more trees. Now and then she saw a fallen trunk lying in the dead leaves, or rocks and streams blocking the path. That already counted as rare “scenery” on the road.

The scenery was dull, and the road was even worse. The forest floor, covered in rotting leaves, was soft and uneven. Vines, thorns, and roots that stuck up from the ground kept appearing and were easy to trip over. She had once thought that the narrow, bumpy alleys of the lower city shantytown, cut to pieces by steam and gas pipes, were already the hardest roads in the world to walk. Now she found that for humans, even the most run-down corners of a town were far friendlier than this pure “nature”.

[What was it the captain said again… something called “the shaping power of civilization”?]

Shirley let her thoughts wander in her head, and, like a sacred miracle, she even recalled things she had learned in class. Then she lifted her head again and looked at the elf guiding them.

Celine, on the other hand, kept walking as if she were flying. This rough, hard forest seemed like a part of her own body. She moved through the annoying trees and vines as freely as wind blowing through a courtyard.

At last, Shirley stopped.

Celine stopped at once as well. The elven maiden did not even turn around, but it was as if she sensed the moment Shirley stopped walking.

“How far is it from here to the Wall of Silence?” Shirley asked first, before the other could speak.

“Very far. The Wall of Silence is very far away,” Celine answered with a serious face, though her answer was no answer at all. “We cannot rest for long. We must return to Atlantis’s protection as soon as possible, we must… get there before the corruption catches up.”

“What exactly is this ‘corruption’?” Shirley thought for a moment and finally asked the question that had made her curious the whole way.

She had not asked before because she was afraid that such a “basic” question might upset the elven maiden in front of her. According to Miss Lucretia, “Celine” was a “native mind” that moved inside a dream. Shirley did not really understand what a native mind was, but she roughly knew it was something very tricky. If you carelessly mentioned knowledge beyond its “boundary”, spoke of things outside the dream, or even just asked a few too many questions, it might cause that mind to go wrong.

Shirley was no stranger to “going wrong” like that. When she made up lessons with Alice and heard things that went beyond what she could understand, she would go wrong too—the main symptom was her thoughts cutting out.

In her own way, she understood the idea Miss Lucretia had explained. She believed that if she asked questions she should not ask, she could also make this elf maiden named Celine blank out.

She had been trying her best to avoid that.

But after spending some time with her, Shirley found that this “Celine” was not as “unstable” as she had first imagined.

Or rather—the elf was a bit too stable.

Even if Shirley mentioned odd questions, Celine would just ignore them. Aside from “leading lost people to the Wall of Silence”, this elf seemed almost entirely unaffected by anything else.

So after they had been on the road for a while, Shirley began to boldly ask the elf all kinds of questions. Most of them never got any useful answer. But sometimes… a casual question brought a surprise.

“The corruption… began after the Creator disappeared,” Celine said, stopping. Unlike most times before, she answered Shirley’s question seriously. “We do not know what it truly is, but it devours and twists things in the forest, turning them into… shapes that cannot be understood. It is very dangerous.”

“After the Creator disappeared? The Creator disappeared?!” Shirley’s eyes widened at once. While she had not listened very well in class, she always listened hard when the captain talked with the others, so of course she knew the stories about the elves. “The Creator you mean is… Saslokar?”

Right after the words left her mouth, Shirley felt something was wrong. She probably should not be calling a Great Demon God’s name so directly. It might upset the elf in front of her—but she soon saw she had worried too much.

Celine did not seem to notice Shirley speaking the main god’s name at all. She was sunk in some strange sadness, eyes lowered. “The Creator will return. The Creator is only inspecting the border. The Creator just went a little farther this time… Before the Creator returns, Atlantis will shelter all the elves within the Wall of Silence and the Sanctuary World… Atlantis will wait for the Creator to come back.”

For some reason, Shirley felt that Celine’s last sentence sounded like she was hypnotizing herself.

But before Shirley could ask anything else, she saw Celine—who just a second ago had been lost in sadness and a bit dazed—suddenly lift her head. At some point, the elf maiden’s eyes had become razor sharp. She gripped her long-handled battle-axe tightly and looked toward some point deep inside the forest.

Shirley tensed up at once: “Huh? What’s wrong?”

“Shh!” Celine lowered her voice. “Something foul has entered the forest…”

Something foul?

Shirley froze for a moment. Then she heard the rustling sounds coming from the nearby bushes, from deep under the ground, from the shadows of the trees, even from the air.

It felt like many strange, vicious things were writhing in the shadows and slowly gathering. A solid, heavy malice and a skin-crawling sense of being watched suddenly filled the thick woods. Shirley felt Dog send her a surge of shared senses at once. Through the powerful senses of the Abyssal Hound, she saw the things that were “seeping” into the forest.

Tentacles made purely of shadow were gathering from every direction!

[They are Sunspawn remnants… not Annihilators?!]

Shirley froze again. She clearly remembered that when she had just entered the forest this time, Dog had said it sensed lingering traces of Annihilators. So why were the first ones she met these monsters that followed the Black Sun?

But her shock only flashed through her heart for a moment. Shirley reacted at once and went into fighting mode. She tensed all her muscles, watching the directions where the dark tentacles gathered, and warned Celine in a low voice: “Careful. These things use shadows to move, and they’re really tough. They’re especially hard to kill!”

Before she even finished, she saw ripples begin to spread under the shade of a tree not far away. The tentacles that had been hiding in shadow form quickly gathered into tall, thin human shapes, each one taking on a solid body.

But that exact moment, when they took on human form, was what Shirley had been waiting for.

In the next second, the chain went tight and the air howled. Shirley lunged a few steps toward the nearest figure and swung her arm with all her strength, sending out a meteor dog!

Dog flew out like a huge flail, slamming full-force into the first Sunspawn remnant to appear. With a dull thud like meat being pounded to mush, the tall, thin figure did not even have time to look around the dreamscape before it was smashed into a spray of corrupted flesh.

Almost at the same time, all around Shirley and Celine, in the crisscrossing shadows of the dense forest and bushes, more and more tall, thin figures began to appear…

Chapter 594: Battle and… Death?

One tall, thin shadow after another rose out of the air from every side. The rustling of tentacles squirming through the soil kept sounding, making Shirley's scalp crawl. The remnants of the Sun gathered and pressed closer. They stood up straight from the shadows, showing their terrifying, twisted faces and corrupting the forest inside this dream.

Chains howled through the air. With sharp booms of compressed and torn wind, Shirley rushed back and forth across the clearing among the trees. She charged at every remnant of the Sun that had just stepped into the dreamwalking state and had not yet found its footing. She raised her hand and brought Dog down again and again, swinging the chain wildly with the monstrous strength she had gained from her symbiotic pact with the Abyssal demons—swinging the Abyssal demon Dog itself at the same time—knocking those not-quite-human horrors to the ground and banishing them from this dream.

But the number of intruders still grew. The remnants of the Sun that she had knocked down for the moment climbed up from the shadows again and again.

The dim forest, full of shifting light and shadow, became the perfect field for the remnants of the Sun to move freely and rebuild themselves. corrupted flesh that she had smashed away dissolved into the shadows, then gathered again in the shadows. Tall, thin silhouettes kept appearing all around. The moment Shirley's movements slowed even a little, they launched ruthless attacks at once.

A sharp shriek suddenly rose behind her. A spike-like tentacle thrust out of the air itself and stabbed straight at the back of Shirley's neck. Her hair stood on end at once, but when she tried to dodge, it was already too late—

There was a dull, wet sound as flesh was cut, but the pain she expected did not come. Shirley, already braced to take the hit head-on, turned her head in shock and saw a battle-axe sweeping past from behind her. The blade spun, then rose and fell again, cleanly chopping apart two more "spikes" that had lunged in for a surprise attack.

The edge of the axe blade shone with a dim blue light, as if it was covered by some burning force field that scorched and twisted the nearby air. An elven maiden named Celine held the strange long-handled axe in one hand. While she beat back the attackers and guarded Shirley's flank, she stared in confused shock at the tall black figures still appearing and gathering from all around. At last she could not help asking: "What… are these things?"

"They're definitely not something that grew in your forest, that's for sure!" Shirley shouted as she swung her chain high and brought Dog down, smashing apart a knot of shadows that was gathering not far ahead. "These things are so damn hard to deal with!"

Celine raised her axe to block another attack coming from the opposite side. Hearing Shirley's shout, she froze for a second, then frowned without thinking and said: "Those words are a bit rude."

"If you don't swear out loud, the curse words just rot in your stomach. That's disgusting," Shirley said with a wild, bright grin. She stepped on a mass of flesh that was still wriggling and pulling itself back together. Black smoky mist rose from the chain in her hands, and she looked almost cheerful. "I like to keep clean. I never let curse words stay in my gut overnight."

Celine listened in a daze to Shirley's "theory." She seemed to be trying hard to understand this logic, but in the end she only frowned and shook her head. She turned her attention back to the enemies around them and muttered: "You're talking nonsense."

A tentacle that swelled and shrank without a steady shape, its surface crawling with eyes and teeth, suddenly wrapped around Shirley's arm. Her heart jolted. She used all her strength to tear free of its grip, then forced back the clump of shadows where the tentacle had risen from. Only then did she glance toward Celine without thinking.

A strange doubt rose in her heart. Maybe it was just her imagination, but in these short few minutes, this elf named Celine seemed to have become more… human than before.

Was it because of the sudden attack? Because they were fighting side by side?

Shirley remembered how Celine had seemed when they first met. Back then, Celine had not shown so many emotional reactions. She had expressions of joy, anger, sorrow, and calm, but those reactions felt more like something designed ahead of time. She would only keep repeating the plan to head for the Wall of Silence. Besides that, no matter what Shirley said, Celine hardly reacted. Almost never was there surprise, confusion, or lively pushback.

Shirley did not know anything about psychology or behavior studies and had no words for the wrongness she felt. But her life experience had trained her to sense changes in other people's moods. She could clearly feel that something about Celine was changing—she just could not figure out why.

But she did not have much time to think about it.

After their first confusion and panic, the remnants of the Sun had adjusted and found their footing here. Now they were truly dangerous.

A vague shadow flashed at the edge of her sight. In a rush, Shirley only had time to yank her chain back and barely dodge the attack. The next second, another spike shot out from the shadows on the ground nearby and stabbed into the arm that still belonged to a human.

The sharp pain made her curse without thinking. Dog rushed in at once from the side and bit through the fleshy spike that had formed from the shadows. Shirley pulled back in a hurry, leaving that deadly range of attack. She had not even let out a breath of relief when she suddenly heard rustling behind her again.

She turned her head on instinct and saw a tall, thin shadow burst up from the ground right in front of her. The next moment, countless tentacles poured out from inside the shadow's "long coat" and wrapped around her arms and neck. The huge force that surged through those tentacles yanked her forward in an instant. She only had time to gasp before she was dragged up close to the shadow.

The tall shadow lifted its "head" toward her. A swollen, twisted mass of flesh pushed out from the collar of the long coat and suddenly opened like a flower bud. Right in front of Shirley, eyes, countless sharp teeth, and many writhing tendrils like mad tongues opened inside that blooming flesh flower.

In that brief moment, it felt as if a thousand voices exploded in Shirley's mind. Endless screams and whispers piled over one another, forcing their way into her head. Those howls and murmurs seemed to be trying to pass some message to her, but just as she felt she was about to understand them, most of the information slipped out of her mind, leaving no trace.

In this sudden link, her mind kept only one vague and strangely meaningless line:

“…Find their… the Sun…”

Shirley seemed to sink into boundless chaos. Endless darkness and emptiness wrapped around her. Countless noises roared over her. She slowly opened her eyes wide, her divine gaze blankly fixed on the blooming flower of flesh before her. Her will to resist felt peeled away from her body. Dog’s voice faded in her mind and drifted into the distance…

But in the next second, a thunderous boom exploded deep in her consciousness. In that endless darkness, Shirley seemed to see a ghost-green flame jump once. The flame shone on her soul and sent a sharp stab of pain through her head. The next instant, she snapped back to herself.

The tall, thin shadow came into focus again. The “head” made of foul, blooming flesh was shaking violently right in front of her. This remnant of the Sun let out a series of sharp hisses and howls. It seemed shocked. It could not understand why its corruption had failed to enter its prey’s mind —but soon, it no longer had any need to be shocked.

Clusters of ghost-green flame suddenly appeared on the surfaces of the many eyes inside the flesh flower. In the blink of an eye, the reflections in those eyes turned into real, spreading fire. Flames of spirit form burst out from the remnant’s “head,” blazing outward from the inside and burning this dream invader with fierce speed.

The monster shrieked and twitched. Under the burning of the spirit form flames, it convulsed hard, then curled up into a knot of strange black matter. Flames that poured from its body spread outward at once, like hunters that had caught the scent of prey, flowing toward the other remnants of the Sun that were gathering all around.

The fire spread like the wind. Sparks leaped from one place to another, and one remnant of the Sun after another caught fire. In almost the blink of an eye, they all turned into blazing sacred beacon torches.

Shirley stared in shock. The horrible feeling from when her mind had nearly been corrupted now cooled into a thin, icy aftertaste. But as the spirit flame spread, that lingering fear turned into a different emotion. She began to laugh. Wild pride showed on her face. She raised the black iron chain in her hand and looked with smug delight at the remnants of the Sun howling and struggling in the flames: “Trash like you think you can pull off some kind of mental corruption? I’m under the captain’s protection, damn it!”

The remnants of the Sun, of course, did not answer her. One blazing sacred beacon torch after another collapsed in the fire. Before they could withdraw from the dream, they turned into drifting ashes in the forest.

As for Shirley, she still looked smug, but she did not truly relax until the last “sacred beacon torch” fell. Only then did she turn her head toward Celine.

Celine’s voice reached her first: “Shirley, I feel… not very well…”

A heavy panic and unease hit her. Shirley’s heart clenched. She ran to Celine at once, and the next second, she saw the change happening to her.

The elven maiden’s feet had already begun to sink into the ground without anyone noticing. Dark, root-like shapes split from her legs, more and more of them, and reached down into the soil. She lifted her head and looked toward Shirley. She seemed to want to raise her arms, but bark-like growths were already spreading over them—growing stiff and harder to move.

Chapter 595: Unexpected Reunion

Shirley stared, dumbfounded, at what was happening before her eyes. It was like facing a twisted nightmare. For a moment she did not know how to react at all.

Celine slowly reached her right hand toward her. Shirley walked over on instinct, as if she meant to grab Celine's fingers. But before she could touch Celine, the elf's arm was completely covered in rough bark-like material. In the last second, all Shirley touched was a hard, coarse branch. Then the "branch" began to grow quickly, stretching upward, taller and taller toward the sky…

Celine's face disappeared inside the tangle of branches that burst into full growth. In the last instant before the transformation was complete, she opened her eyes a little wider. It was as if she suddenly understood something. She looked at Shirley, as if she wanted to tell her something. Then her expression froze at that moment and completely melted into the tree.

Now she had become a small tree with long, slender branches.

Shirley stared blankly at this unbelievable sight. She replayed the whole process of Celine changing into a tree in her mind and thought of that last look Celine had given her. For a long time, she simply stood there without moving.

What had happened? Why had it turned out like this?

How could an elf turn into a tree?

A faint wind suddenly blew nearby. There was malice hidden in the sound of the wind as it drew closer. Shirley finally woke from her shock. She snapped her head up and looked toward the source of that malice. In the dim forest, she saw a dark red glow and a haze like smoky shadows appear faintly, then fade away again.

Dog sensed the hateful aura at once—the aura of Abyssal demons.

“Annihilators! They were hiding in the shadows of those remnants of the Sun just now!”

Hearing Dog’s low growl, Shirley finally understood what had happened.

It was the Annihilators who had drawn those remnants of the Sun here. Maybe they were working together, or maybe it was only using them. They had wanted to use the hands of the remnants of the Sun to get rid of her and Celine. But things had gone beyond their plans. When one remnant of the Sun tried to corrupt her mind, the captain’s flame was stirred, turned back on them, and wiped out all the attackers.

Before this, the strong presence of the remnants of the Sun had covered the auras of the Annihilators. Now that the cultists knew they had been exposed, they made the quick choice to run.

Shirley looked toward the dark part of the forest. She took a step, then hesitated. Her eyes swept across the clearing. The remnants of the Sun that had died in the spirit flame were all curled and twisted into ash. The ashes slowly faded into the air. Faint ghostly green flames still burned between some of the ash piles, but they were shrinking and going out.

The captain’s flame was fading—that was not a power she could control.

Shirley knew very well that the “victory” just now had little to do with her. And she had no idea if that flame would appear again the next time she faced danger. Maybe… the mark the captain left on her could only work once.

If she chased the cultists blindly and then found in a real fight that she could not beat them, they would be in real trouble.

But her hesitation lasted only a second or two. Before the drifting smoke and mist moved out of Dog's sensing range, she bit her lip, spat to the side, and ran toward the deeper darkness.

She ran past the small tree that Celine had become. The thin twigs at the tip of the tree brushed Shirley's shoulder. Branches and leaves swayed and rustled softly.

After running through the forest for who knew how long, Shirley and Dog finally slowed down.

"Their scent has scattered up ahead, and it's fading fast," Dog said as it lifted its ugly big head and turned it left and right in the air. The blood-red glow in its eye sockets flickered. "There must be demons among them that are good at hiding their tracks. Maybe a Death-Omen Bird… tsk, what a bother."

"We lost them?" Shirley muttered, unwilling to give up. "I thought we'd finally catch one or two this time…"

Dog shook its head and did not say more. It only tried again to tell which way the fading trail truly led.

Just then, the sound of footsteps from somewhere in the forest cut off what it was doing with Shirley.

Shirley tensed at once. She raised her chain, bent forward, and looked toward the sound. But the figure that stepped out from behind the trees and bushes was not the cultist she had expected.

An elven maiden in light hunting clothes, carrying a strange long-handled battle-axe, walked out of the woods.

Shirley's taut stance went stiff. She stared in shock at the elven maiden coming out of the trees, at her familiar face. Even though she already knew she was inside a strange dream, a sense of absurd unease rose quietly in her heart. Then she heard the elven maiden speak to her in surprise:

"You didn't receive the evacuation order? Why are you still moving outside the Wall of Silence?!"

Shirley opened her mouth. A flood of words rushed up in her chest, but when she tried to speak, she could not form even one. She looked oddly at the "Celine" standing before her again. Her first instinct was to greet her, but she quickly realized this Celine did not know her at all—this was no longer the Celine who had taken her toward the Wall of Silence before.

While she was still frozen, a second set of footsteps sounded behind the elven maiden. Shirley looked that way in surprise. A familiar figure in a black dress, hugging an enormous stuffed rabbit doll in her arms, stepped into view.

"Miss Lucretia?"

"Shirley?" Lucretia walked out of the forest. Seeing the familiar figure at the fork in the path, the "sea witch" showed surprise as well and said: "I really didn't expect this…"

This unexpected meeting left both of them a bit stunned. Shirley grabbed Dog and looked Lucretia up and down, then glanced at the elven maiden standing beside her. After a moment, Shirley cautiously stepped back half a pace and said: "Just to be safe—"

Lucretia spoke right away: "Identity check."

Shirley answered quickly: "Where was Alice's head yesterday at noon?"

“In the pot,” Lucretia replied without a pause. Then she asked at once: “What is my father’s biggest hobby right now?”

“Fishing, walking the dog, and feeding pigeons—you pass.”

“Yes, you pass,” Lucretia said. She clearly relaxed a little. She lowered the conductor’s baton she had been gripping and set the stuffed rabbit doll down on the ground. “This dream is very strange. A bit more caution never hurts.”

Shirley nodded along. Just then, the elven maiden Celine finally spoke: “You know each other?”

“Yes, friend,” Lucretia answered lightly.

Shirley could not help giving the elf beside her another complicated look. Then she turned to Lucretia and asked quickly: “Did you see any sign of those Annihilators on your way here?”

“Annihilators?” Lucretia frowned. “I didn’t see any—did you run into them?”

“Not just Annihilators, I also ran into a bunch of trash from the Sun,” Shirley said with some regret. “Too bad those Annihilators ran off in the end…”

She then quickly told Lucretia what had happened to her just now, including how she had almost been corrupted by a remnant of the Sun and how the captain’s flame had appeared and saved her.

But she did not mention the Celine who had been with her, nor that unbelievable scene of Celine turning into a small tree.

Another elven maiden named Celine was standing right next to them, listening curiously to her and Lucretia’s conversation.

Until she understood what was going on with all these “Celines,” she had to avoid causing any unknown changes in them as much as she could.

“Dog and I chased them all the way here. We were almost on them, but they still got away,” Shirley said, shaking her head with regret after she finished her story. “There was a Death-Omen Bird among them. That’s a kind of demon that’s good at hiding its aura and confusing senses. Dog isn’t good at dealing with that thing.”

Lucretia lifted her head. She looked thoughtfully at the forest around them, which looked almost the same no matter which way you turned. After a moment of thinking, she suddenly said: “They shouldn’t have gotten far… You just said they bolted right after they saw the spirit flame kill those remnants of the Sun?”

“That’s right,” Shirley said with a nod. “They ran fast and didn’t care about their ‘allies’ at all.”

“So they were terrified by my father’s flame. They must have been full of fear when they ran, right?”

“…I guess so,” Shirley answered, not too sure and a little confused. “Is there something wrong with that?”

Lucretia did not answer her. Instead, she lowered her head and looked at the stuffed rabbit doll sitting on the ground in a daze. She said: “Rabby, I know you’re listening.”

The stuffed rabbit doll swayed slowly from side to side and gave a tiny, complaining sound: “Rabby doesn’t like cultists. Their minds stink, and there are really gross things in there…”

Lucretia said nothing. She simply raised the conductor’s baton in her hand.

The stuffed rabbit doll stood up at once. It patted the dirt off its body and muttered as it worked: “All right, all right, Rabby knows, Rabby will go look for them… You have to remember to bring Rabby back!”

“Go… while their fear still hasn’t faded.”

“Okay,” the stuffed rabbit doll answered. Then, right in front of Shirley, it exploded with a bang. A cloud of white smoke poured out of it, drawn in rough lines like a hand-drawn picture. The smoke rose and spread, instantly covering its silly yet creepy figure. As the smoke thinned and drifted away, the stuffed rabbit doll vanished from Shirley’s sight along with it.

Chapter 596: Inherited Fishing Talent

Now Shirley once again set out on the road to that legendary Wall of Silence, together with Lucretia and still under the mental guidance of the elf maiden named Celine.

They walked through a dense forest where light and shadow tangled together. They stepped along paths covered in fallen branches and leaves, pushed through thorns and bushes. From deep in the woods came the cries of small animals and birds from time to time, but those sounds only made the forest feel even colder and more lonely. Looking at Celine’s back as Celine walked ahead, Shirley even had a brief illusion. She felt as if time had turned back and she had returned to that recent trek through the forest when she had followed this same guide.

Nothing seemed to have changed. The forest always looked the same. The noises around them were the same. And the two “Celines” looked completely identical.

Only the witch walking beside her, who sometimes turned into colored scraps of paper to hurry along, reminded Shirley that things had already changed.

By now, without the elf maiden noticing, Shirley had told Lucretia everything that had happened before. She had also shared it with everyone else trapped in the state of Dreamwalking, including the captain who was acting outside the dream. The captain’s preparations before the Dreamwalking had worked very well. The Power of Flame tied everyone together. That link was even more useful than Shirley had expected.

After learning what had happened to “the other Celine,” Lucretia could not help feeling different when she looked at the elf maiden walking in front of them.

That Celine who had moved together with Shirley had turned into a tree in the end. Before she completed that transformation, she seemed to have had something she wanted to tell Shirley.

So would this Celine also suddenly turn into a tree?

Over on Nina and Morris’s side, they had also met a guide who called herself “Celine.” What about that Celine? Would the same change happen to her?

In the end, what were these “Celines” that appeared in the Nameless One’s dream?

At first, Lucretia had only thought “Celine” was a mental entity, formed from the dream’s deep, chaotic thoughts. But now all kinds of clues showed that Celine had a special nature far beyond what they had imagined. This elf who called herself Celine seemed to have a very complex link with this forest and with the entire dream of the Nameless One. It was far more than a simple tie between a dream and a mind-born spirit.

The process of her transformation into a tree might be revealing the true nature of that link.

The elf maiden walking in front suddenly slowed her steps. She turned and looked back at Lucretia and Shirley, who were falling far behind, and waved hard: “Hurry up. The forest is too dangerous right now. Once we reach the Wall of Silence, you can rest.”

Lucretia glanced back at Shirley and Dog beside her, then they all quickened their pace together.

As she hurried to catch up, Shirley muttered under her breath: “Can that big Little Doll really find those sneaky cultists? I still feel like it’s not very reliable…”

“Rabby does act up sometimes, but as long as I give clear orders, it won’t cause trouble,” Lucretia said softly. “Hunting inside dreams is what it does best. It will track them and chase them all the way to the Mortal Realm, and then we can find where those cultists are really hiding.”

“So what is that big rabbit supposed to be, exactly?” Dog grumbled at her side. “I smelled… a human scent on it. It’s definitely not some simple magic construct, not even an ordinary evil spirit or some run-of-the-mill demon. And it’s not just the rabbit. The other things on your ship give me the same feeling. They all feel strange to me.”

“Human scent?” Lucretia looked at Dog and smiled a little. “Ah, as expected of a Abyssal Hound. Your senses really are sharp. Yes, it’s a human scent. It’s the human scent from a piece of my soul.”

Dog froze. “…Huh?”

“It’s nothing that big,” Lucretia said. “When Rabby first met me, it tore off a piece of my soul. It probably never thought that bite of soul would take away its freedom forever. A lot of the things on the Radiant Star are like that. They all came from the boundary regions or from the Spirit Realm. They were dangerous beings, and for a time they thought they were hunters and saw me as their prey. For me, that is a great convenience.”

Lucretia spoke slowly, still wearing that faint smile.

“I use my soul as bait and search for servants at the boundary,” she went on. “Souls cursed by Subspace make the best poison and the best chains. Those who mistake themselves for hunters end up bound by my soul. I sew them into cloth, pour them into bottles, carve them into wood. They become part of the Radiant Star. I need these servants, because I need assistants for my journeys along the boundary, and humans… humans die too easily."

The sea witch finished her explanation and lowered her head to look at Dog. "Your sense is very accurate. That ship is full of tiny traces of 'human scent.' You really don't need to be so shocked."

Dog and Shirley both stared in a daze. Lucretia's words had clearly stunned them. For a while, the two "people" said nothing at all.

Seeing this, Lucretia only smiled again. Pleased by Shirley and Dog's silence, she turned back and continued to follow in Celine's footsteps.

When the sea witch had gone a bit farther ahead, Shirley finally shook the chain in her hand. Even though she was speaking through the mental link, she still could not help lowering her voice: "DogDog, isn't this what the captain called… what was it… baiting the spot? She's using herself as bait?"

"Sounds like it," Dog muttered quietly through the mental link. "The captain mentioned this when he was teaching me fishing tricks."

"No wonder she's the captain's daughter…" Shirley could not stop herself from sighing. "That whole family seems to be good at fishing…"

"Tyrian doesn't seem very good at it."

"He fished up so many submersibles from the sea back then! He didn't reel them up by hand, sure, but he was still one of the people in charge…"

"That counts?"

"Just answer this: did he or did he not pull them out of the sea?"

"…"

…

Duncan quietly shut down his “monitoring” of Shirley and Lucretia’s side.

He sat in a “chair” drawn from tangled lines and piled colors. Words like “baiting the spot” and “fishing” kept circling in his head. After a while, he turned his gaze a little and looked at the “mirror” nearby, shaped from uneven lines. He spoke to Agatha’s face in the mirror: “She never remembers proper knowledge, but anything else, she picks up so fast. If Shirley could put even a tenth of that effort into memorizing vocabulary, she wouldn’t be fighting Alice, that solid blockhead, over test scores.”

Agatha stayed quiet for a few seconds before she finally broke the silence. “To be honest, I also think Miss Lucretia has very excellent ‘fishing skills’…”

Duncan waved his hand. “Anyway, we don’t have to worry about Shirley and Lucretia for now. Being together is much safer than moving alone, and maybe that rabbit called Rabby really can catch those elusive cultists. What matters more now… is this ship.”

He rose from the chair and let his eyes pass over the piled, twisted colors and lines around him, picking out the outlines of different parts of the room from those lines. After getting used to this dizzying chaos, he had already recognized many familiar things in here.

There was a bed, chairs, a table, and other basic furniture, all placed roughly where they should be in the Mortal Realm. But when it came to details, like what was on the table now or what hung on the walls, everything blurred into messy patches of color.

It was just as Duncan had guessed. In the Mortal Realm, Goathead did not dare to spy on the true state of the captain’s cabin. At most, he had caught a quick glimpse inside when the captain opened the door. Those vague impressions had become the crooked lines and color blocks that formed this room.

Outside this room, though, the Vanished had been almost perfectly rebuilt one to one. That was because, in the Mortal Realm, Goathead knew every part of the Vanished by heart, except for the captain's cabin.

This eerie version of the Vanished had grown out of the "shadow" of the Vanished in the Mortal Realm. But it was not a simple one-to-one swap. In this change, Goathead's "awareness" and "memory" had played the key role.

By now the facts were clear. This ship was the dream of his first mate, even though Goathead had no idea he was dreaming at all.

But this place was also Atlantis's dream. At the very least, there was some kind of "link" between it and Atlantis's dream.

Duncan raised his hand. A tiny flame appeared in the air in front of him. The flame rippled like water and spread quickly in all directions, but it stopped when it reached the edge of this "chaotic room," then rippled and reflected back.

This was the result of Duncan's "tests" over the past while.

Inside this room, which Goathead could not perceive, Duncan could summon his own flames freely without worrying about waking Atlantis like last time. But outside the room, he could only move the fire seeds he had mapped onto the ship in advance. Any extra flame might wake Atlantis and end the Nameless One's dream too soon.

So… was there a safe way to fully take control of this ship, deepen his link with Atlantis, and still avoid startling her again and stirring up her resistance?

Deep in thought, Duncan lifted his head and looked toward the door.

Maybe he was making this too complicated. Maybe it was actually very simple.

After a moment’s hesitation, he told Agatha to stay in this “safe room” for now, then stepped out.

That muddle-headed Goathead still stared blankly at the edge of the chart table and did not react at all when Duncan appeared. Duncan walked straight past him, past the room of the enchanted sea chart, and out through the cabin door. Then he followed the route he knew by heart, climbed the stairs beside and behind the captain’s cabin, and came out onto the aft deck.

In the endless darkness and slowly drifting mist, something appeared in his sight. It seemed to be quietly waiting for him, and had been waiting for a long time.

It was the helm of the Vanished.

“…Time to take the wheel again.”

Chapter 597: Stream of Light

Ever since he had discovered this strange Vanished sailing through endless darkness and fog, Duncan had been very careful not to try and seize its wheel.

He had not known what this ship really was, nor how it might react if he tried to “take control.”

But now he knew the ship was the shadow of the Vanished, and that it had changed because Goathead had slipped into Dreamwalking without knowing it. That knowledge eased many of Duncan’s worries.

It was time for this ship that sailed through dreams to learn who its real captain was.

Duncan slowly walked up onto the helm platform at the stern. His steps passed the iron hooks and ropes nearby. The ropes lay silent, coiled and waiting in the dark. In the middle of the platform, the dull-colored wheel rocked a little from side to side, as if it was still making tiny course changes here in the dreamscape, as if Goathead was still faithfully steering it.

Duncan came to the wheel and took a slow breath. He could not help remembering the scene from the first time he had stood here and set his hand on the helm.

He shook off those stray thoughts. Then he reached out and slowly gripped one of the smooth, cold handles at the rim of the wheel. Along with the smooth, chilly feel came a faint resistance.

Duncan ignored the resistance that seeped through the dream itself. He called on the “safe” fire seeds he had sent onto the ship earlier and ordered them to gather at the helm while he tightened his grip on the wheel.

The next second, thin threads of flame appeared in the darkness out of nowhere. Spirit-form fire flared up and in an instant set the helm platform at the stern ablaze. Duncan’s body turned into a half-transparent spirit form within the flames, and fire swept over the whole helm, wheel and all.

In that instant, Duncan felt the ship changing under his hands. It became clear and solid in his mind, just like the Vanished in the Mortal Realm. He sensed its deck, its masts, each sail and every rope. He sensed the dark, hidden rooms and corridors below the deck…

The whole ship groaned and creaked. This Vanished, shaped from a shadow and formed by the power of dreams, suddenly seemed to awaken. It finally recognized its captain. Every part of the ship seemed to cheer. The ropes, barrels, and other things that had been still a moment ago started to sway in the dark.

Right after that, as the spirit-form sails slowly filled, Duncan felt the ghost ship begin to speed up. Before, it had drifted slowly in the dark mist. Now it moved as if it had a clear destination and was sailing toward some point in the darkness.

Duncan felt that sudden change with surprise, especially the sudden burst of speed. But before he could sense what lay ahead on this course, a voice suddenly came from nowhere and went straight into his mind: “…Who is there?”

It was a young girl’s voice, a little hazy and confused, sounding half awake and half asleep. It echoed everywhere in the darkness. In the very next instant, Duncan felt light and shadow bloom before his eyes. Then a huge structure appeared out of the darkness ahead, and dim phantom lights rose in the ship's path.

It looked like a giant whirlpool. But inside the whirlpool he saw countless shapes like vines or branches. Endless vines and boughs surged toward the Vanished from ahead and, in the blink of an eye, wrapped almost every inch of space beyond the railings. In Duncan's sight, that vast plant structure filled everything and stretched and moved backward as the Vanished sailed on.

It felt as if the ship had suddenly "flown" into a tunnel woven from some huge plant. Vines and branches twisted together to form the walls and the dome of that tunnel. A crushing sense of pressure came with it. At the same time, countless tiny lights appeared along the vines and then flowed together like water.

Those lights finally reached the Vanished. They began to spread along the deck and the sides of the hull, creeping closer and closer to the stern where Duncan stood. Something seemed to be gathering inside the glow, but it never took on a clear shape. The lights simply gathered and drew nearer, as if searching for something.

Under that overwhelming sight and strange radiance, Duncan held the wheel tight. He controlled himself and refused to step away from the helm no matter what happened. He watched the dark vines and branches slide past outside the railings. He felt the Vanished's speed slowly drop, as if some unseen force was dragging at the ship. Then the wandering lights finally gathered near him again, and he heard the young, childlike voice once more.

"Who is it? Who is there?"

Duncan stared hard at the light. He watched it drift near him and wander around the helm without purpose, while the voice kept sounding in his mind.

“Have you come back, Saslokar? …Have you come home? You have been gone so long…

“I cannot see you… Where are you? Can I open my eyes now? Is it all over?

“I… I cannot open my eyes, Saslokar. I am a little scared. I cannot see anything… but something is here…

“I kept them all safe. I built a wall. You will see them when you come back… but I cannot see you. Are you there? Have you come back?”

The light called out again and again. It drifted and gathered around the helm, then broke apart into blind, chaotic streams. More than once, a strand of light flowed right up to the wheel and even brushed against Duncan’s coat and sleeves.

Yet “she” seemed unable to sense Duncan at all.

“She” could not see anything, as if the owner of that voice and Duncan were locked in different dimensions, living in different times and spaces.

Duncan watched the streams of light wandering past. He listened to the voice that seemed to speak straight in his mind. When the glow drew close, he could even feel a faint warmth from it. The words, repeated over and over, sounded like they carried many vital clues. He frowned, hesitated for a moment, then finally reached out. One hand stayed on the wheel. The other reached toward one of the streams of light.

The light touched his palm, bringing a warmth that felt both real and unreal.

Then the little stream of light flowed straight through his arm. Its warmth faded away. As if it belonged to another dimension, the light passed on toward the stern.

But in that brief contact, Duncan learned, or rather confirmed, the name of the light and the voice. She was Atlantis, the elves' World Tree.

That name stamped itself into Duncan's mind as pure information, as if showing the corrupting nature of knowledge itself.

Duncan blanked out for a second. Then he suddenly felt the deck under his feet tremble.

A moment later, the tremor ran through the whole ship. The Vanished, sailing through the dark mist, began to shake violently. The spirit-form sails went out in the darkness at once. Cracks spread over the deck. Everything that made up the ship started to fade and fall apart. Even the wheel in Duncan's hands began to lose its solid feel.

Duncan froze, then realized what was happening.

The dream was losing stability. The time to "wake up" had come.

Yet this time he had gone out of his way to avoid using flames that would disturb Atlantis. In that brief contact, he had not felt any sign that Atlantis was waking. So why was the dream still falling apart so fast?

…

A sudden wild wind in the desert tore Vanna from her thoughts. She sprang up from behind the stones where she had been sheltering from the wind and looked toward the direction where sand and dust were rising.

Walls of sand were rearing up in the distance. Everything in the dust and haze grew vague at great speed. The jagged rocks became twisted and unreal, as if they might vanish from this world at any moment.

After a brief moment of shock, Vanna received a message from the captain.

The Nameless One's dream was losing stability. This dream was about to end.

The flying sand and the twisting, fading horizon showed that the borders of the dream were racing toward her.

Vanna quickly turned her head and looked across the almost dead campfire.

The old giant there was lifting his head. Calm fire burned in his deep, hollow, stone-like eyes.

“Traveler, it seems the time has come to say goodbye.”

Vanna paused, then suddenly understood. “How did you… know…?”

“I do not know what is going to happen,” the giant said gently. He slowly rose from the pile of rocks. His body stood in the wind like a tower. Lowering his head, he gazed calmly into Vanna’s eyes with a kind of divine gaze. “But I can feel that a journey is ending for now. You are about to leave, aren’t you? You do not belong to this ruined world. There is still life in you, and this world has not seen life for a very long time.”

Vanna opened her mouth but could not think of what to say. In this short moment before the dream woke, it seemed she had time only to say farewell.

The giant smiled and bent down to pick up his strange, long staff.

Vanna noticed that there were now a few more symbols on the surface of that huge “gatekeeper’s cane,” which was even taller than the giant himself.

They were letters. They carried a strange, blurry sense of familiarity. For a second, she felt she was about to understand them. But in the next instant, the meaning of the letters slipped from her mind like running water.

They were words she did not know.

“Traveler, perhaps we will meet again,” the giant’s voice came from above, breaking Vanna’s daze. “And maybe it will be soon.”

Vanna started. “Why?”

The giant pointed at the gatekeeper’s cane. “Because there is a sentence here that I have not finished carving yet.”

Vanna blinked and had just opened her mouth to ask something when the storm of sand rushed at her from behind. In the rising dust, the world in front of her shook and collapsed at great speed.

A second later, the broken world came back together and turned into a familiar living room, a familiar table, and a familiar roof.

Familiar faces reappeared in front of her.

Chapter 598: Layered Space-Time

On the waters near Lightwind Harbor, far from the main shipping routes and covered in thin mist, the huge and imposing silhouette of the Vanished slowly cruised through the fog.

Then the sea surface suddenly rippled in a strange, unreal way. The ghost ship's reflection rose and fell in those ripples. For a very brief instant, the reflection seemed about to gather itself up out of the water, but in the next moment everything returned to normal.

In the captain's cabin, on the edge of the chart table, the wooden carving of Goathead suddenly turned its head in confusion. Its base gave a faint creak as it lifted its head and looked around. After a long moment, it muttered in puzzlement: "Why did that just feel so strange…"

On the wall in one corner of the room, the ancient oval scrying mirror now held layers of rolling black mist. The figure of Agatha stood within the glass, quietly watching Goathead on the table.

Goathead finally noticed the gaze from the side. It snapped its head around, saw Agatha, and let out a yell: "Hey… you scared me! Why are you staring at me first thing in the morning?"

As it spoke, it shook its head again, as if it suddenly remembered something: "Right, Lady Agatha, where did you go last night? I felt like your presence wasn't on the ship… Don't you usually wander through the mirrors at night to patrol?"

Agatha did not answer Goathead's question right away. She kept quietly watching the every move of this "First Mate." Only after a long silence did she speak: "You didn't feel anything last night? You didn't notice any anomaly when I left?"

"No," Goathead said after a brief pause, then slowly realized something. "Wait, what do you mean… did something happen again last night?"

"Mm. The captain should be coming to see you soon," Agatha said with a frown and a small nod. Then she asked: "Just now you said you felt strange. What exactly was that about?"

Goathead thought for a moment before realising she meant the muttered comment it had just made to itself. It still had no idea why this usually calm and gentle former Gatekeeper was acting so strangely this morning, but it still answered: "I don't really know how to describe it. I just… jolted. Like I was spacing out and someone suddenly tapped me on the shoulder."

Agatha gave Goathead a puzzled look and studied it for a moment: "…Do you have shoulders?"

"Then it was a tap on the head—just a figure of speech, you get it," Goathead said, shaking its head. "Maybe I zoned out a bit while steering. There must have been a bit of swell on the sea just now that shook me awake…"

"There was no swell. The sea stayed calm the whole time—only the dreamscape rippled," Agatha said, shaking her head. "You were dreaming just now."

Goathead froze. After several seconds it finally let out a sound: "…Huh?"

…

Looking at the city streets, now completely back to normal in the morning light, Duncan slightly furrowed his brow. His face showed a thoughtful expression.

The two dolls stood quietly behind him.

He stood thinking like that for who knew how long, then suddenly muttered under his breath: “It seems that no matter how long I stay ‘over there,’ no matter how the Nameless One’s dream ends, when I ‘wake up,’ time in the Mortal Realm is always back at dawn…”

Alice turned her head to look at Lunie, then turned back to the captain and scratched her hair in confusion: “Uh… did you stay ‘over there’ for a long time this time?”

“From how it felt, I lingered in that dark, misty space for almost twice as long as last time—right up until the dream jolted awake again,” Duncan said, nodding slowly. “But it seems that the time node in the Mortal Realm was still the same as before. It was still dawn, just as the Sun was rising. That does… fit how dreams work, a little.”

He paused, searching for the words, then explained to Alice: “The way time feels passing inside a dream is chaotic. A single second and a thousand years of felt time might both be only an instant in the Mortal Realm, and everything gets corrected at the moment you wake up.”

Alice thought about it, then shook her head in confusion: “I don’t get it…”

“It’s fine. It’s not important,” Duncan said with a smile, pushing aside the messy thoughts in his mind for now. He stepped forward and ruffled Alice’s hair. “Let’s go back first. This exploration… was very fruitful.”

With the two dolls in tow, Duncan quickly returned to the witch’s manor at No. 99 Crown Street. His crew members had already come back from the dreamscape and had gathered again in the living room.

When Duncan walked into the living room, Vanna, Morris, and the others were already talking about their own experiences in the Nameless One’s dream.

Unlike last time, when everyone fell into dreamwalking with no prophetic omen at all, this round of dreamwalking had been done with preparation. Using flame, Duncan had left everyone a temporary mark, making sure the crew members could at least exchange basic information inside the Nameless One's dream. So when they woke up this time, no one needed to spend extra effort explaining what they had gone through. They could focus their energy on discussing the various clues instead.

Duncan's arrival broke off the crew's discussion. Morris and the others all got to their feet to salute the captain. Nina, however, rushed over and threw herself at him, looking especially happy: "Uncle Duncan!"

Duncan gave Nina a gentle hug, then let his gaze sweep over the figures in the room. He saw Lucretia sitting on the sofa opposite the coffee table with a rather odd look on her face, and spread his hands with a smile: "Do you want a hug too?"

The witch of the sea thought for a moment, then shook her head: "No."

Duncan chuckled and went to sit in his own seat. His expression quickly turned serious: "All right, then let's get to business. We can skip the basic exchange of information. What we need to focus on now are two new developments.

"First, the 'Celine' who appeared before Shirley, Morris, and Nina.

"Second, the 'giant' Vanna met, the one who claimed to be a deity."

He raised his head and let his gaze fall on Morris.

"I want to hear your thoughts first, Morris."

"The fact that multiple 'Celines' appeared in the dream means we need to adjust our earlier judgment of her," Morris said. He took off his blessed monocle and began to wipe it as he spoke. “Before, we judged that ‘Celine’ was only a mental entity that appeared in the Nameless One’s dream, like a native resident. Her actions did not seem closely tied to how the dream itself operated. But now, it seems that is not the case…

“Once the range and time of our activity in the dream pass a certain limit, a ‘Celine’ appears near us and tries to guide our minds toward that place called the ‘Wall of Silence.’ That kind of mental guidance might be a mechanism of the Nameless One’s dream itself.

“In other words, that elf called ‘Celine’ may be the avatar form of some rule within the Nameless One’s dream. She is not a mind of her own, but a mechanism. When the conditions are right, she is triggered. When the conditions change, she may vanish.”

As Morris spoke, his gaze shifted to Shirley at the side.

The “vanish” the old scholar mentioned clearly referred to the “Celine” who had been with Shirley earlier—that “Celine” had finally turned into a tree.

“As for the exact rules of this ‘triggering’ and ‘vanishing,’ we may need several more tests to sum them up—or we may never be able to,” Morris went on as he put his blessed monocle back on. “But one point is clear. The appearance of ‘Celine’ is friendly toward us ‘Visitors,’ while it is hostile toward those cultists who intrude into the dreamwalking state. She called those intruders ‘filth.’ That should represent the Nameless One’s own judgment, or stance. That is good news for us.”

Duncan listened quietly to the old gentleman’s analysis and nodded. Then his gaze fell on Vanna.

“Then about that ‘giant,’ Vanna, what do you think?”

“I have no leads,” Vanna said after thinking for a while. She shook her head honestly. “I went over everything that ‘giant’ told me, but I couldn’t find anything that matched in the myths or historical records of the Mortal Realm. Even in elven culture, where the historical line is relatively complete, there is no mention at all of that giant or of the ‘city of hills and plains’ he described…”

“Even the elves’ ‘heritage’ is only relatively complete. If that giant came from an age before the Great Annihilation, then it is perfectly normal that we cannot find matching clues in modern records,” Lucretia said, shaking her head. “The key question is what kind of relationship that giant and the desert under his feet have with the elves.”

The witch raised her head and looked into Vanna’s eyes.

“Miss Vanna, you never saw a trace of forest in that desert. And you didn’t hear any information about elves from the giant’s mouth either, did you?”

“Yes. Nothing at all,” Vanna answered with certainty.

“That elf called ‘Celine’ also had no idea what a desert even was. The only thing that could be linked to the ‘giant’ was her description of the creator Saslokar. She said Saslokar was a deity with no fixed form, able to turn into a deer, a goat, or a giant. But that connection seems far too forced to me,” Lucretia said as she thought aloud. “So right now, it feels like Vanna and the rest of us have been split into two different ‘space-times.’ The environments we face, the people we meet, and the information we hear are all completely different. Yet these two ‘space-times’ are definitely connected…”

“Yes. At the very least, both of these ‘space-times’ are certainly parts of the Nameless One’s dream,” Morris said at once, nodding. The old scholar wore a thoughtful look. After thinking for a moment, he spoke slowly: “Then we need to figure out one thing. What causes the huge difference between these two space-times? Is it a discontinuity in space, or a discontinuity in time?”

Chapter 599: The Mechanism of Awakening

As it turned out, what a truly seasoned scholar thought of when facing a problem was indeed different from an ordinary person.

The question Morris raised in his thinking almost instantly lit up many people's thoughts.

"First, we have a major premise. The 'desert' Vanna saw and the 'forest' the others saw are both parts of the Nameless One's dream. Under that premise, these two 'places' have only two possibilities," Morris said as he sat on the sofa, slowly laying out his thoughts. "Either the 'desert' and the 'forest' are different locations at the same moment in time, or they are the same location at different moments in time. In any case, they should not be two completely separate systems. At least one of time or space should connect them."

Nina did her best to follow the old gentleman's line of thought, then suddenly asked curiously: "Why can't they be both different locations and different moments in time?"

"Because they are in the same dream," Morris explained. "A single dream cannot contain two or more completely independent systems of time and space. Otherwise, they would be two unrelated dreams. At least, the knowledge I have right now does not support that idea."

"Oh…" Nina drew out the sound and nodded, half understanding and half not.

Duncan was still turning over the two possibilities Morris had raised. In his mind he kept testing the two models—“the same place at different moments” and “different places at the same moment”—against the clues they already knew. After a long while, he set the complicated question aside for now and said: “Let me remind you of something. Besides the ‘desert’ and the ‘forest,’ there is another ‘place’ drifting on the edge of the Mortal Realm. It is not inside the dream, but it is clearly also part of the Nameless One’s dream.”

“…That dark space filled with mist, where the Vanished’s reflection sails,” Morris said at once, his expression turning serious. “I have also been thinking about this. Which part of the Nameless One’s dream does that dark mist correspond to, exactly?

“The most likely guess for now is that it lies on the border of ‘about to wake but not yet awake.’ On that reflected Vanished, you can touch Atlantis’s echoes, but you cannot directly see what happens inside the dream. That matches the traits of a dream’s border very well. It is just that, clearly, the ‘border’ of the Nameless One’s dream is quite vast. It is large enough to let an entire ship drift aimlessly within it…”

Duncan recalled the streams of light he had seen on that reflected Vanished, and the voice from Atlantis he had heard within those lights. His expression slowly turned thoughtful.

The reflected Vanished was Goathead’s dream. It sailed along the border of Atlantis’s dream. Atlantis seemed to be waiting there all this time for Saslokar. Yet the Goathead in the dream had told Duncan that Saslokar was already dead, and had died long, long ago…

After thinking for a moment, Duncan shook his head. Right after that, he noticed something slightly off in the room, and his gaze landed on Lucretia: “Where is Rabby?”

“You finally noticed,” Lucretia said with a faint smile. “Rabby didn’t come back. It jumped into other dreams. It should still be chasing those prey right now.”

Duncan froze for a moment before he understood what Lucretia meant.

That eerie stuffed rabbit doll had actually tracked down those cultists?

“It will crawl out from those cultists’ nightmares and then leave coordinates in the Mortal Realm that are enough to summon you. I have already told Rabby to leave some of them alive,” Lucretia went on. “Don’t worry. In matters like that, it is reliable.”

Duncan nodded slowly.

Just then, he seemed to hear something again. His brow creased as he looked toward the nearby coffee table.

He reached out and gently brushed his hand across the surface of the table. Ghost?green flame spread over the wood like a phantom. The outline drawn by the fire took on a mirror-like sheen, and Agatha’s figure slowly emerged from within it.

“Agatha,” Duncan said as he looked at the lady appearing in the mirror. “Is something happening on the ship?”

“I may have found the reason the Nameless One’s dream jolted awake this time. It has to do with the First Mate,” Agatha said with a quick nod. “If possible, I hope you can come back for a bit.”

…

On the misty sea near Lightwind Harbor, a doorway of flame suddenly opened above the deck of the drifting Vanished. Duncan and Alice stepped out of the gate.

Duncan turned his head to glance at Alice, who had followed him back.

The doll had followed along as if it were only natural. When she saw Duncan looking her way, she just showed her trademark cheerful grin: “Hehe—I came along again!”

Duncan sighed helplessly and waved at the doll: “Fine. I’ll go to the captain’s cabin and see what’s going on. You go to the food storage hold again and check those barrels that had problems before.”

“Okay, Captain!”

Alice left in high spirits, as if she carried a great mission. Duncan watched the doll go, then tugged at the corner of his mouth and started toward the captain’s cabin.

As soon as he opened the door, he saw Goathead on the edge of the chart table whip its head around. Its black obsidian eyes stared straight at him. On the nearby wall, Agatha’s figure stood in the ancient oval scrying mirror. For some reason, this usually calm and reliable Gatekeeper looked utterly exhausted, even like she had lost all will to live.

Duncan froze for a moment when he saw Agatha’s deathly tired face. Before he could even ask what had happened, Goathead’s noisy voice suddenly burst out:

“Captain, you’re finally here! Your loyal—well, everything that needs saying—has been waiting so long! Is what Agatha said really true? Did that Nameless One’s dream appear again last night? And did you meet that Goathead who looks exactly like me again? She also said that eerie, gloomy Vanished you saw came out of my dream, but I didn’t even know I could dream! She said it was because of that little jolt of mine that the Nameless One’s dream was startled awake, and it even interrupted what you were doing. But I really don’t know what happened. You have to believe me, I never meant to hide anything, who could have known that last night would…”

In that instant, Duncan almost felt the buzzing racket condense into a solid wall and slam into him head-on. The nonstop chatter drilled into his ears with a roar, and his mind started to hum at once. Only after several minutes did he snap back to himself and quickly wave his hand: “Stop! Be quiet!”

Goathead stopped at once, but the joint between its neck and base gave a strange cracking sound—as if the earlier stream of chatter had been so strong that even slamming a halt to the topic made a noise.

Then Duncan heard a sigh of pure relief from the mirror beside him. Agatha said: “It’s finally over…”

Duncan gave the lady in the mirror a strange look.

“As you ordered, I did not hide what happened last night from the First Mate,” Agatha reported to the captain, her face full of exhaustion. “And then it turned into this. Before you came, it just kept going on and on at me. No matter where I hid, I could hear it muttering, muttering, muttering… Even the undead I met in the Frostholm cemetery—one who was framed, had his home destroyed, died unjustly, and clawed his way back out of the grave three days later from sheer resentment—couldn’t complain as much as it does! The noise it makes in one minute beats twenty old ladies at the citizen Center all complaining at once about the price of bread going up!”

Agatha added in deep bitter frustration: “And telling it to shut up doesn’t work at all! It only listens to you when you say that!”

Duncan finally understood why Agatha had worn that expression of “I might as well have died back in the Great Hollow under Frostholm” when he walked in.

It took a lot of effort for him to control his own expression. Keeping his face as straight as he could, he tried to comfort her: “…You’ve worked hard.”

Agatha let out a sigh. Her figure in the mirror split into several shards at once, showing that she had mentally cracked and no longer wanted to think or respond.

Duncan: “…”

He felt that he probably shouldn’t have stuffed so many strange ideas into his crew members’ heads. When they tried to carry out some abstract phrasing, they ended up even more abstract than the words themselves.

Ignoring the cracked Agatha in the mirror, Duncan turned his gaze back to Goathead.

The black wooden carving was staring straight at him. Maybe because it had been holding back so many words, even its stiff wooden face looked a little twisted.

“Don’t waste too many words,” Duncan said first, making that point clear. Then he spoke again, his face serious: “Second, everything Agatha said is true.”

Goathead’s head twitched. Its jaw opened and closed several times before it finally forced out the words: “I… I really, in my sleep, turned the Vanished’s reflection into that ship you saw in that dark space?”

“Or to put it another way,” Duncan said calmly, meeting Goathead’s eyes with a godlike gaze, “when the veil of night descends over Lightwind Harbor, your dream will sail along the border of the Nameless One’s dream.”

Goathead’s head squeaked and creaked as it shook. It looked oddly conflicted: “But I really don’t know… I was just steering while fully awake. The enchanted sea chart also recorded the Vanished’s cruising route, and it matches my memory exactly…”

Agatha’s voice suddenly came from the side: “Then how do you explain that little jolt of yours when dawn came?”

Goathead fell silent.

Duncan, however, raised his head and looked at the oval scrying mirror on the wall.

Agatha, who had been in pieces just a moment ago, had already recovered and was now watching them with a very serious expression.

“After leaving the Nameless One’s dream, I returned here at once,” Agatha said. “I saw the First Mate wake up from some kind of… trance. It said it had just been distracted, but I can be sure that the Vanished’s reflection returned to normal at the very moment it ‘woke up.’ If I’m not mistaken, that should also be the reason the Nameless One’s dream was jolted awake this time.

“So I suspect that whether it is Atlantis or the First Mate, as long as one of them wakes up, the Nameless One’s dream will end.”

Chapter 600: Traces After Waking

Agatha could slip through shadows and mirrors in an instant. In the very first moment after the Nameless One's dream ended, she could return to the Vanished in the Mortal Realm and observe the changes at the border of the reflection. Duncan did not doubt her ability at all.

"As long as either Atlantis or Goathead wakes up in a jolt, the Nameless One's dream will end…" Duncan frowned slightly and thought carefully about the idea Agatha had just raised. "So that means the Nameless One's dream is actually being 'sustained' by Atlantis and Goathead together?"

"Or rather, it is their shared dream," Agatha said seriously. "That would also explain why that 'reflected Vanished' was sailing along the edge of Atlantis's dream."

Duncan did not speak for a while. He just quietly sorted through his thoughts.

After a long time, he suddenly broke the silence: "So, like you said, the reason the Nameless One's dream ended early this time was that my First Mate was startled awake. – Then what startled him awake in the first place?"

Agatha thought for a moment, then spoke, not very sure: "Maybe… it had something to do with the way you steered at the end?"

"Steered?" Duncan's brows tightened a little.

“You were very careful with your flames this time. You even planted your fire in advance into the Vanished’s reflection, leaving a safe Fire Seed on that ‘ship in the dream.’ That did keep Atlantis from being ‘frightened,’ but to that dream ship, you yourself were still an ‘outsider’,” Agatha said as she laid out her guess. “Do you remember? You forced your way into that dark, foggy space from the ‘outside’ by touching that vine in Lightwind Harbor in the Mortal Realm…”

Agatha spoke while Duncan listened. Goathead kept turning his head, looking at the captain and then at Agatha. As the most direct party involved in the whole affair, he was also the most confused one on the spot. But now he finally understood what Agatha meant. He reacted at once and hurriedly looked at Duncan: “Captain, my loyalty is beyond doubt, Captain! You are the true Master of the Vanished. Even if I really was dreaming, I would still…”

“I know, but the problem isn’t you,” Duncan cut Goathead off with a wave of his hand. “It’s a basic property of the dream – it rejects ‘intrusions.’”

He paused, then continued while he thought: “It seems that unless you are dragged directly into the inner Dreamwalking space like Vanna and the others, and become part of the Nameless One’s dream, any attempt to connect to the Nameless One’s dream from the outside will cause this kind of ‘rejection.’ It will either wake Atlantis, or wake you…”

Goathead lifted his head. Even his hard wooden face showed a strangely human, conflicted look. “Then what do we do? Captain, you know I don’t even know when I’m dreaming. I can’t control this at all…”

“You can’t control it, but this matter itself may not be that hard,” Duncan said thoughtfully. “I already have an idea… maybe I can test it tonight.”

…

Lucretia frowned as she watched Taran Ael busy himself among a huge pile of “junk” in the laboratory. After a long time, she finally could not help speaking: “You sent an apprentice to my house early in the morning to drag me here, just so I could see how messy your lab is? You’ve been ‘digging’ in that pile of tangled machines and papers for half an hour… Did I ever tell you I’m very busy?”

“Almost done, almost done. There’s a huge pile of data that was recorded automatically. I need to sort it all together…” Taran Ael lifted his head from behind a machine with a black casing. There was some unknown grease smeared into his messy hair. “I improved all this equipment myself. Now it seems there is still a lot of room for them to be more convenient… Oh, I finally got this paper box off. This is the last one…”

The elven Grand Scholar muttered as he finally squeezed out from that dizzying forest of devices. He came back to Lucretia with a big armful of printouts, paper tapes, and film. He put everything on the table and, without even lifting his head, went on: “Yes, I know you’re busy, because Lightwind Harbor is shrouded in a massive manifestation, and you and your Father are running everywhere because of it. I’m grateful for that. But we ‘locals’ should also do something, even if we still haven’t found a way to fight that ‘dream’…”

Lucretia’s expression finally grew a little more serious. She put aside her annoyance at having her work broken off and being rushed out so early. She came to the Grand Scholar’s desk and looked at the records spread across it. “So, this is your effort to fight that ‘dream’?”

“I’m not the only one working hard. Many departments, many of my colleagues, and other organizations in the city, the Knowledge Guard and the constables – we’re all trying to find a way. We may not be as strong as your Father, but clumsy methods are still methods… Yes, this part is my result.”

As Taran Ael spoke, he pulled out a long strip of paper tape from the pile and laid it in front of Lucretia.

“This is last night’s record of my vital signs and sleep.”

Lucretia’s expression changed slightly. She took the paper tape from him and looked seriously at the jumping curves and rows of punched marks on it. She noticed it was automatic data output from some kind of punch-card recorder, and there were very obvious “breaks” in the data.

“I slept here in the lab last night,” Taran Ael said as he pointed to a cot in the corner of the room. Several strange devices sat beside the cot. They looked as if they had been moved here in a hurry, their cables and pipes tangled together. “I made all this stuff before. I tried to use it to improve my sleep efficiency, to get better rest with the shortest possible sleep time… Those electrodes can record my brain activity. The curves on the tape are that. The punches next to them are my breathing records: one round hole for each breath out, one square hole for each breath in…”

“There are two clear interruptions here,” Lucretia cut him off. “Judging from the timestamps on the edge of the tape, they happened at nine o’clock last night and early this morning, which means…”

“Which means the start and end of the Nameless One’s dream,” Taran Ael took the tape back from her, found the two breaks, and held the tape up before him. “At those two times, my brain clearly had a ‘blank.’ But that’s not the biggest problem. The biggest problem is actually… between those two breaks.”

He held up the tape. On that long record, the curves and punched holes ran on in a continuous line.

“There are still records,” he pointed to the section between nine last night and this morning. “Do you see the problem, Lady Lucretia…?”

“I’m guessing you recorded more than just this,” Lucretia already understood. She spoke quickly. “Where are the other things?”

“This is the most direct one.” Taran Ael did not try to be mysterious. He turned, picked up another stack from the table – a pile of black-and-white images.

Lucretia took the stack and glanced at it. They were all photographs. The subject was the cot in the corner of the lab.

The first few photos showed Taran Ael lying on the bed. In one of them, the Grand Scholar even waved at the camera. But in the later photos, there was only an empty bed – the electrodes that had been fixed to the Grand Scholar’s head had fallen onto the pillow.

“I set up three cameras, hooked them up to timers and continuous film. Every fifteen minutes, they each took one picture of where I sleep, from three angles,” Taran Ael said. “You see? After nine o’clock, there’s no one on the bed – because that’s when the Nameless One’s dream arrived, and I had already vanished to ‘the other side’…”

The Grand Scholar spoke as he picked up the long paper tape again. He found the middle section and placed it in front of the Sea Witch.

“So here’s the question, my lady – between nine last night and five this morning, in the time when I had already vanished from the Mortal Realm, whose brain activity did this machine record?”

Lucretia drew in a slow breath and looked at the last photo in her hand.

In the empty cot in the corner of the lab, the electrodes used to read brain activity lay loosely on the pillow. The metal plates of the electrodes gleamed coldly in the lens, as if, in the silent veil of night over the whole city, they were quietly connected to ghosts unseen by the naked eye.

“The problem doesn’t end there. The Nameless One’s dream has brought us many puzzles. The strange data recorded by these devices is only one part of it,” Taran Ael’s voice pulled Lucretia out of her thoughts. The Grand Scholar walked back behind his desk, sat down, and slowly said, “The other problem is this – after Dreamwalking, where did we actually go?”

“…What do you mean?”

“I just listened to your description. When the Nameless One’s dream came, you and your Father’s followers were drawn into a strange dream. There was a vast forest in it, very similar to what I saw when I was trapped in the dream before. But… I have no memory of anything like that from last night.

“Ever since I was trapped in that dream the last time, and you pulled me out, I have never seen that forest again in my sleep.

“And it’s not only me. Everyone in this city is the same. When the Nameless One’s dream descends, everyone in the city disappears into the veil of night. But we don’t wake up in a world of dreams like you. We don’t act in that mysterious forest. We close our eyes, and when we open them again, everything is a normal new day. If you and your Father didn’t tell us, we wouldn’t even notice anything happened last night.

“So where did everyone in the city go when the veil of night descended?”

Lucretia of course did not know the answer. Taran Ael did not really expect to get an answer from this witch either. He was just talking to himself, giving himself a goal.

sunlight came through the clouds, through a tall tree outside the lab, through its thick canopy and crisscrossing branches and leaves. It scattered in mottled patches across the Grand Scholar’s desk and across the data recorded by his automatic devices.

Lucretia slowly raised her head. Her gaze followed the sunlight as she looked at the flickering shadows of leaves outside the window. Her eyes slowly widened.

“Master Taran Ael…”

“What is it, my lady?”

“…Did you always have a tree like that outside your lab?”

Chapter 601: The Growing Dream of the Nameless One

It was as if Taran Ael only became aware of what was wrong with the surroundings when Lucretia spoke. He turned his head to the window in shock. He stared for a long time at the lush tree that blocked most of the sunlight outside, then his expression changed. He quickly walked to the window.

He stood there and looked out at the tree. Doubt showed on his face. It seemed he still could not tell whether his memory or the world of the Mortal Realm in front of him was wrong. After a moment, he finally reacted and shook his head at once. “No. There was no such tree.”

The Grand Scholar spoke and pointed toward the roof of the building opposite the tree. “Remember when the Sun went out? I jumped out of this window and landed on that roof across the way. There was definitely no tree in the way then.”

Lucretia also came to the window and looked down at the base of the tree. She saw it rooted in one corner of the yard. Its position looked especially abrupt. Yet part of its roots pushed out of the soil and merged into the nearby steps and paving, as if it had been growing there for many years.

She turned back and saw the grave look on Taran Ael’s face.

“The Nameless One’s dream is still growing, my lady,” the Grand Scholar broke the silence. His tone was serious and low. “Some of its parts have already spread into the Mortal Realm in broad daylight.”

“Not just spreading, Master,” Lucretia reminded him. “If I hadn’t called your attention to it, you still wouldn’t have noticed anything strange about this tree. And even I only realized something was wrong after quite a long time. Remember? It was already there when I walked into this room.”

Taran Ael said nothing. He just looked out the window with a heavy expression. He watched the nameless tree that had taken root in the Mortal Realm, the streets and roofs beyond it, and all the parts of the city he could see.

“It’s very hard for people to notice how strange a dream is while they’re inside it… The subconscious will rationalize everything bizarre in the dream, to keep us from being scared to death by our own dreams,” the Grand Scholar finally turned back after a long silence. “The boundary between the Mortal Realm and the dream is blurring, my lady. Maybe before long, the whole of Lightwind Harbor will never wake up again. No one knows whether the city will still exist then, or in what form… We have to stop the Nameless One’s dream from growing any further.”

“Take your notes and your clear head, sort out your thoughts, and go find Governor Sara Mell. He needs help right now,” Lucretia said. “You should also go see Ted. That Truth Keeper is probably at his wits’ end too.”

“I’ll set out right away,” Taran Ael said at once. But then he could not help glancing at Lucretia. “…And you?”

This “witch” did not belong to Lightwind Harbor, but she had clearly stepped into this matter already. From what Taran Ael knew of Lucretia, she would never just stand aside at a key moment.

“I have no fewer things to do than you,” Lucretia waved her hand. The edges of her figure were already starting to blur. “The Nameless One’s dream will definitely appear again. I have to prepare for tonight – and my eyes are not only on Lightwind Harbor.”

Before Taran Ael could respond, the Witch's figure suddenly burst into a flurry of colorful paper. The paper swirled up in a sudden whirlwind and flew out of the room.

In the Harbor district, on the upper deck of the Radiant Star moored by the shore, those flying scraps of colored paper spun into the cabin and came together again as the Sea Witch's figure.

A tin sailor pieced together from scrap iron plates, bolts, and water pipes hurried up to her. Its steps creaked and squeaked as it bowed to the captain. "Mistress, Mr. Tyrian was looking for you. A call came an hour ago."

"I know. I felt it," Lucretia said quickly. "Go find a few helpers. Move all the camera apparatus from the warehouse up onto the deck and aim them at the docks of Lightwind Harbor. Set the timers. After nine o'clock tonight, record the changes in Lightwind Harbor. Go."

The tin sailor bent at once. "Yes, Mistress."

The rusty sailor left. Its squeaking footsteps faded into the distance. Lucretia frowned slightly at its retreating back and muttered under her breath: "You need oil…"

Then she shook her head, stepped to the scrying crystal, and raised her hand to light it.

After a short wait, Tyrian's figure appeared inside the scrying crystal.

"Looks like you're busy over there too," Tyrian spoke as soon as he saw her. "Is the situation in Lightwind Harbor still getting worse?"

"Today I saw a tree outside Taran Ael's lab. A tree that has 'grown' from the dream into the Mortal Realm," Lucretia said calmly. "The city is slowly falling into the Nameless One's dream. Or the Nameless One's dream is slowly surfacing from the Mortal Realm. Either way, things really are getting worse here. But tell me about your side first. You sent word so early. It seems what I was worried about has still happened."

"In the elves' residential quarter near Cemetery No. 2, there have been three reported cases of 'Sleep Sickness,'" Tyrian did not bother to build suspense. "Three elves have fallen into a sleep they can't wake from, and no other illness can be found. Their condition is very close to that Sleep Sickness case you mentioned before in the city of Pland. But this time, the psychiatrist's hypnosis and dream-intervention methods are all useless."

"hypnosis and dream intervention are useless…"

"Yes. According to the psychiatrist's report, the three elves look very much like 'the Dreamless' – you should know that special 'congenital defect' among elves," Tyrian nodded. "The psychiatrist simply can't find any entrance to the three patients' dreams. It's as if their minds have fallen into endless nothingness and already vanished from the Mortal Realm. If all methods of waking them fail, we can only rely on drip-feeding nutrients to keep their vital signs going."

Lucretia's brows slowly drew together. She stayed silent in thought.

Tyrian's voice went on: "I'm not worried about the situation right now. Three unconscious patients are not enough to put real pressure on the city. What I fear is what happens next. Frostholm is on the northern border, and elves have always liked borderlands. There are thousands of elves registered in this city, spread across all the districts. If this 'sleep' spreads quickly, the order that Frostholm finally managed to stabilize will face another shock."

"I know. But you'd better prepare yourself," Lucretia finally spoke. "Dad is trying to find the source of the Nameless One's dream, but that will take time. From what you've said, the reach of this dream is not even limited to Lightwind Harbor. It acts directly on the race called 'elves'… Some clues show it points to the elves' original faith and involves a god. You know how troublesome that is."

The corner of Tyrian's mouth twitched. After a few seconds of silence, he said very carefully: "If – and I mean if – in the worst case you really have to face an Elder God in a runaway state over there, not one of the Sun's spawn, not some replica in the Deep Sea, but a deity trapped in a race's memory… do you think Father…"

Lucretia knew what her elder brother wanted to say.

They had not worried about their Father for many years – or rather, they used to worry, but in a completely different way.

After several seconds, Lucretia finally let out a light breath. "I'll shout 'Come on!' for him, then stand far away and watch."

Tyrian: "…"

"What else should I do?" Lucretia glanced at her elder brother in the scrying crystal. "Rush up there like you and get smacked by Dad in passing? How many poisonous mushrooms would I have to eat before I went to meddle in a battle at that level?"

Tyrian's expression turned very awkward. "…I know. But can you stop bringing up how Father smacked me…"

"Then I'll bring up how you got caught by Dad watching that exotic dance."

"…Let's change the topic."

Lucretia casually ended the connection.

The Sea Witch had a pleased look on her face.

Her elder brother still looked quite energetic. That was good.

She sat in front of the scrying crystal for a while and sorted out her thoughts. Then she raised her hand and tapped on the surface of the crystal again.

“Rabby, I know you’re listening.”

A faint light stirred deep inside the scrying crystal. A moment later, Rabby’s sharp, girlish voice came from within the sphere: “Mistress~ shhh~ Rabby is moving in secret right now…”

“Looks like you’ve already found where they’re hiding,” Lucretia said quietly. “Can you tell which city it is?”

“Doesn’t really look like a city,” the light inside the scrying crystal slowly brightened and dimmed as Rabby spoke in a pleased tone. “Looking through their memories, it feels more like a ship…”

“A ship?”

“Mm~ these cultists built a ship,” Rabby said proudly, dragging out her words on purpose in a rhythm that made people want to punch something. “They built a ship, and there’s blood e~very~where~~!”

Lucretia froze for a moment. She ignored Rabby’s deliberately annoying tone. Instead, a look of pleasant surprise slowly appeared on her face.

Rabby had found one of the cultists’ sea bases.

…

Waves slammed against the hull outside the cabin. Steam pipes hissed through relief valves in the bulkheads. From the direction of the engine room came a harsh, irritating noise. A thin man sat up from his bed. His gloomy mood made his already sinister face grow even darker.

He sat on the edge of the bed in a daze for a while, then casually picked up the cup by his side and drained it in one gulp.

Last night’s operation had not gone smoothly. Their careful plan had been broken by a sudden accident. The girl who had acted together with the hound from the Abyssal Deep had suddenly burst out with a terrible, strange power from within her body and destroyed those Remnant Folk of the Sun in an instant. That was beyond anything anyone had imagined.

The choking terror brought by those wildly spreading flames still clung to the hearts of every Church comrade who had been near the scene.

The gloomy man let out a sigh, put down the cup, and rose from the bed.

Resting in his room all morning had not eased the pressure. Maybe he should go see how the others were doing.

He shook his head, cleared his thoughts while standing by the bed, then turned and walked toward the door.

But just then, something caught the corner of his eye. His steps stopped without him thinking.

He bent down and looked at the soft white mass at the foot of the bed –

“Cotton?”

Chapter 602: A Master Angler’s Awareness

Knock, knock, knock.

The sudden knocking at the door cut off the sinister man’s brief confusion when he saw that wad of cotton. He quickly drew back his gaze and turned toward the sound.

After sensing the aura at the door for a moment, he walked over and undid the padlock.

A man in a dark hooded robe stood at the door. Half his face hid in the shadows of the hood. He seemed displeased at how slowly the door had opened and asked: “Why did you take so long to open the door?”

“I am not your servant, Dumont,” the sinister man in the room said, frowning, clearly in a bad mood. “Do not take the Saint’s momentary favor too seriously.”

“Think what you like, Richard. I am only reminding you,” the Annihilator called Dumont said calmly. “Do not let fear linger in your heart for too long. You have been off ever since you pulled out of the Nameless One’s dream two days ago. Your extra caution, fear, slowness, and suspicion have already drawn the Saint’s attention. He has not shown displeasure yet, but if you stay this way, it will harm our cause…”

Before Dumont finished, the Annihilator named Richard stepped forward in a sudden move. His sinister face was almost pressed against the other man’s hood as he snapped: “You could always go in and try it yourself, instead of staying safe here in the Mortal Realm and making snide remarks!”

“I will go,” Dumont said with the same calm expression. He did not mind Richard’s hostility at all. He only took half a step back and said: “Tonight, as one of the next batch of Chosen, I will enter the Nameless One’s dream with you.”

Richard finally drew back his hostile look. He stared at Dumont in surprise and asked: “The Saint has already decided to send another group? The plan moved up?”

“What else did you expect?” Dumont spread his hands and shook his head. “What you reported has been taken very seriously. Now the Saint knows that a dangerous power hostile to us has appeared inside the Nameless One’s dream, that another faction has begun to move. Our ‘allies’ also sent word. They seem to have already fought this enemy.

“So put away your complaints and your paranoia. I know you ran into trouble in the last operation, but you are among your own. The Holy Lord’s divine blessing is upon us.”

“…The Holy Lord’s divine blessing is upon us,” Richard finally let out a quiet breath. The anger faded from his face. “I was a bit worked up just now.”

“That is understandable. After all, you were hurt in the operation before last, and in your last operation you ran into danger again. These wounds are a heavy burden on the mind,” Dumont said. He glanced over Richard’s shoulder.

Faint dust floated in the air. A translucent black chain hung in midair, and at the end of the chain, a Death-Omen Bird perched weakly on a nearby cabinet, clearly in poor shape.

“So you are sure you do not need a few more days of rest?” Dumont asked. “In your current state, even if you skip one operation, no one will complain.”

“No need,” Richard said at once, shaking his head. His eyes grew wary again. “My devotion to the Holy Lord is my greatest strength. I will have myself ready before tonight.”

“…Since you are that determined, I will pass it on to the Saint,” Dumont said with a nod. “Also, since you are not going to miss tonight’s operation, get ready. Before nightfall, go to the assembly hall. The Saint will announce some things.”

Richard met Dumont’s eyes for a moment, then nodded: “All right.”

Dumont said nothing more. He stepped back again and silently watched the door close. Only then did a faint smile appear on his always calm, indifferent face. He turned and walked deeper into the corridor of the ship.

Another hooded Annihilator, short and stocky, stepped out of the shadows at the corner of the corridor and walked alongside Dumont.

After they had gone a short distance, the cultist named Dumont finally broke the silence and said: “Richard is not in good shape. His demons are weakening, and his mind is losing its balance. Soon, the symbiotic pact will drag him into death. Fate is closing in on this fellow.”

“That is the fate he chose. The Abyssal Deep will remember his sacrifice,” the other cultist said quietly. “We will all return to that place of origin in the end. It is only a question of sooner or later… But I am really curious. Why is his mental imbalance so serious? The others who entered the Nameless One’s dream also ran into all kinds of failures. Some were even badly wounded by corruption and pulled out of the dream on the verge of death, yet their mental state is not nearly this bad…”

Dumont stopped and glanced back at the distant closed door.

After a moment, he looked away and shook his head: “Not all serious wounds are the same.”

He turned again and kept walking, speaking at an easy pace: “If you are badly hurt fighting corruption in the dream and come back from the edge of death, all you need afterward is rest and honor. But if you are beaten half to death in the dream by an underage maiden using a dog, then wake up screaming and fall out of bed—in the assembly hall, no less, with the Saint reading your memory on the spot—then you are going to need more than rest.”

When he finished, both Annihilators fell silent at the same time. They walked on slowly for a while. At last the short, stocky cultist muttered under his breath: “That is really terrifying…”

“…Yes, terrifying indeed.”

Inside the cabin, Richard sat on the bed with a dark expression, listening as the sound from the corridor faded. His face grew more twisted with every passing second.

His symbiotic pact demon, the Death-Omen Bird, lay weakly on the low cabinet beside him. Thin mist rose from the bird-shaped demon, floating in the air like a real substance and spreading in all directions, boosting its master’s senses.

But after a while, he forced down the urge to keep extending his senses. With an effort of reason, he drew back the Death-Omen Bird’s power.

He had to restore himself and his contracted demon as fast as possible. He had to prove himself in the next operation. The cycling End was drawing near. This world’s dusk would soon arrive. Whether the followers of the Abyssal Deep could win a place in the unknown age after the era of the Deep Sea would depend on what they did in that “dream.”

Proving himself in that “dream” would be the best shortcut toward eternal glory.

He let out a long breath, but his hand brushed against something soft on the bed.

It was that wad of cotton again.

Richard picked it up, puzzled, and looked around the not-so-spacious cabin, as if he were searching for where this strange cotton had come from.

Did it escape from the bedding?

He searched the room, but could not find any source of more cotton. In the end he went to the window and scratched his hair in confusion.

Why did he care so much about a wad of cotton?

The Annihilator hesitated for a moment, then shrugged. Forget it. It was only a wad of cotton. It was not worth thinking about.

He pulled open his shirt and felt along his skin until he found a zipper. He tugged it open and stuffed the cotton into the writhing flesh beneath.

A soft laugh suddenly came from the corner of the room, like a five-or six-year-old girl hiding in the wardrobe, watching her clumsy lord and giggling at him.

The Death-Omen Bird on the cabinet seemed to sense something. It lifted its head and looked in puzzlement toward the sound, then lowered its head again.

…

“Rabby found one of those cultists’ strongholds?”

In the captain’s cabin of the Radiant Star, Lucretia sat at her dressing table. ghostly green flame danced along the edge of the mirror. Candles burned quietly before the glass, and her father’s voice came from within it.

“Yes,” Lucretia nodded toward the mirror. “The stronghold is on a ship. And from the looks of it, they are not just ‘hiding’ on that ship. They have full control of a large vessel, and there are many Annihilators gathered on board. It must be an important base.”

“…That rabbit has done great work,” Duncan said in the mirror, his expression grave, his tone full of feeling. “Those cultists come and go like ghosts. They never act openly in the city-states, and they are very hard to catch. I did not expect that we would find one of their gathering points this time… Hiding on a ship really was beyond our expectations.”

“The ship is large, and it looks like it was built for dark and bloody rituals,” Lucretia said. “Rabby smelled a thick scent of blood on board, the lingering smell of many sacrificial rites. A ship like that cannot dock at a city-state like an ordinary vessel. The aura left by dark rituals cannot fool the church, so there must be a supply port behind it…”

As Lucretia laid out her thoughts, Duncan in the mirror fell into deep thought. After a while, he suddenly asked: “Is Rabby still hidden on the ship? Will it be discovered?”

“It is very good at hiding. Unless it goes out of its way to face some of the higher-ranking cultists head-on, like that ‘Saint,’ it will not be exposed under normal conditions,” Lucretia said. “It comes from the Shadows of the Spirit Realm and can hide in people’s emotions and senses. On that ship, the entire place is full of negative aura. That environment itself is its best cover.”

“Good,” Duncan nodded. “Let Rabby keep hiding. Do not let it contact that ‘Saint.’ Have it gather as much information as possible.”

His original plan had been to have Rabby build a mirror ritual as soon as it found the cultists' hideout so that he could "descend" to the scene in person. Then, before those cultists all died, he would rush to teleport his followers over, then beat those cultists up. Before their symbiotic pact demons could kill themselves, he would keep knocking them out and see how many he could capture in the end.

The whole plan was simple and efficient, and Vanna had strongly approved it.

But now it seemed that the "big fish" Rabby had found was even bigger than anyone had expected. Naturally, he could not solve the problem in such a simple and rough way.

As a master angler, he had to let the line out a little farther.

Chapter 603: Test

Lucretia fully agreed with Duncan's idea of "letting the line out to catch a big fish." In fact, from the start she had not been very keen on the simple, rough plan that Father and Vanna had come up with.

It was not that she had any grudge against the Athlete. Mainly, she felt that with how sensitive and afraid Dog was of the spirit flame, and how quickly Abyssal demons killed themselves, they might not catch a single living cultist if they really used such a crude approach…

"Those cultists will hold a gathering before nightfall. I will have Rabby find a way to get some information," Lucretia said as she thought aloud. "Right now, the biggest problem is that there is a so-called 'Saint' on that ship. That means Rabby can only 'observe.' Any active move could be noticed by that Saint."

"A Saint?" Duncan sounded curious. "I know about the Saints of the Four Gods. I have a high opinion of Vanna's fighting ability. But what is the deal with the Oblivion Church's Saints?"

His question made sense. The Saints of the Four Gods were people favored by their deities. Their main trait was not great fighting power—though most Saints could fight—but their ability to communicate with their gods. Ordinary priests needed very complex rituals and certain prices to pay before they could hear a few whispers from their deities. Saints, on the other hand, almost needed no preparation. Sometimes a prayer in their heart was enough to let them talk with their gods. In more extreme cases, if a Saint was in danger, their deity would even find a way to contact them first, to give warning or guidance.

Put simply, the gods pampered them like their own children.

But the Annihilators' "Saints" could not be like that at all. Duncan knew well the state of the Abyssal Lord and the Lord's attitude toward those so-called "followers." From that one line—"catch a few Annihilators and see what happens"—Duncan was sure of one thing. If one of those cultists ever became a "Saint" who could truly hear their god's will, they would probably be "called home" the very day they were promoted—and then dragged into the Deep Sea of the Abyssal Deep by their "Lord" and beaten again and again.

"Annihilators see Abyssal demons as the purest beings, the ones closest to the original Blueprint, so they keep using demonic power to change themselves and get closer to that Blueprint. In this process, they gain greater power," Lucretia explained. "I heard Vanna talk about this. In Frostholm, she once saw high-ranking Oblivion priests who had almost fused with Abyssal demons through symbiotic pacts. And the so-called 'Saints' go a step further.

"There is not much human left in them. They look more like demons than humans. They move like Abyssal demons and can draw power straight from the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea. Aside from keeping a human way of thinking, they are basically a kind of 'Abyssal Deep creature.' These Oblivion 'Saints' are almost able to enter the Abyssal Deep and the Deep Sea as freely as demons do—that so-called 'eternal paradise.' Perhaps it is only the last bit of humanity in them that still chains them to the Mortal Realm.

"Annihilators have no true deity watching over them, but through contracts with demons, they can still gain great power. Their 'Saints' are the same.

Those freaks are powerful, strong-willed, and know countless forbidden truths about corruption. If they faced each other head-on… Rabby would not be a match for those Saints."

Duncan listened with interest to Lucretia's "little-known trivia," then suddenly asked: "So how do they compare with Vanna?"

Lucretia froze, her expression turning a bit odd as she thought it over.

After a long pause, she finally said: "…Miss Vanna's fighting power is quite… 'special' even among Saints. I think it is hard to compare."

Duncan nodded in understanding: "All right, I see."

After a brief pause, Lucretia spoke again: "There are some other developments."

Duncan's voice came from the mirror: "Go on."

Lucretia organized her words: "Tyrian sent a message. Three cases of 'Sleep Sickness' have appeared in the city-state of Frostholm. The patients are Elves. Their symptoms are close to…"

She had only spoken half a sentence when the voice from the mirror cut in: "The same kind of coma as that Elf maiden Flora from Pland and as Taran Ael back then, right? But this time, hypnosis and dreamwalking by psychiatrists have both failed. Their dreams are like empty holes, and their minds are lost inside those holes."

Lucretia stared at the mirror in surprise: "How did you… the message from Pland?!"

Then she suddenly understood.

"Right before I contacted you," Duncan nodded in the mirror, "Heidi reported four such patients. They are also Elves, also in an endless sleep. And if things are as I suspect, these are not the only two city-states with problems. Maybe tomorrow, maybe even later today, similar reports will reach Lightwind Harbor from other city-states."

Lucretia frowned and listened. After a long moment, she blinked, remembering the ancient tales Taran Ael had once told. She murmured as if to herself: "All Elves… are the fruit and seeds of Atlantis…"

"Legends are the projection of the Mortal Realm. Some parts of those stories are true," Duncan said slowly. "Atlantis's power holds the Elf race together. It gives them a hive-like bond. On the level of the spirit, it is possible that all Elves are one whole.

"This trait has lain dormant for a long time, but now… the Nameless One's dream has awakened their link."

"Hive… one whole in spirit…" Lucretia repeated Duncan's words without thinking. The description made her frown, but she could not find any phrase more fitting. "So the Nameless One's dream is spreading among the Elves, and Lightwind Harbor was only the first place where it broke out?"

"I call it the 'Primordial Blast Point,' the very first point of outbreak," Duncan said softly. "And now the question is—why did this place become the Primordial Blast Point? What caused the Nameless One's dream to erupt?"

Why?

Lucretia blinked in shock. While she was still dazed, Duncan's voice continued from the mirror:

"Before the Nameless One's dream broke out, two things happened. First, the Sun went out. The whole Boundless Sea fell into darkness. Apart from Pland, Frostholm, and Lightwind Harbor, every other city-state lost twelve hours of time. Second… the Vanished crossed the 'vanished sea' and came to the waters near Lightwind Harbor."

Lucretia understood what Father meant at once.

She spoke without thinking: “So the Sun’s extinction activated the Nameless One’s dream hidden in the Elf race, and the approach of the Vanished… made Lightwind Harbor the ‘Primordial Blast Point’…”

“The first part was my guess from the start,” Duncan said with a nod. “The second part is a possibility that only just occurred to me.”

